Each Human Heart.

There is within each human heart A sympathetic spring, And when touch'd by skilful hands Twill sweet vibrations ring.

Twill cause a tear to dim the eye And trickle down the cheek : Disarm the brave of every nerve. And make the strong man weep.

A trifle oftimes will suffice This tender chord to touch, And then 'twill thrill our very soul, Its latent powers is such.

Some recollection of the past. Of childhood's early hour. When life was in its primal moin, And youth a budding flower.

A mother's last and dying words, As when she bade adieu, And told us all to meet her, far Beyond yon azure blue.

Yes, deep within our hearts it dwells-'lie holy good and pure; And harden'd though our hearts may seen It lives, and will endure.

The dust of years may cover it And hide it from the view, But when we least suspect its power, Mis gushing will burst through
