We are told that Air Canada is operating as a rudderless ship. I should like to know more about the operation of the CNR and Air Canada, but the minister and the government have denied the members of the House an opportunity to examine the officials of these two large Crown corporations. We wonder why the minister has denied the members of the House an opportunity to examine the annual accounts for the years 1971 and 1972. We wonder why there has been a refusal to come clean in respect of the Air Canada financing bill. We wonder why we have not been able to get the management side of the story. If we did, perhaps we would all be in a much better position to deal in a more objective way with the total impact of this particular dispute.

We note that the net income of the Canadian railways, as reported by Statistics Canada, has more than doubled in the first four months of 1973. Perhaps this may have some bearing on the kind of settlement to which the non-ops are entitled.

The members of this House have been denied an opportunity to cross-examine the officials of these institutions. We would also like to know what has happened in respect of the promised freight rate freeze that had been alluded to by the minister in his outburst at the Western Economic Opportunities Conference. These are some of the answers we seek.

I see you are on the edge of your seat, Mr. Chairman, and therefore I shall be very brief. In my opinion parliament and the people of Canada have been cheated by this minister who has refused to allow these two Crown corporations, each of which provides an essential service, to be scrutinized by a parliamentary committee.

It is for that reason that we are somewhat suspicious, and that we lay the result of this strike primarily on the doorstep of this government. It is mainly due to the government's incompetence and the devious manner in which it has handled transportation matters in this country.

Mr. Rodriguez: Mr. Chairman, I am a neophyte in the House and I as a newcomer here and as a spectator of this sport I have listened, read and tried to find out what is going on. I also happen to have a very large group of non ops and running tradesmen on railroads in my riding. So I decided to take a look at Hansard of the period when similar legislation was introduced in the House.

After reading Hansard for August 29, 1966 and after listening to the speeches that have been made in the House yesterday and today, I must say that I have never heard such phoney, hollow speeches, and such verbiage as I have heard thrown around here by the Liberals and Conservatives. I want to give an instance of this. The Conservatives have been clamouring for the return of the workers to their jobs since the rotating strikes started. When I look back at Hansard for August 29, 1966, I see that the former leader of that party, the right hon. member for Prince Albert, as recorded at page 7733 of Hansard, had the following to say:

I recall very well that debate in 1950.

He was referring to similar legislation in 1950, the first instance of compulsory arbitration imposed by parliament on the railway workers. He went on to say:

The attitude then taken by the Conservative party was that in so far as compulsory arbitration was concerned the party was against it, and members of this party voted accordingly when a vote took place on the motion made by the then prime minister.

So it seems that the Conservative party had taken a position against compulsory arbitration. I hear them in the House today advocating that. They have advocated it since July 26, 1973, when the rotating strikes started.

I have listened to my leader. He said that every court should have a jester. I suppose every parliament should have a Pontius Pilate. I think it is remarkable that the Minister of Transport should tell members in the House that we are not here to solve the dispute, we are here to solve the emergency, and that we are not all cognizant of the material, the information, and the statistics involved in this dispute.

Why are we elected by the people of Canada if we are not to inform ourselves and become knowledgeable of the kind of legislation that we are expected to debate and to pass? I suggest to you that members of the House are not now familiar with the demands of the non-ops and the arguments of the companies, which have been few and far between because the companies have not negotiated fairly and in good faith. Surely then members are not justified in sitting in the House if they have not informed themselves on those matters. They should have done their homework, and it is obvious that they have not.

The hon. member for Verdun made a comparison, which I found funny, between the salary of an engineer on the railroad and that of his secretary. He said that she was making $1,800 less than the engineer. I suggest that if he had any sort of social conscience he should have organized the secretaries so that they would not be making $1,800 less than the organized workers.

I was glad to hear the Minister of Transport this morning. Indeed he is eloquent, and I would compare him in many ways with the hon. member for Verdun because in fact they are the only two members sitting on that side of the House who have any knowledge of or sympathy for the working people of this country. It is revealing indeed that the Minister of Transport was called upon by the Liberals to bail them out, and obviously the Conservatives in this particular instance will also be bailed out by that speech in which the minister said that we are not in a position to make a decision. It seems to me that once parliament took the option of bringing in legislation to put the workers back to work to end the emergency, the onus is on parliament to make sure that the emergency is ended and that the workers have a fair and just wage on which to live.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Rodriguez: I do not call that politicking because I have listened to members on that side of the House, and to the Liberal members in my area. Incidentally, there are no Conservatives in northern Ontario. I have listened to the Liberals stand up before the non-ops in the last three or four days and tell them: "We agree that what you are asking is fair and just. We agree with your wage demands. They are not out of line. We agree with your desire for job security. It is what every other worker in industry has. You are not asking for anything that is out of line".

Now they come and support a bill which gives the workers what the company offered last Monday, and which the union turned down. I find that false because at election time both the Tories and the Liberals stood up and pretended that they were the friends of the workers. If they are the friends of the workers, why do they not on this occasion, instead of saying all these words which are empty and hollow, accept the Weldon report and give the workers a fair and just settlement? Why do they engage in the parrying of empty, fancy words back and forth? It seems to me that it is time the workers realized that the two old line parties are closely allied with business and will never bring in a decision in favour of the workers.

An hon. Member: What about British Columbia?

Mr. Rodriguez: This has been so ever since 1950. I know you are upset about this. The hon. member for Peel South is very upset. I can understand the fact that he is upset because I am sure the workers will note how he and his colleagues voted last night, and they will note how they will vote on our amendments. I hope they will carry the message to other workers throughout the highly industrialized areas such as the cities of Hamilton and Windsor so that the workers know how the Conservatives and Liberals are voting when it comes to a crunch between management and workers.

The Minister of Labour in his press release on August 30 stated in his preamble regarding the strike:

> This strike . . . has resulted in widespread economic loss to the extent that the welfare of the nation has become imperilled.
> As the Prime Minister has indicated, it is essential to the interests of the people of Canada, and the welfare of our nation, that railway operations be resumed immediately.

The minister echoes what was said in 1966 and before that in 1950.

• (1700)

Indeed, this whole scenario which is now unfolding has been played before. One has only to pick up the Hansard of 1966 and read the same script again. It is interesting to note that one year it is the Liberals who are imposing compulsory arbitration and the Tories who are screaming against it, and then it is the Tories who are pushing compulsory arbitration down the throats of the workers while the Liberals slither into the role of pretended opposition. It is precisely this kind of situation which demonstrates that there is absolutely no difference between these two groups. They are identical in all but name, and I strongly suspect that the only reason the members on both sides of the House have not merged is that they enjoy having someone who agrees to argue with them.

An hon. Member: Let's talk about British Columbia.

Mr. Rodriguez: There is no strike going on in British Columbia at the moment.

Let us get back to the Minister of Labour's statement. He stated that the welfare of the nation is in peril. In the last few weeks we have been told that the economy is suffering and the general public is suffering. This, obviously, is true. We are told that the government must legislate the workers back to work, because they are essential. Actually, I have never heard the words "essential service" used so often as in the last two days. If they are so essential, and it seems that they only become essential when they remove their services from their employers, why, in heaven's name, are they not given a fair wage and job security?

Members here enjoy a fair wage but do not enjoy security. Do hon. members think of these essential workers between contracts? No. When the non-ops are doing their job day after day, year after year, do the two old time parties ever pause to wonder if these essential workers have enough money to feed and shelter their families and keep up with the rising cost of living, which has run amok in this country? I doubt it.

The simplistic solution of wage and price controls brings no guarantees for workers earning poor wages. Do the two parties ever think about the growing insecurity which these essential workers face through the ever-increasing encroachment of technology on their jobs. I think not. And I do not believe for a minute that parliament has been recalled because the Liberals are concerned about the welfare of the nation or the interests of the Canadian people. After all, it was not so long ago that the Minister of Finance sauntered out of his summer retreat to announce to an angry and concerned public that prices are hurting, but that's not enough to recall parliament. And this is where deception of the most gross and despicable nature is being perpetrated on the Canadian people. The Liberals name the villain, act out a little parliamentary voodoo, and then declare the demon exorcised.

Yesterday, Mr. Chairman, we observed a demonstration by the rail workers. Those rail workers have been cast in the same role over the years, albeit reluctantly. They know they have always been screwed by the government and they know they are about to be screwed again. They know why they were demonstrating outside the House of Commons. They know why we are here. They were here because they believed that the members of parliament who are in this House, and who are their representatives, are not going to give them a fair settlement, and they were correct. They knew the situation, knew what they were to be offered, and they were absolutely correct.

I say that when this government exercises its prerogative to recall parliament and get the workers back to work, back to their jobs, the responsibility rests with the government to make absolutely certain that those workers receive a just settlement. This government is not and should not be in the business of strike breaking, and it should not be in servitude to the companies.

An hon. Member: What would you do?

Mr. Rodriguez: We would give the workers a just and decent wage, so that they could keep up with the increasing cost of living. It is clear that the rail workers are only asking for what is fair and just. Their demands clearly are not exorbitant.

Surely no member in this House can say that what these men are asking is exorbitant and inflationary. Indeed, it is the policies of provincial Tories and federal Liberals which have led to the inflationary spiral which has put these men behind the eight ball. It is obvious that their fringe benefit packages cannot begin to approach those of workers in other comparable industries, and I could give you comparisons.

In the Sudbury area the major employers are Inco and Falconbridge. The union employees of those two large companies have worked out a medical and dental plan, and there is a company pension. The non-ops do not have those things. The average wage of the Inco or Falconbridge workers is $5.75 per hour. I think the non ops get $3.54 per hour. On the other hand the stores in the area that serve the workers of Inco and Falconbridge base their prices on the high wages, and not on the average wage of $3.54 paid to the non-ops.

These men have their backs to the wall. If you think that this legislation will end the emergency on the railways, you have another think coming, because the bookings off will continue, as will the harassment, and members here will have contributed to the broken spirit of the railroad workers. As I said, the fringe benefit packages of these workers cannot begin to approach the benefits of workers in comparable industries. Nor can it be said that they do not deserve sick leave and pension plan improvements.

It is true that the non-ops are in jeopardy because of advancing technology, and it is only fair that they have some provision for security. It is also true that the rail workers have been more than patient with the companies and the government. It has been 19 months since the last wage increase was granted. So, I think they have been more than patient. Further, they have no strike benefits. It has also become evident that the companies have not bargained in good faitn. Actually, the deputy minister went on television the other night and said that the companies have not bargained in good faith.

I say, let us string the companies, so that they will always bargain in good faith in the future and perhaps we will not need to be unfair to the workers.

How can the government come up with such an objectionable, useless mess of nothing as Bill C-217? This bill offers the workers nothing. This bill attempts to give the workers exactly what they had turned down in negotiations, because they knew it was not sufficient. It waxes strange indeed that this government not only permits but encourages Canadian National railways, which belongs to the working people of this country, to operate as badly as a private corporation, instead of setting a standard for rail workers, instead of leading the way for fair and just and respectable settlements in Canada. Instead, there has been collusion, and the companies have brought forward this mess of pottage that we see reflected in Bill C-217.

Do the Liberals honestly think that this bill will bring peace and harmony to the labour situation? Where have they been for the last nine months. Workers have been booking off. I raised the issue in this House as early as the beginning of July, and the bookings off had been taking place for the previous three months. I predict, Mr. Chairman, that this unrest on the railroads will continue. The rail workers have been displaying dissatisfaction over the last nine months with the offers the companies have been making. They have been fed up with the fact that after nine months they have no contract. Where were the Liberals during those selective strikes? What were they doing during the rail disruptions and the bookings off?

If the Department of Labour was aware that the companies were not bargaining in good faith, as apparently they were not, why did the department not step in and make sure that the companies demonstrated good faith in bargaining?

It has been stated that the non-ops will not accept this legislation. If this becomes a fact then I contend that the responsibility for this mess lies smack on the doorstep of the Department of Labour and the Liberal cabinet. The history of settlements forced on the workers, at times when Liberals or Tories were in charge of legislation to put workers back to work, might be compared with putting Dracula in charge of the Red Cross blood banks!

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Rodriguez: If this government's Minister have become so locked in to the protection of the corporate welfare bums of this country that they cannot see beyond their noses, then they must shoulder the responsibility for the repercussions. It is not the duty of the non-operating rail workers to continue to subsidize the economy. Why should the rest of the economy ride on the backs of the railroad workers? But Mr. Chairman—

The Assistant Deputy Chairman: Order please. I regret to interrupt the hon. member but his time has expired. The hon. member for Ottawa West.

Mr. Reilly: Mr. Chairman I shall try to follow the advice of the hon. member for Skeena who admonished us earlier to keep our remarks brief and then proceeded to use every minute of the time allotted to him. I can tell you—

Mr. Howard: You should tell the truth for a change. I know it is a shock to you, but you should.

Mr. Reilly: Well, Frank, as I recall you were cut off.

Mr. Howard: Try to be truthful.

Mr. Reilly: I want to tell you, Mr. Chairman, that I will support the amendments proposed by my leader.

An hon. Member: Which one?

Mr. Reilly: All of them.

An hon. Member: Which leader?

Mr. Reilly: I see the hon. gentlemen opposite have—well, perhaps I should not say it.

An hon. Member: Go ahead.

Mr. Reilly: Mr. Chairman, earlier today we heard from the hon. member for Verdun who, as a result of what I think is his quite humanitarian approach to the problems of the working man, was dispossessed and practically disowned by his own party. We also heard from the Minister of Transport, a man for whom I have the most profound regard. In the early 1950's when the so-called quiet revolution was getting under way in Quebec he virtually put his life on the line for the very workers he is now talking about. Unfortunately, I cannot speak as well of the present Minister of Labour who has contrived to throw the entire collective bargaining process into such a shambles that management and labour may never recover from it.

We cannot force people back to work without giving them a decent break, but even though I hate the idea of forcing people back to work when they want to strike, I submit there is no alternative. The minister knows that, and all members of this House know it. Even the hon. member who spoke a few minutes ago knows that.

We cannot allow the strike to go on, but there does not appear to be any way of solving it short of legislation. The minister, and anyone who has had experience with labour management, as I have, know that a strike has never produced anything worthwhile at all unless it is a strike for recognition. We have to provide a means by which these men and women can go back to work and resolve their disputes with their employers in a way which will not disrupt the lives of the people of this country. I believe that the body of the bill plus the amendments that we have before us now constitute the most acceptable way of accomplishing that aim. I urge all hon. members to vote for the bill, as I shall. As I promised, Mr. Chairman, I did not use all my time. Thank you.

[Translation]

Mr. Dionne: Mr. Chairman, we have now before us a bill entitled: "An Act to provide for the resumption and continuance of operations of railways and for the settlement of the disputes with respect to terms and conditions of employment between railway companies and their employees."

The proposed wage adjustments are based on the conciliation report submitted in July.

The minister will not succeed in making us believe that he has made an effort. Those proposals have already been made. I recognize that many other seasonal, part-time or often unemployed workers would appreciate the opportunity of obtaining a steady job under those circumstances, but it does not satisfactorily settle the problem of railway employees.

With a patched-up labour legislation, this government has favoured the spreading of a type of contagious disease that we could call the strike disease, and what is unfortunate is that it is spreading at such a rate that we ought to change as soon as possible this legislation so as to avoid this multiplication of strikes with all the inconveniences involved: loss of pay, disorganization of the economic situation, not to mention disgraceful scenes such as we have seen yesterday. Altogether, the legislation will bring a slight improvement in conditions existing before the strike but it must be possible to set pay rates more in keeping with the workers' demands.

Furthermore, there are several other factors besides the salary to be considered and that the legislation does not even refer to.

No doubt some would be ready to point out that negotiations will continue. It has been said in this house today that there were no negotiations, but I see that the negotiations have failed. Therefore, there should be something done which at least looks like negotiations and which would satisfy the demands of the workers.

There are other points, some of which have been discussed, which could be solved later. But if we base ourselves on previous developments, the railway employees have not received much satisfaction. There are important factors to consider in setting the working conditions of an employee. It must be taken into account that the employee is a human being and not a machine and that he wants security and stability. Generally he also wants the place where he works to be well organized and well managed. It is normal that he be treated fairly. He also wants to be informed on the financial situation of the firm, so that he may be sure that he will receive a fair income. These are basic realities inherent to the human condition.

I hope that this legislation providing for a return to work will be modified and applied in all fairness by all parties and that it will respect all legitimate opinions when the time comes to solve a dispute over working conditions. I remind you once more that there are many other things to consider besides salaries.

I seconded, at the beginning of the session yesterday, a motion by my colleagues the hon. member for Rimouski (Mr. Allard) asking for a detailed inquiry on the administration of the Canadian National Railways; I urge once again that such an inquiry be undertaken. Without a doubt, the people would better understand the causes of misunderstanding. A complete revision of the pension plan would enable us to see that the benefits could be shared more equitably amongst the employees.

We might be surprised to find out the cost of maintaining luxurious trains and organizing picnic cars or palaces on wheels. It might be wise to look into the salaries of some directors, starting with the president who earns $75,000 a year, and a whole series of assistants and deputy-assistants several of whom, it seems to me, are more favorites of the regime than rail transport experts. Judging from the railway timetables, we can better understand the claims of the railway employees.

We are now going through a sufficiently perturbed evolutionary stage in union movements to make the supporters of collective bargaining pause and think things over. Succeeding disputes leading to numerous strikes of all kinds certainly do not reflect mutual agreement.

Supporters of today's strike will find reasons to justify their right to strike tomorrow. An endless renewal leads us into adventures without solution and helps to maintain, to the detriment of the interested parties, an atmosphere of collective disagreement, instead of fostering the agreement hoped for by the majority.

I have already mentioned on various occasions that I consider strikes as en evil that is sometimes necessary and that must be kept from spreading. Any serious observer will admit that unions were born to meet a need and that need continues to exist.

I assumed for over ten years the duties of president of a union local and I have an excellent recollection of labour-management relations. However, I find it abnormal to conclude that strikes are the best solution to right the discomforts that emerge in such relations. One must not lack imagination to the point of thinking that a whole series of mistakes can be corrected by setting out to make more mistakes. Those concerned should rather pursue the line of reason and act as adults. In a democratic country everyone has a right to express his views and may even wish to have them respected. However, he will have to have enough understanding for those of others.

The important thing is to pinpoint the many causes of misunderstanding and set the bearings of labour legislation towards the protection of the rights of the weak, the small, the poor, mainly those who need protection the most.

A brief summary of the causes of conflict could undoubtedly provide grounds for reflection for those who really care about improving the situation: the steady increase in the cost of living through the multiplication of taxes, rates, control boards, commissions, inquiries, etc. Add to that the complexity of laws which result in lengthy and costly legal procedures and you will better understand the reasons which contribute to building up a striking mentality about which both management and workers are concerned.

It is rather strange to see some propensity for organizing small union battles on various fronts. We now have a situation of mutual misunderstanding. And why in most cases? To obtain salary increases which are immediately reduced by increases in product prices and taxes of all sorts.

There are fights to obtain true salary increases, the missing dollars without thinking too much about who makes them, who controls them and who determine their value.

What is the use of earning $4. or $5. an hour, if a dollar is only worth 50 cents or less. This is a matter of wealth and purchasing power distribution.

Labour agreements were negotiated in a truly harmonious atmosphere a few years ago. Things have changed since then: strikes come first and bargaining follows which is too often the case. Although some of the claims are really legitimate, there has been lately a certain amount of irresponsibility which is not conducive to the spirit of understanding which ought to exist during bargaining, through illegal strikes if necessary, while trying to exert pressure on the employers at the same time.

I would say, however, that a good many employers and the government as well have not set too good an example in this regard, allowing considerable delays in negociations and thus aggravating the position of their employees for months. Such is the situation with the railway workers.

On two occasions, employees have returned to work hoping for an improvement in their working conditions, but they never obtained what they had been expecting.

Since Parliament has now reconvened to put an end to the railway strike, why not take this opportunity to assure workers—not only those on the railways, but all those whose working conditions come under federal jurisdiction and most of whom are quite understanding—through adequate legislation, of decent working conditions, in order to avoid the continuous conflicts we are witnessing now?

We often find that private enterprises and some administrators of public services make a lot of fuss over the violence which often erupts during disputes, but these people rarely mention the mental and physical suffering which thousands of workers must bear, year after year, to earn a living in difficult and often painful circumstances. A well-balanced legislation should aim at eliminating abuses of this kind. Labour legislation should be written in a clear style to enable union leaders and workers to understand their scope without calling too often on the services of lawyers who apparently do not need to go on strike to increase their fees.

Union dues could be used more effectively to help individual members in difficult circumstances through illness or accidents, instead of paying for the costs of slow and expensive procedures or finance struggles pitting unions against unions which foster nothing but animosity between them.

Let all legislators draw from the same inspiring sources the salary adjustment grounds that were brought forward at the time of the pay increase for ministers, members of Parliament, senators, judges and some senior officials and we shall thus avoid useless and harmful strikes.

The right to live is derived from a natural right and that right must be recognized long before the right to strike or the right to exaggerated profits and steps should be taken by legislators to provide every one first of all with the right to live. We should have enough clearsightedness to organize an intelligent distribution system for existing goods without resorting to strike when the vast majority of citizens wish to work.

In the present case and in order to promulgate a balanced legislation, we should create a committee secure from undue influences, made up of experienced people, well informed about labour and management problems, including a few experts qualified to provide accurate data on the changes in the cost of living index and determine the bases of wages in various industries, considering all relevant factors whenever a normal production of goods or services is required.

In public services, an arbitration court made up of qualified labour and management representatives should apply a salary adjustment mechanism based on the cost of living index and check-up should be made every six months. Members of such a court should also assume the responsibility of ruling on employee grievances concerning working conditions, and that within a maximum of ten days, and organize a secret ballot system enabling employees to vote freely for the union of their choice and the decisions that should be made.

Let us stop thinking in terms of compulsion when it comes to contributions or arbitration and let us consider rather a fair and just distribution of the firm's profits and of the workers' salaries and peace shall prevail in relations between employers and employees; the solution will not come without some effort, but the current situation compels us to take the proper means, and without delay.

It is imperative to restore the equivalence of the purchasing power on the basis of the needs of individuals and the value of the wealth, considering that physical work tends to be replaced by machines.

The worker is in search of means to live and earn the living of his family; let him be treated in fairness so that he may not have to wander around holding a sign to demand the right to enjoy rights and to bargain for agreements which often become disagreements.

● (1730)

[English]

Mr. Turner (London East): Mr. Chairman, I want first of all to extend my good wishes to the Minister of Labour.

None of us in this House envies him the task with which he has been confronted during the past three weeks. He has toiled long and hard and worked night and day trying all avenues to secure a negotiated settlement of the non-operating workers dispute. No one in this nation can say that the minister shirked his duties throughout this difficult period.

Having worked on the railroad for 27 years, I believe I am very close to railroading. I cannot, therefore, escape taking a very close interest in this dispute, although I pledge to you, Mr. Chairman, that I will be as fair and as unbiased as I can.

The legislation which has been presented to the House represents a starting point from which continued collective bargaining, mediation or binding arbitration can begin. The employees of the railroads will have a lump sum of retroactive pay in their pockets at an early date. I am sure that the negotiations which take place will consider the allegation that the railway workers' wages in past years have fallen below the wages being earned by organized labour in general, working in other industries across this country. I am also quite sure the negotiations will include a long, hard look at the increases in the cost of living which have occurred in Canada in recent months.

The question of job security is another very important consideration which must be given attention in future talks. This item is exceedingly important to the workers' peace of mind and sense of well-being. The announcement which the Minister of Labour made, setting forth an industrial inquiry commission, is essential to the attainment of a good settlement. The costing of pensions has remained central to the negotiations which have transpired. Further, they represent the salary on which one day the employees and their families will have to live.

We have been told for many years that the railways are essential to the well-being of the nation and her people. This fact has once again been proven through the last few weeks, especially during the days of the total shutdown. It is, therefore, also essential that the members of this parliament remember that the railway workers are essential people in our economy and must have the right to a decent living wage, good working conditions, reasonable pensions, and job security.

I think that every member must realize that every hour during which the Canadian railroads remain paralysed worsens the tragedy which is affecting millions of our citizens. Right at this moment more than 1,200 men, women and children are stranded on Cape Breton Island, desperate for transportation to Newfoundland. The establishment of immediate ferry services between North Sydney and Newfoundland must be considered an absolute priority. Crews must be provided to man ferry services immediately. The amount of mental suffering, agony and anguish is already beyond belief.

Western farmers must have their grain shipped to markets throughout Canada and internationally. Interruption of essential transportation links with our island provinces and with Vancouver Island has serious implications. Workers all across the nation are being laid off and great financial losses are bound to result.

All the railway workers realize the hardships their strike is causing. They also know that in terms of dollars per week they do not take home enough money. These workers are responsible people who are only looking for a fair and just settlement without the use of the only weapon which they usually have, that of the strike. Having talked to hundreds of workers, I am convinced that the men and women involved do not like the idea of a strike. All they want is the right to work and earn a decent living wage so they can maintain their homes and raise their families at a decent standard of living.

At the present wage level, I am told, many rail workers do not even qualify for a National Housing Act loan. Mr. Chairman, it is unthinkable that in this great country of Canada many employees in an essential service cannot afford to own the roof over their heads. This is what married life is all about: this is the dream—the right to work hard to save a down payment, followed by the purchase of a home of a married couple's choice and then, again through the process of hard work, to pay for the house and also to make improvement to it, all the while making monthly payments.

I must say that the railway workers are all hard working, responsible citizens. During the war years many of them responded to the call of their king and country so that our way of life would not fall and our right to freedom would be maintained. Also at this time all the railroad unions agreed not to strike. The membership of the non-operating unions, shopcrafts and running trade unions agreed to work longer hours. These were all very patriotic gestures, but since the war all these good deeds have been forgotten. The workers have fallen behind other workers in wages as well as working conditions. Mr. Chairman, these workers, all solid citizens, are working for wages in the lower brackets. I think it has to be said that this group of workers has been very patient since last November and they have waited a long time. I know these men are law-abiding people.

For a moment I would like to imagine something. What I would pretend at this juncture is that I am an arbitrator. What I will relate to you is the way in which I would approach these talks as an arbitrator. First, however, we must note that I am certainly no arbitrator. I am one of the little men. I was one of the men who worked for these meagre wages. I am not a mediator or arbitrator who receives $50 per hour or $250 or $300 a day for the sole purpose of recommending what workers should receive in terms of benefits. However, it does raise the point that I may be in the wrong business.

Maybe, indeed, we should all take a look at the field of labour relations. At any rate, given that I were an arbitrator, I would approach the wage situation as follows. I would work on the principle that the workers' wages should in some way reflect the annual growth in the company and in the economy. I know quite well the growth which has been achieved in our gross national product. I know equally well the growth in revenue experienced by both CNR and CPR. I am also quite aware of the subsidies which are provided to them.

As an arbitrator, and being conversant with management and labour's position in this case, I feel that many of the workers' requests are not unreasonable. The average wage of non-operating railway workers is $3.54 per hour. That is $141.60 per week, with a take-home pay in the neighbourhood of $100 per week for the employee. Some take home a little more and some take home a little less. But you do not need a BA, an MA or a PhD to know that workers who have families to support cannot make ends meet on the wages they are presently receiving. We must remember that $3.54 per hour is the average. Some of the employees work at rates of pay as low as $2.32 an hour. The welders, steel bridge gangs and bridge tenders work for around $4 per hour. If the non-operating workers are so essential, surely they should be compensated for their labours.

As an arbitrator, I would also remember that members of these unions also form part of the general public and the public interest, a phrase members of the opposition parties have bandied about. They are taxpayers, and also heavy consumers. We must never fail to remind ourselves that in our society today, as always, it is the working person whose purchases make the wheels of industry turn in this country. Thus, the money spent by millions of workers filters down to the transportation industry through the hauling of goods that these workers help to produce.

Given the state of affairs I have outlined, if I were an arbitrator I would certainly look favourably upon increasing the men's salaries above that which is being sought as a floor in this bill. However, in saying that I must repeat my earlier comment that I strongly believe the temporary measures and the minimum increase in retroactive pay placed before this parliament represent a fair process through which the railway workers can get a better deal.

In arriving at an exact figure as to what wages should be, definite consideration must be given to the industrial inquiry commission's report on the exact cost of the pension package. The arbitrator will also have to take into account increases in the cost of living. This is how I would act if I were an arbitrator and this dispute were put before me.

I should like to make one point perfectly clear at this time. I feel the bill before us is the tool by which a fair and just settlement can be reached. This bill should facilitate a settlement which is just and fair for the worker. Strikes are not the answer to labour disputes. Both sides, labour and management, in addition to the general public, suffer. If we can send men to the moon, surely we have men in this democratic society of ours who can sit down and come up with an idea that is fair and just to both sides to a labour dispute, so that we can eliminate the problems facing the most precious and valuable asset this country has—its working people.

Mr. Fraser: Mr. Chairman, I will be brief. I had hoped the Minister of Labour would be in the chamber at this time as I should like to ask him a question. As he is not here, I will address it to his parliamentary secretary. Before coming to the question I should like to say that, speaking on behalf of the non-operating workers in the area of my home in British Columbia, there is no question whatsoever that these workers are badly behind in terms of wages paid to people performing the same kind of work outside the railway trades.

I will give some examples because the disparity may be greater for those people in British Columbia than in other parts of the country, and I recognize the arguments used that wage settlements have to be on a national scale and applied equally everywhere. All hon. members ought to realize, when considering this question, that there are regional disparities and that an award that may be sufficient in one area is not necessarily sufficient in a high-cost area. This is a problem somebody will have to look at. I hope the minister will do so because I think it will recur.

At the moment, in Vancouver a man working for CP Transport as a warehouseman gets $3.50 an hour, but outside the railway trades a man doing exactly the same job gets $5.05 an hour. A warehouseman-tractor driver for CP Transport gets $3.54, but a man outside the railway trades gets $5.15 an hour. A rate clerk gets $3.69 an hour, but outside the railway trades he gets $4.95 an hour. A CP switchboard operator gets $3.15 an hour, and outside he gets $4.33. If there is a member in the House who does not see that these people have fallen a long way behind, he should see me after my speech and I will give him the rest of the list. They are behind, and something must be done.

The second thing I want to say is this. I hope all hon. members will support the amendments put forward by this party, and I hope all the people who are presently on strike will recognize that this bill, if these amendments are adopted, will at least provide a decent base upon which to continue negotiations. The amendments to be proposed by this party will ensure that negotiations cannot drag on indefinitely.

The Minister of Labour in his statement yesterday referred to the establishment of an inquiry into railway pension plans. As some hon. members know, pension plans in the railway industry have been for a long time, and still are, causing great concern to workers in the industry. Also some hon. members know, an association has been established called the Canadian Railways Employees Pension Association, the purpose of which has been to bring the pension matter to the attention of the public, to the Department of Labour and, I am sorry to say, the leaders and the members of the unions within the railway trades. The Minister of Labour said:

> —I intend to appoint an industrial inquiry commission . . . to estimate the cost of the negotiated settlement relating to pensions, and comment on any differences between his cost-estimate and that of the railway companies.

Earlier this afternoon the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre asked the Minister of Labour whether this inquiry would consider the total pension problem within the railways. I am happy to see that the Minister of Labour is now in the chamber. As I understood the minister's answer this afternoon, he suggested he would be willing to have his appointee look at more than just the question of whether the estimate of cost as put out in negotiations to date is necessarily accurate. In this regard I want to bring to the attention of the minister the fact that as recently as last July 27, in a publication put out by the British Columbia branch of the Canadian Railways Employees Pension Association, the position of this association on the matter of pensions, funding, advantages and benefits was put as follows:

The railway companies and the bargaining agents are all spreading the same propaganda about the new pension formula being a 2 per cent formula. Many of the statements made are misleading. Tens of thousands of railway employees will retire with railway pensions of 1.3 per cent for each year of service, not 2 per cent as many believe.

I am not for one minute saying that is accurate or inaccurate, because I do not know. But I do know that the contributions the companies are making to the pension plan, as opposed to the contributions being made by the workmen, represent a substantial disparity. This is also a matter of great concern. I think it is proper to bring to the attention of the minister the fact that evidently a press release has been put out today by the pension association. I am sure the minister is aware that there are over 20,000 such people in the country. The effect of the press release is that they want the terms of reference of the appointee the minister has referred to broadened so that his inquiry will include all aspects of the Canadian National, and I suppose they mean also the CP, pension fund.

So my question to the minister is, can he give us some assurance that this whole question will be gone into? If the minister does not want to go that far at this time, can he give us the assurance that he will meet as soon as possible, which means almost immediately—and I recognize the demands on his time at the moment—with representatives of this pension group so that immediate negotiations can take place with a view to setting up an inquiry to end once and for all this running sore; because the complaints the pensioners have are justified or they are not? It seems to me—and I think all hon. members will agree—that it is now time to advise these people that the problem will be independently considered and settled.

Mr. Munro (Hamilton East): In answer to the hon. member for Vancouver South, may I say that I indicated earlier today to the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre that the very significant improvements that were made to the CPR and CNR pension plans were signed, sealed and delivered, so to speak, in March as a result of a lot of work that had been done. These were agreed to by all the leaders of the railway unions. This was a significant improvement going back to 1956.

What the pension association and some members of parliament, including the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre and the hon. member for Vancouver South, are asking is that we now take a further look at the benefits structure and the over-all plans to see whether they can be improved over and above the improvements agreed to in March. That is a quite legitimate suggestion.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): With reference, of course, to those already retired.

Mr. Munro (Hamilton East): Yes, with reference to those already retired. I think this is quite a legitimate position, but I do not think it can be accomplished relative to the bill before us today. I think we would have to go into all sorts of questions. The parties should be consulted in that regard. There is the question of whether it could be done through a joint committee, something similar to what was done before with assistance from governmental officials, if you like, from my department and the Department of Transport.

If it should appear that is not the best method, then perhaps an industrial commissioner should look into the whole broad question. So, as I assured the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre I am now assuring the hon. member for Vancouver South that I would be prepared, as would the Minister of Transport, to bring the parties together to see what further significant changes can be made to improve these pensions.

If this can best be accomplished by an industrial commissioner, I have already indicated that I will consider that. At this stage, however, I do not think this should be confused with what is pertinent now, relative to the dispute before the House, that is, the whole question of costing. As a result of representations made to myself, particularly, by the unions, it seems they had considerable suspicion concerning the costing figures of the CPR and the CNR and asked that these be analysed quickly. If the assumptions of the actuaries, and so on, were accurate and the figures of the company were exaggerated, they wanted it all examined quickly, in the event that an arbitrator is appointed under this legislation, so that he could get the views of the industrial commissioner immediately. This might be very beneficial to the workers, because if they could establish that the figures of the railway companies were exaggerated, the arbitrator could take that into account and it might benefit the workers in respect of wages and other matters in dispute.

This could be pretty important. I can tell you it is very important in respect of the union leadership in this particular dispute. So if we, in a too hurried fashion, impose upon the industrial commissioner who was appointed yesterday, John Deutsch, other duties, we would be very concerned that not enough discussion had gone on and that this might delay his coming to a conclusion concerning the accuracy of the costing that has been arrived at by the CNR and the CPR and would delay the turning over of his findings to the arbitrator appointed under this legislation.

I think we must keep in mind that in the unhappy event, which now seems inevitable, that an arbitrator will be appointed under this legislation, it is important that he get his decision out quickly. If these men are to receive a further increment in wages and have other matters resolved, they do not want the same type of delay that has already occurred. That is the reason for not broadening the terms of reference of this particular industrial commissioner to include the subject about which the hon. member is talking.

I also indicated earlier that in respect of the costing analysis to be done by John Deutsch, I have received representations today as to how his terms of reference can be further improved. I hope to be able to give all hon. members further details on that particular matter later today.

The Deputy Chairman: It being six o'clock, pursuant to special order made earlier this day I do now leave the chair until 8 p.m.

At six o'clock the committee took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The committee resumed at 8 p.m.

The Assistant Deputy Chairman: Order, please. The House is again in committee of the whole on Bill C-217. The hon. member for Saskatoon-Biggar has the floor.

Mr. Gleave: Mr. Chairman, I just want to say a few words in respect of the pension issue. The hon. member for Vancouver South quoted the minister on the pension issue, but it could stand being mentioned again. The minister said:

> Consequently, I have appointed an industrial inquiry commission pursuant to Part V of the Canada Labour Code, to estimate the cost of the negotiated settlement relating to pensions and comment on any differences between its cost estimate and that of the railway companies. I might add that today I appointed Dr. John Deutsch to be the industrial inquiry commissioner to conduct this inquiry.

I have respect for Mr. Deutsch. As a matter of fact I served on the Economic Council of Canada at the time when he was chairman, and I find him to be a man of considerable ability. I wonder what role the representatives of the unions will play in this inquiry. Will they have the right and the privilege of appointing members to this inquiry? This is one of the matters which the minister may wish to clarify.

I want to say to the committee that in the time that I have been a member of the House the men who work on the railroads have expressed a profound dissatisfaction with the administration of the pension fund by the CNR and by the CPR. The CNR of course is owned and run by the people of Canada. If the minister or this government think that they can divorce the matter of pensions from the over-all settlement of this rail dispute, then let me tell them that they are wrong.

Let me point out that in the election of 1972 the railroad workers called a meeting to which they invited all the candidates who stood for nomination in the constituency of Saskatoon-Biggar in that year to appear and talk to them. Let me say, for the information of the Creditiste party members, that one of the nominees who appeared there was a member of their party. I may say that being a Creditiste he would have received no cheers if he had advocated the policy which the members of that party have advocated today in the House. They understood the situation all too well.

These men wanted to know what the pension fund was, what their share in it was, and what their benefits were going to be. They no longer easily accept the idea that they are putting money into a fund which they do not control and, worse than that, of which they do not even have an accounting. They no longer accept that sort of approach. Also, they are far ahead of the management of CNR and CPR in that they know it is not necessary for a man to work until the age of 65 in what is essentially an arduous occupation. They know that it is not necessary. They know that there is a sufficient work force in Canada for them to be able to take a pension at a younger age if they so wish, and that they should be able to obtain the kind of pension which would give them a decent standard of living. They are not prepared to end their days in poverty.

I say all this to the committee in the hope that some hon. members who are not closely associated with the people who work on the railroads may have a greater understanding of their thinking. This is what the railroad workers are saying to me when I meet them. They should have the right to know what is in their pension fund, and they should have an accounting of how much money is available in it because they are putting money into it. They should have the same rights as has the shareholder in a corporation or in a co-operative.

They should know how much money they have put in, how much is available and what rate of interest it is earning, because it is their money. They are not getting this information. If the Minister of Labour institutes an inquiry and if it is not going to bring to these men on the railroad the information which I have described, he will find that they will not be satisfied. They are very sceptical even of the proposal that was put before the general chairman and which the general chairman recommended to the men working on the railways. They may have to accept it, but I tell you that whether they voice that protest or whether they do not voice it they will accept those recommendations under protest. They wanted to appear before the Standing Committee on Transport and Communications but they did not have the opportunity to do so because the government did not refer the CNR financing bill to the committee in the last session. Why? Why did it not do that. Why did the government not put before the Standing Committee on Transport and Communications the matter of CNR financing, so that it could be examined?

Representatives from the constituency of Saskatoon-Biggar wrote to the chairman of the transport committee, the hon. member for Crowfoot, and asked for the privilege of appearing before that committee. They were never given that opportunity, because the government would not put the CNR financing bill before that committee, and that committee sat in idleness. This government wanted it to sit in idleness.

The government did not want public hearings and an investigation into the financing of one of the largest businesses which the government controls. So, that group of railroaders who spoke for pensioners never had the opportunity to come before that committee and say "This is our problem. This is what we think, and this is what we know." They had even arranged to engage a man who was fully knowledgeable in this matter, but they did not have the opportunity to appear before the committee.

The Minister of Transport may again make impassioned speeches, as he did today, and tell us about the nitty-gritty of negotiations, but he has much to learn about railroading. If the government does not satisfy the demands of the men who are working on the railroad, it will be in for trouble.

When you go to Saskatoon people ask, "Why did the CNR sell the hotel in Saskatoon?" We have been given no answers. I wrote to the Minister of Transport 10 days ago, but he did not even have the courtesy to answer my letter and tell me why the CNR sold its hotel in Saskatoon. The citizens of Saskatoon are asking this question. The minister has not answered, I suspect, because he does not know. Apparently the CNR can build a needle in Toronto, but it cannot maintain the single hotel it had in Saskatoon.

An hon. Member: The city of Toronto got the needle.

Mr. Gleave: The city of Toronto said it would have the needle. I suspect the people there are right. However, that is an example of the kind of indifference displayed both to the railroaders and other citizens in my constituency, and no amount of rhetoric on the part of the volatile Minister of Transport will cover that indifference and contempt which have been shown and which are still evident here tonight. The government will have to do better than that.

As has been said before, the government has brought the farm economy of western Canada to a standstill. Grain is not moving. The elevators are full. Feeder cattle are moving south to the United States because there is no means for moving them east in Canada. The government has slapped export controls on fat beef and pork which would move to the United States, and has not considered what ought to be done now that rail transportation is at a standstill. One wonders if ministers really know what is going on and what the people of Saskatchewan are really thinking. There is a foul-up in the feed grain market, to such an extent that no one knows what the real basis of pricing is.

An hon. Member: Otto knows.

Mr. Lang: It is up 30 cents.

Mr. Gleave: You know, when we asked the minister responsible for the Wheat Board and the Minister of Agriculture to appear last night, they did not appear.

Mr. Lang: Where?

Mr. Gleave: In this House. I am not surprised that the minister did not know that. That is part and parcel of this government's total indifference. It slapped an 18-month freeze on freight rates, without regard for what is to happen, because it was too damn much trouble to consider freight rates item by item, and policies item by item, to see what would happen if certain things are done.

Mr. Lang: Are you against the freeze?

Mr. Gleave: It is like the freeze of the Conservatives. They propose a freeze on over-all pricing.

Mr. Lang: Are you against this one?

Mr. Gleave: It is like taking a sledgehammer to swat a fly.

Mr. Lang: But this is not a fly.

Mr. Gleave: Let me say this about the pension program, Mr. Chairman, if this House can persuade the minister to carry out a full investigation into the pension plan of the CNR, it would be doing something useful. I will tell him what the railroaders of my constituency say and think. They think the CPR exercises a veto over any move that the CNR makes with regard to pensions. That may be true, or it may not be true. I think they are right. That is what those people think, Mr. Chairman. If the minister and his assistant from London, Ontario, do not know this, I am very surprised. I think most of the railroaders know it, and they will tell you if you ask them.

We want to get away from the situation in which a private company which is not responsible to the people, but which has received millions of dollars from the taxpayers of Canada, exercises a veto against policies that this government or parliament may set with regard to Canadian National Railways, which is owned and financed by the people of Canada.

I see that the Minister of Transport has left the chamber. I do not think it matters much. He was not paying attention. Anyway, he does not answer letters. I do not think he gives a damn about what happens in western Canada anyway.

An hon. Member: Certainly he cares. The government cares.

Mr. Gleave: If it cares, why did the CNR sell the only hotel it had in Saskatoon, eh? How much did the friends of hon. members opposite pay for the hotel? That is what the people of Saskatoon would like to know. When will you tell us how much your friends paid for the hotel? When will members opposite come forward with records, because we are waiting to find out? And do not be so sure that the people of Saskatchewan are going to forget. They are not going to forget. You ignored the people. You refused to put the item before the Standing Committee on Transportation so even that committee cannot find out the facts. You do not want us to know the facts because you cannot bear to see them exposed to the public. I am saying to you in this House what I intend to say out on the hustings, so be ready to answer.

• (2020)

[Translation]

Mr. La Salle: Mr. Chairman, I would like to add my modest contribution to the consideration of the bill before the House.

That bill is designed to bring railway workers back to work as soon as possible, Indeed, I think that the consequences of that dispute have been assessed in many ways, sometimes with partisanship, sometimes very objectively.

I believe, like all hon. members, that it is unfortunate that the government should have to legislate on such a matter. All hon. members nevertheless have respect for the worker, regardless of what some here may think, who believe that they alone are interested in safeguarding the interests of the worker. I think that all members want to give workers their fair share and do them justice. Of course, it is easy to play politics with such a debate. The Standing Orders of the House specifically allow members to make foolish remarks, but they do not have to. Therefore, I shall try not to do so, Mr. Chairman.

I think that we must also consider the growing concern of the people over the dispute. They want to know whether the government has acted in a cautious way at the appropriate time. It is very easy to condemn the government for not having acted sooner. We now have had the opportunity to listen to several hon. members and to acquire certain information. If the government has not up to now adopted rigid positions, it is because it wants to leave this to the responsible parties in the dispute. In fact, I wanted to give them time to explain themselves and to find a solution through the present negotiation process without necessarily coming up with the bill now under study.

On the other hand, I would be tempted to say, if I wanted to act in a partisan way, that the government waited till the population demanded the adoption of legislation to justify its position. I honestly think that if the two parties do not come to an agreement, considering the great difficulties and the inconveniences that this dispute has caused to the Canadian population, it is absolutely necessary that the government should legislate.

Therefore, the population expects action from Parliament and not necessarily from the government. I think this is where the role and responsibility of each hon. member comes into play. What should each member do and what should be the attitude of Parliament? We know perfectly well that the government needs a majority to adopt a bill and I think that, as hon. members, we must consider in a very objective way the interests of society.

Therefore, it is not time to rejoice from the embarrassment that this has caused to the government. It is not a question of finding out if the official opposition could find there some political capital. It is not either a matter of showing, as the NDP is doing now, that the workers are opposed to the bill, which would be close to political partisanship. I think that what is important now is that the people have proof that the members of Parliament are behaving as administrators in the case of a dispute which is so expensive for the country. It is this way, I think, that Parliament will regain confidence from the people.

Therefore, in the case of this dispute, it is the interests of society which must concern us and guide our decisions. I know some amendments will be moved. I therefore appeal right away to hon. members, to the government: be objective enough to accept amendments that can help the workers and do justice to all interested parties.

Now, I feel it is imperative that the government should see the problem in that light. It is also imperative for the parties of the opposition to present amendments that are truly objective and not merely of such a nature as to prove, in an eventual election campaign, that one party was more favourable than another to the employees concerned in this conflict. To my mind, we will not deserve the respect of the people if we do not hold the government responsible for all the difficulties the employees are now up against.

The Minister of Transport (Mr. Marchand) stated this morning that we are not here to solve the conflict but to bring back order. We also know that this bill will not necessarily solve the problems of the workers. It will enable the parties to resume negotiations in the hope that they will reach an agreement. It seems to me that through the proposals made on both sides the initial stands of the interested parties can be drawn closer together. I hope that a satisfactory settlement will be arrived at for the employees, as we should protect them. We also know that we should be realistic as regards the possibilities of the companies concerned.

I could also avail myself of this opportunity to blame or to invite the government to watch closely the problems, as stated by the hon. member who preceded me, as far as the pension fund is concerned. I too have seen employees who are affected by this dispute and are far from pleased with this plan. Other employees told me about sick leave, a field where glaring defects exist. Therefore, I shall limit my remarks to those two problems which directly concern those employees by inviting the minister responsible to correct the situation for the good of the employees and bring about the justice to which they are entitled.

Like many others, I am inclined at the outset to be greatly disappointed with the slowness of negotiations; we are naturally inclined to blame the government for its failure to establish negotiation mechanisms capable of bringing those negotiations to an end within the stipulated time. It is hard to accept that a group of workers should have to finance an eight or nine-month retroactivity period. It is absolutely unfair. On the basis of that consideration I stand, of course, on the side of the employees who complain that they have to finance salary increases which come with a year's delay. To what extent have the companies concerned in those disputes benefited by those amounts of money they did not have to spend during those months? They certainly made profits. When the settlement takes place, and I hope it will be acceptable to the employees, there will surely be a retroactivity period, but what guarantee or what compensation will be given, for instance, to the employees who lost a salary increase during eight or nine months? The bill does not mention it and I feel that we should consider the possibility of compensating the employee who has lost money during a certain period. The company has surely collected interest on that money. It is therefore a glaring injustice suffered by the employee. We must ask the government to set up some permanent consultation procedures to carry out the negotiations within the prescribed time.

I learned this afternoon that there was something more important than the negotiation procedures and the information made sense to me. It seems that it is still more important to provide unions with information on productivity; the unions should obtain data on future markets. We are well aware that during negotiations or when a union is seeking a salary increase for the employees of a certain industry, the large companies have the necessary means to obtain data on future markets. It may be that when a company readily accepts a settlement it is in its interest to do so; the union being unaware of that is pleased to see the negotiations concluded in such a short time and feels that it has made a good deal. However, since the company has information on the future market and well-grounded information on the general productivity, it realizes that it is advisable to sign a collective agreement today, aware that it will make additional profits tomorrow.

I think I am well justified in claiming from the government the possibility of organizing information mechanisms at the union level. Of course, the unions of Ford or General Motors are well enough organized to have research offices. But thousands of small unions do not have enough information to be able to discuss at the same level as the company. And, of course, the unions and the workers are discriminated against.

I think it is important to ask the government for information mechanisms so that the unions be able to discuss, given equal datas, at the same level as the employer. I think that the unions would then have the necessary information to ensure the future of Canadian productivity. We must ask the government to modify the consultation mechanism.

But if we were to limit ourselves to the development of a consultation mechanism ensuring the negotiation of a settlement within the time prescribed without taking the productivity into account, it would be wrong because the unions do need this information at the production level.

And the information that has been given to me on the subject allows me to believe that it would be of great help to the unions, to the employee, if they were given the same information as the employers.

I felt I had to rise in this debate and since I want to be very practical and very brief I would also like to ask the government to give particular attention to subsidies granted in respect of railway transport. I know that those subsidies are necessary. The freeze on rates was put into effect but we know that there are two means of transport in Canada, rail and trucking.

Recently the president of the Quebec Trucking Association, Mr. Archambault, made his views known to the right hon. Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau). I have here a clipping from a newspaper which gives details on the subject:

> In his letter to the Prime Minister Mr. Archambault stresses that the government must not favour a policy which boils down to "two different sets of weights." If Ottawa subsidizes the rail industry every time there is a strike or a labour dispute it will have to grant the same privilege to trucking companies when they are faced with a work stoppage or tough bargaining.
> The people of Canada actually have two modes of ground transport, rail and trucking. To subsidize only one mode is to prejudice the other.
> The Quebec Trucking Association is asking the federal authorities to "put an end to the exclusive privileges granted to railways." It adds that the current situation should not lead to further paternalism in that field.

So I think it is important to point out that request made by the Quebec Trucking Association. That association and its members who drive the trucks are also entitled to some security.

Of course, the government must consider the subsidies necessary to maintain the rates at their lowest level but, if it does not want to have problems in the field of trucking, it must also grant that industry subsidies allowing it to compete with railway systems.

Mr. Chairman, I believe that I had to make those comments and to be practical I say that I agree with the bill even though I regret that the government is forced to follow that course of action. I hope that the railway workers will understand the necessity to resume operations and that they will respect the legislation that we will adopt within a few hours.

I hope also that the bargaining process which will follow the passage of the bill will produce a satisfactory and acceptable minimum. And because we have been summoned to discuss that legislation and that apparently Parliament will sit again next week to deal with the cost of living increases, I will keep my comments for next week.

Mr. Chairman, I wanted to make that brief comment with the hope that the government will pay special attention not only to a legislation calling back workers to work but that it will invite the executives at the bargaining tables and that the minister will improve some imperfections and unfairness in respect of those employees.

If hon. members show the objectivity that the population is waiting for and is requiring, I believe that the government will have taken the right step. If it has not enough motivation, it will effectively obliged to do so. But I hope that the government will not wait for that. Through the co-operation of all members, and with the proper objectivity, we will succeed in suitably improving the lot of those workers.

[English]

Mr. Peters: Mr. Chairman, I regret again being here to order the railroad employees back to work. This is not the first, but the third time I have been here on such an occasion. I find this occasion even more distasteful than the others. For the past seven or eight years, and during the last two in particular, the government has shown absolutely no interest in the railroads, how they operate, their financial structure, pension plan or anything else.

• (2040)

The contribution made by the government to the railroads in Canada has been the addition of a relatively small number of hopper cars to the rolling stock in western Canada and the introduction of a new ferry here and there. I am sure the government and members of the Liberal party who sit on the transport committee have concluded that the railways are not very important in the national scheme of things. Yet when the railway workers go on strike for two or three days there are cries from all parts of Canada about grain piling up, about shortages of food, about people starving.

I was very interested in the comments made by members who come from Prince Edward Island and Newfoundland. I have been to both of those islands. They are very attractive. Certainly, the people who live there try to sell the idea that they are very attractive. Yet they have been raising hell because people who went to visit those islands found that their stay has been extended. I would have thought that the hospitality of the islanders was such that they would make these people welcome and enable them to pass a very pleasant stay, rather than having all this fuss.

The railroads only become frightfully important when something happens to prevent their operation. Few members of parliament have shown the slightest interest in the fact that maintenance of way crews have been largely removed. They have shown little interest in the fact that seldom a day passes when there is not an accident on one of our railroads, that seldom a day goes by when there is not a derailment somewhere or other simply because the railways are being poorly operated and because insufficient maintenance of way personnel are employed.

In most cases the companies have got rid of five out of six of the section gangs, the people who used to walk the rails to determine whether it was safe to run trains over them. Now they run an inspection trolley over the lines twice a year and this process decides whether or not the rails are safe. Nobody cares a damn. Nobody cares about the accident rate. Nobody seems to care about the railways at all. The government spends a lot of money in Rockcliffe establishing a STOL airport so that people can fly between Ottawa and Montreal, despite the fact that a train could travel from Ottawa to Montreal much faster than passengers could make that journey by aircraft, counting time taken for travel at both ends.

But nobody cares. Nobody is interested in the railway. Nobody seems interested in the fact that the railways are not carrying passengers any more, that we are not using the railways to the best advantage. Nevertheless, when there is a strike, everyone gets alarmed and the CPR calls in its friends, the government, to do something about it. The companies are not interested in negotiating. Indeed, the workers have not been interested in negotiating on occasions. I think it can be said in connection with some of these contracts that the union has been willing to drag its feet hoping the government would make a decision.

Most members of parliament have not looked at the financial statements of the two major railways. Today they are making money hand over fist, just as the banks are. They are making a fortune. The government has not even asked us for the money needed to pay the interest on the CN debt for the last two years. Maybe the company is making enough money to afford to pay the interest without the benefit of legislation.

There is another problem which parliament has not faced, and it has to do with pensions. Other agencies in Canada have been told that in order to be acceptable for income tax purposes, a registered pension plan must be vested. This has not been done in the case of the Canadian National. We have said to the CN, "Just put in an IOU." The company borrows the money paid in by contributors and invests it to do all sorts of things which are not necessarily in the interests of the workers.

I have heard a number of people say they have helped to negotiate contracts. Everybody knows all about the way in which unions or companies should be run, when it comes time to settle a strike. That is not important. But what the Minister of Transport said today was important; and if he thought it was important, why should we not act along the lines he suggested? He said we should allow the unions and the companies to negotiate, that they should use the strength they have. The financial position of the railroads is not bad at the present time.

So far in this debate we have listened only to those who say we must get the railroad workers back to work. Nobody has mentioned an alternative. In my riding there are railroaders employed by the Canadian National, the Canadian Pacific and the Ontario Northland Railway. These people are interested in running the railways, but they are also interested in achieving some dignity while they are working for these companies.

Let me give hon. members some figures. In 1950 the Ontario Northland Railway employed 2,500 workers. Today it has less than 1,600 employees. Its pension plan is fully vested. The government of Ontario has made a commitment to put in nearly $1 million a year in addition to other contributions to the plan. But check the figures contained in the financial report of Ontario Northland and you will find that the average wage of all the employees, including the supernumerary people in Ontario, all the hangers-on in the Ontario Railways Commission, is only $8,500 a year: and some of the supernumerary people are getting between $35,000 and $40,000.

There are many in my area who make less than $4,000 on the railway. No one can say this is a reasonable amount of money to earn. I agree there comes a time when the public interest becomes so important that one has to override principles. I am sure there are few women who, if they were offered enough money, would not put principles behind them and take the money.

Some hon. Members: Shame!

An hon. Member: Explain.

Mr. Peters: Mr. Chairman, I might have overstated the position.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Peters: The argument I was trying to put forward is that there is a point at which all would agree that a settlement should be arrived at. The suggestion I make is that we have not yet arrived at that point; we have not allowed negotiations to continue up to that point. If we decide to satisfy all the people in this country who believe that the railways are important and that the railways should run, we must do better than the workers would have been able to do for themselves, because we are asking them to do something on behalf of the public which they themselves did not want to do.

I have talked with many railroaders and I know they want to go back to work with enough wages so that they will again be in a position to hold up their heads in their communities. There was a time when railroaders were the top blue-collared workers in Canada, but that is no longer so. Many of them earn less money than a garage worker, a plumber or an electrician. In fact I am sure that in many cities these men earn less money than a garbage collector.

We represent the people of Canada and the people have an interest in this strike. I suggest that before we pass this piece of legislation each member should consider increasing the amount that is proposed. When the non-operating unions began negotiations many months ago they put forth a number of proposals they felt were fair and just.

These people have suffered as much as anybody else from the high cost of living, and I suggest that whatever we give them should be accompanied by a guarantee over the lifetime of the contract so that at the end of 1974 their standard of living will be maintained. I am sure this would be salve to my conscience as well as to the consciences of the people of Canada.

The people of Canada are not opposed to the railway workers getting a fair deal. What they are opposed to is the inconvenience they have been put to in relation to the operation of our national transportation system. I am sure they find no satisfaction in the fact that this government has had to recall parliament to ask for a piece of back-to-work legislation which provides only the minimum sought by the workers when they prepared their proposals probably 18 months ago.

I suggest that if parliament wants to be fair to the Canadian public it will accept the responsibility of putting these men back to work on the terms we propose in respect of wages, with a guarantee that their standard of living will be maintained to the end of 1974. The only way that can be done is including an escalation clause based on the cost of living, and I am prepared to move such an amendment.

Within 10 or 15 years in my area we have lost 1,000 of 2,500 employees of the railway, and seniority is now a major issue. These men want to be sure of their jobs. I do not think this is a matter that should be left to compulsory mediation or arbitration. I believe we should solve this problem.

I am prepared to say that for humanitarian reasons, if for no other, there should be two men in the caboose.

An hon. Member: Oh, come on!

Mr. Peters: I presume the hon. member disagrees. I can remember when trains only had 40 or 50 cars, but now trains have as many as 80 or 90 cars. These trains operate with as many as four units. They are being operated with one engineer, probably one fireman and a head-end brakeman. They have one guy in the caboose. The railways now want to get rid of another man on each of these trains. I suggest for humanitarian reasons there should be two in the caboose, because that guy a mile back has to stay there for seven or eight hours.

An hon. Member: Give him a tape recorder.

Mr. Peters: Mr. Chairman, I hope the railroaders hear these remarks and realize how much sympathy they will get for their solitude from members of the Conservative party, who probably now feel there are too many people in the caboose. I suggest they are discounting the safety factor. The best they can do is suggest we give that man in the caboose a tape recorder.

An hon. Member: Let's settle the strike.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

An hon. Member: Get out of the caboose.

Mr. Peters: These men in the caboose will get little comfort from a tape recorder. An hon. member suggests that we should settle this strike at any price. He reminds me of Chamberlain who said: "Peace at any price". An hon. member wants peace at this time at any price so he can go home, but I suggest this is too important a problem. Parliament should not pit constituents across Canada against workers employed in this industry. We must not only be fair, we must appear to be fair. In fact, we must be more than fair.

We have a responsibility to solve these problems which face the railroad worker, one of them being this matter of seniority, and another relating to the number of men in each train crew. A great many non-operating employees have lost their jobs through attrition. In my area I suggest this would be four out of five, and I am sure that is the situation in many other parts of rural Canada. I think this reduction of crew through attrition has reached the point where safety becomes an important factor, particularly if there is to be any further reduction in this area. Members of parliament should be better informed before making decisions in relation to the curtailment of railway staff. This is not the time to make such a decision.

This government has not placed the CNR annual report before parliament for consideration. I suggest that until the Minister of Finance gets off his fanny and appoints some new auditors, and places an audited statement before parliament, we will not get around to discussing these problems. Such a consideration might have been of assistance to the railways and the workers in this situation. I will not be satisfied with this legislation until we provide a guarantee to the workers that they will be no worse off in 1974 than they are after we pass this bill. As it stands now we will have implemented a contract by law, and will have taken from these workers their process of labour negotiation. Any settlement less than what I suggest would represent a shirking of our duty to those constituents we represent across Canada.

Clause 2 agreed to.

Clause 3 agreed to.

On Clause 4: Railway services to be resumed.

Mr. MacDonald (Egmont): Mr. Chairman, I rise to speak briefly in respect of Clause 4 as it has a specific application and concern to those who represent the two island provinces on the east coast of Canada.

I was very delighted when the Prime Minister, making his speech to the nation earlier this week, referred specifically to the extreme transportation difficulties faced by Prince Edward Island and Newfoundland. I was somewhat less delighted when the Minister of Labour in making his opening remarks in this debate yesterday did not make reference to the particular difficulties created in those two provinces.

Earlier today one of my colleagues from Prince Edward Island asked the Minister of Transport, who unfortunately is not here this evening, whether we have now seen the last of these disastrous strikes and the specific effects they have in those island provinces. During my term here in parliament, which has not been that long, we have twice experienced the serious effects of a dislocation created by a strike by workers providing basic transportation services to and from Prince Edward Island and Newfoundland.

I think it is incumbent upon this government, in addition to the reply by the Minister of Transport earlier today, to give an undertaking to the governments of both Newfoundland and Prince Edward Island—which by the way, acted in a very similar manner in respect of the suspension of basic ferry services to those provinces—that in the succeeding weeks and months a definite agreement will be worked out with these two provinces so that they will not in future be faced with the kind of strikes that cause serious economic harm not to just one segment of the society in either of these two provinces but in a total way. It has been mentioned already in the newspapers and, I believe, in other ways that the premier of my province is taking court action to sue the federal government for its failure to continue service between the mainland and Prince Edward Island. I understand that similar action is to be taken by the government of the province of Newfoundland.

While this action shows in fact the seriousness with which these two governments view the suspension of service, I think you will understand Mr. Chairman, that it is not the basic requirement. What we must arrive at in the very near future is a solid agreement which will for ever and a day prevent a situation arising again where service can be totally disrupted. In the case of Newfoundland we see a situation in which it is virtually impossible for there to be any service in respect of goods or persons by water, and one does not have to conjure up much imagination to realize the disastrous economic effects being felt at the present time in that province.

My province of Prince Edward Island is not faced with a total blockage by water, because we do have the private service operated by Northumberland Ferries. However, the main Canadian National operation between Borden and Tormentine has been suspended. There is not only the problem that the suspension has gone on now for some days, but also the fear of that suspension which has been felt for over a month. One cannot describe the effect in terms of millions of dollars of business lost in our second largest industry, the tourist industry, plus the related effects to the farming and fishing industries and the effect this has on the other industries within the province.

I would suggest that at a very very early date the Minister of Labour and the Minister of Transport convene a meeting with responsible officials from the government of Prince Edward Island, as well as with representatives of both management and unions of the railways, to work out a new format and a new structure that will prevent this kind of disastrous result that is felt in particular by these two island provinces.

It is perhaps a truism to say that by the terms of confederation both in respect of the province of Prince Edward Island—which ironically is celebrating its centennial year of confederation this year—and the province of Newfoundland which is celebrating almost 25 years of confederation, a basic fundamental agreement was to continue transportation and communication with the mainland. That fundamental agreement has been destroyed. We must, in the context of working out the particular problem that affects the non-operating and other employees of the railways of this country, deal with the specific and very difficult problem concerning the ferry operations to Newfoundland and Prince Edward Island.

I would invite, in particular, the Minister of Labour to make a commitment this evening that as soon as we have dealt with the immediate crisis concerning the non-operation of railways that there will be convened at the highest level a meeting of himself, the Minister of Transport and responsible officials from the governments of Prince Edward Island and Newfoundland, and the railways, in order that we may arrive at a structure and method whereby we will not have to see an individual group of employees suspend the vital transportation link to these island provinces.

I do not think I would be a responsible member of this House if I did not receive that kind of commitment from the Minister of Labour and his colleague. Without that commitment, this kind of approach to end this crisis is merely a band-aid approach in respect of a fundamental problem that has become increasingly recurrent in the last two decades. In 1950, in 1966 and again in 1973 we have seen the kind of serious harm that results to the economy and society of these island provinces when there is in effect no continuous transportation or communication link between these provinces and the mainland of Canada.

Mr. Munro (Hamilton East): Mr. Chairman, I have listened attentively to the hon. member. I realize, as does the government, the tremendous inconvenience and indeed suffering in many cases to Prince Edward Island, the hon. member's home, and of course Newfoundland. I think really what the hon. member is getting down to is that he wants some assurance that a strike will not occur. In essence, that is how I interpret the hon. member's remarks. If he wishes to tell me otherwise, I will listen. In other words, he wishes assurance that a strike will not occur in those areas where such service is so essential to the survival of the people of islands such as he described.

We have already had some debate in this House in respect of how we can deal with strikes in essential services. I think the hon. member's leader indicated he would set up an essential services disputes commission.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Munro (Hamilton East): There have been other remarks in respect of the comments of the Leader of the Opposition relating to the Mills task force study. It might interpose various stages, but ultimately it comes down to the question of whether we are prepared in certain specific cases to deny the right to strike and impose compulsory arbitration.

No matter how we clothe it, and no matter how edgy we might be in respect of this fundamental question, I can answer the hon. member right now by saying yes, we could correct that situation assuredly so that it would never happen again. The answer to that type of question, some people would be prepared to say, is compulsory arbitration. In that way there could be assurance that there would be no suspension of essential services in terms of transportation to Prince Edward Island.

However, the hon. member's party is not advocating compulsory arbitration. No party in this House advocates compulsory arbitration. This points up the necessity that there must be another answer than compulsory arbitration in dealing with some of these very essential areas which are involved, without denying the right to strike. In other words, the right would be there but the motivation for its utilization, hopefully, in the future would not be there.

Some time earlier I suggested in respect of a question asked at the time we were talking about bringing back parliament that we ought to bring together a group, when this trying matter is over, in which labour would be adequately represented, in an effort to come up with a technical answer other than the standard ones we have been hearing today. I do not believe an essential public services disputes commission, or the method the Leader of the Opposition was talking about in respect of the Mills study, is the answer because it is clear that it may involve, when it is essential and necessary, compulsory arbitration. There is no sense hiding this fact. The Leader of the Opposition has reached no other conclusion, and neither did the Mills study, concerning how you can ensure services which are necessary, as the member has described, when such serious consequences result from their disruption.

No one has come up with any other solution as yet, to ensure that such a situation will never happen again, other than adopting compulsory arbitration as a last resort. I am suggesting that there must be some other solution. I think the government is aware of this. When the strike is over we are prepared to give some study to this whole matter. What I am saying to the hon. member is that I do not think at this stage the solution offered by the hon. member's party, or the one in the Mills study, is the type of answer that can give the hon. member an assurance for eternity that this will never happen again.

Mr. MacDonald (Egmont): Mr. Chairman, I think it would be wise to clarify a couple of points so that the minister firmly understands what I am talking about. I think the minister was trying to go from A to Z without stopping at a number of intermediate points. I asked him specifically whether he would see to it that the high level meeting arranged between himself and his colleague, the Minister of Transport, and responsible officials in the two provinces as well as union representatives of the railroads, takes place.

I think it is very clear, for instance, that in the situation of the last two strikes with which I had some contact, a very large part of the ingredients of the walk out in effect in Prince Edward Island was its being tied into the national strike situation which, in many ways, was not directly related to the situation as it applied to the ferry operation in PEI. We should look at that carefully to see whether another kind of arrangement could be made. This does not mean that we should be asking particular employees in this service to forego the right to strike.

Second, I think we have to consider these two provinces in a totally different category from that of the national railroads. We have already taken certain steps with respect to essential services, whether these be with regard to the armed forces or the RCMP. When we look at a service that affects the whole economy of a province, I do not think we should look at it in the same light as we would look at the railroad situation as it affects one of the other provinces where there is a variety of means of transport.

All I am saying to the Minister of Labour at this point is that now we have to realize, having gone through this situation three times since 1950, that we must not put these two provinces in the same jeopardy again. In order to achieve that purpose I think the minister must give an undertaking that in the course of the next few months we will work out a new structure which will prevent the same situation from occurring again, not in total terms because we know we cannot prevent it in total terms, but to go a good deal beyond the present situation which is merely a bandaid approach.

Mr. Munro (Hamilton East): I hope to achieve that.

Mr. McGrath: Mr. Chairman, I should like to support the remarks of the hon. member for Egmont and in so doing to ask the minister, or the Prime Minister, who is at present in the House, whether the government, consistent with the constitutional responsibility that it has to maintain ferry services between the mainland and these two island provinces, will directly take over the operation of these two essential services, in view of the fact that the ships which provide these services are owned by the Department of Transport?

Mr. Gleave: Mr. Chairman, I am concerned about subclause (3).

Mr. McGrath: Mr. Chairman, I directed my question to the Minister of Labour.

The Deputy Chairman: Order, please. The minister did not rise and the Chair recognized the hon. member for Saskatoon-Biggar. I think we could come back to the hon. member for St. John's East afterwards.

Mr. Gleave: Mr. Chairman, I should like to refer to paragraph (a) of subclause (3) of clause 4 which sets out the conditions that the railways must observe when employees go back to work, if and when they do, following any settlement that parliament may choose to impose on them. I am concerned that justice be carried out in any settlement that we achieve. I was a little shocked, and indeed surprised to hear the Minister of Transport say earlier today that what we should be concerned about was a settlement, and that equity or fairness was not a prime consideration in spite of the fact that ordinarily in contract negotiations between employee and employer the matter of the power that rests in the hands of either party is the prime consideration in the type of settlement to be achieved.

I say that since the matter has been put into the hands of this parliament we must be concerned with justice and equity. We are dealing with this matter because of the failure of management to bargain with its employees. Management has failed in its responsibility to its employees, and to the people of Canada by not providing them with the service that they need, because in each case the railroads have a virtual monopoly over the type of service which they are giving to Canadians.

I think the employees have suffered enough and we should ensure that they get fair treatment when they go back to work.

I do not know whether the House in general is aware of the attitude of the Unemployment Insurance Commission during this strike. More than one worker has telephoned me because as an individual he was thrown out of work and, although he was not directly involved in the labour dispute, he was denied any opportunity to collect unemployment benefits, despite the fact that he had been unemployed for two or three weeks and would probably continue to be unemployed for at least another week. He was denied unemployment benefits despite the fact that he had consistently paid into the fund.

We have the spectacle of the Unemployment Insurance Commission deciding that it would treat all the people who were connected in terms of work with the two railway transportation systems as though they were in effect out on strike, when in fact many of them were not on strike at all. It adopted a blanket approach.

I question the right of the Unemployment Insurance Commission to adopt a blanket approach. I thought the commission was responsible to each employee because he paid into the fund and therefore was entitled to be treated as an individual. However, this government does not treat people as individuals but rather as a mob. That is what it did with people who were thrown out of work. One worker telephoned me and said: "I do not have a job any more and probably will not have one any more".

I think that this clause does not adequately protect those persons because it refers in paragraph (a) to workers who went on strike, but I am also concerned with those who are idle as a result of the strike, that is, who are idle involuntarily. Therefore I move, seconded by the hon. member for Assiniboia:

That paragraph (a) of sublcause (3) of clause 4 of Bill C-217 be amended by inserting after the word "Act" in line 25 the words "or were laid off as a consequence of the strike".

I would say that if the minister responsible would see fit to incorporate this of his own volition, it would be acceptable to me. My purpose is merely to see that this protection is contained in the act.

The Deputy Chairman: At this time I will put the amendment. The amendment is as read by the hon. member.

Mr. Munro (Hamilton East): Mr. Chairman, I might add that there is considerable merit in this amendment. I fully realize the intention of the hon. member to protect those who were laid off as a result of this strike. In many cases they were not strikers themselves, but were either with the trainmen or the shopcrafts. Many non-ops were laid off who were not part of the selective strike and who lived in some other geographic region.

Although the amendment has merit, I think it can be improved. After we examined the NDP amendment we thought that a second part should be added to it. I suggest that the following words should be incorporated. We could stand the clause and return to it after we have had a chance to consider the amendment, which might read:

That no such employees shall again be laid off by any such railway company as a consequence of any such strike.

In other words, even though we may pass the hon. member's amendment this may happen: a person who has been laid off may be called back for a day and then may be laid off again. I think, as a consequence of our amendment, he could not be laid off again. If the clause could stand until we have had a chance to do some checking on this particular wording, we could move an amendment along these lines. I take it that the NDP would agree. In that case, this amendment would apply not only to subclause (3) of clause 4 of the bill but to the other lay-off clauses further on in the bill. The NDP has given advance notice of their intention to move amendments to these clauses.

The Deputy Chairman: Is it agreed that we suspend discussion of the amendment put by the hon. member and thus give the minister time to draft the appropriate wording? We could come back to the point raised earlier by the hon. member for Egmont and the hon. member for St. John's East.

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. McGrath: Mr. Chairman, we think the amendment is reasonable and we think the minister's suggestion is reasonable. We are prepared to wait until the minister has had a chance to examine the clause and submit an amendment of his own.

Mr. Howard: Mr. Chairman, I want to be clear, as do other hon. members, that we are just standing the amendment. I understand that would leave the clause open for further discussion. I hope that is the case, because I have another proposal to make with respect to another part of the clause.

The Deputy Chairman: The hon. member read the mind of the Chair. The Chair feels that other hon. members want to discuss generally the subject matter of clause 4, and by standing the amendment and coming back to it later I think we would not prevent hon. members from participating in debate at this stage.

Mr. Howard: Mr. Chairman, I wish to raise another matter somewhat analogous to that put forward by the hon. member for Saskatoon-Biggar. It relates to railway workers some of whom were on strike and some of whom were laid off as a result of the strike. It flows from an experience that railroad workers went through in 1966 following the passage of the law that time. The wording of subclause (1) of clause 4 is almost identical to the wording that was contained in the act of 1966. That related to the resumption of operations. In that sense the wording was identical. That is what I want to talk about.

In 1966 we discovered, following passage of the law that required the railway companies on the coming into force of the act to resume operation, and required every employee then on strike to resume the duties of employment, that although the railway companies resumed operations the law did not require the railway companies to call their employees back as soon as the companies had resumed operations. In 1966 we found that although the railway companies resumed operating the railways, some employees had to wait days and even weeks before being called back to work.

That action stemmed partly from the attitude of the railway companies to further—I apologize to the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre for splitting an infinitive—penalize railroad workers. I do not think this parliament should stand for that sort of activity. I do not know if that was an oversight in 1966, but that was the result. Inasmuch as the wording in this clause is identical to the wording in the 1966 bill in part, I think we should insert a provision that says that not only shall the railways resume operations on the coming into force of this act, but that the employees who were on strike and those who were laid off as a result of the strike should not be further penalized but should be called back to work at the same time, immediately. The companies should not allow this matter to drag on for weeks.

I apologize to the minister, to the Chair, to members of the official opposition and others who may be concerned, for my having only one copy in handwritten form of my proposed amendment. I prepared it as I was looking at the clause and thinking of what happened in 1966. Perhaps I could read it slowly so that the minister can grasp it. If the amendment is acceptable, perhaps we could set it aside for further drafting. The amendment proposed is as follows:

That subclause (1) of clause 4 be amended by inserting between the words "suspended" and "and" in line 5 thereof, the following:

"and shall call back for employment every employee as soon as the operation of the railway is resumed—

Please notice that I use the word "employee" as distinct from "non-operating employee" who might have been laid off as a result of the strike. The subclause, if the amendment were accepted, then would read:

Forthwith upon the coming into force of this act, every railway company shall resume operation of the railway and subsidiary services the operation of which is suspended—

Now comes the amendment.

—and shall call back for employment every employee as soon as the operation of the railway is resumed—

Now I revert back to the clause as it is.

—and non-operating employees shall resume the duties of their employment with the railway companies.

If the minister would accept that amendment, I think it would alleviate any sense of frustration and feeling of antagonism on the part of people who were put out of work. They feel that they are being further discriminated against just as they were in 1966.

Mr. Munro (Hamilton East): Mr. Chairman, clause 4(3) directs the company to take back all those who have been on strike and allow them to resume their duties. It requires that they be given their jobs back. Even if their job is guaranteed, however, it does not say that they will be able to commence work immediately the act comes into force. If we insist on being that specific I think we will find that a great many employees whose jobs are guaranteed will be idle. I might add that not only now, because of the act as it is, is the job of the striker guaranteed, but in the amendment that is coming with respect to lay-offs the company must call all of them back and not lay them off again if the lay-offs have any connection with or are a consequence of this strike.

There is protection now in terms of jobs for all those who were laid off, and all the strikers. The only difference here is that the company would not be required to call the men immediately, but gradually, while under the proposed amendment every employee, whether laid off or on strike, is to be called back immediately. All the evidence that is at our disposal and that, I am sure, is within the knowledge of the hon. member and his party, indicates that there will be a tremendous number of men standing around for a few days with nothing to do until things get rolling again. I think that could lead to a somewhat ludicrous result.

Mr. Howard: I know the minister wants to accept the principle that I am suggesting, Mr. Chairman. He talks in terms of a few days, but in 1966 we saw that stretched into a few weeks in many cases. Examination of the attitude of the railway companies in 1966 showed that at the community level, where the railroad workers dwell, there were cases of discrimination by the company; they delayed the resumption of duty by some of their employees who went on strike, just to penalize them. That should not be permitted this time.

The minister says that it may not be possible for the railroads to commence operating completely the day after the act comes into force. He mentioned "a few days". I wonder if he could spell that out as a number of days and put something in the clause to ensure that it is a reasonable length of time. If it is left wide open as it is now in the act, I can foresee the same situation developing—and things are going to be difficult enough as it is. Could the minister go along with that idea?

Mr. Munro (Hamilton East): Yes, if the hon. member is—

The Deputy Chairman: Order, please. Before the suggested amendment is put, I think I should put the debate in order procedurally by reading the amendment as it would be before the committee officially, not only in the words of the hon. member for Skeena. I shall read the amendment to the committee so that it will be in the name of the Chair instead of in the name of the hon. member for Skeena. It is moved by the hon. member for Skeena:

That subclause (1) of clause 4 be amended by inserting, between the words "suspended" and "and" in line 5 thereof, the following:

"and shall call back for employment every employee as soon as the operation of the railway is resumed"

The hon. member for St. John's East rises on a point of order.

Mr. McGrath: Mr. Chairman, we do not have a copy of the amendment before us, and consequently cannot address ourselves to it except to suggest that perhaps the minister and the hon. member for Skeena could get together on this matter. Our position on the original amendment moved by the NDP is that we believe that no employee of the railways should suffer punitive action or reprisal as a result of this strike.

Mr. Munro (Hamilton East): Mr. Chairman, I would point out to the hon. member for Skeena that we have already an amendment that guarantees jobs for those laid off. There has also been some improvement suggested to the NDP amendment, and the hon. member agrees that the wording in his amendment is very restrictive: almost every employee would have to go back immediately. I am sure the hon. member has not tried to create a ludicrous result, but to ensure that they would go back with reasonable promptness and without the delays experienced last time. Perhaps we could stand this clause and some wording could be worked out with reference to the hon. member's suggestion. This would also give us an opportunity to strengthen the lay-off section.

The Deputy Chairman: Order, please. The suggestion is to stand the amendment of the hon. member for Skeena. The hon. member for Cape Breton-The Sydneys is seeking the floor and I wonder if he wishes to speak on these two amendments only, or on another point; otherwise I think we should wait until we come back to these two amendments and the solution which might come back to the committee.

Mr. Muir: Mr. Chairman, I tried to get your eye on a couple of occasions but was not successful. However, the hon. member for Saskatoon-Biggar and the hon. member for Skeena to some extent brought out what I had in mind. Even if we are to stand these proposed amendments, I think we must have something more concrete than just the minister saying that it would be ludicrous, or that we cannot say everyone has to go back to work and there would be nothing for them to do, etc. We must have something more concrete to provide protection for these men.

Clause 4(3) provides:

> No person acting on behalf of a railway company shall
> (a) refuse to permit, or authorize or direct another person to refuse to permit, an employee who went on strike before the coming into force of this act to resume the duties of his employment forthwith—

I have been around here for quite a long time, Mr. Chairman, and I have heard lawyers talking about legal terminology, the meaning of terms such as "may", "shall", and "forthwith". Perhaps the minister could tell us just what "forthwith" means. Does it mean one day, two days, ten days, five days? In the past, in cases where there was a pretty rough foreman or superintendent, sometimes a worker was never taken back to work. I am informed that in certain areas now the word is out from foremen and supervisors to this effect, "We are going to fix you. We had 64 employees and now we are going to get along with 40."

Much as we may dislike the situation, now that it has been introduced into this chamber we are responsible for what takes place. Are we going to arrange it so that these men go back to work one day after the act comes into force, or are they going to be tagging along for several weeks, as was mentioned by the hon. member for Skeena? Indeed, in some instances where there is a personality conflict or a clash of some sort, the worker will probably not get back. The minister has said that the workers would be standing around doing nothing. From my knowledge of the CN there is plenty of work to be done around the yards and the stations. If they want to get the work done, and have excess labour for a few days, they can easily find work for them.

I think it is the duty of the minister to tell this committee during the discussion on the amendment just what he means. He is speaking now on behalf of the government. Are these men going to be penalized? Are they going to suffer? Are they going to be discriminated against? Are those who went on strike on a certain day going to be working the day the trains get moving again? Are they going to be called back as soon as everything gets moving? I suggest that they should.

Mr. Munro (Hamilton East): Mr. Chairman, I have already indicated that it is the government's desire to protect all the strikers, all those laid off. It is also our desire to see that not only are their jobs protected, but that the railways, which are ordered by this legislation to resume operations immediately, act with promptness to bring these men back on the job.

One of the protections in the bill is ordering the railways, as soon as this bill comes into force, to resume operations immediately. The legislation guarantees the jobs of the strikers and of all those laid off as a consequence of this strike. They will be brought back with reasonable promptness. Their jobs are protected.

It is certainly the government's desire not to leave any employee open to discrimination or to prevent him from getting back his job reasonably promptly after this bill is passed, and after the railways get back into operation. We can attempt to devise some wording that will cast a burden on the railways to act promptly.

I wish the hon. member would appreciate that we cannot very well come up with wording that imposes an absolute obligation from the minute this bill comes into force to bring every single solitary person back. It will take a considerable number of days before the railways can be in full operation just as they were prior to the commencement of the selective strikes. I am sure we can devise some appropriate wording that will be satisfactory to the hon. member who just spoke and to the hon. member for Skeena. That is why I suggest the clause should stand to see what we can work out.

Mr. Baldwin: Mr. Chairman, I wish to make a suggestion. This illustrates the points that have been made here before. There are 264 tried and true men and women trying to write legislation. I stood with 12 lawyers and 12 politicians trying to draft proposals. I know how difficult it is.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Baldwin: I should say lawyers and would-be politicians. I suggest that the minister and his officials exercise their ingenuity and try to come up with a general covering clause, something to the effect that no person acting on behalf of the railway company shall allow, or permit, any form of discrimination to be exercised against any person who has been on strike who lost his position temporarily by reason of the strike. If you do that, you cover everything. If we try to cover every case without a covering clause, we will be in trouble. We will be here all night.

Mr. Munro (Hamilton East): I agree with that, Mr. Chairman. The act already prevents discrimination. The problem is the promptness in bringing back the people. With our ingenuity I think we can devise some wording that will be satisfactory to cover the whole thing.

Mr. Blenkarn: Mr. Chairman, we have heard a lot about management being the big bad guys. The real problem is that this government and this minister refused to take the responsibility of preventing this strike.

We have heard a lot about the men on strike. They may wind up not having a job. For five weeks the railways have not been in operation. Alternative methods have been found to ship goods. Do we expect the railway to take on people it no longer needs? Should it be a great big feather bed?

It is about time the government started talking about the people in this country, the lost business, lost trade, and everything else. This government did not bother with its constitutional responsibility. It has a constitutional responsibility to ensure that transportation exists between the provinces. This government has not come up with any subsidy for the businessmen, the tourist industry and others who have lost their shirts because this government could not fulfil its responsibility.

Let's get down to reason. Let's get these railways operating again, but let's not have a great big feather bed to protect everybody forever.

Mr. Rodriguez: Mr. Chairman, I was glad to hear the last speaker make the comments he did. They were certainly revealing to any person who stands up in this House and says he is really concerned about the workers.

I just wish to point out that the security of jobs for these men is very important. We must consider what was done in 1966 in terms of calling the men back to work. I am sure there are many things to be done to get the railways back in operation. These men have been standing around not doing anything for the past five weeks. It will be some small compensation for the company to pay these men, even though they may not be doing anything for the next two weeks, waiting for everything to get rolling again.

Mr. Deputy Chairman: Is it agreed that clause 4 be stood at this time?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Deputy Chairman: Clause 4 will stand at this time.

Clause 4 stands.

On Clause 5—Terms of collective agreements amended.

Mr. McGrath: Mr. Chairman, we have a very important amendment to clause 5. Our amendment is consistent with the views put forward in the House today by my leader and the views I put forward in the House yesterday on behalf of my party. Very simply put, we believe that the very least that the unions should have as a basis for operation is the real rate of inflation that exists in the country at the present time.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. McGrath: As a consequence, I move the following amendment to clause 5:

That subclause 5(1) of Bill C-217 be amended by striking out the word "thirty" where the same appears in line 39 on page 3 thereof and substituting therefor the word "thirty-four", the word "five" where the same appears in line 1 on page 4 thereof and substituting therefor the words "six and one-half", and the word "three" where the same appear in line 6 on page 4 thereof and substituting therefor the words "one and one-half".

Mr. Benjamin: Mr. Chairman, I rise to speak on clause 5 and the amendment moved by the hon. member for St. John's East. It was said in this debate last night, and again today, that we are not legislating a settlement. What the government has in legislation is a minimum base package below which future arbitration cannot fall. I should like to suggest as strongly as I can that the base package proposed in the legislation is neither just nor fair. It is not sufficient. I know there is concern in the minds of many members, particularly those on my right, lest we become involved in some sort of bidding game. I want to avoid this as much as they do.

The Deputy Chairman: May we have order, please? It is very difficult to hear what the hon. member is saying. This is an important piece of legislation and the co-operation of all hon. members is desirable.

Mr. Benjamin: As you will recall, Mr. Chairman, the hon. member for York South gave notice yesterday of our feelings on this point. In spite of remarks made by the Minister of Transport about the difficulty of knowing what is fair or just, I see no reason why members of the House should not form an opinion for themselves and be ready to express it. We have taken on this responsibility. What we are doing is legislating at least this minimum package.

We have heard much about the national interest—how it ought to be placed above an individual interest or the right to strike in any kind of service, public or otherwise. I submit we cannot allow the principle of public interest to be subverted by legislation which is unfair, legislation which compels people to go back to work on a basis which is unjust. I assume all members of this House are reasonable men and that they wish to be fair. This is not a bidding game to see who can get the most cents an hour for the non-operating unions. I hope all of them will listen carefully to the recommendations of Professor Weldon and his reasons for making them, and then come to the conclusion that they are not unreasonable.

I submit that the Canadian public does not expect parliament, in the course of protecting the broad public interest, to be unfair to the smaller number involved in this labour dispute. I am sure my good friends in the official opposition who have sat with me on the transport committee for the last five years know whereof I speak and that they would agree with me when I say the proposals made by Professor Weldon are fair and just. They represent, I submit, the least we can do by way of a base package in our back to work legislation.

Let me remind you, Mr. Chairman, that the union demand of November 1, 1972, was 55 cents an hour for 1973 and 15 per cent for 1974, plus some premiums for shift work. It is perfectly true that Professor Weldon was the union's appointee to the conciliation board. What he recommends, however, is substantially less than the non-operating unions demanded of the railroads. Professor Weldon recommends 10.79 per cent in the second year of the contract and 38 cents an hour in the first year of the contract, and he does so on the following grounds: 5.45 per cent of the increase represents the inflation factor. Note, this is not the inflation factor arrived at by the non-op unions or by Professor Weldon himself, but the inflation factor arrived at by the Time magazine board of economists, and one would hardly call them a bunch of raving radicals. We all know that inflation at its present rate will amount to 7 or 8 per cent in 1973.

Professor Weldon also recommends a further 3.34 per cent to cover productivity increases—not those related to the railways, which are in the neighbourhood of 6 per cent, but the national productivity increase which the same economists put at 3.34 per cent. Surely hon. members will agree that this is reasonable. He also recommends a further 2 per cent in each of those two years for what the trade union movement and the non-op unions in particular call a catch-up.

There is little disagreement with the claim that the non-operating unions have fallen behind those engaged in comparable industries, that their position has worsened with respect not only to workers in the manufacturing industry but with respect to their counterparts in the United States. Professor Weldon measures this discrepancy as being around 6 per cent. He carefully recommends that these workers get 2 per cent of the 6 per cent in the current year and a further 2 per cent next year. Hopefully, they will be able to negotiate the remaining 2 per cent in a future year.

Mr. Chairman, would you be good enough to ask my colleagues to soften their conversations so that you can hear me?

The Deputy Chairman: Order, please. Again, I would invite hon. members again to co-operate with the Chair, even those standing behind the curtains, by asking them to make as little noise as possible so we can hear one another, and at least so the hon. member who has the floor can hear himself and get the impression that he is being listened to.

Mr. Benjamin: Thank you, Mr. Chairman. In my usual kind and soft manner I am trying to be as persuasive as possible. I would remind the hon. members for St. John's East, Moncton, that railroad town, London East, Crowfoot, St. Boniface and others who worked on this subject of transportation in committee over the last several years, of the discussions, and the information we had received long before Professor Weldon submitted his report.

Professor Weldon's recommendations are substantially less than requested by the unions, but they amount to 26 cents per hour, over two years, more than is provided in this bill. As was said earlier today, I think this is the least we can do to ensure that we legislate the end of this emergency. What is more important, I submit, is the fact that Professor Weldon's proposal is necessary to ensure protection to the broad public interest, and to ensure that we are being just and fair to the railway workers of the country.

This suggested award would cost the consumers of railroad services and, or, the taxpayers of this country something in the order of $8 or $9 per capita in each of these two years. I submit to hon. members that this is a reasonable price to pay for good and efficient rail service. More important, this is a very reasonable price to pay for the provision of fair and just treatment to these employees we all agree are so essential. That is not an unreasonable price to pay in order that we be fair, just, and properly reward these essential, trained, conscientious and efficient workers.

Therefore, Mr. Chairman, I wish to move a sub-amendment as follows:

> That the amendment be amended by striking out the words "thirty-four" and by substituting therefor the words "thirty-eight", and also by deleting all the words of the amendment after the words "thirty-four" or "thirty-eight", as the case may be, and substituting therefor the following words:
> "and by deleting all the words after the word 'Part' in line 1 on page 4, and substituting therefor the words 'by 10.8 per cent effective January 1, 1974'".

The clause with the sub-amendment and the amendment would then read:

> The terms and conditions of each collective agreement to which this Part applies are amended forthwith by increasing each hourly basic rate of wages in effect on December 31, 1972, as established by or pursuant to such agreement, by thirty-eight cents per hour effective January 1, 1973 and by increasing each hourly basic rate of wages in effect on December 31, 1973, as established by or pursuant to such agreement and pursuant to this Part, by 10.8 per cent effective January 1, 1974.

The remainder of that clause would be deleted.

May I close this portion of my remarks by appealing to hon. members on both sides of the House to decide that this amount is the least we can provide in order to be fair and just to railway employees while serving the broader public interest in ending this emergency situation created by the interruption of our rail services.

Nobody can suggest that this amount is unreasonable. Those on the management side of negotiations have literally agreed that this is not an unreasonable position. May I repeat, for the benefit of my hon. friends in the back corner here, that we are not interested in some kind of a bidding game and do not want this bill to fall into that situation. We have moved this sub-amendment and I can only wish that the hon. member for St. John's East had suggested these figures. We have moved the sub-amendment in a further attempt to persuade members in all parts of the House that this is a more fair and just piece of legislation than originally proposed in order to send our railway workers back to work.

If anyone can point out any unreasonableness in this proposal, or show in any way that it is excessive or inflationary, I would be glad to hear from him. I would invite the Minister of Finance to indicate how it is unreasonable, unjust or excessive.

One might expect that a union appointee to the conciliation board would bring down a higher amount than was suggested. I think the fact that he did not is further evidence that this board was very careful, and that Professor Weldon made a reasoned study of this whole matter.

My own personal feeling is that the chairman of the conciliation board came up with his figure because it was half way between the other two, but did not make the effort that Professor Weldon made. When one looks at the differences in the thicknesses of the two reports it is not hard to realize that Professor Weldon devoted more time and effort than anyone else on that board.

May I close by urging hon. members not to subvert the wider public interest by legislating unfair and unjust wage conditions on those railway workers we are sending back to work.

The Deputy Chairman: Order, please. Hon. members of the committee have heard the amendment proposed by the hon. member for Regina-Lake Centre.

• (2210)

Mr. Munro (Hamilton East): Mr. Chairman, we now have the amendment from the hon. member for Regina-Lake Centre. He is indicating Weldon at 10.8 per cent, I take it, and is recommending Weldon the second year between 10 per cent and 11 per cent. We anticipate from the Conservative Party 34 cents for the non-ops in the first year which, if you want to translate it into percentage points, is about 9.6. They have developed their rationale for that. The hon. member for Regina-Lake Centre has developed his rationale. I understand that before the night is over the Social Credit Party will have its variation in respect of what the wage package should be. This is briefly where we are now. We are engaged in an auction while the strike is on. Every party will have its varied and different position with regard to what it feels is just.

The hon. member asked me what I felt was fair and just. It is not for the government or myself to determine what is fair and just in this particular case right here.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Munro (Hamilton East): Surely what is for us to decide in Parliament is how we can inaugurate a process, the best in our imagination, to guarantee a fair and just result in terms of wages and all the other rights. Perhaps in answer to the hon. member for Regina-Lake Centre when he asked me whether I consider Weldon—I think that is how he put it—at 10.8 per cent is a fair and just determination, I should say I do not know. Maybe in the view of others, the chairman, the companies and so on, who were involved in all the hearings to which I was not a party, it is too low. Also I might add maybe it is too high. But that is not the point that we are here to determine. We are here to determine what is the fairest and most equitable process by which we can guarantee that the non-ops, the shopcrafts and the trainmen after final determination, undoubtedly by an arbitrator, can get a complete package in terms of wages and the other considerations that will be in the hands of the arbitrator we are talking about.

There is the question of job security. We have talked about pensions. I will have suggestions later tonight in terms of amendments to guarantee improvements in these particular areas by special reference to the arbitrator, letting him know that this Parliament wants him to look at them. There are other ways to do it. We could have a special reference in the legislation directing the attention of the arbitrator to certain areas which concern parliamentarians.

The non-ops are concerned about catch-up. The allegation is that their basic rates are too low and that percentages do not favour them. Maybe there is some validity to that. However, that question is not on the floor of the House for us to determine. There can be a reference to the arbitrator to look into questions of this kind and make his determination. In the meantime we have the chairman's report in each case as the base. If we pay that now, the workers will receive it retroactively based on that recommendation. They will get it while the arbitrator is at work.

However, in respect of all these other questions as to whether the base rates are too low, whether the relationships between the non-ops and other groups is correct or not, and whether the levels between the non-ops and other occupations of the railways are equivalent to other similar and analogous classifications in the private sector, these are all questions which surely, on the floor of parliament, we are not qualified to determine. We can ensure by reference to the arbitrator that consideration will be given to these questions.

I said yesterday, on the introduction of the bill, that I would expect automatically that the first thing the arbitrator would take into account would be the cost of living since the date of the conciliation report. So, why do we have to negotiate this on the floor of the House? We now have the bidding system in respect of 34 cents and 38 cents, and we have not yet studied the suggestion of the Social Credit Party. Why do we not let the arbitrator decide it?

I wonder whether anyone has considered the implications of what might happen in terms of labour disputes relative to this parliament and labour disputes falling within federal jurisdiction. By the time this bidding system is over tonight, and if there should be a variation of the procedure in the bill, I would try to convince all those people who believe in free collective bargaining that the procedure in this legislation is the best defence against the advocates of compulsory arbitration. I will tell you why.

If we start negotiating on the floor of this House, and making our own subjective judgments instead of leaving it to the other process, then the worker may decide that he can get a better deal from the parliamentarians on the floor of parliament. Why then should he go through the conciliation process and receive a conciliation chairman's report which often forms the basis for the settlement arrived at later? The parties to the dispute may say that parliament is prepared to enter the picture and make suggestions. I think in this way we would have added another step to the whole process.

The parties involved may say: let us go through negotiation, through mediation and through conciliation, and then let us go to parliament on them all. I would think that those who advocate the bidding system here should in the future be fair and honest enough to accept some responsibility if this should be a start down the road to many more labour disputes coming to the floor of parliament, particularly when they should be settled outside parliament.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Munro (Hamilton East): Let those who advocate the bidding system tonight also take on the responsibility if there are more strikes which are pre-conditioned to be determined on the floor of parliament and if this should involve compulsory arbitration—and sometimes we hear this—let the people who are part of this bidding system take the responsibility for compulsory arbitration, something which none of us really want. I think this is the first disastrous step toward that end, and I think we should stop it right now and get back to the fundamental issue.

● (2220)

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Munro (Hamilton East): If all parties concerned are convinced—and I am sure this is a reasonable thing to ask—that an arbitrator will be appointed, one who is a fair and reasonable man, he can then take into account all the factors and all the points that were made. He can look at Hansard and the arguments that have been advanced, the concerns of parliamentarians and of everyone else, and no doubt he will do that. That is also one of the fundamental guarantees of a fair and equitable settlement outside of parliament, the only place where it should be made.

There is no sense in my repeating these remarks.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Munro (Hamilton East): There is no sense in my repeating what this may do to the whole bargaining process, how it may lead to further disputes winding up on the floor of parliament, with each parliamentarian proposing a new variation and making subjective judgments with respect to further disputes that will wind up here in the future. Are the Conservative party and the NDP going to influence the conciliation board chairman with respect to one or another dispute?

I think that the step we are taking tonight is a very serious one indeed, and I believe that my party, and the government of which I am a member, are prepared to stand behind the principle that is embodied in this bill. We are in opposition to the amendments which get us into a bidding system, with the disastrous results which I have described.

I want to assure hon. members that I am not one who, during my involvement in political life, has ever been unsympathetic to the workers, especially the group of workers at the low end of the totem pole. Never in my political life have I been opposed to their interests.

An hon. Member: Except now.

Mr. Munro (Hamilton East): What I am ensuring is that they have an 8½ per cent floor and 30 cents instead of 34 cents or 38 cents.

Mr. Baldwin: Why 30 cents?

Mr. Munro (Hamilton East): Because Mr. Justice Munroe recommended it.

[Mr. Munro (Hamilton East).]

Mr. Baldwin: Is this immutable and forever?

Mr. Munro (Hamilton East): No, not immutable, but because he made that determination and because under the bill we can appoint an arbitrator who can take into account all the wage considerations. If you want to talk about the non ops, who are the main concern in the amendment, perhaps the arbitrator will come to the conclusion that more than 34 cents or 35 cents should be given, but it is he who should make that determination and take into account the differentiation in the cost of living since Mr. Craig Munroe's report of July 13.

I also want to point out that we do not want our position nor do I want my position to be interpreted as meaning that somehow we are opposed to these workers getting more.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Munro (Hamilton East): It is quite the opposite. Any effort that I have made was to assist the parties in arriving at a settlement outside of the House which in my view, had it been successful, would no doubt have resulted in the workers getting more than is proposed in the bill. I am now saying it publicly that, in my own judgment, I feel that that might have been the result. But it was not, and we are here, and I think we should follow this line because otherwise we will end up in a hopeless quagmire when it comes to the resolution of future labour disputes.

For those reasons I think I have the support of my party, and I believe these amendments, and the bidding system which started off with the 34 cents and the 38 cents, should be rejected by all hon. members.

Mr. Stanfield: Mr. Chairman, I want to say just a word because I have been over this ground earlier today. I will repeat my understanding and my approval of the fact that we are not here to try to write a collective agreement, and certainly we should not be involved in any bidding or auction game, or anything of that sort.

I want to emphasize that with regard to the second year of the agreement the change that we are proposing is a change which gives the non-operating unions the same percentage increase, as good a deal or no worse a deal, depending upon one's point of view, as the other two unions. It is not justifiable to ask non-ops to go back to work on a poorer settlement in percentage terms for 1974 than the other two parties.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Stanfield: I doubt that there is any real difference of opinion about that so far as 1974 is concerned. So far as 1973 is concerned, we are simply prepared to support a determination by parliament that the rate of inflation for 1973 has exceeded expectations by that per cent, and it is on that basis that we are recommending the 4 cent increase. But I want to say that that is the only departure from the recommendation of the chairman of the committee that I am prepared to support. Therefore, I am not prepared to support the subamendment recommending 38 cents, and I will be voting against it.

Mr. Marchand (Langelier): Why?

Mr. Stanfield: Because in my judgment we are not here to effect a settlement.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Stanfield: We are here to put a bill to the House that will get the railways operating on a fair basis.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): Your bill is not a settlement.

Mr. Douglas: Mr. Chairman, in clause 5 of this bill we come to the nub of this legislation because it sets forth the financial terms upon which we will require some 56,000 non-operating workers to go back on the job pending future compulsory arbitration. The government is forcing parliament to go through a ritual dance which would be a charade if it were not a tragedy.

For 25 years in this country there has been no genuine process of collective bargaining for railway workers. The railway workers have had hanging over their heads, like the sword of Damocles, the knowledge that if they went on strike the government of the day would convene parliament and force them back to work. The railways have known that, and have used that for their own sinister purposes.

The railways have never bargained in good faith. The Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Labour, who is the hon. member for London East, himself has said that the railways have not in this case bargained in good faith. They have always known that if they dragged their feet and delayed reaching a decision, the government would call parliament together and force the workers back to work.

What we are facing in this country at present is a contrived national crisis in which the railways have deliberately brought about a situation where the public is being deprived of essential services, where the economy is being dislocated, and where the public is demanding that the strike be brought to an end by some means or other. That is why this entire debate is a charade, because the real process of free, collective bargaining does not exist in this case.

Mr. Reilly: Hear, hear!

Mr. Douglas: The minister said that there will be certain implications if the amendment or subamendment are accepted. I submit there will be implications if they are not accepted, because the railways will know once again that if they refuse to bargain in good faith in the future, and precipitate a strike, the workers will once more be sent back to work at a basic wage which is acceptable to the company, even if it is not acceptable to the workers. If the minister, who says he wants to preserve the process of free collective bargaining, is sincere, the best way he can demonstrate that sincerity is by putting into this bill a figure which will be acceptable to the employees, and the railways will not be so quick in future to precipitate a situation which will require parliament to send men back to work.

Why does the government not do this? We listened to a fine demonstration of rhetoric on the part of the Minister of Transport. This proved the adage that no one is so vehement and enthusiastic as a recent convert to the establishment. He asked, "Who knows what is a fair settlement?" Tonight the Minister of Labour got up and said, "We are not here to make a fair and just settlement." He said he does not know what is a fair figure at which to send the men back to work.

I point out that the Minister of Labour has in his possession all the records of the hearings of the conciliation board and all the advice of the officials of his department, of the conciliators and of the mediators; yet he does not know what is a fair settlement. No wonder his intervention was such a disaster when he tried to bring the parties together. Both the Minister of Transport and the Minister of Labour say, "We cannot negotiate this matter on the floor of parliament." The Leader of the Opposition even said that we cannot draft an agreement. Mr. Chairman, this is precisely what we are doing, and the government will not deceive anybody with this kind of rhetoric.

What is the government doing? It is asking this parliament to take from a group of men the right to withhold their labour, and to send them back to work at a figure set by parliament. The only other recourse available to those men is to go to an arbitrator, who is unknown, and who will make the final decision as to what their incomes will be for 1973 and 1974.

Is there any other group in Canada whose income will be dependent on a bill passed by this House and on the decision of a single arbitrator? Will any arbitrator set the price of cars sold by General Motors? Is anybody going to say what people should sell a television set or radio for? Is any arbitrator going to decide what the fees will be of lawyers, doctors and insurance agents in this country? Is any arbitrator going to decide what interest rates will be charged by the banks?

An hon. Member: Yes.

Mr. Douglas: Under this legislation the government is asking parliament to send men back to work at a figure that is not acceptable to them, and to leave the final disposition of their income rates for 1973 and 1974 in the hands of an arbitrator. I submit that if the government is to ask this parliament to deprive a group of workers of their basic rights in a free society, we have an obligation to put into this legislation a guaranteed minimum that will at least be acceptable to them. It may not necessarily be all they want, but it ought to be acceptable to them. We must then hope that the arbitrator will give them some additional income in order to compensate them for having lagged behind steadily for the last 15 or 20 years.

The Minister of Labour says that we are now engaged in a bidding contest. This is not a matter of bidding. The question which faces this committee of the whole, this parliament, is twofold. First, what is a minimum, just figure which ought to be given to these men in return for compelling them to go back to work?

Mr. Railton: Do you not want them to go back to work?

Mr. Douglas: The hon. member asks if I do not want them to go back to work. I want the men to go back to work, and the best way to get them back is by treating them fairly and justly and giving them a wage that is fair and just, and this bill will not do it.

The minister talked about bidding. We are not talking about bidding. We are not talking about 55 cents; that is what the employees are asking, but the non-ops have indicated they would be prepared to go back to work on the basis of 10.8 per cent in 1973 and 1974. Surely that is the very least they ought to be given.

I agree that here, in the House of Commons, we cannot deal with job security and the pension plan. That is too complicated. We may be able to discuss these matters in some standing committee of the House at a later date. Yet when we are legislating, surely we have the responsibility to legislate a figure that is acceptable to these men.

I do not agree with the right hon. member for Prince Albert who talked about an attempt to blackmail parliament, since I think the officials of the non-op unions were quite right to tell this government what their attitude would be before this legislation was passed, and to say that they are perfectly certain they cannot sell the provisions of this bill to their union members. They would not have been fair to us or to the people of Canada if they had not expressed their views.

I remind the Minister of Labour that this is not a matter of bidding. This is a matter of finding a figure which is not only fair and just, but which is also acceptable. You can lead a horse to water but you cannot make it drink; or, as John L. Lewis said many years ago to President Roosevelt, "You cannot dig coal with bayonets." You cannot force men to work against their will. Ever since the day when Abraham Lincoln freed the slaves, no one on this continent has been compelled to work against his will.

The railway system is so essential that this parliament is ordering men back to work. If we are going to order them back to work let us do so in terms that are not only acceptable to the men but are acceptable to the Canadian people.

I want to tell the Minister of Labour and the Minister of Transport that they will live to regret the speeches they made today, and the Liberal party will live to regret them. Not only do the men who are affected feel that the offer made in this legislation is too low, but that is also the reaction across the country. Read the newspaper editorials—get the reports coming in from all over the country which show that the public is convinced that these men are being treated shabbily and that parliament is being asked to use its muscle to impose an unjust settlement.

I want to remind the Minister of Transport, who said this morning "You can't change this thing when you get into committee; we are not going to start changing it in committee of the whole." The President of the Privy Council will recall that in 1966 the Right Hon. Lester B. Pearson brought in a similar piece of legislation to send the railway workers back to the job. He made certain proposals in that legislation, but when it was pointed out to him in the House, and in committee of the whole, that the figure was unacceptable, unfair and unjust, the government of that day brought in an amendment and raised it. The result was that the legislation passed and the workers accepted it.

If the government is prepared to accept the figure of 10.8 per cent that we are proposing for each of the years, 1973 and 1974, I think the House would accept it. I think the country would accept it and, most important the workers would accept it and get back on the job. That is the principle task that faces this House—to get a settlement that the workers will accept.

[Translation]

Mr. Fortin: Mr. Chairman, unfortunately it would seem that this extremely important debate will go on and on but the situation remains. We have been called back for an emergency. However, after having heard the remarks of the Minister of Labour (Mr. Munro), it is my duty to speak at this moment and to define certain issues that have been raised.

Mr. Chairman, when we were recalled at a moment when the rotating strike had become a national crisis, people were speaking of the isolated Maritimes provinces, of industries that could not get supplies. What happened? We were recalled here to tell the 56,000 workers "the negotiations have failed, mediation has failed, arbitration has failed and now you will go back to work". And on what conditions? These conditions are set forth in the government bill itself.

The Minister of Labour seems to have forgotten that it is not Parliament that has established the rate of 30 cents or the 5 or 3 per cent. The Minister of Labour should know that it is not the members who have put that in the bill but that he did it himself with his senior officials.

Mr. Chairman, in this manner, the government admitted the power of Parliament to amend this bill, to improve it, because the goal of this Parliament is to establish justice in this country and therefore we submit that we have the right to amend the bill.

If the argument of the Minister of Labour were logical and according to procedure, it would mean that the only power Parliament has is to say to the ministers and to the government: Yes, we approve entirely of your bill. Now, if such were the case, Parliament would no longer be a democratic institution, the hon. member would no longer represent the true interests of the Canadian workers, including railwaymen, and that would mean a total waste of time on our part.

Mr. Chairman, the minister would like Parliament to ratify all of the failures of mediation, of negotiation and of arbitration. Now I do not know what the other parties will do but I know that, for our part, we are here not only to see that 56,000 workers will go back to work, but to stand by an ideology in which we firmly believe, namely that every Canadian citizen should have the right to live decently, to earn a living under healthy and acceptable working conditions. And if the renewal mechanisms concerning the collective agreement, mediation and arbitration have failed to work, it means not that those workers tried to overdo it, but merely that those mechanisms are out of date, that they no longer can cope with the requirements of labour and that it is extremely urgent to modernize the negotiation mechanisms so that Parliament will no longer find itself in a situation like this one.

The minister has been referring to some kind of bidding and said: The Progressive Conservatives want this figure, the NDP want a different one and the Social Credit Party still a third one. Mr. Chairman, we are not trying to outdo others here. It is our duty as members to do what bargaining, mediation and arbitration should have done, and if those processes have failed, Mr. Chairman, it is for the Minister of Labour to improve them rather than to blame members who really want to discharge their duties.

Mr. Chairman, that is why our party intends to propose an amendment later through one of my colleagues. That amendment will not be intended to do one better than others. It will be moved consistent with the philosophy of the Social Credit according to which each Canadian citizen has a right to be reasonably well off and it is the primary duty of the government to ensure an honest living to Canadians whether or not employed. And it is not because 56,000 workers in Canada have decided to improve their lot that we will behave like sheep, that we will approve the government and tell them to return to work without doing them justice. Our primary duty is to do justice to those workers without forgetting all the while that justice should extend to the whole country.

[English]

Mr. Rose: Mr. Chairman, I am sorry that the Minister of Labour is not in the House at the moment. Perhaps he is calming his frazzled nerves behind the curtain. Perhaps he needs to, because he has been through a very difficult period.

I should like to remind the minister that when he castigates members of this House for becoming part of the auction system and part of the bidding system, he himself started the bidding. One of the difficulties with his bid is that it is the low bid. In my view it is the kind of bid that will be unacceptable to most of the people who are concerned in this labour dispute.

The men may go back to work—some of the men may go back to work and some may not. My riding is affected by the strike in negative ways as there is a poultry industry, a dairy industry and a cattle industry there, and the feed situation is difficult at this time. I am not going to go into details because nobody is in the mood to listen tonight anyway.

We seem to be locked into a fixed position, but the amendment put forward by the Official Opposition may very well be passed. I certainly intend to support it. I am only sorry that I have to support it if our amendment fails. I regret that the Leader of the Opposition, by being "responsible", has seen fit to grant these men nothing to catch up after 25 years of being behind.

These men were once kings of the road. They were number one in the industrial world all across Canada. Because they have been put into this position they are now twenty-seventh or twenty-eighth. Why? They are in that position because they do not have access to what is guaranteed to other workers—free collective bargaining.

What are we doing? We are legislating them back to work under a system of compulsory arbitration, for the good of the country. We know they must go back to work. However, what kind of a situation are we placing ourselves in if we, as responsible legislators, legislate 56,000 or even 156,000 bitter, resentful men who are trapped in their jobs, many of which are lousy, back to work because they are essential?

The patience of these men is exhausted. If the Minister of Labour does not know that by now, he has no sensitivity about the feelings of these men and the dynamics of the situation, certainly in my part of the country. Some people have talked about 38 cents. We are part of the auction. Give them the world. Give them a buck. Give them anything because you support organized labour. However, that is not the case. A CNR switchman with a wife and two children in my riding, working full time, would be better off on welfare. That is the situation. What has a man like that got to lose by not going back to work? He has a lousy job, lousy working conditions, a lousy pension and no security. Are you going to appeal rationally and reasonably to people who are being pushed around like this?

I want the strike to be settled. I want it settled with the minimum of fuss. I want reasonable justice for these men. To try and avoid fuss would be wasting everybody's time. If you avoid a fuss, there will be real trouble. It is not just wages. These men are being subjected to kangaroo courts. They do not have any grievance procedure. They have company spooks with them on the job.

I humbly submit to the Minister of Labour that we are in trouble. A very serious situation is brewing in the railroad industry all across Canada. No one can be blind to that. The minister has sent people out there to look into the situation. The minister was powerless before, and tonight he is again powerless.

I do not advocate disobeying the law. However, I am not going to vote for any resolution, motion or bill that will send these men back into the situation they have been in for the past generation. The former minister of labour, the hon. member for Verdun, says there will be more flexibility. This means that if you are earning 30 cents you might be able to go up to 37 or 38 cents. However, if you are at 38 cents, there is no flexibility. Are all these people going to be driving Cadillacs next week if they get 38 cents? That is nonsense, and everyone knows it.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Rose: This session an opposition member is chairman of the transport committee. Do members know what has been brought before the committee so far this year? Nothing! This country is crippled because of transportation problems, but nothing has been referred to that committee. Why not? Because the chairman is an opposition member. Because someone had the temerity to move that he be chairman, the committee did not get anything to consider. The committee did not get the CNR financing bill. How is the CNR being financed? Every year the CNR financing bill, which involves $500 million or $600 million, is trotted out. We have not seen it this year. Where is the CNR annual report? We cannot have it. The committee wanted to travel throughout western Canada to look at some of the problems. Were we permitted to do that? No. We might have headed off this sort of strike. Many members of parliament could have been considerably more knowledgeable about the dynamics and injustices of this issue if we had had that opportunity to travel.

Obviously, the CNR is not going to let down the CPR. The CN is a Crown corporation. Or is it? I do not understand the niggardly position of CN on wages and, for that matter, pensions. The top pension for a retired CN employee, 65 years of age, is $228 a month. What is it for Air Canada and the public service? It is $322. What happens when we talk about pensions for these people? Usually there is talk about some scandal, or the funds having been invested at very low interest rates. Why does CN not want to pay higher wages? It is because they are trying to maximize the return to the bond holders. We do not know who are the bond holders.

The CN is in the unusual situation of being its own transfer agent. We know that 42 per cent of the ballots are held privately. The only other corporation in that situation is Ontario Hydro—and look at the fun they have been having lately. In the past two years, $59 million was paid to private bond holders. They expect a settlement might cost that or even a little more. Are these shares going to the pensioners or are they going to retired school teachers, the Imperial Bank of Commerce, the Royal Bank, the Banque Canadienne Nationale, TransCanada Pipe Lines, or insurance companies?

The CN might have started originally as a trusteeship to liquidate the Grand Trunk debt and the debts of other little railroads. However, this situation was changed in 1960. We are here to protect the advantages of Canada. I am not sure whether the preoccupation of the CN with its bond market satisfies that intention. Neither will the niggardly, pitiful proposal of a 30 cents increase do that. That is not in the best interests of Canadians: all members of this House should realize that. Members should vote for the subamendment. I hope that some kind of sanity will prevail here sooner or later so that we can get this country back on the rails.

Mr. McGrath: Mr. Chairman, there should be no question about why we are here tonight. We are here tonight for two reasons, first, the failure of the government to deal with inflation and, second, the failure of the Minister of Labour to settle the dispute. We are not here to participate in any bidding game. Since the report of the conciliation board was brought down, since the report of the chairman was delivered to the Minister of Labour on July 13, inflation has run rampant in this country and as a consequence my leader, whose remarks were misrepresented by the Minister of Labour tonight, has taken the responsible attitude he ought to take as Leader of the Opposition by acknowledging that fact.

The Minister of Labour talks about the opposition participating in a bidding game. The fact of the matter is we accept the arguments put forward today by the Minister of Transport but we feel the government does not recognize the gravity of the inflationary situation we face. The Minister of Labour failed to take that factor into account. Incorporated in the bill presented by the government is a report of the chairman of the conciliation board. I agree with the Minister of Labour that this is the report which should be before the House tonight because we, as parliamentarians, have no business settling this dispute. We should accept the report of the chairman of the conciliation board because he is supposed to be neutral. But we have a responsibility to protect the workers of this country from the effects of inflation, and this is what we are trying to do by way of our amendment.

We put forward our amendment as a responsible amendment. We go one step further and try to narrow the disparity which exists between the non-ops, the shop crafts and the trainmen. This is why we have "upped the ante" for the second year. We cannot and will not accept the sub-amendment put forward by the NDP because they are in fact engaged in an auction game, and theirs is an irresponsible move.

Some hon. Members: Oh!

Mr. McGrath: I submit to you, Mr. Chairman, that we moved our amendment as a serious amendment in the honest conviction that, notwithstanding the failure of the government to recognize its responsibility, we have a duty to protect the workers of the country from the effects of the spiralling inflation we now face.

Mr. Harney: I must admit, Mr. Chairman, I was somewhat impressed by what the Minister of Labour apparently intended to say, but I was stunned by one phrase he used, a phrase which apparently he did not intend to use. He referred to the crisis which is before the country now as being a labour dispute. I submit it is prejudicial to refer to this conflict as a labour dispute. It is a dispute between labour and capital; it is a dispute between employer and employees. It is not a labour dispute. It is most important for members to recognize that it takes two sides to tangle. Surely, if we allow this kind of thinking, as exhibited by the Minister of Labour, to form the presupposition for the reasoning we use in order to settle such disputes, we obviously will always come down much more heavily on one side than on the other.

This is why, in this kind of legislation, which is an aspect of bargaining, we say three things. First, to the railways: You will operate the railways forthwith. Second, to the workers: You will go back to work. Then, to the workers again, we say this: You will go back to work at a certain rate. But because of the attitude of mind built up in so many of us we have failed to tell the railway companies that they must operate the railways at a certain profit and no more. What would be so irrational about doing this? If we can legislate workers back to work and tell them we accept a certain payment, why should we not look very closely also at the operation of the companies, and their profits, and what they are doing in terms of the savings of the Canadian people invested in their enterprises?

I rose, really, to establish just one point. It concerns the right of the House of Commons to make an act of judgment in this matter. The government initiated this act of judgment by calling us all back and presenting us with a bill containing a number of specifics having to do not only with a money settlement but with other important matters.

For example, the bill contains a clause which says that the wage settlement shall apply retroactively. It could have been presented to us without such a clause. This was an act of judgment on the part of the government. It was also an act of judgment to specify a minimum rate as a basis for further negotiation and arbitration.

The Progressive Conservative Party presented its own act of judgment. It said the government proposal did not go far enough. I do not care whether they call it an adjustment or what they call it, they are simply saying: you are not paying these men enough. We in this party reserve the right to do the same. Our view is that the settlement is niggardly. Our view is that we have the power, the right and the duty to discuss this settlement fully, including the question of wage rates.

I listened carefully to the Minister of Transport this morning. It was hard to avoid listening to him carefully, he was so eloquent. He spoke to us with candour, with intensity and with fervour, as well as with considerable logic in relation to the unimportant bits and pieces of his speech.

I respected him for addressing himself squarely and clearly not only to the parliamentary situation in which we find ourselves but to the real nature of the conflict between management and railway workers. I notice that the members of the Official Opposition applauded the minister's speech enthusiastically. I do not think they applauded because they liked him more but because they liked us less. It was fairly obvious that the minister was tearing a strip off us this morning. I suspect he realizes that the only effective criticism of his position can come from this quarter of the House and not from hon. members to my right.

We are all bargaining, and let us admit it. The government party put in the first bid; the Conservative party put in the second bid, and we are putting in our bid now. The Social Credit party will put in their bid in other kinds of money. But we are all bargaining. We are all judges and we, in turn, whether the Minister of Transport likes it or not, will be judged by the people of this country.

Unfortunately we are here not only as employers but as arbiters; we are the judge and the jury. This is why members of my party have advanced the very correct thesis that it is totally invidious for parliament to be in this position.

I should like to say to the Minister of Labour and the Minister of Transport that if they do not think parliament should be involved in bargaining, the choices open to them are simple; not to call parliament back, or to do the kind of thing the right hon. member for Prince Albert did back in 1961, that is, not to bargain but to tell the people to go back to work. This is a very cruel but logical kind of procedure.

What I am stating is very simple. The logic of the government's position has to be followed through to its conclusion. Once having begun the process by bringing us back and by placing the bill before us, it must accept the validity and the necessity of continuing the bargaining right here and now.

I do not know how I could possibly add to the remarks of my colleague, the hon. member for Fraser Valley West. I cannot find the words from my own repertoire so I will do a little bit of quoting.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Harney: A number of years ago one of North America's foremost social critics, Paul Goodman, wrote in a book called "Growing Up Absurd" that we have a cockeyed way of distributing remuneration for work done in our society. He set forth three very simple principles which describe the way we pay people in our society, not the way we ought to pay them, and he said that the more the work is hard, the more the work is necessary, and the more the work is in the public realm, the less people get paid.

This is certainly the case when we are dealing with railroad workers. Perhaps there are some people who work harder than they do, but I doubt if you will find work that is more necessary than theirs. Their work is certainly public, and they are the very people in every case that we put up against the wall.

I discovered a little bit of cant in the speech of the Minister of Labour in his use of the term "labour dispute," but we are all guilty of using cant in these matters. Many of us have said: "Well, management may have its point of view, labour may stand for its point of view, but the only people who get hurt are the innocent public". There is no such thing as an innocent public. We are all participants in the marketplace, we all have our responsibilities, and we here in parliament cannot hide behind the so-called innocence of the public. We have a responsibility to see that the very mechanism of the marketplace, so lauded by my colleagues to the right, works.

This is Labour Day weekend and many of us, if parliament rises tonight or tomorrow, or by Sunday, will be heading off for a Labour Day holiday, probably participating in Labour Day events and making labour speeches. Let us remember one principle, not only on Labour Day but tonight when we are discussing a matter which has to do with labour, and that is the principle of using the services that people provide rather than using the people who provide the services.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

[Translation]

Mr. Matte: Mr. Chairman, since there is before the House an amendment and an amendment to the amendment which have aroused the Minister of Labour (Mr. Munro) himself, I had intended to wait till the end of the discussion on this sub-amendment before moving a further amendment. But since my proposed amendment solves the problem of the amendment and the sub-amendment before us, I believe it my duty to explain at this point how, by way of an amendment slightly different from the one proposed, unanimity in this House could be achieved.

It is always extremely ticklish to arbitrarily fix any figure. Why 30 cents, 38 cents or 34 cents? What does that represent? It represents a fixed amount which may well prove inadequate.

However, we are faced again with the same thing when we talk of percentage because that is also a fixed amount. It says "5 per cent." Why 5 per cent? At one point the same paragraph says "3 per cent." Why 3 per cent? Three per cent of what? Nobody knows. Those are arbitrary figures. Now, as my colleague from Lotbinière (Mr. Fortin) put it so well earlier, we believe we need a more realistic base for the decisions we are going to take since we are unfortunately left with the possibility of doing that as a result of the bargaining failure.

In view of those arbitrary figures which mean nothing why not base our decision on something fair to the employees, something reasonable and especially logical? That would be quite preferable to the proposed amendments which are simply based on the normal increases that those employees could have received due to the increase in the cost of living index. So it would be quite simple in order to solve the problem with which we are faced to replace the words "thirty cents per hour", "five per cent", and "three per cent" which are found in paragraph 5 (1) by "an amount based on a percentage equal to the increase in the cost of living index." That amount would be based on the average salaries of all railway employees. I think that whether you are an employee, a member of management or a member of parliament, that is perfectly fair, reasonable and understanding.

We all appreciate that the increase in income to be granted to those workers should be similar to that granted to workers in other fields, since in this century of progress we have provided nothing but obsolete and cruel means which might have been acceptable in centuries past. Indeed, it is unfortunate in this age of progress that people have to resort to compulsion or to medieval methods such as strikes to solve their problems. It is absurd, but we cannot blame the workers for doing so, because it is the only way available to them to obtain justice.

Therefore, we do not blame the workers for going on strike, but we blame the government for tolerating such a situation. Considering the present emergency situation, we are motivated to find a solution which will not aggravate the employees and will not push them to anarchy as we are told that the 30 cents an hour increase will not be accepted nor the back-to-work order incorporated in Bill C-217.

Then, why not avoid all those conflicts by simply substituting for the word "thirty cents an hour", "5 per cent" and "3 per cent" the wording "an amount based on the increase in the cost of living index"? If this amount is 38 cents, so be it. If it is 40 cents, it will be 40 cents. If it is a lesser amount, it will be so, but we will be assured it is fair.

Therefore, Mr. Chairman, I wonder whether the House should not at once consider this amendment which I have not yet moved but which I would like to do, to determine whether it would replace adequately the amendment and the subamendment now before the House. In this manner, we could resolve the problem very quickly, that is on August 31 instead of September 1 perhaps. I wonder whether we should immediately study our amendment.

Some hon. Members: Question.

The Deputy Chairman: Is the House ready for the question?

Some hon. Members: Question.

Mr. MacEachen: Mr. Chairman, I have listened to the hon. member who has just taken his seat and I wonder whether he is proposing to put his amendment at this stage, or whether he expects to put it after the other amendments have been disposed of.

The Deputy Chairman: Order, please. The hon. member for Champlain did not present to the Chair an amendment or propose an amendment in due form. This is why the Chair cannot even make a decision. Procedurally, I think there is a difficulty.

[Translation]

The hon. member for Champlain (Mr. Matte) has referred to a proposed amendment, but according to the procedure prevailing in committee, it is impossible to accept any subamendment without having disposed of amendments already before us unless the committee decides to set aside the amendments before it.

Mr. Fortin: Mr. Chairman, on a point of order.

That is exactly what we have been asking for and we know very well that we cannot debate more than two amendments or subamendments at the same time. This is why we have merely referred to our amendment in the hope of getting unanimous consent in order that it may be discussed at the same time and voted on. That is why we have proceeded thus, but if the committee would let us introduce our amendment, then, Mr. Chairman, the problem would be solved.

[English]

Some hon. Members: Question.

Mr. Mackasey: Mr. Chairman, I apologize for rising so late on this subamendment, but I should like to draw to the attention of the hon. member from the Social Credit Party that his arithmetic is not all that good. He cannot blame the whole cost of living on the wages of the railway employees.

If the members of the New Democratic Party cannot hear, I can talk loud enough to tell the hon. gentleman who last spoke from the New Democratic Party that when he puts employer against employee and worker against boss, that type of thing went out of existence 65 years ago.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Mackasey: At least the hon. gentleman who had the good fortune of being born in Quebec City is honest in his philosophical approach as compared with some of the speeches we have heard from that end of the House today. It is obvious that the New Democratic Party once again wants to have it both ways, and it cannot have it both ways.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Mackasey: Now, Mr. Chairman—

Some hon. Members: Sit down!

Mr. Mackasey: Because I am overwhelmed I will sit down.

The Deputy Chairman: Is the committtee ready for the question.

Some hon. Members: Question.

The Deputy Chairman: The question is on the amendment to the motion.

Some hon. Members: Amendment to the amendment.

The Deputy Chairman: Maybe hon. members are confused, but the hon. member for St. John's East has moved a motion to amend the bill, and the motion of the hon. member for Regina-Lake Centre is an amendment to the motion proposed by the hon. member for St. John's East. The question is on the amendment to the motion.

● (2330)

Amendment to the amendment (Mr. Benjamin) negatived: Yeas, 26; nays, 181.

The Deputy Chairman: I declare the subamendment defeated. Is the committee ready for the question on the amendment?

Mr. Lewis: Mr. Chairman, I rise to say a few words at this stage on behalf of my colleagues and myself. I did not participate in the debate on the subamendment because I felt that last night I had stated our position and there was not much purpose in my repeating it. But I must say that I listened to pieces of sophistry from the Minister of Transport and the Minister of Labour that are really disturbing. As a matter of fact, what the government and what this parliament had before them was a number of suggestions as to how this dispute should be settled and on what basis the workers should be ordered to go back to work. The government chose one set of suggestions and the NDP chose another, not in a bidding or an auction but because we sincerely believe that the set of suggestions we make to this parliament gives the workers justice in a way which the set of suggestions that the government proposes does not.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Lewis: And then there is this sophistry about our not being in a position to make a choice, to use our judgment. It has been said, who are we to know? That kind of hypocritical modesty does not impress me.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Lewis: Every day of this government's life it makes judgments of that sort. It makes judgments on who shall receive a LIP grant and who shall be refused one; who shall receive an OFY grant and who shall be refused one; whose sentence to death shall be commuted to life on the basis of evidence that someone else has received, that the cabinet looks over and then decides on the result. The government had all the information that any blessed arbitrator could have. It had the briefs from both parties; it had the verbatim report of what took place before the board of conciliation; it had the reports of all the mediators; and it had all the information about the cost of living, about productivity, about salaries and wages in comparable occupations outside the railways.

All that information was before them. It is fatuous, hypocritical and dishonest to say that they were not in a position to make a judgment. The fact is that they made a judgment to give the workers as little as they conscientiously could. So they dragged out the chairman's report, and I say particularly because the railways had announced two or three days ago publicly, for the benefit of the eloquent and misleading Minister of Transport—

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Marchand (Langelier): I rise on a question of privilege, Mr. Chairman. I am not saying that the proposal made by the NDP is more than the amount the employees were ready to accept.

Mr. Lewis: I do not know where the Minister of Transport got that, but I do not think that kind of remark is appropriate.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Lewis: I say the government made a choice, one which is unfair and unjust to the workers and would force parliament to make the workers go back to work, against their will and without justice or decency.

Then, as I see it, my friends in the Conservative Party decided that some increase had to be given. They agreed with the government that we should not make the judgment on the best and most just basis on which to send the workers back, but that some increase should be given. The workers had spoken to them, and they agreed it should be higher. So they concocted a validation to give them a few cents more. I do not care what their concoction was. I am not satisfied with what they propose. But I know that this bill will pass before this night or next morning is out, and that the workers will be required by law to go back to work. Therefore, my colleagues and I will vote for the Tory amendment, much as we think that it is not enough. We will support the amendment because we want the workers to get as much as possible when they go back to work, even if that is not enough.

I must admit that I say with a great deal of hesitancy and regret that I have to support the amendment. The Leader of the Opposition says that his party wants to give the non-operating employees justice in the second year, and they want to give them the same increase as the other groups are getting. Let me tell him first that they will not receive the same increase, because the same formula of 6½ per cent on January 1, 1974, and another 1½ per cent on July 1, 1974, on a base of $3.80 odd, which is what it will be, is a great deal less than the same percentage on a base of $4.40. So he is not giving them the same, and the increase he proposes is three-quarters of 1 per cent on an average.

What he has proposed in place of what the government has in the bill is an average increase for 1974 of 7.25 per cent instead of 6.5 per cent. In other words, he offers them an added three-quarters of 1 per cent. This is the great Tory generosity to the non-operating employees. Three-quarters of 1 per cent for the whole of 1974 is offered. But I am not surprised. The people to my right months ago wanted to impose a freeze, so that the operating and non-operating employees, if it had come into force, would not have been able to receive any increase. So I suppose I should be grateful to them for agreeing to any increase.

I say as seriously as I can that this kind of situation in this parliament is sad. It is sad for parliament and sad for Canada that some 50,000 men and women—and there are women in the non-ops union—who have been out on strike for weeks without a single cent of strike pay or strike benefit are to be forced back to work by a law which does not provide for a settlement that is acceptable to them, or that is fair, just and reasonable. It is even sadder that this parliament should engage in an exercise which will take from the shop crafts union and the running trades employees the right even to begin a strike, and force on them a proposition that they are not prepared to accept.

Well, if that satisfies the government and if that almost satisfies the Conservatives, that is not news to us. We know, and we have always known, where the parties that spend their efforts helping to assist the development of the strong and privileged in this country stand. We have always known where they stood, and now they have proven it.

As I said, we shall vote for the Tory amendment, inadequate though it may be. I also want to say that when this measure reaches third reading, we will again oppose it as unjust to Canadians in their work.

The Deputy Chairman: Is the committee ready for the question?

Some hon. Members: Question.

Amendment (Mr. McGrath) agreed to: Yeas, 111; nays, 100.

The Deputy Chairman: I declare the motion carried. Shall the clause as amended carry?

[Translation]

Mr. Caouette (Charlevoix): Mr. Chairman, further to the remarks of my two colleagues, the hon. member for Lotbinière (Mr. Fortin) and the hon. member for Champlain (Mr. Matte), I must say we feel that it is quite improper for us to bargain as we did tonight. We should solve the problem efficiently and not, as the hon. member for Champlain explained, play around with figures; we can solve it only by basing our decisions on the cost of living index. Then, and only then will we solve the problem adequately for all, the railroaders concerned. I therefore move, seconded by the hon. member for Champlain (Mr. Matte):

That subclause (1) of clause 5 of Bill C-217 be amended as follows:

By deleting in lines 6 and 7 on page 3 of subclause (1) the words "thirty cents per hour", in lines 1 and two on page 4 of subclause (1) the words "by five per cent" and in line 6, on page 4 in subclause (1) the words "by three per cent" and substituting therefor the following: "by an amount based on a percentage equal to the increase in the cost of living index calculated on the average salary of all the railway employees."

[Mr. Lewis.]

Adopting that amendment would spare us what we have witnessed this evening, that is bargaining from 30 cents to 34 and then 38 cents, according to the arguments of the Progressive Conservatives who suggest that salary increases be based on the cost of living index, which has gone up by 4 cents since the last recommendations of Mr. Justice Munroe, or according to the NDP which maintains that 38 cents would equal 10.8 per cent in relation to the cost of living index. Why fool around with figures, percentages, when it would be so simple and salutary for the workers to solve the matter by simply indicating, as we are now proposing, that the increase be based on the cost of living index. We would not be grappling in a year or two with a recurrence of the problems confronting us today, but that would be the ideal solution.

So once again we have presented our motion, and we hope that the House will understand its merits.

● (2350)

[English]

The Deputy Chairman: Order please. I wish to inform hon. members that the motion that is proposed by the hon. member for Charlevoix does not seem to meet the rules and regulations and practices of this House. I want to make my comments directly to hon. members and refer them to citations on the acceptability of the amendment that is before us.

[Translation]

I must point out to the hon. member for Charlevoix that the proposal he is making now relates to a decision just made by the committee and if the hon. member wishes to be referred to various citations of Beauchesne's, particularly citations 146, 194 and 202, he will realize that the Chair cannot accept a proposal with respect to which a decision has already been made. The Chair is quite willing to understand the intention of the hon. member, but nevertheless he would have had to propose his amendment before a decision had been arrived at concerning the amendment agreed to a short while ago. Citation 146(1) of Beauchesne's provides that, and I quote:

No member shall—

Mr. Fortin: That is definitely not that one, but another one.

The Deputy Chairman: It is rather citation 148, which reads as follows:

148. (1) It is a wholesome restraint upon members that they cannot revive a debate already concluded; and it would be little use in preventing the same question from being offered twice in the same session if, without being offered, its merits might be discussed again and again.

Also, I would invite the hon. members to examine, on page 164, Subsection (1) of Citation No. 194, and I quote:

194. (1) A motion or amendment cannot be brought forward which is the same in substance as a question which has already been decided—

I understand that the hon. member proposes a new alternative to the committee, but he is dealing in fact with a matter which has already been decided by the committee.

The quotation continues:

—because a proposition being once submitted and carried in the affirmative or negative cannot be questioned again but must stand as the judgment of the House. This Rule applies to the decision taken on amendments to the Address in Reply to the Speech from the Throne.

Finally, I would refer the hon. member to Subsection (1) of Citation No. 202, on page 169 of the same work; I should rather say Subsection (1) of Citation No. 200, on page 167, and I quote:

200. (1) An old rule of Parliament reads: "That a question being once made and carried in the affirmative or negative, cannot be questioned again but must stand as the judgment of the House." Unless such a rule were in existence, the time of the House might be used in the discussion of motions of the same nature and contradictory decisions would be sometimes arrived at in the course of the same session.

And I think that it is precisely on the last part of this citation that the decision must be based because, should the motion presented by the hon. member for Charlevoix be voted upon, the committee could reach a decision completely in opposition to that which has just been reached in connection with the motion submitted by the hon. member for St. John's East (Mr. McGrath).

For all these reasons, and according to British procedure and to the practice of this House, it is impossible for the Chair to accept this proposal.

Mr. Fortin: Mr. Chairman, I rise on a point of order.

The Deputy Chairman: The hon. member for Lotbinière is rising on a point of order.

Mr. Fortin: First, Mr. Chairman, I thank you for not having given me the opportunity to defend our amendment!

Mr. Chairman, I rise on a question of privilege.

As to the British reforms which you mentioned with so much eloquence. Mr. Chairman, usually when a motion is put forward, the mover or one of his colleagues is given the opportunity to discuss the procedural acceptability of the proposed amendment.

Mr. Chairman, in the circumstances, I am extremely surprised to see that your ruling was made before we could make our point; moreover, you started ruling by referring to clauses which were not relevant.

This is why I ask that we be allowed to state our views.

The Deputy Chairman: Order please. The Chair does not want to engage in a debate with the hon. member for Lotbinière. It is nevertheless a prerogative of the chair when, in his mind, a question is not clear; but as this question was obviously clear and considering the citations quoted as well as the late hour, I think that hon. members would not want us to engage in a long procedural debate.

The ruling was based on facts and it has been made.

Mr. Fortin: Mr. Chairman, I rise on a question of privilege. You said: "If the question was clear". I would like to know why then, when you decided at the beginning that our motion was not in order, you referred to Citations 146 and 202 which were not relevant while you later quoted Citations 148 and 200, on the recommendations of your advisors?

Mr. Deputy Chairman: Order. Is the committee ready for the question on clause 5 as amended?

[English]

Shall clause 5, as amended, carry?

Some hon. Members: Carried.

Some hon. Members: Question.

Some hon. Members: No.

The Deputy Chairman: The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): On a question of privilege Mr. Chairman, I really feel there has been some misunderstanding. When Your Honour rose immediately after the amendment was moved, as I understood what Your Honour was saying, it was to the effect that you wished to make comments to indicate your position. I thought it was clear that you were going to permit comments from the floor. If that had not been clear I certainly would have been on my feet at that time. It seems to me the ruling has come pretty quickly, and as a matter of fact I certainly feel that there are arguments the other way. If Your Honour takes the position that because the House has passed an amendment to a clause therefore we have made a final decision, I do not think that can stand up. If that position is taken then Your Honour is saying we cannot even defeat clause 5. We have not finally taken this position.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): I think it is quite unfair for hon. members opposite not to be heard with respect to the procedural admissibility of their amendment. I do not happen to agree with the amendment, but I do think they have the right to be heard.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

The Deputy Chairman: Order please. Maybe the point raised by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre is well taken. However, as far as the Chair is concerned the hon. member for Charlevoix did give advance notice of the content of his proposed amendment a few minutes before. The Chair even had a chance to call for Beauchesne's French edition and to look up a few citations. Of course there might have been confusion in the numbers, but the Chair did make the correction and referred to Citation 148 and Citation 200 instead of Citations 202 and 194.

● (Midnight)

After a decision has been rendered it is not the practice of this House to reopen a discussion. A decision has been rendered by the Chair. I do not think there is anything against the Chair making a decision if the Chair is definitely sure of the decision it is rendering. The hon. member may want to cite precedents whereby the Chair was refused the opportunity to make a decision without opening a procedural debate. Citation 200(1) of Beau-chesne's is quite clear. I based my decision mainly on that citation.

Mr. Peters: Mr. Chairman, we have before us an amendment to clause 5. Regardless of whether I agree with the decision that was made, I wish to make an additional proposition. On behalf of parliament I wish to add a cost of living bonus for those who are covered by this and other clauses of the legislation. I do not feel it is in competition with what has been done in the amendment which the committee just approved.

As I said this afternoon, if parliament makes a decision on behalf of two conflicting parties to implement legislation forcing the workers and the companies to resume their operations, we should at least ensure that those who are affected are not worse off at the end of the legislative process than at the beginning. I sincerely believe that justice will be done for the workers in the three categories which are affected by this clause, the non-operating members of the railway fraternity. I therefore, move that the following be added at page 4, line 7:

—and by increasing each basic rate of wages by a percentage increase, equal to the cost-of-living increase, as determined by Statistics Canada, effective on the dates such cost-of-living figures are released by Statistics Canada subsequent to January 1, 1973 and continue for the life of this legislation.

This means that if the cost of living remains static, the workers forced back to work will be no worse off than they are at present. However, it if increases, the cost of living increase determined by Statistics Canada will be applied. As the Minister of Transport said, this technique has been used in collective agreements by various organizations, not to get a wage increase, but to retain the standard of living. This was done in the late 50's or early 60's in a contract in which I was involved.

Adding this subclause fulfils the responsibility of parliament to ensure that those legislated back to work will be assured of retaining the same standard of living. This should be supported by all members in order to retain for these people the standard of living which they were able to convince the chairman of the conciliation board was fair and just. This and other groups will be able to do that throughout the life of this legislation.

The Deputy Chairman: I hope the committee will not prevent the Chairman from accepting the amendment without procedural debate. At this point, the Chair finds it acceptable. Is the committee ready for the question?

Some hon. Members: Question.

● (0010)

Amendment (Mr. Peters) negatived: Yeas, 29; nays, 172.

The Deputy Chairman: I declare the motion to amend clause 5 defeated. Shall clause 5 carry?

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Orlikow: Clause 5 deals entirely with wages. The government has studiously avoided another subject which is of equal concern to the railway workers. I refer to job security. As I listened to the Minister of Transport making his eloquent speech this morning, I came to the conclusion that the more difficult his position becomes, the more eloquent he becomes as compared with the years when he led workers as a labour leader, and the more his views change. As I listened to him I could not but realize that there was not a word of consideration on his part for the difficulties which the railway workers experience. What we heard was a 100 per cent defence of the status quo in the railway industry as it has been and as it will continue if the government has its way.

In less than 20 years the labour force in the railway industry in Canada has been reduced by more than one third. No other industry has experienced a reduction of this size. Railway workers are worried about their lack of job security and by the fact that the tremendous increase in the productivity of the railway industry has gone entirely to the profit of the company.

Mr. Munro (Hamilton East): I rise on a point of order, Mr. Chairman. The hon. member is talking now about job security and he makes some valid points, but he is speaking on the subject with reference to clause 5 which deals with the wage question. I suppose he may be doing so because the NDP has prepared an amendment with respect to the Weldon report tied in with the wage consideration. However, I suggest we have a proposal which would accomplish the same purpose with respect to job security. It pertains to clause 16(3), which is on page 12. There we are talking about special references to the arbitrator concerning job security. This is a general application clause which applies to all three groups. I suggest the hon. member would find his comments more pertinent to that clause.

Mr. Orlikow: Could I ask the minister whether the government intends to move an amendment which would spell out job security provisions for railway workers?

Mr. Munro (Hamilton East): I have a proposed amendment involving a direction to the arbitrator which I think the hon. member will find acceptable.

Mr. Orlikow: If the minister has an amendment I am content to wait, but I tell him right now I shall not be satisfied to leave the question of job security as one of the unsolved problems to be dealt with unilaterally by an arbitrator.

Mr. Munro (Hamilton East): Before the hon. member prejudges the question, I suggest he look at the amendment. He may find that the special direction to the arbitrator which would be contained in the statute gives him a sense of security.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Chairman, I rise on a point of order. Earlier in the day the President of the Privy Council requested that those of us who were planning to submit amendments should produce copies of those amendments in advance. We readily complied. Even my friends to the right complied in due course. I suggest that if the government has further amendments to move, they should in all courtesy let us have copies of them now.

Mr. Munro (Hamilton East): That is quite agreeable. I will send them over now. I should like the hon. member to appreciate that some of the amendments took into consideration arguments which have been advanced, and we only worked them out in the latter part of the day.

Mr. Morgan: Mr. Chairman, as a rookie member I have been sitting here all day wondering what the House is attempting to do. We have a serious responsibility and I sometimes wonder, with all the rhetoric and so-called logic which has gone on amongst us, whether we are really taking our responsibilities seriously or whether we are here only in a pro forma position. I have listened to what the leader of the NDP has to say, and hearing all the rhetoric and double-talk which has come out of him I am reminded of a little rhyme. Perhaps it is the hour of the day which brings it to my mind. It is:

There was an old man from York South,
Who knew not what the truth was about.
So to save himself trouble,
He spoke at the double,

At once from both sides of his mouth.

That is an example of what he and his party have done here. The so-called government has failed to set a good example. It has done nothing. It has caused chaos in this country, with inflation running rampant. The government sat on its hands, and the Minister of Labour has not contributed a thing toward that which we want done in this country.

An hon. Member: Hallelujah!

Mr. Morgan: Perhaps because of the hour my mind is cast to the thought that "When Munro went from "health" into "labour", the government said, "Here is your saviour". But to say the least, there was no star in the East, and the pain was just greater and greater."

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Morgan: I am satisfied that the members of this House have the ability and the intelligence to solve the problems that come before us, but sometimes I am weary about what goes on. I admit I am a rookie and perhaps I must get used to this kind of nonsense that goes on and on. But things must be done—inflation must be corrected, and the people of this country must be looked after. I submit that this is not being done. We sit here hour after hour discussing things that could be done with any degree of intelligence and if we had a government that knew what it was doing and where it was going. If that were the case, we would not have these problems today. I think that as soon as we can bring to a conclusion what we are attempting this evening, putting the railway workers back to work, the better the country will be served.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. MacEachen: Mr. Chairman, I shall take to heart the words uttered by the hon. member who has just resumed his seat and make my remarks very brief. We on this side of the House have voted against two amendments to clause 5. We have done so in order to emphasize a principle that was enunciated earlier today by the Minister of Transport, and later by the Minister of Labour—a principle that sought to establish a future settlement, first of all on the basis purely of the award by the chairman of the conciliation board, and later by the arbitrator, in conformity with the practice that has been established in the past.

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Bell: You can't reflect on a vote.

Mr. MacEachen: I am not reflecting on the vote. I am saying that we have sought to emphasize this principle in committee of the whole. The committee has not accepted the principle we put forward, and in accepting the subamendment moved by the Leader of the Opposition it has accepted a different principle. I make no comment about that at this stage. However, facing us now is a decision in respect of the clause as amended. When the Chairman calls the clause as amended, the clause as a whole will be before the committee.

I want to indicate to members of the committee that we on this side of the House will be supporting the clause as amended because we take the view that it is essential that this bill be passed in order to end the national crisis in the transportation system; and in addition to that, an effort to defeat this clause would deny the workers a wage settlement or would be an effort to deny the workers a wage settlement—and that is the very heart of this clause.

Certainly it is not our intention to frustrate that objective, and for that reason it is entirely consistent for us to indicate to members of the committee and the country that we support this clause as amended in order to reach the objective I have stated.

An hon. Member: You have no choice.

Mr. Hees: What else could you do? You have been licked, and you have to accept that verdict. In other words, you have been knocked out and you have now announced that you have been knocked out. That is real Liberal honesty.

The Deputy Chairman: Order, please.

[Translation]

Mr. Fortin: Mr. Chairman, we have tried in various ways to amend clause 5 with which we could not agree in any way in principle. This clause provided for an hourly rate which was inadequate and established standards which were not indexed on the rise in the cost of living, which went against the objectives of the workers.

Mr. Chairman, while accepting of course the principle of an increase of 30 cents, we believe it is not sufficient and this is why we were putting up a fight: we wanted the increase provided for in clause 5 to be geared to the ever increasing cost of living. This is why our party supported the motion moved by the hon. member for Timiskaming (Mr. Peters) who wanted to see this clause to provide a constant rate for the increases in the cost of living. We wanted to see this amendement to clause 5 based on a amount calculated on a percentage equal to the rise in the cost of living index computed on the average wages of all railway employees.

Mr. Chairman, such was the principle that we upheld as forcefully as we could and it is exactly the same as the one put forward by the hon. member for Timiskaming (Mr. Peters); that is why we voted with him. Now we cannot go any further, except to pass or reject clause 5. It is obvious that in keeping with our position, we will support this legislation as amended.

Mr. Chairman, I would ask the House to note that I am still wondering what difference there is between our argument and that of the hon. member for Timiskaming.

The Deputy Chairman: Order, please. Shall clause 5 carry?

[English]

Shall clause 5 as amended carry?

Some hon. Members: Carried.

Mr. Peters: On division.

The Deputy Chairman: All those in favour of clause 5 as amended will please rise.

• (0030)

Clause 5 agreed to: yeas; 173; nays, nil.

The Deputy Chairman: I declare clause 5 as amended carried. The hon. member for Skeena rises on a point of order.

Mr. Howard: I wonder, Mr. Chairman, whether we might propose something to the committee to expedite what we are doing.

An hon. Member: Sit down.

Mr. Howard: Mr. Chairman, I think we could move matters along a little more quickly if we now take the opportunity to revert to clause 4 which we stood earlier. I had moved an amendment earlier and, on reflection, I think I would like to withdraw it.

The Deputy Chairman: Does the committee give unanimous consent to the hon. member for Skeena to withdraw his amendment?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Howard: Mr. Chairman, I am asking unanimous consent to revert to clause 4. We must do that in order to get to the next stage. We cannot jump over one set of procedures.

The Deputy Chairman: Does the committee agree that we revert to clause 4.

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

On clause 4.—Railway services to be resumed.

Mr. Howard: Earlier on clause 4 I moved:

That sub-clause (1) of clause 4 be amended by inserting between the words "suspended" and "and" in line 5 thereof, the following:

"and shall call back for employment every employee as soon as the operation of the railway is resumed".

I would like permission of the committee to withdraw that amendment.

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

[Mr. Fortin.]

The Deputy Chairman: Order, please. I must remind hon. members that we have to follow certain rules. The hon. member can withdraw his amendment only with unanimous consent. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Amendment (Mr. Howard) withdrawn.

Mr. Howard: Mr. Chairman, upon reflection upon the original amendment which I moved has now been withdrawn, and in an attempt to approach this in a better way I should like to move:

That sub-clause (1) of clause 4 be amended by inserting between the words "suspended" and "and" in line 5 thereof, the following:

"And shall call back for employment every employee within four days of the coming into force of this act".

Mr. Munro (Hamilton East): Mr. Chairman, I sent over to the hon. member for Skeena an amendment I propose to move to the present clause on page 10. That clause not only dealt with the earlier amendment raised by the New Democratic Party with regard to protection for those people laid off but added a further provision that once those people laid off are brought back to work they could not be immediately laid off again as a result of the same strike. Then the hon. member for Skeena indicated he wished to move an amendment to clause 4 which would impose a reasonable time limit on the railways to bring back both the strikers and the laid off people.

We took that into account in the further strengthening of the lay-off provisions which I sent over to him. I have sent to the official opposition a copy of the proposed amendment. Hon. members will notice that the proposed clause starts off with the words, "Forthwith upon the coming into force of this Act". That is very strong wording in terms of the immediate implementation. Really in layman's language it means as soon as possible. This can impose upon the railways a legal obligation to proceed with haste. Then it goes on in the next four lines to say:

—every railway company to which any part of this Act applies shall call back to work every employee of the railway.

So, I think this affords the hon. member for Skeena every possible protection he wants. Again I would point out that the clause I sent over refers to every employee and not just those laid off or on strike.

Mr. McGrath: Mr. Chairman, we believe the amendment proposed by the government is a much stronger amendment than that put forward by the hon. member for Skeena and consequently with some reluctance we will have to vote against the amendment put forward by the hon. member for Skeena if he intends to proceed with it. However, we make clear that we intend to support the amendment proposed by the minister.

Mr. Howard: The hon. member for St. John's East can run into a trap. Let me say first that the Minister of Labour stood up and said he sent over to me a copy of the proposed amendment to which he just referred. It arrived here while I was on my feet moving my second amendment. That was the first time I saw it. The second point I want to make is that clause 4 says at the outset:

Forthwith upon the coming into force of this act, every railway company shall resume operation—

"Forthwith" means immediately, right at that very moment on the very day. The first amendment I moved carried with it the same implication that the workers would be called back to work forthwith. The minister rejected that earlier today saying that that was an impossibility because all the people would be standing around doing nothing.

Mr. Nielsen: He changed his mind.

Mr. Howard: He does not have a mind to change, like the hon. member for Yukon. If the minister now intends to say clearly and unequivocably that he accepts the first principal point I put forward in the amendment that the workers be called back on the very first day this bill comes into force, then he is accepting the point I put forward earlier. If that is not it, then he is playing games with me. What does he mean?

Mr. Munro (Hamilton East): I could dwell on what has been going on. "Forthwith upon" can impose an obligation upon the railway companies to proceed as quickly as possible. It does not mean that it will be done immediately. It does not mean the next day.

An hon. Member: What does it mean?

Mr. Munro (Hamilton East): In all honesty I cannot say to the hon. member for Skeena that it will be the next day. The reason I am saying this is simply that it may be impossible for the railways to get everything in working order and ready to absorb all the employees within a day. I suggested at one point that even if there were adherence to this legislation immediately by all the workers it is not possible for the railways to be in full operation by this weekend. There are people on the railways who disagree with me publicly in that respect, including union leaders.

I am saying that the time interval which is permissible and which is limited should give the needed flexibility. Otherwise it seems to me to offend logic to cast an obligation for all this to happen within one day. That is simply my point.

Mr. Muir: Mr. Chairman, I wish to have some clarification. The minister said "as soon as possible". Does that mean that if a foreman does not like certain workers or their attitude during the strike he can make "as soon as possible" three weeks from the end of the strike, four weeks, or two weeks from its completion, and when these people approach their members of parliament about not being able to return to their jobs, to whom do we go? Do we speak to the Minister of Labour or do we go to the CNR and, if we do, what is the interpretation of "as soon as possible"? I have sat in the House for many years and even asked the minister who is now in charge about when such and such a thing will be done. His answer has been "as soon as possible". Six months later someone else asked the same question, and again the answer was "as soon as possible".

What is the interpretation of these words, and what will happen to these workers? The reason I ask this is that I am concerned about the workers of this country. No leader of any party in the House has a monopoly on concern for the workers. They stand up so sanctimoniously and wrap themselves in a cloak of purity. They say they are the only ones who care about the poor, the disabled, the widows, the orphans and the workers of this country. As I look around this House on all sides I see men who were formerly hardrock miners, fishermen, coal miners, farmers, and many types of workers. For example, the Minister of Veterans Affairs was a farmer. Are they all great millionaires and men who only worry about the rich guy? I think we all worry about the worker. I certainly do. I have spent my days in the unions and in the coal mines and I have worked hard for the unions and the coal miners. I have been on picket duty and on strike and I did not receive a retainer fee of $100 a day from the CLC or from anyone else.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Muir: I ask these questions because I am concerned as an ordinary Canadian about the workers of Canada. No leader of any party, no one in the House, has the right to say that they are the only ones who worry about the worker. For many years the Minister of Transport has worked in the labour movement. Has he thrown his concerns out the window; has he forgotten about the workers? I ask the minister about this because I have been listening to certain people to my left. I want certain assurances—and here I agree with the hon. member for Skeena—about how soon these men will go back to work and whether they will be given their proper duties to fulfil, and will not be discriminated against by a boss who feels he wants to get back at the workers. I am sure that many of us are concerned. Let us not listen to a lot of damn foolishness from one man rising in the House and saying he, the little god above all, is the only one who cares about the workers of this country.

Mr. Munro (Hamilton East): In reply to the hon. member for Cape Breton-The Sydneys may I say that these words were used in an effort not to tie this down to a particular day in case it was not workable. The hon. member liked the phrase "forthwith upon". The closest analogy to that would be "almost immediately". You do not impose an obligation within a day if the results are likely to be ludicrous.

This casts a definite obligation on the companies to proceed in all haste to hire each and every employee regardless of whether or not they were on strike, and they are obliged to do so almost immediately. I think it would be unreasonable to require them to do so in almost one day within the coming into force of this bill, in terms of the practicalities involved and the knowledge of how much time the railways will need to achieve full operation. I think this clause does give the protection sought by the hon. member for Cape Breton-The Sydneys as well as that sought by the hon. member for Skeena.

Mr. McGrath: Perhaps we could settle this simply by referring to the Oxford dictionary. We said at the outset that we thought the minister's amendment is a much stronger one than the one proposed by the hon. member for Skeena. That is borne out by the definition of "forthwith" in the Oxford dictionary. It says simply "immediately, without delay".

Mr. Muir: May I ask the minister one brief question? If all that he says should be done is not carried out, is he prepared to assure the House that it will be carried out as soon as these discrepancies are brought to his attention?

Mr. Munro (Hamilton East): Yes, Mr. Chairman. I might add that also under the Canada Labour Code there is protection against discrimination against workers. I discussed the matter fully with the Minister of Transport and he is prepared to co-operate in terms of dealing with the companies to ensure that the intent of parliament is carried out as rapidly as possible.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Muir: I thank the minister for his reply, but I regret to say that it has brought up another question. Is the minister prepared to prosecute the railway companies if they do not carry out the letter of the law as contained in this legislation?

Mr. Munro (Hamilton East): Obviously we are satisfied that if the companies do not carry out the will of parliament they will be in breach of the statute and will be committing an offence and should be prosecuted.

Mr. Baldwin: The same as anybody else who does not obey under the criminal law.

The Deputy Chairman: Is the committee ready for the question on the amendment proposed by the hon. member for Skeena?

Mr. Howard: I drafted the four day proposal after consulting with members who sit in the party to my right with the thought that they might support that proposition, but the hon. member for St. John's East has dashed that commitment to the ground, thus indicating that some Conservatives are not to be trusted no matter what the situation.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. McGrath: Mr. Chairman, I am not aware of any such consultation, and may I suggest to you with great respect, even though the hour is late, that we are realizing what the hon. member is trying to achieve and we support his objective. All we are saying is that the minister's amendment states it much more strongly and effectively.

Mr. Howard: It does not help the matter a bit, Mr. Chairman.

● (0050)

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Howard: I have noticed one thing about the gentlemen who sit to the right of me. They can dish it out, but they sure can't take it. I am trying to put some facts on record so that those who may have dealings with them in future will know about them. I also wish to see whether hon. members will be generous enough to give me a second opportunity to withdraw the amendment.

[Mr. McGrath.]

The Deputy Chairman: Am I to assume that the hon. member is seeking the unanimous consent of the committee to withdraw his second amendment?

Mr. Howard: Certainly.

Mr. McGrath: We are generous enough to get the hon. member off the hook.

The Deputy Chairman: Does the committee give unanimous consent to the hon. member for Skeena to withdraw his amendment to clause 4.

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Amendment (Mr. Howard) withdrawn.

The Deputy Chairman: The committee will now consider an amendment which was moved by the hon. member for Saskatoon-Biggar which reads as follows:

That paragraph (a) of subclause (3) of clause 4 of Bill C-217 be amended by inserting after the word Act in line 25, the words "or were laid off as a consequence of the strike".

Mr. Munro (Hamilton East): I believe this is a similar amendment to the one which the hon. member for Skeena withdrew. I think the basis on which the hon. member for Skeena withdrew his amendment also takes care of the concern of the hon. member for Saskatoon-Biggar concerning lay-offs. Indeed, there is to be some further assurance that the person who is laid off and then brought back to work cannot immediately be laid off again. That amendment, of course, can be inserted in the general section at the back of the bill at page 10 and applied to the entire bill. I think that would take care of the situation and perhaps the hon. member would be prepared to withdraw his amendment or take care of the matter when we get to page 10 of the bill.

Mr. Gleave: I am concerned to see that justice and fairness are observed and that workers go back to work following the action of this parliament. I accept that the minister in good faith has suggested this course and that the proposed wording in this act will give as much assurance to the workers as possible. I appreciate what the minister has done, and with that I am satisfied with the proposal as it stands.

The Deputy Chairman: Am I to understand that the hon. member wishes to withdraw his amendment.

Mr. Gleave: Yes, Mr. Chairman.

The Deputy Chairman: Does the committee give unanimous consent to the hon. member for Saskatoon-Biggar to withdraw the amendment he proposed to clause 4?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Amendment (Mr. Gleave) withdrawn.

The Deputy Chairman: Shall clause 4 carry?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Clause 4 agreed to.

The Deputy Chairman: The committee will now consider clause 6. Shall clause 6 carry?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Clauses 6 and 7 agreed to.

On clause 8—Railway services to be resumed.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Chairman, we gave notice of an amendment to clause 8 similar to the amendment that was moved by the hon. member for Saskatoon-Biggar to clause 4. I take it that the minister will move his amendment when he reaches clause 14 and that it will cover this group as well as the others.

Mr. Munro (Hamilton East): Quite so.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Therefore we shall not move that proposed amendment.

The Deputy Chairman: Shall clause 8 carry?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Clause agreed to.

On clause 9—Terms of collective agreements amended.

Mr. Neale (Vancouver East): Mr. Chairman, I wish to propose an amendment to clause 9. As, not surprisingly, a similar amendment was shot down in flames previously by the "friends of the workers," I expect mine will get short shrift. Nevertheless, I feel there are a few things I have to contribute, in the hope that hon. members on the other side of the House and hon. members to my right will take them into consideration when the "proverbial" hits the fan in the next few weeks, because I expect it will.

An hon. Member: Explain.

Mr. Neale (Vancouver East): Earlier today the Minister of Transport and the hon. member for Verdun told this House about the expertise they had derived from their many years of negotiation. Prior to coming to this place I spent 27 years as a full-time trade union leader. Most of that time was spent in negotiations, in arbitration and conciliation covering every aspect of this question federally and provincially. I like to think that during that 27 years a little expertise rubbed off on me.

In those years I learned two things specifically that have concerned me all day, and I want to relate them. One has to do with the problem of arbitration. I have never advocated arbitration, and have never advocated compulsory arbitration in my life—and I have no intention of doing so tonight, tomorrow, or Sunday, if we stay that long. I want to give you some idea why. In British Columbia, the previous government brought in legislation which provided for compulsory arbitration. They called it the mediation act. There is a senator sitting in the other place who agreed to compulsory arbitration in British Columbia. The settlement, after arbitration in that case, was less than the workers had been offered during negotiations.

Two years ago in British Columbia, 40,000 construction workers were out on strike. They were ordered back to work by the provincial government and refused to go, but went back into negotiation because the government did not enforce the legislation. Subsequently, they got the best settlement they had ever received in all the negotiations I can recall in British Columbia. That gives you some idea of what arbitration is all about.

I have never known arbitration to give a better settlement than that previously offered. What has been offered in this case is the bill that is before us now. I also know that the railroad workers have some knowledge of arbitration, because they have been sandbagged—not for two years, nor for ten years, but for over 40 years in this country. If you go back in history you will find that during the depression they took any kind of job they could get. Then the war came along and their wages were fixed by law. As a consequence they got nothing more. Since the war, even though the Minister of Labour talks about the right of free collective bargaining, the railway workers have not had it. Nobody can tell me that an employer will negotiate in good faith if he knows that at the end of the road there is compulsory arbitration.

We talk about honesty and fair bargaining on both sides in past settlements just because we have not had to force them back on every set of negotiations. But there were only fair and reasonable negotiations on one side because employers knew all along that they just had to sit tight and offer practically nothing in order to force the workers to strike, and then this House would order them back to work under compulsory arbitration.

Years ago there was a song called "King of the Road," which had something to do with hoboes. That is not the true meaning of King of the Road which was introduced at about the time Eugene B. Debbs was leading railroaders in the United States and led them to higher wages. Even with the amendment that we have passed this legislation does not bring the railroaders level with the cost of living.

The minister accused the leader of my party of blackmail when he suggested that my leader said they would not order their people back to work with this legislation. If you think that is blackmail just listen to this. I have had telephone calls and telegrams from people in the railroad unions in western Canada who have told me that even if their leaders order them back to work they will not go. I know the west has always been a little more militant than the rest of the country, but the militancy seems to be spreading east in the labour movement. I expect real problems after we have supposedly fixed up the situation and settled the dispute.

I have been talking to railroad workers in British Columbia and would like to give some examples of how they have slipped behind other workers. An engineer in the yards told me that after 29 years' employment he earns $36 a day. At Vancouver Plywood we start girls with no training at $38 a day.

The Assistant Deputy Chairman: Order, please. The hon. member rises on a point of order?

Mr. Cafik: No, Mr. Chairman. I wanted to know if the hon. member would permit a brief question. He indicated that he had received a great number of telephone calls and telegrams. I would like to know where the telegrams came from, in view of the strike.

Mr. Neale (Vancouver East): The telegrams were phoned to me. I do not know whether the hon. member expects me to telegraph my punches, but I do not intend to do that as long as I am standing here, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. Guay (St. Boniface): I should like to ask the hon. member a question through you, Mr. Chairman.

The Assistant Deputy Chairman: The Chair can always agree, but does the hon. member agree to answer a question?

Mr. Neale (Vancouver East): Mr. Chairman I shall be very brief and then entertain any question from either side of the House.

Mr. Guay (St. Boniface): I will send him a telegram then.

Mr. Neale (Vancouver East): I was just going to cite one more example of the dire situation of the railroad workers. Their basic wage rate is $2.39 an hour, according to my information. Most of the workers I talked to would get more money if they went on welfare in British Columbia. I cannot understand why they work eight hours a day for that money.

For the information of the hon. member for Temiscamingue who constantly attacks the government of British Columbia, I would point out that the basic wage in British Columbia will soon be $2.50 an hour. That is 11 cents an hour more than the present base rate paid by the railroads. I cannot understand why the hon. member is forever attacking the government of British Columbia when he knows so little of what goes on in his own province, let alone in one so far from La Belle province.

I want to conclude by saying that this is just a charade that we go through with the railroad workers. We try to point out to them that they have a right to free collective bargaining when we know they have not. Sooner or later we must devise some other system to resolve their problems or we are going to find ourselves right back here. Even if we force them back to work now, we will be back here in two years in the same position. When that time comes they will not only be asking for an increase to match the cost of living but will be asking to catch up with other workers, and they are entitled to that.

We had better take a good look at what we are doing, Mr. Chairman, because I expect to see serious dislocation in the railroads across the country.

I therefore move, seconded by the hon. member for Westminster that subclause (1) of clause 9 be deleted and the following substituted therefor:

(1) The terms and conditions of each collective agreement to which this Part applies are amended forthwith by increasing each hourly basic rate of wages in effect on December 31, 1972, as established by or pursuant to such agreement, by ten and eight-tenths per cent effective January 1, 1973, and by increasing each hourly basic rate of wages in effect on December 31, 1973, as established by or pursuant to such agreement and pursuant to this Part, by ten and eight-tenths per cent effective January 1, 1974.

The Assistant Deputy Chairman: Order, please. Shall I read the amendment?

Mr. Reynolds: A point of order, Mr. Chairman.

[Mr. Cafik.]

The Assistant Deputy Chairman: Order please. I shall put the motion first. Shall I dispense with reading the motion?

Some hon. Members: Dispense.

The Assistant Deputy Chairman: The hon. member for Burnaby-Richmond-Delta.

Mr. Reynolds: I wonder if I could have the permission of the House to ask the previous speaker a question.

The Assistant Deputy Chairman: The time of the hon. member had not expired. Is it agreed?

Mr. Neale (Vancouver East): Yes, I agree.

Mr. Reynolds: Mr. Chairman, I agree with the previous speaker on some points and know that he is a very well respected labour leader in my province. I know he has been in contact with the union people and their leaders today, as I have. I should like to ask him this question: when parliament does pass this bill, as we expect it will shortly, and the bill becomes the law of the land, will the hon. member do his duty as a member of parliament and advise his workers that they should go back to work?

Mr. Neale (Vancouver East): Mr. Chairman, I said previously that I would not telegraph my punches and I do not think that kind of question even deserves an answer in this House.

The Assistant Deputy Chairman: The hon. member for St. Boniface on a point of order.

Mr. Guay (St. Boniface): Mr. Chairman, possibly my question may be easier for the hon. member to answer. I should like to ask why his party now accepts the suspension of the right to strike for railway workers. Is this a new policy of the NDP?

• (0110)

Mr. Neale (Vancouver East): Mr. Chairman, there is another question that requires an answer. We have not said we agree with lifting the right to strike. We have not yet voted on this bill.

The Assistant Deputy Chairman: Is the committee ready for the question?

Amendment negatived: Yeas, 26; nays, 153.

Clause 9 agreed to.

On Clause 10—Railway companies and unions to negotiate.

Mr. Alkenbrack: Mr. Chairman, I rise to put a protest on record. During this debate it has been pointed out more than once by members from all parties that the non-operatives now on strike are receiving no strike pay. This is a ridiculous situation. Throughout their years of service to the railways, these men have paid their union dues. For the most part this money has gone to the United States. They are receiving no remuneration from these American based International unions.

Some time ago in this House I protested the fact that certain steel workers in my constituency were sending their money to the United States, to their detriment, when the unions could have been saving these funds in Canada for the use of Canadians.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Alkenbrack: I see that my point is understood by the committee. I protest the fact that these 56,000 non-ops are receiving no strike pay. They should be. I want to point out the injustice being perpetrated on these men by their international unions. They should at least be receiving a small pittance to sustain them during this time when they are not receiving any wages.

Clause agreed to.

Clause 11 agreed to.

On Clause 12—Railway services to be resumed.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Chairman, this is another clause on which we have given notice to amend. However, we believe the subject matter of our amendment will be covered by the proposed amendment to clause 14. Therefore, it will not be necessary to delay the committee with regard to clause 12.

Clause agreed to.

On Clause 13—Terms of collective agreements amended.

Mr. Rowland: Mr. Chairman, this is not going to be a long speech.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Rowland: It is not going to be a very happy speech either. I am sick at heart over what is happening here tonight.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Rowland: Since the admission by the first speaker on the government side this morning, this House has been abandoning any consideration of justice in the wage settlement to be given to these workers when sending them back to work. I am sick at hearing that.

The Minister of Transport said we are incapable of determining the justice of this question. I am not going to argue that because it has been done over and over again. There is no sense to that argument. The facts and figures are there for anyone who cares to look at them.

Let us look at the argument put forward by the government. Let us take it in their terms. First, they told us it was not our business to decide whether the settlement is fair or just, but we must concern ourselves with what we can best do to see that the procedures of collective bargaining function in the railway industry once again. That is what they told us it was our business to do. The job we are here to do is to see that the process of collective bargaining once again begins to operate in the railway negotiations.

The process has broken down because, as was said, on the two previous occasions in the past 23 years when the railway workers went on strike and parliament sent them back to work, the railway companies counted on parliament to send them back to work. It is accepted by members on all sides of this House that the railway companies did not bargain in good faith. If we want to make the collective bargaining procedures work once again, we must do it in a way that will give the workers a settlement that will make the railway companies afraid to have parliament again bargain in this way. And that is our job, to make collective bargaining work, and that is the way to do it, not to impose on the workers a half-baked settlement.

The second argument is that we cannot make a judgment respecting the justice of the case put forward either by the railroads or by the unions. That is a questionable assertion, but let us accept it for the moment. The Minister of Transport told us we are here to end a rail strike, to get people back to work.

Some hon. Members: Yes!

Mr. Rowland: How does he expect us to get people back to work with wage provisions which are totally unacceptable to the workers? Unless the bill sets out terms which are sufficiently acceptable to the workers we shall settle no crisis. All we are doing is perpetuating one.

The productivity of the railroads has increased and I think it is only fair that the workers should get a share of the benefits of this increase. After all, they have contributed to it. If it had not been for them there would have been no increase in productivity.

The settlement imposed upon the operating trades by clause 13 gives them about .2 per cent of that increase in productivity. That is the amount which will go to yardmen who are on two-hour call 24 hours a day, men who work under difficult conditions and who are subject to accidents of the bloodiest kind, men whose family lives are ruined as a result of the terms upon which they are employed.

This settlement is imposed on conductors and brakemen who work on trains which have greatly increased in size and which travel at ever greater speeds. They work on trains which now carry exotic chemicals, new products of every kind. This traffic requires increased knowledge on the part of conductors and brakemen. They have managed to grasp this knowledge and keep the railroads running, thus contributing to increased productivity.

Moreover, they have run these faster trains over railbeds which are inadequate by any standards, and they have done so with good safety records. What are we giving them in return? About .2 per cent of a share in the rewards of increased productivity.

I said I intended to be brief, and I will finish on this note. But I am sick at heart that the House could do this to a group of men. I cannot comprehend how we could do it. I intend to move an amendment. I know what the result will be, but I shall put it anyway because I think it should at least be heard.

The Assistant Deputy Chairman: Does the hon. member for Ottawa West rise on a point of order?

Mr. Reilly: Yes, I do, Mr. Chairman. After the hon. member for Verdun, the Minister of Transport and other members on the government side have spoken so eloquently and, I believe, with deep understanding and conviction about the problem we are facing, I cannot imagine why the hon. member for Selkirk cannot get the attention of the Committee and the courtesy of those present.

Mr. Rowland: I thank the hon. member for Ottawa West for his intervention on my behalf. It is very kind of him. However, it is fairly obvious that it is difficult to get the attention of the Committee at 1.30 in the morning after we have gone through such a process as this. I certainly cannot fault my colleagues, but I had something I wanted to say. I am sick at heart. With full knowledge of what is going to happen to it, I am moving the following amendment.

That subclause (1) of clause 9 of Bill C-217 be deleted and the following substituted therefor:

(1) The terms and conditions of each collective agreement to which this Part applies are amended forthwith by increasing each hourly basic rate of wages in effect on December 31, 1972, as established by or pursuant to such an agreement, by ten and eight-tenths per cent effective January 1, 1973, and by increasing each hourly basic rate of wages in effect on December 31, 1973, as established by or pursuant to such agreement and pursuant to this part, by ten and eight-tenths per cent effective January 1, 1974.

Some hon. Members: Question!

Mr. Gleave: I know the hour is early, Mr. Chairman, but the Committee decided some hours ago to complete consideration of the question this day. The Committee at that time was fully aware of the nature of the decision the Committee would be required to make, and to interrupt an hon. member who has the floor, and interject with catcalls when he seeks to propose an amendment and put his case is not only rude, not only disorderly, but ill-advised.

It just so happens that there are a large number of people in my constituency who run trains. Somebody, at some time, should talk to some of these people. My hon. friend made the point that there is no comparison between railway productivity now and productivity some years ago. Just look at the number of units which are hooked on to these diesels that head west across Alberta, through the canyon and into British Columbia. I have talked to these men and they tell me that such is the length of freight trains today that sometimes they cannot see how to switch them through a siding and know they are safely operating those trains. We should be concerned to see that the railroads are giving consideration to the safety of these men and ensuring that they are adequately paid.

We should be concerned about making sure that the railway companies for which they are working are giving consideration to the safety of these men, and to seeing that they are adequately paid. We must remember that they are subject to call at all hours of the night and day. They do not have a comfortable job which starts at 8.30 or 9.00 in the morning and ends at five o'clock at night. With the job that these men are doing there is not the regular family life that so many of us take for granted. I think this should be taken into consideration by members of this committee. I support the plea and the proposal of my colleague.

The Assistant Deputy Chairman: Is the House ready for the question?

Some hon. Members: Question.

[Mr. Reilly.]

The Assistant Deputy Chairman: All those in favour will please rise.

Amendment (Mr. Rowland) negatived: Yeas 21, nays 155.

The Assistant Deputy Chairman: I declare the amendment lost.

Clause 13 agreed to.

On Clause 14—Railway companies and unions to negotiate.

Mr. Howard: I was not rising to speak, Mr. Chairman. I just thought you were rushing a bit and I wanted to give the Minister of Labour a chance to speak.

Mr. Munro (Hamilton East): Mr. Speaker, I have an amendment I should like to have moved to Clause 14, which is as follows:

That Bill C-217 be amended by adding thereto, immediately after the heading "GENERAL" on page 10, the following heading and section:

"Layoffs

14.1 Forthwith upon the coming into force of this Act,

(a) every railway company to which any Part of this Act applies shall call back to work every employee of the railway company who has been on strike or has been laid off as a consequence of any strike that has ceased to be valid by reason of the coming into force of this Act; and

(b) no such employee shall be laid off or again be laid off by any such railway company as a consequence of any such strike."

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): What about employees returning to work, what guarantee have you in that regard?

The Assistant Deputy Chairman: Order, please. The committee has heard the amendment.

Mr. MacEachen: Mr. Chairman, I should like to move that amendment.

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): Let us be in order.

The Assistant Deputy Chairman: Shall the amendment carry?

Some hon. Members: Carried.

Amendment (Mr. MacEachen) agreed to.

The Assistant Deputy Chairman: Shall Clause 14 as amended carry?

Some hon. Members: Carried.

Clause 14 as amended agreed to.

The Assistant Deputy Chairman: Perhaps we might have order, please. I know the hour is late and there seem to be too many children around right now, but I would ask for order.

On Clause 15—Appointment of mediator.

Mr. Alexander: Mr. Chairman, I would like to make one or two remarks in respect of this clause dealing with the appointment of a mediator. I notice that in this particular clause dealing with non-operators, shopcraft employees and operators that there is specific reference to the fact that the railways and the unions shall forthwith enter into negotiations and do so in good faith. I think we all hope that the parties will do just that by making full disclosure and, hopefully, not make unreasonable demands.

It was earlier pointed out by the Minister of Labour how important the role of the mediator could, should and will be, as well as that of the arbitrator. What is most significant is the fact that Clause 15 does not refer to a time limit in respect of the appointment of a mediator. This gives us some concern as we heard on several occasions yesterday afternoon, yesterday evening and this morning that there has been a lack of good faith and that some parties have attempted to stall, thereby defeating the purpose of that phrase "good faith" in respect of collective bargaining.

We feel that the time could possibly arrive when the Minister of Labour will have to move quickly. In this regard I would point out that Clause 15 states that:

> The Minister of Labour may, upon the coming into force of this Act, appoint a mediator to mediate the matters in dispute—

In order to give some definite proposal regarding time we would suggest that within 60 days after the coming into force of this act the minister must, if the parties have not reached an agreement, appoint a mediator to look into the matter. Without carrying on further, and I think the principle I am trying to put forward is self-explanatory, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Peace River:

> That Clause 15 of Bill C-217 be amended by inserting in subclauses (1), (2) and (3) thereof, immediately after the word "Act" where the same respectively appears in each such subclause, the words,
> "and shall in any event upon the expiration of the sixtieth day thereafter".

The Assistant Deputy Chairman: Is the committee ready for the question on the amendment?

Mr. Lewis: Mr. Chairman, I know the hon. member for Hamilton West moves this amendment with the best intentions, but I should like to suggest to him that it is not a useful amendment. Perhaps he ought to reconsider it. Certainly we cannot support it. What the amendment means is that the minister would be obliged to appoint a mediator immediately. Obviously what the bill now implies is that the minister may decide not to appoint a mediator and go to arbitration immediately. I think it would be meaningless to go through another process.

I am sure the hon. member for Hamilton West knows, as I do, that one of the most aggravating things to the employees in a dispute situation is the continuing delays which take place in going from one procedure to another. These particular employees, the non-ops, the shopcraft and the operating employees involved in this bill have been through many months of negotiation and conciliation.

In the case of the non-operating employees there have been three or four mediators. Therefore it really would be a total waste of time merely to cause some further delays to a final settlement of the dispute if the law forced the minister to appoint a mediator whether or not he considers such an appointment is useful. I suggest to the hon. member that if he looks at the amendment—I am sure I have read it correctly—he will see that the step he is proposing may be an unnecessary step that would merely delay the final settlement of the dispute, and result in further bitterness and frustration on the part of the people involved. I hope he would withdraw it.

Hon. members know that my colleagues and I do not like the whole scheme, but if it is to be there I hope the minister will take no step that has no chance of being useful. In most cases he will go directly to the arbitrator and therefore get a resolution of the dispute as quickly as possible. For that reason we cannot support the amendment, and I think perhaps if the hon. member looks at the amendment he will see that the suggestions I have made may have some validity.

Mr. Munro (Hamilton East): Mr. Chairman, my point would be exactly that made by the hon. member for York South. I do not think it was the intention of the hon. member for Hamilton West to inject a further period that would cause delay in having a final determination made. The legal interpretation of his amendment is that it would be precisely that.

Mr. Alexander: Mr. Chairman, possibly the only reason I intervened by way of this amendment was to give some assurance that this House is concerned about the possibility of footlagging when it comes time to negotiate. Unfortunately the clause in respect of the mediator is there. It must be there for some particular purpose. I have the greatest respect for my friend, the Leader of the New Democratic Party, but he seems to be saying that notwithstanding the fact that we have this clause we should go to clause 16 which deals with the arbitrator. If that is the case I think that is wrong in principle because we have clause 15 which gives the minister the right to appoint a mediator. However, in view of the lateness of the hour and in light of the fact that I know the position of the NDP, and also of the government, I would ask for unanimous consent to withdraw the very significant amendment I have placed before the committee.

The Deputy Chairman: Order, please. Does the committee give unanimous consent to the hon. member to withdraw his amendment?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Amendment (Mr. Alexander) withdrawn.

Clause 15 agreed to.

On Clause 16—Appointment of arbitrator.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Chairman, I simply want to remind the minister that he has an amendment to clause 16. I have one also, but the minister sent me a notice of one he has.

Mr. Blenkarn: Mr. Chairman, the whole problem that has been bedevilling labour negotiations in connection with this particular dispute and leading up to it has been the increase in the rate of inflation. This has probably resulted in the efforts of Mr. Justice Craig Munroe's intentional attempt to try to give a fair settlement. However, the problem has been that that settlement talked about a 5½ per cent or perhaps a 5.45 per cent rate of inflation.

We all know, just by talking to our wives, by going to the grocery store or by reading the paper, that every day the price of groceries, bacon, ground mincemeat for hamburger and macaroni, goes up. So what happens is that members of the union are unable to accept what three or four months ago they would have been delighted to accept. It is in that light that I move, seconded by the hon. member for York Simcoe:

That subclause 16(3) of Bill C-217 be amended by adding the following subparagraph:

and shall in respect of wages specifically provide for the adjustment of wages to any increase or increases in the cost of living where the arbitrator is satisfied that such adjustment has not been previously or adequately provided.

The minister has said that the arbitrator, if appointed, will as a matter of course look at the rate of inflation and look at the escalating cost of living. We are saying here to the arbitrator that he must look at the cost of living and the rate of inflation in making an award. We must remember that the 34 cents we have now agreed on for the first year and the 6½ per cent for the second year, and so on, were based on the assumption that there will be some inflation.

But how much inflation? The arbitrator must make an award and he must look at the last couple of months. I am sure that the arbitrator will want to look at the inflation figures that may come out in a week or so from now with respect to the cost of living index in August. Perhaps those figures will reflect the 6 cents increase on a loaf of bread and the 3 cents increase on a quart of milk. What we say is that you cannot expect men to take home in real terms less than they used to under previous collective agreements.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Blenkarn: I hope that the committee will accept this amendment unanimously.

The Deputy Chairman: The committee has heard the amendment of the hon. member for Peel South. Is there agreement?

[Translation]

Mr. Fortin: Mr. Chairman, we followed with interest the proposal that has just been made; we support that motion because it takes into account the cost of living, an extremely important factor. It is the basic reason for the present conflict, as it is for most if not all present labour grievances in Canada.

Mr. Chairman, I have but one most important observation to make in this connection: we will support this proposal objectively, but I wonder, once again, why the Progressive Conservatives voted against a similar motion a while ago.

[English]

Mr. Munro (Hamilton East): Mr. Chairman, so far as the intent of the amendment is concerned we have no basic objection. The only question I have is whether the hon. member might not want to reflect for a moment and consider whether it might not be appropriate to submit this amendment to clause 16 (2) where it can be embodied as a special direction to the arbitrator to take into account the cost of living as suggested in the wording of the amendment.

Mr. Blenkarn: The problem is that subclause (2) reads that "the governor in council may, by order". We are saying that he shall take into account inflation and analyse the figures. Where the arbitrator is of the opinion that the 34 cents, the 6½ per cent and the 1½ per cent do not properly take into account inflation, he will take into account inflation when he is making the award. We analysed this pretty carefully and felt that the best place in which to put it was in subclause (6), which says that no award or decision of the arbitrator shall provide for a reduction in any wage rate established by this act. We want to go further and say that no award of the arbitrator shall ignore the fact that purchasing power has changed.

Mr. Munro (Hamilton East): Mr. Chairman, I think I can now be more specific. Under subclause (3) we are now prepared to move an amendment. We have given to the opposition parties some samples of amendments with reference to other matters, one of them being job security which will be a special reference to the arbitrator under subclause (3) of clause 16. I suggest that taking the cost of living index into account can also be a special direction to the arbitrator if he is satisfied that it has not been otherwise taken care of. So I suggest an amendment to subclause (3) which will read that an "arbitrator appointed under this section shall"—and then we can carry on with the wording of the special direction embodied in the hon. member's motion.

I wonder whether the matter could stand for now, and we could come back later to this clause.

Mr. Blenkarn: If the minister has an amendment that will embody this direction, that will be satisfactory to me. We are prepared to accept the drafting of the minister.

The Deputy Chairman: Is the committee agreed that we stand the amendment moved by the hon. member for Peel South?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Chairman, is it not now possible for the minister or for some other minister to move the proposed amendment to clause 16? I could send him my copy of it, if he has lost his.

Mr. Lang: Mr. Chairman, I will be pleased to move the following amendment:

That Bill C-217 be amended by striking out lines 14 to 17 on page 12 and substituting the following:

"section (1),

(a) shall closely examine the job security demands of the union and fully explore the feasibility of a job security plan based on the principle of attrition;

(b) shall not alter or amend any existing work rules or practices in a manner that could have an adverse effect on rates of pay, earnings or employment opportunities; and

(c) shall, for the purpose of the arbitration, have all the powers conferred on a conciliation board under section 175 of the Canada Labour Code".

The Deputy Chairman: Order, please. The committee has heard the amendment proposed by the Minister of Justice.

● (0200)

Mr. Lawrence: On a point of order; Mr. Chairman, some of us on this side of the House thought that the minister in his amendment would include some reference to the cost of living. The amendment does not do so.

The Deputy Chairman: There is nothing preventing hon. members from moving an amendment afterwards. The minister has now moved his own amendment.

Mr. Reid: It will be added as a subamendment.

Mr. Blenkarn: Do I take it that it is necessary to amend the minister's amendment?

Mr. Reid: That is right.

Mr. Orlikow: On a point of order, Mr. Chairman, I do not want to interrupt the hon. member for Peel South but wish to spend a few moments in commenting on the amendment moved. The fact that the minister had to bring in this amendment is clear proof of the point we have tried to make throughout this debate. There has not been, on the part of railway management, any desire or intention to engage in real, meaningful bargaining. I am not surprised at the great differences of opinion between the companies concerned and their employees with regard to sections of the agreement to do with wage rates. Any company tries to maximize profits and does so by trying to keep its labour costs as low as possible. On the other hand, the employees of any company try to get as much by way of wages and fringe benefits as possible. That there may be differences of opinion in these areas is not surprising.

There have been differences of opinion between the companies and their employees for many years over job security and the employees have had a good deal of experience in trying to deal with this question. Some years ago they negotiated an agreement calling for a job security fund. Money was put into that fund at the rate of one cent per hour per employee. That money has virtually never been used because the terms of that agreement were so restrictive that the companies would not, or could not, use it.

In the current negotiations the unions were prepared to make an important concession in order to introduce a section in the agreement which would protect the rights of their members. They were prepared to give up any craft or job description and, if the company would agree to guarantee the jobs of employees who had two or more years of employment, they were prepared to say that the company could direct any employee laid off as a result of automation, or for any other reason, to any other job and if the employee so adversely affected refused to take the job to which he was directed, he could be laid off without protest by the union.

The evidence submitted by the union and the conciliation board showed conclusively that that agreement would not have cost the companies one cent. Despite that, the companies did not show the slightest intention to reach any agreement in this area. Is it any wonder that railway employees are angry and suspicious, and that members of parliament are getting calls from their railway union constituents who tell them that no matter what parliament passes by way of legislation, they will not go back to work? I am not saying they are right. I am not urging them to disobey this law any more than I would urge any citizen to disobey any law, whether I agree with the law or not: for the law should be obeyed. Yet railway employees feel this way these days, to a large extent because, as the companies have become used to saying no, they have continued to say no even though such agreement will not cost them one cent.

What are the facts? I touched on them briefly last night. The work force of the non-operating employees has been reduced by more than one-third in the last 20 years. Productivity has increased greatly; it has increased in the railway industry probably more than in any other industry in the country. The age of employees working for the railways is such that in the case of the CNR the normal rate of attrition is about 18 per cent per year, while the attribution in railway employment is less than 3 per cent per year.

It is obvious that normal attrition can adequately take care of the expected reduction in the numbers of non-operating railway employees, especially in light of the seniority of the present employees. Despite 16 per cent of CNR employees now being over 55 years of age and almost one-third of CNR employees having less than four years of employment with the company, the company simply refuses to deal with the recommendations and with the suggestions made by its employees and their unions. It refuses to take seriously the proposals made by Professor Weldon to the conciliation board, that all employees of four years or more seniority should be guaranteed employment with the railway regardless of the fact that their particular jobs might be eliminated by reason of automation or other reasons. In the circumstances, it is not surprising that the employees are angry. It is sad indeed that we need to deal, by way of legislation, with a problem which should have been freely and willingly resolved between the companies and the employees, as this would not have cost the companies any money at all.

We have looked at the amendment the minister has proposed and it seems to go a substantial way toward meeting the objections which the railway unions put forward about the question of job security being left in the conciliation board report as outlined by the chairman and not being included in the bill as originally proposed by the government. The minister's amendment goes a substantial way to meeting the objections of the railway unions and the employees they represent, and for that reason I will not move the amendment to which I referred earlier.

Mr. Lawrence: Mr. Chairman, as you know, the hon. member for Peel South indicated that he had a further amendment to move to this particular clause. I think he is ready with it now.

Mr. Reid: Mr. Chairman, on that same point I think before the subamendment can be approved the motion would have to be accepted, and then the hon. member for Peel South could move his amendment.

Mr. Deputy Chairman: The question is now before the House as an amendment, and nothing prevents the hon. member from moving a subamendment or an amendment to the motion to amend.

Mr. Blenkarn: Mr. Chairman, I have had some discussions with people on the other side of the House with respect to the drafting and the placement of the clause I suggested within the context of the statute. As we are aware, the minister has produced a new subclause 3 with a part (a), a part (b) and a part (c). I would therefore ask this House for unanimous consent to withdraw the amendment that I previously placed and to make a further amendment. I suppose the best way is first to withdraw what I have proposed and then place another amendment.

With the unanimous consent of the House I would ask leave to withdraw the amendment previously placed to subclause (6) on page 13 of the bill so that I may introduce a further amendment to the minister's amendment.

The Deputy Chairman: Does the committee give unanimous consent to the hon. member for Peel South to withdraw his previous amendment to subclause (6) of clause 16 on page 13 of the bill?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Amendment (Mr. Blenkarn) withdrawn.

Mr. Blenkarn: I therefore move that subclause 16(3) of bill C-217 be amended by adding a new subparagraph (d) as follows:

shall in respect of wages, specifically provide for the adjustment of wages to any increase or increases in the cost of living where the arbitrator is satisfied that such adjustment has not been previously or adequately provided.

The Deputy Chairman: Order, please. I am sure the hon. member would not have any objection if the Chair makes a necessary correction to put the amendment in the proper form. I think it should read as an amendment to the motion moved by Mr. Lang to clause 16(3) by adding subparagraph (d) which reads as follows:

shall in respect of wages, specifically provide for the adjustment of wages to any increase or increases in the cost of living where the arbitrator is satisfied that such adjustment has not been previously or adequately provided.

Shall the amendment carry?

Some hon. Members: Carried.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Chairman, I rise on a point of order just to protect my position. I wish to move an amendment to subparagraph (b) of this amendment now before us. I would prefer to do it after we have disposed of the new subparagraph (d), but I just do not want to have thrown at me a rule to the effect that I had to do it in order.

Perhaps I might elaborate on my point, Mr. Chairman. There is a rule in the book somewhere which says that subparagraphs have to be taken seriatim. I just want still to be able to deal with (b) after (d).

The Deputy Chairman: Order, please. I assure the hon. member that he will be entitled to move his amendment to the new subparagraph that will automatically, by the decision, be added to subclause (3) of clause 16.

[Mr. Reid.]

Mr. Howard: Mr. Chairman, I tried to get this thought across earlier before the hon. member for Peel South moved his subamendment which raised a question in my mind. I thought that if he regarded my point as valid he might have been able to incorporate it in his amendment.

Apart from the fact that in substance this is what we attempted to do unsuccessfully earlier this evening, and apart from the fact that there is some uncertainty about what emphasis an arbitrator may place on the cost of living and so on, there is another question which comes to mind.

I wonder whether the amendment is limiting in its impact? In other words, I wonder whether the language of the subamendment proposed by the hon. member for Peel South might preclude the arbitrator from taking into account such questions as an increase in productivity that may be reflected in the wage structure as well.

Perhaps the subamendment moved by the hon. member for Peel South would be more broad and definite in its application if it were to include some phraseology to make sure that the arbitrator is not going to look at this in a narrow sense, and conclude from it that because it talks about "specifically provide for" increases etc. he need not feel bound by the law to proceed to tie it to such matters as productivity. I know that it comes down to a question of interpretation and I know that it is not the intent of the hon. member for Peel South that it be limiting but that it be broad in scope. I wonder whether the inclusion of some such phraseology would help. After the subamendment is dealt with, I may be able to say whether that sort of language might be incorporated in some way to ensure that no room for doubt exists in the authority.

Mr. Blenkarn: Mr. Chairman, there is clearly no room for doubt. The clause is framed the way it is because the award set out in clause 5 indicates that the figure set out there is partly for inflation, partly for increased productivity, and partly for something the people making the award were concerned with, namely, what is called catch-up.

In this particular clause we are concerned strictly with inflation. We have galloping inflation. This government seems incapable of controlling inflation. It does not want to control it. We are concerned about protecting these men against that. The arbitrator is required to ensure that, in making the award, the cost of living is taken into account, if this has not already been done, and to make variations to cover the cost of living.

Mr. Howard: If I can put it gently, that is misinterpreting clause 5. Clause 5 makes a simple declaration about which wage increase shall apply on an absolute basis one year and on a percentage basis the next. It does not talk about catch-up or any other factors. I can understand the hon. member for Peel South in his jealousy to guard himself, in that he voted against the cost of living concept earlier when it was clearly put to the committee on an absolute basis of equality, but he does not have to misinterpret the whole position in order to justify his case.

The Deputy Chairman: Is the committee ready for the question on the amendment moved by the hon. member for Peel South?

Some hon. Members: Question.

Amendment (Mr. Blenkarn) agreed to.

The Deputy Chairman: The committee will now consider the main motion moved by the Minister of Justice to amend subclause (3).

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Chairman, earlier today I gave notice of intention to move an amendment to subclause (2) of clause 16, the effect of which was to deny the right to refer work rules to an arbitrator. The minister in considering that proposed amendment, a copy of which was sent to him, sought to deal with the matter of the amendment which is now before us in the name of the Minister of Justice. This is dealt with in subparagraph (b), the reference being to an arbitrator, which reads:

shall not alter or amend any existing work rules or practices in a manner that could have an adverse effect on rates of pay, earnings or employment opportunities; and

I appreciate the action of the Minister of Labour in considering my proposal and in presenting his wording of the idea. However, I submit he has restricted it by the qualifying words in the latter part of subparagraph (b).

I suspect that many members are aware of the main issue involved at this point. The issue is one raised by members of the UTU with particular respect to the consist of freight trains. This was discussed earlier today. At the present time, the crew consist is made up of the engineer and brakeman up front and conductor and brakeman in the caboose.

There is a move on by the railway management to get rid of the brakeman in the caboose, in other words to reduce the consist of freight trains to three individuals. The UTU feels very strongly that this is a change which must not be made. Their fear is that if the arbitrator is free to change some of the work rules and practices, this is one that might be changed.

I know there are other rule changes the UTU would like to achieve, but they would prefer to achieve those by the process of negotiation. They would rather not win some of the changes they want to win and run the risk of losing their position with regard to the crew consist by virtue of that matter being one that could be referred to the arbitrator. As a matter of fact, the members of the UTU, the trainmen on the trains do not feel that the kind of arbitrator who will be called in to do the job set up under this bill will be qualified to deal with such a matter as work rules.

I feel very strongly that the intent of my earlier amendment should be observed and that the minister in subparagraph (b) should stop after the word "practices". Therefore, I move:

That the amendment be amended by deleting subparagraph (b) therefrom, and by substituting therefor the following words:

(b) shall not alter or amend any existing work rules or practices; and

It will be seen that this is a technical way of putting the amendment so that it will be clear. The effect is to remove those dangerously qualifying words in the minister's proposed amendment. I hope the committee, realizing that members of all parties have had representations made to them on this point by those on the running trains, will agree to accept this subamendment to the minister's amendment.

Mr. Munro (Hamilton East): Mr. Chairman, I wish to indicate to the hon. member that in the drafting of the amendment, I tried to cope in the best way possible. That is why the wording is in this manner. I think it is a clear signal to the arbitrator that we are concerned about the consist. We are concerned about this fourth man, the brakeman, about whom the hon. member spoke. However, it does not give him a specific direction. In each instance these are items that are in dispute. It does not identify it exclusively, but it does signal to him the concern of parliament. I feel that is preferable.

If we are now going to start to negotiate on the floor, and put certain things the arbitrator can deal with and certain things he cannot, and if management starts to make representations whereby they would like to take a few things out of the hands of the arbitrator which the union would like to have him deal with, we are into this whole business again. For that reason I hope the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre will see the artistry we think is contained in the words in subparagraph (b).

Mr. Lewis: The minister has added certain qualifying words. I am not suggesting that my hon. friend should seek permission to withdraw his amendment; he himself will have to decide that. However, I should like to ask the minister whether he would agree to include the words "or safety" as an additional protection. Thus, if the committee does not accept my hon. friend's amendment the paragraph would read:

—alter or amend any existing work rules or practices in a manner which could have an adverse effect on rates of pay, earnings, employment opportunities or safety.

Mr. Munro (Hamilton East): I do not see any objection, since we have already added some qualifying words, to adding the words "or safety".

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): If the minister is willing to do that, I will be prepared to withdraw the amendment I have proposed. Either the minister or I could move that we simply add to the minister's motion, at the appropriate place, the words "or safety".

Mr. Munro (Hamilton East): Agreed.

The Deputy Chairman: Order. The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre is seeking unanimous consent to withdraw his amendment. Is this agreed?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

The Deputy Chairman: Since there seems to be a consensus, perhaps by unanimous agreement we could add the words "or safety" after the words "employment opportunities". Is this agreed?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

The Deputy Chairman: Shall the clause, as amended, carry?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Andre: Mr. Chairman, I rise for the purpose of introducing an amendment to this clause, one which we believe will substantially improve the bill.

Yesterday and today, but especially today, we heard a good deal of rhetoric, some of it inspiring, much of it repetitious. It has been said repeatedly, both inside and outside the House, that the process called for by the bill, namely the process of continued conciliation, mediation and, if necessary, arbitration, is a charade; that it will not in fact result in a just settlement. This is a cause for concern. I do not believe this myself, and I sincerely hope it is not true. Nevertheless, our purpose in introducing this amendment is to provide further protection for the employees so that should this process not result in a settlement which will allow the railroads to continue operating, if, in fact, dissatisfaction were to reach such a stage, ten members of parliament could bring this question back before the House for disposition.

A similar provision was included in the 1966 legislation. I should like to point out—and I hope this will be acknowledged by the unions—that we are proposing a realistic safety measure. It is not a gimmick. We are not talking about 40 Members of Parliament, but about ten. I would therefore move:

That Bill C-217 be amended by inserting therein, immediately following subclause 16(6), the following:

"(7) A copy of any decision by an arbitrator appointed under subsection (1) shall be laid before the House of Commons not later than five days after the day the decision is made or, if that House is not then sitting, within the first five days next thereafter that the House of Commons is sitting.

(8) Where, within five days after a copy of a decision by an arbitrator is so laid before the House of Commons, a motion for the consideration of the House of Commons, signed by not less than ten members of the House, is filed with the Speaker to the effect that the decision be revoked or amended, the House of Commons shall, within the first fifteen days next after the motion is filed that the House is sitting, in accordance with the Rules of the House, take up and consider the motion, and if the motion, with or without amendments, is approved by the House, the decision of the arbitrator shall be revoked or amended in accordance with the terms of the motion as so approved and the collective agreement to which the decision of the arbitrator had applied shall be so amended.

(9) All questions in connection with any motion taken up and considered by the House of Commons pursuant to subsection (8) shall be debated without interruption and decided not later than the end of the third sitting day next after the day the motion is first so taken up and considered".

Mr. Broadbent: Mr. Chairman, it would be charitable to assume that this amendment proposed by the Conservative party is in the form we see because of the fact it is 20 minutes to three in the morning. However, I am not in a charitable mood at this time of the morning and I find it completely ludicrous that a member of that party, whose members argued earlier during this debate that parliament should not involve itself in the resolution of conflicts on a continuing basis but only in circumstances involving some kind of an emergency, should now make this kind of a proposal. What is its logic?

[The Deputy Chairman.]

I suggest the logic of the amendment is that if any 10 members of the House find an objection to any decision made by the arbitrator, parliament once again will be involved in a debate on the issue at hand. Surely if that party to my right wants to be consistent with its leader's statement, who suggested we should keep parliament out of these disputes, it would not present this amendment. However, this is fully consistent with that party's totally inconsistent behaviour during this debate, so I am not surprised.

An hon. Member: Don't get nasty.

Mr. Broadbent: I think the amendment should be rejected outright. I am not going to prolong the debate by saying anything other than that the Conservative party has not only committed illogical inconsistencies but, beyond that, has misinterpreted what was done in 1966. If hon. members of that party would get the Statutes of Canada for 1966-67 and look at page 5 of Section 11 they will find there is no such precedent for the kind of proposal they have now placed before the House. In fact the proposal in that section refers to restrictions exclusively in respect of regulations, which is a completely different proposal from the one before us, and I urge that this committee reject it.

Mr. Mackasey: Mr. Chairman, unlike the hon. member for Oshawa-Whitby, I do my best at a quarter to three in the morning. I do agree with what he has said. I think the hon. gentleman did advance this proposal in good faith but has probably missed the point. In 1966 the proposal had reference to 10 members, but the review of the work of the arbitrator was very limited in scope, in fact limited to the terms of reference to the arbitrator. The proposal by this member would involve a complete review of the decision of the arbitrator. That in turn would mean a periodic review, and this could go on and on, forever and ever and ever. I would urge the hon. member to withdraw his motion.

I have nothing further to say, but I hope the employers of the railway employees who are in the galleries will realize that a negotiated settlement a week ago would have been a lot less expensive than what they will have to pay as a result of the amendments that have now been adopted.

Mr. Andre: Mr. Chairman, the simple purpose of this motion was to enable members of the NDP to assure the unions that there was a safety valve. In view of the fact that the government and the NDP will obviously not support it, I would ask for unanimous consent to withdraw the amendment.

The Assistant Deputy Chairman: Is it agreed?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

The Assistant Deputy Chairman: I must remind hon. members that the hon. member requires the unanimous consent of the committee. Does the committee agree?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

An hon. Member: Howard is expediting things again.

The Assistant Deputy Chairman: I know that hon. members are tired and it is hard for anyone to be attentive.

[Translation]

—as much attention as possible, but it is clear to the Chair that someone is opposed and does not want unanimous consent.

[English]

For the third time I will ask whether the committee gives unanimous consent to the request by the hon. member to withdraw the amendment?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Howard: Mr. Chairman, because there seems to be some doubt I would ask you to put the question. In other words, I do not give my consent.

An hon. Member: Don't ask us for consent again.

The Assistant Deputy Chairman: Those in favour of the motion will please rise.

Bill reported.

Mr. Munro (Hamilton East) thereupon moved that the bill be read the third time and do pass.

• (0250)

Mr. David Lewis (York South): Mr. Speaker, I should, I suppose, at this hour ask the indulgence of the House.

An hon. Member: Be humble.

Mr. Lewis: Mr. Speaker, I want to say a few words very seriously. As we have indicated, my colleagues and I are disappointed that the bill which has now been carried in committee and which will, of course, with the support of the other three parties in this House, be carried into law, is a great deal less just to the people concerned than it ought to have been. Therefore we will, in line with the position we have taken throughout, vote against the bill.

I said at the very beginning of this exercise that my colleagues and I were as aware as anyone else of the hardships which the present emergency has created for many sections of Canada and of the need at some time like the present for parliament to act to remove the cause of those hardships. But I repeat what I have said—repetition in this House is not unusual—that precisely because parliament found it necessary to take rights away from Canadians that the law gives them to stop people from striking when they are on strike, to prevent them from going out on strike which they have a right to do by law, such as the employees in the shopcrafts and running trades, when parliament takes on that responsibility it has a duty to be fair and just to the people whose rights it takes away.

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): How about the little people who get hurt?

Mr. Lewis: I suggest that the bill which is now to be given third reading is not fair and just to the people who are being penalized by it. None the less, it is a mark of our democratic process and of this parliamentary process that the bill has been improved. I know that in one respect the members on the government benches are unhappy with the change from 30 cents to 34 cents, and so on; but in many other respects, as a result of the recommendations made by members of the opposition parties, by members of the Conservative party and members of my party, other clauses in the bill have provided greater security for the employees involved in the strike and who were laid off. I have watched on television, I have listened on the radio, and I have seen exhibited in the confines of parliament the bitterness and frustration of the people involved in the strike which this bill seeks to end. I heard them on radio, on television and in person yesterday chant that they will not go back.

Many times in this House, many of us have been in a minority on a given subject. We have lost the fight—not only my colleagues and myself but other members of this House. We have lost a cause for which we have fought and which we have considered to be of immense importance to us, to our ideals, to Canada and to its people. But we have learned to accept the result, the democratic result, the decision of this parliament.

I can appreciate the frustration and the anger of those who are being affected by this law and who are to be ordered to go back to work under conditions not fully acceptable to them. But what they do will be their decision. I want to emphasize that in our view, and I know in the view of every member of this House, all Canadians have to accept the decision of parliament. The cause of the strikers and the cause of the employees will not be served by those who set out deliberately to defy the law that has been passed, even though that law is not entirely fair to them. Because it is not entirely fair to the people concerned in the railways, we cannot but vote against the bill on third reading.

Mr. James A. McGrath (St. John's East): Mr. Speaker, I merely want to say on behalf of our party that we hope this is the last time we are called upon to pass this type of legislation, because we feel there is a better way.

• (0300)

[Translation]

Mr. André Fortin (Lotbinière): Mr. Speaker, I wish to say very briefly that we will support this bill, but with reluctance, since this is not a democratic or proper way of settling a labour dispute. One thing is sure, however: this bill has been improved by the work of parliament and our party is pleased that at least some hon. members from other parties recognized the importance of speaking of gearing wages to the cost of living. That is something we have been clamouring for in all sectors of the economy and for once, this evening, our ideas made some headway. I heard colleagues of all parties speak of it.

Mr. Speaker, before ending my remarks, I should like to say that the I am surprised at my hon. colleague from York South (Mr. Lewis) paying that he will vote against the bill, against the back-to-work order, when his party spent I don't know how much time proposing amendments in conjunction with the government, which amendments were accepted. Finally, Mr. Chairman, if the NDP vote against the bill, I wonder what logic there is in their attitude.

[English]

Mr. Erik Nielsen (Yukon): Mr. Speaker, I perhaps travelled farther than any other member of the House of Commons to get here, and it would be inappropriate if I did not say a word or two about some others who have been completely overlooked in the few days during which this debate has been going on. If it were not for the communications network that was maintained by the CN in the Yukon Territory and the Northwest Territories we would have had virtually no communication with the outside world, electronically at least. That network has been maintained during the strike by supervisors most of whom were workers at one time. Therefore, I think I would be remiss if I did not extend our appreciation to those supervisors who provided the service to these often forgotten areas of Canada.

Mr. Speaker: Is the House ready for the question?

Some hon. Members: Question.

Mr. Speaker: All those in favour of the motion will please say yea.

Some hon. Members: Yea.

Mr. Speaker: All those opposed will please say nay.

Some hon. Members: Nay.

Mr. Speaker: In my opinion the yeas have it.

And more than five members having risen:

Mr. Speaker: Call in the members.

The House divided on the motion (Mr. Munro, Hamilton East) which was agreed to on the following division:

Mr. Speaker: I declare the motion carried.

Bill read the third time and passed.

Mr. MacEachen: Mr. Speaker, it is understood that the bill will go to the other place, so probably we should suspend the sitting to the call of the bells, when we could give royal assent, hopefully, to this measure.

Mr. Baldwin: Mr. Speaker, I was wondering if at this late hour the minister is inspired to give a divine decision as to what we are going to do next Tuesday.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Or, more immediately, what are we going to do for the next hour?

Mr. Speaker: If there is agreement, we will suspend the sitting to the call of the bells.

SITTING SUSPENDED

At 3.25 a.m. the sitting was suspended.

SITTING RESUMED

The House resumed at 6 a.m.

Royal Assent

THE ROYAL ASSENT

[English]

Mr. Speaker: I have the honour to inform the House that I have received the following communication:

Government House
Ottawa, September 1, 1973

Sir:

I have the honour to inform you that the Honourable Ronald Martland, Puisne Judge of the Supreme Court of Canada, in his capacity as Deputy Governor General, will proceed to the Senate chamber today for the purpose of giving royal assent to certain bills.

I have the honour to be,
Sir,
Your obedient servant,
André Garneau
Brigadier General
Administrative Secretary to the Governor General.

A message was delivered by the Gentleman Usher of the Black Rod as follows:

Mr. Speaker, the Honourable the Deputy Governor General desires the immediate attendance of this honourable House in the chamber of the honourable the Senate.

Accordingly, Mr. Speaker with the House went up to the Senate chamber.

And being returned:

Mr. Speaker informed the House that the Deputy Governor General had been pleased to give, in Her Majesty's name, the royal assent to the following bill:

Bill C-217, an act to provide for the resumption and continuance of operations of railways and for the settlement of the disputes with respect to terms and conditions of employment between railway companies and their employees—Chapter 32.

Mr. Speaker: I am sure I express our feelings and thanks when I express appreciation for the services we have received in the course of this long day's sitting from the staff of the House.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Speaker: I am advised that not only the library, restaurant and cafeteria staff, Journals and Debates, but the House of Commons personal staff, the pages and the protective staff have dutifully remained at our service during these long hours. I am sure we appreciate their services.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Speaker: Pursuant to Section (3) of Standing Order 2, this House stands adjourned until Tuesday, September 4, at 2 o'clock p.m.

At 6.13 a.m. the House adjourned, without question put, pursuant to special order.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Tuesday, September 4, 1973

The House met at 2 p.m.

PRIVILEGE

MISS MacDONALD—INTERROGATION BY POLICE CONCERNING FILES MISSING FROM INDIAN AFFAIRS DEPARTMENT

Miss Flora MacDonald (Kingston and the Islands): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege, notice of which I have given you, on behalf of myself and every member of this House. You, Sir, as parliament begins each session, ask the Governor General, in the Queen's name, to continue the privileges, mandates and powers to be held, enjoyed and exercised by members of parliament.

My question of privilege concerns the fact that on Friday last my parliamentary office was visited on two occasions by members of the Ottawa city police force and the RCMP without first having sought an appointment or without your permission or that of your staff.

Some hon. Members: Shame, shame.

Miss MacDonald (Kingston and the Islands): The purpose of their visit was to inquire about files and documents missing from the Department of Indian Affairs and Northern Development. On the first occasion, these gentlemen interrogated my staff, in my absence and without my permission, as to my activities, contacts, telephone calls and conversations during the preceding 24 hours.

On the second occasion when I arranged to meet them they continued this type of interrogation. What gravely concerns me, Sir, is the implication throughout their questioning of my involvement in a criminal offence.

Some hon. Members: Shame, shame.

Miss MacDonald (Kingston and the Islands): Obviously I have an interest in seeing that the investigation is conducted satisfactorily, and for that reason I subsequently arranged to meet with these police officers. Yet, I have an overriding obligation to ensure that the privacy of my office is not violated.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Miss MacDonald (Kingston and the Islands): I have raised this question, Sir, because its gravity affects not only myself but all members on both sides of this House. If you find I have a prima facie case of breach of privilege I will move, seconded by the hon. member for Fundy-Royal (Mr. Fairweather):

That all matters pertaining to the interrogation of myself and my staff on Friday last be referred to the Committee on Privileges and Elections for study and report.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Kingston and the Islands (Miss MacDonald) did provide the Chair with notice as required by the Standing Orders. Furthermore, the hon. member and I have had a few discussions in connection with the incident to which she has just alluded.

I have no doubt that all members of this House are highly concerned about such activity. I have no doubt whatsoever that members would not want to be placed in the position where, in their absence from their offices, representatives of police forces, either federal, provincial or municipal, should be allowed to go in and, without any authority whatsoever, question members of the staff. I think that is an extremely serious matter, and I have no doubt at this point that I express the views and concern of each member of this House when I say that if ever there was an apparent breach of a member's privilege, this is it.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Speaker: At the same time, I think perhaps hon. members would want me to have an opportunity to have a discussion with the hon. member for Kingston and the Islands to ascertain whether the House would want to have a debate on this matter or whether we should simply agree that there is a prima facie case of breach of privilege, put the motion and have the matter referred to the Standing Committee on Privileges and Elections. I am not sure whether or not hon. members, in their joint and unanimous concern over the incident, would want us to proceed in this way. If there are views which might be expressed at this time for the guidance of the Chair I would be grateful to hon. members. I, personally, would not hesitate to rule that there is a prima facie case of breach of privilege, subject to what guidance I might receive from hon. members on the point.

Mr. G. W. Baldwin (Peace River): Mr. Speaker, I do not want to say anything more on this matter other than to indicate that you have expressed the views I hold, and which I am sure represent the views of members on both sides of the House. I think the only issue which can be decided at this time is whether or not the motion should be put now or there should be a debate. Possibly the government House leader and the other House leaders might have an opportunity for consultation and discussion with Your Honour on this point so that we may come to a decision which will accelerate the solution of this question, and also see that it receives the attention it deserves. I would make that suggestion.

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (President of the Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, your expression of opinion on this matter certainly has found support in this part of the House and we would be ready to co-operate to seek the most effective method of dealing with this matter. Perhaps it would be useful to follow through on the suggestion of the hon. member for Peace River (Mr. Baldwin) and have a meeting with Your Honour and other House leaders.

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, we would have been prepared to agree without debate to the passing of the motion proposed by the hon. member for Kingston and the Islands (Miss MacDonald), but since there is the suggestion of consultation we would be glad to participate in that consultation. I have no hesitation in expressing the view now, however, that we think what is needed is inquiry into the matter by the committee rather than a debate at this stage on the floor of the House.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

[Translation]

Mr. Réal Caouette (Témiscamingue): Mr. Speaker, we agree with the suggestion that the House Leaders should meet instead of our holding a debate to settle the matter as soon as possible, since all hon. members do feel, as you said a while ago, that police officers should not have access to our offices without our knowledge, at any time, whenever it suits them, but that they should be authorized to do so beforehand. We therefore strongly support a meeting of the House leaders so that consultation may be held at the earliest possible time.

[English]

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, if you will permit me a few seconds, might I suggest that the hon. member for Kingston and the Islands (Miss MacDonald) be invited to meet with the House leaders when this matter is being discussed.

Mr. Speaker: It is my understanding of the situation that, on the basis of the Chair's finding there is a prima facie case of privilege, the motion would be put later on following the discussions which have been alluded to, that is consultations with the House leaders, the hon. member for Kingston and the Islands and the Chair, following which arrangements could be made for putting the motion and perhaps having the matter referred to the Committee on Privileges and Elections as suggested by the hon. member for Kingston and the Islands.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

SUGGESTED PROCEDURE FOR DEALING WITH BUSINESS OF THE DAY

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (President of the Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, I am rising at this point under motions to suggest a procedure that has been discussed earlier today to deal with the business of the House facing us this afternoon under introduction of bills. We will be seeking to move first reading of a bill to amend the Old Age Security Act and a bill to amend the statute law providing for the payment of supplementary retirement benefits. It would be our wish to proceed with second reading of the amendments to the Old Age Security Act. We realize members might want to have an opportunity to look at the bill before the discussion begins.

At the same time, it is the decision of the government that the Prime Minister make a statement on motions today dealing with inflation and the cost of living. The cabinet has completed its study of this statement, but it is not ready, translated and in proper form for distribution. It might be convenient, in order to accommodate these various considerations, if we agreed to suspend our sitting until 4 p.m. The statement to be made by the Prime Minister would be circulated as soon as possible to give opposition parties an opportunity to study and comment on it. Then, following motions, we would continue with the normal question period and the normal business of the House.

That is a proposal I make in order to accommodate the need to have a look at the Prime Minister's statement so that comments might be possible.

Mr. G. W. Baldwin (Peace River): Mr. Speaker, the general suggestion made by the government House leader is acceptable. We would have been ready, if necessary, to respond to the Prime Minister's statement at this time, but one can well understand, in view of the importance of this statement, that the document must have the greatest possible scrutiny. The punctuation must be adequately fitted to the statement.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Its incubation took a long time.

Mr. Baldwin: Having in mind the limited period of gestation, we are quite prepared to consider the motion as suggested. Under those conditions, we will agree to the suggestion.

On the matter of the bill to be introduced, what the government House leader suggested is reasonable. As a matter of fact, we are prepared to go one step further. Because the bill is one which covers suggestions we have made from time to time, we are willing that it be dealt with in committee of the whole, thus saving the time which might otherwise be taken in sending it to the standing committee.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Baldwin: We hope that, with adequate opportunity for debate for those who want to make representations, it might well be completed by tonight—I hasten to add, within orthodox limits of our time. Under those conditions and for that reason, we would be prepared to go along with that addition to what the government House leader has suggested.

An hon. Member: Start the meditation.

Mr. Baldwin: Transcendental?

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, as must be obvious, there has been a fair amount of collective bargaining today. In this instance it has been reasonably successful. I believe that if you combine the comments made by the government House leader and those made by the hon. member for Peace River (Mr. Baldwin) you will get a picture of what it is to which we have agreed. May I point out that the proposal for a suspension until four o'clock is one that in our view should not come into effect until after the introduction of bills, so that the two bills in question will have been introduced and will have received first reading.

Although our leader was ready to speak immediately in response to any statement the Prime Minister might make—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Baldwin: It is a good thing you are not under oath, Stanley.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): There is one thing about my leader; he always does what I say he will do. We also feel it would be a good idea to have time to look at the bill to amend the Old Age Security Act and to look at the Prime Minister's statement before we proceed further.

We also agree to the proposal that when the bill to amend the Old Age Security Act has had second reading, it could be considered in committee of the whole rather than being sent to the Standing Committee on Health, Welfare and Social Affairs. Accordingly, we are a party to the agreement that has been reached thus far today.

Mr. Speaker: Is it the wish of the House that the bills in question be introduced at this time, and that the sitting be suspended thereafter until four o'clock?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

OLD AGE SECURITY ACT

PROVISION FOR QUARTERLY ADJUSTMENT OF PENSION

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of National Health and Welfare) moved for leave to introduce Bill C-219, to amend the Old Age Security Act.

Motion agreed to, bill read the first time and ordered to be printed.

Mr. Speaker: When shall the said bill be read a second time? Later this day?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Privilege—Miss MacDonald

STATUTE LAW (SUPPLEMENTARY RETIREMENT BENEFITS) AMENDMENT ACT, 1973

PROVISION FOR REMOVAL OF TWO PER CENT LIMIT ON ESCALATION, REDUCTION OF ELIGIBLE AGE, ETC.

Hon. C. M. Drury (President of the Treasury Board) moved for leave to introduce Bill C-220, to amend the statute law providing for the payment of supplementary retirement benefits to certain persons in receipt of pensions payable out of the Consolidated Revenue Fund.

Motion agreed to, bill read the first time and ordered to be printed.

Mr. Speaker: When shall the said bill be read a second time? Later this day?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. MacEachen: Mr. Speaker, it might be worth recording that we are agreeable to dealing with the old age security bill in the committee of the whole. If that could be understood we could agree to the suspension until four o'clock.

Mr. Speaker: Is it therefore agreed that the House suspend the sitting until the call of the bells at four o'clock?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

SITTING SUSPENDED

At 2.23 p.m. the sitting of the House was suspended.

SITTING RESUMED

The House resumed at 4 p.m.

PRIVILEGE

MISS MACDONALD—INTERROGATION BY POLICE CONCERNING FILES MISSING FROM INDIAN AFFAIRS DEPARTMENT—REFERENCE TO COMMITTEE

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Earlier this afternoon the hon. member for Kingston and the Islands (Miss MacDonald) proposed a privilege motion. The Chair ruled at that time that there was a prima facie case of privilege. At the suggestion of some hon. members it was agreed that the ensuing formalities might be considered after discussions or consultations between the House leaders. Those have taken place and it has been agreed that the motion should be put and the matter referred, without debate, to the Committee on Privileges and Elections.

I would therefore put the motion proposed by the hon. member for Kingston and the Islands, seconded by the hon. member for Fundy-Royal (Mr. Fairweather):

That all matters pertaining to the interrogation of myself and my staff on Friday last be referred to the Committee on Privileges and Elections for study and report.

Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the said motion?

Motion agreed to.

Cost of Living

[English]

THE CANADIAN ECONOMY

STATEMENT BY PRIME MINISTER ON MEASURES TO DEAL WITH COST OF LIVING

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, parliament has achieved the first purpose for which it was recalled into emergency session. It has legislated an end to the national rail strike and hon. members know that today the trains and ferries are running again. The Minister of Labour (Mr. Munro) will soon announce the appointment of an arbitrator for the dispute, one whose terms of reference are to bring about a prompt and fair settlement. Getting the trains running again was an urgent national economic necessity, as is the second purpose for which hon. members are here. That is the problem of rising prices, especially food prices, which the government wishes parliament to deal with now.

The government wishes to benefit from parliamentary discussion of inflation and the economy; it wishes to seek the approval of parliament for immediate legislative action that it proposes; it wishes to report on non-legislative actions that it has taken and will take. I will briefly describe the government's legislative proposals and non-legislative actions in this statement.

Mr. Speaker, Canadian prices for consumer goods have, indeed, gone up rapidly, although our situation is better than that of most other industrialized countries. In fact, our economy is dynamic and expanding quickly; the expected rate of growth this year is 7 per cent of the GNP in real terms. Such rate of growth is seldom achieved, here or elsewhere. Jobs are being created at a faster rate than in any other developed country: when we compare the first seven months of this year with the corresponding period last year, we see that the rate of new jobs has gone up by 5 per cent and that 411,000 more Canadians have jobs, that is an unprecedented rate of growth namely 4.3 per cent of the labour force. And so, despite the swift increase in the labour force, unemployment has gone down to 5.2 per cent whereas last September it reached its peak at 6.9 per cent.

Workers income and corporation benefits have by far exceeded the global rate of inflation in Canada. During the first quarter this year, the real income of individuals, after income tax, went up by an average 6.2 per cent compared with the same period in 1972. If Canadians have a net increase in income, it is due to a large extent to the fact that the financial budgetary reductions of last February have borne fruit.

Higher costs of food products and others result from world shortages, the effects of which an importing and exporting country such as ours cannot escape. In the face of higher world prices, our action is limited. Nevertheless, Parliament has in effect accepted the important proposals put forward by the government to slow down inflation through tariff and tax reductions that will alleviate the burden of higher prices on Canadians. Parliament has agreed to greatly reduce personal income taxes and sales tax, to increase tax exemptions, to provide as of January 1974 for the escalation of personal income tax, to increase sensibly old age security pensions, to remove federal sales taxes on children's clothing, to cut tariffs on a wide range of consumer goods.

[Mr. Speaker.]

[English]

Any system of prices and incomes controls has thus far been rejected as ineffective in coping with a phenomenon that is worldwide and because controls risk aggravating the real problem—the problem of supply—should farmers and other producers restrict production in the face of controls. That is what has happened elsewhere. A Food Prices Review Board was established to monitor prices, to investigate price rises, to train the spotlight of publicity on those increases considered to be unwarranted.

The government also announced its intention to nearly triple family allowances.

This package to restrain inflation and to mitigate the effects of inflation was directed at Canadians generally, but especially at those who are least able to protect themselves, those on low and/or fixed incomes. As the world inflationary forces continued, I announced on August 13 further steps extending this comprehensive approach under three sets of measures. These were: measures to conserve and increase the supply of food while protecting farm incomes; measures to protect the consumer against unwarranted price increases; measures to mitigate the effect of rising prices, especially on those who suffer most.

I would like to discuss legislative proposals for parliament and non-legislative actions taken or to be taken, under these three headings. I shall discuss, first, measures to conserve and increase the supply of food. The government, on June 29 last, placed soya, rape and flax seeds and their by-products under the control of the Export and Import Permits Act to protect our protein feed situation after the United States imposed their export embargo. Similarly temporary export controls on beef and pork were imposed on August 13 to safeguard meat supplies for Canadians against a rush of Canadian exports to the United States caused by trading and price distortions brought on by price controls in that country. A good supply of meat continues to be available in Canadian towns and cities and prices have dropped substantially following the government action because of increased marketings—

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Hees: This has been a startling statement thus far.

Mr. Trudeau: —coupled with some consumer resistance. The conclusion of the rail strike will further serve to reduce pricing anomalies. Export controls will last only as long as they are necessary—

An hon. Member: Not in western Canada.

Mr. Diefenbaker: They are hurting the farmer.

Mr. Trudeau: Is there anything else?

Mr. Fairweather: Nothing has been said yet.

Mr. Hees: That is why we want to fill in for you.

Mr. MacEachen: You are awfully nervous over there.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Speaker: May we have order, please.

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Nielsen: Now say something.

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, I am wondering if the opposition is not afraid of the contents of this statement, otherwise they would not make so much noise; they would be much more relaxed in preparation for listening to their own leader make his statement. Export controls will last only as long as they are necessary to protect the food supply of Canadians and are not intended to be a permanent instrument for supply control.

On a more long-term basis, the provinces have been invited to a ministerial-level conference in September to agree on principles and policies to encourage increased food production at reasonable returns to farmers. Increased food production in Canada, encouraged by measures to bring more stability and security of prices to producers, strikes at the heart of high food prices now being faced by consumers. Therefore, the government is prepared to put in place measures such as higher support payments for agricultural commodities, advance payments on a wide range of agricultural products, commodity-oriented government-producer financed income stabilization programs and such other measures as might evolve after the September conference. There is no shortage of food in Canada now, Mr. Speaker, and the government will see to it that there is no artificial creation of scarcities.

Adequate farm manpower at times of peak need is critical to food supply, and if we are to increase production we must increase the availability of manpower. The Manpower and Immigration Department is preparing new and more effective arrangements for the recruitment, training, deployment and housing of seasonal farm workers. Additionally, wherever labour market bottlenecks may be contributing to rising costs, the Minister of Manpower and Immigration (Mr. Andras) will conduct major efforts to ensure there is sufficient supply of skilled workers to meet demand.

● (1620)

And now, Mr. Speaker, I am coming to the second series of measures dealing with the consumer's protection.

Following my statement of August 14, the terms of reference of the Food Prices Review Board have been extended so that from now on, it can investigate price increases in such or such commodity. Its staff has been strengthened: some experienced civil servants attached to its investigation section, are already busy detecting unwarrantable price increases. In addition, the research division and the administration services have been enlarged. The government, I can assure this House, is anxious for the Board to be in a position to detect unjustifiable increases as well as those responsible for them and to lay them to an unrelenting publicity. If the Board points out glaring abuses which those responsible do not eliminate, the government will resort to its powers to take the necessary steps. If it needs other powers, it will not hesitate to call on Parliament.

On the other hand, the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs (Mr. Gray) will introduce in the House a bill amending and widening the Combines Investigation Act in order, among other things, to define and provide penalties in the greater number of cases of misleading advertising and other unfair commercial practices.

[English]

Finally, Mr. Speaker, I shall discuss measures to mitigate the effect of rising prices. Accompanying these measures to conserve and increase the supply of food, and to protect consumers in respect of food prices, the government will be asking parliament to approve a number of measures to protect the purchasing power of pensions and allowances.

First, legislation has been introduced to escalate the pensions under the OAS and GIS plans every three months instead of every year. This will make these pensions much more responsive to price increases. The legislation will take effect in October, 1973, when the basic pensions will increase from $100 to $105.30, reflecting the increases in the consumer price index for the ten-month period from October, 1972, to July, 1973; and the total pension, including the GIS supplement, will go from $170.14 to $179.16 for a single person.

Second, legislation will be introduced to remove the 2 per cent ceiling on the annual escalation of pensions paid under the Canada Pension Plan. The provinces will be asked for their support of this change, as required by law. Parallelling this change in the CPP, legislation has been introduced today to remove the 2 per cent ceiling on cost of living increases of pensions paid to retired employees of the Government of Canada.

As for private pensions, the government proposes to remove the provision that only employee pension plans with a 2 per cent maximum on the annual escalation of pensions being paid may be registered under the Income Tax Act. From now on, pension plans which provide for full escalation of pensions in response to cost of living increases will be registerable.

Third, the government has already introduced a measure which will assist families with children to meet higher living costs: the virtual tripling of family allowances in January, 1974, to an average of $20 per month. To meet the higher prices which must be paid now, however, parliament will be asked to approve an interim increase in family and youth allowances to $12 per month starting in October next. The $12 allowances would not be taxable.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Trudeau: As for the poorest families in Canadian society, the federal government shares 50 per cent of the cost of social assistance paid by the provinces to families in need. The government said in August, and repeats today, that it stands ready to pay 50 per cent of the costs of increasing these payments to compensate for higher prices. Certain provinces have already acted to do so, and others are undoubtedly considering taking such action soon.

The foregoing constitutes payments of income to Canadians.

The government also intends to take other measures to reduce the cost of basic foods, measures which will greatly contribute, I think, to maintain and even reduce the price of essential foodstuffs.

[English]

We are completing discussions with the Canadian Wheat Board and the Ontario Wheat Producers Marketing Board to immediately reduce prices of wheat to millers and other users for human consumption in Canada. The reduction would be approximately to the level of the early August prices and would be part of a multi-year agreement which would provide guaranteed minimum and maximum prices to the Canadian farmer.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Trudeau: We would pay to the Wheat Board and other producers up to $1.25 per bushel of wheat consumed by Canadians—bread, pasta and all other uses—as a consumer subsidy. The result will be that a further bread price increase of about 5 cents a loaf which was inescapable in October will not now occur.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

[Translation]

Mr. Trudeau: The federal government wishes also to alleviate the burden of the price of milk for Canadian families and insists that any measure taken will benefit consumers. The government is therefore willing to guarantee payment of a 5 cent subsidy per quart of milk to the provinces where marketing boards will agree to maintain or reduce the cost of milk for at least one year. At the same time, the government will set up a program aiming at reducing by an equivalent amount the price of a package of powdered skimmed milk. In this respect, it will hold meetings with provincial representatives without delay.

To make sure that these measures will fully benefit consumers, the Food Prices Review Board will be instructed to closely supervise the results of the subsidy programs that I have just announced.

[English]

Turning from food prices, another area of concern to Canadians and the government is the price of gasoline and heating oil. The world is going through a period of rapidly escalating petroleum prices and Canada is not immune from world conditions. The market in eastern Ontario, Quebec and the Atlantic provinces is dependent entirely on international crude oil supplies, mainly from Venezuela, Iran and the Arab states. Crude oil from these sources has gone up in price by more than 30 per cent in the past year.

In the rest of Ontario and the western pronvinces, which are supplied by Canadian production, the price has risen along with international prices. In part this is because about half of Canadian production is sold in the United States markets where increasing reliance on foreign supplies has made the United States vulnerable to foreign prices. Canadian crude oil production has consequently been sold in the U.S. at the opportunity prices available, and the domestic Canadian consumer has seen this U.S. demand raise his prices too.

Prices of petroleum products, including gasoline and home heating oil, in Canada today have reached the point at which the government believes immediate measures are required to stabilize the action of the marketplace in the interest of consumers and the rational development of Canadian industry.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Trudeau: Accordingly, the following measures are now being announced:

1. The oil industry will be asked to refrain from making further price increases affecting Canadian consumers before January 30, 1974. This price restraint would apply except where, to the satisfaction of the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resouces (Mr. Macdonald), the increase in the cost of imported crude oil warrants a Canadian price increase.

2. The government intends to seek a control mechanism whereby higher prices in the U.S. market would not automatically increase prices at home in Canada.

Some hon. Members: Oh!

Mr. Trudeau: An export tax or a national oil marketing board are two possible control mechanisms. Discussions will be held as soon as possible with provinces and industry prior to the introduction of legislation.

3. The government will also hold early consultations with provinces and industry on the extension of pipeline facilities so as to enable Canadian oil to be shipped into Montreal. At a time of rapidly escalating international prices, this would put Canadian oil into competition with international oil and would give additional security against international disruption of supply.

Mr. Speaker, in present world conditions the most urgent task of the government is to ensure that those who are least able to defend themselves against the effects of inflation are protected. This has been a fundamental objective of the government. The measures which I have announced today are consistent with and will further strengthen the measures which the government has already taken to ensure that this objective is met.

The government must also ensure that the inflation which we face today and which reflects world shortages of foodstuffs and key commodities is not translated into escalating costs which might necessitate the imposition of income and price controls. The government believes there is a better way and a better course to follow.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Trudeau: The measures which it has taken to increase disposable income and thus offset the effect of inflation on real income should be taken into account by those who set prices, profits and wages. The government expects them to behave in this way and not take advantage of the current situation to push up prices and costs.

These measures, Mr. Speaker, express the government's determination to deal with the problem of inflation in Canada.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Hon. Robert L. Stanfield (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, at one point the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) suggested that we in the opposition were afraid of the contents of the paper he has just presented to the House. When one considers that the Prime Minister was not able to produce this document at two o'clock, the fact that at two o'clock we got the impression that we would receive it in plenty of time before four o'clock, and we received it between 25 and 20 minutes to four, it looks as though the Prime Minister was rather afraid of anybody seeing what was in it. I do not know how early in the afternoon the government decided on these measures, but certainly it had some difficulty getting them down on paper.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Stanfield: That kind of delay is not the sort of tactic or well organized endeavour that is likely to engender very much confidence in respect of what is in this document. There was a good deal of high expectation, which turned out to have been misplaced, that the Prime Minister would finally present a significant policy statement to this parliament. Instead, the Prime Minister has given us this afternoon a sort of pot-pourri of measures that deal with the most evident and discomforting symptoms of the sickness, or some of them—a review of the substantial measures previously announced—but no comprehensive assault on inflation.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Stanfield: The Prime Minister then went back to talk about the great anti-inflationary benefits conferred by the budget of the Minister of Finance (Mr. Turner) last February. The government has evidently found it completely impossible to monitor the effects, because we have not had that monitoring report as yet and it has been clear for very many months that the budget of the Minister of Finance was a joke as far as an attack on inflation in this country is concerned.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Stanfield: In respect of the measures announced this afternoon with regard to the Food Prices Review Board—and I am sure this is disappointing for the hon. member for York South (Mr. Lewis) and his colleagues—as I understand what the Prime Minister said, nothing effective at all has been done to put any teeth into the operations of that board.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Stanfield: The Prime Minister announced some measures that will receive general approval, such as the subsidy in respect of milk and the increase to $12 in family and youth allowances, although a lot of us wonder what kind of improvising is going on when the government announces a longer term program involving income taxation regarding these payments or allowances when introducing an interim measure which involves no such taxation. However, I am not going to quibble about questions like that in discussing a matter of such general importance.

Let me just say, with regard to the increase in old age pensions announced, or boasted about by the Prime Minister—that is, the device or principle of escalating on a quarterly basis—that for a long time, and until very recently, the Prime Minister and the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Lalonde) have been saying that this is an impossible thing. They rejected it as impossible and as something very foolish for me to have recommended a year ago.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Stanfield: I express the hope that every member of this House will take a very careful look at the bill the government has put before the House and the contrived and complex methods the government has adopted to deal with this very urgent problem facing our older people.

We approve of the wheat subsidy. But here is a government coming forward, in the first part of September, increasing to $1.25 a payment which it reduced from $1.04 to $1 in July. In the meantime the government has sat idly by and watched the price of bread go up six cents a loaf. Now the Prime Minister says this measure will avoid a further increase of five cents which would otherwise be inevitable in October.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Stanfield: I think a government that again has been idle while watching the price of bread go up six cents a loaf, and now puts forward this lame kind of proposal, is not one that is very much concerned about the ordinary people of this country.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Stanfield: I will have something to say about petroleum in a few minutes. But there is nothing in this statement for the homeowner. The government has not even suggested removing the 11 per cent sales tax on building materials, and has made no proposal to remove the sales tax on clothing for all Canadians, following up the step taken last winter in respect of clothing for children.

● (1640)

There are those who for their own reasons characterized the proposals we put forward in February as either outdated or simply unworthy of a Canadian government.

An hon. Member: Both.

Mr. Stanfield: I certainly do not concern myself with such criticisms coming from the government side, because they said the same thing about the proposals we urged in connection with unemployment. They said the same thing about the program we put forward with regard to indexing income tax. They said the same thing with regard to our recommendations that old age pensions should be adjusted on a quarterly basis. They kept on criticizing those policies until they turned around and implemented them themselves following that not very happy, from their point of view, election a while back.

Now the Prime Minister puts forward arguments about shortages and a comprehensive approach to controls as being inconsistent with an adequate supply situation. I say to the Prime Minister through you, Sir, that that is an absurd generalization. It is an insult to the integrity of Canadian producers, many of whom have already indicated through their various organizations that they would co-operate in keeping supplies at high levels during a controls program and would support such a program. But a producer's concern about his input costs is in fact legitimate argument against selective controls or attempts to deal with food prices in isolation. I have no reason to believe that an across the board program would not receive sincere support from Canadian producers.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Stanfield: Just after the Prime Minister condemned the use of price controls or anything of that sort in a situation of world shortage, or in a situation where world factors push up prices, what did he do? He did not resort to a 90-day freeze, but a five-month freeze in connection with petroleum by itself. If there is one product in the world where international factors push up prices beyond the control of Canadians, that is it. I ask the Prime Minister how he can justify refusing to adopt a comprehensive and fair approach to controls while he is prepared to adopt isolated controls. How does he justify refusing to adopt a comprehensive system of controls, because they would create shortages, when he resorts to such a control at his own convenience?

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Stanfield: I do not want to spend much time on the views of my friends to the left, but they seem to be in the incredible position at the moment of saying that you cannot make a freeze and temporary controls program work, but you can legislate roll-backs. There is neither consistency nor common sense in such an argument. The fact is that the government is fiddling around with selective quotas, freezes and other controls. All their suggestions and plans are oriented to each individual crisis as it comes up. Following that logic through to its conclusion, it would seem that when we get to the point of crisis in every facet of the economy, the sum of all their ad hoc responses will by that unhappy time constitute the sort of basic program which we put forward over six months ago.

Mr. Speaker, I am not arguing against measures of relief for those hardest hit by the cost of living squeeze as it now exists. Indeed, we have always advocated a number of such measures. These certainly are part of our over-all policy. We recognize, too, the need for certain support programs. We will support them if they are necessary, and we have always said that they are. We will support measures of this kind, but we must also, as a parliament, attack the problem.

We must stop the vicious circle that a widespread inflation psychology draws us further and further into, and we must do this with two criteria in mind. First, we must attack the problem of inflation in a way that makes it possible to continue sustainable growth in productivity and jobs. Regional disparity dictates that we must do this in the national interest. One of the things which frightens me about the present tactics of the government is that their monetary policies, their high interest rates, will wreak havoc on the economy of the slow growth areas of this country long before we have a chance to get unemployment in those areas down to anything like a satisfactory level. So I say that we need, in the national interest, a policy that will enable us to continue the creation of jobs. Simple humanity dictates that we must do this in the interests of the individual Canadian. The discredited approach of slowdown taken by this government in 1969 and 1970 must not be followed again.

Second, the program of attack must be comprehensive, short-term and as fair as possible. Selective approaches are in many instances not fair, and in a larger sense are not perceived to be universally fair. I am not suggesting for a moment that the price of petroleum products should not be frozen for a period followed by a system of controls. I just say it should be a general approach. When you are dealing with the psychological side of inflation, this element of fairness—everyone involved, and all pulling together in the common interest—and this mood of fairness cannot be over-emphasized.

I am certainly no lover of government intrusion into the economy to the extent that our policy involves, but based on these two criteria and the urgency of the matter I am prepared to act in this way. Big government, big business and big organized labour can choose to sit on the sidelines and look after their own interests. But the ordinary citizen looks to this parliament for leadership, for concern and for action. And we in this parliament must provide that action. The government says, "It is an international problem". So are death and taxes. But we do not stop trying to improve living, and we do not stop paying taxes. Certainly inflation is an international program, and short-term, economic stabilization programs are the widely accepted international response to the problem.

This is the government whose Minister of Finance presented a budget some six months ago which the minister said was "aimed at increasing the real income and improving the standard of living of Canadians". The minister's words of February 19 are nothing more than a sick joke now on September 4. The minister said the budget was "aimed at reducing inflationary pressures . . . aimed at ensuring that older Canadians share more fairly and more fully in the growing national prosperity . . . so they may better enjoy living in well-earned retirement."

This is a government that chose to cling to power in speaking through the Minister of Finance on February 19 of this year. A sick joke! Where are we today? For many Canadians, daily life has become simply a matter of survival. For those who have recently benefited from pension increases, the increases have been almost instantly consumed by rising prices of the very essentials of life. For those who work for wages, it is all too clear that inflation is destroying not only their incomes but the future value of their retirement benefits. In conditions such as this, orderly investment is difficult and saving is almost impossible.

Canadian consumers are confronted now with endless rounds of demands, and very understandable demands, for higher wages which will make demands upon costs that can only be met by further demands upon the consumer. The cause of our even being here now, which was the national railway strike, was merely the tip of the iceberg: every hon. member of the House knows this.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Stanfield: Surely what we must do now is to make it clear that we cannot carry on doing things in bits and pieces. We must make a comprehensive, concerted effort, I suggest, for two years. Two years is a very short span of time in the lifetime of a nation. It can be a very significant period in Canada's history. We should get on with it, and we should build upon it. Obviously this government will not do that, so the evident key to the problem is to replace it as soon as possible with a government that will.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. David Lewis (York South): Mr. Speaker, at this moment we are dealing with a problem that is of great concern to all Canadians and to all members of this parliament. Every time the Leader of the Official Opposition (Mr. Stanfield) and his colleagues deal with this problem they have a lexicon of words that they use and repeat all the time. The Leader of the Opposition wants a comprehensive attack; he wants a concerted attack; he wants a short-term stabilization program; he wants a temporary attack.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Lewis: At no time—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Lewis: I do not really care whether the Conservative members keep up their noise or not, but I think it should be set down in the record that the Leader of the Official Opposition was afforded the courtesy of being listened to by all members of parliament—

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Lewis: —even by those who disagreed with him. But if they want to continue, they can. It is in your hands, Mr. Speaker. As I said, the Leader of the Opposition wants these things—comprehensive, concerted, temporary. At one time he said there should be a 90-day freeze; at another time, a couple of weeks ago, it was a program for one and a half years. Today it has become two years. At no time when he or any one of his colleagues speaks about this over-all, comprehensive attack on inflation, as they call it, do they say how they would do it, how far they would go, how they would control the prices to the farmer, whether they would control the prices at one end or whether they would freeze wages at every point. We saw last week that if the Conservative program had been in effect then, not only would there have been a strike of the non-ops but we would have had a strike of all the railway employees—

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Lewis: —against the wage freeze which they would have imposed.

My friend, the Leader of the Opposition, says he cannot understand how someone could oppose across the board controls, and at the same time call for some selective controls and roll-backs. I cannot help him if he cannot understand it, but the logic is perfectly obvious and I want to state this as simply and as seriously as I know how. An over-all, across the board system of controls has been proved to be unworkable in the United States and in the United Kingdom.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Lewis: But there are in an economy—particularly one as strong as Canada's—areas where controls can do the consumer good and bring justice to the people. Those controls are—I will come back to some of these in a moment—on interest rates which affect every house buyer and borrower, on the price of oil and gasoline which we can and should control, and controls and roll-backs on the gouging which takes place as a result of profits—to which I will also refer in a moment—by packers, supermarket chains, banks and oil and gasoline companies. There are areas where it is possible to impose selective roll-backs, whether they be on gasoline or oil, to subsidize the cost of bread and milk to the consumer, as well as the cost of meat, and to do all these things without imposing the kind of bureaucratic jungle which the official opposition is proposing to this parliament.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Lewis: My last word on this point is to draw to the attention of members of parliament, the people of Canada and the media in the gallery, that it is not without significance that the administrations in the world which have insisted on these kinds of across the board price controls have been conservative with a small "c" or a capital "C", whether in Washington, in London or anywhere else.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Muir: How about New Zealand?

Mr. Lewis: They do not have across the board controls in New Zealand. These Conservatives do not know what they are talking about. I had the honour and pleasure of spending a couple of hours with the Prime Minister of New Zealand when he was here for the Commonwealth conference, and I know from him that they have no such system of controls. They have what we have been demanding, that is, an effective, what they call prices justification tribunal.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Lewis: What we have said, and what I want to emphasize today if I may—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member who has the floor will allow me to interrupt him for a moment because it is my duty to bring to the attention of hon. members that in ordinary circumstances at five o'clock we would proceed to the consideration of private members' business. I assume it is the wish of hon. members that we proceed with the business which is now before us. Is this agreed?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Speaker: It is so ordered.

Mr. Lewis: Mr. Speaker, what we have said from the start regarding the problem of increasing prices that faces Canadians is that there is a way in which these Canadians can be helped. I think it is thoroughly dishonest for anyone in the House or in Canada—and I hasten to say that no spokesman for the Conservative Party has suggested it, so I am not directing it against them—to suggest that this parliament or Canadians in general could in any way completely stop the pressure on prices in this country. It is just impossible, and it is not honest to suggest it, Mr. Speaker.

● (1700)

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Lewis: We believe it is possible to impose roll-backs and controls in areas which are of direct assistance to the people of this country, and it is possible to assist those who are worst hit by the effects of rising prices. It is possible for parliament to do those two things, and they would have an immediate effect for the betterment and the welfare of the people of Canada.

I remind hon. members of this House that almost 60 per cent of the consumer price index is governed by food and shelter prices. The food weight, if I remember correctly—if I am out, it will not be by more than a percentage point or so—in the consumer price index is about 27 per cent and the shelter weight is about 32 per cent. Together those two, food and shelter, represent 59 per cent of the total burden of the consumer price index. But if you took that consumer price index and, instead of applying it on the average, or in the over-all as the present CPI necessarily does, you applied it to certain sections of the community, to the lower and middle-income people, then I suspect food and shelter would represent not only 59 per cent of the cost basket of the consumer but probably closer to 70 per cent and in some cases 80 per cent.

It therefore stands to reason that if we apply will and intelligence to this problem, and if we are able to reduce the effect of the rising prices of food in one area and the effect of rising prices of shelter in the other area, we will immediately beneficially affect the welfare of the largest proportion of the Canadian people, of the Canadian consumers. But in order to do that you must have an agency with power, and the Prime Minister's statement is disappointing beyond description in that it still leaves the Food Prices Review Board, (a) limited to food and (b) without any power itself or without any power in the government to do anything about unjustified price increases.

I do not know what in heaven's name is holding back the government except its traditional failure to meet the situation with courage and with will. I simply do not understand. There is not even a constitutional argument. There is no constitutional obstacle that the government has to overcome, Mr. Speaker, since early in August following the meeting of the provincial premiers in Charlottetown, P.E.I., the premiers came out of that meeting and unanimously announced that they were prepared to co-operate with the federal government in any action it may take to deal with the rising cost of living.

[Mr. Speaker.]

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Lewis: That places in the hands of the federal government an undertaking by the provincial jurisdictions which enables the federal government to overcome any jurisdictional obstacle that one might have thought was there. It can do it by delegation of powers, by enabling legislation or by concurrent legislation. There are a whole number of avenues through which Ottawa and the provincial capitals could act jointly and simultaneously to give power either to the Food Prices Review Board or to the government on the recommendation of that board to roll back unjustified price increases. The failure to give us that undertaking in this statement is a great disappointment to everyone who thinks seriously about the problem at this time.

Of course, Mr. Speaker, we are delighted about the increase in family and youth allowances to $12 effective October 1, instead of having to wait for the increase until January 1 next year. That is of great value to most families. To the average Canadian family with children it means an increase of between $15 and $10 a month over what is received now in family and youth allowances. While it is not a large amount of money, it is certainly of very great assistance to Canadian families. I think anyone who does not recognize the value of that as being a partial answer to the rising cost of living is merely being political instead of being objective.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Lewis: I welcome, of course, the increase in the subsidies on domestically consumed wheat, although I am always astounded by the little bit that the government is ready to give to help the ordinary Canadian, compared with the large chunks it is ready to give to the large corporations. The total expenditure, under the present plan, of $1 a bushel represents $60 million or $65 million. From my statistical knowledge, I understand that about 65 million bushels of wheat are consumed in this country. As I say, that means a total cost of $60 million or $65 million, and an additional 25 cents a bushel subsidy means an additional $15 million to assist the Canadian family buying bread and pasta.

I think it is shameful that the government should limit itself in that way. The Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) said that this would avoid an increase of five cents on a loaf of bread that was bound to come in October. But, Mr. Speaker, this evening's Ottawa paper tells us that this morning an immediate increase of six cents per loaf of bread was announced. I say the government should have had the courage to make the subsidy for wheat another 25 cents or so in order to roll back the six cents immediate increase in the price of bread, instead of leaving it at its present high level of cost.

I also, or course, welcome the five cents a quart subsidy for fluid milk, and the similar amount for powdered milk. I merely note in this case that the Prime Minister found it necessary to say—I hope I have got the right place, because I am speaking from memory—that the Prices Review Board was going to be asked to serve in this situation to make sure that the subsidy will get to the consumer. That is precisely the point we have made all through.

You can give all the subsidies you like to the producers, but if there is no surveillance over what happens in the long chain of packaging, wholesaling and retailing, and if you do not have a body with power to roll back unjustified price increases, there is no way you can make certain that these subsidies out of the federal treasury get to the pockets of the consumers instead of being added to the profits of the corporations. The very fact that the Prime Minister makes reference to the Prices Review Board in that context underlines the correctness of our demand that the board, or the government on the recommendation of the board, should have power to do something about unjustified price increases.

This seems to be the day, Mr. Speaker, for opposition leaders to claim credit for what the government has done. But I think it should be obvious to everyone that even the inadequate measures which the Prime Minister has announced would not have been announced had we not a minority parliament where the government has to listen to the opposition parties.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Lewis: I do not say it always listens to our party; I say it listens to other parties in this parliament as well. I think it should be underlined that a year ago the government could not have been moved to do this kind of thing. All the requests from opposition members to do something in certain areas were left without answers, without sympathy. But the evidence now is that in moving as far as it did, it is clear that this minority parliament makes the government move or else it would not remain in office.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Lewis: Turning to gasoline and heating oil, Mr. Speaker, the proposal concerning the possibility of an export tax and a national oil marketing board, together with the proposal for freezing the price, are proposals we have made from time to time and we welcome them in the Prime Minister's statement. I merely point out to him that once again he has waited until the price has gone up very considerably and then he freezes it. We have had an increase of 95 cents per barrel of oil at the wellhead in the last nine months. I wish the government had had the sense and the courage to put the freeze on three months ago. If they had, we would not have the kind of increase that we have now.

● (1710)

Mr. Speaker, I have not had a chance to discuss this with every one of my colleagues, but those I consulted before coming into this chamber—and I am sure it is true for all—are disappointed and heartbroken that the Minister of Finance (Mr. Turner) has not made any announcement about interest rates. I am told that the Leader of the Opposition did not refer to them either.

An hon. Member: Yes, he did.

Mr. Lewis: I am now told that he did. At this point I am not interested in that, Mr. Speaker. What I am interested in saying is that the Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation under the National Housing Act have no right to increase the interest rates on mortgages that go to the ordinary Canadian. They should be rolled back. The least the government could have announced was increased money for the assistance of home ownership so that some people would get mortgages at the 8 per cent level instead of having to pay 10 per cent or 11 per cent. The fact that there is no help for interest rates, particularly mortgage rates on housing, is disappointing and bad.

May I say to the Prime Minister and his colleagues that it is not thoughtful or sensitive of them to say they are ready to pay 50 per cent of the increased social allowances that some provinces may be willing to pay. Time and time again all of us in the opposition have to remind this government that there are sections of the country that cannot afford to increase social allowances by themselves. The 50 per cent the government pays to Ontario, Alberta or British Columbia may be sufficient to enable those provinces to increase welfare payments, but I suggest that the Atlantic provinces, and probably Manitoba, do not have the means to increase the social allowance. If this government wanted to help the poor and those who are on welfare to obtain a good diet, they should have said they would provide 100 per cent, or at least 75 per cent of the cost of the additional welfare money from the federal treasury. The money is there. Just the other day the Minister of Finance found $500 million. Apparently he had miscalculated the deficit by that amount.

Finally, Mr. Speaker, I want to make the point that it is time we looked at the profit picture of the large corporations and did something about that. You can be as certain as the fact that you are sitting in that chair, Mr. Speaker, that when workers across the country read, as they will, of the large increases in profits by the corporations they will justifiably demand a share of that additional productivity. Those additional profits are undoubtedly made at the expense of the Canadian consumer. An excess profits tax ought to be imposed to make sure that does not happen.

I should like to take a moment to cite a few figures, Mr. Speaker. In the second quarter of 1973, Dominion Stores increased their profits by 92.56 per cent over the same quarter in 1972, but sales increased by only 12.97 per cent. The Oshawa Group Limited, wholesale food distributors, showed an increase in profits of 57.26 per cent, and increased sales of only 22.43 per cent. The Ford Motor Company had an increase in profits of 48.1 per cent, but an increase in sales of only 21.66 per cent. Genstar Limited, a Montreal developer working in the west as well as the east, showed a profit increase of 83.6 per cent, while Cadillac Development Corporation, which has its headquarters in Toronto, with large development operations and holdings, had an increase in profits of 37.4 per cent. Two of the largest banks in Canada announced an increase in profits of 46 per cent and 50 per cent for 1973, compared with the same period in 1972.

Can anyone, objectively and conscientiously, suggest that the increase in profits for the retailers, the wholesalers, the car manufacturers, the developers and the banks was not an increase at the expense of the Canadian consumer by gouging them unjustifiably in the marketplace, by squeezing out of them everything the traffic will bear at the present time?

It is possible to control profits, to control prices and therefore to roll back the burden on the ordinary Canadian consumer. That is why the statement by the government that it will, maybe, in the future do something about giving itself power with regard to the Prices Review Board is not good enough. That kind of legislation should come before parliament very shortly. There is no excuse for inaction in the areas which can benefit all Canadians.

● (1720)

Mr. Réal Caouette (Témiscamingue): Mr. Speaker, the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) kept his promises and his word. Last October in Shawinigan Falls he stated that he was about to distribute goodies to the people of Canada. Indeed, the goodies has just been handed out this afternoon.

Mr. Speaker, the reason why we were called here was to settle the rail strike. And that settlement, I think, constitutes the pretext for the next strike that will be called in two years or 28 months. It did not settle anything, nor will it. It will result in freight rate increases, passenger fare increases and new price increases across Canada at the very time when the Prime Minister announces that the government is quite willing to help the Canadian consumers and producers, to promote employment, to retrain workers.

Mr. Speaker, the Prime Minister talked for half an hour but he failed to come to grips with the root of the problem—the reason why we are faced with the present situation—the financial system and its disadvantages. Nobody wants to talk about the debt money system which calls for prohibitive interest rates.

Interests are up to 12 per cent or 12½ per cent on housing loans. For example, this morning the Provincial Bank of Canada was asking a borrower 12½ per cent on a 25 or 30 year home building loan. In 30 years that house will have cost him $45,200, while it only costs $20,000. The Prime Minister did not talk about that. That house will more than double in price but nobody talks about that. Nobody says that interest rates have doubled in the last 10 years. As soon as we talk about the monetary question, we immediately hear crybabies say: Ha! ha! Let us rather pick on our people, let us tax the haves in order to give to the have-nots.

Mr. Speaker, we accept the 5 cents cut on the price of a quart of milk; we accept a more reasonable price for bread, but what makes me laugh, is when this is called consumer subsidies.

My colleagues and I from the Social Credit have been proposing consumer subsidies for exactly 30 years. The government begins to realize it. The opposition begins to realize it and even the New Democratic Party begins to believe that we must look to the consumers for their protection.

Mr. Speaker, we also approve of the increase of pensions and allowances. We approve of the good intentions of the government, but we believe that we must at the same time increase old age security pensions and family allowances. We believe that welfare recipients should also see their incomes adjusted so that their buying power will increase.

Mr. Speaker, the Creditists have been laughed at in the past, but listen today to those who offer solutions. I heard the Leader of the Official Opposition (Mr. Stanfield) say earlier that everything the government does is bad but, if he were there he would not do better.

However, he blames the government for not freezing incomes and prices. This has been tried, it is in fact still being tried in the United States, but it has been a complete flop. It produced the black market and discouraged producers to such an extent that they reduced their production and the problem is now worse than ever. That is what the Progressive Conservative would like to impose in Canada. Mr. Speaker, that is not the solution.

As for the New Democratic Party, it used to be in favour of price controls, but not wage controls. This could not balance out. Today, the New Democrats believe that we must not impose price and wage controls. However, knocking down big corporations, seems to be their solution to inflation.

Mr. Speaker, it is true that the profits of Chrysler Corporation Limited, Ford Motors Canada Limited and Noranda Mines Limited have increased. That is a fact. However, the leader of the New Democratic Party (Mr. Lewis) must know that the president of Noranda Mines Limited does not pile up profits in his bedroom. He must know, for example, that Noranda Mines Limited is spending this year $32 million to build a new ore processing plant. All profit-making companies—

[English]

An hon. Member: What about Ford profits?

Mr. Caouette (Témiscamingue): You can take any one company. They are not piling up their money in their bedrooms. They are spending money to expand the economy of Canada, but hon. members opposite do not understand that.

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker, it is wrong to attack those who create employment because they make profits, those who develop the Canadian economy. The leader of the New Democratic Party does not want any control, but he would like to nationalize. It is another form of control: to nationalize so that the government could poke its nose into everything, exactly as in Cuba or in other socialist countries where free enterprise no longer exists and where the government has the last word.

Mr. Speaker, those are not proper solutions and this government is a little late in taking action. Some time ago, western producers were paid not to grow wheat; Quebec and Ontario dairy farmers were penalized because they were exceeding their quotas. Production quotas were set and today we fear a shortage of products. Mr. Speaker, the government is responsible for that. Had production been encouraged when it was time, we could have withstood better the competition in world markets and would not have had to wait for the United States to make their decision before setting our own production.

Mr. Speaker, the right hon. Prime Minister himself said, not so long ago, that our GNP would reach $102 billion this year, and owing to that gigantic production, our total national income, around $72 billion. How can we possibly buy a $102 billion production with $72 billion? Instead of trying to reduce production, let us find the means of increasing the purchasing power with which to buy Canadian production. This would be an efficient way of fighting inflation and the ever rising cost of living because, for my part, I do not think the present measures will prevent it from going up further.

The implementation of this whole program will lead to new taxes that will be included in prices, and so, lead once again to an increase in the cost of production. There is but one thing to do: issue new credits through the Bank of Canada to balance the Canadian purchasing power with Canadian production: then we will have fought off inflation and the rise in the cost of living.

TABLING OF REGULATIONS COVERING TAXING OF PROFITS OF MANUFACTURERS AND PROCESSORS

LOWERING ELIGIBLE AGE FOR OLD AGE PENSION—REQUEST FOR UNANIMOUS CONSENT TO MOVE MOTION

Mr. René Matte (Champlain): Mr. Speaker, under Standing Order 43, I am asking for the unanimous consent of the House to discuss a matter of urgent and pressing necessity.

Since no provision whatsoever is made to ensure an adequate minimum income to people aged 60 to 65, and considering the very uncertain financial situation of couples in that age bracket and in cases where one spouse has not reached the required minimum age, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Rimouski (Mr. Allard):

That a special committee of the House be appointed to study the possibility of lowering from 65 to 60 the age of eligibility to the old age security pension and to make the pension automatically available to a spouse whenever the other has reached the age of eligibility.

Mr. Speaker: The House has heard the hon. member's motion. Under Standing Order 43, that motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimity?

Some hon. Members: Yes.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Speaker: There is not unanimous consent, therefore the motion cannot be put.

INQUIRY AS TO PRICES PAID WESTERN FARMERS FOR CATTLE—REQUEST FOR UNANIMOUS CONSENT TO MOVE MOTION

Mr. Gilbert Rondeau (Shefford): Mr. Speaker, under Standing Order 43, and seconded by the hon. member for Bellechasse (Mr. Lambert), I am asking for the unanimous consent of the House to move the following motion:

That a committee of the House be appointed to conduct a thorough inquiry on the ridiculous prices paid to western farmers for their meat, especially beef, as those farmers are being exploited by the various slaughter houses that control marketing, set prices and bring about as they please a false meat shortage in Canada for the benefit of slaughter houses and to the detriment of producers and consumers.

Mr. Speaker: The House has heard the hon. member's motion. Under Standing Order 43, that motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Yes.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Speaker: There is not unanimous consent; therefore, the motion cannot be put.

UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE ACT

AMENDMENT TO PROVIDE FOR JOB INVENTORY

Mr. Frank Oberle (Prince George-Peace River) moved for leave to introduce Bill No. C-221, to amend the Unemployment Insurance Act.

He said: Mr. Speaker, the proposed bill is not only designed to provide Canada Manpower and the Unemployment Insurance Commission, or, more idealistically, a combination of the two with an inventory of all job opportunities in every field of endeavour, but it would also coordinate the efforts of the unemployed who are searching for work, on one hand, and industries, on the other hand, which are desperately looking for workers in most areas of Canada.

Motion agreed to, bill read the first time and ordered to be printed.

Oral Questions

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

[English]

FINANCE

POSSIBILITY OF PRESENTATION OF BUDGET AND ELIMINATION OF TAX ON BUILDING MATERIALS

Hon. Robert L. Stanfield (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the Minister of Finance whether he intends at an early date to present a budget, either a mini-budget or a full-fledged budget, and, if so, whether he has any intention of eliminating the 11 per cent sales tax on building material. I am thinking, also, of the federal government sales tax on all clothing, not merely on children's clothing.

Hon. John N. Turner (Minister of Finance): It is not my present intention to do so.

GRAIN

SUGGESTED DISMISSAL OF MINISTER IN VIEW OF REVERSAL ON DOMESTIC SUBSIDY PROGRAM

Hon. Robert L. Stanfield (Leader of the Opposition): One supplementary, in view of the hour. I should like to ask the Prime Minister, now that the entire cabinet is supporting a reversal of the domestic grain subsidy program announced by the responsible minister back in July, and in view of the fact that this minister also implemented the disastrous LIFT program, whether he will tell the House why he continues to keep that minister in charge of that particular responsibility.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Speaker: Order. I have some doubt as to the admissibility of the question from the point of view of procedure. I do not think the question is in order.

FINANCE

INTEREST RATES—LACK OF REFERENCE IN PRIME MINISTER'S STATEMENT—POSSIBLE GOVERNMENT ACTION

Mr. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa-Whitby): I have a question for the Prime Minister, Mr. Speaker. In view of the fact that there was nothing about interest rates in the announcement he made this afternoon, could the right hon. gentleman inform the House whether or not it is the intention of the government within the next few days to bring forward a bill dealing with the interest rate situation, particularly with respect to mortgages?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): No, Mr. Speaker.

HOUSING

ASSISTED HOME OWNERSHIPS PROGRAM—REQUEST FOR INCREASE IN FUNDS

Mr. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa-Whitby): A supplementary to the Minister of State for Urban Affairs. In view of the fact that the housing legislation we passed shortly before the recess contained within it a proposal to assist home ownership, and since there is a relatively small amount of money set aside for that purpose, can the minister, as a means of ensuring a greater flow of money into the construction of homes for people of average income, undertake to substantially increase the amount of money going into this aspect of the home ownership program?

Hon. Ron Basford (Minister of State for Urban Affairs): The assisted home ownership program would help those earning between $6,000 and $11,000 a year to purchase homes at rates which go down to 6 per cent. The sum of $134 million was set aside for this purpose and since the legislation only became operative for practical purposes in August, we have not nearly expended that $134 million. So at this point of time the question is hypothetical.

FEED GRAIN—REPRESENTATIONS BY QUEBEC UPA—MINISTER'S POSITION

Mr. Adrien Lambert (Bellechasse): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the hon. Minister of Agriculture.

Can he tell the House whether he has received a telegram from the Quebec FPV whereby this organization expresses its dissatisfaction with the results obtained to date by Quebec farm producers, following the implementation of the new policy on feed grains for 1973-74? If so, what was his reply?

[English]

Hon. E. F. Whelan (Minister of Agriculture): I have not seen any telegram from the organization the hon. member mentioned, but I do know I was requested to meet this group of people.

GOVERNMENT ADMINISTRATION

REQUEST FOR MEANS OF TESTING CONFIDENCE IN GOVERNMENT

Mr. James A. McGrath (St. John's East): A supplementary to the Prime Minister. In view of the fact that the statement the right hon. gentleman made today meets only two of the four conditions set out by the leader of the New Democratic Party in his shopping list of August 21—I refer specifically to the failure of the government to meet the NDP demand with respect to the food prices review board, and interest rates—

Mr. Speaker: Order. Perhaps the hon. member has reached the point at which he will ask a question.

Mr. McGrath: I want to conclude by asking the Prime Minister whether he now intends to place a motion before the House to test its confidence in the government at this time.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): I am sure there are many ways in which the opposition can express its opposition to the government. There are bills before the House, and we shall be discussing them later. If the opposition wants to defeat them, it is perfectly free to do so.

FOOD PRICES REVIEW BOARD

SUGGESTED NEED FOR INCREASED POWERS—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Mr. David Lewis (York South): A question to the Prime Minister arising out of his earlier statement. The statement repeats the undertaking by the government that if the Food Prices Review Board can show that there have been abuses, the government will take action. In view of the fact that the board will need some time before it can make any report, and in view of the fact that legislation also takes time, may I ask the Prime Minister whether he would consider producing legislation to give the government or the board the powers that he thinks might be needed, in order that those powers might be available should the board find that they ought to be used?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, the hon. gentleman is to some extent asking the government to legislate with a hypothetical situation in mind. In so far as the Food Prices Review Board does respond to that hypothesis and go through the various stages which I mentioned in August—the stage of identifying cases of excessive prices increases, the stage of bringing the responsible people in, of giving publicity to those increases, of asking those concerned to roll back prices voluntarily, referring the matter to the government in the absence of such voluntary compliance, the possibility open to the government of using various non-legislative or administrative powers, powers it already possesses, in order to exercise moral or other suasion against such people—

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Trudeau: I am saying there are a series of steps which are hypothetical, all of which the government is prepared to take, but we do not want at the present time to introduce the type of legislation to which the hon. member is referring. However, I repeat that if these various hypotheses materialise, or appear as though they are likely to materialise, I would convey the desire and the intention of the government to bring forward such legislation.

An hon. Member: Ten o'clock!

Mr. Lewis: Mr. Speaker, I often wish I could make a little speech on these questions such as the person replying is able to make. I will put it in terms of the time-honoured phrase "In view of". In view of the fact that there has already been factual information about changes in prices on the shelves which would clearly indicate excessive price increases, and in view of the fact that legislation which gives some power to roll back prices will frequently prevent something from happening, and having in mind the fact that this might easily have an influence on people to refrain from increasing prices unjustifiably, and in view of the fact that the Prime Minister—

• (1740)

Mr. Speaker: Order, please; I will recognize the hon. member. I am sure both the hon. member for York South and the Prime Minister will recognize that this is really a debate during the question period, and I would hope that questions can be asked in a more brief form.

Mr. Lewis: May I now put the question?

Mr. McGrath: Mr. Speaker, I merely rise on a point of order to suggest to you that this kind of business of the coalition might more appropriately be taken up in caucus.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Speaker: I suggest to hon. members that we are in a difficult situation in relation to time. Perhaps the hon. member for York South could now ask his question, to which there might be a brief answer, after which the Chair will recognize the right hon. member for Prince Albert.

Mr. Lewis: Mr. Speaker, based on the premise I suggested to the Prime Minister, I should like to ask whether he would want to reconsider his position and produce the necessary legislation to give the government or the board the power to control prices in given areas in order to avoid the difficulty that his own recitation has suggested?

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, my recitation could be summed up by saying there are many measures which could be taken now, and indeed the fact that one such incident is before the courts for prosecution should be an indication to the hon. member that there is power to act and that action is being taken against those who use unfair practices.

INDIAN AFFAIRS

INTERROGATION OF MEMBER CONCERNING MISSING FILE—INQUIRY AS TO MINISTER'S ACTIONS

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prince Albert): Mr. Speaker, my question originates from the matter raised by the hon. member for Kingston and the Islands. Having been in this House for many years, it is my feeling that what was suggested by her today involves a most shocking matter. I would ask first the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development whether he or his department made any complaint concerning this alleged document, and did he make any suggestion as to who might be in possession of that document?

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): Mr. Speaker, my department did launch a complaint about the fact that some files had been stolen, but there was no indication as to where they were. I was as shocked as any other member of this House when I learned that the police had gone into the office of the hon. member.

INTERROGATION OF MEMBER CONCERNING MISSING FILE—INQUIRY AS TO AUTHORITY UNDER WHICH ROYAL CANADIAN MOUNTED POLICE ACTED

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prince Albert): I should like to ask a supplementary question of the Solicitor General. Were the RCMP acting under a search warrant, was that search warrant directed toward a member of the House of Commons, or were they acting under the tyrannical powers of—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I should like to bring to the attention of hon. members of the House that earlier this afternoon this very matter was referred to the Committee on Privileges and Elections. The very point which is being made in the question asked by the right hon. member is a matter which is in essence covered by the motion moved by the hon. member for Kingston and the Islands, and I would hope that matter can be considered by the committee very soon to the satisfaction of hon. members.

Mr. Diefenbaker: With great deference, Mr. Speaker, what will be considered is whether what was done was a breach of privilege of a member of this House, rather than the question I am asking. I should like very much to know whether we have "Watergate's" in our midst.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Guay (St. Boniface): You ought to know.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, will the individual who made that intervention identify himself? Is he cowardly enough to make it without standing up?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

Mr. Guay (St. Boniface): Mr. Speaker, I will identify myself. I was the one who said "You ought to know". I said that, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, all I can say is that normally the hon. member is known for his wit, but this despicable suggestion I throw back in his teeth.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I understand the hon. member for St. Boniface wishes to rise on a question of privilege, but it seems to me again that we are not achieving very much by this kind of exchange.

I would remind hon. members that the situation which formed the basis of the questions asked by the right hon. gentleman was the subject that was referred to a committee of this House by unanimous consent. I would hope that this matter can be dealt with expeditiously by the committee. Unless there is a general wish to pursue the matter I do not think very much can be gained by continuing this exchange, particularly in view of the fact that we have only 12 minutes left before we call it six o'clock. For the moment, the Chair will recognize the hon. member for St. Boniface on a question of privilege.

Mr. Guay (St. Boniface): Mr. Speaker, I just want to say that, in view of the seniority of the right hon. gentleman in this House, I would refrain at this time from making any further remarks and will co-operate with the Chair.

Mr. Diefenbaker: That is even worse than the other remark.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I certainly do not wish to prevent the right hon. gentleman from rising if he has a question of privilege, but obviously we are not getting anywhere or achieving very much by this needless exchange between the hon. member for St. Boniface and the right hon. gentleman. I would hope that we could get on with the business of the House.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, with great respect, the hon. member made an innuendo.

An hon. Member: So did you.

Mr. Diefenbaker: I do not think he intended to do so. What I think he intended was a smart-aleck remark, but I do say to him that any suggestion along the lines he has made is a despicable falsehood.

Mr. Trudeau: You suggested it yourself.

Mr. Diefenbaker: The Prime Minister speaks now, and I suppose he would use profanity under the circumstances.

LABOUR CONDITIONS

VANCOUVER—ALLEGED FAILURE OF SOME RAILWAY EMPLOYEES TO RETURN TO WORK—EFFECT ON MOVEMENT OF TRAINS—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Mr. John A. Fraser (Vancouver South): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Labour. We have heard continuing reports throughout today that at least one union is holding up rail traffic in the city of Vancouver. Can the minister advise the House what the present situation is and whether trains are still not moving in the Vancouver area, as well as the steps the minister is taking in an attempt to remedy that situation today?

Hon. John C. Munro (Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, my officials are advising me constantly about the status of the situation in the city of Vancouver, to which the hon. member has referred, as well as in respect of one or two other cities. The reports I am receiving are to the effect that the situation may rectify itself before the end of the day.

Mr. Fraser: Mr. Speaker, I have a very short supplementary question. Would the minister tell the House whether any trains are moving in and out of Vancouver at this time or is this situation restricted to the trains of only one railway company?

Mr. Munro (Hamilton East): Mr. Speaker, I do not think the matter of trains moving in and out of Vancouver has as yet assumed that degree of importance. The fact of the matter is that over the weekend most of the activity necessary related to the assembly of railway cars for movement to Vancouver, and that was being done in the mid-western provinces.

EFFECT OF FAILURE OF RAILWAY EMPLOYEES TO RETURN TO WORK ON FEED GRAIN SHIPMENTS TO BRITISH COLUMBIA—GOVERNMENT ACTION

Mr. Donald Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich): Mr. Speaker, my question is supplementary to that addressed to the Minister of Labour. In view of the fact that the railway strike is not fully settled, as was so confidently announced by the right hon. Prime Minister, and that most employees have not returned to work, what steps is the government proposing to take to ensure that feed grains, for both human and animal consumption, will reach points throughout British Columbia, particularly Vancouver Island, in the quantities required?

Hon. John C. Munro (Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, I should not want my previous answer to mislead the hon. member into exaggerating the situation. I believe the strike is settled for all intents and purposes, and, judging from historical comparisons, things are settling in very well. I believe the union leadership and the railway companies should be complimented by all members of this House for the degree of responsibility they have shown. The fact of the matter is that this situation has not had any serious repercussions at the moment because almost all the activity in terms of the movement of grain involves the railways getting under way by the assembling of the cars in the western prairie provinces.

ENERGY

INQUIRY RESPECTING SUPPLY OF HEATING OIL FOR EASTERN CANADA—MINISTER'S POSITION

Mr. Gérard Laprise (Abitibi): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources.

In view of the announcement made earlier by the Right Honourable Prime Minister concerning the transportation of Western oil products to Eastern Canada, could the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources assure the House that these measures can be applied soon enough to provide the population with sufficient heating fuel at a reasonable price to meet next winter's demand in Eastern Canada?

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, I should point out that the measures suggested this afternoon by the Right Honourable Prime Minister do not apply directly to the problem referred to by the hon. member, but rather to the construction of a pipeline from Toronto to Montreal. However, I should add that my department, the National Energy Board and myself are doing everything in our power to provide an adequate supply of oil, and especially of heating fuel, for our population next winter.

SOCIAL SECURITY

NUMBER OF PERSONS BETWEEN 60 TO 65 INELIGIBLE FOR OLD AGE PENSION—STATUS OF DISCUSSION ON GUARANTEED MINIMUM INCOME

Mr. Claude Wagner (Saint-Hyacinthe): Mr. Speaker, I should like to put a question to the Prime Minister concerning the cost of living.

Since most senior citizens do not receive any pay or dividend on investments which would enable them to face inflation, has the Prime Minister ordered any study on the number of people aged 60 to 65 who are not yet eligible for the old age security pension but who would need to get from the government a fixed monthly income until a guaranteed minimum income plan is implemented?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, personally, I have not ordered such studies, but the matter has of course been discussed by the Minister of National Health and Welfare, other colleagues and myself, and if the hon. member would refer to statements made by the minister on this subject, he will then see what the government's position is.

Mr. Wagner: Mr. Speaker, I should like to put a supplementary question.

[English]

Mr. Speaker: I would hope there would be as few supplementaries as possible because there are only five minutes left before I call it six o'clock, although of course hon. members may wish to conclude the question period before we rise for dinner. For the moment, the Chair will recognize the hon. member for Saint-Hyacinthe for a supplementary, and then the hon. member for Saskatoon-Biggar who has a supplementary to the previous question.

[Translation]

Mr. Wagner: Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a supplementary question to the Prime Minister.

Could he inform the House what progress is being made about the guaranteed minimum income, and to what extent this study takes into account the very serious problem of the cost of living?

Mr. G. W. Baldwin (Peace River): Mr. Speaker, I have a question which is supplementary to the original trend of questions directed to the Prime Minister. Does the program announced by the Prime Minister today with regard to inflation constitute the so-called contingency plan which the government was holding under wraps until the situation with regard to cost of living got serious enough to justify bringing it forward?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, at the time I referred to a contingency plan this was not the particular one to which I was referring.

INTEREST RATES—REQUEST FOR STATEMENT BY MINISTER

Mr. Sinclair Stevens (York-Simcoe): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Finance. In view of the minister's statement last Friday that our short and medium-term interest rates are two to three points lower than those in the United States, would the minister inform the House how he reconciles his statement with our mortgage rate structure in this country where mortgages cannot be written for terms of longer than five years and yet we find that NHA rates in Canada are 9.5 per cent—

ENERGY

SUGGESTED CONSTRUCTION OF OIL PIPELINE TO MONTREAL—CONSULTATION WITH PROVINCES

Hon. Alvin Hamilton (Qu'Appelle-Moose Mountain): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources and refers to the statement of the Prime Minister. In view of the announcement of the Prime Minister that the government intends to build an oil pipeline to Montreal, has the government consulted the provinces of Quebec, Ontario and Alberta in relation to the complexities and problems about volume, supply, markets and price?

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, in the discussions we have had with all the relevant provinces, as a result of the energy analysis, we broached with them among other things the security of supply problem for the eastern Canadian market and, particularly with the officials of the province of Quebec, considerations that might lead to the construction of the pipeline into Montreal. I should say that the particular problem that is contained in the Prime Minister's statement was, of course, not discussed although it was communicated to the relevant provinces before the statement was made in the House.

SUGGESTED CONSTRUCTION OF OIL PIPELINE FROM SAULT SAINTE MARIE TO MONTREAL—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Hon. Alvin Hamilton (Qu'Appelle-Moose Mountain): I have a supplementary, Mr. Speaker. My question is still for information. In the minister's answer earlier he mentioned the pipeline from Montreal to Toronto. Now, I am asking whether the plan to build a reversible pipeline through Sault Sainte Marie, the northern route to Montreal, is abandoned?

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): No, Sir, by no means. Obviously from a financial standpoint the continuation of the existing pipeline facilities from the Ontario market into Montreal would be the cheapest although that would require some looping of the existing line. It does not rule out, however, the possibility that a northern tier line, if you like, might be added as an additional facility to western Canada.

Mr. Broadbent: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. About 17 minutes ago you indicated that you would recognize me for a supplementary on the important question of housing, and since it is almost six o'clock and it is an important matter I wonder whether that could be done?

Mr. Speaker: My understanding is that the question which the hon. member was going to ask was so important, along with others, that members would want to conclude the question period before we rise,—there are some 13 minutes or so left—otherwise we would have to continue the question period at eight o'clock. I am in the hands of the House in this regard.

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

WELFARE

REQUEST FOR INCREASE IN FEDERAL AID TO PROVINCES UNDER CANADA ASSISTANCE PLAN

Mrs. Grace MacInnis (Vancouver Kingsway): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Prime Minister. In view of the fact that families on low income with children are suffering especially from the high food prices, and in view of the fact that my leader pointed out earlier that some of the provinces cannot afford this cost-shared assistance, will the government now offer, under the Canada Assistance Plan, to pay the full cost of increased provincial or municipal food allowances to families on social assistance.

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I do not agree with the premise of the hon. lady's leader that no province can afford this. It really depends where they put their priorities.

Mr. Lewis: You said some provinces can.

Mr. Trudeau: But, Mr. Speaker, the fact is that the government has acted to help all families with children by announcing legislation to effect an immediate increase to $12 of the payments under the present Family Allowances Act, lest some provinces not want to act along the Canada Assistance Plan lines that I suggested.

Hon. Otto E. ing as scheduled and, if not, what alternative arrangements have been made?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, because of the importance of the matters that are now under discussion and the necessity for the presence of various key ministers, I asked the Japanese government to postpone the ministerial visit, to which they have agreed. I, personally, will be going at the request of the foreign minister.

An hon. Member: You are not a key minister?

Mr. Hellyer: Would the minister assure the House that in view of the importance to the Canadian economy of Japanese trade, both in so far as opportunities for our exporters are concerned and also in so far as the impact of Japanese buying on Canadian prices is concerned, that the full ministerial delegation meeting will be rescheduled at the earliest possible date?

Mr. Sharp: Yes, Mr. Speaker. The Japanese government is just as anxious as we are.

Mr. Speaker: Perhaps the hon. member for Oshawa-Whitby should put his question at this time, after which the Chair will recognize the hon. member for Annapolis Valley.

HOUSING

ASSISTED HOME OWNERSHIP PROGRAM—REQUEST FOR ALLOCATION OF ADDITIONAL FUNDS

Mr. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa-Whitby): Mr. Speaker, my supplementary question is directed to the Minister of State for Urban Affairs. Since the obvious explanation for the AHOP funds not being used up is that his own department has just completed the regulations making the criteria available to the public, and since this is the only program under which we give mortgage money to the average income people at rates between 6 per cent and 8 per cent, would the minister assure the House that he will take steps soon to get an increased budget allocation for funds for this program?

Hon. Ron Basford (Minister of State for Urban Affairs): Mr. Speaker, during the course of September it is usual to review the CMHC budget to see what moneys have been taken up by the provinces and individuals under each program. That will be done to see what money can or should be moved around in the budget from one program to another. That will be done in this case in addition to the constant review of what action can be taken to deal with housing. We are obviously building houses in the country at record levels. Our problem is solely one of income distribution.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

INCREASE IN OLD AGE PENSIONS—REQUEST FOR ESTIMATE OF COST

Mr. J. P. Nowlan (Annapolis Valley): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Prime Minister and it is supplementary to others regarding his statement this afternoon. Could the Prime Minister advise what is the estimated cost of the pension changes that he has outlined to the House at the present rate of inflation?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I gave some figures in my statement. I said that the increase would be from $100 to $105 and some cents on old age pensions and $170 to $179 on old age pensions, plus the guaranteed income supplement.

Mr. Nowlan: Could the Prime Minister give us the over-all total cost of pension changes if there is an estimate from the Treasury Board?

Mr. Trudeau: I believe it is less than $100 million, but I would not like to be tied down to that.

REQUEST FOR OUTLINE OF GOVERNMENT'S LEGISLATIVE PROPOSALS TO DEAL WITH INFLATION

Mr. David MacDonald (Egmont): Mr. Speaker, my question is also for the Prime Minister. In the light of the fact that the Prime Minister indicated in his statement that he was anxious to have some parliamentary discussion of inflation in the economy, and further an indication from the Minister of Finance that he foresees no immediate budget proposals, I wonder under what particular parliamentary device the Prime Minister foresees such a discussion taking place and, further to that, I wonder how soon we can have an outline of the legislative proposals which the government will be putting forth in the coming days to deal with the underlying economic causes of inflation?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I am sure it would not be beyond the ingenuity of members of the House to express their views on inflation and the cost of living when they are debating the bills of which the government has given notice.

Mr. MacDonald (Egmont): I think the Prime Minister is well aware of the fact that the legislative provisions that are forecast here are mostly in the nature of assistance either under the family allowance program or old age assistance. Could the Prime Minister indicate in specific terms what the government has in mind by way of specific economic proposals with which this House can deal to get at some of the root causes of inflation?

FINANCE

THE EFFECTS OF THE SALES TAX ON BUILDING MATERIALS

Mr. Henry Latulippe (Compton): Mr. Speaker, I would like to direct a question to the Prime Minister.

Would he tell us whether the 11 per cent sales tax on building materials has had any effects on the increase in the cost of living, and also on inflation?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I am under the impression that the hon. member is asking the Prime Minister to express an opinion.

ADMINISTRATION OF JUSTICE

FRANK EVANS—REASONS FOR FAILURE TO SERVE SENTENCE

Mr. Sean O'Sullivan (Hamilton-Wentworth): Mr. Speaker, my question to the Solicitor General concerns the case of Frank Evans, convicted and sentenced some eight months ago to two years in a federal penitentiary. As this man is still at liberty, living in high fashion which includes several visits to racetracks and driving a Cadillac, can the minister advise the House whether the federal government will forthwith ensure that this man begins serving his sentence in a federal penitentiary?

Hon. Warren Allmand (Solicitor General): Mr. Speaker, I am not familiar with that case, but I will check into it and report to the hon. member.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

INDIA-PAKISTAN AGREEMENT—SUGGESTED EXPRESSION OF GRATITUDE OF CANADIANS

Mr. Andrew Brewin (Greenwood): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Secretary of State for External Affairs. Has the minister extended to the parties concerned an expression of the gratification of the Canadian people and of many members of the House with regard to the Indo-Pakistan agreement of August 28, 1973 concerning the repatriation of Bangalees detained in Pakistan, Pakistanis stranded in Bangladesh, and Pakistani prisoners of war in Indo-Bangladesh custody? It is a great humanitarian achievement affecting the lives of many thousands of people and affecting the reconciliation of the Indian sub-continent.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Perhaps the minister might be allowed to reply to the hon. member's oration.

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I share the views of the hon. gentleman on the Indo-Pakistan war, its consequences and the great change that has taken place in relatively few days in the attitude toward a settlement. I had an opportunity of expressing similar views to representatives of both these countries urging them to this course of action, so I share his gratification personally.

AGRICULTURE

REQUEST FOR CONSIDERATION TO FARMERS WHO FEED THEIR OWN GRAIN TO LIVESTOCK

Mr. William C. Frank (Middlesex): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Agriculture. In view of the uncertainty of the strength of the livestock market, is the minister giving any significant consideration to farmers who normally feed their own grain, giving them any immediate specific encouragement to feed their 1973 grain production, rather than cashing it in now, which would result in still higher costs of living to the Canadian consumer?

Hon. E. F. Whelan (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, I think the programs the Prime Minister announced, particularly concerning the meeting I will be having with my provincial counterparts later this month, will take all of these topics into consideration.

FINANCE

REQUEST FOR STATEMENT BY MINISTER ON EFFECTS ON INFLATION OF MONETARY, FISCAL AND EXCHANGE RATE POLICIES

Mr. James Gillies (Don Valley): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Finance. In view of the fact that the statement presented today by the Prime Minister said practically nothing at all about monetary policy, fiscal policy and exchange rate policy, which one would have thought would have been the foundation of any statement on inflation, would the Minister of Finance make a statement on how he feels these policies are affecting inflation in this country right now?

Hon. John N. Turner (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, the Prime Minister suggested that an appropriate vehicle could be found for this type of debate, and I am ready and willing.

FOOD PRICES REVIEW BOARD

SUGGESTED CHANGE OF JURISDICTION TO COVER ALL PRICES—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Mr. Lorne Nystrom (Yorkton-Melville): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Prime Minister regarding his statement today. In view of the fact that the statement made no reference to extending the Food Prices Review Board into a general prices review board and that inflation affects many commodities, is the Prime Minister considering changing the Prices Review Board to one that would consider all prices, not just food prices?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, the government acted on the recommendation made to it by parliament last spring, and that recommendation did cover the area of food as opposed to others.

GRAIN

BARLEY—EFFECT OF INCREASED PRICE ON FEED LOT OPERATORS—SUGGESTED CONSULTATION WITH MANITOBA FEED GRAIN COMMISSION

Mr. Gordon Ritchie (Dauphin): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the minister in charge of the Canadian Wheat Board. As a result of the announced feed grain policy of the minister and the response of the Manitoba Feed Grain Commission in raising the price of barley to feed lot operators, so that many are considering reducing their operations or moving their feed lots across the border, would he consider consulting with the Manitoba minister of agriculture and the Manitoba Feed Grain Commission in order to resolve this serious matter?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, I have no present intention of meeting with the minister of agriculture for Manitoba. I think that the producers of animals in the prairie provinces should recognize that the return on animals should still be adequate, even with the higher feed grain prices. I certainly will be encouraging them to stay in production and to increase the production of animals.

Mr. Speaker: Perhaps the Chair may be allowed to recognize the hon. member for St. Paul's, and I believe the hon. member for Hamilton West has a quick supplementary, after which I will suggest to hon. members that we might return following the usual expiry of two hours, that is to say, at 8.15 p.m. Of course it is left up to hon. members to decide what they want to do.

COMBINES INVESTIGATION ACT

DATE OF INTRODUCTION OF AMENDMENT DEALING WITH MISLEADING ADVERTISING

Mr. Ron Atkey (St. Paul's): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs. Would the minister advise when he intends to introduce the amendments to the Combines Investigation Act or related legislation dealing with misleading advertising, which was referred to earlier today in the Prime Minister's statement?

Hon. Herb Gray (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs): I hope this will be very soon, Mr. Speaker.

FRANK EVANS—REASONS FOR FAILURE TO SERVE SENTENCE—CONSULTATION WITH PROVINCIAL AUTHORITIES

Mr. Lincoln M. Alexander (Hamilton West): Mr. Speaker, I wish to ask a question supplementary to that asked by my colleague from Hamilton-Wentworth concerning Frank Evans. In the light of the fact that the minister and his department have indicated that they have no jurisdiction because the person sentenced never did reach Joyceville but was still in the custody of provincial authorities, will the minister take up the matter with his provincial counterpart so that he may apprise himself of all the facts in order to make a report to this House?

Hon. Warren Allmand (Solicitor General): Yes, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker: Now that hon. members have had time to digest the suggestion I made a moment ago that we return at 8.15 p.m., is this agreed?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

OLD AGE SECURITY ACT

PROVISION FOR QUARTERLY ADJUSTMENT OF PENSION

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of National Health and Welfare) moved that Bill C-219, to amend the Old Age Security Act, be read the second time and referred to a committee of the whole House.

He said: Mr. Speaker, I am proud to see that the first bill to come up for debate this week in the program which the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) outlined this afternoon to protect the purchasing power of the Canadian consumer lies within my field of responsibility.

These measures will ensure that Canadians will continue to enjoy the standard of living that they should, one of the highest in the world. They will ensure that the recent unprecedented rise in food costs which has caught the world in its grip will not be allowed to erode the value of the dollars spent for necessities in our daily lives. In this program, Mr. Speaker, we are proposing measures to protect all sectors of our community, not just wage earners, not just pensioners, not just persons receiving social assistance and not just those faced with the increased costs of raising families.

Increased prices hit us all and must in turn be fought on a number of fronts. What we propose in this anti-inflation program is to act now to offset the immediate problem of food prices in particular while we continue to work for a reduction in the rate of inflation itself.

To date a number of measures have been presented which can deal with the longer term situation. I need not remind hon. members that in July I introduced a reform to the Family and Youth Allowances Acts which would almost triple the present payments to an average of $20 a month per child with provision for escalation in the future in response to increases in the consumer price index. Old age security and guaranteed income supplement payments are now escalated annually to reflect the full cost of living increase. Canada Pension Plan payments too will be fully escalated by changes in the price index beginning next January, subject to concurrence of the provinces as required by law. Pensions which the government of Canada pays to its retired employees will also be fully escalated.

It is fitting, therefore, and I might say in keeping with the tradition of Liberal governments, that we focus our attention first on those in our society who can least help themselves in the face of rapid price increases—that is, those on fixed incomes.

Canada has possibly the highest guaranteed income in the world for senior citizens. The basic benefit plus the supplement ensures that for each senior citizen there is a solid floor of guaranteed minimum income, over $2,000 in the case of a single pensioner and almost $4,000 in the case of a couple.

The greatest strides have been realized in a very short period of time. Just a decade ago, in 1963, the highest payment an older Canadian could claim from the government as a right was $65 a month, less than $800 per year for a single person, and only $1,000 for a couple. Moreover, the benefit was not payable until age 70. By the way, this was after five or six years of Conservative government rule.

An hon. Member: How about "six buck Harris"?

Mr. Lalonde: I will come to that. Since that time the benefit has risen to a maximum of over $170 per month in the case of a single person, and $325 per month for a couple, almost triple the former amount.

Mr. Fraser: Is it enough?

Mr. Lalonde: In fact, the maximum amount to which a single pensioner is now entitled is one third higher than the former maximum for a couple. In addition, it is now guaranteed five years earlier, at age 65.

I have been asked, is it enough? One thing is certain. If we had to rely on the Conservative government to improve the situation, we would have had to wait another 100 years, if we judge by the record. Let us look at it another way. In the seven years of Conservative government—

Mr. Woolliams: You were not here then.

Mr. Fairweather: You were one of the party men.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. The minister of National Health and Welfare has the floor.

Mr. Lalonde: Mr. Speaker, I think someone is telling me that I was in the party opposite at the time. That was my problem. I left the party because they would not take my advice.

Mr. Bell: Who said you were in?

Mr. Lalonde: Let us return to the facts. It seems that they hurt those on the other side. In the seven years of Conservative government from 1957 to 1963—

Mr. Fraser: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker, the Liberal party has been the government since 1963, and if the best they can do is talk about what happened over a decade ago it shows clearly they have nothing of merit to say about the needs of today.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. That point could be made after the minister has concluded his remarks. The Minister of National Health and Welfare has the floor.

Mr. Lalonde: It is strange, but the Conservatives do not want to hear about the great things they did in their time of power, Mr. Speaker. In the seven years of Conservative government from 1957 to 1963 the maximum pension went up by only $19 per month, less than $3 per month in each of the seven years on an average. That is not a great achievement. In the seven years which will soon have elapsed since January 1, 1967—and I wish to compare those seven years of Conservative rule with the past seven years we have spent under a Liberal government—the Liberals have increased the maximum by more than $100 per month. Compare that figure with the 19 measly dollars that the Conservatives paid out from 1957 to 1963.

Mr. Baker: Tell us about the cost of living.

Mr. Lalonde: In the same period, total expenditure on old age pensions has risen from about $1 billion to approximately $3 billion a year, with an increase in the number of persons benefitting from the plan from 1.2 million in 1967 to the present figure of 1.8 million, owing mainly to the lowering of the qualifying age to 65. And on top of this, one must add the pensions paid under the Canada Pension Plan and Quebec Pension Plan, another milestone in the provision of income security for retired persons introduced by the government of Lester B. Pearson.

If we compare the amount that a low-income couple aged 65 and over can obtain to the amount that a low-income couple under the age 65 receives under the provincial social assistance, we find that the maximum attainable for senior citizens is almost $4,000. Social assistance rates, however, range from a low of $2,000 to a high of $3,000 for a couple across Canada. In fact, the rate for a couple on full old age security is greater than the social assistance rate for a couple with one child in every province and the rate for a couple with two children in six of the ten provinces. This disparity is of very great concern to all of my provincial colleagues, and is one which is now being worked on.

One must not forget at this time that in addition to increasing the monetary benefits for our senior citizens, the budget brought down by my colleague the Minister of Finance (Mr. Turner) in February of this year increased the basic single exemption from $1,500 to $1,600 and the married rate from $2,850 to $3,000—this in addition to an exemption for senior citizens which now stands at $1,000 and which may be claimed whether or not the person is receiving the old age pension. At the same time the Minister of Finance reduced the basic federal tax by 5 per cent, a reduction which will result in decreases of between $100 and $500 in the basic federal tax payable.

Thus the Liberals have long demonstrated their commitment to the financial security of our older citizens. We have no wish to see that commitment eroded by forces beyond their control as we continue the fight to bring inflation under control.

Mr. Caouette (Témiscamingue): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker, the minister has just made a pure political campaign speech. He should tell us when the election is going to take place or admit that his speech is taken from Social Credit speeches of the last election.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. I think the hon. member is anticipating a point he might like to advance in the debate at some stage of our discussion, but I do not think that the intervention just made properly falls under the heading of a point of order.

Mr. Lalonde: Mr. Speaker, I am very flattered by the compliment paid to me by the hon. member for Témiscamingue (Mr. Caouette) and, if this is a political speech, in which I am only reciting facts, I suggest that it redounds very highly to the credit of the present Liberal government and the previous one.

● (2030)

As far as the introduction of a political element into a speech is concerned, let me say I would never even try to compete with the hon. member for Témiscamingue (Mr. Caouette).

An hon. Member: You couldn't!

Mr. Lalonde: It is to underline our commitment, therefore, that we bring forward the present bill at this time as one facet of our attack on inflation and its effects on Canadian consumers. This is not to make false claims that the bill represents a solution to the problems of inflation. I leave the field of panaceas to the Official Opposition.

I must say, Mr. Speaker, that supporters of the party opposite remind me a great deal these days of the magic men from the travelling medicine shows, peddling the same thin sugar and water concoction as a cure for everything that ails us. Realism dictates otherwise. We are faced with extraordinary conditions caused by a situation which is world-wide, and a response on many levels is required to offset the immediate effect of food price increases while we continue to deal with the longer term problem. No amount of Tory hocus pocus will make it go away. What is required is an attack on the immediate concerns coupled with long term measures to get at the universal roots of inflation. The government has today put forward such a program.

The excessive increase in the cost of living results in increasingly pressing needs which are a cause of daily concern. The proof of this is the number of persons of 65 and over with incomes so low that they must claim the guaranteed income supplement; 32 per cent of our older citizens receive a partial supplement under the guaranteed income supplement and 26 per cent receive the full supplement, which means that almost 60 per cent of pensioners under the old age security plan are in receipt of a supplement. When the cost of living increases and there is no income adjustment, all those with low incomes must greatly deprive themselves, and such a situation is unfair.

This is all the more obvious when it comes to food prices. While it is true that a family budget includes a certain number of fixed expenses, food costs on the other hand vary substantially. Consequently, when people are hard up, they generally cut down on the food budget. When food prices start climbing suddenly, as is the case at present throughout the world, the impact is particularly rough. According to statistics on family expenditures in Canada, a family with four children and an income of $10,000 spends 16 per cent of it on food. Another family of the same size but with an income of $4,000 spends nearly 28 per cent of it on food. Evidently, an increase of 20 per cent in food costs over a period of 18 months, as we have known, hits the low-income family twice as hard as the high-income one.

Besides, Mr. Speaker, that is another reason why the Canadian government assumes 50 per cent of the costs paid by the provinces to increase social welfare benefits as compensation for the present increase in food costs.

Through this provision, although social welfare services are a provincial responsibility, the federal government commits itself to share 50 per cent of the costs involved in giving financial assistance to the needy. In this connection, I was particularly pleased to hear that Ontario and Quebec, for instance, shortly after the statement of the right hon. Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) on August 13 last, announced a 5 per cent increase in social welfare benefits, in addition to previous increases granted since the beginning of the year. I have every reason to believe that the provincial governments will study the situation in their turn in order to find a solution to the problems of people on welfare.

This having been said, Mr. Speaker, it is that much easier for us to estimate the importance of the problem of those who live on a fixed income. Indeed, we have put Bill C-219 before the House today to reduce somewhat the economic constraints on those persons.

This bill proposes that, as of October 1973, the benefits paid under the old age income security and guaranteed minimum supplement plans be increased by 5.3 per cent of the rates now in force. This represents a minimum increase of $5.30 per month for single persons who do not receive the guaranteed income supplement and a maximum of $17.20 for married couples when both spouses are entitled to the pension and the supplement. This means that the basic pension will be upped to $105.30. The maximum supplement for a single person will be increased from $170 to $179.16, and for a couple from $324.60 to $341.80. This reevaluation takes into account the increase in the cost of living during the period from October 1972 to July 1973, compared with the ten preceding months. Among other things, the bill proposes that during the three month period beginning in January 1974 and all subsequent quarters, the old age security and guaranteed income benefits will be adjusted, with a two months' delay to the price increase registered on the official price index of the preceding quarter.

I will explain. The rates of benefits which will be paid in January 1974 are calculated by multiplying the rates in effect during the month of October 1973 by the proportional ratio between the average of the official Consumer Price Index for the period from August 1973 to October 1973 and the average of the official Consumer Price Index registered for the 1973 May-July quarter. The two months' delay is provided so that, on one hand, we may obtain from Statistics Canada all the necessary data on the fluctuations of the Price Index and on the other hand, we may take administrative action intended to insure the payments in accordance with the increase in the rates of both the old age security and the guaranteed income supplement plans.

I should say here of course that this bill provides that the pension will not decrease in case there is a decrease in the consumer prices in one quarter in relation to the preceding quarter.

Mr. Speaker, I would now like to speak on the matter of the increase in benefits. It is not the first time that we have thought of adjusting pensions, at least among the Liberals. The government of the late right honourable Pearson government took this measure for the old age security and the Canada pension plan as early as January 1968. I should say that I was flabbergasted to find out during the last election campaign that a number of Conservatives were suggesting a most original idea that of adjusting pensions on the cost of living, totally ignoring the fact that the government had already done so six months previously.

[English]

Some hon. Members: Oh!

An hon. Member: That's not so.

Mr. Stanfield: A fraud!

Mr. Lalonde: Some hon. members seem to doubt that fact. I will send them the press clippings from the last campaign and they will be able to see for themselves in writing.

[Translation]

And I was also surprised to hear last week for the umpteenth time on the CBC news that the government would soon gear pensions to the cost of living. I must say that never one of our decisions got such publicity, and I thank our sponsors wholeheartedly.

As I was saying, Mr. Speaker, old age security pensions were raised since January 1968, although at that time a 2 per cent ceiling was imposed on old age security pensions and guaranteed income supplement. Calculations and ajustments were thus comparatively easy. In spite of a change in the number of pensioners each year and of a new yearly calculation of the guaranteed income supplement, benefits, the 2 per cent maximum still applied. But when, at the beginning of 1972, the government removed the ceiling gearing the old age security pension and the guaranteed income supplement to the increase in the cost of living, the payment of a pension to some 1,800,000 Canadians became subject to another variable. However, the difficulty was not impossible to overcome. It is clear that by adopting a new formula like a full escalation in relation to the cost of living, one cannot and, in fact, one must not expect the system to work perfectly. We must devise a viable system which can be adapted, and attempt first of all to define a firm and broad basis to which further adjustments and improvements will be made.

This is what we tried to do when we removed last year the ceiling on the increase.

Today we propose another improvement.

● (2040)

[English]

Under the present law, as I am sure all hon. members are aware, escalation is made on an annual basis with payment in April of each year. This has meant that there is a six-month time lag between increases in the cost of living and adjustment of pensions benefits to reflect that increase. This allows us to obtain the consumer price index figures and apply the increase factor to 1.8 million cheques, which can vary from the basic single pension to the full OAS-GIS payment for a couple, and any amount in between.

We were not convinced that six months was the minimum time to which we could reduce the computation of changes and printing of amended cheques under the new system. However, at the time of raising the basic pension to $100 in April of this year we were not in a position to reduce that time lag. Since that time, however, we have been determined to find ways to overcome this delay while still maintaining the efficiency and accuracy of our administration. This bill, Mr. Speaker, is a measure of our success.

I am proud to say that we have been able to reduce the processing time to two months from receipt of the consumer price index figures. This means the recalculation, printing and forwarding of cheques to 1.8 million Canadians is completed in just over 40 working days. I cannot imagine even the official opposition being unrealistic enough to suggest that it could be reduced to a monthly basis and remain efficient.

I noticed this afternoon that the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Stanfield) suggested that the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) and myself had opposed this idea. I can only refer him to the debates of the committee on March 13 last when this question was considered, and I was impressed by the remarks on this matter by the very able hon. member for York South—I mean York Centre (Mr. Walker).

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Lalonde: I would say both are equally able, but at this time it was the hon. member for York Centre. We made it quite clear that we had tried to escalate this and that we might be able to come up with something, but that I could not be too hopeful. I said that it would be possible to escalate it twice a year, or possibly every three months; but that every time we do we would increase the cost of administration. We had estimated this would add about $2 million to the cost, and I pointed out that money spent on the cost of administration would not go to our senior citizens. I leave it to the Leader of the Opposition to refer to the context of those remarks.

Needless to say the administrative difficulties resulting from a change to quarterly escalation are considerable, but I am confident that we can continue to function efficiently for the benefit of our senior citizens.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Is the hon. member for Ottawa West (Mr. Reilly) rising on a point of order?

Mr. Reilly: Mr. Speaker, I merely wonder whether the minister would permit a couple of questions.

Mr. Lalonde: I only require another minute to conclude my remarks, Mr. Speaker, after which I would be pleased to answer a question if the hon. member wishes to ask one.

As it is, this change will add between $1.5 million and $2 million to the cost of administering the program. I would much prefer to devote funds to benefits paid out rather than to administrative purposes, but there comes a time when such a measure is the only acceptable solution to a current problem, and I am afraid this is the case today.

Lest anyone be cynical enough to suggest that this is merely a bookkeeping exercise, I should like to point out that this change in procedure represents a significant additional financial allocation on the part of the government for the benefit of our senior citizens. In the current fiscal year, for example, it will mean increased benefits for them of over $90 million. This increases our financial commitment to old age security to over $3 billion. I know the Canadian people would expect us to do no less.

This is one of the measures we propose on behalf of the Canadian consumer in response to the present inflationary cycle we now face. As part of our program to counteract the decreasing power of the consumer's dollar, it will ensure that those who must depend on fixed incomes do not lag behind in our society. Those who have contributed so much, and are still contributing to what Canada is today must be maintained in dignity. I would urge all hon. members to join me in seeking to expedite passage of this bill for that very purpose.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Reilly: Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the minister, who has delivered, if not a totally impartial, certainly a vigorous apology for his government's record in the field of old age pensions, whether he will concede that in the last 10 years the value of the dollar has decreased by 50 per cent, during which period his government has had custody of our circumstances?

Secondly, I should like to ask him whether he considers that here in the city of Ottawa, which is by no means the most expensive place in the country to live, a couple can live in dignity on $341.80 per month?

Mr. Lalonde: On the first point, Mr. Speaker, we have examined this matter of the increase in the cost of living over the last while, and the indication is quite clear that the increases to old age pensions, brought about mainly by Liberal governments, have been greater than the increases in the cost of living during the same period. This is something of which we can be reasonably proud, and I think it is something which certainly shows that we have been very much concerned about the welfare of our senior citizens.

Mr. Heath Macquarrie (Hillsborough): Mr. Speaker, I welcome this legislation but I do not suggest to the minister that we are dancing in the streets over the magnanimity he has displayed tonight. I listened with great pleasure to the presentation of the minister because in all my years here I have never heard such a modest proposal receive such an immodest introduction.

It reminds me of a story a former premier of Prince Edward Island used to tell about a farmer who had some difficulty getting one of his cows across a bridge. He tried to draw the cow from the front and push her from the rear and cajole her into moving across, but she would not go. Finally, another farmer came down the highway and said: "Let us scare her over". So he got behind her and blew the horn of his truck. The cow jumped over the bridge and into the river, whereupon the first farmer said: "That was a hell of big toot for such a small cow".

How could the minister take such a long bow for such a bit part? The minister once again found it impossible to resist the temptation of partisanship. After the first speech he made here I advised him that this was not a good thing. I sent his speech to hundreds of thousands of Canadians and I feel my party received at least 75,000 potential votes for the next election as a result. I am going to send this speech of his out tomorrow.

Such partisanship has made enemies for the government which the minister has recently joined. I first met the minister in the great city of Fredericton in 1963 at a thinker's conference sponsored by the Progressive Conservative Party. At that time he made an excellent speech, learned, thoughtful and modest. We have heard a lot tonight about what is going to be done. I was impressed that the minister should mention the family allowances tonight and that we are to have a change; it is not going up, it is going down. Why? He did not tell us that.

We are also told again that there will be discussions about the Canada Pension Plan. Did it not occur to the minister before this that some amelioration might have been made, and did he not think of discussing this with the provincial ministers, his counterparts, before this? I fear that the minister spends too much time comparing Grits and Tories and adding up the facts, as he calls them, and too little time on proper consultation that would make for a better discharge of his duties.

This legislation tonight demonstrates several things. As I and other members of this House told the minister when he brought about the increase in the old age security, it is not enough. It has proven to be not enough at the present time. It also indicates that the galloping inflation is going so fast that we must jack it up every three months now instead of once a year. That is a fact of life. But he does not learn the facts of life. He likes to compute what went on over the past.

If he wants some computations and compilations he may recall that had the original pension as it stood in 1963 kept abreast merely in purchasing power it would now be $107.50, without any increase at all, maintaining the original purchasing power that it had on that dreary day when his party took over the reins of office in this country. The bill demonstrates something else. The people on fixed incomes, especially the older people, have been bearing too much of the burden of inflation which this government has allowed to get out of hand lo these many months.

Most significantly of all this measure, puny though it is, demonstrates and underlines and underscores that we have in Canada today a grave economic situation, and that in the face of that we have the government piddling. We are not dealing with the issues. We are not getting the economy straightened out. We are not bringing prosperity to the land. We are not controlling inflation. So we seek by bits and pieces and by transfers of income to tinker and gear up in a short-range way instead of tackling the problem.

The economy is sick; that is the problem. We pretty well recognize in this legislation that inflation has now become a way of life. I suppose that during the life of the government—if I may use that word a bit loosely—we will have eternal inflation. So we need to take these temporizing, band-aid measures such as the one before us. I intend to support this measure as I supported it when the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Stanfield) first suggested it several months ago.

At that time the minister described the suggestion as a nightmare. That was the word he used. He said the administrative cost would be enormous and that they could not cope with it. Tonight he made that Freudian slip about which part of York was which and told us of his answer in March. I will repeat to him what he said on May 22 when an even more able colleague from Fraser Valley East (Mr. Patterson) asked him about this. He said in the committee on May 22:

> We have come to the conclusion that the costs of adjustments on a quarterly basis, for instance, imply a large administrative load and large administrative costs relative to the benefits that are really being given out.

An hon. Member: Shame.

Mr. Macquarrie: So the nightmare of yesterday has become the glory of today. The minister talks a lot about visiting the provincial capitals for consultation. I think he has been somewhere else. He has been to Damascus lately too. Tonight we see that the stone which the builder rejected a few months ago has now become the cornerstone of the temple. But considering the ersatz temple of ad hockery being feverishly constructed by this government, I suppose we need not be surprised at such snatchings and graspings from the platforms of other parties. Indeed sometimes the more our policies are derided the more quickly they are snatched away. Imitation is the sincerest form of flattery and plagiarism implies certain value judgments. I suppose it is better to be right in the end than never right at all. It is well he went to Fredericton because he has made a belated judgment on a limited aspect of the suggestions of our party. He talked of the medicines we have put on display. He should analyze them pretty carefully because he is likely to be swallowing some of them, as he has demonstrated tonight.

The minister flatters us by taking our policies, but I would like him to do a little more and to note that we are a dynamic party and tend to keep abreast of developments. While we continue to suggest this, if he were listening carefully a short while ago he would have known that we had advised a degree of retroactivity on this. Had he listened a little more carefully, he would have brought forth a measure that would have put July there instead of October.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Macquarrie: If he has had such a tremendous transformation of his department that he can do with great dispatch what was an impossible nightmare in March and May, surely there would be no great difficulty in gearing this measure to July instead of October. Because, God knows, there were plenty of price increases from July to the present day, and there will be plenty from July to October. Let the old people of Canada who bear the burden of these price increases in the long hot summer of Liberalism get a little more benefit out of this. That is the suggestion we made to him and he should have paid attention to it. It could have been July as easily as October.

I say to him also that he wants to take careful note of the many people in the country who may not benefit from this. He did not discuss the war veterans. What does this mean when they get an addition in one part of the pension and have it taken away in another? These are the sort of things that have to be considered.

If I were as partisan as the minister I could spend the next little while telling him some of the facts of recorded history—the high and low days of historic Liberalism or hysteric Liberalism. I also want to make a few comments and to suggest how he may improve this piece of legislation. I have given him a suggestion about retroactivity which I am sure will commend itself to the people of Canada, and since he wants to serve them will commend itself to him.

I would say that instead of the formula he uses it might be more meaningful and more helpful to the people whom he mentioned if we used the index in reference to the food, clothing and housing component rather than the statistical formula he mentioned. Because it is in this area that the burden of the increased cost is most painful to the senior citizens of the country. I suggest that this would have been a far better way to improve the situation.

There is nothing much to be gained by suggesting who thought of what first. I have no need to apologize for my role in public life and my concern for the senior citizens in those days when the minister was in the cabinet room but not in the cabinet perhaps—near the seats of the mighty but perhaps not in one of them. Nor do I have to apologize for my party. I think the older people of this country must be heartily sick and tired of having their needs and their sufferings paraded out for political purposes time and time again. I have no intention of going into the auction room and dragging the old political shibboleths out in an appeal for the vote of the older people. I will trust them as well as the middle aged and the young people of this country to make their judgment on to whom to turn if they want an efficient administration, if they want economic know how and if they want some compassion in the governing circles of this land.

On that I will rest my case. I would also suggest, if it finds agreement in other parts of the House, as it has been mentioned in part earlier by the House leader of our party, that we are prepared to allow my golden words to serve for my glorious party. We can then go into committee of the whole, pass this measure and get the pensions out into the hands of the old people as fast as possible. That is what we are interested in. Then perhaps we can get on to something fundamental, some significant legislation in the long delayed fight against inflation in this country.

Mr. Reilly: I rise on a point of order, Mr. Speaker. I asked the minister two questions. He did not answer the second question. There is in fact some dispute among us on this side of the House about whether he answered the first, but I will not go into that. I asked him whether he personally believed that it was possible for a couple of old people to live in dignity on $341.78. I would like a yes or no to that.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. I heard the question originally and perhaps it was not answered. It is a question that is really not a point of order but more a point of debate and could be asked when later the House composes itself into committee of the whole, where every hon. member would have an opportunity to ask questions of the minister, including the hon. member who has just raised this point.

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, the bill before us tonight, like so many bills brought in by Liberal governments, does not go far enough and does not come to grips with the real issue, and yet it does enough that this House will be anxious to get it passed as quickly as possible in order that the pension increase provided for October will come into effect at that time.

In speaking tonight the minister struck me as trying to expiate one of his sins, that of having spent a few years working for the Tory party. But I do not see why he needed to take it out on us or on the senior citizens of Canada who regard this legislation as extremely important. Now that the minister is an ex-Tory and has become a Liberal—

Mr. Stanfield: And God knows what he will be tomorrow.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): —he delivered himself tonight of the remark that the bringing in of this bill is in keeping with the traditions of Liberal governments. I want to tell the minister that I agree with him, for the fact is that for 50 years it has been the tradition of Liberal governments, so far as old age pensioners are concerned, only to act when those governments are pushed to the wall.

We got the first old age pension in this country—yes, introduced by a Liberal government—because my predecessor, the late J. S. Woodsworth, in a parliament where the government was in a minority position, was able to use the support he had from a few others to force that first pension out of the Liberal government of that day. As hon. members know, because it is a story that has been told in this House many times, that was a pension of $20 a month payable at age 70, with a means test as long as your arm.

This place is not one in which there is any rule which says we must be modest. Therefore I am not going to worry about any such rule in what I say in the next minutes or so. That pension of $20 a month at age 70, with its vicious means test, stayed that way until I came to this place as a result of a by-election in 1942.

I am not going to be modest. I am going to take some of the credit for starting right in to try to carry on where J. S. Woodsworth had left off. By the summer of 1943, the first year I was here, we had got the first increase from $20 up to $25 per month. But that was not because the Liberals were that concerned about old age pensioners. It was because of the pressure we were able to exert here on the floor of the House of Commons, backed by the pressure and support we were getting from some of the provincial governments.

The Liberals can stand, as they do in pension debate after pension debate, and tell us the number of times they have improved the pension, and tell us by how many dollars they have increased the pension compared with the number of dollars by which the pension was increased when the Tories were in power. But the fact is that every one of those increases, from $20 to $25, to $30, to $40, to $46, to $55, to $65, to $75, to $79.58, to $80, to $82.88 and to $100 came as a result of pressure on the floor of this House, mostly from us, and not because there was any love on the part of the Liberal governments for our senior citizens.

And that is what we are getting again now. The pressure of the high cost of living, which everyone is feeling is being felt in particular by our senior citizens, and this is being impressed on the government on the floor of this House by members in all parties, yes even by members on the Liberal side, and certainly by the Conservatives, the Social Crediters and by ourselves.

It is not to be overlooked that there was an election last October 30 which gave no one a majority, and that the Liberals have been doing their best to hang in there ever since. It is not to be overlooked that from time to time we have nailed some theses to the door, the latest occasion being on August 21 when we demanded action on the question of escalating old age pensions on a quarterly basis, and the result is that because of that pressure we are getting this bit of action tonight.

Every one of these increases has been welcome—the changes we have sought, the removal of the means test, all of the additions, and the lowering of the age to 65. As I say, they have all been welcomed, but let not this ex-Tory turned Liberal stand up in this House and try to convince us, and particularly try to convince me, that it is because of any Liberal traditions of concern for old age pensioners. The Liberal tradition he is following tonight is not to act until the Liberal government is pushed to the wall. And it is pushed to the wall tonight. So the Prime Minster (Mr. Trudeau) this afternoon, knowing he was not able to adjourn the House after the railway strike debate was over, comes on and tries to give this so-called leadership. And this is part of the package. We welcome it, but let us have it presented to us in honest terms.

In my opening sentence or so I said that in my view this bill does not go far enough and does not come to grips with the real problem of our old age pensioners. Although the minister put the matter in the wider context of the cost of living problem of today, and I accept that, I am prepared while I have the floor tonight to talk only about old age pensioners. Their real problem is not just to get the annual escalation to which they are entitled on a quarterly basis. Their real problem is that they desperately need a substantial increase in the basic amount of the pension itself.

When this session opened last January the Minister of National Health and Welfare, in a speech on which I was pleased to compliment him much more than I feel I can compliment him tonight, said on January 11, as recorded in Hansard at page 202, that there was soon to be announced an old age pension increase. I now quote his words exactly:

—and I hasten to add that it will not be a mere token increase.

He knew then that what was needed was a substantial increase in the old age pension. We told him that in our view that meant an increase in the basic pension to $150 a month. But the minister, having said he would not bring down a mere token increase, did just that. He brought down an increase from $82.88 to $100 a month.

Every member of the House of Commons knows that that amount, that $17.12 increase in the basic amount of the pension, has long since been eaten up by the increase in the cost of living, and that the figure we were advocating in January of $150 a month as a basic pension is in fact now out of date.

Our party, the NDP, at its convention in Vancouver a few weeks ago, recognized this by declaring that it is now our policy that the basic amount of the old age security pension should be $200 a month. And don't let anyone smile, as the minister is now smiling, although maybe it is because of something somebody else is saying to him, because I have a long memory. I can recall when members were telling me I was out of my mind because I was asking for pensions of $30 a month, $40 a month and $50 a month. We won those amounts, and more. But the fact of the matter—and I pick up the theme of the questions asked by the hon. member for Ottawa West (Mr. Reilly)—is that if our senior citizens are going to live in the dignity and honour to which they are entitled, $200 a month has become a minimum.

I accept the fact that this debate takes place in the context of the cost of living problem and the pressure it is imposing upon persons with fixed incomes. But there is a wider context. We still have not solved the problem of providing our senior citizens with what is really their right, and that is sufficient income that is not just charity, not just enough to keep them alive, but which recognizes the contribution they have made to our society, that recognizes their right to live in dignity and honour.

I am just as sure as can be that it was our efforts over the years that got the basic pension up from $20 a month to $100 a month, and I am equally sure that some of us will still be here to get it up to $200 a month. I call upon the minister to face the fact that what he should be bringing before parliament right now is not just a quarterly escalation that will produce an increase of $5.30 in October, but an increase in the basic amount of the pension itself.

I was interested, Mr. Speaker, in the fact that the minister picked up the minutes of proceedings and votes of the Standing Committee on Health, Welfare and Social Affairs for Tuesday, March 13, 1973. I brought the same minutes into the House with me this evening intending to quote some of the same sentences that the minister quoted, although perhaps my emphasis, or the conclusion I draw, from what he said on that occasion, is not the conclusion that he underlined. In fact, neither did my good friend the hon. member for Hillsborough (Mr. Macquarrie) underline that conclusion that really matters. At any rate, this is what the Minister of National Health and Welfare said on March 13, 1973 at page 1:12 in response to an appeal from a Liberal, the hon. member for York Centre (Mr. Walker), that escalation be put on a semi-annual basis or quarterly basis; these are the words of the minister:

Of course it would be possible to have it twice a year. Theoretically it would even be possible to have it every three months. But every time you do that you increase your cost of administration; we have calculated, that it would add about $2 million to the cost. And the money that you add to the cost of administration would not go to the senior citizens. So my inclination at the present time is to try to increase more often the total amount of benefits, including escalation, rather than load the system, with more frequent escalation, a part of which at least would go into administration and not to the old people. I would rather save on the administration and try to get that money to the people through more frequent raises.

I ask my good friend the Minister of National Health and Welfare, who said these things on March 13, what he has done in the cabinet to which he now belongs—not a cabinet which is in the front room while he is in the back room, mind you. What has the minister done in cabinet to try to get these more frequent raises in the basic amount that he declared on March 13 to be the important thing to do?

Later that same day in the standing committee the minister was pressed further on this question of semi-annual or quarterly escalations. The point was made by Liberal members that the amounts getting through to the pensioners were lagging behind because of the time it took to bring the annual escalation into effect. At page 1:22 of the document to which I have already referred the record says:

MR. LALONDE: My point is that one way for Parliament to compensate for this unavoidable lag is to change the basic amount, every once in a while, as has been done at different times, and people catch up then—more than catch up—on what they might have lost in terms of the delays in the escalation. That is what I meant.

I was not scandalized, Mr. Speaker, as the previous speaker seems to be, over the fact that the government has changed its tune about the cost of administration of a quarterly escalation program. In March, the minister said we must not do this because it would cost too much, but now the government is prepared to spend the money. What scandalizes me, what bothers me and what disturbs me is that the minister, out of his own heart and mind, said in March that what he preferred was to try more often to get increases in the basic amount of the pension. Yet he makes a speech tonight, does not refer to that at all, but refers to Liberal tradition and all that when all he is doing is putting escalation on a quarterly basis.

I know that by putting escalation on a quarterly basis the result will be that in a 12-month period pensioners will get a greater number of dollars than they would have got otherwise. But the fact of the matter is that in any fourth quarter the pensioners, in that quarter, will not be getting any more dollars than they would have got in the twelfth month as the result of an annual escalation. So, Mr. Speaker, to tell us how much this is going to cost and to suggest great generosity on the part of the Liberal government is, I think, an attempt to kid us.

The fact of the matter is that an escalation program is necessary, and I think a quarterly one is better than an annual one. I do not think anyone in this House is going to force a vote or oppose this measure, but to put it in its proper perspective it really is not answering the needs of our older people as individuals on fixed incomes. It is not coming to grips with the basic problem that faces us with reference to senior citizens. This is a problem we have been trying to solve for 50 years, namely, that they are entitled not just to charity and welfare, not just to enough to keep them alive, but to enough to enable them to live in the respect and dignity that they deserve as members of a society, because they are human beings and because of the contribution they have made over the years.

Of course we will support this measure, Mr. Speaker; of course we will put it through with a limited amount of debate. I imagine there will have to be a number of Liberal speeches to boost it and try to dress it up a bit, but I plead with the minister to get back to that feeling that I thought he had for the old age pensioners when he made his first speech back on January 11. I ask him to get back to that approach, to that appreciation, and face the fact that what he is doing tonight is peanuts. It really does not meet the needs and rights of our older people.

I submit, sir, that we are doing the right thing in terms of the old age pension cause, that we are doing the right thing in the political life of this country when, as a New Democratic Party, we say that the time has come to go for a basic old age pension of $200 a month. Maybe we will do well if we get from the Liberals half of the proposed increase or get it up to $150, but we are going to keep working for the higher amount because we believe our people are entitled to it and that our economy can afford it.

I know there are those who ask what it will do to our tax bill and the economy, but the whole aim of society surely, Mr. Speaker, is to order its economy and order its arrangements so that there is justice and equity among our people. We have not really done that until we make sure that our older and our retired people get the standard of living to which they are entitled.

While I am on my feet and discussing the question of old age pensions, Sir, there are one or two other things I should like to say. When I was planning what I might say I confess I said to myself "Now watch out; it is a simple bill dealing only with escalation and there might be someone in the chair who would say we should stick to that narrow provision". But, Mr. Speaker, you have been stymied. Because in introducing this bill the minister made very few references to the quarterly escalation that the bill effects; rather he gave us this great history about the traditions of the Liberal Party. Of course, once he had made that speech the official spokesman for the Progressive Conservative Party felt he could do the same, and so we have a wide open debate on the whole question of the Old Age Security Act and the amendments that ought to be made to it. Because the minister has opened up the act and told us what has been done over the years, I remind him again—I know there is no corner of this House in which I have more support than on the Liberal side, especially the members from the province of Quebec—that the time has come to lower the eligible age for old age security and also under the Canada Pension Plan.

I was hoping, after I made that generous reference to Quebec Liberals, that they would applaud!

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Now they are applauding, even if I had to ask for it. Mr. Speaker, this is an issue that will not go away. The government cannot continue to insist that the pension be paid only at age 65. I note that the government of the province of British Columbia is making the first start. The provinces have to pay attention to their limited resources and have to apply means tests that some of us may not like. In British Columbia, at least, the government is supporting the idea of pensions for certain persons at age 60. I advocate strongly that right now the eligible age under the Old Age Security Act and under the Canada Pension Plan should be 60 for all those persons who are out of the labour market. I am not advocating on this occasion that pensions be paid universally at that age in the way they are now paid at age 65. I am saying that persons who do not have income from employment and who are 60 years of age and over, whether they are spouses, single persons, or what have you, should now be entitled to receive the full amount of the old age pension.

I welcome strongly the support that has been given for this proposition not only by my colleagues, all 30 of them, but, as well, by quite a few Conservatives, most Social Crediters, and by members of the Liberal Party who are being pressed on this subject by people in their constituencies. I just do not know what has happened to the Minister of National Health and Welfare that the message has not got through to him.

This issue will not go away. I urge that further consideration be given during this present session of parliament to lowering the eligible age at least for those who are out of the labour market. As I say, this should happen not only with respect to the old age security pension but, as well, with respect to the Canada Pension Plan. The Minister of National Health and Welfare already has before the House one bill amending the Canada Pension Plan. It deals with a few minor things; he has promised another one. Indeed, I was pleased to hear him say tonight that the 2 per cent escalation under that plan is to come off in January. The minister probably remembers the time when I asked him a few weeks ago what steps were to be taken to make sure that the 2% ceiling on that escalation comes off in January, as he had promised. He quickly corrected me and told me he had made no such promise; it was just a hope. Tonight he spoke more firmly. You see, that is the result of the pressure of the high cost of living and of the provinces. At any rate, I was glad to hear him say tonight that it is to come off in January.

I was also glad to hear him refer to the other bill that was introduced today by the President of the Treasury Board (Mr. Drury) which will take the 2 per cent ceiling off the escalation of pensions for retired civil servants, retired Armed Forces personnel, retired RCMP personnel and so on. But I urge on the minister, when he meets with his provincial counterparts—as he has promised to do this month, I believe, or very soon—to discuss the Canada Pension Plan and finalize with them the removal of the 2 per cent ceiling as well as to do something about increasing yearly maximum pensionable earnings; to tell them a fact of life, namely, that the time has come for the lowering of the eligible age under that legislation as well as under the Old Age Security Act to age 60.

These are things that I feel should certainly be considered and acted on. If Your Honour feels that I have strayed a bit from the narrow terms of the bill, I am afraid I must agree. I did not think I could speak as I have done but for the fact that the minister made the far ranging speech that he delivered tonight.

I shall mention two or three other things and then take my seat. I am glad that we are making some headway. I have to say sometimes to some of my colleagues who feel frustrated because things move so slowly around here—and they do move terribly slowly, as I can confirm—that over the years things do move. One does get pension increases for retired civil servants. Now we are to get rid of the 2 per cent escalation ceiling with respect to their pensions. We are to get rid of that ceiling with respect to pensions of retired Armed Forces and retired RCMP personnel as well. We are to get a kind of lowering of the age at which retired Armed Forces and retired RCMP personnel can get their escalation.

Although we are dealing with these things, particularly with the old age security and the guaranteed supplement that is included thereunder, I hope that our veterans on the war veterans allowance do not go through the experience of getting an increase in their OAS and GIS from one hand of the government and having it taken away by another. The hon. member for Humber-St. George's-St. Barbe (Mr. Marshall) raised this question the other day in the question period and got an answer from the Minister of Veterans Affairs (Mr. MacDonald) that was reasonably satisfactory, but I was not completely convinced. I join with my hon. friend for Humber-St. George's-St. Barbe in saying that this must be a certainty. There must not be an instance this time of war veterans who are on the war veterans allowance getting an increase in OAS and GIS and then having it cut back from their WVA the next month because they exceeded the ceiling set out in the War Veterans Allowance Act.

The other major things I want to talk about I shall refer to only in passing. I think the federal government must look thoroughly into the question of providing protection to the people of this country so far as their private pension plans are concerned. There are many instances of employees not getting the benefits they thought they were entitled to; certainly, there are far too many cases of pension plans that are inferior. There are far too many cases of pension plans that do not provide for a proper escalation. I was glad to hear the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) speak this afternoon of a regulation coming under the income tax department which at the moment will not permit the registration of private plans that escalate by more than 2 per cent per year. This regulation is to be changed so that such plans can be registered. I would go further. I would say that they should not be registered unless they make full allowance for increases in the cost of living to the full extent of the rise of the cost of living. Once the government talks to some of these employers in terms of what this will mean to them in income tax, we shall be surprised how quickly they will see the light. So I urge that attention be given to the whole broad pension question right across the board.

We made a few references to railway pensions last week in the debate on the rail strike. We pleaded in particular with the Minister of Labour (Mr. Munro) to give to John Deutsch much more than the commission to look into the value of the pension changes which have been made, which he has done. We pleaded with the minister then, and I plead with the minister now, to establish a commission to go into the entire question of the adequacy and fairness of railway pension plans. That is another issue that will not go away. The whole question is not just one that some of us like to talk about because we have been talking about it for years and cannot get over it. We think it is part and parcel of the whole idea that used to be known as the just society, if that phrase has not been spoiled. We think it is part and parcel of the idea of a decent, humane society, in which our older people are not just kept alive but in which they can enjoy the dignity, the honour and the respect that are possible because of the work they have done and of the wealth that our economy is able to produce.

We shall support this little bill, Mr. Speaker, because what it does is the least that can possibly be done at this time. But we plead with the government and we plead with this House to realize that the pension problem calls for a lot more than has been done. Some of us are going to keep talking about it until we get a full measure of justice and security for all our older people.

[Translation]

Mr. Adrien Lambert (Bellechasse): Mr. Speaker, it is with deep satisfaction that I heard this evening the speeches of the spokesmen of the various parties in the House, because we seem to be heading at great speed towards the acknowledgment of human rights. I am greatly pleased, because there was a time when any reference to the rights of senior citizens, disabled persons, families or children seemed like preaching in the wilderness. However, at the present time, there seems to be a consensus which is heart-warming, as we all wish to bring greater security to older people and are ready to do so not only because of an election, but due to a rapidly changing situation.

Bill C-219 now under consideration precisely provides for an increase in the pension of people of 65 or over, according to their needs and the rise in the cost of living.

Unfortunately, Mr. Speaker, whenever an increase in the cost of living is mentioned, a great many people think of an increase in food costs. They feel that these are the only costs which contribute to the cost of living increase, that is, everything we eat to rebuild our strength and live. Yet, there are many other factors which contribute to the cost of living increase which, although very important, are rarely mentioned.

I was very much interested in the statement which the right hon. Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) made this afternoon and which, at times, sounded like a Speech from the Throne, in view of the various measures presented to hon. members who are urged to pass them in order to remedy a number of situations.

For example, when I heard that part of the remarks dealing with the increase in the price of gasoline, I was very interested because a couple of weeks ago I did in fact say in a press release that the increase in price of gasoline by the great oil magnates did contribute much to the increase in the cost of living these people were not forced to crawl in front of control boards to get higher prices as must do, for example, whole milk producers. In fact, the latter must submit a request to provincial control boards to ask permission to raise the price of their milk according to the contingencies of production costs so that they may realize profits and keep operating. Once again, we have a policy for the rich and a policy for the poor.

As for the increase in gas prices, these magnates only have to decide, at a given time, that they are more hungry than yesterday and they boost their prices. It is an accomplished fact. All newspapers announce that the price of gasoline has risen by 2 cents, 3 cents or 5 cents and that is what contributes, to a great extent, to the higher cost of living because everyday we only have to watch, to see what happens on our roads, in our towns, everywhere, to understand that more and more gasoline is used for all sorts of things, to do things that will bring satisfaction or will give something likely to satisfy the needs of human beings.

Mr. Speaker, another thing greatly contributes to the rise in the cost of living; we hear very little about, at least it is not given much attention. This afternoon, I heard, the leader of the New Democratic Party (Mr. Lewis) utter a very short sentence. Then I heard our leader (Mr. Caouette) who mentioned what he has repeated again and again: the rise in interest rates leads to a much higher cost of living, and here again the government seems powerless facing those who enjoy the privilege of controlling credit and to determine the interest rates on the money loaned to the Canadian taxpayers, to the large corporations.

Mr. Speaker, I intend to come back on that subject at a certain moment when we will make a thorough study of related matters in order to demonstrate once and for all—if it is possible—to all Canadians, to consumers and producers that farmers have some rights, they can exist and they have a mission to fulfill in Canada, that they must produce what is necessarily to appease appetites, to fill stomachs, that they have well-established rights, that they must be recognized and they are not responsible for the rise in the cost of living.

Once again, I would like to point out to all Canadian consumers that it is their interest to help farmers have their rights recognized so that they can continue to produce the necessary foods to meet the needs of the people; if we do not move right now, I am afraid the reduction in farm production will be accelerating and young people will no longer be interested in our most essential industry, the farm industry.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I would like also to call the attention of the House to the fact that many aged persons sent letters and telegrams to us, phoned us to let us know their needs and their hopes for more generous pensions.

Without reading them, I only wish to mention some of the letters received recently. I suppose that all members receive such mail. This means that older people ask their representatives to pass measures which will ensure their security, a security which they certainly deserve after their many years of work. As a matter of fact they used their energies, their power to achieve something in our country like clearing a farm, building a house or promoting an industry, building a railway, a road or a plane. Thanks to their energy, all these people have worked, often under very difficult conditions, giving their best to build a Canada in which they hoped to live happy years at retirement without always worrying: Where shall we find the money to buy clothes, to keep warm and to eat?

I have here, Mr. Speaker, an excerpt from a letter writen by a man who is not from my riding. He is from Montreal. He gies his address and his name. The letter was sent to the right hon. Prime Minister in 1970 and I quote:

Honourable Prime Minister, to me and to other people you answered that you would try to improve our lives by a raising the old age security to $150 a month without restriction.

This means: without taxes, without means tests, without being bothered by investigators who come looking into my closets, my refrigerator or still my vegetable cellar.

Well, he wanted security. He was not asking for the impossible; he was simply asking for something possible.

He also said and I quote:

We have to file an income tax return and we are even paying a little tax. Why not grant us an exemption of $3,000 at 70 years of age . . .

Now I would add "60 years" because it is possible. I go on with quotation:

Don't you think that we have been paying long enough? How many years have we to live? An average of 5 years. What would such an exemption mean for the country?

Mr. Speaker, this is a wise and clever suggestion. He is not asking an increase for the sake of it, but at the same time he is offering the government a formula which would enable these people to get an increase, not directly in the amount of their cheques, but by sparing them the obligation of having to return too sizable an amount to the government at the end of the year.

Finally, he says this:

To end their days decently, the aged should receive a monthly $200 pension, bearing in mind the present cost of living . . .

A while ago, I heard the previous speaker, the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) express precisely the same views. I remember having supported a motion here, in this House, at the time a bill on old age security was being studied, proposing precisely a similar increase. Is it idle fancy, Mr. Speaker? We must study the situation in our country to see whether it is possible to face the problem. With $200 a month, will the age—and if I had the time, I would say how many of them there are; something like 1,800,000, I believe—gobble everything up so that there is nothing left for other Canadians?

Mr. Speaker, let's go back to Manitoba. Like everyone else, I have had the opportunity of seeing, from the air, the vast prairies covered with beautiful grain crops, where people toiled to reap and transform them in order to feed the people. We also had the opportunity to realize that some vast stretches of land were ploughed, ready to be seeded in preparation for next year.

So it is not these people with $200 per month who will exhaust the resources of our country. One has but to stop a moment and look around to see that we also have an extraordinary potential of young people from 35 to 50 who are still in good health and capable to bring their contribution to this country's production if we enable them to channel their energy, to use the hours that Providence puts at their disposal in order to process in detail all the natural resources of this country.

Old Age Security

Mr. Speaker, we must do everything we can to provide more security to older people, not only to those of 65 or over, but also to the 60-year old persons. I was pleased a while ago to hear the previous speaker mention again convincingly, the possibility for Canada of lowering from 65 to 60 the eligibility age to the old age security pension. As for me, I would add married people, even those whose age is below 60, because after all it is only logical whenever one retires that his or her spouse may be able to do the same so as to provide both with a happy retirement, spent in security, which would enable them to visit our magnificent country while they are still in good health, so as to see the work accomplished by our ancestors in order to build such a beautiful country which allows us to enjoy a security and freedom as no other country in the world can afford.

As far as I am concerned, I am willing to see Bill C-219 passed without delay. My colleagues whom I questioned about it, told me that they were in agreement with that.

The Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Lalonde) could also move, during the days to come, an amendment to the bill that would enable people aged 60 to become eligible to the pension and provide more generous family allowances.

I was pleased this afternoon to hear the Prime Minister say that the family allowance rate would be $12 per month as of October. Mr. Speaker, people who have children can easily understand, considering the high cost of living, the great service we could do to all Canadian parents, and especially Quebec parents, who are at present helpless.

I am concerned with the birthrate which is decreasing year after year in our province. Unfortunately, that is not due only to the pill but also to an economic context which is preventing them from being their own selves. How do you expect a couple to live in apartments in Montreal or elsewhere when there is room only for machines and none for human capital. Then it is time something should be done and quickly before it is too late, because with the little experience I have of life I have learned one thing, that when we fail to do something by ourselves and for ourselves it is done by others and against us.

Therefore if we do not want that to happen, let us act now, and work like responsible people and give each and everyone that security which lies in freedom.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Baldwin: Mr. Speaker, I was just wondering whether the acting government House leader or the parliamentary secretary would confirm that we will be going on with this bill tomorrow, hopefully to be completed before too long. In the event we have concluded the statute law supplementary retirement benefits amendments tomorrow, would the parliamentary secretary or the acting House leader indicate what we are going ahead with?

Mr. Reid: Mr. Speaker, I can confirm that we will be dealing with this bill tomorrow and following that the statute law in respect of the pension plan. Following that, I am afraid it will depend on the House leaders to determine the future course.

Adjournment Debate

Mr. Baldwin: In other words you have nothing else ready?

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

[English]

A motion to adjourn the House under Standing Order 40 deemed to have been moved.

ENERGY—PROPOSED WEST COAST OIL TANKER ROUTE—INQUIRY AS TO CANADA-UNITED STATES COMMITTEE TO DISCUSS ENVIRONMENTAL PROTECTION—CANADIAN PROPOSALS

Mr. John A. Fraser (Vancouver South): Mr. Speaker, on March 8 I asked some questions of the Minister of the Environment (Mr. Davis). I notice he is not here tonight, nor apparently is his parliamentary secretary. However, notwithstanding that I notice the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Sharp) is here, and considering the fact that the questions raised are matters of some concern to him perhaps he will hear my remarks and give me the answers I would otherwise expect to receive from the Minister of the Environment. I notice that the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of the Environment (Mr. Rompkey) has just entered the House.

In March of this year I asked the Minister of the Environment what had been done by the Canadian government and the United States government to enter into control arrangements in respect of tankers on the west coast. Since that time a great deal has been revealed to us. I was about to say that a great deal had happened, but nothing very much has happened since the session ended on July 27 this year.

Before the adjournment I happened to have the privilege of speaking on the adjournment debate. At that time I pointed out to the House that, in view of the problems we now have in respect of United States legislation approving the tanker route, we are in the position that we do not know what the reaction of the Canadian government will be. Despite the brave words of the Secretary of State for External Affairs that we have only begun to fight, Parliament has been adjourned for a month now and we have heard little about the fight the Canadian government is waging.

On July 27, 1973 the Secretary of State for External Affairs took umbrage when I said that the government had assured residents of the west coast that everything was being done not just to keep tankers out of Puget Sound, as has been suggested, but to stop the tanker route entirely. The minister's reply was to the effect that he did not think that was so. I remind the House that on November 20, 1971, in the Montreal Star there appeared a Canadian Press story concerning the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development in which he is reported to have said that they are still interested in a pipeline. The article goes on to say:

> . . . Mr. Chrétien rejected a reported statement by U.S. Interior Secretary Rogers Morton that Canada has lost interest in an Arctic pipeline.
> "That is not the case," Mr. Chrétien said. "We are interested."
> "We, as Canadians, are not too happy with the fact that they are planning to use tankers from Alaska to California . . .

I underline the word "California".

> . . . because there would be great danger to the beautiful coast of B.C."
> "That is why we have to consider the possibility of having the pipeline through Canada."

The Secretary of State for External Affairs may take some comfort from the fact that some time earlier, on October 8, 1971, he was reported in the Sun as saying that he was not quite certain that any oil protest was of any use. It seems strange the government has decided to fight—in the words of the Secretary of State for External Affairs—and yet a month has gone by in which nothing has happened. We had a parliamentary delegation go to the United States. We recognize that the legal machinery of the United States Congress has taken effect and that we are to have a pipeline across Alaska, which means we will have a tanker route down the west coast of British Columbia, not just to California but into Puget Sound.

We simply want to know what has been done since we adjourned on July 27. What negotiations and initiatives are being taken on the part of the government vis-à-vis Canada and the United States to decide whether or not there is a quid pro quo between Canada and the United States to get the tankers out of Puget Sound? We want to know, in a word, whether the government has started to fight, and if not when it intends to do so.

Mr. William Rompkey (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of the Environment): Mr. Speaker, our concern about the risk to the environment entailed in the passage of super tankers through the Straits of Juan de Fuca to Puget Sound has been made clear on a number of occasions, both in communications with the United States and in public statements. Our preference would obviously have been for an overland pipeline route through Canada. However, developments in the Congress of the United States make it obvious that this is not to be so. However, there is still time for discussions on this matter because it is some time yet before the oil actually begins to flow.

The Canadian government is not able to prevent the construction of the trans-Alaskan pipeline since it is entirely within U.S. territory. The great bulk of the oil is being transported to California, as has been said before, in large vessels. However, some of it is planned to go into Puget Sound. There is no reason why Canada should be concerned about the traffic going to California. Our concern is with tankers going into Puget Sound through the Straits of Juan de Fuca. We have sought to influence the United States either to supply these refineries in Puget Sound in some other manner or to manage the tanker traffic in such a way as to minimize risk.

One proposal has been to supply the needs of those refineries overland from Canada. To do this it would be necessary to enter into discussions with the United States on this matter. There would be problems of pricing, a guarantee of supply, and these might present obstacles in that direction. As congressional and U.S. government action to overcome the impediments in the way of proceeding with the construction of the trans-Alaska pipeline is not yet complete, it has not been possible at this point to discuss this proposal with the United States.

We are considering what action might appropriately be taken to minimize the risk to the environment if the United States could not go along with this proposal and tankers enter Puget Sound. The first, of course, is prevention. By this I mean traffic management, navigational aids, tanker construction, and so on. We are satisfied in our discussions with the government of the United States so far that the best that technology can provide will be provided in the construction of these ships and that their quality will be the highest so far developed in the shipping industry anywhere in the world. They will be as safe as modern technology can make them. Nevertheless, spills can occur.

The second point is clean up. We are in the process of developing a joint oil spill contingency plan. This will make available trained personnel and first rate equipment.

The third area of action is compensation for damage. We are currently to develop a set of principles between our government and that of the United States which will form a basis for agreement with the U.S. in dealing with the settlement of environmental disputes.

The fourth area of action is joint research into the impact on the ecology of the west coast of any oil spills. Meetings with the United States have taken place. We would like to have a comprehensive, joint Canada-U.S. research program in this field.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Laniel): Order, please. I regret very much but I allotted as much time as possible to the hon. member and the time has now expired.

URBAN AFFAIRS—LAND BANK—INQUIRY AS TO AMOUNT OF LAND PURCHASED

Mr. Don Blenkarn (Peel South): Mr. Speaker, on July 3 I asked the Minister of State for Urban Affairs if he could give an accounting to the House of the land purchased under the $100 million a year land banking proposition. Mr. Speaker ruled that the question I asked be put on the order paper. Fortunately an answer was given by the right hon. Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) on August 30 last—I might add, a flippant answer—to the hon. member for York-Simcoe (Mr. Stevens) as recorded at page 6068 of Hansard for that date, and I quote:

Since he is interested in land costs, I might refresh his mind by recalling that the government has already approved $100 million per year for five years so that the provinces can embark upon useful land assembly programs. No province except Newfoundland has decided to act on this. I wish hon. members would urge provincial governments toward more action in this regard.

I am pleased that the Minister of State for Urban Affairs is here tonight because clearly that whole program of land banking has turned out to be as inept as we suggested it would when the bill was presented to the House. With the exception of Newfoundland no province has bothered to take advantage of the scheme.

Two provincial governments have presented briefs saying that we do not need land banking today to solve the problem. We need land spending, because the problem is the cost of single family serviced lots on which to build. Since I spoke on this matter earlier this year the cost of a single family lot in the Toronto area has risen from $18,000 to $20,000, to $22,000, to $25,000, and in some cases to $28,000 and $30,000.

The time for action was last spring. Action is now needed more urgently than ever. The only way to solve the price of a commodity that is in short supply is to increase the supply. That is basic logic. That is something anybody can understand except the government. Having clearly been shown that its program for land banking is inept, the government should now use the funds set aside for banking land to spend land, to service land.

We have a limited supply of social capital in this community. While we have a sewer program under the National Housing Act, that program is clearly not enough. Some municipalities have sewer facilities, but they have not got water mains, parks, roads or commuter services. They have not got recreation centres and all the other things that go with the total package of servicing.

It is high time the government produced a program of loans and grants to municipalities that would make possible the servicing of land so that we could have land spending instead of land banking. Because clearly we do not need land banking. We certainly do not need $100 million in land banking. We need as much funds as possible devoted to land servicing.

That proposal has been presented to the ministry and to the government by experts in every field. Yet the government still relies on the bankrupt ideas of its own advice instead of the current advice given to it by people in the development industry, by municipalities, by people who want to own homes, by builders who want to buy lots on which to build but cannot find them.

What we need is a comprehensive program that will deal with the serious problem of the shortage of serviced land. There are many other problems in connection with the building of houses. There is the high cost of mortgages at 10½ per cent. There is the tax on building materials. The economics of building are that for every dollar spent on land you need $2 in buildings to make the project economically feasible. If the lot costs $25,000 the house has to cost $50,000 for it to be economically feasible. The minister knows this. CMHC knows this. Every trust company and bank in the nation knows it. If we are going to have houses at prices people can afford, we have to bring down the price of the land. Otherwise they cannot be financed. If they cannot be financed then people cannot afford to buy them. The only answer is to attack that horrible problem, the lack of serviced land. Not land banking, but something better.

Hon. Ron Basford (Minister of State for Urban Affairs): Mr. Speaker, it is a great pleasure to have another Tory position on housing and land assembly put on the record. When the National Housing Act was before Parliament for second reading last spring we had 18 Conservative spokesmen and 18 Conservative housing policies. I am delighted to see that the hon. member for Peel South (Mr. Blenkarn) is diametrically opposed to the position taken by the hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra (Mr. Clarke), who said that we should get out of the housing business. He is also opposed to his own Conservative colleagues at Queen's Park in Toronto where Mr. Grossman and the provincial treasurer, John White, have been talking about the need for land assembly. I am delighted that the hon. member is out of step with his provincial conservative colleagues and also with the mayor of Toronto, who has been urging the province of Ontario to allow the municipality of metropolitan Toronto to take advantage of the federal legislation.

The National Housing Act was amended this year to include provisions by which the federal government, through the land assembly arrangements, could support provinces or municipalities. I have made it clear that we are ready, willing and able to support municipal land assembly proposals on a 75 per cent-25 per cent partnership or by a loan of 90 per cent. There is also a totally new provision in the federal legislation for the development of whole new communities.

That legislation has been passed and at the federal level we have made it clear that we are prepared to provide a minimum of $100 million a year for land assembly and new communities, plus some $260 million a year which we are now spending for the servicing of land. I hope that the provinces and municipalities will take greater advantage of the program than they have to date. This year we have only had applications totalling $12 million from the provinces. I think that is shameful.

It has been shown that land assembly can work. Through provincial land assembly for Malvern, which is in a part of the country that the hon. member knows, the Ontario Housing Corporation has been able to put land on the market substantially below the market price, proving that public intervention in the land business can help.

At the federal level we are prepared through legislation and budget to put massive amounts of money behind the assembly of land and getting that land on the market. The hon. member is dragging a red herring when he says that the land is solely for banking and is never to be used. The provisions of the legislation are for new communities and for the use of serviced land now. The legislation at the federal level and the money at the federal level are there. I only wish people would take advantage of these measures, first to provide new serviced land for homes in markets of high land cost, and second, under the new communities provision, for the development of whole new communities to take some of the population pressure away from areas such as metropolitan Toronto and greater Vancouver. It is a successful program, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. minister's time expired 30 seconds ago.

CONSUMER AFFAIRS—PETITION FOR CONTROLS ON FOOD PRICES—GOVERNMENT POSITION—POWERS OF PROPOSED PRICES REVIEW BOARD

Mr. John Reynolds (Burnaby-Richmond-Delta): Mr. Speaker, on April 12 I asked the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) some questions regarding the food prices review board. I also presented a petition from 20,000 people in my riding. After listening to the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Lalonde) it is going to be hard for me to be non-partisan.

After almost three months of inactivity and inaction, Mrs. Plumptre's food prices review board finally submitted its first report. Never has a more toothless, innocuous document been submitted to the Canadian people. It is little more than a superficial examination of problems that every Canadian is already fully aware of. The real nature and causes of drastic price increases, particularly in food, were not examined at all. Even to suggest that Canadian confidence has been restored in our system of production and distribution by virtue of this report or by the actions of the food prices review board is completely ludicrous.

One needs hardly to have wasted vast sums of money on this board to have it report that prices appear certain to rise sharply in the immediate future unless action is taken. Repeatedly one finds oneself asking, "What action?". Certainly the charge that the Canadian Wheat Board had changed its price support policy, a matter of only a few cents a bushel, can in no way account for a 35 per cent rise in the price of bread and a 300 per cent rise in miller's wheat. Nor can this account for a further 75 per cent increase soon to be expected in these commodities.

Today we listened to the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) telling us that the subsidy for wheat is to be increased by 25 cents a bushel. This, apparently, will save Canadians five cents on a loaf of bread. Well, Mr. Speaker, if we consider that one bushel of grain is enough for between 53 and 60 loaves of bread, it follows, if we take the figure of 60 loaves per bushel, that it would take a subsidy of 60 cents per bushel to reduce bread prices by one cent a loaf. I submit that the Prime Minister was misleading Canadians when he suggested that the price of bread will be reduced by 5 cents a loaf, as I do not think that will be the case.

Further, no recommendations are made in regard to mass consumption meats, except that the board will watch closely these price movements. One would think by this statement that 20 million Canadians have not already been watching these price movements.

The recommendations by the food prices review board are enough to insult anyone's intelligence. In fact, as far as the retailers are concerned, recommendations such as were included in the report have been policy at major food outlets across Canada long before the board was in existence, and unit pricing and standardization of package sizes have been claimed months ago by the previous minister of consumer and corporate affairs, the hon. member for Vancouver Centre (Mr. Basford).

To inform consumers that they should buy only what they need and that they should shop carefully and compare prices is to tell consumers to do something most consumers have been doing for years. There has not been any report of action taken by the board on unjustified price increases.

In so far as suggestions to government itself are concerned, the board makes two suggestions. The first is that government should face up to the threat to consumer prices posed by recent price increases. The second suggestion, and perhaps the most far reaching, is that the government expedite proposed increases in family allowances to offset recent price increases. Everybody knows about this. The government today has introduced a proposal that will do just that. I hope the people realize that this increase will be swallowed up by inflation and that they are being bribed with their own money. The entire report must be regarded as meaningless and the sooner it is dismissed, along with Mrs. Plumptre, the sooner meaningful legislation can be introduced to deal effectively with staggering price increases.

I should like to close by referring to what the Prime Minister said on April 12 when I asked my question regarding my petition. He said, as recorded at page 3230 of Hansard, "I suppose there is a growing demand for all kinds of things in this country." In the last few months we have seen a growing number of pictures of the Prime Minister and his wife in the newspapers. This is publicity for himself. He is trying to gain publicity across the country. I say that the Prime Minister should take his wife and child and the members of his government should take their wives and children, into the grocery stores of our country. Let them shop like ordinary people and see how prices are increasing. Let them act to lower prices so that average people can make better use of the dollars they bring home in their pay packets.

Hon. Herb Gray (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member's original question asked for the terms of reference of the food prices review board or what the terms would be when the board was set up. In the period of time since he asked his question this information has been made public and his question has been overtaken by events. He has used the opportunity, and he has a perfect right so to do, to attempt to cast doubt on the government's policies without putting forward any positive alternative, except possibly to suggest by implication that the proper alternative would be some form of price and wage control.

It is really strange how the hon. member and his colleagues in the Conservative Party have nothing better to offer Canada than a policy that has proven an abject failure in the United States, a country with an economy very like our own. Certainly that party has not much to offer Canadians except a policy of failure, a policy that has in the United States brought about shortages of food and greater price pressures than existed before that policy was in place. That policy caused an unfortunate fall out in Canada since it brought about upward pressures in the price of beef in this country, until the government wisely imposed export controls on beef and pork products.

In spite of the hon. member's attempt to cast doubt on some of the policies we have been using to help mitigate the effects of the upward pressure on the cost of living, he really has not succeeded, especially if by implication he wishes to see nothing more in their place than policies which have failed in the country to the south, causing worse difficulties than existed before they were put into being.

The first report of the prices review board did not simply suggest that the government take action to lower prices. It recommended that the government give consideration to subsidizing wheat used for domestic human consumption so as to moderate the increase in the price of bread and pasta products. This was a position endorsed by many commentators and editorial writers across the country.

The government responded constructively in the Prime Minister's statement today to this basic recommendation in the first report made by the board. That statement made it clear the government would set up a subsidy program aimed at making sure that an increase in the price of bread estimated at about 5 cents a loaf would not take place in October. I think this was a constructive move—

Mr. Speaker: I regret to interrupt the minister but his time as expired.

VETERANS AFFAIRS

SUGGESTED INCREASE IN WAR VETERANS ALLOWANCE—REQUEST FOR UNANIMOUS CONSENT TO MOVE MOTION

Mr. Jack Marshall (Humber-St. George's-St. Barbe): Mr. Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43 on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity related to the legislation on old age security tabled in the House yesterday. Although the legislation will escalate pensions under the OAS/GIS plans, the increases will not benefit those veterans receiving war veterans allowances who are 65 and over. I therefore move seconded by the member for Hamilton Mountain (Mr. Beattie):

That this House instructs the government through the Department of Veterans Affairs to provide, by Order-in-Council, or by amendment to the War Veterans Allowances Act, that similar increases be awarded to war veterans.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Speaker: This motion requires unanimous consent. Is there unanimity?

REFERENCE OF TAX ON BUILDING MATERIALS TO COMMITTEE—REQUEST FOR UNANIMOUS CONSENT TO MOVE MOTION

Mr. Henry Latulippe (Compton): Mr. Speaker, under Standing Order 43, I seek the unanimous consent of the House to discuss a matter of pressing and urgent necessity.

Considering that there is no provision in the legislation presently under discussion likely to remove the 11 per cent on building materials which, we feel, directly contributes to the high cost of living, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Bellechasse (Mr. Lambert):

That a special House committee be appointed to assess the resulting impact of this tax on building materials and the cost of living increase and report as soon as possible.

Mr. Speaker: The House has heard the hon. member's motion. Under Standing Order 43, this motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Speaker: There is not unanimous consent; therefore, the motion cannot be put.

ELECTORAL BOUNDARIES READJUSTMENT ACT

CHANGE IN NAME OF CONSTITUENCY FROM PEEL SOUTH TO MISSISSAUGA

Mr. Don Blenkarn (Peel South) moved for leave to introduce Bill C-222, respecting the Electoral Boundaries Readjustment Act.

Some hon. Members: Explain.

Mr. Blenkarn: Mr. Speaker, this bill is to amend the Electoral Boundaries Readjustment Act to provide that the designation of the constituency of Peel South be changed to that of Mississauga. On January 1 next year, the towns of Port Credit, Streetsville and Mississauga are being combined together into the city of Mississauga. The boundaries of Peel South encompass the city of Mississauga. Therefore I would ask speedy passage of this bill.

Motion agreed to, bill read the first time and ordered to be printed.

DEPARTMENTAL FURNISHINGS

Question No. 1,707—Mr. Kempling:

For each of the past two financial years, by province, what was the total value, in dollars, of contracts awarded for departmental furnishings, for example counters, weldments and shelving, for post offices, to companies established in each of the provinces?

Mr. John M. Reid (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Privy Council): The Post Office Department awarded contracts for shelving as follows:

Contracts awarded directly to suppliers	1971-72	1972-73
Manitoba District		$ 1,162.00
British Columbia & Yukon District	$47.00	10,381.00
Total	$47.00	$11,543.00

Insofar as the Department of Public Works is concerned: Counters in post offices are not considered as furnishings since they are constructed as part of the construction contracts. Shelving when it is built-in is also constructed under our construction contracts; when it is free standing it is ordered by Post Office from D.S.S. as ordinary furniture. As far as weldments are concerned, lock boxes and other small postal fittings are the only furnishings provided by D.P.W. Details of contracts awarded and orders placed against standing offer agreements for these items are shown on the attached sheets. See attached listings.

CONTRACTS FOR HAULING ARCTIC CARGO BY WATER

Question No. 1,974—Mr. Forrestall:

1. For the contracts issued in 1971 and 1972 for hauling Arctic cargo by water, were Canadian-owned and Canadian-registered shipping companies and ships given preference and, if not, for what reason?

2. What is the specific policy of the government with respect to this issue, namely, the preferential treatment afforded to Canadian-owned and registered ships and shipping companies?

Hon. Jean Marchand (Minister of Transport): 1. All ships hauling our Arctic cargo in 1971 and 1972 were Canadian Registered.

2. Department of Transport tender specifications and contracts require the contractor(s) to guarantee that all ships used to transport Arctic cargo will be Canadian Registered and, if not British built, then duty fully paid. The Canada Shipping Act only requires that ships being registered in Canada be British owned rather than Canadian owned.

GENERAL CONTRACTOR OF MARINE SHIPPING REQUIREMENTS

Question No. 1,976—Mr. Forrestall:

Will the contract for 1973 General Contractor for Marine shipping requirements in the hauling of Arctic cargo by water be made with a view to assisting existing Canadian enterprise over international entries and, if not, for what reason?

Hon. Jean Marchand (Minister of Transport):

	Companies	Permanent Fleet
(a)	Chimo Shipping Limited	Yes
	Agence Maritime Inc.	Yes
	Branch Lines Limited	Yes
	Federal Commerce & Navigation Co. Ltd. (This company operates a permanent Canadian Registered Fleet through subsidiary companies)	Yes

CONTRACT FOR DISHWASHING MACHINES AND GARBAGE DISPOSAL UNITS

Question No. 2,019—Mr. Hales:

1. Was a contract, GG.2592264-3, LK.2702034, for dishwashing machines and garbage disposal units in the amount of $65,208 awarded to Hobart Manufacturing Co. Ltd., Don Mills, Ontario?

2. Where tenders called and, if so (a) what are the names and addresses of those who tendered (b) was the lowest tender accepted?

3. Were there any extra charges over and above the above figure and, if so, what were they?

Hon. Jean Marchand (Minister of Transport): Yes. Tenders are invited from Canadian ship operators and require all ships to be of Canadian Registry.

TRANSPORTATION MODES FOR OFF-LIFTING SEABORNE FREIGHT

Question No. 1,978—Mr. Forrestall:

Does the government intend to continue experimenting in improved transportation modes for off-lifting seaborne freight such as by helicopters with respect to haulage of Arctic cargo by water and (a) if so, what steps have been taken to facilitate such experimentation (b) if not, for what reason?

Hon. Jean Marchand (Minister of Transport): The Ministry of Transport has experimented with and developed the helicopter (skycrane) method of discharge to the point that it is now being offered by commercial companies in competition with conventional methods. Furthermore, hovercraft is being developed as a cargo handling method on the Mackenzie River under Government auspices. The Ministry intends to continue exploring improved methods for discharge of cargo.

CANADIAN REGISTRY OF SHIPS INVOLVED IN ARCTIC RESUPPLY

Question No. 1,979—Mr. Forrestall:

For (a) 1971 (b) 1972, for each of the shipping companies which secured contracts to haul Arctic cargo, did they operate a permanent fleet under Canadian registry and, if so, which ones?

Hon. Jean Marchand (Minister of Transport):

	Companies	Permanent Fleet
(a)	Chimo Shipping Limited	Yes
	Agence Maritime Inc.	Yes
	Branch Lines Limited	Yes

MAINTENANCE COST OF ST. LAWRENCE RIVER CHANNEL DURING WINTER

Question No. 2,035—Mr. Boisvert:

What is the cost of maintaining the St. Lawrence River channel during the winter?

Hon. Jean Marchand (Minister of Transport): The operating cost of icebreakers used to maintain the St. Lawrence River channel during the winter was $1,583,000 for fiscal year 1972-73.

CORPORATIONS AND LABOUR UNIONS RETURNS ACT

Question No. 2,057—Mr. Hellyer: (Supplementary)

What statutory responsibility is vested in the Minister of Labour by the Corporations and Labour Unions Returns Act?

Hon. John C. Munro (Minister of Labour): The Corporations and Labour Unions Returns Act, (Revised Statutes of Canada 1970, Vol. II, Chapter C-31, Part III, Section 14) provides, amongst other things, that one duplicate of the statement comprised in Section A of each return filed by a union as required by Part II shall be kept on record in an office of the Department of Labour designated by the Minister of Labour for the purpose, and such duplicates shall be made available for inspection in those respective offices by any person, upon application at any reasonable time and upon payment of such fee, not exceeding one dollar in respect of any one corporation or union, as may be prescribed by the regulations.

URBAN MAIL SERVICES

Question No. 2,071—Mr. McKenzie:

How many more trucks, full-time and part-time drivers and total employees does the Post Office Department use in the operation of urban mail services in each of the cities of Victoria, Saskatoon, London, Hamilton, Windsor, Kitchener-Waterloo, Ottawa-Hull, Quebec City, Saint John, Moncton and St. John's, Nfld., as compared to the period up to April, 1972 when private contractors handled the collection and distribution of mail service?

Hon. André Ouellet (Postmaster General):

	Trucks	Drivers Full Time	Drivers Part Time	Total Employees [1]
Victoria	1 more	5 more	6 less	same
Saskatoon	5 more	6 more	5 more	9 more
London	19 more	19 more	7 less	18 more
Hamilton	15 more	8 more	6 more	17 more
Windsor [2]	same	1 more	1 less	same
Kitchener-Waterloo	8 more	9 more	4 less	7 more
Ottawa	1 less	10 more	2 more	17 more
Hull	same	2 more	1 more	3 more
Quebec [3]	same	1 less	1 less	3 less
Saint John, N.B.	1 more	4 more	2 more	9 more
Moncton	1 more	8 more	same	11 more
St. John's, Nfld.	5 more	5 more	2 less	3 more

[1] Includes supervisors, clerical and maintenance personnel.

[2] Windsor has been under Government operation for a number of years. Integrated service consisted of a small operation which had remained under contract.

[3] Figures for Quebec city only include services which were integrated as part of the integration program announced on November 23, 1971. Actually, most Quebec city urban services were integrated in the fall of 1970.

NOTE: The increase in the number of trucks and drivers can be explained as follows: (a) Some contractors were also engaged in the cartage industry and were able to direct trucks and drivers to postal work as required. (b) Some contractors employed owner-drivers to supplement contract requirements during peak or abnormal periods. (c) Some contractors provided incentives for higher productivity. (d) Employees of some contractors were paid on a per item basis and with an incentive plan, worked longer than the 8-hour day in effect for postal drivers. (e) Normal expansion of service to newly developed urban areas.

QUALIFICATIONS FOR POSITION OF CORRECTIONAL OFFICER WITH CANADIAN PENITENTIARY SERVICE

Question No. 2,116—Mr. Coates:

1. What are the present qualifications, both as to age and education, for applicants for a position as a Correctional Officer with the Canadian Penitentiary Service?

2. On what date was the present set of qualifications determined and what had been the former level of qualifications from the point of view of age and education?

3. How many applications were processed for positions as Correctional Officers by the Canadian Penitentiary Service in the fiscal year 1972-73?

4. Of the total number of applications processed, how many appointments were made to the service as Correctional Officers?

5. Did all of the appointees meet the basic qualifications for the positions in question and, if not, on how many occasions were the qualifications waived either as to age or education?

6. In the same period of time, how many persons left the employment of the Canadian Penitentiary Service prior to the normal retirement age?

Hon. James Hugh Faulkner (Secretary of State): I have been given the following information by the Public Service Commission. 1. There are no age limit qualifications for applicants for a position of Correctional Officer with the Canadian Penitentiary Service other than the legal minimum age stipulated in the Canada Labour (Standards) Code, which refers to provincial legislation, and the age of retirement as provided by the Public Service Superannuation Act. There are no minimum educational requirements for Correctional Officers in terms of diploma,s certificates or years of education. However, the Selection Standard requires that candidates have the "ability normally required to complete secondary school" which may be evidenced either by completion of Secondary School or by passing a test authorized by the Public Service Commission.

2. A new set of standards was determined in 1972, and the former level of qualifications was flexible insofar as education was concerned and an age limit was in fact 21 to 45 years of age (the top level being waived for veterans).

3. Two thousand fourteen applications were processed for positions as Correctional Officers in the fiscal year 1972-73.

4. Five hundred fifty-three appointments were made to the Service as Correctional Officers.

5. All appointees met the basic qualifications.

6. One hundred eighty-three Correctional Officers left the employment of the Canadian Penitentiary Service prior to the normal retirement age.

Order Paper Questions

NFB FILM "A PROPAGANDA MESSAGE"

Question No. 2,148—Mr. O'Sullivan:

1. Did the National Film Board produce a film "A Propaganda Message—Un Message de Propagande" Library No. 106C 0371-076?

2. Was this film commissioned by Information Canada?

3. What was the total cost of production?

4. How many prints of this film were made?

5. Is this film available for distribution across Canada through the National Film Board or Information Canada and, if not, for what reason?

6. Was this film ever placed on a restricted list by the National Film Board and, if so, for what reason?

7. Has this film ever been shown on any CBC television outlet station?

8. Has this film been distributed to film lending libraries outside of Canada and, if so, to what countries?

Hon. James Hugh Faulkner (Secretary of State): I am informed by the National Film Board as follows: 1. Yes.

2. Yes.

3. Total: $131,226.

4. 16mm prints in circulation in Canada, 32; 16mm prints in circulation outside Canada, 6; 35mm prints in circulation in Canada, 9.

5. Yes, the film is available to the Canadian public, free of charge, through the 27 film libraries in NFB offices across Canada.

6. The film was released in January 1972 for distribution in the commercial theaters in Canada through Columbia Pictures of Canada. As is customary in such circumstances, there was a six-month restriction on 16mm distribution in Canada. The film became available in Canada through NFB 16mm library network in July 1972.

7. According to the terms of NFB contract with Columbia Pictures for theatrical distribution, "Propaganda Message" will not be available for television distribution until January 1974.

8. "Propaganda Message" is also being distributed through the following Canadian diplomatic posts: One 16mm print, London, England; one 16mm print, Paris, France; one 16mm print, Chicago, Illinois, U.S.A.; one 16mm print, San Francisco, California, U.S.A.; one 16mm print, New York, N.Y., U.S.A.; one 16mm print, Washington, D.C., U.S.A. In addition, the Paris and New York offices of the National Film Board each have a 35mm print for promotion purposes.

CONSTRUCTION OF TWO HARBOUR TUGS

Question No. 2,185—Mr. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich):

Was a contract signed with Vito Steel Boat and Barge Construction of 9425 River Road, Delta, British Columbia, for the construction of two 45 foot harbour tugs to be used at CFB Esquimalt and originally to be built in West Coast shipyards for delivery August 31, 1973 and, if so (a) was the shipbuilding subcontracted to a boat builder elsewhere than in Brish Columbia and, if so, where (b) was there provision in the original contract permitting such subcontracting (c) for what reason was there no safeguard in the contract to ensure that the vessels would be built in West Coast shipyards (d) what is the new delivery date (e) how is delivery to be effected (f) what increase has there been in the original cost of $545,000 (g) what provision is made in the contract for delivery and the cost of delivery?

Order Paper Questions

Hon. Jean-Pierre Goyer (Minister of Supply and Services): A contract was issued to Vito Steel Boat and Barge Construction, 9425 River Road, Delta, B.C., to construct two 45 foot harbour tugs, to be delivered August 31, 1973, for use at CFB Esquimalt. (a) No, however, construction of the bare hulls was subcontracted to a company at Wheatley, Ontario. (b) Yes. (c) It is not normal departmental policy to place restrictions on a Canadian prime contractor since he is responsible for satisfactory completion of the contract. (d) No change in delivery date. (e) Delivery will be by the contractor, FOB Esquimalt, B.C. (f) None. (g) The contract provides for delivery to Canadian Forces Base, Esquimalt, B.C. and the cost is included in the contract price.

MULTICULTURAL PROGRAM NEWSPAPER SUPPLEMENT

Question No. 2,194—Mr. Nelson:

1. In how many ethnic newspapers was the four page supplement outlining the multicultural program inserted by the Minister responsible for Multiculturalism?

2. What was the total cost of inserting the aforementioned supplements?

Hon. James Hugh Faulkner (Secretary of State): 1. One hundred twenty-five.

2. $230,745.

STORAGE OF NATIONAL MUSEUMS ARTIFACTS

Question No. 2,207—Mr. Forrestall:

1. (a) In what areas of Canada (b) at what addresses are artifacts of historical significance being presently stored for the National Museums of Canada?

2. What programmes or funding levels are budgeted for the fiscal year ending March 31, 1974 to upgrade such facilities, in terms of climate control, restoration facilities and other factors essential to the proper preservation of artifacts kept for future generations of Canadians?

3. Will the government consider giving the highest priority to undertaking programmes to upgrade and maintain such storage areas to ensure that artifacts held for future generations of Canadians are protected fully against the ravages of time?

Mr. John M. Reid (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Privy Council): I am informed by the National Museums of Canada and the Department of Public Works as follows: The answer is based on the assumption that all artifacts of the National Museums of Canada are of historical significance: 1. (a) Ontario, Quebec and Manitoba; (b) Uplands Airport, Display Area; Canadian Forces Base Rockcliffe Hangers 66, 67 and 68, 1868 St. Laurent Blvd., Ottawa; Lorne Building, Elgin and Slater Streets, Ottawa; Ashton Press Building, Bells Corners, Ontario; 1523 Laperrière Ave., Ottawa, Ontario; Victoria memorial Museum Building, Metcalfe and McLeod Streets, Ottawa, Ontario; Canadian Forces Base Borden, Camp Borden, Ontario; Canadian Forces Base Shilo, Shilo, Manitoba; 25 COD 6585 Hochelage St., Montreal, P.Q. (school) 6060 Notre Dame, Montreal, P.Q. (depot); Canadian Government Printing Bureau Building, Sacred Heart Blvd., Hull, P.Q.; 7 Murray Street, Ottawa, Ontario; 1306 Wellington Street, Ottawa, Ontario; 330 Sussex Drive, Ottawa, Ontario; 350 Sussex Drive, Ottawa, Ontario; 2818 Bank Street, Ottawa, Ontario.

[Mr. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich).]

2. The following buildings, where artifacts are being stored, are budgeted for upgrading in the fiscal year ending March 31, 1974: Victoria Memorial Museum, $690,000; Phase II renovations; 330 Sussex Drive $11,000; air conditioning study.

3. Yes.

RECOMMENDATIONS OF PERFORMANCE ASSESSMENT COMMITTEES—ES GROUP

Question No. 2,216—Mr. Brewin:

With reference to the Agreement of July 1969 between the Treasury Board and the Professional Institute of the Public Service of Canada for employees in the economic, sociology and statistics group of federal employees where provision was made for movement to the first of the four remaining rates in the ES1 range and to the sixth rate in the ES2 range on the recommendation of a performance assessment committee and approval of the deputy head, has the deputy head withheld his approval to recommendations of performance assessment committees in any cases between the commencement of the Agreement in July 1969 up to March 31, 1973 and, if so, what are the names of the persons concerned and what reason, if any, did the deputy head give for his withholding of approval?

Hon. C. M. Drury (President of the Treasury Board): To the extent of available departmental records, there have been 33 instances in which a deputy head has withheld his approval of performance assessment committee recommendations to move an employee to the upper portions of the ES-1 and 2 salary ranges during the period July 1969 to March 1973.

Reasons for withholding approval were: (1) insufficient length and depth of experience; (2) performance considered not sufficiently outstanding to warrant further progression in the salary range at the time.

BROCHURE ENTITLED "WORKING WITH YOU BETWEEN JOBS"

Question No. 2,219—Mr. Alexander:

1. How many copies of "Working With You Between Jobs", issued by the Unemployment Insurance Commission, were printed?

2. What was the cost of (a) printing (b) the plates for the said printing?

3. How many copies of the printing were distributed?

4. What firm, or firms, by way of names and addresses were involved in the printing and distribution?

Mr. Mark MacGuigan (Parliament Secretary to Minister of Manpower and Immigration): 1. There is no UIC publication such as "Working with You Between Jobs". This title was a slogan used earlier this year for two brochures forming part of the information kit on the new approach and on the proposed decentralization of Offices of the Commission.

2. (a) and (b), $2,430.31.

3. Two thousand three hundred fifty (the total of the two brochures).

4. The printing was done by the Queen's Printer and the distribution by the Commission's staff.

R CLASS ICEBREAKERS

Question No. 2,232—Mr. Forrestall:

1. Has the government approved final construction of any of the R class icebreakers and, if so (a) on what date will contracts be announced (b) what is the level of funding presently authorized for such construction?

2. For how many such R class icebreakers has approval in principle been given?

Hon. Jean Marchand (Minister of Transport): 1. (a) November 1, 1973. (b) $17,500,000.

2. One.

REVENUE FROM AND PROBLEMS RELATED TO ALCOHOL

Question No. 2,237—Mr. Mather:

1. What was the total federal revenue from beer, wine and spirits in 1972?

2. What, in the same year, was the estimated cost in illness, motor vehicle fatalities, social problems and crime related to alcoholism?

3. What, in the same year, was the total federal expenditure on anti-alcoholism programs?

Mr. John M. Reid (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Privy Council): In so far as the Department of National Revenue, Customs and Excise, Statistics Canada, and the Department of National Health and Welfare are concerned, the answer is as follows: 1. Final revenue statistics are not yet available for the fiscal year 1972-73. The following are tentative figures for this period with respect to federal revenue collected by way of Excise Duty and Excise Tax on beer, wine and spirits. These figures do not include revenue from sales tax imposed by the Excise Tax Act as such funds are recorded in one account without any distinction as to sources. Fiscal year: 1972-73, beer, $166,-833,492.67; wine, $10,006,021.88; spirits, $249,312,084.19; total $426,151,598.74.

2. Statistics Canada does not collect data or make estimates on the cost of illness, nor on social problems or crime related to alcoholism. Statistics Canada does collect data on the number of motor vehicle fatalities where the ability of the driver had been impaired by alcohol, or where pedestrians who were hit and killed by motor vehicles had been drinking. However, data are not yet available for 1972.

3. Under the Hospital Insurance and Diagnostic Services and the Medicare Acts, a considerable amount of money is spent annually on the treatment of alcoholics. Because such detailed information is not recorded under these programs, even an approximation of such costs cannot be determined. Under the Canada Assistance Plan, the federal government shares with the provinces and municipalities in the cost of providing institutional care, mainly in the form of half-way houses, and counselling and social rehabilitation services to alcoholics. Again it is impossible to isolate such costs. Also, certain projects which deal in part but not entirely with problems relating to alcohol abuse have also received funding under the Non-Medical Use of Drugs program. Total expenditures for these projects have increased from $28,935 in 1971-72 (the first year of the Non-Medical Use of Drugs program) to $335,235 in 1972-73. In 1971-72, the Department spent the following specifically on anti-alcoholism programs: National Welfare Grants, $26,128; Sustaining Health Grant, $15,000; Medical Services, $34,205; National Health Grant, $43,618.

CANADA COUNCIL GRANTS TO MUSICAL COMPOSERS IN QUEBEC

Question No. 2,253—Mr. Lambert (Bellechasse):

Has Canada Council granted scholarships to musical composers from Quebec during the fiscal year 1972-73 and, if so (a) how many (b) for what amount (c) to how many persons in the constituency of Bellechasse?

Hon. James Hugh Faulkner (Secretary of State): I am informed by the Canada Council as follows: (a) Thirteen grants. (b) The total amount of these grants was $20,690. (c) None.

OFY—1973 PROJECTS IN NEWFOUNDLAND

Question No. 2,259—Mr. Marshall:

1. How many OFY projects were approved in Newfoundland in (a) 1972 (b) 1973?

2. What was the average cost per project for the approval process?

3. What will be the total cost of the OFY Program in 1973 for Newfoundland?

4. How many jobs were created by the OFY Program in 1973 in Newfoundland?

5. In 1973 how many (a) students (b) non-students have been hired by OFY projects in Newfoundland?

Hon. James Hugh Faulkner (Secretary of State): 1. (a) 145; (b) 256.

2. The Administrative expenses of Opportunities for Youth are not constructed in such a manner as to provide this type of information.

3. As of June 18, grants to 1973 OFY Program projects in Newfoundland amount to $1,470,694.

4. There are 1894 project participants in the 1973 OFY Program in Newfoundland.

5. In the 1973 OFY Program in Newfoundland, (a) 1753 Project participants are students, and (b) 141 project participants are non-students.

FEDERAL FUNDING—MISAWA HOMES OF CANADA LIMITED

Question No. 2,266—Mr. Jelinek:

What government agencies, if any, are involved with Misawa Homes of Canada Limited and has there ever been at any time any federal funding of this Company?

Mr. John M. Reid (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Privy Council): In so far as the Department of External Affairs is concerned, the department is presently seeking authority for payment of a $37,500 contribution to match identical contributions by the government of the province of Manitoba and the Misawa Homes Company Limited of Japan for the construction by Misawa Homes of Canada Limited of 10 prefabricated housing units to assist in the resettlement of victims of the Westman Islands disaster. In so far as the Department of Manpower and Immigration is concerned, a Training-in-Industry agreement was signed on July 25, 1972 at an estimated Canada cost of $31,595.40 for the training of 42 workers. In so far as the Department of Regional Economic Expansion is concerned, an offer of incentive assistance in the amount of $282,377 was accepted on April 28, 1972 by Misawa Homes of Canada Limited for a facility at Gimli, Manitoba; a payment in the amount of $203,078 was made on April 18, 1973.

POST OFFICES IN CHARLEVOIX CONSTITUENCY

Question No. 2,301—Mr. Caouette (Charlevoix):

1. Which post offices in the constituency of Charlevoix serve more than 1,000 persons?

2. During the past three years, who tendered for maintenance contracts in each such post office?

3. Who obtained the contract and at what price?

Mr. John M. Reid (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Privy Council): I am informed by the Post Office Department and the Department of Public Works as follows: 1. We do not have a listing as to the number of persons. We have householder lists which give the following figures: Forestville, 1,052; La Malbaie, 1,035.

2. Forestville, P.Q. (Maintenance work). Tenders were opened on February 17, 1970. Three tenders were received: 1. Charles Roy, Forestville, P.Q; 2. Gilles Lessard, Forestville, P.Q.; 3. Paul E. Lavoie, Forestville, P.Q. La Malbaie, P.Q. (Maintenance work). There were no tenders called for maintenance work at this location as the service is provided by the caretaker.

3. Forestville, P.Q. The contract was awarded to the lowest bidder, Charles Roy, on February 23, 1970, in the amount of $239.50 per month.

POST OFFICE, TOLEDO, ONTARIO

Question No. 2,308—Mr. Cossitt:

1. Was the Post Office in Toledo, Ontario moved on or about March 19, 1973 and, if so, to where and for what reason?

2. Was the Post Office in Toledo, Ontario again moved on or about June 17, 1973 to the Shell Service Station in Toledo, Ontario and, if so, for what reason?

3. What permanent plans does the Post Office Department have for the location of the Post Office in Toledo, Ontario?

4. Is the position of Postmaster vacant in Toledo, Ontario or is it about to become vacant and, if so, does the Department intend to invite applications by public advertisement for this position?

Hon. André Ouellet (Postmaster General): 1. The Toledo, Ontario Post Office was moved on 19 March 1973 from the Shell Service Station to the Postmaster's residence due to the bankruptcy of the business.

2. On June 15, the Postmaster moved the office back to the Service Station as she managed to rent the original postal space from the new management of the station.

3. Postal premises for such post offices as Toledo must be provided solely by the Postmaster. There are no plans to relocate the office since the premises now are suitable.

4. The position of Postmaster at this office is not vacant at the present time.

TRIP OF MINISTER OF FINANCE TO REGINA, JUNE, 1973

Question No. 2,315—Mr. Cossitt:

1. Was the Minister of Finance in Regina on June 13, 1973 and, if so, was such trip paid for by public funds?

2. What was the total cost to the government of such trip by the Minister including any public expenditures for persons accompanying him?

3. Did the purpose of this trip include making an address to the Saskatchewan Liberal Association?

Hon. John N. Turner (Minister of Finance): 1. (a) Yes. (b) No.

2. Nil. The minister's expenses were paid by the Liberal Party of Saskatchewan.

3. Yes.

LIP—NUMBER OF JOBS PROVIDED

Question No. 2,317—Mr. Alexander:

1. (a) What method is used to calculate the number of jobs provided under the Local Initiatives Program with an example of the calculation for the years 1971-72 and 1972-73 (b) how many jobs were provided in those periods as well as in 1973 to date?

2. (a) What method is used to calculate the number of persons employed under the Local Initiatives Program for the years 1971-72 and 1972-73 with an example of the calculation (b) how many persons were employed in those periods as well as in 1973 to date?

Hon. Robert K. Andras (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): 1. (a) The method used to calculate the number of jobs provided under the Local Initiatives Program for 1971-72 and 1972-73 was identical. For each project the highest number of jobs for any one month recorded in the contract between the Department of Manpower and Immigration and the sponsor of the project was considered to have been created for that project. e.g. if the contract stated that the jobs created would be as follows: No. of Jobs, January, fifteen; February, sixteen; March, eighteen; April, fifteen; May, fourteen. Eighteen was taken as the number of jobs created for the project. The sum of these figures provides the number of jobs created under the Local Initiatives Program for 1971-72 and 1972-73; (b) Jobs created under the 1971-72 program, 92,321; Jobs created under the 1972-73 program, 85,811 to August 2, 1973.

2. (a) and (b) Information concerning the number of persons actually employed under the Local Initiatives Program 1971-72 and 1972-73 is not available. Sponsors were only required to report the number of manweeks of word carried out under the project and no information was sought on the number of people actually employed.

MARITIME COMMAND—SEABED DETECTION DEVICES

Question No. 2,332—Mr. Forrestall:

1. What plans does the Department of National Defence have for permanent seabed, active and passive, detection devices?

2. What is the nature of existing capability with regard to permanent seabed detective devices?

Hon. James Richardson (Minister of National Defence): 1 and 2. It is not considered to be in the national interest to disclose Canadian plans or capability in respect of seabed detection systems.

UPGRADING OF ICEBREAKERS

Question No. 2,337—Mr. Forrestall:

1. In what specific modifications is the government considering to upgrade 3 heavy and 5 medium icebreakers over the next five years as indicated in answer to Question No. 1,900?

2. To what degree will the vessels be available to Maritime Command for the purpose of a military presence in the Canadian Arctic?

Hon. Jean Marchand (Minister of Transport): 1. CCGS LABRADOR—Increased power and modifications in the engine room and accommodation. CCGS JOHN A. MacDONALD—Increased power and bow modification. CCGS NORMAN McLEOD ROGERS—Hull strengthening. As to the medium icebreakers we are considering modifications to the bows. Studies are under way to see to what extent their power should be increased.

2. Canadian Coast Guard ships would not normally be available to Maritime Command. The Coast Guard and Canadian Forces already co-operate closely in the north. Every year, Canadian Forces officers travel aboard Coast Guard ships in the north. This season, CCGS SIR WILLIAM ALEXANDER will be dedicated entirely to a DND mission. This co-operation will be strengthened as required subject to Coast Guard commitments.

ARCTIC ICEBREAKER CAPABILITY

Question No. 2,338—Mr. Forrestall:

1. Does Canada believe that it has at present an absolute (a) technological (b) practical lead in Arctic icebreaker capability?

2. Does the government believe that this lead can be sustained without active building programmes and prototype construction?

Hon. Jean Marchand (Minister of Transport): 1. (a) The Coast Guard has established an icebreaker development group, part of whose duties is to keep the Coast Guard abreast of the latest technological developments throughout the world; (b) In terms of the Canadian Arctic, the Coast Guard has more expertise in building and operating ships than any other nation.

2. Yes.

REPLACEMENT OF CANADIAN COAST GUARD "DETECTOR"

Question No. 2,340—Mr. Forrestall:

1. (a) On what date will the survey and sounding vessel Canadian Coast Guard Detector, now 58 years old; be replaced (b) with what will it be replaced?

2. Will consideration be given to having this vessel preserved for historical purposes?

Hon. Jean Marchand (Minister of Transport): 1. (a) CCGS DETECTOR is still a reliable and active vessel with a number of years of service left in her. There is, therefore, no requirement for an immediate replacement; (b) Not applicable.

2. If sufficient interest and funds are available, this will be considered at the end of her service life.

REPLACEMENT OF CCGS "ERNEST LAPOINTE"

Question No. 2,341—Mr. Forrestall:

1. On what date will the light icebreaker, survey and sounding vessel Canadian Coast Guard ERNEST LAPOINTE, now 43 years old, be replaced and with what will it be replaced?

2. Will such replacement vessel have ice capability and (a) if so, of what nautre, (b) if not, for what reason?

Hon. Jean Marchand (Minister of Transport): 1. CCGS ERNEST LAPOINTE has still many years of active service left and there are no plans to replace her at present.

2. Not applicable.

REPLACEMENT OF "CCGS N.B. McLEAN"

Question No. 2,342—Mr. Forrestall:

1. On what date will Canadian Coast Guard vessel N.B. McLEAN, now 43 years old, be replaced and with what will it be replaced?

2. Will such vessel have ice capability and (a) if so, of what nature (b) if not, for what reason?

Hon. Jean Marchand (Minister of Transport): 1. CCGS N.B. McLEAN has been reboilered this year and there are no plans to replace her at present.

2. Not applicable.

CONSTRUCTION COST OF CNR TO DATE

Question No. 2,344—Mr. Allard:

What is the total construction cost of CNR to date?

Hon. Jean Marchand (Minister of Transport): The management of the Canadian National Railways advises as follows: In the absence of a precise definition of "total construction cost" it is assumed that the question refers to the Total Property Investment in Road, Equipment and Other Physical Properties as at December 31, 1972. These figures are shown in the Consolidated Balance Sheet on pages 38 and 52 of Canadian National Railways Annual Report for 1972 and on pages 43 and 57 in the Property Investment Statement. Reference should also be made to Note 1: Property Investment on pages 40 and 54 of the report in connection with the bases for accounting for properties and equipment.

POWER CORPORATION OF CANADA, LIMITED

Question No. 2,347—Mr. Gauthier (Roberval):

1. To the knowledge of the government (a) who is the president of the Power Corporation Company (b) who are the directors (c) what are the names of its subsidiaries (d) what is the value of its commercial operations?

2. Is it a Canadian-controlled corporation and, if so, in what percentage?

Hon. Herb Gray (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs): 1. As reported in the Annual Summary for the period ending March 31, 1973 filed with the Corporations Branch: (a) Mr. Jean Parisien is president of Power Corporation of Canada, Limited. (b) The directors of Power Corporation of Canada, Limited are: Mr. Wilbrod Bherer, Mr. A. E. Campeau, Mr. Peter D. Curry, Mr. Louis Desmarais, Mr. Jean-Paul Gignac, Mr. W. Earle McLaughlin, Mr. A. D. Nesbitt, Mr. Paul Desmarais, Mr. Paul Britton Paine, Mr. Jean Parisien, Mr. Claude Pratte, Hon. J. P. Robarts, P.C., Q.C., Mr. R. C. Scrivener, Mr. J. M. Seabrook, Mr. P. N. Thomson, Mr. W. I. M. Turner. (c) Subsidiaries are: Canada Steamship Lines, Limited; Dominion Glass Company Limited; Laurentide Financial Corporation Ltd.; The Imperial Life Assurance Company of Canada; The Investors Group. (d) Total assets for 1972, $422,690,000.

2. 1970 and 1971 CALURA returns indicate that the majority of shares issued, in all classes of shares, were issued in Canada. However, the department does not have information as to nationality of ownership of shares.

SALE OF LAND ON NORTH SHORE OF VANCOUVER WATERFRONT

Question No. 2,359—Mr. Reynolds:

1. Did the National Harbours Board sell a 50-acre site on the North Shore of Vancouver Waterfront, presently owned by the Fullerton Lumber Company, in 1971 and, if so, how much did the Company pay the National Harbours Board for this property?

2. Has the government purchased this site or does it have it under option, and, if so, how much has the government paid for this site or how much does it intend to pay?

3. Is the Fullerton Lumber Company substantially controlled by foreign interest and, if so, who are the principals?

Hon. Jean Marchand (Minister of Transport): The National Harbours Board advises as follows: 1. The Fullerton Lumber Company received Letters Patent in September 1971 covering 49.08 acres fronting Block 23 DL 265 North Vancouver. Authority to issue Letters Patent originated from a Department of Marine and Fisheries' lease dated 1908. The said lease contained the provision that the Crown would Quit Claim to the lessees (originally J. P. Fell and H. Heywood-Lonsdale) any portion of the lease-hold reclaimed by the lessees under authority of NWPA. By virtue of the old Marine and Fisheries' lease, the lessee was able to purchase the property for $1. We are advised that the Fullerton Lumber Company spent something in the neighbourhood of $1,500,000 for fill material. Further, the lessee has paid lease rental to the appropriate government agency, i.e. Department of Marine and Fisheries, Vancouver Harbour Commissioners and National Harbours Board since 1908 at rates that have been current in the community throughout the years.

2. No.

3. The Fullerton Lumber Company has title to the property and the Company's principals are: James Fullerton, James Fullerton III, Robert Morely and Robert J. Simmonsen. The Registrar of Companies has the same address for all four of these men viz 1200 Roan Oake Building, Minneapolis, Minnesota, U.S.A.

UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE COMMISSION—OTTAWA DISTRICT OFFICE

Question No. 2,367—Mr. Cossitt:

1. Has there been a general breakdown in efficiency in dealing with unemployment insurance claimants by the UIC Office in Ottawa and, if so, what immediate steps does the government plan to take to improve this situation?

2. Who is the Manager of the UIC Claims Office in Ottawa and what was the date of his appointment?

3. Will steps be taken to immediately improve service to Members of Parliament and their staffs when they make inquiries to this Office concerning problems with constituents' claims?

4. Is the government taking immediate action to improve the public relations image of this Office and, if so, what is being done?

Mr. Mark MacGuigan (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Manpower and Immigration): 1. There has not been a general breakdown in the efficiency of the Ottawa Office of the Unemployment Insurance Commission. An analysis of the performance of the office in the last few months shows that service to the public has been improving, in that claimants are being dealt with more quickly and inquiries concerning difficult cases have been reducing.

2. The manager is Mr. Laurent Ledoux who was appointed April 2, 1973.

3. The Office has made constant efforts to provide effective service to the nine Members of Parliament in the area served by the office. The Ottawa District Office has staff specially trained to handle inquiries efficiently and as quickly as possible. The results indicate that this service serves a very useful purpose. In addition, the plans with respect to the decentralization of its services that the Commission is now putting into effect include opening a number of other offices in the area, which will further improve the service to the public.

4. It is not the policy, in so far as the UIC is concerned, to run a campaign, at a local level, to improve the public relations image of any district or regional office. Locally it is more a question of service than of advertising. The image campaign is usually done, for the federal government departments, corporations or agencies, on a national level, through mass medias, brochures, information sheets, etc, and it applies, in general, to every local offices across the country.

EXPANSION OF ROBERTS BANK SUPER PORT

Question No. 2,380—Mr. Reynolds:

1. Is there a detailed plan for the expansion of Roberts Bank super Port and, if so, what is it?

2. Have tenders been called for any dredging for the Roberts Bank super Port?

3. Has an environmental study been done or is one being planned before any of this work is continued?

4. Are there any plans to meet with the Municipality of Delta to consider road access to any expansion of the Port, availability of water and services from the municipality to the super Port?

Hon. Jean Marchand (Minister of Transport): The National Harbours Board advises as follows: 1. No detailed plan has been prepared to date; there is a preliminary sketch of a proposed expansion.

2. No.

3. An environmental study is currently under way and will be completed prior to any submission being prepared for Treasury Board approval in principle.

4. Yes, in due course as present planning matures.

DEPARTMENT OF LABOUR PERSONNEL

Question No. 2,382—Mr. Reynolds:

For what reason did staff, earning $20,000 or more a year, of the Department of Labour increase from nil in 1963 to 49 in 1973, as stated in answer to Question No. 1,091 on March 26, 1973?

Mr. John M. Reid (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Privy Council): There have been several factors leading to the increase in the number of staff in the Public Service earning $20,000 or more a year. Increases in salaries and total growth of the Public Service have been two important factors. For example, a salary of $20,000 in the Public Service in 1973 is roughly equivalent to a salary of only $11,500 in 1963, allowing for the various wage increases during the intervening period. This rate of increase was generally comparable to the national trend. In 1963 the Public Service included approximately 154,000 continuing full-time employees. Of this number, about 2,330, or 1.5 per cent, earned $11,500 or more a year. At the present time, the Public Service includes approximately 209,000 continuing full-time employees with about 6,230, or 3 per cent, earning in excess of $20,000. The doubling in the percentage of staff earning this level of salary can be explained by the vastly increased complexity of the responsibilities of government during the past decade. The federal spending program has grown from $7.2 billion in 1964-65 to $18.4 billion in the current year. This has necessitated both an increase in management personnel and an expansion in the types of research, planning and advisory staff of the type that receive salaries in this range throughout the Canadian economy.

ONTARIO REGIONAL OFFICE HEADQUARTERS

Question No. 2,404—Mr. Atkey:

1. For what reason is the Department of Manpower and Immigration Regional Office in Toronto planning to move into the Canada Square Building at the corner of Eglinton Avenue at Yonge Street, when the Regional Office recommended against such a move, favouring instead the Olympic and York Tower at King Street and York Street offering equivalent accommodations and facilities at a lower price?

2. Will the above offices in the Canada Square Building be serviced by the WATS line telephone system and, if so, what is the additional cost of this system above and beyond ordinary telephone equipment and service in view of the fact that Bell Canada does not normally provide this service north of St. Clair Avenue?

Mr. Mark MacGuigan (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Manpower and Immigration): 1. Although initially the Department of Manpower and Immigration and Immigration Ontario Regional Office indicated a preference for the York Centre Building, on the basis of final cost figures provided for both the Canada Square Building and the York Centre Building, the Ontario Regional Office recommended the leasing of office accommodation in the Canada Square Building.

2. Yes; there will be no additional cost for the WATS line telephone service as Bell Canada normally provides this service north of St. Clair Avenue.

SUMMER REGISTRATION OF STUDENTS AT 100 YOUVILLE PLACE, QUEBEC CITY

Question No. 2,417—Mr. Godin:

1. During the summer, how many students registered at the placement office established especially for them at 100 Youville Place, Quebec City?

2. How many were offered jobs and what are their names and addresses?

Mr. Mark MacGuigan (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Manpower and Immigration): 1. As of 10 July, 1973, there were 8,611 students registered at the placement office established especially for them at 100 Youville Place, Quebec City. Complete statistics will not be available until September.

2. As of 10 July, 1973, 2,700 of these students were referred to jobs of which 1,044 were placed in employment. Again, complete statistics will not be available until September. It is not the policy of the Department to publish the names and addresses of job applicants.

COLLISION BETWEEN "GREENPEACE III" AND FRENCH NAVAL VESSEL "LA PAIMPOLAISE"

Question No. 2,424—Mr. Wagner:

Has the Department of External Affairs requested from the French Government damages due the Greenpeace III as a result of the ramming attack of the French during the last Mururoa nuclear test and (a) if so, on what date (b) if not, for what reason?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Secretary of State for External Affairs): As a result of the collision of his ketch the Greenpeace III with the French naval vessel, "La Paimpolaise", Mr. McTaggart the owner, through his legal counsel, with whom the Department of External Affairs has been in close touch, requested the French government to pay compensation. Earlier this year, the French government denied any liability for the collision and declined to pay compensation to Mr. McTaggart.

The Department of External Affairs, has, on several occasions, before and after that denial, made representations to the French authorities in respect of Mr. McTaggart's claim and is continuing to use its good offices with the French authorities with a view to having the French government reconsider their position so that a settlement of the matter can be reached in a manner satisfactory to both parties. The latest Canadian demarche was incorporated in a note of June 8, 1973 delivered to the French Foreign Ministry by our Embassy in Paris.

International law normally requires that local remedies must first be exhausted before a state can consider espousing the claim of one of its citizens against a foreign state. Therefore, in addition to representations respecting Mr. McTaggart's claim for compensation, the Canadian Embassy in Paris was instructed to seek advice in France as to what legal remedies might be available to Mr. McTaggart there. The Embassy's lawyers expect to complete their study of this matter shortly.

MOUNT HOPE AIRPORT

Question No. 2,444—Mr. O'Sullivan:

1. Has the government conducted any study of the possible effects of air and noise pollution from the proposed expansion of facilities and use at Mount Hope Airport?

2. Has any such study been requested by the Department of Transport?

3. Has the government received any representations concerning the possible medical implications of the proposed expansion and, if so, from whom?

Hon. Jean Marchand (Minister of Transport): 1. The Ministry of Transport has conducted extensive studies in terms of noise contours at Mount Hope Airport. MOT has not yet studied possible air pollution. See answer (2) below.

2. Terms of reference for studies on possible air pollution are now nearing completion, and such studies will shortly be undertaken by an agency other than MOT.

3. Yes. The brief of the Hamilton Academy of Medicine which was sent to Hamilton City Council was made available to Ministry officials in Toronto and Ottawa on June 14th. The Minister was further verbally briefed by Dr. Pengelly on behalf of the Academy at a meeting on July 5th.

INCREASE IN TRAFFIC ON NORTH SYDNEY TO PORT-AUX-BASQUES FERRY SERVICE

Has there been an increase in ferry service by, (a) 12.6 per cent in passengers; (b) 13.0 per cent in automobiles; (c) 62.6 per cent in trucks; between Port-aux-Basques and North Sydney and, if so, what action is being taken to cope with the steady increase beyond the one additional ship being built?

Hon. Jean Marchand (Minister of Transport): The traffic increases given are correct average increases for the 1972 year, except that the increase in trucks was 28 per cent rather than 62.6 per cent. To cope with these increases, an additional passenger vessel has been chartered for the period 1973-1977. Addition of this vessel and some operational adjustments in the service will increase the passenger/automobile movement capacity by 30 per cent for the summer peak season of 1973. The vessel under charter is also able to carry trucks. Design studies are underway for new ferries to carry passengers and highway vehicles to meet the demands of the future. The requirements of the Gulf service are under constant review and depending on the development of traffic movements, additional vessels may be chartered pending completion of expansion of the Canadian-built fleet. Chartered vessels will continue to be manned by Canadian crews.

HARBOUR FACILITIES—CORNER BROOK, NEWFOUNDLAND

Question No. 2,458—Mr. Marshall:

Has the Minister of Transport received a brief from users of pier and storage facilities at Corner Brook, Newfoundland, indicating that facilities had proved insufficient for 1972 volume of traffic and, if so, is it the intention of the Department to provide an additional 21,000 square feet outside storage space?

Hon. Jean Marchand (Minister of Transport): Yes and studies now are in process to determine the future marine terminal requirements for the Western part of the Province including Corner Brook.

STEPS TAKEN TO INITIATE STUDY INTO HARBOUR FACILITIES AT CORNER BROOK, NEWFOUNDLAND

Question No. 2,459—Mr. Marshall:

Has the Department of Transport taken steps to initiate a study into the long-term needs of Corner Brook's harbour facilities and (a) if so (i) by whom is this study being carried out (ii) on what date is the study expected to be completed (iii) what are its terms of reference (b) if not, for what reason?

Hon. Jean Marchand (Minister of Transport): No. The Ministry of Transport is engaged in a Newfoundland Transportation study of harbours including Corner Brook. This study is expected to be completed in the fall of 1973.

REAL ESTATE DATA BANK, ALBERTA

Question No. 2,462—Mr. Hollands:

1. How many persons from (a) the Department of National Revenue (b) other departments are engaged in the land assessment program in Alberta?

2. What portion (counties and municipalities) of the Province of Alberta has been assessed to date?

3. Is the information gained in the assessment program being stored in a Land Data Bank?

4. What is the Land Data Bank and for what purpose is it being established?

5. Will the information gained by the land assessors be used by the Department of National Revenue for capital gains tax assessment?

6. What formula is being used by the assessors to ensure that fair value is arrived at in assessing individual properties?

7. Is the information being gained by the assessors going to be available to property owners or the general public upon request?

8. Has an appeal procedure been established whereby property owners may contest the government's assessments?

Hon. Robert Stanbury (Minister of National Revenue): It is presumed that this question relates to the Real Estate Data Bank project of the Department of National Revenue, Taxation, in which information is being assembled about properties which were sold in the years 1971 and 1972. 1. (a) The Department has 12 real estate appraisers in Alberta. It is estimated that they are presently spending 75 per cent of their time on the Data Bank project and 25 per cent of their time on appraisal assignments for the department; (b) The Veterans Land Act administration of the Department of Veterans Affairs is assisting the department in the Data Bank project. They have employed 6 university students for the summer months who are working under the direction of their field officers. The Veterans Land administration have 18 field officers in Alberta and it is estimated that they are spending 20 per cent of their time on the Data Bank project.

2. The Data Bank project does not involve assessments or appraisals of properties. It is a sales survey which is being carried out in all parts of Alberta and the rest of Canada. Approximately 75 per cent of the program has been completed and it is expected that the remainder will be completed by December 31, 1973.

3. The information being gathered will be computer-stored in order that it may be readily accessible for future reference.

4. The Real Estate Data Bank is a survey of sales which took place in the period around Valuation Day. It is being established to provide factual information about these sales and will be used as a future source of information for the public and the department to assist in determining the Valuation Day values of properties.

5. The information will be used by the department to assist in assessing the reasonableness of Valuation Day values reported by taxpayers when disposing of their properties.

6. As indicated above, individual properties are not being assessed in the Data Bank project. The department has no formula for use in determining values of individual properties.

7. To the extent that it is not confidential, when the information is gathered and assembled it will be made available on request to the property owners and the general public.

8. Where a taxpayer, upon disposing of a property, reports a Valuation Day value for that property with which, upon examination, the Department is unable to agree, the usual appeal procedure provided by the Income Tax Act will be available to the taxpayer once his income tax return has been assessed.

LOCAL EMPLOYMENT ASSISTANCE PROGRAM

Question No. 2,463—Mr. Marshall:

1. (a) On what date did planning for the Local Employment Assistance Program (LEAP) first commence (b) on what date were funds first allocated to the Program (c) when was the first project funded under LEAP and what was the nature of the project (d) what was the total amount of funds granted to it (e) where is it located (f) how many people are employed by the project (g) on what date was LEAP officially announced?

2. (a) What is the total amount of funds committed to LEAP for the fiscal year 1973-74 and of this amount, what portion has been allocated to Newfoundland (b) what criteria were used to determine the allocation of funds?

3. What is the total number of (a) jobs (b) projects expected to be created by LEAP in (i) the Maritimes (ii) Newfoundland by the end of the fiscal year 1973-74?

4. (a) Is the primary emphasis of LEAP to fund commercial enterprises and, if so, what criteria are being used to determine whether or not a project is viable (b) what criteria are being used to determine whether or not an enterprise will duplicate already existing services in an area?

[Mr. Stanbury.]

Hon. Robert K. Andras (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): 1. (a) March 1970; (b) August 28, 1972; (c) January 26, 1973. The project was designed to provide employment opportunities to six disabled persons in sorting, cleaning and repairing for resale, used clothing and furniture; (d) $10,080; (e) St. John's, Newfoundland; (f) six; (g) No formal announcement has been made of the existence of this program although provincial ministers of welfare were informed of it in a joint letter from the Ministers of Manpower and Immigration and National Health and Welfare on January 11, 1973. This letter was tabled in the House on March 19, 1973 by the Minister of Manpower and Immigration.

2. (a) $9,500,000 and $340,500; (b) allocations were made initially on the basis of unemployment rates within provinces.

3. (a), (b) (i) and (ii) As proposals for the development of LEAP projects may originate from non-profit organizations, community or citizen groups, voluntary agencies or individuals, it is not possible to state definitively how many projects or jobs will be created. As of July 6, 1973, six projects have been approved for conduct in the Maritime provinces creating 59 jobs. Three of these projects were in Newfoundland and they will employ 22 persons.

4. (a) No. The primary purpose of LEAP is to create worthwhile employment opportunities for people who would probably remain unemployed despite normal labour market activity; (b) Provincial officials serve on regional review boards to ensure that complementarity of program objectives is achieved and, additionally, intergovernmental and interdepartmental consultation takes place where the possibility of duplication of services exists.

DEPARTMENT OF SUPPLY AND SERVICES—PICKUP AND DELIVERY SERVICES

Question No. 2,465—Mr. Hales:

JOB INFORMATION CENTRES

Question No. 2,475—Mr. Marshall:

What are the names of the 14 selected cities where Job Information Centres will be opening?

Hon. Robert K. Andras (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): The initial 14 cities where Job Information Centres are to be opened were selected in May 1973 for the following locations: Kelowna, Surrey, Williams Lake, Red Deer, Saskatoon, Brandon, Windsor, St. Thomas, Cornwall, Ottawa, Rimouski, St. Hyacinthe, Saint John and St. John's. Since then a number of Job Information Centres have been opened at these locations and additional cities have been selected.

UIC—NOTIFICATION OF OVERPAYMENTS

In its initial notification of an overpayment to a claimant does the Unemployment Insurance Commission (a) inform the claimant of the method of repayment which will be utilized (b) indicate the existence of the "agreed upon deduction" form (c) invite the claimant to contact the Unemployment Insurance Commission office in order that the method of repayment may be discussed?

Mr. Mark MacGuigan (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Manpower and Immigration): (a) Overpayments are sometimes discovered while claimants are receiving benefit and on other occasions when the claim has become inactive. In the first instance a notice is sent to the active claimant advising him of the overpayment. Repayment is then effected by withholding the necessary amount from the benefit that would otherwise be payable for as long as required to complete the repayment. In these instances, if the claimant wishes and so advises the Commission, he may make arrangements to have a portion only of the benefit due on each cheque retained for repayment purposes, thereby allowing him to receive some benefit during the repayment period. In the second case (inactive claim) a series of three letters are used to inform the claimant that he should work out mutually agreeable arrangements with the Commission for the repayment of the money. The second and third letters are used in the event that the claimant does not reply to the previous one. (b) The letters that both active and non-active claimants receive with respect to an overpayment both indicate that he should contact the Commission to work out suitable repayment arrangements. In the case of active claimants the computer system is being modified slightly in mid-August to remove the possibility that now occasionally occurs whereby full deductions from the benefit of an active claimant may occur before he has contacted the office in order to make arrangements for partial amounts from the benefit otherwise due him. (c) When a claimant whose claim is inactive is notified by letter that he has been overpaid, it is pointed out that he should contact the nearest office of the Commission to work out an acceptable method of repayment and this is done on the basis that it will not cause him undue financial hardship.

HONG KONG VETERANS

Question No. 2,478—Mr. Cossitt:

1. According to records of the Department of Vererans Affairs, how many Canadian Army veterans who served at Hong Kong were living at the end of World War II?

2. How many such veterans died between the end of World War II and this date?

3. Is the percentage death rate for Hong Kong veterans higher since World War II than the percentage death rate for those who served in the Canadian Army elsewhere and what are these percentages, based on the latest figures available?

Hon. Daniel J. MacDonald (Minister of Veterans Affairs): 1. One thousand four hundred five.

2. Approximately 254.

3. The number of persons who served in the Canadian Army elsewhere than in Hong Kong and who have died since World War II is not known.

DISABILITY PENSIONS TO HONG KONG VETERANS

Question No. 2,479—Mr. Cossitt:

1. Will the government take immediate steps to increase to 100 per cent the disability pensions being paid to veterans of the Canadian Army who served at Hong Kong and who became prisoners of war and (a) if so, on what date will these steps be taken (b) if not, for what reason will these steps not be taken?

2. Has the government given any recent consideration to increasing pensions for such veterans who have been forced to retire from their occupations prior to normal retirement date as a result of health conditions created by war-time imprisonment?

Hon. Daniel J. MacDonald (Minister of Veterans Affairs): 1. It is not planned to increase to 100 per cent the disability pensions paid to veterans of the Canadian Army who served in Hong Kong and who became prisoners of war of the Japanese. It is just over two years since the Pension Act was amended to provide that former prisoners of war of the Japanese would be paid a minimum pension equal to that for a disability assessed at 50 per cent if there was any assessable disability whatever. This measure not only quarantees a minimum 50 per cent pension to the veteran during his lifetime but ensures an award to his widow and dependent children at his death. In the event that the disability is greater than 50 per cent, pension is paid at the higher rate. This legislative change was in keeping with the request made by the Veterans' Organizations at that time.

2. There are no plans to increase pension for veterans who have been forced to retire from their occupations prior to normal retirement date as a result of health conditions created by wartime imprisonment. Disability pensions under the Pension Act are paid as a right based on the degree of disability present from time to time. The individual's financial condition, station in life, or employment situation have no bearing on the decision. The worsening of a condition may result in increased assessment and higher pension.

IMMIGRATION OFFICE, SEATTLE, WASHINGTON

Question No. 2,487—Mr. Reynolds:

1. How many full-time employees are there at the Immigration Office in Seattle, Washington?

[Mr. MacGuigan.]

ESCAPE OF J. E. McCANN FROM BRITISH COLUMBIA PENITENTIARY

Question No. 2,493—Mr. Reynolds:

1. Did the Director of Security and all Squad Leaders who were on duty May 17, 1973 hold a meeting with the Director of the British Columbia penitentiary and, if so (a) was the Director advised that inmate No. 3384 J. E. McCann was organizing an escape from the institution (b) did this group recommend that the inmate be placed in SCU?

2. Was any action taken on this recommendation and, if not, for what reason?

3. Was Security Officer Smith subjected to disciplinary action because of the inmate's escape and, if so, for what reason?

Hon. Warren Allmand (Solicitor General): 1. Yes; (a) no; (b) no.

2. Not applicable.

3. Yes. Officer Smith was found negligent in the performance of his duty. He signalled the yard clear when in fact inmate McCann was still in the yard. This signal had the effect of reducing perimeter security, thus facilitating the inmate's escape.

CBC ADVERTISING EXPENDITURES, 1971 AND 1972

Question No. 2,498—Mr. McKenzie:

1. How much money was spent by the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation on advertising during the years 1971 and 1972?

2. Of this amount, how much was spent advertising (a) English-language radio programs (b) English-language television programs (c) French-language radio programs (d) French-language television programs?

3. (a) Through what media did CBC advertise its programs during the years 1971 and 1972 (b) what percentage of the advertising budget was spent on each of these?

Hon. James Hugh Faulkner (Secretary of State): I am informed by the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation as follows: 1. The CBC uses its own broadcasting facilities to a great extent to promote its programs, and much of the Corporation's advertising in publications requires no cash expenditure since ads are frequently placed on a contra-account basis whereby comparable value in broadcast time is exchanged for space in the publication. Thus, expenditures on advertising have been kept to a minimum as follows: $203,966 for the fiscal year 1971-72, and $309,842 for 1972-73.

2. (a) $56,869 in 1971-72; $74,427 in 1972-73; (b) $74,256 in 1971-72; $158,191 in 1972-73; (c) $14,995 in 1971-72; $3,165 in 1972-73; (d) $57,846 in 1971-72; $74,059 in 1972-73.

3. (a) and (b) The CBC advertised its programs in newspapers and magazines. The approximate percentage breakdown of the total expenditures given in part 1 above was about the same for both years, roughly 90 per cent spent on newspaper advertising and the balance on magazine advertising.

7. (a) No; Mr. Lake left Eldorado's employ June 30, 1968. (b) No; Mr. Burton left Eldorado's employ November 30, 1964. It is understood that they did not leave the employ of Eldorado, directly, to take up offices with Echo Bay Mines but did so after some months had elapsed.

*SURVEY OF DEMANDS FOR UNIVERSITY GRADUATES

Question No. 2,512—Mr. Fairweather:

1. Will the Minister of Manpower and Immigration publish the results of the recently published annual survey of demands for university graduates?

2. Does the survey indicate that the demand for post graduate students is down substantially from 1972?

3. What is the percentage of decline in demands for post graduate students in each of the years 1970, 1971 and 1972?

Mr. John M. Reid (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Privy Council): The answer to part 1 is yes.

The answer to part 2 is yes, employers' anticipated requirements for post graduate students declined substantially between 1972 and 1973. It should be noted, however, that under estimation of requirements is a frequent occurrence.

The answer to part 3 is that the percentage changes in anticipated requirements for post graduate students on the part of reporting employers were as follows: 1969-70, minus 19.2 per cent; 1970-71, plus 31.4 per cent; 1971-72, minus 13.9 per cent.

YOUTH HOSTELS IN NATIONAL PARKS

Question No. 2,519—Mr. Clark (Rocky Mountain):

1. Is it the policy of the government that the Canadian Youth Hostel Association could be able to (a) own (b) manage (c) operate youth hostels in Banff and Jasper National Parks and, if not, what are the reasons for prohibition of (i) ownership (ii) management (iii) operation by the Canadian Youth Hostel Association of hostels in national parks?

2. Has policy in this matter changed in the past ten years and, if so (a) on what date (b) for what reason?

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): 1. (a) No; (b) yes; (c) yes; (i) allowing a private organization exclusive rights to occupy and control land within a National Park for its members only is not consistent with National Parks principles or sound administration of publicly owned property; (ii) N/A; (iii) N/A.

2. Yes; (a) 1964; (b) with increasing use and pressures on the national parks it became apparent that land within national parks could not and should not be made available for the exclusive use of every interested organization.

GOLD TRANSACTIONS

Question No. 2,521—Mr. Mazankowski:

1. Was an Order in Council issued directing the Bank of Canada to request every bank in Canada to report names and addresses for every gold transaction over 10 ounces to the Bank of Canada and, if so (a) on what date (b) on what dates are such reports required (c) what is the purpose of such reports?

2. As Canada is not on the gold standard, for what reason is such documentation necessary?

3. Is the procuring of such information considered an invasion of privacy and, if not, for what reason?

Hon. John N. Turner (Minister of Finance): 1. No. I am advised, however, that the Bank of Canada, under the authority of Section 117 of the Bank Act, has requested of the chartered banks that they provide quarterly totals of their purchases and sales of gold in Canada broken down by country or geographical area of residence of their customers. This information is collected to assist Statistics Canada in the production of data relating to the Canadian balance of international payments. It may be that, to enable them to meet the geographical classification requested, banks are asking customers dealing in gold to record mailing addresses but information on names and addresses of individuals is not passed on to the Bank of Canada. Indeed the Bank Act specifically provides that banks are not required to furnish to the Bank of Canada information with respect to the accounts or affairs of any individual person. The Bank of Canada is taking steps to reduce the misunderstanding that appears to have arisen concerning its request for statistical information.

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): (a) 18 (Oct/Dec.) 1972; nil; March 1973, 18; (b) Animals were taken by biologists of the Territorial Game Management Service and by the Inuit hunters hired for the project; (c) animals were taken for Rumen Analysis and other biological, physiological and pathological determinations; (d) hides are being used by the Department of Industry and Development of the Territorial government to investigate what market potential might exist for them. Three muskox skulls have been donated to the Saskatchewan Institute of Applied Arts and Sciences. All other skulls with horns are presently being measured for comparative purposes, e.g. Northern Museums and other places to which the public has access; (e) no heads or hides have been given to public officials or representatives; (b) N/A.

*LACK OF NATIVE REPRESENTATION ON COMMITTEE ON THE FINANCIAL AND ECONOMIC IMPACT OF CANADIAN NORTHERN PIPELINES DEVELOPMENT

Question No. 2,559—Miss MacDonald (Kingston and the Islands):

1. (a) For what reason is there no native person on the Committee on the Financial and Economic Impact of Canadian Northern Pipelines Development (b) has the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources considered the suggestion by the Canadian Association in Support of Native People, that an equal Advisory Committee of Native People be established to provide the government with this most important point of view?

2. For what reason has the Minister created such an Advisory Committee to deal with a project which will have a substantial impact on the native people, without including one native person on the Committee?

Mr. John M. Reid (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Privy Council): 1. (a) There is no such committee as the Committee on the Financial and Economic Impact of Canadian Northern Pipelines Development. However, the National Advisory Committee on Northern Pipeline Financing was established on March 31, 1973 to advise the government on northern pipeline financing and on ways of ensuring maximum participation by Canadians, having regard to the availability of funds within Canada. It is a committee of financial specialists only, concerned primarily with the technical aspects of the money market. There is also an Economic Impact Committee which is part of the government's Task Force on Northern Oil Development. This is an interdepartmental group which examines views on economic impact matters from all sectors of Canadian society. A further committee of the Task Force on Northern Oil Development, called the Environmental-Social Committee, receives and carefully examines views from associations of native people. It is charged with the responsibility of ensuring that the concerns of the native people of the North are made known and carefully considered. (b) Yes.

2. Views of the native people on pipeline matters are obtained through the Task Force on Northern Oil Development committees noted in 1, and through associations of native people which are assisted in their research by grants from the Department of Indian and Northern Affairs.

APPOINTMENT OF Mr. H. J. MITCHELL

Question No. 2,562—Mr. Cossitt:

1. On what date was Mr. H. J. Mitchell, Chief, Policy, Planning and Programming, National Historic Parks and Sites Branch, Parks Canada, appointed?

2. Was this appointment made from the Public Service Commission or was it made by the Minister and what were the various considerations leading to this appointment?

3. What previous positions did Mr. Mitchell hold with the government and for what period of time?

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): 1. July 15, 1969 in an acting capacity and confirmed in this position July 15, 1970.

2. Mr. H. J. Mitchell was appointed as a result of a competition conducted by a Departmental Selection Board and approved by the Public Service Commission. The criteria for appointment was demonstrated knowledge of good management concepts, practises and techniques and the ability to plan, organize and direct a program encompassing complex situations and impact on the general public.

3. 1937 to 1939 Civil Service Commission Office Boy; 1939 to 1945 Canadian Army, Gunner to Sergeant; 1945 to 1946 Department of Mines and Resources, Clerk 3; 1946 to 1948 Department of Mines and Resources, Clerk 4; 1948 to 1949 Department of Mines and Resources, Clerk 4; 1949 to 1952 Department of Resources and Development, Principal Clerk to D.A. 2—Accountant and Office Manager in the Yellowknife Mining Recorder's Office; 1952 to 1954 Department of Resources and Development, Administrative Officer Grade 1—Area Administrator and Chairman of the Municipal District of Hay River; 1954 to 1957 Department of Northern Affairs and National Resources, Administrative Officer Grade 2—Area Administrator and Mining Recorder in Yellowknife; 1957 to 1959 Department of Northern Affairs and National Resources, Administrative Officer—Grade 4—Regional Administrator, Aklavik; 1959 to 1961 Department of Northern Affairs and National Resources, Administrative Officer Grade 4—Liquor and Legislation Section Head Territorial Division—Ottawa; 1961 to 1966, Department of Northern Affairs and National Resources, Administrative Officer 5, 6 & 7—Assistant Chief, Industrial Division, Ottawa; 1966 to 1969 Department of Indian Affairs and Northern Development, P.M. 6—Assistant Administrator of the Arctic—Ottawa; 1969, to Present Chief, Operations Division National Historic Sites Service.

INDIAN AFFAIRS—ELECTION OF BAND LEADER

Is the government planning to amend Section 77 of the Indian Act to lower the voting age from 21 to 18 for the election of a band leader as in the case of federal general elections or by-elections?

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): The government has previously indicated that no substantive amendments to the Indian Act would be made without prior consultation with the Indian people. It is understood that the Alberta Indian Association in conjunction with the National Indian Brotherhood and in consultation with other associations and the Indian people are preparing a number of amendments to the Indian Act for consideration. In addition a private member's bill respecting voting age was introduced some months ago and referred to the Standing Committee of Indian Affairs and Northern Development. The committee, upon recommendation of the National Indian Brotherhood and the Native Youth Association of Canada, decided that Bill C-16 would not be proceeded with pending the results and recommendations that will be brought forth from the study by the provincial and territorial member organizations of the National Indian Brotherhood as to the over-all recommendations to the revision of the Indian Act.

PUBLIC WORKS—CRANE REPAIRS, GRAVING DOCK, ESQUIMALT, B.C.

Question No. 2,567—Mr. McKinnon:

Has the 100-ton crane at the Graving Dock at Esquimalt, British Columbia, been unserviceable for some two years now and, if so, on what date does the government intend to have this equipment repaired?

Hon. Jean-Eudes Dubé (Minister of Public Works): The 100-ton stiff leg derrick at the Esquimalt graving dock is a little over 50 years of age. The consultant firm of A. B. Sanderson & Company Limited was retained in 1970-71 to report on the condition of the structural, mechanical and electrical components of this derrick. It was the opinion of the consulting firm that it would not be economical or desirable to attempt to repair this facility and it was subsequently recommended that the derrick be retired from service. The replacement of this facility is under study at the present time in conjunction with a study of proposed dry docks in British Columbia. Discussions are being held with the Ministry of Transport, the Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce and other agencies of government as well as private interests. At the present time it is very difficult to say whether this will be replaced as consideration is being given to floating cranes and/or other alternatives.

UIC—SET UP OF SYSTEM FOR EMERGENCY PAYMENTS

Question No. 2,573—Mr. Marshall:

1. Is it the intention of UIC offices to set up a system of emergency payments so that payments can be made in four, eight and 24 hours and, if so, what are the details?

2. Is it the intention of UIC to change the method of repayment of overpayment and, if so, what are the details?

3. On what date is it expected that these changes will take place?

Hon. Robert K. Andras (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): 1. UIC now has two types of monitored payment: Type 1, This type of payment is requested through the Regional Pay Centre with priority to be included in the next computer run. This provides a 48 hour turnaround. The payment is normally mailed to the claimant. Type 2, This type of payment is requested through the Regional Pay Centre and processed in the unit record system. Turnaround time is 24 hours, or less if the claimant is in the same locality as the Pay Centre. The payment may be mailed, delivered to the District Office or to the claimant's residence. A new type of payment will be incorporated into the system as Type 3. Type 3, This new type will provide fast payment to any claimant whose claim has been delayed and who faces possible hardship. This payment is requested through the District Office. Payment is available within four hours at the District Office.

2. On June 5, 1973, a policy was approved whereby all active claimants would be given the opportunity to establish an agreed amount of their normal benefit payment which will be applied against any non-fraud overpayment. This agreed deduction has always been part of UIC procedure for non-active claims but was not applied to active claims. This new policy ensures that prior to any recoupment of overpayments from benefit, the claimant will be contacted and will be given the opportunity to agree to a deduction which must be in the range of 25% to 75% of his weekly unemployment insurance rate. At present, this policy is being carried out by contacting the claimant prior to setting up any overpayment on the computer system.

3. Implementation of Type 3 monitored payments is now taking place. The tentative implementation schedule is: Quebec Region, August 14, 1973; Ontario Region, September 10, 1973; Prairie, September 17, 1973; Pacific, September 24, 1973; Atlantic, October 1, 1973. These dates are dependent on scheduled delivery of equipment. On August 15, 1973, the computer system will automatically delay recoupment by three weeks on non-fraud overpayments in order to allow time to contact the claimant and agree on a deduction.

1. What are the names, addresses and specific functions of all persons who are employed by St. Lawrence Islands National Parks at the present time or who have been employed at any time since January 1, 1972?

2. On whose recommendation were these people hired?

3. Were such persons processed through Canada Manpower offices in the course of hiring in every case and, if not, for what reason?

CABLEVISION—OPERATION OF UNITED STATES COMPANIES IN CANADA

Question No. 2,452—Mr. Baker:

1. Was a court ruling made to the effect that the Department of Public Works has power to order the removal of a coaxial cable from the St. Stephen International Bridge and did Terra Cable Limited file an objection relating to its presence and use with CRTC and, if so, for what reason does the Department allow its continued presence and use?

2. Does Acadian Cable TV Ltd. make a contribution in any way to Canadian culture, business or national interest and, if so (a) in what manner and to what extent (b) does the Minister of Communications or the Minister of Public Works consider such contribution to outweigh the protection of Canadian-owned business and citizens operating under licence at St. Stephen's, New Brunswick?

3. Has the government or any board, commission or official thereof approved the use of ANIK I to connect cable television operations originating in the United States, that is, the TelPrompTer or any other US company to operate in the Provinces of New Brunswick and Ontario and, if not, is there an application for such authority pending?

4. To the knowledge of the government, what are the names of the officers and directors of the TelPrompTer Corporation and does the TelPrompTer Corporation or any of its officers, directors or shareholders have any interest of any nature or kind, direct or indirect, in a company known as Acadian Cable TV Ltd.?

Return tabled.

Mr. Speaker: Shall the remaining questions stand?

Mr. Hales: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker, I would like to bring to the parliamentary secretary's attention the fact that that, although he cleared off a good number of questions today, there still remain under my name question No. 1,809, which has been on the order paper for five months, and No. 2,019 which has been there for four months.

Mr. McKenzie: Mr. Speaker, on July 19 I placed question No. 2,543 on the order paper. Can the parliamentary secretary give any indication when this question will be answered?

Mr. Reid: I will look into the matter, Mr. Speaker.

MOTIONS FOR PAPERS

[English]

Mr. John M. Reid (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, would you be so kind as to call notices of motions Nos. 230 and 231.

COPY OF TRANSCRIPT OF PUBLIC HEARING FOR LICENCE OF NORTHGATE CABLE COMPANY

Motion No. 230—Mr. Beattie (Hamilton Mountain):

That an Order of the House do issue for a copy of the transcript of the public hearing of application for licence of the Northgate Cable Company to be incorporated, February 10, 1970, file No. 6404254.

Mr. John M. Reid (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, since the hon. member has been provided with a copy of the document requested I would therefore ask him to withdraw his motion.

Mr. Beattie (Hamilton Mountain): Mr. Speaker, I have indeed received the document. I thank the parliamentary secretary and withdraw my motion.

Mr. Speaker: The motion is dropped.

NORTHGATE CABLE COMPANY—APPLICATION TO CRTC

Motion No. 231—Mr. Beattie (Hamilton Mountain):

That an Order of the House do issue for a copy of the Northgate Cable Company's application to CRTC.

Mr. John M. Reid (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, since the hon. member has been provided with a copy of the document requested, I would therefore ask him to withdraw his motion.

Mr. Beattie (Hamilton Mountain): Mr. Speaker, I did receive it, and I withdraw my motion.

Mr. Speaker: The motion is dropped.

Shall the remaining notices of motions stand?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

FOOD PRICES

BREAD—REQUEST FOR ASSURANCE SUBSIDY WILL PREVENT FURTHER INCREASE IN PRICE

Hon. Robert L. Stanfield (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask some questions arising out of the Prime Minister's remarks yesterday relating to the position of Canadians in need. The first relates to the price of bread, the cost of a 24 ounce loaf having gone up six cents today. In view of the fact that spokesmen for the industry have said that the government's increased subsidy of $1.25 per bushel would not prevent a further increase of six cents on a 24 ounce loaf of bread in the next month, and have categorized the increased subsidy as throwing a stone at an elephant, I would like to ask the Prime Minister how the government intends to back up the assurance that he gave yesterday that the announced increase in subsidy will prevent a further increase of five cents a loaf which would otherwise be inevitable in October?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Lang: —the Leader of the Opposition has referred to the increase of 25 cents in the consumer subsidy, and of course he is quite right in saying that this, by itself, cannot have the effect of stopping a further increase in the price of bread. Just as the reduction of four cents some little time ago was minimal influence in the price of bread, so the 25 cents would in terms of real cost only mean a reduction of about half a cent on the price of a load of bread. However, accompanying this has been action on our part in arranging a long-term agreement in relation to the price of wheat in Canada which will be lower than the present world price and will be effectively equivalent to price levels on August 1, both for spring wheats and Durum. People associated with the baking industry have indicated that these two courses of action together should obviate the need for further increases in the price of bread for some number of months.

BREAD—ASSURANCE TO PRIME MINISTER BY INDUSTRY AT THE TIME OF ANNOUNCEMENT PRICE WOULD NOT BE INCREASED

Hon. Robert L. Stanfield (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, a supplementary question and I ask it because of the comment made by the spokesman for the industry today. Did the Prime Minister or the Minister of Justice, who is responsible for the Wheat Board, have any assurance from the industry that the price of bread would not be increased further in October when the Prime Minister made that statement in the House yesterday?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, we had discussions with representatives of the industry who gave us a clear indication that the six cent increase that has just taken place had included not only the amount necessary to cover the increase in the cost of wheat from $1.95½ to approximately $3.25 but that it covered all the additional costs in line with their ordinary increases. They also indicated that if the price of wheat were stabilized there ought not to be a further increase in the price of bread for six months or a year. I would count on the Prices Review Board to ensure that this is so.

Oral Questions

VETERANS AFFAIRS

WAR VETERANS ALLOWANCE—POSSIBLE ADJUSTMENT OF CEILING TO PERMIT RECEIVING OLD AGE PENSION INCREASE

Hon. Robert L. Stanfield (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, a final supplementary to the Prime Minister, still on the question of Canadians in need relating to the position of veterans on War Veterans Allowance—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The Chair will recognize the hon. Leader of the Opposition for a supplementary question but I think I should indicate that I do this in view of the hon. gentleman's special position in the House. I think he is entitled to this, but if the supplementary refers to increases in veterans benefits I have some doubts about whether it is really a supplementary. Perhaps it is more a related question. I say this to protect the position of the Chair, generally speaking. The hon. member, of course, will be allowed his supplementary after which the Chair will recognize the hon. member for Saskatoon-Biggar.

Mr. Stanfield: Mr. Speaker, I do not wish to take advantage of my position or your generosity. My question is related to the position of those in need and arises out of the Prime Minister's statement yesterday. It was for that reason that I took the liberty of asking a supplementary relating to the position of war veterans.

In view of the ceiling that now exists on the maximum amount that war veterans can receive, and because this ceiling remains fixed, those who are now receiving the maximum will not derive any benefit from the proposed changes in the old age security or guaranteed income supplement position. Can the Prime Minister state whether the government intends to adjust the ceilings of the war veterans allowances so that the veterans can receive these advantages?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, this question was discussed in cabinet and brought to us by the Minister for Veterans Affairs. The minister has the authorization of cabinet to bring forward some proposals and these would be made known in due course.

GRAIN

EFFECT OF SUBSIDY ON DOMESTIC GRAIN ON WESTERN PRODUCER—NEGOTIATION OF LONG-TERM FLOOR PRICE

Mr. A. P. Gleave (Saskatoon-Biggar): Mr. Speaker, a supplementary question to the Minister in charge of the Wheat Board. In view of the fact that the August based price of wheat which he referred to is $3.18, and that the subsidy of $1.25 will bring that up to $4.43 which is $1.22 less than the present export price of the Canadian Wheat Board, does the minister now say to this House that the western farmer is going to subsidize the Canadian consumer to the extent of $1.22 per bushel?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, what it means is that an agreement of a long term nature is being developed which incorporates a true and effective two-price system into our Canadian wheat selling system with a floor price in the area of $3.25 as a long-term floor price. I remind the hon. member that the $3.25 figure, which will be the long-term floor for wheat for domestic consumption, is higher than the price which has been paid for wheat in Canada at any time on our history except in the last few months.

Mr. Gleave: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Since the Canadian Wheat Board Act makes no provision for such manipulation as has been proposed to this House, can the minister in charge of the Wheat Board tell this House with whom such arrangement is being negotiated?

Mr. Lang: The arrangement is being negotiated and discussed with the Canadian Wheat Board which of course, can enter into such arrangements easily, say, with a buyer from another country. I think it would be attracted to the proposition of entering into an arrangement for between five and seven years on the basis of a firm price ranging from $3.25 to $4.50. We are having discussions with the Canadian Wheat Board about the length of agreement which would be desirable. We put forward to them the possibility, for instance, of three, five or seven years as the term of the agreement. They seem to favour seven years.

THE CANADIAN ECONOMY

METHOD OF APPLYING SUBSIDIES TO BREAD AND MILK

Mr. Réal Caouette (Témiscamingue): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary for the right hon. Prime Minister.

Yesterday, he announced a subsidy of 5 cents per quart of milk, and another on bread. Last night, I noticed that milk had already gone up by 3 cents a quart, going from 35 to 38 cents, and a loaf of bread from 37 to 43 cents. Now, will the government subsidies be granted on the basis of the prices before the Prime Minister's statement yesterday, or on that of the new consumer prices?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, the minister in charge of the Wheat Board has just answered the question with regard to bread. In the case of milk, it will be the price of milk paid by consumers in the provinces whose governments will agree to stabilize or lower the price paid in fact by the consumer. The hon. member surely knows that whole milk falls within provincial jurisdiction; the federal government on its own, intends to pay a subsidy of 5 cents per quart sold to the consumer, in order to lower consumer prices and prevent them from going up, provided the provinces agree, through their dairy commissions, to keep prices from going up or even to roll back prices.

Mr. Caouette (Témiscamingue): Can the Prime Minister tell us when this agreement will be reached with the provinces, seeing the cost price of milk has already gone up by 3 cents a quart since his announcement yesterday?

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, I believe that as early as yesterday the Minister of Agriculture was to contact his opposite provincial numbers. Somehow, I feel the Créditiste leader is alluding to prices in one particular province, but uniformity is not the case in Canada since each province can control the price of whole milk according to the standards of its own marketing board. That is why the federal government has said that it is willing to pay a 5 cent subsidy provided, in fact, it benefits the consumer and not the provincial governments.

COMPENSATION TO PRODUCERS FOR LOSS RESULTING FROM DIFFERENCE BETWEEN EXPORT AND DOMESTIC PRICES—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Mr. Frank Hamilton (Swift Current-Maple Creek): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a supplementary question to the minister in charge of the Canadian Wheat Board. In view of the announcement of the freeze on domestic milling wheat at some $3.25 a bushel, as opposed to the export price of $5.65 a bushel, will the minister tell the House if producers will be compensated for the $2.40 a bushel spread between export and domestic prices of wheat, as they will sustain a loss per bushel of $1.15 even with the maximum subsidy which will amount to over $60 million a year loss to the western producer.

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, the compensation to producers is in the assurance that over the long term the domestic price of wheat will not fall below $3.25, which, as I indicated a few moments ago, was until a few months ago a price higher than we had ever had in the history of Canada.

REQUEST FOR RECONSIDERATION OF AMOUNT OF SUBSIDY ON WHEAT

Mr. Les Benjamin (Regina-Lake Centre): In view of the representation of the minister in charge of the Canadian Wheat Board, will the Prime Minister give consideration to revising the 25 cent increase in the subsidy to at least $2 and maintain such a subsidy until such time as world prices fall to a level equal to the present domestic price?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I wonder why the hon. member is suggesting $2 rather than $3, $4 or $5.

Mr. Benjamin: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. I asked the Prime Minister a straightforward question. Will he give consideration to raising the amount of the subsidy to the full amount of the difference, $1.15. I am only suggesting 75 cents in order that Canadian farmers can avoid subsidizing bread prices in the fall? Will the government consider revising the figure to that amount?

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, if the hon. member listened attentively to the Minister of Justice in charge of the Canadian Wheat Board, he would understand that this is in the nature of a contract which the government is prepared to make, on behalf of the Canadian people, with the Wheat Board. As the minister indicated, the wheat board is making this kind of contract all the time with foreign countries. This is a guarantee of having a minimum price and a maximum price. This is the proposition the government has put to the Wheat Board and which we are confident they will accept.

INQUIRY AS TO ACCEPTANCE BY WHEAT BOARD OF AGREEMENT SETTING MAXIMUM AND MINIMUM PRICES FOR WHEAT

Hon. Robert L. Stanfield (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I think the Prime Minister just answered my question. I wish to ask the minister responsible for the wheat board whether the wheat board has accepted this proposition, whether this is being announced as something the wheat board has agreed to or whether discussions are going on with the wheat board? The Prime Minister announced this matter as though the wheat board had already accepted it.

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, the announcement of yesterday followed agreement to the general principle and the figures by the Canadian Wheat Board. We left open the question of the term which would be most desirable for final resolution. That is now being resolved.

Mr. Speaker: I think the hon. member for Humber-St. George's-St. Barbe has a supplementary to the second prong of the original two-pronged question asked by the Leader of the Opposition.

VETERANS AFFAIRS

REQUEST FOR ACTION TO INSURE RECIPIENTS OF WAR VETERANS ALLOWANCE BENEFIT OF INCREASE IN OLD AGE PENSION

Mr. Jack Marshall (Humber-St. George's-St. Barbe): Mr. Speaker, I have a related question for the Minister of Veterans Affairs. In view of the fact the minister now has authority from cabinet to make the increase in old age security exempt from inclusion in the war veterans allowance for those over 65, will he take this action and will it be done in time so that the war veterans falling within this category will receive this benefit at the same time as those receiving the increase in the old age security pension?

Hon. Daniel J. MacDonald (Minister of Veterans Affairs): Mr. Speaker, the government will take steps to see that the veterans get a fair deal.

Mr. Lawrence: Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs. I will defer asking it until he returns.

Oral Questions

GRAIN

REQUEST FOR INCREASE IN SUBSIDY ON DOMESTIC WHEAT

Mr. Lorne Nystrom (Yorkton-Melville): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Prime Minister. It is supplementary to the first prong of the two-pronged question asked by the Leader of the Opposition. In view of the announcement yesterday that the Canadian farmer will be subsidizing the Canadian consumer by at least $1.20 a bushel, can the Prime Minister assure the House that the domestic price which the farmer receives for his wheat will be no lower than the international price which he receives? In other words, will he consider increasing the subsidy on domestic sales so that the farmer will not have to pay for the consumer's bread?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, the real reward to the farmer, and the reason this arrangement is so much in his interest, is that the price of $3.25 is being protected over a period of years during which the world wheat price may fall well below that level. This is according to experiences and is an historic fact. Just as for two years we had an effective domestic price at $3 through the two-price system, which was for quite a long time $1.40 or nearly that above the world price for wheat, the world price for wheat may now be temporarily above the price at which wheat is available to Canadians. However, that may be offset in due course by the price in the world market being below the price of $3.25 which is being protected for the Canadian farmer.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. A number of members are seeking supplementaries. I will recognize the hon. member for Qu'Appelle-Moose Mountain and then try to move on to the next question. If there is time, we will return to this important matter later.

SUGGESTED CONSULTATIONS ON RESTORATION OF INTERNATIONAL WHEAT AGREEMENT

Hon. Alvin Hamilton (Qu'Appelle-Moose Mountain): Mr. Speaker, my question is supplementary to that asked by the hon. member for Yorkton-Melville. Has the minister in charge of the Canadian Wheat Board made any contact with the United States, Argentina and Australia with regard to getting a joint declaration of intention to restore the old international wheat agreement to make this policy of the government work?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, we have made it clear to our trading partners including the countries to which the hon. member referred that we support the principle of orderly marketing internationally, as we have just so clearly indicated we do nationally. We are ready at any time to begin discussions toward a meaningful grains arrangement with a proper price range which protects a reasonable price in down-turns and also places a reasonable maximum in up-turn circumstances where a shortage of grain can make such a difference in price. I think it is fair to say that among exporting countries, the United States in particular has not yet shown a readiness to begin serious discussions about such an arrangement.

POSSIBLE ACTION BY GOVERNMENT TO EXPRESS DISAPPROVAL OF ATOMIC TESTING BY FRANCE

Mr. John Reynolds (Burnaby-Richmond-Delta): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Secretary of State for External Affairs. In view of the fact the government of France has grossly misrepresented the facts concerning the Canadian ship Greenpace III, and in view of the fact the Minister of Defence, Mr. Robert Galley, has announced from Papeete, Tahiti, that notwithstanding the decision of the world court, France will continue its atomic testing, does this government contemplate any steps to voice disapproval of this policy by the government of France?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, the government of Canada has already expressed its displeasure and has protested this action. It intends to continue doing so.

Mr. Reynolds: If the government of France continues this inaction, does the government plan any sanctions of an economic nature such as the restriction of French imports, to make clear our stand on France's internationally illegal policy?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member's question is hypothetical.

ENERGY

PETROLEUM PRODUCTS—INQUIRY AS TO LEGISLATION ON PRICE FREEZE

Mr. T. C. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources. It arises out of the Prime Minister's statement yesterday regarding the imposition of a freeze on the price of petroleum products. Does the government intend to introduce legislation to give effect to this freeze or is it relying entirely upon voluntary restraint by the oil industry? Has the minister had discussions with the oil industry and have they indicated their willingness to adhere to this policy?

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): No, Mr. Speaker. We do not intend to introduce legislation with regard to the freeze. It is the intention to introduce legislation with regard to divorcing the Canadian domestic price of oil from the American market. Discussions have been held with the producers. We will be having additional discussions with the producers with regard to the request that was made yesterday.

INCREASE IN PRICE OF CRUDE OIL—POSSIBLE ACTION TO ROLL BACK—GOVERNMENT ACTION

Mr. T. C. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): In view of the fact that the price of crude oil has risen four times in the past nine months, an increase of almost $1.00 per barrel, despite the fact that in recent years the production cost per barrel has declined, has the minister or the National Energy Board made any studies to see whether these increases, particularly the 40 per cent increase effective August 1, are warranted? Does the government intend to take any steps to roll back this price if, as a result of their studies, they find the increase was not justified?

● (1440)

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, on the basis of the statement by the spokesman for the oil industry in respect of recent increases, they have acknowledged that they were really only to keep pace with increases in the international prices. In other words, there has been no suggestion on their part that these increases are related to cost increases incurred in Canada. It is for this reason that the general approach there is related to a change in circumstances. The windfall that is occurring here is such that we feel there should be an introduction of either an export tax or possibly an oil marketing board so the windfall would be to the benefit of a wider public.

Mr. Speaker: The Chair will recognize the hon. member for his second and last supplementary question, followed by the hon. member for Shefford and the hon. member for Fundy-Royal.

Mr. Douglas: Mr. Speaker, I thank the minister for his answer which justifies the position we have taken in asking for a two-price system. I should like to ask the minister whether, in view of the statement he has just made, his government is merely going to freeze this escalated price, or does it propose to take any steps to urge the oil industry, or ask parliament for legislative authority, to roll this price back?

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): Mr. Speaker, I think it is fair to point out that there is a combines proceeding under way against the oil industry in relation to this increase. It would not be my intention to seek legislation in order to return prices to the levels of a year ago.

EXPO 74 IN SPOKANE, WASHINGTON—POSSIBLE RECONSIDERATION OF DECISION NOT TO PARTICIPATE

Mr. Gilbert Rondeau (Shefford): Mr. Speaker, I should like to put a question to the Minister of Environment.

Since the Canadian government has until the end of September to go back on the decision to abstain from taking part in Expo 1974 on Environment which will be held in Spokane, Washington, does the minister intend to have that decision reconsidered by the cabinet?

[English]

Mr. William Rompkey (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of the Environment): Mr. Speaker, the minister is considering this matter at the present time, and as soon as there is a change in our position I will be glad to inform the hon. member.

INDIAN AFFAIRS

POSSIBLE RECOVERY OF MISSING FILES—MINISTERIAL ACTION

Mr. R. Gordon L. Fairweather (Fundy-Royal): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development. Have the department files which were the subject of an investigation been discovered within the offices of the department itself? Did anybody think to look in the offices before launching a police investigation, and what steps is the minister taking to improve his office procedures?

[Translation]

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): Mr. Speaker, first of all, the file cabinets were stolen; then, one was found on the roof. I have been told that a quarter of the files have been found in the building and that three-quarters have not yet been found, either by officials from my department or by the police.

FINANCE

POSSIBLE RECALL OF THREE PER CENT PERPETUAL BONDS—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Mr. A. D. Hales (Wellington): Mr. Speaker, I should like to address my question concerning Dominion of Canada perpetual bonds to the Minister of Finance. In view of the extremely low interest rate these bonds carry, namely 3 per cent, and bearing in mind that they are held by many widows, senior citizens and people on fixed incomes as well as the fact that a much higher interest rate is now available, would the minister seriously consider calling these bonds in at face value so these people would be able to obtain a fair return?

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Hon. John N. Turner (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I want to thank the hon. gentleman for the courtesy of giving me notice of his question. Just before the summer adjournment I met with a committee of members from both sides of the House to discuss once again this question of the perpetual bonds issued some years ago. In spite of further research, we still have not found an equitable way to redeem the bonds.

Mr. Speaker: Does the hon. member for Northumberland-Durham have a supplementary question?

Mr. Lawrence: No, Sir, the minister I wanted has dodged out on me again.

AGRICULTURE

POSSIBLE REMOVAL OF EXPORT CONTROLS ON CATTLE—REQUEST FOR CHANGE IN REGULATIONS COVERING FEEDER CATTLE

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prince Albert): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Agriculture and has to do with the embargo on cattle exports to the United States. I would ask whether the government or his department has given consideration to determining if this embargo will end on September 12 when the controls imposed by the United States will terminate?

Hon. E. F. Whelan (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, this all depends on what action is taken by the United States. If they remove their controls we hope to be able to remove our export controls as well at the same time.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, in addition to that, between now and September 12 when it is believed these controls will be removed by the United States, will the minister give immediate attention to changing the regulations now in effect which result in feeder cattle of top grades being denied export from Canada while lower grades are allowed to be shipped out with the result that Canadian feedlot companies and organizations have to compete with the United States for our feeder cattle which are under embargo, and this is working havoc with our feedlot operations?

Mr. Whelan: Mr. Speaker, we are watching this very closely. I am in close consultation with the Minister of Trade and Commerce who has the authority to use these export-import permit controls. I am in close contact as well with the Canadian Cattlemen's Association and other organizations. I have had conversations with the feedlot operators in the west and in the east. We realize that a situation does exist and that feeder cattle are going to the United States. I would report to the House, Mr. Speaker, that feeder cattle have moved to the United States in other years in greater numbers than are now moving. This government does not like to put excessive controls on anybody.

HOUSING

INQUIRY AS TO GOVERNMENT ACTION TO CONTROL COST

Mr. Eldon M. Woolliams (Calgary North): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the Prime Minister a question in relation to his statement in respect of measures to deal with the cost of living. Does the government intend to take any other immedaite measures to control the high cost of housing which is causing a great deal of suffering to those Canadians who want to purchase homes?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I answered a similar question yesterday by indicating that when further measures are to be taken we will announce them in the usual way.

INTEREST RATES—SUGGESTED INTERVENTION BY BANK OF CANADA TO CONTROL

Mr. Eldon M. Woolliams (Calgary North): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the Minister of Finance a further question. In light of the fact that interest rates have reached an all-time high, causing suffering to those in the middle and low-income brackets, will the government now intervene with the Bank of Canada to make certain that interest rates are either rolled back or controlled?

Hon. John N. Turner (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I think the hon. gentleman in his quieter moments would understand that interest rates are responding to a very strong expansion in the economy and a very strong demand for credit. The international interest rates have resulted in the unprecedented situation where Canadian interest rates on short and medium-term money are two to three points lower than in the United States and five points lower than in any other industrial country in Europe.

An hon. Member: So what?

Mr. Woolliams: Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask one additional supplementary question. Do I take it from the answer of the Minister of Finance that he is going to leave the whole problem on the shoulders of the medium and low-income people of Canada, irrespective of the excessive—

Some hon. Members: Order, order.

DISPUTE WITH RAILWAY EMPLOYEES—SUGGESTED APPOINTMENT OF THREE ARBITRATORS

Mr. David Orlikow (Winnipeg North): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Labour. In view of the great number of issues in dispute remaining between railway workers and the companies and the difficulty facing one arbitrator in dealing with all these matters in dispute, is the minister in a reasonably short time going to give consideration to the appointment of three arbitrators, one to deal with each of the unions in dispute with the companies?

Hon. John C. Munro (Minister of Labour): No, Mr. Speaker. As the hon. member is aware, today we have appointed Mr. Justice Emmett Hall as the arbitrator with reference to the non-operating unions. We are talking now with the leaders in respect of the shopcrafts and the UTU, and we will listen to their submissions as to how they wish to proceed. They might wish to negotiate for a time prior to wanting an arbitrator. They may be desirous of having a different arbitrator than the one we have appointed for the non-ops, or they might be agreeable to working out their disputes within the ambit of the present arbitrator. In other words, I would prefer to leave this until I have a further opportunity for discussion.

DISPUTE WITH RAILWAY SHOPCRAFT EMPLOYEES—JURISDICTION OF ARBITRATOR TO DEAL WITH PAY

Mr. David Orlikow (Winnipeg North): I should like to ask the minister one supplementary question. As I understand it, he has answered the first question in that the appointment of Mr. Justice Hall has been accepted. Could I ask the minister, in view of the fact that a substantial number of the workers in the shopcraft categories are in fact to get an increase of less than 34 cents an hour in pay for this year, whether that matter will come within the jurisdiction of the arbitrator to rule on whether they are entitled to get the full amount.

Hon. John C. Munro (Minister of Labour): If an arbitrator is appointed with reference to the shopcraft, most definitely yes, Mr. Speaker.

ENERGY

GASOLINE—CONTROL OF RETAIL PRICES—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Mr. Terry O'Connor (Halton): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources supplementary to those asked earlier. In view of the fact that some retail gas outlets in southern Ontario raised the price of gasoline ten cents per gallon last night, will the government policy in this regard involve any steps to roll back retail prices or prevent further jumping of the gun in anticipation of a freeze?

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, I cannot be sure whether they are independents or affiliated to the companies. Of course, the freeze is related to the price of crude oil for sale in markets west of the Ottawa Valley line.

Mr. O'Connor: Mr. Speaker, with the greatest respect, my question relates specifically to retail prices. Is the government going to take any steps in respect of retail prices? I may say to the minister that these are dealers affiliated with companies.

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): Mr. Speaker, I pointed out that the government policy related to crude oil prices.

HEALTH

FREE DRUGS FOR OLD AGE PENSIONERS—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Mr. Robert Muir (Cape Breton-The Sydneys): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of National Health and Welfare. May I ask the hon. gentleman if he can advise what progress is being made with regard to the provision of free prescription drugs for all those Canadians who qualify for old age security and any portion of the guaranteed income supplement?

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Those provisions among many others are being discussed in the general review of social security for all Canadians, including aged Canadians.

Mr. Muir: Mr. Speaker, is the minister in a position to advise just how soon this study and review will be going on and how soon we may have some developments in this regard?

Mr. Lalonde: The review is going on now.

ROYAL CANADIAN MOUNTED POLICE

INQUIRY AS TO INFORMATION GIVEN PROVINCIAL GOVERNMENTS ABOUT CABINET MINISTERS

Mr. René Matte (Champlain): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the right hon. Prime Minister.

Could the Prime Minister tell the House whether he follows the policy of informing his colleagues, the provincial premiers, when the RCMP or the Solicitor General tell him of some compromising action on the part of cabinet members in a province?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, the question is really too vague for me to be able to reply to it.

HAMILTON—STRIKE OF GARBAGE COLLECTORS—REQUEST FOR FEDERAL INTERVENTION

Mr. Duncan M. Beattie (Hamilton Mountain): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of National Health and Welfare. In light of the fact that a labour-management dispute which is going on in the city of Hamilton has halted garbage collection for the past seven weeks and in light of the fact that the health inspectors are out on strike also, would the minister inform the House if he would use his good offices to investigate the smelly situation which could reach epidemic proportions if not halted soon. I ask this question notwithstanding the fact that it comes under provincial jurisdiction?

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, I think the hon. member gave the answer to his own question. This is the exclusive responsibility of the provincial government of Ontario and I think this parliament has given a good example as to what could be done. We are waiting for the leadership of the government of Ontario in that respect.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

AIRPORTS

STE SCHOLASTIQUE—POSSIBLE RE-OPENING OF EXPROPRIATION CASES

Mr. Claude Wagner (Saint-Hyacinthe): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question for the Minister of Transport.

In view of the displeasure expressed by many of the Sainte-Scholastique expropriated people whose spokesmen are here today in the house, does the Minister intend to re-open the Ste Scholastique file to review the apparently justified claims of the people expropriated, especially in the field of farm rentals, so that they will be treated more fairly?

Hon. Jean Marchand (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, Mirabel involved 3,142 cases of expropriation, 2,587 of which were settled, 135 are being settled and 80 have not been settled. Furthermore, 340 have received advances.

COMBINES INVESTIGATION ACT

DATE OF INTRODUCTION OF LEGISLATION

Mr. Allan Lawrence (Northumberland-Durham): Your patience is everlasting, Mr. Speaker. My question relates to part of the statement made yesterday by the Prime Minister, but this one is related to legislation regarding the Combines Investigation Act. I should like to ask the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs when we may be able to view either the details of the bill or the bill itself.

Hon. Herb Gray (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I am consulting with the House leaders about this. I am hopeful that it will be very soon.

Mr. Lawrence: Mr. Speaker, I wonder whether the minister could inform us if the legislation has even been drafted?

Mr. Gray: Yes, it has, although the draftsmen are putting some finishing touches to it.

AGRICULTURE

SUBSIDY ON FLUID MILK—AGREEMENT OF PROVINCIAL MARKETING BOARDS

Mr. Terry Grier (Toronto-Lakeshore): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Agriculture. I should like to ask the minister whether he, on behalf of the government, has placed before the provincial milk marketing boards formal proposals embodying the announcement made in the Prime Minister's statement of yesterday and how soon he expects agreement will be reached?

Hon. E. F. Whelan (Minister of Agriculture): A meeting is now going on in the Sir John Carling Building between the Canadian Dairy Commission, the industry and producer representatives. We hope some conclusion will be forthcoming from this meeting this afternoon.

SUBSIDY ON FLUID MILK—REQUEST FOR ASSURANCE CONSUMERS WILL RECEIVE BENEFIT

Mr. Terry Grier (Toronto-Lakeshore): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Prime Minister in the same general area arising from the assurance which he has seen fit to give in respect of a subsidy on milk for consumers. Is the Prime Minister prepared to guarantee to the House that this milk subsidy will be passed on to the milk consumers?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, that is the intention in the statement I made yesterday. The federal government is prepared to pay a five-cent subsidy per quart on milk, provided the provinces give the assurance that was mentioned in my statement that they will either contain or roll back the prices.

NORTHERN AFFAIRS

ACTION TO ENSURE BENEFIT OF SUBSIDIES RECEIVED BY RESIDENTS OF NORTHERN AREAS

Mr. Erik Nielsen (Yukon): Mr. Speaker, since there are no marketing boards similar to those which exist in the provinces in the two northern territories, the Yukon Territory and the Northwest Territories, and since this is a matter falling under the jurisdiction of the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development, what steps is he taking to ensure that the citizens of Canada in those two northern areas receive the same kind of benefits in respect of these announcements concerning subsidies.

SUBSIDY ON FLUID MILK—METHOD OF APPLICATION IN NEWFOUNDLAND

Mr. James A. McGrath (St. John's East): Mr. Speaker, since the province of Newfoundland has no milk marketing board, has the government figured out ways and means to make this subsidy effective in the province of Newfoundland where the price of milk is the highest of any province in Canada.

● (1500)

Hon. E. F. Whelan (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, we foresee no real difficulty in doing that in Newfoundland because of the way in which the market operates there. We feel that we can work with the producers. If they do not pass on the subsidies to the consumers we will point out that fact to the food review board so that the public will know the distributors are not acting as good corporate citizens.

THE CANADIAN ECONOMY

GOVERNMENT POSITION ON CONTROL OF INFLATION BY SUBSIDIES AND SELECTIVE PRICE CONTROLS—EFFECT OF MONETARY AND FISCAL POLICY

Mr. James Gillies (Don Valley): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Prime Minister. Now that we have had a chance to study the statement made by the Prime Minister yesterday, is it proper to define the position of the government of Canada as being that inflation in this nation can be cured by subsidization and selective price controls?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): No, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Gillies: My question is again directed to the right hon. Prime Minister. Am I to infer from his reply, therefore, that the government of Canada is content with the monetary, fiscal and exchange rate policy and is suggesting that these have no influence on the rate of inflation in this country?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The question is hardly in order.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

REQUEST FOR FURTHER PROTESTS ON "GREENPEACE" INCIDENT AND ATOMIC TESTING BY FRANCE

Mr. Barry Mather (Surrey-White Rock): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Secretary of State for External Affairs which is related to one which was asked him a little earlier today. Having in mind the fact that the meeting of members of parliament from the three major parties in the House yesterday with members of the French national assembly who are visiting Ottawa revealed that our French colleagues supported, first, nuclear testing in the Pacific, and second, had little concern over the Greenpeace protest incident, will the government renew its representations on these points in such a manner as to indicate in the most tangible way the feelings of parliament on this matter?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, the House will be interested to know that I will be seeing the French ambassador this afternoon.

Mr. Speaker: I will now recognize the hon. member for Egmont followed by the hon. member for Athabasca and then call orders of the day.

THE CANADIAN ECONOMY

INQUIRY AS TO GOVERNMENT'S LEGISLATIVE PROPOSALS TO DEAL WITH INFLATION

Mr. David MacDonald (Egmont): Mr. Speaker, my question is supplementary to that of the hon. member for Don Valley and I direct it to the Prime Minister. It is also related to questions that I have asked him both yesterday and Friday. Since he has indicated that the program of the government is not totally one of subsidization, and having had a little time to think over the questions raised yesterday, could he indicate in specific terms what legislative proposals the government will be advancing here in order that parliament may deal effectively with the root causes of inflation?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, if the hon. member would refer to my statement of yesterday, and to the one I made early in August, he would see that there are three prongs to the government's attack on inflation: one is subsidization, and I think that that aspect could not be knocked by the opposition because they are asking for higher subsidies rather than lower ones. The other is to ensure a sufficient supply, and the third is to come to the assistance, mainly through social security measures, of those who cannot protect themselves against inflation.

Mr. Speaker: Hon. members will appreciate that we have gone beyond the time allocated under the rules to the question period. I thought I would recognize the hon. member for Egmont on a supplementary question and also the hon. member for Athabasca.

INQUIRY AS TO WHETHER MEASURES ANNOUNCED BY PRIME MINISTER TO COMBAT INFLATION CONSTITUTE GOVERNMENT'S CONTINGENCY PLAN

Mr. Paul Yewchuk (Athabasca): Mr. Speaker, my supplementary question is for the Prime Minister. In previous weeks in the House he mentioned that he had a contingency plan with which to deal with inflation. Can the Prime Minister indicate whether the announcement made yesterday represented this contingency plan or whether there is still a contingency plan to deal with inflation?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I answered the very same question yesterday. The hon. member should refer to Hansard.

OLD AGE SECURITY ACT

PROVISION FOR QUARTERLY ADJUSTMENT OF PENSION

The House resumed from Tuesday, September 4, consideration of the motion of Mr. Lalonde that Bill C-219, to amend the Old Age Security Act, be read the second time and referred to the committee of the whole House.

Mr. Speaker: As we adjourned last night, the hon. member for Bellechasse had been recognized. I therefore recognize the hon. member for Bellechasse.

Mr. Adrien Lambert (Bellechasse): I thank you, Mr. Speaker, for giving me the opportunity of concluding my remarks. I shall be very brief in view of the intense heat that we have to put up with. I would merely add this: I have the definite impression that it is extremely advantageous for the Canadian people to have a minority government, because it enables them to have the passing of measures which would certainly have been turned down under a majority government. Here is the proof: A few years ago, under a majority government, the old age security pension had been increased by 42 cents, whereas in 1973, under a minority government and during the same session, we obtained most substantial increases. This means that Canada can do something for the aged whether the government holds a majority or not. What must be considered is the capacity of our country for giving justice and ensuring security for the aged.

I also wished to add that really extraordinary things are happening within the field of family allowances and to meet the needs of those who spend as much today as they did a few years ago for social security, especially family allowances, Providence really put things straight.

This afternoon, I was given really extraordinary answers to questions I had placed on the order paper and that will prove interesting not only to hon. members but to the Canadian people as well.

To the first question:

1. What percentage of the gross national product was spent on family allowances, as at July 31, 1945?

The reply was the following:

1. 1.92 per cent.

Those figures are for the year 1945. Here was the second question:

2. What percentage of the gross national product was spent on family allowances, as at July 31, 1972?

The answer was:

2. 0.49 per cent.

Now, Mr. Speaker, the more people work, the more they develop the natural resources of this country, the more they increase their production capacity so as to enable families and individuals to live in greater comfort, the smaller the percentage of increases benefits granted to families.

Not later than yesterday I was saying that Canadian families, especially those in the province of Quebec, are in difficulties and that we were asking the government to provide a greater percentage for social benefits by increasing family incomes to enable them to cope with the cost of living increase.

Now, Mr. Speaker, social benefits allocated to families in 1947 amounted to 8.99 per cent of the budget and in 1973, to 2.48 per cent.

That is why I was greatly pleased yesterday to hear about the increase that is to be given in October, but as I was leaving the House, I had the honour of meeting the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Lalonde) and of talking for some time with him. He found the statement I made quite reasonable and I repeated to him what I asked during the month of July, although family allowances will be increased from September 1 in order to enable low and middle income families to benefit more from an income which would encourage them to fulfill their duties, to carry out their mission so that this decrease in births comes to an end in our province and our country.

On behalf of these people, I would like to ask the Parliament and the government to adopt this measure as quickly as possible and even if it costs a few millions more I would like to say that the Canadians have carried out a task which is extremely difficult. They turned the wealth of Canada into consumer products. The people did that. This makes the task easier for parliament and government members: we do not have to work to produce these things but we have the responsibility, the duty to work and enact legislation in order to ensure a just and fair distribution of these things so that we are all certain that the weakest, the poorest in society gets enough income to live in quite normal conditions. Providence gives to man, man processes goods and the government must ensure their distribution. Some may disagree as to the means to be taken, but it is a fact that in the Canadian society the most practical means we have known up to now has been to have enough dollar to meet the requirements of modern life. Again, I want to assure the minister and the government of our fullest cooperation in having those measures passed as soon as possible. Thus, we could prove to the people of Canada that we are responsible members, that we are aware of the situation. By the way, we saw again earlier during the question period how parliamentarians are concerned about the problem of the rise in the cost of living.

We, Créditistes, propose as a solution to check the staggering rise in prices and salaries that our suggestion be at least given a trial, namely a compensated discount on Canadian prices, on Canadian production, a discount to be made available to consumers, as the right hon. Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) put it so well this afternoon when he explained in his reply to the leader of the Social Credit party of Canada (Mr. Caouette) that the discount should be passed on to the consumers. So there is only one more step to fuller understanding, that the government do not seek the money required to pay that discount through taxes in the pockets of the taxpayers who already do not have too much, but that it make a sensible use of the Bank of the people of Canada, the Bank of Canada, which has the same powers as any other bank to create credit, to create money.

Then, we would be sure of reaching the goal; consumers would be paying less and the levying of taxes would not contribute to price increases. Mr. Speaker, that is the real solution. Therefore, why not try it on a certain commodity, apply it temporarily or permanently, because I am convinced that after applying it to a certain commodity during a definite period, every Canadian will ask that it be continued, contrary to this policy of prices and salaries control which was applied in the United States with such disastrous results.

This is not the solution. The solution we suggest is the one I have just set forth, and I think it makes good sense if we want the Canadian economy to be brought back to health and to serve all Canadians without problem, to serve all families, so that we can live in a prosperous country with all the freedom we may wish for to and, at the same time, with all the security possible.

[English]

Mr. S. Victor Railton (Welland): Mr. Speaker, I welcome the opportunity to speak in this debate, having heard the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Lalonde) present a package which would bring about changes in two pieces of legislation, and work in escalation of benefits according to the consumer price index. I thought he made a very good case. I realize he had decided that it was about time someone on the government side pointed out the advanced policies that the government had introduced. He also showed the public the practical methods adopted by the government to look after their complaints and to come to their aid.

I was also in this chamber to hear the screams from the opposition parties. Each in turn claimed that the minister's proposal was its idea originally. And some claimed that the amount provided was too little. I can picture the scene when Gabriel sounds his horn, with St. Peter praising the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) and the Minister of National Health and Welfare for this good bill, and in the background a noisy cacophony hollering, "We thought of it first."

The reason for parliament's recall to deal with the railway strike was quite logical. Everyone accepted without question that as the strike continued its effect grew greater. The distribution system and the economy of the country were sliding into chaos. But the accusations of the opposition that the strike would never have happened if the government had taken steps to control inflation were completely false. They indicated ignorance, or an attempt to mislead the public.

After the debate last week on the railway strike I was glad to note that all parties in the House had expressed some ideas about the legislation, so as to ensure fairness both to the unions and management, preserve job security, and at another time introduce the principle of indexing wages to the consumer price index. I believe that was a very definite gain.

In my opinion this present debate does not have quite the emergency flavour as that on the railway strike, mainly because I believe that restrictive measures taken to control prices often upset the balance of the economy and produce effects that are not visible at the time regulations are enacted.

This innovation of indexing is not new. In this parliament, however, it began with the veterans' pension, then was extended to the railway workers in our suggestions to the mediator, and it crops up again in the minister's bill. It is a fairly sensible attempt to help people on fixed incomes to combat the rise in prices.

One should then look at the inflation rate in Canada and conclude that it is as good as or lower than any other industrial nation in the world. This includes the U.S.A., the U.K. and the European Economic Community. In regard to food price rises, Canada is at least comparable to the U.S.A. and better in many ways; but since the rise is about 5 per cent or more, the government's intervention as outlined will give relief to the fixed income groups and dampen the speed of the rise.

What makes inflation so difficult to control are world shortages of protein foods both for humans and for slaughter animals. Moreover, there has been a big shift and change in diet everywhere. This began in Europe and has now shown up in Japan, China, India, Russia and Africa. Another point in this inflationary cycle is that the U.S.A. has a large domestic market and its proportion of food exports to its domestic market is smaller than Canada's.

There have been many examples in the recent past of the bad effects of freezes and attempted price controls. Mr. J. Kenneth Galbraith enunciated the economic truth that controls would never work if instituted at the time or in the face of shortages. Controls tend to reduce production and increase scarcity. One other factor in all this is that people have lost confidence in paper money and ordinary securities and a great deal of private investment has shifted toward real estate. So not only do we have some shortage of money and lack of confidence in the financial markets, but there is less money available for risk and venture capital and new business.

Though we may talk about the causes of inflation and though we should try hard to combat it in every way we can, a very practical approach to the problem through the parliamentary processes would be to make sure that our social security legislation prevents hardship in the lower income groups. In spite of inflation, the majority of Canadians are prosperous and an hour of working time still buys more beef than an hour did ten years ago.

The Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Lalonde) in April this year published a working paper which brought out certain basic values that our Canadian social assistance program should enunciate. First, Canadians should and probably do believe in the independence of the individual. Second, they believe in the responsibility of each person to his neighbour. Third, they believe that there should be equity and justice in the distribution of benefits in this prosperous society.

In other words, we must have independence but also interdependence. As far as possible, all citizens should enjoy good mental and physical health. In this regard we must never forget that good fortune in health is often due to nothing but good luck. In addition, one should consider how Canadians look at the idea of the work ethic. Typically, almost everyone enjoys working for his living, his family and his retirement, and with good grace gives a portion of his earnings to his less fortunate neighbours. We, as Canadians, feel that it is not just the lazy who should get a fair share of leisure. However, we as Canadians also feel that the powerful people in our society should only get their fair share of the increases in national income.

Canadians no longer condone nor admire the private accumulation of great amounts of wealth; nor do they like to see great disparities in income, no matter how menial or, on the other hand, how important a man's occupation may be. Just this morning a report from the board of directors of the Ontario Medical Association discussed this question of professional income. In the past ten years doctors have made money, but they work long hours and accept great responsibility. This will gradually be changed as we learn to cope. We now have very good reasons to apply these ideas and principles that I have enunciated to the present legislation. We can provide escalation to both the old age security and guaranteed income supplement according to the consumer price index.

The working paper of the minister which I mentioned earlier envisaged a joint review by the federal and provincial welfare ministers of the total Canadian social security system, to be completed in two years. It forecast implementation of an agreed upon policy within three to five years, this to be within existing tax levels and following the guidelines coming out of the conference. For instance, family allowances were to be increased by January 1, 1974, and Canada Pension Plan amendments would hopefully be fully escalated in relation to the consumer price index by 1975.

A guaranteed annual income would eventually be available to those people whose earnings are insufficient because of inability to work, or to those people who are not expected to work, such as the retired, the disabled, the single parent families or the unemployables. The latter category results from such factors as age, lack of skills or length of time outside the labour market. This guaranteed annual income was envisaged as being paid in addition to the general income supplement.

These ideas are innovations, but it is obvious in our society that fit and combative people usually do well financially whereas the disabled, the unfit or the non-self-assertive people frequently suffer by comparison. In many primitive societies both in North America and Africa, though cruelties in wartime existed, the aged, the infants and the misfits usually received kindly treatment and a share of the tribal prosperity. They were also included as full members in these primitive societies' activities and consequently had a feeling of belonging.

This act is the beginning of a new recognition of an old fact—the need to supply one section of the community, the elders, with at least a minimal or sustenance level of income. The new act simply changes the old as regards escalation of payments. It brings in quarterly increases related to the consumer price index both on the old age security cheque and the guaranteed income supplement. It does this for both single and married recipients. It does not provide a guaranteed annual income, as it might hope to do in the next five to ten years, at what I would call a dignity level, but it does at least ensure that the old age pension cheque and the guaranteed income supplement will increase quarterly with the consumer price index.

In conclusion, Mr. Speaker, present inflationary trends may continue despite attempts to turn the tide and all attempts of the opposition to help the government—and I say that advisedly—to provide good legislation to do so. However, since the Canadian economy appears to remain buoyant we can afford this scheme. It will cost us a great deal, but this in turn may dampen the economy's boom. Finally, we must not forget that the next logical step in the future will be to consider the necessity for legislating a guaranteed annual income. Who thought of that first?

I would just like to say, since I have had my chance to speak, that it is my feeling that this debate could soon be brought to a close and the matter sent to the committee of the whole.

[Translation]

Mr. Roch La Salle (Joliette): Mr. Speaker, I would like, if I may, to comment briefly on Bill C-219, which is in my opinion well adapted to the present circumstances. We must readjust old age pensions to take into account the increases of recent months in the cost of living. I have listened to several comments since yesterday and, of course, it seems that all parties are generally in favour of this legislation tabled yesterday by the minister. I for one will certainly not hesitate to support this legislation which corrects the difficulties with which senior citizens have been to grips for some time.

I have also listened to certain suggestions that the amounts which should be allowed to senior citizens could be higher than those presently awarded. I believe it is not an exaggeration to suggest the payment of a minimum of $200 per person, considering the cost of living at the present time.

Now, I would like to remind the minister, who is now in the House, of the importance of considering—which I would have liked to see—whether it would be possible under this bill to extend the OAS to the spouse who has not yet reached 65.

It is absolutely impossible for couples to make ends meet when only one spouse receives benefits.

I suggest that it is normal that, like all other hon. members, I remind once again the minister of the importance of establishing, in the near future, I hope, the possibility of allowing a couple to benefit from the maximum of $340, and I hope that amendments will be made and increases will be granted rather shortly so that those individuals may enjoy proper assistance based on the cost of living.

I would have hoped indeed that the minister would take that opportunity to introduce a bill lowering the age of eligibility for a pension. I wish to say that I will readily support that bill bringing A certain remedy for our senior citizens, but I would like to remind the minister once again—and I think that it is my duty to do so—that judging from the comments made to us as members, every Canadian is in favour of that. I say it again, I have already made a survey on the possibility of reducing the eligible age to 60 and 99 per cent of the thousands of answers I received were of course in favour of such a possibility.

I feel that, as representatives of the people, we must assess technical changes in industry over the last few years. We will realize that, physically, it is absolutely necessary to lower to 60 the age of eligibility for the old age security pension. Is it too much to ask that the minister in charge at least consider the possibility of doing so? Of course, some people, whose work is lighter, wish to work until they are 65. On the other hand, we know thaat in some industries where the work is more demanding, several workers would like to be able to get the old age security pension at 60.

We also know that we would thus also improve the social atmosphere. We would make way for younger people and industry would not complain about rejuvenating its labour force. Due to collective bargaining, it is difficult to remove some of these people today; as a matter of fact, in some industries it is impossible to do so.

Therefore, I think that on account of a lack of work, we are now discouraging young people who are now more learned, better informed. I believe we ought to consider the possibility of granting old security to people 60 years old, at least to those who want it. It is right to say, I think, that we have the responsibility of giving a rest to those who deserve it. After working for forty years, a person who reaches 60 deserves, I think, to retire. This should incite hon. members to favour granting old age security in earlier years.

It seems to me the minister had already shown his interest in this proposal. A few months ago, he said in this House he was giving his word he would take up the matter with the provinces. I hope that negotiations to this effect are already under way. Indeed I hope and believe that the Canadian people—in my own riding, the opinion strongly favours this suggestion—would be eager to avail itself of this possibility with all its interesting consequences. This would certainly improve the social climate and I think Parliament should seriously investigate this matter.

The proposition as made is an acceptable corrective, in view of the recently experienced increases, but I feel it is inadequate in comparison with the needs and the changes which workers in industry have known. As evidence of this, I say that in a paper plant which I know quite well, a machine which ran at 300 rpm never rushed its operator nor compelled him to run to do his job. Today, because of the changes, this same machine drives the paper at a rate of 3,000 feet per minute and this forces the worker, even if he is more than 60 years old, to run to do his job properly. This example proves the importance of considering the changes that are happening in industry and the benefits that they may bring.

I therefore believe that the minister is aware of this question today. I urge the government to consider this possibility in the interest of those who are already 60 years old. In view of the present context, I know that the opposition parties could well have a tendency to force the government to take such action. In fact, several hon. members have often stated that they are in favour of such action.

We have heard some members of the Progressive Conservative Party promote a reduction in the pensionable age. I know that the New Democratic Party has long been in favour of a rejuvenation of this legislation. I also know that the members of the Social Credit Party are in favour of this measure. Should I ask all opposition parties to unite and force the government to take this action? We know that we are numerous enough to do this. Of course, you may well tell me that we would have to pay the price for it.

I would like also that we assess the possible savings if, on the one hand, we should grant holidays to thousands of people and, on the other hand, we should found work for thousands of unemployed; I would also like to know what is the cost to society of those unemployed and of the difficulties facing the people nowadays.

I think we could make there important savings which could be very beneficial. In doing so we would, I think, correct and improve a social climate which demands it.

I would like to confine myself to these few remarks. We could make speeches like others did, express many views about the importance of corrective measures needed to check rising prices but I think I must confine myself to this because there will be other opportunities to discuss other issues, other problems or difficulties facing society but I hope that through the plea I make to the Minister first on the possibility to grant the old age security pension at 60 without disregarding the legislation which I find just and equitable with the necessary adjustment, we will succeed in bringing justice to the people and seriously correcting the problems facing us if we lower the eligibility age for old age pensioners for all interested people, all these changes being taken into account.

I hope that the Minister will not wait for the opposition parties that speak loud outside this Parliament and that, occasionally, seem reluctant to vote or to force the government to act in this way. Just two months ago I had the opportunity to move an amendment in this direction but unfortunately in spite of the encouraging words from members of the opposition spoken outside this House I found that they voted unanimously against my amendment.

Then I hope Mr. Speaker that they will be more honest and that if they are in favour of granting the old age security at 60 they will not hesitate to so inform the Parliament. It is certainly not enough to speak about it, we must act. If men are judged from what they do rather than from what they say I hope that what they say outside this House will be implemented within.

I hope that the Minister will take kindly to my appeal before the opposition forces him to act in that way. Society as a whole will take into account, I think, a piece of legislation which could prove so beneficial and we shall really bring in the relief which people so badly need.

I hope that these few comments will make the minister more aware of such a measure and I would be very happy for all those who could profit by it.

Mr. Lalonde: Question.

Mr. P. B. Rynard (Simcoe North): Mr. Speaker, I am a little surprised at the minister shouting "question". Yesterday he took a half hour or more to explain this legislation, which needed no explaining because it is simplicity itself. It does not do anything. When it was asked for last March, the minister could not introduce it. Now, however, it is possible.

I compliment the minister. He has not lost any of his skill for touching up things. When he was on this side, he did a good job of touching up things for the people with whom he was associated. He has not lost his skill. He now has a bigger job to do, and a tough one.

Something should be added to this bill. It does not say anything and does not do anything. You pay your income tax quarterly. What a big deal for the old age pensioner to get his cost of living increase quarterly. Is this again to mislead the old age pensioners into thinking we are doing something for them? We should be increasing the basic old age pension so they can get ahead a little instead of behind.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Hear, hear!

Mr. Rynard: I want to make some suggestions; I hope the minister will take kindly to them. When answering a question today about care for the aging, the disabled and so forth, the minister used the same skill. He should be named "old man tomorrow", the way he gets around questions in the House of Commons and does nothing. That is a good title. Someone once named Sir John A. Macdonald "old man tomorrow", but he did something. Maybe that is how the name came about originally. Because he weighed everything in the balance, and acted.

The minister has a nice smile. I like him. However, I want to say to the minister that the light is always in the window calling sinners to repentance. The minister always has the opportunity to repent.

I say in all seriousness that the eligibility age for old age pension should be lowered to 60 for all those medically unfit to carry on their jobs full time. Putting it another way, this means all those 65 or more in calendar years. We always use calendar years to determine when people should be laid off, not physical years. It should be physical years, not calendar years.

Plant doctors and others should indicate those who should be considered. This could be confirmed by an application form for the pension on physical grounds, either from their own doctor or a specialist, if necessary.

I remember when the hon. member for Oxford (Mr. Nesbitt) raised this matter with regard to the Canada Pension Plan. Unless one's disability is very severe, it is almost impossible to get a pension. No one knows this better than the minister. A person might be completely disabled as far as remunerative work is concerned and still not qualify for a disability pension. If a person is in a wheelchair, he can qualify. Some illnesses are not that obvious.

Whenever there is evidence that a man is physically or mentally unable to join the work force, he should automatically receive a pension, whether it is the old age pension or a disability pension. The old age pension would be the simpler to institute. Even though a man is unable to work, it is sometimes difficult to prove that he is totally disabled. The minister has completely forgotten this man, or has he? I sometimes wonder whether he glosses over legislation just to meet the requirements of the side on which he sits.

The minister has forgotten that a great number of people live in the grey area, just on the brink or slightly above qualifying for the supplement. They are entirely forgotten. They are the victims of a hard earned dollar turned into a soft dollar by an inflationary spending government.

The minister was critical of what the Tories have done. He put on record that he was once a Tory. He forgets that he joined the Liberals about the time the inflationary spiral began. It was this inflationary spiral that necessitated increasing the pensions. The other day the minister even claimed credit for those increases.

I notice the minister is taking in all this. He carefully avoided mentioning the "six buck boys" because he was riding on the other side of the fence at that time. He forgot about the great philanthropists of the Liberal party in the 1950's.

There were other sins of omission and commission. In 1936, Prime Minister King issued perpetual bonds at 3 per cent after lowering the bank interest so that even 3 per cent would make them mighty attractive. It was understood they would be redeemed before the coupons ran out, or at least when they ran out. This Liberal government said "No dice, we won't pay you" and issued more. Some of those people are the same people who bought bonds and today are being denied justice.

In answer to a question today, the Minister of Finance (Mr. Turner) said the government does not yet have an answer to this question. He should also be called "old man tomorrow". What is the government going to do for these people?

I want to quote a case of a man who is now in the grey area about which I have been talking. He cannot qualify for a supplement. He has a few perpetual bonds. At the time he purchased the bonds, he was earning $24 a week, a good salary in those days. He worked six days a week. Today, his weekly salary of $24 would be less than a day's pay, yet the government has the gall to try and redeem these bonds at 39 cents on the dollar. What will 39 cents buy with today's soft money? If the minister will figure it out, he will see that it will purchase less than 15 per cent in housing and food. This is how the senior citizens have been treated over the years. Is it any wonder many of them sit in solitude wondering about the next handout, the misery, and what they will have to do without until the next handout comes along.

The minister boasts about increasing the single pension from $170 to $178.16 and from $324.60 to $341.80 for a married couple. However, he forgets that a bachelor apartment costs $125 per month or more. This leaves a little over $50 per month for boots, clothes and food. The minister also conveniently forgets—and I receive many letters on this point—that in the case of couples when one or the other dies, more often the man first the $324.60, now promised to be $341.80, scant enough to pay apartment rent of $150, leaving $175 for food, clothes—and so on is reduced and whoever is left finds himself in dire straits with just $28 a month for food, clothes and accessories. This is a sad hour for reflection by many who made this country, and made it work with toil, sweat and tears. I should like to ask the minister why he did not do something about this basic problem. These people have to break up their little homes and try to get a one-room establishment in order to cut down on rent and make ends meet. Nothing whatever has been done for these people.

How about the chronically ill people—I have asked this question before—on old age pensions who are trying to live out a daily existence, unwell and needing a little more help because of chronic illness? They are kept surviving at home out of the hospital. The cost of medication is expensive for everyone, but it is doubly expensive for those on low incomes. I should like to ask the minister what in the world he was thinking when he allowed these people to be entirely neglected, as he has over the years since medicare was brought in. The minister knows as well as I that Mr. Justice Hall in his report on medicare recommended that pharmicare services should be included. This has never been done.

This government brought in medicare but nothing has been done for the old age pensioners who are chronically ill, living out of the hospital and not able to buy the drugs they require to continue living out. I suggest that it is penny wise and pound foolish the way national medicare is operated across Canada today. If the minister would sit on a commission to investigate how medicare is operating he would soon find that out for himself.

No consideration has been given to those who are ill and need lifesaving medication. The minister knows as well as I that at age 60 you have four times the amount of illness and hospitalization than you have at age 40. Surely this is a burning question that requires consideration on his part.

This government reminds me of those people who drop dimes in the beggar's cup as they pass by. They do this through compassion but they do not think about the problems of the beggar. Basically the minister has done little or nothing for the old age pensioner who is surely entitled to have his pension adjusted to the increase in the cost of living every three months. As a matter of fact, many taxpayers are required to pay their taxes as I stated earlier to the revenue department on a quarterly basis.

This bill is an empty shell. The minister years ago should have given the old age pensioner enough to live on by raising the basic pension to meet the inflationary dollar situation. The basic old age pension should be at least sufficient to provide housing. With the inflation which has existed for the last 10 years under Liberal government the majority of old age pensioners have been left with less than enough on which to exist. At this time only 40 per cent of those over 65 years of age do not receive the supplement, and about half of those in the 40 per cent group have to scrimp and suffer untold hardship to make ends meet. This is why the basic old age pension should be raised and why drugs should be covered under drugcare, or at least those on doctors' prescriptions. What has been done is a little whitewash job to cover the sins of omission in respect of the treatment of old age pensioners.

Mrs. Grace MacInnis (Vancouver Kingsway): Mr. Speaker, while I was listening to the hon. member who has just completed his speech I found running through my mind the words of one of the hymns of my childhood. I think they describe very well our view of this legislation. The words are:

Showers of blessing,
Showers of blessing we need,
Mercy drops 'round us are falling,

But for the showers we plead.

We get mercy drops from this government, and this legislation is one of those mercy drops for the elderly people of this country. But what we need are showers, or even a first-class thunderstorm, when it comes to providing security for the elderly people. Of course, we welcome these mercy drops, but they are not adequate in themselves to provide security in this day of increasing prices and living costs.

Yesterday my colleague, the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles), pointed out that the old age security pension has never been raised except in response to pressures of various kinds. As a matter of fact it was pressure at the beginning that brought old age pensions into being, pressure which finally became overwhelming throughout the country. I well remember the fact that young families frequently had to take their parents to court and have the court declare that they were unable economically to support their elderly parents before they could get any form of relief. It was that type of thing at the end of the First World War that finally resulted in the first old age pension legislation. Ever since that time we have had a stiff and bitter fight for every single improvement. The pressure has been economic and political, and has been brought to bear by groups of various kinds. I should like to give special mention to one particular group, the old age pensioners themselves. They have exerted increasing pressure.

The elderly people of this country have a great deal of credit coming for the way in which they have organized, first on a local basis, then provincially, and finally in national combinations of various kinds. They have not only managed to make their own ranks strong; they have gained little by little the support and the respect of other segments of the community. You cannot confer dignity upon anyone. But the elderly people of this country have earned the right to dignity as a result of their own abilities and successes in helping themselves and getting the rest of the community to help them. I believe that fact should be mentioned.

The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre also dealt with the various increases to the old age pension. He went over each of the increases, and when you consider the different amounts you realize they do not seem to have any practical relevance either to each other or to conditions that existed at the time. They seem to be calculated on the basis of whatever was felt was the least the government could get away with at a given time.

Every little increase in old age pensions over the years has been prised out of reluctant governments of one sort or another in much the same way as the elderly people as pioneers prised out the rocks and the stumps from this country. All their lives they have done their utmost through backbreaking work, with little time or opportunity to provide security for their old age. Now when they get to their elderly years they have to join the ranks of those who have prised, shoved, pushed and pressed reluctant governments to raise little by little the amount they have to live on to the end of their days. We are still at that stage as far as the elderly people are concerned.

The elderly people are not the only ones in that category, but I am dealing with them in particular in view of the legislation now before us. We have had a very difficult and unremitting struggle to get old age pensions to the point they have now reached. Old age pensions have grown in shreds and patches like a crazy quilt, with little bits from here and yonder. Little attention has been given in the past to whether this quilt would cover a person let alone the bed, giving him or her a reasonably comfortable place in which to rest.

We no longer are satisfied with that. Not that some of us have ever been satisfied with it. We believe that up to this point the old age security pension has never been based on what it should have been based; that is, on how much it costs to live at the time the pension is set, how much it costs for food, clothing, shelter, travel and the amenities which go with full living. This is how the old age security pension should be calculated. We say that now is a good time for this government to try to have this principle as the first properly based edifice in its pension structure. Because pensions ought to be calculated on what will provide a decent and full standard of living for the people involved. This minister has shown some vision and some capacity for seeing around the general pension field. However, I realize he has backslid a bit; with the crowd around him he is in a backsliding environment.

[Mrs. MacInnis (Vancouver Kingsway).]

If this minister has been backsliding somewhat it is because he has had some assistance from pulling hands around him. Yet the minister has shown vision in respect of what can be done in the field of social security legislation. I think probably he is the first minister I have known in his portfolio who has had sense enough to go to the provinces on the matter of family allowances while the amounts and conditions were still fluid. He has asked them what they thought about the tentative study that has been made. He has suggested that they talk about it and see if there can be some agreement. I remember when other ministers went to the provinces with a scheme already established, and with a father-knows-best attitude said, "Take it or leave it". Frequently they left it because it did not suit their particular conditions.

This minister has now brought forward a family allowances scheme which really fits the whole country for the first time in an adequate way. This is a tribute to the minister. I should like to appeal to him now to see if he can do the same thing in trying to be the architect of an old age security scheme that would get away from bits and pieces and shreds and patches. I hope that he will find a way to give all elderly people a fair and just scheme in the light of what it costs to live. I realize that bits and pieces are being put in all the time, but they are still inadequate amounts. The amount of the basic pension is the biggest single difficulty. At the federal convention of our party this summer we came to the conclusion that a basic adequate old age pension, with today's living costs and standards, could not be less than $200. Last year we advocated $150, but that was before inflation really went past the moderate stage into the galloping stage. I do not believe an amount of $200 is too much for today's living conditions.

There is another point. We want also to see put in this new scheme the idea of pensions being made available, not compulsorily, at age 60. If these people were withdrawn from the labour market I think it would give a push to the young people who want a chance to get started in life and have difficulty finding an opportunity. The elderly people dare not let go today, because if they have a job it is their only way of existing until age 65. If it were possible for them to stop work at age 60 and receive their pension this would be very beneficial for those people who have the ailments of heart and body many people have between the ages of 60 and 65. Some of these people are no longer physically or emotionally capable of holding down a job. I think this point should be covered.

Yesterday one of my colleagues in the Social Credit Party again brought up another very important point. I hope the minister will see his way clear to consider these elderly people who are living two to a pension. In a great many cases across this country frequently the husband, because he is a little older, is qualified for the pension while the wife who has never worked outside her home is not. Their family has grown up and there is no other means of living for that couple other than the one pension the husband receives. There is no point in the woman, at that age, going out to look for work because it is non-existent. Even if she did go out to work her elderly husband would be left alone. That woman is doing a tremendous service. She is looking after her husband in the way of providing meals and the other services the wife ordinarily takes care of. However, in many cases she also performs the medical services he needs. She acts as a nurse and supervisor in respect of a whole host of things which otherwise the state would be compelled to provide.

Such a woman should be paid for the type of services she performs. If she were not there society would have to pay for people to do the work she is doing. The very least we could do is to see that there is a pension for her as well as for her husband, regardless of the fact that she is still under the eligible age. I hope we can do this.

I detected on the faces of some people yesterday, when my colleague was pointing out that the amount of the pension should now be $200, a few incredulous smiles and some looks of complete despair. They seemed to be asking where this is going to end. At the present time there can be no end because we are just carrying out an exercise of pouring water through a sieve. We raise the pensions of elderly people, we raise the pensions of the veterans, and we have a bill to raise the pensions of some public servants. Many other changes come along and all the time we are pouring water through a sieve, because by the time the old age pensioner receives the envelope containing his first pension adjustment, which will come in October, the people in the supermarkets, the landlords and the other forces in the community who have the means of life at their command will take away that increase from the older people.

This is the way it is all along the line. I believe it is high time that we faced up to the fact that there is not very much use in giving all these pension increases if as soon as we give them they are taken away. We are now making provision for the subsidization of bread and milk, and there is some moral suasion to have the price of furnace oil kept within bounds. I suggest, however, that these things are not enough. I have heard across this country—and not only in socialist or NDP circles—a growing clamour that those items of food which relate to nutrition and diet ought to be taken out of the profit distributive system.

I am beginning to hear this, not only on hot lines but in serious discussions on the radio and on television. After all, we will have to come to it some day. We came to it years ago in the matter of water. Water is one of the essentials of life and yet none of us worry or lie awake at night tossing in our beds for fear the price of water will go up tomorrow or for fear that one of the firms handling water will beat the others to the punch, raise the price and make the others raise their price too. None of us worries for fear water will become adulterated. We worry plenty about pollution, but that is another matter. None of us fears that additives will be put into the water to make it look more attractive or to make it sell better so that some particular firm can get ahead. It is this kind of nonsense that is wrecking our attempt to provide security through pensions, this kind of nonsense applied to essential foods.

Bread, butter, milk and protein foods such as meat, cheese, eggs and fish are foods which today are being gambled with, just the way people gamble on horses at the exhibition. I tell you frankly that until we as members of parliament start to grapple with the problem of how we can take away these main elements of food from the people who gamble with them—and they are gambled with from the beginning of the food chain, the time when the freight people first get the foods until they reach the supermarket—we will find that our efforts in helping to provide security for the senior citizens and other people will be frustrated. We must find ways and means of achieving a solution to that.

I have been to the supermarkets more frequently in the last while and have found that they have become places of tragedy. I have watched elderly people and harrassed mothers with two or three children clinging to the buggy and following her as she went around the supermarket. I have watched the hopeful expressions on their faces. They do not look at T-bone steaks and other expensive cuts of meat. They look at hamburger, weiners and other small amounts of meat while their faces become longer and longer and they become more desperate, realizing that they can no longer afford those things which are essential and always have been essential.

Until we can provide enough elements of a good core diet for the old people and for families with small children, people on low incomes, we will not be able to resolve this situation and provide the necessary security for older people and in fact for people of any age. I want to say that this is part of the whole problem of social security in this country. That is why I bring it here, without apologies, when speaking on this bill, because it is closely related to it.

This bill will provide a certain increase for older people. The increase is small enough but there are quarterly upward revisions. To be able to keep those upward revisions we must adopt measures in other areas. Let us consider the matter of rents. I wish we could find somebody, perhaps another minister or perhaps even the same minister, who could talk to the relevant ministers in the provinces. In this case it should be the Minister of State for Urban Affairs (Mr. Basford), but so far he has not shown much realization of the fact that people on low incomes or even lower middle incomes simply cannot afford either to buy or rent housing at today's prices. What must be done is for a minister of this government to discuss with the provinces the matter of pulling housing costs into an acceptable price range and holding them there. I think we will have to tackle the important matter of rents. Leadership must begin from here. The provinces have already said—and I have not heard it mentioned here too often—that they are willing to co-operate in the putting into effect of any measures that this government can devise for coping with inflation. I think it is high time that the federal government devised some measure to look after the housing needs of Canadians and to keep the whole price range of new homes within the purchasing power of the middle and lower income people. This cannot be done without lowering interest charges for buyers and without assisting the provinces to work out workable rental legislation which will hold the rents steady.

Mention was made by the hon. member for Simcoe North (Mr. Rynard) of the need to provide free drugs for elderly people under medicare. I will do a little trumpet blowing for a few minutes. Some of you may not have realized that British Columbia now has an NDP government which has announced that they are initiating a program to provide prescription drugs for everyone over the age of 65 without charge. I think the hon. member for Simcoe North would be well advised to urge the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Lalonde) to go to British Columbia to watch that pilot plan in action and then to bring under medicare the sort of scheme that we will put into effect in British Columbia before long.

We must not forget that it was the NDP government in Saskatchewan which supplied the model for medicare and the NDP governments in both Saskatchewan and Manitoba which supplied the model for no-fault car insurance, a system which has been a blessing there and will be a blessing in British Columbia as soon as it is adopted. I suggest that there are places where any federal government could look for a model for ways of protecting people and providing them with social security.

I want to say again that we welcome this legislation. As I said, it is certainly only a drop or two in the bucket, but every drop is welcome so far as we are concerned. It is one more small indication that slowly but surely the notion in this country is beginning to prevail that if we want to create a civilized or even a workable society—remember that this one is not working or we would not have the situation we face—we must have a new motive force behind government, and that motive force must be the meeting of human need rather than the protection of human greed. What this government and others before it have been trying to do for many years is to protect human greed in various ways by looking after the interests of special groups, groups which are privileged at the expense of others who are deprived of what is theirs rightfully. We want to change that. We are at a stage now where never was so much suffered by so many for the advantage of so few. This is one small indication that the government will try to provide a basic pension for elderly people which is worthy of Canada.

Mr. H. G. Herbert (Vaudreuil): Mr. Speaker, one of the key measures in the list of steps the government is taking to counteract the effect of rising prices on consumers is a more rapid increase in old age pensions. This House is being asked to approve an amendment to the Old Age Security Act to provide for quarterly rather than annual escalation. This will mean that instead of waiting until next April for increased pensions the 1.8 million people receiving old age security pensions will get a partial increase for October. If prices continue to rise in the next three months they will get another increase in January.

Since last October average price levels have increased by 5.3 per cent over the previous ten month period. As a result the basic old age security pension would be raised to $105.30 effective October, 1973. Price increases in August, September and October of this year would be reflected in the OAS pension rate for January. Price increases in the period November to January would be reflected in the April pension rates, and so on for each quarter. In this way pensions will become much more responsive to recent price increases.

[Mrs. MacInnis (Vancouver Kingsway).]

The guaranteed income supplement will also be increased for October, and each quarter after that if price levels continue to rise. A single person getting the full supplement to the old age pension can expect to get $179.16 for October in place of the $170.14 he receives for September. A married couple, both getting full GIS and OAS, will find their $324.60 monthly payment increased to $341.80 for October.

The old age security pension, with an eligible age of 65, is a monthly benefit paid to all people who quality on the basis of both age and residence in Canada. These are the only requirements. Canadian citizenship is not necessary. An applicant must prove his age. However, if necessary, help in obtaining proof of age will be given by the old age security office.

A person may qualify for pension if he or she has resided in Canada, after reaching the age of 18, for periods which total at least 40 years, or has resided in Canada for the ten years immediately before approval of the application, or has been present in Canada, after reaching age 18 and prior to the ten years mentioned above, for periods which equal, when totalled, at least three times the length of his or her absences during the ten year period, and has resided in Canada for at least one year immediately preceeding the approval of the application.

Some types of absences from Canada during the qualifying periods under certain circumstances may be considered not to interrupt residence in Canada.

A person should apply six months before reaching pensionable age. This allows time for proof of age to be obtained, if necessary, and for the history of residence to be confirmed.

Payment of pension normally begins in the month following that in which a person reaches the eligible age. If a person is late in applying he or she can be paid retroactively for up to one year.

If through infirmity, illness, insanity or any other cause a pensioner is considered to be incapable of managing his own affairs, the pension may be paid to any person or agency appointed by the regional director to act on the pensioner's behalf. Such a person or agency is required to account to the regional director annually, and at the end of the appointment, for money received and spent.

An old age security pensioner may receive a guaranteed income supplement if he or she has no income other than the pension, or only a small amount. An application for the guaranteed income supplement is sent to each old age security pensioner around the time application for pension is approved. Accompanying the application is a booklet giving details of the plan and a guide to help in completing the application form.

Anything considered as income for income tax purposes is counted as income for the purpose of the guaranteed income supplement, even if the amount is not large enough to require payment of income tax or even if one did not file an income tax return.

Income does not include possessions, savings, investments, or a home or property that one may own; nor does it include for purposes of the guaranteed income supplement the old age security pension itself. Income is any money one receives in the form of retirement pensions, earnings, interest, dividends, rents, etc.

A review of the history of universal old age security and guaranteed income supplement payments indicates that universal old age security payment replaced needs-tested payment. The guaranteed income supplement has been introduced. The escalation formula has been introduced for the OAS and GIS. A special GIS rate for married couples has been introduced, and full cost of living escalation has been introduced for OAS and GIS, with henceforth quarterly escalation.

It is interesting to note that over 1,800,000 persons are presently receiving old age security payments in Canada. Of this total 576,000 receive partial benefits under the guaranteed income supplement plan, and some 478,000 receive the full benefit of the guaranteed income supplement.

The cost to the taxpayer of old age security in the year 1972-73 is $1,786 million, and the guaranteed income supplement adds another $739 million, for a total of over $2½ billion. In 1973-74 the estimate for old age security is $2,203 million, and for the guaranteed income supplement $750 million, making a total of almost $3 billion. This represents something like 15 per cent of the total federal tax load, and if related to personal income is something in the order of 50 cents on every dollar of federal personal income tax.

Not only has the government given Canadian senior citizens improved financial security through the most generous old age security plan in the world, both in terms of benefits and eligibility, but the energy and creativity of so many of our older people are also being rewarded through the New Horizons program which is administered by the Department of National Health and Welfare.

It has met with overwhelming acceptance by retired citizens as a means of helping themselves remain active in our country's activities and provide a service for their peers who for some reason are cut off from the mainstream of Canadian life. By the end of this month the program will have provided funds totalling more than $7 million for just over 1,100 projects in its ten months of operation, and by the end of this year we can expect to have added to that a further $2.3 million in funding.

This, Mr. Speaker, will be the second time this year that the government has increased the old age security pension. Last April it was raised to $100 a month from its previous level of $82.88. In May of 1972 the 2 per cent ceiling on escalation was removed, and full automatic escalation was extended to both the guaranteed income supplement and the old age security pension.

In the period since 1967 when the GIS was first paid the combined pension has risen from $105 to $179.16 for a single person, or from $210 to $341.80 for a married pensioner couple.

I am disappointed that the parties in this House were not able to reach agreement on an early termination of this debate. Mr. Speaker, we believe that Bill C-219 deserves and, it is to be hoped, will soon receive unanimous support.

● (1630)

Mr. Eudore Allard (Rimouski): Mr. Speaker, without any personal preliminary comments, I would like to offer my most sincere contribution to the fight against inflation, unemployment and poverty, in the present and normal framework of our monetary, economic and political systems of free enterprise as they exist and operate today in Canada.

I will give immediately the basic principle underlining the global view I want to give of the present situation of our national economy in 1973 and of a slightly different way of checking the economic, national, personal, familial or social imbalance which affects all of us through the well known problems of inflation, unemployment and poverty. This basic principle is as follows: the same monetary, economic and political systems which make possible such a magnificent national production of over $114 billion in 1973, that is an average of $5,000 per citizen, or $25,000 per family of 5 persons, could also allow us to legislate in such a way as to distribute in a more adequate fashion these resources amongst the persons, the families and the business enterprises which make up our country.

This basic principle is translated into a practical technique, in a recognized down to earth formula which is called "merchandizing". All businessmen, producers, real producers, produce not for production sake but for consumption, for the distribution of their production, for the needs of their customers capable of paying the going price. With this basic principle, this practical technique there is every chance to attain the goals chosen instead of letting ourselves be carried by chance, tradition, conservatism, superficial, patchwork, slap-dash methods inpired by intellectual or mental anemia. Having clarified the basic principle and practical technique which guide me, I trust my explanation will serve as a basis in judging the relative value of my way of understanding and remedying the present economic situation, and that of the government as expressed by the right hon. Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) and contained in the bills now being put before us supposedly to check inflation.

Please note, however, that according to me it is not enough to check inflation, unemployment and poverty; we must, above all, correct the situation and restore permanently the national economic balance between individuals, families and business enterprises of all sorts.

The national economic imbalance of inflation, unemployment and poverty which affect all strata of society is not the result of chance, but that of the legislative measures passed by the 264 Canadian ministers and members of Parliament elected by the people. They alone have the right to vote in Parliament for the passage of bills on the distribution of income and taxes among individuals, families and business enterprises.

If production in Canada, in 1973, reaches $114 billion or $5,000 per capita, Canada will rank amongst the richest nations in the world. We can see that all our economic ills are but the result of a poor distribution of the extraordinary production amongst all Canadians, each one of whom has the right to live.

Providence has placed an over abundance of all things in nature. There is always too much for all and enough for everyone. Nature lacks nothing, but its managers are remiss in the distribution of its wealth.

All 264 federal ministers and members of Parliament are Canadian consumers. All presidents, directors and managers of our larger private and public corporations are also Canadian consumers and depend on the 22 million Canadian consumers who need a 1973 purchasing power to live in 1973.

The input of capital, international trade, and multinational companies contribute to our national production in 1973. All those factors are subject to and governed by Canadian legislation in 1973.

The 264 federal ministers and members can immediately transfer $18 billion of eager capitalization to a lagging consumption within our monetary, economic, political, regular, capitalist, and conventional systems of free enterprise.

It is through legislative action that our governments have fostered poverty, unemployment and inflation. It is through reverse legislative action that our governments will restore the national economic balance for all Canadians.

The 264 ministers and members of the Parliament of Canada, elected by all the people of Canada, can immediately transfer, if they want to, $18 billion from the ambitious capitalization to the deficient consumption out of the 1973 production, and that's that.

These $18 billion will be drawn solely from concrete reserves, discretely or secretly constituted by multi-millionaire or billionaire companies, thanks to tax exemptions, excessive safety reserves or unjustified depreciations. Understand if you will, but all the harm comes from there.

Without any tax increase, without any price increase, our present 264 ministers and members will be able to reduce the income tax of the nine million Canadian producers, for their work or their capital, and pay to the 13 million dependent Canadians, without work or capital, a vital personal minimum in every household, lodging, home or slum in Canada, in 1973.

All 22 million Canadian consumers will thus find themselves revalorized by this tremendous increase of their purchasing power, for themselves or their families, regenerated by a more complete participation in the national production, and all the 264 ministers and members will have fulfilled their role which is to see economic justice prevail in a just society.

All 9 million Canadian producers would have their taxes abated by roughly 40 per cent. They would pay $3 instead of $5, $300 instead of $500, $3,000 instead of $5,000, and all 13 million dependent Canadians in every house, housing unit, residence or slum in Canada would receive their guaranteed personal income in accordance with the following table:

1. $30 a month per citizen between the ages of 0 and 9;

2. $60 a month per citizen between the ages of 10 and 17;

[Mr. Allard.]

3. $90 a month per citizen between the ages of 18 and 59;

4. $200 a month per citizen 60 years of age and over.

However simplified this program might seem at first glance, a serious analysis will prove that it could replace to advantage the many present allowance, grant and pension programs which are not satisfactory and require too many useless inquiries and requests.

Any citizen earning less than $50 a week or $2600 a year may be considered as a dependent citizen and claim that amount.

Nine million Canadian producers derive income from salaries or interest on their capital and pay the required taxes; 13 million dependent Canadians without work or capital have a right to live and claim their guaranteed vital right or guaranteed personal income; 22 million Canadian consumers thus become economically more valuable in the eyes of the state, society, and all their fellow-citizens.

Mr. Speaker, let hon. members and ministers be optimistic and practical in view of the great national output produced by 9 million working Canadians. It is possible to meet the needs of 22 million Canadian consumers, including the 13 million dependent Canadians who are entitled to that production according to a distribution determined by the government.

Mr. Speaker, inflation, unemployment and poverty are the three main symptoms of the national economic imbalance which still plagues all Canadian people, from the top to the bottom of the economic and social scale.

Only if the national economic balance is restored among individuals, families and companies will poverty, unemployment and inflation disappear from our midst. Only the government of Canada has the power to restore as soon as possible and maintain afterwards the national economic balance that would remove poverty, unemployment and inflation, for the benefit of all Canadian citizens and that, in 1973. All that is needed is to so decide before God and before men.

No high official, or academic, or professional body, or union or national or provincial economic council, no religious group, catholic, protestant or other, no nationality, English, French or other, no political party, or election fund, no bank manager or company president or director has the right to pass legislation in the Parliament of Canada. Only the 264 members, elected by the Canadian people, have the right to vote in the Canadian Parliament on behalf of the 22 million citizens of Canada.

Therefore, it is now, in 1973, that the present problems must be solved. The same constitution, the same Confederation, the same financial, economic and political mechanisms that provide the Canadian people with the tremendous national product of $114 billion, can thus enable us to ensure a fairer distribution among the 22 million Canadian citizens who live in the 6 million houses, residences or slums across our beautiful Canada. The 264 Canadian members of Parliament, the 30 ministers, the Prime Minister, and especially the Minister of Finance as well as the Minister of National Health and Welfare, with the minister responsible for the Treasury Board and the three leaders of the opposition parties are the only Canadians responsible for restoring the national economic balance among individuals, families and companies within the Canadian economy in 1973, in our present government.

Mr. Speaker, that is what we could do with the present monetary system, if only it was really set up in a way to give satisfaction and do more justice to all Canadians.

Mr. Claude Wagner (Saint-Hyacinthe): Mr. Speaker, in view of this capital legislation, we would be tempted to wonder why hon. members are losing their time making speeches when they all agree. Politics is rather curious. If a member refuses to speak, to say that he agrees or disagrees, there will always be someone to claim that he dared not state his views or that he was opposed to this relief given by the government to the aged.

So it is important on the occasion of a debate on such a legislation that very briefly every one voice his approval or disapproval so that our views be on the record. At least, we have given an opinion.

Mr. Speaker, I would be happy if we discussed the bill in a less partisan way than in the beginning. I was surprised indeed when the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Lalonde) got carried away in his first words. He was not satisfied with introducing a pretty valuable legislation, he took advantage of the situation to launch partisan attacks, to discredit upon what may have been done when Conservatives were in power, to reserve for himself and the Liberal party the merit of this legislation and previous bills, claiming that in the field of social security and social progress, the people opposite possess the whole truth.

It is unfortunate, Mr. Speaker, that people who heard speeches from the gallery or read Hansard wonder why we have to play partisan politics on the backs of senior citizens, children or welfare recipients. On the contrary, it seems to me that if the treasury is in a position to give more relief to the aged, it is the Crown, Parliament which is responsible for it. No political party or politician can lay claim to all the merits of a legislation for himself or his colleagues.

Mr. Speaker, I understand the pretexts or excuses to justify those positions. Within a few days the members of the government will participate in a great annual convention which will take place September 15 and where they will consider the attitude of the Canadian public towards their party last October. They will probably come to the conclusion that the Canadian people have been extremely wise and they will probably also conclude that the convention of September 15 may be followed by another one where they will be able to decide once and for all what will happen to their party.

Be that as it may, Mr. Speaker, I believe that speeches with electoral undertones such as those given here should be set aside for other occasions, and I urge the Minister of National Health and Welfare to repeat, maybe even more violently, the first part of his remarks before his supporters at the convention. This convention will open at the same time as the official statistics on the cost of living are published, in September. Maybe Liberal supporters will then also come to the conclusion that this government is unable to solve the problem of the cost of living and the problems of the Canadian economy. In fact, one crisis follows another while the government hopes for a miracle from one week to the next, but certainly this miracle does not consist in legislation as inadequate and ineffective as that which we are studying today.

Mr. Marchand (Langelier): That is not partisanship!

Mr. Wagner: Mr. Speaker, we are quite willing not to be partisan, as the Minister of Transport (Mr. Marchand) says and to give justice to those who deserve it. But what strikes me is not so much the gist of this legislation, but the attitude, the overbearing manner, the spirit in which it is introduced, similar to that which the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Lalonde) showed in introducing the bill, and that in which the Minister of Transport responded at noon today, by quoting statistics, to a deeply human problem, for instance, that experienced by the expropriated people of Sainte-Scholastique. Reacting with the arrogance our hon. friends opposite have showed for some time will not develop trust in our political leaders and institutions among the Canadian people.

Mr. Speaker, I will talk about this bill. I am quite willing to say that escalating old age pensions in line with the cost of living has some merit. However, it should be recognized that a year ago almost to the day, we traveled across the land and solemnly promised to increase these pensions and, in co-operation with the provinces, stated that escalations of these pensions in line with the cost of living index would be necessary so that these periodic readjustments would not be immediately eaten up by the increases in the cost of living. I even pointed out at that time that obviously this would not permanently solve the problem. I feel that there are other values which are much more important than that of purchasing power and which are certainly not properly served by an increase of a few cents or a few dollars.

You will remember, Mr. Speaker, that at that time our friends opposite retorted, as reported on the first page of the newspapers: The Progressive Conservative Party members, especially Wagner, are making stupid and unconsidered promises. And these same Liberals only had, Mr. Speaker, to be barely returned to power and to remain in power, thanks to the NDP's systematic prostitution and to be hard pressed by a dynamic, alert, courageous and powerful opposition, to adjust their firing—that is part of an excellent strategy,—and to make their own several Progressive Conservative commitments, among which the subject matter of Bill C-219. Therefore, let us give back to Caesar what belongs to Caesar: Let us recognize where the good things come from and let us accept them for the good of the Canadian people.

Let us stop playing a hypocritical game.

Of course, we will vote for this measure to amend the Old Age Security Act in order to provide quarterly adjustments, to the pension and guaranteed income supplement based on the quarterly increases in the consumer price index. However these provisions affect only the present pensioners and in no way reach people of 60 to 65 years of age. While waiting for a guaranteed minimum income policy, I ask the government to specify its views on the possible and gradual eligibility of Canadians aged from 60 to 65 years to the old age security pension. I ask the government to deal with the situation of the citizen of 60 to 65 years whose spouse is already aged 65 years or more, in order that he may now receive a pension. During this debate, it seems to me that the Minister of National Health and Welfare, if he can take a moment at the end of the debate, ought to answer these questions asked by thousands of Canadian men and women who are directly concerned. This question never ceases to crop up when we visit our constituencies and have the chance to talk to various classes of people. It is of concern to them and should, I think, bring a response from the government as soon as possible.

The sole reference which may be made to this operation's cost in millions of dollars is not, in my view a satisfactory answer. It is not because someone says: This will cost one, two or five millions more that this is an adequate solution to a human problem, especially when we know of the shameful waste in the spending of public funds and when we know that the wrong projections of this Minister of Finance, once adjusted, enable the government to make greater contributions from the Treasury without raising taxes for that. Millions of people are guided toward foreign aid and other activities in foreign countries so that the reports we receive allow us to think that it is quite possible those funds are not distributed as a businessman would. All that constitutes a record that I, for one, in any case, intend to look into in coming weeks to find out if those funds made available by the government of Canada and distributed by CIDA truly reach their destination and are truly used to help underdeveloped foreign countries in need of them.

If in reply to the requests voiced here for the 60 and 65 year olds reference is made to the concept of guaranteed minimum income or the objective of coherence in the field of social security, to be considered suitably, that concept will have to be further specified by the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Lalonde). As a matter of fact I wonder—and that might be another question for the minister to answer—what has been done since the release of the yellow paper last spring on the question of guaranteed minimum income.

Surely, I hope the government will give us explanations on the subject because it is not a type of subject that should be saved only for an election campaign. That question could well be examined thoroughly and intelligently in this House and could well constitute a subject matter to be examined by the parliamentary committee.

In any case, Mr. Speaker, this bill pertains only to those 65 and over. In support in that regard of my colleagues of the Social Credit I ask the government in the expectancy of a guaranteed minimum income for all, to refer to the committee of the House that whole question of the 60 and 65 year olds. Is this financially possible? What are the true objections? What are the statistics concerning this? How can this be interpretated in the various areas of this country? What decisions should be taken and can the budget warrant such a decision?

It seems it would be in our interest to air the whole question in a committee of the House, using the information the government has and adding ours. Let that committee make its study without delay, a study leading eventually to recommendations that could probably be referred to a federal-provincial conference on social security.

[Mr. Wagner.]

This bill, concerning people of 65 and over, is a step forward in that the increase already granted the golden age people would mean a somewhat better position, because that increase would not be completely eroded by the ceaseless increase in the cost of living. But the Canadian people will quickly understand, and especially the pensioners, that this is not all the same a real and net increase. It does not mean either an increase in the purchasing power of the 65-year old people but at the most a normal and just measure to maintain the pensioners' purchasing power. So that, Mr. Speaker, the people of 65 or over find themselves like their fellow citizens, like the average citizen, the knife-grinder, the dealer, in that they are at grips with the cost-of-living problems.

The measures announced by the right hon. Prime Minister to check the cost-of-living increase are but a partial solution to the inflation problems on the national level. Moreover, those measures came once the harm was done, when the crisis was at its pinnacle. And we realize today how appropriate it was for my party last Friday to be able to have Bill C-219 amended so that the railway workers may get a better treatment to cope with the cost of living.

The government, Mr. Speaker, did not worry enough about the condition of the average people, the average Canadian, the ordinary taxpayer, the one whose tax is deducted from his salary, the one who cannot cheat the revenue department. Those Canadians are probably the ones who are forgotten by this government. The government has not announced anything, for instance, concerning rates of interest on mortgages, the 11 per cent tax on building materials, transportation, special taxes on clothing for adults. He stopped half-way, that is with clothing for children. There are so many areas beside food where the constant increase in the cost of living is being felt. And yet, most Canadians, whether they are less or more than 60 years of age expected some concrete measures in these specific areas. The government was content, unfortunately, with a partial approach and incomplete solutions, mostly because of the cost of living, but also for other reasons which stem from the very concept of our society.

Social unequalities go unchanged in this country. The imbalance in the access to human achievement is also being perpetuated in this country. In the very name of social justice, more should have been done, Mr. Speaker. In order to convince ourselves better, we have but to read the Labour Day message of the Canadian Catholic Conference.

I do not intend to repeat what the bishops said, even though I am in excellent company, but I will limit myself, Mr. Speaker, to quoting four sentences which could probably be reflected upon by us all while we discuss the problem of the cost of living, and in particular, its incidence on senior citizens.

Here is the first sentence:

1. Why must the little consumers with fixed incomes bear the weight of the spiraling cost of living while corporations continue to increase their profits?

2. Why is it that one Canadian out of four cannot adequately fulfill his basic needs for food, clothing, housing, while others get rich in the food, clothing and real estate industries?

3. Why does it cost so much for some people to eliminate their debts while banks and finance companies accumulate abusive profits?

4. Why is it that international trade agreements are usually in favour of developed countries to the disavantage of those countries which supply the raw materials?

Mr. Roy (Laval): Are there answers to these questions?

Mr. Wagner: We realize, Mr. Speaker, as the hon. member for Laval (Mr. Roy) is suggesting, that the answers must come from the government. The government must have leadership and undertake to eliminate these disparities. There will no doubt always be disparities, but as long as the government has enough heart and courage to take the necessary decisions, we can believe that answers will be found to those questions asked by the bishops. But when a government is more interested in hanging on, in running with the hare and hunting with the hounds, in looking out for its left wing and buttering it up, in delighting itself in a statu quo situation, then we shall never get answers to those questions asked by the bishops and the Canadian people.

Mr. Speaker, we must also realize that the bill now before us is valid only in the short term, as a palliative, a necessity, an answer given by the present system. Thus, it is inappropriate, ineffective and inadequate because it does perpetuate marked disparities in our society, favouring one class in particular, chastising another and ignoring all the others. Above all it does perpetuate one supreme value, namely the concept of the purchasing power.

Let me quote the last part of the bishops' message on social disparities.

Consumer power has become the unequivocal symbol of a social class . . . This assessment based on financial resources creates new social gaps which are more difficult to fill than those which exist between people speaking different languages. How can we be proud of this institutionalization of social segregations?

Mr. Speaker, most of the people who will be affected by this bill, will not, I am afraid, get very much out of it, because of the steady increase in the cost of living. This bill does not root out in any way the evil which makes them, like many of our citizens aged between 60 and 65 and ordinary citizens generally, people who have worked all their lives, and have earned money that has been given out to those who already have too much. The measure of justice which is commensurate with the fundamental values of man, where human fraternity is concerned is still to come.

I hope the government, during this debate, inspired by the contents of the yellow paper or something else, will tell us about the measures to come, the legislation being considered, which will be more in harmoney with our new collective conscience, especially among the youth of this country.

[English]

Mr. Jack Cullen (Sarnia-Lambton): Mr. Speaker, I listened with some interest to the hon. member for Saint-Hyacinthe (Mr. Wagner) who, as a former barrister and a distinguished judge, I am sure was told during one of his law lectures that when you have the facts on your side you pound them into the jury, when you have the law on your side you pound it into the judge, but when you have neither the facts nor the law on your side then you pound the table.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Cullen: That is what we found the hon. member doing. I noted with interest that in his comments he made reference to the Canadian Catholic Conference but that he would not read from its report. It was a pretty well selective bit of reading that he did. Perhaps I might be permitted to commit the same sin. On page 8 of the English text they commend the government and the action it has taken, and they say this:

● (1710)

In this country the Working Paper on Social Security in Canada proposes certain steps towards some measure of income equality. How many of us have given these proposals much attention?

So I suggest with respect to the hon. member that he should re-read that in both official languages to see if he can get the gist of the bishop's message. He said that he did not think we should become too much involved in a partisan political debate. I am not surprised that the hon. member has made this recommendation because in looking at their political background in this area his party are weak. We heard the hon. member for Simcoe North (Mr. Rynard) talk about physical years and we heard the hon. member for Saint-Hyacinthe (Mr. Wagner) talk about calendar years, which is what his cohort indicated they should not be talking about. Then the hon. member for Simcoe North said it is not fair to compare the amounts of the increases because in 1963 there was not the same inflation.

I suggest that the hon. member is really saying that they should not have received any raise during that particular time because they did not need it. If we go along with that and say because there was no inflation they did not need a raise, the hon. member's party had 207 or 209 seats and it seems to me they could have done something to provide some help to these people in respect of the cost of drugs. I do not see one reference in Hansard during that period where the hon. member made the speech he made today about the government doing something about the cost of drugs.

It would seem to me that something could also have been done at that time for housing senior citizens. If that government had been doing what this government is doing, we would have had 20,000 housing units for senior citizens dating back to, say, 1958. What a giant step forward that would have been. But the Tories looked at it with their "tunnelvision", as they seem to do so far as senior citizens are concerned, and said that because there was no inflation they really did not need the money, and decided to turn their attention to something else. Nothing was done about drugs and nothing was done about housing. Nothing substantial was done to give dignity to the senior citizens in programs such as the New Horizons Program. So I am not surprised that the hon. member does not want to become involved in a political debate, because he knows, as a distinguished barrister, that he does not have much of a case or that certainly his party does not have much of a case.

I listened very carefully and attentively, as I always do, to the hon. member for Vancouver Kingsway (Mrs. MacInnis). I heard her comment to the effect that we should be paying married couples $400 a month. She did not suggest how much that would cost, but I suggest it would be something in the neighbourhood of $1,300 million. The NDP is different when it forms a government from when it is in opposition. We have heard the NDP talk about $400 a month, but what does the NDP government give when it is in power in certain provinces? In British Columbia they suggest $250 a month is enough. In Manitoba it is $242 a month. In Saskatchewan it is $219, plus a 5 per cent increase announced in August which takes it to $230 a month. What is the highest figure in one of the richest provinces, British Columbia, where most of the money to be spent was raised by the Social Credit Party? The amount in that province is $250 a month. Half of that amount comes from the federal treasury.

It is one thing to be in opposition; it is another thing to be in government so far as the NDP is concerned.

Mr. Orlikow: Mr. Speaker, would the hon. member permit a question?

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Laniel): The hon. member would have to have the consent of the hon. member who has the floor.

Mr. Cullen: Mr. Speaker, I am very anxious to see this bill go to the committee stage today. I would be quite happy to take the question right now, but—

Some hon. Members: Question.

Mr. Cullen: If hon. members are prepared to agree to second reading and proceed to the committee stage I would be happy to sit down now. I do not think it is necessary to catalogue what the government has done; it has been fantastic. Mr. Speaker, might the question be put now?

Some hon. Members: Question.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Laniel): Order, please. Other members are standing up, so there does not seem to be unanimous consent.

Mr. Cullen: I must say I regret that. This bill provides for a very ordinary run-of-the-mill increase based on the cost of living. I think the tactic and the idea behind this is good. I believe it is necessary. I am afraid, however, that there does not appear to be unanimity among the opposition parties. I notice that no members from the Liberal Party stood up. They are prepared to pass the bill and refer it to the committee stage.

Mr. Macquarrie: I rise on a point of order, Mr. Speaker. There seems to be a grasping for consensus by the hon. member. We are, as we were last night, prepared to facilitate the passage of this bill.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Laniel): Order, please. Is it the wish of the House that I ask whether there is unanimous consent to put the motion for second reading at this time?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

• (1720)

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Laniel): I am wondering if the House would give unanimous consent to proceed immediately to the second reading of the bill and to its reference to the committee of the whole.

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time, and the House went into committee thereon—Mr. Laniel in the chair.

The Deputy Chairman: Shall clause 1 carry?

Mr. Latulippe: Mr. Chairman, I am pleased to say a few words on clause 1 of Bill C-219.

Mr. Chairman, this bill is very important even if we know that it will not solve our problems; we must apply ourselves to restore a national balance between the various economic social and legislative elements in this country. We have legislation to pass because of the effects of the present system which has thrown our economy off balance to such an extent that it is necessary through legislation and regulations to increase pensions, salaries, etc. Mr. Speaker, people are not satisfied and amendments must be introduced and corrective measures must be passed in several fields.

I would say, Mr. Chairman, that the modern state is man's enemy. In the midst of this chaos, there is however one thing: the success of science. The results are there before our eyes as evident as the light. Science itself gives proof of it, as it is a perfect success in its own field but men use it as an instrument of exploitation and domination. We are always exploited, dominated by various factors. When there is no war on we experience a general unbalance in our economy, tax increases, problems for our population, increases in prices, in the unemployment rate too, and we witness a general unbalance of our economy. We have no stability and the bill before us is far from being able to stabilize the economy as much as it should.

Mr. Chairman, the development of interplanetary rockets is wonderful in itself. Man is freed from the universal gravitational pull, the cosmic route is open, all planets are within the reach of any man or nation: is it not magnificent, Mr. Chairman? In this age of plenty, when science is as advanced and applied as it is, we can hardly find the most simple solutions. We cannot make them available to the people so that they may live in reasonable comfort. We hear of nothing but surpluses in our economy; we hear of nothing but production increases and we are bothered by overproduction. In front of so many wonders the pride of men knows no limit but at the same time on earth at least one billion people out of three billion do not fully fill their stomach. And we have the guts, Mr. Chairman, in our economy, in this Parliament to give subsidies, to pay exorbitant amounts of money through taxes taken out of the pockets of citizens who do not have enough, to reduce our production. It is a crime, Mr. Chairman, vis-à-vis humanity. Instead of reducing production we should provide funds to increase it, to make available to a greater extent to Canadians and those who need it in the world. In front of so many wonders the pride of men knows no limit. In that foolish run towards ever more science, more technology, more conquests of a material nature, humanity is heading the wrong way.

It is not a question of condemning science or technology Mr. Chairman, but of proclaiming that they are not an aim per se, that they have their limits in any case, that they must above all serve man, not enslave him, or even less destroy him and for all those reasons they must remain at the human level. Are the mediocre means proposed by the Prime Minister likely to cure the evils from which we suffer? They are but puny measures; prices will continue to rise, taxes will take even more away from the people. The evils from which we suffer are the result of the present system where finance is the only thing worth working for.

We do not work for the human being, we do not try to give him what he needs, to make available to him what he requires; for example, we work to increase interests as well as the public debt. When the public debt grows, taxes go up.

The bill now under consideration reflects the wish to see the cost of living go up still further, since pensions will be geared to the cost of living every three months. Taxes of all kinds are crippling the economy and creating inflation. What is crippling the economy is the lack of consumer purchasing power.

Through these various means, Mr. Chairman, the essential purchasing power is taken away from the consumers and given to the makers of dollars, and as a result, interest rates and the public debt go up.

Under those conditions, Mr. Chairman, we must find the abuses and remove them if we really want to solve the problems.

We find, Mr. Chairman, that the problem is not to feed the hungry but to eradicate hunger; it is not to help the oppressed but to abolish oppression; it is not to remove the evils throughout the world, but to cope with them with the proper remedies.

● (1730)

Of course, it is understood that every man's right entails a duty towards society, but who can force the State to fulfil its duties? The State is the power, the strength, the law; it is the law; it has no moral conscience, it is irresponsible, it is its own end and purpose. The State is nothing more than a manifestation of tensions.

That is what I think, Mr. Chairman; that is why we cannot remedy deplorable situations, solve our problems and restore our economic stability.

The man who is hungry has a right to life and food. In the world of law, he can only die; but in fact, he will live, saved by pity, charity; but these cannot constitute in the system anything but a compounding influence, for they only confirm the impotence of the law and its decisions.

Mr. Chairman, when a large number of Canadians live off welfare, live off the workers who sweat and carry the burden of taxes, of public debts, we are discouraging all initiative. There are no Canadians with any encouragement left, there are no Canadians, owners of industries or businesses, with any encouragement left. All are discouraged, all are ready to give up. A great number of them are contemplating giving up their business because they can not even earn an adequate living from it.

Because of the burden they must bear, Mr. Chairman, because they have to carry everything, the State, taxes, income taxes, increases in salaries, they are incapable of making ends meet. That is the cause of great bankruptcies these days.

Mr. Chairman, we must therefore take modern businesses out of the false universe of law to make them enter into the living universe of duty and of moral obligation. Order presupposes a law which establishes an end; it also requires means to attain an end.

Here again, in Canada, during the first ten days of August, Mr. Chairman, Her Majesty the Queen of England and the Prime Ministers of 32 countries members of the Commonwealth held a great conference in Ottawa to study major economic problems in relations between great institutions. At no time did anyone deign lower himself to the question of the needs of man, who is the basic unit of all political, economic and social administrations.

Despite the extraordinary growth of our annual production, the national economic disequilibrium is present everywhere under all kinds of forms, for example inflation, unemployment, and poverty affecting all social levels, even the richest.

Faced with the urgent necessity of restoring the economic balance in the life of the nation, each of us tries to make gestures, defensive acts in a hurry and a flurry which are not in keeping with the importance of the corrections that must be made. These corrections would require more calm and mastery to be really efficient, for now and the future.

The regulations or improvements to the regulations which we are now adopting to do some good to one sector of our society—senior citizens—are being adopted much too rapidly. The problem has not been sufficiently studied.

What we give, we give only in driblets, whereas we should give fully and generously to restore the balance of our economy.

I state here, Mr. Chairman, the whole difference between act and thought, between gesture and idea. When we say that thought leads the world, that thought comes before action, that we must think before acting or speaking—because the word equals an act in some circumstances—we recognize explicitly that all that happens in real life is the result of previous thinking which led to action and to a change in our way of life.

Mr. Chairman, if we only see inflation, unemployment and poverty, if all Canadians complain that incomes are too low and taxes too high, I say that an exact knowledge of present economic facts can enable us to realize immediately, for all Canadians, a rise in income or a decrease in taxes. If we do not take time to get information, statistics tell us that in Canada, in 1973, we produce $114 million's worth of goods and services but that only 60 per cent of this production are consumed and 40 per cent capitalized. Consumption merely amounts to $66 billion and capitalization of $48 billion, $8 billion of which for individuals and $40 billion for big companies and financial institutions.

Knowing that, Mr. Chairman, we realize it would be easy to transfer $18 billion from capitalization to consumption. Thirty billion would still be left for the liquidity requirements of all companies and for the development projects needed for expansion needs in Canada. With $18 billion added to the citizens' purchasing power the government could reduce by 40 per cent the tax on the workers' income and provide also a guaranteed minimum income to every citizen.

We talk about a guaranteed minimum income, but we do not ask ourselves whether we have sufficient revenues for that. We know we have a $48 billion surplus in 1972-73, but we do not want to talk about it. We do not realize that we could spend up to $15 or $18 billion to provide a guaranteed minimum income to all Canadian citizens, even with a tax reduction. All Canadian citizens would then see an increase in their purchasing power, without any increase in taxes.

A vast economic operation would be needed to restore the economic balance. First of all, we would have to remove the taxes that most contribute to the increase in the cost of living, such as the 11 per cent tax on building materials. But they do not want us to talk about that, they do not want that to be mentioned. We are called to order when we want to mention it, but it is a tax that directly contributes to the rising cost of living. It is a tax that gets us into extreme debts, a tax the Canadian people could do without, for it greatly contributes to the increase in housing. Rates of interest should be reduced, especially those of the Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation, that exploits the citizens, although the government controls it. The Industrial Development Bank exploits industries by lending money at 12 per cent interest, which contributes to the increase in the cost of living and causes debts to all Canadians. But great care is taken to keep silent on this.

Mr. Chairman, these overly heavy taxes are taking unfair advantages of a great many people and are responsible for the increase in the cost of living.

It is the interest on money which tends to increase the cost of living because no one can make both ends meet without borrowing money. All monies are borrowed from the first to the last cent. All monies bear interest and when the latter is very high, nobody has the courage to denounce that kind of exploitation. As far as I am concerned, I have the courage and the nerve to state the situation to the public and even to the whole world because the problem is the same everywhere: the exploitation of man by money.

The decision of the government to escalate pensions on the cost of living index with quarterly adjustments, is only a band-aid which will not cure economic ills because all other areas will face increases. The labour force will have more excuses to go on strike and demand wage increases, the cost of living will continue to rise and the whole economy will suffer more and more.

It is allright to say: We will adjust the pensions according to the cost of living index but if the cost of living goes higher and higher, what is the use of basing the pensions on the increase of the cost living?

[Mr. Latulippe.]

The causes we should determine are those of the economic ills. We have to uncover them.

To balance our economy, there are only three ways: the financing of our municipalities, school boards and governments according to administrative costs. We must finance stocking at reasonable interest rates, because this interest rate is one of the main causes of the increase in the cost of living. But if the government was willing to take its responsibilities, we could finance all the storage of goods at reasonable interest rates which would not contribute to the increase in the cost of living.

Today still, with the 88 formula of banks to finance storage, we pay a 12 per cent interest rate. This does not make any sense but nobody talks about it. The Prime Minister and the members do not mention it. We are the only ones to talk about it.

The Deputy Chairman: Order! I regret to interrupt the hon. member but his time has now expired.

[English]

Mr. Orlikow: Mr. Chairman, it is not often that I participate in debates about old age pensions because my colleague the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre has been so active in this field. However, I could not let some of the opening remarks made by the minister go by without reply. I consider the minister to be one of the best, if not the best, who has ever held that portfolio in the time that I have been in this House. At the same time I consider him to be a friend. But I must say that I was somewhat disappointed in his partisan praise for the record of the Liberal Party in the field of pensions, and I cannot help but refer to the actual record.

The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre referred to the fact that pensions were first introduced in Canada when his predecessor as member for Winnipeg North Centre, the late J. S. Woodsworth, proposed them in 1925. I want to remind the minister that the then member for Winnipeg North Centre, together with the then member for Winnipeg North, Mr. A. A. Heps, jointly wrote a letter to the leaders of the three political parties at that time, Mr. Mackenzie King of the Liberal Party, Mr. Meighen of the Conservative Party, and Mr. Forke of the Progressive Party, in which they indicated that they would support any of the three leaders if they would bring forth pensions. It was only after this that Mr. King agreed to bring forward the first old age pension plan in this country.

I should like to say a few words now about the comments made by the hon. member for Saint-Hyacinthe. I am not going to go back over the record of the Conservative Party when it was led by Mr. Bennett or by the right hon. member for Prince Albert, but I do want to refer briefly to the recent federal election campaign. At that time the New Democratic Party was proposing that the old age pension should be increased to $150 per month. The Leader of the Official Opposition not only would not agree to that, but he would not even agree to increase it to $100 a month. The most that the people of Canada could get from the Leader of the Opposition during the election campaign was a promise to increase the old age pension and the guaranteed income supplement to take care of the increase in the cost of living. When the hon. member for Saint-Hyacinthe speaks about an increase in the old age pension to $400 a month for a couple, I think he should remember what his leader was saying during the election campaign.

Let me now say a few words about the speech made by the hon. member for Sarnia-Lambton in which he was critical of the New Democratic Party provincial governments because they had not raised the rates for welfare or social allowances. I agree with him that the rates for welfare in all provinces should be higher than they are, but in making those remarks he was comparing apples with oranges. We are not here to discuss the rates paid to those people who need assistance in the provinces, though I am prepared to discuss that on another occasion and to agree that the rates are too low in all provinces. I am not very happy about that. We are here to discuss the rates of assistance in the form of old age pensions or guaranteed income supplements or provincial supplements to those people who are 65 years of age or older. The hon. member for Sarnia-Lambton did not put on the record that in the province of British Columbia every single person 65 years of age and over gets a minimum income, guaranteed by the province, of $200 a month. In other words, whatever their income is from other sources, if it is less than $200 the province brings it up to that figure. I think the record should be clear and the hon. member should not have confused it as he did, though perhaps inadvertently.

Mr. Cullen: A point of order, Mr. Chairman. I know the hon. member wants to be fair. It was my intention to make reference to that extra $50 and criticize it, because it goes against N.D.P. policy of universality. It seems to me that all the old age pensioners in Canada should be in a similar situation, rather than being better off in one province than in another.

Mr. Orlikow: Mr. Chairman, we are talking about a floor, a minimum. We have never said that everybody should get exactly the same amount. That is ridiculous, Mr. Chairman, and we never suggested it or advocated it. We said that there should be a floor that every person should get. In British Columbia, for people 65 years of age and over it is $200. That is precisely what we are talking about, and I want to say to the hon. member for Sarnia-Lambton that there should be a floor for old age pensioners under the program provided by the federal government which should now be $200 a month. Although I have not talked to the particular minister in charge of this in British Columbia, I believe that if we were to do that the province of British Columbia would supplement that $200 floor.

We are going to support this bill because we support pension increases. This country is wealthier than it has ever been and can afford to let the people who worked so hard to develop it and have now retired have a share in the increased productivity and wealth. We have consistently called for increases but our proposals have equally consistently been opposed by Liberals and Conservatives. We have been told it is too expensive, too visionary, that the country cannot afford it, or that the time is not yet. There is always an excuse.

Old Age Security

During the election campaign we said that the country could afford a $150 pension for senior citizens. We say now that the country can afford a pension of $200 a month for senior citizens. We know this government is not ready to implement that proposal and that a Conservative government would not be ready to do so either. We therefore support this measure to increase the pension and the guaranteed income supplement to at least take care of the increased cost of living on a quarterly basis.

I now want to speak of something that was proposed some time ago. Two or three years ago I proposed that the old age pension and guaranteed income supplement should be adjusted periodically, not after the cost of living had risen but in advance of such rise. I have been critical of accountants who work for the Department of Finance and I am still critical, but I am certain that they have enough ability to estimate approximately by how much living costs will rise in the next three months, six months or next year. I suggest to the minister that he should seriously consider adjusting increases in the old age pension in advance of increases in the cost of living, rather than allowing pensions to lag, as at present. Pensioners at present suffer because pensions lag behind increases in living costs.

I have another criticism. The government is proposing to increase pensions on the basis of the overall increase in the cost of living. Pensioners face two serious problems in dealing with increased living costs. First there is the increase in food costs, an increase which is almost twice as great as the overall increase in living costs. I am not being critical when I say this, as I realize that a very substantial part of that increase has gone to farmers who in recent years have been underpaid for their produce. The increase in food costs has not been in the order of 4½ per cent, the amount by which the cost of living increased in the first six months of 1973, but in the neighbourhood of 9 or 10 per cent. So the proposed increase will not help greatly those people who are getting the old age pension or guaranteed income supplement.

The increase in housing costs has been even more substantial than that, and that ought to be taken into consideration. Without taking up too much time, may I suggest that the Minister of National Health and Welfare discuss with the minister in charge of housing ways to provide a dramatic increase in housing accommodation for senior citizens at rents which they can afford. I say this because every time we increase the old age pension private landlords who rent to old age pensioners immediately increase rents by almost the full increase in the pension, so that old age pensioners are left with very little of the increase that Parliament has awarded.

We have proposed that the basic old age pension should be $200 per month for every person who qualifies. I again urge on the government, as other members of the NDP have urged, that the age at which people get the old age pension should be reduced to 60, and that the reduction should take place in the same way as when the age was reduced from 70 to 65. Pensionable age was reduced by one year at a time. In this case it ought to be reduced by one year at a time until older people who qualify can get the pension at age 60. I, like every other member of parliament, frequently get inquiries from people between 60 and 65 who cannot work. As the hon. member for Sarnia-Lambton said, the rates for welfare, or for social allowances in every province, are a disgrace when you compare those with what we now allow to people who get the old age pension.

Many people cannot work until they are 65. Many women have been left as widows, or have never worked, or cannot work but must, and they find they cannot work beyond age 60. Therefore, I say it is a disgrace that they are allowed a very meagre standard of living until they reach age 65. I urge the government to give serious consideration to announcing that it is prepared to reduce the age at which certain people can get pensions to 60. I hope that will be done in the near future.

Similarly, I urge the government to give serious consideration to amending the Canada Pension Plan so that people who retired voluntarily from the work force between the ages of 60 and 65 are given the full benefits of the Canada Pension Plan.

Lastly I urge the government to look into the matter of private pension plans, so that people who retire, having contributed for many years to a plan will get a pension that is based on real dollar value, rather than on the number of years that they have contributed to that plan. The pension may have looked good while they were contributing; but those people now find when they retire at age 65 that, in terms of 1973, 1974 or 1975 dollars, it really is not enough for one to live on.

I urge the government to take my suggestions into consideration. They are not radical or revolutionary; they are not things which have not been proposed before. If the government gives consideration to my proposals and brings forward legislation this year, that will be a good beginning but not more than that. Further, these proposals will be met with approval by people in all parts of Canada, regardless of their political affiliation.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Thursday, September 6, 1973

The House met at 2 p.m.

PRIVILEGE

MR. NIELSEN—REFERENCE TO PRESS INTERVIEW GIVEN BY SOLICITOR GENERAL

Mr. Erik Nielsen (Yukon): Mr. Speaker, I rise at this time on a question of privilege concerning a matter of which I have given Your Honour the notice as prescribed by Standing Order 17(2). As a matter of courtesy I have supplied the notice to the hon. member for Notre-Dame-de-Grâce (Mr. Allmand) who is concerned with the privilege I intend to raise.

On Tuesday, September 4, the House passed the following motion which appears at page 6181 of Hansard for that day:

That all matters pertaining to the interrogation of myself and my staff on Friday last be referred to the Committee on Privileges and Elections for study and report.

This related to a matter of privilege raised by the hon. member for Kingston and the Islands (Miss MacDonald).

On September 5, the Solicitor General appeared in an interview given to parliamentary correspondents, part of the tape which was recorded at that time being used on "Telejournal" at 10.30 p.m. and the newscast of Radio Canada for the same date. The subject matter of the complaint of the hon. member for Kingston and the Islands was the subject of that interview. The questioning of the Solicitor General, and I quote from a transcript of that interview, was as follows:

Q: Mr. Allmand, you are responsible for the Royal Canadian Mounted Police. Have you obtained supplementary details on the incident concerning the department of Indian Affairs and Miss Flora MacDonald?

A: Yes. First, the Royal Canadian Mounted Police was not concerned with this investigation, since it is a matter of theft and in Ottawa, theft comes under the responsibility of the Municipal Police. There were two Ottawa policemen in this investigation and because it was a matter of government documents, there was an RCMP officer with the two policemen. Therefore, it seems, according to our information, that the secretary of Miss Flora MacDonald got in touch with an official of the department of Indian Affairs saying that she had information that someone was in the process of passing these documents to Flora MacDonald or that there was a possibility that these documents would be brought to Flora MacDonald's office.

Q: Not clear . . . Why to Flora MacDonald?

A: I don't know why but she had this information. The secretary got in touch with this officer from the department of Indian Affairs saying this without giving more information at that time. Later, when the three officers were present the same official of the department of Indian Affairs phoned the secretary once again to have more details. Following this telephone conversation the three officers visited the secretary, simply to find out how she had come about this information and to protect not to accuse, the secretary of Flora MacDonald, to protect Flora MacDonald and her secretary, her office, her office staff, against problems. For instance, if someone has really brought the documents into the office, there might be problems for Flora MacDonald and her staff. And you must remember that at that moment there was an Indian demonstration on Parliament Hill, that morning, Friday morning, and many Indians were present on the Hill, about two hundred. Therefore there was a possibility that there had been such a communication on that morning.

Q: Did you have a sound recording of that conversation between the secretary and the department of Indian Affairs?

A: No, because it seemed at that time that the secretary was willing to cooperate, therefore it is her that phoned the department; it is not the police officers which first got in touch with the secretary of Flora MacDonald. She contacted the department of Indian Affairs concerning these documents. She instigated the matter.

Q: Therefore, for you the question of privilege no longer stands?

A: It is not for me to decide that, it is up to the Parliamentary Committee, but I understand that the officers are ready to give all this information to the Committee when it will sit, and I believe that the Committee will sit soon, in a few days, and the police officers are ready to give all this information to the Committee. But there never was any question of accusing Flora MacDonald and her staff, but only to protect her against the possibility of accusation; for instance if a stolen document is found in your house, you are immediately suspected. Therefore, it is to protect her against that, that the police officers visited her office after the telephone call made by her secretary.

I will be moving a substantive motion when I have presented my arguments to the Chair to the effect that the interview given by the Solicitor General and his statement given to the media on this occasion constitute a contempt of parliament.

I have already read to Your Honour the reference that was made to the House by the standing committee. That reference is to be found on the page I outlined, in Hansard for that day, and the timing of it, Sir, was four o'clock in the afternoon. The timing of the interview with the Solicitor General in the scrum room downstairs was approximately six p.m. that evening, well after the order of the House was passed sending the matter to the committee.

The hon. member for Kingston and the Islands, in her submission to the House with respect to her question of privilege, stated that the interrogation of her staff by the police was done without her authority or her knowledge, and without the authority or knowledge of yourself, Sir. The intimation by the Solicitor General, in the remarks he made with respect to this, clearly is an effort to repudiate that statement made by the hon. member for Kingston and the Islands. When she says that the interview of her staff by police officers was conducted without her authority or knowledge, her word must be accepted on that score and it is unbecoming, and in my view contemptuous, for the Solicitor General to suggest it was done with her knowledge indirectly through the members of her staff.

I have some citations to quote in support of the motion I will be moving. The first is extracted from May's Parliamentary Practice, 17th edition, at pages 119 and 120. Under the heading "Premature Publication of a Committee's Proceedings or Evidence" I quote:

> By the ancient custom of Parliament "no act done at any committee should be divulged before the same be reported to the House." Upon this principle the Commons, on 21 April 1837, resolved, "That the evidence taken by any select committee of this House, and the documents presented to such committee, and which have not been reported to the House, ought not to be published by any member of such committee or by any other person." Where the public are admitted this rule is usually not enforced. The publication of proceedings of committees conducted with closed doors or of draft reports of committees before they have been reported to the House will, however, constitute a breach of privilege.

An example of indignities offered to either House is cited at page 120 where there is reference to "slighting and contemning an order of either House." If that be the case it is even more strongly a matter in support of my question of privilege, because if it be contemptuous for a member to disclose evidence of a committee, it is even more contemptuous for a member to disclose evidence before it is given by a very probable witness who would be called before the committee to give that evidence—

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Nielsen: —as to the involvement of an agency of the government coming directly under his jurisdiction, namely, the RCMP.

I have a further citation from Beauchesne's Fourth Edition, 1958, at page 429 as follows:

> The House of Commons has disciplinary powers over its members, and a member who abuses his privilege of speech may be punished, not merely by suspension from the service of the House, but by imprisonment or expulsion from the House, or both.

I am certainly not suggesting that the House should go to those great lengths with respect to the Solicitor General, but I wish to assure hon. members that the matter I am raising is a very serious one indeed, and it simply cannot be equated to statements made on proceedings in this House by ministers outside the House while those proceedings take place. The fact remains that this very serious matter of privilege was referred to a standing committee of this House for investigation and report, and by his conduct the Solicitor General in effect has given evidence which should have been given before the committee, and therefore is contemptuous of the order of the House made on that occasion.

From Bourinot's Parliamentary Procedure, Fourth Edition, at page 474 I quote this citation:

> It is, strictly speaking, a breach of privilege to publish the proceedings of a committee before they are formally reported to the House.

Again, Sir, this supports my contention that the evidence should be given properly before the committee and not before the media downstairs in the scrum room.

Again, Sir, in his book "The House of Commons at Work" Eric Taylor, on page 68, says:

> Most cases of "breach of privilege" are contempts of the House. The House must preserve its own dignity and authority, in order to carry out its functions.

On page 69 of the same work the method of punishment of a member is set forth. There are other references in May's to which I would refer Your Honour. At page 132 of the most recent edition under the heading "Contempt in General" appears the following:

> It would be vain to attempt an enumeration of every act which might be construed into a contempt, the power to punish for contempt being in its nature discretionary. Certain principles may, however, be collected from the Journals which will serve as general declarations of the law of Parliament. It may be stated generally that any act or omission which obstructs or impedes either House of Parliament in the performance of its functions, or which obstructs or impedes any member or officer of such House in the discharge of his duty, or which has a tendency, directly or indirectly, to produce such results may be treated as a contempt even though there is no precedent of the offence.

I contend, Sir, that the statements by the Solicitor General to the media were an attempt directly to impede and obstruct the work of the committee in reaching its findings and subsequent report to the House.

I contend also, that it was an act of disobedience for the Solicitor General, well knowing that he was likely to be called as a witness before the committee in this very important matter in which his department was involved, to have made these statements. At page 134 of May's under the heading "Disobedience to Rules or Orders of Either House" appears this statement:

> Disobedience to the orders of either House, whether such orders are of general application or require a particular individual to do or abstain from doing a particular act, or contravention of any rules of either House is a contempt of that House.

The Solicitor General knew of the order of the House that the matter be referred to the committee, yet he flew in the teeth of that order and purported to give evidence before the media instead of before the committee itself.

Again, at page 140 of the most recent edition of May's under the heading "Other Forms of Misconduct" appears this example:

> Giving evidence elsewhere in relation to any debates or proceedings in the House of which he is a member or officer, or any committee thereof.

That is an example of misconduct by a member amounting to contempt. Again, at page 142 of May's most recent edition under the heading "Premature Publication or Disclosure of a Committee's Proceedings or Evidence" is a statement I would refer to you.

But even more serious than the contempt of the House, or of equal seriousness, is the reflection which the Solicitor General indirectly cast on the hon. member for Kingston and the Islands when in his interview to the media downstairs on this occasion he said that the investigation was conducted at the request of a member of the staff of the hon. member for Kingston and the Islands. He is in effect saying that what the hon. member based her question of privilege on—that the investigation, the interrogation was conducted without her knowledge and consent—is false. It does not lie within the mouth of the minister, let alone a member, to say that sort of thing except before the committee. On page 148 of the same edition of May's this is made very clear. I quote:

> Analogous to the molestation of members on account of their behaviour in Parliament are speeches and writings reflecting upon their conduct as members.

Now, Sir, the statement and the actions of the hon. member for Notre-Dame-de-Grâce would be bad enough if made merely as a member but he is a minister of the Crown, and his references downstairs have to be taken as not only a member but a member of the Treasury Benches as well. In my view, no other conclusion can be reached than that his conduct amounts to a gross contempt of the procedures of the House, and certainly of the hon. member for Kingston and the Islands.

I therefore move, seconded by the hon. member for Fundy—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member cannot make the motion now, but he might indicate to the Chair the motion which he would propose to move if there were a prima facie case of privilege. Perhaps the hon. member would defer the motion on this basis. Of course, the Chair is very interested to know what the motion would be.

Mr. Nielsen: If Your Honour finds that there is a prima facie case of privilege I propose to move:

That the conduct of the hon. member for Notre-Dame-de-Grâce in publicly making material allegations and purported statements of fact on the 5th September, 1973 relevant to the matters of a question of privilege that were referred by order of this House on the 4th September, 1973 to the Committee on Privileges and Elections for study and report, the said committee not having so reported, is a violation of that order and a contempt of this House, and therefore this House censures the conduct of the member for Notre-Dame-de-Grâce.

Mr. Speaker: As hon. members know, it is not the practice to engage in debate on such matters unless there is a finding by the Chair that there is a prima facie case of breach of privilege. Naturally, as has always been done and in fairness to the hon. member whose conduct is impugned by the member's question of privilege, the Solicitor General should be given an opportunity to comment, after which the Chair will take the matter under advisement.

Hon. Warren Allmand (Solicitor General): Mr. Speaker, of course, the statements referred to by the hon. member for Yukon are true. I did make a statement before members of the press yesterday on the subject, and the hon. member quoted from that statement. Although he did not have the full statement, what he did quote was correct.

I made the statement in response to a request from members of the press who asked me if I had any report on the investigation, and on the question of privilege raised by the hon. member for Kingston and the Islands. I must say that when I was first asked by the press to make a statement, I hesitated. However, after a certain amount of hesitation, I recalled that the hon. member for Kingston and the Islands, after the question was referred to the Standing Committee on Privileges and Elections, had made statements before the press. As a matter of fact, after Your Honour had accepted that prima facie case of breach of privilege, the hon. member for Kingston and the Islands made a statement on television that night amplifying what she had said in the House, so that she has done the same thing of which I am now accused.

Second, before I made my statement to the press, I took the precaution of checking with the table for an opinion. I was advised by the table that it was in order for me to talk to the press about this thing.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Allmand: In conclusion, Mr. Speaker, if I have breached the privileges of this House, so has the hon. member for Kingston and the Islands.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I am not sure if the hon. member for Kingston and the Islands wishes to rise on a question of privilege or point of order. I am sure the House would like to allow her to make any comment she wishes, in view of the statements made by the minister. But, again, I suggest to hon. members that if we become involved at this time in debate on questions of privilege, we will spend the afternoon on the matter before a ruling is made by the Chair and this is apt to be highly irregular. However, I think we should hear the hon. member for Kingston and the Islands.

Miss Flora MacDonald (Kingston and the Islands): On a question of privilege, Mr. Speaker, I was referred to in the statement made by the Solicitor General. He said that I made certain statements following the ruling in this House. I wish to say that the interviews which I gave to the media, and which I had discussed with you prior to the interviews, were done at approximately 2.30 in the afternoon. The ruling was not made until four o'clock in the afternoon when the House reconvened.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I see the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre seeks the floor, as does the hon. member for Yukon a second time. I urge hon. members to allow the Chair to consider the matter and review the citations referred to by the hon. member for Yukon, which I think it is the duty of the Chair to consider, following which perhaps the matter could be considered further.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. As the table has been dragged into this, is the table not to be given a chance to speak?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I believe the table is mute in debate.

Mr. Allmand: Mr. Speaker, I apologize, but my consultations were with the parliamentary counsel and not the table.

Mr. Nielsen: While Your Honour is going to take the matter under advisement, I might suggest that authority will be found in the most recent edition of May's for the fact that the whole matter could be cured and allayed by the Solicitor General tendering a formal apology to the House in this matter.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Speaker: I again suggest to hon. members that the proper course to follow is for the Chair to look into the matter further. In light of the citations quoted by the hon. member for Yukon (Mr. Nielsen), I should say to the House that having received due notice as required by Standing Order 17(2), I gave the matter serious thought during the last hour or two. I was inclined to make a ruling, but I feel I owe it to the hon. member for Yukon and all other members to look more closely at the situation and, in particular, consult the authors to which the hon.

member has alluded in order to ensure that the decision which may be rendered will be fair to all hon. members, including the Solicitor General.

MR. REYNOLDS—REFERENCE TO ANSWERS TO ORDER PAPER QUESTIONS CONCERNING BRITISH COLUMBIA PENITENTIARY

Mr. John Reynolds (Burnaby-Richmond-Delta): Mr. Speaker, my question of privilege is with regard to some answers which the Solicitor General gave yesterday to questions on the order paper. They relate to the British Columbia penitentiary. Since I spoke to Your Honour, I have had an opportunity to meet with the Solicitor General (Mr. Allmand) and show him copies of correspondence I have from the penitentiary which dispute the answers given to me yesterday. The minister has agreed to hold an administrative inquiry into the issue if I supply him with the documents, which I intend to do. I ask Your Honour to withdraw my question of privilege until the inquiry is completed by the minister's department.

Mr. Speaker: I am sure the hon. member has the Chair's consent to withdraw the question of privilege.

SUGGESTED INTERVENTION OF MINISTER IN DISPUTE WITH VETERINARIANS—REQUEST FOR UNANIMOUS CONSENT TO MOVE MOTION

Mr. Claude Wagner (Saint-Hyacinthe): Mr. Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43 on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity.

Considering that the 125 Quebec veterinarians are meeting on September 8 in Saint-Hyacinthe to express their dissatisfaction with the Treasury Board which refuses, it seems, to grant them any salary increase, even though their collective agreement has expired last June, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Brome-Missisquoi (Mr. Graftey):

That the President of the Treasury Board intervene personally in this dispute in order to avoid a serious disruption of the meat inspection and animal disease control activities in Quebec following a strike or other similar action on the part of the Quebec veterinarians.

Mr. Speaker: The House has heard the hon. member's motion. Under Standing Order 43, this motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Speaker: There is not unanimous consent; therefore, the motion cannot be put.

SUGGESTED COMMITTEE STUDY OF DIFFERENCE IN EXPROPRIATION PAYMENTS AT PICKERING AND STE SCHOLASTIQUE—REQUEST FOR UNANIMOUS CONSENT TO MOVE MOTION

Mr. Gilbert Rondeau (Shefford): Mr. Speaker, under Standing Order 43, I request the unanimous consent of the House to discuss an important and urgent matter.

Considering that the people expropriated in Sainte-Scholastique receive an average of $200 for 4/5 of an acre compared with $2,200 an acre given to the people expropriated in Pickering, Ontario, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Champlain (Mr. Matte):

That a special committee of the House be set up to study this enormous difference in the evaluations and the payments for the land in Sainte-Scholastique and that in Pickering, Ontario.

Mr. Speaker: The House has heard the hon. member's motion. Under Standing Order 43, this motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Speaker: There is not unanimous consent; therefore, the motion cannot be put.

SUGGESTED COMMITTEE STUDY OF DIFFERENCE IN VALUE OF EXPROPRIATION PAYMENTS BETWEEN STE SCHOLASTIQUE AND PICKERING—REQUEST FOR UNANIMOUS CONSENT TO MOVE MOTION

Mr. Gilles Caouette (Charlevoix): Mr. Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43 to seek the unanimous consent of the House to discuss a matter of pressing and urgent necessity.

In view of the fact that a 10 per cent cost of living bonus is being granted in addition to the $2,200 per acre paid for land expropriated in Pickering, Ontario, whereas nothing has been granted in Sainte-Scholastique, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Shefford (Mr. Rondeau):

That a special committee of the House be created to study the enormous difference in the assessment of the cost of living bonus between those who are being expropriated in Sainte-Scholastique and those in Pickering.

Mr. Speaker: The House heard the motion of the hon. member. Under Standing Order 43, the motion requires unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Speaker: As there is not unanimous consent, the motion of the hon. member cannot be put.

SUGGESTED COMMITTEE STUDY OF THE HOUSE CONSIDER DIFFERENCE IN LAND VALUES BETWEEN PICKERING AND STE SCHOLASTIQUE—REQUEST FOR UNANIMOUS CONSENT TO MOVE MOTION

Mr. André Fortin (Lotbinière): Mr. Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 43, I seek the unanimous consent of the House to discuss an important matter.

In view of the fact that $300 million have been provided for the expropriation of 18,000 acres of land for the development of the Pickering airport, while only $125 million have been provided for the purchase of 88,000 acres of land at Sainte-Scholastique, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Shefford (Mr. Rondeau):

That a special committee of the House be appointed to consider that enormous difference in the assessment of the purchasing cost of lands at Pickering and at Sainte-Scholastique.

Mr. Speaker: Order please. I suggest to the hon. member for Lotbinière that in moving a motion just introduced by another hon. member, he does not comply with Standing Order 43. I have already asked the House whether or not there was unanimous consent.

The House has indicated its refusal to give unanimous consent and it is in that sense that I believe it unfair that hon. members ask the Chair to put the same motion again.

SUGGESTED COMMITTEE STUDY OF DIFFERENCE IN RENTS BETWEEN PICKERING AND STE SCHOLASTIQUE—APPOINTMENT OF SPECIAL COMMITTEE SUGGESTED—REQUEST FOR UNANIMOUS CONSENT TO MOVE MOTION

Mr. René Matte (Champlain): Mr. Speaker, although I take your comments into consideration, I would like in turn to move, pursuant to Standing Order 43, that since a yearly rent of $2,000 is being charged to the former owners of Sainte-Scholastique as against the yearly rent of $1 plus taxes being charged to the former owners of Pickering, Ontario, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Shefford (Mr. Rondeau):

That a special committee of the House be appointed to consider that matter of the difference in the assessment of rents in Sainte-Scholastique as compared with those at Pickering.

Mr. Speaker: I must point out to the hon. member that there is here a clear case of abuse of the Standing Orders of the House and that this motion will not be put to the House.

Mr. Caouette (Charlevoix): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Charlevoix (Mr. Caouette) rises on a question of privilege.

Mr. Caouette (Charlevoix): Mr. Speaker, since it is unfair to present motions one after the other under Standing Order 43 concerning the Pickering problem, may I point out to this House that the way the people of Sainte-Scholastique are treated is also unfair?

THE CANADIAN ECONOMY

INQUIRY AS TO GOVERNMENT MEASURES TO CONTROL RETAIL PRICES

Hon. Robert L. Stanfield (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Prime Minister concerning the shocking 2.3 per cent increase in the wholesale price index, an increase which will no doubt be reflected in due course in retail prices. Does the Prime Minister now propose to institute any direct and comprehensive measures to hold the line on retail prices? I ask this question in view of the fact that the subsidization program announced by the Prime Minister on Tuesday did not contain any such measures, and in view of the emphasis which the right hon. gentleman places upon the importance of timing.

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): The figures referred to by the Leader of the Opposition obviously reflect a situation which existed a month or so ago, and it is because the government was aware of this situation and conscious of the hardship being caused to the Canadian people that we have taken the double series of measures which I have had occasion to announce in and outside the House.

FOOD PRICES

BREAD—INQUIRY AS TO GOVERNMENT ASSURANCE FROM BAKERS OF NO FURTHER PRICE INCREASE

Hon. Robert L. Stanfield (Leader of the Opposition): The answer being "no", I should like to ask the Prime Minister a further question. Bearing in mind the increase in the price of bread which has taken place in recent days, and in view of the assurance given by the right hon. gentleman in the course of his presentation on Tuesday, has any firm undertaking been received from the bakers of bread in Canada that there will in fact be no further increase in the price of bread in October? Has any agreement been reached with the bakers to suspend price increases and, if so, for how long have the bakers agreed to hold the line?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): The same type of question was asked yesterday, and replied to by the minister responsible for the Wheat Board. He indicated he would be informing the House as soon as possible of any final arrangement concluded with the Wheat Board to meet this problem.

Mr. Stanfield: The Prime Minister gave a firm assurance to the House on Tuesday that the increase in subsidy from $1 to $1.25 would prevent a further increase in price from taking place in October. Am I to understand he is now telling the House he is not in a position to say that the bakers have given a firm assurance, or that the government has entered into an agreement with the bakers to prevent a further price increase taking place? Is that the position?

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Trudeau: I repeat, the minister responsible for the Wheat Board informed the House yesterday of the answer to this question, and unless my memory is inaccurate he also informed the House that he had received such an assurance from the bakers.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Drury: Yes, he did.

Mr. Stanfield: May I ask the Prime Minister a direct question, seeking a direct answer?

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Stanfield: Having made a firm statement in the House on Tuesday, can the Prime Minister now tell the House that the government has a firm agreement with the bakers that the price of bread will not be increased in the month of October, and that the government has a firm agreement with the bakers as to the duration of that agreement?

Mr. Trudeau: I do not have the exact answer.

Some hon. Members: Oh!

Mr. Trudeau: I don't know what all the excitement is about over there. I have been asked a so-called direct question but obviously members opposite do not want a direct answer.

[Mr. Stanfield.]

GRAIN

REQUEST FOR STATEMENT ON WHEAT SUBSIDY POLICY

Mr. A. P. Gleave (Saskatoon-Biggar): I should like to direct a question to the minister in charge of the Wheat Board. Since both the premier of Saskatchewan and the Leader of the Opposition in Saskatchewan have rejected the proposals made by the government as unsatisfactory, can the hon. gentleman inform us when he will rise in the House to place this policy on record and explain in detail how it is going to work to the advantage of either the producer or the consumer?

• (1440)

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Justice): I think it is very clear how it will work to the advantage of both. The firm price of $3.25 for sale of wheat by the Canadian Wheat Board to the millers assures that the cost of wheat in products consumed in Canada will not increase through this long-term period, and therefore the consumers will have that assurance and a lower price available to them now than would be available if prices were simply allowed to be tied to the world price.

On the other hand, from the point of view of the producer the assurance of this long-term price regardless of world prices in the future is extremely important. Producers generally have favoured long-term agreements in order that they have orderly pricing and in this particular case this is effective of course in relation to the domestic market which is perhaps one-eighth or so of the wheat sold but it does give him a price at the floor of $3.25 over what is supposed to be a seven-year period and that amount is higher than any price ever received for Canadian wheat except in the last few months.

REQUEST FOR TABLING OF AGREEMENT WITH WHEAT BOARD

Mr. A. P. Gleave (Saskatoon-Biggar): Mr. Speaker, in light of the statement that the minister made in this House today and yesterday, will he now table in this House any agreement such as he described between the government and the Canadian Wheat Board or any Order in Council that has been passed instructing the Canadian Wheat Board along these lines and will he say whether either one of them is valid for seven years?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, the exact steps for formally implementing this agreement or validating it will be put forward in due course and brought fully to the attention of the House.

BREAD—INQUIRY AS TO AGREEMENT OF BAKERS TO MAINTAIN PRESENT PRICE

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prince Albert): Mr. Speaker, having regard to the fatuous answer given to me by the Prime Minister, I think on July 26, when he said bread would go up only one-tenth of one cent, may I ask if this is an indication of his expectation of controlling inflation? I should like to ask the Minister of Justice this question. How many representatives of the baking firms has he been meeting with and what was the nature of the verbal or other agreement that was made concerning the maintenance of the present price of bread during the next few months?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, I have had discussions both before and after the decision of several days ago. Also I went very carefully over the price increases which had occurred before that time. I was able to draw the conclusion from those discussions, and indeed I had the firm statement of representatives, that the price of wheat having gone from $1.95½ in the early part of July to the level of $3.17 by which time the major bookings were made for the month of September, that that fact, along with other cost factors resulted in the increase in the price of bread which has been recorded of about six cents, and if the price of wheat did not further increase, that should obviate a further price increase in bread for six months to a year. This was not, of course, in the nature of any iron-clad agreement—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Lang: —but rather a statement about ordinary pricing practices. Of course, in every way possible, as in the case of all other pricing matters, this is subject to review by the Prices Review Board if inappropriate price increases occur.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, I shall read what the minister said yesterday. This appears at page 6249 of Hansard. He said:

> Mr. Speaker, we had discussions with representatives of the industry . . .

And so on.

> . . . They also indicated that if the price of wheat were stabilized there ought not to be a further increase in the price of bread for six months or a year.

Is that correct? Is it correct that all that took place then was this: In their judgment without there being any binding arrangement, if certain things happened then there ought not to be an increase. Is that correct?

Mr. Lang: Mr. Speaker, the words the right hon. gentleman quoted accurately portray what did take place. The baking industry was not saying that if all sorts of things happened it would co-operate. They would not be in that position. We were speaking particularly about what had been done in relation to their recent price increase. I am not here to defend the justice or otherwise of the six-cent increase, but I do know that approximately three cents of it could have been attributed properly to the increase in the world price of wheat, and the portion of it that was allowed to be reflected in the price being paid by the millers, and that no additional price increase in relation to this product should be required because of the stabilization of the price of wheat.

In addition to that I was told that the price increase of six cents had included the usual cost increases up to that date, which I think were normal, and that as a result no further price increases should be required for up to six months or 12 months.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Speaker: The Chair will recognize the right hon. gentleman for a moment, and then I suggest that the Chair attempt to conclude the first round of questioning by going to the hon. member for Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands, the hon. member for Témiscamingue and then return to questions by the hon. member for St. John's East and others.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, I thought there were only two languages in this House, but now I find a third one.

Mr. Speaker: The right hon. gentleman will be recognized, but the hon. member for Saskatoon-Biggar has risen on a point of order.

Mr. Gleave: Mr. Speaker, in view of the lengthy statements by the minister and the lack of clarity of those statements, would it be in order to revert to motions so that he can put before this House in some detail the policy he has not been able to define up until now.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Speaker: The right hon. member for Prince Albert.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, if I understand the minister correctly there was no agreement but simply a declaration of the intention of the possibility that there would not be an increase if, if and if. The last portion of his statement yesterday is the most revealing. He said:

> I would count on the Prices Review Board to ensure that this is so.

What would the Prices Review Board do? How would it understand the minister explaining the incomprehensible in a way which cannot be understood?

Mr. Speaker: Order. Perhaps the question should be brief and the answer should be brief. It seems to me, in fairness to all hon. members, that we should try to get on more quickly. I apologize to the right hon. gentleman for interrupting him. I tried not to interrupt him or the minister who gave a lengthy explanation. I would hope that we could complete the first round of questions before the end of the question period.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, you will notice that the minister went on to explain about the pricing, the "ifs" and the work of this government in respect of prices. All this has no reference to the questions I asked. May I summarize it this way? Am I correct in suggesting the minister talked with some millers who told him that if certain eventualities took place, which we do not know are going to take place, then in that case while there would be no undertaking—

Mr. Speaker: I wonder whether we might try to bring the matter to a conclusion. Perhaps the right hon. gentleman should ask a question now, and then we would listen briefly to the minister.

● (1450)

Mr. Diefenbaker: I was trying to help the minister out.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Diefenbaker: I ask the minister this simple question, and he can answer it yes or no without all the equivocation and evasion in which he has indulged.

Some hon. Members: Question.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Is it now clear that there will be no increase in the price of bread as a consequence of the representations he has made and the statements made in reply thereto on the part of the millers? Is that clear?

Mr. Lang: Mr. Speaker, my answer is clear.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

An hon. Member: You are through, Otto.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Diefenbaker: Otto ought to know more than that.

ENERGY

TEMPORARY FREEZE ON PRICE OF CRUDE OIL—POSSIBLE APPLICATION TO OTHER PETROLEUM PRODUCTS

Mr. T. C. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the right hon. Prime Minister and arises from his statement last Tuesday concerning, to use his own words, the price of petroleum products, including gasoline and home heating oil. The Prime Minister said, as recorded at page 6184 of Hansard:

> The oil industry will be asked to refrain from making further price increases affecting Canadian consumers before January 30, 1974.

In view of the statement by the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources in the House yesterday to the effect that this temporary and voluntary freeze will apply only to the price of Canadian crude oil, may I ask the Prime Minister whether he can clarify what appears to be a glaring discrepancy and specifically indicate whether the temporary freeze will apply only to crude oil or whether it will apply, as he said in his statement, to the price of petroleum products including gasoline and home heating fuels?

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, the hon. gentleman knows the price increases in the Canadian market during last year resulted from increases in the cost of crude both east and west of the Ottawa Valley line. The position we have put to the industry is that there should be no more increases in oil prices until parliament has had an opportunity to act in respect of the number of control mechanisms to which we have referred. As a result of that, there would really not be any justification for increases in the prices of crude, heating oil or gasoline.

[Mr. Speaker.]

I had an opportunity of indicating yesterday, in response to a question posed by an hon. member who suggested a retailer or retailers had increased the price of gasoline, that we exercise no control over the retail price through any legislation passed by this House. I would indicate that in the case of any general increase in the price by a group of retailers I would very much like to know the circumstances, as very clearly that is governed by the Combines Investigation Act and should be the subject of an immediate inquiry.

REQUEST FOR ASSURANCE CONSUMERS WILL RECEIVE BENEFIT OF PRICE FREEZE ON CRUDE OIL

Mr. T. C. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): Mr. Speaker, since members of this party support the idea of a freeze on the price of Canadian crude, I should like to ask the minister what steps he proposes to take to ensure that the benefits of this freeze will be passed on to the consumers of gasoline, home heating oil and diesel fuel as was promised by the Prime Minister in his statement of last Tuesday.

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, we have the expectation that the request to the industry will be honoured and there will not be increases. As I have indicated, I cannot prevent any individual retailer from increasing his price, but I am fairly confident that the industry as a whole will honour the request.

Mr. Speaker: The Chair will recognize the hon. member for Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands on his last supplementary, after which the Chair will recognize the hon. member for Témiscamingue in appreciation of his patience and forbearance.

Mr. Douglas: Mr. Speaker, in view of the fact that 99 per cent of petroleum refining in this country is controlled by foreign-owned oil majors, and therefore they are selling crude oil to their own refineries and their own distributors, I should like to ask the minister whether he has had any discussion with the major oil companies to ensure that the freeze on the price of crude oil will reflect itself in stable prices for the consumers in this country?

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): Mr. Speaker, I have not yet had a response from all, but from the indications I have had at this point I think I can say that I am expecting the request for restraint to be honoured. In respect of individual retailers, as I have said, we are not in a position to control them, but I do expect that as a whole they will honour this request at all stages.

UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE

USE OF UNEMPLOYED IN HARVESTING WITHOUT LOSS OF BENEFITS—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Mr. Réal Caouette (Témiscamingue): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Manpower and Immigration.

Considering that people from the West Indies came to Canada to work in the crop fields—I have nothing against that—but considering also that the government pays their travelling expenses as well as their shelter expenses, would the minister consider inviting Canadians unemployed and on social welfare to work in the crop fields without losing their present benefits?

[English]

Hon. Robert K. Andras (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, to correct one aspect of the hon. gentleman's preamble, the payment of transportation for offshore foreign seasonal workers is borne by the worker himself and the employer, and I can assure him we do not subscribe to the idea of picking up the cost of that, although we do the organizational and informational work at government expense. We are certainly recruiting from every place we can unemployed Canadians to fill these jobs. In fact, in southern Ontario we have supplied some 18,000 of the 36,000 workers who are there now, and we will continue to invite Canadian workers to take these jobs on every possible occasion.

[Translation]

Mr. Caouette (Témiscamingue): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question.

We hear every day in the Montreal area on radio and television that apple, carrot, tomato and cucumber crops presently stand to be lost. Farmers are asking for manpower but the unemployed do not want to go because they fear they will lose their benefits. Could the minister not make exceptions particularly at this time of the year to allow those workers to receive their benefits while at the same time working at jobs offered by farmers?

[English]

Mr. Andras: Mr. Speaker, I think the Unemployment Insurance Act would be violated if we were to permit those receiving benefits to earn money beyond the top limit that is permissible under the act. In fact, if there are people on unemployment insurance who refuse to take those jobs under certain well-known conditions their benefits would, of course, be challenged.

[Translation]

Mr. André Fortin (Lotbinière): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question for the Minister of Manpower and Immigration.

Since a good number of Canadians are holding two jobs at the present time and contributing to the unemployment insurance fund in both instances, does the minister intend to review the Unemployment Insurance Act or at least conduct a study of the matter in order that Canadians who have the heart to work at two jobs not be penalized?

[English]

Mr. Andras: Mr. Speaker, I do not think we would be disposed at this time to dictate to Canadians whether or not they can hold more than one job. That would have to be the subject of a great deal of examination.

If I may supplement my answer to the previous speaker, we are prepared to share with the provinces the transportation cost of Canadian workers to these agricultural locations he has described. In fact, this has been done in many cases where we pay 50 per cent of the transportation cost and the province pays the other half.

[Translation]

Mr. Fortin: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Lotbinière on a point of order.

Mr. Fortin: Mr. Speaker, I feel that in answering the question, the minister misled the House, because Canadians who are seeking employment themselves are not remunerated by the manpower centre but only those who found a job through that centre. But Canadians who try to find a job themselves are penalized.

[English]

Mr. James A. McGrath (St. John's East): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the right hon. Prime Minister. In view of the fact that the statement made in the House on Tuesday by the Prime Minister will be about as effective in bringing down rising prices as was the budget brought down in the House by the Minister of Finance last February, as evidenced by the fact that the price of bread will continue to rise—

● (1500)

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Perhaps the hon. member should now ask his question. He is obviously making a speech rather than asking a question.

Mr. Andras: On a point of order—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I believe we should try to make some headway. The minister is rising on a point of order. We would recognize that if every member asked a question that had a preamble to it, we would be unfair to other members waiting to ask questions. The Chair will recognize the minister on his point of order.

Mr. Andras: Mr. Speaker, I did not mislead the House. What I was trying to convey, and what I did convey, was that the Department of Manpower and Immigration, in conjunction with the provincial governments, paid 50 per cent of the transportation costs of workers from their home locations to agricultural centres; that is, for workers seeking jobs. I did not say we paid their salaries.

Mr. Stanfield: With all due respect, Mr. Speaker, that is not a point of order and the minister—

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The Leader of the Opposition will appreciate, at the same time, that the point raised by the hon. member for Lotbinière was not a point of order. I thought it would save time and we could move on as quickly as possible if I did not make a ruling on a dispute over facts being brought before the House by way of a point of order or question of privilege. Making such a ruling takes time; that is why I moved on quickly to the hon. member for St. John's East. I think that is what hon. members would wish the Chair to do. I now recognize the hon. member for St. John's East.

REQUEST THAT PRIME MINISTER APPEAR BEFORE SPECIAL COMMITTEE

Mr. James A. McGrath (St. John's East): Mr. Speaker, it seems I must continue to rise, like the price of bread.

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): You are pretty stale.

Mr. McGrath: In view of the fact that the price of bread will continue to rise, notwithstanding the statement made in the House on Tuesday by the Prime Minister, and in view of the 2.3 per cent increase in the consumer price index, I ask the Prime Minister if he is now prepared to appear before the Special Committee on Trends in Food Prices, in compliance with a majority vote of that committee this morning, to explain the failure of the government to cope with inflation.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member for Battleford-Kindersley.

Mr. McGrath: Mr. Speaker, on a point of order—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Speaker: I apologize to the hon. member for Battleford-Kindersley, who will be recognized in a moment.

Mr. McGrath: Mr. Speaker, I think I indicated by my patience that I had a very urgent and very serious question to direct to the Prime Minister. This morning the food prices committee, by a majority vote, called on the Prime Minister to appear before the committee to explain the government's policy on inflation, and more particularly his statement to the House on Tuesday last. My question is: will the Prime Minister appear before the committee?

Mr. Speaker: With respect, that is hardly a point of order.

Mr. Cullen: Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Perhaps we should forget about the question period, which does not appear to be producing very much except points of order and questions of privilege. Is the hon. member rising on a point of order?

Mr. Cullen: Mr. Speaker, what the hon. member says is true: a motion was passed in the committee this morning. I heard out of the hon. member's mouth that the procedure was to call the steering committee to consider the manner of inviting the Prime Minister. That is what I propose to do, and not by way of a question in this House.

[Mr. Speaker.]

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member for Battleford-Kindersley.

WHEAT—INQUIRY AS TO DOMESTIC PRICE IN VIEW OF SUBSIDY BY GOVERNMENT

Mr. Norval Horner (Battleford-Kindersley): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the minister responsible for the Canadian Wheat Board. In view of the fact that the Prime Minister in his statement said that producers would receive a subsidy of $1.25 a bushel for wheat consumed in Canada, will the minister confirm that regardless of the export price, producers will receive $3.25 from the mills plus $1.25, making a total of $4.50 for wheat used domestically?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, the long-term arrangement being envisaged involves a firm price of $3.25 at the floor and a payment from the treasury as long as the world price is between the floor and the ceiling, to make up the difference to the producer of that amount.

WHEAT—SUGGESTION THAT PRODUCTION COSTS BE CONTROLLED OR DOMESTIC PRICE ADJUSTED ANNUALLY

Mr. Paul Yewchuk (Athabasca): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Prime Minister. In view of the fact that the government's recently announced three-pronged attack on inflation was also part of a three-pronged attack against the west, I would like to ask him—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. May we have order, please. I must remind hon. members that there are certain rules relating to the asking of questions. It seems to me that every question asked by hon. members is preceded by a preamble, an allegation or a statement. That is entirely irregular. I suggest to hon. members that they try to take this into account in asking their questions.

Mr. Yewchuk: Mr. Speaker, I ask the Prime Minister whether he would clarify an important matter pertaining to the price freeze on domestically used wheat which will result in lower incomes for farmers. Is the government considering ways and means to control production costs as well and, if not, will the price for domestically used wheat be adjusted annually to reflect costs of production?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I am astonished that the self-appointed spokesman for the west says that an increase in family allowances and old age pensions is an attack against the west.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

WHEAT—FREEZE ON DOMESTIC PRICE—NEGOTIATIONS WITH ONTARIO WHEAT PRODUCERS MARKETING BOARD

Mr. R. E. McKinley (Huron): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a supplementary question to the minister in charge of the Canadian Wheat Board. Is he negotiating, or has he negotiated, a freeze on the price of wheat for domestic use with the Ontario Wheat Producers Marketing Board?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, my colleague, the Minister of Agriculture, is having discussions along these lines.

FINANCE

DATE OF INTRODUCTION OF AMENDMENT TO BANK ACT TO ENABLE PROVINCES TO HOLD EQUITIES IN PROVINCIAL BANKS

Mr. David Lewis (York South): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Finance arising out of a policy adopted by the federal government at the Western Economic Opportunities Conference, in Calgary. The federal government agreed to amend the Bank Act to enable provincial governments to hold certain equities in provincial or regional banks. I ask the Minister of Finance how soon the House may expect the presentation of such an amendment to the Bank Act.

Hon. John N. Turner (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, when Premier Barrett put that question to me at the conference, I said I hoped to introduce legislation to that effect in 1974.

Mr. Lewis: Could the Minister of Finance indicate why it cannot be done earlier, say some time in 1973? Why the delay until 1974?

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, I do not know whether the hon. gentleman is acting as a principal or as an agent, but in any event I must have regard to the total parliamentary time available to the House.

AGRICULTURE

FEED GRAINS—REQUEST FOR BETTER PRICE FOR EASTERN FARMERS

Mr. Henry Latulippe (Compton): Mr. Speaker, I wish to put a question to the Minister of Agriculture.

Could he say whether he has any new policy to introduce in response to the growing number of requests from Eastern farmers for better prices for feed grain?

[English]

Hon. E. F. Whelan (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, the feed grains program has been announced. We said that the program will be fully in operation by September 15 and we are still shooting for that date.

[Translation]

Mr. Latulippe: Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question.

In view of the importance that eastern farmers attach to their requests and since they also have resolved to hold a demonstration in Ottawa if the government does not act before September 15, would the minister say what measures he intends to take in order to prevent this demonstration?

[English]

Mr. Whelan: Mr. Speaker, we have informed them of what we are going to do. If they want to parade here and make a presentation, I have no objection.

FEED GRAINS—REQUEST FOR BETTER PRICE FOR EASTERN FARMERS

Mr. Roch La Salle (Joliette): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question for the Minister of Agriculture.

In view of the talks that have been held between the Quebec Union des producteurs agricoles and the Department, has the framework which will have to be set to ensure equity between eastern and western Canada been actually accepted by the Union des producteurs agricoles du Québec?

Hon. E. F. Whelan (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, to my knowledge they had no objection to it and seemed in full agreement.

FINANCE

REQUEST THAT GOVERNMENT CONSIDER ACCELERATED WRITE-OFFS FOR AGRICULTURAL PRODUCERS

Hon. Robert L. Stanfield (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Finance who has expressed the view that the best way to deal with food prices is to encourage production. In view of the fast write-offs and such measures granted to manufacturers to encourage production, does the minister propose to offer a complementary system of fast write-offs and fiscal inducements to farmers to encourage them to increase their production, particularly in view of the tendency of the minister in charge of the Wheat Board to freeze their prices?

Hon. John N. Turner (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, dealing with the preamble to the question first, the result of the corporate tax reduction is certainly having a paramount effect on the intentions of manufacturers and processors. They have raised their expectations by as much as 19 per cent for capital investment in the forthcoming year as a result of these reductions. As for the part of the question that relates to the farming community, that incentive applies to processors of both food and fisheries products.

Mr. Stanfield: Mr. Speaker, a supplementary question. In view of the minister's desire to encourage the production of farm products, and in view of his boasted success with regard to encouraging manufacturing production by this technique, is he prepared to apply this technique to encourage the production of farm products?

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, I think it is implicit and explicit in the Prime Minister's statement of Tuesday that we are encouraging the production of food. The hon. gentleman is right, maximizing supply is one of the ways to beat the world commodity problem at the moment. By putting a floor under the price of wheat and instituting discussions with the provinces to stabilize farm prices, we will do more to encourage that than anything the hon. member suggests.

HOUSING

MALVERN, ONTARIO, DEVELOPMENT—REDUCTION AND HOLDING OF MORTGAGE INTEREST RATES—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Mr. Reg Stackhouse (Scarborough East): Mr. Speaker, in the absence of the Minister of State for Urban Affairs I should like to direct a question to the Prime Minister. In view of the proposal by the minister in charge of the Ontario Housing Corporation to match any reduction by the federal government of interest rates on mortgages in the next phase of the Malvern development so that interest rates there may be held at a maximum of 8.75 per cent, will the Prime Minister inform the House whether he has received information from the Ontario government to that effect and, if so, what will be the response of the federal government?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I apologize. As the hon. member only indicated that the question was for me in the dying words of the question, I will take notice of it and try to answer on another day.

Mr. Stackhouse: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. I indicated in the preamble to my question—if the Prime Minister is listening now, as he was not then—that I was addressing my question to him in the absence of the Minister of State for Urban Affairs. Perhaps I may repeat the question. In view of the proposal by the minister in charge of the Ontario Housing Corporation to match any reduction by the federal government of interest rates on mortgages for the next phase of the Malvern development so that interest rates there may be held at a maximum 8.75 per cent, and the advocacy of that minister that interest rates for public housing be held at that level, would the Prime Minister inform the House whether the federal government has received any information from the Ontario government to this effect and, if so, what will be the response of the federal government?

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, I will inquire.

[Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton).]

LOCAL INITIATIVES PROGRAM—REQUEST FOR STATEMENT TO CLARIFY GUIDELINES OF NEW PROGRAM

Mr. P. B. Rynard (Simcoe North): Mr. Speaker, I should like to address a question to the Minister of Manpower and Immigration. In view of the recent announcement of the new Local Initiatives Program, would the minister make a statement on motions to clarify the guidelines in view of the fact that there are some confusing interpretations of the program?

Hon. Robert K. Andras (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, I hoped that the letter I sent, with all the kits and material, to all hon. members had clarified that matter, but I shall most certainly give that request and recommendation my consideration.

IMMIGRATION

IMMIGRANT ADJUSTMENT PROGRAM—REQUEST FOR PROGRESS REPORT

Mr. Peter Stollery (Spadina): Mr. Speaker, my question to the Minister of Manpower and Immigration concerns the immigrant adjustment program which has been in operation for some three weeks. Can the minister inform the House of the success of the program and give some idea of the number of people who have applied to have their status adjusted?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Unless the minister can reply briefly, I would suggest to the hon. member that this is the kind of question which could be asked at the time of adjournment. The hon. member is asking for general information from the minister, and such a statement should be made on motions. If there is urgency, the question could be considered this evening at the time of adjournment.

ALLEGED REFUSAL OF TREASURY BOARD TO MEET VETERINARIANS—MINISTERS' POSITION

Mr. Claude Wagner (Saint-Hyacinthe): Mr. Speaker, I should like to put a question to the President of the Treasury Board.

Since the collective agreement of federal veterinarians working in Quebec expired June last, can the minister say whether it is true that the Treasury Board is refusing them any increase and if such is the case, does he intend to meet personally the veterinarians involved in order to avoid any action affecting meat inspection and control of animal diseases in Quebec?

Hon. C. M. Drury (President of Treasury Board): Mr. Speaker, I can assure the hon. member that the government does not expect any interruption of meat inspection. Negotiations are under way and I feel that they are progressing rather satisfactorily. As I have always maintained, it is not government policy to discuss terms of negotiations in the House.

INDIAN AFFAIRS

ECOLOGICAL STUDIES IN JAMES BAY AREA—EFFECT ON NATIVES AND ENVIRONMENT

Mr. Wally Firth (Northwest Territories): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development regarding the recently announced $10 million ecological studies of the James Bay area. Can the minister tell the House whether these studies will deal with the possible displacement of several thousand Cree people who have lived in the area since time immemorial as well as dealing with the effects on the natural environment of the proposed hydro-electric scheme?

TAPS TANKER ROUTE—INQUIRY AS TO NEGOTIATIONS WITH UNITED STATES ON ALTERNATIVES

Mr. John A. Fraser (Vancouver South): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the right hon. Prime Minister. Can the Prime Minister assure the House that since we adjourned in July the government of Canada has entered into negotiations with the government of the United States with a view to persuading that country to cancel its plans to unload Alaskan oil at sites in Puget Sound?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I will have to inquire what particular initiatives were taken in that period of time and perhaps the Secretary of State for External Affairs or the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources could answer the question.

ADULT VOCATIONAL TRAINING—CLOSING OF CLASSES AT POINT EDWARD—ROLE OF PROVINCIAL DEPARTMENT OF EDUCATION

Mr. Robert Muir (Cape Breton-The Sydneys): Mr. Speaker, a question for the Minister of Manpower and Immigration. Is the minister aware that ten classes plus instructors are to be closed and moved from the adult vocational training centre at Point Edward in Cape Breton? In view of the confusion surrounding this unfortunate action, may I ask if it is being brought about as a result of instructions from the minister himself or officials of his department?

Hon. Robert K. Andras (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, I will have to take the question as notice. I am not aware of the information the hon. member has given but I shall look into it immediately and report to him.

Mr. Muir: Mr. Speaker, a short supplementary—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Perhaps the hon. member may have a supplementary and then I will recognize the hon. member for Lambton-Kent. After that we will have to call orders of the day quickly as we have gone beyond the question period.

Mr. Muir: Mr. Speaker, may I ask the hon. Minister, when he is investigating, if he would ascertain what part the provincial department of education is playing in this so that we will not be told by officials of that department in Nova Scotia that this problem belongs entirely to Bob Andras?

POSSIBLE ESTABLISHMENT OF HEALTH CARE RESEARCH COUNCIL—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Mr. J. R. Holmes (Lambton-Kent): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of National Health and Welfare. In the past the minister has referred to the report "Health Care in Canada", a study prepared for the Science Council of Canada by Dr. Rocke Robertson. I should like to ask the minister if it is his intention to implement the recommendation to establish a health care research council and if so, when?

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, these recommendations obviously have to be the subject of consultation and discussion with the provinces.

TAPS TANKER ROUTE—INQUIRY AS TO NEGOTIATIONS WITH UNITED STATES ON ALTERNATIVES

Mr. Stuart Leggatt (New Westminster): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Secretary of State for External Affairs. In view of the answer given in this House on Tuesday to the hon. member for Vancouver South by the parliamentary secretary to the Minister of the Environment, namely, that the government has not yet commenced negotiations for guarantees in connection with the delivery of oil at Cherry Point to avoid the Strait of Juan de Fuca route, can the minister advise the House when serious negotiations will commence? In other words, when will we begin to fight on this issue?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, the officials of the United States government are very well aware of the statements made by me on this subject, by the Minister of the Environment and by the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources. We are preparing for the kind of negotiations that will be necessary. It is a negotiation, and it is one in which I hope we can succeed.

POST OFFICE

REPORTED POSSIBLE STRIKE OF POSTMASTERS—STATUS OF NEGOTIATIONS

Mr. Leonard Hopkins (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Postmaster General. As there are reports that the Canadian Postmasters Association will go on strike, what is the status of current negotiations between the Post Office and the CPA?

Hon. André Ouellet (Postmaster General): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to announce that a tentative agreement was concluded this morning with the Canadian Postmasters Association; therefore I doubt that there will be a strike. I am very hopeful that this settlement will be ratified by the postmasters.

RURAL MAIL CONTRACTORS—REQUEST FOR STATEMENT ON RESULTS OF STUDY

Mr. Alex Patterson (Fraser Valley East): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Postmaster General. In replying to the question I asked on June 18 the Postmaster General indicated that the representations on behalf of rural mail contractors had been under active consideration. Is the minister in a position to advise the House of the results of the review of the terms of rural mail contracts and the request made by myself and others on behalf of these contractors?

Hon. André Ouellet (Postmaster General): Mr. Speaker, the last time such a question was asked of me I said I was most anxious to act in order to adjust some contracts between the Post Office and many of our rural route contractors. I had to wait at the time for a settlement with the Canadian Postmasters Association. Now we have good news for the postmasters. I am very confident that I will be able to announce in a few weeks' time very good news for our rural route contractors.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The Chair will recognize the hon. member for Ottawa West and then call orders of the day.

THE CANADIAN ECONOMY

REASON FOR ALLEGED PRINTING OF RATION STAMPS

Mr. Peter Reilly (Ottawa West): Mr. Speaker, my question derives from the line of questioning begun by my leader at the beginning of the question period.

An hon. Member: Which one?

Mr. Reilly: Which one? We have but one leader on this side of the House. But if we had two, we would have two more than hon. members opposite.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Perhaps the hon. member would ask his question. As hon. members know, we have reached the end of the question period. Questions should be asked quickly and answers, if any, given quickly. After this question I will call orders of the day.

Mr. Reilly: Mr. Speaker, I am directing my question to the Prime Minister, with all the respect that is due to him. Following his statement the other day that there was no shortage of food in Canada, I want to know why it has been necessary for the government to have printed, by a firm in Toronto, millions of ration stamps, including those applying to food and other commodities.

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, could the hon. gentleman give me the source of this information, or substantiate it in some way?

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Trudeau: If it is not a pure canard I will take the question most seriously, but I imagine it is either a figment of the hon. member's imagination or somebody else's.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Perhaps the House would consent to my recognizing the hon. member for Malpeque. I had intended to recognize him earlier. He has been very patient.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

WEEKLY STATEMENT

Mr. MacLean: Mr. Speaker, may I ask the government House leader the usual Thursday question as to what business he proposes to bring before the House for the rest of this week and next week?

Mr. MacEachen: Mr. Speaker, we will continue in committee of the whole on the bill to amend the Old Age Security Act. This will be followed by second reading of the bill to amend the statute law providing for the payment of supplementary retirement benefits, which will be followed by the bill to amend the Family Allowances Act. My hon. friend is aware that there are number of allotted days to be dealt with, and I am considering calling such a day for Monday.

Mr. Yewchuk: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. I did not raise my point of order earlier because I wanted to expedite the question period. In his response to me the Prime Minister suggested that I was a self-appointed spokesman for the west. That was an erroneous statement. I was appointed by the constituents of Athabasca.

OLD AGE SECURITY ACT

PROVISION FOR QUARTERLY ADJUSTMENT OF PENSION

The House resumed, from Wednesday, September 5, consideration in committee of Bill C-219, to amend the Old Age Security Act—Mr. Lalonde—Mr. McCleave in the chair.

On clause 1—"Consumer Price Index".

[Translation]

Mr. Rondeau: Mr. Chairman, Bill C-219, to amend the Old Age Security Act, now under consideration, is evidence that a bill can very well go through first, second and third reading in committee of the whole without being referred to a House committee. It is evidence that when the government wants to have a bill dealt with in a hurry, it is the first one to admit the inefficiency of committees of the House, because on account of the government control over these committees, the consideration of bills in these same committees has nearly never changed much to the original version of a bill. That is why almost all members are convinced that these committees are inefficient.

However, I appreciate this method of considering bills in committee of the whole, because it enables us to offer suggestions and move amendments.

This Bill C-219 to amend the Old Age Security Act has a praiseworthy intent in itself, but when put into practice it will be seen clearly that it is not the true solution to the problems of inflation and insecurity, because this bill will not solve the problem of inflation any more than all the other statements of the ministers, and specifically those of the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau), in view of all the false solutions that have been put to us so far.

On June 8, 1970, the federal government declared war on inflation through its then Minister of Finance, Mr. Benson, and after that through other ministers who have made similar statements that they were going to stop inflation.

Today, the legislation on old age security, providing especially for a quarterly adjustment of old age security pensions to the cost of living, is tangible proof that the government has completely failed in its efforts to curb inflation. The government, through its Minister of Finance, announced with fifes and drums on June 8, 1970, that it would conquer inflation. It was fantastic, on June 8, 1970, to hear the cabinet ministers, and especially the then Minister of Finance, strongly and enthusiastically announce that the government would fight against and conquer inflation.

If I may, Mr. Chairman, I should like to refer to the very speech made by the hon. Minister of Finance, as reported on page 7817 of Hansard for June 8, 1970. I quote:

> Mr. Speaker, I would like to report to the House on the meeting of the Federal-Provincial Committee of Ministers of Finance and Provincial Treasurers in Winnipeg last Friday and Saturday.
> There were some significant developments during the course of this conference which have an important bearing on current economic conditions in Canada and which I would like to outline in some detail for the information of hon. members.
> In my remarks to the conference regarding the economic situation, I reminded provincial ministers that the fundamental objective of the federal government is to halt the inflationary spiral of costs and prices in order to pave the way for a return to the path of strong but stable growth.

Mr. Chairman, the Minister of Finance claimed that it was dramatic for Canada to announce to the Canadian public that the government had decided to conquer inflation. He further stated, and I quote:

> I want to make it perfectly clear that the federal government remains determined to break the back of inflation. We are hopeful that this further measure will prove effective, together with existing policies, in halting the cost-price spiral.

In September 1973, the government's drum against inflation is smashed in. It is not even heard any longer. The government has lamentably failed, unfortunately, in its Robin Hood fight against inflation. After hearing so much noise against inflation, many Canadians thought that the government had a really big gun to fight it, but today we realize that it was not even a slingshot.

The government has failed pathetically against inflation and the bill now under consideration admits; we have failed. We have failed to check inflation and we are now going to try to follow it. We do not know where it will lead us. We do not know where it is heading, but we are following it just the same. The government undertakes to lengthen every three months the scale of inflation by adjusting old age pensions to the inflation rate. At the present time, the government does not know what is the scale of inflation, but it is still ready to jump on it. The government is proving today that it did not know where it was going on June 8, 1970, that it does not know yet where it is going as concerns inflation, but it is still trying to go every which way.

Mr. Chairman, for the benefit of my hon. colleagues, I would like to repeat what I said on that date in this House on behalf of my party, in reply to a statement made by the Minister of Finance of the time concerning inflation. I quote from page 7822 of Hansard:

> Mr. Speaker, we are quite willing to see the Minister of Finance (Mr. Benson) and the government take steps to fight inflation and we recognize that the minister is sincere when he talks about his anti-inflation policy, but we have serious doubts as to the means he is taking to attain that goal.

First of all, we should get a clear understanding of what is meant by the words used.

I then went on to define inflation, because the government wanted to fight inflation. However, inflation means an increase in currency beyond the proportion of available goods—that is the definition given in the dictionary—and we are now witnessing inflated production costs.

This is completely different, and whatever you may think, the government with all its economists has not yet found the slightest solution to the problems of inflation in Canada.

And I said further on:

The present "inflated prices", a more appropriate description of the inflation the Minister of Finance would have us believe in, result from increased production costs. Before establishing . . .

And it was then that the Minister of Finance set up the Prices and Incomes Commission.

. . . the Prices and Incomes Commission, the minister should have appointed a commission to determine the causes of these "inflated prices", which would probably have made it possible to take more realistic action, more likely to correct the situation.

For example, a few years ago the government lifted all restrictions on interest rates on mortgage loans . . .

Mr. Chairman, one does not have to be a genius in order to realize that since the federal government, through its Minister of Finance, removed the ceiling on interest rates on housing loans, which was then 6 or 6¼ percent, the rate of mortgage loans in Canada now ranges between 10 and 11 percent.

● (1540)

It is very simple to see that when one pays 10 to 11 per cent interest on a mortgage, this automatically boosts the price of the rent. The same goes for the 11 per cent federal tax on building materials that the government has imposed and that it has never accepted to abolish after countless motions moved in this House to ask the government to do so. That is very simple to understand; the 11 per cent tax, the exaggerated interest rates are factors which have boosted costs and this has produced inflation. Instead of establishing a Price and Incomes Commission, the government should have analysed the costs or the causes of inflation in Canada. Today, the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Lalonde) has to try to produce a "gimmic" which every three months will gear pensions to the cost of living. He does not say—he does not know, I am sure—where inflation will lead him; he does not know what level inflation will have reached in six months or a year. But the Minister of National Health and Welfare undertakes today to adjust pensions on a quarterly basis so that senior citizens may receive quarterly benefits.

Mr. Chairman, once again—and I say this today as I said it when the Minister for Finance made a statement on June 8, 1970—the government will not succeed. Why? And the Minister of National Health and Welfare, who is here today, will not succeed because the government will base the quarterly increase in old age pensions on false data published by Statistics Canada concerning the consumer price index.

Mr. Chairman, I have absolutely no faith in Statistics Canada and its data and the government will determine the price index on the data published by Statistics Canada to adjust the old age security pensions.

Mr. Caouette (Charlevoix): Lies!

Mr. Rondeau: Mr. Chairman, I would like to explain here the technique used by Statistics Canada to show that the hon. Minister of National Health and Welfare and the government are wrong in 1973 as they were June 8, 1970 in wanting to rely on an organization which is absolutely anti-scientific et incompetent. I specify: I know very well the methods used to prepare statistics in Canada.

Throughout the country, there are about 800 people who are busy one week a month visiting 30 or 40 families to establish unemployment statistics. They have to visit about eight families a day during six days, one week a month. Each is paid $2.20 or $2.25 an hour, plus 13 cents or 16 cents a mile if he holds an insurance policy for pleasure and business driving and he must visit the same family every month for six months. Six new households are visited every month and the six families visited consecutively during six months are left out. Mr. Chairman, it is a real joke when you see the same investigator, who came during six consecutive months, coming to ask once more to the same family if they are unemployed and how long, how many hours they worked during the preceeding week. Sometimes we are surprised that some householders, as I saw it myself in the country, set their dog on the investigator, fed up as they are to see him coming at their door during six consecutive months. This is when the investigator, tired as well of having called during six consecutive months at the same houses, sets up his own statistics in his car with figures he determines himself. As I said on February 11, 1971 on page 3315 of Hansard:

I know that the third month, when he returns to the same household after finding out at previous interviews that the head of the household was getting annoyed at always being asked the same questions, the investigator feeling embarrassed always having to ask the same questions and since he would run the risk of getting a more or less rude answer as on previous visits, he merely fills his IBM forms with the previous answers or puts in imaginary answers in order not to bother again the investigated household.

Mr. Chairman, I could also give you the technique through which these statistics are falsified. To go back to my quotation:

With such methods, it is stated that the number of unemployed has been computed in Canada. With figures arrived at in such a poor scientific way from a sampling of 30,000 Canadian households per month they talk then in this House, with great compassion, on the most serious problem now—unemployment—leaving aside what is less important for the government, the unemployed in this country.

The 30,000 households "investigated" for six consecutive months constitute about ½ per cent of all Canadian households.

If, during these so-called inquiries, an average unemployment rate of 7 per cent was found for households visited for six months, the number of unemployed recorded is multiplied by the ratio represented by the 30,000 households investigated out of a total of 5,180,473-odd Canadian households in 1966.

I have before me the last issue of the Canada Year Book, that is 1969, which is available to every member of this House. One can see there the number of Canadian households visited. . . . On which figure and which year does the Dominion Bureau of Statistics base the "guesstimated" number of unemployed in order to supply monthly statistics on the unemployment rate? How is it possible to believe that the figures published by DBS are correct while, on top of all that I already mentioned about the production of statistics, they instruct the 800 investigators who are on the road for a week a month to visit rural districts where there are fewer unemployed, because a farmer who works on his farm in the winter is not unemployed? And in the summer, they take a sample of the unemployed in the cities.

In winter, the Federal Bureau of Statistics orders a census taken in rural areas, where there is no unemployment, and in summer, where unemployment is less intense, that is in the cities. I resume my quotation:

Mr. Speaker, let us establish statistics now with statistics. For instance, the 800 persons taking the monthly census each represent about 6,500 households, because there were 5,180,473 households in Canada in 1966.

How is it that the province of Newfoundland has 71 census takers while it has only about 96,632 households? Therefore, there are about five times too many investigators in Newfoundland since they should be 14 and not 71. Are those statistics serious? With such random statistics it is no wonder that the government is all the time probing and searching. The governments are very well represented by such bad statistics. Our statistics are a joke when we know the way they are made up . . .

Since Prince Edward Island comprises 25,360 households, it should have four investigators instead of nine, so there are five too many.

Nova Scotia, with 185,245 households, should be entitled to about 29 investigators. It has 54,25 too many. New Brunswick has 141,761 households and is entitled to 21 investigators. There are 43,22 too many or twice as many as it should have.

The province of Quebec with 1,389,115—

—households would qualify for 214 investigators, but since it has only 153 it is short 60.

Ontario has 1,876,545 households, should have 289 investigators, has only 201, therefore it is short 87 if ratios should be taken into account to get accurate figures. Manitoba has 259,280 households and would be entitled to 40 investigators but has 47, that is 7 too many.

We find the best balance in the province of British Columbia. And I quote:

British Columbia had 543,075 households in 1966 and while it was entitled to 84 investigators, it had only 81. Therefore, it was short three. However, it is still in British Columbia that the best balance is achieved as concerns investigators.

Mr. Chairman, if I delve into the matter even further, I find that figures are discussed which mean absolutely nothing even within the provinces themselves. I continue the quotation:

And if I should pursue a little further my examination of statistics for the province of Quebec, especially those concerning unemployment in the city of Montreal, there, again, I will discover most interesting facts. For instance, in nine constituencies of the city of Montreal where unemployment is high, there are ten investigators. The constituencies of Hochelaga, Lachine, Bourassa, Laval, Saint-Denis and Saint-Jacques each have one;

It is a very simple matter: Statistics Canada applies the same policy at the provincial as at the federal level, that is, investigators are not sent out when there is unemployment, but are when there is no unemployment! In the Montreal ridings, when there is unemployment, there are no investigators, but in those ridings where there is some, there are investigators. And after that, we see hon. members in this House maintain their points stubbornly, quoting figures that are totally erroneous, meaningless. Now, to go back to the quotation:

All statistics on unemployment are the result, as I explained earlier, of a heap of figures established in a non scientific way, that the government may change when they see fit by ordering inquiries in sectors or areas suitable for hiring, so as to better disguise unemployment.

Mr. Chairman, as I was saying, the government, and unfortunately the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Lalonde), were going to base themselves on the consumer price index, on figures arrived at by Statistics Canada which are not and will not be any more serious than present labour force figures.

Mr. Chairman, I should also like to add that this proves that the government has not found the solution to the problems of inflation, any more than it has found that to the problems of old age pensions in Canada by maintaining them at the level—

The Chairman: Order. I regret to interrupt the hon. member, but the time allotted to him expired some minutes ago. I did, however, want him to be able to complete his argument with regard to the compilation of statistics. It is, of course, within the power of the committee to grant to the hon. member extra time as he enters into a new part of his argument. Is this agreed?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

[Translation]

Mr. Rondeau: Mr. Chairman, in concluding I move, seconded by the hon. member for Champlain (Mr. Matte):

That in clause 1, the words "Statistics Canada" be replaced by the words "a scientific private body of statistics".

[English]

The Chairman: Order, please. The hon. member for Shefford has sent the Chair a motion to the effect that Statistics Canada be replaced by a scientific board of statistics. The Chair has some question concerning the receivability of the amendment and is prepared to hear argument on the point at this time.

[Translation]

Mr. Fortin: Mr. Chairman, in support of the motion moved by the hon. member for Shefford (Mr. Rondeau), I should like to point out that in the committee of the whole, members have the privilege to move amendments to a bill.

Mr. Chairman, without referring specifically to Beauchesne's Parliamentary Rules and Forms or to the works of other commentators such as May, Bourinot or others, I will say that the purpose of the amendment is explained in clause 1 of the bill, and I quote:

""Consumer Price Index" with respect to any adjustment quarter means the average for that adjustment quarter of 10 the Consumer Price Index for Canada,—

Now we come to the crucial point, and I resume the quotation:

—as published by Statistics Canada under the authority of the Statistics Act, for each month in that adjustment quarter;"

We would like to replace that by the following words: "published by a private body of scientific statistics."

That means, Mr. Chairman, that we are not changing the purpose of the act, we are not changing through this amendment the spirit of this legislation; we do not intend either to give rise to extra expenditures.

Mr. Chairman, that means that this amendment is against clause 1, as a question of principle, namely that at present statistics are prepared by a public body.

The purpose of this amendment is very simple. It is a matter of replacing the federal body by a private one. That is why I refer to Beauchesne's Parliamentary Rules and Forms.

As we do not want to delay the debate, I shall refrain from giving references you know as well as I do, but since the purpose of this amendment is to replace a questionable organization called Statistics Canada, for the purpose of gathering basic statistics for the administration of the act by a private scientific body, so that the interests of Canadians are really respected, it is obvious to us that this amendment is in order.

Another reason for us to disagree with Statistics Canada—and this has nothing to do with procedure—is that if this body reflected more the policy of bilingualism in Canada, we would already be more inclined to look favourably on what it does. But since we are unable to obtain any information from this body or to get in touch with it except in English, we have even less sympathy with it.

Of course, this has nothing to do with procedure, but I should like to urge Your Honour to look favourably on this amendment because it would not result in additional expenditures; we simply want to have the right men in the right places.

[English]

Mr. Macquarrie: Mr. Chairman, I have been taken by surprise by this amendment. I am not clear concerning the body which the hon. gentleman mentioned. While this bill is anything but startling in its precision, I believe generally speaking one should strive in legislation for clarity concerning the sort of institutions we have in mind in carrying out a public trust. I wonder whether the hon. gentleman has a definition of this body which could be inserted in the right place in the bill. I do not want to use the amendment as a vehicle for either praising or blaming Statistics Canada, but I am sure it would be helpful to Your Honour and to the committee—it certainly would be to me—if we had a definition of the body to which the hon. member refers so we would know upon whom the responsibility would be placed in this matter.

Mr. Cafik: Mr. Chairman, in respect of the amendment presently before the committee, it seems to me it would be difficult for us to support the amendment in view of the fact that there is no such organization in existence which would be able to determine the consumer price index as is done now by Statistics Canada. I should like to point out to members of the committee that it seems to me this bill would be frustrated in its essential purpose, at least temporarily until such a body was set up, at being able to escalate, according to the consumer price index, the benefits to old age pensioners and recipients both under the OAS and GIS on the basis of increases in the cost of living. On that basis alone I would find it difficult to agree to this amendment. In effect, it would destroy the bill at least in a temporary way until such a body was set up. That is not in any way a comment in respect of Statistics Canada.

In addition to that, we feel that the recommendation by the Governor General which accompanies this bill does not deal with this specific question but, rather, with the question of escalating the OAS and GIS payments; it does not deal specifically with Statistics Canada. For that reason also I respectfully suggest, Mr. Chairman, that the motion before us is out of order.

The Chairman: The hon. member for Charlevoix on a point of order.

[Translation]

Mr. Caouette (Charlevoix): I rise on a point of order, Mr. Chairman.

[English]

The Chairman: The hon. member for Charlevoix rises on a point of order.

[Translation]

Mr. Caouette (Charlevoix): With respect to the discussion going on, Mr. Chairman, the hon. member of the Progressive Conservative Party asked for clarification about the organization suggested by the hon. member for Shefford (Mr. Rondeau) to replace Statistics Canada. The parliamentary secretary suggests for his part that there are no organizations other than Statistics Canada to compile statistics. So, to clarify the discussion I would like to point out that all national food, clothing, petroleum producing corporations all year round commission statistical surveys from associations of economists in Toronto, Montreal and Vancouver and those same firms of statisticians or economists can be referred to by the federal government. We say that Statistics Canada through its formulation, its basic principles, its action or working methods does not produce reliable statistics. That is why we want a private association of firms of economists in existence from which the government could easily commission statistical surveys on the cost of living. If the parliamentary secretary is not aware of that all he has to do is ask, probably the fund raisers of the Liberal party, if big corporations can give him information on their statistical surveys which, in many cases, are a lot more specific than those made by Statistics Canada.

Mr. Fortin: On a point of order, Mr. Chairman.

[English]

The Chairman: The hon. member for Lotbinière rises on a point of order.

[Translation]

Mr. Fortin: Mr. Chairman, on what has been said I would like, in reply to the hon. member for Hillsborough (Mr. Macquarrie) and for your information, to refer to paragraph (2) of citation 199 of Beauchesne's Parliamentary Rules and Forms which states:

(2) A motion is not irregular on account of its vagueness.

Supposing that this motion is vague, it is not a reason to rule it inadmissible. Mr. Chairman, it goes without saying that it is the prime responsibility of the government to obtain valuable statistics. We question the work of Statistics Canada. This is why our motion is positive. And citation 198 stipulates that a motion must be positive. This is why I continue claiming that this amendment is admissible.

[English]

The Chairman: The hon. member for Shefford has presented a motion for the consideration of the committee which if accepted would mean that clause 1(1) would read in part:

"Consumer Price Index" with respect to any adjustment quarter means the average for that adjustment quarter of the consumer price index for Canada, as published by a scientific private body of statistics under the authority of the Statistics Act, for each month in that adjustment quarter;

The Chair has very grave reservations about the amendment in that it might involve an amendment to the Statistics Act which is not before the House or the committee at this time. I have a further reservation as to the amendment. I would draw the hon. member's attention to citation 246(3) of Beauchesne's Fourth Edition, where it is stated:

In relation to the standard thereby fixed, an amendment infringes the financial initiative of the Crown, not only if it increases the amount, but also if it extends the objects and purposes, or relaxes the conditions and qualifications expressed in the communication by which the Crown has demanded or recommended a charge.

With respect to the hon. member, I think his proposed amendment would be quite a departure from the recommendation of the Governor General, and on that ground would fail to meet the time-honoured practices of this House. For those two reasons, more particularly the second one because the Chair really does not know the ramifications of the proposed amendment in respect of the Statistics Act, I have to declare the amendment out of order.

[Translation]

Mr. Fortin: Mr. Chairman, on a point of order.

I shall be very brief. I would like, most seriously and sincerely, to thank you just the same—even though we are disappointed that our amendment was rejected—for having given us the opportunity of pleading its case. The right to do so was denied us, Friday, which is a pity. But now we see that the Chair is honest and objective.

[English]

Mr. Epp: Mr. Chairman, in rising to speak on clause 1 of Bill C-219, there are a number of points I want to present to this committee. Specifically, I wish to clearly point out what I feel are the shortcomings of not only the bill but also the solution which, hopefully, is to be brought about in relation to the financial position or purchasing position of our senior citizens.

As a result of clause 1 of the bill before us we will see an adjustment on the basis of calculations to be made quarterly in respect of the guaranteed income supplement, in the hope that with these increases pensions will keep pace with today's rapidly rising rate of inflation. This bill will cause indexing to be done on a quarterly basis, and I assume it is the government's intention that this will enable the old age pensioner to re-establish his purchasing power. Let me very clearly point out to the minister that all we are doing by this bill in respect of indexing is enabling the old age pensioner to re-establish his purchasing power in respect of a three-month period during which that purchasing power has been severely eroded.

In addition, we are taking for granted that if the purchasing power is indexed three months back to before the inflationary spiral occurred, this will be sufficient. I submit this is not the case and it is a fallacious premise on which to start indexing old age pensions or social security payments. Let us for a moment consider the financial position of many of our old age pensioners. During their working years all too often the remuneration received for their work had to be used for buying the necessities of life; they had no financial ability or opportunity to establish a voluntary retirement fund. Therefore such a fund simply does not exist for many of these people.

Furthermore, the Canada Pension Plan came too late for many of these people, in that they were not able to contribute to it and thus supplement their old age pensions and social security payments. If they were able to pay into it, they receive only the minimum benefits after a five-year period. In spite of these encumbrances, many of our senior citizens scrimped and saved through the years and were able to build a small nest-egg which in many cases represented their only financial security for retirement. This small financial resource was to give these people security, and today it is being callously eroded by the high inflation rate. This nest-egg is literally worthless today compared with its value at the time it was saved. So what is involved is not simply indexing old age pensions but dealing with the inflationary situation in which we find ourselves.

The greatest tragedy is not simply erosion of purchasing power but erosion of the security to which these people are entitled and which they should demand because of the contribution they made to this country. It is our responsibility to return that security to them. The old age pensioner is no benefactor of galloping inflation, neither is the consumer. There is only one benefactor and that is the government. Although the income of workers and corporations has risen, purchasing power has not risen. It has not kept pace. But up until now the government has taxed higher earnings even though those higher earnings have not provided an increase in purchasing power. As a result, the government has a surplus of funds and with its largesse can now say, "We will give the old age pensioners some money."

The government now says it will provide indexing of pensions on a quarterly basis, something it said previously was financially impossible, not to mention logistically impossible. Suddenly it has become possible. The government now is going to repay the old age pensioners with money it has already taken from them. While I support indexing of pensions, one clear fact remains; that is that this bill will not restore to old age pensioners the purchasing power they had last January. Not only do we need indexing of the pension; we also need a higher base from which to start. Only in that way will we increase the purchasing power of old age pensioners. We are not increasing the purchasing power of old age pensioners through indexing. It is to be hoped that that power will remain equivalent to what it is now.

The old age pensioner has become a pawn in what I believe is a very heartless political game. Yesterday, as recorded at page 6267 of Hansard, the hon. member for Vaudreuil said that on two occasions in the last year the government had raised the old age pension. I ask him and the government: where has the largesse come from? Why is there this magnanimity at the moment? It is clearly a reaction to a political situation that demands a solution. The government's answer is to index pensions—but is that a solution to the basic problem?

The basic problem is inflation. The government is saying to pensioners, "We will keep you in the same relative position but we will not cure the root of the problem of inflation." Will the old age pensioner be in a better position by virtue of the passage of Bill C-219 or will he still be the victim of inflation? The old age pensioner cannot financially protect himself as well as the active worker or corporation. It is our responsibility to protect him.

In reply to the hon. member for Vaudreuil, I submit that this is not largesse or magnanimity on the part of the government. It is a panic reaction after the government has made the old age pensioner a victim of inflation. We have all too often made the old age pensioner a pawn for political reasons, for election votes. Members on all sides of the House have been responsible for this. If votes were to be gained, pension increases were given. My political philosophy is such that I am not a proponent of increased government spending. I am not a proponent of simply handing out money when a crisis situation arises. But I want to place clearly on the record that a pension is not a handout: it is something one has earned.

In my opening remarks I pointed out that too many of our senior citizens did not have the ability or opportunity to establish a relatively independent financial position for themselves. As a result, they must rely on government. It is incumbent upon us to provide them with a pension on which they can live in dignity. Only in this way can they maintain dignity.

Even though we welcome this bill, what is needed is an over-all thrust at the root problem of inflation which affects every person in Canadian society. We are not simply faced with a rate of inflation to which people can become accustomed. Today we have runaway inflation. That is why the government must again adjust old age pensions. That is why the government must introduce an interim program to increase family allowances. It is because of the complete failure of the government's financial responsibility, to which the Minister of Finance alluded in his budget speech. The minister said that his budget would do two things—put more disposable income in the hands of consumers, and check runaway inflation. In placing this bill before us the government admits that those two statements are no longer true and possibly were never true.

If this bill is to be the thrust of the fight against inflation, at least according to the government, I point out it is not a prescription to cure an ailment. At best it is a shin-plaster to cure bone cancer. It is simply not enough to present this House with a pension indexing system to restore purchasing power to a level which was not adequate in the first instance.

I wish to present one or two views that the department should consider. I shall digress from the group 65 years of age and over. The group of people between 60 and 65 years of age has already been mentioned by a number of speakers. As I travel through my constituency I receive many complaints from people in this group. Often they have had years of hard, physical work and now simply are not capable of meeting the physical requirements of their jobs. But they cannot leave those jobs because if they do they cannot find alternative, suitable employment. They are locked into a very difficult situation.

Therefore I submit to the minister, even though it has been done before, that his department should seriously consider reducing the pensionable age to 60, especially in light of the rate of inflation today. Perhaps it could be done on the same basis as when the age was reduced from 70 to 65. It might be done as a voluntary pension so that when a worker removed himself from the labour market he would be entitled to it. In that case, hopefully, the jobs vacated would be available to people between the ages of 18 and 25 where there is the highest unemployment rate. Not only would this government be responding to the needs of our older citizens, but it would be showing that it does not want to react in panic when inflation strikes and that it is seriously concerned about the purchasing power of pensioners rather than just making political gain when the need arises.

I submit, as other hon. members have, that we must look again at the basic amount of the old age pension which often is the only protection of senior citizens. It should be increased; this is the only way to increase the purchasing power and financial power of our older people. I am not so naïve as to believe that the opposition can simply make suggestions without showing responsibility relative to the cost involved here. Naturally, the department would have to study the cost. But the government is well aware of its surplus revenue position and that revenues have increased sharply.

In conclusion, Mr. Speaker, I emphasize one point. Despite what we do with Bill C-219 to index the old age pension, and despite the increase in the family allowance to $12 in October, we must get back to the root problem. The root problem, and the reason we are here today, is inflation. We cannot simply continue giving subsidies, indexing and reacting quarterly when we have to in an effort to beat inflation and protect the consumer. That just will not work.

Before the federal government, the provincial governments or the municipal governments curb spending in areas which do not have as high a priority as the one we are discussing today—and I think all hon. members agree with the priority of old age pensions—some relief must be given to the consumer, more purchasing power must be placed in the hands of the individual. Every Canadian is looking to this government, not for more subsidies but specifically to ensure that our position in October, November, December and next year will not have to be adjusted again. They want to know that a positive stance has been taken and that our relative purchasing power has not been eroded but, rather, increased.

It is incumbent upon this government to look seriously at the problem in that perspective and to find a way that will enable everyone to enjoy a better quality of life without having to accept from the government a quarterly handout the money for which came originally from the taxpayers themselves.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Chairman, I made an extended speech on this matter when we were at second reading and therefore I do not intend to take advantage of clause 1 to say it all over again. There are, however, one or two questions which I should like to put to the minister, and at some stage before we get through with clause 1 I should like to say a few words about the thousands of words used in this bill to try to say what it means.

My question to the minister follows the speech just made by the hon. member for Provencher. I was delighted to hear him take a strong stand for an increase in the basic amount of the pension but I think his statement would have been stronger if he had indicated a specific amount. As I said the other night, we think that the amount to go for now is $200 a month.

I should like to ask the minister what happened to that principle, that article of faith that he proclaimed before the committee on March 13 when he downgraded escalation on a quarterly basis as a means of enabling pensioners to catch up and instead said that he would prefer to see more frequent increases in the basic amount. Surely, Mr. Chairman, the minister who took such a strong stand does not feel happy about having to sit in the House during a couple of days of debate on a bill that is going to offer only a $5.30 increase for those who get the basic amount and only a $9.02 increase for single persons on the full supplement.

I take as the basis for what I am now saying to the minister not only my own speech of a couple of days ago but the speech just made by the hon. member for Provencher. I ask the minister why he did not come into the House at this time, in view of the tremendous pressure being exerted on our senior citizens, with something a lot better than this, namely, a substantial increase in the basic amount in keeping with his article of faith of March 13.

Since we are in committee of the whole I wonder if my friend from Témiscamingue would mind letting the minister answer my question.

Mr. Lalonde: Mr. Chairman, I have not changed my point of view on this matter. I think all around it would be preferable still; I feel that we should proceed by an increase in the basic amount rather than just escalation. At the time I made that statement, however, I would remind hon. members that we had not had the increases in the consumer price index that have occurred over the last few months. Maybe I was naïve, but I was certainly hoping that we would not see such a large increase in the consumer price index over the next few months. The events of the last few months have certainly required a re-evaluation of the situation.

As I said at the time, this change is going to cost between $1½ million and $2 million in additional administrative costs. This is not the solution I enjoy. I would certainly prefer to see this $2 million go to our senior citizens in increased benefits. It is felt, however—and I feel this—that in view of the recent increase in the CPI, the move to a quarterly escalation is the appropriate move at the present time.

The hon. member has referred to "only an increase of $5.30" for a pensioner on the basic pension. May I go to the other limit and refer to the couple on GIS: this represents an increase of over $17 a month, which is pretty substantial. If it does not make the people richer in terms of real benefits, it certainly will make sure that they are not hurt by inflation. That is the object of this bill.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Chairman, I have one more question for the minister. I wonder if he would not like to reconsider what he just said. He said that maybe he was naïve in March. I liked him when he was naïve. Is not the fact that the consumer price index has gone up so much more than he thought it would actually an argument in favour of the principle he announced in March, namely, that the best way to enable our senior citizens to catch up is by more frequent increases in the basic amount?

Before he answers perhaps I might say that I was not leaving out anything, at least I thought I was not, when I indicated only two increases, the $5.30 a month for a single person on the basic pension only and the $9.02 per month as the maximum increase for single persons getting both OAS and GIS. The minister quite properly added a third figure and said that a couple getting the maximum under OAS and GIS would get $17.20 a month more. But that is for two of them and is only $8.60 a month for each person, which is less than the single person gets. Surely the minister cannot be proud of that.

Perhaps I should not push him too hard. He has already said he is not happy about this. Is it not a fact that the very substantial increase in the cost of living that the minister referred to is an argument for a substantial increase in the basic amount of the pension at this time?

Mr. Lalonde: Mr. Chairman, I would hate to disagree with the hon. member on this point. The fact that there has been a substantial increase in the cost of living requires a substantial adjustment that will take into account that increase in the cost of living. That is exactly what we are doing now. The matter of getting to our senior citizens a larger share of the gross national product or of federal government expenditures is an issue that is totally different from that to do with the cost of living. It is an argument saying that out of the money that is allocated in the social field we should at this time allocate again, in addition to the real increase that was granted as recently as within the last six months, another increase in real terms thus adding to the share that senior citizens of this country are receiving of the moneys allocated for social purposes. I do not need to recite all the arguments that have been made in this respect having to do with the level of moneys or social allowances paid under social assistance plans coming under provincial responsibility. The hon. member knows about them as well as I do.

There is also the question of family allowances that are administered by the federal government. I submit that the government moved last April and made plans for increasing the basic amount of family allowances over and above whatever adjustment was required for the consumer price index. At present we are making sure that there will not be any long delay between when an increase in the consumer price index takes place and when there will be an increase in actual pensions. As I said, by reducing this delay to two months the government has gone as far as it can go sensibly and realistically in the administration of the plan. The issue that members of the opposition, including the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre, are raising is a totally different one. It has nothing to do with the consumer price index itself. This is taking care of increases in the cost of living.

The other argument was whether, in view of all the other demands being made on government expenditures in the social field, the next step should be another substantial increase in the allocation of funds to senior citizens. I am sure we can always find that what is being done is not sufficient. A few months ago the hon. member was recommending a basic pension of $150 a month. Now his party has gone to $200 a month, to catch up with the Social Credit party. I am sure that the Social Credit party before long will advocate $250 per month. I do not want to embark on that race.

I think I have answered the point raised by the hon. member. His point had nothing to do with the consumer price index. That is another argument.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Chairman, may I ask one more question, after which I shall yield to the hon. member for Témiscamingue. I recognize that the minister does not want to be involved in the race, as he says, between us and my hon. friends opposite. On the other hand, surely he does not need to lag so far behind.

My other question is this. I assume that, like all of us in this place, he saw the front page of the Globe and Mail this morning. That newspaper is a sort of daily bible here. It carried a story about the government having a $500 million surplus that it had not counted on. According to the story, only $290 million has been taken up. Did not the minister try to get some of the other $210 million for a further increase in the old age pension?

Mr. Lalonde: Mr. Chairman, I read the Globe and Mail, but do not trust it.

● (1640)

[Translation]

Mr. Caouette (Témiscamingue): Mr. Chairman, I shall not take up much of the time of the House but I should like to clarify a few points. A while ago, my colleague for the riding of Shefford (Mr. Rondeau) quoted facts concerning Statistics Canada which dealt with the percentages, 3, 5 and 5.3 per cent, etc. I think the government should order Statistics Canada not to make its surveys, for instance, in the field of prices, the day after Christmas or Easter because then there are special sales right across the country; instead, surveys should be made throughout the year. The same goes for unemployment in Canada. If we count the unemployed before Christmas or Easter, clearly there will be more before than after. Statistics Canada does seem to play the game of the government.

Now, Mr. Chairman, about Bill C-219, which provides that senior citizens can look forward to receiving $179.16 in October instead of $170.14 and that a couple where both spouses qualify for maximum benefits will see their monthly payments grow from $324.60 to $341.80.

Yesterday, the leader of the New Democratic Party (Mr. Lewis) talked about the advantages of having a minority government, saying that the New Democratic Party had asked for these things, that the NDP had asked for higher pensions, but he forgot to say that when we moved motions in the House to bring down the pension age to 60, to have the pension paid to the spouse, even if he or she had not reached 65, all members of the New Democratic Party voted against these motions. When we moved a motion to grant a pension of $200 a month to a single person and $350 to a married couple, the New Democratic Party voted against this motion. Today, they tell us: It is the New Democratic Party which asked for higher pensions.

An hon. Member: Whited sepulchers!

Mr. Caouette (Témiscamingue): Whited sepulchers, that is the right word.

Mr. Chairman, that is what they say, but yesterday, as we can read on page 6272 of Hansard, the hon. member for Sarnia-Lambton (Mr. Cullen), who was talking about the intellectual honesty of the members of the New Democratic Party, the socialist members, said, and I quote:

> The NDP is different when it forms a government from when it is in opposition. We have heard the NDP talk about $400 a month, but what does the NDP government give when it is in power in certain provinces? In British Columbia they suggest $250 a month is enough. In Manitoba it is $242 a month. In Saskatchewan it is $219, plus a 5 per cent increase announced in August which takes it to $230 a month. What is the highest figure in one of the richest provinces, British Columbia, where most of the money to be spent was raised by the Social Credit Party?

The NDP boasts of having increased pensions in British Columbia with the money left to it by the Social Credit when it came in power.

> —$250 a month. Half of that amount comes from the federal treasury.

Moreover, $125 a month come from— they have run away, Mr. Chairman. They cannot face the facts.

Mr. Chairman, they do not boast of having voted against all our motions. That is not all. In 1962—and I refer to the Liberals to whom I will give a dressing-down by the way—in 1962, during our electoral campaign throughout the country but more specifically in Quebec, the old age pensions amounted to $65 a month.

An hon. Member: True or not!

Mr. Caouette (Témiscamingue): We asked for $100 a month. The Liberals were laughing at us.

An hon. Member: They found it funny!

Mr. Caouette (Témiscamingue): It was funny! It could lead to inflation. The old people who were only receiving $100 a month would have lost their children's respect. They were laughing at us, the Creditists, we were crazy.

Mr. Chairman, today the Liberals are introducing a resolution increasing that pension to $179.16.

Mr. Chairman, this will be reported in Hansard tomorrow. In 1973, that is 11 years later, the Liberals have become $77.16 a month crazier than they were in 1962.

We are asking a $200 monthly pension at 60 years of age because at 60 a man or a woman can no longer find employment. We all know that. At the present time we see a pensioner of 65 with a wife aged 61 trying to make both ends meet with $150 or $160 a month. If the mother asks for assistance, she is told: "You should apply for public welfare".

I have seen cheques of $1 a month addressed to a 61 year old mother of a family, as adjustment payment on a pension of $160. That made a total of $161. The social welfare added a dollar to get this total of $161.

Mr. Chairman, there are women of 55 or 60, mothers of familes in Hull and Ottawa who have to scrub floors at night in public buildings, even in Parliament buildings, because they don't have a pension that would enable them to live decently. If only they could have a pension at the same time as their husband.

Mr. Chairman, some young men would cheerfully do this type of work without much effort and they would be happy to have something to do. But no, women of 55 or 60, mothers of large families are compelled to work hard all their life, scrubbing floors in public buildings.

An hon. Member: And when they do, their husband's pension is reduced.

Mr. Caouette (Témiscamingue): That is true, Mr. Chairman. If they work at night scrubbing floors, the husband who is 65 years old has his pension reduced and is told: You are receiving another income.

Mr. Chairman, another hon. member had something to say yesterday. It is the hon. member for Saint-Hyacinthe (Mr. Wagner), a former Liberal. He nearly became a Créditiste but is now a Progressive Conservative. As we may read on page 6270 of yesterday's Hansard, he said and I quote:

> In any case, Mr. Speaker, this bill pertains only to those 65 and over. In support in that regard of my colleagues of the Social Credit I ask the government in the expectancy of a guaranteed minimum income for all, to refer to the committee of the House that whole question of the 60 and 65 year olds. Is this financially possible? What are the true objections? What are the statistics concerning this? How can this be interpretated in the various areas of this country? What decisions should be taken and can the budget warrant such a decision?

● (1650)

Mr. Chairman, the hon. member for Saint-Hyacinthe (Mr. Wagner) should have said: I support the request of the Créditistes, instead of: With the support of my colleagues of the Social Credit, I ask—

The hon. member for Saint-Hyacinthe never asks anything with our support! And this is so true that he voted against the amendments we moved. It is so true Mr. Chairman, that his own leader—

An hon. Member: Which one?

Mr. Caouette (Témiscamingue): The hon. Leader of the Official Opposition (Mr. Stanfield) has never talked yet of paying the old security pension at 60. He was asked about it in western Canada and he said: I will consider the matter. As he is not quick, he will not be quick about it.

Mr. Chairman, one must be honest, after all. Some Progressive Conservatives say one thing, others say the opposite, they do not agree, they are afraid to take position. The hon. member for Saint-Hyacinthe mentions the matter because he heard me speak about it in his riding. It seemed to register and he said to himself: In that case, I shall bring up the matter. However, when he proposes the payment of of a monthly pension of $200 at 60, as we are urging, he cannot get the support of his own leader. So, I call them jokers, hypocrits. It is as clear as that.

The New Democratic voted against our proposals and they said today: We are the ones who asked for higher old age pensions. Liars! They voted against our motions to this effect and the people of Canada know that the Crédistes are the first to have called for the payment of a monthly pension of $200, $350 for a couple, throughout Canada.

An hon. Member: At 60, and you support this?

Mr. Caouette (Témiscamingue): At 60! It is true, Mr. Chairman. I must give his due to the hon. member for Joliette (Mr. La Salle) who supported our motions, and now—

Mr. Olivier: He will support anything!

Mr. Caouette (Témiscamingue): The hon. member for Longueuil (Mr. Olivier), where is he? I do not see him.

An hon. Member: He never proposes anything.

Mr. Caouette (Témiscamingue): That is true. The hon. member for Joliette cannot support the hon. member for Longueuil since he never proposes anything.

Mr. Chairman, some people say that the hon. member for Joliette will become a Créditiste. I urge him to do so. As for me, I was a Liberal at one time, like those I see before me. Then, when I had enough, I at least had the heart to dump the Liberal party and go elsewhere. At that time, I became a Créditiste. I was fooled for a while, but I was not fooled all of the time. According to an old saying: "You can fool all the people some of the time, and some of the people all the time, but you can not fool all the people all of the time." This is not true!

Mr. Godin: Mackenzie King used to say that!

Mr. Caouette (Témiscamingue): You are right. It was the leader of the Liberal party, the Right Hon. William Lyon MacKenzie King, the father in spirit of all those before me, who used to say that. We should say the same thing. In any event—

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): He was a bachelor.

Mr. Caouette (Témiscamingue): The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) tells me that he was a bachelor. He would still receive a pension of $179.16 a month under the new legislation.

Mr. Chairman, I am stating these facts to draw the attention of the House to the work that we have accomplished, and not only for electoral purposes. I congratulate the government—it had to do it—on having managed at least to give $341.80 to an aged couple. This is getting close to what we were asking for, that is $350. That $341.80 is not too bad. People aged 65 or more will do a little better with that.

But I deplore, on the other hand, that the government, the minister, has not introduced a legislation in favour of the sick, the crippled, the blind, the welfare cases. This morning, I received a letter—

An hon. Member: That is under provincial jurisdiction.

Mr. Caouette (Témiscamingue): True, but they should have convinced the provinces of that ten years ago.

An hon. Member: We pay 50 per cent.

Mr. Caouette (Témiscamingue): That is right. I received a letter from a mother from Saint-Jérôme; she has five children at home, pays a rent of $80 a month and gets $147 in welfare allowances, half being paid by the federal government. How can they believe that a mother with five children can live with $147 a month?

I am in favour of paying an old age pension of $341.80 for two people, but I should be in favour of paying a pension of $400 for instance to a needy mother with five children at home.

I ask the minister some questions; the minister answers with a smile, he is so kind, he is a good guy, he answers that Quebec is paying one half and we are paying the other. Quebec says: "We do not have our half, and if you do not have yours, well, we do not have it either! Then, the pension is not increasing!

Well, Mr. Chairman, it is very important to look after the invalid, the disabled, the blind and the welfare cases, not after thieves. Let us give them pension increases so that they can live properly.

Mr. Chairman, this was a matter I had to clear. My colleagues and I will support this bill; we shall try to have the age of eligibility for this pension lowered to 60. If the hon. Minister of Finance (Mr. Turner) will let go of the purse strings—he will ask for it? Fine! The day before yesterday, he told me that he would meet here, at the end of this month, with provincial representatives to discuss the possibility of lowering this age for the interested party and also examine the spouse's situation.

I hope the minister is taking notes of our requests; I do not want at all to get the credit for it, the minister will get it. We shall be satisfied with passing measures to improve the living conditions of the Canadian people as a whole.

[English]

Mr. McKinnon: Mr. Chairman, speaking to this bill I wish to deal mainly with the high cost of living. I then intend to make some remarks on the economy. Some members opposite would like to pretend that the package presented on September 4 was designed to curb or stop inflation. This is, of course, nonsense. Inflation is not caused by old age pensions being too low. It is not caused by retired civil servants receiving pensions which do not keep up with rising prices. The two bills, C-219 and C-220, will not affect inflation in the slightest. So let us not parrot the local headline writer who wrote "Government clamps down on inflation". Perhaps that headline in the Ottawa Citizen was the right length to fit the space available, but it would certainly mislead anyone naïve enough to assume that headlines refer to the stories upon which they are placed. These two bills are designed, I suppose, to render a temporary palliative to the sickness of inflation. They make no attempt to cure the disease, and to claim they do is about as truthful and realistic as to claim that aspirins cure cancer.

Let us consider the plight of three large groups in our society—those on fixed incomes, those operating small businesses and those workers who are not enrolled in powerful, multinational unions. First, take the position of those on fixed incomes, the pensioners. The government's plan is to allow inflation to go unchecked and raise pensions when forced to do so. The Minister of National Health and Welfare should have been ashamed to bring in this bill without apologizing to the elderly of the nation for the months of needless mental distress he caused them by his remark last May that he would not bring in quarterly adjustments because to do so would mean an administrative nightmare. But what else could one expect from this erstwhile grey eminence of the Liberal administration? In the meantime his department has been decreasing such things as grants for cancer research.

The Deputy Chairman: Order. I regret to interrupt the hon. member, but it being five o'clock it is my duty to rise, report progress and request leave to sit again later this day.

Progress reported.

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

[English]

SUBJECT MATTER OF QUESTIONS TO BE DEBATED

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Laniel): It is my duty, pursuant to Standing Order 40, to inform the House that the questions to be raised tonight at the time of adjournment are as follows: the hon. member for Brandon Souris (Mr. Dinsdale)—Post Office; the hon. member for Assiniboia (Mr. Knight)—Agriculture; the hon. member for Peel South (Mr. Blenkarn)—Labour Relations.

● (1700)

It being five o'clock, the House will now proceed to the consideration of private members' business as listed on today's order paper, namely, private bills, notice of motions (papers), public bills.

PRIVATE BILLS

[English]

THE NATIONAL DENTAL EXAMINING BOARD OF CANADA

On the order:

Second reading and reference to the Standing Committee on Miscellaneous Private Bills and Standing Orders of Bill S-7, an act respecting the National Dental Examining Board of Canada—Mr. Railton.

Mr. Reid: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. The hon. member who has this bill in his name is not prepared to proceed with it at the present time. There have been discussions and I think there would be agreement to take notice of motion for the production of papers No. 88 in the name of the hon. member for Toronto-Lakeshore (Mr. Grier).

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Laniel): Hon. members have heard the suggestion of the parliamentary secretary. Is there unanimous consent that we consider at this time, and stand other items, notice of motion No. 88 as it appears on the order paper.

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

PRIVATE MEMBERS' MOTIONS FOR PAPERS

[English]

VETERANS AFFAIRS—REQUEST FOR COPY OF PROGRAM FORECAST OF DEPARTMENT, INCLUDING BUDGETS A,B,X

Mr. Terry Grier (Toronto-Lakeshore) moved:

That an order of the House do issue for a complete copy (including budgets A, B, X) of the Program Forecast (Program Review) by the Department of Veterans Affairs for the latest year for which parliament approved departmental expenditures.

He said: Mr. Speaker, the debate this afternoon in effect continues one begun last May 24 when a similar motion for the production of a program forecast for the Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce was considered by this House. I wish to be as brief as I can, bearing in mind that a number of points on both sides of the argument have already been made. I think it is worth repeating, however, that this motion for the production of papers has perhaps less to do with the Department of Veterans Affairs per se than it has with the principle of the need of hon. members for information upon which to base their judgment concerning the wisdom of expenditure proposals of the government.

I may say in passing that there are a number of similar motions standing in my name for the production of program forecasts for other departments. The debate is really about the kind of information available to members of parliament upon which they can come to some kind of informed and educated conclusion concerning the wisdom of the vast array of expenditure proposals put before them in the form of the main estimates, the blue book.

I noted when I last spoke on the subject that there seemed to be a general tendency on the part of governments of all political stripes to regard material produced within the public service as secret, confidential and not for the eyes of the public, the media or members of parliament. While I admit at the outset that certain kinds of documents, in the interest of the public service and in the interest of effective and fair government, perhaps ought not to be made available, my view is that this general tendency extends to almost any documents at the disposal of the ministry in the course of its arriving at proposals.

I pointed out at the time that the program forecasts would be of particular use to members of parliament in so far as they provide really three forms of illumination upon the process through which the ministry goes in arriving at its final expenditure proposals. I noted that program forecasts really fall into three categories. There is budget A, which is simply a forecast of expenditures in the current year for those programs undertaken in the previous year; second, budget B contains a schedule of the cost of new implemental programs which the ministry would wish to undertake; and, finally, there is budget X, which refers to the programs which, other things being equal, the ministry might be prepared to dispense with in order to obtain funds to proceed with new programs.

It seems to me that kind of information, perhaps in modified form, would provide members of parliament on all sides of the House with an insight into the type of considerations the ministry went through, and would save time and provide a good deal of valuable information to members in coming to a conclusion concerning the wisdom of the government's expenditures, which I need hardy tell this House run to many billions of dollars.

The ministry has at its disposal all the resources of the public service in the preparation of its estimates and programs, and so it should. But speaking as one member of parliament, I wish some of those resources, or should I say some more of those resources, were shared with the ordinary members of parliament on all sides. We are not asking for all the data having to do with the planned programs and budgeting system as suggested by the hon. member for York West (Mr. Fleming). I would be prepared to settle for some editing of the program forecast as it now stands, in order to protect the curious inner workings of the ministry and to prevent public servants feeling inhibited in making recommendations.

It may well boil down to the fact that what I would be prepared to settle for lies somewhere between what the government is now prepared to give us and what these motions call for. But I see great merit and great need for the provision of some information which would present members with a broader base upon which to come to a judgment without imperilling the government's budgetary system.

As the hon. member for York West said last May, the power to govern rests with the government. I cannot quarrel with that. But the right to grant or withhold supply is the most ancient right of parliament itself which was wrested from reluctant governments over the course of centuries. What I am asking for is more sound information on the basis of which parliament can grant or withhold supply. I am not talking about prejudging the conclusions of the cabinet, as the hon. member for York West suggested. It is not a question of wishing to see the information before the cabinet and the ministry have provided their recommendations to this House. On the contrary, I am talking about information to justify and give reasons for those recommendations.

During the same debate last May, the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce (Mr. Breau), made some remarks on this matter which I feel should be repudiated. He said that the government does not need copies of the minutes of the NDP caucus meetings in order to make up its mind concerning policy. The analogy hardly stands up. I am not calling for the production of the minutes of the meetings of the Privy Council or of the cabinet, and therefore it is not analogous to suggest that the hon. member is doing me a favour by not asking for the minutes of the NDP caucus meetings.

What we are talking about is not an analogy between two parties but, rather, about the basis on which the government of the country forms certain conclusions and the basis on which parliament judges those conclusions. I think it does no service to the principles which we are debating here to exaggerate the request being made.

The hon. member for Gloucester went on to say that he did not understand why the hon. member for Toronto-Lakeshore should have trouble arriving at a political judgment as to which program should be voted for. But that is not the point. On the contrary, I am trying to get some information upon which I can form a judgment which is not purely dictated by political motives.

If you deny members of parliament information in respect of the dogma or ideology behind a program, you will have political judgments and nothing else. Surely members of parliament—I readily admit to being a very junior one—find ample time during the course of committee proceedings to put aside narrow political judgments and try to make some objective evaluation of the worth of a program. I have no difficulty in arriving at a political judgment, but I have some difficulty in arriving at an objective judgment in the absence of any substantial information upon which to make it.

The hon. member referred to evaluation reports which members of my party had asked for in the course of committee hearings during the winter. These evaluation reports, among other things, dealt with a program involving about $150 million undertaken by the Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce. We were told in the committee by the hon. member that these evaluations were being carried on, but we have never seen the evaluation reports. In the first place, I would ask why we have not seen them when the expenditure of so many million dollars rests on them and, secondly, I suggest that when we never see them we can perhaps be forgiven when some of us wonder if in fact they exist. The hon. member for Gloucester said that the NDP seems to be looking for independent evaluations. By all means let us have independent evaluations, but such an evaluation is not precisely the same thing as the program forecast asked for today.

[Mr. Grier.]

These reports are a part of the total, and it is an important principle to provide members of parliament with information on the basis of which they can make objective and sound judgments. We do our homework in the opposition, as I am sure the supporters of the government do, but the resources at our disposal, I think it goes without saying, have very real limitations. Faced with committees day after day and the need to judge the worth of programs day after day, it seems self-evident that in the government's own interest, if for no altruistic reason, it would make sense to provide us with more information.

The opportunities for scrutiny now open to members of parliament could be better used than they are. Again speaking as a very junior member of the House, I was not a member when the estimates were considered in committee of the whole, but I have been impressed by the opportunities for scrutiny which are available in committee although not on all occasions have I been impressed by the extent to which those opportunities have been utilized. I would concede to the hon. member for Gloucester that on many occasions these opportunities are largely utilized for purely partisan political purposes, but I believe that if more information were available there would be less of that and more objective evaluation of the cost of many government programs put before us.

I am willing to be quite realistic in attempting to meet the legitimate inhibitions and reservations expressed by members of the government to providing documentation of their eventual decisions. If it makes it easier not to insist on getting program forecasts, surely that is something that can be worked out. But the principle of the thing and the point of the whole debate is to urge upon the government the value and the wisdom of providing members of parliament with something other than the figures contained in the blue book and such other research information, very often of a partial nature, which they may be able to produce.

In conclusion, I know some government members have not yet had the privilege of finding themselves in the opposition and perhaps do not fully appreciate some of the difficulties involved. They may find it difficult to believe that an opposition member might occasionally be prepared to drop his partisan cloak and get down to brass tacks, in dollars and cents, about the internal financing of government programs. But believe it or not, I say through you, Mr. Speaker, to members opposite that is very frequently the mood in which an opposition member goes to committee meetings.

Time and again we find ourselves bereft of all but the scantiest information provided by a ministry. Whatever else we can pick up and use to substantiate conclusions, in the absence of the kind of information I am seeking, is very often dictated by political reasons alone.

[Translation]

Mr. Maurice Dupras (Labelle): Mr. Speaker, I have tried to listen as carefully as possible to the remarks made by the mover the hon. member for Toronto-Lakeshore (Mr. Herbert) to find out why last May he failed to convince my colleagues from York West (Mr. Fleming), Vaudreuil (Mr. Émard) and Gloucester (Mr. Breau), of the merits of disclosing government long term plans. I was hoping that today he would take the time to give us all the arguments he can muster to convince us that actually if the government made known the long term plans of the various departments, the Department of Veterans Affairs as well as the Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce and other departments, that would be beneficial to everybody. I fail to see any such benefit for General Motors or Chrysler as well as other industries which compete against one another and also stand to gain by keeping secret the main elements of their long-term plans.

In any case, Mr. Speaker, he mentioned with felt nostalgia I think the disappearance of a practice that formally existed whereby the committee of the whole examined most bills. Today, as one knows, the committee of the whole is only used for bills from the Department of Finance or others which call for the spending of public monies.

However, the fact still remains that each and everyone of us has the opportunity and advantage, if he wants, to attend, contribute to and participate in the sittings of various committees where, for example, the estimates of every department can be examined. Moreover, after the implementation of projects and programs everyone of us can, if he wants, attend the sittings of the Standing Committee on Public Accounts and check again on the activities of the various departments.

And so, the mere fact that the committee of the whole is not used to the same extent as previously, and also that long term programs of the various departments are not announced do not jeopardize the interest of Canadians, and Canadians do not miss anything by being unaware of those long term projects.

● (1720)

Nevertheless, Mr. Speaker, I take this occasion that is offered to me to speak of the Veterans Affairs Department, for many reasons. As you know, I participate in the debates of the standing committee, and it is a department I have very much at heart. I would like to present some information on the activities of the department.

In accordance with long standing practice, the government's spending proposals are presented to parliament before the commencement of the fiscal year in the form of the estimates' blue book, a document with which hon. members are quite familiar. Hon. members will appreciate that these estimates represent the end product of a great deal of effort by literally thousands of people in all departments and agencies of the government, both in Ottawa and in the many far-flung locations where Canada is represented.

Although the main estimates represent a relatively short-term spending plan, the dynamic nature of Canadian life inevitably gives rise to changes that affect the expenditure proposals contained in the blue book, with the result that supplementary estimates are often required to provide for changes made necessary by the constant search for a better life for all Canadians.

Hon. members will also realize that although the annual estimates present the government's short-term spending proposals, continuous planning is takingg place on a longer term basis in an effort not only to anticipate future needs but in an ongoing search for new and better ways of achieving objectives and allocating resources. One element in this continuing process is a procedure whereby approximately one year before the main estimates are tabled in parliament each minister puts forward his recommendations for changes in existing programs to improve service, increase efficiency and to meet new demands not currently being met. In the same manner, recommendations for new or substantially changed programs are submitted for consideration by his colleagues.

It is widely and correctly recognized that these various planning documents prepared within departments of the government are of necessity confidential papers. Indeed, I would refer hon. members to Hansard for February 28 of this year, at page 1747, when this same subject was briefly discussed arising from one of the notices of motion placed by the hon. member for Toronto-Lakeshore (Mr. Grier). At that time the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce (Mr. Breau) replied as follows:

Notices of motions for papers Nos. 87 to 114 are internal documents of a confidential nature and therefore cannot be tabled.

This is still the situation as it relates to the notice of motion now being debated. I would reiterate, however, that particulars of approved programs are made public in the form of annual estimates.

The Department of Veterans Affairs is a relatively senior department in terms of age. Few departments, however, have experienced so much change in as short a time as veterans affairs has in the last few years. Only six years ago, in 1967-68, the total expenditures of the department amounted to $399 million. The published estimates for 1973-74 amount to $480 million. Furthermore, although the current fiscal year is not yet six months old, it is already forecast that expenditures will exceed $540 million because of recent measures approved by parliament. That is close to a 40 per cent increase over the last six years.

The substantial change in current spending is due primarily to the passage of two pieces of legislation, Bill C-148, an act to amend the War Veterans Allowance Act which received royal assent on April 5, 1973, and more recently the adoption of Bill C-202, a piece of legislation which is truly a high-water mark in the history of veterans legislation and which resulted in major changes being made to the basis on which the rates of disability pension are determined. This latter bill received royal assent on June 28, 1973, and became effective on July 1.

It has been my privilege to serve as chairman of the Standing Committee on Veterans Affairs which has the responsibility of examining the estimates and draft legislation respecting the Department of Veterans Affairs. The Standing Committee on Veterans Affairs is noted for the non-partisan and co-operative manner in which it operates, and I know that hon. members will understand and excuse my pride in having had the opportunity to play a part in bringing about the legislative changes to which I have referred and which have done so much to improve the financial lot of disability pensioners and war veterans allowance recipients.

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker, I would like, if I may, to review briefly the measures adopted during the last few months for the benefit of veterans. I do so for many reasons. As I said a short while ago, I have a very legitimate pride, because I have the privilege of chairing the Committee on Veterans' Affairs and also because, like you, Mr. Speaker, I have a certain feeling of solidarity towards my former buddies in the air force and those in the army and the navy as well.

And in a short period of time, Mr. Speaker, measures have been announced and implemented precisely so that our companions who fought with us and many of whom came back physically disabled be treated with a little more fairness and honesty.

[English]

I would like to deal first with disability pensions. Less than two and a half years ago the Pension Act was the subject of a comprehensive overhaul. The major improvements legislated at the time included the creation of the exceptional incapacity allowance, the clarification of the benefit of doubt clause, the introduction of special consideration for Hong Kong veterans, the establishment of a totally independent bureau of pension advocates, and the creation of the Pension Review Board. This landmark legislation which became law on March 30, 1971, resulted in increased benefits for veterans and their dependents and also opened the door to many thousands of others to apply for pension or to renew a previous application which had been rejected.

All hon. members will be aware of what has happened as a result of this opening up of the Pension Act. Many thousands of applications have been received and the Canadian Pension Commission has had to be expanded substantially in order to cope with the resulting avalanche of claims. I am happy to report that the backlog of applications, although still very substantial, has now started to diminish.

Although it is less than two and a half years since these major amendments were made to the Pension Act, it is noteworthy that the act has been further amended three times and that rates have been increased on four occasions. On April 1, 1971, basic rates were raised by 10 per cent. On January 1, 1972, and again on January 1, 1973, pension rates were escalated in accordance with a cost of living formula in order to maintain the purchasing power of the pensioner's income. Most recently, Bill C-202 was enacted on June 28, 1973, and this was truly a red-letter day in the history of Canadian pension legislation since the basic rate structure is now tied to the composite of five unskilled categories of public servants.

This change followed the recommendations of a joint committee of officials of the department, the Canadian Pension Commission and representatives of veterans' organizations and resulted in an average increase in basic pension rates of 24 per cent. It is estimated that the full year cost of this increase alone will exceed $50 million. No provision was made in the main estimates for this increase in pension rates for obvious reasons and, as a result, appropriate inclusion will be made in supplementary estimates to finance these increases.

The situation with reference to war veterans allowances has been equally dynamic and since April 1, 1971, the rate structure has been increased on four occasions, the most recent being April 1, 1973, when rate increases of $20.14 per month for the single recipient and $39.60 per month for the married recipient were granted. At the moment, the actual income ceiling for a single recipient is $2,293.68 and for a married recipient $3,926.52.

In addition, recipients age 65 and over also benefit from the regulation which exempts $15 per month, if single, and $30 per month, if married, of their old age security and guaranteed income supplement payments. Over and above these income values, recipients may now earn up to $1,000 per annum, if single, or $1,500 per annum, if married, without affecting their war veterans allowance payments.

There were other significant changes and Bill C-148 is one of them. They became effective on April 1, 1973, with the result that war veterans allowance has been changed from a means tested program to a modified income tested program. For example, the former limits on savings and personal property have been removed and the recipient will now be able to own his own home, regardless of value, without his allowance being affected. In addition, war veterans allowances, like disability pensions and old age security, will be automatically increased in accordance with changes in the consumer price index.

Although veterans affairs is considered a mature department with well defined and well established programs, I have attempted in my remarks to illustrate the rate and extent of change which has been occurring in the recent past. In many instances, these changes could be foreseen only in very general terms and I have indicated the extent to which supplementary financing will be required in the current fiscal year.

My remarks are not intended in any way to suggest that every effort should not be made to plan as carefully as possible, but merely to indicate how the best of plans are subject to unforeseen change or to timing which cannot be accurately predicted.

I have dealt with only two programs of the department, namely, pensions and war veterans allowances, since these have been the two most dynamic in recent times. In closing, I would like to mention briefly a study which is currently being made by treatment services on the long term effects of imprisonment on former prisoners of war in the European theatres of operations. This study, which is being made by Dr. J. Douglas Herman of Ottawa, is an attempt to determine if the hardships of incarceration in prison camps produced any identifiable or delayed action disabilities on those who were unfortunate enough to have been prisoners of war. What this study will reveal and where it will lead is, of course, not known at this time and I mention it merely to illustrate the type of research which conceivably could give rise to further changes in any one of several departmental programs.

I would like to speak at greater length on the programs for which the minister is responsible, but since I do not wish to encroach upon the time available to other speakers, I will terminate my remarks at this point.

Mr. Jack Marshall (Humber-St. George's-St. Barbe): Mr. Speaker, the motion we are dealing with asks for a complete copy, including budgets, of the program forecast of the Department of Veterans Affairs for the latest year for which Parliament approved departmental expenditures. The hon. member who just spoke indicated that he is chairman of the Standing Committee on Veterans Affairs. He has done his best on that committee but I do not know why he was reviewing things that happened in the past. What we want to know about are the things that are going to happen in the future.

One of the most important of these came to light in the last couple of days when the old age security bill came before the House to provide for an increase of 5 per cent in the basic rate of pension, raising it by $5.30 and the OAS and GIS by $9.16. With the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles), I have been pressing the minister this past week to make those amounts exempt for those war veterans over the age of 65 who are receiving war veterans allowance. We have received evasive answers to the effect that they are going to be dealt with fairly, but unless we keep pressing this matter, nothing will ever happen.

Mr. Dupras: Oh, come on.

Mr. Marshall: I heard somebody say "oh, come on." Certainly I know that the Department of Veterans Affairs has done a lot of good for veterans and I have complimented the minister on this. But strangely enough, Mr. Speaker, in that great reef of documents that the Prime Minister read the other day there was not a word about the war veterans in our country. There are 900,000 of them and with their dependants the number climbs to three million, yet there was no mention of them until we brought the matter up in the House.

The government keeps bragging about what they have done for the veterans. They seem to forget, however, that in 1914, over 54 years ago, a commitment was made that the veterans of Canada in the first world war and subsequent wars would be looked after by the Parliament and the government of Canada. The government may brag about what has been done in the last two or three years but they should see the suffering of those veterans who are considered burnt out at age 60. If it had not been for the veterans of 1914-1918 and 1939-1945, a lot of us would not be here today trying to deal with the problems of the country and the 5,000 poverty-stricken Canadians who live in this wealthy nation.

The government should not be too smug about what has happened in the past but should be considering what can be done for those veterans who are in the 70 to 80 years of age bracket today who are not getting the benefit of the commitment that our predecessors made some 54 years ago.

I have to bring up one matter which disturbs me. If the chairman of the Standing Committee on Veterans Affairs thinks that the press is going to pay any attention to veterans affairs, he has another thought coming. The irresponsibility of the press is demonstrated by the ignorance of most Canadians regarding matters relating to veterans. I could stand in the middle of the House of Commons and do bayonet drill, but nobody would pay any attention because the veterans who built a base for this country 54 years ago are forgotten.

Mr. Dupras: That is not true, you know.

Mr. Marshall: It is true.

Mr. Dupras: Stop playing politics.

Mr. Marshall: "Politics" the man says. If there was ever any politicking it was in every word that came from him.

On a number of occasions I have told the Minister of Veterans Affairs that I respect what he is trying to do, but the fault lies with the government. It is just baloney to say that anybody is being political. I can only say that I hope the other notices of motion on this subject will not be treated in such a ridiculous fashion.

Mr. H. T. Herbert (Vaudreuil): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member for Humber-St. George's-St. Barbe (Mr. Marshall) seems to think that because the opposition, by their right, have the opportunity to bring up such subjects as they wish in this House, it is all right to suggest that no thought is being given to the veterans in the legislation under discussion. This matter has been under active discussion, Mr. Speaker, certainly between myself and the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Lalonde) as well as the Minister of Veterans Affairs (Mr. MacDonald), to ensure that there will be the necessary legislation or order in council so that veterans will benefit from the increase in the old age pension. We hope this legislation will be passed by this House, effective in the month of October. I was surprised, having heard the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Stanfield) ask a supplementary question, to hear the suggestion that we are playing politics. Surely the opposition is playing politics, as that question was an attempt to get on the record the suggestion that only the opposition ever thinks about our veterans.

Mr. Marshall: What happened last week, when I asked a question and got an evasive answer?

Mr. Herbert: I welcome this opportunity to participate in this debate, for surely there are all too few occasions when we can speak in general terms about the veterans charter and the way in which it has been and is being administered.

I consider that in certain respects Canadian veterans have been most fortunate. I believe that the veterans charter has been, and continues to be, the most comprehensive, constructive program ever developed for men and women who have placed their lives, voluntarily in most cases in Canada, at the disposal of their country in time of war. Indeed, they could be considered to be doubly fortunate, for the administration of that compendium of excellent legislation has been of an extremely high order. Dedicated public servants have given an imaginative, positive, humane and personal service to their clients, the war veterans and the widows and the orphans of those who gave their lives. Their efficiency and effectiveness means that we hear little about them. Like the water in a well or a good wife in a home, they are taken for granted as long as they fulfil their functions satisfactorily.

But we do hear, or read, from time to time suggestions that the veterans affairs portfolio is an anachronism; that with the last major war ending 28 years ago the ministry has outlived its usefulness and should, in fact, have been phased out years ago. Such statements are based on a pitiful ignorance of the veterans charter legislation and its long-term benefits; and I want to take a few minutes in this debate to look briefly into the future of the continuing benefits and, to some extent at least, put the record straight.

First of all, just who are the veterans affairs clients, and how many of them are there? Canada still has approximately 900,000 veterans, most of them with wives and some with dependant children. The number of widows of fatal war casualties and of veterans is unknown; only the number of widows and orphans drawing benefits of one kind or another is known. Naturally, a large majority of the veterans are productive, self-supporting members of their communities, but are receiving benefits of one kind or another. Moreover, the last survivor of the 1885 Northwest Field Force died only about 18 months ago, and war veterans allowances are being paid to seven widows of members of that force.

"Old Soldiers Never Die—" goes the song, and a DVA welfare officer once added: "And their wives live even longer". Needless to say, allowances are still being paid to a relatively large number of veterans of the South African War and to widows of such veterans; and, of course, to those of World War I and, increasingly, of World War II. The same is true of disability and widows pensions, or compensation, to be more precise.

How long will these programs continue? It is hard to say, but a veterans affairs statistician, using standard life mortality tables, came up with a statistic a few months ago which stated that, assuming no more wars, the last disability pensioner would die about the year 2030. With modern science extending life expectancy, that prediction may look very conservative in a decade or so. The statistician did not even attempt to predict when the last dependant's pension would be paid. In other words, it looks as if there will be a group of public servants administering the Pension Act for more than half a century.

Obviously, the cost of a war does not stop when the last bullet or arrow is fired. Indeed, veterans programs only being when the servicemen and women exchange their uniforms for "civvy street" attire. That is when the expenditures for rehabilitation programs, medical treatment, home construction, pensions, allowances and so on begin. How effectively those programs are administered has an important bearing on the economic and social stability of the country; for those who have been good citizens in time of war are potentially even better citizens in time of peace, if they can be helped to make a satisfactory transition.

The rehabilitation of the World War II veterans was well done and was completed long ago. Naturally, they are the largest group of veterans we have now. Their average age is between 58 and 59. What of them in the future?

The majority of them, being still sound of mind and limb, are providing for themselves and their families. In the next ten years, however, there will be a certain percentage who will pass on and leave impoverished widows or will have to retire to economic conditions which will cause distress. Because of their service to their country, these people are entitled to the benefits of the veterans charter. Apart from these potential clients who are today healthy both physically and financially, there are about 150,000 World War II veterans and dependants receiving disability pensions or war veterans allowances, at a total annual cost of around $200 million.

Medical treatment, of course, is another major requirement for veterans, regardless of age. Nearly ten years ago the government of the day decided to transfer the DVA hospitals to responsible authorities who would agree to certain conditions regarding standards of treatment, employment of staff, etc. What is the current situation? At the end of last year there were more than 5,000 patients in eight hospitals and three veterans homes. More than half of all DVA patients are under what is really nursing home care. In plain language they are old folks just growing older. Obviously the problem is not decelerating.

It is difficult to engage and retain highly qualified medical staff to work in a strictly domiciliary or chronic care climate and the number of acute care cases is gradually diminishing. But the department is still committed to providing first class care for those they do have.

The hospital transfer policy was first implemented in 1966 by the transfer of Sunnybrook Hospital in Toronto to the University of Toronto, and later by the transfer in 1968 of St-Foy Hospital in Quebec City to Le Centre Hospitalier de l'Université Laval, and Lancaster Hospital in Saint John to the province of New Brunswick in 1972. These transfers have fully justified the validity of the premise which occasioned the government's decision.

There have been many other ricochet benefits to the Canadian community at large as a result of the pioneering done in the forties and fifties by DVA treatment services. For example, Lyndhurst Lodge in Toronto is probably the most up-to-date and efficient rehabilitation centre in the world for paraplegics and quadriplegics. This hospital is now operated by the Canadian Paraplegic Association but it was set up by DVA originally in 1945 for the 225 paraplegic and quadriplegic victims of World War II. By 1950, the rehabilitation of these veterans having been completed, it was turned over to the Paraplegic Association and since then more than 3,000 civilian patients have been treated and discharged from Lyndhurst and are, once again, leading reasonably normal lives and are productive members of society.

The prosthetic device division of the Department of National Health and Welfare is a direct successor to the prosthetic services set up by DVA after World War II for the Canadian veterans who had suffered the loss of limbs or eyes. Many of the supervisors and technicians in this service are former DVA employees who were transferred to health and welfare when this service was made available to the general public.

The research and development programs carried out primarily for the disabled veterans represented a major contribution to all disabled persons. Our comprehensive experience on veterans covering a period of over 60 years is available to medical science and is an invaluable source of research information, especially in the study of geriatrics.

● (1750)

Land settlement and home construction is another program that has been a boon to thousands of World War II veterans and their families. It is being phased out now, the final application date for new loans being next March 31 and for all loans March 31, 1977.

However, these loans are for up to 30 years, which means that the administration of the Veterans Land Act will continue well into the 21st century. To illustrate, lending under the Soldier Settlement Act of World War I ceased in 1924, but there is still one outstanding account. We know that the Veterans Land Act took into account the lessons learned in the administration of its predecessor, but changes in the national economy and in the circumstances of the individual veterans and their families ensure that public servants will be required to manage the VLA loans until they are paid out.

The other large veterans affairs program is welfare services which provides, among other things, field services for the War Veterans Allowance Board. Obviously, those services will be required as long as WVA application are received and payments are made.

Perhaps equally important are the counselling services the welfare officers provide to their clients. These men and women know the various social and philanthropic services that are available in their particular areas and they are able to advise a veteran, a widow or an orphan in need of the services that will help them to cope with that need. Sometimes they act as a co-ordinator to ensure that the different resources available are utilized to the best advantage.

Usually, too, their standing in their communities is such that other agencies accept their recommendations without question when the need is immediate. That is a great advantage to veterans and to the dependants of veterans.

How long this special service will, or should, continue is unpredictable, but as veterans and their families grow older and life becomes more complex, their need for good advice and counsel is more likely to increase than it is to decline. That need will have to be met by an organization of qualified public servants.

What these remarks boil down to, Mr. Speaker, is the fact that the veterans charter provides many continuing benefits, benefits that will have to be administered for half a century or more. Obviously a point in time will be reached when a full-scale federal department cannot be justified for this purpose, but the functions will have to continue even though the administrative groups are branches of one or more other departments.

I hope these few remarks will put in perspective the outlook for veterans' benefits and will explain why it will be some time yet before the veterans affairs portfolio is likely to disappear, and several decades before the responsibilities it now looks after will have been fully discharged.

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, the motion before the House in the name of the hon. member for Toronto-Lakeshore (Mr. Grier) is one of 27 motions in his name that call for an expression of opinion on the right of parliament to see the program forecasts that are worked out by various departments of government. In no case does any one of these motions call for an examination of work done in the respective departments, but rather each of these motions relates to the principles of secrecy which the government continues to practice with regard to so many of its reports, papers and documents. However, since the hon. member for Labelle (Mr. Dupras), followed by others, chose instead to treat this as though it were a debate on veterans affairs in general, I wish to say just one word before Your Honour rules me out of order on the basis of what I have already said.

The hon. member for Labelle read from his prepared statement a sentence that I think was very important. He said that the $15 increase to individuals in old age security and guaranteed income supplement that was provided in 1972 was given special status for veterans 65 years of age or over. That special status is contained in an order in council which says that a veteran 65 years of age or over may exceed the ceiling in the War Veterans Allowance Act by $15. The hon. member also pointed out that in the case of a married veteran the figure is $30. There is nothing vague about that. It is clear and straightforward, namely that veterans who are 65 or over got and still get the $15 increase that was added to the OAS/GIS in 1972.

All that the hon. member for Humber-St. George's-St. Barbe (Mr. Marshall) and I are asking is for the same kind of clear statement with respect to the increase in OAS/GIS that will come in October.

I like the Minister of Veterans Affairs (Mr. MacDonald) very much, but it is not good enough for him to stand up in this House and say the government will take steps to see that the veterans get a fair deal. That is fine as a general statement, but until we know what it is, I will suspect that that means some kind of compromise, something less than we got in 1972.

I ask the hon. member for Labelle to go back to the minister and the department so we will have the very simple answer to the question asked by the hon. member for Humber-St. George's-St. Barbe, namely that there will be an order in council exempting the full amount of the OAS/GIS increase coming in October so the veterans will get the full benefit of that increase without any question.

Mr. Dupras: Mr. Speaker, I wish to inform the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) that I take exception to the fact he mentioned I had a prepared text. As I have not mastered the English language, I like to have a text before me. I will show the same deference to the hon. member if he ever speaks in French.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I extend my apologies to the hon. member. I hope he will take the message I gave him to his minister.

Mr. Dupras: I will.

PRIVILEGE

MR. NIELSEN—REFERENCE TO PRESS INTERVIEW GIVEN BY SOLICITOR GENERAL—RULING BY MR. SPEAKER

Mr. Speaker: Is it the wish of the House that the Chair give the ruling, which I indicated earlier today would be made at the first opportunity, in relation to the point of order which was raised earlier today?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Speaker: Earlier today the hon. member for Yukon (Mr. Nielsen) rose on a question of privilege relating to statements made by the Solicitor General (Mr. Allmand) in a press interview where questions were asked about a matter previously referred by the House to the Standing Committee on Privileges and Elections. The duty of the Chair is to rule whether there is a prima facie case of privilege that would make it possible for the hon. member for Yukon to put a motion of censure against the minister.

The hon. member made a well researched presentation to the House. He cited a number of authors and precedents which the Chair agreed to study before making a ruling.

I should apologize to hon. members. Looking at my notes, I feel it might be an imposition on the House to continue at this time. On reconsideration, perhaps the House might allow the Chair to postpone the ruling. I am thinking, in any event, about the absence of the hon. member for Yukon, and it occurs to me it might be a matter of courtesy to have him in the House when the ruling is made. So having read the introductory paragraph, perhaps I might continue when we reconvene at eight o'clock. Is this agreed?

● (1800)

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

At 6 p.m. the House took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The House resumed at 8 p.m.

Mr. Speaker: Earlier today, the hon. member for Yukon (Mr. Nielsen) rose on a question of privilege relating to statements made by the hon. the Solicitor General (Mr. Allmand) in a press interview where questions were asked about a matter previously referred by the House to the Standing Committee on Privileges and Elections. The duty of the Chair is to rule whether there is a prima facie case of privilege which would make it possible for the hon. member for Yukon to put a motion of censure against the minister.

The member made a well researched presentation to the House. He cited a number of authors and precedents which the Chair agreed to study before making a ruling. I have now had an opportunity to do so and am prepared to give hon. members the doubtful benefit of the knowledge gained from a study of the precedents cited by the hon. member as well as other precedents and citations.

Hon. members will appreciate, I am sure, that it is an extremely serious matter for the House even to debate a motion of censure against one of its members. My information is that the last instance of such a debate goes back to 1925. This in itself is an indication that the House does not lightly embark on such a course of action and the Chair itself must exercise extreme caution before allowing such a debate to take place under the guise of an alleged breach of parliamentary privilege.

The submission is that statements made by a member outside the House, contrary to an order of the House about matters currently under investigation by a committee, constitute a breach of privilege and a contempt of Parliament. In support of his claim the hon. member has quoted citations from Beauchesne, Bourinot and May. He refers firstly to a citation in Mays 17th edition at page 119. The author states that:

> ... by the ancient custom of Parliament no act done at any committee should be divulged before the same be reported to the House.

However, this principle clearly deals with in camera sessions and I find it difficult to relate that citation to the present circumstances. The hon. member has cited Bourinot's 4th edition at page 474. The same principle is quoted to the effect that it is a breach of privilege to publish the proceedings of a committee before they are formally reported to the House. As I have said, this citation does not appear to be applicable to the present case.

The hon. member then refers to Beauchesne's Fourth Edition at page 429. The author quotes the following doctrine:

> The House of Commons has disciplinary powers over its members, and a member who abuses his privilege of speech may be punished, not merely by suspension from the service of the House, but by imprisonment or expulsion from the House, or both.

It should be pointed out, however, that this is an excerpt from a report of a committee of the British House dealing with the British Official Secrets Act. Again I suggest respectfully that the citation is not applicable to the case now before us.

I think the essential procedural point to be considered is the distinction between statements made in the House and statements made outside the House. It is a well known rule that members ought not to comment in the House about proceedings in a committee until such committee has reported to the House. This cannot possibly apply to statements made outside the House. The distinction is consistent with the ruling made by the Chair yesterday during the question period, and consistent also with a ruling made by Mr. Speaker Macnaughton on June 5, 1964. On that earlier occasion the Chair agreed with the argument put forth by the hon. member for Yukon that, when breach of privilege is claimed, a distinction must be made between words spoken in the House and words spoken outside the House.

The hon. member has referred finally to a citation found in May's 18th edition at page 132, as follows:

> It may be stated generally that any act or omission which obstructs or impedes either House of Parliament in the performance of its functions, or which obstructs or impedes any member or officer of such House in the discharge of his duty, or which has a tendency, directly or indirectly, to produce such results may be treated as a contempt even though there is no precedent of the offence.

Were the words spoken by the minister an attempt to impede and obstruct the work of the committee? Was the making of a statement outside the House contrary to the order of the House? In fact, the order of the House was that the Standing Committee on Privileges and Elections consider a matter raised by the hon. member for Kingston and the Islands (Miss MacDonald). The suggestion is that the action of the House ordering that a matter be considered by a committee is at the same time a prohibition that it be commented upon otherwise than in committee.

I have been unable to find any precedent to support this suggestion. In my estimation the citation from May's 18th edition dealing with the impeding or obstruction of House business contemplates situations that are entirely different from that which is now under question.

The examples given by May of misconduct which may be treated as a contempt of Parliament refer to misconduct of strangers, misconduct of counsel, misbehaviour on the part of witnesses and disobedience to rules or orders of either House. Examples of such disobedience are given as the refusal or neglect of a witness to attend, the neglect to make a return, neglect to withdraw from the House when so directed, disclosure of proceedings in secret session. All these are clear examples of malfeasance which, in my view, do not appear to be relevant to the circumstances of the case before us.

The contention of the hon. member, based on a citation from Eric Taylor's "The House of Commons at Work", is that a breach of privilege is also a contempt of Parliament. This may be so but the fact remains, however, according to long established practice, that a prima facie case of breach of privilege must be first established.

The hon. member has indicated the terms of the motion which he has proposed to put to the House. It reads as follows:

That the conduct of the hon. member for Notre-Dame-de-Grâce in publicly making material allegations and purported statements of fact on the 5th September, 1973 relevant to the matters of a question of privilege that were referred by order of this House on the 4th September, 1973 to the Committee on Privileges and Elections for study and report, the said committee not having so reported, is a violation of that order and a contempt of this House, and therefore this House censures the conduct of the member for Notre-Dame-de-Grâce.

The purport of the proposed motion is very clear. The hon. member would ask the House to censure an hon. member for a statement made outside the House. On the basis of this motion itself I must find that there is not a prima facie case of breach of parliamentary privilege.

Mr. Nielsen: Mr. Speaker, I may say without hesitation that I accept the ruling. The Solicitor General (Mr. Allmand) is rather fortunate, for if the House had debated the matter it might have involved the ultimate penalty of imprisonment. He probably would have been on temporary leave of absence in any event.

Mr. Speaker: I must say that the Chair is very grateful to the hon. member for Yukon for so graciously accepting the ruling, which I appreciate is perhaps difficult in the circumstances. I am grateful to the hon. member and appreciative of this gracious acceptance of the ruling.

OLD AGE SECURITY ACT

PROVISION FOR QUARTERLY ADJUSTMENT OF PENSION

The House resumed consideration in committee of Bill C-219, to amend the Old Age Security Act—Mr. Lalonde—Mr. McCleave in the Chair.

The Chairman: The discussion is on clause 1. The hon. member for Victoria.

Mr. McKinnon: Mr. Chairman, when we rose at five o'clock for the consideration of private members' business I had just made the point that it ill becomes the Minister of National Health and Welfare to act as if this government is a great blessing to Canada while at the same time his department has been decreasing research grants for cancer. This kind of action comes from the same coalition that exists in my province of British Columbia on a federal-provincial basis.

In that province the federal Liberals and their soulmates the NDP can share the blame for the fact that elderly citizens requiring domiciliary care, while in theory coming under government medical coverage, in practice find no coverage and must instead pay $400 to $600 per month for private hospital care. Then we have here displayed—and the party to our left must accept 31/140's of the responsibility for the actions of this government—is an uncaring and callous attitude toward the reality of the desperate situation of those elderly people. The party to our left, the NDP, must accept its responsibility for the situation in that they have maintained these incompetents in office.

Let us look at the situation in respect of the small businessmen or women. They are caught in price squeezes which unfortunately are all too often caused by the ineptness of the Liberal-NDP coalition government. I spoke to a feed mill operator last week in Victoria; he had phoned me to say that his feed grain supplies of grade 3 wheat could not be delivered. The Canadian Wheat Board had supplies of this grain in the elevator in Victoria but could only sell it at export market prices. The net result was that this feed mill proprietor faced an increase in cost of feed grain from $138 a ton to $200 a ton in one day.

The Chairman: Order, please. I hestitate to interrupt the hon. member. The discussion has been pretty far ranging, but generally it has been within the field of welfare and security. I hope the hon. member will be able to bring his remarks more closely to the subject of the bill.

Mr. McKinnon: Mr. Chairman, I only strayed to the extent that these bills were produced as a package, as I understood it, to combat inflation, and I thought I might be allowed the same discretion or leeway granted the Prime Minister in introducing this as a package. It is extremely difficult for me to speak of the plight of the elderly citizens in my constituency without speaking about the price of the food which they cannot afford to eat. I trust I will not be too bitter in my condemnation of the government for its fiscal policy, but it is very difficult today to separate the need for increased pensions from the cost of food, economic fiscal policies and their effect on the high cost of living. In any event I will attempt to follow your suggestion, Mr. Chairman.

I have heard many quotations from the speech of the Minister of Finance when he introduced the budget on February 19. No doubt it will be a favourite mine for other parties for some time when they are looking for nuggets of bad guessing, inappropriate forecasting and general lack of understanding of the economy, present and future. My favourite quote is when the Liberal Minister of Finance, to applause from their coalition partners, said:

> This budget is aimed at reducing inflationary pressures in Canada—

Later in the same paragraph he said:

> It is equally essential to reduce the squeeze of rising prices on family budgets and the erosion of the hard-earned savings in Canada.

I realize there will be arguments from my colleagues as to which of all the inexact, inappropriate claims made in that budget speech is the furthest removed from what has since transpired, but the statement I have just read is my choice. It displays an almost unbelievable lack of prescience. This Minister of Finance, who considers a $500 million miscalculation to be of no consequence, boasts of the Canadian dollar keeping even with the United States dollar, but neglects to mention the disastrous decline of the U.S. dollar that he is so proud to accompany in its plunge. This is rather like the first mate on the Titanic boasting that he is not going down any faster than the captain.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. McKinnon: The fiscal and economic policies of this government have brought on inflation, and inflation brings on labour demands for higher wages. What else could be expected to happen? Inflation robs the workers of part of their pay cheques and this brings on labour unrest. As this government seems unable to devise any legislation that even approaches the problem of inflation, I predict continuing labour unrest. The cause is inflation, and in its customary fashion this NDP-Liberal coalition ignores the cause and legislates against the effects.

I have done a little reading on the matter to see what some learned people have thought about inflation. I noted that Bernard Baruch said:

> Inflation—the most important economic fact of our time—the single greatest peril to our economic health.

I came across another quotation I should like to read from an author one might find unusual to be speaking about inflation. Hemingway said:

> The first panacea for a mismanaged nation is inflation of the currency; the second is war. Both bring a temporary prosperity; both bring a permanent ruin.

Perhaps the one quotation that would be the most popular in this House with this minority government would be this quotation from a prominent world statesman of another country who said:

> In country after country, it is becoming inconceivable that national economic policies will be developed which do not contain, as a significant element, some form of incomes policy.

That was stated by Harold Wilson, former Prime Minister of Great Britain and leader of the Labour party who could hardly be said to be anti-labour. He said that in any advanced country today the number one problem is containing inflation.

I now wish to speak about the spirit of uncertainty in the economy. Rapid changes in prices, interest rates, performance of stocks, etc., have created uncertainty, apprehension and even fear among investors, businesses and the public at large. Businesses are hampered in making any long-term decisions by the great uncertainties in both supply and demand.

The average Canadian is confused and worried. Can he buy a home for his family with interest rates in excess of 10 per cent? Will his savings be rendered insufficient for his needs through the ravages of inflation? Will he even be able to provide for the present with the prices of the very basics of his existence, food, clothing and shelter, soaring?

This is what Canadians at every level face—uncertainty and apprehension about the future. The pensioner is worried as he sees the purchasing power of his cheque shrink; the worker is worried as he sees his hard-earned wage shrink in value each time he goes to the store; the businessman is worried about increased wages and higher interest rates; and the producer is worried about the costs he faces for machinery, labour and supply.

Who is to blame? Can the farmers be blamed for increased production costs and for their desire for a reasonable standard of living? Can the manufacturers be held utterly responsible for the greater amount they must pay for raw materials and labour? Can the worker be blamed for demanding raises when the real value of his wage is sinking? Finally, can the pensioner be blamed for wanting to live with a modicum of dignity? I suggest the answer to all these questions is no. The disarray into which the present government has allowed the Canadian economy to slide is the reason for the uncertainty and fear.

Granted, a very few producers may be taking advantage of the fears of shortages to make a fast buck. A very few companies may be gouging the consumer with unwarranted price increases, just as a very few groups may be making unjustified and inflationary wage demands. But to single out any one of these as the cause of the economic problem is to live in a dream world. It is like looking into the problems of the 19th century for solutions to the problems of today.

What is our government doing? The government has produced this hodgepodge legislation in answer to the very real problems of the Canadian economy. These measures are gravely deficient, however, in that they treat only the symptoms and not the disease. This does not mean our party opposes the measures, for it is foolish to oppose anything that will relieve some of the suffering of the sick patient. We do support these specific moves because in some small way they will relieve some of the immediate suffering of some Canadians.

However, we in the Progressive Conservative party advocate and seek to do far more for the Canadian people. Our economic policies are aimed at treating the disease. They are not like the Liberal's bandaid policy for treating symptoms, and I might say that they are not like the NDP policies either. The main difference between the NDP and the Conservative party is that the Conservatives want all Canadians to be rich and the NDP want all Canadians to be poor.

We propose a comprehensive freeze on prices, profits, wages and interest rates. Immediately this is suggested in this House we hear questions about the United States freeze. Let us look at it for a minute. The area right now that seems the most disastrous is that in respect of beef prices. Freezing beef prices has caused grave shortages in meat supplies. Why is this the case? I suggest it is because the freeze was not comprehensive. It was, like the Liberal policies, a bandaid approach. To expect producers to be able to supply beef at fixed prices when the cost of feed grains was soaring was absurd. The inevitable result was that suppliers withheld beef rather than sell at a loss.

It was because Nixon treated one symptom and rejected any comprehensive approach that his policies failed. Now we are presented with this Liberal bill which advocates exactly just such a bandaid approach. It too will get no closer to a solution to the basic problems which plague our economy.

Many advanced industrial nations face inflationary problems today. These are frequently blamed on the rapid rise in the international prices of raw resources of food, minerals and oil. The government often points this out and claims that these pressures are beyond its control, and it claims to be blameless for Canada's inflationary woes. A government leader gets up and says: "Every western industrial country has serious inflation; what can we do in face of such international forces?"

For a moment it sounds plausible. But this excuse will not work because what they never mention is Canada's unique position among advanced industrial nations. Canada produces and exports vast quantities of those raw materials which are soaring in price internationally. Canada should be repaying the benefits of those increased prices, not suffering from the ravages of inflation.

If the government had the wisdom and the courage to look at the whole Canadian economy, to introduce dramatic, sweeping and intelligent resource and industrial policies for Canada, then all Canadians would benefit. These stop gap measures will never cure anything. The Progressive Conservatives want comprehensive controls so that the Canadian economy will no longer continue its erratic, leaderless wanderings. We want this to enable us to implement real policies directed at leading the Canadian economy to a period of stable development which will benefit all Canadians. Under proper leadership Canada, with her raw resources in ever increasing demand, can create jobs and prosperity without the uncertainties of inflation for decades ahead. The Progressive Conservatives can provide such leadership, and we have sought the opportunity to do so.

Finally, Mr. Chairman, I will, of course, vote for the bill. It is the least that can be done to relieve the distress placed upon our senior citizens by the mismanagement of the government. I would much rather be voting for measures that would do something to remove the cause, and I hope that some day this government or its successor will attempt to deal with the root cause, which is inflation.

Mr. Beattie (Hamilton Mountain): Mr. Chairman, I would like to begin my remarks on this bill by heaping a bit of praise on the head of the Minister of Agriculture, that great friend of the bedevilled and exploited Canadian consumer. I salute the hon. gentleman for being the first minister on the government benches to admit publicly, some time last May, that he was aware that Canadian consumers are angry about the continuing rise in the cost of living.

That was a very astute observation on the part of the minister, and it could lead to any number of things. To begin with, even at this late date he might send notes to his colleagues informing them of the seriousness of the situation. He might even let the Prime Minister in on his secret.

Last night the Minister of National Health and Welfare went to great lengths explaining what a great boon the Liberal government has been for the Canadian people since 1963.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): It was the night before that.

Mr. Beattie (Hamilton Mountain): The night before that? Then I am sure you were here. Obviously the minister had been doing a little research on the subject. I wonder would he tell his colleagues that the crippling spiral in the rate of increase in inflation began immediately after the Liberals took over government from the Conservative party in 1963? At that time the rate of increase in inflation was 1.2 per cent. Last year, from April 1972 to April 1973, the rate was 6.6 per cent. That could come as a surprise to the Prime Minister and other ministers, but these are facts and figures that cannot be disputed.

In 1962 food prices increased by 1.8 per cent over the previous year, with a Conservative government in power. Last year, under this government, the increase was 7.6 per cent. God knows what it will be this year.

The Minister of Agriculture also said that Canadians have been spoiled by low food prices over the past 20 years. But here he was wide of the mark. Canadians were spoiled by low food prices up to the time the Liberals assumed office in 1963, but from that time on it has been quite a different story.

If the government really does have contingency plans to deal with inflation, as it implies it does, then it is time that it unveiled them. Inflation is not a contingency, it is a fact. Inflation is a cruel fact. I say to the minister and his colleagues that the Canadian consumers are not only angry over the situation but are completely fed up with the government's lack of concern and lack of action.

A great deal has been said in the past about the pros and cons of capital punishment, but I have not heard anything said about the punishment of capital as a result of the government's failure to come to grips with inflation. Punishment of capital is the erosion of savings, pensions and other assets accumulated by Canadians who plan for their years of retirement.

Punishment of capital downgrades one of the most precious of virtues, resourcefulness. It is a process that penalizes people who are frugal, people who save their money and invest in securities or property that they feel will ensure them a reasonable return on their investments. These are people who want more than a bare existence from their government in their years of retirement, and who are willing to plan and work to that end.

Let us see how these people fare under our present government and compare their situation with that of people who do not save, plan or invest, but who elect to retire on old age security pensions and supplements. In the first place they pay taxes on their earnings before they take out a few dollars to put into a savings account, an investment or a retirement plan. Then they pay taxes on the earnings on their savings through the years, and on dividends. Then, if their income is over a certain figure after retirement, in spite of the fact that they have been paying taxes on that same money all their working lives, they pay more taxes on their retirement income. But what is even worse, their income is further reduced by the total of the increase in inflation during the years that they have been working.

This is real punishment and it has a crippling effect on initiative and resourcefulness. It puts a heavy price on human endeavour, and it has the effect of denying Canadians a fundamental right, the right to guarantee themselves a comfortable old age by their own efforts.

Anyone who saves and invests for retirement is further penalized by receiving a lower pension than those who do not plan their retirement income. They receive the basic pension, while a person who does not have any other source of income receives the pension and a supplement. I am not opposed to giving the supplement, Mr. Chairman, but it is necessary simply because the pension itself is not adequate. No better evidence can be presented than the fact that the government recognizes the necessity for a supplement when the pension is the only source of income.

When this aspect of the problem is added to the immediate effects of inflation on Canadian consumers, especially on those consumers in the lower income brackets, then it is obvious that we cannot wait any longer to come to grips with inflation. I simply cannot understand why the government does not at least try some of the proposals put forward by the Official Opposition. I am thinking specifically of temporary wage and price controls proposed by the Leader of the Opposition. The government has tried almost everything else, and it is not good enough for it just to state that controls will not work if they have not even been tried. It is obvious that we will have to take drastic measures in the fight on inflation, and we must begin now. The Food Prices Review Board does not seem to be getting anywhere. When we consider that the government has not put forward any other concrete proposals to deal with the problem, Mr. Chairman, then we also have to consider that we are going to use up still more precious time debating and procrastinating.

[Mr. Beattie (Hamilton Mountain).]

In the meantime, consumers cast about for their own solutions. Unfortunately, while such things as meat boycotts are well intentioned, they do not have any lasting effects. Prices continue to spiral; some retailers and wholesalers are taking this opportunity to gouge consumers and blame it on inflation, and even innocent retailers who are caught in the squeeze are being maligned.

The government's spokesman on the issue, or one of them at least, calls on Canadian consumers to rejoice in the fact that they have been spoiled by low food prices and to take the present inflationary spiral in their stride. Naturally, Mr. Chairman, it is easier for the government to let ministers interpret the situation in their own way and give the public slanted versions of the seriousness of the problem than to take positive steps to get inflation under control.

The Minister of Finance gave his version of the problem when he said that wage and price controls would not work in Canada and that they had not worked when tried in the United States and the United Kingdom. On the first point, I do not see how the minister can say that they would not work when he has no evidence to support his claim.

If wage and price controls have not been tried, Mr. Chairman, the Minister of Finance is not in any better position than I to determine whether or not they will work. I doubt that even he could quarrel with that logic. On the other point, there are conflicting opinions whether or not they worked in the United States. The best evidence we have is reflected in the fact that the rate of increase in inflation in the United States is less than in Canada, so it would appear that something is working for them.

The Prime Minister has stated in the past that the government's abortive attempts to implement wage and price controls on a voluntary basis proved that such controls would not work. He also said that labour would not co-operate with the government in voluntary restraints and therefore that precluded any possibility of success with the program.

I cannot accept that argument either, Mr. Chaiman. Because there were no clearcut guidelines for anyone to follow, and the government's program of voluntary restraints was purely and simply an attempt to pass the buck and place responsibility for inflation on anyone who happened to be handy. The government could not have cared less whether the culprit was industry, labour or the country's wholesalers and retailers.

In fact it was not a program at all. It was a shallow attempt to put off making a decision, an attempt to buy time in the hope that divine providence would intervene and solve the problem for them. The only thing that divine providence has ever done for this government is to deliver the N.D.P. as a Liberal rump, stripped of their doubtful principles and philosophy and laid bare for the government to use as they see fit. If they are waiting for divine providence to deliver us from inflation, and it appears that they are, then we will have a very long wait indeed. But the Canadian people, particularly our older people, are tired of waiting and the time has long since passed when the government can avoid making a decision.

The senior citizens in this country will never be able to make ends meet until such time as the government comes to grips with this cancer. How can they relax in the evening of their days when they see their only hope of justice in the form of a rail strike to bring the government back to a point of temporary sanity?

Before my time runs out I should like to make one more point with regard to the government's responsibility in this matter. The case has been made over and over again that the government has failed to measure up to its responsibility in fighting inflation. Now that is a fact of our daily lives.

However, there is another area in which the government has failed in its duty to the electorate. This government has doubled the national budget in the last five years over what it had become in the previous hundred years. When the present Prime Minister took office the national budget was about $10 billion. In the coming fiscal year it is just short of $20 billion. I charge this government with doing more than anyone or anything else to contribute to the present spiral in the rate of increase in inflation. It is obvious from the estimates that it does not have any intention of reducing expenditures, or of even trying to hold the line.

The villain in this piece is not the labour unions, or industry, or the wholesalers and retailers in our country. The culprit is not some person or thing outside the country, as we have also been led to believe. The villain in this shabby drama sits there across the room, smug and complacent and determined not to take suggestions or advice from anyone who seriously wants to restore the buying power of the Canadian dollar.

We have already been warned by the garment industry that clothing in Canada will probably increase in price by as much as 50 per cent in the next six months, and possibly sooner. Industry knows or suspects that this is going to happen, but the government appears to be completely unaware of this fact or is completely disinterested. There are signs that food and shelter are also going to experience dramatic price increases in that period but still we have had no indication that the government is aware or interested.

We cannot wait for several more months for these things to happen, Mr. Chairman. We must take some sort of initiative now. I call upon the government to stop worrying about the NDP support and begin to act like a government. If the government table legislation that is designed to grapple with national problems, they can forget about the NDP; we have already demonstrated that point. They will not need them, for the simple reason that we will give them the support they need. But the government will have to start acting responsibly, and this could prove refreshing as well as fruitful for the electorate after months of playing games. At least in my opinion it would be worth a try.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Chairman, I should like to say a word or two. It might be more than a word or two but it will be about clause 1.

Mr. Lalonde: Hear, hear! You are the first one.

Old Age Security

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): If my tone of voice seemed to suggest that some of the speeches made recently have been out of order, that is what I meant. It seems to me that the time comes when Standing Order 55(2) should be applied, as indeed Your Honour tried to apply it a few moments ago.

I should like to talk about the language of this bill, some examples of which are to be found in clause 1. I know that the law has to be clearly written so that every loophole is covered and no smart lawyer can get around it. But I also believe that the law is written for the people, and it seems to me that a law that provides a pension for senior citizens ought to be written in such a way that an average senior citizen can pick it up and know what it means.

I am not sure that all of the 264 members on the floor of this House can pick up this piece of legislation and know precisely what it means, except, of course, that they have read about it in the newspapers. Let us take clause 1. Part of what I say refers to clause 2 as well, but I will make my remarks in relation to clause 1. In the main, clause 1 of the bill tries to tell us that the consumer price index will be used for the purpose of the quarterly escalation of the Old Age Security Pension and the payment of the Guaranteed Income Supplement. In order to do that it tells us in the paragraph on page 1 what is meant by the consumer price index and makes reference to the adjustment quarter. Then we discover that there can be two kinds of adjustment quarter, the first adjustment quarter and a second adjustment quarter, and that there can also be a payment quarter.

Having given us that information, the clause proceeds to define these various concepts. In order to define the first adjustment quarter, it uses four full subparagraphs (a), (b), (c) and (d). They define what the first adjustment quarter is in relation to each of the four different months in the calendar year in which the escalation is to take place. Then, not in any logical sequence, but I suppose because of the alphabet, we are given a definition of payment quarter. I would have thought that we would be given the definition of the first adjustment quarter, then of the second adjustment quarter, and then of the payment quarter; but no, we get the definition of the first adjustment quarter, then of the payment quarter, and then of the second adjustment quarter.

For the purpose of defining the second adjustment quarter, the bill again has to use not one or two simple sentences, but four subparagraphs, (a), (b), (c) and (d). After that we are told, as we read on in the bill, that payments shall be adjusted quarterly. And just in case enough has not been put into the bill, we find this phrase, "in such manner as may be prescribed by regulation . . .".

Having read all that, we then come to a clause or two that tell us how much a pensioner will get under the provisions of this bill in various quarters. Up to this point I have just been describing in my own words what the various clauses do. But having looked over the first three or four pages of the bill, I find that there is a honey of a clause that starts at the bottom of page 3 and continues over on page 4. I should like to read it into the record. It is the part of the bill which says how much money a person will get in any quarter, and it goes like this. The amount:

(a.1) for a month in the six-month period commencing on April 1, 1973 is the basic amount;

(a.2) for a month in the payment quarter commencing on October 1, 1973—

Until I let Your Honour know differently, I shall be quoting from one sentence. I continue with the words that say that the sum to be received:

—is the amount obtained by multiplying

(i) the basic amount,

by

(ii) the ratio that the average for the ten-month period that ended on July 31, 1973 of the Consumer Price Index for Canada, as published by Statistics Canada under the authority of the Statistics Act, for each month in that ten-month period bears to the average for the ten-month period that ended on September 30, 1972 of that Consumer Price Index for each month in that ten-month period; and

(b) for a month in any payment quarter commencing after December 31, 1973 is the amount obtained by multiplying

(i) the amount of such pension that might have been paid to such a person for a month in the three-month period next before that payment quarter,

by

(ii) the ratio that the Consumer Price Index for the first adjustment quarter that relates to that payment quarter bears to the Consumer Price Index for the second adjustment quarter that relates to that payment quarter.

Finally there is a period.

Mr. Lalonde: It is obvious.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): It is common practice in this institution for members to criticize what somebody has done but not say how it can be done differently. I thought, having been a printer and having had to work with words in one way or another, and having been in another profession in which one makes use of words to convey ideas, that I might try to see if I could not put in a reasonably simple sentence all that this gobbledygook says. I am not going to move an amendment. I would not suggest that our law should be made so simple that an ordinary person can understand it.

Mr. Baker: Or lawyers couldn't make a living.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): My learned friend from Commanche Drive is obviously worried about what would happen to lawyers if the law were written in simple language. But let me indicate what I think should have been done. I know we are having a bit of fun about this, but I am also making a serious point. The individuals who draft these laws, instead of trying as hard as they can to make them obtuse and incomprehensible, should try to make them simple and understandable.

Let me try something on for size. For purposes of this draft I accept what the bill tries to do. I might disagree with some provisions, but I accept what the bill tries to do. Let me read what I think might have been drafted. That clause could say:

The quarterly escalation provided in this act shall take place, each year, in January, April, July and October, and it shall be calculated on the basis of the increase in the Consumer Price Index during the three months that ended two months prior to each January, April, July and October, as compared with the Consumer Price Index in the immediately preceding three months period.

Mr. Blenkarn: It's too simple.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): My hon. friend from Mississagua finds it too simple.

An hon. Member: He's a lawyer.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): It might have been useful to put a simple statement like that in the explanatory notes, but it is not there. Perhaps those who draw up the explanatory notes could not figure the clause out. It is really quite simple.

If the Minister of National Health and Welfare, his parliamentary secretary, the government House leader and the very useful help which is sitting in front of the Minister of National Health and Welfare say that I have not taken into account the fact that we must consider the special circumstances that relate to the first payment, the one that starts this October, let me say that I have drafted something to cover that as well. What I have already suggested as a first paragraph would cover the picture in general terms. I see the parliamentary secretary nodding his head. I suspect this is the first time he has understood the bill.

As for the first payments, the first increases which are to come into effect in October and which, by the way, are spelled out in that long sentence I read, the matter could be reduced to this:

The escalation to come into effect in October, 1973, shall be calculated on the basis of the increase in the Consumer Price Index during the ten months from October 1, 1972, to July 31, 1973, as compared with the Consumer Price Index during the ten months from December 1, 1971, to September 30, 1972.

An hon. Member: Explain.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Someone says, explain. If my hon. friend will look at Hansard tomorrow, he will realize that that is what all the gobbledygook in the bill is. Tonight it is not as important to make this change as to get the bill through.

However, I am glad that we have gone through this exercise in committee of the whole so that the important and competent officials of the Department of National Health and Welfare who are with us, and they are important and competent, will, next time this kind of legislation is to be drafted, say to the drafters, "For heaven's sake, put this stuff in plain, ordinary language that can be understood."

An hon. Member: Even by the lawyers.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Yes, even by the lawyers, so that they can understand what is in the law without having to seek the advice of counsel. When the minister gets to his feet, I would be glad to hear his comments on what I have been saying.

● (2050)

Now may I ask on what basis the government picked these two particular 10 month periods for the purpose of calculating the increase that is to come into effect in October? I can understand the time sequences that were chosen for the regular quarterly escalation. In other words, if a quarter starts in January, you have to pick a period as recent as possible, so the government picked a period that ended two months before that. However, on what basis was the decision made to pick a particular 10 month period compared with another 10 month period? If the minister tells me they did some experimenting and calculating and found that that comparison gives the old age pensioners more than some others, I will be quite happy. However, if that calculation does not give them the best possible increase, why did they not pick one that would have done that?

Mr. Lalonde: Mr. Chairman, I might now answer the question raised by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre. With regard to the last question he raised, these two particular 10 month periods were chosen in order to make the catching up effective.

The hon. member will remember we amended the Old Age Security Act as of last April. We made an increase which included the adjustment in the cost of living of the previous year and also included an increase in real terms in old age security payments. That part of the increase made in April represented the adjustment in the consumer price index.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Roughly three dollars.

Mr. Lalonde: That is correct. That was based on the act as it stands at the present time. The act now provides for an annual escalation every April for the year ending the previous October. At the present time there is a six month time lag in the adjustment of the consumer price index. Last April we brought the CPI component of the total increase up to the previous September 30.

We are now catching up from last October to the most recent date possible, July 31. That is a 10 month period. We selected that particular period to ensure there would be no loss to senior citizens in the adjustment. We had to refer that 10 month period, October to July, to the previous 10 month period which dated from December 1971 to September 1972. That is the only reason we picked that particular 10 month period. The existing act explains the catching up.

With regard to the other worthwhile points raised by the hon. member, for a while I was wondering whether he had been looking over my shoulder or that of my parliamentary secretary. The suggested drafting he proposed was extremely close to what I had written in the margin for my benefit to show the meaning of the particular clauses which the hon. member read. Having been a practising lawyer for a few years and having tried my hand at drafting certain pieces of legislation, I must say I quickly abandoned the profession of drafting legislation, immediately recognizing my incompetence in that field.

I am not going to deal with every suggestion made by the hon. member. I have taken note of them and they will certainly be discussed with those drafting these particular bills. I am sure the hon. member understands it would not be appropriate for me to say all his points will be included in the drafting. This would require a complete redrafting of the bill since it has been drafted on the basis of particular quarters, as spelled out in the bill. I am sure the hon. member's points will also be noted by the Minister of Justice and those in the Department of Justice who are responsible for drafting legislation for the government.

There is a long standing tradition in the federal government as to the particular school of drafting. I have always found this difficult to follow. It seems that federal bills are drafted in a much more complex way than provincial bills. However, being a lawyer, I find it difficult to argue with other lawyers and win my point. I will pass on the hon. member's comments.

Mr. Oberle: Mr. Chairman, I wish to direct a question to the minister. It arises out of my concern for those senior citizens who live in provinces such as British Columbia which can be classified as "have" provinces.

The Premier of British Columbia is rapidly emerging as one of Canada's most ambitious entrepreneurs. He is implementing all kinds of social services that are not that much in tune with the rest of the country. I worry about the senior citizens who have to live in these "have" provinces on an income based on federal contributions that exist throughout the land. British Columbia is so wealthy that the Premier and the government of that province found it necessary to introduce social services in addition to those in which the federal government shares.

Have the minister and the department given any thought to making it mandatory for these provinces to pass on these increases as well as the additional payments which the provinces are making, or will the provinces be able to take advantage of the additional contributions from the federal government and simply absorb them in their own payments?

Mr. Lalonde: Mr. Chairman, there is certainly no intention on our part to make any such mandatory requirements. Obviously Parliament is free to pass whatever law it wishes to increase social benefits to the citizens for whom it provides benefits. Similarly, the provinces are free to add to those benefits if they wish. The fact that the federal Parliament decides to increase a particular benefit does not take away freedom of action from any particular province.

I was happy to note that, at this time at least, the government of British Columbia has decided not to take away, if I may use that expression, the increase the federal government has given to the senior citizens. I understood the Premier of British Columbia to say they will pass on to the senior citizens the increase which this particular piece of legislation provides, contrary to what happened last April. I am sure that made quite a few senior citizens in British Columbia most unhappy. I must say my feelings at that time were very much with the senior citizens of British Columbia.

● (2100)

Mr. Oberle: Do I understand, then, that the hon. gentleman has a commitment from the Premier of British Columbia that he will pass on the benefits of this bill to the senior citizens?

Mr. Lalonde: I do not have a commitment, but the Premier of British Columbia has given a press conference on this subject and issued a press release. So I presume he has made a commitment to the public of British Columbia.

Mr. Jelinek: Mr. Chairman, I shall be very brief as there is not much more left to be said about Bill C-219 except to state emphatically that the measure is long overdue and falls far short of satisfying the requirements of the senior citizens of this country. Let us also realize that the bill would not be before us had it not been for the inability of the government to solve the railway dispute without recalling Parliament.

The government continues to spend millions upon millions of dollars on programs which have little to offer the country in the way of constructive development, but when it comes to our senior citizens, those same citizens who have made this country the great nation that it is today, like amounts of dollars can never be found. It makes no sense to me that the government should spend millions of dollars each year on Rochdales, Satan worshipers and on LIP or OFY programs, far too many of which are worthless, while the incomes of our senior citizens decrease in value because of the spiralling increase in the cost of living.

The bill presently before the House deals only superficially with the real problems facing senior citizens on fixed incomes. Once again the government has introduced legislation which the opposition parties have been insisting upon for months. As always, the senior citizen bears the brunt of government inaction and is forced to take the largest cut inflicted by the sharp knife of inflation.

While the government urges all sectors of the economy to curb inflationary spending, it continues to disregard its own advice by embarking upon a program of government expenditure unparalleled in the history of any country in the world. In the area of government salary administration alone, in the last ten years the number of people making the equivalent of $20,000 a year has doubled. Quite simply, if the government itself is not able to control spending effectively in its own departments, it certainly cannot be expected to control spending in other sectors of the economy.

One aspect of the bill which even the government is conceding is that inflation under the Liberal administration will continue to take its course. Not only are members opposite incapable of controlling this inflation, but they are anticipating such increases in the future that they have attempted to placate senior citizens by appearing to give them something, though in reality all they are doing is letting them remain at their already low standards. If the intention was to make this legislation truly effective, the effects of the spiralling cost of living over the past year should have been taken into consideration.

The subject is a most serious one, Mr. Chairman, and I would be remiss if I did not express my disdain for the tone in which the Minister of National Health and Welfare addressed the House and the partisan stand he chose to take when presenting this bill. His attack on all members of the opposition was unwarranted and in questionable taste; in no way did it enhance the stature of himself or of his party.

As I have often stated, all hon. members in this chamber naturally approve any proposals for increasing financial assistance to senior citizens. But is the government seriously suggesting that the passage of the bill before us will in any way help fight the high rate of inflation, or, more specifically, deal with the high cost of living? We all know from recent statistics that in the past few months the cost of living in Canada has increased more rapidly than during any similar period in the past 25 years.

I am sure no Canadian needs to look at statistics to realize that we are in the midst of one of the worst inflationary periods the country has ever known. Every time we go into a store, whether it is to buy clothing, food, or any other commodity, we are confronted with dramatic price increases. And if one has been following developments in the real estate market, it soon becomes evident that owning a house has become only a dream for the majority of Canadians.

Rents, too, are rising, as are interest rates. Everything is more expensive and, as usual, the people most dramatically affected are those who must live on low and fixed incomes. Once again the government is trying to escape these facts by presenting superficial bills, such as the one before us, which provide no relief but only serve to perpetuate an already intolerable situation.

The time has come for the government to face its responsibilities to the people of this country. Indeed, it has long passed. We are in the grip of an inflationary spiral which threatens to strangle our economy if we are not prepared to take positive action now. On one hand, the Prime Minister and the Minister of Finance oppose economic controls. On the other hand, the Prime Minister and the Minister of Finance are imposing selective controls.

Upon close analysis of recent, so-called controls applied to the petroleum industry it becomes increasingly apparent that the government has failed to offer any real protection to the Canadian consumer. We all recall the measures taken to set up the Food Prices Review Board. Here another piece of toothless legislation has been drafted as a smokescreen to cover up inaction and a genuine lack of concern. It is obvious that the credibility of the Liberal government will soon sink as low as that of the NDP.

It must be made clear to everybody in this country that what is placed before us in Bill C-219 is not progressive legislation but merely one step, long overdue, which falls far short of providing meaningful gains to the senior citizens.

Mr. Stackhouse: Mr. Chairman, I like the way in which the Minister of National Health and Welfare has been generous in sending out copies of his speeches to his colleagues at public expense. I have read them with great interest and appreciation, so much so there are times when I think the Prime Minister might well appoint the speechwriter to be Minister of National Health and Welfare. There seems to be such a gap between the sentiments expressed by the minister in his speeches and the action embodied in the legislation which he submits.

One of the things that concerns us in the present debate is this gap between promise and performance. Certainly we see it in the bill which is before us, a measure which offers all too inadequate a solution to the needs of the old age pensioners. I can remember just a few days ago when people from one coast to the other ridiculed the minister of finance of that day as "Six buck Harris" because he offered an increase of $6 a month. I am wondering whether we shall soon be talking about "Five buck Lalonde", because that is what he is offering people who are now suffering as a result of the heavy increase in the cost of living which has fallen upon senior citizens as upon all others in this country.

The pension increase which has been enacted and the increase proposed in the legislation before us amount to far less than the actual increase in the cost of living since November, 1970 when the Prime Minister said inflation had been licked.

Is it not extraordinary that three years later we are now offering an increase in the pension to meet the challenge of inflation—three years after the Prime Minister said that inflation had been licked? Inflation will lick him, and it is high time. Certainly it will have to lick him if we are to help the people, because his government is offering inadequate support to those people who need it the most.

I think we must recognize that the proposal in this bill simply does not meet the needs of those people in terms of the increase in prices and the cost of living which the old age pensioners must bear along with the rest of the people in terms of their needs as human beings. What we should be equally cognizant of is that the way in which we are increasing the pension will not solve the problem. It is not enough simply to give them $5 if that $5 is worth nothing. It is of no help to increase their pension and at the same time allow prices to escalate. This really does not help our old people.

The problem will not be solved simply by increasing pensions and wages. Some restraint must be placed on the rise in the cost of living. I think this government should be judged by the way in which it has brought in, at this emergency session of Parliament, a promise of a package that would deal with inflation but which does not include some effort to control prices and bring a halt to the escalation in the cost of living. I believe this bill is inadequate in meeting the needs of the people because there is no reference to the needs of those people who require government support because of disability and infirmity. If we simply pass this bill, add quarterly escalator to the old age pension system, and do nothing about those people living on a disability pension, we will simply be doing something for the senior citizens and nothing for those who suffer from infirmity and disability.

I think we must consider this problem very seriously. Because even though it requires the co-operation and agreement of the provinces, surely it requires initially the enterprise and initiative of the federal government in seeking that kind of agreement and common policy which would more adequately meet the needs of these people who number in the thousands. Let me simply cite the experience of one such person, a 61-year old widow in the metropolitan area of Toronto. The following report appears in the press:

> "I'm lucky if I can buy hamburger once a week, the way prices are today, "she said in an interview last night.
> Until four years ago Mrs. Ritchie worked in a bank and took home $117 every two weeks. Then she had a kidney removed and had to leave her job.
> Now she spends $43 a month for her one-bedroom apartment on Mornelle Ct., $7.83 for a telephone, and $15 for bus fare. With the $77 that remains, she buys food, household supplies and drugs not covered by government funds.
> "It's terrible. It is awful living this way. I can't describe what it's like, really."

That story could be repeated a thousand times. It is so impressive that in one of his fine speeches the minister referred to this particular matter and showed that it is important not only in his thinking but in the thinking of his provincial counterpart. For he says the following in one of his speeches:

> ... some provincial ministers were not completely enthusiastic about the latest increases in old age pensions. Some argued that we should look at the needs of other deserving groups such as the blind, the disabled, single parent families, etc.

In another speech he says:

> In the first place, the social security plan shall ensure to persons unable to work, the elderly, the blind and the disabled, an annual guaranteed income that is fair and compassionate.

He goes on to say that one of the needs in reorganizing the social security problem in this country is to integrate the various assistance programs so that the disabled and the infirm can be more adequately supported. I agree with that, but we know that while there is provision in the bill for a legislative program supposedly to meet the inflationary challenge to those least able to cope with it, there is no reference to these people. In March of this year the following statement was made on technology and the handicapped:

> Canada's bill of rights should be amended to include full rights for the disabled—

These people are being denied adequate pension provisions. I plead that we not let this program go by without some reference to the need of the disabled and the infirm to receive more adequate recognition.

Indeed we might well call in another outstanding authority, Senator David Croll, whose voice surely is heard with respect on the other side of the House as it is in the other place. He is quoted as saying in a news report:

> Income-security benefits for the aged are "disproportionately high when compared with social assistance payments for other groups."

The senator also referred to the way in which, to a large degree, those who are receiving disability and infirmity pensions through co-operation by the federal and provincial governments are being inadequately provided for. I submit that the initiative lies with this House of Commons and that this Parliament has a duty to challenge the government to meet that need. I would say that on this point we might very well remind the minister of a quotation which he cited in another impressive address from T. S. Eliot who said:

> Between the Idea/and the Action
> Between the Conception/and the Creation
> Between the Emotion/and the Response
> Falls the Shadow.

When we look at this bill and think of the needs of the people throughout this country, particularly those who are disabled and infirm, we must all agree that between the idea the minister had in some of his speeches and the action he proposes in this legislation falls the shadow of disappointment and disenchantment.

Mr. Reilly: Mr. Chairman, yesterday the minister sponsoring this bill, if I can quote from Hansard, said that the opposition reminded him of the magic men from the carnival medicine shows peddling the same thin sugar and water concoctions as a cure for everything that ails us. If I might continue in the same carnival metaphor, I would suggest that the demeanour of the minister and his accomplices is rapidly taking on that of another kind of carnival operator who used to operate what is known as the shell game—now you see it, now you don't.

In March 1973, when the minister introduced his $100 minimum pension, he said it was enough to banish poverty among the old people of this country.

Mr. Lalonde: Mr. Chairman, I rise on a point of order. I think the hon. member is referring to a so-called quotation that he knows very well was incorrect. I never said that, and he acknowledged that, indeed, there was an error at the time.

Mr. Reilly: I acknowledged that the minister said it was an error. He accused Hansard of improperly translating his remarks, but in all of the time I have observed the proceedings of this House and in all of the time I have taken part in the proceedings here I have found the Hansard reporters to be impeccable in their interpretation.

Mr. Lalonde: On the point of order, Mr. Chairman, if the hon. member wants to make a specific accusation or charge I challenge him to do so. I never accused Hansard of anything. I corrected Hansard on the basis of what I actually said, and that part of Hansard was a translation. If he reads the French text, which was the actual text, he will see that I never said anything of the sort. I should think that the hon. member would at least have the courtesy of taking my word for it. If he does not, I challenge him.

An hon. Member: We are going to have a duel.

Mr. Reilly: What I suspect really happened was that there was a press release prepared by the minister's office and given to Hansard, as is very often the custom, and the minister revised the speech when he found the particular phrase to be fatuous. But somewhere along the line he slipped up. I believe someone in the minister's department in a fairly influential position in fact believed that a $100 pension was going effectively to abolish poverty among the aged in this country. I believe such people still exist and are still trying to convince us of that view.

Before I go any further I want to ask the minister the same question I asked him twice yesterday, to which I received no reply. I want to ask him, first, is it not true that since 1963 the purchasing power of the Canadian dollar has shrunk by almost 50 per cent? Secondly do he and his colleagues sincerely believe—and I think the country has a right to know this—that the figure now proposed for an individual or a couple is enough to allow that individual or couple to live in dignity and in comfort? I want a yes or no answer right now.

Mr. Lalonde: If the hon. member will sit down I will stand up, Mr. Chairman.

An hon. Member: This is not the question period.

Mr. Lalonde: Are you ready now?

Mr. Reilly: Yes.

Mr. Lalonde: As far as the first part of the question is concerned, I do not have the exact figures of the increase in the consumer price index over the last 10 years. It may be what the hon. member suggests, but I do not know. It may well be different.

One thing that should also be mentioned is that the real income of Canadians during that period—and I suspect that the hon. member took that period because it was 10 years of Liberal government—has increased very substantially, much greater than the increase in the consumer price index; and he can check that.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Lalonde: As to the second part of the question the hon. member has raised, everybody has his own view as to what the figure should be, but I might indicate to the hon. member that the Economic Council of Canada published figures some time ago as to what they called the poverty level.

Mr. Yewchuk: When?

Mr. Lalonde: These figures have been adjusted to the present time taking into account the increase in the consumer price index. I am sorry, the figures are as of the end of 1972. The council suggested that for a couple the figure was $3,516.

I might remind the hon. member that with the increase which was granted in April we raised the guaranteed income of a senior citizen for the first time above the level as defined by the Economic Council of Canada. As a result of the measure proposed today, the income of a couple is going to be $4,101.60, if I know how to multiply $341.80 by 12. Whether this is enough or not, once more anybody can have a view on this, but I would think as compared with other situations, and particularly those in various provinces under Conservative administration—and I refer to the case of the hon. member for Edmonton-Strathcona and the point he raised—

Mr. Reilly: Mr. Speaker, I did not ask for a political speech. I asked for a yes or no answer and I did not get it.

An hon. Member: Oh, sit down.

Mr. Reilly: I believe I have the floor, Mr. Chairman.

An hon. Member: Ask a question or sit down.

The Deputy Chairman: Order, please. Will the hon. member take his seat. The hon. member knows that under the procedures of the committee once a member relinquishes the floor to someone else, even if it is to answer a question posed by the hon. member, that member then has the floor. The hon. member for Ottawa West cannot force an hon. member to limit his remarks to a yes or no answer. It is very difficult for the Chair, because when recognizing a member the Chair must allow him to speak for 20 minutes to complete his remarks, and at that time advise him that his time has expired. Then the hon. member can seek the floor again.

Mr. Lalonde: Mr. Chairman, I can understand the hon. member wanting to prevent me from quoting the figures that the Conservative government of Ontario has adopted under social assistance. I thank you for allowing me to complete my remarks.

The social assistance figure for Ontario, as checked this morning with Toronto—I remind hon. members that Ontario is the richest province in Canada, and certainly that government cannot plead that it cannot get more funds—for a couple is $246.75 per month, or a total of $2,900.61 per year. This is over $1,200 less being paid by the Ontario government than what is now proposed.

In respect of the matter mentioned by the hon. member for Edmonton-Strathcona covering the disabled, the handicapped and people under 65 years of age who are really in need, perhaps I could give the figures for Alberta, at least for the edification of the hon. member. The figure is $244 for a couple in Alberta.

Mr. Stackhouse: On a point of order, Mr. Chairman. The hon. member keeps referring to myself as the member for Edmonton-Strathcona. I am the member for Scarborough East. This indicates two things to me: first, he knows very little about the west; secondly, his knowledge of geography is as impoverished as his knowledge of social needs.

Mr. Lalonde: I apologize to the hon. member and I hope he is not taking the attribution of this particular riding as an insult.

• (2130)

Mr. Yewchuk: On a point of order, Mr. Chairman, I wonder if the minister would kindly quote the same figures for the Liberal governments of P.E.I. and Nova Scotia?

Mr. Lalonde: I do not have those figures right now but I can tell the hon. member that out of their provincial income those provinces are contributing more to social assistance than the provinces of Ontario and Alberta.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Lalonde: Mr. Chairman, I now have those figures. They are published in a very good document that I recommend to the hon. member entitled "Working Paper on Social Security in Canada," tabled in this House last April. Table 8 in annexed page 53 shows that in P.E.I. the figure in April was $2,188. There may have been an increase in the meantime. I do not have the exact up to date figure, but that is poor little P.E.I. for you. If you look at the expenditure in terms of percentage of personal income, P.E.I. is contributing to social assistance 3.4 per cent of its personal provincial income, while the great big generous government of Ontario is contributing 1.4 per cent.

Some hon. Members: Shame!

Mr. Yewchuk: That is a pretty poor excuse.

Mr. Lalonde: If you look at Table 7 on page 52 of the booklet in question, you will find that the two provinces—

Mr. Reilly: On a point of order, Mr. Chairman, the query is merely whether the minister believes that the amount in question is enough to live on. I do not think this calls for a lengthy, impassioned peroration on the crimes of the government of Ontario. I am not here to apologize for the government of Ontario; I am here to attack him and his colleagues.

The Deputy Chairman: Order, please. I am sure the hon. member would not wish the Chair to intervene between two hon. members in a debate or to give direction to an hon. member as to what he should say or should not say in his speech as long he follows the rules and the practices of the House. The minister has been allowed the floor by the hon. member for Ottawa West—

Mr. Reilly: For the purpose of answering a question.

The Deputy Chairman: —and it is impossible for the Chair to remove the floor from the minister unless he has completed his 20 minutes.

Mr. Lalonde: I will leave hon. members to guess which of the two provinces in Canada give the smallest percentage of their personal income to social assistance. These are the two provinces under the leadership of Conservative governments, Ontario and Alberta, with respectively 1.4 per cent and 1.7 per cent.

Mr. Yewchuk: On a point of order, Mr. Chairman, all the minister has done is indicate that the very good governments of those two provinces, which happen to be the richest provinces, have most of their people working, and they do not need to pay so much.

Mr. Lalonde: Mr. Chairman—

The Deputy Chairman: Order, please. The Chair asks the co-operation of hon. members. If we are going to use points of order to ask questions and to give hon. members' opinions, the committee will not progress. I would invite the minister, if he has not completed his remarks, to do so and the Chair will then return to the hon. member for Ottawa West.

Mr. Lalonde: I just want to say, in conclusion, that I am sorry the hon. member who has just spoken apparently is satisfied with the levels being paid for social assistance in the two provinces to which reference has been made.

Mr. Reilly: Mr. Chairman, I got no answer to the question I asked, but I really did not expect one anyway. There are many deficiencies in the manner in which all governments perform. As I said before, I am not here to deliver an apologia for the government of Ontario. I am here to try to talk some sense to this government.

Mr. Yewchuk: An impossible task.

Mr. Reilly: I may be wasting my time but I have a few minutes in which to do it and very little else to do this evening, so I might as well waste it this way. I would like to give the minister and his accomplices over there a few reminders, going back to 1969 when the Prime Minister discovered inflation. He told us it was the worst problem we had to face. He told us of the people on fixed incomes, how they were suffering, and how he was going to go about easing their plight.

He was warned at the same time by the Economic Council of Canada, which the minister a few minutes ago was so ecstatically quoting, that if he followed the plan he had announced two things would happen. One of them was that inflation would not be beaten, could not be beaten by that plan; and the second thing was that unprecedented unemployment would follow. And they were right. Arthur Smith was right. For his pains he was fired, banished, never to be heard from again.

What did we hear then? As my colleague pointed out a few minutes ago, we heard that inflation was licked. Then it turned out that it wasn't licked. We got a budget that was supposed to solve the whole matter, but it did not.

What happened then? We had a parliamentary committee on prices. What was it able to accomplish? Nothing. Now what do we have? We have the Plumptre committee, whose chairman is a Rockcliffe $40,000 a year ancient party wheelhorse who, from her mansion up there in the most exclusive part of Ottawa, advised the poor of this country that if they did not like the price of something they saw on the shelves in their grocery stores, not to buy it. A lady called Marie Antoinette gave essentially the same advice to the poor of Paris when they could not afford bread, but at least the people of that day had the wisdom to cut off her head.

An hon. Member: I thought you were against capital punishment.

Mr. Reilly: What we have from the famous Plumptre committee, and it is endorsed by the government, is yet another subsidy. Who is going to pay for that subsidy? One again it will be the middle class, the middle income people who have carried the country on their backs for so long. Because taxes rise inexorably due to things like the Taj Mahal on the Ottawa that the Secretary of State for External Affairs has built himself—Temple Pearson.

The fact of the matter is that we have been through Plan A, Plan B, Plan C and Plan D. And there is an exigency operation, as we all know, an emergency plan in Toronto, covering the printing of food rationing stamps and gasoline rationing stamps. The government has not tried to deny this.

● (2140)

In fact, the government has failed in its every attempt to cope with the problem of inflation, and now it proposes to give an extra $5 a month to the pensioners who already cannot properly exist. The minister would not say whether he believed $340 per month was enough to live on in dignity. I would remind him that in the province of Ontario the minimum wage is $2 an hour which, translated into a 40-hour week, works out to $80 a week. Multiplied by four it comes to $320 per month. That is a good deal more than he proposes to give to the person who has worked all his life, the person who worked at a time when very likely there were no contributory pension plans and whose savings have been eroded to the point where he is lucky if he can exist at all. The minister is proud of the fact that he has raised these pensions above the poverty line. I would not be very proud of that where I the minister.

[Mr. Yewchuk.]

An hon. Member: You will never be the minister.

Mr. Reilly: I certainly would never be the minister in your outfit. I think the hon. gentlemen over there dined a little too well. They are just clutching their bellies in spasms of uncontrollable mirth at everything I say. To be heckled by the backbench of the Liberal party—

An hon. Member: Is an honour.

Mr. Reilly: —is an honour, you are right. It shows at least that they are listening.

I am not going to make the mistake of asking the minister or any of his colleagues any more questions before I conclude lest the floor be taken away for all time. I will merely conclude by saying that the minister knows full well that, while the purchasing power of the dollar has declined by 50 per cent since his government took power, he also knows full well, but refuses to say that he himself believes, that the figure he offers is not enough to live on in comfort and with dignity. In his moving address in March he told us that he often thought of his own father and mother who had worked hard all their lives. I told him then that I hoped they did not have to exist on the pension he was handing out. He is now handing out another five dollars in the middle of summer. I can only conclude by saying that I hope he is a hell of a lot more generous to them at Christmas than he is in September.

Mr. Macquarrie: Mr. Chairman, I will take the opportunity to close the debate for the official opposition. I have enjoyed hearing the contributions of my colleagues and I hope the minister will pay attention to their good ideas. I enjoyed both interventions by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre. I enjoyed seeing the NDP cohabit with the Liberals and compete with the Social Credit party at the same time. That made an interesting exercise.

When I looked at the bill I thought the person who had been a party to the FISP bill in the last Parliament, whom we thought was out of the way, had returned. The bill is incomprehensible. We believe that in some mathematical conjuration we will get an improvement for the senior citizens four times a year, and because we have supreme faith we are supporting the bill.

I have two pieces of advice for the minister. He who presides over more federal-provincial consultations than any other minister, perhaps, in my judgment is ill-advised to waste his time in political tub thumping and criticism of Conservative governments in this country. That is not the way we make a better Canada for the older people of the country who live in all provinces. The better administration of shared programs is not aided by the kind of partisanship that we saw tonight.

Having noted this, and having expressed the faint hope that the minister might take note of what advice was given to him today, may I end with another piece of advice. I hope he will have someone who knows something about the difference between good English and legal English write a brochure so that the older people of Canada may know what the bill is all about.

Having offered that faint-hearted goodbye, I may say that as far as we are concerned we are now prepared to have this measure move into the concluding stages in the hope that tomorrow we can get into something more substantial that will help fight inflation.

Mr. Lalonde: Mr. Chairman, I appreciate the comments made by the hon. member. I do indeed carry on a lot of consultation with the provinces on a consistent basis. The points I made tonight are points of fact which are there for everybody to see. They are not meant as charges but they certainly are meant as valid answers to certain silly accusations made against the government.

As to the hon. member's suggestion for a brochure for the senior citizens, I might say that such a brochure does exist at the present time. It is available and is widely distributed to senior citizens.

Mr. Macquarrie: On this bill?

Mr. Lalonde: Not on this bill but on the law as it stands now. Obviously there will be an updating and the brochure will be made available to all senior citizens. In that way they will become well acquainted with their rights.

As a matter of fact, the brochure sent out goes much further than just summarizing the bill; it provides an actual table for the various categories and the various levels of income. Just by looking at it anybody can see, is he is in a certain rate of income, what he is entitled to under the old age security and guaranteed income supplement programs. I appreciate the remarks of the hon. member and will make sure that all senior citizens receive such a brochure in the very near future.

Mr. Baker: Mr. Chairman, I should like to say something before this matter is closed. I have been in this House since January 4, 1973, during which time there have been some committees of the whole. However, I believe this is the first time in that period—indeed it may well be one of the very few times—that this House has had the opportunity of seeing, among those who advise the minister, one of the distinguished lady public servants of Canada. I think it is worthy of note.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Baker: This evening, when the last few moments have an air of unanimity, I think it is fitting that we recognize the contribution that has been made and will be made in an increasing way to the public service of Canada by the women who form part of, and work side by side with their fellows in, the public service of their country.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Chairman, I fully agree with the comment just made by my neighbour, the hon. member for Grenville-Carleton. The young lady in question, having had this tribute paid to her, deserves to have her name recorded in Hansard. I, too, salute Miss Norma O'Brien.

The Deputy Chairman: The Chair agrees with the hon. member and joins in saluting the lady mentioned.

Shall clause 1 carry?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Clause agreed to.

Clause 2 agreed to.

On Clause 3—

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Chairman, there are two comments I want to make. At least, I want to make a comment and ask a question about clause 3. I am pleased to see in clause 3 a subclause which says—and one wonders if this will ever happen again—that if the consumer price index goes down, that will not result in the reduction of the pension. That sort of provision has been included in bills ever since the escalation provision came into effect, and it is a good idea to continue it in this case. Of course, if the CPI were to go down, it would have to go back up to its original level before there could be further escalation. It is good to see that point covered.

The other point I wish to deal with by way of a question. I think I understand this but I want it to be clear. My query has to do with the amount of increase that will be received by those on the guaranteed income supplement. To keep it simple, I will talk only about single persons. As I understand it, every single pensioner in receipt of any amount of guaranteed income at present will receive in October an increase of $9.02. In other words, I understand that this is not a matter of prorating, because the amount of any reduction is based on other income, and this calculation has already been made. In point of fact, whatever the amount of guaranteed income supplement a single person now may be getting, it will go up by $9.02 in October. Is that correct?

Mr. Lalonde: Mr. Chairman, that is absolutely correct, and all people on GIS will receive the full amount mentioned by the hon. member.

Clause agreed to.

Clause 4 agreed to.

On Clause 5—

Mr. Alexander: Mr. Chaiman, I should like some clarification with respect to clause 5. I notice that clause 5 permits the Governor in Council to make regulations with respect to the determination of the average of the consumer price index. I wonder if the minister could explain this and tell us how this procedure is to work, and what is contemplated in this provision.

Mr. Lalonde: This has only to do with the rounding out of figures when we are dealing with infinitesimal fractions. That is the purpose of the regulations.

Mr. Alexander: Is this a case of rounding out figures where many decimal points might be involved? Is that what the minister is saying?

Mr. Lalonde: Yes. When dealing with the figures, you may end up with thousands of decimal points, and this regulation would permit us to round out the figures to the closest point. That is the purpose of it.

Clause agreed to.

Title agreed to.

Bill reported.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Laniel): When shall the said bill be read the third time?

Some hon. Members: By leave, now.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Laniel): Is this agreed?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Lalonde moved the third reading of the bill.

Mr. Heath Macquarrie (Hillsborough): Mr. Speaker, in my eagerness to speak I rose to my feet before the third reading motion had been put. I merely have a comment one sentence long to make to the minister. Next time he takes one of our policies, if he would give us a little notice we would expedite his bill even more quickly than we did this time.

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I, too, have just one short sentence to say, and I suspect the minister can hear it even before I say it. May the next bill to amend the Old Age Security Act include a substantial increase in the basic amount of the old age pension.

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, I have taken note of the comments made by hon. members. The only question left in my mind is, if this was Conservative policy, why did the Conservatives talk so long and delay passage of the bill?

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Perhaps the bill was too conservative.

Motion agreed to, bill read the third time and passed.

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

[English]

A motion to adjourn the House under Standing Order 40 deemed to have been moved.

POST OFFICE—PURPOSE OF SURVEY OF FORMER EMPLOYEES—POSSIBILITY OF MAKING RESULTS AVAILABLE TO UNIONS AND MEMBERS OF PARLIAMENT

Hon. W. G. Dinsdale (Brandon-Souris): Mr. Speaker, there is no department of government that receives more attention than the Post Office Department. I think it has the highest track record for complaints which are debated on the motion to adjourn, and this has been the case for some considerable time. I recall my predecessor on this topic, the hon. member for Hillsborough (Mr. Macquarrie), hit, I think, the highest ratings on the late show in bringing this matter up, and that record is being met in the present parliament.

The matter I want to discuss tonight with respect to the Post Office Department has to do with a problem that has persisted for a number of years, namely, the declining morale of the workers. The Post Office Department has been emphasizing automation at the expense of the well-being of workers. You cannot have a happy organization unless the people who are delivering the service are happy in that service. It is said that to err is human. I agree; but if you really want to foul things up, you must rely on the computer. This situation describes the present mess in the post office precisely.

The fact that the Post Office Department is not really coming to grips with the matter was demonstrated in a question that was fed to the Postmaster General (Mr. Ouellet) today with regard to the group postmasters. Over the years, this group of employees served beyond the call of duty and never complained. These are the people who provide service in the small communities, the post offices in the corner stores. Even they are becoming a bit restless and unhappy because of the failure of the Postmaster General and the government to deal fairly with them in the wage negotiations that have been going on for over a year.

Many questions have come up in recent weeks. The one I want to deal with tonight arises out of the project adopted by the Calgary regional office of the Post Office Department. In an attempt to get to the root of declining morale among the postal employees in that area, demonstrated by the rapid turnover in staff, it took the initiative in instituting a survey among former post office employees.

On July 26 I asked the Postmaster General if it was true that a survey of this kind was being conducted. I took the trouble to notify him of my question earlier in the day because usually the Postmaster General replies with pious platitudes that everything is the best in the best of all possible worlds. But he confirmed this was so in the Calgary office. I agreed it was a good idea and asked whether the survey might be conducted right across the country. The minister said he would give this consideration.

I hope whoever is responding for the Postmaster General tonight will be able to inform us whether the very creative idea which originated in the regional office in Calgary has been carried forward across the nation in the interest of improving vital postal service as rapidly as possible.

I could have raised another question tonight. On July 17 I asked about the discontinuance of the directory service of the Post Office Department. This ensured efficient service to the people of Canada. The letter carrier kept an up-to-date list of changes of address. In its wisdom, the Post Office Department decided to add yet another frustration: this service was discontinued, notwithstanding the fact the letter carriers are willing to carry out this service. Indeed, they have been urging the government to restore it.

These are seemingly simple matters on the surface, but it is the little things which destroy the quality of service. I am sure hon. members will agree that if we have a happy public, we have a happy employee.

The Postmaster General is not with us this evening. He was not present when I spoke on the last occasion, July 17, just before the House adjourned. The Parliamentary Secretary to the Secretary of State (Mr. Marceau) replied. His words of wisdom, as recorded at page 5730 of Hansard, began as follows:

> Mr. Speaker, I will not take up the nonsensical accusations of the hon. member for Brandon-Souris (Mr. Dinsdale) because the government has no time to waste.

I remind him and this arrogant government that it has all the time in the world to waste because it is living on borrowed time. If it does not deal with fundamental matters such as efficient postal service that affects every citizen of Canada, in a very short time it will have all the time in the world to twiddle its thumbs, as it is doing at the present time.

[Translation]

Mr. Léopold Corriveau (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, I am happy to reply to the hon. member on behalf of the Postmaster General (Mr. Ouellet).

The purpose of this questionnaire was to discover the causes of the relatively high rate of personnel turnover, that is 10 per cent.

Last June, this questionnaire was sent to the Calgary area. To my knowledge, this is the only place where such a questionnaire was used.

In their desire to improve relations with their employees, Post Office Department officials sent out these questions, which concern the department in general, supervision, conditions of work, training, promotion opportunities, descriptions of duties, shift assignments, etc.

Fifty replies have now been received. These answers are now being analysed.

Since this questionnaire deals with an internal problem and is of limited scope, I do not think it necessary that it be made public.

AGRICULTURE—POSITION OF CANADA ON NEW INTERNATIONAL GRAINS AGREEMENT—REQUEST FOR STATEMENT BY MINISTER

Mr. Bill Knight (Assiniboia): Mr. Speaker, as usual I have my loyal audience at this hour thanks to an immense amount of co-operation between the House leader and the whips.

I rise to call attention to a question which has been aired in the last few days and which deserves to be restated. It relates to whether or not the government is taking any initiative toward establishing an international wheat agreement or an international grains agreement. The last time I asked the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Whelan) whether moves were being made in this direction he told us he was looking into the matter but that he had to attend a meeting of provincial ministers of agriculture in Charlottetown, and, following that, of provincial premiers in Calgary. After his devastatingly poor showing there it is incumbent upon the government to outline the steps it is taking in an effort to establish international agreements respecting wheat and grains.

Steps in this direction should be taken now because the suppliers, the exporters of grain, Canada among them, are presently in a position to take the initiative. I refer to the fact that the World Agricultural Council has reported that world production is likely to fall at least 200 million bushels short of world demand. In such circumstances we as Canadians should take it upon ourselves to press for an international agreement under which producing countries are guaranteed a reasonable price over a period of time, and importing countries are assured of some certainty of supply. In other words, there would be some order in the world grain market the result of which would be to provide a measure of security to Canadian farmers.

I bring up this question tonight bearing in mind that the United Nations Food and Agriculture Organization has called the world's major wheat exporting nations to a meeting on September 10 to seek means of alleviating the consequences of the shortfall in world cereal supply. Canada is obviously one of the nations involved and it should be incumbent on the government to bring up the question of international wheat and grains agreements.

In addition, one or other of the ministers concerned should outline to the House, or at least to the Standing Committee on Agriculture, the direction government policy is taking in terms of the international situation, so as to bring some order into the marketing of grain for the benefit not only of Canadian farmers but also of the millions of hungry people in the world.

Further, on the issue of grain, for the first time in a long time the people of Canada are starting to realize the fundamental importance of farm production in terms of food supply in this country. If this government is going to make this kind of a move with relation to grains it should not do so until it is enunciated and discussed in the Standing Committee on Agriculture or on a statement on motions in this House of Commons.

I need mention only a few points. What are they doing in world negotiations on trade? What are they doing on the international scene and in respect of an international grains agreement? Why do we not have a full airing and discussion of the policy enunciated the other day when the western farmer at this point in time is subsidizing the consumer by $1.15 due to the maximum price of $4.50 and the minimum price of $3.25? Ten months ago I asked why this government was not changing its two-price system and subsidies because the wheat producers in my area were being left out.

If we are to be called upon to do this kind of thing by the government, then it is incumbent upon the government to give the representatives of those people a full opportunity to air and discuss measures of that type. Further, this government ignored a meeting of all ten provincial agricultural ministers in terms of telling them what the feed grain policy was. They similarly ignored a meeting of the four western premiers of the areas in which the feed grain is produced. They ignored telling parliament what the feed grain policy was and took the opportunity late in the day when the press was not there to sneak into the Regina Inn and announce their feed grain policy. That shows how much confidence the government has in its feed grain policy. The matter ought to be aired in this House and in the standing committee as soon as possible.

That policy takes away a certain amount of control from the Wheat Board and the west loses its natural advantage in terms of farm production. Then the government had the audacity to move that the Export and Import Permits Act have control over the import of grains into Canada, and that this control be taken away from the Wheat Board. Although that policy has not been criticized too much—and probably that is our fault—it probably is one of the strongest moves by the forces of conservativism to take away the forces of orderly marketing from the Canadian Wheat Board.

Finally, may I say that in the world situation as it is today, and with the desperate situation in which many of our buying countries find themselves in trying to meet the price—buying countries which have been prepared to make 3, 4 and 5-year agreements to buy grain—we have an opportunity as a supplying nation to once again take the initiative in bringing world order into the marketing of grain and to enunciate in this House for the farmers of Canada a clear and definite statement on the approach we are taking to the establishment of an international wheat agreement and an international grains agreement.

[Translation]

Mr. Léopold Corriveau (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, I am glad to answer the hon. member in the name of the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Whelan).

The hon. member's question of July 23, 1973, to the Minister of Agriculture was whether or not the minister would make a statement on motions. The minister's answer, Mr. Speaker, is still the same; he is considering the matter.

The minister has already established that a type of agreement on grains is under study. It might be important to remind the hon. member of two facts: first, that international agreements were not always concluded to the satisfaction of Canadian producers and, second, that it is not always judicious to reveal to the persons we are negotiating with the state of our position before time, if this time ever comes. Canada still continues to hold its position concerning an efficient international wheat agreement, as previously agreed, but, apparently, several of the main parties to this agreement are still not ready to start the necessary discussions.

I do not think any other comments are necessary, Mr. Speaker.

LABOUR RELATIONS—SUGGESTED ESTABLISHMENT OF PUBLIC INTEREST DISPUTES COMMISSION—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Mr. Don Blenkarn (Peel South): Mr. Speaker, on the day we came back, August 30, I asked the Prime Minister if the government had any intention of introducing legislation along the lines recommended by the Woods Commission in 1968, and in particular with regard to a public interest disputes commission.

In 1966 we had a national railroad strike and parliament was recalled. The usual legislation for compulsory arbitration was banged through, and as a result of that the late Right Hon. Lester B. Pearson established the Woods Commission to inquire into methods by which we could more properly handle Canadian industrial relations. That task force made an exhaustive study of industrial relations and produced a 100,000 word report. That report cost this country $1.5 million.

On receipt of that report the then Minister of Labour, the Hon. Bryce Mackasey, said he would study it and might prepare some legislation, but that might take a year or so. One year went by, another year went by and several more years went by. Last year we had to come back again, and this year we had to come back again, produce ad hoc methods and go through the ritual dance, settling another industrial dispute in an area of essential service.

The Woods Commission recommended a public interest disputes commission, and to give this House some concept of what that might do I make these suggestions. The commission at the outset would be independent, not representing labour or management but representing the public and the public interest. That commission would determine what industry and what part of the industry or service is absolutely essential in the public interest. The commission might suggest in respect of railways, for example, that passenger trains are not essential and a strike may take place in some part of the country in that area. It would obviously decide that ferry services are necessary, and that it is necessary to move food to the north, to move grain shipments and perhaps certain bulk products to keep our industrial machine going.

Perhaps the commission would decide that certain strikes could be held on a limited basis. It might also determine special procedures whereby certain standards could be established in the case of wage disputes. For example, it might decide in respect of the railways that the durable goods industry's average wage payment scale might be the pay scale applicable. In respect of air controllers it might decide that the pay scale should be similar to that of employed lawyers, or something of the sort. This would be the purpose of the commission, to set guidelines and determine in the public interest which services are essential.

The commission might recommend to the government that a dispute cannot be allowed to continue any longer, that recommendation being made public, or it might allow a partial discontinuance of service. It might decide that if a union did not co-operate there should be a trusteeship, or that if a company would not co-operate there should be a seizure of its assets.

The commission might recommend such a thing as a statutory strike during which nobody gets paid but everybody works for a time and profits and incomes are set aside awaiting the outcome. It might even recommend compulsory arbitration. But the commission would be on top of the dispute from the very outset. When the rail dispute started and bargaining commenced back in November a public interest disputes commission would have been there. It would have been down at the table and representing the public interest. Because there is a public interest. We cannot go on having rail strikes. We cannot go on having air controllers strikes. We cannot have our harbours and canals tied up. This nation depends on these methods of transportation, communication and service.

The trouble with the strike weapon and the lock-out weapon is that they are the old trial by battle. We abandoned trial by battle in the judicial process a long time ago. We abandoned it probably because as a nation we got tired of looking after the widows and orphans who did not quite make it in battle. We must have a government that has leadership and that will develop a method of solving these kinds of disputes. This nation cannot afford this kind of activity any longer. It cannot afford to have its whole economy held to ransom.

The government has now had the proposals of the Woods Commission for five years. I do not say, and this party does not say, that those proposals are the last word. But my leader has said on several occasions, as have other hon. members of this House, that the Woods Commission is a start. It is a suggestion. It is something on which to base some legislation.

What have we got from across this chamber? We have got nothing—no leadership, no desire, no belief in how to solve the problem. That is the kind of government this nation has put up with. This nation cannot afford the kind of answers such as that given by the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) to me on August 30, when he said, "Mr. Speaker, I have no announcement to make in that regard today". I had asked him would he introduce legislation that would make it no longer necessary for this House to be recalled in the fashion that it was recalled. He could not even be bothered to answer. That is the leadership this nation has had in labour relations. This has to stop. We are entitled to a government that is prepared to govern.

Mr. Charles Turner (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, the working and union people of Canada are in the wrong profession. If they were doctors, lawyers, dentists, wholesalers, retailers, etc. there would be no need to strike or even negotiate. They would simply raise their wages and prices, and the public would pay. Like the hon. member, maybe we should belong to a closed shop group, the lawyers.

The public interest disputes commission, if the recommendation were implemented, would be composed of three men appointed to serve on a part-time basis. The commission would be independent of parliament, of the executive, or of any government department, and would report to the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau). The commission would be composed of public members only, without representative character.

They would be selected in consultation with a Canadian industrial relations council, another of the bodies recommended by the task force, which is to be a representative body. The commission would have a small full-time secretariat of high calibre and have access to the Department of Labour and other sources of assistance.

The two major functions of the commission would be, first, to determine special procedures for resolving industrial disputes in industries that are likely to jeopardize the public interest, and second, to deal in an advisory way with actual disputes threatening the public interest. Parties in federal industries would negotiate their own procedures, but on failure to agree, or if the procedure was deemed inadequate, the commission would prescribe a procedure of a limited nature that would not lead to finality by way of compulsory arbitration, or control, or seizure of the operation, or other extreme measures.

The present system of disputes settlement, as contained in the Industrial Relations and Disputes Investigation Act, prescribes a common procedure for the settlement of all disputes arising in the federal jurisdiction. The parties negotiate and, failing a settlement, they can apply for a conciliation officer or a conciliation board. If an officer is appointed and does not settle the dispute, a board is appointed if the dispute is of a critical public interest nature. Not many boards are required, an average of 25 per year being used over the past eight years. Where no settlement results, further mediation efforts before strike are made by the department. The parties are free to go on strike or lock-out seven days after the board of conciliation report is received by the minister, not when the agreement expires as recommended by the task force. Under this system disputes are settled and screened out in direct order of difficulty in successive stages of negotiation, conciliation and mediation. Very few disputes go through all stages.

The existing system for dealing with disputes in the federal jurisdiction is successful in getting settlements in 95 per cent of disputes, with an average of six strikes per year and with only six disputes having to be placed before parliament for legislation in the past 30 years.

The question must be asked whether the scheme recommended by the task force can be even this successful in view of its many imponderables. Will an elaborate and involved system, in which the government will operate under a gun held by a commission and in which a Minister of Labour will have no authority, serve any effective purpose? In federal jurisdiction there has been an average of only 115 disputes per year in the past eight relatively busy years, and this seems an insignificant caseload for the research-oriented scheme conceived by the members of the task force. While they may be true to their calling and their academic background, labour and management disputants are more realistic in approach and outlook.

Motion agreed to and the House adjourned at 10.28 p.m.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

SUPPLY—DESIGNATION OF MONDAY, SEPTEMBER 10, AS ALLOTTED DAY

Mr. MacEachen: Mr. Speaker, I would like to confirm the statement I made yesterday that Monday will be an allotted day.

Mr. Bell: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker, we know the government House leader is leaving and we wish him good luck on his trip, but may I ask whom he has lined up to say no in his absence to all our requests?

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

AGRICULTURE

GOVERNMENT POLICIES RESPECTING FEED GRAINS, BEEF EXPORTS AND WHEAT PRICES—REQUEST FOR UNANIMOUS CONSENT TO MOVE MOTION

Mr. Jack Murta (Lisgar): Mr. Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43 to seek the unanimous consent of the House to move a motion on what is considered to be a matter of urgent and pressing necessity, namely, the confusion and uncertainty throughout the agricultural industry in Canada caused by the ambiguous and incomplete policies of the government and the administration of those policies with regard to feed grains, beef exports and wheat prices. I move, seconded by the hon. member for Huron (Mr. McKinley):

That this House requests the Minister of Agriculture and the minister responsible for the Wheat Board to appear before the House of Commons Agriculture Committee to clear up the state of confusion occasioned by the government's ambiguous policies on feed grains, wheat support and beef embargoes.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The Chair will inquire whether there is unanimous consent, but before doing so I would remind the hon. member for Lisgar and also other hon. members that the form of these motions should be watched closely in view of the fact that under the practice we have developed there is no opportunity to reply to the allegations or charges which may be included in a motion or in its preamble. I think hon. members should exercise some discipline and care in ensuring that these motions are not couched in too clearly and obviously argumentative a form. In any event, I will inquire whether there is unanimous consent for the motion proposed by the hon. member for Lisgar. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Speaker: There is not unanimous consent.

POLLUTION

GREAT LAKES AND MAIN RIVERS—REQUEST FOR UNANIMOUS CONSENT TO MOVE MOTION

Mr. Otto Jelinek (High Park-Humber Valley): Mr. Speaker, in view of the continuing pollution problems affecting not only the Great Lakes but also our main rivers and streams, and in view of the apparent lack of progress in providing any relief for this most serious situation, I ask leave of the House under the terms of Standing Order 43 to move, seconded by the hon. member for York East (Mr. Arrol):

That this House instruct the government to take immediate steps to end the growing pollution of our lakes, rivers and streams, and that the government of the United States be pressed into advancing its timetable of commitment to clean up Lake Erie and Lake Ontario.

Mr. Speaker: Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Speaker: There is not unanimous consent.

FINANCE

CURRENT FISCAL POSITION OF GOVERNMENT IN LIGHT OF ADDITIONAL EXPENDITURES RECENTLY ANNOUNCED—SUGGESTED INDEPENDENT ECONOMIC FORECASTING UNIT

Hon. Robert L. Stanfield (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Finance who made a statement to the press in August regarding the revised budgetary position of the government. Is it now the minister's intention to make a statement in the House as to the currently revised fiscal position of the government?

Hon. John N. Turner (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, there will probably be an opportunity to do that very shortly, I should imagine, as a result of the announcement by the House leader this morning. It is obvious that the measures recently brought before the House as a result of the announcement on August 13 and the announcement this week by the Prime Minister have added about $292 million to the costs as against revenue.

Mr. Stanfield: I take it from what the minister says that he will be prepared to participate in the debate on Monday next. In view of the statement the minister made to the press in August in which he indicated that he had emphasized to the government the importance of choosing carefully among spending programs in order to keep spending within the adopted fiscal stance. I now ask the minister whether he proposes to cut back on other expenditures in view of the increased expenditures announced or whether he has changed his stance or whether the Prime Minister has changed his stance for him?

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, the total fiscal stance or cash requirements of the government will depend not only upon the increased expenditures I have just referred to but on what the revenue picture brings in. In any event, the hon. member mentioned priorities. The government felt there could be no higher priority at this stage than to protect Canadians in the low income and fixed income groups against the erosion of inflation. That was the purpose of these expenditures. As an additional purpose, in macro-economic terms—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): I just wanted to bring some members of the House into the picture—I would hope that the additional disposable income made available to Canadians as a counter action against the erosion of inflation would have a stabilizing effect not only on profits but on incomes.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I have to interrupt the minister.

Mr. Stanfield: One further supplementary, Mr. Speaker. We will look to Monday for further enlightenment, but in the meantime the Minister of Finance has been gyrating at a new record rate. In view of the great divergence between the revenue the minister is taking in and the revenue he is estimating, according to his own admission to the press in August, I should like to ask if he is now prepared to support the establishment of an independent forecasting unit so we can get something like accurate economic forecasting in this country?

[Mr. MacEachen.]

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, I do not think any forecaster in this country or anywhere in the world, whether public, private, academic, business or labour, was able to forecast, first, the strength of the economy or, second, the worldwide rate of inflation, both of which have affected the revenues of the government.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The Chair will recognize the hon. member for Egmont on a supplementary and then the hon. member for Northwest Territories.

Mr. David MacDonald (Egmont): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question for the Minister of Finance. Since the minister admitted in August that revenues were exceeding the original expectation in his budget forecast in February by some half a billion dollars, and since the cost to the treasury of the announcement made earlier by the Prime Minister is some $290 million, is the minister prepared to indicate that government revenues will still create an inflationary factor among the general public? Further, will the minister be prepared on Monday to tell the House to what extent the inflationary effect of the Prime Minister's earlier announcement will really relieve the problems of low income families and those who have to pay very high interest rates in terms of housing costs particularly?

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, I will take those remarks carefully into consideration in framing what I might like to say.

INDIAN AFFAIRS

NORTHWEST TERRITORIES—GOVERNMENT POSITION RESPECTING JUDGMENT ON CAVEAT APPLICATION—PAYMENT OF DEFENCE COUNSEL'S FEES

Mr. Wally Firth (Northwest Territories): Mr. Speaker, in the absence of the Minister of Justice I should like to direct my question to the Prime Minister. Now that the Supreme Court of the Northwest Territories has ruled in favour of the caveat application of the Northwest Territories Indian Brotherhood, can the Prime Minister tell the House whether it is the intention of the government to accept this judgment?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I have been informed by the Department of Justice that they have not received the judgment yet. I believe that they have received the conclusion but they are only expecting the judgment which is a long one, some 60 pages, I am told, by Sunday night. They propose to examine the judgment and ascertain the conclusions and motives for the judgment and decide whether or not an appeal is in order.

Mr. Stanfield: There are advantages to slow mail.

Mr. Firth: Mr. Speaker, may I direct a supplementary question to the Prime Minister. Does the government intend to pay the fees of defence counsel appointed by the Northwest Territories Supreme Court to serve on the government's behalf?

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, I would have to inquire whether that matter was considered by the Department of Justice.

NORTHWEST TERRITORIES—SUGGESTED INCLUSION IN NEGOTIATIONS OF LANDS COVERED BY TREATIES 8 AND 11

Miss Flora MacDonald (Kingston and the Islands): Mr. Speaker, my supplementary question is directed to the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development. Since the minister's statement of August 8 specifically exempts those lands in the Northwest Territories covered by treaties 8 and 11 from direct negotiation between the government and the native people, is the minister now prepared to reconsider that decision in light of the fact there is sufficient doubt about the aboriginal claims of the people in the Northwest Territories, and will he take into consideration whether those lands should now be included in any negotiations between the government and the native people in the Northwest Territories?

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): Mr. Speaker, I cannot make a decision at this time because the legal aspects of the problem have to be considered by the Department of Justice. As far as I am concerned, I have said and I repeat today that I will be always willing to sit down with the Indian people of the Northwest Territories and try to find a way out of the difficulties in which they find themselves and in which we find ourselves. Not later than this morning I was approached by a person to that end and I said, as I always have said to the Northwest Territories Indians, that I am willing to meet them at any time to discuss the problem.

AIRPORTS

PICKERING AND STE. SCHOLASTIQUE—REASON FOR DIFFERENCE IN PRICE PAID FOR LANDS EXPROPRIATED

Mr. Réal Caouette (Témiscamingue): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Transport.

Yesterday, we raised the issue of land expropriations in the Pickering and Ste. Scholastique areas. Can the Minister tell us why there is such a big difference between the rates paid for expropriations in the Pickering and Ste. Scholastique areas?

Hon. Jean Marchand (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I am having this situation investigated. There are several reasons why the rates should be different. I think that this will be nothing new for the hon. member if I say to him that some lands and properties do have a higher value than others and all this has to be taken into consideration. For a $100,000 house built in Pickering, we do indeed pay the full value. When comparing this with a $30,000 house in Mirabel, one should not infer discrimination.

Mr. Caouette (Témiscamingue): A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker.

In my opinion, it is not so much a question of the houses which have been bought. I should like the hon. minister to tell us why $300 million can be spent to buy 18,000 acres of land in Pickering, while it is not possible to spend more than $125 million to buy 80,000 acres of land in Ste. Scholastique?

Mr. Marchand (Langelier): I think that this is putting the question in a somewhat simplistic manner. Out of the 80,000 acres of land which have been expropriated in Mirabel, some were fallow lands which could have been bought by anybody. The market price of a piece of land can very well be arrived at and I think that the hon. member could do it. A piece of land in full production does not have the same value at all. It would be like comparing potatoes with oranges. Therefore, I do not feel I am in a position to answer this question.

LABOUR RELATIONS

RESTORATION OF NORMAL RAILWAY SERVICE IN LIGHT OF FAILURE OF SOME EMPLOYEES TO RETURN TO WORK

Mr. John A. Fraser (Vancouver South): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Labour. Keeping in mind the provisions of Bill C-217 as amended by the House, can the minister advise when it is reasonable to expect rail service to be back to normal in Vancouver and other affected areas?

● (1120)

Hon. John C. Munro (Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, there was a desire on the part of many in Vancouver for an explanation of the provisions of the bill. That is being supplied in detail, although I have the conviction that the details of the bill have been explained to all those concerned throughout the country. I would like to indicate to the hon. member, and naturally I hope to have his support, that we cannot tolerate further open defiance of the laws of parliament. It is one thing to be reasonable, and we feel we have been reasonable, but we cannot continue to tolerate this defiance. I believe I speak for all parliamentarians and the government.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

STEPS TO EXPLAIN PROVISIONS OF ACT TO RAILWAY WORKERS

Mr. David Orlikow (Winnipeg North): Has the Minister of Labour taken steps to send officials of his department who are well acquainted with the details of the act to Vancouver, Thunder Bay or wherever there are difficulties to explain to the railway workers the provisions of the act and what the powers of the arbitrator are?

Hon. John C. Munro (Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, I have already indicated, and I reiterate, I am satisfied that the provisions of the bill have been explained and that those who are doing the explaining are fully aware of the provisions of the bill. That having been said, I believe the reasonable period in terms of explanation is at an end and we should insist on compliance with this act of parliament.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prince Albert): Mr. Speaker, I wish to ask the Minister of Labour why he did not accept the request of various unions across the country that he go to Vancouver and explain the provisions of the bill, realizing his well known lack of desire for publicity?

Mr. Munro (Hamilton East): Mr. Speaker, I believe my position, and I think the right hon. member will agree, is to insist on compliance with an act of parliament that has been passed and not to lend any credence to anyone who may believe there is any way by which they can avoid compliance with this act. In the circumstances, I feel there are other appropriate ways of getting explanations to those who desire them. In fact, we have done that. I reiterate to the right hon. member I am now fully satisfied that all those who expressed concern are well aware of the provisions of the act and should now instruct all their men to comply with its provisions.

Mr. Diefenbaker: In view of this declaration, have any informations been laid or when are they going to be laid?

Mr. Munro (Hamilton East): Mr. Speaker, I have already indicated that if we are going to insist upon compliance with the act, action will have to be taken very shortly indeed. This reasonable period in terms of explanation is just about at an end. The right hon. member has just expressed an inclination that these explanations should be offered. Indeed, I believe the implication of his question was that I should have done it. I take it from that that he has no disagreement with the procedure to date. I would hope I would have his support when I insist on behalf of all members of parliament that there now be compliance with the provisions of the act of parliament.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The Chair will recognize the right hon. member for Prince Albert for one further supplementary and then the hon. member for Hamilton West.

Mr. Diefenbaker: With this vast accumulation of words to conceal information, will the minister now say whether any informations have been laid or, if not, when they are going to be laid? That is a very simple question. It cannot be evaded by the kind of language in which the minister has been engaging.

[Mr. Orlikow.]

MANPOWER

LOCAL INITIATIVES PROGRAM—ADVERTISEMENTS RESPECTING CONSTITUENCY ADVISORY GROUPS

Mr. Lincoln M. Alexander (Hamilton West): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Manpower and Immigration related to the LIP program. Why did he or his department find it necessary to publish advertisements in the papers in the last two or three days indicating that constituency advisory groups would be set up when, in fact, he had asked for the opinions of members of parliament, which opinions were supposed to be in his hands today, as to the efficacy of constituency advisory groups? It seems to me the minister's letter was a sham and a farce. Would he explain the circumstances to the House?

Hon. Robert K. Andras (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): We will certainly hold to the intention of offering members of parliament the opportunity to make the decision whether there should or should not be such groups within their constituencies. It is a legitimate choice because some constituencies, by reason of their make-up or structure do not lend themselves, at this stage anyway, to the operation of local advisory groups. If the hon. member reads the advertisement carefully I think he will find that an attempt is being made to make provision for more local input concerning decisions as to the desirability or otherwise of projects. The indication was given that in a typical constituency such a choice would probably be made. There was no attempt to put the hon. member on the spot.

Mr. Alexander: Notwithstanding what the minister has said, there was an indication of pressure placed on members of parliament to go along with these constituency advisory groups. To my mind the advertisement was very misleading. Can the minister tell the House that projects categorized as essential or desirable by constituency advisory groups will be accepted for funding by the minister? He has left the impression with the community that the constituency advisory groups would have the final say. Is this a fact or is it not?

Mr. Andras: I think the advertisement refers to consultation and respect for that consultation, but I want to make it absolutely clear, as I did in my letter to hon. members and in any public statements I have made, that while consultation will be a major factor in the decision-making process, ultimate authority for the approval of projects or otherwise will remain with the minister, who must accept that responsibility.

Mr. Alexander: Is it the intention of the minister, in order to give some credibility to his statement and to the policy that has been announced, to break down the $83 million by constituencies in order that we can ascertain whether, in fact, constituency advisory groups will have the opportunity to have their projects funded?

Mr. Andras: Every constituency will have the same opportunity. The exact amount allocated to constituencies will be subject to already committed negotiations with the provincial governments. The allocation as between provinces has already been decided upon under a formula that has existed in the past. As I have said, allocation within a province will be subject to discussion with the province concerned, but it will be based primarily on allocation to areas of high unemployment.

Mr. Erik Nielsen (Yukon): Since not all hon. members intend to involve themselves in the scheme proposed by the minister and since the advertisements appearing in the national press leave a very positive impression in the constituencies that their member of parliament is involved, will the hon. gentleman cease and desist, or give instructions to his officials to cease and desist, from publishing, as he has, the kind of advertisement which indicates that all members are involved?

Mr. Andras: I was under the assumption that all hon. members would wish to take some responsibility in this matter. We have received many representations in the past year.

Mr. Nielsen: Not from all members.

Mr. Andras: Maybe not all. Maybe the hon. member wishes to avoid that responsibility. But many other hon. members have indicated to me that they wish to make a definite input when these projects are considered. I think this is a commendable suggestion on their part and I have followed it through to the best of my ability.

Mr. Nielsen: Will the minister answer my question and stop publishing the advertisements?

AGRICULTURE

IMPLEMENTATION OF MILK SUBSIDY—RESULT OF MEETING WITH PROVINCIAL MARKETING BOARDS AND INDUSTRY REPRESENTIVES

Mr. Terry Grier (Toronto-Lakeshore): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Agriculture. Can the minister advise the House as to the result of the meeting that took place Wednesday between provincial marketing boards and industry representatives in connection with the implementation of the milk subsidy announced by the Prime Minister?

Hon. E. F. Whelan (Minister of Agriculture): A further meeting is being held today. The response, as I said at the time, was fairly good. They are trying to iron out the technicalities—I guess that is the best way of saying it.

Mr. Grier: Mr. Speaker, on Wednesday, in reply to a question I directed to him, the Prime Minister referred to either the containment or a roll-back of milk prices as a result of the subsidy. Can the Minister of Agriculture confirm that his written announcement of the same date referring to the definite expectation of a roll-back is in fact a government policy objective?

● (1130)

Mr. Whelan: Mr. Speaker, it all depends on the agreements that we come to with the individual provinces which control fluid milk marketing for human consumption. These consultations are taking place.

MILK—REQUEST FOR ASSURANCE OF SUFFICIENT PRICE TO FARMERS

Mr. A. P. Gleave (Saskatoon-Biggar): I have a supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. In giving consideration to subsidies, roll-backs and so on, will the Minister of Agriculture assure the House that the dairy farmer will receive a price sufficient to cover his costs of production and to enable him to stay in business so there will be enough dairy production to serve the needs of the people of Canada?

Hon. E. F. Whelan (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, I think federal action regarding industrial milk and the actions of the provincial marketing boards to try to guarantee producers a proper return, particularly the two main marketing boards in the provinces that produce over 80 per cent of the milk, prove that they are concerned. This government is concerned to see that consumers of milk do not have to bear this extra cost any more than they can afford to do so. This is why we are making this proposal to them at this time. I reiterate that our actions show our concern, and that the meeting we are calling on September 27 with the provincial Ministers of Agriculture, and with the leaders of the national farm organizations which will take place prior thereto, show this concern even more so.

REGIONAL ECONOMIC EXPANSION

QUEBEC—ASSISTANCE TO DESIGNATED AND SPECIAL ZONES—REQUEST FOR STATEMENT ON NEGOTIATIONS WITH PROVINCE

Mr. Adrien Lambert (Bellechasse): Mr. Speaker, I realize that the Chair is absolutely right in view of the statement made yesterday. I should like to direct a question to the hon. Minister of Regional Economic Expansion.

Considering that a few months ago the minister announced that negotiations were under way with the provinces concerning the assistance program for areas in special and other zones, can the minister tell the House whether he will soon issue a statement following his talks on this subject with the Quebec government so that the people in charge at the municipal level may be made aware of the situation as soon as possible?

[English]

Hon. Donald C. Jamieson (Minister of Regional Economic Expansion): Mr. Speaker, very intensive discussions at a high level have been going on between officials of the department and the government of Quebec, indeed, with all provincial governments. I am happy to tell the hon. member that in the case of the province of Quebec substantial progress has been made with regard to agreement on a general development policy for the province of Quebec affecting not only my department but other federal agencies. It is our hope and expectation that a general development agreement will be ready for conclusion and signing later in the present year, I hope within a matter of perhaps a month or six weeks.

[Translation]

Mr. Lambert (Bellechasse): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask a supplementary question to the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion.

May I ask the minister if the negotiations are progressing well enough that we may hope to learn about the nature of the master agreement before the end of September?

[English]

Mr. Jamieson: Mr. Speaker, as I indicated, it is not my expectation that the work can be concluded by the end of September. The fact is that, in addition to the general development agreement, we are also examining a number of supplementary development agreements under the umbrella approach. It is our hope that two or three of these can perhaps be introduced, if not simultaneously, certainly very quickly after the development agreement. However, if the hon. member has anything specific in regard to a particular region I would be glad to try to elaborate for him.

CONSUMER AFFAIRS

MONITORING OF SALES TAX AND TARIFF CUTS TO ENSURE BENEFITS REACH CONSUMERS—REQUEST FOR REPORT

Hon. Robert L. Stanfield (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs who for some seven months has been refusing to make a report on the results of any monitoring of the anti-inflationary effects and reduction of prices that the budget of the Minister of Finance was supposed to produce. Can the minister tell the House, after seven months of delay, when we may expect to have this report? Can he give us a precise date when we may expect this report?

Hon. Herb Gray (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs): Mr. Speaker, the Leader of the Opposition is incorrect in suggesting that I have been refusing to prepare a report. Work on this has been going on. I expect it to be completed about the middle of September. It will be delivered to the Minister of Finance, following which I trust its conclusions will be made available appropriately to the House and the public.

Mr. Stanfield: Would the Prime Minister give us the assurance that these games regarding this report on the monitoring effects of the budget, which has been so long promised and so long delayed, will stop and that the report will be presented to the House and rapidly as possible?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Yes, Mr. Speaker, I will gladly renew the assurances just given by the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs.

[Mr. Jamieson.]

NATIONAL REVENUE

POLICY RESPECTING DELIVERY BY RCMP OF NOTICES TO TAXPAYERS DEMANDING INCOME TAX RETURNS—NAME OF DEPARTMENT

Mr. Eldon M. Woolliams (Calgary North): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask a question of the Minister of National Revenue. Is it the policy of the Department of National Revenue to have the RCMP serve and deliver notices to taxpayers in various cities and elsewhere simply entitled "Demand for Income Tax Returns as prescribed by form No. 2", when in fact there is no prosecution involved or even quasi-criminal proceedings anticipated?

Hon. Robert Stanbury (Minister of National Revenue): Mr. Speaker, if the hon. member would like to give me details of his concern I would be glad to look into the matter.

Mr. Woolliams: Did the minister authorize the forwarding of a memorandum to the various Department of National Revenue offices across the land advising that the new name of the department in question will be "Revenue Canada, Taxation", and are those instructions now being withdrawn along with the memorandum sent out by his department? If so, why?

Mr. Stanbury: No, Mr. Speaker. As the hon. member and other hon. members know, for some time a short description of departments has been used and a short description is used in our department as in others. But the fact is that the name of the department has not been changed and it is not expected that it will be changed.

PUBLIC SERVICE EMPLOYMENT ACT

INQUIRY AS TO INTRODUCTION OF AMENDMENTS

Mr. Walter Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the President of the Treasury Board. Now that the government has brought before the House a bill dealing with the benefits accorded retired employees of the government of Canada, would the minister inform the House when the government intends to bring forward the amendments to the Public Service Employment Act which were promised in the Speech from the Throne but have not yet seen the light of day?

Hon. C. M. Drury (President of the Treasury Board): Mr. Speaker, these provisions are still in the process of being drafted. We hope to bring them forward at the earliest possible date.

Mr. Baker: Is there any truth to the rumour that is rampant in the city—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member knows that a question couched in those terms is out of order.

Mr. Baker: Then may I rephrase my question. May I specifically ask the minister whether he will undertake to introduce this legislation perhaps within the next two weeks, and also undertake that this important piece of legislation is not going to be delayed in order to be included in a bag of election goodies at the next election?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I would seek the co-operation of all hon. members in enabling the Chair to recognize as many questioners as possible by limiting the number of supplementaries between now and the end of the question period. A number of members have been waiting to ask questions during the last few days and the Chair is anxious to give them an opportunity to do so. This can only be done with the co-operation of all hon. members.

TRANSPORT

REQUEST FOR TRI-LEVEL COMMITTEE STUDY OF TRANSPORTATION PROBLEMS IN SOUTHWESTERN ONTARIO

Mr. Perrin Beatty (Wellington-Grey-Dufferin-Waterloo): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the sartorially splendid Minister of Transport, if he is listening to me. I should like to repeat the essence of the question I asked him on June 27, at which time he asked for more time. Is the minister now willing to accede to the request of the Midwestern Development Council that a tri-level committee be struck to inquire into all aspects of transportation needs in southwestern Ontario?

Hon. Jean Marchand (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I regret that my translation system is not working.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Marchand (Langelier): My normal answer would be "in due course", but if the hon. member would repeat his question I will borrow my seatmate's system.

● (1140)

Mr. Beatty (Wellington-Grey-Dufferin-Waterloo): Mr. Speaker, the question I asked was whether the minister is now going to accede to the request of the Midwestern Development Council, which had a meeting with the minister some three and a half months ago, that a tri-level committee be struck to look into all aspects of transportation problems in southwestern Ontario, including passenger transportation?

Mr. Marchand (Langelier): Mr. Speaker, I do not recall having received this request, but I will inquire of my department and if it is there I will give an answer on Monday.

CORPORATE AFFAIRS

POSSIBLE INCREASE IN ACTIVITIES OF TEXASGULF FOLLOWING PURCHASE OF CONTROL BY CANADA DEVELOPMENT CORPORATION

Mr. Lorne Nystrom (Yorkton-Melville): Mr. Speaker, my question was for the Minister of Transport who apparently has just stepped out of the House. I will direct it to the Prime Minister. In view of the fact the green light appears to be on for the purchase of Texasgulf by the Canada Development Corporation, I should like to ask the Prime Minister, if he is listening, or some other minister, whether he can say, in view of the fact the Canada Development Corporation has now been given the green light in respect of this purchase and in view of the fact the government is the sole owner of that corporation, that the activities of Texasgulf in this country will be stepped up in terms of investment, jobs, research and development?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I am sure those representations by the hon. gentleman will be heard by the directors of the CDC who, as the hon. member knows, under the law have a great deal of autonomy.

Mr. Nystrom: In view of the relatively successful job the CDC has been doing, and in view of the fact the corporation is supposed to be going public, can the Prime Minister say whether any consideration is being given to keeping this Crown corporation wholly owned by the people of Canada?

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, there are several Crown corporations which are wholly owned by the people of Canada. I cannot answer a hypothetical question.

HEALTH

POSSIBILITY OF CAMPAIGN TO COMBAT GLUE SNIFFING

Mr. Sean O'Sullivan (Hamilton-Wentworth): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of National Health and Welfare and arises out of an undertaking given several weeks ago by the minister to the right hon. member for Prince Albert. At that time the minister advised he would consider a campaign to combat the problem of glue sniffing in Canada. Can the minister now advise the House whether his department is ready to conduct such a national campaign and whether it will include warnings against other solvents and drugs?

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, I do not remember having given a commitment to the right hon. member, but this matter is under continuous study. I think I said at the time that it was a very complex issue and that glue sniffing, indeed, was only one element. There are many other aspects involved. No large campaign is planned at the present time. It is more a matter of providing information to the public through the media on a general basis and as a result of questions like the one asked by the hon. member.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

REPRESENTATIONS TO CUBA FOR RELEASE OF RONALD PATRICK LIPPERT SINCE VISIT BY FAMILY

Mr. Tom Cossitt (Leeds): Mr. Speaker, I have a question I should like to direct to the Prime Minister. Following the co-operative action in July of the Cuban government in permitting the sister and daughter of Ronald Patrick Lippert to visit him while a prisoner in Cuba, has the government of Canada made any representations whatsoever to the Cuban government since that visit by Mr. Lippert's family on behalf of the release of Mr. Lippert and, if so, can the Prime Minister report any progress to the House?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I will pass the question on to the Secretary of State for External Affairs. I have not made any recent inquiries.

Mr. Cossitt: Mr. Speaker, I would ask the Prime Minister whether he is now prepared to change his previous inhumanitarian attitude and make a direct appeal to Prime Minister Castro—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member knows that a supplementary question asked in those terms is out of order. I would suggest to hon. members that after they have asked their questions in the first instance, we might save a bit of time if they would not ask a supplementary when there is perhaps nothing much to be added to the first question. I know hon. members very often feel they must ask a supplementary, but when we are moving toward the end of the question period a little more forbearance on the part of hon. members might help.

SUPPLYING OF INFORMATION TO QUEBEC MUNICIPALITIES ON AMENDMENTS TO ACT

Mr. Roland Godin (Portneuf): Mr. Speaker, I wish to put a question to the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs.

Can he tell the House whether or not Canadians took advantage of Bill C-133? Could he also tell us whether Quebec municipal authorities have received information on the procedure to be followed to take advantage of that new act?

Hon. Herb Gray (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs): Mr. Speaker, may I ask my hon. colleague to repeat his question?

ROYAL CANADIAN MOUNTED POLICE

SUGGESTED ADVANCED PARAMEDICAL TRAINING FOR OFFICERS WHO INVESTIGATE MOTOR VEHICLE ACCIDENTS

Mr. Heward Grafftey (Brome-Missisquoi): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Solicitor General. As the police are often the first at the scene of an accident, is the Solicitor General considering a policy, in respect of those provinces whose police services are carried out by the RCMP, whereby RCMP officers will receive advanced paramedical emergency training, and many of their vehicles will be converted into police ambulances as in the city of Montreal?

Hon. Warren Allmand (Solicitor General): Mr. Speaker, that is a very interesting suggestion. I would be very pleased to take it up with the RCMP to see what can be done.

POST OFFICE

REPLACEMENT OF ROYAL CREST AND WORDS "ROYAL MAIL" BY WORDS "CANADA POST" ON MAIL BOXES AND TRUCKS IN VANCOUVER

Mr. Bill Clarke (Vancouver Quadra): Mr. Speaker, in the absence of the Postmaster General I should like to direct my question to the Prime Minister. Does the appearance of the words "Canada Post" on mail boxes and mail trucks in Vancouver, coupled with the removal of the Royal crest and the words "Royal Mail", a practice which I notice has spread to Ottawa, indicate a change in government policy, and does it signal the end of the Royal mail in Canada?

Hon. Robert Stanbury (Minister of National Revenue): Mr. Speaker, I will be glad to take that question as notice for the Postmaster General, but I can say that I have noticed that the coat or arms is still on my local mail box.

Mr. Woolliams: You must have a private one.

AGRICULTURE

POSSIBILITY OF INCREASE IN SUBSIDY ON MILK USED FOR MAKING CHEESE

Mr. Jake Epp (Provencher): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct my question to the Minister of Agriculture. In view of the statement by the right hon. Prime Minister on Tuesday last respecting the subsidy on fluid milk to a maximum of five cents per quart, is the minister considering an increase in the subsidy for manufacturing milk used in the making of cheese?

Hon. E. F. Whelan (Minister of Agriculture): No, Mr. Speaker. We raised the return for manufacturing milk on August 1 by the equivalent of $1 a hundred. We had previously raised it, earlier in the year, by the equivalent of 60 cents a hundred. That is what the producers asked for at that time. We do know that some of their costs have gone down since that time.

PASSING ON OF ENTIRE BENEFIT OF FLUID MILK SUBSIDY TO CONSUMERS

Mrs. Grace MacInnis (Vancouver Kingsway): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question for the Minister of Agriculture. Will he indicate specifically how the government plans to make certain that the entire benefit of the milk subsidy will be passed on to the consumer?

Hon. E. F. Whelan (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, if it is not passed on to the consumer no one will receive it.

UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE

PROVISION OF BENEFITS TO RAILWAY EMPLOYEES LAID OFF BECAUSE OF STRIKE

Mr. Doug Neil (Moose Jaw): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Manpower and Immigration. In view of the fact that those railway employees who were laid off by the railway companies because of the strike but who were not directly involved in the strike still have not received a decision as far as unemployment insurance claims are concerned, and as many of these employees have not had any income for some six weeks, will the minister advise whether a decision has been made and, if not, will he see to it that a decision is made in the immediate future?

Hon. Robert K. Andras (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, a decision was made last week and that information was transmitted to all unemployment insurance offices across the country, along with an instruction to proceed with special measures to speed the processing of claims for those entitled to benefits.

Oral Questions

CANADIAN PACIFIC AIRLINES

ACTION TO HALT SERVICING OF AIRCRAFT OUTSIDE CANADA IN LIGHT OF MACHINISTS' STRIKE

Mr. Paddy Neale (Vancouver East): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Transport. In view of the fact there is a legal strike in effect between the International Association of Machinists and Canadian Pacific Airlines, would the minister inform the House what action his department has taken to halt the ferrying of CP Air DC8 aircraft No. 801 to World Air Centre in Oakland, California, on September 9 of this year for overhaul and repair, as requested by the IAM by telegram on September 7?

Hon. Jean Marchand (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, under international agreement all airlines can have their normal repairs made outside the country; this is not new. If they are doing it in order to avoid the strike, there are some other provisions in our laws that would prevent Canadian Pacific Airlines from doing so. I know that they asked to be relieved of those financial obligations, and I do not think that the government accepted that.

ENERGY

OIL—PROPOSED EXTENSION OF PIPELINE TO MONTREAL—IMPACT ON PRICES IN QUEBEC

Mr. Roch La Salle (Joliette): Mr. Speaker, in order to avoid a supplementary, I will ask a twofold question to the hon. Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources.

As regards the oil pipeline recently referred to in an announcement, since the information available at this time indicates that for many years to come imported oil in Quebec will cost less than western oil, can the minister give us the assurance that the implementation of that project would guarantee to Quebecers prices identical to those of imported products?

And secondly, would the minister also indicate, since his Quebec counterpart expressed his surprise at not having been consulted in that respect, whether it is his intention to negotiate or discuss the matter with the Quebec minister in the next few days?

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, I would like to point out the fact that we have had discussions with Quebec representatives in July on all matters relating to energy, particularly on the construction of an oil pipeline to Montreal. And I will have next week the opportunity to meet with my Quebec counterpart and I will again be most interested in having his opinion on the matter.

As to prices, I must say that one of the considerations is that the international price of crude oil keeps on increasing; for that reason, we are very much concerned about a situation where the Montreal market must pay a higher price than other parts of Canada. It is for that reason—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): I apologize, Mr. Speaker, but—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Perhaps the minister would like to return to motions.

CONSUMER AFFAIRS

PROSPECTIVE INCREASE IN COST OF WINTER CLOTHING—REQUEST FOR REMOVAL OF FEDERAL SALES TAX

Hon. Paul Hellyer (Trinity): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct my question to the Prime Minister. In view of persistent reports that winter clothing will cost 20 per cent to 50 per cent more this fall, will the Prime Minister immediately recommend to parliament the removal of the 12 per cent federal sales tax on clothing for adults?

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I thank the hon. gentleman for the suggestion.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The Chair will recognize the hon. member for Trinity on a supplementary and then call orders of the day.

Mr. Hellyer: Mr. Speaker, in view of the fact that a 12 per cent reduction at the wholesale level represents an approximate reduction of 20 per cent in prices at the retail level, would the Prime Minister not agree that this is one of the most important measures this government could recommend to parliament—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

Mr. Trudeau: You are out of order.

Mr. Hellyer: —to give lower and middle income groups—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

Mr. Hellyer: —a chance to protect themselves against the winter cold?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Will the hon. member kindly resume his seat. He knows that a question asked in those terms is irregular.

Mr. Nielsen: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege now that we have come to the end of the question period. I did not want to impinge upon that. It involves the Minister of Manpower and Immigration and is similar to the question of privilege raised earlier in the session concerning the Secretary of State and his circulation of correspondence leaving the impression that he had the concurrence of all members of parliament. The minister is responsible for the appearance of certain newspaper advertisements throughout the country leaving the positive impression that all members of parliament are involved in some kind of organization which he wishes to set up in communities under the Local Initiatives Program.

It is not a question of wanting to avoid responsibility but rather a question of the right of members to reject the minister's offer of inclusion in this scheme. All members of the House have not agreed nor have they answered the correspondence that has been circulated by the minister. It is therefore not within the minister's right, by virtue of his office or any other reason, to leave the impression in national newspaper advertisements that all members are involved in this scheme. I personally want no part of the approval of a grant for the making of wooden ducks by a motorcycle gang in Montreal or grants to count tombstones or seagulls.

My question of privilege, put succinctly, is that the minister, not having agreed to remove that advertisement, should rise now and say that he will have it redesigned so as to remove the impression that he has the co-operation of all hon. members in this scheme of his. That is my right and I insist upon it. I wish the minister would give his assurance that he will do that.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Andras: Mr. Speaker, I do not think I will have another advertisement prepared suggesting that, but I will certainly note that I do not have the co-operation of the hon. member.

Mr. Speaker: Orders of the day.

STATUTE LAW (SUPPLEMENTARY RETIREMENT BENEFITS) AMENDMENT ACT, 1973

PROVISION FOR REMOVAL OF TWO PER CENT LIMIT ON ESCALATION, REDUCTION OF ELIGIBLE AGE

Hon. C. M. Drury (President of the Treasury Board) moved that Bill C-220, to amend the statute law providing for the payment of supplementary retirement benefits to certain persons in receipt of pensions payable out of the Consolidated Revenue Fund, be read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Health, Welfare and Social Affairs.

He said: Mr. Speaker, I wish to say a few words to explain the details of the bill to amend the Supplementary Retirement Benefits Act. The principal reason for introducing this bill is to provide that increases in the consumer price index will be fully reflected in the escalation of benefits payable under this act. As hon. members will recall, I have stated in the House on a number of occasions that the government's objective was to remove the 2 per cent ceiling on the annual increase of pensions payable under this act, but I had suggested that this should be sought at the time of an agreement with the provinces that the 2 per cent ceiling on increases of pensions under the Canada Pension Plan would also be removed.

At the present time, the pension index for the purposes of the Supplementary Retirement Benefits Act is the equivalent of the pension index under the Canada Pension Plan, as the latter was defined on January 1, 1970, with the result that any annual increase in the pension index is subject to the existing limit of 2 per cent now provided for in the Canada Pension Plan.

It is, however, not expected that this decision on the Canada Pension Plan will be reached before the meeting of the federal and provincial welfare ministers in October. As one element of the government's measures to mitigate the effects of price inceases on those unable to protect their incomes, the government has now decided to proceed without waiting for that agreement. Accordingly, the amendments proposed in this bill will remove that 2 per cent limitation and provide that any increase in the consumer price index will be fully reflected in the escalation of benefits under the Supplementary Retirement Benefits Act. The proposed increase will reflect the full change in the consumer price index since the Supplementary Retirement Benefits Act was passed in 1970 or the year in which the pensioner concerned ceased to be employed, whichever is the later. As a result, the new pension increases payable in 1974 will range from an increase of about six and a half per cent for those who retired in 1973 to about eleven and one half per cent for those who retired in 1970 or earlier.

When this act was passed in 1970, a shared cost method of financing was provided whereby the contributions of members of the public service, Canadian forces, RCMP, as well as members of parliament was established at half of 1 per cent of their salaries with a matching government contribution. This was intended to meet the cost of the pension increase for those already retired from the public service as well as those who retire within a seven year period, after which additional revenue was expected to be required.

This approach had been proposed by a special committee made up of the members of my advisory committee on the Public Service Superannuation Act and representatives of the Canadian Forces and the RCMP. In considering the increased cost of the amendments under this proposal, the advisory committee was concerned about asking present members to increase their contributions in order to pay for greater pension increases of those who had already retired.

The government appreciated the viewpoint of the advisory committee and is therefore proposing that, effective from January 1, 1974, it will assume the cost of all escalation for all those who retired before 1970 and the balance of the cost of the escalation of pensions of persons retired since 1969 which is not covered by matching contributions made by those persons and by the government with respect to them.

In the long run, the contribution of half of one per cent together with the government's matching contribution will almost certainly be insufficient to cover the cost of escalation for employees now entering the public service with an average working life of 30 years in the service ahead of them. Under certain assumptions it would be necessary to increase the contribution rate in the very near future if such an employee is to pay half the cost of his pension escalation after retirement. Under other assumptions it would not be necessary to do so for a few years. The government is proposing to adopt a phased approach under which the present rate of contribution would be raised by half of one per cent each, effective January 1, 1977. What further increases might be required in later years will be determined by future parliaments.

The third feature of this bill on which I would like to comment relates to the age at which the escalation of pensions of former members of the public service, Canadian Forces, RCMP and members of parliament can commence unless they are disabled. At the present time the act provides that this age should be 60.

Since 1970, the amendments to the Public Service Superannuation Act which lowered the age at which public service employees could retire from 60 to 55 if they had 30 years of service created anomalies between the public service employees and members of these other groups. I assured hon. members from time to time that the government was concerned over these anomalies and would propose amendments to the act to take care of them when this legislation was introduced.

Accordingly, this bill provides for a lowering of the age at which escalation will commence for former members of the Canadian Forces, the RCMP and members of parliament, from 60 to 55 for those who have 30 years of service, to 56 for those who have 29 years of service, and so on, while all other persons on pension in those groups receive their increases on attaining the age of 60. The present provisions for eligibility of immediate escalation in the case of disability are not changed.

This formula has been determined after consultations with representatives of the Canadian Forces and the RCMP, bearing in mind the assumptions regarding cost factors mentioned earlier, and the amendments which were made in the Public Service Superannuation Act last year. Since those amendments led to increases in the pensions of civil servants retiring after age 55 with 30 years of service with effect from January 1, 1973, the amendment which introduced this new formula will have retroactive effect to that date under the terms of this bill. Mr. Speaker, I commend second reading and passage of this bill to the House.

Mr. Heath Macquarrie (Hillsborough): Mr. Speaker, I note that last night in one of its rare lapses Hansard made a mistake and quoted me as suggesting that in my eagerness to speak I had done such and such, whereas I had said in my eagerness to be agreeable I made a certain determination. Today I am not eager to speak, but I am agreeable to any scintilla of help that the government might bring forward to assist any group of people in this country.

I have found a certain element of fascination in this particular measure. I have known the President of the Treasury board (Mr. Drury) for a number of years. I have heard him speak in this House a good many times, but this is the first time I have seen him come before the House in the role of the dispenser of goodies.

He has generally been the man who knew how to say no, no, to increases for this group of public servants, no to that group of public servants, no when he was asked for more flexibility in dealing with the post office workers, no when it was pointed out to him time and again that he was injuring terribly the people in many parts of the country by his extension of the iniquitous prevailing wage rate system. He was the man who said no when it was suggested that those who were longshoremen on the east coast deserved the same pay as those on the west coast. He said the same thing about the nurses. He also was the one who was not able to say yes when we protested that firefighters at the Charlottetown airport were not properly served if they were getting a lower rate than firefighters in other parts of the country. It is not, I suppose, quite right to say that Scrooge has become Santa Claus, but it is interestingly close enough to attract the attention of those who have watched this minister so long.

Something less pleasant is the impact on any thoughtful member of parliament that here is another measure which illuminates and dramatizes the extent of inflation which is raging across the country. We are trying in this measure, as we tried in the one yesterday, to bring about some small measure of amelioration, some tiny piece of protection against something which is rampaging the land and affecting the people of Canada, every one. It is another partial measure, and of course in so far as it does help we are glad that it has come about although it has been a long, long time coming.

One of the distressing things about this resumed emergency session of parliament is the lack of alacrity, if I may put it that way, of the government in bringing forward such measures as it deigns to ask to be legislated. I think that in all my years here I never before found myself getting ready for a sitting of the House without, until an hour or two before I went into the chamber, having any idea of what, in fact, would be on the parliamentary agenda for that day. It not only took the whole of the session before, but the whole of the recess and of the resumed session for a determination to be made that the three measures we now have before us would be introduced. This indicates something less than a galvanic ability to deal with the problems of the land.

The bill is also startling and dramatic when you read that the figure 2 per cent was once regarded as something less than fantastic, unreal, as a cost of living escalator. But that figure is not a drop in the bucket with the inflation we have now, something like 14 per cent in those essentials of daily life per year. Of course, many people thought at the time that the 2 per cent was unreal and inadequate, but how far from reality it seems today. One would think we were talking about a bygone era, yet it is only a few years ago that 2 per cent was within the bounds of possibility.

The bill also causes us to reflect again upon the fact that certain groups of Canadians, in this case those who have served the country well for a long time, have been bearing the burden of inflation. The people to whom this measure refers are Canadians who have served the government, who have served the people for many many years. Most thoughtful people in our society, even in these days of early and easy obsolescence, have pondered about their future. A great financial institution at one time had the slogan, and they may still have it, "Make your future more secure". We used to believe that whatever disadvantage there might be in entering the Public Service, at least there was security. Now, we know what has happened to that security. We know that many public servants who thought they had a pension which would give them security in their later years, have found it to be totally inadequate.

One of the disturbing things that I have noticed in recent months is the actual discomfort of so many of the people involved. There are thousands upon thousands of Canadians whose plans for retirement have been altered because the purchasing power of their dollar has been diminished. Every day we get letters from people who had thought that by careful planning they would be able to retire at such and such an age. Not long ago I talked to a very bright executive in a private company who was ready to retire next year. However, he said that considering what the dollar buys today he will have to work for at least another five years, and if this inflation continues he will never be able to stop work completely. This is a man who is not by any means on the bottom rung of the ladder.

Mr. Speaker, inflation is the sworn enemy of any kind of security that thoughtful people have tried to provide for their families and their own declining years. Inflation that has got out of hand is more than a political problem, more than the subject of political argument. It is a grim and, I would say, a criminal social problem which effectively shatters the future plans of people because of a government's inability to keep the economic and fiscal operation of the country under reasonable control. To tell people living in a country where inflation is soaring that they will make their future more secure by doing such and such a thing is preaching an incredible and incredulous doctrine.

It is interesting that a portion of this bill refers to something which is just and proper, that is the dropping of the age to allow people with long service to retire earlier. Yet because of the effect of inflation, the diminishing value of the dollar, many people are finding that they have actually to work longer. In a country like this, any citizen at age 60 should be able to step out of the work force if he wishes and have his future needs looked after. But the opposite prevails.

I am not going to go into these matters in detail, Mr. Speaker, but just want to make a few more general remarks. There is one group that we have to take note of and that is members of parliament. The member of parliament is used to being a target because of what he is able to eat and what kind of office he is supplied. I even noticed some criticism recently about the gymnastic facilities that members have on the hill, and I thought I should go about the country demonstrating that probably no group needs them more tham members of parliament!

However, I was looking at the report on members of parliament retiring allowances. I discovered that only one person of the many who have come here, having given up their profession or business, was in the top bracket giving him an annual pension of $8,000 to $8,999. I believe that man was in the House for about 30 years. The next man was in the $5,999 bracket and he had about 20 years service. This is an indication that the affluent society does not occur within this supposedly select group. Like all other people, this group requires the kind of thing that the bill provides. We have known for a long time that the 2 per cent escalation was not reasonable for retired public servants, and even at this late date we are grateful that it has been removed from the legislation. We will do our part in that regard, Mr. Speaker.

Many members hear from former members of the RCMP and the railway people who are suffering now because they find that their pensions are insufficient. There is not a group mentioned in the bill from which I have not had letters revealing their anxiety and I imagine all hon. members have received letters as well. Much more must be done than is provided in this bill.

I was sorry to hear the minister indicate that the change in the Canada Pension Plan will have to wait. Just the other day I expressed the view that I was shocked that discussions on these matters had not taken place with the provinces long ago. How long do we have to watch inflation growing more burdensome before something is done about it? We should have had that consultation and that approval already. I cannot accept the thought that any province would not agree to an increase on the 2 per cent and I cannot believe that such consultation would take more than a couple of hours. I do not think it is necessary to wait for a plenary session of the ministers of social welfare of the whole nation. It is inconceivable that any province would stand in the way of approval, but I think it is up to the dominion government to move on this. I am not content that it should be let go for a while longer and when it is before us this party will help facilitate its passage.

In all of this the hundreds of thousands of Canadians on private pensions and the poor people who have no pension plan, have been left out. They are the victims of maladministration and, as the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) himself revealed the other day, they are the victims of a faltering conception of how bad the problem is and a limping approach toward remedial action. One wonders how long it will take those who have responsibility to be fully aware of the urgency of the situation. To govern a nation entails a heavy responsibility. That responsibility becomes tremendous when the economy of a country is in the state of our economy.

• (1220)

The government of the day, in its mental approach to these problems, should act as if an emergency faced it. There is no need for the languid approach which says, "We will leave it until October; we will slap another 2 per cent on here and, in the interim, add a bit to family allowances." Why need the family allowance be $12 instead of $20? These discussions were promised months ago. Did somebody say that $20 is too much? If a bill can provide for $12, surely it can provide for $20. I am no genius at mathematics, but even I can see that. Surely, if it was thought last spring that the need was for $20, what has happened to the cost of living cannot make one say that the need has diminished to $12. If someone last spring thought that $20 was an adequate figure for a family allowance, how could it be said, after the way food costs have been soaring in the months since the original announcement, that the increase should now only be up to $12. These things are incomprehensible, indefensible—

Mr. Knowles (Norfolk-Haldimand): And reprehensible.

Mr. Macquarrie: —and reprehensible, as the hon. member for Norfolk-Haldimand (Mr. Knowles), who has a fine vocabulary, suggests.

There are some problems connected with this bill. Questions will be raised by my colleagues. One is somewhat leery of the general principle whereby certain people, namely, the contributors to these pensions, are to be soaked for inflation which they did not create, and soaked at the say-so of the government that created it. There is something unfair about that. It is not retired civil servants who are responsible for our roaring inflation.

Mr. Baker: Nor the serving ones.

Mr. Macquarrie: Nor is it the serving ones, either. Yet the government, which is responsible, says to civil servants, "Okay, we will increase your contributory responsibilities because we are responding to this and dealing with it." That attitude reminds one of the old president of the treasury board. That is the kind of thing I would have expected him to do in his dealings with postal workers and people at the suffering end of the prevailing wage rate. Was it Shakespeare who said, "For this relief, much thanks"? I would be begrudging if I did not say, "For what is there, thanks; we appreciate it." But this is long overdue and it is not enough. At least it is something. For that we are thankful.

Having made that observation, I will take my seat and assure the minister that, despite the observations I have made, we will not stand in the way of this legislation. I hope he will show an unaccustomed willingness to listen to others and accept from some of my collegues helpful suggestions on how best to cope with this problem which the people referred to in this legislation have borne for far too long in this country.

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I agree with the hon. member for Hillsborough (Mr. Macquarrie) that any bill relating to any facet of pensions raises the whole, broad question of the adequacy or inadequacy of many of the pensions of the people of this country. I also agree with him very strongly when he says that the problem of inflation hits pensioners with particular force and, aware of the problem as we are today, it behooves us to make improvements in all our pension plans. Indeed, I urge that when we talk about the need for improving all pension plans, we think not only of those plans that come under the aegis of government, but that we increase our concern about the adequacy and safety of the provisions of private pension plans.

There is legislation on the federal statute books and on the statute books of our provinces, I believe, which provides standards for pension plans. There are also provisions in the income tax regulations which do the same thing. In my view, these items of legislation and these regulations need to be overhauled. We need to take a close look at the whole pension picture in this country.

Nevertheless, before us at the moment is a bill dealing with just a sector of the pension picture. Indeed, if my statistics are correct, I believe it affects about 100,000 people who are retired. I arrive at that figure by adding up the number of retired federal civil servants, plus their widows and orphans, and the number of retired personnel of the RCAF and Canadian Armed Forces as well as other groups referred to in this bill. I doubt if the total actually is 100,000, but it is of that order.

For those 100,000 people and for those others who are working for the federal government and will join that retired group in due course, this is a very important piece of legislation. However, if I may hark back to what I said that I agreed with the hon. member for Hillsborough, I regard this bill as important not only to the 100,000 persons it will affect immediately, but important, as well, because it establishes a principle which I hope will soon be extended to all pensioners in this country; that principle is the right to have pensions escalated after retirement, and escalated at least to the extent of the full advantage increase in the cost of living. Accordingly, I have no hesitation in saying that I welcome this bill. Indeed, I welcome it warmly. That does not cut off my right to be critical about it and to suggest that some other things should be in it. But in so far as this bill improves the pension position of retired public servants and of those in other groups, I am glad that this bill is before us.

When I think of some of the red letter days I have experienced in my years in parliament, I have to admit that one that stands out is December 19, 1969, when the minister who is piloting this bill through the House announced for the first time that the government was going to bring in legislation providing for the annual escalation of the pensions of retired public servants. It is almost 30 years since the first group of retired civil servants came to see me and asked me to go to bat for them with the proposition that their pemsions should be increased after retirement. I am happy to say that two or three of those who came to see me about this matter in 1944 lived to see their pensions escalated in 1970. One of them almost reached the age of 100 and enjoyed quite a bit of the escalation that was introduced.

When that proposal was made on December 19, 1969, and put into law in what was Bill C-194 of that session, passed by the House of Commons on March 23, 1970, it was a pretty good piece of work on the part of the government and the House of Commons, even if it took 25 years of prodding to get it. It provided for persons who had worked for the government in the various categories listed guarantee of an annual escalation of their pensions because of increases in the cost of living.

There were two main shortcomings. One was the imposition of a 2 per cent ceiling on the amount of escalation that could take place in any one year, no matter how much the cost of living might increase. The other was a limitation of age 60. While it did not affect public servants generally, it did have an adverse effect on retired personnel of the RCMP and the Canadian Armed Forces.

Just as I had urged for 25 years that this piece of legislation be brought into effect, the President of the Treasury Board (Mr. Drury) knows I began urging right away that these two improvements be made. He and I have had many night sittings over this. It would take all day to look back over the record. I am glad that the hopeful things he said to me in a number of those late shows will be done some day. I will not even talk about the fact he was very firm that this could not be done until a similar change had been made in the Canada Pension Plan. I suppose the President of the Treasury Board was preventing my doing that by the explanation which he gave. The fact of the matter is these two main shortcomings have now been dealt with in whole or in part by the bill that is now before us.

As I understand it, as far as the 2 per cent ceiling on the escalation is concerned, it will come off completely starting in January, 1974. At one time there was talk that instead of just taking the ceiling off, it might be raised to something like 3 per cent or 4 per cent. Thank heaven that was not done, but that the ceiling is to be taken off completely.

From studying this bill and comparing it with previous legislation, I think there is a bit of a retroactive effect in this legislation which I welcome. This, of course, is a detail that can be dealt with when we get to committee. As I understand it, those who got a 2 per cent increase in 1971, 1972 and 1973, in each of which years the cost of living went up more than 2 per cent, will get the shortfall in the calculation of their rate of increase in January, 1974. In other words, in January, 1974, a public servant who retired in 1973 will get a percentage increase equal to the actual rise in the cost of living for this one year period. Those who retired in earlier years will get an extra percentage point or two for the years 1971, 1972 and 1973. The old timers, those who retired before 1970, can anticipate an increase in their pensions in January, 1974, in the order of 11 per cent, 11 and a fraction per cent or even 12 per cent. That is good. It will mean a great deal to many of these people.

I earnestly hope I have correctly understood it in this regard. In reading the bill, I tried to figure a way in which the government would have to pay some back dollars that it did not pay in 1971, 1972 and 1973 because the 2 per cent ceiling that was in effect then will now come off. I will leave that until we get to committee. However, I do think I am correct in my interpretation of the bill that in January, 1974, persons who were retired prior to 1970 will have a calculation in 1974 which is cumulative so they will pick up the portion of the cost of living increase which they did not get. This is another of those occasions when I am very happy to see the President of the Treasury Board nodding his head vertically. That is good.

One of the things about this life, if I can indulge in a philosophical utterance for a moment, is that we never reach perfection. There is always something more for which to strive. I will get to that in a moment. At any rate, for those of us who have fought so hard and so long for civil service pensions to be escalated by the full extent of the cost of living, this is another of those so-called red letter days.

The other thing that this bill does and to which the minister has drawn attention is to touch in a slight or a meagre way the question of lowering the age at which escalation can come into effect, especially for retired personnel of the RCMP and Canadian Armed Forces. This is another subject we have discussed many times in the question period and in late shows.

As the minister just indicated, the way the law now stands, unless an RCMP or armed forces person retires early because of illness, he does not get the escalation until he reaches age 60, even though he may have served the full term he was permitted to serve under the regulations of those two branches of government service. Many people feel very badly about this. They point out they served their full term. They know the arguments the government has put forward about their pension plan being different and so on and that at these earlier ages, some of them can get other jobs. The fact is that many of them cannot. I have run into cases of persons who served out their term whereas they could have taken a retirement because of illness a year or so earlier and qualified for the escalation. However, because they served out their term, they were not able to do so.

When the rumour got around that this bill would do something about the age, I hoped the minister would bring it right down to 55 or 50 so that persons who had served their full term in the RCMP or armed forces would be entitled to the escalation of their pension the year after retirement. The minister has not done that. I think he likes these late shows in which he and I are often involved. It must be that he likes to leave something so that I can still go after him.

All that is being done is to provide retired armed forces and RCMP personnel to pick up their escalation at 55 if they have 30 years service, 56 if they have 29 years service, 57 with 28 years service, 58 and 27 years service and 59 if they have 26 years service. Why do we have to take two or three bites at the cherry? Why could the minister not have dealt with this in one action and met the points these people have brought forward? In any event, this is another case of welcoming what is before us, but wishing the minister had gone all the way.

Despite those words of criticism, I regard this bill as extremely welcome. I know that retired civil servants who will be affected by it will be pleased to know that in January they will get an increase in their pension based on the actual cost of living, particularly the old-timers who retired before 1970. I think particularly of the old-timers who were retired before 1970 who have the prospect this January of a pension increase of perhaps 11 per cent, or possibly even a bit more.

The hon. member for Hillsborough made reference to the fact that there is one section of the bill which deals with retired members of parliament who are on pension. I was one who was extremely annoyed, when Bill C-194 was brought in back in the session of 1969-70, to find that what some of us had fought to achieve for a long time, namely an improvement in the pensions of retired civil servants, had been linked with a massive improvement in the pension plan for members of parliament. The whole thing was put into one package. Some of us did not like what was done for MPs at the time as compared with what was being done for others; we moved the appropriate amendments and we took our stand about that. It is a matter of record, and those who were here remember it well. I speak as one who was opposed to the generosity of the arrangements made for the MPs, but I think it should be clear, now, that what is being proposed here does not change the basic scale of pensions for MPs at all, not make one cent higher the pension any present member of parliament will get on retirement. All it does is to remove the ceiling on the escalation of pensions for those who are already retired while, of course, it will remove it in the future for any members now here who will at some point in the future go on pensions.

In the main this is a piece of legislation which will improve things, if I may be non-partisan, for persons like M. J. Coldwell, Gordon Churchill and Jim Brown. I mention three people whose names I am sure are well remembered by those who have been around here for a time and I know that in the case of the first person I named, he went out on pension when the maximum was $3,000 a year, for all the service he had put in. He has received the escalations in pension which were provided under the existing act, which brought the pension up a little bit, but it is still a pretty small pension, much smaller than the one to which the hon. member for Hillsborough referred. I am thinking of people like Mr. Coldwell, Mr. Churchill and His Honour Judge Brown—I understand that the latter has retired from the bench because of ill health. I think all of us who knew them are not ashamed that in this legislation we are including for them an escalation of their pensions in January which will be equal to the actual increase in the cost of living, and in the case of Mr. Coldwell, since he went out some years ago, he will get the 11 per cent which will be available to him. Indeed, for these gentlemen we should be doing even more, and I felt, Mr. Speaker, that because some references are bound to be made to this aspect of the bill, I should make this point. I am still sorry it is linked with the other. I think that when we make provisions for MPs they should stand on their own feet and not be part of a package. But what this does is simply add an element of fairness to those who have already retired.

Now, Sir, I said that despite my appreciation of this bill, my readiness to welcome it and not to play the usual opposition role of saying it isn't as good as it ought to be, there are some things which remain to be done—not in this bill, but I hope they will be in some bill in the future. Before I get to that, may I just say a word about the costing arrangement? I have discovered already that some of those who did not like the one half of one per cent are therefore not likely to like the one per cent which is to come into effect in 1977. Still, it doesn't worry them today, because they think anything can happen between now and 1977. This is something I should like to discuss when we get into committee, whether it is really necessary at this point to provide for that increase in the premium to one per cent in 1977.

The more substantial things about which I should like to say a few words have to do with improvements which I think should still be made to the Public Service Superannuation Act and related pieces of legislation. I said a moment ago that one of the things about life is that we never reach perfection, and I am glad life is like that. "A man's reach must exceed his grasp, or what's a Heaven for?"— isn't that the quotation? It is wonderful we have reached the point at which pensions are being escalated by the full amount of the cost of living increase. Wonderful. But it is not good enough. The day must come when pensions are increased by an even better scale such as the wage index or the gross national product. We got awfully close to this when we were dealing with veterans' disability pensions a few months ago, but in the end the government chickened out.

However, it is there, stated as a goal not only by some of us on the floor of the House but in a special report by an important joint committee. This comes to light when older retired civil servants write to some of us and note that civil servants who have succeeded them and who have now retired get a pension higher than the former civil servants got as salary when they were on the job. Many retired civil servants say to me: Doesn't it cost us as much to live in today's society as it costs the ones who retired last year? In other words, they are saying there should be a relationship between pensions and the rate now being paid either for the job those same civil servants did or the rate of pension now being paid. I think the most direct way to go at it is to establish an index based not just on the rising cost of living but on the rise in the standard of living and you can get that in one of two ways, either by relating it to the wage index or by relating it to the gross national product. I hope that as soon as we get this bill through, as soon as we get the principle of escalation by the full cost of living well established, the next crusade to get the cost of living escalated by an even better index will not take as long as this one did.

At some point I think there will have to be more discussion, especially with the representatives of the various public service organizations, about the whole basis of public service pensions. I know that many of the questions which are asked are answerable—questions about the fund and the amount of interest paid on the fund, whether higher pensions could be paid if the money were lent out, and so on—and I know the answers that are given to those questions, for I have heard them so often. But still there is uncertainty among public servants as to whether they are really getting the best pension that their contributions can buy, and I think the least to ask for is a further study of this matter. I think, also, there should be a review of the six-year provision, the provision which says a pension is based on 2 per cent per year of the average salary for one's six best years. Especially in these days, when increases are won a little more rapidly than used to be the case, and when they rise with a little more acceleration, there is an argument for reducing the number of years to five, or four, or even fewer.

I also think a serious look should be taken at the position of widows and at the pensions paid to women generally in the public service. I do not know why society accepts so easily that if a man and wife have lived together and built up their home, and one of them has done the work and the other has stayed at home, the pension arrangement is satisfactory if it provides that if the wife dies first the husband's pension continues at 100 per cent, but if he dies first, the pension for the widow continues at only 50 per cent. Why should it not be the same? Perhaps we will have to work this out and say 75 per cent for each of them, or what-have-you.

I sometimes wonder in these days of women's liberation why there is not much more cry about equality in the pension field as between men and women. Mrs. Bird's committee dealt with this point briefly and drew attention to the fact that men in the public service pay 6½ per cent of their income into the public service superannuation fund whereas women pay only 5 per cent. The difference at the other end is that if a man leaves a survivor there is under certain conditions a survivor's pension. But a woman who had paid only 5 per cent into the fund cannot have any survivor at all, whether she is single or married.

I suppose that any call to women to pay the same percentage as men—in other words, to pay 6½ per cent instead of 5 per cent—would not be met with great enthusiasm by women in the public service. But if something were considered by way of survivor's benefits even for single women, for people whom they have helped support and so on, there might be some interest shown. I am just making the point that it seems to me that we are still living in the early 1900's in our concepts of pensions as between men and women, and that one place where we ought to sort this out ought to be in the field of public service pensions.

As I say, Mr. Speaker, I think there should be equality in pensions between men and women. I think the question of who can be a person's survivor should be looked at again, particularly in the case of single persons, whether they be men or women. And I think that the provision about a widow receiving only 50 per cent pension, whereas if a man survives he receives a 100 per cent pension, just is not right. I suppose this is part of the old attitude that a woman, after her husband dies, can try and find somebody else to provide a meal ticket for her and that the poor bereaved husband has to have a 100 per cent pension so that he can pick up another wife and have enough money to keep her. These ideas have gone and I think a good place for some new thinking about the structure of pensions is right in the public service field.

Perhaps even before we get to the position of equality among men and women we ought to give our public servants at least the same provisions that we give ourselves with respect to our own widows. We have our own Members of Parliament Retiring Allowances Act under which, if a retired member of parliament dies leaving a widow, providing she was married to him while he was a member of parliament, her pension is 60 per cent of what his was or would have been, whereas in the case of public servants' widows it is only 50 per cent. I suggest there is a basic unfairness there. I think it is terribly unfair on our part to have provided a 60 per cent pension for our widows but only a 50 per cent pension for the widows of public servants.

These are matters that have to be looked at. Hardly any of the ideas I have expressed on the floor of this House are new on my part, but apparently we have to keep on expressing them in order to get them considered. I urge that all of the various points I have discussed, such as a new escalation formula based on a wage index related to or on the gross national product rather than on the cost of living; a new look at the funding principle; shortening of the number of years on the basis of which a pension is calculated; the relationship between pensions for men and women, and so on, should be looked at and given very thorough study.

I see we are getting pretty close to one o'clock and although my 40 minutes would take me past one o'clock, I shall conclude before one so that any member who has been planning to speak next can be ready at two o'clock.

I should just like again to put in a word for the recipients of the war veterans allowance. We have to do this every time. Some of these retired civil servants are on pensions that are pretty low. Whatever the reason for that may be, there is no argument that they are low. There are retired civil servants whose pension and other income is such that they also receive war veterans allowance. There is to be an increase in the pensions of those people in January, so here we go again: off it comes from their war veterans allowance, since there is a ceiling in that act.

The President of the Treasury Board will say that this question falls under the department of another minister, but the President of the Treasury Board is a pretty important member of the cabinet in all financial matters. Just as the hon. member for Humber-St. George's-St. Barbe (Mr. Marshall) and I have been urging that steps should be taken by the Minister of Veterans Affairs (Mr. MacDonald) to make sure that veterans get the full amount of old age security and the guaranteed income supplement increase without it coming off their war veterans allowance, so steps should be taken to see that retired civil servants who receive an increase in their civil service pension also get the full benefit of it and not have it taken off their war veterans allowance.

I also urge that action on the Canada Pension Plan not be delayed, that the 2 per cent ceiling must come off soon.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): I am glad to see the hon. member for Hillsborough applauding, though I was even happier to hear the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Lalonde) say two or three days ago that he expects this to happen before January 1 next. He is much more positive about it now than he was earlier in the session.

There must be no failure in this respect. What we are doing for these 100,000 people we must do for all those thousands of people who are participants in the Canada Pension Plan. Escalation of their pensions, to take place in January 1974, must not again be limited to 2 per cent but must be the full amount of the cost of living increase, just as will now be the case for our public servants.

Again I suggest, as I said earlier in my remarks this morning, that one of the values of this legislation is that it establishes a principle—and I think it is a principle that should apply to pensions of all kinds, both government and private—namely that we have to do all the prodding and pushing we can to make sure that private pension plans are also escalated. As I said the other day, I welcome the statement of the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) that the income tax regulations will be changed so that private pension plans that do escalate beyond 2 per cent can be registered. I think the government could go further and say that these plans cannot be registered unless they do go beyond 2 per cent.

Since it is just about one o'clock, Mr. Speaker, I guess I had better draw my remarks to a close. As I say, I welcome this legislation. I welcome it in the name of the people who will benefit from it. I also want to see these other improvements I have mentioned. And most of all, I want to see the kind of benefit that we are talking about today made available to all our people, and this includes private pensions across the board.

One last kick before you get to your feet, Mr. Speaker. We must not forget the lowering of the pensionable age across the board to the age at which it is already possible for public servants to retire, namely 60. Let us make that, on a voluntary basis, the rule for all.

Mr. Speaker: It being one o'clock I do now leave the chair until 2 p.m.

At one o'clock the House took recess.

[Translation]

AFTER RECESS

The House resumed at 2 p.m.

Mr. Gérard Laprise (Abitibi): Mr. Speaker, the debate on Bill C-220 as well as on the old age security bill adopted yesterday and on those which will be tabled next week has been made possible by the railway strike. If parliament had not been called back, senior citizens, pensioners and young people would have had to wait till the end of October or till next year for higher benefits.

Moved by the uncontrolable inflation of prices, to which it is one of the main contributors, and goaded by public opinion, the government is trying to calm the population by adopting measures which are aimed at making tolerable this continuing rise in prices which sometimes swallows up the savings of a lifetime of work. The fight against inflation has been abandoned and, through this law as well as the other social laws which have been adopted or which we plan to adopt in the near future, inflation is being accepted and an attempt is made at following it, as my colleague from Shefford (Mr. Rondeau) so aptly put it yesterday.

These laws will have no other effect than to further increase the cost of living. What we offer today to some members of our society, we will be taking away from those who work, from those who have an income. The government had agreed to an annual readjustment of pensions and allowances on the basis of the increase in the cost of living and the price index. Today, it has to bring the readjustments on a quarterly basis and soon maybe it will probably have to do it every month. Why? Because the cost of living increases more rapidly than incomes. The dog will never succeed in catching its tail, especially when the tail is getting shorter faster than the nose of the dog is getting longer. That is the situation which we are facing today. We get increases in salaries, we get increases in old age security pensions, more generous allowances, but prices keep increasing at a faster rate than these incomes. The net result is that we are further behind than before, and this situation has been prevailing for at least two decades.

The solutions that our governments have adopted since that time have always been the same: they have never succeeded in slowing down the increases in prices, they have always caused further depreciation of the dollar so that the Canadian consumer still continues to have difficulties in making his budget meet both ends. What is the reason for such a mad rise in the cost of living? The reason is that this government has failed to strike at the root of the evil. The government is facing a crisis like the one in the thirties, the difference being that instead of a price collapse we are witnessing a price explosion which has the same effect on the people as well as on savings.

Not long ago, people used to save money so as to provide for a happy retirement, secure from a loss of income at an advanced age. That concept is rapidly vanishing with the loss of the dollar's purchasing power.

As a matter of fact, Mr. Speaker, in the annual news letter published by the Canadian Bank of Commerce, one can find very interesting figures on the economic changes in Canada, especially with respect to the purchasing power of the Canadian dollar. On the basis of a 100 cents per dollar in 1961, the dollar value in 1962 was 98.8 and in 1971, 75 only. That means that within 10 years the dollar lost at least 25 per cent of its value.

So the person who saved $1,000 in 1961 had only $750 in 1971. Therefore, that runaway inflation robs the people who tried to save money, who deprived themselves of certain things during their working years to save money to provide for a more prosperous retirement. The price rise deprives them of their savings and there is the lack of incentives to save.

Contributions to a pension fund, either in private enterprise or in the public service feel the repercussions of the same situation. Some people who work for companies, if they are numerous enough, join forces to ensure a relatively late retirement, still too late given the production facilities we now have. But when retirement time comes, they find that the money they deprived themselves of during 30, 35 or 40 years of work has lost its value. It does not ensure them the retirement conditions they had anticipated.

As a result, Bill C-220 which is before us tends to rectify this situation by pegging the pensions of some categories of public servants so that these pensions increase at the same rate as the continuing rise in the cost of living. But no provision in the legislation will prevent prices from increasing, so that the pensioner is no better off than before. He will always be in the same situation and since the fiscal system is so designed that the taxpayer is taxed according to a percentage of income and that sales tax is established according to a percentage of prices, it ensures that the higher the prices, the higher the taxes from the three levels of government so that the workman, the labourer or the pensioner has to face higher and higher taxes.

Then the situation which will prevail for the retired we want to relieve through Bill C-220 will be one where their incomes will be a little higher.

[Mr. Laprise.]

Since these are taxable incomes, they will have more to pay in taxes and they will not be any better off after having obtained this pension increase and prices will keep on increasing for them as well as for all others.

In view of this situation, Mr. Speaker, people must try and remain at work longer, even though the whole of the economy could do without their services at an earlier age than before. Their needs are growing and the value of the dollar is decreasing. History records the following, and I quote the Labour Gazette of November 1970:

> The life expectancy in Ancient Greece was 18 years. One hundred years ago, in the western world, it reached perhaps 30-odd years. Today, for the whole population of the world, it stands at 60 for one out of 14 persons. In the USSR, this proportion is 1 over 11; in North Amercia and Europe, one over seven.
> But, progress in hygiene, dietetics and related fields have extended life expectancy. Lately, they have even greatly improved it. It is nonetheless obvious that age creates great difficulties for workers because, on the labour market, the age at which a man or woman becomes known as an "aged worker" is decreasing instead of increasing as could be expected in the light of improved fitness and health among middle-aged people.

There is a saying that living to a ripe old age does not matter as much as remaining young longer. And I feel, Mr. Speaker, that thanks to the progress of hygiene and medical science, we have managed to remain young longer so that as people are growing older, the scope of possible employment is narrowing. Senior citizens must often accept jobs that young people turn down because they are relatively badly paid or not so well considered socially.

So, Mr. Speaker, the aged people now find themselves more than ever in a difficult situation. Workers who enjoy a steady job in a firm to whom they have belonged for a great number of years can expect to remain with that employer until age 65. Some will even keep their jobs until they are 70. I know some such workers in my constituency. However, the situation is not the same for those who do not enjoy such stable employment. For the latter, landing a job at 50 or 55 becomes very difficult; they have almost no means and they must wait until they reach the age when they are entitled to receive the old age security pension, which is now fixed at 65.

Mr. Speaker, this bill features a more direct approach to lowering the retirement age of public servants; in my opinion, that benefit should be extended to all classes of society and at least those who so wish should be allowed to go on retirement as early as 60 in the public service and the private enterprise as well. That should perhaps not force them to go on retirement when they reach 60, but at least those who so wish should have the possibility of withdrawing from the active work force with the assurance that they will receive a sufficiently high income to allow them to lead a decent life.

With such a provision, Mr. Speaker, those who have worked for 30, 35, 40 or even 45 years could have access to retirement and should benefit from those things they have contributed to create during their active working life, and I believe that they deserve it.

In the northern hemisphere, in America and particularly in Canada, people are known for their guts and their willingness to spare no effort when needed.

Mr. Speaker, Canada should be more respectful towards these people at the time of their retirement and ensure them a happy life particularly when they contributed to a pension plan as public servants do.

I think the light increases proposed in this bill should be accepted and I am convinced that my colleagues of the Social Credit will join me in voting for this bill on second reading.

When listening to the first round of speeches, it seemed to me that all parties agreed on what was proposed; of course, we always hope to get more, but at least we can be sure that retired civil servants will get a little more than they had before.

This example should be followed at all government levels: I am thinking, for instance, of the workmen's compensation legislation. In some provinces, compensation payments are still not geared to the cost of living. There are people who have been getting full compensation for many years and who are still receiving the same amounts they got when the accident happened. Those amounts are no longer sufficient today and I think that the example given in this bill should encourage governments at all levels to follow suit.

[English]

Mr. Walter Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, I want to commend the President of the Treasury Board (Mr. Drury) for the very short and succinct speech he made introducing what I think is an extremely important piece of legislation for all those who, in some way or another, have served their country in the public service. I am glad that he did not embark on an immodest extolling of the virtues of his predecessor or his own virtues, as did the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Lalonde) recently. Perhaps his conduct in this regard is due to the fact that, so far as the public service is concerned, there are few virtues the President of the Treasury Board can extoll. This may have had something to do with the length of his speech and with the lack of self-congratulation.

The government does not want to take upon itself sole credit for the fact that we are dealing with this legislation. Members of the government certainly are draftsmen of the bill, but if you examine the history of public service legislation you find that this government and its predecessors were really dragged, kicking and screaming, to the point where they finally gave in to what, over the years, were the reasonable demands of public service staff associations, the officers of public service associations, retired public servants and others who have written to people like myself and the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles). As I say, the government has finally given in and seen the reason for positions that have been taken by my party and, for that matter, the NDP with respect to this matter.

The shame with respect to this legislation is that the motive behind it is not primarily to protect the public servant. It is far from that. The government has not acted to save the retired public servant from hardship. The government acted as it has in the past few days just to save itself. That is the prime motivation. For a long time this move toward increased pension benefits for a great number of people who served their country well has been urged on the government by members of this party, the staff associations and other interested people, but the government waited to act until there was a crisis upon the country. From the point of view of motivation the government cannot clothe itself in a cloak of compassion and humanity. That has not been a hallmark of the government with respect to action on public service matters.

This morning during the question period I asked the President of the Treasury Board why amendments to the Public Service Employment Act, forecast in the Speech from the Throne on January 4, 1973, had not yet been introduced, despite urgings from me and from my hon. friend from Winnipeg North Centre. Why has there been this delay? Why did we debate capital punishment for so many days when there were so many things that had to be done, particularly with respect to public servants? I cannot recall his exact words, but the usual answer has been, "In due course these things will come forward."

Mr. Reilly: In the fullness of time.

Mr. Baker: Or in the fullness of time, as the hon. member for Ottawa West (Mr. Reilly) says. Moreover, I read in the Ottawa Journal last evening that the Public Service Alliance of Canada, representing 40,000 of its members, has had to break off negotiations with the Treasury Board on various matters, one of the most important of which is compensation to the public servant. According to press reports the latest Treasury Board offer is a 3 per cent increase in pay for this year and, I think, 2 per cent for the next year. That is unreasonable, Mr. Speaker, and that attitude is breaking the back of free collective bargaining in this country. The offer does not even keep up with the increase in the cost of living which stands at an annual rate of 8 per cent. The government should realize that it must deal properly with its public servants and that is why I say it ought not to clothe itself in a mantle of glory with regard to this legislation. It has been dragged kicking and screaming to this point in an atmosphere of crisis which was, to a large extent, of its own making.

● (1430)

I want to say to the President of the Treasury Board that my party approves of the proposals he has brought forward in the legislation. I think he realizes that, and I think he realizes that the legislation is long overdue. In the time it has taken the government to bring it forward retired government employees have seen the buying power of their pensions shrink, and for many of them their circumstances have gone from bad to worse; they have become discouraged. I have had many letters from retired public servants who had been looking forward to a future of reasonable security but the view has become more bleak by the month.

I hope this legislation is not coming as too little and too late to rectify the situation, particularly for the older ones. I hope that what the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre said with laudable vision with respect to retroactivity, will make the difference so that they may live out their years in reasonable peace and security.

Mr. Speaker, I have to commend the minister for at long last going on his own and not waiting for some change in the Canada Pension Plan. I join with the hon. member for Hillsborough (Mr. Macquarrie) in believing that there is no disagreement that the Canada Pension Plan ought to be amended, and quickly. Surely, there is no reason for, not having provision in the legislation for the adjustment of pensions generally on a quarterly basis. If I read the bill correctly, it contains no such provision. I support the changes brought forward by the bill. We should deal with it today and so ensure that the beneficiaries would not have to wait until January 1, 1974 to feel the effects of it.

If the record of the government in the first part of 1973 has any relationship to the increased cost of living, between today, September 7, 1973 and January 1, 1974 many retired public servants are going to suffer unnecessary hardship and will continue to do so. The standard of living of these public servants has deteriorated over the years and it is difficult to see how some of them have survived. Farm costs have risen by 13 per cent in the second quarter of this year and one does not have to be a mathematician to understand the effect of this on food prices. Milk production has decreased by 6.1 per cent from last year. The annual rate of inflation is 8 per cent and of the seven most industrialized nations of the world we have had the fastest escalation of food prices with 14.7 per cent. Just yesterday we heard reports of further increases in fuel costs, and today it is reported that the general wholesale index has increased by 2.3 per cent. Surely, Mr. Speaker, this action has come too late as a result of the stubbornness of this government. The people ought not to have been exposed to the suffering that ordinary human compassion could have alleviated.

I am very pleased to take part in the debate with my good friend and neighbour, the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre. He has long been the champion of pensions and has advanced the cause of many who were not in a position to help themselves. However, I do not want him to be misled by the kindness of my personal sentiment towards him. If we are now faced with high prices, inflated costs and greater farm input costs, it is to a great extent because the New Democratic Party has been prepared to live with a government whose policies are conceived in ineptitude and born out of expediency. Perhaps that is why in his speech the hon. member did not mention the responsibility for high costs, the difficulties of many people and the ineptitude of this government in dealing with the problem.

I am not sure whether the consumer price index is the proper yardstick when tying escalations to pensions. One would hope that it would remain relatively stable but if the past record is any indication, it probably will not. Perhaps it is much too broad an index to which to tie future increases. The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre mentioned the possibility of using the wage index or the index of productivity and perhaps that suggestion is worth pursuing.

In the bill that we dealt with earlier there was some mention of using the highest items that make up the consumer price index; food, housing and clothing. I would ask the government to consider all these indices when trying to find a way to bring more justice to retired people. I agree with the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre as well, that perhaps there is some question about the investment, use and management of funds held in trust by the government. Many public servants question this. I am satisfied that the government that will succeed the present government will look at this important field of public trust. The position of women in the public service, the position of widows, which was well illustrated by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre, and the six-year rule which affects the calculation of pensions, are important matters. By studying these areas, perhaps we can make our pensions more beneficial to recipients.

There are still discrepancies, although there ought not to be, in our pension arrangements and there is still a discounting of pensions and superannuation benefits with respect to members of the Armed Forces who have retired and have entered the public service. I suggest that because of present salary scales these discrepancies are lessening. It seems to me that a breach of principle is involved in this matter when, in 1973, it is still felt that service in one area of the government ought not to be recognized when the person who has so served his country serves it in another area.

I think injustice and wrong principles are involved in matters to do with the pensions of members of parliament. Let me explain. If a former member of parliament who draws a pension is appointed by a province judge, he may continue drawing his full pension as an ex-member of parliament, which will depend on the length of his service, the amount of his contributions, his rank and so on, and receive the emoluments of his new office. If that same person is appointed to the position of county judge or some other office that comes under the Crown in right of Canada, he cannot do that. Some people may be cynical, but why should there be this discrimination? There is no such discrimination if a person who draws a pension from industry enters the public service of Canada. We ought to accept the fact that pensions, whether from industry, or whether arising from service in the public service of Canada or from service with the armed forces, the Royal Canadian Mounted Police, the Governor General and the other areas covered in the bill, are the result of services rendered. They are earned and ought to be paid. That being so, we should not recognize such service on the one hand and, by a regulation, deny the recognition of that service if the particular person concerned chooses to serve his country and his community in another capacity.

Really, we have only begun to scratch the top of the barrel in Canada in our dealings with pensions. We have hardly opened the barrel. We have only begun looking into the question of pensions. On behalf of the many public servants who have written both to me, to the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre and to others, and on behalf of those who have not written but have just suffered under a system which made few pretentions to equity until today, I join with the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre in extending thanks to the President of the Treasury Board for bringing forward this legislation even though it is done in crisis and as an answer to the economic difficulties which the government has brought upon itself and the country. As I said at the beginning, welcome though these advances are to all those who will receive them, they were not born out of any underlying motive to protect retired public servants and save them from hardship; rather, they were born out of an effort to save this government.

I will not add anything further. I hope we can proceed through second reading quickly and then give clause by clause consideration to this bill.

Mr. Hugh Poulin (Ottawa Centre): Mr. Speaker, it is indeed a pleasure for me to rise after my friend, the hon. member for Grenville-Carleton (Mr. Baker), has spoken as I, too, support the changes the government has introduced. On behalf of the people of this community, and of public servants, may I say that I support the changes brought in by the government for the benefit of public servants, members of the Canadian Armed Forces, RCM Police and others.

Mr. Nielsen: You would be in trouble if you did not.

Mr. Poulin: I think I am voicing the opinion of all members of parliament representing constitutiencies in the national capital area when I say that we all support this overdue increase which is to accrue to those who have worked in the public service as well as other areas mentioned in the bill, and who have retired. Although the hon. member for Grenville-Carleton who preceded me did not say this, I can say that the minister who introduced this measure deserves full credit for the decisive action he has taken. It will be of benefit to many in this community, and to many others across the country. To my knowledge, public servants look on the minister as a leader that they like. They are extremely happy with the manner in which he is acting in his capacity as President of the Treasury Board.

Mr. Baker: You don't read your mail, Hughie.

Mr. Poulin: I hear an hon. member saying, "You don't read your mail, Hughie." I read it every day. I am one of the members representing a constituency in the national capital area who, together with the hon. member for Ottawa East (Mr. Gauthier), has lived here all his life. I have been here all my life. I have known people who are now public servants at all levels all their lives. I have known public servants occupying the lowest, if you like, and the highest ranks ever since their boyhood. I grew up and went to shcool with some of them. I deal with them day by day; and although they complain to me about other things, they say that they are happy about this legislation. They are content and, indeed, proud of the work they are doing from day to day for this community and on behalf of the people of Canada.

Mr. Nielsen: Their happiness shows up in leaked documents, too.

Mr. Poulin: The members of the public service with whom I have had the privilege of coming into contact since becoming a member of parliament have been most courteous, effective and helpful in dealing with the problems of my constituents. It is because of their good services and exceptional work that it is said all over the world that the public service of Canada is one of the finest in the world.

I am pleased also at the recognition this bill gives to the needs of others. Members of the Canadian Armed Forces have rendered a great service to Canada, and retired members of the force are to receive supplementary retirement benefits under the act. The bill also applies to members of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police who perform an extremely fine function in the country. In the last few days, together with the security personnel of the House of Commons, they did something which entailed a great physical risk when they acted on the occasion of the unwarranted attack upon people in the House of Commons last Tuesday or last Wednesday—I forget which day it was. They did an exceptionally fine job and were, as I said, ably assisted by the parliamentary security force, which also did exceptionally good work at a difficult time. They handled the people concerned with as little fuss as possible and are to be commended.

Mr. Nielsen: Whom have you left out?

Mr. Poulin: I hear a voice coming from the other side of the chamber. The rudeness of that voice is becoming more and more apparent in this House and in the committees of this House. I will ignore it. It will not go away of its own volition, although it may be taken away from here in a short time by the volition of others.

Mr. Nielsen: There is an expert talking.

● (1450)

Mr. Poulin: The hon. member for Grenville-Carleton also referred to the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre. Although I did not hear his speech, I am sure his remarks were very constructive and informative. The hon. member for Grenville-Carleton accused him of being in concert with his party. He, in some ways, thinks it is bad or an evil thing to do that. I remind the hon. member that we on this side, and sometimes they on the other side, attempt to govern this country with a sense of responsibility for the present and the future. Rather than from time to time engaging in destructive snide comments, we are prepared to govern and work constructively for the benefit of this community and Canada. As long as they are prepared to work with us, we will work with them. I am under no illusion.

As the Minister of Transport (Mr. Marchand) said the other day, as a political party, they will only work with us as long as it is in their interest politically to do so. In the meantime, I am prepared to work with them to govern Canada and govern it properly. It seems the others are fearful of this. Day by day, each time we move along, we provide something a little more than they expected. The people of Canada are beginning to see this parliament has been made to work by those who have a willingness to see that Canada is governed properly in these most difficult times. These are not difficult times because we in Canada have a unique situation. It is a world-wide situation which is affecting every man, woman and child in almost every major country of the world. I am referring to the high cost of inflation.

It is said that this government is not doing enough. At least we are doing something. We are doing things that are needed today, tomorrow and in the long range planning for this country. Members opposite have not come up with one alternative or one proposal except the vague idea that perhaps they would freeze wages and prices. They have not even said that with any great authority or definition.

I am convinced that the public servants in this country and others will benefit greatly from the measures recommended by this government and brought in today by the President of the Treasury Board (Mr. Drury). I hasten to join with other members, including the hon. member for Grenville-Carleton, in saying that they will benefit these people and will be welcomed by them.

I am sure all public servants and other workers in the national capital area will realize this as an act of a responsible government and responsible employer, attempting to set a standard which should be followed. We are not engaged in an auction. We are not engaged in bidding 30, 34 or 38 cents, as were the other parties last week, but attempting to be a responsible employer and to set an example by these very necessary and worthwhile amendments which I heartily endorse.

Mr. Peter Reilly (Ottawa West): Mr. Speaker, every time an officer or representative of the government, as did the hon. member for Ottawa Centre (Mr. Poulin) just now, rises to speak about the public service of Canada, we are told that it is one of the finest, if not the finest in the world. One is left to wonder why they have been treated the way they have. Why did they have to sit still while the cost of living, caused largely by the bumbling of this government, has steadily risen over the past few years? Indeed, a total reduction of 50 per cent in the buying power of the Canadian dollar has taken place since this government took over 10 years ago.

Why have these public servants, perpetually eulogized by members and representatives of the government as the best in the world, had to sit with their miserable 2 per cent as the cost of living rose inexorably 5, 6, 7, 8 and now 50 per cent? One is left to wonder why at this particular stage the government has chosen to remedy this deplorable situation. Could it have any remote connection with the fact that three parliamentary seats in this area, heavily populated by public servants, both working and retired, were lost to the Liberals in the last election? Could a member of parliament be as cynical as to suppose a thing like that? I do not know, but one is left to wonder.

The struggle for a superannuation plan in the public service goes back a long way. In fact, it goes back to 1924, after a struggle of some six years during which the civil service commissioner of that day repeatedly tried to obtain such a plan for his employees. Even when it was established in 1924, it was not regarded as a matter of right. In fact, in the history of the civil service, entitled, "The Biography of an Institution", the reasoning for the institution of the plan is described in this way:

> It is believed that a superannuation scheme will prove one of the best means of promoting efficiency in the service. No system of classification or improved methods of administration will be operated satisfactorily in the Civil Service until a comprehensive measure of superannuation is in force. The advantages of superannuation in the public interest are apparent inasmuch as it relieves the Government of the embarrassment and extravagance of retaining the services of officers who have outlived their usefulness; creates a proper flow of promotions; renders the service more mobile; deters efficient officers from leaving the public services for private employment where emolument and opportunity may be greater; helps to attract a better class of applicants for positions in the service and in general tends to promote efficiency in every way.

That was in 1924. Today, still grudgingly, the government is beginning to accord to its public servants, whom as I have said before are perpetually eulogized as the best in the world, whose age or disability has forced them to retire from active work, the right to begin to catch up with the rampant inflation which the multiplicity of government schemes have failed to check. We have had measure after measure, scheme after scheme and things have gotten worse and worse, just as the Economic Council of Canada warned they would as far back as 1969 if this government did not attack inflation in a different way.

Not too long after President Nixon took office in the United States, he said he was going to try to fine-tune the economy in order to stop inflation, to which one commentator replied that he might just as well try to fine-tune a flood on the Mississippi River. That is what this government has been trying to do. It has failed. Because it has failed, many thousands of people who gave their best in the service of government have been the victims. But while some small reflief was given, unlike the hon. member for Grenville-Carleton (Mr. Baker) and the hon. member for Ottawa East who has now left the chamber—

● (1500)

An hon. Member: Ottawa Centre.

Mr. Reilly: I mean the hon. member for Ottawa Centre (Mr. Poulin). I am sorry; he is repeatedly being referred to as the hon. member for Ottawa East. Unlike those hon. members, I am not prepared to extend any congratulation to the government on this move. It comes too late. It does provide a small measure of relief, and I am glad of that. Still, there are a great many faults in this bill as there are in the whole retirement scheme for public servants. I shall try to list a few of the changes I should like to see.

There are a few statistics. There are presently on pension, according to the latest figures available, 44,876 former employees, and maybe now another 10,000: the figures for 1972 are the latest I could obtain. There are 24,401 widows of former civil servants depending on pensions, and 3,840 children, bringing the total affected by this bill, within the public service, to 70,117.

The escalation proposed by the government is based on the consumer price index. I believe it should be based, instead on a wages and salaries index. Since collective bargaining in the public service began only some seven years ago, salaries have risen astronomically by the standards of earlier days, and public servants should receive pension increases which would lift them into line with pensions currently offered to the more highly paid persons now performing precisely the same type of work. The same principle should extend to widows and orphans.

I believe pensions should be calculated on the basis of the best three years of employment, not on the basis of the best six, and I believe there should be an end to sexism in the application of the pension scheme. As the Royal Commission on the Status of Women in Canada pointed out at page 110 of its report, there is yet another shortcoming in the Public Service Superannuation Act. I quote:

Under the terms of section 44(1), supplementary death benefits are paid to the widow of a married male contributor. On the death of a married female contributor, they are paid to her estate. A woman can therefore will the supplementary death benefits to someone other than her husband. Since we see marriage as a partnership in which responsibilities and benefits are shared, we believe that the responsibilities of women and men to their spouses should be the same. Therefore, we recommend that the federal Public Service Superannuation Act be amended so that (a) there will be no differences in the provisions on the basis of sex, and (b) the surviving spouse of a contributor will be paid the supplementary death benefits.

I feel this question, in the same way as any other important work condition, should be a subject of collective bargaining; but with a dozen or so unions in the field, even though they do operate through a joint council on some issues, this is often less than practical. However, the present system through which employees and their representatives can make representations to the government is totally unacceptable. The system works this way: there is a superannuation advisory committee whose members, while they may represent employees organizations, are not chosen by those organizations; instead they are appointed by the government itself. The committee may petition the minister for an investigation or for an opportunity to make representations on behalf of retired public servants, but it remains entirely within the minister's discretion to decide whether any consultations should take place.

In place of this paternalistic and outmoded system I propose the creation of a board of trustees some of whose members would be nominated specifically by employees' organizations. Such a board would have the power to make effective recommendations to Treasury Board upon its own initiative. Believe it or not, the present system has been in force since 1928. I quote the following:

While the association met with repeated defeat in their attempts to secure an appeal board or council, they did gain a momentary degree of satisfaction in 1928 with the creation of an advisory committee on the Superannuation Act. In an ill-concealed attempt to quell discontent over the fact that the government was obviously not going to act on the report of the 1928 committee, King's government established the advisory committee in December, 1928. The committee was composed of five representatives from the staff side and five nominees of the government. The associations represented on the committee . . . were picked by the government in a unilateral decision. The committee was to act in an advisory fashion and to report to Treasury Board on matters of a general nature pertaining to the administration of the act, on specific questions referred to it by Treasury Board and on proposed amendments to the act and regulations. Despite the sense of accomplishment and the back-patting which went on in the associations as a result of the creation of the advisory committee, dissatisfaction soon set in. The committee made numerous suggestions, particularly with respect to legislative changes in the act but neither Bennett's nor King's government was prone to accept these changes because they invariably meant increases or wider coverage necessitating greater government expenditures. The dissatisfaction in the service eventually led to the creation of a parliamentary committee on the Superannuation Act in 1938 which in turn produced increased dissatisfaction when its recommendations went unheeded for many years.

So we are still where we were in 1928. The employees who contribute to this pension fund have no effective say in what is done with the money—who should get it, how much should be paid and to whom. It is all up to the Treasury Board, specifically to the President of the Treasury Board (Mr. Drury) who has received accolades today—not the accolades he deserves.

An hon. Member: Explain.

Mr. Reilly: There is really no difference between the administration of this pension plan and the pension plans of any private employer when it comes to administration. The employees have no say at all. The hon. member for Grenville-Carleton, the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) and the hon. member for Ottawa Centre mentioned the mail they had received. I, too, have had a lot of mail on this subject but I will read only one of those letters. It reads as follows:

Why did I vote against the government in the last election? Not because of any anti-French-Canadian backlash, I am sure. I am bilingual by choice. My two sons I sent to LaSalle Academy and the University of Ottawa. They are bilingual and proud of it.

I voted against the government because of the ample evidence in so many departments that, vis-à-vis the bureaucracy, the government has failed to govern. The dog is being wagged by a tail that has quite apparently long since passed its level of competence!

For a horrible example of a pea-brained ego trip you should be aware of the lack of empathy with which the superannuated civil servant is treated, each month. Apparently he can no longer be trusted. Each month, in order to receive his superannuation which he has earned, he is required to subscribe to a declaration that he has not been moonlighting or otherwise working for any federal department or for the RCMP.

I will not go on; the letter just becomes more bitter. I should also like to quote from the favourite political authority of the right hon. Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau), that veteran of the political wars of the Florentine republic, Niccolo Machiavelli. When dealing with generosity he said this:

I say it would be splendid if one had a reputation for generosity; nonetheless if your actions are influenced by the desire for such a reputation you will come to grief. This is because if your generosity is good and sincere it may pass unnoticed and it will not save you from being reproached for its opposite. If you want to acquire a reputation for generosity, therefore, you have to be ostentatiously lavish; and a prince acting in that fashion will soon squander all his resources, only to be forced in the end, if he wants to maintain his reputation, to lay excessive burdens on the people, to impose extortionate taxes, and to do everything else he can to raise money. This will start to make his subjects hate him, and, since he will have impoverished himself, he will be generally despised. As a result, because of this generosity of his, having injured many and rewarded few, he will be vulnerable to the first minor setback, and the first real danger he encounters will bring him to grief. When he realizes this and tries to retrace his path he will immediately be reputed a miser.

So as a prince cannot practise the virtue of generosity in such a way that he is noted for it, except to his cost, he should if he is prudent not mind being called a miser.

I do not think the right hon. gentleman, or any of his colleagues for that matter, has been overgenerous with public servants. I conclude by saying that I do not deny that when it comes to the virtue of miserliness, they do not lack a certain prudence.

Mr. Ian Arrol (York East): Mr. Speaker, there is no simple solution to any of the problems in Canada today, except for the simple-minded. The only ones who feel that they indeed have the solution are those who have referred merely to their own wisdom, uncorrupted by research, consultation or reflection. When one does choose to look into a particular problem to seek a solution, one may start with the feeling that one intuitively knows the answer.

The first thing that you are forced to conclude is that, whereas you did have some inkling of the answer to start with, all you have now is an appreciation of the complexities of the matter and the honest admission, "I don't know the answer".

On further research, the seeker after truth can be comforted from a personal standpoint, although dismayed, on behalf of long-suffering humanity, by the realization that nobody knows the solution. When we come to the people who seemingly have the authority in the field of economics and we have before us three Ph.D's in economics, Mr. A, Mr. B and Mr. C, we find that A considers B and C to be utter fools, that B considers A and C to be utter fools, and that economist Ph.D. Mr. C considers A and B to be fools and entirely lacking in knowledge. And an observer might be justified in concluding that each is right about the other.

But if there is one single idea that has been put forward for a solution to the economic problems of Canada, or at least a partial solution, the idea of attaching the cost of living index to pensions and salaries might well be that solution. Indeed, the government is to be commended for having paid heed to those who would promote such an idea because this is a real answer to fear and to insecurity. With the cost of living increase added to pensions and to salaries, gone is the despair of knowing that you are earning less, from the point of view of purchasing power, each year.

The situation has been that if in 1961 someone were fortunate enough to have made provision in that year for a $6,000 retirement in 1973—an amount which in the year 1961 would seem quite good—he would find that by 1973 his $6,000 was worth about $4,000, meaning almost in a real sense a robbery of $2,000. Generally speaking, today half of the people of the age of 65 in Canada are near or below the poverty line.

We also find that those who are earning today a regular salary, in order to catch up with the cost of living increase and share in some of the increasing prosperity in Canada seek a wage increase. Since they did not get what they asked for the previous time—they perhaps received half of what they asked for—this time they might well ask for twice what they asked for last time by way of a percentage increase. When the settlement comes, in many cases though not in all, those who receive it have a feeling of euphoria, that they have got it made because they are now earning 50 cents or $1 an hour more than they earned previously. But then once again comes despair when the raise is swallowed up by the ever-increasing cost of living.

Automatically adding the increase in the cost of living to one's pension would not in itself have an inflationary effect but, rather, a deflationary effect. If we could be assured that next year the purchasing power of the dollar is the same as today, there would not be this excited demand for more and more so that one does not lose more and more.

● (1520)

As it is now, labour with strong unions are now providing their members with $8 an hour and are screaming for $10 an hour. No more than 40 per cent of labour in Canada is unionized. Some 60 per cent of those who labour for a living do not belong to a union, and of the 40 per cent that do—and that is a generous estimate—a very small percentage are among the big wage earners. However, this small percentage represents the ones who in the name of keeping up with inflation ask for big wage increases, get big wage increases and contribute to a large extent toward activating again this cycle of inflation.

[Mr. Arrol.]

The bill we have before us does not relate directly to wages earned by those in private industry or the pensions they receive. There are some government initiatives which could be taken under this bill. In order to encourage Canadian private enterprises to incorporate a cost of living index into their salary arrangements with their workers, the Canadian government could well attach a cost of living index to the federal minimum wage. There is nothing to stop the government from doing that, and there is everything to suggest that it should, in order to act as an example of what should be done for all.

With the bill before us today the government has given encouragement to those in private industry to attach a cost of living index for the benefit of their members. This is not to say that the only thing required is the bringing about of a cost of living index, or that the workers would not then ask for more money, because increases beyond present wages merely to meet the increase in the cost of living have been a part of the Canadian way of life and should, of course, continue to be. As the nation becomes more prosperous, so should the individual, but not to the extent of society bowing meekly to the demands for $8 an hour for workers some of whom are unskilled now seeking $10 or more an hour in the construction and allied trades.

The time has come for the government, in the name of Canada's long-term survival and in the name of 95 per cent of Canadian citizens who do not now enjoy $10 an hour salaries, to use its influence and legislative power to deny to a few powerful unions the opportunity to obtain wages which make a mockery of the wages received by the average Canadian. These wages unsettle everybody else and force them to either demand more to catch up or to feel despair at what their life experience has taught them: their inability to ever catch up. Nothing is being done to put the lid on extortionate wages and nothing will be done as long as the government is run by an NDP-Liberal coalition. The Liberals fear the power of the NDP to unseat them and the NDP fear the power of unions which are rich and powerful to unseat them.

Short of wage and price controls, the next best measure is to have the cost of living controlled, with initiatives taken by the bill brought into the House today for second reading. Again I would suggest that the government give serious thought to relating the cost of living to the minimum federal wage as an example to industry. This in itself, apart from wage and price controls, might be one single solution that would be meaningful. Otherwise, I suggest, we have a situation where a person is almost robbed by society's lack of concern, through this government, year after year. In conclusion I would commend the government for taking a step in the right direction.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Health, Welfare and Social Affairs.

Mr. Reid: Mr. Speaker, since we have moved so quickly with the disposition of this bill, I wonder if I might ask whether there is consent to proceed with second reading of the bill to amend the Family Allowances Act and the Youth Allowances Act.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): I would be willing, Mr. Speaker, but might I be pardoned for asking whether the bill has been printed and circulated?

Mr. Reid: Mr. Speaker, I understand the bill has been printed and that there are copies readily available.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Laniel): There are copies of the bill available. Hon. members have heard the suggestion of the hon. parliamentary secretary. The bill received first reading this morning and the House can only proceed with second reading now by unanimous consent. I would ask whether there is consent to proceed today with second reading.

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

FAMILY ALLOWANCES ACT AND YOUTH ALLOWANCES ACT

AMENDMENTS TO INCREASE PAYMENTS

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of National Health and Welfare) moved that Bill C-223, to amend the Family Allowances Act and the Youth Allowances Act, be read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Health, Welfare and Social Affairs.

He said: Mr. Speaker, this bill is to effect a fuller reform of family allowance legislation, and I hope it will receive second reading before long. For that reason I will limit my remarks on this interim measure to a brief outline of the intent of the bill and the reasons for it being introduced at this time.

[Translation]

First of all, Mr. Speaker, I should like to put this bill in its proper perspective, that is within the scope of the program which the government has already announced to protect the purchasing power of Canadian consumers. Thanks to the steps outlined therein, we hope to control, at least to some extent, the effects of inflation which Canada, like most other countries of the world, has been recently experiencing.

This bill has been devised to put to better use the mechanisms already available to meet the needs of the Canadian people. Like many other nations throughout the world, Canadians are now suffering the first consequences of inflation, especially in the area of food costs.

The government has already drawn up a program to protect against the corrosive effects of inflation on the purchasing power of all pensions and allowances paid under federal plans. We have already worked out a program to that effect. Old age security pensions and the guaranteed income supplement are now entirely geared to the increase in the consumer price index and the measures now before Parliament will provide for a quarterly increase starting next month.

Payments under the Canada Pension Plan will also be completely revalorized to reflect the rise in the consumer price index, subject to the provinces' approval, as required by the Canada Pension Plan legislation. The new payments will come into force on January 1, 1974.

The House has just given second reading to the bill introduced by my hon. colleague the President of the Treasury Board (Mr. Drury), bill providing for the full escalation of pensions paid by the government of Canada to its retired employees on the basis of the full increase in the consumer price index.

So it is normal that we examine the plight of another group of society, the three and a half million families which are responsible for seven and a half million children and adolescents. No need to remind my colleagues that last July I introduced the reform bill on family and youth allowances. My colleagues will recall that among other amendments the bill featured an increase in family allowances at an average monthly rate of $20 per child.

That program, which was introduced before the House in July and is subject to approval by parliament, will come into effect next January and further represents an important innovation in the field of universal benefits. As every one knows, it grants the provinces the power to amend family allowance rates on the basis of either age or family size or both at the same time, each province determining the variation best applicable.

That latitude is subject to two conditions, that the rate variation be set so the average payment in any province be equivalent to the national standard, that is to say $20 per child per month, and that the minimum for a child be $12 a month.

Furthermore, under this bill the allowances are escalated on the basis of the cost of living which consequently ensures further increments.

To allow the provinces to determine their own variation if it is their intention to avail themselves of this latitude, we set the middle of October as the deadline for them to make known to us the nature of their respective decisions. As for us, we will have the time required to adjust the rates of each variant of our administrative system and with the consent of the House, we could, as expected, begin making payments early in 1974 under the bill introduced in July.

The time necessary to develop the administrative mechanisms and to consult the provinces cannot be reduced further. It would not therefore be realistic, in order to cope with the present situation, to enforce immediately the reform of family allowances. What we need rather are special measures and it is precisely a special measure that we are considering today.

The exceptional increase in food prices confirms the urgency of passing such provisions.

[English]

When one considers that a family of four with an income of above $10,000 spends approximately 16 per cent of its budget on food, while the same sized family with an income of less than $4,000 spends closer to 28 per cent of its budget on food, it is obvious that the increase of 20 per cent in the price of food over the past 18 months will have a much greater impact on the low-income family as compared with the higher income family.

Important as these figures are, they should however be put into perspective. For example, in 1971, the latest year for which international figures are available, we find that Canadians spent as an average 19.3 per cent of their budget on food. The only country with a lower percentage at that time was the United States, at 18.3 per cent, whereas in other industrialized countries we find the following figures applied: United Kingdom, 23.7 per cent; West Germany, 24.2 per cent; Sweden, 25 per cent; Japan, 26.6 per cent; France, 27.5 per cent.

When one compares the figure of 19.3 per cent in 1971 with the figure of 38 per cent for Canada some 15 years ago, one can see that the Canadian consumer has seen his lot substantially improved over the years, and that even in spite of the recent increases in the cost of food the Canadian consumer is still in a more favourable position than is the consumer of probably any other country in the world in so far as the allocation of his budget to food is concerned.

I would also draw to the attention of hon. members the fact that the average real income of Canadians has continued to increase substantially in 1973 as compared with 1972, and I would refer hon. members to the statement the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) made in the House on September 4 as reported at page 6182 of Hansard. The Prime Minister stated:

[Translation]

Workers income and corporation benefits have by far exceeded the global rate of inflation in Canada. During the first quarter this year, the real income of individuals, after income tax, went up by an average 6.2 per cent compared with the same period in 1972. If Canadians have a net increase in income, it is due to a large extent to the fact that the financial budgetary reductions of last February have borne fruit.

● (1540)

[English]

Therefore, in spite of the substantial increases that we have known in the cost of food we have also to look at the situation in its broader aspects to see the total situation of the economic conditions of Canadians at the present time. The fact is that the present worldwide situation has caught all of us in its grip, and given the present rate of inflation it therefore appears to us that even a few months wait would prove a hardship to many Canadians.

[Translation]

The bill before us constitutes one aspect of the strategy adopted by the government to fight inflation. This bill, Mr. Speaker, is the second which I have had the privilege of introducing this week to my distinguished colleagues in the House; it is also the second project to be proposed within the program designed essentially to protect the purchasing power of the Canadian consumer. Through this legislation, 3.5 million Canadian families will benefit next month from a monthly allowance of $12 per child.

It is known that it is not for the government itself to relate salaries to the variations in the cost of living. That comes under collective agreements, and both employers and employees are at liberty to discuss that matter between themselves. On the other hand, we have the power to increase family allowances in order to supplement the salaries of Canadians with dependent children and for whom the increase in the cost of living means still greater financial commitments. As I said before, we have already introduced in the House a bill to that effect when we were proposing to increase the current family allowances up to an average of $20 per month per child starting January next; today, when presenting a bill, we recommend fixing forthwith monthly family allowances to $12 per child and per adolescent under 18.

This legislation thus makes it possible for us to prevent families living on a small employment income from finding it more advantageous to quit working and live entirely on public assistance by becoming recipients of social assistance.

Unlike social welfare benefits, wages do not take into account the size of the family and the resulting financial charges. In most provinces, couples with two or more children receive higher social allowances than the provincial minimum wages.

The working paper on social security which I submitted last spring suggests that an income supplement system be implemented for these people. The development of such a system however requires a detailed study of the political and administrative issues involved and close co-operation with the provinces.

We hope that the work undertaken will be successful and we expect that it will be. The family allowance program is useful in avoiding that the small wage earner be swept over by family charges that he no longer can bear because of the rising cost of living and be forced to live on the fringe of society. This bill brings a temporary solution to the problems of such people.

Therefore it proposes that family allowances be brought up to the minimum level set by the federal government for the general review of the family allowances act and the youth allowances act, namely $12 per child per month. This provision will result in a direct increase in the benefits paid to three million and a half Canadian families, and the amendments contained in this bill to the present provisions will make any person under 18 eligible to family allowances under the existing act.

That increase alone means an average increase of 66 per cent in the family allowances that are now paid to Canadians.

When we attempted to develop an ideal formula to effect the first adjustment of family allowances, we came up against the problem of having to increase them according to the present rates, that is $6 and $8, and in the case of youth allowances, $10 per month.

Now, since the main purpose of that increase was to provide allowances to consumers as soon as possible, we decided on an across-the-board increase, regardless of the child's age.

As a matter of fact, an average Canadian family will receive $30 more from October to December 1973, when the new program will be implemented.

In January 1974, the allowances will be changed once more according to the formula determined in each province. And again in 1974, in each province, family allowances will amount to an average of $20 per month per child.

[English]

Another notable feature of this interim bill lies in the fact that we will not tax these interim payments. It follows that there is a clear-cut increase for every recipient of the family allowance payments at this time and full benefit accruing to them immediately, with a further net increase in January under the reformed family allowances program. These measures will ensure that the maximum amount of purchasing power is maintained for low and middle-income earners alike.

This legislation, following on the measures proposed for an immediate increase in the OAS and GIS payments with allowance for quarterly escalation, demonstrates the manner in which the government is using its powers and its responsibilities under the two universal direct payment programs as one facet of its whole thrust to combat the effects of inflation which we are all now feeling.

With this package we are determined to ensure the maximum value in purchasing power for the Canadian consumer, child or pensioner, low-income, middle-income or higher income Canadian. But the measures I have outlined today are, as I have said, only an interim step. The government continues working to provide the best form of income security possible, and that is a reduction of the rate of inflation itself. In that light, Mr. Speaker, I would urge all hon. members to join me in seeking swift implementation of these measures.

Mr. Heath Macquarrie (Hillsborough): Mr. Speaker, I expected we would have been continuing our discussion on other stages of Bill C-220 and that we might have been able to bring it to its final stage before the afternoon was out. I regret to say that the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Lalonde) who has just spoken did not overextend himself in the courtesy of his notice that we would be moving on to this bill.

When I take part in debate I generally extend to others the courtesy of listening to them; therefore in the present case I did not even have the opportunity to go to my office for my file on family allowances. I had hoped that the President of the Treasury Board (Mr. Drury) would be responsive to the sentiments expressed in various parts of the House this morning and that we would have moved on to the bill that he was bringing to the baptismal font of this temple of legislative action.

I do not want to begin on a sour note, but I cannot help but notice the difference between this Friday and last Friday. Last Friday it was impossible to find out what, if any, measures would be brought forward on Tuesday; today it seems that all available must be processed this day. Having said that, Mr. Speaker, I must say that I am glad that this bill which emerged only today—one can imagine the length of time that we have been given for reflection upon it—at least is not another FISP bill. For that, we may be profoundly thankful. Not only does it lack the inequities of that particular measure but it lacks many of its inexplicabilities, if I may use that inexplicable expression.

I thought the minister adopted a different tone. Apparently he is a different man on Friday than on Tuesday. Tuesday's child was one which leaned hard upon partisanship; today, Friday, he leans on statistics. As I listened to him regale us with the excellence, the magnanimity and the magnitude of this measure I thought of the old saw about the man who drowned in the lake, the average depth of which was one foot. Even without a large staff, statistics can be produced for a given occasion which may be possessed of some appeal.

Since the minister was statistics-bound today, I wonder why he did not tell us what has happened to rents for the people who are raising families in Canada? This would not be such a pleasant item of information. He might also have told us something about the housing situation and the interest rates which are bearing down upon the parents of children. He might have allowed his mind to range as far as the tax on building materials that has been mentioned in this House for many years, and the calls for its removal.

The one "recall" of the earlier performance of the minister is the "You never had it so good" syndrome. Naturally, anyone piloting a piece of legislation through the House wants to make it appear as useful as possible. However, I cannot imagine anyone in a ministerial position, in a country in the economic condition of this one, not admitting the gravity of the situation and the inadequacy of the actions of the government over the years.

There are thousands of Canadians, Mr. Speaker, who never had it so hard. We hear from them, we see them in the supermarkets and on the streets. We get letters from them in our mailboxes on Parliament Hill. These people know: they do not have to wait for the monthly emanation from Statistics Canada to be able to document the problems they are having in providing the needs of a growing family. The cost of education, clothing, housing and also of transportation—all those daily needs are rising in cost, inexorably.

I spoke about family allowances when I last dealt with this measure and how, as an income transfer, it related to the days of Mackenzie King. I mentioned how little has been accomplished over the years in terms of an income transfer to people with families. If I said that the $20 figure was not one which would enable the minister to take a bow for exceptional generosity, I can now say clearly and quickly—even without having had the knowledge that he would be bringing in the bill—that this is not a grand, sweeping gesture of magnanimity. It is not an administrative measure which will relieve the people of Canada of the problems they are facing—problems of indifference from a government, incapacity from a government and maladministration from a government.

I wonder what parents think when they see and hear that vocal lady who is now the watchdog of prices and who tells them not to buy if prices are too high. What comfort! What callous indifference in the face of gripping and growing human need! This morning I asked, rhetorically, why the interim measure had to be lower than the long-range one. I listened with the utmost care to the minister's statement and I still do not understand why. I still do not understand the explanation of that $8 difference. Perhaps later in the proceedings the minister will enlighten us on this shrinkage.

I see that it is four o'clock, Mr. Speaker.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Laniel): It being four o'clock, the House will now proceed to private members' business as listed on today's order paper, namely, notices of motions, public bills, and private bills.

Mr. Reid: Mr. Speaker, there has been discussion as to the business to be dealt with in private members' hour, and I believe there is agreement to take notice of motion No. 26 standing in the name of the hon. member for Gander-Twillingate (Mr. Lundrigan).

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Laniel): Is it agreed that the House proceed with notice of motion No. 26 standing in the name of the hon. member for Gander-Twillingate and that the previous motions stand?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

PRIVATE MEMBERS' MOTIONS

[English]

EDUCATION

SUGGESTED NATIONAL CONFERENCE ON EDUCATION AND HUMAN RESOURCES

Mr. John Lundrigan (Gander-Twillingate) moved:

That, in the opinion of this House, the government should consider the advisability of taking some initiative in securing the collaboration of the provinces in convening a national conference on education and human resources.

He said: Mr. Speaker, since I have been in this House of Commons I have had on the order paper a private member's motion dealing with the topic of human resource development through education. In previous years my motion was somewhat restrictive in that it involved, it could be argued, this House in the area of curriculum development and suggested that the federal government should have some presence in the field of education and in the matter of defining standards, expectations and objectives in education throughout the nation. This year my motion is more carefully worded. It asks that the government do nothing more than consider the advisability of taking some initiative; that is, consider the advisability of securing the collaboration of the provinces so that there might be a federal presence involved in the discussion of education and human resource development.

● (1600)

Before I go any further I might say that I know my motion will be talked out at five o'clock. This has been promised by the Parliamentary Secretary to the President of the Privy Council (Mr. Reid). He informed me of this in a brazen approach. I am not going to spend 40 minutes telling the House that that kind of attitude on the part of the parliamentary secretary is unacceptable, as no member should present a motion for the simple reason of having it talked out after one hour. We do not discuss these motions for the benefit of the media or in order to have them talked out. Moreover, there was a request that I not proceed with the matter because the appropriate members who can talk it out are not present. I suggest that this sort of thing ought to be investigated.

The motion is straightforward and does nothing to tie the hands of the government. I think we all recognize that it is the fundamental right of every Canadian to receive all the education of which he can avail himself so that he may express himself as best he can in social, economic, political and environmental spheres. Every Canadian should be given the benefit of all the human resource development that he is capable of absorbing. The right to a good education is as fundamental as the right to a livelihood, the right to decent housing and the right to an acceptable quality of life. It is not a right which is enjoyed to an equal extent by Canadians throughout this land.

If we had the time to examine the situation in Canada we would find there are more extremes in the field of education than in the field of regional disparities. We would find that there are provinces and parts of provinces in which the educational system is the most progressive in the western world in terms of adequacy of facilities, the use of the school system and the quality of teachers. On the other hand, there are provinces and parts of provinces in which one would find exactly the reverse. You would find little, one-room schools in which teachers teach all grades. You would find schools without toilet facilities, schools without blackboards and without the audio-visual, technical aids that have come to be expected in the larger school systems today.

These are the kinds of disparities one would find in the field of human resource development across this country. That is why I suggest this area should be under the responsibility of the central government, and why, this kind of problem should be considered at the national level. I will give some reasons for saying why it should be so considered. Every economist who has taken the time to investigate the over-all education system has come to the conclusion that there is a heavy and positive correlation between economic development in a region and the level of education in that region. Practically every economist in the world says that in areas where there is prosperity there has been heavy investment in human resource development. There is a heavy and positive correlation between education and prosperity. Economists say that independent of educators, educators presumably having a vested interest in so saying.

At any rate, economists and educators have concluded that if you want economic development in an area, you must train the people in the area and develop them to the greatest potential they can attain. That factor alone ought to be reason enough for the federal government to consider becoming involved in this field.

In this country there is a program of regional development. One of the biggest disadvantages from which we suffer in Canada—this is tied in with the question of regional disparities—has to do with the fact that the quality of education in some provinces is not as high as it is in the more advanced provinces. I spent a couple of years as a student in Alberta. I travelled extensively in the province and visited many schools. I taught and helped in the administration of their school system.

Let me tell you, Mr. Speaker, that it will take the province I represent in this House another quarter of a century to catch up with Alberta, in terms of our ability to spend money on education and bring our standard of education up to that of Alberta at the present time. This is basically because we do not have the revenue base, we do not have the dollars required to give our people the standard of education they deserve.

I could argue in terms of national unity. The fragmentation existing throughout the country could be attributed to differences in education standards as at present our educational system makes it practically impossible for us to exist as one nation. I am speaking of our being one nation in the sense of being a kind of geographic entity in which the people enjoy a common culture, common expectations, a common outlook and some mobility. In these days you cannot move your family from one province to another without suffering tremendous disadvantages and setbacks. These are the result of the different goals and over-all objectives of the different educational structures within the country.

We have ten totally independent educational structures with totally different objectives and goals. I am not talking so much about physical things such as classrooms, different though they may be, as about the parameters of our educational system. Today our people are tremendously mobile, much more so than when those who founded the constitution gave the provinces responsibility for education. In these days the members of one family within a span of 10 or 15 years might live in every one of our ten provinces. That necessitates some common ground in education. These are a few of the many arguments that one could bring forward. One could bring forward all kinds of statistical details.

The Government of Canada has always recognized, albeit surreptitiously and secretively, that it ought to be involved in the matter of education. Yet no government since confederation has had the guts to say officially that it should be involved in education. The government, today, is involved in education in many ways. It is involved in the education of Indians through the Department of Indian Affairs and Northern Development. Most of our manpower programs are educational programs, whether they are manpower training programs, on-the-job training programs or school upgrading programs under which people who have little or no scholastic foundation are upgraded in their education to standards at which they can be trained.

As well, there are vocational schools, technical schools, and so on all the way up to university. One could go down the line and see that although the government is behind these educational programs, it does not call what it is doing educational involvement. Under no circumstances does it say that these are matters of education. The latest program which comes to mind is that involving the Department of Regional Economic Expansion. A couple of years ago, when the government started talking about being involved in regional development, the provinces wanted it to become involved in education. What is the justification for the government's involvement in education?

Governments take an area where there is potential for industrial growth and say that in order for there to be industrial growth an infrastructure must be established. The new word "infrastructure" means water, sewers, roads, industrial parks and things of that nature. Then schools are thrown in as part of the infrastructure. It so happens that when special are designated across the country there is a chance that the provinces can negotiate with the federal government the establishment of schools referred to as DREE schools. I have been advised by officials in one province of Canada that because the provinces have no say over expenditures and no say over these DREE schools are to be built, they cost twice as much to build as they would cost the province.

These schools, by the way, are sometimes expensive and sophisticated structures. Second, they are built in areas where the federal government wants to build them, not in areas where the provinces might think them to be most necessary. Consequently, as I have been advised by people who have been close to this program, the system is not working out at all and there are major disadvantages in most cases to provincial governments involved. I am saying that it is time to cut out this nonsense. Let us get down to basic facts. The Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) is one of the most regressive or reactionary men I have seen in this field.

An hon. Member: Are you serious?

Mr. Lundrigan: I am absolutely serious, and I can give the hon. member categorical evidence to support my view. I have talked with progressive educators across this country who have pushed for federal involvement in education. There were murmurs from the previous administration that there might be federal involvement in education. Then the Prime Minister came on the scene and I quickly discovered his attitude.

During the first few weeks when I was a member of this House I raised the question of federal involvement in the area of human resource development. I carefully used the phrase "human resource development". The Prime Minister was very quick to point out that this was a categorical and clearcut responsibility of the provinces. I have raised the question several times since then but he will not involve himself in debate. Apparently he assumes that everyone from Quebec would automatically start some kind of gang warfare if the federal government ever became involved in provincial education.

I am convinced that no official of the government of the province of Quebec would be unwilling to allow the federal government to participate in the field of education if it were a matter of trying to provide assistance to the provinces to help overcome the disparities in education across the country. I am sure every provincial educator would object to the federal government trying to direct education in Canada. You can hardly go beyond a teacher in expressing direction. Direction in education is what happens in a classroom. That is the only place it can be talked about meaningfully. If we try to centralize education, we will be asking for trouble. We should not try to direct what eventually goes into the classroom. No one wants to see centralization of power in terms of curriculum and what happens in a classroom.

In terms of trying to help overcome regional disparity and giving Canadians an equal opportunity to develop their human capability and capacity, no official in the Quebec government would be so narrow-minded as to not recognize the need for federal presence. I challenge any minister of education in Quebec to say to his people that he would not recognize the need for federal financial involvement, and perhaps the co-operation of other provinces to arrive at some common goals and objectives across the country. Any Quebec minister who would say that would be placing the narrow political interest of his province ahead of his responsibility to the people.

I am convinced the reason we have economic disparity in Prince Edward Island, in Newfoundland, in parts of northern Canada and in Quebec is that there have never been the available educational opportunities to develop the capabilities of these people. People in these regions do not have the skill to develop their resources. I can speak with some knowledge about the province of Newfoundland. Regardless of the programs and finances available for regional development, we cannot take advantage of them because we do not have the necessary managerial pool. Our people have not had the opportunity to develop their skills in all the fields of industrial and economic development.

Other than Montreal, Quebec City and a few other sophisticated parts of the province of Quebec there is basically the same problem in that province. These people have not had the opportunity. I do not say their educational system has not been up to par, but I know for a fact that up to the past ten years or so Quebec's educational system was one of the retarding factors in the economic development of the province.

It would be wise for the leaders of our provincial governments, including Quebec, to accept a resolution of this nature and get the federal government to recognize that education is the right of all Canadians. It is their right to have a decent livelihood and to develop their potential to the greatest capacity. This would help some our poorer provinces which suffer so much from underdevelopment. They would be able to move ahead much more quickly. I do not say this could happen tomorrow. However, if this problem is not recognized today these provinces will be in the same boat half a century from now.

Some months ago the Newfoundland budget was brought down. I cannot quote the exact figures but I can say a greater percentage of the total budget was allocated to education than in any other province of Canada. At the same time, our expenditure is the most inadequate in terms of the need that exists in any province. I believe the figure was $168 million out of a budget of roughly $500 million. Over 30 per cent of the total budget will go into the field of education.

In dozens of communities in my province there are one-room schools with six or eight grades, and some times ten or eleven. They do not have the proper facilities. Some of them do not even have decent toilet facilities and other things that were expected in most parts of Canada half a century ago. These are the extremes. We do have some beautiful, modern schools. We have made progress, but our rate of progress is so slow that by the time we reach one level of achievement the rest of Canada has moved rapidly ahead and the gap increases instead of lessening.

I present this motion very seriously. I think I do so with the blessing of every educator in this country. I recently had a meeting with many people involved in graduate studies in a particular university. I was quizzed about the prospect of federal involvement in the field of education. I did not have a lot of advice or encouragement to give them. I advised them to draft a position paper and ask for a meeting with the Minister of National Health and Welfare, and others who are involved, in order to present the case that the federal government must recognize that a good education should be a right to be enjoyed by everyone. Once people are educated to their greatest potential the chance of economic development is much greater. There should be common goals, with co-operation from the federal and the provincial people. This would improve national unity and Canadian mobility in a way that would meet modern-day expectations.

Mr. Jean-Robert Gauthier (Ottawa East): Mr. Speaker, I congratulate the mover of this motion. The intent of his motion is most honourable. I wish I had the facility to speak in English as fast as the hon. member. I have a bad habit of speaking French. I hope the few remarks I will make on the subject will be understood by the hon. member.

I appreciate the hon. member's point about the mobility factor and the fact that in this wide-ranging country of ours the problems of education peculiar to regional disparities are very acute. Like the hon. member, I have had 11 years' experience on a school board. I agree that educational opportunities are not equal, and possibly a meeting of the nature he suggested would be proper.

I remind the hon. member that in 1962 there was a Canadian conference on education held in Montreal. It is with some joy that I note the co-chairman of that conference was an uncle of mine, Mr. Robert Gauthier. I wish to mention some of the things that bother me, as a Franco-Ontarian, about the quality of education. Ontario is a very large province. We have regional disparities as between southern Ontario and northern Ontario. We also suffer from the problem of educational inequality.

[Translation]

The aims of education are as various as those of society itself because, after all, they are determined by the values the society. The Canadian mosaic enables any Canadian citizen to be educated in English throughout Canada. But it is not possible for the minority French-speaking citizens in Alberta to get their education in their mother tonque from primary school to university, and this is unfair. The situation is about the same in Manitoba, Saskatchewan and British Columbia.

I believe that a Canadian conference on the problem of equal opportunities would serve a useful purpose in order to find, in cooperation with the provinces, a means, a procedure to enable all Canadians, wherever they live, in Newfoundland or in British Columbia, to further their education in their mother tongue, a social and cultural tool they inherited from their parents.

Of course, this problem goes much beyond the present constitution which gives the provinces autonomy in the area of education. I think a provincial conference would be required to ensure equal opportunities to all Canadians in the tongue of their choice.

I should like to raise another point, which is perhaps more important: the Federal government employs some 275,000 public servants, and recently the adoption of a decentralization policy was announced. We do not have any Canadian government administration school designed to train civil servants. I think the development of a school of this type, like the one they have in France, might be worthwhile.

Of course, efforts are being made by the Treasury Board and the public service, but I do not believe they are very successful; the CAP program, intended for a few hundred persons per year, enables them to develop and better themselves and then reach higher levels.

And I am concerned about the decentralization factor, because in order to have a balanced public service throughout Canada with similar standards, we must set up a government administration school. I hope my suggestion will be looked upon favourably in the government administration.

The hon. member for Gander-Twillingate (Mr. Lundrigan) pointed out that the federal government had shown some interest in education. I believe some remedial action is required. One must remember that from 1955 to 1968, the federal government really showed interest in technical education. Through federal subsidies, it enabled the provinces to build composite and trade schools. Such a move was designed to satisfy a Canadian need in the matter of technology and technical sciences, a really pressing need, and the participating provinces obtained federal grants for the construction of composite schools which provide a wide range of technical options and enabled the student to further an education that was formerly considered as possibly incomplete. We know that a technical school was considered as second rate, but it was no more true than it is today. A technician, a technologist is also a first class citizen. It is no sin for a man to labour in his vocation. And not everybody can go to university and get a doctorate or a degree. I feel that this federal program carried out in co-operation with the provinces was successful; it was undertaken under the government of the right hon. member for Prince Albert (Mr. Diefenbaker), more specifically from 1955 to 1957. Millions were spent. Why is it, for instance, that even today it is impossible for our minority schools in Ontario to obtain French textbooks, teaching audio-visual aids, films and slides, all that necessary teaching material? Because provincial budgets are limited by ceilings, and often federal grants to bilingualism are not given in addition to them but included in them, which to my mind is not fair. It is time to put a stop to that practice whereby provinces include in their general budgets federal funds intended for specific purposes. It is also time that the provinces gave some attention to the educational needs of minorities, perhaps those located in areas such as that of the hon. member for Gander-Twillingate and Ontario. Those problems are acute, important; the provinces, in conjunction with the federal government, could sit at the table and discuss them. As the hon. member for Gander-Twillingate said, this motion does not bind the government; it only expresses an intention, a proposal, which porposal I endorse.

[English]

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, in my view there is no argument against the proposition that a Canadian is a Canadian regardless of where he lives in this country. I think it should be a main objective with us in Canada to make sure this is a country in which opportunities for a good life are as equal as they can be right across the land. That is why some of us are such strong advocates of universal programs in terms of pensions and social security; that is why some of us are such strong advocates of other government programs which raise the level of living and other standards all over Canada.

I fully agree with the hon. member for Gander-Twillingate (Mr. Lundrigan) that basic to all this, basic to the possibility of our attaining equality of opportunity, is the whole question of human resources and in particular the equality of educational opportunity. Even though the hon. member for Ottawa East (Mr. Gauthier) did offer the odd note of criticism here and there, he ended by offering to second the motion put forward by the hon. member for Gander-Twillingate and to support the idea that the federal government and the provinces should sit down together and discuss the whole question of human resources and educational opportunities across Canada.

This is the type of motion, I must say, which has been introduced a good many times in various forms during the years I have been here. However, that does not detract one iota from my desire to commend the hon. member for presenting his motion this afternoon. I am glad that thus far we are all in favour of it and I hope that even yet, despite the tradition of what happens to private members' motions in private members' hour, it just might get passed, and in doing so the House of Commons might say to the government: We think this is a good idea, an idea upon which you should act.

Mr. Ian Arrol (York East): Mr. Speaker, I should like to support the motion introduced by my hon. friend from Gander-Twillingate (Mr. Lundrigan) but with some slight difference in emphasis. I feel that formal education is highly overrated. I feel that the idea of formal education for all up to grades 12 and 13 is a failure. I suggest there is no necessary correlation between the amount of formal education a person has received and the worth of that person as an individual or his success financially. Success is not related significantly to the level of education. I hate to say this, but all modern research shows it: success is related to home background. The output of a school, no matter what facilities it has, is closely related to the backgrounds of its pupils when they enter. If they enter school unaware of literature, and so on, insensitive to it, that is, unfortunately, the way they leave.

I believe that this leads to a situation where, by giving everyone a great deal of education, you have on the one hand either woolly-headed theorists or, in the words of the poet Alexander Pope, bookfilled blockheads—and I suggest we have enough of those in Canada in all fields—or, on the other hand, by giving formal education to grade 12 or 13 you have an army of young people who are educated to become frustrated and bored.

The emphasis lately has been on doing your own thing. It is done in the name of the highest endeavour. It is said there must be development to the full potential, and so on. But this often means having people almost literally playing tiddleywinks or doing whatever interests them. As a result of being forced to receive education, and because it is socially the right thing to do, the whole process has been watered down. Now it is not so much a case of students doing their own thing; the teachers are doing their own thing as well, with the result that standards are lost without there being any formalized examinations.

However, I am still very much in favour of the motion because it presents a tremendous opportunity for the federal government to become involved, in co-operation with the provinces, in such fields as giving financial aid to education in the context of work and performance, education for small businessmen, and such things as that. The Canadian Chamber of Commerce in Quebec has become involved in this as a private venture, and it is one that could engage the federal government. For the small businessman who may have been a failure in mathematics at school there is now the opportunity to really learn what profit and loss is all about. I am sure we have all experienced meeting someone who has been an utter failure in mathematics until he decides to become an airline pilot, and suddenly overnight he is genius at mathematics. We should view this question in the context of education for tomorrow.

Through the Opportunities for Youth program the federal government could also involve itself in the encouragement of young people, who have ambition and the desire to get out of the four walls concept and into productive activity, to learn on the job. If they set up a business they could learn public relations, accountancy, advertising and about everything relating to that business.

I recognize that in the sciences it is mandatory that an opportunity be made available to attend university. For those who wish to pursue scientific activities, as well as those who have the interest and the imagination to pursue social fields or the world of literature, university is essential. But we do a disservice to the young people of Canada by trying to force them to enter what they feel is an alien atmosphere, this business of four walls. Something must be done about this and I think what should be done is what my colleague for Gander-Twillingate suggested, which is to get together with the provinces, admit that the situation has not been very good, and find out how the federal government might help finance whatever endeavours result from such a conference.

[Translation]

Mr. Eymard Corbin (Madawaska-Victoria): Mr. Speaker, this is not the first time, on a Friday afternoon, that I prepared notes expecting to take part in a debate during the private members' hour, but in any case, I rarely have the opportunity to speak. In any event, I have not had much time to prepare for this debate which greatly interests me, and that, for various reasons that I shall spell out in a moment.

[Mr. Arrol.]

The notice of motion introduced by the hon. member for Gander-Twillingate (Mr. Lundrigan)—as the hon. member carefully explained himself—tends, no more no less, to ask the government to reflect on and consider the advisability of calling a national conference on education and human resources. Obviously, the motive is most commendable and valuable. There is no question about that. However, as regards the purpose of the motion the holding of another national conference, I suggest that, to say the least, I have some doubts on this matter because we hold so many national, federal-provincial or constitutional conferences which yield such disappointing results today that I have become somewhat sceptical as to their real value. Of course, time and patience conquer all things, but in this case I would say that I have reservations and the hon. member—I recognize that he is extremely well-meaning—has not quite convinced me of the need or urgency to call such a conference.

The debate may be opened with the prima facie recognition that the provinces have the first and last say in the field of education and there, Mr. Speaker, is the end of the debate, strictly speaking.

The hon. member has drafted his motion in broad enough terms for us to be able to talk of the many aspects of education at the national, provincial or strictly regional level, that is at the level of school districts, for instance.

The provinces have obviously had an acquired right for the past 105 years now, an exclusive jurisdiction over the field of education but, through some fortunate shifting, subsidies, special programs established most of the time, if not always, with the blessing of provincial authorities, the federal government has progressively infiltrated this exclusive jurisdiction of the provinces over education.

In addition to that exclusive jurisdiction enshrined in the Constitution of Canada, there is a traditionally recognized academic freedom not only at the university level but also at the school level in the sense that every province is free to prescribe the courses, the programs, the books it considers likely to further the education of students.

Of course, underlying any social structure is the family responsibility. And the Thomist philosophy I studied when I was in college recognizes that the family, the basic cell of society, has the prime responsibility in the field of education. So we must go back to the roots.

We are now faced with dreadful situations. National bodies dictate national standards and want to impose general standards upon the whole of the Canadian people. And this type of system tends not to solve problems but create dreadful situations. I might have time to further elaborate on that before I conclude my remarks.

The fact is that the subject brought forward by the hon. member for Gander-Twillingate (Mr. Lundrigan)—

[English]

Mr. Lundrigan: I said that.

Mr. Corbin: I realize the hon. member said it, but I would like to endorse it.

[Translation]

The hon. member for Gander-Twillingate speaks like one of those tumultuous rivers in which salmon goes upstream—I must admit that I had an opportunity to fish for Atlantic salmon with him this summer, and this is a compliment I want to pay him. He certainly has the gift of gab and he speaks sometimes so fast, he runs like one of the those cascading streams that I have difficulties following him.

Anyway, it so happens that while I was consulting the library, I found some kind of minutes of the second Canadian conference on education held in Montreal in 1962 and to which my colleague from Ottawa-East (Mr. Gauthier) referred a little earlier.

I found it most interesting to learn that people have been talking about the necessity or usefulness of holding a national conference on education for a long time. I can quote this document, the title is: Educational programs, Programmes d'éducation, 1962. It was published by the Canadian Conference on Education. The Canadian Federation of Agriculture had specifically submitted the following opinion, which I quote in English:

● (1640)

[English]

The Canadian Federation of Agriculture recognizes that—

The constitutional prerogatives of the provinces in the field of education exist. Not only should they be respected but they are necessary to give essential flexibility and autonomy in educational policy to the people of the various provinces.

[Translation]

And it is for that specific reason, Mr. Speaker, that I have certain reservations.

And here I sort of go half way with my colleague.

[English]

Yet Canada is also a nation. In the opinion of the Canadian Federation of Agriculture, Canada can, as a nation, properly strive to have national goals and standards that would represent a consensus on basic needs and would contribute to the strengthening of the nation as well as to improving its methods of educational financing and to achieving equality of educational opportunity for its citizens.

[Translation]

I think that in this resolution, emphasis has been placed on the need to develop general financing programs and on access to education rather than on interference in the formulation of programs and the setting of standards as such.

In this same publication, I also noted another resolution formulated by the Canadian Federation of Mayors and Municipalities, which reads as follows. I quote, in English:

[English]

Whereas the school is one of the foundations on which we build the structure of our democratic society—

[Translation]

As for me, it is rather the family, but for the Canadian Federation, it is the school.

[English]

Whereas it is desirable that a high level of education be assured for every boy and girl throughout the nation; and

Whereas the limited field of revenue available to municipalities does not and cannot yield the funds required to meet existing as well as future responsibilities in the sphere of education; and

Whereas under the British North America Act education is a provincial and not a federal responsibility; and

Whereas it is imperative, therefore, that provincial governments be placed in a position whereby they will be able to contribute more substantially to the costs of primary and secondary education:

Therefore be it resolved that the Dominion and Provincial Governments be urged to consider ways and means whereby, through appropriate and mutually agreed upon financial arrangements, the provinces of Canada may more adequately support the local costs of education throughout the nation.

[Translation]

Of course, there have been many changes in our provincial education systems since that resolution was adopted by the second Canadian Conference on Education, but the fact remains and I think that it went to the heart of the problem. In fact, if the federal government gives the provinces the necessary funds to allow them to fulfil their responsibilities and their obligations in the field of education, I think they will quickly come to an agreement and this is the level at which an agreement must be made. We will then have reached the goals described by the hon. member for Gander-Twillingate (Mr. Lundrigan).

I don't see myself at all as the premier of New Brunswick and I have no such aspirations, but let us suppose for a moment that I were, I would see in a very bad eye the federal government inviting me to a conference on that difficult question. My first reaction would be, as it would be for Newfoundland, Quebec, Ontario or British Columbia, to tell the federal government to get lost, to tell them: "This is none of your business, we have exclusive jurisdiction—

[English]

Mr. Lundrigan: Leave Newfoundland out, we are broad-minded about it.

Mr. Corbin: All right; I will come back to certain statements you made earlier about the province of Quebec.

[Translation]

I think that the provinces would refuse to attend or be convened to such a meeting, unless the federal government specified that the only purpose of the conference were to define the means through which the national government could further contribute, but financially only, to the progress of education in Canada, at the level of each province.

They talk of norms—in English, we call them "standards". Of course, as the hon. member for Ottawa East (Mr. Gauthier) has stated earlier, standards vary greatly. This may be the drawback of a free system of education whose foundations are provincial, but this may be fortunate because each region of this country has its own characteristics, traditions and requirements, and education is given first and above all in order to meet the needs of an area, the immediate needs of families and those of the local economy.

Now, I recognize that the Canadian population is becoming more and more mobile and that a 15 year old boy who is now attending school may expect, when he has reached a certain level of technical training, for instance, to move his family no fewer than three or four times before he reaches the age of 65. That is what statisticians tell us. So, it would not be a bad thing if the provinces—and I do mean the provinces—would agree to establish uniform standards so that the student might bring from one province to the other a basic knowledge enabling him to be up to date should his family move for some reason.

Now, on the subject of standards, there is also talk about equality but the imposition of national standards would not necessarily result in equality, for instance as far as bilingualism and access to education in the language of one's choice are concerned. I know quite well that in New Brunswick, as is often said, spoken or taught French is perhaps not of the same quality as that taught in Quebec but we are getting closer and closer precisely because of the help provided by Quebec for the teaching of the French language in our province.

But in New Brunswick we have passed the stage where so-called bilingual education all boiled down to studying French as such. Nowadays in New Brunswick a student can take courses in his mother tongue from grade one to grade 12 inclusive. The province of Quebec also helped enormously our young graduates from New Brunswick colleges by admitting them to its faculties of medicine, dentistry and optometry. That contribution of the province of Quebec to New Brunswick youth is beyond value. Coming back to my hon. friend from Gander-Twillingate who said that the education system in the province of Quebec was quite retarded, I think that it is in great need of a boost, I must say that he is not entirely correct. I am not in a position to make comparisons between provinces. I do not want to make any with his province of Newfoundland. For that matter, he warned me not to make any but I must admit that Quebec universities offer an education whose value is recognized throughout the world and that is certainly being appreciated by thousands of French-speaking people in New Brunswick who did not have those institutions at home and who availed themselves of the good offices of the government of the province of Quebec.

Mr. Speaker, I do not want to be the one to kill this motion. Still, I would like to add a few words. In principle, I am not against holding a national conference on education, but I fail to see what it would accomplish for the simple reason that the provinces are going to put their foot down and tell the central government "Mind your own business!" If you have money to give us, fine, we will accept it, but don't you dare tell us what to do at home. If our constitution were more flexible, of course we could speak of greater co-operation. I hope the Canadian constitution—at long last—evolves to the point where it will recognize that there are some weaknesses to be corrected today which did not exist 105 years ago, especially in the field of education.

[Mr. Corbin.]

In principle, I do feel that, in the case of a conference on the constitution, the federal and provincial governments should try to find common grounds for an agreement on changing the constitution so as to achieve the objectives advocated by the hon. member for Gander-Twillingate; but, for the time being, thinking of it is useless: it is simply unthinkable.

In addition, many an example can be given to illustrate today's abuses in federal and provincial government relations in the field of education. For instance, the federal government has poured millions of dollars since 1971, towards the teaching of the language of the minority, the second language. It grants subsidies to the provincial governments which, to this day, are not required to account for the use of funds granted according to a predetermined formula to which they have agreed.

Fortunately, thanks to the representations made by members from New Brunswick, Ontario and others, the Secretary of State (Mr. Faulkner) obtained this summer that the province of New Brunswick account for the spending of these grants so that the taxpayers may know whether they served the purposes for which they were granted. So, New Brunswick complied with this request of the federal government and from now on for the next fiscal years, it will account for the spending of these sums of money.

Mr. Speaker, I conclude my remarks. I would have liked to do a bit more research. Nevertheless, I think that, after all, I expressed the substance of my thoughts. The doubts that I have voiced are justified, I think, because I feel to see what could be accomplished in the present constitutional context through a national conference on education and human resources.

Mrs. Albanie Morin (Louis-Hébert): Mr. Speaker, some of the remarks made by the hon. member for Gander-Twillingate (Mr. Lundrigan) have particularly drawn my attention.

He mentioned our educational system in Quebec and nearly accused it of being responsible for all the province's problems for the last 30 years.

An hon. Member: This is not new.

Mrs. Morin: It is true that the Quebec system has many faults, but there have been many changes since the presentation of the Parent report and I would like to tell you about them.

In the past, our system included three main categories: the traditional classical studies, the business studies and the technical studies. The greatest difficulty was the fact that it was impossible to go from one system to another. If a youth started his classical studies and failed at the grade 10 or 11 level, his career and his whole life were ruined. If he could not change over to science or business studies, he was through. The same applied to the youth who started business studies; he could not register in any of the university schools and the same was true in the case of the student registering in a technical course: there was but one field open to him: trades or technical sciences.

Then, the Parent Report suggested great changes. Nowadays, the student completes the same courses up to grade eight and already in grade nine, there is a system of options enabling him to choose science or commerce or classics but should he stop somewhere along the line, should he be unable to complete whatever course he has undertaken he may switch to another course and that has been a very great reform. However, we have created the CEGEP system in Quebec; it was expected to be a very substantial reform but I am wondering whether it gave the results that were expected. Today, after grade twelve, students may go to a CEGEP where they still have the privilege of an option system: science or classics. At the end of this CEGEP course, the student gets a diploma but there is something lacking here: that diploma, unlike the former B.A., does not seem to be recognized to the same extent in other provinces. Therefore, there should be an agreement—I am not against the Conference on Education—as to the degree granted to college graduates or as to the prerequisites on the part of universities. I think there is something lacking there.

Moreover, some Canadian universities have a credit system while in others, the student must still complete an academic year. So there is another weakness: should the student fail at the end of his academic year, he must repeat while under the credit system, if he does not get two credits, he can be promoted to the second or third year, provided he registers again in the course, where he failed.

Some Canadian universities have not yet set up such a credit system and, in my opinion, such a reform is called for. Could it not be done at the Conference on Education? I would have no objection, but because of shared powers the provinces have jurisdiction in the field of education, and I wonder if Quebec would agree to such decisions being made along with other government agencies?

Mr. Speaker, it is five o'clock.

Mr. Speaker: The hour appointed for consideration of private members' business has not expired. It being five o'clock, the House stands adjourned until 2 p.m. on Monday.

At 5 p.m. the House adjourned, without question put, pursuant to Standing Order.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Monday, September 10, 1973

The House met at 2 p.m.

ROUTINE PROCEEDINGS

[English]

INCOME TAX ACT

On the order: Introduction of Bills:

September 5, 1973—Mr. Reynolds—Bill intituled: "An act to amend the Income Tax Act".

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Burnaby-Richmond-Delta has asked that this bill stand. In fairness to the hon. member I think I should indicate that the Chair has reservations about the procedural acceptability of the bill proposed by him. I think I should warn him that my reservations have reference to the possibility that this bill might well affect either the balance of ways and means or the financial initiative of the Crown. I am sure that in drafting the bill the hon. member realized the difficulty that confronted him. I am not now, of course, making a ruling on it, but whenever the hon. member is prepared to have the bill moved for first reading he should at that time be prepared to convince the Chair that the bill is acceptable from a procedural standpoint.

Mr. Reynolds: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I shall do so.

QUESTIONS ON THE ORDER PAPER

(Questions answered orally are indicated by an asterisk.)

[Text]

CITIZENSHIP COURTS

Question No. 1,691—Mr. Stewart (Okanagan-Kootenay):

1. How many judges are there in Citizenship Courts in Canada and (a) what is the remuneration paid them (b) what are the qualifications for appointment?

2. What are the locations of the Courts and how often do they sit?

3. Are there any vacancies to be filled at the present time?

4. Are any new appointments contemplated at the present time?

Hon. James Hugh Faulkner (Secretary of State): 1. Fifteen. (a) In the range $14,988 to $20,421. (b) The statute specifies none.

2. Halifax, Moncton, Montreal, Ottawa, Sudbury, Toronto, Hamilton, London, Winnipeg, Regina, Calgary, Edmonton and Vancouver. The Courts sit daily or less frequently depending upon the volume of business.

3. Yes.

4. Yes.

OFY—PORTNEUF CONSTITUENCY

Question No. 1,781—Mr. Godin:

1. In January 1973, under the Opportunities for Youth Program, how many citizens in the constituency of Portneuf were considered as "resource persons" called on to state the priority needs in the constituency?

2. What is the name and address of each such person?

3. Were they consulted by the liaison office and, if so (a) how many times (b) on what dates?

4. Have members of this first group been fired recently and, if so (a) on what recommendations (b) by whom were they replaced (c) what are the names and addresses of such persons?

Hon. James Hugh Faulkner (Secretary of State): 1. While resource persons are not chosen on the basis of the federal constituency in which they reside, a Local Advisory Committee for the County of Portneuf was established in March 1973, and consists of seven members and three consultants.

2. The names and addresses of those persons who were named to the Local Advisory Committee established in March 1973 are as follows: Monsieur Gaston Brière, Service aux étudiants, Commission scolaire régionale, Tardivel, Pavillon administratif, Donnaconna (Québec); Monsieur Hervé Frénette, cultivateur, 34, rue Saint-François, Cap-Santé (Québec); Monsieur Jacquelin Genois, directeur, Polyvalente Saint-Raymond, 400, boul. Cloutier, C.P. 1077, Saint-Raymond (Québec); Monsieur Michel Ingels, directeur, Service social de Portneuf, 324, rue de l'Église, Donnaconna (Québec); Mademoiselle Martine Langlois, étudiante, 3050, rue de la Chapelle, Portneuf (Québec); Madame Yolande Dussault, directrice, Centre culturel de Donnaconna, 245, rue Royer, Donnaconna (Québec); Monsieur Luc Walsh, 105, av. Jacques-Cartier, Donnaconna (Québec).

The following persons are attached to the committee as consultants: Monsieur Pierre Guy, Conseil régional des loisirs, 310, rue de l'Église, Donnaconna (Québec); Monsieur Raymond Béland, Service social de Portneuf, 324, rue de l'Église, Donnaconna (Québec); Monsieur Gaston Frénette, policier, Cap-Santé (Québec).

3. They were consulted frequently but no records were kept of the dates of these consultations.

4. None.

Order Paper Questions

OFY—GRANTS IN CONSTITUENCY OF YORK NORTH

Question No. 2,000—Mr. Stevens:

1. In the constituency of York North, in each of the past three years, how many applications were received for OFY grants and for each year, what were the aggregate amounts requested in the applications?

2. How many of the applications were approved and what were the aggregate amounts so approved in each of the three years?

3. What was the actual amount dispersed in each year including the amount dispersed to date in the current year?

4. Were there applicants approved in the current year who were also successful applicants in one or more of the previous years and, if so, how many were there and what were the aggregate amounts involved in each of the years?

5. How many jobs were created in the constituency in each of the years through implementation of OFY projects?

Hon. James Hugh Faulkner (Secretary of State): 1. Statistics on applications submitted for funding are available on a provincial basis, and not by constituency, for 1972 and 1973 only.

2. A list of all projects funded under the 1971 Opportunities for Youth Program has been completed. Projects are classified by province and type, and in order of project number, not by constituency. Information includes the project title, a short description of the project activities, amount of the grant, number of participants, and the name and address of the project representative. A list of all projects funded under the 1972 Opportunities for Youth Program has been completed. Projects are classified by province and in alphabetical order of the towns and cities in which the projects were carried out, not by constituency. Information includes the project title and number, a short description of the project activities, amount of the grant, number of participants and the name and address of the project representative. This 421 page listing can be obtained from the Secretary of State Department. A similar list of all projects funded under the 1973 Opportunities for Youth Program is being compiled.

3. See answer to Part 2.

4. No tabulated records exist for OFY applicants approved in the current year who were also successful applicants in one or more of the previous years.

5. See answer to Part 2.

OFY—GRANTS IN CONSTITUENCY OF PEEL-DUFFERIN-SIMCOE

Question No. 2,001—Mr. Stevens:

Order Paper Questions

CANADIAN RECIPIENTS OF ROYAL HONOURS

Question No. 2,355—Mr. Coates:

Are accurate lists of living Canadian recipients of Royal Honours maintained and (a) if so, by what department and are they available to the public (b) if not, for what reason?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Records have been kept of the names of Canadian recipients of orders and decorations conferred by the Sovereign, extending back over many years. Whenever information comes to hand about the decease of holders of such honours, the records are amended but deaths are often not reported nor found in obituary notices. Hence, the records are necessarily incomplete. (a) Until 1972, records of honours were kept by the Secretary of State Department but are now held in the Honours Secretariat, Government House. Information is supplied to the public in response to specific inquiries concerning holders of these honours. (b) See answer to part (a).

CONSULTATIONS BETWEEN MOT AND PROVINCIAL GOVERNMENTS—GROS MORNE NATIONAL PARK

Question No. 2,455—Mr. Marshall:

1. Has any consultations taken place between the Department of Indian Affairs and Northern Development and the Department of Transport to provide for the influx of tourists which will take place as a result of the establishment of the Gros Morne National Park in the Province of Newfoundland and, if so, what action has been taken?

2. Has any consultation taken place between the federal and provincial governments as to future needs of harbour development in the Gros Morne National Park area and, if so, what action has been taken?

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): (1) The Department has not been in consultation with the Ministry of Transport. Parks Canada will be providing interim camping and picnic facilities to meet tourist needs while permanent facilities are being developed.

2. Consultation has taken place regarding the landing areas and associated staging facilities within the boundaries of the proposed National Park. Parks Canada will maintain these areas and facilities and will consult with local fishermen regarding any necessary improvement.

MARITIME COMMAND—HYDROFOILS

Question No. 2,502—Mr. Bawden:

1. In light of the recent contract for $42.6 million awarded to the Boeing Co. by the U.S. Navy to construct hydrofoil ships for use by NATO, were the Canadian Forces ever approached to use the hydrofoil now in dry dock in Halifax for such purposes?

2. In light of the need by NATO for such hydrofoils, is any consideration being given to recommencing the hydrofoil construction program?

3. What are the names of the leading engineers who worked on the design team that built the Canadian hydrofoil?

4. To the knowledge of the government, with what companies are the above engineers now employed?

Hon. James Richardson (Minister of National Defence): 1. The contract referred to is for a Patrol (Hydrofoil (Missile) boat which is part of a three-nation (Italy, Germany and the United States) program within NATO. In 1970-71 Canada was one of the contenders to provide such a craft based on the HMCS Bras d'Or design but the U.S. craft was chosen because of its lower cost. While considering the gun/missile boat program NATO nations also looked into the use of hydrofoils as anti-submarine craft. HMCS Bras d'Or was offered as a test platform for a NATO project group. While some six nations expressed interest none have agreed to supply the funds required for such a program.

2. Not at this time.

3. Messrs. F. H. Buller, J. R. Uffen, R. W. Becker, B. V. Davis, G. L. Oates, S. Morita and M. J. Callow.

4. All of the above engineers are employed by the DeHavilland Aircraft Company of Canada Limited in Toronto except Mr. B. V. Davis who is with Hydronautics Research and Consultants Limited in Halifax.

QUESTIONS PASSED AS ORDERS FOR RETURNS

BEER AND ALCOHOL ADVERTISING

Question No. 2,070—Mr. Carter:

1. Does the government regulate beer and alcohol advertising on radio and television?

2. How much money was spent on such advertising in each of the past five years by the government?

3. If the government does not regulate such advertising, does it intend to do so, and if not, for what reasons?

4. Has the CRTC studied, is it studying, or will it study the possibility of banning alcohol and beer advertising and, if not, for what reasons?

5. Does the government intend to issue directives in this respect?

6. How many (a) automobile accidents (b) deaths, have occurred in each of the past five years in which alcohol was involved?

7. What is the established percentage of mental patients in hospitals, psychiatric wards, and medical and surgical wards whose presence there is related to alcohol?

8. What is the estimated percentage of arrests caused by alcohol?

9. What is the federal expenditure on promotion of alcohol and beer?

Return tabled.

POST OFFICE DEPARTMENT—PURCHASE OF STEP VANS

Question No. 2,480—Mr. Dinsdale:

1. (a) How many new step vans have been purchased by the Post Office Department (b) where and in what numbers are these vans located?

2. To whom was the contract awarded and what were the competing bids?

3. Was there consultation with (a) the Postal Union (b) the Letter Carriers Union before the decision was taken to purchase the vehicles and, if so (i) on what date did the consultations take place (ii) with whom (iii) did the unions approve of the decision?

4. Have there been any complaints about the vehicles and, if so (a) what is the nature of the complaints (b) from what source did they originate?

Return tabled.

GROS MORNE NATIONAL PARK

Question No. 2,541—Mr. Marshall:

1. What jobs will be available in the Department of Indian Affairs and Northern Development in connection with the Gros Morne National Park?

2. What are the necessary qualifications for each of the jobs?

3. Has consultation with the Department of Manpower and Immigration taken place with regard to the provision of manpower retraining courses for applicants for the jobs and, if so, what action has been taken?

4. Has consultation taken place between the federal and provincial governments to ensure that residents of the area will be given every opportunity to acquire these jobs and, if so, what action has been taken?

5. Will the jobs available under federal jurisdiction be subject to Public Service Regulations?

6. Will the jobs available be subject to language requirements under the Official Languages Act?

7. Will concessions in the park be under the jurisdiction of the Department of Indian Affairs and Northern Development and, if so, how will they be advertised?

8. What are the conditions which applicants for concessions in the park will have to fulfil?

9. Will service by concessionnaires have to be provided under the terms of the Official Languages Act and, if so, what are these terms?

Return tabled.

Mr. Cossitt: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. I respectfully refer the parliamentary secretary to order paper questions Nos. 2,271 to 2,280 inclusive which ask for the names of lawyers on the list maintained by the government of those selected and approved to do government legal work. I first asked for this information by order paper questions about five months ago in early April, and when the requested information was not forthcoming in the answers I again sought the information by means of the order paper questions to which I draw attention today because they have remained on the order paper unanswered for almost three months.

This is the third or fourth time I have risen on a similar point of order and asked for some indication from the parliamentary secretary of when answers will be forthcoming. I have been given no valid reason so far why this information has not been furnished. I conclude by saying that surely the parliamentary secretary must be by now in a position to indicate to the House when these answers will be given. Anything else can only indicate questionable skeletons in the government's pork barrel legal closet.

Mr. Clark (Rocky Mountain): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker, I should like to draw the attention of the parliamentary secretary to starred question No. 2,346 which has been on the order paper in my name since June 21, 2½ months ago. It asks for the names and lines of responsibility of any staff that might be accountable to the Minister of State in charge of multiculturalism, if indeed he has any staff.

ENERGY

GASOLINE PRICE INCREASE IN MONTREAL—POSSIBILITY OF ROLL-BACK—INVESTIGATION BY COMBINES BRANCH

Mr. Lincoln M. Alexander (Hamilton West): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the right hon. Prime Minister dealing with the combines investigation going on in Montreal as a result of the 2½ cents per gallon increase in the price of gasoline. Is the Prime Minister now in a position to advise the House whether the government is requesting a roll-back in the 2½ cents per gallon increase in the price of gasoline by the 500 Montreal service stations and, if so, will a statement be made in this regard in the very near future?

● (1410)

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, I am advised that as a result of an apparently collective decision by the retailers in the Montreal area there has been an increase, or proposed increase, at the retail level. As I indicated to the House last week, we do not have jurisdiction to control prices at the retail level, but jurisdiction does exist, of course, against any collusive arrangements resulting in any unreasonable or unjustified increases in price. It is on the basis of the Combines Investigation Act that action has been taken. The Combines Investigation Act does not include the power to roll prices back without due judicial proceedings.

ALLEGED ORDER TO GULF STATIONS IN WINNIPEG TO INCREASE GASOLINE PRICES

Mr. Lincoln M. Alexander (Hamilton West): Mr. Speaker, let me go to another area, seeing that the government is prepared to allow things to stay as they are. Can the minister advise me whether he is aware of the fact that in Winnipeg non-independent Gulf stations were ordered to increase gasoline prices by as much as four cents per gallon? Has the minister contacted Gulf in this regard and has he requested Gulf to roll back that increase?

Hon. Donald Macdonald (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, I was in touch with Gulf this morning and was advised that the Canadian Press report was not a factual report.

REPRESENTATIONS BY GOVERNMENT TO OIL COMPANIES AGAINST RETAIL GASOLINE PRICE INCREASES

Mr. Lincoln M. Alexander (Hamilton West): Mr. Speaker, my last supplementary is this: In view of the concern that has been registered by everyone with respect to the increases by retailers, has the government made any direct representations to the major oil companies about holding the line on retail gasoline prices? If so, what has been their response?

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, given the structure of the industry and the fact that in a very substantial number of cases the retail level is determined by independent operators, the companies have taken the position that while they can have some control upstream, if you like, from the retail level, they cannot control the retail level itself, as, indeed, I pointed out to the House last week.

GASOLINE PRICE INCREASES—POSSIBILITY OF WIDER POWERS FOR PRICES REVIEW BOARD

Mr. Cyril Symes (Sault Ste. Marie): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a supplementary question to the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources. In light of the increases in gasoline prices proposed in western and eastern Canada, is the minister considering giving wider powers to the Prices Review Board in order that gasoline may be investigated?

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, as I pointed out, the report that the hon. member for Hamilton West referred to respecting western Canada apparently is not an accurate report. With regard to the Montreal situation, a combines inquiry is in process. As to whether the powers of the board would be increased, I would have to take that under advisement. That, of course, would not be my decision.

OIL—REQUESTED ABOLITION OF OTTAWA VALLEY LINE PENDING POSSIBLE EXTENSION OF PIPELINE TO MONTREAL

Mr. Cyril Symes (Sault Ste. Marie): Mr. Speaker, may I ask another supplementary further to the question of oil and the proposed pipeline to eastern Canada. Pending the decision on the construction of an oil pipeline to Montreal, is the government prepared to remove the Ottawa Valley line and permit the movement of western Canadian oil or offshore oil by truck and boat past the Ottawa Valley so that real competition ensues and the consumer benefits from lower prices?

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resource): Mr. Speaker, I should point out to the hon. member that the direction of lower prices has been reversed from east to west to west to east and, in fact, over one million barrels of crude moved last week from the Ontario region into the Montreal refinery market.

PROPOSED EXTENSION OF PIPELINE FROM TORONTO TO MONTREAL—GOVERNMENT POSITION IN LIGHT OF OPPOSITION BY QUEBEC PREMIER

Mr. Eldon M. Woolliams (Calgary North): Mr. Speaker, may I ask a supplementary question. As Premier Bourassa is now opposed to the building of a pipeline from Toronto to Montreal, has the government now withdrawn the idea of constructing that pipeline as announced last week by the Prime Minister?

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, I will be seeing representatives of the Quebec government this week, as, indeed, I will be seeing representatives of the Alberta government, for the purpose of discussing this matter. The basic position I have taken with the Quebec government is that if they can provide absolute assurance as to security and price in the Montreal market we will indeed reconsider the decision.

Mr. Woolliams: Mr. Speaker, may I direct a supplementary question to the Prime Minister. As the premier has stated openly and frankly that he is opposed to the building of the pipeline, may I ask the Prime Minister whether there was any thought of consultation and was there any consultation between the government and the province of Quebec before the announcement was made, and has that project now been withdrawn, as the national media have told the Canadian people?

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): Mr. Speaker, there were indeed consultations with Quebec officials, although not with Premier Bourassa, last July as a result of the energy analysis in which the security situation in the Montreal market and the Montreal pipeline were discussed. As I have indicated, the project remains the only really viable way of protecting the Montreal market unless the Quebec government can show absolutely that it will be protected by international contract. We will wait to see that.

Mr. David Lewis (York South): Mr. Speaker, I wish to address a question to the Prime Minister on the same subject. He may see fit to answer it instead of leaving it to the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources. It was the Prime Minister who made the statement last Tuesday. As I read the statement and listened to him, he made a firm statement that the oil pipeline will be extended to Montreal. Is that still the policy of the government or has there been any change in policy since last Tuesday?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, the answer I would give would be exactly the same as that just given by the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources.

Mr. Lewis: May I ask the Prime Minister or the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources, either in a brief reply now or in a statement on motions, to inform the House exactly when consultations with the Quebec government took place before last Tuesday, what was the nature of those consultations, and what was the nature of any agreement, if an agreement was reached?

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): Mr. Speaker, I referred to that in a previous answer. There were discussions on the subject in July. I think it is fair to say the position of the Quebec government is consistent with its present position, namely, that it was opposed to an extension into Montreal. We felt there was not sufficient evidence that Montreal could be protected in the position they have shown. I think it is also fair to say they have taken that position publicly since then.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The Chair will recognize the hon. member for York South on the last supplementary for the moment in any event so it can recognize the hon. member for Champlain . . .

[Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale).]

[Translation]

. . . and complete the first round of questions. We will then return to this matter if hon. members want to do so. For the moment, the hon. member for York South (Mr. Lewis) can ask his second supplementary question.

Mr. Lewis: Thank you, Mr. Speaker.

[English]

My supplementary is for either the Prime Minister or the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources. In view of the fact the Quebec government made it clear in July that it was opposed to the idea of a pipeline to Montreal, and in view of the statement by the Prime Minister that the federal government intended to build one, what change has there been in the situation to justify the minister reneging on the statement made by the Prime Minister?

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): Mr. Speaker, I would point out that the statement made the other day was subject to discussions with the province and with industry.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): As we pointed out, the purpose of building a pipeline would be to protect the Montreal market in relation to security and cost. If they can achieve that by international agreement, I would agree that the concept should again be reviewed. However, at the moment they have shown us no evidence whatsoever that they can protect their position, both from a security and cost standpoint, in light of international events.

PROPOSED EXTENSION OF OIL PIPELINE TO MONTREAL—DISCUSSION BETWEEN OTTAWA AND QUEBEC

Mr. René Matte (Champlain): Mr. Speaker, I should like to put to the Prime Minister a specific question arising from those of the previous speakers.

Could he tell us whether he has met recently the Quebec premier or exchanged correspondence with him in connection with the federal project promoting the construction of a pipeline to carry western oil to Quebec?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): No, Mr. Speaker. As the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources has just indicated to the House, the discussions were held between his employees and provincial officials.

PROPOSED EXTENSION OF OIL PIPELINE TO MONTREAL—POSITION OF QUEBEC

Mr. René Matte (Champlain): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary.

Could the Prime Minister or the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources indicate to the House whether the Quebec government formally voiced its disagreement in connection with that policy announced last Tuesday by the Prime Minister?

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, I have just indicated that the Quebec government did so in July and again last week.

GRAIN

DOMESTIC WHEAT—ADDITIONAL INCREASE IN PRICE TO WESTERN PRODUCERS—REQUEST FOR EXPLANATION

Mr. Jack Murta (Lisgar): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the minister responsible for the Wheat Board arising from the statement he made over the week-end, one which has given rise once again to confusion among those engaged in the grain industry, particularly in western Canada. Could the minister explain the reasoning behind the additional 50-cent increase which he announced and which has been offered, really, to western producers to sweeten the pot?

Mr. Speaker: Perhaps the hon. member would rephrase the question. When a member asks a minister to explain the reasoning behind a decision he is really asking him to make a statement on motions. Maybe that is what the hon. member wishes to do. On the other hand, it may be he wishes to put the question in other terms.

Mr. Murta: I will rephrase my question. I should like to ask the minister why he considered it necessary to make this announcement concerning the additional 50-cent increase in Regina on the weekend and not in the House? To my knowledge, to this date he has never made a statement to the House.

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Justice): I hope to take the opportunity of the debate on the subject matter which will shortly be before the House to make a more elaborate statement this afternoon. The exact levels in relation to an agreement on prices for domestic wheat were subject to further discussions with farm leaders as well as with the Wheat Board. Those discussions took place in Winnipeg and Regina on Friday.

Mr. Murta: Will the proposed ceiling and floor the minister has talked about be in effect for the seven years he has mentioned in the House? Further, will the measures he proposes be brought in by way of legislation and, if so, when will such legislation be brought down?

Mr. Lang: Mr. Speaker, I would wish to discuss the matter further with my colleagues, particularly with the President of the Privy Council, in connection with the precise timing, but I believe a portion, at least, of the stated policy should be established by legislative enactment. I would hope we might find a relatively early period in the somewhat full parliamentary schedule when this could be done.

Mr. Murta: I should like to ask one further supplementary arising from the events of the past few days. Why does the government consider it necessary for one segment of the economy to subsidize the total economy, which is what the hon. gentleman's proposals would mean?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. A question asked in those terms is not in order.

WHEAT—REQUEST THAT INITIAL PAYMENT BE INCREASED IN LIGHT OF HIGHER DOMESTIC AND EXPORT PRICES

Mr. Paul Yewchuk (Athabasca): Mr. Speaker, I have a further question to the minister responsible for the Wheat Board. Since the hon. gentleman has announced a higher price for domestically used wheat, and since the price on the international market is better than it has been, will he consider increasing the initial payment to farmers on wheat?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Justice): The Wheat Board will, no doubt, be considering its over-all policy throughout the year with regard to the interim payments at least, even if it might not be appropriate to change the initial payment at this stage.

DURUM WHEAT—ASSURANCE THAT BENEFITS OF SUBSIDY WILL BE PASSED ON TO CONSUMERS OF PRODUCTS

Mr. A. P. Gleave (Saskatoon-Biggar): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the minister a question with regard to his policy concerning the pricing of Durum wheat, a policy which means that at present prices the producers wll be subsidizing the domestic market to the tune of three or four dollars a bushel. Has the minister held discussions with the processors and manufacturers of pasta and other products of Durum, and has he received definite assurances from them that the benefits of subsidy will be passed on to the consumer?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Justice): I did not enter into discussions directly with those manufacturers. The over-all pricing practices certainly relate the prices of these products to the price being charged for wheat. I might add that I take issue with the hon. member's suggestion that there is something in the order of a $3 differential. The actual differential from the world selling price is certainly significantly less than that figure. Of course, in neither case is it a subsidy by the producers involved because what the producers are getting is a firm seven-year assurance as to the floor, which seems to me to be extremely good business for them in return for some limit at the ceiling now when prices are at record level.

Mr. Gleave: Mr. Speaker, I do not want to offend the rules of the House by entering into a debate, but I respectfully suggest that the actions of the minister come close to causing me to do so in that he has refused to make a statement to the House as to policy. As a final supplementary I would ask the minister when the government is going to be able to assure the House that in protecting the interests of the consumer it is not merely tying the producer down to a price that will assure excess profits for the manufacturers and processors of Durum wheat.

Mr. Speaker: The right hon. member for Prince Albert.

Oral Questions

DOMESTIC WHEAT—SUBSIDY TO MILLERS—EFFECT ON WESTERN FARMERS

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prince Albert): Mr. Speaker, since the House has had a variety of explanations from the minister concerning this matter I should like to find out whether or not this is the final one. Three weeks ago it was stated that there was a reduction in the subsidy to millers from $1.04 a bushel to $1. The next step was an increase from $1 to $1.25 and then it went up to $1.75. Now we have a revised version, not given in parliament but in Regina or Winnipeg. Would the minister say whether or not under this latest plan the farmers of western Canada will actually be subsidizing consumers to the extent of 72 cents a bushel?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, the latest world price for wheat that I know of is $5.62 a bushel, so there is no relationship between the hon. member's figure and any other. The policy of the government has been to try to work toward orderly marketing of both domestic and international grain. I know that at least some of the colleagues of the right hon. gentleman would agree that if we could get a $3.25 to $5 international grains arrangement we would be doing very well indeed and the producers would be very happy with that. The government has introduced this form of price level for a seven-year period for domestic wheat, that 10 per cent or so over which we have some control. At the same time, because of the rapid recent rise in prices and the importance of bread in the diet, we have introduced a consumer subsidy which will be in the order of about $100 million.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, the simplicity of the question required a simple answer. Is it not a fact that under the revised scheme, which is a revision of a revision of a revision, the western farmer will be taken for a ride to the extent of subsidizing every bushel of wheat used in Canada for flour to the tune of 72 cents?

Mr. Lang: Mr. Speaker, the answer is no; the right hon. gentleman is entirely incorrect.

Mr. Diefenbaker: A further supplementary, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker: The Chair will recognize the right hon. gentleman and then I would hope to recognize the hon. member for Cape Breton-The Sydneys.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, if I am wrong I want to be corrected, but I want the truth, not the antithesis of the truth. What is the reduction in amount that each and every farmer will receive per bushel for wheat consumed in Canada under the revised version that has now been produced? I want to know how many cents per bushel. Is that too difficult?

Mr. Lang: Mr. Speaker, I should like to remind the right hon. gentleman that the floor of $3.25 is about $1.25 higher than the best average price ever received for wheat by the Canadian Wheat Board.

Mr. Nielsen: Answer the question.

[Mr. Speaker.]

Mr. Lang: This will offer very significant protection to producers, to such an extent that the Canadian Wheat Board has preferred this protection for seven years rather than five.

Mr. Diefenbaker: The statement of the minister is completely misleading.

CANADIAN COASTGUARD

REQUEST FOR RECONSIDERATION OF PROPOSED TRANSFER OF COLLEGE FROM CAPE BRETON

Mr. Robert Muir (Cape Breton-The Sydneys): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Transport. In view of the fact that negotiations between the Canadian Coastguard College and St. Francis Xavier University over the past two years have led to approval in principle of the establishment of a degree in navigational science, is the minister reconsidering the transfer of the Coastguard College academic programs from Cape Breton?

• (1430)

Hon. Jean Marchand (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, we have different proposals before us which we are studying now, but in none of those proposals will the Coastguard College at Sydney be degraded in one way or another in terms of numbers or quality of teaching.

Mr. Muir: This is an old song up to the present time, but time will tell. Has the minister indicated when he will be available to meet the delegation from Cape Breton on the retention and expansion of the Coastguard College on Cape Breton Island and, if so, on what date will such meeting take place?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Perhaps the minister might reply briefly to the question. The hon. member for Cape Breton-The Sydneys will, I am sure, appreciate that the question is hardly in order but, the question having been asked, the minister should be given an opportunity to reply.

Mr. Marchand (Langelier): I will check my agenda and tell the hon. member tomorrow.

Mr. Muir: I rise on a point of order. I hesitate to disagree with you, Mr. Speaker, because you are generally right, but I think it is most important that we in Cape Breton know whether the minister is willing to give us a few moments of his time in which to plead our case as he is trying to remove the Coastguard College from Cape Breton Island to possibly Ottawa or Cornwall.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. If the minister will not hear the hon. member, I will listen to him.

HOUSING

SUPPLYING OF INFORMATION TO QUEBEC MUNICIPALITIES ON AMENDEMENTS TO ACT

Mr. Roland Godin (Portneuf): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Minister of State for Urban Affairs.

Can the minister tell the House whether the enactment of Bill C-133 has benefited Canadians? Could he indicate at the same time if Quebec municipalities have been provided with information on how to take advantage of that new legislation?

[English]

Hon. Ron Basford (Minister of State for Urban Affairs): Mr. Speaker, the answer to the last part is yes. There have been consultations and discussions with the Quebec Housing Corporation and we trust through them with the municipalities involved. Also, there is a distribution of material on the amendments to the National Housing Act in Bill C-133 that is available and has been sent to municipal leaders, housing group leaders and others. The extent they have been taken advantage of would depend on the particular program involved. As the Prime Minister has indicated, at this point we are disappointed at the reaction we have had from the provinces to the land assembly provisions. On the other hand, we are anxious that the assisted home ownership provisions be used as widely as possible, not only in Quebec.

CONSTRUCTION OF COMMUNITY PROJECTS—POSSIBILITY OF ASSISTANCE TO MUNICIPALITIES BY DEPARTMENT OF REGIONAL ECONOMIC EXPANSION

Mr. Adrien Lambert (Bellechasse): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary.

Can the minister indicate whether the municipalities which will benefit from that new legislation will be entitled to assistance from the Department of Regional Economic Expansion for the implementation of those community programs?

[English]

Hon. Ron Basford (Minister of State for Urban Affairs): Mr. Speaker, municipalities can take advantage of the land assembly provisions, the neighbourhood improvement provisions, the repair and rehabilitation provisions. I hope that municipal leaders, not only in Quebec but throughout Canada, will take notice of these provisions and use them as effectively as they can.

ENERGY

OIL—PROPOSED EXTENSION OF PIPELINE TO MONTREAL—ACCESS TO QUEBEC MARKET FOR OIL DISCOVERED OFF ATLANTIC COAST

Hon. Robert L. Stanfield (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources who has said he will review the position with regard to a pipeline to Montreal if the government of Quebec can negotiate an assured supply of crude oil for the Quebec market. In this policy of the minister's what provision is there for access to the Quebec market for any oil discovered off the Atlantic coast?

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, one of the best assurances we could have, in view of the problem of insecurity in eastern Canada—

Mr. Stanfield: That is not my question.

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): —would be to discover a substantial supply of economic oil off the east coast. Of course, until such a find is made this remains a hypothetical question.

Mr. Stanfield: In view of the insistence of the minister that the government of Quebec negotiate an assured supply, which presumably involves a firm contract over a significant period of time in the future, to avoid a pipeline, what provision is there in the minister's policy for any access to the Quebec market for oil discovered off the Atlantic coast?

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): As soon as there is any oil off the Atlantic coast worthy of any consideration we would, of course, make arrangements for that in the policy, but, as the hon. member knows, at the moment there is no commercial find there that can be exploited and we do not know how many years away we are from such a find.

Mr. Stanfield: I have one other supplementary question. What assurance is the government prepared to give to any company that would build a pipeline from Toronto to Montreal with regard to continued access to half the Quebec market? What is there in the present policy of the government to assure the pipeline builder of half the market regardless of what oil may be discovered off the Atlantic coast?

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): There is a range of assurances that could be given and it is a matter of negotiation. Among others, there is the requirement that a specific degree of throughput be refined there. The exact terms would be a matter of negotiation between the government and whatever consortium would happen to build the pipeline.

VETERANS AFFAIRS

INQUIRY AS TO INCREASES IN WAR VETERANS ALLOWANCES

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Minister of Veterans Affairs. In view of the fact that there are to be increases in old age pensions and family allowances next month, and in view of the minister's statement that the government will treat veterans with fairness, may I ask if the minister is now in a position to indicate precisely what steps the government will take, having in mind in particular veterans who are on the war veterans allowance?

Hon. Daniel J. MacDonald (Minister of Veterans Affairs): As I indicated to the House last week, the government is in the process of taking the necessary steps, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Is the minister now in a position to state definitely whether it is proposed by order in council to raise the ceiling on permissible income under the War Veterans Allowance Act or whether there will be some other adjustment in the amount being paid to war veterans allowance recipients?

Mr. MacDonald (Cardigan): Mr. Speaker, I would prefer not to announce government policy until it is government policy.

Some hon. Members: Oh, Oh!

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Will the minister make an announcement in time so that any improvements for the war veterans can be effective in October, as they will be for the other groups to which I have already referred?

Mr. MacDonald (Cardigan): I hope to be able to make an announcement in sufficient time.

FOOD PRICES

USE OF RESEARCHERS BY REVIEW BOARD—STATEMENT BY CHAIRMAN ALLEGING NO GOUGING

Mr. Stan Darling (Parry Sound-Muskoka): Mr. Speaker, in the absence of the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs may I direct my question to the right hon. Prime Minister. It is reported that the Food Prices Review Board is sending out some 80 researchers today to gather the facts on rising food prices. Would the Prime Minister tell the House on what evidence or research the chairman of the Food Prices Review Board has been saying over the last month or so that there has not been any price gouging in food?

Right Hon P. E. Turdeau (Prime Minister): I will have to inquire, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker: The Chair will recognize the hon. member on a supplementary question, but the Chair has considerable doubt about the procedural acceptibility of the question. The hon. member will be recognized for a supplementary, following which the Chair will recognize the hon. member for Qu'Appelle-Moose Mountain.

Mr. Darling: My question is to the right hon. Prime Minister. As a member of the Special Committee on Food Prices I listened for four hours last Thursday and—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Will the hon. member kindly resume his seat. The hon. member should not forget that when I seek the floor the hon. member should give me an opportunity to indicate why I have risen. The hon. member was recognized for the purpose of asking a supplementary question. Perhaps he should do so now.

[Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre).]

Mr. Darling: Would the Prime Minister tell the House whether any thorough or direct research on food prices has been done in the last several months by the board or by the department and, if so, when can we expect this research to be made public?

● (1440)

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, the department is researching into this kind of matter on a constant basis. So far as the board is concerned, I will have to inquire.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member for Qu'Appelle-Moose Mountain has been seeking the floor for some time to ask a supplementary. He will be recognized at this time.

PROPOSED EXTENSION OF OIL PIPELINE TO MONTREAL—DISCUSSION WITH ALBERTA

Hon. Alvin Hamilton (Qu'Appelle-Moose Mountain): Mr. Speaker, my question relates to the question on the Montreal pipeline I asked last Tuesday. It is directed to the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources. In view of the fact that with respect to his answer of last Tuesday he has been caught out so far as the province of Quebec is concerned, has he had any discussion with the province of Alberta and approval by that province to make this policy work?

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, I am anticipating a meeting with the Alberta representatives this week. We have had discussions in general terms following the energy analysis and I have spoken to my counterpart on the telephone about it. We will be discussing it further this coming week.

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle-Moose Mountain): I have a supplementary, Mr. Speaker. Has the minister suggested to the provincial energy ministers that, before any more fluffs are made by these rapid announcements of the Prime Minister without being properly prepared by the minister, he would like to meet with them to try to get a basis for a national oil and gas policy established before any more goofs like this are made?

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): Mr. Speaker, without accepting the description of the hon. gentleman, I would say there has been very continuous consultation, particularly with Alberta, on these questions. I will look forward to seeing them again this week. I am not sure whether a general conference would be the best way to arrive at a co-ordinated policy.

FOOD PRICES

COST OF RESEARCH BY REVIEW BOARD

Mr. Allan Lawrence (Northumberland-Durham): Mr. Speaker, my supplementary question to the Prime Minister is related to Mrs. Plumptre's announcement, after the food prices committee met the other day, of research into food prices. In view of the fact the House has had no estimate given to it of the annual cost of the Food Prices Review Board, in view of the fact that it must have been a government decision to send out these researchers, and in view of the fact that Mrs. Plumptre announced that it is an expensive operation, can the Prime Minister tell the House today what the estimated cost of this latest research project of the Food Prices Review Board is?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member is seeking the kind of information that is normally sought by a written question on the order paper.

CAPE BRETON DEVELOPMENT CORPORATION

SUGGESTED PROSECUTION OF PRESIDENT FOR ALLEGED FAILURE TO FOLLOW LAW

Mr. Donald MacInnis (Cape Breton-East Richmond): Mr. Speaker, in the absence of the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion I have a question for the Prime Minister. In view of the prosecution of railway workers now under way for disobeying a statute, will the government follow the same procedure under the same section of the Criminal Code and charge Tom Kent, the President of the Cape Breton Development Corporation, under the same section of that act?

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Hon. Jean Marchand (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I am going to take that question as notice.

Mr. MacInnis (Cape Breton-East Richmond): I rise on a question of privilege, Mr. Speaker. There is absolutely no need for the minister to take the question as notice. He already has the documentary proof in his hands provided by Mr. Kent himself as late as June of this year. The minister of Regional Economic Expansion knows all about it and the Minister of Transport is also aware that the legislation has not been carried out as passed by the House in 1967. Two committees of parliament have supported my contention in this regard. I will lay charges against Tom Kent if the government has the guts to do to Tom Kent what it is doing to the railway workers.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Speaker: The Chair will recognize the hon. member for Yorkton-Melville and then the hon. member for Charlevoix.

AGRICULTURE

BEEF—POSSIBLE TERMINATION OF EXPORT CONTROLS IN LIGHT OF LIFTING OF PRICE CONTROL BY PRESIDENT NIXON

Mr. Lorne Nystrom (Yorkton-Melville): Mr. Speaker, in the absence of the Minister of Agriculture and the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce I shall direct my question to the Prime Minister. In view of the fact the President of the United States has lifted price controls on beef, is the Prime Minister considering terminating the controls on the export of Canadian beef to the United States at this time or within the next couple of days?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): We have this under consideration, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Nystrom: In view of the fact the Minister of Agriculture intimated in the House that as soon as price controls in the United States were lifted export controls in this country would be terminated, will the Prime Minister be making an announcement this week so that Canadian producers will not suffer?

Mr. Trudeau: That is exactly the matter I said was under consideration.

PROPOSED EXTENSION OF OIL PIPELINE TO MONTREAL—EFFECTS ON PROPOSED SUPERTANKER PORT AND PETROCHEMICAL INDUSTRY IN QUEBEC

Mr. Gilles Caouette (Charlevoix): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the right hon. Prime Minister.

Considering that the answers concerning the construction of a pipeline for the province of Quebec seem much more unspecific and hesitant today than last week, is the right hon. Prime Minister aware that the representations made by Quebec are mostly due to the fact that the political program of the Quebec Liberal party was in fact based on the construction of a superport for tankers and the development of the petrochemical industry?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I do not agree that we are going back on what we said previously. If the hon. member will just look at my statement in last week's Hansard, he will note that at the very beginning of my announcement concerning the pipeline, I said that the government would soon need to have consultations about this matter with representatives from the provinces and the industry.

GRAIN

SHORTAGE OF FEED GRAIN ON VANCOUVER ISLAND—EMERGENCY PLANS IN LIGHT OF CONTINUING STRIKE BY SOME RAILWAY WORKERS

Mr. John Reynolds (Burnaby-Richmond-Delta): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Labour. In view of the continuing rail strike in British Columbia, has the government any emergency plans to get feed grain to Vancouver Island to solve the very serious problems of the poultry and dairy industry in that area?

Hon. John C. Munro (Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, as the hon. member may be aware, the only hold-out situation is in the city of Vancouver proper and certainly not in British Columbia generally by any means. Prince Rupert is open, and I am hopeful that by the time this day is over the situation in Vancouver may be clarified. In that sense the hon. member's question may, hopefully, be premature.

SHORTAGE OF FEED GRAIN ON VANCOUVER ISLAND—REQUEST THAT EXPORT SUPPLIES BE MADE AVAILABLE AT DOMESTIC PRICES

Mr. John Reynolds (Burnaby-Richmond-Delta): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question for the Minister in charge of the Wheat Board. In view of the fact there is already feed grain on Vancouver Island meant for export, will the minister give the Wheat Board a directive to sell this feed grain already on Vancouver Island at domestic prices instead of export prices in order to solve the very serious problem of the poultry and dairy industries?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Justice): I will not purport to give the Canadian Wheat Board such a directive. It has already on its own initiative been making grain available which had been intended for export and holding it where it seemed that it was needed for the domestic situation, but of course it has to protect the grain producers as well in terms of the prices it charges.

PROPOSED EXTENSION OF OIL PIPELINE TO MONTREAL

Hon. George Hees (Prince Edward-Hastings): Mr. Speaker, my question is to the Prime Minister and is supplementary to a previous question. In view of the government's constant refusal even to consider the building of a Toronto-Montreal pipeline for several years and right up to the present time, is not the reason for the present change in policy solely to try to get NDP support for its non-policy in fighting inflation?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member for Victoria.

[Mr. Trudeau.]

VETERANS AFFAIRS

VICTORIA, B.C.—POSSIBLE TRANSFER OF HOSPITAL FROM FEDERAL AUTHORITY—REQUEST FOR CONSIDERATION OF VIEWS OF VETERANS

Mr. Allan B. McKinnon (Victoria): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Veterans Affairs. Since the veterans in my constituency are disturbed by persistent rumours that the veterans hospital in Victoria is to be transferred to provincial and regional authority, can the minister reassure the House and the veterans of Victoria that the views of the rank and file veterans and patients will be given first consideration before a final decision is made?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I suggest to the hon. member that normally a question such as this should be on the order paper or considered at the time of adjournment. If there is an answer which the minister can give quickly he will be recognized for that purpose.

Hon. Daniel J. MacDonald (Minister of Veterans Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I should like to assure the hon. member that before any contract is signed with the municipality or otherwise that the guaranteeing of the veterans' well-being will be looked after.

HOUSING

PREVENTION OF RENT INCREASES FOLLOWING INCREASES IN OLD AGE SECURITY AND GUARANTEED INCOME SUPPLEMENT PAYMENTS

Mr. Elmer M. MacKay (Central Nova): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of State for Urban Affairs. Has the minister, following the increases in OAS and GIS payments, developed measures, either independently or in co-operation with the provinces, to contain and discourage rent increases in order to protect the recipients of these pensions from having their slight increases appropriated by landlords, which has happened often in the past? If so, will these measures be made public soon?

● (1450)

Hon. Ron Basford (Minister of State for Urban Affairs): Mr. Speaker, in respect of those properties owned by CMHC there has been a rent freeze in effect since early this year. In respect of those under the control of the provincial housing authorities, in which we bear part of the cost of any rental subsidy, most have been under a freeze for quite some time. Having regard to those that are privately owned, of course we have no direct authority over them and any control would rest with the provinces.

INQUIRY AS TO REPORT ON ALLEGED IRREGULARITIES IN FINANCING OF STUDENT CO-OPERATIVE HOUSING

Hon. Paul Hellyer (Trinity): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of State for Urban Affairs. Would he advise the House whether his inquiry into alleged irregularities in respect of the financing of student co-operative housing is complete and, if so, is he now in a position to make the results available to the House?

Hon. Ron Basford (Minister of State for Urban Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I expect to receive that report this month.

TREFANN COURT URBAN RENEWAL, TORONTO—SCOPE OF GRANT FOR SECOND PHASE

Hon. Paul Hellyer (Trinity): I have a supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Does the announcement of a $2.1 million grant toward the second phase of the Trefann Court urban renewal eliminate the rehabilitation of existing housing as alleged, and did the approval include all or any part of the financing applied for by Trefann Court Homes Corporation?

Hon. Ron Basford (Minister of State for Urban Affairs): Mr. Speaker, the answer to the latter part of the question is no. The Trefann Court Homes Corporation application for, I think it is some 16 units of housing, is a separate application, and approval of phase two has relation to urban renewal.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I would bring to the attention of hon. members that we have gone beyond the time allocated for questions. I had hoped to recognize two or three more questioners before moving to orders of the day, but if hon. members have many supplementaries I will have to call orders of the day.

Mr. Hellyer: Mr. Speaker, my supplementary question is really part of my previous supplementary which I think the minister overlooked. I asked whether or not the terms of the phase two renewal program really make adequate provision for rehabilitation of existing housing or whether in fact the proposal put forward by the government eliminates that possibility, as has been alleged in Toronto?

Mr. Basford: Mr. Speaker, phase two which has been approved does so. There are discussions with the province of Ontario now under way as to the application of the newly approved neighbourhood improvement proposals in respect of the Trefann Court area, so that the rehabilitation sections, by which grants and loans of up to $5,000 can be made, would apply in the Trefann Court area under the newly passed legislation. It is that course I hope will be pursued. I will be meeting with the Trefann Court people this evening, I believe, to discuss the possible application of these provisions to that area.

Mr. Speaker: The Chair will recognize the hon. member for Yukon, following which, as I am sure hon. members would be anxious to proceed with the motion to be discussed today, I will call orders of the day.

Oral Questions

NORTHERN AFFAIRS

APPROPRIATION BY UNITED STATES OF FUNDS FOR PAVING HAINES-HAINES JUNCTION LINK AND ALASKA HIGHWAY TO TERMINATION IN CANADA

Mr. Erik Nielsen (Yukon): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development. I would ask whether he is aware of any legislation which has been passed by the Senate of the United States to appropriate some $58 million for paving of the road link between Haines in the State of Alaska and Haines Junction in Canada and on up from Haines Junction to the termination of the Alaska highway in Canada? If he does have such knowledge, will he tell the House whether the Canadian government is now negotiating or intends to negotiate with the government of the United States in respect of the expenditure of these funds on the construction to be undertaken on these highways?

[Translation]

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): Mr. Speaker, we are aware of the steps undertaken by Congress but, according to the reports I have been given, the position of the United States is not yet final; as soon as that country is willing to negotiate with Canada in this regard, we will be happy to discuss the matter with them.

[English]

Mr. Speaker: Orders of the day.

Mr. McKinley: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. Generally speaking, when questions are asked in the House about wheat and the production of wheat they are asked on behalf of the three prairie provinces where, as we know, there is a great deal of wheat produced. Many of us also know that there is a great deal of wheat produced in the province of Ontario which has an Ontario Wheat Producers Marketing Board. I would like to solicit an answer from the minister in charge of the Wheat Board to my question which I direct to this minister as the Minister of Agriculture is absent today. Does the same offer—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

Mr. McKinley: I will be finished in a minute, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker: Would the hon. member kindly indicate his point of order? The hon. member is now doing what hon. members try to do from time to time. After the question period hon. members rise on so-called points of order for the purpose of asking questions they would like to have asked during the question period. I appreciate that the hon. member for Huron feels he should ask an important question, but the hon. member for Hamilton-Wentworth and other hon. members who were anxious to ask questions are in exactly the same position. I regret very much that the hon. member is in that position, but I suggest to him that this is not a point of order. If he will indicate what his point of order is I will make a ruling.

Mr. McKinley: I would simply like to find out, and if I have to rise on points of order in order to stand and speak for the Ontario wheat producers I intend to do so, whether Ontario producers are to receive the same offer, and has a deal been made with the Ontario Wheat Producers' Marketing Board?

Mr. Speaker: I will make my ruling that this is not a point of order and call orders of the day.

Mr. Hellyer: The minister said "yes". He nodded his head.;

Mr. Bell: Let the record show that the minister said "yes".

BUSINESS OF SUPPLY

ALLOTTED DAY S.O. 58(9)—NON-CONFIDENCE MOTION—ALLEGED FAILURE OF GOVERNMENT TO ADOPT MEASURES TO COMBAT INCREASED COST OF LIVING

Hon. Robert L. Stanfield (Leader of the Opposition) moved:

That this House has no confidence in the adequacy of government measures to deal with the cost of living as such measures were announced to the House by the Prime Minister on September 4th, 1973.

He said: Mr. Speaker, within minutes of notice of this motion being presented on Friday, we all learned that today was not destined to be an exactly suspenseful day because of the Leader of the NDP indicated his party would continue to support the government.

Some hon. Members: Shame.

Mr. Stanfield: Notwithstanding the non-shock of that information, I trust that our motion will provoke a stimulating day, and I am confident that such continued enlightenment will lead us shortly either to renewed suspense or the necessity of a formal coalition.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

[Translation]

Mr. Stanfield: Mr. Speaker, I am anxious to hear the comments the Minister of Finance (Mr. Turner) will make later in the day. If he is logical and maintains his most recent attitude, he could easily support our motion. Naturally, I do not expect him to do so but, in default of being enlightened, we may perhaps be amused by new acrobatic feats, turn-abouts, contorsions and pirouettes.

Just over a month ago, the minister called the press to explain that he had erred once again, this time in predicting the amount of tax income and, consequently, the deficit. The good news, on that occasion, was that, thanks to his errors in calculations, he would have less to borrow to make up the deficit and, as a result, this would have a salutary effect on rates of interest and inflation. In addition, he informed the press that he had asked his colleagues to put a brake on their departmental expenditures, that being the best way of fighting inflation. The impression was, Mr. Speaker, that his colleagues would treat his recommendation exactly as they have his previous ones.

[English]

The minister maintained his average of being partly right and mostly wrong most of the time.

• (1500)

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Stanfield: Then, he left for what I am sure was a well-deserved rest and recuperation shortly after, leaving behind him a deficit reduced by some $500 million in expenditures as a result of increased tax revenues and leaving the government in what he called "the right posture", which was that of exercising restraint in government expenditures. Alas, the minister hardly had time to get out of his clothes and into his bathing suit when his policy became unstuck. As a result of an unrelenting and highly visible increase in consumer prices, and as a result of highly vocal public protest, the minister's colleagues in Ottawa abandoned the minister's posture and rejected his advice. From then until now, the duties and responsibilities of the Minister of Finance (Mr. Turner) seemingly have passed from his hands to those of his master economist, the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau). We all recall how he conquered inflation for one day only a few years ago.

Of course, in tandem with the Prime Minister is that father of organic union, the Minister of Justice (Mr. Lang). It is doubtful that the advice and the person of the Minister of Finance would have been abandoned were it not for the fact that it was becoming very clear that parliament would have to be summoned to resolve still another crisis of mismanagement. Otherwise, there would have been no hurry. But because of the rail strike and the need to call parliament, there was not only the need to do something, there was a need to do something in a hurry. As a result we got that makeshift, hodgepodge of measures proclaimed by the Prime Minister last Tuesday.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Stanfield: The subsidy on wheat for domestic milling, having been reduced in July, was raised by the Prime Minister and I understand has been changed several times since then. Increases in family allowances promised for the future were brought into effect rather quickly and the quarterly adjustments to old age pensions, which were said to be impossible to implement by the minister concerned, were in fact brought into effect. Never mind that the measure with respect to wheat and bread prices would, it was said less than a month ago, create a frenzy of speculation and fluctuation in grain markets.

The prize-winning reversal by the Prime Minister last Tuesday was the announced intention to carry western crude into Montreal through western pipelines extended from Toronto. What this government had determined not to do, that is not to build that pipeline,—on Tuesday they determined to do—perhaps. But, it would be a very foolish man who would invest in any decision by this government in the belief that such a decision would last.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Stanfield: Obviously, any decision of this government has approximately the same life span as a gnat. But whether this policy stays or goes, or whether it is repudiated and returned again in the days and weeks ahead, that particular decision does stand as a permanent monument to this government's bogglement in reacting to the present crisis on the one hand, and to this government's contempt for the rightful interest of the provinces on the other hand. Because of this government's previous opposition to such a proposal to build a pipeline to Montreal, this latest turnabout caused alarm and resentment in many other provinces. There was no previous consultation, despite what they may suggest, which indicates not only this government's indifference and disdain for the interests of the provinces, as I have said, but it also indicates that this decision was made, as has become the custom of those gentlemen opposite, off-the-cuff and in an atmosphere of political expediency.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Stanfield: We certainly need a national energy policy in this country, but the reason for this new energy policy escapes me, unless it was indeed for some political reason related to the government's very keen self-interest in survival. Surely, Sir, this reversal in decision could have been the subject of consultation with the provinces. But this reversal and this decision does tell us what many of us have already suspected, that the recent government conference with the western provinces was meant simply as a short-term public relations measure. If anything could have been learned from that conference, even by those as slow to grasp matters as members of this government, the lesson was that the western provinces would expect, as a matter of right, to be associated with and partners in the making of decisions on national policy where those decisions had a direct bearing on the affairs of those provinces.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Stanfield: Gall is not exactly a polite word, Mr. Speaker, but I have not been able to think of a better one. I have long been impressed by the gall of some of those opposite on the front benches. But I thought the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources (Mr. Macdonald) exceeded himself recently, and that is saying something, with his statement that the provinces of Quebec, Nova Scotia and Newfoundland had failed to consult the federal government adequately with respect to their own oil refinery projects.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

[Translation]

Mr. Stanfield: As far as Newfoundland is concerned, Mr. Speaker, the federal government presence there has been constant.

In the case of Nova Scotia, the federal government has shown itself to be a determined partner in its development.

As for Quebec, the projects of that province have been discussed openly for months. Therefore, this accusation of inadequate consultation would rather turn itself back against the minister himself and the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) who have given Quebec a half hour's notice of the reversal and change of the federal energy policy, and as far as we know, have not advised at all either Alberta or the other provinces concerned.

[English]

But the country ought not to be distracted by this spectacular example of federalism by fiat. We ought to observe the massive, total arrogance but above all we must continue to focus upon the substantive issue. What has all this reaction by this government accomplished?

An hon. Member: Zero.

Mr. Stanfield: Mr. Speaker, just consider what the Prime Minister did not say last Tuesday. He did not observe that the country is to endure another round of wage increases, work stoppages and strikes and increased pressure on costs and prices. No one could disparage the efforts of those who have the bargaining power to do so for making an effort to keep afloat on this rising tide of uncontrolled inflation. No one could blame anyone for taking whatever refuge he can from an uncontrolled and unchecked period of rising prices and a gutless government determined only to ride out the storm.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Stanfield: But there are those in Canada who have no powerful trade union or trade association, who have no levers to pull, who have no means of adjusting their incomes to meet the demands of increased prices and rates of interest. They are the great majority of working Canadians and their families.

Mr. Speaker, this government is not kept here by public confidence; they are not maintained in office by faith and trust in their policies. They are not kept here because events have proven them right in their judgment and in their management of the country's affairs. They are kept here, Sir, for the political convenience of a group of members in this House. As long as they are here, the members of this government will keep improvising policies of political convenience. And the real losers, Sir,—

• (1510)

An hon. Member: Are the Conservatives.

Mr. Stanfield: The real losers are not the members of my party who may lose motions of confidence from time to time. The real losers are the Canadian people of ordinary means, because the ordinary Canadian cannot ride things out, Sir. This is a tragic situation, all the more tragic because there is an alternative.

I have spoken many times on the serious and dangerous growth of inflationary psychology in Canada. Nothing fuels and feeds such a psychology so much as the posture of a government that nothing can be done or, on the basis of recent events, that very little can be done. Our fundamental concern from the outset has related to the danger of inflationary psychology taking deep hold and spreading rapidly throughout the country. This, Sir, is not simply an economic condition that can be approached with computers, slide rules and mathematical equations. Inflationary psychology is a social problem. I hesitate to call it a social disease, because that term has another generally accepted meaning. However, in a very real sense inflationary psychology behaves like a disease.

When you are faced with an epidemic of a contagious disease, you do not just fiddle around with selective innoculation. Certainly, you give treatment to those already hit by the effects of the disease, and we have recommended support measures to do this. We continue to support these. But you must also make a massive public assault on halting the spread of the disease. Nobody likes to be given needles. I know that and have always conceded that a great deal of public support would be necessary for the implementation of a comprehensive program of price and income restraints. As the danger of inflation psychology mounts, however, I believe that more and more Canadians are now in a frame of mind to give that support and receive the needle, and join in a program to restore the economic health of this country. Initiating such a program is something that the government has not done and shows no intention of doing.

Sir, why are so many industrialized countries resorting to programs of price and income restraint. Why have they been doing so for some time with varying degrees of success? Why are they doing so if traditional trade-off and counter-cyclical approaches to economic policy are still appropriate and, above all, still sufficient? Surely, these other countries have adopted these programs in an endeavour to achieve at least some stability in their economies. They recognize that the traditional approaches have given us the boom-bust cycle over and over again, with each boom bringing worse inflation than the one previous and each bust bringing worse unemployment. In boom times, what good is a five-figure salary when it is eroded by two-figure inflation. And that is where we are rapidly moving today, Sir, to a two-figure inflation.

Mr. Nielsen: I see the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau), is nearly asleep. He is bored.

Mr. Trudeau: You are not looking too lively yourself.

Mr. Stanfield: We are into another spiral now in Canada. What has been the government's response in 1973, as it remains locked into this traditional approach? The government's response has been to increase taxes on those companies producing food, on those companies transporting food and on those companies selling food. This, of course, increases the price to anybody buying food. The government's response has been to push mortgage rates on homes to over 10 per cent. You look at that kind of policy and conclude that we could well change the title of the Minister of Finance to minister of flat earth and other absurdities.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Stanfield: How can anybody seriously consider the policies of our Minister of Finance and say to all those other countries, "You are all out of step but our John."

Now, we have the International Monetary Fund, in its annual report released yesterday, urging nations who are cooling off their economies through the use of their federal budgets and control of money and credit to supplement these anti-inflation tools with price and income controls. I wish to take a minute to read from their report.

[Mr. Stanfield.]

After emphasizing the difficulties of controlling inflation, at page 6 the report reads:

—In any case there seems to be a growing belief that the task of dealing effectively with inflation will require national governments to use a wide range of policy instruments—to buttress fiscal and monetary policies with other policy measures, such as incomes (including prices) policy, regional policies, manpower policies, and the like, depending on the particular circumstances. Such a viewpoint reflects (a) the disappointing experience that many countries had in relying solely on fiscal and monetary policies to handle the problem of inflation in the past several years and (b) an increasing recognition that the problem may stem, at least in part, from specific features of the economic structure or economic process not clearly related to the level of aggregate demand. Many countries have in particular been making use of incomes policy as a supplement to the instruments of demand management; this seems generally sensible and appropriate since it provides a possible way for countries to achieve a better reconciliation of their aims with respect to resource utilization and price stability than otherwise would be realized.

I believe that our Minister of Finance was going to attend a meeting of the International Monetary Fund in order to provide some leadership.

The fund report then goes on to say, and it is nice to see a factual appraisal of this for a change, that the United States decision to drop mandatory controls too early in the game was a mistake. I have expressed the same opinion for some months and indicated that we could learn something from the United States experience.

The slogan mongers who are in the apology business have invented a phrase about "the disastrous U.S. experience". They have vigorously peddled this questionable gem as a rationale for inaction. The principle seems to be: If your argument is to throw out the baby with the bath water, then it is certainly better not to bathe the baby at all.

Sir, there are some who honestly do not understand what we have been proposing and there are others who have chosen not to understand what we have been proposing. There are some, even, who have chosen to misrepresent what we have been saying.

An hon. Member: Are you listening, little David?

Mr. Stanfield: I will take a few moments to review the essence of our approach.

• (1520)

First, let there be no misunderstanding. We have never represented a so-called freeze as the be-all and end-all, no more than a dentist would represent the freezing of a tooth as the treatment. Those who suggest we are presenting a freeze as a policy to combat inflation are misrepresenting our position.

Our position is to put into place an economic stabilization plan incorporating for a temporary period strict mandatory controls of prices and incomes. The time we envisage for such strict temporary controls is in the order of 18 months to two years.

Mr. Trudeau: Including food.

Mr. Stanfield: I am glad the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) finally woke up. If he wants advice on this subject, I will be glad to give it to him. However, I have very little time and I would like to finish.

In order to put such a program into effect, a short-term freeze on prices and all forms of income is needed at the outset. This is a period for consultation, for setting the range and limits for the controls period and for putting the necessary monitoring and enforcement agencies into place. It is a preparation and stage-setting period. The freeze period should be as short as possible.

Mr. Trudeau: Except at the farm.

Mr. Stanfield: I always made it clear that we do not include the price at the farm.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Stanfield: I am glad to find members opposite are now listening to us. Perhaps they will now look at what we have been saying. We have talked about 90 days because we feel that must be the maximum time taken in this preparatory stage.

Mr. Trudeau: Except at the farm.

Mr. Stanfield: We would certainly want to see it as short as 30 days if that could be done, but we have used 90 days as an outside figure, one which we believe could be fulfilled.

Mr. Trudeau: Except on food prices.

Mr. Stanfield: Except, as I have always said, food at the farm gate. The Prime Minister would know that if he paid attention to what I say. I am on a strictly limited time. I wish to emphasize that we have never put our position forward as any kind of a magic wand, any more than the international monetary fund put it forward as a magic wand. We have never said it would completely halt inflation and we have never denied the international aspects of the problem. We simply say that a comprehensive program is the fairest, would command support and would do better in the long run than ad hoc policies of relief patched onto a traditional approach of tight money and economic slowdown.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Stanfield: Our program envisages, and indeed presumes, judiciously balanced monetary and fiscal policies. It presumes exemplary self-restraint on the part of the government and governments generally in relation to their own spending and aggrandizement.

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): How about the $4 billion deficit?

Mr. Stanfield: It is nice to see the Minister of Finance awake. I hope he is going to defend his budget today because he presented it.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Stanfield: Our approach presumes additional measures to increase the supply and availability of goods and services that are in tight demand.

Mr. Trudeau: Like we have done.

Mr. Stanfield: No, Mr. Speaker, not like they have done.

Mr. Trudeau: Let's hear about it.

Mr. Stanfield: It presumes other actions to take the heat off wage and salary earners, particularly those on low income, so they can escape the vicious circle of trying to keep up with inflation. Steps to take this heat off have always included my plan for the indexing of the personal income tax system, a plan that will be proclaimed into law any day now, thanks to the conversion of the Minister of Finance following a not too successful election campaign.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Stanfield: In the same vein, removal of the 11 per cent federal sales tax on building materials would take some of the edge off the soaring cost of housing. Removal of the federal sales tax from all clothing, not just children's clothing, would also be a positive contribution to easing the inflationary pressures bearing down on wage and salary earners. A comprehensive initiative of this nature would go a long way toward cooling off the inflationary psychology that is on the rise in this country today.

Our plan does not require a massive new bureaucracy. Surely, most of the talents and resources that would be needed are already present in the federal public service. There is the Department of National Revenue and its local administrative and auditing staff, the Department of Agriculture's resources and experts, the skills and expertise within the Department of Consumer and Corporate Affairs, at least I assume they are there, and the analysis and computers in the Department of Finance. All that is missing is the will and determination to marshal these talents and resources in order to deal with this matter of very urgent and pressing necessity.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Stanfield: What the government offered through the Prime Minister's announcement last week was not a policy. It is a mutation of obsolete and discredited approaches to inflation, a mutation based on expediency and survival. It is a tactic, not a policy. It is a ruse rather than a plan. Therefore, since my time is up, I take pleasure in moving:

> That this House has no confidence in the adequacy of government measures to deal with the cost of living as such measures were announced to the House by the Prime Minister on September 4, 1973.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Hon. John N. Turner (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I want to assure the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Stanfield) he should not have felt constrained by time. Because of the importance of the subject matter, he was entitled to all the time he could muster in the House. If he ran out of energy and impetus, I can understand it, but the House would certainly have been willing to let him continue.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Cost of Living

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): When the question was put to me by the hon. gentleman last week, I made it very clear that I very much welcome the opportunity, as I am sure the House does, to take part in a debate involving the state of our economy and the particular problem of inflation that confronts us.

May I say at the outset that I find it rather interesting, ironically, that the Conservative party should be condemning the adequacy of the new measures announced by the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) last week to help deal with the problem of inflation, and at the same time supporting each and every measure as it comes in turn before the House.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): From the tenor of the hon. gentleman's speech this afternoon, it should be apparent that what the debate is all about at this stage is price and wage controls because that is clearly what the Conservative party has in mind for the country when it calls, as did the Leader of the Opposition last Tuesday, and today, for a comprehensive assault on inflation. I believe the new measures announced by the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) further extend and reinforce the major thrust of the past two budgets. Those budgets were aimed at moderating the impact of the rising cost of living on the Canadian people, tackling the basic issue of inflation by increasing supply and at the same time stimulating strong and balanced growth of national output, of jobs, and of the real income of Canadians.

Because of the nature of the motion put forward by the Leader of the Opposition, I want to deal with the contageous problem of inflation, one which continues to be of great concern not only to those of us who live in Canada but to the citizens of every other industrial country in the western world. It can only be considered, however, against the perspective of the developing economic picture both here and abroad. Looking at the Canadian economy, first, in terms of national output, I think we are entitled to put before the House the fact that over the course of the past nine months the Canadian economy has grown at close to a record rate, in fact, at a rate which was obviously unsustainable. The moderation in the rate of the growth of national output during the second quarter of this year, as reported by Statistics Canada, last week better ensures continuing expansion in line with its long-term potential. Over the course of the first half of 1973 the economy has grown more quickly than at any time since 1966 with real national output expanding at a seasonally-adjusted annual rate of 9.2 per cent.

Let us turn, now, to the labour force. As a result of this rapid upsurge in economic growth, the number of new jobs created for Canadians during the first seven months of this year has increased by 411,000, a record rate of increase in employment and one which far surpasses that of any other industrial nation in the world. In July, the year-over-year rate of growth of employment in Canada was 31 per cent greater than in the United States.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

[Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton).]

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): The substantial number of new job opportunities opened up as a result of sharp economic growth has also produced a record expansion in the size of the labour force, which in the first seven months of this year was up by 4.3 per cent as compared with the average in the same period a year ago. This rate of increase is almost 60 per cent above the average yearly rise between 1973 and 1975 projected by the Economic Council in its last annual review. The substantial expansion in employment has led to a sharp reduction in the number of Canadians without work. Indeed, in July the seasonally adjusted level of unemployment was down to 5.2 per cent and with respect to those without work seeking full-time jobs the rate was 4.8 per cent.

[Translation]

Obviously, unemployment at the level I just mentioned is still a subject of concern. However, to bring this problem down to fair proportions it should be recalled that today's unemployment rate would be appreciably lower without the extraordinarily high input of Canadians onto the labour market, input which far exceeds the rate which could be expected with the normal increase in the number of Canadians old enough to work.

It is to be hoped that the trend of the unemployment curve will be downward although monthly variations can be expected. Those variations are often caused partly by sharp and erratic changes in proportion to the movements of a mass of young people old enough to work and who join the labour market or leave it. We have had an example of this in July when for reasons still undetermined a substantial reduction in the proportion of young people from 14 to 24 belonging to the working population and the comparable reduction in the proportion of employed people occurred. In the statistics of the next few months some discrepancies may be expected due to the economic disruptions caused by the railway strikes combined with disputes within other major industries.

A shortage of certain categories of labour occurred in several regions of this country while the unemployment rate is still unsatisfactory in many low growth areas. A number of federal programs are still aimed at solving these chronic problems and mainly during the winter months. The government has already announced expenditure programs amounting to $100 million under a new local initiative program and a federal program providing for the employment of a large proportion of labour. Furthermore, $275 million are always available under the winter employment fund to help finance investment projects providing employment at the provincial and municipal levels.

[English]

I turn, now, to personal incomes, spending and savings. The strong growth of production and employment has brought about a substantial increase in the personal income received by Canadians and, in turn, a very large increase both in the amount of their spending on consumer goods and services and in the amount of their savings. By the second quarter of this year, personal disposable income, that is, the income available after payment of direct taxes, was up 13 per cent as compared with the level a year ago. Far more significant, however, is that the real increase in the income at the disposal of the average

Canadian to spend or save, the real increase, that is to say the amount available after taxes and after discounting the rate of inflation, was up by 6.7 per cent in the second quarter as compared with 1972, and over the whole of the first six months it was up by 6.2 per cent.

Mr. Forrestall: The land is strong!

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): This very substantial increase is the result of a combination of factors: the significant reduction in personal income tax for which provision was made in the budget of last February, the large increase in the number of Canadians with well-paying jobs, and the growth of national productivity.

I recognize, of course, that not all Canadians have shared equally in this growth of national income. The measures before the House are aimed in particular at helping those who have not done as well because of the adverse impact of inflation. As I have said, one of the principal objects of the budget brought down in February was to help those who are not able to help themselves, either because they have left the work force, or because they are on welfare, or because they suffer from a disability over which they have no control, or for other reasons. It has consistently been the purpose of the government to minimize the effect of inflation in the lower and fixed income groups, those who are least able to defend themselves against the erosion of their purchasing power.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): However, in considering the economic situation generally, I believe I am entitled to put certain facts before the House for the consideration of hon. members, since it is critically important to understand and appreciate that despite the erosion of incomes, a process which particularly hurts those on lower and fixed incomes, the great majority of Canadians have experienced a further substantial improvement in their real standard of living over the past year. And this, as I say, despite the increase in the cost of goods and services.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Where have you been?

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): It just happens to be the case.

[Translation]

During the second quarter of the year, the amount allotted by the Canadian people to the purchase of consumer goods and services exceeded by almost 14 per cent that of last year, for the same period, which, in view of rising prices, is still a real increase of 8.6 per cent.

Despite the strong increase in consumer expenditures, Canadians managed to save at an almost record rate of 8½ per cent on their available incomes after taxes.

Let us consider now, Mr. Speaker, our country's foreign trade. The strong growth of domestic demand for domestic products was more than equalled by an increase in the demand for Canadian products abroad, while our exports value has shown during the seven first months of 1973 an extraordinary growth of 25 per cent as compared with last year's figures for the same period.

The increase in our exports of goods and services, combined with the decrease in our imports enabled us to improve considerably our balance of payment position for which the deficit, on an annual seasonally adjusted basis, decreased from $1,400 million for the first quarter of this year to $412 million for the second quarter.

Let us consider now, Mr. Speaker, investments and housing. The strong increase in domestic production in order to meet the demand in Canada and abroad has brought along a considerable growth of investments to enable a further development of our production capacity and to meet social needs of the Canadian people.

The last semi-annual survey forecasts an overall increase in private and public investments of 13 per cent during 1973, that is more than the 9 per cent expected according to investments forecasts at the beginning of the year.

It is expected that business investments, except for housing, will increase by 19 per cent, which means an increase of 5 per cent over previous forecast.

A particularly significant fact is the increasing trend, from 9 to 19 per cent, of capital expenditures foreseen by Canadian manufacturers; this increase certainly reflects the reaction of manufacturing industry to the recently passed legislation on corporate taxes in order to strengthen their competitive position.

There is every evidence that housing starts in 1973 will reach a new record for the third consecutive year. During the second quarter residential construction has progressed in value at the exceptional rate of 19.3 per cent. Housing starts which totalled 284,000, in annual figures, at the second quarter, have increased to 304,000 in July.

● (1540)

[English]

Let me now turn, Mr. Speaker, to consider more directly the question of inflation, which as the OECD has pointed out in the July Economic Outlook is the most serious economic problem confronting western industrial nations at the present time. As that report indicated, the unprecedented simultaneous upsurge in virtually all of the industrial economies has been one of the most critical factors behind the outburst of inflationary pressures around the globe during this period. This simultaneous economic expansion of all industrial countries in the world, which at the same time has compounded world demand, has produced an explosive growth in worldwide demand for both agricultural and industrial commodities, at a time when supplies of many of these commodities were already below normal due to a variety of factors.

Looking at the supply problem, this is particularly true in the case of agricultural products as a result of a sharp decline in production of many basic commodities last year because of adverse growing conditions in many countries. The consequence of a massive increase in international demand for food and for industrial commodities at a time of limited supply has been a sharp increase in the price of such commodities. These sharp increases in prices have, in turn been the major cause of the substantial rise that has taken place in the cost of living in Canada and in every other industrial nation.

For Canada and the United States, the problem has been compounded by the substantial appreciation which has taken place in the relative value of the currencies of a number of other countries as a result of uncertainty—uncertainty over the United States balance of payments position and uncertainty over domestic political developments in the United States. This worldwide upsurge in simultaneous economic growth, combined with the fact of inflation itself and uncertainties surrounding the international monetary system, have had the further adverse effect of sharply increasing the cost of credit—that is to say, interest rates—in every western country.

Within the past several weeks the problem of inflation has been further intensified by the adverse effect of the United States freeze and United States policy of export controls, both of which have had a harmful effect on prices in Canada, as well as by the disruption in supplies of many commodities caused by the rail strikes in this country.

As a major international trader, a country heavily involved in world capital flows, Canada has inevitably been more vulnerable to these global inflationary pressures than most other countries.

Mr. Grafftey: Blame the world.

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): Whether the hon. gentleman admits it or not, there is simply no way in which we can effectively isolate ourselves from such forces and at the same time still expect to reap the considerable benefits that have come to us from international capital flows.

Despite our exposure to these forces, the fact is that Canada's price performance record, both over the long term and more recently, compares extremely favourably with that of other countries.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): I think I am entitled, with the indulgence of the House and with Your Honour's permission, to put these facts before the House. Let us just look at what these facts are. Throughout the 1960's Canada, together with Germany, experienced the lowest rate of increase in consumer prices of all the western industrial nations. Between 1970 and the middle of this year, the increase in the cost of living in this country was the second lowest among the eight leading industrial nations, namely Canada, the United States, the United Kingdom, Japan, France, Germany, Italy and Holland.

In the 12 months ending in June, the rise in the Canadian consumer price index ranked third lowest among the eight nations. The hon. member for York-Simcoe (Mr. Stevens) some time ago mentioned the yearly increase in food prices in Canada and said it exceeded in June that of the other seven nations. That does happen to be true, but the increase in Canadian food prices over the period mid-1970 to mid-1973 was lower than that of any other of the seven countries except for Holland.

The increase that has taken place in the level of interest rates in Canada is certainly not a welcome development and is something that every member of this House deplores, regardless of partisan or political considerations.

Again this is part of a worldwide pattern, although interest rates in this country have not gone up nearly as much as in other countries, particularly the United States, the United Kingdom and Europe.

The fact of the matter is that short-term interest rates in this country are anywhere from three to five points below those prevailing in the United States and Europe, in sharp contrast to the historical record of generally higher rates in this country. The volume of credit has also continued to grow rapidly. The Leader of the Opposition talked about a tight money policy, but, as I say, the volume of credit has continued to grow pretty rapidly, perhaps too rapidly. He knows as well as I do that bank loans have increased at an annual rate of 24 per cent in the second quarter, and the total money supply has increased at a rate of 15 per cent. That is not a tight money policy and the hon. gentleman knows it. If indeed there is any risk, the risk is on the other side.

The fact is—and I hope hon. members will recognize this—that if we in this country allow interest rates to get too far out of line with those abroad, we run the risk of an outflow of funds and a reduction in the supply of capital available to finance continued expansion of the Canadian economy. Such an outflow would also tend to reduce the exchange value of the Canadian dollar and increase the cost of all imported goods, thus putting further pressure on prices in Canada. It is all very well for hon. gentlemen to blame the lowering of the value of the dollar on rising interest rates, but that is not the case.

It has been suggested that we should try to isolate ourselves from international capital markets, access to which has generally been of great benefit to Canada. Some members of the opposition have suggested that we should impose some form of foreign exchange controls. In my view, controls of this nature are no answer: they would distort our capital markets and jeopardize economic growth. They would invite the danger of damaging retaliation by other countries and they would be extremely difficult to administer effectively so as to prevent leakage of funds through all sorts of loopholes.

I am well aware of the fact that Canada's relatively favourable price performance is of small comfort to Canadians who find themselves faced with sharp increases in the price of food and a number of other goods. I receive as much mail as anybody else, including the Leader of the Opposition and I understand and sympathize with the feeling of anger and frustration experienced by many Canadians in this situation and their understandable concern that the government should do something—

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): —even if they are unsure of what that something should be. I want to assure the House that the government is prepared to adopt any measures that it is convinced will be of some lasting benefit in stemming inflationary pressures without at the same time endangering our prospects for the continued strong growth of production and employment. But we are not prepared to adopt policies that offer the prospect of fleeting and temporary advantages at the risk of heavy, long-term damage to the economy as a whole.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Stanfield: You will adopt any policy to stay in office.

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): There is one school of thought that for a period of many months has sought to persuade Canadians that the magic "something" that would waft away the international inflationary pressures besetting our economy was the imposition by the government of a freeze on all prices and incomes, followed by some undefined system of continuing controls for an indefinite period of time. The hon. gentleman today did add a little more precision. With every speech there is a little more precision.

Mr. Stanfield: I added no precision.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): Then he said, in response to an interjection from the Prime Minister, that of course he was exempting food at the farm gate, whereas the hon. member for Don Valley (Mr. Gillies) admitted in debate that if you are going to try to control food prices at the wholesale or retail level there is no way in which you could avoid controlling the price of food at the farm gate.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Gillies: Would the Minister of Finance (Mr. Turner) give me the source of that quotation?

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): I will indeed, but I must confess to the hon. member that I have great difficulty in sorting out his opinions pro and con.

Mr. Bell: Put up or shut up.

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): I hope you will give me some extension, Mr. Speaker, in view of all these interjections.

Mr. Stanfield: The rules apply to everyone in the same way.

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): The Conservative party, once as vehement an opponent of this school of thought as any to be found anywhere in the country, became a late convert only last February. I hesitate to say that political motivation was behind that conversion.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): Since that time, the Official Opposition has been pressing its proposal for the imposition of a wage-price freeze in Canada at every opportunity, with all the convert's typical zeal. Unfortunately for the Conservative party and fortunately for the country, the number of Canadians who still believe that a general freeze control program is the proper remedy for the kind of inflationary problem we are facing in this country at the present time has drastically reduced within recent months to a corporal's guard.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): I seem to recall that when President Nixon announced his reimposition of a 60 day freeze in mid-June, the hon. member for Don Valley told an interviewer that he was thinking of moving a motion to have the House of Commons congratulate the President of the United States.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Gillies: I appreciate this attention, Mr. Speaker, but I would appreciate it much more if the minister would give the sources of his particular quotations.

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): I want to assure the hon. gentleman that like everything else referring to the president it is on tape and we will be able to reproduce that.

In fact, nothing has more discredited the idea of a price freeze under existing circumstances than the action taken by the U.S. administration which led to a drastic cutback in the supplies of many products, particularly food products, and resulted in a further very sharp increase in the prices of many goods, especially meat. On June 28, the Wall Street Journal reported in a lead article:

> The nation's food production machinery is starting to grind to a halt under Phase 3½.

The adverse consequences inevitably made themselves felt severely here in Canada as well as in the United States, and are still being felt. President Nixon himself acknowledged the seriously adverse effects of the freeze on July 18 when he asserted on television:

> The freeze is holding down production and creating shortages which threaten to get worse, and cause still higher prices, as the freeze and controls continue.

I would be interested to know, as I am sure many Canadians and members of parliament would, whether the hon. member for Don Valley is still thinking of moving a motion to have the House congratulate the president on following the policy which he and his party continue to advocate.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): Let us compare the results. Over 20 months since the United States control period instituted in November, 1971 to July of this year, consumer prices rose at a seasonally adjusted annual rate of 4.8 per cent in the United States compared to 6.4 per cent in Canada. This comparison is probably not particularly unfavourable, given Canada's greater involvement in world trade and the relatively much stronger performance of the Canadian economy for some years prior to the introduction of the U.S. control system. Most members of parliament are aware of the fact that whereas only 4 per cent of the gross national product of the United States depends on foreign commerce, about 25 per cent of our GNP depends on foreign commerce. We are more vulnerable than they are to international price movements. During the six months period since phase 3 was adopted by the U.S. between February and July, the adjusted annual rate of increase in consumer prices has been virtually identical, 7.3 per cent in the United States and 7.6 per cent in Canada. Food prices in the U.S. rose at an annual rate of 18.2 per cent, significantly more than the 14.5 per cent in Canada, despite the rigorous control freeze program covering food during that period.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): If many members of the House still have any lingering doubts about the ineffectiveness of a controlling program in containing inflation, I would draw their attention to the report from Washington late last week that in August, at a time when the freeze was partially lifted in support of phase 4 of the program, U.S. wholesale prices increased, seasonally adjusted, by 6.2 per cent over the previous month of July. That represents an annual increase in wholesale prices in the U.S. under a control program of more than 75 per cent taken over the year. Yet, the Leader of the Opposition even today still tries to convince Canadians that we can contain inflation in this country simply by following the U.S. example and by adopting our own freeze control program.

Some hon. Members: Shame.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): I should like to point out further that during the period from last November to July when the United Kingdom instituted a freeze, followed in May by a control program, consumer prices rose 6 per cent in Great Britain, the same increase as was experienced during the same period of time in Canada.

Again I want to go on record regarding the response which the government has made to this worldwide contagious problem of inflation. Although we have undertaken—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I have to interrupt the minister but his time has expired. He can continue only with the unanimous consent of the House.

Mr. Stanfield: Mr. Speaker, I find this rather embarrassing. There were consultations among the parties. The NDP approached us about extending time for the Leader of the NDP (Mr. Lewis) and the Créditistes. We felt very strongly that, since only a limited amount of time was available, I should stay within my time and we should stick strictly to the rule. I hope that since the Minister of Finance is only reading something he said many times before, he would get someone else to read it for him later.

Mr. Speaker: As there is not unanimous consent—

Some hon. Members: Shame.

Mr. Speaker: —the Chair will recognize the hon. member for York South.

Mr. Bell: I rise on a point of order, Mr. Speaker. I not only ask that you follow the rules, but I also ask you to recognize that there is only one opposition party left in the House as of Friday afternoon.

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, I rise on the same point of order. This is the first time that I can recall that in a major debate on the economy introduced by the opposition the Minister of Finance was not given some opportunity to finish what he had to say.

Some hon. Members: Shame.

● (1600)

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for York South.

Mr. Hellyer: The hon. member for York South, on behalf of the government, will finish the minister's speech.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. May we have order, please? I just want to suggest to hon. members that we are, in fact, operating on limited time and I would hope that hon. members would agree at least to give all hon. members who are recognized their full 20 minutes. The hon. member for York South.

Mr. David Lewis (York South): Mr. Speaker, our position on the motion moved by the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Stanfield) is governed by three factors. The first is—

An hon. Member: Fear.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Lewis: —our rejection of the proposals, the irresponsible and unworkable proposals made by the Conservative party. I noted that, for the first time, the Leader of the Opposition had the modesty to assure the House and the people of Canada that the Conservative party was not suggesting that their measures could halt inflation. For the first time, he had the decency to say that to parliament and to the people of Canada. I think that should be underlined. He said that the proposals he made, which consist of a temporary short freeze of 60 days or 90 days, or even 30 days—he mentioned that—and a short temporary longer period of restraint, would fight the inflation psychology? For the life of me I cannot understand the logic of that.

It seems to me that to say to the House or to the various sectors of the Canadian economy there will be a freeze for only 60 or 90 days is to feed inflation psychology and make the situation worse when that period is over. It seems to me when you say to the people of Canada or any sector of the economy that you want to restrain—that was the word used by the Leader of the Opposition and not control—for a few months you feed the inflation psychology and permit everyone to "rev" up and, when the eighteen months are over, go to town on everybody concerned. There is no sense or logic in this, and I find a lack of honesty in the proposal.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Lewis: The second factor that governs our position on this motion is that the government has presented to parliament, in response to our demands, a number of measures which are of benefit to Canadians and to Canadian families. We are convinced that before anyone should even contemplate bringing this parliament down the increase in old age pensions, the removal of the 2 per cent ceiling on the escalation of other pensions and the substantial increase in family allowances must become law. To cause the dissolution of parliament now would mean that these reforms would die on the order paper and be delayed for many months at least, if not forever. This in my view would be a tremendous disappointment to millions of Canadian pensioners and to millions of Canadian families. We simply are not prepared to play this kind of reckless political game.

I note the Hansard reporter is finding some difficulty in hearing me because of the noise from the official opposition.

An hon. Member: Isn't that a shame! Are you saying anything?

Mr. Lewis: I think—

Mr. Speaker: May we have order? I believe the hon. member for York South, and all members who have taken or may take part in this debate, should be given an opportunity to make their speeches without undue interruption.

Mr. Lewis: I think, Mr. Speaker, that Hansard should show that the suggestion that the increased old age pensions and family allowances must become law was greeted with laughter by members of the Conservative party.

The third point that governs our thinking is our conviction that neither the Liberals nor the Conservatives are willing to make basic changes which are needed to end the corporate rip-off, even as it affects the cost of living. We are convinced that it is possible to do much more than the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) announced last Tuesday to protect the Canadian consumer and the Canadian producer from the corporate profiteering which is now taking place at the expense of the Canadian people, but I believe the Conservatives are just as unwilling to do this as are the Liberals and perhaps even less willing.

Ever since this parliament was elected, we in the New Democratic Party have been faced with Hobson's choice. We decided to accept our share of responsibility to make this parliament work as effectively as we could for as long as we could. I say without any fear of honest or objective contradiction that our party in this parliament has produced substantial benefits for the Canadian people which are important to every Canadian family.

Mr. Hellyer: Such as rampant inflation.

Mr. Lewis: We believe that the measures the government has taken, mainly in response to our demands, have been welcomed by the Canadian people and give some hope of relief to many sections of the people of Canada. They give some hope of success. They involve making available to the Canadian consumers an additional $350 million or so in increased incomes and in subsidies for the remaining 3½ months of 1973.

This is not insubstantial. We believe these measures should be enacted into law. This is particularly true in the area of petroleum policy. For the first time this government has agreed, even though there is now danger of its reneging, on the removal of the Ottawa Valley line for petroleum products which was imposed on Canada by the last Tory government. For the first time the Liberal government has accepted the idea of a two-price system and a national marketing board. All these things are important to the future of this country.

I want to repeat what I said in this House last Tuesday when commenting on the Prime Minister's statement. Everyone now agrees, including members of the Conservative party, that the problem of rising prices is a complicated one, partly influenced by international supply and demand factors, partly by deficiencies in the world monetary system. This is largely aggravated by the monopoly power of the large corporations, most of them multinational. I say, Mr. Speaker, that is why I cannot accept these simplistic, inadequate and ill-defined slogans produced by the Tories.

In order to really get at the roots of the problem, we will require long-term changes, not only in our own country but in the world economy. To play politics with the issue, as is now being done by some members in this House, to pretend that there is a simple, quick solution to this problem, is to abdicate all pretense at honesty and to abdicate our responsibility as members of parliament.

This is not to say, as we have said on many occasions, that we are powerless. In addition to the increases in old age pensions and in family allowances, in addition to the subsidies announced for bread and milk, in addition to action in areas of oil and gasoline, we have proposed other policies which in our view could be of immediate value to reduce the rise in the cost of living as well as the hardships which people of Canada feel as a result. I believe they are practical and honest policies instead of gimmicks.

We have suggested on a number of occasions selective controls that can and would work in areas which have a significant impact on consumer expenditure, and in areas where specific action could bring needed relief to consumers. Secondly, we have urged that in order to implement these selective controls we must have a new Prices Review Board, which members of the Conservative party have voted against and opposed. We must have a new Prices Review Board with jurisdiction over all commodities and with the power to impose price ceilings or rollbacks in cases of excess corporate profit or gouging of the consumers.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Lewis: We have asked time and again, and the government has this authority, that the federal government direct all federally chartered financial institutions to allocate a certain proportion of their annual investment to housing at much lower interest rates than the present usurious rates under which Canadians are suffering.

We have proposed an excess profits tax to discourage or penalize the corporate gouging which is now taking place, as I will show in a moment. For families on welfare we have urged the federal government to assume 100 per cent, or at least 75 per cent, of the cost of increased welfare payments under the Canada Assistance Plan.

I say to you that these measures, when joined with measures of adequate support prices for the farmers of Canada in order to increase the supply of farm products, would have an immediate effect on the cost of living, would assist the people of Canada without storing up immense dangers as soon as the so-called freeze and controls, now proposed by the Conservative party, are lifted.

We are convinced that these are fair and practical proposals that would work. They require action in my view to curb the power and the profits of corporations, many of them multinational, which are taking advantage of the present crisis atmosphere which they themselves did much to create.

It is important to note that, as far as the NDP is concerned, at a time when most Canadians are feeling the pinch, corporate profits have been soaring at an unprecedented rate. This is an area that only New Democrats are willing to attack, but it is a crucial area.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Lewis: Let me put as quickly as possible some of the profit figures on the record. In the area of food, Weston, in the six months ending August 30 had an increase in profits over the same period last year of 63 per cent, with an increase in sales of only 17 per cent. B.C. Packers had an increase of 125 per cent in their profits and a sales increase of only 25 per cent. Silverwood Industries in the second quarter had an increase of 107 per cent and an increase in sales of only 10 per cent. Maple Leaf Mills in the six months ending June 30 had an increase of 111 per cent. Dominion Stores had an increase in the second quarter of 92.6 per cent with a 13 per cent increase in sales.

Let me put certain figures on the record in respect of banks, Mr. Speaker. The Toronto-Dominion Bank for three months ending July 31 had a profit increase of 50 per cent; the Bank of Montreal 46 per cent, the Bank of Nova Scotia 14 per cent, the Royal Bank 26 per cent and the Banque Canadienne Nationale 78 per cent. Indeed, Mr. Speaker, the increases this year are on top of an increase in 1972 over 1971 of more than 20 per cent for all the banks in Canada. In the five years from 1966 to 1971 their profit increase was a total of 85.3 per cent, higher than in any other segment of the Canadian economy. For that reason there is no excuse for increasing the interest rates, as the Minister of Finance (Mr. Turner) has permitted, thereby increasing bank profits.

Gulf announced an increase of four cents a gallon at their controlled and owned retail outlets. Despite this announcement it had a second quarter increase in profit of 67 per cent over the same period last year. Not only do these oil companies rip-off Canadians through depreciation allowances, tax deferrals and government handouts of every kind, but they also gouge the Canadian people at the pump, and this is where action is needed.

Let me speak for a moment about the field of housing, because every Canadian who wants to own a home is now suffering. The Cadillac Development Corporation for the first six months ending June 30 had an increase of 45 per cent in profits after taxes. The Campeau Company enjoyed an increase of 65 per cent after taxes. Monarch Investment Limited had an increase in profits of 110 per cent. Malborough Properties Limited had an increase of 284 per cent in profits, and Canadian Interurban Properties Limited enjoyed an increase in profits of 182 per cent. I say to you that these are unconscionable and ought not to be permitted by this government.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Lewis: I have cited some increases in profits in the fields of food, housing, banks and oil and gas only as examples. These increases in profits have a direct impact on the expenses of the Canadian consumer, and only action to stop this profit gouging will assist the Canadian consumer. This is clear evidence of a corporate ripoff, and is clear evidence of the need for an excess profits tax or other measures to end this callous profiteering. I do not say it would end inflation. I have never suggested that for the proposals we have made, but it would produce some fairness and equity for our people. This is also clear evidence that selective rollbacks which we have suggested are both possible and practical and ought to be imposed by a properly constituted Prices Review Board.

I am watching the time, Mr. Speaker, and I see that I have only about three minutes left. Let me in those three minutes deal very quickly in a little more detail with the proposals put forward by the Leader of the Official Opposition.

The fact is that there was a freeze in the United Kingdom in 1961 and in 1966. There was a freeze in Australia in 1962 and a freeze in Denmark in 1963. There was a freeze in the United States in 1972. In every case these policies failed and not only failed, Sir, but the results of these policies were disastrous for the people of those countries after the controls were removed. They have not worked and they will not work, Mr. Speaker. Furthermore, they are totally unfair; they lock into permanent position the inequities of present income distribution.

Had the Conservatives had their way, the freeze for the farmer—despite what they say about stopping at the farm gate which even they know is a sham—would have taken place many months ago. Where would the farmers be now in light of the increase in international prices? Had the Tories had their way, imagine the situation we would have been in with the railway strike. The railway workers would have been frozen into their inadequate wages. As a political necessity, the Leader of the official Opposition even moved for an increase in the wage rate provision of the bill that was presented to this House.

The fact is that we have not suffered and are not suffering now from cost-push inflation, Mr. Speaker. The fact is that the cost of living for the past number of months has barely kept up with the increase in the wages and the wage demands across this country. It is not the worker who is responsible, it is not the farmer who is responsible and the policy presented by the Conservatives is directed at punishing the worker and the farmer.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Lewis: We reject that kind of approach, Mr. Speaker, because it is unfair and unworkable. I ask the Leader of the Opposition to tell this House and the people of Canada how he would freeze prices on imported foods—fruits such as oranges, grapefruit, bananas, and vegetables like lettuce and tomatoes as well as tea, coffee, cocoa and sugar. All of these are imported. How would the Leader of the Opposition impose a freeze on the price of these imported foods that enter into the cost of living of the Canadian people? How would he impose a freeze on the cost of imported machinery or on the price of homes? Mr. Speaker, I suggest to you—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. I am sorry to interrupt the hon. member but the time allotted to him has expired.

Is it agreed that the hon. member be granted extra time?

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: It is not agreed. The hon. member for Témiscamingue (Mr. Caouette).

Mr. Réal Caouette (Témiscamingue): Mr. Speaker, some years ago we had a premier out west by the name of William Aberhart who had this to say to the people of Alberta: "If you have not suffered enough, it is your God given privilege to suffer some more."

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker, having heard the leader of the New Democratic Party (Mr. Lewis), I would be inclined to repeat exactly the same thing.

Last evening, I say a film shot in some Canadian mines as well as in certain Chilean ones. In Chili, three years ago, President Allende spoke almost in the same terms as the leader of the New Democratic Party this afternoon: against profits, for nationalization.

Mr. Lewis: I did not refer to nationalization.

Mr. Caouette (Témiscamingue): Mr. Speaker, last evening, I heard President Allende of Chili speak against large corporations and in favour of nationalization. The largest Chilean mines have been nationalized, but I learned yesterday that Noranda Mines Limited received 22,000 tons of ore from Chili to be refined in Noranda bacause Chili is not equipped to do it. Such is the socialist democracy in Chili.

Mr. Speaker, I have only 20 minutes, but the democratic socialism of Chili is the same as the democratic socialism advocated in Canada. I'll come back to that later with evidence, comparisons between profits gained by Chilian corporations before and after nationalization, to show clearly to the NDP leader and his colleagues the unreliability of their promises.

Mr. Speaker, we are now considering a non confidence motion. The Leader of the Official Opposition (Mr. Stanfield) could have suggested a better way to spend this day, for instance, by passing a measure to better family allowances as well as higher pensions for those on fixed incomes, to improve the consumers' purchasing power and to discuss it objectively.

Mr. Speaker, I am grateful to the Leader of the Official Opposition for inviting us, quite politely and with a smile, to support his motion. And yet, he should have thought of that when he was in the Eastern Townships and stated—I think he was accompanied by the hon. member for Brome-Missisquoi (Mr. Grafftey)—in Magog and Sherbrooke: a vote for Caouette is wasted. It is only a protest vote. It is only a useless vote. When you vote for the Social Credit Party, you are wasting your time. And today—look at the Leader of the Official Opposition smile—he is asking us to vote in favour of his motion which reads as follows:

> That this House has no confidence in the adequacy of government measures to deal with the cost of living as such measures were announced to the House by the Prime Minister on September 4th, 1973.

What does he suggest? Nothing. What does he do? Nothing. He protests, just as he accuses us of doing outside parliament. We protest and he says that the votes we get are wasted.

Mr. Speaker, when it comes to consequence, the Leader of the Opposition is hard to beat. I have been watching him quite often on TV since last election. The CBC invites him on both English and French networks. They invite him on radio for interviews and press conferences. When journalists—there are some in the gallery—ask the Leader of the Opposition: What have you to offer as against what the government is proposing? He tells them frankly: I suggest a comprehensive policy. But what is a comprehensive program, Mr. Speaker?

And if they ask the Leader of the Official Opposition what attitude he will adopt, he answers: a comprehensive attitude. But when asked what he thinks about the future of his party, he says: We hope it will be comprehensive.

When asked about the cost of living, what he would do about bringing it down or keeping it from increasing, he says: We are going to introduce a comprehensive program. That is the word I have heard him say almost every day over the last year. But comprehensive as to what, one does not know.

The government offers the farmers $1.25 more per bushel of wheat. When he is asked how much he is going to give, the Leader of the Opposition says it will be something comprehensive. But about milk at $1.05 more per hundredweight for dairy producers, when asked how far will you go, he says we are going to study that in a comprehensive way.

Mr. Speaker, will the price freeze be comprehensive? Is that his program? I understand that his motion is right, when it says that the government is not going far enough; it is clear that it is not going far enough, but how far are they willing to go? That is what we do not know.

Therefore, I would rather settle for a better pension, increased allowances than not knowing where I am going. That is what the Leader of the Opposition should know.

Mr. Speaker, tonight we shall see him again on television, and he will say: Parliament was not comprehensive. The New Democratic Party, the Créditistes do not understand anything.

Mr. Speaker, when we proposed to increase the old age pension to $200 per month, at 60, the Leader of the Opposition voted against it. He was not very comprehensive, he did not understand then. The New Democratic Party says: We have led the minority government. The NDP also voted against granting pensions at 60. We would like to see that included in the progressive conservative motion.

When we asked for interest-free loans to the provinces—something we are still asking for—to alleviate somewhat the situation in which the provinces find themselves, they voted against our proposal. When my colleagues and myself asked for interest-free loans from the Bank of Canada, which is our financial institution, the leader of the opposition objected, as did the NDP and the Liberals. The Minister of Transport (Mr. Marchand) and the Minister of Finance (Mr. Turner) voted against it.

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): Oh, oh.

Mrs. Sauvé: They are not understanding.

Mr. Caouette (Témiscamingue): Well, yes, Mr. Speaker: I ask interest-free loans to fight against inflation. The Liberals, as the minister said—and she is right—are not much more understanding that the Leader of the Official Opposition.

● (1630)

Mr. Speaker, interest-free loans to fight inflation, this is why we are here, and I will give you an example.

Only 15 days ago, the Quebec premier went to the United States to borrow $100 million for the James Bay project, at a rate of interest of 10 per cent, for 25 years. This means that 25 years from now we shall have paid $250 million for interest payments alone and that we shall still owe $100 million on the capital. On what is this loan from the Americans based?

Mr. Speaker, they say: We must go to the United States. If the James Bay project was not profitable, premier Bourassa could not even borrow a quarter from the United States. On what is the loan based? On actual value, on the natural resources represented by James Bay. If the accounting was done by the Bank of Canada instead of by the Americans, the Quebec government, like that of other provinces in the same circumstances, would save $250 million in 25 years.

Newspapermen will not mention that. They will mention the motion, which contains nothing. That is absolute non-sense. Indeed it says that the government does not go far enough. We know that, as a matter of fact everybody knows that. It is requested that that motion be adopted, but no alternative is offered.

Mr. Speaker, we advocate loans without interest from the Bank of Canada. The assistance we give to India is in the form of new loans without interest for 60 years.

At the present time, the Bank of Canada is authorized to make available loans to Canadian provinces up to 25 per cent of their budgets, under sections 13 and 20, but for six-month periods only. Mr. Speaker, what can a province do in six months? It is being placed in an impossible situation. That is why it does not deal with the Bank of Canada. But if the words "six months" were to be replaced by "25 years", all the provinces of Canada would ask the Bank of Canada for credit according to the possibilities of developing their natural ressources. This is beyond the government's comprehension.

Mr. Speaker, we are eagerly looking forward to the awarding of these pensions suggested by the government so as to provide a better fate to our old people. But such a pension should be paid to the 60 year olds, and even if the spouse has not reached that age he or she should be eligible for it.

The law provides for higher family allowances but soon these will not be sufficient.

Mr. Speaker, to keep on paying production grants when we have already too much production, this is not the problem. We find it in the field of consumption where the purchasing power is not sufficient to permit the acquirement of already existing products. This is what we Créditistes are suggesting and advocating.

When I or my colleagues are talking about the Bank of Canada some find it funny but we will have to come to that. Parliament will come to such a solution as it has been compelled to increase pensions above $100 a month; yet we made everybody laugh here when we were advocating them.

Some of my colleagues will be elaborating on the Tory motion; there is no party line about it. Those who will want to vote for it will be free to do so, just as those who will want to vote against it, but the point I want to make is that this motion represents a loss of a day for the House, a day that we could have used to discuss family allowances or other fields of Canadian economic activity. Indeed the problem is economic. We could have discussed that issue seriously instead of losing a day, waiting to have that opposition day after the normal resumption in October. But no. The leader of the opposition announces and informs us two days in advance that the non confidence motion in the government will be there.

I am not confident that the government will solve the present problem. No. I have no more confidence in the Tories who were in office before and did not solve the problem of inflation or unemployment in Canada.

Inflation, Mr. Speaker, we know we have plenty of; the only thing is that inflation is not in the pockets of the consumers but in government taxes first of all and that same government will suggest tax increases. And as the tax increases are reflected in prices, prices will go up again. Whether there is a freeze or not, prices will rise and the consumer will pick up the tab.

The Creditists are logical when they ask for new credits, not credits or money taken in the pockets of Canadians but new credits based on the real wealth of Canada, at the Bank of Canada. That is where we can find the credits which are necessary for the development of our country, to enable us to deal effectively with inflation, with the rise in the cost of living, and to give new structures to an economic system which would help the population instead of penalizing it as is now the case.

Mr. Speaker, we will not prevent the increases in old age security pensions or in family allowances but we suggest that the government—the Minister of Finance in particular—seriously consider the solution put forward by the Creditists that credits from the Bank of Canada should establish some balance between the purchasing power of the Canadian consumer and the tremendous production in Canada. We would then have economic security with fullest personal freedom.

[English]

Mr. James Gillies (Don Valley): Mr. Speaker, I rise to participate in what I had expected would be one of the most important debates on which this parliament might embark. I have discovered, having listened to three previous speakers, that that is not to be the case.

I want to comment briefly on the remarks of the leader of the New Democratic Party who has a penchant for going around the country asking people to be honest in their approach. I find it far from honest for a man to stand up and say that a party that has espoused a program of income policies is dishonest and playing cheap politics when most countries in the world today that are fighting inflation are using everything they can, including an incomes policy. Indeed, it was totally dishonest of him, in reciting the record of inflation in various countries with income policies, to say that they do not work, as the country with the lowest rate of inflation in the world, Australia, happens to have an incomes policy at present. It is not a question of honesty one way or another.

The leader of the New Democratic Party talked about increases in profits and so on, and said there is no cost-push inflation in the economy. Most people would say that the evidence of the existence of a large cost-push inflation in this economy is the fact profits have gone up as high as they have. In many instances, high profits are a result of administered prices—the very thing you want to stop with an incomes policy.

I also want to say that I find he has a peculiar interpretation of the way parliament should work. The New Democratic Party does not believe the Liberal policies are working effectively, but says they cannot vote against them because they do not like ours. That is not a decision for the New Democratic Party. It is a decision for the country.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Gillies: The leader of the New Democratic Party said today that his party does not believe what is being done about inflation in this country and the way in which the economy is being managed is adequate, appropriate and effective. If that is the position they want to take, that is fine. However, they should not weasel out of it by some theory of parliamentary responsibility, that it is their job to keep parliament here. It is not their job to make that choice. That is a job for the people of Canada.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Gillies: In his speech, the Minister of Finance (Mr. Turner) gave us the same interpretation of inflation and the operation of the economy as he has in the past. He talked about the fantastic rate of growth and the increase in jobs and the percentage rate of increase. He forgets that only two and a half or three years ago, we had 7.2 per cent unemployment in this country, the highest rate in the industrialized world. If the government had not done anything, and it did practically nothing, one would have expected some type of growth to take place in the Canadian economy because of the increase in the rest of the world.

The minister found it strange that we would support the measures the government brought forward as a type of anti-inflationary policy, and then be opposed to the way in which they are approaching the whole situation. Of course, we support the proposition that people who are being hurt, and suffering severely from the ravages of inflation be assisted. Since the government has no policies to cope with inflation, the Canadian people need support and help.

If this government or this country thinks that the way to solve the problem of inflation is to constantly change our social security benefits, we are in for terrible trouble indeed. Even more important, the people we are trying to protect will never be protected properly. There has never been a time in the history of this or any other parliament when we have been able to change our pension and social security programs rapidly enough to take care of the people who are hurt badly in situations of this kind. Of course, we support those propositions, but I want to make it clear that in doing so, under no circumstances do we think that the government has any policy, program or understanding of what inflation is all about.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Gillies: There is one other point I wish to make before I get into my main speech. There are statements being made in this country, some of which can be terribly harmful for all Canadians in the future. The proposition being seriously advanced as we approach the last quarter of the 20th century is that we may have serious economic problems and there is nothing that can be done about them. The proposition that we cannot do something about our monetary and fiscal policies or exchange rate policies to deal with a problem like inflation is a charade, a canard. Putting that proposition before the Canadian people can only do the nation great harm.

It will do us great harm if, when there is an issue that needs to be faced in this nation with worldwide ramifications, we sit around and say that nothing can be done. As I read through Hansard of the 1930's, I believe the approach of this present government, namely that nothing can be done, is exactly the type of approach they would have taken during the worldwide depression at that time.

Surely, we are not prepared to accept the proposition that there is nothing a government can do to work out the economic problems which may beset a nation in a particular time. Indeed, much of the progress that has been made in the world in the past 25 years has been as a result of the fact that governments' have accepted the responsibility of full employment and reasonable price stability. At the end of World War II, the great fear in this country and throughout the industrial world was of unemployment. Governments decided that never again would any nation have to pay the price of worldwide depression, and they used monetary and fiscal policies to prevent one. In the past 25 years, we have had increased growth and prosperity for most people. The problem now is to keep that growth and full employment along with reasonable price stability.

I cannot accept for a second the argument of the Minister of Finance that the fact the real standard of living for Canadians has increased means we do not have to do anything about inflation. We can pay the price of 2, or 3 per cent inflation for full employment. However, when you get a rate of inflation that may well be 8 or 10 per cent in the next year, something has to be done about it, and something can be done about it with proper policies.

There are choices that can be put forward to the Canadian people on how to deal with this inflationary situation. One thing we, as a responsible parliament, cannot put forward is the proposition that we should not do anyting. The government's policy is to sit and wait, hoping that inflationary forces throughout the world will go away. The government hopes worldwide inflation will end and eventually something will be worked out, prices will fall, they will be in a better situation politically and perhaps the country will be in a better situation. That has to be the road to disaster. There has to be a recognition of a responsibility, which certainly any central government has to accept, of maintaining price stability.

The second choice, a choice which the liberal administration seemed to approve two or three years ago, is to fight inflation to slow down the economy. Obviously, inflation can be stopped in Canada if we are willing to accept the proposition we should raise taxes, reduce purchasing power and have a high interest policy. There would be no money available for small borrowers or for housing. Of course, this would slow down the economy. We could cure inflation through policies of that sort, but they are totally unacceptable. The price we would have to pay would be far too high.

The third thing we can do is accept the fact we have a responsibility toward inflation. We can use monetary and fiscal policies and exchange rate policies and supplement them with an incomes policy in order to get the expectations, about which my leader spoke under control. We can recognize, for good or ill, that something is wrong with the way in which we have been managing the economy of this country, not only during this inflationary period, but over the past three or four years.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Gillies: The fact is that one really cannot accept the proposition that a country as wealthy as Canada must accept an unemployment rate of 7.2 per cent, as was the situation two years ago, or that today the rate of inflation should be rising at one of the highest rates. As we all know, statistics can be used to support whatever argument one wishes to make, but recent statistics do suggest that the rate of inflation in the United States is substantially lower than it is in Canada. A few years ago, the rate of inflation in Canada was a good deal lower than it was in the United States. This, again, negates the argument that there is nothing we can do about the inflationary forces operating in our economy.

The Minister of Finance (Mr. Turner) and his department must recognize that great changes are taking place in world conditions and in the relationship between our economy and the economy of the rest of the world. We must shape our policies accordingly. The practice of the past 20 or 30 years, of saying we can operate the Canadian economy most effectively by an almost total reliance on a continental approach will never work in the same way from now on, and again I say this in no negative manner. The fact is, Mr. Speaker, we are so tied in, when it comes to economic policy, with policy-making in the United States that we do not really exercise an independent policy at all. When the United States devalues its currency, as it did some time ago, the Canadian dollar is devalued at the same time—against some countries it has been as much as 30 per cent. Did the Canadian economy need to be devalued by that amount in our domestic circumstances? The question is not whether we should float with the United States dollar because of the advantages of that relationship, but whether that float is operating in absolutely clean and appropriate fashion. People around the world ought to know, when they look at the balance of payments figures for Canada, that the Canadian exchange rate is reflecting changing trade patterns. Similarly, it is necessary for us to re-examine our monetary policy.

The Minister of Finance made much of the fact that short-term rates are low. But long-term rates are high. We shall not halt the inflationary trend until action is taken to deal with high rates of interest, particularly as they affect the key industry of housing, or restrict the flow of money to farmers and fishermen, for example, who need resources in order to operate effectively. We need to examine the causes giving rise to such large short-term capital flow; we need to determine whether this situation is good for the economy. It is hard to make a case for the Canadian economy being better off as a result of the heavy amount of short-term capital flow taking place over the past years. In Canada, one can predict changes in interest rates by noting what the Federal Reserve Board does in the United States. It is, no doubt, important to watch this relationship closely, but it might well be the case that the monetary policies which Canada needs are quite different from those required by the United States.

The solution is, of course, a short-term interest equalization tax. Such a tax is not unusual. Most countries in the world have adopted this device as a means of maintaining independent economic policies. In developing fiscal and tax policy it seems to me we should make sure that whatever is done will lead to the benefit of all Canadians and to the expansion of the economy. We have asked the Minister of Finance many times to tell us what has been the effect of the cut in corporate income tax from 49 per cent to 40 per cent, its relationship to Canadian investment and its use by parent firms operating outside Canada. We were never given that information. The point I wish to make is that the Canadian economy, as it is operating today, has greatly changed as compared with ten years ago, or even five years ago, and policies must reflect that situation.

We must find some way of supplementing monetary, fiscal and exchange rate policies, geared to ensuring full employment without inflation with other programs. Many countries are adopting incomes policies at the present time. The position taken last February by the Progressive Conservative party was that in a contemporary economy a large degree of "cost-push" inflation would exist. It is still present in the Canadian economy. We are often reminded that 25 per cent of our GNP is generated outside the economy. The fact remains that 75 per cent is generated inside the economy, and it is possible to design an incomes policy which would set the permissible rates of increase in wages, prices and profits in such a way as to curb inflationary pressures. We simply cannot permit prices to rise when there is no competition in the marketplace, and the only way of attacking this situation is through an incomes policy. I find it strange that the government would not recognize the need for such a policy at this time.

There is no way in which the Conservative party or, indeed, the people of Canada, can accept the proposition that there is nothing which can be done about inflation. To take this attitude is wrong. If the government would only provide leadership in devising new and constructive policies to deal with fiscal arrangements, exchange rates and so on, the people would be more than willing to support an incomes policy, particularly if the administration opposite would also moderate its own expenditures and order its priorities more carefully. And, I may add, if it showed much more exactitude in the forecasting of its deficits and surpluses—the problems could be dealt with more expeditiously. We apparently had the incredible situation last year of operating with a deficit in the middle of a high inflationary situation because the forecasts were apparently not correct; we did not know where we stood. There needs to be a great improvement in the operation of our economic forecasting machinery.

In conclusion, Mr. Speaker, it seems to me that the issue we are debating today is this: can the government do anything about inflation, or is it enough to say: Don't worry; we shall make adjustments in the social security programs; the real income of Canadians has risen, and inflation does not present any particular problem. As I listened to the speech made by the Minister of Finance, I had the impression that neither he nor his colleagues had been in touch with the people of this country; that they feel, in fact, no problem is facing us. Mr. Speaker, one does not have to look up statistics to realize that a major problem exists in the Canadian economy today. More important, one does not have to be very seriously involved in the interpretation of economic events to know that the major inroads of inflation can be countered only if the government takes the necessary steps to re-examine its policies with respect to monetary matters, taxation, the exchange rate, and if it has the good sense to consider an incomes policy. Surely, Canadians must not have to live with 8 per cent inflation for much longer.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

• (1700)

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, I listened with a great deal of interest to the hon. member for Don Valley (Mr. Gillies). Because of his background in economic subjects I have tried for many months to listen to him. I sympathize with him because once again I find he has proved the adage that it is difficult to sound sensible and like a Progressive Conservative at the same time.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Horner (Crowfoot): That is pretty weak.

Mr. Lang: The hon. gentleman began with the promise that he was going to give the Minister of Finance (Mr. Turner) some advice about how our economic policies should be developed. He had a little trouble, as does his party, in knowing which quarter of the century he was in, because he thought he was in the fourth quarter of the century. Then, in the course of his advice to the Minister of Finance, he clearly indicated that there was a solution to this problem of inflation that the world is facing. I quote his advice to the Minister of Finance which was "to find some way". At the same time, he gave some other advice to the government, which so far as I can see was to advise us to have high interest rates as well as low interest rates. Presumably, the high interest rates were designed to assist the Canadian dollar, and low interest rates were advocated because they are much more popular than high interest rates. So, the hon. member indicated we should have both at the same time.

This, of course, reminds one of the history of the hon. member, and that of his party, who suggested a little earlier during the budget debate that at the same time as we turn up the fire under the kettle we hold the lid on. As I recall his criticism, I believe he only asked for an extra $1 billion deficit, whereas his colleagues upped it to $2 billion in the speeches that followed. The fact of the matter is that the world is in the grip of a rapidly rising price situation. The fact is also that the most significant factor is the rapid rise in the price of food. That is true in this country and it is true in other countries as well.

There has been growing talk of an inflation psychology. I suggest most seriously to hon. members, and to the people of this country, that a good portion of the rise in the price of food should not really be treated as an ordinary price rise similar to that which has taken place in every other sector over a period of time, or indeed that is taking place even now. A good portion of the rise in food prices is an overdue adjustment of income to farmers in Canada who produce grain and meat for market.

It is of particular importance that these adjustments have taken place. Adjustments of a similar magnitude compared with other price rises need not and will not take place in the future, but the adjustment that has taken place to date is overdue. I say that because it is important that other sectors in this country should not believe that they somehow have to try to catch up to the over-all price increases that are taking place in this country, including the increase in the price of food. This would be an attempt simply to take back for the more protected—those on higher incomes—all the gain that has been made by giving farmers a better income return, as well indeed as other gains being made under this Liberal government by the low income earners in this country.

The figures, even at a relatively brief glance, indicate what has been happening in the food sector of agriculture. I refer to such figures as the percentage of total family expenditure on food compared to total expenditure, which decreased from 21 per cent of income in 1964 to 17.6 per cent of income in 1969. I refer to the further fact that from 1967 to 1971, the food price portion of the consumer price index increased by approximately 11 per cent, while the total consumer price index increased by 16 per cent.

Nor does that tell the whole story. Within the food price index a significant number of elements, such as workers in food processing, transportation, selling, retailing and so on, were themselves receiving a fairer average increase in return for their effort. The person who was left without adequate return was the producer of grains and animal products, particularly of those products over which this country has least control because of the importance of the international market.

Therefore, it is an important fact that a good portion of the recent food price increase represents an overdue increase in return to the producer of animal products, grains and meat, and it is good that this has been so. But it ought not to be taken back by demands made in other sectors, particularly those with the highest level of protection, through wage gains. Again I emphasize that I do not include those in low-paid fields. Whether through wage negotiations or as a result of additional government assistance, such as an increase in family allowances, I hope we will be able to protect them better and better in terms of the distribution of income in this country.

During this period of difficulty for the producers we have over the years been taking certain action to assist the income of farmers. We made a beginning, and we hope to continue to improve this beginning, towards making more secure the outlook of the producer of agricultural products. Let me remind hon. members that in 1969 we fixed the domestic price for wheat at $1.95½, and this at a time when the price in the world was dropping below that figure. It dropped approximately 30 cents below that price for a time.

During this period of time, the Canadian consumer was asked to pay this modest amount more for his wheat products which he purchased on the market. Then, two years ago, we introduced the two-price system, with an additional $1.04½ for every bushel of wheat consumed in Canada, in order to bring to $3 the return to the Canadian grain farmer on his domestic wheat. In this way, we had a continuation of the payment by the consumer over international prices of some 20 cents to 30 cents and a payment from the treasury, in the form of assistance to the income of farmers, of $1.04½.

Recent price increases in the world have brought wheat prices beyond that level, and now seemed to be an opportune time to look at giving more additional security to the grain farmer in relation to his wheat sales in the domestic market. Again, I emphasize that I am talking about the domestic market, which perhaps involved only one bushel to eight or one bushel to 10 in relation to the volume of export wheat we ordinarily handle. It is this 10 per cent or 12 per cent which we have under our own control on which we can give some protection to our wheat producers.

At the same time, we can give the consumer some immediate or short-term relief against further increases beyond any level that anyone might have dreamed of several months ago. We can do so by offering to the producer a $3.25 floor on the basis of No. 1 CW wheat in Thunder Bay, which again is much higher than anyone might have dreamed of several months ago. I should remind hon. members that until this year, as shown by the Wheat Board annual report, no total return to farmers on their wheat had exceeded a $2 figure, and we are putting into this seven year arrangement a floor of $3.25 which will therefore be a transfer from the consumer to the producer at any time when world prices drop below that level.

Our specific proposal is that the arrangement for several years for spring wheat, and consequently for related wheats, will be in the range of $3.25 to $5, a floor and a ceiling. This is an arrangement which, if it were offered to us and available to us on an international basis, would be considered to be very good indeed for our Canadian farmers. In the case of Durum, because of the current special world price situation, we propose to enter into the arrangement with the same floor of $3.25 per bushel, recognizing the long-term close relationship between spring wheat and Durum, but a ceiling of $7.50 per bushel.

In order that not all of this be passed on to the consumer, as it was about to be had we not acted earlier this month, we propose to pay to the producer through the Wheat Board in the case of the bulk of the wheat produced in the Prairies, and in another manner direct to the producer or indirect, $1.75 per bushel on the grain consumed in Canada. The Wheat Board therefore will be pricing spring wheat throughout the seven year period at $3.25 to the millers, Durum at between $3.25 and $5.75 depending on the world price, and the treasury will pay up to $1.75 in all cases where the price of wheat is higher than the maximum limits. This $1.75, which amounts to a total of approximately $100 million at its maximum, is a direct consumer subsidy designed to hold the price of bread at present levels and avoid unnecessary increases due to the price of wheat, and will be paid to the producer because of the agreement which gives him the range of $3.25 to $5 on spring wheat.

Hon. members have asked about the manner of putting this into effect and about security. It is my hope and expectation that at an early point in time we can come before the House of Commons with a bill to set up for the seven year period the treasury payments which are involved in this program.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Lang: It is because it is a seven year program that it is so attractive to our producers. It is part of our over-all program in assuring step by step additional income and security to our producers of grain and animal products.

In our recent August 3 announcement of a feed grain policy for Canada, very important commitments to a storage program and to a guaranteed price program were included. Hon. members are well aware of our view that a major grain stabilization program is essential to give long term security to our farmers. The Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau), in a statement the other day, indicated at a federal-provincial meeting of ministers of agriculture that additional stabilization programs on other products will be discussed because it is true that the most important thing for a producer of animals and for meat production in this country is the assurance that prices tomorrow, the day after and the day after that, will be at reasonable levels which take into consideration the costs and the risks of the producer. No one should really suggest that today in this country meat is over-priced so far as the producer is concerned. In fact, with feed grain and protein prices being where they are he needs at least this amount. But what he needs even more than a fair return at present is an assurance that his return in the future is secure. If it is, he will stay in the business of producing animal products for this country in the best way he can. This is a sensible program of action.

As with the program on oil and gas announced by the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources (Mr. Macdonald), it is always important to move forward in a certain way, and then to discuss matters that are involved with the provinces. That is what we have done here. We acted directly and immediately with that part of the program on which we could act, and then we proceeded to consult the provinces with regard to the longer term parts of the program. We are criticized on the one hand for acting without consultation, but hon. members opposite should imagine what they would have said if we had talked about consultations and meetings without having acted on a program.

We have acted on a program to deal with the problems of people who, like the farmers, need income adjustment and whose income adjustment should not be counted as part of the over-all price increase in the country. That is the way in which this government will continue to move in dealing with the problems of this country.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prince Albert): Mr. Speaker, I had intended to make a different kind of speech on this occasion, and having the privilege of following the Minister of Justice (Mr. Lang) I hope I will be excused if I devote most of my time to endeavouring to interpret what he had to say. It is very difficult to understand. Of course, he was able to convince the Leader of the NDP (Mr. Lewis) by his statements last fall when together they got into that form of philosophical discussion that resulted in a union then, and has since become a rather unusual union. I was very much interested in the speech of the leader of the NDP. He wrapped himself in the garments or righteousness, and he was able to place before the House the concept "if you would see perfection, see me". I always like to hear him debate because he is able to speak with clarity and with an unusual ability to get around facts, but at the same time to leave the impression of being entirely logical without possessing that quality.

● (1720)

I immediately want to give high marks to the Minister of Justice for that philosophical discussion that took place a few days after the election when he sought converse with the Leader of the NDP, not to convert but to understand. Apparently, as a result of that discussion, he was able to bring about that unity that has prevailed throughout the ensuing days. Some day I will deal with the leader of the NDP and shall read some of the sonorous statements he uttered with leonine gestures concerning what he would do with the government if it did not do what he wanted. The government has not done these thing but now, following a meeting with the pride of lions in the causus, the lion has become an adoring lamp. He does not like what the government is doing, but "my goodness we are going to support it". He even ancitipated what Her Majesty's Loyal Opposition was going to advance and issued a pronunciamento on Saturday to the effect that they would stand with the government. Nothing to equal that has been seen since the days of Damon and Pythias. He votes with the government not because of what the government is doing but because only in joining with the government is there survival for the NDP.

Now, I have a word for the Minister of Finance (Mr. Turner). I have great admiration for his facility of speech, for his ability to read the most difficult financial terms and for the fact that he is equally proficient in both languages. I greatly admire his ability to say that they have not done anything, but certainly have plans in mind for the future, and then say that the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Stanfield) does not know what he is talking about.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Diefenbaker: I am glad to note that there is some applause. "He doesn't know what he is talking about". They borrowed 40 per cent of his ideas in respect of the economy during the last three months.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Diefenbaker: What is the government solution as enunciated by the Minister of Finance? This reminds me that the government's attitude concerning the soaring cost of living is analogous to the driver of a fast moving car going downhill who finding that the brakes are not working, opens up the door and endeavours to put his feet on the roadway to slow down the speed. There is nothing in their policy which will meet the problem. The hon. member for Don Valley (Mr. Gillies) was able to analyse the situation with a clarity and with a knowledge of economics which was unanswerable. Therefore, the Minister of Justice did not find it necessary to deal with it. The Minister of Justice says his policy is an excellent one. Which policy—the one enunciated 8 days ago, the revised version of five days ago or the revised version of the revised version of Saturday in Winnipeg?

What do western leaders say concerning this policy? Well, I have here a quotation from the leader of the NDP in Saskatchewan, but possibly it would arouse the antagonism of the leader of the NDP in this House. He said according to a recent press release:

"I am disappointed that the first areas of price controls seem to be agricultural products.

"I understand and appreciate that these prices should be controlled. Consumers should be protected from soaring food prices but it shouldn't be at the expense of the farmer."

Usually, the leader of the NDP is willing to control everyone but labour. He goes on to say:

"If farmers are subject to ceiling on their prices, they should have selective price controls on their costs—

They applaud that in the NDP and vote for a government that is not doing it.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Diefenbaker: Lest anyone think that the views of Premier Blakeney might be regarded with some suspicion, I now wish to quote the words of the leader of the Liberal party in Saskatchewan, Mr. Steuart. He is one of the proteges of the Minister of Justice. He says:

"I can't see that the farmer should in any way subsidize any food commodity.

"For years and years the western farmer was forced to sell his grain for Canadian consumption as well as world-wide consumption at whatever price he could get on the world market. And we were told for years and years that that was the way it was.

"The world market was a dollar and a half, it didn't matter what the farmer's costs were, he had to take a dollar and a half.

"Now for the first time since World War II, for the first time in over a quarter of a century, the farmers are getting good prices for their commodity.

"And so we're sort of seeing a backlash where people are saying 'well we better put ceilings on these prices.'

"And I say no."

That is the leader of the Liberal party in Saskatchewan. I wonder whether the Minister of Justice consulted him. He did in the last election with tremendous success.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Diefenbaker: He won his own seat in the province. The question continues:

"And I say no. We're not putting ceilings on anything else. If the federal government wants to subsidize food prices, I say good. . . .

"But in no way should the western farmer or any farmers in Canada be asked to subsidize it."

What does the Minister of Justice say to that? What about this subsidy? The first hint of a subsidy, I think, was about five days ago.

Mr. Stanfield: Back in July.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Yes, but this is the revised version. They were going to hook the farmer for about $1.70 a bushel to subsidize the consumer. That is what the plan was.

Finally, there was the alteration outside the House of Commons of what he said on Friday, and I had questioned him on this. He said he was giving us the full story, but now there is a revised version. Under the plan as it is today, the western farmer producing wheat will be subsidizing the consumer of Canada by approximately 67½ to 72 cents a bushel. That is wrong. Any subsidy should be paid by the people of Canada as a whole, and not by the farmers of western Canada.

● (1730)

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Diefenbaker: The Minister of Justice enunciated with great gusto an illusory plan, not yet achieved, for a seven-year sale in advance. What is the experience we have had with him up to now? The government is going to put a ceiling on the farmer's wheat. That is what the Liberal party did during the last war. It restored the Wheat Board, having let it die, so it could put a ceiling on the price of wheat, and the farmer could not get the price that would otherwise have been available. Now the government is going to do it directly and put a ceiling on the farmer's wheat.

Has the minister forgotten the unholy mess his government made—not him, because he is merely a puppet of the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau)—in connection with the sale of our wheat all over the world at prices below the cost of production? That has been going on for the last several years; and the minister cannot deny it, as he sent a letter to his constituents and forgot to delete that part. Wheat was sold to the U.S.S.R. at a price lower than the cost of production. I am referring, not to a political record but to a government document issued in connection with customs operations, exports by commodities. It shows that they sold wheat to the U.S.S.R. at $1.73 per bushel when the asking price, on contract, in Vancouver at the time was $2.96. They sold wheat to the People's Republic of China for $1.97 at a time when the asking price was $2.92.

Mr. Lang: That is not true.

Mr. Diefenbaker: They sold wheat to Cuba at $1.75 when the asking price was $2.90. They got rid of the farmers' wheat at a price below the cost of production. Now the individual who initiated this says he has a new plan on behalf of the farmers.

Let me refer to other sales. They sold wheat to the U.S.S.R., again at $1.72 a bushel when when the going price was $2.97. They sold wheat to Cuba for $1.72, and to North Korea for $1.54. Isn't it strange how all these people got in on this deal? This has been going on. The minister and the government have been blind to the fact that there has been a population explosion all over the world and food should be produced to the geatest possible degree. We should also be able to expect governments, realizing the facts known to people all over the world, not to dump farmers' wheat at prices below the cost of production.

Mr. Horner (Crowfoot): They were giving their friends a good deal.

Mr. Diefenbaker: I mentioned this historic letter the minister wrote to his constituents, dated March 2, 1972. In this letter he sets out the record in respect of the parliamentary speech index so that all may read and all may know. Then he makes his own observations in handwriting. In this letter of March 2, he said he was attending a Minneapolis farm forum. That is where representatives of agricultural organizations in Canada and in the United States gather. He asked the Americans why we in Canada were selling grain below the cost of production, and then said we were ready for reasonable prices if they said the word. The farmers of western Canada were taken for a ride in respect of 400 million to 500 million bushels because of this policy of dumping our wheat all over the world at prices below the cost of production.

Some hon. Members: Shame!

Mr. Diefenbaker: The minister wants us now to forget. Let me mention one other thing. He has now arrived at the point where he is able to look seven years ahead.

An hon. Member: That is two years better than Russia usually does.

Mr. Diefenbaker: What was his record when he was only looking a year or so ahead? Has the western farmer forgotten the Lift program? When it was introduced, I suggested that the only individuals who would get a lift would be the western farmers, in the posterior; and that is what happened. The minister went all over the country and suggested a cut-down on production. He said this was necessary as there was no possibility of selling. At the same time, there were hundreds of millions of bushels of wheat stored—and they dumped it at fire sale prices all over the world, at the expense of the farmer. Was the minister right in respect of the Lift program? I suggest that was the greatest hoax and deception ever perpetrated on the western farmer.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Diefenbaker: Now the minister says, in effect, that this is all in the past, he has a new vision, he has seen the light. I suggest it was not a new light that he saw; it was the heat he found developing in western Canada that forced him to alter the unalterable. He enunciated a policy on Friday, he went to Winnipeg, he saw, he heard, and he ran. Now he has a policy developed under those circumstances and says that all we have to do is take his advice and the western farmers should fall into line.

Where are our wheat stocks today? Let me refer hon. members to this statement:

> The Wheat Board have not sold any wheat past December as apparently all available stocks have been allocated and they want to have some idea of the outturn and grades of this year's crops before making further sales.

The minister cannot challenge that statement because it comes from his seatmate's company, James Richardson and Sons, Limited. It is a wonder he did not let his seatmate whisper to him, telling him what the situation was. The statement goes on to mention that ships have been waiting, and so on. Let us go on to another matter in connection with the advice and the impenetrable mess that has been made of this situation. Farmers are again being taken for a ride. Until the last couple of days, and the revised version, the farmers' wheat was to be sold at $3.18 a bushel to the millers. Unsatisfied with having trimmed them under the Lift plan, he now wants the wheat farmers to subsidize the consumer. Let me tell him that in the last election there was one Liberal member returned in Saskatchewan. When the farmers realize this new policy, there will be a reduction to the minimum.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Horner (Crowfoot): Bye-bye, Otto.

Mr. Lang: You have said that before.

● (1740)

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Laniel): Order, please. I regret to interrupt the right hon. member, but the time allotted to him has expired.

Some hon. Members: Carry on.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Laniel): The right hon. member could continue with the unanimous consent of the House. Is there such consent?

An hon. Member: No.

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Cost of Living

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Laniel): There does not seem to be unanimous consent.

[Translation]

Mr. Corbin: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Laniel): The hon. member for Madawaska-Victoria (Mr. Corbin) is rising on a question of privilege.

Mr. Corbin: Mr. Speaker, I said no, and I said it as the member for Madawaska-Victoria and because the Leader of Official Opposition (Mr. Stanfield) refused to extend the time of the Miniter of Finance (Mr. Turner).

Mr. J.-Roland Comtois (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I am very pleased to participate in this debate because I will have the opportunity to complete some of the remarks made by the Minister of Finance (Mr. Turner) who was unfortunately interrupted when his time expired.

Although the government is constantly considering contingency measures to control prices and incomes, it has always concluded that in present circumstances, such controls would not bring any improvement and on the contrary could be disastrous.

Besides, the American experience in this connection is significant. The main cause of the inflationary pressures facing us is this worldwide unbalance between supply and demand, especially as far as farming products are concerned.

This problem cannot be solved effectively by the imposition of prices and incomes controls in our country. Controls do not encourage an increased production, on the contrary, they often have an opposite effect.

[English]

Mr. Speaker, the aim of the long series of government policies has been to encourage an increase in supply through expansion of our productivity in an effort to get to the root of the inflationary problem, to ease the pressure of rising prices on the budgets of Canadian families, particularly those on low and fixed incomes, and to prevent any efforts that may be made to exploit inflation by profiteering at the expense of the Canadian people. These policies are not band-aids, as the Conservative opposition describes them, but carefully selected, co-ordinated and comprehensive policies aimed at best achieving the objectives I have just outlined.

The budget of the Minister of Finance (Mr. Turner) of last February, together with that of the previous May, were designed to contribute in a major way to maximizing the supply of goods produced by our nation and minimizing the adverse impact of worldwide inflation on the Canadian people. The Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Stanfield) chooses to characterize the budget of last February as a "sick joke". I would like to remind the House that when the Minister of Finance forecast in the budget that real growth of the Canadian economy this year would be in the order of 7 per cent, the Conservative leader and members of his party also thought that was a joke.

Cost of Living

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Laniel): Order, please. The hon. member for Cape Breton-East Richmond (Mr. MacInnis) rises on a point of order.

Mr. MacInnis (Cape Breton-East Richmond): Mr. Speaker, I rise on this occasion, as I have on a number of occasions previously, with respect to the reading of speeches. Where the member is reading figures or statistics from a prepared document, that is all right; but if he is reading some nonsense that somebody else put on paper for him, then I think it is time we used the rule that speeches should not be read in this House.

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): I rise on the same point of order, Mr. Speaker. I think the hon. member for Cape Breton-East Richmond (Mr. MacInnis) should apply the same rule to the speech made by the Leader of the Opposition.

Mr. MacInnis (Cape Breton-East Richmond): Mr. Speaker, may I ask what the Minister of Finance (Mr. Turner) wants me to do for him? Does he want to get up on the point of order that I raised, or does he have some that he wants to raise himself? I am raising the point of order with respect to the speech that is being read now.

An hon. Member: "Respect" is a good word.

Mr. MacInnis (Cape Breton-East Richmond): Thank you; "respect" is. Respect of the rules would mean that he should put aside the paper that somebody else prepared for him, and not read it.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Laniel): Order, please. The hon. member has raised a point that has been raised many times in this House, and I think it is a valid point. Hon. members are entitled to refer to notes they have made. I think the point is quite valid.

[Translation]

The Chair would ask the cooperation of the hon. parliamentary secretary if possible, and suggest that while referring to his notes, he abide by the rules and address the House without reading from a text.

I recognize the parliamentary secretary.

Mr. Comtois: Mr. Speaker, I willingly accept your comments, but allow me to read these few notes in English for the simple reason that I wanted the opposition members to understand what I was going to say. And if members of the opposition want to make speeches in French, I shall gladly listen to them even if they read their speeches.

I should also like to refer to my notes. Of course, the Minister of Finance (Mr. Turner) handed me a few notes in order that I may complete the remarks that he wanted to make. When one wants to quote figures and statistics accurately, it is important to refer to notes instead of saying just anything in the House.

[English]

Mr. Speaker, I would like to continue, if possible. The Conservative leader and members of his party also thought that was a joke. They doubled up with laughter when the Minister of Finance warned that there was a risk of the economy overshooting the target and aggravating inflation, a risk that was considered worth taking.

Throughout the course of this year there has been very substantial growth of national production, of jobs and in the real income of Canadians—but the Conservative opposition rejected the forecast of these developments. They proposed a further substantial increase in government spending, further tax cuts costing another $700 million or more, an increase in the federal deficit of 2½ times, with the cash requirement doubling to $4 billion, and a continuing massive increase in the money supply.

For the particular benefit of the Conservative leader, let me outline some of the major steps adopted or proposed by the government over the past 16 months to maximize supply and minimize the impact of inflation.

● (1750)

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker, let me proceed with my remarks in French.

Through budget measures we have reduced personnal income tax by the equivalent of 12 to 13 per cent in February and we have also granted a special exemption of $650 to $1,000 to the blind and disabled people. Thanks to all those measures we have increased the so-called week-end take-home pay.

We have abolished the sales tax on all children clothing; we have also abolished the sales tax on soft drinks and food. Moreover, we have abolished the excise tax on certain toilet articles and cosmetics. We have also imposed a temporary reduction in tariffs of roughly $1.4 billion on many products. In addition, by adjusting the equilization formula $190 million have been made available to the provinces which enable them in many cases to reduce their school and property taxes. We have indexed the old age pensions and the guaranteed income supplement since January 1972. In October those pensions will be significantly increased.

In October, the family allowances will be also temporarily raised to $12 a month, not taxable, for each child and, in January, to $20 even though it will be taxable. The Canada Pension Plan will be fully indexed as will be all federal civil servant pensions and others paid by the federal government.

Moreover, several provinces have granted or are considering granting soon a significant increase in their payments for social welfare and it should be remembered that the federal government pays 50 per cent of all social welfare plans in Canada.

We have reduced taxes for manufacturers, thereby creating many jobs, an unprecedented number of jobs during this and last year.

The government established a Food Price Review Board and we hope that it will bring about very good results.

We have imposed temporary controls on exports of beef, pork and a few grains in order to prevent any increase in prices and, overall, a shortage of these products in Canada.

We also increased the subsidy to wheat production from $1 to $1.75 in order to prevent a rise in the price of bread, which was unavoidable. We will pay subsidies of 5 cents by quart of milk to all the provinces that will accept to maintain or reduce the price of milk for a period of at least one year. We asked the oil industry not to increase the cost of its products before January 30, 1974, except in the event that imports would increase and provided that this step be approved by the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources (Mr. Macdonald). The government also announced the implementation of a program designed to prevent the rise in prices of oil products in Canada, if the latter were to increase in foreign countries as a result of shortages.

[English]

Mr. Speaker, the cost of implementing the measures that were announced in August and September is estimated at $322 million for the fiscal year 1973-74. Taken together, I believe all these measures adopted over the past several months add up to one of the most intensive and far-ranging programs of action adopted by any country for dealing in a workable and realistic way with the kind of inflation we are now experiencing, and moderating its impact on Canadians.

The type of inflation facing us at present is caused by the simultaneously strong demand everywhere in the world for a limited supply of goods. No one country standing alone can turn back that tide. While the Conservative leader wants to assume the vain posture of a King Canute by commanding the worldwide inflationary tides to recede from our shores, the interests of the Canadian people demand that we as a government concern ourselves with economic realities.

As the Minister of Finance has said before, we are doing everything reasonably possible to maximize our own supplies and in the process are increasing national output, employment and incomes, while at the same time minimizing the erosion of incomes of those who stand to be most hurt by inflation.

It is important that we ensure that our rate of inflation in Canada does not exceed significantly that of other leading industrial nations for any extended period of time. That puts a heavy responsibility on all Canadians, individually and collectively, to avoid pressing for excessive increases in prices and incomes in a vain effort to obtain protection against inflation. The result of such a course could only be an accelerating spiral of costs and prices that would intensify inflation, jeopardize Canada's international competitive position and impede the growth in future of production and employment.

We have been down that rocky road before and I do not believe many Canadians want to travel it again. I hope that we Canadians have enough plain, ordinary common sense to avoid that destructive course and, instead, to work together to achieve the goal of a steadily improving standard of living that we all can share.

Mr. Gleave: Mr. Speaker, as it is close to six o'clock, may I call it six o'clock?

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Laniel): Is this agreed?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Laniel): It being six o'clock, I do now leave the chair until eight o'clock tonight.

At six o'clock the House took recess.

Cost of Living

AFTER RECESS

The House resumed at 8 p.m.

Mr. A. P. Gleave (Saskatoon-Biggar): Mr. Speaker, this evening I wish to address myself to two themes which are one and the same, namely, the production of food and the cost of food, how they are related in this country and what we may or may not do to meet the needs of Canadians. Surely that should be our purpose. Our problems with regard to prices and inflation are related to our supplies of food and whether Canadians are doing what is sensible and logical to meet the circumstances which we face.

The Minister of Justice (Mr. Lang) who is responsible for the Canadian Wheat Board said this afternoon that escalating prices in Canada are due to the international scene. He can say that if he wishes, and thereby avoid the real issue of what we do on the Canadian scene. I listened to the speech of the hon. member for Don Valley (Mr. Gillies). He stated what we should do and outlined the circumstances surrounding the present economic situation in Canada. At the end of his remarks I still did not know what he or his party would do to meet the circumstances which we face.

If we want food at reasonable prices, we should produce more food.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Gleave: The Americans have received the message and have changed their policy to all-out production. This has been stated by Mr. Butz, the United States Secretary of Agriculture. This has also been quoted in Time, which is like Pravda for the present U.S. administration: it is the magazine which tells the official story for the United States, just as Pravda tells it for the U.S.S.R.

Mr. Grafftey: Yes, like Watergate.

Mr. Gleave: That is a mess. The U.S.S.R. has its own Watergate, only the details are not published. The article I have referred to reads in part:

> The greatest obstacle to increasing output is not technical but psychological: the farmer's traditional fear that if he grows everything he can, he will only produce a glut that will depress prices.

The article is absolutely right. There is no technical bar to producing all the food Canadians could possibly use, at very reasonable prices.

I want to compare what is being done in the United States with Canada. They have established a policy to pay $2.05 for every bushel of wheat that American farmers produce in the next crop year. They have released all acreages held back as a result of programs to restrict production. In other words, the message is out: All-out production.

What is the Canadian policy? Today the minister in charge of the Wheat Board finally announced a policy which he has been germinating for the past 48 hours, or possibly the past week. I have followed the newspaper releases each day. When I heard him enunciate this policy I thought that he and his advisers must have been in an aircraft headed toward Regina, and while travelling between here and Regina they outlined the policy they were going to announce on their arrival. It increases or decreases as it goes along.

But what is the policy? For approximately the 10 per cent of Canadian wheat production going into the domestic market they will guarantee a price of $3.25 a bushel. In order for the farmer to get this, he must sacrifice part of the price presently being offered on the international market. Nothing is said about the total production of western Canada. If the farmer produces to his maximum, will he be guaranteed $1.75, $2, $2.25 of any other figure on the total production he may produce for the international and national market? No. This government has given no clear signal to the farmer that they want him to produce the maximum wheat, barley, hogs or cattle for the Canadian consumer. They are dodging and hedging. If the government wanted to serve the Canadian consumer, they would give a clear signal for all-out production.

A ceiling has been imposed on Durum. The farmer has been told he will be paid a certain figure. He has been told he will have to take so much less than the price for Durum on the international markets. The minister said today this was not as much as I had said, that it was only a couple of dollars. It does not matter: That is only a matter of degree; the principle is the same. The government wants to chisel the farmer at one end and the consumer at the other. What conversations have they had with those who produced and processed Durum wheat and its chief product which is Pasta? Unless some commitment is made by manufacturers and processors, the ceiling on the price of Durum is nothing more or less than a gift to those who process it.

In my city of Saskatoon the price of pizza has increased. You will find prices have gone up. What action has been taken to see they are reduced? Precious little. How much of the milk subsidy will find its way into the hands of the farmer and of the consumer, and how much will find its way into the hands of the processor? This rests with the provincial governments. It will depend on how effectively they can deal with those who process milk.

I want to take some of my scarce time to quote from what was said on a CBC program by the United States Secretary of Agriculture. I do so for the benefit of those who sit to my right. When he came to Ottawa on August 2 to confer with officials of the Canadian government, Mr. Butz said:

> I think it was a mistake in the first place to impose ceilings on meat prices. I think our people in the United States have learned a very important economic lesson, and I hope people in Canada have learned the same lesson, that is, in a biological industry you don't get more by paying less.

That is what we did. We tried to get more by paying less, and the net result was that we liquidated our stocks of chickens and were slaughtering pregnant sows. The way to get food at more economical prices is to produce more and guarantee the farmer against price reductions when he does produce greater quantities. That is the real answer if we want more food.

The Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Whelan) and the minister in charge of the Wheat Board have been saying that the price of food ought to be raised to the consumer; that it is about time. The minister in charge of the Wheat Board says the government is sympathetic to those whose wages are low, but those earning higher wages can afford to pay more for the food they buy. They are separating Canadian citizens.

Mr. Speaker, if we want to do something for those at lower income levels, we should see that they are provided with food; that if they cannot afford to buy it they can get it anyway. The food stamp program in the United States makes us in Canada look as though we were a bunch of pikers. They do provide food for those whose incomes are low. They are trying to make sure that people in the United States do not suffer from malnutrition. It is a disgrace that here in Canada, with all the productive resources we have at our disposal, people should suffer from malnutrition. They do. And we do nothing about it except bring in programs which increase the price of food.

Mr. Grafftey: You voted for them.

An hon. Member: They were your suggestions, remember?

Mr. Gleave: All right. You will have a chance to speak when your time comes. Controls have been placed on Durum wheat, bread wheat. I note that neither the Minister of Agriculture nor the minister in charge of the Wheat Board is in his place tonight despite the fact that they raised this question earlier today. Why have they not placed ceilings on soybean prices, since they have placed a ceiling on the price of wheat? The increase in the price of soybeans has been much greater than the increase in the price of wheat. A year ago the price was $3.39 a bushel. As of September 7 it was $10 a bushel. And soybeans are one of the most important sources of protein we have. The government never concerned itself about the price of soybeans, yet the very farmers in western Canada whose wheat is subject to a ceiling are buying soybean meal for their chickens and hogs. No action has been taken to place a ceiling on the price of corn. The price a year ago was $1.50. On September 7 it stood at $2.45. No action has been taken to bring this basic cereal under control.

The government has put into place a feed grain marketing policy and the Wheat Board, which is following that policy, has stated it will no longer use the commodity markets in Winnipeg as a means of setting the price for barley. Officials of the commodity market say that in these circumstances the market will no longer be able to function. What, then, is to be the method of pricing flaxseed, rapeseed and rye? The government has a responsibility to ensure a viable marketing system. It is not discharging this responsibility because the minister in charge of the Wheat Board has failed to make a statement in the House outlining his policy and the way in which it will operate. In my opinion, the reason he has not made a statement is that he does not know what to say.

The present situation is such that I defy anybody to say with certainty whether the Wheat Board is still an independent body or whether it is being dictated to and run by the minister in charge of the Wheat Board and the grains group which sits behind him. It is a serious thing not to know what kind of pricing and marketing mechanism will be in effect. In terms of rapeseed and flax we could find ourselves in the position of contracting sales in the absence of a posted price. The ordinary producer would have no way of finding out what the price should be. He would be operating from a position of weakness, with no bargaining power whatever.

This is the direction in which we are heading as a result of what the two ministers I have mentioned have done, or are failing to do. And what action does the Minister of Agriculture take? He simply tries to keep a low profile. He tries to keep out of sight while we subsidize to the extent of $1 a bushel every bushel of barley that goes into the market east of the Ottawa River. At the same time, those who represent the Quebec farmers claim they are being overcharged for feed grain.

Somebody is ripping off the farmers of western Canada and the feeders of eastern Canada at one and the same time. We deserve better than this from the marketing mechanism. We did have a good marketing mechanism but it is being destroyed piece by piece by those who should be responsible for it.

I am not going to vote for the motion that has been put before this House because I have no confidence in the people who sit to my right. The hon. member for Battleford-Kindersley (Mr. Horner) said when the feed grain policy was announced that he agreed with it. He is on record in the Star-Phoenix as agreeing with the government's policy, which will cost the western farmer $1 for every bushel of barley he sells. The minister of agriculture of Alberta said he had some reservations about it, and I know what his reservations are. His only reservations are that the guys in Quebec are going to get the same deal that he gets, and he wants the guys in Quebec to be shafted.

Why should I support people who refuse to agree to orderly marketing for rapeseed or flaxseed? Why should I support people who are not in favour of orderly marketing for western grains and whose policy is as ambivalent as that of the minister in charge of the Wheat Board?

Mr. Horner (Crowfoot): It is not as clear as yours.

Mr. Gleave: Mine is very clear.

Mr. Speaker: Order. I very much regret that I have to interrupt the hon. member, but his time appears to have expired.

[Translation]

Mr. Heward Grafftey (Brome-Missisquoi): Mr. Speaker, if a sample survey were carried out throughout Canada to discover which is the most important problem for the population in every Canadian province, I am sure that we should come to the conclusion that inflation is.

But the other problem we are faced with results from the fact that this government firmly believes inflation to be truly a gift from God. We have a government which, for many months, has been unable to come up with a policy to control prices and incomes.

A number of people have discussed all the ins and outs of these problems, but I repeat that the Canadians who are affected by this inflation resulting from the poor administration of this government are those in the low-income bracket: senior citizens, pensioners, farmers, including those in the east.

[English]

It is very rarely, Mr. Speaker, that I put letters from my constituents on the record, but I am forced to put one on from a Mrs. Parker who lives at R. R. 4, Mansonville, Quebec. She writes:

Dear Mr. Grafftey:

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): This will be good.

Mr. Grafftey: The Minister of Finance (Mr. Turner) had better listen, because he is not informed about this:

> Just a note to give you an idea how the grain feed prices stand. Oats, barley, wheat are $6.50 per hundred pounds, corn, cracked, $7.20, calf grow, $7, scratch feed, hog grower, laying mash $8. In some cases its a mark up of 100 per cent in the last six months, over-all the mark-up is about 100 per cent over the last year.
> The co-op tells me the brokers are having a heyday. Perhaps some questions should be asked about the difference between what the western growers are getting and what the eastern co-operatives pay the brokers. It may be a shocker—
> Dora S. Parker

If hon. members opposite would pay attention, I should like to inform them that the Leader of the Official Opposition (Mr. Stanfield) has time and time again proposed, among other things, a reserve feed bank for the eastern feed grain farmers.

An hon. Member: We have not heard about that.

Mr. Grafftey: Hon. members have not heard about it because they have not been listening. They do not choose to listen. We proposed in detail how we would come to grips with the problems of the eastern farmer and economic guarantees of the western farmer. But hon. members opposite and to my left just do not choose to listen.

[Translation]

I was interested in hearing the leader of the Social Credit Party of Canada (Mr. Caouette) this afternoon. Indeed, it is true that with the leader of my party I made a tour of the Eastern Townships and spoke with Canadians belonging to every political party: Liberals, Creditists and Progressive Conservatives.

An hon. Member: You spoke to our electors!

Mr. Grafftey: Yes, we spoke to your electors who as a result of the poor administration of this government are truly destituted. Such is the case of eastern farmers, pensioners, senior citizens, the real Creditists who would like to see the policy of our leader applied, namely price and income controls, which would be a comprehensive program and policy and I would suggest to the leader of the Creditists to take the opportunity to get acquainted with the policy of the Leader of the Official Opposition (Mr. Stanfield).

I am sure of one thing, and that is that the Quebec Creditists do not approve of a Socialist-Liberal coalition. We do not have a minority government at the present time but a real coalition and people in Quebec as everywhere else in Canada will not approve of such a coalition for as long as Canadians remain in poverty.

I would like to say also at this time that I am very glad that the Minister of Finance (Mr. Turner) is in the House tonight because, ever since his appointment, all his forecasts have been wrong.

[English]

There is one thing, Sir, that a very simple poll across this country would teach us, and that is that the number one domestic issue facing Canadians today is infaltion—mounting prices. We are faced with a Liberal-Socialist coalition that just refuses to act. We are faced with a government that blames everybody but themselves. They appoint a chairman to some commission, give her $40,000 a year—which surely solves her inflation problem—and who does she blame? Aided and abetted by the government, she blames the people.

I am going to talk about another matter. When prices go up, the Minister of Finance and the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) blame the provinces. In addition, the Minister of Finance likes to blame world conditions. This reminds me, Mr. Speaker, of the little kid in school who never studied for his exams and flunked. But he said, "I'm all right because everyone else flunked, so that's okay." I listened to the hon. member for Don Valley (Mr. Gillies) this afternoon and I must say it is the height of irresponsibility on the part of hon. members opposite to prattle day in and day out in this House about nonsense to the effect that since the rest of the world is not doing too well, we are okay too; that just because everybody else is flunking, we have to flunk too. It is not necessarily true that everybody else is flunking. They have an incomes and prices policy in Australia, and so far as inflation and rising prices are concerned, that country has one of the best records in the world.

How about this continual comparison with the United States? It seems absolutely erroneous to me. We will not necessarily apply in detail or in general the same policies as does President Nixon. There is a big argument, and if the Leader of the NDP (Mr. Lewis) would only listen he would know that we have said time and time again that one of the reasons their controls at one stage did not work is that they lifted them too soon.

Conditions today are not the same as when they applied the controls or lifted them in the United States. I submit to the right hon. Prime Minister and to the Minister of Finance that it is a phony, an erroneous argument and that he is comparing apples with pears. If the minister would just throw aside some of those self-satisfied statements and documents with which he presents us all the time, he would admit to us that he is comparing apples with pears most of the time.

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): No, with lemons.

Mr. Grafftey: Why is there a need for a prices and incomes policy? I do not have too much time at my disposal this evening, nor do other members.

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): Take all the time you want.

[Mr. Grafftey.]

Mr. Grafftey: The clacks do not want the truth. Why is there a need for a prices and incomes policy? Its harmful effects on the distribution of income within the state and within the world are evident. I have recited its effects on people with fixed incomes, on pensioners and farmers. Its harmful effects on the labour-management bargaining process and on the pricing mechanism of the state are obvious. Its potentially harmful effects on a state's trading policies are obvious.

I wish the Minister of Finance would stop saying that if we had prices and incomes controls they would automatically harm our trading position. They would not, and he knows it. It is an old-fashioned argument that might have been applicable 100 years ago, but is certainly not applicable in contemporary conditions. It is a distortion of economic growth patterns. It has an emotional impact. Once we know that the inflation psychology is rolling, it continues to roll and very few things can stop it. We have said time and time again that a freeze followed by controls is not the be all and end all, but it is certainly something that deserves on its merits to be tried.

Mrs. MacInnis (Vancouver Kingsway): It has been tried in the United States.

Mr. Grafftey: You are prattling the same nonsense as is the Minister of Finance. This is not a comparison. Inflation has become a psychological, social and political problem and no wise government refuses to deal with it as does this government. A wise government cannot ignore excessive inflation as this government has.

The only reason that we have any measures in front of us here this week to at least partially deal with the problem is the rail strike. Because of this government's mismanagement of the rail strike, parliament was recalled. I cannot help but pay tribute to an outstanding Canadian at present not in this House. Under the government of the right hon. gentleman to my right at the time when the hon. Michael Starr held the labour portfolio, we did not have rail strikes. They were properly settled in those days. Mr. Starr got the parties together. Not once under the administration of the right hon. member for Prince Albert (Mr. Diefenbaker) did we have to recall parliament.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Grafftey: But we had to recall parliament under the present Minister of Labour (Mr. Munro) because we had piecemeal policies—too little too late. Then the NDP became excited. They said that this will be the big chance to attack inflation because they had been back to their ridings for a few weeks and they heard the people talking. What do we have? We have a few ad hoc, piecemeal measures which satisfy the NDP, but they are easily satisfied by the present government. They will soon see, if we get out of here and go back to the people, that what we have been dealing with in terms of government measures this week and last week will not satisfy the Canadian people.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

[Translation]

Mr. Grafftey: I note, Mr. Speaker, as I have often noted before, that for five years under the present government we have been setting new unemployment and inflation records. This is simply due to the fact that the present government has no policy regarding prices and incomes.

[English]

There is an area of finance or economics. I must make a confession to you, Mr. Speaker; I am not well versed in it—but I will only tell you what the people tell me. The right hon. gentleman alluded to it this afternoon.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Grafftey: What has happened in the last four years? The right hon. member for Prince Albert told us that they had a Lift program in the west. They told the farmers not to plant wheat. Within the last three or four years eastern farmers have been put on milk quotas. The government told the farmers three or four years ago to take it easy because we had huge milk surpluses. At the expenditure of millions, almost billions of Canadian tax dollars, the government told the farmers not to grow wheat and not to produce milk products. Three or four years later, I am told by people in my riding that one does not need a college education to determine that we are now faced with skyrocketing dairy product prices and skyrocketing bread prices. What kind of sense is there in such a policy?

Will the government come forth today and express to us and then to the Canadian people what in the world they have been doing in the last five Years? This underlines ably one of the things I have been saying for years about the present economy. The Liberals call themselves socialists not in a hurry, the NDP call themselves Liberals in a hurry, and what we get in this country so often is half socialist, half free enterprise measures that do not work. What is more, the government wastes billions and billions of Canadians' tax dollars. How long will we have to call this a minority government? How long will the people of Canada be faced with this Liberal-Socialist coalition?

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): Wait until the next election.

Mr. Grafftey: I cannot wait for it. We are ready.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Grafftey: As I have said, the finance minister and then the Prime Minister rise in the House and say that they cannot do anything about wage and price controls that this is a federal state and consultation with the provinces is needed. That is exactly what the Leader of the Opposition has said. One thing that a price freeze will do is to give us the 90 days or whatever is needed to consult with the provinces. What does the government do? They go straight ahead where some people fear to plunge. Trust the present government! What do they do? They apply anti-inflationary measures not within federal powers, without consulting the provinces. The principles and policies to encourage increased food production and reasonable returns to farmers are subject to federal-provincial agreements. They know that.

Cost of Living

The removal of the 2 per cent ceiling on the annual escalation of pensions paid under the Canada Pension Plan is legally subject to agreement by the provinces. They know that. There is no time for consultation. Increased social assistance to the poorest families in Canada is entirely dependent upon the financial ability of the provinces. The 5 per cent subsidy per quart of milk and the equivalent reduction on a package of powdered skim milk would only be paid when and if provincial marketing boards agreed to maintain or reduce the cost of milk for at least one year.

● (2040)

Then we have this situation. The federal government must reach agreement with the provinces and industry to extend pipeline facilities so as to enable Canadian oil to be shipped into Montreal. What a beautiful one that is. It was mentioned last week by the minister. However, it is off again this week. We are told they are backing away. What a silly way for federal government to act in a federal union such as Canada without even consulting the provinces. There is this whole list of things in which consultation is needed if we are to have a reasonable degree of control in this country.

[Translation]

This is exactly the position of the Leader of the Official Opposition regarding price and income control. It is obvious.

[English]

When all the shouting is over—and I am sure there are some who feel I shout a bit too much—someone will ask: Why an incomes and wages policy? Again it must be repeated that virtually all western economies today have some form of incomes policy. This government will paralyse the economy for the sake of power. We can act in only two ways. One is by using fiscal and monetary policy alone and putting many thousands of Canadians out of work. The present government did that a couple of years ago. I am sure they will not do it again. Then there are fiscal and monetary policies and an incomes policy as advocated by the Leader of the Opposition and this party. Members opposite do not listen, in any event. They know how they are going to vote. Members to my left have decided, and should not even participate in the debate.

In conclusion, let me point out that during the last three days the Leader of the Opposition was in my part of the world. People on fixed incomes, farmers and pensioners came out in their hundreds to tell the government to get things moving. People are suffering because of the government's policy. They told the Leader of the Opposition, myself and the press who were present that inflation and the high cost of living composed the number one domestic issue facing this country. Everywhere we went they had the same thing to say. The right hon. gentleman from Prince Albert alluded to it this afternoon.

What a mockery of parliament it is for the leader of the NDP, before the debate gets under way, to be in such a hurry to support this government. He reminds me of a man who says, "I have made up my mind. Don't confuse me with the facts". Is this a debating chamber, or a rubber stamp? It is a rubber stamp. The young and the old in my riding who have been following public affairs since they were small say they have never seen a party push to the government so quickly and say, "We are with you fellows" before the debate even gets under way.

What does this mean? It means this is a Liberal-Socialist coalition. It has not been finalized because they do not want to see the leader of the NDP in the same cabinet as the President of the Treasury Board (Mr. Drury).

An hon. Member: No way.

Mr. Grafftey: No way? You are with them every day, in every way. The people of Canada want a wages and incomes policy. They want the government to announce what it intends to do about inflation. They want a government that will act.

Mr. H. T. Herbert (Vaudreuil): Mr. Speaker, this House is asked to approve or disapprove of measures introduced by the government to deal with the cost of living. The debate indicates approval of the measures which have been introduced. Therefore, the question surely is related to measures not introduced.

An hon. Member: Who wrote the speech for you?

Mr. Herbert: It is a little homework I did myself. Her Majesty's Loyal Opposition has made clear its position—a 90-day price and income freeze. This will give them the time to consider other measures necessary to control inflation. But the 90-day period has long since expired; so what are the results of these lengthy deliberations? Another 90-day freeze so that the official opposition can continue its deliberations.

Let us be honest. The party opposite has always been and continues to be completely barren of positive, constructive ideas. It is popular at the moment to speak of a price freeze. The cost of food has spiralled and every one of us has felt the effect in our pocket. Many people are being hurt. The government is attempting and must continue to attempt to alleviate this suffering.

The Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Stanfield) referred to the alleged alliance between the NDP and the Liberals. Let us look at that statement for a minute. Anyone who listens to the radio, watches television or reads a newspaper knows what the NDP is suggesting. Their ideas are communicated for everyone in the country to receive and judge. This is logical. They know it would be a miracle indeed for them to be in a position to govern in the foreseeable future. But in a minority government situation they are using their small force in the best manner available to them.

If everyone in the country hears, so does the government. Newspaper reports suggest government agreement with two out of four major NDP proposals. If the old age pension increase from $100 to $105 were introduced solely at the prompting of the NDP, would this make it any less desirable? Did the loyal opposition vote against it? Quite the contrary. The Tory party has supported the measures introduced by the government despite its power to amend, decrease or increase as it wishes.

Even today the opposition motion which is before us is a negative motion and not a positive one. I will come back to the Tory party in a minute, but I wish to direct a few remarks to the NDP. I have always respected the left-wing parties for their ideological approach to living and for the honesty of their conviction. Trying to argue against socialism to a socialist is an interesting but seldom rewarding experience. What I have not appreciated is what is, in my opinion, dishonesty in the use of statistics. True, everyone plays the game, but the NDP are directing their statistics at the very people who are likely to be most misled by them.

I refer specifically to recent references to company profits. If company A made a profit last year of $1 million, and this year a profit of $2 million, its profits have increased by 100 per cent. Using just the percentage increase clearly implies that this company is prospering and in fact might be accused of profiteering. However, if this company needs a profit of $10 million to provide a 5 per cent return to its investors, then its profitability position in the current year is almost as disastrous as it was in the preceding year. May I suggest to the leader of the New Democratic Party (Mr. Lewis) that he will lose all remaining credibility if he continues this line.

Let me read an extract from an excellent column by John Meyer in that Tory newspaper, the Montreal Gazette. I still read the Gazette although its clear intention is the defeat of the Liberal government. Mr. Meyer writes:

● (2050)

The practice of reporting profits in terms of the percentage of their improvement over the preceding period can be misleading. A food store chain, for example, was subject to man-in-the-street interviews by the CBC a few days ago because its profits had doubled. Individuals were asked at random what they thought of this. Predictably, their replies were extremely critical of the company. The clear implication was they thought it was profiteering.

What wasn't explained is that in the period with which the comparison was made, profits had been extremely low and, even when doubled, they were still under the accepted level of return. Food store chains are, of course, all the more vulnerable, being held responsible as they so frequently are for this increase in food costs. Some food stores have invited criticism through sloppy tagging of products but they ought not to be so wrongly condemned because their profits are returning to acceptable levels.

The food store chains are the most visible targets, because of food prices, but almost all businesses are vulnerable to uninformed scrutiny, by legislators as well as by the public. Businessmen are beginning to feel the full impact of what has been a common complaint for years, that profits has become a dirty word.

One thing should be abundantly clear: a construction company's objective is not putting up skyscrapers, an underwear manufacturer's objective is not to keep everybody warm, and a food chain's objective is not to abolish starvation. A company has but one objective, that is, to make money. What is there to be ashamed of in that? A man or a group of persons invests in a company and risks the loss of their investment for one reason only, the making of a profit to give them a reasonable return on their investment.

Let me read again from John Meyer's article as follows:

—there has been the sharp rise in manufacturing profits through the first and second quarters but, more often than not, only limited reference to the dangerously low levels from which they rose. Manufacturers had an average profit of 4.2 cents from each sales dollar last year which is still less than that earned in any of the best three years of the sixties and a full cent less that the 5.2 cents on the dollar reached in 1964.

Also speaking in respect of chain stores, so long as we have fierce competition between Loblaws, Steinbergs, A & P, IGA, Dominion and others we do not really need to fear excessive profiteering. These same food chains, by the very efficiency and size of their companies, have materially contributed to stable food prices in the last few years. In concluding my comments to the NDP may I reiterate that a company exists to make a profit. The average man wants to work for a profitable company. Let us not try to continually make "profit" a dirty word.

Let me now dwell for a few minutes on the situation in the United States. We must consider it obligatory to watch and learn from the experience of other countries. The experience of Britain and the United States is surely such that we can learn from their mistakes. The following relevant comments come from the U.S. News & World Report:

—American companies are embarked on a vast program of expansion and modernization, placing orders in record amounts for machinery, office equipment, trucks, and new factories and offices. Those demands come at a time when industry is loaded with unfilled orders and when shortages of skilled manpower, materials and productive capacity are spreading. That's a situation, economists point out, that naturally fosters higher prices.

From the same article I read the following:

Around the world, foreign nations, whose economies are booming, are bidding against the U.S. for raw materials that are increasingly difficult to get—copper, rubber and tin, jute and hemp, lead, zinc and iron ore.

Still later in the article it is stated:

—"56 per cent of the over-all wholesale-price index is set in world markets," so that, in a sense, the U.S. is now "importing some inflation" from other nations where pressures under wages and prices are even more intense than there.

The United States is a country of 200 million people. Is there any suggestion that we in a country of just 20 million people cannot be affected by these same pressures? The article continues:

"The poor anchovy catch off Peru has been disastrous"... "If anchovies—an important animal feed—don't show up somewhere (the U.S.) may be in for years on inflation of soybeans."

Let me read additional comments concerning the situation in the United States:

Baby chickens were being slaughtered by the hundreds of thousands by producers who said they would be unable to get enough money for chickens at market weight to cover the rapidly rising cost of feed.

In the next column of the article it is stated:

The spectre of widespread shortages of steaks, pork, chickens and eggs in the months ahead was raised, in turn, by one major American producer of livestock meal. Cost of this basic animal food was said to be rising too high for the processor to sell it under present ceilings.

Processed fruits and vegetables appear to be facing the same price squeeze. Canners are just now starting their packing season, and find prices of raw fruits and vegetables up sharply because of smaller crops caused by bad weather, while retail prices are frozen at last year's level. Inventories of can goods are far below normal because of increased demand.

Later the article reads:

Controls which hold prices below the levels which market conditions would otherwise generate for any sustained length of time are bound to create shortages, and thus the necessity for some means of rationing to substitute for the rationing function normally performed by prices in a free market economy such as ours.

An hon. Member: Maybe they will renew your subscription.

Mr. Herbert: Maybe they will give you one free. Any government of this country that did not avail itself of the experiences of other nations would be negligent to the extreme. The Tory party should now tell us what are those magical measures it would introduce after its 90-day think session. I suggest it would be another 90-day think session.

One answer is clear. One encourages increases in production of all items in short supply. This week we bought 25 pounds of tomatoes for $1. I wish we could live on tomatoes. We were able to buy 25 pounds of tomatoes for $1 simply because there has been a good harvest and an oversupply at the present time. Secondly, we should try to get help to those most in need, the pensioners and those with large families. Help is being provided to the elderly by way of the increase in old age pensions and to large families by the increase in family allowance payments. It is interesting to note that only one-quarter of our old age pensioners draw the full supplement; that is, only one in four over the age of 65 has no income whatsoever. Almost half of our senior citizens have incomes which make them ineligible for supplementary payments. This is a statistic of which the elderly citizen can be proud. For those on welfare, the provinces who religiously guard their jurisdictions are being encouraged to increase welfare payments, with the federal government picking up 50 per cent of the tab.

In housing, I am keenly watching the use that is being made of the various measures introduced by the Minister of State for Urban Affairs (Mr. Basford). Excellent assistance programs for homes for the elderly and low-interest loans for low-income families have been adopted. Is there going to be extensive use of these programs?

I have listened to the tirades of Her Majesty's Loyal Opposition, but I have learned very little.

Mr. Alexander: You have only stolen about 40 per cent of their policies, that's all.

Mr. Herbert: If one thing is needed at the present time, it is emotional control. I believe the government has sensibly avoided responding to what could be termed a popular move—an incomes and price freeze. This in itself has taken guts in a minority government position. The motion before the House deserves a clear and resounding nay.

• (2100)

Mr. Alex Patterson (Fraser Valley East): Mr. Speaker, I am sure that every hon. member in this House is aware of the fact that we are now engaged in one of the most important and urgent debates we have faced in this parliament. The problems that we are confronting in Canada—and not only in Canada—are such that they require the intensive application of the mental capacities of every member and all other agencies throughout our country. This is necessary if we are to solve this great problem that we have been discussing today, namely, inflation.

It is the inability of the great masses of the people of Canada to obtain, not the luxuries that are available to the wealthy but the necessities of life, a decent home, adequate clothing and nutritious food, that add up to inflation. We have usually thought of poverty, frustration and despair as conditions of people in the underdeveloped nations of the world. Often we have offered a few dollars to assist them in their quest for a decent standard of living. Canadians are presently faced with the fact that these conditions are becoming a stark reality to an increasing number of our own people who are totally unable to stretch their eroding dollars to get a roof over their heads, clothes on their backs and food in their stomachs.

I suggest, Mr. Speaker, that members of this House should recall one cold day last January—January 12, to be specific. It was a Friday. On that day my leader stood up in the chamber and asked the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) what he and his ministers were planning to do about the tremendous rise in the consumer price index. In particular, he asked the Prime Minister if he had instructed his ministers to prepare a series of interim emergency measures to halt or at least reduce the erosion of Canada's purchasing power. The Prime Minister's reply is recorded at page 227 of Hansard as follows:

> If the leader of the opposition is thinking about price and wage controls, the government has already stated its position on that question, that we have contingency plans which we will bring into action if necessary but that we would give no advance notice if we were going to do so.

If hon. members care to check the Hansard index under the heading "Price and Wage Control—Contingency Plans" they will find 21 other references to those contingency plans between January 12 and June 6. The index ends there, but I am sure if we had a recent one we would find more references to those contingency plans.

I wonder what the government is really trying to do. What are the contingency plans? What is it that they have been keeping up their sleeve to bring out in the case of an emergency? I would suggest that if we have not reached a state of emergency at the present time, then my understanding of the word "emergency" is rather uncertain. I believe today, Mr. Speaker, that the government is endeavouring to fool the people of Canada into believing that it is responsible and competent while it knows right well that it has failed to deal with the problems and has proven itself both irresponsible and incompetent.

Some hon. Members: hear, hear!

Mr. Patterson: As for the contingency plans, Mr. Speaker, I would suggest that the government does not have any. They are mythical plans. In this respect, I am reminded of the words of a popular song of not so long ago. The writer could very well have been the Prime Minister, and the singer possibly the Minister of Finance (Mr. Turner). The song goes like this:

> Don't be afraid; it will not harm you. It's only me pursuing something I'm not sure of; across my dreams with nets of wonder I chase the bright elusive butterfly of love.

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): That is beautiful.

Mr. Patterson: I would suggest that these nebulous contingency plans that the Prime Minister keeps referring to are even more elusive for the Canadian people than the "elusive butterfly of love" in the song.

Here we are, in the middle of the month of September, nearly nine months after the Prime Minister's first reference to these contingency plans, and the government has failed to produce anything. The government may have laboured during those nine months, although this is questionable, but the fact is it has produced nothing. Prices continue to rise at an unprecedented rate. The government's $40,000 a year Beryl Plumptre tells the people of Canada that they do not need to buy food, and the House of Commons giant killer, the leader of the New Democratic Party (Mr. Lewis), seems to have difficulty in bringing his own group to the point where they are prepared to exercise their responsibility and show by their actions what they have been saying for months and months, that this government does not deserve the confidence of the Canadian people.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Patterson: Note what one columnist wrote concerning this situation. In the Montreal Star of August 15, W. A. Wilson quoted one deeply despondent Liberal who is, he tells us, a figure of consequence in the party. Referring to the hon. member for York South, this renowned Liberal said:

> He can't put up with us much longer if he wants to survive himself. He'd be better off to kick us out and pick up the Liberal votes in Ontario especially.

Then Wilson writes:

> —with a sudden outburst of bitterness, this great Liberal exclaimed, "This is not an accident—it's just drunk driving."

There we have it, Mr. Speaker. It was on the same day last January to which I referred earlier that my colleague the hon. member for Prince Edward-Hastings (Mr. Hees) told the Prime Minister that it would take months and months for the government to bring the problem of increases in food prices before parliament in any meaningful way. What was the Prime Minister's answer? He said:

> No, it will not take months if the opposition has a clear position on it, which is doubtful.

Now, Mr. Speaker, it appears that the Prime Minister does not have any answer to the problem. He is looking for the answers. I would suggest that the leader of my party has set out in very clear terms what we believe and what we are convinced would take us at least on the road to a constructive solution to the problems facing the country at the present time.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Patterson: Every sector of the nation is reeling under the impact of spiralling prices, but most of all those on fixed incomes and those on pensions. I do not know what one hon. member was trying to prove today when he spoke about senior citizens being well taken care of, and so on. If we listen to the pleas that come to our ears and read the letters that come to our desks, we find that the senior citizens are facing problems they have never faced before. It seems that even though increases thave been granted, they are not keeping up with the increasing cost of living. We think of those on fixed incomes who find it almost impossible to make ends meet and to put on the table food sufficient for the needs of themselves and their families.

Many Canadians who were industrious and thrifty in their working years and made some preparation for their retirement years now find that what they thought was some security is only enough to keep them from benefiting from the various programs now instituted to care for those who were unable, for various reasons, to make any provision for the future. The understandable soliloquy of some of them is, "We might as well have spent it as we earned it, because we are no better off than those who are fully dependent on assistance programs".

Why is this? It is because the government has allowed the dollar to depreciate to the point where it bears no relation to its former value. The low-income families, the working poor, are bearing the brunt of inflation. The nation has just experienced a crisis as a result of actions by a group of individuals who, as a result of insecurity, frustration and despair withdrew their services as they fought a losing battle against the galloping increases in the cost of living which were not offset by even a corresponding increase in wages, let alone provisions which would enable them to participate more fairly in the higher standard of living enjoyed by many others in the community.

The middle-income group is finding that what was an income sufficient to meet their basic needs and to assist in contributing to the general well-being of the community has been reduced to the point at which it can barely maintain them in decency. To many of them, the hope of paying for a home has become an illusory dream. Every sector of our economy and of our society is reeling under the impact of the inflationary spiral.

Many letters come to our attention. Allow me to refer to one lady who wrote to me about her problem in meeting the situation and in endeavouring to cope with the increased cost of living. This woman pleaded for action and asked me if I would make xerox copies of her letter and give a copy to everyone in parliament. I appreciate her zeal. I did not do that as I realize every member of parliament gets such letters. She is representative of a host of our citizens who do not know which way to turn. So I urge the government to be serious on this issue. The food prices spiral is crucial and there are plenty of examples to show that.

What about interest rates? We have had four increases in the interest rate on mortgages since the beginning of this year. Think, also, of the price one must pay for gasoline. Every two or three weeks the price of gasoline goes up two, three, four or five cents a gallon. Four months ago in Ottawa one could buy regular gasoline for 39 cents a gallon. Now you cannot get a gallon of regular gasoline for less than 54 cents. That is about a 38 per cent increase in four or five months. One could go on with such examples but I think I have said enough.

On Tuesday, September 4, my leader, commenting on the Prime Minister's ineffective plan to combat inflation, referred to the Minister of Finance and his budget proposals of February 19. My leader said that the proposals really were a sick joke. Many things which have happened as a result of government action or inaction constitute sick jokes which have been perpetrated on the Canadian people.

The Prime Minister announced on September 4 that further government wheat subsidies would forestall a further price increase of about five cents a loaf in October. Within only a few hours of the Prime Minister's statement, sources in the milling industry were hinting that bread prices would go up anyway. The Minister of Justice (Mr. Lang) who is in charge of the Wheat Board admitted only a day or two later that no agreement had been made with the milling or bakery industry. The two ministers should get together and make sure which story they want to tell the people of Canada.

Then the statement was made regarding gasoline prices and within hours of the statement the price of gasoline had jumped by three cents a gallon at a set of pumps not more than five or six blocks from this chamber. In Montreal, on Friday, just three days after the Prime Minister announced his controls, the Union of Retail Gas Merchants voted to raise their price by three cents a gallon. So we can see how effective—I use that term advisedly, although perhaps I should say "ineffective"—government statements or controls have been in this particular case. The leader and other members of my party have indicated clearly the position that ought to be taken if these problems are to be resolved.

There has been much discussion and controversy over the suggested freeze of prices and wages followed by a period of selective controls where required. The speaker who preceded me pointed out that the implementation of controls similar to those of the United States would not bring beneficial results. I suggest that according to statistics as of January, 1973, inflation in the United States had been reduced to an annual rate of 3.7 per cent and the accelerating trend in wage increases had been halted and even reversed slightly. In addition, these results were achieved while unemployment decreased from 6.1 per cent in August, 1971, to 5 per cent in January, 1973, and output growth advanced from 2.7 per cent in 1971 to 6.5 per cent in 1972. I think that is a better record than this government has been able to achieve.

The Food Prices Review Board must be given some power immediately.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Patterson: This must be done if there is to be a solution to the problem of increasing prices. It is interesting to hear the cries of the party to my left, as just the other day the hon. member for Vancouver Kingsway (Mrs. MacInnis) proposed a motion under Standing Order 43 to give the board some teeth, including the power to roll back food prices. As well, the leader of that party has very quickly made an about-face and in the last couple of weeks has been crying for similar action. Where were they some time ago when their voices were needed in order to implement a program such as this? They were determined to sustain in office a government that was not committed to the program they wanted. It seems that they are satisfied with very little on a great many issues in order that they may swing their vote behind the government and retain it in office. Apparently they have changed their view; they have repented. Possibly a deathbed repentance is better than no repentance at all.

So, Mr. Speaker, one wonders, as one remembers the steps taken by the Prices Review Board in sending out these gentlemen, or ladies, as the case may be, across the country to investigate, if that action is to be any more effective than other actions the government has proposed up to the present time. I doubt very much that these results will be very much better. So as we look at the situation I say that the Canadian people, surely, have a right to expect more from this government and from the $40,000 a year girl and others who have been engaged to help her in this particular matter.

May I suggest that if there ever was a time when a motion of non-confidence was appropriate, it is the present time. I wish to read the motion into the record. The leader of my party moved:

That this House has no confidence in the adequacy of government measures to deal with the cost of living as such measures were announced to the House by the Prime Minister on September 4th, 1973.

I suggest that the motion is worthy of support by all members of the House, including Liberals. Surely all those in the opposition parties will support the motion, because I believe the people of Canada expect action now.

Mr. Terry Grier (Toronto-Lakeshore): Mr. Speaker, I listened to the remarks of the hon. member for Don Valley (Mr. Gillies) this afternoon and I think he showed a peculiar, a curious conceit in suggesting that those who disagree with the motion are those who support a policy of no action at all. I want to make it clear that my quarrel with the motion moved by the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Stanfield) is a substantive quarrel based on a very serious disagreement about the substance of the proposals put forward.

I am frightened when I hear people who know so little cheer so loudly for a policy. When I hear them speak in the House, my fears of their ignorance are verified. I am not impressed by a party whose members in the House of Commons are of and speak for the business and professional and better-off groups in the community—who are themselves, as I suspect most of us are, in the top 1 or 2 per cent of the income groups of this country—calling for incomes policies and wage controls. Well they might, Mr. Speaker; they have made it. My concern and the concern of my party is for many other millions of Canadians who have been treating each other fairly in the marketplace and neither deserve nor need to be controlled.

My leader and the hon. member for Saskatoon-Biggar (Mr. Gleave) have presented some aspects of the policy which our party believes is the answer to many of the problems of rising prices. We talked about fair incentives to the farmer greatly to increase the supply and production of food. As the hon. member for Saskatoon-Biggar said, surely that is the basic and best approach.

On many occasions we have advocated that the Food Prices Review Board be given teeth. It should not only be given the power of investigation, which it has, but power to impose cancellations or roll-back of price increases which are unjustified by the facts. I was interested to hear the hon. member for Fraser Valley East (Mr. Patterson) say the same thing. Perhaps he does not know that in another place last Thursday his party voted against such a motion moved by myself.

We called for subsidy programs to assist those on low and fixed incomes. We are modestly gratified to see the government has brought forward some programs along that line. We have called for controls on supplies and production of energy resources in this country. Although it is not entirely clear, it appears the government is moving in that direction. Our policy might well be summed up as favouring selective controls where they count, not indiscriminately across the board. There should be a prices review board with real teeth, assistance for those on low and fixed incomes and a program of supply management for food and other scarce commodities.

Reference has been made today to the types of inflation from which this country has been suffering. I commend to all members of the House, particularly those of the Conservative party, an article in the Globe and Mail by a distinguished Canadian economist, Vincent Blader. I do not, in the limited time at my disposal, intend to quote from the article. But he does point out that the kind of inflation to which wage and price controls would apply is not the kind we are predominantly suffering from at this time. I suggest the hon. member for Don Valley could do well to read that article.

It is apparently considered unfair and unrealistic to suggest the inflation we suffer from in Canada is related to worldwide problems. I wonder if members of the Conservative party are aware of the world commodity index published in The Economist two months ago which points out, among other things, that the index of food prices worldwide rose more in one year, between June 1972 and 1973, than in all the years from 1972 back to June 1949. That is perhaps cold comfort when we are talking about Canadian policies, but I suggest it is somehow not unrelated to the problems we are discussing today.

The hon. member for Don Valley seemed disappointed that members of this party insisted on dragging into the debate experience in other parts of the world. I suggest that experience is very real. The hon. member suggested the experience in the United States with price and wage controls was not sufficient evidence that we ought not to proceed with them. Well, we have to take our experiences from where we can find them.

There are two countries in particular currently pursuing policies of price controls. One is the United States, to which reference has repeatedly been made. That has not been an experience which would fill this House of Commons with assurance that it should be followed in this country. Second, there is the experience in Great Britain. I think it is instructive. The members of the Conservative Party urged the Prices Review Board to study prices and wage controls in other countries. They did so in Britain. I quote from a document produced last week as a result of that study:

Many statistical studies have been made which have sought to estimate the divergence between actual wage and price movements and those which would have occurred in the absence of the policy. The results—though differing somewhat depending on statistical techniques used—suggest at times a short-run small positive effect, at times a short-run small perverse effect, and at other times no discernible effect—

The same document notes:

Despite the freeze, the food price index rose by about 9 per cent between November 14, 1972, and April 17, 1973, and is continuing to rise rapidly—

In the identical period the food price index in Canada, in the absence of any controls, rose by 8 per cent. That is not an excuse for the 8 per cent but it seems to be a useful comment to make about price and wage controls.

The hon. member for Don Valley twitted the government and this party for changing its mind from time to time. When last speaking on this subject I quoted from a document with which the hon. member had something to do. I want again to quote from that document because it is the most serious and objective study on wage and price controls ever undertaken in this country. It was undertaken by a Senate committee of which the hon. member was study director. I quote:

—the lengthy historical track record of direct controls and income policies is, on the whole, very bad. They have had a particularly nasty habit of letting down those who trusted in them just as inflationary pressures were mounting to their peak. They are often spoken of as though they were the ultimate, completely dependable weapon against inflation—one that governments can always use effectively if they dare. But the record suggests, on the contrary, that they are no such thing—

It is clear that to use the controls suggested by the hon. member for Don Valley would amount to nothing more than a futile attempt to sit on a lid that is bound to come off. I suggest it beggars credulity for the hon. member for Don Valley to say that because they are doing it in other countries, notwithstanding the evidence of his own study we should do it here.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Grier: It is all very well to call for action to protect the inflation expectations. I am not so sure that all forms of action necessarily have a therapeutic effect. If someone has a headache, you do not remove his appendix. Freezes and controls are being suggested as a means of breaking inflationary expectations. If the Tories are so concerned about those expectations, why have they refused to support giving the Prices Review Board the teeth to break those expectations?

Those who advocate price controls should know that, by their very nature, in a free society controls can only be maintained at best for a brief period of time. One member said the trouble with the American program is that they had to relax the mandatory controls. The reason was that the American people demanded that the controls be relaxed. I suggest it is folly to suggest mandatory controls will be acceptable in this country for the period of time suggested by the Leader of the Opposition.

The Tories have twitted this party about the way it is going to vote on this issue. I remember a time not very long ago, maybe ten years, when the Tories sat across the way with a minority government. They were looking for support and they were not too fussy where they got it. Before they start making moral judgments on the votes of others, they should remember when they were in that position. This debate is more of a political opportunity for them than a serious effort to deal with the problem.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

● (2130)

Mr. Grier: I do not see why I, as a member of parliament, should give them the opportunity which the people of Canada denied them last October. I am not here to do a job for the Tories. They can do their own work.

An hon. Member: You are doing a job for the Liberals.

Mr. Grier: I am here to do a job for the Canadian people who sent me to parliament.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Grier: A few taunts from the Tories will not detract me from this purpose. We are satisfied that as a result of our efforts in this chamber, the Canadian people have been presented with more useful legislation that would have been the case had either of the elderly parties been given a majority. I realize it is almost impossible to persuade the Tories, or perhaps even the media, that our motives in this debate have something to do with the real issue. Nevertheless, I assure you, Mr. Speaker, that our concern here is to do a job to arrest inflation and not to play politics with a proposal the very advocates of which do not know its implications.

Mr. Fred A. McCain (Carleton-Charlotte): If I might be permitted, Mr. Speaker, I should like to continue the analogy of ten years ago which was used by the hon. member who preceded me in this debate. My reading tells me that the opposition of that day voted against the government because of political conviction in what they considered was the best interests of the policy they had supported as a party over a period of years. They did not hide behind any excuses for their vote on that day; the voted for Canada and their political convictions which is more than those on the extremely left of the House can claim at this time.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. McCain: I am particularly concerned in this debate with the economics of agriculture because it seems to me to have been one of the items on which great emphasis has been placed by the government. I wish to start by recalling a meeting which I attended and at which the hon. member for Qu'Appelle-Moose Mountain (Mr. Hamilton) appeared as minister of agriculture in support of the Conservative party some ten or more years ago. He enunciated a philosophy at that time which was that this world of ours had advanced in its quest for a decent standard of living at a pace never before known in history. And this included food. He predicted that there would be in this world in the foreseeable future a shortage of protein and a shortage of carbohydrate.

It therefore becomes contingent upon any party in Canada to encourage agriculture in its production, to guarantee that it will come to its aid in times of overproduction and make agriculture one of the main forces of this country once again, as it once was. The hon. member went on to say there would be occasional surpluses in agricultural production, but that scientific preservation of food and new processes which had been introduced made it possible for mankind to preserve those surpluses for distribution when and where required. If you will produce it, said the minister of that day, the private marketing forces of Canada can sell it, and if they cannot, the government will come to their aid. We were looking at a long-term requirement.

I might say, Mr. Speaker, that this speech was delivered in a constituency part of which is now the constituency of Madawaska-Victoria. During the last ten years agricultural production in that area has dropped almost 20 per cent under the administration of the government. I might say, also, that the hon. member for Madawaska-Victoria (Mr. Corbin) was not elected to this House in 1972 on the basis of the agricultural policies of the present government.

There has been a very distinct change in the policies of government during the ten years I have mentioned. In 1971 the minister of agriculture addressed the Canadian Horticultural Council at its winter meeting. He said at that time that the government of the day stood for cheap food. He also told the farmers that if they could not exist in the face of world competition as the cheapest source of supply of any given food demanded by Canadians, they would have to suffer the economic consequences. If you cannot become efficient enough to compete, he told the farmers, then you shall go broke.

This was in contrast with the policy of the Conservative Party which recognized that Canadians were dependent, first, upon a local supply of food and, second, upon the importation of food. They designed a structure for the protection of the Canadian producer containing a flexible duty set-up against the influx of dumping of food by any means by any country where there was a surplus. In contrast to this, when food arrived from foreign countries in competition with the Niagara peninsula and was dumped at disastrous prices, no dumping duty was imposed.

What happened? Peach farmers did not set out additional peach trees. Production declined. When apple juice was dumped on this continent, with Canada as the gateway to the southern markets of the U.S., no dumping duty was imposed though no country in the world could produce apple juice at the price at which it arrived. It had to be dumping; it had to be subsidized shipment because it scarcely covered the cost of freight, let alone the cost of production. But apple producers were not compensated under any program of government. They were told, instead, "We have a cheap food policy; you suffer it out, boys." So the producers did not plant more trees. They did not renew their orchards. The decline in apple production will become more evident as the years go on as a result of the neglect of that situation.

When the potato industry found itself in world competition, in pursuance of which governments around the world subsidized the shipment of potatoes to traditionally Canadian markets, the minister of agriculture said, "I'm sorry. We can't help you. We can't take your surpluses off the market because it might cost the consumers a few dollars. We might take off too many and the price might go up." Well, Mr. Speaker, the production of potatoes went down again by almost 10 per cent from 1971 to 1972 and it would have been much cheaper for the consumer to have had the production of 1971 to market through the 1972-73 seaon. This is economic mismanagement in the most unforgiveable fashion because it abuses every man who works on the farm and every consumer who eats a bite of food. Across the board, it has been a most short-sighted policy.

If the government had taken a look at the graphs in respect to farm income, it would have found that it was declining at just about the pitch of Niagara Falls. If the government had taken a look at the cost of input of agricultural requirements, it would have seen an incline similar to that of Mount Everest. And as the net income of farmers declined, the exodus from the farms began to accelerate with the aid of the task force on agriculture. This was the task force which recommended the removal of two-thirds of the farms in agriculture today, to be completed by 1980.

Tell that to the consumers, because that is the very policy which also contributed to the shortage of food. That is part of the policy which contributed to the shortage of potatoes in Canada in the middle of May, though the supply would ordinarily have lasted into July. Do you think, Mr. Speaker, that anybody in the House should vote for economic idiocy and blindness of this nature? As production declined, prices were bound to rise as supplies also declined.

Instead of having ARDA—and I use this as a comparison—we had the imposition of a plan upon the Canadian farmers which retired land from agriculture in a mandatory fashion. They either bought land and retired it from agriculture, or they rented it and put it out of production in agriculture, a combination which could not help but eventually arrive at the store counter where the consumer would suffer as the farmer had suffered.

The economic management was like a planned disaster. The capital position of the farmers declined almost annually for ten consecutive years under Liberal management. While part of that capital loss has been replaced in the last crop year, there are farmers who will be paying income tax on the money they pay for mortgages for the next 20 years to come as a result of the financial mismanagement of this government.

I say to those to our extreme left, many of whom come from agricultural areas, that if they vote in support of this government's economic management in agriculture, if they vote in support of this government's consumer prices, then their vote is diametrically opposed to all of the principles they have ever enunciated.

There is a reptile, I am told, which sheds its skin on an annual basis and then turns around and swallows it so as to leave behind no trace of its presence. It could very well be that the only trace of the party to our left, if it continues to move in its devious ways, may be the echoes which may still be vibrating through the canyons of this country.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. McCain: I grant you, Mr. Speaker, there is an element of food shortage on a worldwide basis; there is no question of that. But it has been precipitated by Canada's participation in an idiotic food policy and perhaps that of other countries in the western hemisphere. But the government of this or any other country is supposed to be capable of analysing internal problems and predicting the outcome of its policies.

A casual glance at the graphs of this country indicate that there was a meeting of the ways wherein the food supply would not meet consumer requirements. This has been shaping itself for the biggest part of the last ten years under Liberal management of the economy in the food world. It came to the point where we had a Food Prices Review Board. These two parties, which undoubtedly will again vote together tonight, began to embark upon a witch-hunt to find out whose fault it was. Was the food shortage the fault of the producers, the processors, the wholesalers or the retailers?

Statistics were placed before the food prices committee which showed that agriculture was a poor economic opportunity, that processing was less than average in its profit picture in Canada, and that wholesaling and retailing had the small end of the profit margin in regard to dollars turned over and capital invested. So you might say that from the sod to the cellophane, agriculture was a very poor place in which to invest money. In a vain effort to lay the blame anywhere but on itself, the committee embarked upon a witch-hunt led by the Liberals and the NDP. I submit that in the agricultural policy that this government has followed, the witches are on the opposite side. They ran a collision course with reality, and as a result the consumer has paid in an undue and unnecessary fashion.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Laniel): Order, please.

[Translation]

Mr. Matte: Mr. Speaker, on a point of order.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Laniel): The hon. member for Champlain on a point of order.

Mr. Matte: Mr. Speaker, without reflecting on your sense of justice and fairness, and in all deference to the Chair, I wish to point out that it had been mentioned to Your Honour at the beginning of the afternoon that three or four members of our party wanted to speak in this debate, but unfortunately only our party leader has been recognized.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Laniel): Order, please. I very well understand the point raised by the hon. member. If he will look at the representation of the various parties, he will realize that the Chair—not necessarily I, but also those who chaired the sitting today—has tried to be fair and to balance things. At any rate, the Chair tries in general in each debate to allocate in all fairness the time allotted to hon. members.

Order, please. It being 9.45 o'clock, it is my duty, pursuant to Standing Order 58(9), to interrupt the proceedings and to put forthwith every question necessary to dispose of the motion before the House.

[English]

All those in favour of the motion will please say yea.

Some hon. Members: Yea.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Laniel): All those opposed will please say nay.

Some hon. Members: Nay.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Laniel): In my opinion the yeas have it.

And more than five members having risen:

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Laniel): Call in the members.

The House divided on the motion (Mr. Stanfield) which was negatived on the following division:

SUGGESTED LEGISLATION TO COMPEL USE OF AUTOMOBILE SEAT BELTS—REQUEST FOR UNANIMOUS CONSENT TO MOVE MOTION

Mr. Otto Jelinek (High Park-Humber Valley): Mr. Speaker, in view of the continuing increase in automobile fatalities and injuries in Canada and the fact that through the introduction of legislation in other countries making the use of seat belts compulsory these same countries have experienced a 20 per cent reduction in automobile fatalities, I would move, under the provisions of Standing Order 43, seconded by the hon. member for Hamilton Mountain (Mr. Beattie):

That the government implement forthwith legislation compelling the use of seat belts by both driver and passengers in private automobiles.

Mr. Speaker: The Chair will inquire whether there is unanimous consent.

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Speaker: There is not unanimous consent.

TABLING BY MINISTER OF STATEMENT ON NEW AIR ROUTES TO UNITED STATES AND CUSTOMS PRECLEARANCE

Hon. Jean Marchand (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, due to the deep interest shown in Canadian-American negotiations for the establishment of new airline routes and privileges of customs preclearance, under Standing Order 41(2), I have the honour to table two copies in French and English of the public statement that I will make this afternoon.

[English]

Mr. Mazankowski: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker, I draw your attention to the fact that I believe the minister, in doing what he has just done, has in my opinion seriously breached the traditional practice of the House. This statement is of great magnitude from the standpoint of both the economic policy of this country and, indeed, the future of transportation, and it is customary for documents of this nature to be presented in advance to the opposition parties so that opposition spokesmen can respond adequately. In my opinion, what the minister has now done is a deliberate affront to parliament and the people of Canada and I do not think his action should be condoned.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Mazankowski: I understand that the minister has called a press conference for this afternoon. I believe that the only reason for his doing so is to maximize the political benefit from his statement as much as possible.

Some hon. Members: Shame!

Mr. Mazankowski: Although this policy may be consistent with the practices of the government— I could cite many examples—and consistent with the practices of this minister who has denied the Standing Committee on Transport and Communications the right to examine the Canadian National and Air Canada reports, I do not believe any member of this House has any excuse for allowing this to take place.

I do not want this point to go unnoticed. I believe that the minister's action has created a situation which is not conducive to the traditions of the House nor to its orderly functioning. I would humbly submit to the minister through you, Mr. Speaker, that he request the House to revert to motions some time later this day so that spokesmen for the opposition parties can have an opportunity to comment on the matter.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, in a few brief words I should like to support the point of order raised by the hon. member for Vegreville (Mr. Mazankowski). As Your Honour is aware, this is a point that has been raised a number of times. On most occasions Your Honour has found our objections not valid. On most occasions you have found that the kind of document that a minister was seeking to table under Standing Order 41(2) was proper under the terms of the order itself, but on at least one occasion, when our friend of former days, the Hon. E. J. Benson, sought to table what was in effect a press release, Your Honour found otherwise. I therefore wonder—I can only wonder because I have not seen the document; perhaps Your Honour has—whether this one does not come within the category of a press release rather than a report or a government paper. In that respect I wonder whether it would not be better, since we are still on motions, for the minister to read the statement to us and then hand it to the press conference at three o'clock.

[Translation]

Mr. Marchand (Langelier): Mr. Speaker, I would like to comment quite briefly on that point or order. In my opinion, the hon. member has raised a point of order which also seems difficult to me.

There is no formal agreement between . . .

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Marchand (Langelier): Mr. Speaker, I listened to the hon. member a while ago; he can extend the same courtesy to me and after having heard my remarks, he may get angry if he wants to. In any event, I merely say that there is no formal agreement, but only a report drawn up by the head of the Canadian delegation in Washington. The two parties have formally agreed to keep quiet until today but that an announcement would be made in Washington and in Ottawa.

I merely wanted, with all due respect for this House, to table the report in the House before meeting the press.

[English]

Mr. Baldwin: Mr. Speaker, it is so seldom this government has anything of substance to lay before the House that we think they should do it in the proper form.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Baldwin: In most cases, members of the opposition extend to the government the courtesy of accepting the fact that when ministers attempt to table documents under Standing Order 41(2) they constitute documents falling squarely within the terms of the Standing Order. However, in the present circumstance, we are not prepared to do so now. I suggest that Your Honour should be entitled to examine the document and that we should be entitled to do the same. We are not prepared to accept that it is "a report or other paper dealing with a matter coming within the administrative responsibilities of the government." We do not have to accept the minister's statement. We are entitled to see the document, read it and examine it. Only under those conditions will we be prepared to give our consent.

In order to have this matter handled in the best parliamentary tradition, I plead with the minister, who made a very good speech the other day, to fall into the pattern, become a good parliamentarian and handle this matter the way a member of parliament, especially a minister, ought to handle it, by making a statement on motions and allowing members, on this side of the House to answer and deal with it. That is the way it should be done. I urge the minister to consider withdrawing the document and making a statement on motions. I am sure he will have unanimous consent to do so.

Mr. Speaker: As hon. members know, documents can be tabled in the House under the terms of Standing Order 41(2) and statements can be made under the terms of Standing Order 15(3). We have had similar incidents in the past. There is the precedent to which the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre alluded. The ruling made by the Chair at that time was that you cannot have a combination of both whereby a minister attempts under Standing Order 41(2) to table a statement which he might have made under Standing Order 15(3). I am inclined to make the same ruling in this instance.

It is always difficult for the Chair to make a decision in such a case without having had an opportunity to study the document that a minister attempts to table under the terms of Standing Order 41. I think the suggestion made by the hon. member for Peace River is a valid one. Perhaps we might allow the matter to stand and the Chair will look at the document. But if it is a statement which the minister might have wanted to make under the terms of Standing Order 15, I would respectfully suggest that it could not be tabled under Standing Order 41. That is the ruling which was made on a previous occasion and I would have to make the same ruling again. However, all this would be subject to the Chair being given an opportunity to look at the document.

[Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre).]

THE CANADIAN ECONOMY

INCREASE IN UNEMPLOYMENT AND INFLATION—REQUEST FOR EXPLANATION—POSSIBLE NEW MEASURES TO COPE WITH SITUATION

Hon. Robert L. Stanfield (Leader of the Opposition): I have a question for the Minister of Finance, Mr. Speaker. Would he give the House a very brief explanation as to why Canada now faces both a soaring rate of inflation and an increase in the rate of unemployment?

Hon. John N. Turner (Minister of Finance): The unemployment figures published this morning show a rise in the seasonally-adjusted rate. They do not in any way reflect a weakening in the economy. As I said yesterday in the speech I tried to finish, the economy has been expanding at a seasonally-adjusted rate of 9.2 per cent. I think the House is entitled to understand that the strength of the economy is reflected by the number of new jobs, August over August, 1972 464,000 new jobs, the largest increase in the history of Canada.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Stanfield: Yesterday the minister tried to read us the telephone book; I do not know whether he will read us the telephone book again today or not. Now that we have experienced "stagflation" during what are traditionally the best six months of the year, can the minister tell the House whether he has any new measures to propose in view of this increase in the unemployment rate associated with a horrendous rate of inflation?

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): The hon. gentleman asked me whether there were any unusual factors that might apply. Again, I think the House is entitled to know that during the reference week of August 19, when the survey was made, there were 80,000 men and women on strike, including the rotating strikes on the railways. This had peripheral effects resulting in further unemployment in respect of other concerns which could not obtain supplies from companies that were on strike or supplies that were normally delivered by rail. One cannot expect that strikes, which are supposed to produce an adverse economic effect on the country, will not result in a statistical fall-out as well. This is exactly what happened.

Mr. Stanfield: If it is not the weather, it is something else, obviously. I should like to ask the minister whether this experience during the last six months since March—5.5 per cent unemployment in March, seasonally-adjusted and 5.5 per cent seasonally-adjusted in mid-August, amounting to virtually no change as far as married men over 25 are concerned—corresponds with the hon. gentleman's definition of sustainable growth?

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): I think sustainable growth is reflected by the fact that, as I have said, August over August, 464,000 new jobs have been created in this country. Despite the interpretation the hon. gentleman would like to place upon the figures, the trend of unemployment, discounting monthly variations, has been downward and is well below the figures last year.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

UNEMPLOYMENT INCREASE—POSSIBILITY OF ADDITIONAL FUNDS FOR LOCAL INITIATIVES PROGRAM

Mr. Bill Knight (Assiniboia): I have a supplementary for the Minister of Manpower and Immigration. In light of the fact that the adjusted rate, particularly for those in the 14-24 age bracket, has risen from 9 per cent to 9.7 per cent—

An hon. Member: You share the blame!

Mr. Knight: —can the minister inform the House whether the government is considering increasing the funds allocated to the Local Initiatives Program?

Hon. Robert K. Andras (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): Not at this moment, Mr. Speaker.

● (1420)

UNEMPLOYMENT INCREASE AMONG YOUNGER PERSONS—INQUIRY AS TO YOUTH EMPLOYMENT PROGRAM NEXT SUMMER

Mr. Bill Knight (Assiniboia): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question for the Secretary of State. In light of this report, and in view of the unemployment rate among those in the younger age bracket would the Secretary of State inform the House whether the government intends to operate a youth employment program over the next summer?

Hon. James Hugh Faulkner (Secretary of State): Mr. Speaker, that will be announced in due course, but I imagine that there would be a student summer employment program next summer.

[Translation]

SUGGESTED APPLICATION OF COMPREHENSIVE CONTROL OF PRICES AND SALARIES

Mr. Réal Caouette (Témiscamingue): I wish to put a supplementary to the Minister of Finance, Mr. Speaker.

Is the Minister of Finance now contemplating the implementation of a "comprehensive" prices and wages freeze program?

Hon. John N. Turner (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, according to the definition given by the hon. member to the word "comprehensive" yesterday the answer is no.

[English]

PROPOSED TAKEOVER OF ACKLANDS LIMITED BY UNITED STATES COMPANY—GOVERNMENT ACTION

Mr. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa-Whitby): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Prime Minister in the absence of the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce. It arises out of a report this morning of a United States takeover bid for Canada's largest wholesale automotive supply dealer in Winnipeg, Acklands Limited. In view of the employment implications in particular of this takeover bid, would the Prime Minister assure the House that the government is taking some steps at least to hold back this takeover bid?

Hon. Robert K. Andras (Acting Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, on behalf of my colleague, absent on government business, and as Acting Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce I would be glad to take the question as notice, study it very carefully, and give an answer to the hon. member.

Mr. Broadbent: In view of the imminence of this decision as reported in the press—it appears that the decision may be reached within a matter of days, if not hours—I ask the minister or the Prime Minister whether they will assure the House that steps will be taken by the government to ensure that this takeover bid is not completed before there is a thorough investigation by the government in terms of the implications of this takeover for the Canadian economy?

Mr. Andras: Mr. Speaker, in seeking an answer for the hon. member I will give full note to his representation.

GOVERNMENT INTENTION RESPECTING PROCEEDING WITH FOREIGN INVESTMENT REVIEW BILL—POSSIBILITY OF CHANGES

Mr. G. W. Baldwin (Peace River): I have a supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Has the government any intention of shortly reintroducing Bill C-132, which deals with such matters as this; and in light of the information given may I ask the minister whether it is the intention of the government to introduce any changes to this legislation, or will it come before us in its original form?

Hon. Robert K. Andras (Acting Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, I will endeavour to get an answer to that question as well for the hon. member.

PROPOSED TAKEOVER OF ACKLANDS LIMITED BY UNITED STATES COMPANY—INQUIRY AS TO REPRESENTATIONS BY MANITOBA

Mr. Erik Nielsen (Yukon): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question for the minister respecting the matter raised by the hon. member for Oshawa-Whitby. Has the premier of the province of Manitoba communicated with the government and requested its assistance in this matter?

Hon. Robert K. Andras (Acting Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): Not to my knowledge, Mr. Speaker, but I would have to look into that.

ROYAL CANADIAN MOUNTED POLICE

INQUIRY AS TO INFORMATION GIVEN PROVINCIAL GOVERNMENTS ON CABINET MINISTERS

Mr. René Matte (Champlain): Mr. Speaker, I should like to put a question to the Prime Minister.

On September 5, I put to him a question that he considered too vague, and having reread it in Hansard I found it very clear and I should like to put the same question again.

Could the Prime Minister tell the House whether he follows the policy of informing his colleagues, the provincial premiers, when the RCMP or the Solicitor General tell him of some compromising or suspicious action on the part of cabinet members in a province?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I find this question if not vague, at least extremely general, and so, the answer should be just as general: In principle, no.

Mr. Matte: Mr. Speaker, I shall put a very precise question.

In October 1970, was the Prime Minister aware of the findings of a joint investigation made by the RCMP and the Quebec Provincial Police, concerning specifically the recent disclosures of the Quebec Minister of Justice in connection with the alleged relationships between ex-minister Pierre Laporte and some members of the underworld.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member is asking a question relating to events that happened two or three years ago, and I believe that, under the circumstances, it could easily be put on the order paper. If there is any urgency, it could be considered at the time of adjournment.

[Mr. Andras.]

THE CANADIAN ECONOMY

UNEMPLOYMENT—POSSIBILITY OF NEW BUDGET BEFORE END OF YEAR

Mr. James A. McGrath (St. John's East): Mr. Speaker, my question is supplementary to the one directed by the Leader of the Opposition to the Minister of Finance. In view of the failure of the minister's budget of last February either to reduce unemployment or hold the line on the cost of living, and in view of the fact that high interest rates will further increase unemployment especially in the slow growth regions, does the minister intend to bring in a new budget before the end of the year?

Hon. John N. Turner (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I replied to that question earlier in response to the hon. gentleman's leader. My present intention is no.

UNEMPLOYMENT INCREASE AND RISING PRICES—COST-PUSH INFLATION AS FACTOR

Mr. James Gillies (Don Valley): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Finance. Given the fact that we have an increase in unemployment and rising prices, and at the same time have seen no real increase in the gross national product in the last quarter, does the Department of Finance or the Minister of Finance consider this evidence that we still have a large element of cost-push inflation operating in the economy?

Hon. John N. Turner (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I do not think the hon. gentleman's conclusion follows his preamble, but I want to remind him that the rate of growth in this country, seasonally adjusted, for the first six months of this year is 9.2 per cent.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The Chair will recognize the hon. member on a supplementary, followed by the right hon. member for Prince Albert.

Mr. Gillies: Is this real growth?

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): In real terms.

Mr. Gillies: Mr. Speaker, again this is a question to the Minister of Finance. I would remind him that in the second quarter there was no real growth in the economy.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Will the hon. member kindly ask his supplementary.

Mr. Gillies: What evidence would the Minister of Finance accept that there is still a large element of cost-push inflation in the economy today?

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, there has been, as the hon. gentleman may suggest, some slight breakout in the rate of labour settlements over the last month, but the prime influence on inflation in this country is the imbalance in world demand over world supply of commodities, particularly agricultural commodities.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The right hon. member for Prince Albert.

Mr. Gillies: I rise on a point of order, Mr. Speaker. With due respect, may I say I have never risen on a point of order or personal privilege in the House before, but the answer of the minister to this question, which I think is fundamental, legitimate, and the most important question before the country today, was totally non-responsive.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Speaker: I am sure the hon. member will appreciate that that is hardly a point of order. It is a question of debate or argument. The minister appears ready to join in the argument, but perhaps we might go on to the next question.

AIR TRANSPORT

REQUEST FOR INFORMATION ON NEW ROUTES TO UNITED STATES AND PRECLEARANCE ARRANGEMENTS

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prince Albert): Mr. Speaker, arising out of the matter raised by the hon. member for Vegreville I would like to ask the Minister of Transport to tell the House what new routes the Canadian airlines will have as a result of the agreement with the United States and, second, what alterations are there under the arrangements entered into between Canada and the United States respecting the preclearance procedure?

Hon. Jean Marchand (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I think that the document that was initialled in Washington between the head of the Canadian delegation and Mr. Styles, representing the government of the United States, is the largest such package that has ever been negotiated not only between Canada and the United States but throughout the world.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Marchand (Langelier): But, Mr. Speaker, there are so many new routes that I do not think you would allow me to enumerate them at this time.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Does the minister not feel that in an hour or so outside the House of Commons he will remember these things that he will not make available to the House of Commons? This is a contemptuous disregard of parliament on his part.

Mr. Marchand (Langelier): Mr. Speaker, I think that this document is very important for the people of Canada. I tried to table it here and I was not successful. I hope that somebody will decide to inquire into it.

Mr. Diefenbaker: The minister should know. He is trying to hide something.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Diefenbaker: I ask him now, will he treat this House of Commons as a responsible body? I ask that the House agree to revert to motions so he can tell the House of Commons what he should announce here rather than outside it?

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

GOVERNMENT INTENTION RESPECTING ROLL-BACK OF NHA AND CONVENTIONAL MORTGAGE INTEREST RATES IN VIEW OF LEVEL

Mr. Sinclair Stevens (York-Simcoe): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Prime Minister. In view of high mortgage interest rates already creating home buyer resistance with the result that there is a lessening of construction and employment, does the government now intend to order roll-backs of NHA and conventional mortgage rates which are now at 10½ per cent compared with less than 9 per cent a few months ago and a current average rate of 8 per cent in the United States?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, without agreeing with the premise of that question, the answer is no.

Mr. Stevens: Mr. Speaker, if I may I should like to put a supplementary to the Prime Minister. Is it the government's position that mortgage interest rates of 10 per cent to 10½ per cent are acceptable and necessary in Canada?

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Greenwood.

ENVIRONMENTAL AFFAIRS

STEPS TO ENSURE BETTER PROGRESS IN CLEANING UP POLLUTION IN GREAT LAKES

Mr. Andrew Brewin (Greenwood): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of the Environment. In light of the fact that the International Joint Commission, in its first annual report pursuant to the Great Lakes Water Quality Agreement, has criticized the Ottawa and Washington governments for lack of adequate and timely support in the first year of operation under the agreement, will the minister say what steps will be taken to ensure more adequate progress in the concerted clean-up drive in the Great Lakes agreed to by both countries last year?

Hon. Jack Davis (Minister of the Environment): Mr. Speaker, the responsible authorities from Canada and the United States will be meeting early in October to review the report and recommendations of the International Joint Commission.

Mr. Brewin: I have a supplementary, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I have to interrupt the hon. member for Greenwood. The hon. member for York-Simcoe rises on a point of order.

Mr. Stevens: Mr. Speaker, I believe the Prime Minister was about ready to answer my question and I wonder whether he could be given an opportunity to answer.

Mr. Speaker: The Chair has recognized the hon. member for Greenwood.

Mr. Brewin: Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question for the Minister of the Environment. In view of the fact the report criticizes Canada's delay in getting the regional office for the commission in Windsor functioning after its opening in May, has the Windsor office now been supplied with adequate funds and staff?

Mr. Davis: Yes, I can assure the hon. member that adequate funds are available. It is simply a matter of hiring additional staff which is the question.

ALLEGED CONFUSION IN NEW POLICIES RESPECTING FEED GRAIN AND DAIRYING—SUGGESTED PUBLICITY CAMPAIGN

Mr. Adrien Lambert (Bellechasse): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask a question to the Minister of Agriculture.

In view of the fact that there is confusion among people in connection with the dairy policy reform and the feed grain policy announced by the government, could the minister inform the House whether he or his department have undertaken or will undertake soon a publicity campaign on this matter? In the affirmative, how are they proceeding? Through radio, television, newspapers or through the hon. minister, or his parliamentary secretary or officials of his department?

[English]

Hon. E. F. Whelan (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, it can be done even with the help of the minister or the hon. member. The meetings are ongoing at the present time with the provincial authorities, and the people in the provinces who handle milk are also concerned about the feed grain problem and program. I do not know what more we can do at this time, but I do agree we probably should be using some kind of advertising program just to state the facts as they are.

FEED GRAIN—PROTEST OF QUEBEC UPA AGAINST NEW POLICY—REQUEST FOR STATEMENT

Mr. Roch La Salle (Joliette): Mr. Speaker, I should like to put a supplementary to the Minister of Agriculture.

In view of the fact that following three recent regional conventions of the Quebec FPW, it was decided that if, by September 15, the temporary policy on feed grains has not been implemented, a march on Ottawa would be organized to urge the government to action, will the minister give the House the assuranc that he will make a statement before September 15?

[Mr. Speaker.]

[English]

Hon. E. F. Whelan (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, I recently met with the President of the UPA and other farm leaders from Quebec, la belle province—

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Whelan: —and I must say that I found them very reasonable people. They accepted our explanation of the feed grain problem. I told the House last week that there would be an announcement on August 15, that we are shooting for that date. We still are, and they seemed satisfied and ready to accept the minister's explanation.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The Chair will recognize the hon. member for Brome-Missisquoi, but I think this might be an appropriate moment to remind hon. members that with the large number of members seeking an opportunity to ask questions we should attempt to limit the number of supplementaries. For the moment the Chair recognizes the hon. member for Brome-Missisquoi.

[Translation]

DAIRYING—DISCUSSION WITH PROVINCES BEFORE ANNOUNCEMENT OF NEW POLICY

Mr. Heward Grafftey (Brome-Missisquoi): Mr. Speaker, I have another supplementary for the Minister of Agriculture.

I should like to know whether he consulted the provinces before announcing his policy on subsidies to dairy producers, and whether the Quebec government has given the minister the assurance that it will freeze retail prices of dairy products for the coming 12 months?

[English]

Hon. E. F. Whelan (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, I just said that these discussions are still being carried on regarding the subsidy on milk. They have not been finalized at all.

Mr. Speaker: The Chair will recognize the hon. member for Lisgar on a supplementary and then the hon. member for Rocky Mountain.

REQUEST THAT STANDING COMMITTEE CONSIDER FEED GRAIN POLICY

Mr. Jack Murta (Lisgar): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the hon. member for Bruce who is Chairman of the Standing Committee on Agriculture. Since the Minister of Agriculture indicated it would be a good idea to have more clarification on the whole matter of feed grain policy, I should like to ask the hon. member for Bruce whether or not it would be possible for the government to reinstitute or revitalize, so to speak, the Standing Committee on Agriculture so that we could have the Minister of Agriculture and the minister responsible for the Canadian Wheat Board before us at the earliest possible time?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member will have to wait a moment for his reply. The hon. member for Brome-Missisquoi rises on a point of order. Is the hon. member rising on a point of order?

Mr. Grafftey: Mr. Speaker, I do not want to interfere with the answer to that question, but in relation to my question I would point out—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Grafftey: A little courtesy is not always out of order in this House. In relation to my question it is obvious that the translator did not keep up with it so the minister could understand it. Therefore I will put it in the other official language. My question to the minister is—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I recognized the hon. member on a point of order. I appreciate the difficulty he has, but perhaps for the sake of order we ought to allow the minister to reply to the supplementary asked by the hon. member for Lisgar and then the hon. member for Brome-Missisquoi could be allowed to rephrase his question in English. Then we will try to get on with the next question. We are running short of time already.

An hon. Member: En français.

Mr. Speaker: The minister may reply in any language.

Hon. E. F. Whelan (Minister of Agriculture): Monsieur l'Orateur, I thought the translation was perfect. I thought my answer was fair. However, I wish to make one correction in the answer to the hon. member who asked me the question previously. I said August 15. It should have been September 15.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member rises on a point of order.

Mr. Murta: Mr. Speaker, I am sorry but I must also rise on a point of order and attempt if possible, with the indulgence of the House, to get an answer from the hon. member for Bruce in respect of the question I asked him concerning the Standing Committee on Agriculture.

Mr. Ross Whicher (Bruce): Mr. Speaker, we will look into that matter immediately.

UNEMPLOYMENT AMONG YOUNG CANADIANS—EFFECTIVENESS OF OFY AND RELATED PROGRAMS IN CREATING JOBS—NEW MEASURES

Mr. Joe Clark (Rocky Mountain): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Finance. Since unemployment among young Canadians continues at almost double the national rate in a month when all of the make-work projects of the government are operating, can the minister provide the House with any firm evidence that OFY and related programs are creating a significant number of new jobs for young people who would otherwise be unemployed, and in any event has the government any new programs that will break the continuing pattern of high unemployment among young Canadians?

• (1440)

Hon. John N. Turner (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, the first part of the question got lost in the noise at this end of the House, but I will read the question in Hansard and consult my colleague, the Secretary of State.

LABOUR RELATIONS

SUGGESTED BREAKING UP OF BARGAINING UNIT TO PROVIDE FOR SEPARATE NEGOTIATIONS BETWEEN RAILWAY UNIONS AND COMPANIES

Mr. Paddy Neale (Vancouver East): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct my question to the Minister of Labour. In view of the fact that any contract put into effect under Bill C-217 will expire at the end of December, 1974, and in view of the fact that the House will no doubt be called on to legislate the railroad workers back to work in the event of another strike, would the minister give consideration to breaking up the bargaining unit so that separate negotiations can ensue between the railroad unions and the two major railways, namely, the CNR and the CPR, in order that in the event a strike is necessitated between the workers and either one of the two major companies it would not constitute a threat to the Canadian economy?

Hon. John C. Munro (Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, without acknowledging at such an early stage the inevitability of legislation again at the termination of the present collective agreement, may I say, as I indicated earlier, that we will study the history of the present events that led up to the strike we have just experienced to see whether we cannot come up with a formula to reduce the motivation to strike next time. Having said that, may I say with particular reference to the hon. member's suggestion: yes, that is under consideration.

HISTORIC SITES

PRESERVATION OF BOYHOOD HAMILTON RESIDENCE OF LATE PRIME MINISTER PEARSON—REQUEST THAT GOVERNMENT RECONSIDER DECISION NOT TO PARTICIPATE

Mr. Sean O'Sullivan (Hamilton-Wentworth): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of State for Urban Affairs. It arises out of the decision of the federal government not to participate with the city of Hamilton in preserving the boyhood residence of the late Right Hon. Lester B. Pearson and to develop a park in memory of that great Canadian. As the minister has already joined other hon. members in rejecting the reason given that not enough time has passed since the death of the former prime minister to make an objective assessment of his contribution, has the minister reconsidered this decision and can he now assure us that the federal government will participate in a most fitting tribute to the memory of this great Canadian?

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Hon. Ron Basford (Minister of State for Urban Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I communicated to the mayor of Hamilton my view that the reasons I saw published in the paper seemed rather absurd and that Mr. Pearson's contribution to the country needed no judgment by any government official or agency. Whether or not a particular home is marked as a historic site is up to my colleague, the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development. However, I have assured the mayor of Hamilton that if a proposal is put forward for a neighbourhood improvement plan throughout the whole area we will negotiate with Hamilton and the province of Ontario for the application of the National Housing Act provisions to that area.

AGRICULTURE

INQUIRY AS TO GOVERNMENT PLANS TO CONTROL PRODUCERS' COSTS

Mr. H. W. Danforth (Kent-Essex): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct my question to the Minister of Finance. In view of the fact the government has now embarked on a policy of selective controls as seen by attempts to establish a maximum and minimum price on grain and to freeze the consumer price of milk, has the government any plans now to control the input costs of agricultural producers which are now rising at an unprecedented rate of 13 per cent?

Hon. John N. Turner (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, the way in which the hon. gentleman phrases that question makes it difficult for me to reply to it because I cannot accept the tone of his preamble. One thing about which the government is concerned is the stabilization of farm income in this country, which of course has some relation to costs.

Mr. Danforth: In view of the fact that world prices of feed grains have pushed the feed costs of Canadian production of meat, dairy and poultry products to a virtual non-profit level, has the government any plans to control or subsidize these specific costs to guarantee adequate Canadian production for our consumers, or is the government relying on a further consumer price increase?

Mr. Speaker: The minister will be recognized to make a brief answer, but at least the first part of the question asked by the hon. member would require a lengthy statement which normally should be made on motions.

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): We cannot get them on motions.

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): Staying within the confines of your ruling, Mr. Speaker, may I say that the entire subject will be high on the agenda of the conference led by my colleague, the Minister of Agriculture, when he reviews with his provincial counterparts the whole question of the stabilization of farm income.

[Mr. O'Sullivan.]

THE CANADIAN ECONOMY

GOVERNMENT MEASURES TO COPE WITH UNEMPLOYMENT AND INFLATION

Hon. Robert L. Stanfield (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, perhaps the Minister of Finance will be happy with the tone of my question. In view of the fact that as of mid-August 433,000 people in Canada were unemployed and looking for work, and in view of the fact that the rate of inflation is some 8 per cent, I should like to ask the minister whether he is able to propose one constructive measure that he proposes to take in the face of this rate of unemployment, this inflation, and the prospect of winter coming on, because I must tell the minister that his record as Minister of Finance in the last six months makes Edgar Benson look pretty good.

Hon. John N. Turner (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I share the hon. gentleman's concern about the men and women of this country who have not yet found work. I have said on many occasions that the first priority of the government is still jobs. The hon. gentleman might recall the action of my colleague, the Minister of Manpower and Immigration and the fact that there is a $100 million LIP program available this winter. There is also still unexpended $275 million of the winter capital works projects program—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Perhaps the minister would like to return to motions to make a statement. We are running short of time.

Mr. Elmer M. MacKay (Central Nova): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question I wish to address to the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion on the government's fiscal and economic policies. In view of the continuing high unemployment, down slightly in the Atlantic region and up in Quebec, and the fact that these regions are the hardest hit by inflation, has the minister developed a new variable to his multi-dimensional, multi-faceted, decentralization policy which he is so busy expounding, tailored to meet the specific challenges of using DREE to rescue the poorer regions of Canada—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The Chair will have to study the hon. member's question before being able to determine whether or not it is in order.

Hon. Jean Marchand (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, the agreement is not ratified; it is simply a report and I may say incidentally that as soon as the agreement is ratified, it will be announced in the House first. There will be 46 new routes, some of which will be between Calgary and Edmonton and the south of the United States.

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member can ask his supplementary, but once again, I will ask for the co-operation of hon. members so that we may try to recognize as many members as possible before the end of the question period.

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): Mr. Speaker, I ask the Minister of Transport whether he can give the House the assurance that within 40 minutes his memory will be clearer and that he will be able to recollect the particulars, since he was present at a press conference—

Mr. Baldwin: Talk gently, John.

Hon. John N. Turner (Minister of Finance): I would assure myself that my colleague, the Minister of State for Urban Affairs, has enough money to meet the housing problems of the country.

In view on the one hand of the federal government announcement regarding the construction of a pipeline and, on the other, of the Quebec government statement concerning the development of a deep water port for supertankers in the lower St. Lawrence region, is the minister in a position to inform us as to whether there were consultations or discussions with the Quebec government prior to his announcement? SUGGESTED INSTITUTION OF INSURED MEDICAL AND SURGICAL SUPPLIES FOR OLD AGE PENSIONERS AND OTHERS ON LOW INCOMES

Mr. P. B. Rynard (Simcoe North): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of National Health and Welfare. In view of the fact that the galloping increase in the cost of living is particularly severe on old age pensioners and those on low incomes, hitting hardest of all those suffering from chronic illness and in many cases requiring expensive services, would the minister consider instituting insured medical and surgical supplies for those people, thus fulfilling the recommendation of the Hall Commission report on national medicare?

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, as the hon. member knows, the federal government is already sharing on a 50 per cent basis any help given to people in need under the Canada Assistance Plan. At the same time, the government has a firm commitment vis-à-vis the provinces that no new joint program is going to be initiated in this particular area without the development of a consensus with the provinces.

CONSUMER PACKAGING AND LABELLING ACT

GOVERNMENT INTENTION RESPECTING PUBLICATION OF REGULATIONS AND PROCLAMATION

Mr. Ron Atkey (St. Paul's): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs. In view of the fact the Food Prices Review Board, apparently with the minister's consent, has sent over 80 researchers across the country to investigate certain practices of food retailers, would the minister tell the House whether he has given up on the Consumer Packaging and Labelling Act which would have permitted departmental investigations of this sort but for the fact that the minister has yet not published the draft regulations so that the act can be proclaimed and be in force?

Hon. Herb Gray (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs): Mr. Speaker, the board does not need my consent to carry out its mandate, in the way the hon. member suggests. I hope to see the draft regulations published in the Canada Gazette shortly when the work of translation is completed.

Mr. Atkey: May I ask the minister if he can give the House the assurance that the draft regulations will be published and the act proclaimed and in force at least by the third anniversary of its passage in the House on March 17, 1974?

With regard to the recent pronouncements by the government of Quebec on the development of that province's petrochemical industry and the minister's statement in the House yesterday that Quebec has shown no evidence that it can protect its position from a security and cost standpoint in light of events in the international oil market, does the minister still agree with the Prime Minister's statement on September 4 that an oil pipeline to Montreal would provide beneficial competition and security for Canadian consumers?

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Yes, Mr. Speaker.

[Later:]

Mr. Symes: Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question for the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources. In light of the minister's affirmative reply to my question, does he not agree that the federal government should extend pipeline facilities to Montreal, regardless of the Quebec government's—

PROPOSAL TO UNITED STATES RESPECTING SUPPLYING OF CANADIAN OIL TO PUGET SOUND REFINERIES

Mr. John A. Fraser (Vancouver South): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the right hon. Prime Minister. In light of the statement by the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources over the weekend that he would be prepared to discuss supplying Canadian oil to U.S. refineries at Puget Sound in order to keep U.S. tankers from unloading oil in those waters, can the Prime Minister advise what steps have been taken to make this proposal to the United States and whether such a proposal is now government policy?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Yes, Mr. Speaker, on the latter part of the question, this matter has been stated by the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources and by the Secretary of State for External Affairs on previous occasions.

Mr. Fraser: Can the right hon. Prime Minister assure the House that such a proposal will be made forthwith to the appropriate U.S. officials?

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, I am expecting to see Governor Love, the President's energy adviser, within a matter of weeks and this will be one of the matters on the agenda.

Mr. Peter C. Bawden (Calgary South): Mr. Speaker, I also have a question for the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources. May I ask where he proposes to get the oil that he is intending to offer in his coming meeting?

UNEMPLOYMENT—EXCLUSION OF STRIKERS FROM FIGURES

Mr. Allan Lawrence (Northumberland-Durham): Mr. Speaker, mine is a supplementary question to the Minister of Finance relating to the very first answer he gave this afternoon. In light of the assumption of many people across the country when they have read the Statistics Canada reports on unemployment in the past that the figures specifically did not include strikers, and in view of the fact that the legal definition of those unemployed in this country specifically excludes strikers, would the minister tell the House if his answer indicated a change in the position or a change in the policy of the government?

Hon. John N. Turner (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, maybe I did not make myself clear to the hon. gentleman.

Mr. Trudeau: He did not understand.

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): What I said was that during the reference week ending August 19—

Mr. Stanfield: Stick to the weather, John.

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): —there were 80,000 men and women on strike in this country including the rotating strikes. While the hon. gentleman is perfectly correct that those 80,000 are not included in the statistics, there were obviously lay-offs in those concerns that depend on supplies from those companies on strike. So there is a peripheral effect which would obviously apply to such companies.

Mr. Speaker: Orders of the day.

Mr. MacInnis (Cape Breton-East Richmond): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order brought about because of my difficulty in getting an answer from the government. Although realizing that the question is not one which they are required to answer, I have attempted, through writing and otherwise, to find out if there is anybody on the government side of the House with a sufficient sense of fairness to look at the document presented to the courts by Tom Kent, President of the Cape Breton Development Corporation, which has since been denied. Is there anyone who will stand up and defend it, or at least give justice to the men whom Tom Kent is now cheating because of a false document?

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker—

Mr. MacInnis (Cape Breton-East Richmond): Mr. Speaker, on a further point of order—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I would hope that we could get on with the business of the House which is to be called. The hon. member rises on a second point of order. I will try to recognize the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre eventually on his own point of order.

Mr. MacInnis (Cape Breton-East Richmond): Mr. Speaker, since the members on the government benches have had the opportunity to defend the action of Tom Kent, and since not one of them has accepted that invitation, do you not think that somebody on that side, especially the Prime Minister, out of a sense of fairness would fix up this situation and not allow Tom Kent to deceive either the courts or parliament?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order with respect to another matter. Earlier this afternoon Your Honour ruled that a statement which the Minister of Transport sought to table under Standing Order 41(2) was not one that could be tabled in that way but that it appeared to Your Honour to be a statement which the minister could have made on motions. That being the case, I wonder if Your Honour would ascertain whether there is now unanimous consent for the House to revert to motions, so that the minister can make that statement here, in the House of Commons.

Mr. Speaker: I suggest to the hon. member that his interpretation of the ruling of the Chair differs slightly from my interpretation of what I said. As the hon. member seeks the unanimous consent of the House to revert to motions, I will inquire whether there is that unanimous consent.

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

[Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton).]

Mr. Speaker: Obviously, there is not unanimous consent. Orders of the day.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

[English]

FAMILY ALLOWANCES ACT AND YOUTH ALLOWANCES ACT

AMENDMENTS TO INCREASE PAYMENTS

The House resumed, from Friday, September 7, consideration of the motion of Mr. Lalonde that Bill C-223, to amend the Family Allowances Act and the Youth Allowances Act, be read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Health, Welfare and Social Affairs.

Mr. Heath Macquarrie (Hillsborough): Mr. Speaker, I note that my eloquence is moving members, even before I have begun to speak.

Mr. Nowlan: You have not seen anything yet.

Mr. Macquarrie: As my colleague from Annapolis Valley has just said, I have not seen anything yet.

This is the last of the trilogy of anti-inflation measures or, as the minister put it on Friday, it "is within the scope of the program which the government has already announced to protect the purchasing power of Canadian consumers." The minister on Friday made references to the bill of his colleague, the President of the Treasury Board (Mr. Drury) and the amendment to the Old Age Security Act with which this chamber has already dealt. He also referred to pending changes in the Canada Pension Plan. We are thus completing our examination of what one might describe as the prime ministerial welfare package for this country.

Last week the House adjourned for two hours to allow for this magisterial declamation against inflation and rising living costs, of which there has been some discussion in recent days. But it is misleading, I believe, to the public of this country to suggest that on this question of social welfare, what was announced by the Prime Minister last week conveys, implies or inscribes any dynamic, compelling urgency as a motivation for the announcement which was made in this particular welfare field. So, we have here not a series of bold, new thrusts but a rediscovery of items which have been mouldering on the order paper for a good many months.

The Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) made references to changes in the Canada Pension Plan. Was this a new and special response to the vaulting cost of living increases throughout the summer months and, indeed throughout the year, that is, through the fall, winter and spring? Canada now, as has been documented in this chamber, has the most rapid escalation of food prices of seven major countries, an escalation which is up to 14.7 per cent per annum, as documented by one of the most prestigious international economic bodies in the world, and an overall increase in the cost of living of 8 per cent per annum.

The welfare package is not a new response, because away back on January 4 of this year we find in the Speech from the Throne references such as the one that follows. I quote from page 5 of Hansard of January 4, 1973:

> Subject to the appropriate agreement being reached with the Provinces, changes to improve the Canada Pension Plan will be introduced to provide higher pensions for widows, widows with dependent children and the disabled and to make other needed amendments.

Weeks went by; months went by, and on April 18 we saw the presentation, with great fanfare, of the orange paper. The Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Lalonde) said on April 18, as recorded at page 3404 of Hansard:

> In this regard, we advance two specific proposals in relation to the Canada Pension Plan which we would like to embody in legislation this year—subject to a provincial consensus. This involves an increase in the level of yearly maximum pensionable earning—and the removal of the ceiling on cost-of-living escalations of Canada Pension Plan benefits.

That was said in April. This is September. All this indicates something less than emergent galvanic action. Indeed, it prompts one to ask how long it will take to get these improvements into our legislative stream.

I ask again, as I asked on Friday and Wednesday of last week, where is the delay? Why is there a delay in this process? A lot of time has elapsed since January 4; a lot of time has elapsed since January 18. Were there not any dominion-provincial conferences in this period? Were there no conversations? Were there no visits to provincial capitals? Why were these matters not discussed? Why, in all the time that has elapsed from January, were the provinces not asked for their approval of this particular matter?

In the old days people used to be concerned if one spoke for buncombe. There is no room for buncombe in a country that is going through the times that this one is going through. So, that part of the prime ministerial statement to which reference has been made was misleading. It was not a new item at all. But there is another statement which is much more serious. I was amazed to hear the Prime Minister say, as recorded at page 6183 of Hansard:

> As for the poorest families in Canadian society, the federal government shares 50 per cent of the cost of social assistance paid by the provinces to families in need. The government said in August, and repeats today, that it stands ready to pay 50 per cent of the costs of increasing these payments to compensate for higher prices. Certain provinces have already acted to do so, and others are undoubtedly considering taking such action soon.

Has someone suggested that the Canada Assistance Plan is a new measure to deal with the current cost of living emergency?

● (1510)

The Canada Assistance Plan has been in operation for a good many years. It is in essence a 50/50 sharing by dominion and provincial governments. Therefore, it was not any new pronunciamento, to use a favourite word of the right hon. member for Prince Albert (Mr. Diefenbaker). In fact, in the 1971 Annual Report of the minister, in the chapter dealing with the Canada Assistance Plan, it is pointed out, and I quote:

> No upper limit is placed on the benefits for which federal sharing is available.

The dispossessed and the needy were not given anything new last week when it was suggested that this is a new corrective measure. This is a new remedial promise. Many months ago I suggested to the minister that what was needed in the Canada Assistance Plan was a new formula. In this emergency, let the government of Canada undertake to help the dispossessed by giving 75 per cent of the cost until such time as the elaborate new look at social services is completed. When I mentioned that last spring, the minister said it was a short-term bandaid type of approach.

In March, 75 per cent was not acceptable, but the mere statement that 50 per cent would continue to be paid made the headlines in the great prime ministerial statement last week. I hope those in Canada who stand in need, not only of welfare payments, but in need because of the times in which they live, through no fault of their own, of greater aid are not taken in by this pretended munificence, this phony benevolence indicated in the statement.

Last Friday when dealing with this subject, I expressed my regret that the figure of $20 per child in the family allowance was not adopted instead of the minimum figure of $12. I said then and I say now, if we can legislate $12 on an interim basis, we can legislate $20 and give a little more assistance to the people in need.

When the once entrenched Prime Minister of Canada, the Right Hon. William Lyon Mackenzie King, introduced this measure in 1945—the minister and I were young indeed, perhaps adolescents, depending on how quickly we developed—the figure then as a matter of income redistribution, and that in essence is what these types of payments are, amounted to 1.45 per cent of the Gross National Product. In 1973, our existing payments amount to .5 per cent of the Gross National Product. In other words, the Minister of National Health and Welfare has been presiding over a family allowance system about one third as generous as that of the cautious Mackenzie King. To keep abreast of the value in terms of the Gross National Product which Mackenzie King gave, the present $8 cheques would have to be $17.40 and the $6 would have to become $13.

This is obviously a mathematical concept I am putting forward because we must always take into consideration the horrendous rise in the cost of living. In light of cold economics and in light of the proportion of the Gross National Product that is involved, the 12 per cent is not enormously munificent. As I say, to keep abreast of Mackenzie King, it would have to be $13.40. The minister is almost $1.50 below Mackenzie King; not outstanding progress, not rushing out full tilt toward a generous, compassionate welfare state. It is not the kind of galvanic progress which would guarantee that the minister's party and his party alone should remain in power forever and ever with the continual support of a certain group to my left. Geographically, they are to my left, but their performance in recent months causes me to wonder who is left and what is left.

We have learned, and I suppose when one stops learning he may as well stop living, that in dealing with government, propped or prodded by the NDP—they used to prod them, but now they prop them—we must be thankful for small mercies. We learned officially today what we knew empirically all along, that unemployment is rising and has risen even through the heat of the summer, even with the fanfare and the ballyhoo of LIP programs and the like.

Inflation is tough enough on any citizen, any head of family. How much worse, how much more terrifying and how much more soul destroying is rampant inflation to the head of a family who cannot find work? How does he cope? What does he do? How does he walk among his fellows with respect? How does he look upon his children as he tries to meet their needs and demands and cope with their aspirations?

In light of what is happening to our cost of living and our employment statistics, I hope the minister will not be overly immodest about this improvement. Heaven knows, many, many heads of families will need the increased cheques. I hope they will go out to them as soon as possible without any administrative delays which will cause this group of people to be frustrated in their expectations. These are difficult times. Despite the efforts that have been announced, this government has neither slain nor scotched the snake of inflation. However, for this measure of assistance we have to be thankful because it will for many people make a situation that is a little better.

We in this House would be naïve to think that we have in fact accomplished overly much. We would be naïve to believe that palliatives have cured. To believe this would be to believe that General Plumptre's army would be a rescuing force. I am sure that latest charade in the phony war against inflation will probably go down in history as the most ineffectual exercise in supererogation undertaken in this country. Whatever the people of Canada need to know, they do not need someone to tell them the cost of living is going up. Whatever else was needed, surely that was not the need.

Finally, true to my long standing tradition of not making long speeches, although they may not be as short to others as they are to me, we are going to support this measure. We note a lack of certainty in this bill. It is an interim bill, but it has no terminal date. We are told that something will start at an early date. I want to know if the cheques will get out on time. When will the new cheques be ready? I know the October date is not to be found in the bill. Is the minister sure that the consultations about which he has spoken will progress in such a way that the people can expect the $20 average in January 1974? If this is the case, we are delighted but we cannot find such an assurance in the legislation itself. I hope that later in our proceedings the minister will be able to give us an assurance of this kind.

For our part we shall support this measure. Faint as it is, it does help, and we wish to help these people as much as possible.

Mr. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa-Whitby): Speaking on this measure, I really wish to deal with two questions. One is directly related to the substance of the bill before us and to the benefits it provides. The second relates to a broader context, that is the way in which the legislation affects the redistribution of Canadian income.

It seems to me that the area of family allowances is one of the few areas in which the federal government really does involve itself in the direct redistribution of income. In a discussion of this subject it seem to me, therefore, that the bill before us should be discussed in a wider context, one which goes beyond the particular arrangements which have been made.

As the minister explained, family allowance payments in respect of all children in Canada are to be increased to $12 effective October 1. This is splendid. It will mean an average increase in family income of $10 per month, during the period October 1-December 31 of the present year, affecting some 3.5 million Canadian families. So an obvious advantage will accrue to Canadian families under the terms of the bill before us. A great many needy families will be directly assisted in coping with the results of inflation. This is especially important when we bear in mind that food prices have gone up by some 20 per cent in the past year alone. I should like to point out that conditions in which many families are living in Canada today are not such that we can be very proud of them. Some 4.5 million Canadians are living in poverty, and this figure includes 1,700,000 children according to a study prepared for the Senate Committee on Poverty. The fact that as of two years ago 1,700,000 children were living in a state of poverty is one we should keep much in mind when we hear statistics about the growth of real output in the economy, and so on, such as the Minister of Finance (Mr. Turner) has brought to our attention.

The hon. member for Hillsborough (Mr. Macquarrie) has just expressed the opinion that the government ought to bring the level of payments up to $20 beginning October 1 instead of deferring such action until January 1. We in this party support such a proposition because we put it forward last spring when the minister placed his white paper on the subject of family allowances before the House. We said at that time that rather than wait until fall, or until January, the increase should come into effect on July 1. We gave assurances that had such a bill been brought before the House for second reading at that time we would have assisted in securing speedy passage for it so that it might have been implemented before the summer recess.

The minister has assured us that negotiations are going on with the provinces so as to work out the details of the complex formula which has been devised in order that the provinces might have an effective say in the distribution of the eight dollars additional to the $12 minimum. It seems to be a highly desirable formula, one which meets the requirements of a complex federal state such as ours. We accept the minister's assurance that this work will be done in time for the bill to be passed by January 1 and, speaking for my party, I can assure him that we shall do everything we can to support these efforts.

The proposal before us will provide Canadian families with an immediate increase in disposable income. The second advantage of the scheme is its universal aspect. It is only a year or so ago, I would remind the House, that the present Minister of Labour (Mr. Munro) when he was minister of national health and welfare, placed a proposal before us which would have introduced a means test into the family allowance scheme. It would have cut millions of ordinary Canadians from the benefit of the legislation. The NDP and the NDP alone voted against the proposal on second reading precisely because such a step would have been socially divisive; it would have been followed, in my judgment, by severe disruption of support for any social legislation which might have been introduced in subsequent years.

I say this to the minister. I hope I am preaching to the converted. He is a different minister and he has brought in a different package, despite the fact he is a member of the cabinet which put forward the plan we criticized so strongly a year ago. I, for one, hope the government does not bring in legislation in the social field or any other field which imposes a means test as a condition of benefit, such benefit being provided by the generality of the taxpayers. That kind of legislation will not get the support of the New Democratic Party. It is the sort of legislation that has been passed in other countries in the world which, instead of creating a sense of community, a sense of co-operation and fellowship among citizens, creates barriers and divisions. It creates antagonism toward government social schemes of all kinds and as such is the kind of legislation that the New Democratic Party cannot support in any way.

I read with interest the speech of the hon. member for Hillsborough on Friday last. When he pointed out that the present bill had universal application and did not involve a means test, he said: "For that we may be profoundly thankful." I would remind him that it was his party, the Conservative party of Canada, which just one year ago in this House supported the kind of legislation that he condemned here last Friday. It was the Conservative party of Canada, the hon. member's party, that supported a family allowance scheme that was based on a means test. I, therefore, welcome the hon. member for Hillsborough to the halls of the converted. I am glad he now accepts that family allowances should be applied universally rather than through a system that involves discrimination in the form of a means test. We, too, join with the hon. member for Hillsborough in welcoming the universal application of this particular scheme. At this point I shall leave that aspect.

I want now to deal with the legislation in a broader context. No matter how immediate and pressing are our needs, particularly in relation to food costs and housing, whether a person lives in Labrador, Halifax, Vancouver, Oshawa, or any part of rural or urban Canada, the fact is that within, I hope, a matter of months, to put it in a realistic context, inflation will be brought under some meaningful control in this country and the economy restored to a more stable or constant level, to the kind of situation where we are not continually preoccupied with how to beat inflation. Once we restore conditions to near normality the real effectiveness of this particular family allowance measure, it seems to me, will then be tested. What this kind of proposal does, or ought to do, is to redistribute income from upper income citizens and corporations to the average citizen and the poor in Canada, so that there is created within this country a more equitable society in which there is genuine equality of opportunity for our children to develop their talents and capacities. The real test of this legislation, therefore, which will come when another provision takes effect from January 1—what I might call stage two—will be: Does this bill move us toward a redistribution of income in Canada or does it not?

Before answering that question, I should like to put before the House some statistical information relating to the present situation in Canada. After many years of legislation since the second world war, introduced by governments at the federal level and also at the provincial level—though I am speaking principally of this federal institution—have we had a redistribution of income in Canada? The answer to that question is a resounding no.

I should like to present to the House statistics showing allocation of income prior to taxes for the years 1951 and 1971. Let me take first the lowest 20 per cent of the population. In 1951, the bottom 20 per cent of the population had 6 per cent of the disposable income before taxes. In 1971, after 20 years of a variety of Conservative and Liberal governments, this bottom 20 per cent still had only 7 per cent of the disposable income—a gain of one per cent after 20 years.

The next 20 per cent of the population had 13 per cent of the disposable income in 1951, and in 1971 still had only 13 per cent. The middle 20 per cent had 17 per cent in 1951, and in 1971 this percentage had increased to the colossal figure of 18 per cent. The fourth 20 per cent, going upwards in the distribution of income, had 22 per cent of disposable income in 1951, which by 1971 had risen to 23 per cent. We then get to the group of Canadians who are struggling to eke out an existence in this country, namely the top 20 per cent. In 1951 they had 41 per cent of the disposable income, twice the amount that their percentage of the population, in one sense, would seem to warrant. In 1971 this figure had dropped the grand total of two percentage points; they still have 39 per cent of the disposable income before tax.

I remind hon. members once again that we are talking here about family allowances. There were originally intended by the Liberal government of 1944 to provide for real equality of opportunity among young Canadians. If we are concerned to have genuine equality, then we should all be shocked and dismayed by the foregoing. After 20 years of pretty high prosperity in Canada we still have a situation where the top 20 per cent of Canadians have 40 per cent of disposable income in Canada, whereas the bottom 40 per cent of the population have only 20 per cent of the disposable income. There has been virtually no change in the distribution of pre-tax income in Canada during the past 20 years, and I think we should seriously concern ourselves with this fact.

I now pass on to deal with what is seen by many, both in this House and outside, to be an important means of curing this situation. Rather than have a national incomes policy, for example, many people contend that all we have to do to rectify the maldistribution of income that occurs before taxes are applied is to continue to have progressive taxation of the kind that gained some popular political support in the 1930's. This is particularly an argument—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Is the hon. member rising on a point of order?

Mr. Blais: No, Mr. Speaker; I am seeking the hon. member's permission to ask him a question.

● (1540)

Mr. Broadbent: Mr. Speaker, I would be very pleased to deal with that as I do not intend to take all of the 40 minutes allotted to me. However, I would ask the hon. member to hold his question until the end of my remarks.

Mr. Blais: I simply want to ask it now because it deals specifically with the point that the hon. member has reached.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member who has the floor is the one who will decide whether he will allow a question. Do I understand that the hon. member for Oshawa-Whitby gives that permission?

Mr. Broadbent: Yes, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Blais: I would like to ask the hon. member for Oshawa-Whitby whether the figures he is reciting now relate to pre-tax income or post-tax income, and whether he has comparative figures relating to income after taxation with respect to these various sectors in the income groups?

Mr. Broadbent: Mr. Speaker, the question is perfectly timed. The figures I gave were pre-tax income. The point I was coming to is that a number of people, particularly in the Liberal party and Conservative party, have said, "All right; you can rectify that situation by 'our' progressive tax policies." Now, I want to provide the hon. member and others with statistics that deal with distribution of income after taxation. I will now deal with the post-tax situation. I will deal with the question of who pays proportionately most taxes in Canada and who benefits proportionately most from government services and programs.

According to a study done earlier this year for the Economic Council of Canada by Mr. Allan Maslove, entitled "The Pattern of Taxation in Canada" we find, after considering the net effect of municipal, provincial and federal taxes, that the tax structure in general is extremely regressive, with the upper income groups paying proportionately less than their share, and the lower income groups paying proportionately more than their share. Who bears the least load of the tax burden? That question is posed and answered in the study to which I have referred. The answer is that those whose incomes are $12,000 and more per year bear the least load of taxes in this country, which is the direct opposite of the effect a progressive tax system should be achieving.

If the rich bear the least load of taxes the question must be asked: who benefits proportionately more from the programs and services of governments? The study reaches the conclusion that the upper income groups benefit proportionately more than the average and lower income groups. It seems to me that in a period of five minutes it would be very difficult to reveal a set of statistics to this House that are more damning of the workings of parliamentary democracy in this country during the past 20 years.

What I have tried to show with respect to pre-tax income is that over the past 20 years there has been little change. The rich are still getting much more than their share of income, and the poor are receiving fantastically less than their share. Spokesmen for the Liberal party and the Conservative party for years have said that they would rectify the situation, but there has been no improvement in the situation with respect to the distribution of income after taxes. Instead, we have a worsening of the situation. That is a shocking condemnation of taxation policies enforced at municipal, provincial and federal levels. It seems to me that the bill before us has to be seen in that context.

When Prime Minister Mackenzie King introduced the original Family Allowances Act in 1944 he said the intention of the measure was to provide real equality of opportunity for young people. It seems to me that when we talk about family allowances we must talk about distribution of income and how family allowances can redress inequalities in it. I and my party strongly support a universal system of family allowances precisely because here we can tax all those who can afford to be taxed, particularly upper income Canadians and corporations, and redistribute money to those who are in need.

I cannot forgo the opportunity to comment on the actions of this parliament last spring when it voted $500 million in concessions to Canadian corporations, concessions that, according to all serious economic analyses made by authorities outside the political parties and the government structure, were entirely unwarranted. Here I am talking about responsible economists. Not one argued that tax concessions totalling $500 million were necessary for the Canadian economy.

I do not at all question the personal integrity of the man who preceded me in this debate, but I do point out the contradictory actions of his political party, which last spring voted in favour of $500 million in tax concessions to corporations which had been making the largest profits in Canadian history. Now, he comes along and tries to act as the spokesman for the average and poor citizen. It seems to me there is a basic contradiction in that kind of action, a contradiction that cannot be tolerated by my party.

If we had divided the $500 million in concessions to corporations among the 3½ million families that have children, we could have given each family about $140, which really would have done something to redistribute income in Canada. It might even have reversed the statistical pattern with respect to the distribution of income over the past 20 years. But the Liberal and Conservative parties decided the corporations needed the $500 million more than the average income people and the poor citizens of Canada.

In conclusion, Mr. Speaker, I wish to say that we in this party certainly support the $12 minimum family allowance payment. In view of the current fantastic surplus position achieved by the Minister of Finance (Mr. Turner) we believe it could be increased to $20 now, instead of next January. But we support the measure because it is a universal scheme. Again I remind hon. members that even if the family allowance goes up to $20 per child, and even if this is an important step, it remains a small step in dealing with the grotesque inequalities that exist in our society. This parliament should be dealing with those inequalities on a priority basis.

● (1550)

[Translation]

Mr. René Matte (Champlain): Mr. Speaker, the bill before us gives us an opportunity to think over a few things, and I believe that could be beneficial. Mr. Speaker, what is accomplished through this bill? I think it palliates at the very least some oversights that were allowed to continue to exist since the advent of family allowances.

It will be remembered how for several years our party insisted on the absolute necessity of setting family allowances at a reasonable level which would at least enable us to acknowledge the value of the most important element of a population, the very people who make up that population. And since the advent of family allowances, the small adjustments which were made have always been stingy ones which failed to grapple with the real problem. It was considered more urgent to deal with other types of subsidies and expenditures without realizing that it was absolutely necessary to guarantee at least reasonable allowances to that major element of any population that is the continuance of the family. There was a failure to deal with that to the extent that for a long time family allowances have been simply ridiculous, and still are. It was simply a mockery to continue to give such allowances.

I will be told of course that this bill will solve the problem. I say, Mr. Speaker, that it is not true. Of course if we compare an $8 allowance with a $12 allowance, there seems to be a significant increase but it was so unfair to give $8 or $10, as the case may be, that what is now being done is far from solving the problem—even if the mathematical increase might be fairly great.

That is why we wonder why in trying to solve such a problem the work is not more in depth than it is. Why not set logical standards? Why not begin at once for instance to deal with the integration of family allowances in a comprehensive system, under which all Canadian families would be guaranteed the necessary minimum income, so that every Canadian could live decently notwithstanding his age? Sooner or later, we shall need an integrated system of that kind instead of skimming over the family allowance issue, as we are doing now, by granting a certain increase to children up to 16 years of age. We contend that it is not enough. A little more should be granted and thus more respect would be shown the Canadian family.

We agree on that, but we should like the government to realize that there is much more to be done and we would want it especially to consider seriously the possibility of solving the problem once and for all through the establishment of a guaranteed annual income system.

We talked about that very during the last election campaign. We say, and we have supporting evidence, that we can realize that immediately, notwithstanding the arguments the minister could put forward against it. And once we will be provided with an integrated guaranteed annual income program, controls will be lessened and we shall no longer be faced by this illogical situation when control and administration are more costly that the benefits paid.

We are still faced with this situation and this is why we should think about it if we truly want to find adequate solutions to this problem.

Many shortcomings should be corrected. I know that everything cannot be settled at the same time but we should at least indicate some kind of orientation and I would like to point out the inconsistency which consists in an exemption of $300 per child.

Mr. Speaker, we know about today's cost of living. We know that the new benefits will be far from adequate, that they will not help the families and yet we still accept those figures. How can we encourage the Canadian family? How can we give to each family the ambition and ideal required to reach education, progress and so on since nothing truly encourages the families. This is why when speaking about family allowances we should relate them to the overall situation of Canadian families. This is why I wanted to point out those facts.

If the government thinks that it will please the people and correct major problems with such a bill it is deluding itself, for not much will be cured in this way. At least if the Minister had agreed to immediately raise these allowances to $20 instead of waiting until the 1st of January 1974, or if he had made the increase retroactive at least to the beginning of 1973, it could have been considered as a more tangible effort the effects of which could have been felt immediately throughout the Canadian economy, since any increase in the purchasing power of the Canadian people could help fight against the calamities which are confronting them: inflation, price increases, and all the other problems which we are facing, Mr. Speaker.

I think that the Minister should think of all these factors which will eventually prompt us to contemplate long term instead of short term solutions. How long will such a law be adequate? How long will we be able to say that we finally found a solution?

That is why we cannot discuss this matter without thinking about the basic problem—a guaranteed minimum income—and that is why also we must think, Mr. Speaker, of the constitutional difficulty as we all know that the government of Quebec in particular jealously wants to control social security. The Quebec Social Affairs Minister tried some time ago, and on that point I agree with him, to set up an integrated social security program. Everyone is aware that it is very difficult to set up such a program when there is a lack of co-ordination, when there is a lack of agreement and when each government follows its own particular way.

At the time it was accepted that the federal government should administer family allowances, we were then of course going against the constitution, but once the population has accepted this principle, of course I am not against the idea that it should continue to accept it. It seems to me however, that a federal government should at least, if it has taken over that field, have the decency to establish logical standards which do not make a mockery of us. When we offer to the provinces such ridiculously small allowances, as I was saying earlier, we do not seem to have the authority of a national government. This is possibly one of the reasons which prompted the government of Quebec to give its own family allowances. I believe this is quite sufficient proof of the inadequacy of the federal family allowances.

If through legislation we are to establish a general standard for the whole country, I agree, Mr. Speaker, but let us establish a standard which is perfectly admissible throughout Canada and which really reflects the needs of the standard family in Canada.

As to the amount of $20, I do not think it is sufficient and this is why, in concluding, I should like to say again that we must not only find palliatives immediately and try to lessen the difficulties encountered by families, but think right now of establishing programs in order to guarantee everyone this famous material security we need to free ourselves and develop better.

It is our role to find solutions. And it seems to me that it is our duty to say so, insist on old age security pensions and family allowances, Mr. Speaker. Each time we touch on this, we always touch on the basic problem of income security.

And our party has concrete solutions to propose to that end. We do not have reserve rights on this; we are prepared to see the government and the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Lalonde) in particular steal that beautiful concept from us and we will be very happy to assist them and then some. This is the way we conceive our political role in this House and we want to co-operate with everyone to satisfy all Canadians in a real and concrete way.

Mr. Francis Fox (Argenteuil-Deux-Montagnes): Mr. Speaker, the world of reasons and explanations is not the one we live in. Today I begin my speech with these words by Jean-Paul Sartre not because I am an existentialist but because we are debating today a fundamentally practical measure designed to make the daily life of thousands of Canadians easier.

Mr. Caouette (Témiscamingue): That is what Moses used to say!

Mr. Fox: They do not say the same thing in Témiscamingue.

The world of existence in Canada, in this month of September 1973, is a world in which some Canadians suffer a great deal from rising prices, especially food prices. The world of reasons and explanations, to come back to Sartre, and not to Moses, shows us that these upward trends are for a large part beyond our control. The bad crops of last year practically everywhere in the world, an increased global demand for quality food products, the fact that we have to import from abroad food products such as coffee and sugar,—to mention just a few—,are the main causes of this situation.

But what course of action can we take confronted with such a situation: A few countries such as the United States tried price control and this proved to be a failure. With the increase in the cost of food, the American stockbreeder was obliged to kill his cattle prematurely since the established price brought about a loss which resulted in a shortage of meat throughout the United States.

In Canada, we managed to resist applying simplistic measures to deal with rather complex economic problems, which enabled us to avoid some of the problems that the American people were faced with.

It is often said that price control is the appropriate answer. Well, in such a situation, food prices in the United States have increased, between December and March of this year, twice as fast as food prices in Canada.

In a letter to the Wall Street Journal on April 24, 1973, American economist J. K. Galbraith, one of the most powerful promoters of selective price controls, denounced a price control policy during a shortage period. In addition, price control is not a synonym of freeze. In Quebec, for example, the price of consumer milk controlled by provincial authorities has just been increased as was the price of bread. I do not think moreover that government authorities should set the minimum retail resale prices. Setting maximum resale prices can be justified from an economic point of view but not minimum resale prices encouraging the economic inefficiency of the retailer whose costs must eventually be borne by the consumer.

It might be appropriate, at this time, to refer to the competition legislation introduced in this House by the present Minister of State for Urban Affairs (Mr. Basford) who is responsible for the Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation, who was, at that time, Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs. Through this legislation, the federal government proposed precisely that minimum retail prices be declared contrary to the law and that only maximum prices could be established.

I could go along in this vain for quite a long time, I think, but what is important, in the long run, once reasons and explanations have been analyzed, is to take some action. And this is what the government did this year, by way of tax reductions in the budget speech and through the measures announced by the right hon. Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) on September 4.

The statistical analysis brought to the attention of our Special Committee on Trends in Food Prices proves clearly that the burden of recent price increases weighs most heavily on Canadians on low and fixed incomes. Studied as a whole, the figures compiled in 1972 by the OECD reveal that, in 1971, Canadians spent 20.6 per cent of their income on food, whereas the Americans spent 16.7 per cent, the Japanese, 26.6 per cent, the Germans, 24.2, the French 27.5 and the English almost 24 per cent. It must be remembered that in Canada, 15 years ago, as the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Lalonde) pointed out on September 7 last, 38 per cent of the family budget was spent on food. This means that, despite inflation, the lot of the Canadian consumer has, over the long term, considerably improved.

Often, however, such statistics, instead of revealing the extent of the problem some families may know, manage to cover it up and people look no further. Still, if Canadians, generally, spend 20 per cent of their budget on food, the low-income family has to devote to food a higher proportion of it.

[English]

The National Council on Welfare, in an excellent report on nutrition published in March of 1973 and entitled "One Child, One Chance", refers to a recent survey conducted by Statistics Canada. The council stresses in its report the importance of food costs to different types of families. For instance, a family of four with an income of $12,000 spends about 15 per cent of its disposable income on food, whereas the same family of four with a yearly income of $4,000 spends 32 per cent of its income on food. Since controls in a world shortage situation can only lead to reductions in output and to rationing, it seems clear that the most rational course of action is to adopt measures which will lead to increases in agricultural output, which will lead in turn to lower prices and in the meantime to put more dollars into the pockets of Canadian consumers so that they may face increased food costs.

If we wish to have a stable and growing agricultural industry, farmers must be able to make investment decisions with the assurance that they will receive reasonable rewards in return for their labour and investment. Stable prices will lead to rational investment decisions. But it is incorrect to believe that farmers will produce in abundance if their investment decisions are to be made in a situation where prices vary wildly from year to year, and if they cannot have some certainty that when their produce is marketed they will not be subject to extreme highs or extreme lows in prices.

The increase in family allowances to $12 is good news for the 3.5 million Canadian families responsible for the 7.5 million Canadian children. This measure, along with the reduction in taxes announced in February which average out to about 12 per cent, reductions in tariffs on imported foods, the substantial increases in universal old age pensions from $82 to $105 within a few months, subsidies for milk and bread, the full indexing of pensions paid by the government of Canada, are important and effective measures.

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker, I do not want to pass in silence over the magnificent work carried out by the Minister of National Health and Welfare in the area of family allowances. Not so long ago, some newsmen saw in this federal program the stumbling block for Canada. They nearly wanted to bring this country to an end because the federal government suggested increasing the amount paid to the people of this country. Thank God ridicule does not kill for otherwise Quebec would have too few editorialists. The discussions held between federal and provincial authorities in this area show instead that following discussions and bargaining, although points of views may differ on some questions, the real interests of our people shall prevail over jurisdictional disputes, while respecting the necessary autonomy of each level of government.

Once these disputes have been settled, editorial writers no longer mention them. They prefer looking for other issues which they may consider again as as many stumbling blocks for Canada. We may some day come to realize that a certain level of dynamic tension in federal-provincial relations is only normal and healthy, when this tension reflects differing points of view which are finally reconciled in the light of universally acceptable solutions.

The minister, in agreement with his provincial colleagues, has succeeded in that field in devising a formula benefitting the Canadian people, while complying with provincial government priorities and interests. This is no victory of one level of government over another; it is only a victory for all those who believe in a Canada whose main objective is to afford development possibilities to all its citizens.

[English]

Mr. Jack Marshall (Humber-St. George's-St. Barbe): Mr. Speaker, I have made several speeches on family allowance legislation in the five years that I have been in this House. Along with the number of questions and motions that I have put forth, I am sure this results in a lengthy listing in the index to Hansard under my name. I hope therefore, that this will be one of the last occasions on which I shall have to ask for the passage of all stages of Bill C-223 as quickly as possible so that we can get on with the new bill that will give increases up to an average of $20 to all children in Canada on a universal basis. We hope, as the minister promised, that this will be implemented in time for the cheques to go out in January. The hon. member for Hillsborough (Mr. Macquarrie) has indicated the co-operation of our party on all social security measures introduced in the House this week which will help relieve some of the suffering of those who must rely on the government for assistance. I am sure that all hon. members who speak will confirm this co-operation.

I do not think I have to remind most hon. members, but I feel it is necessary to point out that this is the fourth bill which has been introduced on family allowance legislation. Yes, Mr. Speaker, we have had four bills since the government introduced its first white paper on income security almost three years ago, in November, 1970. Since that date, we have had a white paper and an orange paper; we have had numerous studies to point out what should be done under social security programs for the country and we have had four bills. At this stage, three years later, the needy children of our country have not seen, nor have the mothers of those children seen, one additional copper to the amount afforded under the family and youth allowance measures which were introduced back in 1945. Bill C-264 and Bill C-170, which were introduced in the last session, are now commonly referred to as the FISP fiasco. I could spend many long hours reviewing the circumstances which we faced over many long months in dealing with those two bills which came to nothing through the incompetence of the government, but in order to speed up second reading I will await the opportunity to elaborate when second reading of Bill C-211 comes before the House again.

I should like to remind the hon. member for Oshawa-Whitby (Mr. Broadbent) what happened to the FISP bill. He can say what he wants, but if I understood him correctly, he indicated that it was the New Democratic Party which prevented the bill from becoming law. At that time, the New Democratic Party, along with our party, tried to introduce many amendments to the FISP bill which contained many inequities. It was a bad bill, but I can confirm that the majority of our members were prepared to vote for it because at least it would have helped the many children in the country. It was the hon. member for Trinity (Mr. Hellyer) who at that time was sitting as an independent, who took the technical action to stop that bill.

We had Bill C-264 as well as Bill C-170 and now we have Bill C-233 which will give temporary increases to $12 per month to all children up to the age of 18, hopefully for the months of October, November and December. Everybody seems to agree with the bill, but the fact it is before us proves that the same objective could have been accomplished by a similar simple amendment in 1970 when there was a need, as expressed by the government, to help the children of our country and there was every reason to do so. Certainly, this action could have been taken earlier when the cost of living got out of control just a few months ago. I, and many other members, have made this suggestion for some time now but to no avail. In May of this year, Mr. Speaker, I suggested this course of action to the government, and that is on the record in Hansard. To quote from a late show debate on May 17, at page 3906, I am reported as saying:

> The present family allowances bill could very easily have been amended as it presently exists, if there was any semblance of sincerity by the minister, instead of playing political football with poverty-striken Canadians.
> All they would really have to do, if they were concerned, would be to amend the clause in the present family allowance bill, which signifies the amount now received, by a greater amount. The only other clause required—

Which I recommended at the time—

> —would be the insertion of a clause dealing with annual increases in the cost of living. This was done very simply under the old age security bill and the war veterans allowances bill and it could have been passed in record time.

Is this not what we are doing now, Mr. Speaker, apart from the insertion of the cost of living index? Could this not have been done back in 1970 when the then minister and the government agreed that, as part of their income security plan, poor families had to be given increases in family allowances? But this was not the concept of the government at that time. They were talking about selectivity in 1970 and they got themselves in such a mess with Bill C-264 and Bill C-170 that the computers could not even cope with it. Now, the minister is back to universality, with which we agree, and which everyone was suggesting with regard to family allowances three years ago.

In any case, I hope that the government has finally seen the light and that the minister will keep his promise that these increases will be contained in the October cheques. I am sure the mothers of the needy children in the country are beginning to get pretty skeptical about the government's promises on allowances. If we go back over the experience of the past three years we will see why. I appeal to the minister and the government to make every effort to implement these measures. The situation in which those citizens who have to resort to welfare find themselves is at a critical stage. It is particularly critical for the many thousands of children in these families. At least it will give a little relief to the families in my province who cannot cope with the galloping increase in the cost of living.

For example, under the Canada Assistance Plan and the social assistance program of my province, a family of five in Newfoundland will get the magnificent sum of $215.00 per month. This particular family, taking for granted that they have three children under the age of 18, is now probably getting $22 under the present family allowances scheme. So, presumably, they will get an extra $14 per month. Together with family allowances, this family's income will now be $250 per month. I mention this, Mr. Speaker, because even though the increases will be welcome, they will not improve the lot of this family to any great extent. Really, we should be discussing in parliament, before we leave, changes required in the Canada Assistance Plan, because many thousands of people on welfare just cannot cope with the cost of living today.

The Minister of Finance (Mr. Turner) said yesterday that government policies were directed towards relieving the suffering of those on fixed incomes. But he left out a few other citizens, Mr. Speaker. No mention has been made during the past three years of the blind. The minister has been questioned about the disabled people in our country who are under 65. How do they cope? Allow me to refer to another example that affects people in my province. Two people on long term social assistance in Newfoundland get $140 a month on which to live.

I should like to read one of the many hundreds of letters I get from people in this category. It reads in part:

> Dear Sir:
>
> I was wondering if you could give me any information on social assistance.
> I have been out of work now for six years with a bad heart, and my wife, she has angina of the heart. I am getting up in years. I am 64 and my wife is 58, so I was wondering if there is anything better than the $140 a month.

The writer went on to say that war veterans of his age are getting aid, and that they deserve it. He says that he owns his own home, pays $315 a year tax, and his heating bill is between $40 and $50 a month. In addition, he has to pay the light bill and for repairs to his home, as well as for clothing for himself and his wife. He appeals for help. He says, near the end of his letter:

> So you can see for yourself what I have to live on. I am not living. I am just waiting to die. So I would appreciate it if you would let me know if there is anything going to be done.

That is typical of the many hundreds of letters that I get from people residing in my own and other parts of the country. Every time I ask the minister about this problem, the broken record is turned on: this is a provincial responsibility and we pay 50 per cent of the cost of social assistance.

The Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau), in his address last week, repeated that pledge which means nothing, namely, that if the provinces agreed to raise social assistance, the government would pay 50 per cent of the cost. Isn't it time, Mr. Speaker, that there was a halt in this game of passing the responsibility back and forth between the two levels of government and something positive was done to relieve the suffering of those citizens who do not have the means or ability to cope with inflation? Is it not time we revised the Canada Assistance Plan to allow for a bigger contribution by the federal government, particularly in the have not provinces? And isn't it about time that the minister called an emergency conference to deal with this program? This is a very critical matter.

I know that the minister is sincere in his attempts to relieve the poverty that exists in our supposedly great nation, but we are overlooking the plight of too many of our citizens. We can deal in some measure with our senior citizens, because they come within our jurisdiction when they reach 65, and thank God we have reached the stage where two people over 65 can get $325 a month. Under the government's new proposals they will get a little more. But what do we do with people who are 64 years of age? They can be sick or maimed and suffering under the worst circumstances, but our laws allow us to give them only $140 per month. The minister said in one of his speeches that the level of social assistance which is given to the poor of the provinces is a national disgrace. How true that is.

Another serious problem that we, as responsible parliamentarians, should be dealing with is that of the working poor. Once again I will give examples from my own province. At the present moment, a group of hospital workers in Newfoundland is striking for higher wages. Nobody wants strikes, particularly in essential services, least of all the workers themselves; but how are they to cope with the rising costs of food, shelter, oil and other necessities of life? One of these employees gets the grand sum of $55 per week, in this day and age; another gets $420 per month after 20 years of service; another gets $312 per month after having worked for nine years. They have to bring up families. Is it fair to allow that situation to exist in our country?

Yes, Mr. Speaker, I agree that the increase in family allowances will help these people a little bit. I realize also that this is a provincial matter. But surely the federal government must face up to the disparities in our country, show some leadership and live up to the pledge of the Prime Minister, who stated in the throne speech five years ago that this government was committee to providing a decent quality of life to all Canadians, in all provinces, wherever they may live.

I think the minister should be complimented for bringing in this measure to increase family allowances; however, the problems of our youth are much broader. I hope the minister will consider other programs during the three to five years it will take to introduce social security program for Canadians. More effort must be directed towards youth development. Children in this day and age are growing up undernourished, so they will be unable to cope with society in later years because of that fact.

Let me read one more note from my mail, Mr. Speaker, on the subject of the nutrition of our Canadian children. I shall quote in part from a letter from a school board supervisor in my district. I will read the following extract:

> It can be stated with a reasonable degree of certainty that the ability to learn is closely related to nutrition; thus we find that often as not the child suffering from malnutrition will either find himself in a 'slow' or special education class. It is obvious that under such conditions the school is not only confronted with instituting special programs in an attempt to remedy the problem but the child's interest in school diminishes to the point that it is likely he will drop out as soon as possible.

The partial solution to the problem is the instituting of diet supplementary programs in the schools, because it is in the school that the problem can be discovered more readily. The difficulty is, of course, that funds are not available for this kind of program. Once again, when I bring this problem to the minister's attention, it will become a provincial problem because education comes within provincial jurisdiction. At the same time, these children are suffering from inadequate diets and lack of proper nutrition.

The school board to which I referred attempted to institute a program involving eight schools. Under it 200 children were supplied with soup, crackers and hot chocolate and, in conjunction with this program, special education classes were conducted. It is obvious that we are not in a position to serve all the children but can take care of only the most pressing cases. Of course, the ideal situation would be to make a similar type of program available to all children. I am sure we could find, even under the British North America Act, a way to bring such a program under the Department of National Health and Welfare which would ensure that children would develop properly in body as well as in mind.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Marshall: Mr. Speaker, in the interest of passing this bill I will refrain from further remarks. I shall only say to the minister, bring the bill before the House, let us get it through and let us get on with the job.

[Translation]

Mr. Roch La Salle (Joliette): Mr. Speaker, I will make a few brief remarks on the bill before us which I think is quite important in view of the present circumstances.

I listened carefully to some speeches. I know the minister has often been asked why he was not making available allowances of $20 or $25 and why he was not doing so immediately?

Mr. Caouette (Témiscamingue): Because the minister is too slow.

Mr. La Salle: Mr. Speaker, I will limit my remarks to the bill and try to make a suggestion to the minister which I think deals with the problems with which we are faced.

As all other hon. members, I will be pleased to support a legislation which mathematically is very interesting, and I also feel that the increase in allowances to $12 as of October 1 will be quite welcomed by all mothers and, or course, their children.

I would like especially to ask the minister to give particular attention to the age of eligibility. We know quite well that when family allowances came into being, the age of those who completed their education was a lot closer to 16 or 18 than today.

We also know the important changes that took place in the field of education. By that, I mean—I have four children, so I know what I am talking about—that today, because of the deep changes made in our education systems, children must have lunch at school and spend a lot more money than it used to be.

We also know that even if we talk of free education, it does not really exist. Therefore, in view of the additional costs, which today are enormous, I wonder if the minister would consider the possibility of granting family allowances at least until the age of 21.

An hon. Member: Until 25.

Mr. La Salle: We know that today a large percentage of the students do not complete their studies until 21 and even later. I wonder to what extent we could reasonably ask the minister to consider this possibility. The generous additional income which has been granted and which will be available on January 1 would be more helpful to families if the age limit were raised to 21. After seriously discussing the matter with several of my constituents—instead of making a survey—I believe that they are very much in favour of this and endorse my arguments. They find it quite normal that we should consider the possibility of raising the eligibility age to 21. Of course, we could again consider that as long as the child is at school.

● (1630)

Now, I take the liberty during consideration of this bill—which, once again, I consider very worthwhile and will support most willingly—of asking the minister to consider that possibility.

Also, we ask the minister to increase immediately the allowances to $20. As I understood the bill introduced by the minister a few months ago which will come into force in January, it does seem that this basic minimum of $12 will be granted across the country and that the surplus of the general average of $20 will enable the provinces to grant it to large families or people with inadequate incomes, where the need is greater in their opinion.

I would like to take advantage of this opportunity to say that I am very happy to see that the provinces will be able to adjust the family allowances while respecting first of all the national basis, but with the possibility of adjusting the amount from $12 to $20, on the basis of need.

I suggest, as the hon. member for Argenteuil-Deux-Montagnes (Mr. Fox) said earlier, that this respect shown to the provinces, this opportunity granted to them, deserves of course some congratulations to the Minister who understood and accepted it; therefore the provinces that wish to exercise this power will be able to do so provided that they respect first of all the principles established by the federal government.

Therefore, I hope that on January 1st, we will have the opportunity of rising these allowances to an average of $20, and I understand that if the Minister—I think this is correct—cannot increase or did not deem advisable to increase immediately these allowances to $20, it is because in January the provinces will have to adjust this amount insofar as they have the authority to do so. And of course, in view of the fact that the $20 allowance will be taxable in January, it might be inconvenient for the people to receive an amount of $20 which would be reduced later on the basis of the provincial policy.

I wanted to make these few comments and again repeat these things bringing them to the attention of the Minister in order to know whether the eligibility age might be raised to 21 for the reasons I referred to earlier. I want to say of course that I am quite in favour of this increase which will be, I am sure, welcome by all the mothers and I hope that the government will not wait as long before considering again the need for an increase in these allowances based on the increase in the cost of living or the cost of services.

In conclusion, I would like also to state that this might be the way we could perhaps manage to increase the birthrate. Of course, it is often argued that there are less children as a result of the very high cost of living today. I think that this is an argument that we should ponder upon.

I could very well get carried away and say that raising allowances from $12 to $20, as some others have proposed, is inadequate; I could call for $30, but I would like to be rather positive and realistic. To the extent that it will be possible for the government to pay allowances directly related to the child and the family, to the extent that we will be able to ensure an adequate income to families, which would alleviate the very great difficulties which we encounter, we will perhaps be able to believe that it will be more tempting for a couple to raise more children.

After all, we know that there are young couples who have many reservations about the difficulties which have beset their parents and about the cost of living in general.

Thus the bill represents an improvement. Can the government or Parliament review it much more frequently? That is quite possible, and I only hope that it will.

Generally speaking, like so many other hon. members I welcome this most acceptable increase and you may be sure that I shall not hesitate at any opportunity given me to reiterate the requests we have to make in order to bring in more relief to the general public.

[English]

Mr. B. Keith Penner (Thunder Bay): Mr. Speaker, I enter this debate only briefly because it is most important to pass quickly this measure which will increase family allowances and get some extra cash into the hands of mothers who are facing rather substantial rises in costs this fall, particularly for food but also for clothing which their children require as they return to school.

That there is an urgent need for these additional consumer dollars, there is no doubt. This is especially true where the wage earner is not in a strong position to bargain for pay increases which would help him and his family to meet the rising cost of living. Unfortunately, there are still too many people in Canada who are not in a strong bargaining position. Others, the average Canadian worker, have not only been able to keep up, but in many cases to get ahead of the increases in the consumer price index.

Some statistics have recently come to my attention which show that during the period 1969 to 1972, the average weekly earnings of Canadian workers, and this is indicated by the industrial composite, increased by an annual average of 8 per cent. That is more than twice the rise in the consumer price index. The quarterly change for the first quarter of 1973 over the last quarter of 1972 indicates a rise in the wage earnings of 2.3 per cent compared with a 1.9 per cent rise in the consumer price index. These figures point out that the average wage earner has been able to keep up with, and in fact get a little ahead of, the rise in the consumer price index.

It can be said that for most people in Canada, wage and salary increases have enabled them to adjust and even somewhat improve their standard of living. However, and this concerns all members of the House, what is true for most Canadians is certainly not true for all. This has been brought to our attention by many members, including the hon. member for Oshawa-Whitby (Mr. Broadbent). Many Canadians who are in a weak bargaining position for one reason or another have suffered a great deal because of the inflationary situation which now faces them. In addition, what has been true about wage increases up to the end of the first quarter seems not to have been the case with respect to the second quarter of this year.

● (1640)

The President of the Canadian Labour Congress said recently—and I have no reason to doubt his conclusion—that Canadian workers lost one dollar a week in purchasing power in the second quarter of this year as a result of inflation. He went on to say that the workers are trapped on all economic fronts and that there are no brighter prospects before them in the foreseeable future. The proposal to increase family allowance will help all workers to offset the loss of purchasing power sustained in the second quarter of the year, and, more important, it will assist those on low incomes to provide the basic necessities of life for their families.

I should like to move, now, into another area related to family allowances. It has been said in the past that the family allowances program assists in providing equality of opportunity for all Canadian children. This view was also expressed a short while ago by the hon. member for Oshawa-Whitby, a member for whom I have great respect. He spoke as an egalitarian—I believe he would consider himself as being one. He thought the program should go further than it does and he praised it particularly on the grounds that it provided for equality of opportunity. Almost everyone agrees that the family allowance program is a good one. Middle-income families have come to accept it and expect it, and any attempt to eliminate the program or to revise it in such a way as to help only those in the greatest need would be met with strong resistance. The strength of such resistance has already been shown.

As I say, it is a good program, a program accepted by most Canadians, and one which is now being improved. But we should not claim too much for it. To say that it equalizes opportunity for Canadian children is to go further than is right or appropriate. No matter how large the payments may become in the future, and the minister has already told us there will be a further increase of up to $20 per month per child in 1974, and even if they were to rise as high as $40 or $50 a month per child, we could not claim they would equalize opportunity for all children. Such a program could never move us toward an egalitarian society. I want to try to explain this point of view, and I want to do so carefully because I could easily be misunderstood.

The source of inequality of opportunity in our society is only partly economic; a large part of existing inequality is due to cultural inheritance. Much of the transmission of culture, in the narrow sense, occurs through the family, through the more subtle and profound influences upon the child resulting from love, integrity and family morale. This constitutes a kind of inheritance which cannot, at least for those above the subsistence level, be significantly affected by economic measures. To express these thoughts, Mr. Speaker, is not to cast any aspersion upon the family allowance program, but to place it in proper perspective. If we in the House of Commons could upgrade and improve the quality of family life simply by redistributing tax dollars, as some egalitarians would have us believe, life would be much simpler than it actually is.

Equality of opportunity is an elusive goal and we may be able to assist in modest ways by removing obstacles of one kind or another, but much of the task is entirely out of our hands. As we all know, many a child born and raised in a poorer home has achieved a good deal more and contributed more than others who were nurtured in affluence. This statement is in no way meant to be a justification of poverty or low incomes. That would be silly. But I do argue that the most important factor in equality of opportunity is the quality of parenthood, the quality which enables children to face the challenges of life without being overwhelmed by them. Economic measures alone are no substitute for the good and valuable influences exerted upon a child by his or her parents.

The history of family allowances in Canada shows us that the scheme was brought in primarily as a fiscal measure intended to bolster consumer spending. As such, the program stands on its own as a social security measure. That is what it is, and we should not wax overly eloquent by claiming any more for it in the way of equality of opportunity. The family allowance program is an integral part of the social security program because it recognizes that wage-earners are seldom in a position to relate their income to the size of their families. The birth of a child does not mean that a breadwinner is able to bargain on that account for an increase in wages or salary.

Although, as I have mentioned, the family allowance program is widely accepted throughout Canada at the present time, there are concerned people who raise some questions about it. Such questions have been raised at meetings in my constituency and it is appropriate to deal with at least two of them now. One question which has often been asked is whether this program encourages people to have more children—whether it is an incentive to procreation. It is true, as many authors have pointed out in recent works, that population growth presents a serious threat in today's world. I cannot, however, agree that the payment of higher family allowances, allowances which assist low-income families in financing child-raising, will automatically encourage people to have more children. The experience of other countries does not support such a contention.

Let me illustrate. We have been paying universal family allowances in Canada since 1945, while in the United States no such universal family allowance has been paid. Yet the birth rate in both countries has shown a remarkably similar trend. Both countries experienced fairly rapid declines in birth rates until the end of the 1930's, a small increase during World War II and a sharp increase thereafter until near the end of the 1950's. From then on, birth rates have been falling quite dramatically. For example, in Canada the number of live births per 1,000 of population fell from 26.1 to 16.8 in the period 1961 to 1971. There is, therefore, no evidence showing a strong statistical relation between the existence of a family allowance policy and the rise or fall of the birth rate. For example, some European countries have quite generous family allowance programs, yet there has been no rise in the birth rate. On the other hand, in African and Asian countries, where family allowances are unknown, the birth rate remains high. Here in Canada, the province of Quebec since 1967 has paid family allowances over and above those paid by the federal government. The Quebec government has been the only one to do this, yet the birth rate in Quebec has dropped from 26.1 live births per thousand in 1961 to 14.8 in 1971. The birth rate in Quebec is now the lowest of all Canadian provinces.

I realize that there are other factors that also have to be taken into account in assessing population trends. However, I believe it is reasonable to conclude that the presence or absence of family allowance does not appear to affect to any degree the birth rate of a country. In addition, one cannot argue, in all humanity, that because some persons may think certain parents ought not to have children, we should allow children to suffer from poverty and malnutrition.

It seems to me that other measures should be and are being adopted to encourage family planning. For example, the Department of National Health and Welfare has set up a program of public information and education on family planning. In addition, it is promoting the training of professionals and non-professionals who are engaged in providing family planning services as well as supporting family planning research projects. It is through these better programs of public information and education that we are attempting to come to grips with family planning. It is through the family allowance program that we are hoping to improve the living standards of the present generation of Canadian children who, through no fault of their own, may find themselves living in conditions of poverty.

That is one of the questions raised about the program; another is the claim that the increase in family allowances will require higher taxes. Let me reiterate what was said in the working paper on social security in Canada and what the Minister of National Health and Welfare has said repeatedly. The implementation of the new over-all approach to social security, including higher family allowances, will take place over time "within existing levels of taxation". The government has assigned a high priority to social reform. It seems to me that this is one of the very significant accomplishments of the present government and parliament. This means that, in deciding each year how to spend the tax dollars it has collected, the government will be assigning a great deal of importance to ensuring that appropriate amounts of money are allocated to fund the new social security programs, such as higher family allowances.

I conclude by saying that I commend the government for bringing in this measure to increase family allowances. I also share the interest of those hon. members who want this measure to pass without delay so that higher family allowance payments can be received by the mothers of this country to help them and their children, hopefully as soon as next month.

Mr. Cyril Symes (Sault Ste. Marie): Mr. Speaker, my comments on Bill C-223 will be brief. I support this bill to increase the amount paid for a child under 16 years to $12 beginning October 1, effective till January next. At present, as we all know, the family allowance payment for a child under 10 is $6, and for a child between the ages of 10 and 16 it is $8. The increase to $12 will not be taxable, and next January an average of $20 per child will be paid.

Although a newer member of this House, I have been looking with interest at what has been the Liberal government's policy on family allowances over the years, especially during the last majority government and the present one, and have been struck by the amazing number of reversals of policy that this Liberal government and its predecessor have undertaken. In 1972, when the Liberals had a majority government, they introduced a new family income security program. They tried to do what the hon. member for Thunder Bay (Mr. Penner) has just said was not the aim of the family allowance system; they tried to use the family allowance system as an anti-poverty program. Under that proposal, which thank goodness never did get through the House, a higher amount of family allowance would have been given to low income families and a reduced amount to middle and upper income families. Under that plan some hundreds of thousands of upper income families would have received no family allowance.

That plan was rejected. It was rejected because the benefits to be paid the poorer families were inadequate and the benefits for middle income families were unrealistic. For example, a family with an income of $11,000 having five children would receive only 75 per cents per child, which was absolutely ridiculous. The NDP opposed that plan for many reasons, as mentioned by the hon. member for Oshawa-Whitby (Mr. Broadbent). We maintained that family allowances should be universal.

We are now in 1973 and the Liberals have been chastised by the electorate and now form a minority government. A while ago the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Lalonde) grandly announced that, beginning in January of 1974, family allowances would be increased to an average of $20 per child and would be subject to tax. Why that change of heart? Besides the obvious foolishness of the FISP plan, the government is now in a minority situation and realizes that the NDP holds the balance of power. It knows that since NDP opposed the previous plan, it will certainly oppose its reintroduction. Thus the government has come up with this $20 family allowance plan commencing next January.

Then this month the government has introduced yet another plan to increase family allowances to $12 per child beginning October 1. Why this about face, this further change? The reason is that the cost of living has risen so dramatically, and the NDP told the government a few weeks ago that an immediate increase in family allowance was one small way to help compensate families and enable them to meet the rising cost of living. But as is typical of Liberal government policy, it is too little, too late.

I see it is now five o'clock, Mr. Speaker, so may I call it five o'clock and continue after the supper adjournment.

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

[English]

SUBJECT MATTER OF QUESTIONS TO BE DEBATED

Mr. Deputy Speaker: It is my duty, pursuant to Standing Order 40, to inform the House that the questions to be raised tonight at the time of adjournment are as follows: the hon. member for Victoria (Mr. McKinnon)—Veterans Affairs—Victoria, B.C.—Possible transfer of hospital from federal authority—Request for consideration of views of veterans; the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) Veterans Affairs—Inquiry as to increases in war veterans' allowances; the hon. member for Edmonton-Strathcona (Mr. Roche)—Health—Request for assistance to Alliance for Life.

● (1700)

It being five o'clock p.m. the House will now proceed to the consideration of private members' business as listed on today's order paper, namely, public bills.

Mr. Reid: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker, I believe there has been agreement to take the bill standing in the name of the hon. member for Surrey-White Rock (Mr. Mather).

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Is it agreed that the House proceed to consideration of Bill C-35, An Act to amend the Motor Vehicle Safety Act (seat belts) standing in the name of the hon. member for Surrey-White Rock?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

PRIVATE MEMBERS' PUBLIC BILLS

[English]

MOTOR VEHICLE SAFETY ACT

AMENDMENT TO PROVIDE FOR MANDATORY EQUIPPING OF VEHICLES WITH SEAT BELTS

Mr. Barry Mather (Surrey-White Rock) moved that Bill C-35, to amend the Motor Vehicle Safety Act (Seat belts), be read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Transport and Communications.

He said: Mr. Speaker, the purpose of this bill is to amend the Motor Vehicle Safety Act in such a way as to include a change which would make mandatory the equipping of all commercial motor vehicles, notably trucks and buses, with safety restraint seat belts, and further would make mandatory the use of such seat belts by the operators of commercial vehicles. Similar legislation is now in effect in the United States and is saving lives on that country's highways. My contention is that the passage of this bill, or the furthering of what is proposed in it, would also have a good effect in Canada.

In Canada 5,000 people are killed, 190,000 people are injured—many of them for life—and $1 billion is the economic toll taken by traffic accidents every 12 months. To put it another way, in each and every week in Canada 1,000 Canadians are killed, 3,500 are injured, and the dollar loss is multimillion. If you consider this toll on the order of a war in which people are slaughtered, the economic loss is immense. We can calculate the cost of this road war for, say, a four year period. In the last four years 20,000 Canadians have been killed, 750,000 others have been injured, and no less than $4 billion have been lost, all through traffic accidents.

This is a toll comparable with that in a major war. I consider it demands more attention and more action on the part of the federal government and the provincial governments than have been given to it so far. We cannot hope to end this type of war, but I submit that with proper consideration we can hope to bring about a reduction in the toll that it takes, and perhaps produce an armistice during which we can have time to consider and put life saving legislation into effect. The three main features of motor vehicle accidents concern the driver, the vehicle, and the road or driving conditions. My proposal has to do with two of these elements.

In the United States commercial vehicle accidents involving the vehicles covered by my bill claim 10,000 lives a year, with 124,000 persons disabled. In our terms, if we take the usual one-tenth standard with regard to the difference in population between the United States and Canada, this would mean that approximately 1,000 Canadians are killed every year and approximately 12,000 are injured in bus and truck accidents.

Towards reducing this loss the United States department of transport, the federal highways administration, in 1970 introduced regulations providing that seat belts for the drivers of buses and the drivers and co-drivers of trucks and truck tractors had to be installed in all motor vehicles used in inter-state or foreign commerce built on or after July 1, 1971. Older vehicles manufactured after January 1, 1965, had to be fitted with seat belts by July 1, 1972. In the news release which was issued with respect to this legislation it was stated that a landmark provision of the new regulations is the requirement that a motor vehicle, which has a seat belt assembly installed at the driver's seat, shall not be driven unless the driver has properly restrained himself with the seat belt assembly.

This is exactly what my bill seeks to achieve in Canada, the mandatory use of safety seat belts in commercial vehicles. I think it is clear to anyone who considers the situation that the drivers of commercial vehicles, notably buses or trucks, have many lives other than their own in their hands when they are driving such vehicles. It is obvious that if an accident occurs and the driver of a commercial vehicle, a bus or a truck, is not wearing a seat belt and is hurled forward, or into the roof of the vehicle, or ejected from the vehicle, the vehicle would be out of control, and very likely would be involved in the destruction of property, and the possible loss of the lives of people in other vehicles.

It has been estimated that the use of proper seat belts in trucks and private cars has cut the rate of fatal accidents by 40 per cent in North America. In this bill I am seeking to make a change in the safety provisions with respect to motor vehicles, a change which I believe is necessary and simple to bring about. No doubt other hon. members will argue that while the equipping of motor vehicles with safety facilities is a federal matter, the use of such facilities comes under provincial authority. This is quite true, and it presents a ridiculous picture.

The federal government, under the terms of the Motor Vehicle Safety Act passed by the House on March 11, 1970, has the power to prescribe, by regulation, the design, construction and functioning of motor vehicles manufactured or imported into Canada, including seat belts. But actually the Motor Vehicles Safety Act is not concerned with the use of motor vehicles since this is presently regulated by the provinces. We at the federal level can require seat belts to be in motor vehicles, but we cannot make any provision for their use.

In bringing this bill forward, Mr. Speaker, I am of course conversant with the facts I have just related. But what I am seeking here is not so much passage of the bill as drafted, but the referral of its subject matter to an appropriate committee of the House for further study, and hopefully the encouragement of federal-provincial action in an important and neglected field of Canadian transport safety.

In conclusion I would like to point out that this proposal is non-political in every sense. If the subject matter of the bill is allowed to be sent to committee for study and discussion, no doubt the committee can improve on what I have proposed. Passage of this bill or of similar legislation can save lives in this country. We in this House have the power to do that.

Mr. Don Blenkarn (Peel South): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to see that an hon. member has introduced a bill that is not dissimilar to a bill introduced in the Ontario legislature by the provincial member representing the same riding as I represent, designated as Peel South. It is imperative that some regulation be implemented, some direction, some concrete steps be taken to indicate the desired safety requirements that must be installed in motor vehicles. However, I am a bit disturbed about the form of this bill, which indicates that the Governor in Council should pass regulations prescribing classes of belts and so on.

One of the greatest problems we have in this country is that pieces of legislation come before us with some good concept and then the bill goes on to say, "the Governor in Council shall by regulation—". Nothing ever happens, because in many cases the regulations are never formulated. Indeed, if they are, rules are made of a quasi-criminal nature which the citizen must respect, but these rules or regulations are never brought before the elected representatives of the country for discussion, comment and detailed consideration. They are in some way pulled out of the hat by someone off in his ivory tower who decides that he and not the elected representatives of the nation should make the rules. It is that kind of thing I cannot accept.

While it is imperative that the automobile industry should be given direction in connection with safety, it is also imperative that this House of Commons give that direction. It should not be left to the whim of some inspector in some office somewhere. On this particular issue, I should like to commend the automobile industry for the efforts it has made in past years in connection with the installation of seat belts in private automobiles. Indeed, I find today that one cannot buy an automobile in which the belts do not ring or the buzzers sound or that the automobile will not start without someone hooking up a seat belt. So, this is the situation in which a private industry, the automobile industry, realizing the safety problems and criticism it has suffered as a result of books written by Nader and others, has decided to do something on its own. I am surprised this government has not given the automobile industry guidelines concerning the kinds of things members of this House, representing the people of Canada, would like to see that industry do.

Really there has been nothing. There have been pious hopes that there be safe automobiles, but really what has happened has been that we have a captive automobile industry which imposes on Canadians safety standards perhaps not even worked out in Canada, and perhaps not even those desired by Canadians, but rather requirements which come to us from across the border. The industry in Canada receives no direction from the government concerning the kinds of things we, as Canadians, require for safety on our highways.

The hon. member for Surrey-White Rock (Mr. Mather) spoke of commercial vehicles. It is high time the government of this country, where commercial trucking means so much in the transport of goods and equipment, came forward with regulations, suggestions and an innovative approach to the industry to bring in safety features that would be appropriate to conditions in Canada.

Mr. Blais: Mr. Speaker—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Laniel): Order, please.

Mr. Blais: Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the hon. member if he will allow it.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Laniel): The question, of course, can be asked only with the consent of the hon. member.

Mr. Blenkarn: If it is a short question, Mr. Speaker, since I have only a few moments.

Mr. Blais: Mr. Speaker, I would like to know if the hon. member is for or against this bill?

Mr. Blenkarn: That is the kind of bright question I would expect from the other side.

An hon. Member: They should fasten their seat belts.

Mr. Blenkarn: That is right; they should fasten their seat belts because that is what they will need when they are fired out of here.

Let me say that this bill needs more work done on it. It is the type of bill which should go to a committee of this House but not in its present form. Indeed, what should happen is that a motion should come before this House directing the Standing Committee on Transport and Communications to make an investigation of the kind of regulations and suggestions which should be made for the automobile industry in connection with safety. I commend the hon. member for bringing this matter before the House. I know other members wish to speak on this subject, so I will conclude my speech now.

Mr. Mather: Mr. Speaker, I wonder if the hon. member, as he resumes his seat, would permit one short question from me?

Mr. Blenkarn: Yes, certainly.

Mr. Mather: Would he object to the subject matter, not the bill, going to a committee for further consideration?

Mr. Blenkarn: Mr. Speaker, in my view the whole subject matter should go to the standing committee immediately. There are a number of important matters on which leadership should be given to the automobile industry. We should not have to depend on foreign suggestions relating to safety and have those imposed upon us here in Canada.

Mr. Charles Turner (Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, the Motor Vehicle Safety Act is designed to protect the public against personal injury, impairment of health or death. The Motor Vehicle Safety Act achieves this end by permitting the Governor in Council to make regulations respecting the use of the national safety mark in relation to motor vehicles. These regulations take the form of safety standards applicable to various classes of motor vehicles. In other words, it is illegal to apply the national safety mark to a motor vehicle unless that motor vehicle complies with the safety standards applying to it. Furthermore, provincial legislation makes it illegal to sell a new vehicle which does not bear the national safety mark. Regulations in the form of safety standards are not written directly into the act because the rate of technological change is of such a magnitude that it would be impractical to change the act every time a safety standard was improved.

During 1972, for instance, the safety standards were amended 18 times and three new standards were introduced. Before going further, I must emphasize that our objective is to obtain the highest possible seat belt usage rate. It is obviously impractical, however, to achieve this objective through the amendment of an act which already, by means of the regulations, requires seat belts to be fitted in every new automobile, together with a warning system in the case of front seat-occupants, which reminds the driver to fasten his seat belt and to ask his passenger to do the same.

Seat belts have been required equipment on new automobiles sold in Canada since the regulations, made pursuant to the Motor Vehicle Safety Act, became effective on January 1, 1971. The effectiveness of the relevant safety standard was widened on July 1, 1972 to include trucks, buses and multi-purpose vehicles. This widening of the safety standard required a seat belt of a specified type to be provided at each designated seating position of a truck and multi-purpose vehicle regardless of the vehicle weight. It also required that a seat belt of specified type be provided for the driver of a bus.

Various provincial governments required that seat belts be fitted to automobiles some time before the federal Motor Vehicle Safety Act became law. Some provincial requirements on this topic go as far back as 1967. The adoption of what is called the auto pact influenced the design of automobiles designed in the United States and manufactured in this country, bringing about the widespread installation of seats belts in anticipation of government regulations.

Seat belt utilization is admittedly more infrequent than we would like it to be. However, improved motor vehicle safety regulations are resulting in safety belts which are more comfortable to wear and are easier to fasten and unfasten. These trends should result in the greater usage of these important safety devices. Furthermore, amendments to the motor vehicle safety regulations, which are in the process of being proposed for adoption at present, will make safety belts even easier to use, resulting, we hope, in a further increase in their usage.

The proposed amendments address themselves to emergency locking retractors and one piece shoulder and lap straps among other things. The inertia reel device allows the wearer of the belt full freedom of movement under all conditions except in emergencies which involved the rapid deceleration of the vehicle. The one piece shoulder and lap strap requirement will result in the wider use of shoulder straps. The effect of this trend will be to reduce the number of instances of the occupant of the automobile striking the windshield, the steering wheel, the mirror, the instrument panel, and other objects within the occupant compartment of the vehicle, thereby reducing injuries in motor vehicle accidents.

The national highway traffic safety administration of the United States government has recognized the hostility of a large majority of automobile occupants to the wearing of seat belts and is slowly moving toward the introduction of a regulation which will require the installation of automatic occupant restraint systems which will necessitate no action on the part of the occupant to make them effective. These systems, however, are complex and costly when compared with the well-tried and well-understood seat belt. It is hoped that in Canada gentle persuasion of motorists to use the seat belt will result in the saving of lives and reduction of injuries, thus creating a trend superior to those that the more complex restraint systems favoured by the United States government can achieve.

While comparing the Canadian situation with that prevailing in the United States, it should be pointed out that since August 15, 1973, U.S. safety regulations require automobile seat belt systems to be interlocked with the motor in such a way that the vehicle cannot be moved unless the driver and passengers on the front seat are first seated and then have fastened their seat belts properly. In Canada, it is considered that such an involved arrangement might merely increase the autmobile users hostility toward seat belts as a result of the numerous inconveniences and annoyances. Consequently, the ultimate aim of the widespread employment of seat belts would not be served.

The interlocking of the seat belts with the motor has been included in the proposed amendments to the Canadian motor vehicle safety standards as an option with which the manufacturers may comply if they so desire. It is probable that some automobiles incorporating the interlocked feature will be on sale in this country after September of this year, since a notice leaving it optional in our regulations has already been given in the Canada Gazette Part I of May 26, 1973. For reasons of ease of production, there will be a tendency for identical vehicles to be sold on both sides of the border. The risk of substantial penalties for the sale of non-complying vehicles in either Canada or the U.S.A. could make the small production cost savings resulting from deletion of ignition interlock hardware unattractive for the manufacturers.

The warning light and buzzer telling the driver that he or one of his charges has not fastened his or her seat belt is fairly easily defeated and it is disquieting to hear that many auto salesmen are quick to show possible buyers how to defeat the system. This type of activity destroys to some extent the good work done by the federal safety standards, and if we are going to achieve good results in the fight against death and injury on the highway, this type of behaviour must stop.

A number of complaints have been received by the Ministry of Transport regarding the comfort of seat belts and expressing a fear that the shoulder strap will cause injury to the neck rather than minimize injuries in the event of an accident. These fears are not supported by the in-depth accident investigations conducted by the ministry and the nine university accident investigation teams under contract to the Ministry of Transport.

Three federal safety standards address the matter of holding the occupants of a vehicle inside that vehicle and of preventing them from striking the inside of a vehicle in an accident. Seat belt installations in passenger cars, seat belt assemblies and seat belt anchorages comprise these three standards. They result in a well engineered restraint system on vehicles built in the last few years. But how can the owners of vehicles built before these standards became effective protect themselves and their passengers? It becomes increasingly difficult and not really practical to require the fitting of seat belts to older vehicles because in most cases the engineering task would be too great and the operation economically not feasible. The correct installation of occupant restraint systems as we understand them today affects many parts of the vehicle such as the floor structure, door posts, the roof and the seat frames. It is impractical to add to older vehicles the refinements of recent models, but if by the stroke of a pen we are going to demand that a large segment of the motoring public protect itself by taking some action, then the segment that is unable to protect itself by the means provided to the majority can, justifiably perhaps, complain that it is being discriminated against.

One class of the population that is often forgotten when seat belts are under discussion is children. Good child seats are available for children of up to approximately three years of age and, as we have discussed, the large majority of automobiles are fitted with seat belts of fairly good quality. The smallest occupant which seat belts are required to accommodate by the safety standard, however, is a fifth percentile female. This female is 59 inches in height and has a weight of 102 pounds. Thus, a child over three years of age who may weigh in the region of 20 to 30 pounds and is smaller than a small adult female, is not specifically provided for. There is considerable danger in young children, even if they are well developed physically, using seat belts designed for adults because of their malleable bone structure. Furthermore, internal injuries can be sustained as a result of a belt exerting too much pressure on the abdominal area of children because of their lack of muscular development. Pediatricians recommend that adult seat belt systems should certainly not be used for children until they weigh 40 to 50 pounds and are four to five years of age at least. Child seat manufacturers are ignoring to a large extent children between the ages of three and six, thus the parents do not have the option of purchasing special seats for their offspring if they are of certain ages and weights.

Shoulder belts should generally not be used by children until they have reached 55 inches in height and are approximately nine to ten years of age because of the possibility of facial and neck injuries due to the high location of the belt relative to the child. Many imported vehicles have been fitted with one piece lap and shoulder harnesses, and all Canadian and imported vehicles will be so fitted after September 1, 1973, so it will be impossible for the child to use only the lap belt.

We will be either forcing children into unsuitable restrain systems or leaving them unprotected if we make the wearing of seat belts mandatory, when what we should perhaps be doing is requiring manufacturers of child seats to offer a wider and more reasonably priced seat for the older child. It should be mentioned that under the Hazardous Products Act a federal standard for children's car seats and harnesses does exist, making it illegal in Canada to sell a child seat that does not comply with safety requirements set out in the standard.

A rather unexpected influence on this whole matter is in the course of developing behind the scenes to some extent. This influence is exerted by the courts in withholding a certain percentage of the damages originally awarded to a plaintiff because that plaintiff did not wear the seat belt provided. The particular case of interest is Jackson et al v. Millar et al, where the judge applied a reduction of 10 per cent to the damages awarded to Jackson because he failed to wear his seat belt.

The accident in which Jackson suffered serious injury was the result of a number of causes. A party of three youths decided at a relatively late hour on a Sunday evening to go to a drive-in movie theatre. One of three was able to borrow his father's car and they set off at about eleven o'clock p.m. After alternately dozing and watching the movies until the early hours of the morning, they decided to drive to a cottage owned by the parents of one of the youths. They found nobody at the cottage and decided to return to Toronto to their homes.

During the early portion of the journey the two passengers slept quite a lot, that is, until the accident occurred in which Jackson was injured. The car went into a skid and spun around, during which time it appears to have struck some guard rails causing Jackson to be thrown out of the vehicle. The other two occupants were unharmed in the accident even though they were not wearing their seat belts; however, their location in the vehicle was such that they were not adjacent to the door which sprung open. Jackson was seriously injured. Although the only fault on his part was not to have worn his seat belt, and keeping in mind that the driver was found to have acted negligently in driving when he was tired, damages awarded to Jackson were reduced by 10 per cent, this being the amount by which the judge found the plaintiff to be responsible.

Thus, in reducing the damages allowed to Jackson, the judge could well be setting a series of precedents which, when they have received sufficient publicity, will cause people to be a little more careful about wearing the restraint systems provided for them.

In conclusion, I would like to restate my strong support for increased seat belt usage in Canada. I will support any program that will increase its use. I do not believe that the proposed amendments to the Motor Vehicle Safety Act contained in Bill C-35 can achieve this purpose. The safety standards prescribed in the regulations made under this act are already providing seat belts for passenger cars, trucks, multipurpose passenger vehicles and also for drivers of buses.

Mr. Mather: Mr. Speaker, would the hon. member permit one question before he resumes his seat?

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Laniel): Order, please. The hon. member for Surrey-White Rock (Mr. Mather) is asking the hon. member for London East (Mr. Turner) for permission to ask a question.

Mr. Turner (London East): Yes, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Mather: Would the hon. member who has just concluded his interesting remarks object, not to the bill but to the subject matter of the bill going to a committee for further study?

Mr. Turner (London East): I agree with that, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Otto Jelinek (High Park-Humber Valley): Mr. Speaker, I listened with great interest to the speech by the parliamentary secretary, some of which was basically a reading of the motor vehicle safety regulations of which we are all aware. I also listened with great interest to the hon. member for Surrey-White Rock (Mr. Mather), and I offer my compliments to him on his initiative in bringing forward the important matter of further safety in motor vehicles in Canada. I believe in the safety of all Canadians and therefore I should like to add, possibly in committee, some further amendments to the proposed legislation.

It is, as most members are aware, an indisputable fact that seat belts have saved not only many lives but have on numerous occasions prevented serious and crippling injury. Those countries that have passed such legislation are experiencing dramatic reductions in loss of life. All we have to do is look at the example of Australia which implemented seat belt regulations for all drivers and passengers in private vehicles and drivers of commercial vehicles. One year after this legislation came into effect, a 20 per cent reduction in deaths by traffic accident was recorded.

Mr. Speaker, the most advantageous aspect of the proposed legislation is that it will serve to make people aware of the value of these safety features in their automobiles. Advertising campaigns by insurance companies, governments and safety councils have already had a certain effect, but legislation in this regard will doubtless enhance the safety program presently being undertaken.

If we but considered the legislation currently in existence in most provinces and states in North America concerning the use of crash helmets by motorcyclists, and the overnight reduction that legislation had in reducing serious head injuries to these individuals, we would all give serious consideration to the immediate implementation of the bill presently before this House.

Mr. Speaker, no one speaking in support of this bill is speaking without facts and figures to back up this proposal. The success encountered by other safety studies speaks for itself. I doubt if there is a member in this House who is not aware of an instance where someone they know escaped serious injury because they were wearing their seat belt, or transversely, suffered serious injury because they had neglected to use the equipment, which is mandatory for all motor vehicles sold in this country, as we all know.

Mr. Speaker, if through this legislation we are able to save one life or prevent one serious crippling injury, then we will have served a great purpose. If through this legislation people throughout our land become safety-conscious and safety-minded, then this too will mark the proposed legislation a success. If we prevent the mutilation of one body hurled through a windshield, or the face of a child being scarred for life, then this too will mark this legislation successful.

As a new member, I am not exactly sure what the amendment means. The explanatory note to the bill is in part as follows:

> The purpose of this bill is to require the equipping of commercial vehicles, trucks and buses, with safety belts in the driver position and to require the use of these restraint belts by the driver—

I take it that the hon. member for Surrey-White Rock intends that safety belts be compulsory only in commercial vehicles and that drivers of commercial vehicles should wear them when this legislation goes through. When this bill is passed to the committee, for the reasons I have stated I would like to see it contain a provision compelling the use of seat belts by both driver and passengers in private automobiles in this country. Such a step would make the legislation truly all-encompassing. Therefore, Mr. Speaker, with these amendments in mind that I will propose in committee, I would urge all hon. members to support the bill.

Mr. Reg Stackhouse (Scarborough East): Mr. Speaker, I am happy to support this bill because it tries to take positive action to deal with one of the most serious social problems confronting our country. Since the first traffic fatality in North America in the year 1899 there have been almost two million such fatalities in the United States and Canada. In this country we are presently suffering between 5,000 and 6,000 traffic fatalities per year, and it is often brought to our attention that more Canadians and Americans have been killed in traffic accidents than have been killed in warfare in this century.

If we were confronted with the prospect of 5,000 or 6,000 Canadians being killed in military action somewhere in the world, this House would be filled; this country would be concerned. Yet the challenge is there that such a large number of Canadians are facing death within the next 12 months through traffic accidents. We must become increasingly conscious of the need to take steps that will lead to greater traffic safety.

I should like to take a few moments to deal with an aspect of this problem not dealt with by the bill and which perhaps cannot be dealt with by committee. That is the limitation on the effectiveness of such legislation. I agree that we should have such an act, and I agree that the owners of the vehicles affected should be required by law to equip their vehicles with the kind of seat belt that the bill would demand.

But we must remember, even if we accept the terms of reference mentioned earlier by the hon. member for High Park-Humber Valley (Mr. Jelinek), that we cannot through legislation make sure that the maximum number of drivers of commercial and personal vehicles will actually use seat belts. You can legislate ownership but you cannot legislate common sense. The trouble is that we can have laws requiring cars, trucks and other vehicles to be equipped with seat belts, but we cannot require people to use them. Even the threat of a penalty often may not be enough to make people do what common sense instructs them to do. That is why I think the government ought to institute an effective educational program.

It has been my experience in elementary and secondary schools of a particular community of this country that such traffic safety educational training programs have an impressive effectiveness. I use the occasion of this debate to draw to the attention of the House the need for the federal government to invest more resources in traffic safety education. We are told that not only are 6,000 people being killed on our roads every year but that 200,000 are sent to hospital as a result of traffic accidents. Indeed, one-tenth of hospital beds in Canada are regularly occupied by accident victims.

In such a situation I think it is mandatory for the federal government, in co-operation with the provinces, to help boards of education finance expanded traffic educational and safe driving programs. If we were to do that we would, over the years, build up in the minds of the public a consciousness about this matter that would reinforce what this bill seeks to do.

Speaking in terms of what this would cost, I remind hon. members that local boards are possessed of limited resources and therefore must get assistance from the federal level of government which has much greater resources. If we were to put into traffic safety education programs across this country even a fraction of the millions of dollars we are squandering on some kookie schemes which have been carried out under LIP and OFY, we would be doing a great service for the safety of the people of this country.

Mr. Joseph-Philippe Guay (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I, too, want to say a few words on Bill C-35, an act to amend the Motor Vehicle Safety Act with specific reference to seat belts. Having listened to other hon. members speaking, I also feel that the jurisdiction in this field is that of the provinces and of the federal government.

The seat belts now being fitted to vehicles sold in this country are undoubtedly the single most valuable and effective safety device required by the motor vehicle safety regulations. For this very reason I am not opposed in principle to laws requiring the wearing of seat belts. In a very real sense they are a logical outcome of the public concern over traffic safety which brought the Motor Vehicle Safety Act and regulations into existence.

Perhaps it is time for us to say to the public, "The government has done a great deal in recent years to make safe the motor vehicles you drive. Now we are going to require you to do your part and to use this most effective safety device, instead of either ignoring it completely or actively inhibiting its function". I have very serious doubt, Mr. Speaker, that amendment of the Motor Vehicle Safety Act is a proper or even a feasible method of compelling the use of seat belts, but I do not propose to dwell on that point at the moment.

I express my concern that this bill, undoubtedly introduced with the most humane of motives, attacks only one part of a larger problem, implies little appreciation of the wider issues involved, and consequently could ultimately cost more Canadian lives than it would save. Mandatory seat belt wearing could save as many as 1,500 lives each year and could eliminate or alleviate many thousands of injuries which now occur unnecessarily as the result of motor vehicle accidents. However, a partial measure, introduced without the necessary preparatory programs, could well produce such a hostile public reaction that subsequent, more comprehensive and effective measures would be condemned to public rejection from the outset.

For I believe, Mr. Speaker, that public acceptance is essential to success in such measures as the one we are discussing. In a democracy such as ours, conformity with the law does not depend on the powers of the enforcement agencies. It depends on the respect of the ordinary citizen for the social purpose and inherent reasonableness of the provisions of the law. And I believe that the actual usage rates of seat belts in this country indicate that we have some extensive ground work to do before we will get the acceptance which is so essential to success.

For this reason, the government is currently conducting a number of independent studies of the factors which determine seat belt usage. Why do many people appear unconvinced, in the face of all the contrary evidence, that wearing a seat belt substantially increases one's chance of escaping death or injury in a collision? Why do people who believe in the value of seat belts so frequently fail to "buckle up"? How many people support the principle of legal compulsion to increase seat belt usage? Until we have answers to questions such as these, I cannot but regard Bill C-35 as premature and likely to endanger the ultimate achievement of its own commendable objectives.

Specific studies are going on. I obviously cannot anticipate in any detail the results of such studies as I have mentioned. But it seems to me that there are likely to be at least three distinct types of objection to the use of seat belts which demand separate consideration in drafting any law requiring their use. The first of these might be characterized as rational objections based on personal observations. For example, it is unfortunately all too common to find that if one wears the diagonal shoulder belt, one cannot reach the parking brake release or the window-winder, or perhaps some more vital control. And to get into this situation one has to pass a small test of engineering knowledge; you need co-ordination of hand and eye to fasten the belt in the first place.

I think the public may legitimately press for improvements in the convenience and comfort of seat belts. I hope that the improvements which have been introduced into the motor vehicle safety regulations for the 1974 model year will result in substantially increased rates of seat belt usage. I think that any government is bound to examine very ca fully, before introducing legislation requiring the use of seat belts, the practicability of such a requirement. In a recent, well-publicized study conducted by three students of industrial engineering at the University of Toronto it was found that the seat belt design in a number of current vehicles significantly limited the driver's access to vehicle controls. These findings are also being confirmed in the continuous evaluations of current model vehicles being conducted by the government, in addition to its testing for compliance with the motor vehicle safety regulations.

We must also anticipate a considerable number of rational objections based on misinformation. Questions are asked such as, "But what if I'm strapped into a burning car following a collision?" "What if my car ends up in a river or lake?" Both of these occurrences are quite rare. In both cases a restrained occupant has a far better chance of remaining conscious during the initial phases, and consequently of extricating himself. A seat belt buckle is simpler to release than to fasten, and except in the most improbable circumstance that the buckle itself is damaged in the collision, it will unfailingly release the belt when required to do so. Objections such as these should be countered by an appropriate public information campaign before any law requiring the wearing of seat belts is introduced, if it is to obtain the support which is necessary.

A further factor which would necessitate a public information campaign is the general lack of understanding of the importance of correct positioning and adjustment of the seat belt. Within the practical constraints imposed by the necessity to fit a large range of sizes and shapes of occupant, the seat belt normally falls in approximately the correct position on the body. It can, however, be significantly affected by the seated posture of the occupant. At best, an incorrectly positioned seat belt is less effective than it might be, and at worst it may be lethal. In particular, it is important that the lap belt should be positioned as low as possible so that it does not bear on soft abdominal tissue. Fatal internal injuries have been caused by lap belts worn high on the abdomen.

Similarly, the importance of not twisting the belt is too little known. The width of the belt plays a vital part in distributing the collision forces over an area. A twisted or rolled belt applies a more concentrated and potentially more injurious force to the body. The importance of ensuring that this type of information is available to every vehicle user before the introduction of a law requiring seat belt use need hardly be stressed.

Finally, one must expect to encounter entirely irrational objections to the wearing of seat belts and these may be the hardest of all to take into account in legislation. I believe that any law requiring the wearing of seat belts must provide for certain exemptions. An irrational fear of being so restrained would seem to justify such exemption, if it can be medically certified. Exemptions might well be required on a number of other grounds, in particular that of physical deformity of the driver or passenger.

While I have treated the problem of gaining public acceptance of the type of law envisaged in Bill C-35 in a necessarily abbreviated way and have barely touched upon a number of other important questions, I hope I have said enough to persuade this House that the real objectives of the bill are most unlikely to be achieved by instant legislation.

The introduction of a law requiring the wearing of seat belts is a matter necessitating the most careful planning and preparation. I think it is easy to be misled by the Australian experience in this area, to underestimate the preparatory work which was done there and to overestimate the ease with which such legislation can be translated for Canadian use. I also fear, Mr. Speaker, that we may soon see in France some of the unfortunate side effects of a somewhat limited requirement for the use of seat belts; one, moreover, which was introduced by regulation and apparently without any prior effort to inform the public of its intent and objectives.

In my concentration on the issues involved in the introduction of a law requiring the use of seat belts I have so far ignored the alternative methods which are available to achieve the underlying objectives of Bill C-35, namely, to increase the safety of vehicle occupants through the use of occupant restraint systems. However, it is important that we do not disregard these other options.

As I have tried to indicate, we cannot yet consider seat belt wearing legislation to be a panacea. For this reason, the government is also undertaking a basic study to determine the relative effectiveness of the various alternative types of restraint systems which are now available. The study will provide data which, hopefully, will enable us to compare a wide range of alternative technical and legislative policies, including some which would undoubtedly fall within areas of provincial authority.

In conclusion, I should like to reaffirm my support for any measure which results in improved utilization of seat belts. I have, however, endeavoured to show that there are very serious dangers in attempting to bring about such improvement through piecemeal legislation introduced without the careful planning and supporting programs which I believe to be necessary if the intent of the legislation is to be realized.

I have briefly mentioned some of the studies which the government is currently undertaking and which bear upon the substance of the bill before the House. I have also attempted to place the question of legislation requiring seat belt wearing in proper perspective with other approaches to the same objective which are also under study by the government.

While I support wholeheartedly the aims of this bill, I do not believe it would achieve the results which its sponsor anticipates. Further, I am concerned lest it endanger the achievement of the desired reductions in deaths and injuries of vehicle occupants by subsequent, more comprehensive or alternative measures.

FAMILY ALLOWANCES ACT AND YOUTH ALLOWANCES ACT

AMENDMENTS TO INCREASE PAYMENTS

The House resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. Lalonde that Bill C-223, to amend the Family Allowances Act and the Youth Allowances Act, be read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Health, Welfare and Social Affairs.

Mr. Cyril Symes (Sault Ste. Marie): Mr. Speaker, when the House adjourned this debate at five o'clock for private members' hour I had just begun my speech on Bill C-223, the bill to increase the family allowance to $12 beginning October 1. This is the government's response to the rising cost of living and is an attempt to help families that find it very difficult to feed and clothe children. I was outlining some of the policies of the Liberal government both when it had a majority and in the present minority situation, and referred to the various family income security plans the government had proposed and which in the wisdom of this parliament had been rejected. We now see an interim measure in which the minister of health has decided to raise the allowance to $12 per child. The allowance will be non-taxable. At five o'clock I was pointing out that this step was so typical of Liberal policy, being too little, too late.

The question that comes to the mind of every Canadian is this. If this is an anti-inflation policy, if it is a policy to combat the high cost of food and clothing, why was the family allowance not raised earlier than this date? I have a suspicion that the family allowance would not have been raised at all had it not been for the rail strike, for the fact that parliament was recalled and that the New Democratic Party presented, as one of its proposals to the government to help Canadians meet the cost of living, the suggestion that there be an immediate increase in family allowances.

The Minister of Finance (Mr. Turner) as late as mid-August said while he was vacationing in Kenora that prices were hurting but that this was not sufficient to recall parliament. I wonder whether he would have had the nerve to come to my constituency of Sault Ste. Marie and make that statement, for in August a survey conducted by the Canadian Press showed that Sault Ste. Marie was the second most expensive place in Canada in which to buy food. According to this Canadian Press survey, the cost of a food basket of standard products purchased in Saint John was $16.14, in Toronto $13.57, and in Sault Ste. Marie $15.69. The total rise in the food price index in one year has been 14.7 per cent.

This situation, Mr. Speaker, did not catch the Liberal government unawares. Month after month Statistics Canada were documenting the increases in the cost of food. Yet the Minister of Finance and his colleagues in the cabinet did not consider it of sufficient importance to recall parliament this summer to deal with the cost of living. While the cost of feeding a family has been mounting, the government has been procrastinating.

In its arguments, which we have heard time and time again, the government have stated that they could not afford to increase pensions or family allowances. In saying that, how on earth do they assume that the Canadian consumer can afford to pay exorbitant prices for food and clothing for his children? All families have been forced to cut corners and make do, especially families of low or moderate income.

Consider, Mr. Speaker, what faces a mother who is sending her children back to school. She has to buy new clothes and shoes for her children. I have received letters to the effect that this fall many mothers are not doing this; they are patching clothes, using hand-me-downs for their children, trying to stretch the life span of a pair of shoes. They are cutting back in this way in order to try to beat the high cost of living. But how on earth do you cut back on essential foods? Growing children need proper nourishment and you cannot cut back on this. Yet the government has sat placidly by watching month by month as the cost of food has risen.

Of course, we have Mrs. Beryl Plumptre, chairman of the Food Prices Review Board. What kind of soothing advice did she give to people trying to beat the cost of living? To mothers of families she said, "Don't buy the more expensive kinds of food. Don't buy steak. Use hamburger instead." I checked the price of hamburger in my constituency, Mr. Speaker. Last year it was 88 cents a pound; now it is $1.12 a pound. There is small comfort there. People cannot even afford hamburger if they are members of unorganized labour, if they do not have unions to help increase their wages or if they are living on fixed incomes.

While the Minister of Finance and the government refused to recall parliament to deal with the issues, somehow mothers had to feed and clothe their families. As I have said, it was hard enough for middle-income families, and it was virtually impossible for the 4½ million poor in Canada, those already living below the poverty line. How on earth did the government expect them to cope with the situation? If it had not been for the railway strike and the NDP shopping list we would not have this bill before us today. This bill, to raise family allowances immediately, is only a stopgap measure, and the government well knows it.

Time and again we have tried to prod the government into action, but how reluctant it has been to move. There has never been real initiative on its part. It has always adopted ad hoc measures, reacting to the pressures of the moment, to public opinion and to the minority situation in which it finds itself. From the government and its predecessor we have not seen a concentrated attack on the cost of living in the broader perspective, and by this I mean a redistribution of income through a fair tax policy. I do not know how many members of this House and of the Canadian public are aware of the injustices that are present in our tax system and in the distribution of wealth.

My colleague from Oshawa-Whitby alluded to this point this afternoon, with many statistics. I would like to cite but one. In 1961, taking into account all taxes direct and indirect, a family earning under $2,000 a year paid 60 per cent of its income in taxes, whereas families with income over $10,000 paid only 38 per cent of their income in taxes. This unjust system was continued for over a decade by successive Liberal and Conservative governments. Recently some relief was afforded through reforms in the personal income tax laws which our party advocated when the House met in January and which were reflected in the Speech from the Throne.

We do well to remind ourselves of the other side of the coin, that our tax policies point out where the concern of the old-line parties really lies. Here I am referring to the tax concessions given to large corporations. This Liberal government, which says it is so concerned about the average Joe Public, gave $500 million in tax cuts to large corporations in its recent budget, despite the tremendous increase in corporate profits over the last quarter of the previous year.

I want the Canadian people to think what that $500 million would have meant had it been distributed among Canadian families to help them meet the cost of living. If it were distributed among the 3½ million families with children, it would average $140 per family. That would have been a constructive move. That would have been meaningful. That would have been a fair and just way to help the Canadian people. But I have no confidence that we will get such a just tax system from the Liberal government or from its mirror image, the Conservative party.

Now the government is giving an increase of $6 or $8 per child through the proposals in this bill. This is too little, too late. But still it is better than nothing. I want the Canadian public to reflect on the history of the old-line parties, especially the Liberal party and its family income security programs. There has been no real initiative on its part in launching a basic attack on the cost of living and on income inequalities. Such initiative will not spring from within that party. It takes prodding. It takes pressure from the public. It takes pressure from the parties in this minority House of Commons to get the government to act. Over the years the NDP has been the catalyst. In the past we have argued for adequate social security measures, adequate pensions and adequate family allowances. We will continue to do so. We will support this bill as a stopgap measure, but we will continue to argue for greater increases and for a fair and just over-all social security policy.

Mr. Douglas Roche (Edmonton-Strathcona): Mr. Speaker, I will support this bill to increase family allowances to $12 per month per child. But to remain silent would be to turn my back on my true feelings about the bill and the economic and social policies of the government. I think these feelings are shared by many, if not most Canadians today who are bewildered, frustrated and disillusioned by the erratic, self-serving approach of the federal government.

Indeed, Sir, last week I conducted interviews with 159 of my constituents in various economic and social areas of Edmonton-Strathcona. I found that 52 per cent of the people I talked to are dissatisfied with the performance of the government, and 64 per cent think the government is not taking sufficient steps to control inflation. There is a deep desire by the public for firm, comprehensive policies to cure "stagflation" which, however you define that word, means we have 8 per cent inflation with 5.5 per cent unemployment. Because the public is not getting firm policies from the government, a sense of disillusionment is becoming pronounced in Canada today. This sense of disillusionment with the political process is a far more important question than the government realizes.

The family allowances bill before us is a reflection of the reactive response that so characterizes the government, and it puts me, I am frank to admit, in a quandary. I am very much opposed to increasing public dependency on the government, yet I can see how desperately the poor and middle-class sections of society need to be helped as a result of runaway inflation.

This summer I travelled by car across Canada from Alberta to P.E.I., an exercise I recommend to all members of parliament as distinct from weekly air trips during which you neither see nor feel the fabric of Canada. I talked to many Canadians. I could see just how much an improvement in the family allowance level would mean to them. This experience helped me to resolve the struggle within myself, of fighting big government on the one hand and having concern for the practicalities of helping people who definitely need to be helped.

But, Mr. Speaker, let not members of the government hold up their heads in pride at what they are doing in presenting us with this bill. Let them not think that a $4 to $6 monthly hike in family allowances is the answer to hardship caused by inflation. Let them not think that justice is being delivered to the Canadian people, because this bill, the pension bills and the subsidies that have constituted the government's response to the inflation crisis all deal with secondary problems.

While we debate family allowances as a supposed cure for our problems, the fundamental problem of income distribution remains obscured. A bold, new social program for the seventies is desperately needed, Mr. Speaker, not a tinkering with the family allowance system of the forties. And if there is any doubt about this, ask the people of Edmonton-Strathcona right on their doorsteps, as I did. Ask the demonstrators who came to parliament this afternoon to protest against the gouging of the public through high food prices. Ask the five million Canadians living below the poverty line if an additional $4 to $6 a month per child will lift them out of poverty.

The social security system in Canada today is in chaos. The whole system, at all government levels, costs Canadians more than $6 billion a year, yet it has not significantly alleviated poverty let alone eliminated it. There are five million Canadians living below the poverty line. The special Senate Committee on Poverty reported that "poverty is the great social issue of our time". For the chronically unemployed, the unskilled, the poorly educated, the disadvantaged, infirm, aged, one-parent families or inhabitants of depressed areas, poverty has become a way of life, an ugly subculture within Canadian society.

These are the people who have been most hurt by the government's economic slowdown and inflation. Generally, they have inferior educational, medical, cultural and information services and lack the skill or knowledge to make use of many of the facilities available to the general public. The greatest tragedy is the children, for they grow up in a cycle of poverty. The welfare system is itself a block to improving the lot of the poor because social programs are not co-ordinated among the three levels of government; there is confusion and intergovernmental ill-will.

The focus of government help is on the casualties of our system instead of the prevention of problems. And to compound this, the increasing welfare costs are squeezing money for prevention programs. People on welfare do not have the sympathy of Canadians today. This is because the government has emphasized social assistance programs so much that the line has been crossed from protection to reliance. The welfare system was designed originally as a supplement to the economic system. Now it has become a political tool of the government, used by the government to bail it out of political emergencies. The government, which brought in restrictive economic policies in the first place, tries to help people by adding social programs such as family allowances which eat up tax dollars and add to the working man's burden. This philosophy is wrong and is producing an overdependence on government by people who should be able to take care of themselves.

The unemployment insurance program frequently provides excessive benefits, particularly in cases where people have other sources of income. What is especially offensive to Canadians is that there are tens of thousands of people who find themselves in the position where taking a job at or near minimum wages provides them with less cash disposable income than they can get from the welfare program. This is certainly unfait to the working poor and contributes to the feelings of alienation in our society. Unless courageous action is taken, the future will bring spiralling costs necessary to prop up an ineffective welfare system. The result will be dissatisfaction and bitterness among both those who give and those who receive. And perhaps worst of all, the element of compassion toward those genuinely in need will erode away. Then our society truly will be poor.

Government is better able to help those who cannot help themselves when it creates an economic climate that enables employable people to help themselves. It is not the government but the initiative of free men and women that enables people to work out their own destinies. The human spirit is best served by encouraging people to be dependent on themselves rather than on the government. This is the route to a life of human dignity for the poor, not perpetuation of government handouts as we have before us in the family allowance program.

Therefore, Canada's goal must be the creation of greater income-earning potential among the poor themselves. When this principle is recognized, there will be public support for more manpower programs to train the unskilled and retrain those in declining industries, and for more adult education leading to employment in expanding industrial projects. A better step toward this goal is to increase the minimum wage rather than try to advance family allowances. Thus people are given money for work done, not subsidized for work not done.

Instead of collecting extra tax dollars necessary to finance so many social welfare plans, the government could reduce taxes so as to offset increased costs due to higher minimum wages. An increase in minimum wages actually costs the country less because it cuts down on social security costs. We would then be paying people, not governments. Through steps such as this government is taking, it is lurching toward a guaranteed annual income for all Canadians. The handwriting is on the wall. All you have to do is put together the speeches, actions and policy papers of the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Lalonde).

The government thinks it is doing a good thing in moving Canadians along the road to more social security. But it is leading us deeper into the bottomless pit of the welfare state. And what is unconscionable is that it is using the national emergency of runaway inflation to make Canadian families even more dependent on the largesse of the government in order to buy food, clothes and shelter.

I want social security, too, as a protection for those who truly need help, the handicapped, the poor, the aged. But I am not going to sit idly by and watch this government play politics with the continued development of the Canadian people into a great international nation. I will fight this government in this chamber and on the hustings, because the Liberal Party believes in making people more dependent on the state and my party believes in the uplifting spirit of human independence.

[Translation]

Mr. Réal Caouette (Témiscamingue): Mr. Speaker, I was glad to hear the previous speaker say that this government or a subsequent government will have to resort to the guaranteed annual income to establish security while respecting individual freedom in Canada. The hon. member mentioned the increasing cost of living, minimum wages and price and wage freeze but the bill now before us relates to the family allowances increase to $12 from October 1.

At this stage, I would say that for years now we have been requesting family allowances—not only $12 a month but $20—and I would call the minister's attention on the fact that in 1956 when I was the Liberal candidate in the riding of Abitibi East, and my leader was Mr. Georges-Emile Lapalme, both wearing a white beret at Val-d'Or, we urged the government to grant monthly universal family allowances of $20.

Now the minister is a bit late with his intention of increasing family allowances since it has been a necessity for a long time.

Mr. Roy (Laval): He was not born yet!

Mr. Caouette (Témiscamingue): Perhaps he was not born yet. Anyway, he was not very old in 1956 as this happened 17 years ago.

An hon. Member: He is a young minister!

Mr. Caouette (Témiscamingue): Surely he was already born even though he is a young minister. Perhaps he was too young to understand. But even today even though he is older, his understanding has not improved.

In 1956, we requested a monthly $20 and my colleagues and I have been here since 1962 and urging for monthly and universal family allowances of $20 and I regret that bill C-223 is not providing for the payment of benefits amounting to $20 a month retroactive to January 1, 1973.

Some ministers said that wage increases have just been granted to railway employees retroactive to January 1, 1973. We are in favour of that. But as far as making the new family allowances retroactive, the government does not understand that.

Mr. Speaker, we have asked that a $20 monthly allowance be paid directly by Ottawa to all Canadian children. Yet, this bill provides for a $12 increase and a further $8 increase effective January 1, 1974. But the plan will be provincially administered, and this is where I make reservations. The $12 allowance will be guaranteed to all, but the provinces will be free to play with the remaining $8. In fact, they will be in a position to grant $25 to a group of children and $15 to another. And I am under the impression that in the province of Quebec for instance, $2 or $3 more will be paid each month directly to all and then the remaining $5 will be used indiscriminately. It will not be the first time that this has happened.

It came to my knowledge, with respect to winter works about 2 or 3 years ago, that Ottawa was paying the provinces—I am speaking specifically of the province of Quebec—for the work done, and whenever municipalities or organized groups asked for payment, Quebec answered: It is Ottawa that did not pay. Therefore, they kept those people waiting and forced them to borrow from credit unions or banks, in order to pay their winter works before the grants were paid by Ottawa. I once asked specific questions and learned that the grants had actually been paid to the province of Quebed but that Quebec had tampered with the federal money to pay something else.

Mr. Speaker, I am afraid that exactly the same thing will happen with family allowances as with winter works. How nice! Those people in Quebec criticize Ottawa all the time, the federal government, the central government, they protest against the encroachments upon provincial autonomy; but when the time comes to ensure provincial autonomy they misappropriate funds under the pretext that they are poor, that Ottawa will not spend a penny and that they are ill treated.

Well, Mr. Speaker, I am fedup with those crybabies who are far too many in the province of Quebec. One of them spends his time railing against Ottawa, namely René Lévesque, leader of the separatist party, who believes and would have the people in Quebec believe that with the advent of a separatist government, Quebec would become civilized. We had an example of such dealings this afternoon. During the news broadcast a while ago, I heard that the New Democratic Party regime in Chile had been overthrown.

An hon. Member: It is Mr. Allende.

Mr. Caouette (Témiscamingue): Mr. Allende, yes. The president even committed suicide, according to the latest news.

Mr. Speaker, three years ago, before Mr. Allende was democratically elected, he said exactly what members of the New Democratic Party are saying in this chamber. He said exactly what René Lévesque is saying in Quebec: Profiteers! We shall get rid of them so that the people may own their economy, their national heritage! The people have become the owners of their national heritage in Chile, but see where they stand today, after only three years. And I suggest, Mr. Speaker, that if ever—I hope that this will never happen—someone like Lévesque came into power in the province of Quebec, we would end up exactly where Chile is today, in September 1973.

● (2040)

It is all very well to arouse popular feeling against the haves, but it is easy to get to the point where people do not own anything anymore. This is what they have done in Chile.

I said yesterday that I was shown a 3,000-foot movie made by the National Film Board; it must have cost at least half a million dollars. They took union leaders from Rouyn-Noranda to Chile, two years ago, on the occasion of the first anniversary of the coming into power of Mr. Allende, to say how miners were better treated in Chile than in Rouyn-Noranda, Val d'Or, Chibougamau and Normétal. And I learned, Sunday night, that Chile had just shipped 22,000 tons of copper ore to be processed in Noranda by some capitalists, because they are unable to process it in Chile.

Mr. Speaker, it is easy for René Lévesque and his allies, his assistants, his "sheep", to say that the rest of Canada is no good, that the Anglo-Saxons are mean and should be crushed. It is easy also for the New Democratic Party to say: Let us crush the bad Americans because they exploit us. At the same time, the ministers of finance in the socialist provinces, in British Columbia, in Saskatchewan and in Manitoba spend their time in the United States begging to borrow money from American moneylenders. It is easy to attack people from whom you beg.

Let us be careful, Mr. Speaker. There are some weaknesses, yes. There are some things that we should correct, yes, but let us not destroy what is good in our organization.

I was saying a moment ago that the Chileans wanted to abolish private enterprise completely and they did it; they nationalized. They talked about inflation three years ago. If we were to go there today, we should see that inflation is at least ten times worse than in Canada.

Mr. Speaker, as regards the bill now before us to increase the purchasing power of Canadian families by way of family allowances, I hope it will indeed increase their purchasing power, but I know that the whole program introduced by the government will be financed through taxes, which means that again there will be price increases.

And as long as we follow that pattern, Mr. Speaker, the cost of living will not stop rising. A mechanism, a method has to be found so that all Canadians will get additional purchasing power that will not be integrated in prices, and the only way out is through new credits allocated to the people, credits which are not integrated in the prices and which really increase the purchasing power, thus assisting in effectively fighting unemployment, the rise in the cost of living and inflation. Nobody believes in that yet and neither do the Liberals, the Progressive Conservatives or even the New Democrats.

The NDP suggests lower interest rates. Mr. Speaker, no matter how much we may lower them, if one dollar is created and if it is required that it dies at $1.05, $1.07 or $1.08, that is a mathematical impossibility, no matter what the interest rate on new credit.

I do not refer to existing money. If a Liberal member lends me $10 and I give him back $10.50, he is lending me something he possesses. It is a normal thing that I compensated him for the help he provided me, but that is not what the banking system does. Banks lend credit that does not belong to them and insist on interest rates of 10, 11 or 13 per cent. This is inflation! This is an abuse of authority. This is the banking legislation as passed by the present government.

I remember that three years ago I was attending a sitting of the Committee on Finance, Trade and Economic Affairs, to which representatives of Canadian Bankers Association were witnesses. At that time, an economist of the Bank of Nova Scotia said that if we eliminated the ceiling of 6 per cent on interest rates, we would enable banks to loan more to small people who need credit so that they could live and get out from under. I then said to the committee members: This is wrong, this is a lie. You will not be more helpful to poor people but you will have greater control over the Canadian economy.

Let us see, Mr. Speaker, if this is not happening today. The banking system has more authority than ever; the Bank of Canada has become a real puppet in the hands of financial institutions and the government is the servant of the whole system.

The government is powerless. The right hon. Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) and tne Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Lalonde) both want to help the people, but they cannot do so because they lack financial means. The minister is aware of that fact. He knows perfectly well that I am right.

Somebody said earlier that the minister was young; I agree and I wish he were young enough not to be lost forever. I also hope that someday the minister will realize that concrete steps must be taken not only in the field of finance but also when it comes to expanding the monetary mass in Canada. We must tally up figures that reflect the resources of this country. And when figures are put on the actual resources in Canada, there will be no stinginess with family allowances, with assistance to provinces and municipalities, and with old age pensions at 60. There will be no more stinginess with the pensions of retired people and those on fixed incomes. But we will have latitude on the basis of the tremendous physical opportunities we have in Canada.

Mr. Speaker, the minister does not ask himself, can Canada produce enough to guarantee $20 or $25 a month the children of this country? No, he knows the production is there. Can Canada produce to give pensions of $200 a month to those 60? The minister is aware that Canada can produce. This is so true that all our stores across Canada, our industries, are filled to capacity. We have discount sales in Montreal, Vancouver, Halifax, Winnipeg, and Edmonton. The people in Canada must mortgage their salaries for three to five years with finance companies to buy this year's or last year's production and yet, if the purchasing power was adjusted on the basis of current production, we would have prosperity in Canada. We would not be afraid of René Lévesque, the Chilean regime or the Communist regime; we could maintain at home a regime of free enterprise where personal initiative would be respected and promoted, where Canada would belong to Canadians and where Canadians would have security with personal freedom.

Mr. Jean-Robert Gauthier (Ottawa East): Mr. Speaker, this bill providing for higher family allowance as of next October is part of the concrete measure program presented by the federal Liberal government.

Under this bill, a monthly allowance of $12 would be paid as of October 1, 1973. The 3.5 million families now receiving the family and youth allowances, that is to say all families with dependent children of 18 or less, will be granted this new increase. In Canada, the number of children in this category is set at 7.5 million.

Mr. Speaker, I greet this government measure with great pleasure because it will allow Canadians and especially my constituents to really increase their purchasing power. This bill is good because its basic purpose is to add a supplement to the family income and that will be greatly appreciated in my riding as a concrete and positive measure introduced by a responsible and efficient government at grips with the soaring cost of living in Canada.

An hon. Member: What a supporter!

Mr. Gauthier (Ottawa East): The great problem of inflation has caused many to worry about this world plague.

An hon. Member: It is true.

Mr. Gauthier (Ottawa East): We hear and read every day pessimistic announcements by many improvised experts. They often fail to define their miraculous measures based on a so-called economic empiricism which would make us believe in simple solutions to the great world problem which is inflation.

An hon. Member: It is true.

Mr. Gauthier (Ottawa East): Wage and price controls are inevitable according to some and perilous according to others. It remains however impossible to find one instance where those control measures were effective in any industrial country during the past 25 years.

In addition, this is a world-wide problem and under the circumstances, it seems to me that the economic facts are altered through so-called political objectives when it is suggested that the time has come for price and wage controls.

The Liberal government has selected to campaign for programs aimed at increasing the purchasing power of Canadians and checking price increases of some basic products for the Canadian family.

I know, Mr. Speaker, that it is much more difficult to take such a position, because it requires from each of us a special effort to explain the problem to our constituents and to request their co-operation in the fight taking place to assure the stability of our economy.

I accept the challenge and I will try to the best of my knowledge to explain rather than frighten, to act rather than freeze, because in short, Mr. Speaker, it is our duty, as members of Parliament, to inform, to give leadership, to take proper measures, in order to govern responsibly and efficiently.

It has been rightly pointed out for some time, that any inflation more especially affects the citizens in the low or middle income groups or those with a fixed income. Most of them are unable to increase their income at the same rate as the prices they must pay to obtain some goods and other necessities of life. Each new price increase reduces accordingly their real purchasing power and their standard of living.

This is why all the measures announced up to now by the Liberal government are grappling with the problem. They are especially meant for the citizens who generally need more assistance in such difficult times. Furthermore this was pointed out by the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Lalonde) in his comments on Bill C-223, at page 6351, and I quote:

● (2050)

When one considers that a family of four with an income of above $10,000 spends approximately 16 per cent of its budget on food—

An hon. Member: It is too much!

Mr. Gauthier (Ottawa East):

—while the same sized family with an income of less than $4,000 spends closer to 28 per cent of its budget on food, it is obvious that the increase of 20 per cent in the price of food over the past 18 months will have a much greater impact on the low-income family as compared with the higher income family.

An hon. Member: This is true.

Mr. Gauthier (Ottawa East): Mr. Speaker, in a workers' constituency like mine, where the size of families is larger than the national average, it is obvious that government legislation providing for a $12.00 increase of family allowances will be much appreciated.

Combined with the recent measures taken by the government, this legislation will give our people more purchasing power and, consequently, improve their standard of living.

In closing these short remarks, Mr. Speaker, I note that Bill C-223 fits remarkably well into the already announced government policies—

An hon. Member: That is true.

Mr. Gauthier (Ottawa East):—aimed at upgrading the social security system.

An hon. Member: That is true.

Mr. Gauthier (Ottawa East): Mr. Speaker, Bill C-223 follows up the measures already announced related to the old age pensions and to the guaranteed income supplement, with quarterly adjustments. The government uses its powers and assumes its responsibilities in the war against inflation.

[English]

Mr. Gordon Ritchie (Dauphin): Mr. Speaker, in his speech on Bill C-223, an act to amend the Family Allowances Act and the Youth Allowances Act, the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Lalonde) suggested that, putting the bill into proper perspective in the total program which the government had announced to protect the purchasing power of the Canadian consumer, the legislation was designed to limit the effects of inflation in Canada. He especially mentioned that Canadians are suffering the first consequences of inflation, particularly in the area of food costs. He went on to say that the exceptional increase in food prices confirms the urgency of passing such provisions.

I agree with the intent of this bill but I suggest that food prices will continue to rise, that far-reaching changes are altering the food industry and the food marketplace and that this bill will act only as a stopgap in the present escalation of food prices. First of all, Mr. Speaker, the rise in food prices was long overdue to the primary producer, the farmer. There had been very little increase in the price paid to farmers, especially grain farmers, in the last 20 years. Also, the number of people who have left the farm in the previous ten years has been nothing short of rural depopulation. Now we are experiencing a rise in food costs around the world and the Canadian consumer is vitally affected.

There has been a rapid rise in the main export grains and commodities such as flaxseed, rapeseed, wheat, barley and other feed grains. This rise has not all been due to a shortage of grain, as some would have us believe, but has come about because the prices of these grains and oilseeds are set around the world and the hard currencies, the mark and the yen, which set our prices have appreciated so much against the Canadian dollar that much of the price rise can be ascribed to the changes in the international monetary market. For instance, the German mark, which only a short time ago traded at four marks to the dollar, is now trailing at 2.4, indicating that the Canadian dollar has devalued 40 per cent against the mark.

The price of rapeseed is largely set by the German mark. What was the going price of $3 for rapeseed for the Canadian farmer a few months ago is now $5. This increase does not represent any actual accrual in price but merely reflects the changes in currency values. This indicates, Mr. Speaker, that the rise in grain prices has been in many instances the result of international monetary changes rather than the result of the drastic moving up in grain prices so far as international markets are concerned.

This depreciation of the Canadian dollar has benefited Canadian farmers. Canadian consumers who benefited for years from the fact that German and Japanese goods were relatively cheap now find there has been a reversal and the other side of the coin has come up, so that the farmer selling foodstuffs has an immediate advantage. However, the government has moved to reduce the farmers' advantage in a swift and sure fashion.

[Mr. Gauthier (Ottawa East).]

Yesterday in the House we heard the right hon. member for Prince Albert (Mr. Diefenbaker) detail the convolutions that the government went through in setting the price for wheat to be made into bread in Canada. At first the price seemed to be set at $3.25 per bushel to the millers, with $1.25 of that being paid in subsidy. The next announcement was that it would be $3.25, with a subsidy over and above the $1.25. Then the minister in charge of the Wheat Board, during a trip to Winnipeg, got it up to a $1.75 subsidy.

An hon. Member: Order.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. I regret to interrupt the hon. member. I know that extraordinary latitude has been granted in speeches throughout the debate today and on the previous day. If we can agree that this debate is to be treated as some sort of debate on the economic affairs of Canada, instead of one which has to do specifically with the act that we are considering, we would be home free. However, if we do not so agree, then the hon. member is clearly not in order as he is not dealing with an act relating to family allowances and youth allowances.

I know we are in difficulties. The Chair has tried to be reasonable and perhaps even a little deaf with regard to hon. members' contributions in the last couple of days. However, once in a while when the Chair does that it is called to order. Therefore, if the hon. member would refer to family allowances at least once every couple of minutes, the Chair would feel much easier.

Mr. Ritchie: Mr. Speaker, may I point out that the minister in his statement said that this bill was brought forward as part of a package to alleviate the pressure of food prices. I believe he said something like that in his opening statement and mentioned that the bill was being brought forward to alleviate some of those problems.

We are in agreement with the proposal that family allowances be increased which, as the minister stated, is to help families cope with the high cost of food. I am detailing some of the reasons why food prices have risen and why this legislation is necessary. I suggest that the rise in food prices has been due to monetary convolutions around the world, and unless changes are made prices will continue to rise. In any event, had grain prices remained low there would have been more of an indication for a fall off in food production. It is important that food production be increased, and this is the result.

I wish to point out something else the government will have to consider with regard to the problem of high food costs. The world market for feed grains has increased phenomenally. The main Canadian feed grain commodity—at least the one that moves into the markets of the world—is barley, which is currently bringing over $3 a bushel in the marketplaces around the world and there is every indication it will remain at this level for the coming year. There may be some reduction when the American soybean crop comes on the market along with the American corn crop. However, this price largely represents the increase in the depreciation of the Canadian dollar. This makes it necessary to increase family allowances to help those who have had their incomes depleted. We should not forget that in the international money market billions of American dollars being held abroad are depreciating in value. Many holders of American dollars abroad have been buying American wheat, soybean, and so on, in the commodity market so as to protect their dollars.

This bill is to allay the price of foodstuffs. A certain danger now exists. The price of barley is quite high. It is agreed that with the present state of pricing, producers of hogs and cattle could have to have increased prices. There is also the problem of the hassle between the governments of Manitoba and Saskatchewan and the minister in charge of the Wheat Board. This is a matter of uncertainty and will raise the price of grain and input of the feeder.

As well as this bill, the government could have moved in other ways to improve food production. The tax bill passed recently makes it exceedingly hard for farmers. The manufacturing and processing industries received tax benefits, but the government did not even restore the straight line machinery benefit or a real basic herd provision. The continuing impact of capital gains, dovetailed with the continuation of the estate tax by the provinces, has a very deadening effect on long-term agricultural production and planning. This is perhaps due to the basic individual nature of the farming industry.

I have attempted to detail some of the reasons food costs have risen, prompting the bringing forward of this bill. It has been stated this bill is necessary because of the increase in the cost of living, mainly in the price of food.

Mr. Harry Olaussen (Coast Chilcotin): Mr. Speaker, in today's world there is a need for improved social conditions. There is a need for improvement in the quality of life. There is a yearning for the better things in life. However, we find people such as the hon. member for Témiscamingue (Mr. Caouette) who are quick to criticize governments for trying to improve social and economic conditions, and quick to criticize provinces which attempt to do something for the average person. I will not go into that question in further detail. All I can say is this: if that kind of rhetoric is put into practice, I feel sorry for the average person in this country and, indeed, for the world.

Canada today finds itself at a stage in which the cost of living is affecting every man, woman and child. The price spiral is particularly felt by those on low incomes and by those blessed with one or more children. The decision to bring in an immediate change to the present Family Allowances Act in order to cope with the inflationary spiral in this country reflects the need for such action. It reflects the need to enable families to meet greater financial commitments in feeding and clothing their children. This decision, I am sure, is welcomed by most members who feel that immediate relief is essential in this area and that, coupled with other plans to deal with the cost of living, the burden to low-income Canadians can be reduced and that families can afford to live in a manner befitting a civilized and a rich industrial country such as ours.

As a result of this bill, the main purpose of which is to provide allowances to consumers as soon as possible, the 3½ million families in Canada will benefit from an across the board increase to $12 per month, regardless of the children's age. This will be followed by an increase to $20 per month starting in January, 1974, and according to the formula determined in each province. Undoubtedly there are many who would criticize a family allowance program and the need for such benefits. First, I must point out that the program came into effect in 1945. It was universal in scope, covering every child under the age of 16 who was born in Canada or who had been resident in Canada for one year. The program has been in effect since then and reflects a commitment to the dignity and worth of the individual and the family. It reflects a need to be humane and fair both in the benefits and in the administration of such a program. It reflects a need to avoid discriminatory provisions. Finally, it reflects a need to provide a level of benefits sufficient to assure every Canadian family the necessary resources to escape poverty.

We are all agreed that the presence of children places a financial burden on low-income families. Wages and salaries do not ordinarily take into account the size of a person's family. Neither do most social insurance measures. The government must see to it that families are given the resources to raise their children in the best way possible because the health and well-being of the children is important in a civilized and concerned society such as we have in Canada.

There are those who claim that giving family allowances will encourage families to raise more children. However, sociological studies do not show that this is so. The Canadian population rate has been going down. The birth rate in the province of Quebec, where large families have been usual, has been the lowest of any Canadian province. According to the tables provided by Statistics Canada, live births per 1,000 population for Canada in 1961 were 26.1. In 1971 the figure was reduced to 16.8. In British Columbia, for the information of my constituents, live births have gone down from 23.7 per 1,000 population in 1961 to 16 per 1,000 population in 1971.

In Quebec, where birth rates have always been high, we find that live births per 1,000 population went down from 26.1 in 1961 to 14.8 in 1971.

These details emphasize the fact that the country's birth rate has decreased dramatically and that family allowances have no effect on the size of the family. There is no need to discuss the inadequacies of the family allowances bill which was debated in the House last year. Suffice it to say that the Liberal majority government of last year intended to create greatly expanded bureaucratic machinery to deal with a scheme which was totally unrealistic and unacceptable to the opposition members of the House. I am therefore glad to see that the principle of universality has not been discarded in the measure before us and that it is not to be discarded in the foreseeable future. The universal aspect of this piece of social insurance legislation is fundamental to an act of non-discrimination. It is not a welfare assistance program and does not stigmatize families by dividing them into income categories.

We find that with the recent introduction in Japan of allowance programs there are now 63 countries which have family allowances schemes in effect—all the industrialized countries with the exception of the United States. Fifteen countries provide allowances in principle to all families ordinarily resident in the country containing a specified minimum number of children. In 47 countries, entitlement to allowances is ordinarily an incident of employment relations, that is, allowances are limited to employees. In all countries except three—Bulgaria, South Africa and Yugoslavia—basic allowances are paid irrespective of family income. In all, the general trend is toward government financing rather than contributory payments, and greater acceptance of the proposition that child-rearing costs are a community responsibility.

We in Canada are fortunate to live in a rich country. We boast every year about our increasing gross national product, about our increased productivity. We have seen how practically all nations which call themselves civilized have adopted universal family allowance schemes. I feel, Mr. Speaker, that the principles underlying this legislation are good. The government recognizes that families with children have special needs. On the basis of this recognition and of the urgency of the matter before us, I hope members of this House will give unanimous assent to the passage of the bill.

Mr. Walter Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, I hesitated at first to enter into this debate because I was involved in the earlier debate on pensions, related to members of the public service and other servants of the government of Canada who have served their time and who now, I think, need some protection. I was very happy to support that bill. I am glad to say I am prepared to support the bill which is now before the House, if on no other ground than that which was mentioned a few moments ago by the hon. member who has just resumed his seat. He said there were families in this country who are in need. There are families in need in the communities represented by each of us.

But before we rush into consideration of this bill in its final stages I think it is well for us to consider where the need really lies and, more importantly, how that need arose and what is our responsibility in the face of that need. We have heard several most interesting debates thus far since parliament resumed. We have discussed amendments to the Pension Act, amendments to the social security legislation and, currently, the measure which is before us. All this represents what has been described as another stopgap effort in a somewhat meaningless fight against inflation in response to a crisis situation, blame for which lies to a great extent upon the shoulders of the government.

Mr. Speaker, I propose to quote a paragraph which appeared in the Financial Times edition of September 10, 1973. It is taken from an article dealing with the economy, which I believe offers the best description of the package of legislation placed before us as an anti-inflationary measure. The article, which appears on page three, starts this way:

> The government put another finger in the dike in an attempt to stop the rising tide of inflation but the latest anti-inflation package seemed to be just another stopgap attempt until the floodwaters subside.

That is what has happened in this country, Mr. Speaker. We have gone from crisis to crisis, from economic calamity to economic calamity, putting a piece of sticky plaster here and a piece of sticky plaster there, stopping the flow of our economic blood rather than getting down to fight, on its own ground, what has become the cancer of inflation.

Mr. Smith (Saint-Jean): What do you propose?

Mr. Baker: Mr. Speaker, every time I hear the hon. member on the other side open up, I realize that the noise he makes is as the noise from an empty barrel.

There is no doubt that the country cannot continue to afford the laying on of sticky plasters. There is no doubt that there is an end to what a growing nation, a nation which is dependent on other parts of the world, can hope to salvage by continually increasing payments, as worthy as they may be, without at some time or other taking a long, hard look at the causes and asking itself whether or not the time has come for a government, at long last, before the course is run and before economic calamity takes place in the country, to cry halt.

The problem about the government, Mr. Speaker, is that it has not yet decided to cry halt. We are faced with measures which propose just temporary relief for persons in need. I do not want to suggest, and I would not suggest, that such relief is not needed. But neither the government nor anyone else in this country should delude themselves into thinking that the policies which were announced in that empty speech delivered by the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) on September 4 will ever do anything to get to the root of our economic troubles.

Mr. Smith (Saint-Jean): But will you vote for the bill?

Mr. Baker: I think I made my position clear with respect to this bill at the outset. In the name of those people who are suffering because of the inadequacies of the policies of the government, of course I will vote for the measure. At the same time, I want to make it clear that until this country accepts the fact that we cannot fight the problems we face in 1973 with the economic weapons of the 1950s, until we decide to look our problem in the eye, to grasp the nettle firmly, to tackle these difficulties with new economic policies and new economic controls such as have been outlined as the policy of our party, we are fighting an action whilst in retreat.

Mr. Speaker, I ask you to note that we are living in a nation where the wholesale price index is galloping upward, where the consumer price index is galloping upward, where farmers are facing an intolerable burden of production cost, where they are asked to produce under this burden, where we have big unions and labour who not only expect inflation but accept it as a way of life. The unions are told by their membership, "Protect us against this expected inflation." There is an economic psychosis present in our country. I think it has been well demonstrated by the lack of progress that the policies of this government have failed to cure it.

We must not look to increased allowances for anything more than temporary relief. We must get down to the root of the problem. We must tell the farmer that we will control his input costs, that we will ensure the eastern farmer a reasonable supply of feed grain at a reasonable price. We must tell the old age pensioner and those in this country who depend on youth allowances—unfortunately, there are many of them—that we have a policy to meet the problem, not just a policy that adds to the inflationary picture. We must tell them that they do not need to look to governments all the time, but that they can become self-sufficient. We must tell the heads of families that there is an end to increasing prices and to the crush of inflation. We must tell members of unions and, more importantly, workers in this country who are not members of unions that they can expect that the dollar they bargained for in 1973 will be worth something in 1974.

This is the challenge that this government had on September 4, 1973, and it is the challenge on which the government turned its back. Instead we have to deal, rather than with a policy of firm foundation, one of lasting worth, with yet another Trudeau band-aid measure.

An hon. Member: What would you suggest?

Mr. Baker: If the hon. member was not in the House when my leader spoke, then I suggest he read Hansard for that day. I would then ask him to consider my leader's speech in the quiet of his room and to balance it against the speech of his own. If he is an honest man, I think he will come to the proper conclusion.

I do not intend to prolong this debate much longer, I am sure you will be delighted to know, Mr. Speaker, but I do want to say to those who would care to listen, and to listen with their ears rather than their mouths, that there is something that can be done in this country. All the wisdom in this country does not end with the treasury benches. There is an alternative to stopgap measures to fight a problem that the government of the day has decided, with the support of the NDP, cannot be fought. I do not believe that in this land of plenty, this land of such great potential, we should be saddled with a government so devoid of imagination and compassion that the only thing they can offer the people of Canada is a stopgap attempt of the sort described in the Financial Times which I have quoted.

In an effort to bring this matter on, and knowing that the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Lalonde) is interested in getting his band-aid plastered on a sickly patient, I shall sit down. In the interests of those who must be protected from the inadequacies of this government, I intend to support this legislation.

Mr. Stuart Leggatt (New Westminster): Mr. Speaker, I rise to support this bill. Like everybody else, I suppose I am in favour of motherhood, too. In fact, I am not sure whether any of us has the intestinal fortitude to vote against the bill. In any event, I listened with astonishment and amazement to the hon. member—I am sorry, but I cannot remember his riding—who suggested that a reasonable alternative would be to raise—

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Edmonton-Strathcona.

Mr. Leggatt: Yes, Edmonton-Strathcona (Mr. Roche)—who suggested that we should raise the minimum wage as a solution to the problem of inflation. About 10 per cent of the workers of this country are governed by federal minimum wage legislation, and almost all of them are above the minimum wage. So this would be a completely useless step. Talk about band-aid! That is not even a band-aid; that is a piece of scotch tape.

There are a couple of things in the bill about which I am a little concerned and have some reservations. One is the non-taxable aspect of this emergency measure which will last until the January, 1974, provisions, when the family allowance will go up to $20 per child. Frankly, I cannot understand why this could not have been made taxable and put at a higher level on the same principle. I think most hon. members accept the principle of taxability. The concept of universality with taxability seems to me to combine the element of fairness with the avoidance of an unnecessary bureaucracy to manage the system.

The major reason for my support of this bill, and I think for the support of many members of my party, is that it really means a redistribution of income next year of about $800 million. That is a significant figure in terms of social justice and equity in this country and I welcome the bill on that basis.

The other reservation I have is one about which I think we should all ask ourselves, namely, whether increasing family allowances encourages larger families. I think it should be perfectly clear that larger families in this country are no longer a worth-while social goal. In fact, in view of the finite resources of this planet, I think having a large family should be classed as an anti-social act. I am delighted to see the Minister of Justice (Mr. Lang) present in the chamber this evening; he can contemplate that particular thought. After all, there is only so much to go around, and the Minister of Justice must be consuming a fairly large section of the resources of his own family at the present time.

The best scientific opinion today tells us that this country and every other country in the world is seriously overpopulated. We can take two basic assumptions which the vast majority of people everywhere will agree with and which will persuade us there is an overwhelming case for reducing world population. The first of these assumptions is that it is desirable for every industrial society, with all its benefits, to continue to exist for more than a few decades. Certainly we will not exist for much longer unless we control world population. The second assumption is that every child born into this world should have the opportunity to obtain enough to eat and to enjoy a decent standard of living. For these goals to be reached it is essential that the total demand on the world's resources be reduced.

Per capita world demand must increase if we are to get anywhere near avoiding poverty in most countries of the world. To some extent this family allowance legislation does allow per capita demand to increase; money will be made available to buy food and clothing in areas of real need. We must remember, however, that the population of the world is doubling in a period of 35 years. There are 3.8 billion people in the world today; there will be seven billion people in the world by the end of this century. The problem of inflation is clearly related to over-population. In fact, you can relate the increase in the crime rate and a great many problems that are dealt with in this chamber to this oppressive, overwhelming problem of overpopulation.

It is important to note that birth rates in Canada have fallen to their lowest level. The average family now has 2.19 children. But even at that, equilibrium between births and deaths in this country will not be achieved for another 67 years at the present rate. Incidentally, the most socially responsible province in this country, in terms of family size, is Quebec, which has the lowest birth rate of 1.9 children per family. The whole province should be congratulated on its responsibility.

There has been a myth in the part of the country I come from that family allowances were somehow a device or method invented by Mackenzie King to retain the Quebec vote. Based on the figures I have given, it would seem that this would apply to the vote in P.E.I. which has the highest birth rate in Canada. In any event, the family allowance was an important piece of legislation to Quebec, just as it has been to all parts of the country. I can find no evidence that it has either increased the desire to have a large family or the desire to have a small family. But we do need a national population policy in this country, one which sets population goals consistent with our responsibilities as world citizens. Thereafter we should take legislative action to achieve those goals.

What we are really doing here is legislating this increase to relieve the effects of a disastrous inflationary cycle. There is no doubt, at least in my mind, that inflation is caused by rising population in a world of finite resources. If by granting this increase we were encouraging larger families in this country, we would be acting irresponsibly and wrongly. However, as I say, I can find no evidence to that effect so I have no hesitation in supporting this piece of legislation.

Mr. Sinclair Stevens (York-Simcoe): Mr. Speaker, I rise to speak on this bill largely because of the speech made by the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Lalonde) when he introduced the legislation. I think it is one thing for the government to introduce this measure which, judging from the speeches to date, most members of the House intend to support, but it is something entirely different for the government, having introduced the bill, not to admit that their mishandling of the economy has resulted in the country needing the bill.

I say that, Mr. Speaker, because I find it very curious, on a bill which contemplates the raising of the family allowance from the present levels to new levels, that the minister to whom I have referred went out of his way to try to indicate that the inflationary pressures in the country are not due to his government but are somehow due to the world inflation in which his government is caught up. It is time that members of this House stood up and be counted.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

An hon. Member: They did last night.

Mr. Stevens: It is the government's mishandling of the economy that has resulted in inflationary, skyrocketing prices. It is time that members of the House on all sides stood up and refuted the ministers of the Crown who are consistently misrepresenting the facts in the House. Let us look at the facts. What did the minister say when he introduced this bill?

An hon. Member: Talk about the Bank of Western Canada.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Stevens: Mr. Speaker, you always know when you are hitting home. The yahoos start to yelp and holler. Let us look at some of the statements the minister made when he introduced this bill. For example, he said he was introducing it so he could "protect the purchasing power of Canadian consumers." He said that Canadians are now suffering "the first consequences" of inflation, especially in the area of food costs. Mr. Speaker, if we are only suffering the first consequences, I hate to think what the last consequences of such food increases will be.

The minister pointed out that there are 3½ million families, who are responsible for 7½ million children and adolescents, affected by this bill. But I would point out that he attempted to get off the hook as to why we have inflationary pressures in Canada by suggesting it is due to the exceptional increases in food prices which confirm the urgency of passing such provisions. In another section of his speech he said these food prices are due to inflation which Canada, like most other countries of the world, has been recently experiencing.

As I say, Mr. Speaker, let us look at the facts. Surely the minister would not deny his own publication which is put out by the Bank of Canada. In June, 1973, that publication reported that the consumer price index for food for certain industrialized countries indicated clearly that in the 12 months ended last April we in Canada had the worst record of inflation of any of the countries listed in that review. I point to the fact that Canada is listed as having an inflationary rate ending in that period of 12.9 per cent, compared with the United States rate of 11.5 per cent and a low rate, for example, in Germany of 8.1 per cent. That is not the type of thing the government is inclined to admit in this House. Instead, members of the government like to mislead the public into believing that somehow we in Canada are doing even better on the question of inflation than other countries of the world.

As my leader indicated earlier, the IMF has also pointed out that Canada has one of the worst records of any of the industrialized nations with respect to inflation.

Mr. Railton: That is not true. That is what you said.

Mr. Stevens: In short, Mr. Speaker, I would suggest that it is not so much a world problem that is causing inflation to the degree that exists in Canada but, rather, a Trudeau Liberal government problem that is causing our high inflationary pressures. If you like, Mr. Speaker, one could say that in fact Liberal years of government are inflationary years of government.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

An hon. Member: And Tory times are hard times.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Stevens: I say that, Mr. Speaker, based on the fact that in the years that my party last governed this country the average inflation per year was 1.7 per cent. In the succeeding years during which we had a Pearson government inflation crept up to 2.6 per cent on average per year. In the first year of the Trudeau government in 1968, inflation got up to 4.2 per cent under the mastermind who now leads the Government of Canada. By 1972 it had reached 6.6 per cent, and currently it is running at the rate of 7.7 per cent per annum. That is Trudeau government in action.

Let me put it another way. The minister to whom I have referred indicated that somehow rising food prices are something of a world nature and that we are caught up in them in Canada.

Mr. Railton: Quite right.

Mr. Stevens: In answer to certain backbenchers opposite, I would like them to explain something with respect to the July cost of living figures. Unfortunately, we do not yet have the August ones. I would like them to explain the July figures which in the United States, on an annualized basis, show that their food prices were rising at the rate of 6 per cent per year, whereas on an annualized basis, food prices in this country were going up at 22.8 per cent per year. That is just July, on an annualized basis.

Mr. Railton: That's no good.

Mr. Stevens: It is all very well for the minister to try somehow or other to confuse the issue. It is perhaps natural for the government to attempt to get the spotlight off its own ineptitude. However, I am interested that neither the members of the government nor their socialist companions to my left at any time indicate there is certainly at least one other contributing factor to inflation, and that is runaway government expenditure. I believe it is interesting to note that the year before this government took power in Canada, total government expenditures of all governments in Canada, be they federal, provincial or municipal, were slightly over $21 billion. It now appears that in this year alone this government will spend that amount of money at the federal level. Surely that is a clear indication that this government's runaway spending has to be inflationary in this country.

Certain government members say, "Thank God". I do not know if they refer to their leader, but I would point out that if they are thanking God they may also consult the Bank of Canada Review for August, because there they will find the impact of their spending which indicates that government expenditures, based on 1961 equalling 100, have an index of 189.6, almost 90 per cent higher on an index basis than the same expenditures in 1961. I would point out, also, that most of the increase has taken place since 1967. In 1967 the index was 131.5, whereas today it is some 50 points higher at 189.6. Surely if the minister had been a little more candid with us he might have admitted that one of the causes of inflation has been their aggressive spending program.

If I may, I should like to bring this matter into perspective. It is one thing to talk about rising government expenditures, but I believe it is also significant to relate it to the gross national product. The fact is that government expenditures in this country have been rising at such a rate that they are now approaching 40 per cent of the total of our gross national product. The leading country in the world with regard to government expenditures in relation to gross national product—at least in the free world—is Sweden. We find that socialist nation has only now touched 42 per cent so far as government expenditures in relation to gross national product are concerned.

For those who are interested in a welfare state such as Sweden, to which this government tends to be leading us, assisted by the socialists to our left, and for those who are interested in the future that lies ahead of us, I recommend they read an article in the United States News and World Report of July 30 in which it is said the Swedish people are very unhappy at the present time and the government faces an election in which it is likely to be voted out of power for its inept handling of the economy, as is the government of this country to be voted out of power for its inept handling of our economy.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Stevens: But to put this in a little different frame, when we speak about food prices and hint that somehow our prices are no worse than can be found in other sections of the world, particularly the United States, I think it is only right to be specific. I conducted a survey as to food costs in such cities as Ottawa, Toronto, my own riding of York-Simcoe, New York, Chicago, Cleveland and Buffalo, and I believe it is interesting to find that because of mishandling by this government it is now true that one can buy the items which we included in our shipping list more cheaply in a city such as Buffalo than in Ottawa, or in my riding of York-Simcoe.

In fact, the skyrocketing Canadian food prices have now overtaken the price levels in United States cities, yet average Canadian earnings are still nearly 20 per cent lower than comparable United States earnings. Surely it becomes a little ridiculous to have a minister of this government come into the House after this situation has been created at least partly by the government's mishandling of the economy, and ask us to please pass this bill to give relief to those who are suffering, some 7½ million children, because of their inflationary problem.

I should like to point out that I also purchased in November, 1970, the same 15 items I mentioned in the last survey, at a time when the Prime Minister of this country said that inflation in Canada had been licked. At that time—November, 1970—those items could be purchased for $9.97. Today, in my riding, they cost $14.70.

An hon. Member: We know that. That is old stuff.

Mr. Stevens: Mr. Speaker, the hon. member says, "That is old stuff". I have to agree that it is old stuff under this government. If the hon. member is serious, then he is saying that it is now old stuff to have food prices rising at such a rate, for food prices to rise 47% in 33 months.

Since December, 1970, the Canadian consumer price index has risen 60 per cent faster than the United States consumer price index, and our food index has jumped 25 per cent faster than the United States cost of living in respect of food. These are the hard facts. I believe it is time that one or more ministers in the present government responsible for this situation stood up, acted responsibly in this House and admitted they have made mistakes and that inflation, because of their mishandling of the economy is now out of control and they wish our assistance in righting the matter.

● (2150)

An hon. Member: Why don't you act responsibly?

Mr. Gillies: Go back to sleep.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Are you for the bill?

Mr. Stevens: The hon. member to my left is very anxious to know whether I am for the bill. That, to me, is very similar to the same hon. member rushing over to my car after the nail that he put on the ground in front of me punctured my tire and asking whether I would like him to put a patch on my tire so that I can blow it up again.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): I rise on a question of privilege, Mr. Speaker. I did no such thing.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I left the chair for a while, and when I returned and listened to the hon. member speak I had difficulty in reconciling his speech with what I thought was the subject matter of the debate this evening, that is, Bill C-223. I hope that an effort will be made by the hon. member, not necessarily to tell us whether he is for or against the bill but to tell us something about the bill itself.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Stevens: Mr. Speaker, unfortunately you were not here during my earlier remarks—

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Unfortunately?

An hon. Member: He is the luckiest guy in the building.

Mr. Stevens: —at which time you would have known why I took the course that I did. I was induced by the minister who, in making his introductory remarks concerning the bill, introduced himself the questions which I am now attempting to refute I wish to at least bring into perspective in the House the matter of inflation. I have been asked whether I support the bill. How can an hon. memeber ask me such a question—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Stevens: —after hearing my remarks to date.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): That is precisely why I am asking.

Mr. Stevens: If I may, I would like to sum up—

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Question.

[Mr. Stevens.]

Mr. Stevens: —by simply saying that this bill is necessary and should be passed by the House because of the inflationary economy in which we find ourselves now. But I would add that it is an inflationary economy that we do not need to have in Canada. It would have been far better for the government to have taken steps to ensure that the inflationary effect which they are attempting to relieve in this bill did not get out of control to the extent it did; then in fact this bill would not have been necessary. I say this because, if I may again refer to the minister's speech, he stated:

> The bill before us constitutes one aspect of the strategy adopted by the government to fight inflation.

An hon. Member: Hear, hear!

Mr. Stevens: One lone member on the government benches supported that statement. But I ask in all seriousness: Can you say that this bill is fighting inflation in any way?

An hon. Member: Yes.

Mr. Stevens: It may relieve the effects of inflation, but surely it is a gross misrepresentation to indicate that this is a measure to fight inflation. If anything, it will probably add to inflation.

I believe that it would serve the House better if the government were to bring in some legislation to help contain inflation. Included in that legislation I would suggest that they should bring in some measures to curb federal spending. I suggest that the least they could do would be to freeze their spending, or at least to bring it into a near-freeze situation. As has been already indicated, it is one thing to pass legislation which they feel would relieve the impact of inflation to which they have contributed. Surely, however, they will do it eventually. Today would be better than later, so why do they not bring in wage and price controls to help curb inflation?

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Stevens: A survey is being conducted by an independent source very close to this city which certainly indicates that such wage and price controls are desirable. If they want it in Cornwall, I know they want it throughout the nation.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Stevens: I also suggest it is time the government considered structural reforms in order to remove certain of the economic abuses in our structural system that result from the monopolistic power of companies and unions. I believe that the government must accept more responsibility for their monetary policies, as the Minister of Finance (Mr. Turner) indicated in the House—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The minister is seeking the floor on a point of order.

Mr. Lalonde: Mr. Speaker, the Conservative Party has been known—

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Lalonde: The official opposition has been well known over the years for its opposition to any move with regard to family allowances. They are certainly free to talk on this bill as long as they wish; that is their right. But we were regaled by a speech on the Wheat Board a few minutes ago and now we have heard a speech on wage and price controls and on many other subjects. I hope that if we are to continue for another day or two—

Mr. Bell: Ten o'clock. Filibuster.

Mr. Lalonde: —on this particular subject, hon. members will at least obey your instructions, Sir, to speak on the bill.

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Bell: I rise on a point of order. The minister talked out his own legislation.

Some hon. Members: Question.

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

[English]

A motion to adjourn the House under Standing Order 40 deemed to have been moved.

VETERANS AFFAIRS—VICTORIA, B.C.—POSSIBLE TRANSFER OF HOSPITAL FROM FEDERAL AUTHORITY—REQUEST FOR CONSIDERATION OF VIEWS OF VETERANS

Mr. Allan B. McKinnon (Victoria): Mr. Speaker, yesterday I asked a question of the Minister of Veterans Affairs (Mr. MacDonald) concerning the transfer of a veterans hospital from the federal authority to the municipal and provincial authorities in Victoria and I requested the consideration of the views of veterans. At that time, Sir, you were kind enough to suggest that this might be better debated at the time of adjournment, and I certainly agree with you.

My first question is: For whose benefit is the transfer of this hospital? When I was home during the month of August I received 51 phone calls from veterans about this matter, and 51 were opposed to the transfer of the veterans hospital to other than the directorate of veterans affairs. This was an unusual thing and I spoke to several people about it. I spoke to the staff at the hospital, to two of the doctors at the hospital and to many of the patients. Their feelings were all the same—they wanted the situation to remain as it is at the present time.

Victoria is not a usual kind of city. It is a great gathering place for elderly people who come there to enjoy their old age in secure surroundings. People who do not live in British Columbia may not be aware of this, but the cost of domiciliary hospital care for elderly people is staggering for a city of generally low income. While British Columbia medical plans and hospitalization plans in theory provide for the care of elderly citizens, in fact they do not. A person entitled to this care can never find a bed in a domiciliary hospital and must go into a private hospital where the cost is from $300 to $600 a month.

The possibility of this veterans hospital being transferred to civilian control is causing a great deal of insecurity among aging veterans in Victoria. When one sees as many elderly people as there are in Victoria, one soon learns that their greatest concern is the fear of insecurity as they grow old.

Some of the leaders of the veterans' organizations agree that the information sent out by the Department of Veterans Affairs is only to convince them that this transfer is inevitable and that they might as well relax and enjoy it. It is presented to them that they should try to get the best terms they can. I am not inclined to accept that because it has gone beyond that "in between" stage where something could be done by the people most concerned. A senior administration official went out to visit the minister of health in the provincial government, but I was denied admittance even to take cognizance of the arrangements being made. He then went to speak to the heads of the Legion, and again I was denied admittance. This is manipulation of the representatives of the people. I suggest to you, Sir, that a bureaucratic government of this country at times is manipulated by its senior administration, and this is an example of it.

A year or so ago this was but a rumour, and a few years ago we were promised certain conditions would be met. In a speech in 1964, Mr. Teillet, the then minister of veterans affairs, said there would be three conditions. The first was accommodation for the treatment of service-connected disabilities and the second—the one in which I am particularly interested—was that community institutions of acceptable standards must be available to look after workloads created by other classes of veterans, which means that such veterans will be able to get treatment in their own communities, near their own friends and families.

This is just what they cannot get, Mr. Speaker. If control of the veterans hospital in Victoria is to be transferred to the civilian hospitals, several veterans who are now domiciled in the veterans hospital have no chance whatsoever of being admitted to a general hospital. This is simply because they have been operating for many years under different regulations and different attitudes. The attitude in the general hospital—and it has to be that way while hospital beds are in short supply and cost $100 a day—is to get the person in, do the surgery or whatever is necessary, and get him out.

These are not the kinds of terms that we expected for the veterans hospital. These people did not grow old of their own volition. Nevertheless, they grew old. They cannot help it if they are ailing. They are aged, ailing, and apparently need to suffer from some kind of curable disease which is of interest to the medical profession so that members of that profession will take an interest in them. Most doctors are not too fussy about looking after a group of elderly patients. However, the people of Canada did not build the veterans hospital system for the benefit of the medical profession; nor did they build it for the benefit of the senior administrators of the minister's department. They built it for the benefit of veterans.

I suggest to the minister that before any move is taken such as is envisaged for the hospital in Victoria, he go out there and talk to the patients in the Victoria veterans hospital.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member's time has expired.

Hon. Daniel J. MacDonald (Minister of Veterans Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I am grateful for this opportunity of clarifying the present position as it affects the Victoria veterans hospital and of removing any fears of uncertainty that may have been caused by recent rumours as to its future.

First let me state clearly that no definite decision has yet been made regarding the future of this hospital. As a matter of policy, however, the government has indicated on many occasions that it hopes to transfer veterans hospitals to provincial or regional jurisdiction provided that satisfactory arrangements for such transfer can be made. I would emphasize that the purpose of these transfers is to ensure that the best possible medical care may continue to be made available to veterans.

On August 16 and 17, Mr. Speaker, officials of the Department of Veterans Affairs met with provincial officials to discuss the terms of a possible transfer agreement affecting the Victoria hospital. Following this meeting, the federal government officials met with the officers of the British Columbia Provincial Command of the Royal Canadian Legion to bring them fully into the picture.

It is an absolute condition of any transfer agreement that a satisfactory number of priority beds must remain available for veteran patients on a continuing basis. I might add that experience of previous transfers has demonstrated that the care of our veterans in the transferred hospitals has never been at a higher level.

It is the intention of the department to continue to explore the possible transfer of this hospital in accordance with determined government policy, but of course only if the required safeguards are fully assured as they relate both to the veterans and to departmental employees. In addition, the officials will keep in touch with veterans' organizations so that they may remain fully conversant with the status of negotiations.

VETERANS AFFAIRS—INQUIRY AS TO INCREASES IN WAR VETERANS' ALLOWANCES

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, yesterday, September 10, as recorded in Hansard at page 6371, I put this question to the Minister of Veterans Affairs (Mr. MacDonald):

In view of the fact that there are to be increases in old age pensions and family allowances next month, and in view of the minister's statement that the government will treat veterans with fairness, may I ask if the minister is now in a position to indicate precisely what steps the government will take, having in mind in particular veterans who are on the war veterans allowance?

The rest of the exchange is recorded on page 6372 of Hansard and it reads as follows:

[Mr. McKinnon.]

HON. DANIEL J. MACDONALD (MINISTER OF VETERANS AFFAIRS): As I indicated to the House last week, the government is in the process of taking the necessary steps, Mr. Speaker.

MR. KNOWLES (WINNIPEG NORTH CENTRE): Is the minister not in a position to state definitely whether it is proposed by order in council to raise the ceiling on permissible income under the War Veterans Allowance Act or whether there will be some other adjustment in the amount being paid to war veterans allowance recipients?

MR. MACDONALD (CARDIGAN): Mr. Speaker, I would prefer not to announce government policy until it is government policy.

It is not surprising that at that point Hansard records:

SOME HON. MEMBERS: Oh, oh!

Hansard goes on as follows:

MR. KNOWLES (WINNIPEG NORTH CENTRE): Will the minister make an announcement in time so that any improvements for the war veterans can be effective in October, as they will be for the other groups to which I have already referred?

MR. MACDONALD (CARDIGAN): I hope to be able to make an announcement in sufficient time.

Now that we are in the more quiet and relaxed atmosphere of the "late show" period, although there are not many members present to hear what the minister will say, I hope he will give us a firm and definite answer to my question. I say to the minister that I am really hoping for two things. I am hoping he will tell us what the government is going to do in this particular instance when old age pensions are being increased and the pensions of retired civil servants are being increased so that veterans receiving the war veterans allowance will not go through the experience of getting an increase in one hand only to have it taken away from the other.

I said I am hoping to get two things out of the minister. That is the first. I would like to get the assurance that in October the veterans will get the fair treatment the minister talked about. I would like the assurance they will get the full benefit of any increase they receive in old age security and guaranteed income supplement and that in January those who are retired civil servants will also get the full benefit of any increase they receive at that time.

The second thing I would like to get from the minister is perhaps even more important. I make this appeal because I think the minister will want to respond to it. My appeal is that the minister solve this problem once and for all. As he knows, it has happened both ways in the past. There have been times when the government has acted fairly and raised the permissible income ceiling or taken whatever step was necessary so that the veteran receiving the war veterans allowance kept any increase he got. However, there were other times when it has happened in a most unfair manner, when veterans have not been able to keep increases granted to them.

As a matter of fact, this year under this minister, because the increase in disability pensions was delayed so long and because the war veterans allowance increase was made in April, some veterans who got the disability increase in July discovered that the increase which they got in the allowance in April was nullified because of this further increase. I think that happened because of the upset in the government's plan. The government had planned for both of these increases to come at the same time. Because one came in April and one in July, there was this mix-up.

The point I am making is that sometimes it is handled in a way that is most unfair and sometimes in a way that is fair. Is it not possible for this minister, with the support he has from some of us in this minority government situation, to persuade his colleagues in the cabinet to come up with a device so that it will never happen unfairly again, and that every time there is an increase in old age pensions or any other benefits that get into the pockets of veterans, they will not lose that increase from war veterans allowance?

As far as October is concerned, we are talking about only $9.02 a month, which is the increase in OAS-GIS combined. However, it is pretty raw for a veteran, if he gets that increase on one hand, to lose it on the other. My feeling about this minister is that he simply will not let that happen, but I ask him to tell us for sure that it is not going to happen. I ask him to tell us tonight that he will take the necessary steps so that it will not happen again either now or at any time in the future.

Hon. Daniel J. MacDonald (Minister of Veterans Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I welcome the opportunity to reply to this question concerning war veterans allowances. When this question was raised previously I assured the House that veterans have not been forgotten. I believe that the record of this government in the field of veterans legislation is very real proof of our concern for our veterans.

With the passage of Bill C-148 in March of this year, we saw a marked improvement in the rates and ceilings of war veterans allowance and civilian war allowances. Since December 31, 1971, we have already increased these rates and ceilings by 24.8 per cent single, 27.8 per cent married and over 24 per cent for orphans. In cases where the husband and wife are both 65 or over, because of the exemptions provided the increase is 32 per cent.

These increases, together with the amendments to the regulations concerning casual earnings which are $1,000 single and $1,500 married, the removal of the penalty for having a home valued at over $10,000, and the provisions for the automatic escalation of the rates and ceilings in accordance with the rise in the consumer price index, represent in all a genuine effort to improve the standard of living for this very worthy group of Canadians.

A unique feature of Bill C-148 was that for the first time in the history of the legislation, limits on personal property were abolished. In June of this year we introduced legislation which, I am proud to say, the House was pleased to pass, increasing disability pensions paid under the Pension Act by 34.2 per cent, or $100 per month, thus raising the new basic rate to $4,704.

I am sure I speak for all members when I say Canada is proud of its veterans legislation. This government has every intention of maintaining our record of dealing fairly with veterans and their dependants. The effect of the old age security pension and guaranteed income supplement increases on war veterans allowance is only one of the matters with which we are concerned. Others of equal importance have also been receiving our attention.

I assure you, Mr. Speaker, that at the appropriate time measures will be introduced to further improve the War Veterans Allowance Act. Further, in response to the hon. member may I say I am proposing a device which, I hope, will remove the discrepancy about which we have been talking.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Hear, hear!

HEALTH—REQUEST FOR ASSISTANCE TO ALLIANCE FOR LIFE

Mr. Douglas Roche (Edmonton-Strathcona): Mr. Speaker, many Canadians are concerned about the rising abortion rate and would like to see the number of abortions decreased. Abortions have nearly quadrupled within three years and now amount to approximately 10 per cent of live births in Canada, as will be seen by the following figures: 1970, live births 371,888, abortions 11,152; 1971, live births 362,187, abortions 30,923; 1972, live births 342,050; abortions 40,000.

These figures not only reflect the cheapening of human life but also contain a warning concerning the future health of the nation. Perhaps most striking is the correlation of the number of induced abortions with the prematurity of subsequent children and thus with the presence in subsequent babies of congenital handicaps. There are also striking increases in perinatal mortality and various sorts of morbidity of the mother.

Alliance for Life is the only effective national organization directly attempting to alleviate this situation. As a non-denominational, pro-life movement it co-ordinates the work of a growing number of local organizations, currently numbering 50, with a membership of over 10,000 ranging from Newfoundland to Inuvik. It is pursuing its goal by creating and distributing audio-visual aids, by providing trained speakers for high school classes, university seminars, church and social groups, by staging public exhibits, for example, at the Canadian National Exhibition, by keeping the theme of respect for life before television, radio, magazines and newspapers, and by generating research.

Last May, Alliance for Life officials came to Parliament Hill. A delegation headed by the renowned gynaecologist, Dr. Heather Morris of Toronto, presented an excellent brief to the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) and several cabinet ministers. Attached was a petition signed by 350,000 Canadians urging that "abortion legislation be amended in order that full and equal recognition and protection be given to all human life before as well as after birth."

Subsequently, Alliance for Life requested a grant from the federal government to help develop its educational program and to enlarge its ability to communicate with the public. The amount requested was $587,000, the major portion of which would be spent on a carefully prepared campaign of visual advertisements in magazines and cards inside public transportation. The request was met with a hostile response from the Department of National Health and Welfare. The department advanced the argument that if federal support were given to an organization which was clearly opposed to any liberalization of the law relating to abortion, the government would expose itself to pressures to do the same for organizations holding contrary views. In fact, the department has not hesitated to fund organizations which both officially endorse and actively work toward the withdrawal of all legal restrictions on abortion.

For example, the Family Planning Federation of Canada, which recently received a grant of $500,000, takes the official position, and publicizes it, that abortion should be removed from the Criminal Code and that all hospitals be forced to provide abortion on request as a condition of receiving public funds. Part of the $500,000 was distributed to the local affiliates of the federation, many of them called Planned Parenthood. Planned Parenthood of Toronto has stated that this grant is being used to distribute to students literature which says, in part: "We think having an abortion is more moral than bringing an unwanted child into this world".

Planned Parenthood of Toronto stages seminars for 13 to 19-year olds at which the pro-abortion position is clearly advanced. I have in my hand a comic book distributed widely by Planned Parenthood which says:

> Some people consider abortion immoral and they have a right to think this way. Most people, as well as the majority of religious groups, believe that women should have the right to make their own decisions about their unintended pregnancies—whether to give birth (keep the child or put it up for adoption) or have an abortion. Where abortion is illegal only the rich can arrange for a safe one.

Planned Parenthood of Guelph summarizes the result of its abortion counselling service in which for the first six months of 1973, of 29 pregnant women counselled, 25 had therapeutic abortions. Further, the department itself is distributing pamphlets, printed in the United States, containing pro-abortion messages.

It is ridiculous to state that this government is not aiding the pro-abortion movement. It is not only hypocritical; it is a national scandal that the government refuses at the same time to give concrete assistance to the pro-life movement in the face of alarming escalation of abortions in Canada.

Canada has the opportunity to lead the world in showing that non-violent solutions may be found for the ills of our society, and this government has a unique opportunity of being in the forefront of this leadership by promoting respect for all human beings, born and yet unborn.

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, I thank the hon. member for his comments and for the facts he put on record. I have had an opportunity to meet with members of Alliance for Life during the past few months and I have always been impressed by the devotion and the quality of work being accomplished by this organization. As to their particular request for funds, the matter is still under consideration.

In his speech the hon. member made certain statements that I should like to check, particularly regarding the official position of the Family Planning Federation of Canada. I must confess that this is the first time, to my knowledge, that an official position has been attributed to the Family Planning Federation of Canada and I shall certainly investigate this matter further.

As to the activities of various affiliates, obviously one could always answer, on the other side, that there are other affiliates of the Family Planning Federation of Canada which are opposed to abortion in any way, shape or form. I suspect that within the Family Planning Federation of Canada one would find a wide variety of opinion, so in a way I do not think it would be quite fair to take just one side or one group within the Family Planning Federation and represent it as the view of the federation.

As to the particular document that has been printed in the United States and allegedly distributed by my department, it was brought to my attention a couple of months ago and I immediately gave instructions that such distribution be stopped. I understand there is really very little circulation. It was a kind of compendium of brochures and publications available in the field and distributed through the department. No one had ever noticed this reference to that particular book, as far as I know.

In terms of general policy, the federal government does not regard abortion as an acceptable method of birth control; I should like that point to be made very clear. It does, however, recognize that unwanted conceptions may occur as a result of failure to use an effective method of contraception or any contraception at all. In these cases there may be justification for therapeutic abortion, not because the pregnancy was unplanned but because it may have given rise to conditions which, in the opinion of a therapeutic abortion committee, provide appropriate grounds for termination in accordance with the Criminal Code.

Birth control clinics are often visited by women seeking advice about unwanted pregnancies. To turn them away without help would be inhumane and could be regarded as tantamount to an attempt by the clinic's staff to impose their personal views about a subject on which society has expressed its collective will through the law.

It would seem that much of the difficulty in understanding the federal government's position arises from a misunderstanding of the nature of abortion counselling. In the sense in which it is customarily employed and in which it is defined by this department, it involves the objective presentation of several alternatives within the laws of Canada as defined by parliament, and not the deliberate application of pressure to consider one option only.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

PRESENCE IN SPEAKER'S GALLERY OF PREMIER OF BELIZE

Mr. Speaker: Hon. members might allow the Chair to bring to the attention of the House the presence in the Speaker's gallery of Premier George Price, the premier of Belize. I am sure hon. members will want me on their behalf to extend a very cordial welcome to our distinguished visitor who is in Ottawa for consultations and discussions with the government of Canada. On behalf of each and every member I welcome the Honourable Premier of Belize and express the hope that his stay in our capital and our country will be fruitful, interesting and pleasant.

PERSECUTION BY U.S.S.R. OF CERTAIN PEOPLE—REQUEST FOR UNANIMOUS CONSENT TO MOVE MOTION

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prince Albert): Mr. Speaker, I think this is the first time I have done this. I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43 to seek the unanimous consent of the House to move a motion concerning a matter of urgent and pressing necessity, namely, the increasing disregard by the U.S.S.R. of the basic principles of the United Nations charter by its callous and relentless persecution of hundreds of writers, intellectuals and freedom-loving persons, which is reminiscent of the Stalinist reign of terror. If granted unanimity, I will move, seconded by the hon. member for Vegreville (Mr. Mazankowski):

That this House requests the Prime Minister, on behalf of the people of Canada, to make a personal protest to the U.S.S.R., deploring the inhumanity and injustice being perpetrated in the U.S.S.R., the Baltic States and the Ukraine, against hundreds of persons who have done no more than to express their belief in freedom of speech, and in particular against the tyranny being practised against the great scientist, Dr. Andrei Sakharov, and the Nobel Prize-winner for literature, Alexander I. Solzhanitsyn.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Speaker: The House has heard the motion proposed by the right hon. member for Prince Albert. This motion, proposed for consideration of the House under the terms of Standing Order 43, requires unanimous consent. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Speaker: There is not unanimous consent. The motion cannot be put.

● (1410)

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order with respect to the manner in which motions under Standing Order 43 are being denied acceptance by reason of the negative votes of Liberal members, making this particular portion of the rules an entire farce. I want to make it perfectly clear that the negative votes regarding this matter came from the Liberal side of the House.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Trudeau: On the same point of order, Mr. Speaker, I wish to point out on behalf of the government that this rule is often being misused in the House, as you yourself have noted. Very often members of the opposition seek to move motions with which, had there been consultation, or had they been put forward in another way, the government would have been in agreement. But when they are brought forward in this way it is obvious from our experience in recent times that it is generally for political purposes and not in order to obtain the co-operation of the government.

Some hon. Members: Shame!

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Trudeau: Let me complete my point. This type of motion, by its very nature, would interrupt very often an equally important debate with which the government is anxious to proceed. This is a method that the opposition is using in order to usurp the order of business of the House.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Diefenbaker: I rise on a question of privilege. As to any suggestion that there is a political connotation in connection with this motion, all I have to say is that the Prime Minister is trying to raise an alibi because he is treating Canadians from the Ukraine and the Baltic nations with entire disrespect.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, on the same type of question of privilege I would say to the right hon. member that this government, through its communications with the Soviet government, has done more for the unification of families and for justice to the people of the Soviet Union than his government did with this type of bland statement.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. This debate may be very interesting but I am afraid it will solve nothing. The Chair has had an opportunity in the past to express its views regarding Standing Order 43, and these views have not changed.

DEATH OF PRESIDENT OF CHILE—REQUEST FOR UNANIMOUS CONSENT TO MOVE MOTION

Mr. David Lewis (York South): Mr. Speaker, despite the exchange that has taken place I rise to move a motion under Standing Order 43.

Some hon. Members: This will go!

Mr. Lewis: It arises out of the tragic events which occurred yesterday in Santiago, Chile.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

An hon. Member: Has there been consultation?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. May we have order. The hon. member is presenting what appears to the Chair to be a serious motion. Perhaps hon. members would like to treat it that way.

Mr. Lewis: If I could obtain unanimous consent for this motion I am sure it could be put without debate. I move, seconded by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles):

That this House extend its sympathy to the people of Chile in the tragic death of their President and express the hope that democratic institutions will be restored without delay.

Mr. Speaker: This motion, also, is proposed under the terms of Standing Order 43 and requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

An hon. Member: No.

Mr. Speaker: There is not unanimous consent. The hon. member for Prince Edward-Hastings seems to question the decision of the Chair. I will inquire again. Is there unanimous consent?

[Mr. Trudeau.]

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): No.

An hon. Member: Who said no that time?

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): I did.

Mr. MacDonald (Egmont): Mr. Speaker, on a point of order, in light of the very serious developments involving the death of the President of Chile, I wonder whether the Secretary of State for External Affairs is prepared on motions, as I think would be appropriate, to indicate the situation with respect to the relationship between our two countries.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. That is hardly a point of order. I suggest to hon. members that if on motions we get into the practice of asking questions that should be asked during the question period we will be out of order. I appreciate the procedural difficulty hon. members have during the question period in asking whether a minister wishes to return to motions for the purpose of making a statement. Perhaps the minister could reply briefly, but I hope we will not set a precedent in the procedure now being followed by the hon. member for Egmont. Is the hon. member for Rocky Mountain rising on a point of order?

Mr. Clark (Rocky Mountain): Yes, Mr. Speaker. In his statement the Prime Minister gave a clear indication that the negative voices which have from time to time come from the Liberal benches were in fact an expression of the opinion of the government, and I am not sure whether that was the right hon. gentleman's intention. I simply rise on a point of order to allow him, through whatever procedure is correct, to withdraw that statement if in fact he wants to withdraw it.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member for Egmont.

Mr. MacDonald (Egmont): Mr. Speaker, I think it might be useful for the House to avoid the situation that we get into during the question period and have the Secretary of State for External Affairs make a brief statement in order to clarify this very difficult and tragic situation.

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Speaker: It is up to the minister to decide whether he wishes to make a statement on motions.

WILDLIFE

METHODS OF TRAPPING WILD ANIMALS—REQUEST FOR UNANIMOUS CONSENT TO MOVE MOTION

Mr. Don Blenkarn (Peel South): Mr. Speaker, I too rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43 to ask the unanimous consent of the House to move a motion dealing with what I feel is a matter of urgent and pressing necessity, especially in view of the fact that the season for trapping wild animals is again commencing, and in particular to bring the attention of the House and the committees of the House to the inhumane use of certain trapping devices, particularly the leg hold trap. I therefore move, seconded by the hon. member for Hamilton Mountain (Mr. Beattie):

That this House refer the question of kinds and classes of traps used by the fur trapping industry to the Standing Committee on Fisheries and Forestry for investigation and report.

Mr. Speaker: The motion proposed by the hon. member for Peel South requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Speaker: There is not unanimity.

DEATH OF PRESIDENT OF CHILE—REQUEST FOR UNANIMOUS CONSENT TO MOVE MOTION

Mr. John Rodriguez (Nickel Belt): Mr. Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43 on a matter of sad but pressing importance. In view of the tragic death of President Allende of Chile I move, seconded by the hon. member for Yorkton-Melville (Mr. Nystrom):

That this House convey its condolences to the Allende family.

Mr. Speaker: I am not sure in what respect the motion proposed by the hon. member is different from that moved by the hon. member for York South. I have indicated previously that when a judgment of the House has already been rendered on a motion under Standing Order 43, the matter should not be put a second time. There may be a distinction between these two motions. I believe the first motion was directed to the people of that country rather than to the members of the family of the late president. I will simply ask whether there is unanimous consent. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Speaker: There is not unanimous consent.

Mr. Nielsen: The government again.

POSSIBILITY OF LOWERING AGE OF ELIGIBILITY FOR OLD AGE PENSION TO 60—REQUEST FOR UNANIMOUS CONSENT TO MOVE MOTION

Mr. Adrien Lambert (Bellechasse): Mr. Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 43, I ask unanimous consent to introduce a motion concerning a very urgent matter, namely the lack of jobs and the high cost of living which affect particularly those from 60 to 65. I move, seconded by the hon. member for Abitibi (Mr. Laprise):

Labour Relations

That a special committee of the House be appointed forthwith to consider the great difficulties which beset those from 60 to 65 in getting in the labour market, and also the inadequacy of income to face the constant increase in the cost of living, and to consider the possibility of lowering from 65 to 60 the age of eligibility for old age security pensions in order to rectify the situation.

Mr. Speaker: The House heard the motion of the hon. member. Under Standing Order 43, that motion requires unanimous consent. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Yes.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Speaker: Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Speaker: If hon. members who are opposed to a motion proposed under Standing Order 43 and will not give unanimous consent would make it clear, it would be helpful to the Chair. It is somewhat embarrassing for the Chair to have to guess whether there are yeas or nays. In this instance I gather that some hon. members on the third call indicated there was opposition, and if there is I will not put the motion.

CONTRACT NEGOTIATIONS IN ESSENTIAL INDUSTRIES—REQUEST FOR UNANIMOUS CONSENT TO MOVE MOTION

Mr. Ken Hurlburt (Lethbridge): Mr. Speaker, in view of the fact the Canadian public is unrepresented at the bargaining table when the employers and employees who operate our essential services negotiate a new contract in good or bad faith, as the case may be, and in view of the fact it is the Canadian public that suffers the inconvenience and hardship when a strike or lockout results and ultimately must pay the cost of a settlement, I ask leave of the House to move, under Standing Order 43, seconded by the hon. member for Calgary South (Mr. Bawden):

That this House is of the opinion that the government should consider the advisability of introducing legislation that would impose financial damages in equal measure upon corporations and trade unions operating essential industries under federal jurisdiction for every day that such corporations and trade unions fail to negotiate a new contract after the expiration of the previously existing contract.

Mr. Speaker: The House has heard the motion proposed by the hon. member for Lethbridge. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Speaker: There is not unanimous consent.

[Translation]

Mr. André Fortin: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order with regard to the motion of the hon. member for Bellechasse (Mr. Lambert). You expressed the wish that those who refuse their consent do so clearly to facilitate your task: you are often caught between two fires when time comes to apply Standing Order 43. Mr. Speaker, we Creditists are still unsure about the fate of the motion of the hon. member of Bellechasse, since even you had doubts that there were nays. Exactly what is the situation; can the motion be put or not?

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member is the only one to be confused; as far as I am concerned, there was a no and the motion cannot be put.

FAMILY ALLOWANCES ACT

On the order: Introduction of Bills:

July 19, 1973—Mr. Stackhouse—Bill intituled: "An Act to amend the Family Allowances Act".

Mr. Reg Stackhouse (Scarborough East): Mr. Speaker, the bill I have presented, purporting as it does to authorize payment of family allowances to Canadian parents residing outside Canada but working for Canadian governments or Canadian companies, may not be in order, as you have suggested, in so far as its financial implications touch on the prerogatives of the Crown. Beauchesne says a private member's bill touching on these prerogatives requires the consent or recommendation of the Crown. To that end I have discussed the bill with the appropriate minister who thinks the purpose of the bill is included in the amendments proposed in his own family allowances bill. As a result, I have sent him a copy of my bill for study. If its objective is achieved by the government's bill proposing amendments to the Family Allowances Act, I readily agree that my bill should be withdrawn.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member puts the Chair in a difficult position. He cannot withdraw a bill conditionally. I suggest this is a point of order. The hon. member has the procedural right to propose a bill, but he cannot say he will withdraw it if the minister agrees to certain conditions. I am not pressing the hon. member, but if this is the argument he proposes in support of the procedural acceptability of his bill I will study the matter more closely and make a ruling. The hon. member's approach is apparently that if certain conditions are met he will withdraw his bill. I suggest to him that this is not proper procedure. I will study the matter more closely and make a ruling tomorrow on the hon. member's bill.

CANADIAN HORSES SHIPPED ABROAD

Question No. 2,575—Mr. Rowland:

1. Of the Canadian horses shipped abroad during the past five years, what percentage was shipped for breeding purposes?

2. In respect of horses shipped for breeding purposes during the past five years, for each year (a) what breeds were involved (b) what were the numbers of each breed shipped (c) in the case of each breed, how many were (i) stallions (ii) mares (d) for each breed, what was the age range of the horses shipped?

Hon. E. F. Whelan (Minister of Agriculture): 1. The Department does not require the exporter to indicate the purpose of export. However, all horses being shipped must be examined by veterinary officers, found to be healthy, fit for travel and in a condition for work or breeding.

2. Answered by No. 1.

GELDINGS SHIPPED ABROAD

Question No. 2,576—Mr. Rowland:

1. In the past five years, how many geldings have been shipped abroad?

2. What percentage of total shipment of horses do the geldings represent?

Hon. E. F. Whelan (Minister of Agriculture): 1. Specific information on the breed or sex of horses exported is not required for health inspection and is not recorded.

2. As per answer No. 1.

ELECTION EXPENSES

Question No. 2,661—Mr. Olaussen:

1. Which successful candidates in the 1972 general election had (a) the highest campaign expenses (b) the lowest campaign expenses?

QUEBEC LAWYERS EMPLOYED BY DEPARTMENT OF CONSUMER AND CORPORATE AFFAIRS

Question No. 2,192—Mr. Fortin:

1. What are the names of the lawyers and legal firms of the Province of Quebec who worked for the Department of Consumer and Corporate Affairs between January 1, 1969 and January 1, 1973?

2. What tasks were performed by each one?

3. What amount was paid to each (a) in fees (b) in travel expenses?

Return tabled.

*REHABILITATION OF HARD DRUG ADDICTS

Question No. 2,234—Mr. McKinnon:

1. What amounts of money were spent in each province by the government in each of the past five years to rehabilitate hard drug addicts?

2. What are the Department of National Health and Welfare estimates or statistics of the number of hard drug addicts in each province for each of the past five years?

Return tabled.

Mr. Cossitt: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order and again draw the attention of the parliamentary secretary to questions on the order paper Nos. 2271 to 2280 inclusive requesting a list of lawyers used by the government for legal business. I have been seeking this information for about five months. I believe this is the fifth time I have risen on a point of order asking when the information will be forthcoming. On Monday last the parliamentary secretary made no response to my inquiry in this regard and I now wonder, in view of the fact that further days have passed, whether it is not too much to expect him now to advise the House when this information long ago requested will be given.

Mr. Reid: Mr. Speaker, I have had discussions with the officials of the Department of Justice. I have not yet been able to get a firm date when the material will be available.

FINANCE

SMALL BUSINESS LOANS UNDER $200,000—NUMBER AND RATE OF INTEREST

Hon. Robert L. Stanfield (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Finance arising out of the growing complaints of small businessmen about the cost of credit to them these days. I should like to ask the Minister of Finance whether the two-tier system for small business loans is still in effect, as I assume it is, and, if so, whether the minister can tell the House what is the rate of interest charged on loans? I believe the figure of $200,000 is the dividing line between the lower tier and the upper tier. Can the minister tell us what the interest is in the lower tier?

Hon. John N. Turner (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, the hon. gentleman is perfectly correct in saying that the two-tier system is in effect. The rate of interest charged varies from bank to bank. I can give him the complete information tomorrow or send it to him personally.

Mr. Stanfield: Some time ago the minister indicated that a monitoring system was being established to enable the minister to assure himself from time to time that this policy was being followed in a satisfactory way. I should like to ask the minister whether in fact such a monitoring system has been established and whether in fact the minister knows, or has means available to him of knowing on a regular basis, the volume of loans made by banks in amounts under $200,000 and the rates of interest charged?

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, I put that problem to the Governor of the Bank of Canada and suggested to him that we ought to have those figures prior to the Western Economic Opportunities Conference. As the hon. gentleman knows, the Canadian Banking Association has published figures of a breadth and depth not hitherto published. It is my understanding and expectation that we will have henceforth a far wider range of figures. As for the specific request concerning the breakdown of loans below $200,000 and above that figure, I will check again to see what we can produce.

Mr. Stanfield: Is it fair for me to assume, as I do from the minister's answer, that the minister has not in fact established through his own office the monitoring system he indicated he would establish to follow the extent to which this policy was being carried out?

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): I do not think that is quite a fair assumption. The publication of figures by the banking system is becoming far wider than it was. I expect that full publication to continue. As to the monitoring system, I asked the Governor of the Bank of Canada to conduct it rather than the Department of Finance.

[Mr. Ellis.]

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The Leader of the Opposition will be recognized on a supplementary question, after which the Chair will recognize the hon. member for Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands. We will return, if necessary, to this question on which many supplementaries are sought.

Mr. Stanfield: Mr. Speaker, the minister has indicated he will provide certain information for me tomorrow. Will he provide the volume of loans by the banking system in the recent period of time in amounts under $200,000 and the rates of interest charged?

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): I will give the hon. gentleman all the figures that I have.

ENERGY

OIL—RESPONSE OF COMPANIES TO GOVERNMENT'S REQUEST FOR PRICE FREEZE—PUBLIC PARTICIPATION IN EXPORT QUOTA HEARINGS

Mr. T. C. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources. Can the minister tell the House whether he has now received word from all of the major oil companies indicating their willingness to comply with the government's request for a freeze on Canadian crude oil until January 30? Have all the companies now agreed?

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Yes, Mr. Speaker, I think I am correct in saying that certainly all the major ones have, subject, of course, to the qualification that they were not in a position to exercise control over non-owned distributors and subject to certain clarification as to the application of the request which we hope to cover by means of guidelines. But in general terms the answer is yes.

Mr. Douglas: May I ask the minister at what price per barrel at the wellhead is the freeze taking place and when he intends to introduce legislation to carry out the commitment he made last week to divorce the price of crude oil in Canada from the world price?

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): The price would be as of the date of the announcement which, as I recall, was September 4, 1973, and my hope would be to introduce legislation within the month of October because of the importance of early action.

Mr. Douglas: May I ask a final supplementary regarding the minister's announcement some time ago that the National Energy Board would hold hearings concerning quotas for export control of oil. Will they be public hearings so that consumers and other interested persons may have some input into these discussions before the quotas are set?

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): Yes, Sir, they will be public hearings. I should indicate that it will still be entirely relevant to determine the appropriate level of reserves and therefore the surplus available for export notwithstanding the decision with regard to a multi-price system. There may be a request from some of the parties involved for perhaps a month's delay to prepare for hearings, but they will be public.

CANADIAN BROADCASTING CORPORATION

SUGGESTED ABOLITION

Mr. Réal Caouette (Témiscamingue): Mr. Speaker, I should like to put a question to the Prime Minister and before doing so, I am raising a question of privilege.

Yesterday and the day before I was invited by the CBC interviewers to go to room 130S. On the English network, I was questioned about the famous motion introduced by the Progressive Conservative party Monday last. On the French network last night, I was questioned about the present unemployment rate in Canada. Those two issues were truly national. Now neither of those interviews were broadcast by the CBC, while last evening, René Levesque, who has nothing to do at the national level, was shown in colour stating his family allowance scheme for Quebec if one day he became the government leader.

Now, I will put my question to the Prime Minister. When he told me a couple of years ago that he would eventually put the key on the joint, the CBC, is he now prepared to finally do so on this separatist, socialist joint, the CBC?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member is no doubt aware of the fact that I share the use of this key with all parliamentarians. He knows also that a committee of this House has had the opportunity of reviewing this matter. I was not myself present at these committee meetings, but I thought I had detected the impression, at least among many members, that if all was not perfect on the French side, things were going a lot better than during the bad years of 1968 and 1969 and that it was rather on the English network that the New Left was heard all too often on the air.

I ask the hon. member: Was it on the English or the French network that they did not refer to his statements?

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member might perhaps put a supplementary question if he wishes.

Mr. Caouette (Témiscamingue): Yes, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker: I apologize to the hon. member for Témiscamingue. The hon. member for Ottawa West on a point of order.

[English]

Mr. Reilly: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. Discussion of this kind with respect to an independent Crown corporation such as the CBC is most inappropriate—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Reilly: —coming from that government or any other government. Talking about locking doors, as a former employee of the CBC I can tell you it will not work even if they had the guts to try it, which they do not.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. We do not appear to be making very much progress.

[Translation]

The hon. member might ask his supplementary question, after which we will try to come back to the first subject matter and to the supplementaries that hon. members wish to ask.

Mr. Caouette (Témiscamingue): Mr. Speaker, although the hon. member for Ottawa West says that it is a Crown corporation, it is nevertheless subjected to the laws of parliament.

I would ask the Prime Minister, in view of the fact that my statement made a moment ago prompted applause from every corner of the House, does he think he has actually the right key to put on the door of this separatist and socialistic joint, the CBC?

[English]

Mr. Speaker: Is the Leader of the Opposition rising on a supplementary question?

[Translation]

Hon. Robert L. Stanfield (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I would suggest to the hon. member that perhaps the answer he gave last night was not comprehensive enough.

FINANCE

REASONS FOR INCREASE IN BANK INTEREST RATES ON FISHERIES IMPROVEMENT LOANS

Mr. Jack Marshall (Humber-St. George's-St. Barbe): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementay question to the question of the Leader of the Opposition to the Minister of Finance. When the minister is getting information for the Leader of the Opposition on small business loans, would he also investigate the reasons why the banks, which made loans under the Fisheries Improvement Loans Act between 1971 and 1973 at an interest rate as low as 6¼ per cent, are now charging fishermen as much as 8 per cent?

Hon. John N. Turner (Minister of Finance): Without accepting those allegations, may I say that the hon. gentleman is certainly entitled to some clarification.

INQUIRY AS TO LEGISLATION RESPECTING SMALL BUSINESS

Mr. Lorne Nystrom (Yorkton-Melville): Mr. Speaker, my supplementary question is for the Minister of Finance. Can he indicate to the House when we can expect the legislation to deal with small business announced and promised last July, I believe, by the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce?

● (1440)

Hon. John N. Turner (Minister of Finance): As soon as he gets back from Tokyo he will be tackling this particular measure.

Mr. Speaker: The Chair will recognize the hon. member for St. John's East for one last supplementary on this series of questions, and then the hon. member for Calgary North who has a supplementary on a previous subject.

TIGHT MONEY POLICY—PRIOR CONSULTATION ON EFFECT ON REGIONAL ECONOMIC EXPANSION PROGRAMS

Mr. James A. McGrath (St. John's East): Mr. Speaker, I direct my question to the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion. In view of the fact that high interest rates and the tight money policy now being pursued by the government are counterproductive to the government's DREE policy, may I ask the minister if there was any consultation between himself, the Minister of Finance and the Governor of the Bank of Canada before the latter embarked on this tight money policy?

Hon. Donald C. Jamieson (Minister of Regional Economic Expansion): Mr. Speaker, there are constant consultations between myself and the Minister of Finance with regard to various measures to assist the areas of slow growth in this country.

REGIONAL ECONOMIC EXPANSION

NOVA SCOTIA—NEW INITIATIVES IN LIGHT OF RESIGNATION OF PROVINCIAL MINISTER OF DEVELOPMENT

Mr. Elmer M. MacKay (Central Nova): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion. In view of continuing frustrations with regional development, best exemplified by the resignation of Mr. Fiske, Minister of Development for the province of Nova Scotia, who gave as one of the reasons for his resignation the performance of DREE, has the minister any new initiatives to announce such as calling on the Atlantic Development Council to deal with these continuing problems?

Hon. Donald C. Jamieson (Minister of Regional Economic Expansion): Mr. Speaker, I, of course, cannot accept the premise of the question. The reasons why provincial ministers resign are completely outside my purview. But on the latter part of the question may I say this is certainly a possibility. As I believe the hon. member knows, I have made an appointment with the new chairman of the Atlantic Development Council and have asked him what he considers to be the best forum or best area for discussion. I should add that within the next few weeks, some time during this month, I will be meeting with the Council of Maritime Premiers on the same subject.

[Mr. Nystrom.]

OPERATING POSITION OF METROPOLITAN AREA GROWTH INVESTMENT LIMITED

Mr. Elmer M. MacKay (Central Nova): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the minister whether Metropolitan Area Growth Investment Limited, the joint federal-provincial Crown corporation formed some months ago, is now fully operative with all executive officers in place and with ongoing functions? If so, when can we expect a progress report?

Hon. Donald C. Jamieson (Minister of Regional Economic Expansion): Mr. Speaker, there is an interim board of directors at the moment. We have made a recommendation to the government of Nova Scotia with regard to a chief executive officer. It is now a matter for the government of Nova Scotia to indicate whether it is prepared to accept our nominee, because it must be done on the basis of federal-provincial agreement.

ENERGY

POSSIBLE VETO BY QUEBEC OF PROPOSED EXTENSION OF OIL PIPELINE TO MONTREAL—EFFECT ON CEILING ON CRUDE PETROLEUM PRICE

Mr. Eldon M. Woolliams (Calgary North): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources with respect to the policy enunciated by the minister for the hon. member for Nanaimo-Cowichan and the Islands. If the pipeline to be built to Montreal is not going to be built because of a veto by one province, will the policy as to the ceiling on the price of crude petroleum remain the same irrespective of whether that project goes ahead?

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, the hon. gentleman is not correct in his assumption. We indicated we would be having discussions with the provinces, and in the next several days I will be having discussions with the two provinces in question. The decision does remain in principle in favour of a Montreal connection. Therefore the second part of the question does not follow.

Mr. Woolliams: Would the minister make this very clear when he meets with the provincial ministers of Alberta and indeed of Quebec, neither of which provinces he consulted prior to the statement made on Tuesday of last week; because according to the national media Quebec did veto the project?

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): I am sorry, Mr. Speaker, I did not hear the hon. member. Make what clear?

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Regina-Lake Centre.

AIR TRANSPORT

REASON FOR RATIO OF NEW ROUTES AS ALLOCATED BETWEEN CANADA AND UNITED STATES

Mr. Les Benjamin (Regina-Lake Centre): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Transport in light of his statement issued to the press yesterday concerning the agreement between Canada and the United States on new air routes. Can he advise the House what is the rationale or reason for the ratio of two routes for Canada for every three routes for the United States?

Hon. Jean Marchand (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I do not think we can make this kind of assessment because we have to take into account the length of the routes and the important centres of population, and just to take the number of routes would give an entirely false impression.

DIVISION OF NEW ROUTES TO UNITED STATES BETWEEN AIR CANADA AND PRIVATE AIRLINES

Mr. Les Benjamin (Regina-Lake Centre): In view of the fact Air Canada is a publicly owned carrier, can the Minister of Transport assure the House that the major share of these new routes will be granted to Air Canada rather than to Canadian Pacific Airlines and other privately owned carriers?

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Vegreville.

DOMESTIC AND GLOBAL POLICIES

Mr. Don Mazankowski (Vegreville): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a supplementary question to the Minister of Transport. In view of the impact the announcement the minister made regarding new United States-Canada air routes will have, hopefully, on the airline industry in Canada, can he advise the House whether the government will be announcing a new domestic air policy for Canada? Also, can he advise the House when we may expect the long-awaited announcement on the global air policy which he has referred to in the House on many occasions?

Hon. Jean Marchand (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I am very anxious to make this announcement and I hope to do so before too long.

Mr. Benjamin: Inside the House?

Mr. Marchand (Langelier): Yes, I can do it in the House if the House is ready to accept it.

Mr. Mazankowski: On a point of order—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member rises on a point of order. I appeal to hon. members for co-operation with the Chair in order to permit as many questioners as possible by raising as few points of order and questions of privilege as possible.

Mr. Mazankowski: My point of order is for the purpose of clarification. I wonder whether the minister can advise the House whether the government is considering formulation of a new domestic air policy to cover the allocation of air routes for Canadian Pacific Airlines and Air Canada?

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. member will appreciate that is hardly a point of order. He has asked a supplementary question. Perhaps it would be simpler if the Chair allowed the minister to reply, after which I will recognize the hon. member for Crowfoot. Again I suggest to hon. members that it is not in order to ask questions under the guise of points of order. However, the question having been asked, the minister might be given an opportunity to reply.

Mr. Marchand (Langelier): Mr. Speaker, there is an existing policy concerning domestic civil aviation in Canada. It is known. I do not think it is our intention to change it. So far as the allocation of routes to the airlines is concerned, this will be known as soon as the agreement is ratified by both governments.

PROPOSED INCREASE IN LANDING FEES FOR SMALL AIRCRAFT—REVIEW OF DECISION

Mr. J. H. Horner (Crowfoot): Mr. Speaker, my supplementary question is directed to the Minister of Transport. It has to do with landing fees and landing rights within Canada for small aircraft. I understand the department is going to increase landing fees for small airplanes within Canada on October 1. Has the department reviewed that decision and is it now going to change it and lower landing fees for small aircraft?

Hon. Jean Marchand (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I think I have already answered this question in the House, and my reply now will be about the same. We have received many representations on these fees. We are reviewing the whole matter now, and before October 1 we will establish a policy.

SOCIAL SECURITY

ASSISTANCE TO PERSONS BETWEEN 60 AND 65 UNABLE TO FIND EMPLOYMENT—POSITION OF MINISTER

Mr. Eudore Allard (Rimouski): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask a question to the Minister of National Health and Welfare.

Considering that thousands of citizens between the age of 60 and 65 have great difficulty in finding employment, does the minister intend to submit a special bill to help these people?

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, this subject is examined in the working paper which was tabled in the House on April 18 of this year. It is now being discussed with the provinces.

[English]

Mr. Speaker: The Chair will recognize the hon. member for Regina-Lake Centre who has a supplementary to his previous question, after which I will recognize the hon. member for York-Sunbury.

Oral Questions

AIR TRANSPORT

REASON FOR NO ROUTE FOR CANADIAN CARRIER BETWEEN OTTAWA AND WASHINGTON IN AGREEMENT WITH UNITED STATES

Mr. Les Benjamin (Regina-Lake Centre): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a further supplementary to the Minister of Transport, and at the same time may I ask him to take the opportunity to reply to my second question. In view of the fact that the United States has a route from its national capital, Washington, to Montreal and Ottawa, would he advise why no route was obtained for Canada from Ottawa to Washington? Why has this not happened? Did Canada ask for such a route?

Hon. Jean Marchand (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, there is a route now to Washington with a stopover in Syracuse, but I think the point is very well taken. The proposed agreement will have to be ratified by both governments, and this is surely something we can look into. We have a commitment from the United States government that before the end of the year it will be ready to consider points that will be submitted to it in the spirit of the hon. member's suggestion.

HIGHWAYS

PROPOSED ROAD FROM MAINE THROUGH NEW BRUNSWICK TO QUEBEC—INVESTIGATION OF FEASIBILITY

Mr. J. Robert Howie (York-Sunbury): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the right hon. Prime Minister. In view of the strong support recently expressed by the Governor of the State of Maine for a direct corridor road from Maine through New Brunswick to Quebec, will the Prime Minister investigate the feasibility of such a project for the economic betterment of eastern Canada?

● (1450)

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, naturally I want to be helpful to the Governor of Maine and to the hon. member if he is making a policy proposal. My understanding is that the people of the Maritimes are quite divided on this subject and that, depending on where you live in the Maritimes, you are either for or against that corridor road. However, I am certainly open to further persuasion, and if there is a unanimous resolution of the Conservative party, for instance, supporting this corridor road it would naturally influence me to try to do something pleasing to them.

PROPOSED ROAD FROM MAINE THROUGH NEW BRUNSWICK TO QUEBEC—SUGGESTED COMPLETION OF HIGHWAY NETWORK IN MARITIMES

Mr. Eymard Corbin (Madawaska-Victoria): Mr. Speaker, about this same question, considering that there still are hundreds of miles of incomplete highway in each of the Maritime provinces, can the Prime Minister give us the assurance that he will first deal with this problem before investing with the State of Maine in the construction of a so-called corridor highway?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Of course, Mr. Speaker, while I wish to please the Progressive Conservative party, I want even more to please the Liberals. I therefore strongly retain the idea of the hon. member.

AIR CANADA

USE OF JP4 GASOLINE—SUGGESTED USE OF KEROSENE

Mr. Dan McKenzie (Winnipeg South Centre): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Transport. Has the minister yet undertaken a review of the use by Air Canada of JP4 gasoline which is less safe than the fuel used by most commercial airlines and by Department of Transport aircraft that transport federal cabinet ministers? If so, what is the position of the government at this time?

Hon. Jean Marchand (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, a few weeks ago I flew on a DOT Jetstar and it used JP4.

Mr. McKenzie: Since, after the explosion of an Air Canada DC8 on June 21, some 3,150 gallons of kerosene were still safe in the tanks, is the government going to consider ordering Air Canada to use kerosene which, while more expensive, is far less dangerous than JP4?

Mr. Marchand (Langelier): Mr. Speaker, I regret that all the technical advice I have is to the effect that your statement is not right.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I am sure the minister was not addressing the Chair at that moment.

SCIENCE AND TECHNOLOGY

SENATE COMMITTEE RECOMMENDATION THAT DEPARTMENT BE RESPONSIBLE FOR RESEARCH AND DEVELOPMENT EXPENDITURES

Mr. Harvie Andre (Calgary Centre): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of State for Science and Technology. In view of the recommendation of the Senate special committee on science policy that the science ministry be responsible for the over $1 billion spent each year by government departments on research and development, will the minister be recommending to cabinet that her department be made an operational ministry and fulfil this and other responsibilities?

[Translation]

Hon. Jeanne Sauvé (Minister of State for Science and Technology): Mr. Speaker, if I can rely on the quick glance cast at this report, I do not think that Senator Lamontagne recommended that the Ministry of State for Science and Technology be made directly responsible for the whole billion dollar budget reserved for scientific research activities.

[English]

Mr. Andre: Mr. Speaker, my supplementary question is also directed to the Minister of State for Science and Technology. In view of the conclusion of this report that "after years of analysis the time has now come for decision and action," when will the minister be reporting to the House about changes she will make in the operation and organization of her department to conform with some of these recommendations?

[Translation]

Mrs. Sauvé: Mr. Speaker, some of Senator Lamontagne's recommendations already appear in the projects of the ministry. I shall eventually announce some measures concerning the ministry, and I look over each and every recommendation in the Lamontagne report, to my greatest englightenment and that of my officials.

INDIAN AFFAIRS

GOVERNMENT POSITION ON PREVENTING EVICTION OF NON-STATUS WOMEN FROM RESERVES FOLLOWING SUPREME COURT DECISION

Mr. R. Gordon L. Fairweather (Fundy-Royal): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Prime Minister of which I gave him notice so that we might have a considered reply. How will the government respond to the telegram from the National Advisory Council on the Status of Women asking for government intervention to prevent or stay evictions of non-status women from the reserves, which came about as a result of the recent and, I may say, lamented Supreme Court decision?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I know the hon. member would only want me to paraphrase my answer, as it would certainly be a matter of courtesy to answer them before giving an answer to the hon. gentleman. As I understand it, part of their concern deals with the abolition of the Indian Act or certain parts of the Indian Act. I point out to the House of Commons that the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development more than four years ago indicated to the House that we were prepared to do away with the act in its entirety but that we would not want to do it without a great deal of consultation from the native people themselves, because there was obviously a lack of unanimity among them as to the content and timing of such changes. I think the hon. member knows that the Indian people were not 100 per cent in support of the cause that he seems to be promoting.

Mr. Fairweather: Mr. Speaker, perhaps I would have done better without notice, with great respect. I was asking about a stay of the eviction of people. As the right hon. gentleman may remember from when he taught law, the eviction process is to get people out of places where they are not supposed to be. That is really what I want to know. Will there be a stay of eviction proceedings? Will the government intervene? The Indian Act can be dealt with in the next few years.

Mr. Trudeau: No, Mr. Speaker.

THE CANADIAN ECONOMY

PROPOSED TAKEOVER OF ACKLANDS LIMITED BY UNITED STATES COMPANY—GOVERNMENT ACTION

Mr. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa-Whitby): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Manpower and Immigration who is filling in for the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce. It arises out of the commitment he made to the House yesterday to look into the takeover bid for Acklands Limited. In view of the concern expressed by the government of Manitoba, is the minister in a position now to answer that question?

Hon. Robert K. Andras (Acting Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, the legal representatives of Genuine Parts Company of Atlanta have been in touch with us and have written today to the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce outlining the details of the proposed acquisition bid. They have advised us that in the event the acquisition is consummated, Genuine Parts Company has no plan to phase out Acklands' operations or to alter Acklands method of operation. Nor will the company increase Acklands' purchases from United States suppliers. Although Bill C-132 is not yet law, I am informed that the executives of that company are prepared to and have offered to meet the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce, and that meeting is now being arranged.

GOVERNMENT INTENTION RESPECTING PROCEEDING WITH FOREIGN INVESTMENT REVIEW BILL

Hon. Robert K. Andras (Acting Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, perhaps I might be allowed to answer a related question asked by the hon. member for Peace River about Bill C-132. I am informed that the bill continues to have very high priority and will be brought forward shortly.

PROPOSED TAKEOVER OF ACKLANDS LIMITED BY UNITED STATES COMPANY—REPRESENTATIONS BY MANITOBA

Hon. Robert K. Andras (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): Finally, Mr. Speaker, may I deal with another question having to do with the proposed acquisition of Acklands. We have not had, according to my information, representations from the government of Manitoba on this issue.

Mr. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa-Whitby): A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. As it is my understanding that the Minister of Industry in Manitoba has sent a telegram to the minister concerning this subject in which he expressed concern about the possibility of joint federal-provincial action to prevent this takeover, in the event this is confirmed, as it will be, I am sure, by the minister later this day, will the minister assure the House that the federal government will respond to this provincial initiative and take action that will put off completion of the takeover bid until consultation has taken place between the federal government and the government of Manitoba?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. It seems to me that the question asked by the hon. member is at least partly hypothetical and can be considered as a representation. Perhaps we might be allowed to go to the next question.

Mr. Broadbent: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker, as this takeover bid affects in a serious way a couple of thousand employees and as another government in Canada, the government of Manitoba, is concerned about the takeover, I wonder, notwithstanding the improper phrasing of the question, if the minister, who got the sense of the question, could be permitted to answer?

Mr. Andras: Mr. Speaker, again I confirm that a few minutes before the question period my information was that we had not received such representations from the government of Manitoba, but I most certainly will recheck that and in the event that is the case we will certainly respond. I could not make an unequivocal commitment to stop this acquisition because Bill C-132 is not yet law. I am encouraged however, as I think the hon. member might be, to note that the principals are voluntarily submitting their detailed proposals to the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce and are prepared to consult and, I hope, to be influenced by the response.

INDIAN AFFAIRS

CAUGHNAWAGA RESERVE—DIFFICULTIES BETWEEN NATIVES AND WHITE PEOPLE

Mr. René Matte (Champlain): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the hon. Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development.

Could he advise the House of the steps he will take concerning the serious problems which the Mohawk Indians and the white people are facing in Caughnawaga?

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): Mr. Speaker, this morning, I met Chief Kirby of the Caughnawaga Reserve. Under the Indian Act, the Indian people on this reserve, like those on any other reserve for that matter, have the right to pass bylaws concerning non-Indians living on the reserve. This is exactly what the council intends to do. They intend to pass this bylaw which will become effective within 40 days. If people believe it is not fair they could appeal to courts. It is impossible for me under the circumstances to act like a judge in this matter.

Mr. Matte: Has the minister received complaints from young Indians who, with the support of older ones, would disapprove entirely of the band council which they would consider a creature of the federal government?

[Mr. Broadbent.]

Mr. Chrétien: Mr. Speaker, it is the elected council of Caughnawaga which is recognized by the federal government under the Indian Act. The hereditary chiefs do not enjoy such status under the law. Some provisions of the act would enable them to exercise efficient control were they in majority within the Caughnawaga band, but apparently this is not so at the present time.

Mr. Doug Neil (Moose Jaw): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the minister in charge of the Wheat Board. Have all deliveries been made under the long-term, low-price wheat contracts with the U.S.S.R. and China and, if not, how much grain remains to be delivered?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, all the grain has long ago been delivered on the contracts which were entered into during the low-price periods, but there are still some deliveries being made on the contracts entered into after prices rose to a significant degree.

FISHERIES

REASON FOR EMBARGO ON EXPORT OF FISHMEAL

Mr. Charles E. Haliburton (South Western Nova): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of the Environment and Fisheries. It relates to the production of fishmeal. In view of the fact that during the past couple of years Canada has produced several times the amount of fishmeal consumed domestically, will the minister advise as to the motivation of the government in placing a virtual embargo on exports of that product?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The minister may reply briefly to the question and he will be given the floor for that purpose, but normally that kind of information is given to the House by way of a statement on motions.

Hon. Jack Davis (Minister of Fisheries): Mr. Speaker, it was to ensure that Canadian resources are used to produce jobs in Canada rather than in other countries.

REGIONAL ECONOMIC EXPANSION

CANCELLATION OF SUBSIDY ON BUILDING OF SMALL SHIPS—EFFECT ON EMPLOYMENT IN COASTAL PROVINCES

Mr. David MacDonald (Egmont): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct my question to the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion. It relates to the announcement last month by the Minister of the Environment with regard to the cancellation of the shipbuilding subsidy on ships of up to 75 feet in length. The minister stated this would not have any serious effect on regional development. Has any word been received from the premiers of the Atlantic provinces as to the impact of this program and loss of employment this fall? In particular, has the minister any plans to announce with regard to the very serious unemployment problem which is, presumably, resulting in the Atlantic and the Pacific regions?

Hon. Donald C. Jamieson (Minister of Regional Economic Expansion): Mr. Speaker, I will try to be brief. This is a rather complex question. I have not heard from the premiers concerned but I have heard from a number of ministers in the provinces. I will have to check the record to see just which ones they were. At present my department is consulting with the Department of the Environment. Early assessment indicates we can provide some additional funds during the 90-day study period so that orders in the shipyards will not go down during that time. I know we are quite well advanced in negotiations with Newfoundland; I will have to check to see where they stand with regard to the other Atlantic provinces. I believe suitable arrangements can be worked out jointly between DREE and the Department of the Environment.

REQUEST THAT PRESENT INTEREST RATE ON FARM CREDIT LOANS BE MAINTAINED

Mr. William C. Frank (Middlesex): Mr. Speaker, my question is addressed to the Minister of Agriculture. Because of the fact that all members of the House are interested in encouraging farmers to stay in production and as a particular means of encouragement to young farmers, can the minister assure the House that the 7 per cent interest rate on farm credit loans will be maintained as at least one way for farmers to hold down the cost of production?

Hon. E. F. Whelan (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, we are reviewing the whole subject of interest on farm credit loans. We have maintained a 7 per cent interest rate on farm credit loans while other interest rates have increased. This shows our concern for farmers, particularly young farmers. Our concern will continue to be in that form.

CANADIAN BROADCASTING CORPORATION

REQUEST FOR INFORMATION ON CHANGES IN FRENCH NETWORK

Mr. Joe Clark (Rocky Mountain): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question for the Prime Minister. In answer to the hon. member for Témiscamingue the Prime Minister referred to changes that had occurred in the French language network of the CBC. Will the Prime Minister table in the House a list of the changes the government has ordered or otherwise caused to be taken within the CBC French language network in the period referred to in the previous exchange?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, there may have been a misunderstanding, perhaps because of the translation. I did not indicate that the government had suggested or demanded any changes. I indicated that my impression from various people who talked about the kind of complaint the hon. member for Témiscamingue raised was that although the CBC, French side, is by no means perfect it is no longer as strong a vehicle of separatism as it was four or five years ago.

Mr. Clark (Rocky Mountain): Will the Prime Minister ascertain whether in fact any changes were brought about by the activity, indirectly or otherwise, of the government and, if so, will he table a report in the House specifying those changes?

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

CHILE—DEATH OF PRESIDENT—SUGGESTED EXPRESSION OF REGRET OF HOUSE

Mr. Andrew Brewin (Greenwood): Mr. Speaker, will the Secretary of State for External Affairs convey the regret felt by the overwhelming majority of members of the House because of the tragic death of the democratically elected President of Chile, and its fervent hope for the early return of democratic government in Chile?

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, in expressing those words I am sure the hon. member has expressed the view of members of this House. As Secretary of State for External Affairs I will be extending sympathy to the people of Chile on the death of their president and, of course, my condolences to the family. All of us, I am sure, express the hope that democratic institutions will be restored to Chile without delay.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

OFFICIAL LANGUAGES

REQUEST THAT MANUAL OF ADMINISTRATIVE SYSTEM BE MADE AVAILABLE TO MEMBERS OF PARLIAMENT

Mr. Paul Dick (Lanark-Renfrew-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the President of the Treasury Board. Treasury Board has now made available a two-volume manual, four inches thick, entitled "The Manual of the Official Languages Administrative System", which is available to all departments in the public service. This manual sets out how the federal government's bilingual resolution is to be implemented. Will Treasury Board kindly make available to members of the House copies of this manual so that members can see how Treasury Board is interpreting this resolution?

Hon. C. M. Drury (President of the Treasury Board): I will be glad to, Mr. Speaker.

Oral Questions

IMMIGRATION

SUCCESS OF PROGRAM FOR REGISTRATION OF ILLEGAL IMMIGRANTS

Mr. Lincoln M. Alexander (Hamilton West): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Manpower and Immigration with regard to the "last chance" policy of the government. Is the minister satisfied with the rate of registration by illegal immigrants?

Hon. Robert K. Andras (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, the response so far has been positive. There were 700 persons who registered yesterday. This brings the total to 27,756 persons who are taking advantage of the act. I might say that 6,549 of these registrants have already had an assessment interview, of which 6,490, or 99.1 per cent, have conformed with the regulations and can be landed. The remaining 0.9 per cent are subject to further review. I would, as the hon. member would, encourage all those who have not yet come forward to take advantage of this program. However, I think the pace is quickening and I hope that all those entitled will come forward to be registered and landed.

Mr. Alexander: Is the minister aware of the fact it is reported immigration officials have indicated that many illegal immigrants, because of fear and distrust are not coming forward as rapidly as all of us would like to see? If the minister is aware of this, has he taken any steps to alleviate this situation and reduce the fear which I believe does exist?

• (1510)

Mr. Andras: I join the hon. member in recognizing that we have felt this possibility of fear and mistrust existing from the beginning. To overcome this, however, we have carried on a very active information and publicity campaign, and special attention has been paid to many of the pockets where more precise indications of concern have been expressed. As a result, we have seen an increase in trust, an increase in the numbers coming forward. I hope the hon. member and all other hon. members will join me in underlining the sincerity and integrity of this program and in seeking to remove distrust wherever it exists in order that the program will meet with success in the final analysis.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Speaker: Orders of the day. Is the Minister of Justice rising on a point of order?

Mr. Lang: Yes, Mr. Speaker. There have been the usual discussions and I believe there is general agreement to call the report stage and third reading of Bill C-220 which was reported out of the Standing Committee on Health, Welfare and Social Affairs yesterday without amendment. There is an understanding that it will be dealt with fairly quickly in the House at this time.

Mr. Speaker: Is it agreed?

Mr. Bell: We agree.

[Mr. Drury.]

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

STATUTE LAW (SUPPLEMENTARY RETIREMENT BENEFITS) AMENDMENT ACT, 1973

PROVISION FOR REMOVAL OF TWO PER CENT LIMIT ON ESCALATION, REDUCTION OF ELIGIBLE AGE

Hon. C. M. Drury (President of the Treasury Board) moved that Bill C-220, to amend the statute law providing for the payment of supplementary retirement benefits to certain persons in receipt of pensions payable out of the consolidated revenue fund, as reported (without amendment) from the Standing Committee on Health, Welfare and Social Affairs, be concurred in.

Motion agreed to.

Mr. Speaker: When shall the said bill be read the third time? By leave, now?

Some hon. Members: Now.

Mr. Drury moved that the bill be read the third time and do pass.

Mr. Walter Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, in rising to speak briefly on third reading of this bill I wish to say at the outset to the acting government House leader that it is my intention to be the only spokesman for my party at this final stage, and to expedite the passage of the measure.

The bill is a very important one for the public servants of Canada who sometimes, unfortunately, are maligned, criticized and ridiculed in a way they ought not to be. I think we ought to remember, especially in the national capital, that if there is a proliferation of public servants in terms of numbers it is because the country is prepared, at this point at least, to accept a proliferation of government programs.

In the speech which I made on second reading I expressed regret—and this regret still stands—that the government had to be dragged kicking and screaming to the point at which it would at least acknowledge the pleas which have been made for many years by public servants, their staff associations, their families and others, that the concept of linking pensions with the cost of living index be recognized. It has now been so recognized and I think this is an important landmark for public servants and those who have served their country in other capacities in the public realm.

We do not want to say, however, that we have come to the end of the road with respect to public service matters and matters dealing with the armed forces generally. We still have ahead of us the whole concept of collective bargaining in the public service and the position of those members of the armed forces who decide to serve their country in the public service after their term of duty in the armed forces is completed. We still have before us the whole question of the age at which public servants ought to retire—whether that age ought not to be lowered. It still remains for us to consider the position of widows in the context of public servants' pensions and superannuation plans.

Then there is the question raised by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles), the important question of which index is to apply. We must consider whether it is simply to be the cost of living index or whether we should move on to other indices or aspects of the cost of living index which would bring greater justice to public servants. We have to consider afresh the whole subject of working conditions. We must consider, as we go ahead, the wisdom or otherwise of the manner in which the superannuation account is administered, as acknowledged by the President of the Treasury Board (Mr. Drury) yesterday. I believe there is a certain amount of discontent, a feeling that there is great room for improvement in the administration of this account. This will be the challenge before parliament in the years to come.

The government has met in part, the challenge which faces it now, but I suggest it did so with some reluctance and only after a tremendous amount of urging by those of us who have been interested in public service matters over the years. The Liberal member for Ottawa Centre (Mr. Poulin) stated in the course of his remarks that we would all support this overdue increase. There is no question that it is overdue. There is no question that every member of the House wholeheartedly supports this bill on third reading.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, when this bill was being considered in committee yesterday afternoon I suggested that any further debate would really be a case of wrapping it in fancy paper and tying it with a bow ribbon. The fact of the matter is that it is a good piece of legislation. We welcome it, and are glad it is being passed by this parliament.

Some of us have been concerned about this matter for many years, in fact, for decades. I well recall the historic step which was taken at the end of 1969 and early in 1970 when provision was first made for the pensions of retired public servants and other government employees to be escalated after retirement. That was, as I say, a historic step, but there were two or three major deficiencies in the bill which was passed in 1970. What we are doing now is to correct those deficiencies.

The corrections are mainly two. We are providing that the pensions of retired public servants and the other related groups shall be escalated each year, not just by 2 per cent but by the total percentage increase in the cost of living. This is good. This is welcome news to the nearly 100,000 people who are affected by this legislation. The other change is to lower slightly and under certain conditions the age at which escalation can begin in the case of retired RCMP and retired armed forces personnel. This change does not go far enough, but as far as it goes it is most welcome.

As the hon. member for Grenville-Carleton (Mr. Baker) has said, this is not the end of the road as far as public service matters generally are concerned. I underline the various points he has made touching other subjects which ought to be dealt with. But I also emphasize, even as one who has supported this legislation and who supports it today, that this bill is not even the end of the road as far as public service pensions are concerned.

Within a few weeks, or within a few months at most, when we have passed proposed amendments to the Canada Pension Plan, we will just about have done the job of providing for all pensions that come under federal auspices to be escalated at least annually by the full extent of the cost of living increase. But we must move on from that. Merely to get one's pension escalated in step with the cost of living increase is simply a case of being permitted to continue to enjoy only that total amount of goods and services that one enjoyed at retirement. But society moves on. Wage levels move up and the standard of living goes up. Some of us feel that we must now start to think of escalating pensions in accordance with the rise in wage and salary levels and in accordance with the rise in the gross national product.

One of the good things about coming to the end of a crusade is that it gives one a chance to begin a new one. We welcome this bill. We welcome what it means not only to the nearly 100,000 persons it affects, but in principle to all Canadians. But now is the time to look forward to the escalation of pensions on still a better index so that our retired people, public servants and all our citizens, will have the right to enjoy not only enough to keep alive, not only enough to keep up with the cost of living, but the opportunity to share in the increases in the standard of living which society is able to achieve, which to a large extent has been made possible by our older people. With pleasure, we support this bill.

[Translation]

Mr. Jean-Robert Gauthier (Ottawa East): Mr. Speaker, if I have not joined in this discussion it is simply because I support this bill without reservation and because, as an Ottawa resident, I am most pleased to see this government legislation about to be passed.

FAMILY ALLOWANCES ACT AND YOUTH ALLOWANCES ACT

AMENDMENTS TO INCREASE PAYMENTS

The House resumed, from Tuesday, September 11, consideration of the motion of Mr. Lalonde that Bill C-223, to amend the Family Allowances Act and the Youth Allowances Act, be read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Health, Welfare and Social Affairs.

Mr. Sinclair Stevens (York-Simcoe): Mr. Speaker, when I was speaking on Bill C-223 last evening I was unfortunately interrupted by an intentional interjection by the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Lalonde), who to me was attempting to cut off my complete freedom to speak on this bill as I saw fit. It is interesting to note that when the bill was introduced by the minister to whom I have referred, he was not interrupted once. Yet in his presentation he referred to inflation, the cost of living, and made other references in defence of the government's hopeless handling of inflation in this country, 21 times. He made those references in the context of saying that the bill before the House today, Bill C-223, was one of the government's ways of combating inflation in this country. We are surely entitled, on this side of the House, to call that type of representation what it is—misrepresentation.

In this context I think the House should be reminded of the minister's words in his maiden speech in the House on January 11. After pointing out that he felt it was almost sacred in the House that those in government follow the advice of the 264 delegates of the Canadian people who were sharing the government's task, the minister went on to say, as reported at page 197 of Hansard:

I believe the highest honour that can be conferred on one of its members is that of being recognized by his colleagues as a true House of Commons man. As I begin my parliamentary career, I can only express the hope that one day my colleagues will be kind enough to give me such an honour.

Whoever is chalking up the tally in anticipation of the conferral of such honour, I hope they chalk up against the minister what he did in the dying hours of the debate last evening.

It is strange what nine months can do to a minister. Nine months to the day of his saying those words he has become an arrogant, Trudeau cabinet minister. Perhaps the thing I take greatest exception to is not whether the minister misused the rules of the House in making his interjection but that the minister made new misrepresentations. I refer to a statement of his to the effect that the official opposition has been well known over the years for its opposition to any move to increase family allowances. How could the minister make that statement on the same day that my colleague, speaking as the main critic for our party, said in the debate he was concerned that the minister may not be able to bring in the bill contemplated earlier—that is, the $20 average family allowance bill—in time for January, 1974? My colleague concluded by saying, as reported at page 6424 of Hansard:

For our part we shall support this measure. Faint as it is, it does help, and we wish to help these people as much as possible.

In spite of that statement by my colleague, we have the minister misrepresenting to the House, according to his language, that this party has always stood in the way of family allowance advances. Having said that, I believe it is interesting to go a little further and to say, if the minister is sincere in what he says, that I wish he had introduced in the bill now before the House a provision that would at least have restored to the families of Canada the buying power that their family allowances had when the Conservative government was in power in this country. The minister has put a deflator on the $12 proposed in this bill. If the figure were deflated to the 1960 period, it would be found to be actually 50 cents short of regaining to those who received family allowance the buying power it had in the years of Conservative government in this country.

● (1530)

Think of it. Here we have a minister who comes into this House and, without admitting that it is his government's mishandling of the economy that has caused inflation, expects us to accept as a kind of magnanimous gesture an increase which does not even restore the buying power of family allowances to what it was in the years of the previous Tory government in this country. To put it another way, this gesture represents an increase of, not $12—let us not forget this—but $4.80, which is 15 cents per day, per child. That is what the minister expects us to jump up and down about and exclaim, "aren't they tremendous in their anxiety to help families in this country?"

[Mr. Stevens.]

I raise these points because, while we are not opposed to an increase in family allowances, we think family allowances should be put on a basis as contemplated in the bill which, hopefully, will be introduced shortly, that is, to take into account deflation or inflation as the case may be. It is totally wrong for the minister in introducing the bill in this House to pretend that somehow this is a measure designed to fight inflation, and to suggest that this is something the government is doing in the best interests of Canada, without admitting that it is his government's mishandling of the economy which has resulted in those who receive family allowances requiring such an increase.

Having said that—I know this will embarrass the government and the minister—in June of this year the Organization for Economic Co-operation and Development, which represents 24 countries including the United States, Japan, France, West Germany, Italy, The Netherlands and Britain, stated in a report that the consumer price index for food had risen more sharply in Canada than in seven other industrialized countries in the 12-month period ending in June. Those are the facts, and surely we in the opposition have the right to point them out and to insist that the minister discontinue his tendency of misrepresenting those facts to the House.

I would add that the same report also stated that the performance of the United States was the best in respect of all goods and services, yet we constantly find that, rather than introducing measures in this House that would contain inflation, this government only offers measures to relieve its effects, and some measures that indeed contribute to inflation. On that point, I would remind hon. members that on the twenty-first occasion on which the minister referred to inflation in his introductory remarks, he stated:

The government continues working to provide the best form of income security possible, and that is a reduction of the rate of inflation itself.

I should like to see concrete evidence of the steps the government is taking to reduce inflation. It is not enough for the government to give us another twist to that old slogan "The land is strong" by simply saying "Lalonde is strong". This country deserves better government than it has received in the past ten years. The evidence of mishandling is there and it is important that we should not be confused. The bill before us is a measure which simply relieves. I might add that it does not entirely restore the loss in buying power of those who receive family allowances. I say that because the increase is 50 cents short of returning that buying power to its level during the previous Conservative government's days.

It is also interesting to note that if the buying power of family allowance recipients was to be restored to the level of 1946 when family allowances were first introduced, we would be considering an average allowance of $19.35 as opposed to $12. That is why my colleague, the hon. member for Hillsborough (Mr. Macquarrie), indicated in his remarks; he felt it would be more fitting to provide something closer to the average in order to compensate for what has been lost in buying power as a result of inflation in this country.

In short, we are supporting this bill in order to help those who have been hurt by inflation which is at least in part due to this government's mishandling of our economy.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Would the hon. member permit a question?

Mr. Stevens: From you, gladly.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): You are very kind. In view of the hon. member's statement, and he said it last night as well, that his party is supporting this bill mainly because inflation has made it necessary for these payments to be increased, may I ask if that means they do not support in principle the idea of family allowances as a means of redistributing income?

Mr. Stevens: Mr. Speaker, I am sorry the minister is not in attendance to hear my answer to that question. I personally support the bill in principle, and to prove my point I should like the hon. member to read my column sent out on August 15.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Laniel): Is the House ready for the question?

Some hon. Members: Question.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Laniel): Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the said motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. I do not see the House leader or the acting House leader, but I believe there was agreement among the four parties that this bill would be referred to the committee of the whole House rather than to the standing committee.

Mr. Lalonde: Mr. Speaker, there has indeed been consultation through the usual channels and I understand there was agreement to consider this bill in the committee of the whole House. If the appropriate amendment could be made to the motion, I would appreciate it.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Laniel): Does the House give unanimous consent to modification of the motion in order that the bill may be referred to the committee of the whole House?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and the House went into committee thereon, Mr. Laniel in the chair.

On clause 1—Monthly allowance.

Mr. Macquarrie: Mr. Chairman, I am sorry the minister was not present in the House as the hon. member for York-Simcoe finished his address. One wants to have as broad a degree of good will and unanimity as one can on these matters, and I think a courtesy would have been extended had the minister been here. I hope he was not behind the curtain smoking, which would be a most terrible thing for a Minister of National Health and Welfare to do.

● (1540)

Also, I deplore the sour note that was added to the discussion of this measure when the minister, last night sought, on a point of order, to take the floor from the hon. member for York-Simcoe. I know the minister has not been in this House very long and may not be familiar with the ways here, but this is not good form by any means and does not add to the good will which can permeate this chamber if the House decides on the passage of legislation. There are some in the press gallery, if they are ever here, who regard this chamber as something between a large courtroom and a small circus, but when parliament is performing well it is in fact neither. So I deplore what I would have to describe as the ill-mannered performance of last night. I want to say that in the interest of a supportive House in respect of this measure—and I pledged that on behalf of my party long ago—members of my party made interesting and valuable speeches, as did members of all parties.

In my opinion there has been a good discussion of this important matter. I listened to every speech made by the minister and members from every portion of the House. I think this is the way we should conduct ourselves, having due and proper regard for the rights and indeed the views of others, and not imputing motives. I even heard the minister say that the member had a right to speak. Of course he had. That is what this place is all about.

So far as I am concerned, we on this side of the House have conducted a careful examination of the measure and if it is the disposition of other parties to field one speaker on the matter I am prepared to pledge my party to do the same so that we can put this measure forward. We have given it our blessing and our criticism. I suppose the minister will pay as much attention to one as to the other. But at this particular stage we are prepared to play our part to advance this legislation. Faint though it be, we will not blot out such light as it may bring to bear.

Mr. Knight: Mr. Chairman, I respect, as usual, the remarks and the call for unity of the hon. member for Hillsborough. I find that somewhat unique in light of the remarks of the hon. member for York-Simcoe last evening. The members of the Conservative party must have had a long conversation in caucus to make sure they knew how the hon. member would vote when the vote finally came around.

An hon. Member: Did you hear the part about manners?

Mr. Knight: Some Conservatives made disparaging speeches but they sent their noble statesman from Prince Edward Island to clear the air. So we accept his statement. However, I wish to make a few remarks related to the principle of the bill and to clause 1 and what it is all about.

I am one who was brought up in the environment of a working-class home where the mother always looked with anticipation to a family allowance cheque as her source of income to spend on the needs of the children. People in such circumstances can respond in the affirmative to an increase in family allowances and to the principle of universality which is maintained in this interim change in the family allowance and in the bill as it will be presented to take effect in January, 1974.

There are not just the financial implications—and I think in the debate we missed this point—of increasing the family allowance but in this country thousands of women have decided not to go into the work force but to stay at home and raise a family. Psychologically—I believe this is important—they look upon the family allowance as a source of income to them within the family structure for assistance in the upbringing of children. So at a time when we have seen a rise in the cost of living, not only do the mothers in urban areas of my constituency but the mothers on the family farm see an increase in the family allowance as a fundamental increase in the purchasing power of their families and an increase, in fact, of their responsibility in handling that extra money.

I fully support this increase. Other members have mentioned that they wish to see the complete increase to $20 which is to be presented in the new legislation; but I think that is something which, if it comes in January, will be better late than never. In our society approximately 3.5 million Canadian families will be affected by this increase to $12 a month in October, 1973. That, along with the tax concessions in terms of exemptions and so on of February—which I support—is a 12 per cent increase in purchasing power. That is not to be overlooked in terms of the importance of this bill.

I also want to point out that often, and justifiably so, we speak of the individuals in a family living below the poverty line. One in four Canadians is living below the poverty line, which has been described as $4,500 annually. There are 1,700,000 children involved in families living below the poverty line. However, let us speak in terms of the other families involved. Let us speak of the man, for example, who works for the highways department, is raising two or three young children and is earning $6,000 or $7,000 a year. We might also speak of the man who is running a grader for the municipality, is raising a family of two or three children and is earning $6,000 or $7,000 a year, or of a man who may be in organized labour but is working in a co-op store or in a Safeway's store and earning around $7,000 a year. This increase to $12 in non-taxable family allowance is of extreme benefit to these people in terms of the purchasing power of the family. It is related not merely to food but to clothing and other items. So it is fundamentally important that we support this legislation.

I want to state again that had not the Liberals and Conservatives supported the corporation tax cuts for corporations which are making profits the like of which we have never seen before, there could have been an additional $500 million to go to such items as family allowance. That would average in the neighbourhood of $140 a family. It would be a step along the road of a meaningful redistribution of income.

There is another factor I think ought to be considered in respect of redistribution of income. The hon. member for Edmonton-Strathcona, for whom I have considerable respect—I have had an opportunity to converse with him in terms of ideas and ideology concerning airplanes—when speaking last night said he feared we are moving along the road to a guaranteed annual income for Canadians. He said he feared it. I want to say that I welcome it, that I believe it is a fundamental move in the direction of a guaranteed annual income for Canadians which will bring about a basic redistribution of wealth.

While increasing the family allowance at this time and making the increase non-taxable, the minister should give some thought to the increase to $20 maximum which will become effective on January 1, which will be taxable. My point is this: many people have said—in some ways I agree with them—that by making family allowances taxable, greater equity will be achieved because families that do not need this money will pay it back in income tax. There is some justification for saying that. But I point out that if you have read any of the studies on taxation and on the manner in which it is applied in this country, you will find that equity will in fact not be achieved; that our tax structure, in terms of how it affects families, working people, farmers and small businessmen, has certain inequities built into it.

Therefore, certain people in the high-income brackets, given the proper exemptions and proper kind of tax breaks which they get in terms of corporation dividend tax credits, etc., can in fact collect the family allowance of $20 maximum and not pay it back in income tax, while wage earners at a certain level can collect the $20 and will have to pay back a certain amount in tax. If you follow that argument, then you come to the logical conclusion that if you make the family allowance taxable, you have to take into consideration the necessity for a vast revision of the Income Tax Act to make sure that it fits into an equitable and progressive tax system, which is not the case today. I plead with the minister to use his good offices in the cabinet not only to change family allowances in terms of increasing the benefit but also to change the tax system so that it becomes a more progressive system for people in the middle and lower income brackets. In that way it would meet their needs much more adequately.

Several weeks ago the party to which I belong met in caucus. We considered a number of programs that we felt were necessary to bring about in order to meet; in the best possible way, the rise in the cost of living. One of them was immediate implementation of the new family allowances bill. We now have before us an interim measure. I believe we should in the coming months bring forth legislation related to the new change in order to ensure that by January 1 Canadian families receive an increased family allowance in accordance with the criticisms of the NDP in the previous session of parliament, before the general election, when we called for a universal scheme.

In my area many people said they were pleased that we stuck to our guns and would vote against a plan that was selective. We feel that a selective plan would pitch one neighbour against another and would cause the kind of agony that takes place in a small community when one family asks why another is getting so much in family allowance when they are only getting this much, even though they do not know each other's circumstances. This causes bickering and bitterness, as has happened with the old age supplement. We accepted the principle of universality. It may be a fact that once this minority parliament is long gone and we go through another general election, the most fundamental piece of legislation in its significance to Canadians, in the realm of redistribution of income, will be the family allowance legislation, if we make sure that it is on the books in the new form which maintains the principle of universality. Furthermore, it may mean that minority governments will find it preferable in the future to do away with the stupid and erratic use of supplements to old age pensions and will apply them across the board similar to the principle we have established in the family allowances program.

Canadian families in the lower income brackets, if their income is $4,000 and there are four children in the family spend up to 32 per cent of their income on food. Families with incomes of $12,000 spend about 15 per cent of their disposable income on food. So this increase at this time can be of great benefit. As to other measures introduced by the government, although I would like to expand on them I believe they could justifiably be dealt with at another time.

I happened to agree last night with the remarks the minister made to the hon. member for York-Simcoe. The minister was frustrated by the fact that the subject of wheat was brought up in the debate as well as interest rates and other questions related to the cost of living. But I plead with him, in all sincerity, to approach the minister in charge of the Canadian Wheat Board and the Minister of Agriculture and to ask them to make a statement on motions in the House on exactly what kind of program they are putting into effect, where the benefit is to the consumer and where the benefit is to the producer. That matter should be clarified.

I hope the Minister of National Health and Welfare will ask his colleague, who I hope is listening to this debate, to rise in the House and explain those policies so that hon. members do not attempt, as did the hon. member for York-Simcoe and others, to drag into the debate other issues related to the cost of living. If he were to do that, his legislation would go through the House with far greater speed.

In summary, I should like to say that I support this interim measure and look forward to the long-term legislation, which I will also support, to help Canadian families in general and families in the Assiniboia constituency in particular.

The Deputy Chairman: The hon. member for Roberval. Is the hon. member for Hamilton West rising on a point of order?

Mr. Alexander: I rise on a point of order, Mr. Chairman. I do not wish to enter the debate and make a speech. The hon. member for Hillsborough presented the case of the opposition admirably and without equivocation, hesitation or reservation. All I want to do is ask the minister a question. Could he give me some assurance that the moneys that will be due—

The Deputy Chairman: Order, please. I thought the hon. member wished to ask a question of the hon. member for Assiniboia. If not, let me point out to him that I had recognized the hon. member for Roberval. I will come back to the hon. member for Hamilton West later.

● (1600)

[Translation]

Mr. Gauthier (Roberval): Mr. Chairman, without trying to delay the passage of this bill, I would like to make a few comments before we proceed to the consideration of every clause of the bill.

First, we are satisfied in part with this bill and I say right away that I support its passage. However, I regret that the minister did not introduce the measure he referred to in this House, namely that family allowances would be $20. However, we will be assured that our children, all children of Canada, until the age of sixteen, will finally have $12, considering the fact that we have been asking for years that allowances be geared to the cost of living. It is far from being so, but this is still better than nothing.

I congratulate the minister for having maintained the principle of universality as regards the new allowances that will be paid, as stated in the recommendation, after September 30, 1973, in the amount of $12 for every child of Canada, whatever his parents' means or wealth may be.

Mr. Chairman, we have always spoken in favour of universal laws. We are governed by a national government and we must always try to pass universal and not selective legislation. Selective legislation is always somewhat discriminatory for a given group of people.

We are considering here the child as a member of society and not of a group of people, for instance, who are poorer than others. It always bothers me when I hear about poverty. We must give more to Paul than to Harry because he is poorer; Harry is richer, Paul is less poor. Well, I suggest that this is not how we should distribute our country's income. When a child is entitled to family allowances, he is not entitled to it because he is poorer or richer than someone else but because he is a human being with a national right to a redistribution of national wealth.

It is from that point of view, Mr. Chairman, that I wish to support the minister, because he has upheld the universality concept which our party has always advocated. We are often asked: "What do you do about rich children in comparison with poor children?" Now, such is not the allowance issue nor the bill under consideration.

Indeed, we know perfectly well that the richer parents will compensate for the allowances paid to the poor. However, we consider that the allowances will be paid directly to the children, whatever the parents' means. And it will rest with the parents to do their duty by the state, but we do not have to bother about that, the state will see to it.

When we file income tax returns, the state does not forget it. If it must necessarily forget about the poor, it surely does not forget the more affluent and at this point, the head of the family should consider family allowances as a child's right. We are not necessarily giving charity to a child. When I hear about selectivity, it sounds like they were giving allowances because a child belongs to a very poor family. This is not a question of charity, but entitlement.

That is why allowances must remain universal. Thus, a lot is being saved at the administrative level because the allowances require only a distribution office and the production of a child's birth certificate.

On the other hand, if we had a selective allowances program, this would require an army of more than 4,000 inspectors to check on families in order to establish the age of the child and his parents resources, which would eat up perhaps one third of the money.

We are fed up with red tape. And at the present rate, particularly these past four or five years, there will soon be a whole army of bureaucrats. Why? Because certain selective laws require investigations and more investigations, as is the case for the Old Age Security Act and the former legislation on family allowances. And Quebec will soon propose $12 or $20 monthly allowances related to the degree of poverty or affluence of the parents. That is a game to which I object, and to which I will continue to object.

The minister has been firm today: he has introduced this bill containing only five clauses, but which has its merits. Allowances will at least have been increased to $12. The minister has decided to increase them later on to $20. Let him do it, but on the condition that they become universal. And when the matter of selectivity will be raised, let him object, for I repeat that the payment of family allowances is a right of the child and not an act of charity to the parents.

Once again I give the minister the assurance of our support every time that he will introduce legislation along those lines. And I wish with all my heart that in January the minister will submit another bill increasing allowances to $20 a month for all children. The minister has implied that this allowance will be subject to income tax. That is another matter, but all that we ask at first is that, whether it be of $20 or $25, as he determines, it retain its universal aspect, and I can assure the minister that on this point, he will get the support of 90 per cent of the population.

Once again, I congratulate the minister and assure him that we shall gladly support this bill.

[English]

Mr. Alexander: My only fear about this bill concerns the type of machinery which the minister and his department have in position. I ask the minister to assure hon. members and the people of Canada that the cheques containing the increase will go out on October 1. Can we have that assurance? Perhaps the minister has covered this matter already. However, I would point out, with respect to the income tax legislation, that I still receive letters from people asking why it is taking so long to process their returns. I hope the minister can be definite in his answer in order to give some hope to those who have been suffering as a result of the high cost of living.

Mr. Lalonde: First of all, Mr. Chairman, I would like to tell the hon. member for Hamilton West that I am quite happy that there seems to have been a change of heart in the official opposition between last night and this afternoon, and if the opposition—

[Mr. Gauthier (Roberval).]

Mr. Alexander: On a point of order, Mr. Chairman, I resent the minister returning to partisan tactics once again. The hon. member for Hillsborough put our position admirably. I asked the minister a simple question and he, after consulting his officials, surely can answer it. We do not need all this nonsense about changing position and that sort of thing. Just let him answer the question.

● (1610)

Mr. Lalonde: Mr. Chairman, anyone bothering to read the record will soon see who has indulged in partisanship in the last three days in this House. I can only answer the question in a hypothetical way because, as was shown clearly yesterday, I am in the hands of the official opposition with regard to the adoption of this bill. Yesterday they wanted to talk about it for a long time and today they are willing to proceed quickly with it. I am very pleased about that.

If the bill is passed in the next few days, I have no hesitation in saying that cheques will be issued in October and will include the amount that is proposed in the bill. Every month family allowance cheques are sent out so that they are received by families on or about the twentieth of the month. So on or about October 20, if parliament approves this bill, every family in Canada will receive for each child a cheque for $12.

[Translation]

Mr. La Salle: Mr. Chairman, I will be brief and I hope the minister can give us an opinion on what I asked yesterday. I urged the minister to give particular attention to the possibility of granting family allowances up to age 21. Since the minister was then in the House, I should not have to repeat the arguments I presented yesterday, concerning all the changes which have taken place in our education system and which, not only, make it possible for children to go to school much longer than 20 or 25 years ago, but also makes it necessary. On the other hand, education costs are much higher than they were and the obligation for children to stay in school all day and have their meal there constitutes, of course, an additional charge for the parents. I wonder, in the context of present day life, if it would not be wise for the government to consider very soon, the possibility of granting family allowances up to the age of 21. The minister could at least give some hope to the population by telling us that he will think about consulting the population about this measure, which I consider to be very reasonable. I would like also to suggest to the minister, unlike my colleague on the right, the hon. member for Roberval (Mr. Gauthier), who speaks of the universality of family allowances, that a national average be set up. I am very happy to see that the provinces will be able, to the extent where they shall have the right to do so, to give more to those who are in greater need.

I think this bill provides for a just distribution, and I hope that the minister can give some hope to the population concerning the establishment of a program of family allowances up to the age of 21.

Mr. Lalonde: Mr. Chairman, I am of course going to consider the view expressed by the hon. member for Joliette (Mr. La Salle) as I give serious consideration to every point he raises concerning the activities of my department and this subject will probably be brought up again for consideration during the study of the whole social policy we are presently conducting with the provinces.

As far as the mechanism that could be used to help students between 18 and 21 years of age is concerned, I am far from sure that the family allowance system is really the most appropriate one. As the hon. member knows, a good member of those students are able to work, for instance during the summer, and have sometimes quite a substantial income. Furthermore, at the academic level, there are a very large number of scholarships that of course vary according to the provinces and I think that eventually, a good number of provinces might extend their scholarship or loan system or even take steps toward free education even at the university level.

Then it seems to me that the principle of extending family allowances up to 21 years of age for a particular group should be considered in the light of all present social and educational assistance programs. I think that, in terms of priorities, the hon. member will admit that the first step was surely the one we submitted in the bill tabled in July. There are presently, as the hon. member also knows, many demands on public funds in the whole field of welfare which is really inadequate in many parts of the country.

Then, this shall be considered in terms of general priorities and demands made on available funds in the social security sector, not only at the federal but also at the provincial level.

That is, therefore, a question which I really cannot answer now but it will surely be studied in the course of my discussions with my provincial colleagues.

[English]

Mr. Nowlan: Mr. Chairman, may I ask the minister a question? I have not participated in this debate and do not intend to participate now to any great length. I certainly do not intend to be seduced by any provocative remarks in a political vein made by the minister. I listened to the hon. member for Assiniboia trying to bring in by the back door what he accuses the opposition of bringing in by the front door. However, I will not allude to those items in this debate.

For the purposes of the record, in case there is any suggestion of filibuster, I hope it will be noted that this debate began on Friday and continued yesterday, that Her Majesty's Loyal Opposition put up six speakers, and the NDP, in what might be described as an attempt almost to filibuster the principle of this bill, the principle of their pet proposal, put up four speakers.

Mr. Bell: And the minister talked it out last night.

Mr. Nowlan: The minister, in a most unusual display of anxiety, practically exposed himself to the attentions of a medical doctor, to judge from the line he was developing last night. However, being objective, I wish to ask the minister a question. He or his officials may not be able to furnish the answer today. Perhaps the answer could be delivered by letter or given when we discuss another bill, because the present bill is an interim measure so to speak.

When we discussed the FISP legislation I asked a question which is related to the comments of the hon. member for Assiniboia when he spoke about redistribution of income. I want to know how income will be redistributed in this country by the granting of the $20 later, and the $12 at present, in family allowances. What will be the impact of any redistribution on the various regions and provinces?

In this country we have espoused regional economic policies, other economic policies and policies under which the central authority pumps money into many areas of Canada. For several reasons I want to know what will be the dollar impact of family allowances and youth allowances on the various regions and provinces. I do not think that information is in the orange book. If the minister can tell me now, I will be grateful; if not, perhaps he can tell me later.

Mr. Lalonde: Mr. Chairman, I thank the hon. member for the very generous and non-partisan remarks which he made at the beginning of his comments. I refer him to the very useful document that was tabled in the House on April 18, entitled "Working Paper on Social Security in Canada". I refer him to table 10, page 55, which sets out for every province the amounts being paid by way of family and youth allowances, and OAS and GIS.

Since the $12 now proposed involves a simple addition to the existing legislation, if we assume that the average family allowance in Canada is worth about $7.21, it will be very easy for the hon. member to add the percentages that appear on page 55 of the working document to this figure and arrive at the approximate figure that is to be distributed in the various regions as a result of the increase.

● (1620)

With regard to the second aspect of the problem raised by the hon. member, I beg him to wait until we consider the bill providing for an increase to $20. In that particular case we will obviously have to take into account the average income tax rate being paid in each province and region. This will obviously vary with the level of income in regions and provinces, so that there will in effect be a greater regional redistributive effect under the taxable proposals than there would be under this particular scheme. Indeed, the lower being the average income, the higher would be the net amount left for the family.

Mr. Nowlan: I thank the minister. I appreciate that the FISP proposal certainly had much more latitude as to how that proposal would apply in dollars and cents. I will not go any further today but will wait with interest for the main bill. Either in committee of the whole, or in the standing committee if the bill is referred to the health and welfare committee, it would be very interesting if the minister would develop that aspect of the matter.

Mr. Lalonde: I will do that with great pleasure. The argument about redistribution that was made in the House by several speakers during second reading deserves further discussion and clarification. In terms of redistribu-tion of income in Canada, this particular increase will have no great impact. It will obviously give more to the people who need it. It will probably be more helpful to families with low incomes than families with high incomes. In terms of redistribution it is pretty neutral. The new proposal of $20 a month will obviously be more redistributed than under the present system, but it will not be as redistributive as the FISP proposal.

I would not like to be the one to deprecate the bill I have brought before this House. I know there are very good administrative reasons, and some political reasons, why we should proceed in the way outlined in the bill introduced last July. At the same time, we cannot have our cake and eat it too, claiming that because it is universal and taxable it is the greatest redistributive move that can be made. FISP was even more redistributive, but it had other drawbacks. The whole question of universality and selectivity deserves further consideration at a later stage. I will be pleased to discuss this with hon. members.

[Translation]

Mr. Béchard: Mr. Chairman, I have a question for the minister.

Like all hon. members, the minister knows that, unfortunately, every time the federal government increases some allowance or other, the provincial governments—at least some of them—hurry to reduce immediately by as much the social allowances paid to certain families.

For instance, the unemployed or the sick receive social assistance in the province of Quebec. Can the minister tell us whether or not he has the assurance from all his provincial counterparts that the increase we intend to grant Canadian families will not be denied them elsewhere?

Mr. Lalonde: Mr. Chairman, obviously I can give no assurance of this for the time being. However, I intend writing to all my colleagues, emphasizing the decision of parliament if this bill is passed and asking them to see that these amounts are effectively handed out to the Canadian population, and in particular to those who receive social welfare payments. Then, with the support of all hon. members, I think that I will insist that the provinces do not take this increase as an excuse for reducing certain allowances made to social welfare recipients.

[English]

Mr. Stevens: Mr. Chairman, I wish to direct one or two questions to the minister. When I asked the minister yesterday when the government intended to introduce some substantive legislation into the House, he replied that I should go to hell. Was he speaking personally, or on behalf of the government?

Mr. Lalonde: Mr. Chairman, I resent very much that type of statement by the hon. member.

Mr. Béchard: That is typical of him.

Mr. Lalonde: The hon. member knows very well that the exchange that took place behind the curtains was done in a joking way. When the exchange was made there was no animosity between him and myself. Every once in a while this type of exchange happens with my friends on this side of the House when we talk together. There was certainly no intention on my part to in any way offend the hon. member. The attempt of the hon. member to put this on the record speaks for his ethics.

Mr. Stevens: Can the minister indicate how the government arrived at the $12 figure? What was the rationale behind that?

Mr. Lalonde: Mr. Chairman, having listened to the hon. member's competent analysis yesterday. I can only say that it compares with his ability as a banker of previous days. Therefore, I do not think he will have any difficulty determining how we arrived at the $12 figure.

Mr. Stevens: Mr. Chairman, I will restate my question. I indicated that I cannot find the rationale, using deflators and that type of thing, to determine how they arrived at the $12 figure. I ask the minister to give us the benefit of his reasoning as to why they thought $12 was a suitable figure.

Mr. Lalonde: Mr. Chairman, I refer the hon. member to the bill tabled in this House in July. It provides for a national minimum of $12, below which no province will be allowed to go in the establishment of provincial variations. It is in reference to this national minimum that this amount was determined.

Mr. Stevens: Mr. Chairman, I have another point. What assurance can the minister give us that in fact increased cheques will be going out for October, November and December?

Mr. Lalonde: If the hon. member had been in the chamber when I replied to the question asked by the hon. member for Hamilton West, he would have heard the answer to this question.

[Translation]

Mr. Allard: Mr. Chairman, I am very pleased with this opportunity to speak on Bill C-223.

Of course, we of the Social Credit are aware that giving $4 or $12 at the beginning of October is a step in the right direction, but we contend that it is not enough, that much more could be done.

It is strange that whenever it comes to alleviating the misfortune of the haves-not and of the heads of large families, the government seems to have much trouble finding the necessary money so those people will be reasonably well off.

If I may, Mr. Chairman, I could perhaps tell the hon. Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Lalonde) where he could find the necessary dollars to provide for more substantial allowances.

For instance, in 1944, when the gross national product was $12 billion, we were paying $20 a month to older people and $6 a month per child; and in 1973, the gross national product being $114 billion, we are willing to pay older people $179.65 a month, of which I am delighted, although I would have liked that amount to reach $200, while monthly family allowances are still at $6.

I said a while ago that the gross national product was $12 billion in 1944 and $114 billion in 1973, which represents an increase of 950 per cent. In the meantime, consumption which amounted to $10.8 billion in 1944 increased to $66 billion in 1973, which means an increase of 612 per cent. Capitalization, which stood at $1.2 billion in 1944, went up to $48 billion in 1973, an increase of 4,000 per cent.

As one can see, Mr. Chairman, within 30 years, we produce much more but we consume less and less in order to capitalize much more, mainly for the benefit of private, public, national, international or multinational corporations.

Now, if less is consumed, we must see who suffers from this lower consumption and remedy the situation by taking money from such areas as are over-capitalized without however keeping investments from contributing to the progress of the nation.

To think that the Minister of National Health and Welfare claims that he knows no magic wand nor philosopher's stone! He is smarter with words than with figures, statistics, ratios, percentages, which allows him to say he does not know where to get the money, that is, in the hidden hoards of companies.

During 30 years, Mr. Chairman, family allowances were administered with 1944 money, the so-called constant dollar. Now this means that today a mother who wishes to buy a quart of milk at 35 cents must pay with 1944 money.

During that time, old age pensions were administered with current dollars, that is the dollar adjusted to the cost of living, increasing them to $20 a month in 1944, $40 in 1960, $75, $90 $100, $170 later on and to $179 in 1973.

It is presumed that the same thing could have been done for family allowances, but it has been deemed necessary to do otherwise for unexplainable reasons.

Today, with 30 years of delay and on the basis of our experience, let us merely correct the situation, paying with 1973 dollars the family allowances which have remained at the level of 1944 constant dollars.

To be logical, consistent and realistic, I presume that we should pay at least between $25 and $30 per child and, as my hon. colleague from Joliette (Mr. La Salle) suggested a moment ago, at least $90 a month in salary to every student and this, until the end of his education.

This is where the hon. minister could obtain the resources he claims he is lacking. Therefore, if we want to be consistent, we must not spend so much time in discussions. The magic wand and the philosopher's stone are readily available to ensure a fair and honest maintenance to the many large families which are truly living in distress and fear of the next day.

[English]

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Chairman, when we were in committee of the whole on Bill C-219 dealing with amendments to the Old Age Security Act, I spoke critically about the complicated drafting in that bill. I should like a moment or two in which to do the opposite today and to say how pleasant it is to find before us a bill which is very simple. In fact, it is so simple that anyone in the House can understand it. It is only one and a half pages long, it contains only five clauses and it amends two separate acts of parliament.

I cannot suggest that it was my criticism of the other bill which brought about this change because, after all, this bill was already before us. But it does give me an opportunity to say it is not new for a piece of social legislation to be drafted in simple terms. This was particularly true of the original Family Allowances Act. I remember it well. Nevertheless, I went into the library to get a copy, and here it is, only five pages, as we passed it in 1944, and under it millions of Canadian children have enjoyed the benefit of family allowances during the past three decades.

I found myself in a nostalgic mood when my hon. friend from Assiniboia was speaking and referring to his childhood memories. He recalled the family allowance cheque which came in month by month, which enabled his mother to keep things going for him and for the other children in the family. I realized as he spoke that I was here voting for the Family Allowances Act before he was born. As a matter of fact, I would be interested in knowing how many of those who are in this chamber today—any member under 30 and a good many of those between 30 and 40—are healthy, strong, Canadians because we passed the Family Allowances Act in that parliament back in 1944. Not only was it a simple piece of drafting, it was also a very effective piece of legislation, as so many members can testify.

Another interesting fact is that when the original bill was passed in 1944, the top amount payable as a family allowance was $8. That top level has remained unchanged ever since the bill was passed in 1944. So really we are raising the amount for the first time since the act was put on the statute books. It is to be $12 commencing in October, and in a few months we shall be raising it to $20 a month.

I do not wish to spin out the debate because I think it would be a good idea to get the bill through the final stages this afternoon so that it can be put into operation this coming month. It is precisely because of its simplicity that the hon. member for Hamilton West was able to get such a specific answer from the Minister of National Health and Welfare. When complicated calculations have to be made, there can be delays. But when all you do is change a figure in the printing machine which produces the cheques from 8 to 12, things can be done very quickly. So the minister was able to give a positive assurance that if this bill is finally passed by parliament within the next few days, there is no question the October cheques will be based on the higher amount.

I am not saying these things lightly, but because they underline the value of the principle of universality. I listened to what the minister had to say a few moments ago about universality versus selectivity, and also about the distributive effect of these payments. We can go into that on a later occasion. I still want to underline my belief that the best social policies are those which treat people as people, which do not go into the area of charity or selectivity, but which are based on the principle of universality. It was a good bill we passed in 1944 and this is a good amendment which the minister is making today, though it is only good, of course, in the sense that it is an interim measure pending the introduction of the new $20 level which is to be effective in January.

I come now to the main reason for my rising, which is to remind the minister that a friend of his, and of mine, I am happy to say, a former top civil servant, has written to him, as he has written to me, suggesting certain things which might be considered. I rise to ask the minister to give thought to them. I know that the ideas that were put in the letter to which I referred cannot be put in the bill today, and I also know that Bill C-211 has already been drafted. But this former top civil servant, who has some expertise in this area, suggests that what we have here is a Family Allowances Act. It is not a children's allowances act, though sometimes popular terms that come close to that are used.

● (1640)

The expert about whom I am talking suggests that if the purpose of this legislation is to protect the integrity of the family and to make the family a viable economic unit, and so on, in addition to whatever is provided for the children there should be an allowance for the mother. It is also suggested that if we are concerned about the integrity and security of the family, the same kind of legislation should include a housing allowance. I support both of these ideas.

I am in the mood today of enjoying the progress we have made, but I am looking forward to the future. I underline these ideas which, as I say, have already been placed before the minister by an expert in this field, in the hope that he will consider them. We got over that monstrosity of FISP. The minister has introduced some new ideas into the concepts of social security that we are hearing from that side of the House. Maybe those ideas come out in this kind of parliament much better than they do when one party has a majority, but at any rate the minister has come out with some new ideas.

I should like him to go back and read the submission sent to him to which I have already referred, and ask the officials of his department and his colleagues in the cabinet to consider whether a way to redistribute income and establish the security and integrity of the family would not be to have family allowances include not only an amount for each child but an allowance for the mother and for housing as well. To me, these ideas make sense.

I conclude by saying what I have often said, that this is a good piece of legislation. Although we support it, it is not the last word and we hope the minister will give serious attention to ways of improving this good piece of legislation.

Mr. Lalonde: Mr. Chairman, may I thank the hon. member for his kind remarks in regard to the drafting of this particular piece of legislation. I am sure the person who drafted it will be very pleased to hear what has been said, all the more so since the same person drafted the previous bill. This may indicate that the problem that the previous bill had to deal with was more complex than met the eye at that particular time.

As to the other point raised by the hon. member, we are indeed examining the points that he has raised and which have been raised by correspondence. I should only like to refer the hon. member to proposition six of the working document, where we state the following:
