POND LILIES. BY WARGARET R. SANGSTER. In early morning, when the air Is ful of tender prophecy, And rose-hue faint and pearl-mist fair Are hints of splendor yet to be. The lilies open. Gleaming white, Their fluted cups like onyx shine, And golden-hearted in the light, They hold the summer's rarest wine.

Ah, love, what mornings thou and I Once idly drifted through, affoat Among the lilies, with the sky Cloud-curtained o'er our tiny boat! Noon climbed apace with ardent feet; The goblets shut whose honey-dew Was overbrimmed wt hsubtle sweet While yet the silver dawn was new.

The pomp of royal crowning lay On daisie t field and dimpling dell, And on the blue hills far away In dazzling waves the glory fell. And flashing to our measured stroke, The waters seemed a path of gems, Beneath whose clear refraction broke A grove with mirrored fronds and stems. In music on the sparkling shore The plashing ripples fell asleep; We laid aside the dripping oar, For one delight we could not keep.

In all the splendor farther on We missed the morning's maiden blush; The soft expectancy was gone. The brooding haze, the trembling flush. -Harper's Magazine for October. NOTES AND NEWS.
