Mr. GORDON GRAYDON (Leader of the Opposition): I desire to ask a question of the Minister of Justice, and in doing so I intend no reflection against the provincial police of Quebec or the municipal police of Montreal. I should like to know whether the government has taken any steps through the Royal Canadian Mounted Police, or any other agency, to ensure that there will be no recurrences of the fighting which has taken place in the Montreal area between gangs of so-called "zoot-suiters" and members of the armed forces. I ask this question because of what seems to be a quickening concern on the part of people generally as to what is going on in that district.

Hon. L. S. ST. LAURENT (Minister of Justice): I do not know that I can give a direct answer to the question as put by the leader of the opposition, because I would not want to suggest that the Royal Canadian Mounted Police were concerning themselves with matters which are primarily a provincial or municipal responsibility. But, noting the newspaper reports of what had been going on, the commissioner and I had the assistant commissioner proceed to Montreal, where he spent two days making a careful investigation into these instances that had been reported in the press. He returned last evening and I had a verbal report from him this morning. He is going to give me a more detailed written report, but in the meantime the provisional report with which I have been supplied states that there had been, over a period of several weeks, scattered and disconnected incidents in Westmount, Verdun, Longueuil and St. Lambert, and more recently there have been in the city of Montreal two or three street fights either between civilians or between civilians and members of the armed forces. The information obtained by Assistant Commissioner Mead was that these incidents were characterized in the newspaper reports as rather more serious than they were in fact, though it is regrettable that anything of the sort should occur.

In the provisional report it is stated that at present it is not considered that these fights are due to any racial animosities or that they have any political significance, and that view is shared by the director of the municipal police of Montreal. The situation, of course, is one that could be exploited by trouble-seeking persons, and if it were to continue it might become quite disturbing. It is suggested that one remedy which might be successful to a large extent would be in giving less exaggerated publicity to these isolated incidents, because it is noted now that people are commencing to congregate on St. Catherine street in the vicinity of St. Lawrence boulevard waiting to see if something is not going to occur, and the presence of crowds congregating there increases the occasion for unfortunate conflicts.

All I can add is that the provincial and municipal police, as well as the Royal Canadian Mounted Police, are carefully inquiring into the possible origin of these quarrels and are also conferring with the provost corps, and that everyone is trying to avoid any occasion for incidents which up to the present time do not appear to have any other sinister significance than simply spasmodic outbreaks between persons who are quick to take offence. The first clash between service personnel and civilians arose out of an incident when a sailor was perhaps successful in taking a young lady away from a civilian. That was resented and a fight ensued, which led to reprisals, and that appears to have been the start of clashes of this kind between civilians and uniformed personnel. I hope the efforts that are being made will be sufficiently effective to prevent any recurrence of these incidents.

Mr. POULIOT: Would the leader of the opposition be kind enough to give a clear definition of a "zoot-suiter"?

Mr. GRAYDON: I am sure it is not necessary for me to assist the hon. member for Temiscouata, who on so many occasions has demonstrated in this house a very excellent understanding of the English language.

LABOUR CONDITIONS

INQUIRY AS TO PROPOSED CHANGES IN MAN-POWER POLICY

On the orders of the day:

Mr. GORDON GRAYDON (Leader of the Opposition): I understand the Minister of Labour has made plans to announce, some time during to-day or this evening, over a Canadian radio network, some important and far-reaching changes in government policy with respect to man-power. I would ask the minister if he would consider announcing these details as to any change in government policy where I suggest they should be made known first, that is, in the House of Commons; and, if he is not prepared to do that, I think he ought to give some reason why this extraordinary course is being taken.

Hon. HUMPHREY MITCHELL (Minister of Labour): I had intended to make a brief statement, Mr. Speaker. It is quite true that I intend to make a short address over the radio this evening, as my hon. friend has done many times, but in the course of that address there will not be an announcement of any major departure in policy. Under existing orders we have all the powers necessary.

The plan is three-fold. First, some 500,000 men who have been rejected for service in the armed forces will be interviewed individually, with a view to moving them, where necessary, to more essential employment. I might add that in order to speed up this plan arrangements have been made for selective service and employment offices throughout Canada to stay open when necessary during the evenings. Second, the compulsory transfer regulations now in effect are to be extended to cover a greater number of occupations and will be applied more vigorously. Third, the industrial mobilization survey plan will be extended to cover all industries, regardless of priority. The employment of all men aged sixteen to forty inclusive, in all industrial and commercial establishments, will be subject to survey. These surveys will be made as rapidly as possible. Their primary purpose is: to determine cases where men on postponement can be called for military training without interference with essential production; to arrange transfer to more essential jobs of men who are medically unfit or not callable for military service for any reason; to discover cases where an employer, in any priority, has a temporary or permanent surplus of men in the age groups mentioned who may be moved to essential work. In view of its peculiar labour difficulties the agricultural industry will not be included in the survey. I might add that a survey of this nature is being applied to the civil service in Ottawa.

I would stress the point that in regard to men in the age groups mentioned, whether callable for military training or not, or whether married or single, all cases will be examined most carefully. Essential and non-essential industries all will be covered. Every effort will be made to treat fairly the employers and employees involved, but the paramount importance of war production will be the deciding factor.

To explain further: the officers of the industrial mobilization survey division of selective service will investigate plants, and will report to one of twelve industrial mobilization survey committees across Canada.

Workers transferred have the right to reinstatement in former jobs, after the emergency passes. Under certain conditions, special allowances will be paid to those moved to other jobs where hardship would be involved.

Employers and employees may appeal decisions of these committees to courts of referees, which are widely distributed throughout the country and which include representatives of labour and employers.

May I add this: as we did last year, we have reached that period when labour shortages are most marked, when we are moving from one season to a busier season, a condition which is traditional in Canada. I thought I would use this opportunity in an effort to speed up recruitment, particularly of women workers in Canada, to take the place of men in various industrial and commercial undertakings across the dominion.

Mr. GRAYDON: I take it that what the minister has given us to-day is substantially what he intends to give the nation on the broadcast?

Mr. MITCHELL: Yes, absolutely.

Mr. GRAYDON: I heartily agree with him that in the original instance these arrangements involving substantial changes in regulations and setting out government policy should be made in the House of Commons. We are at one in that thought. Not long ago I heard one minister in the cabinet make a statement which I thought was quite in order, and that was that while he did not want the House of Commons to become simply a bulletin board, in respect of everything to be announced, at the same time there is a considerable distinction between major changes in regulations and major changes in government policy. I am glad the government is accepting the responsibility on this occasion.

Mr. GILLIS: In making this survey will the different labour organizations across Canada be utilized?

Mr. MITCHELL: This policy was first decided upon after consultation with the national selective service advisory board, which is composed of labour organizations, farmer organizations, employer organizations, and ranking civil servants in the various departments of government most concerned. Then, as to appeal: of course the boards of referees are made up of representatives of employers and employees. I think I can assure the house that in particular industries there will be consultation with the labour organizations most directly affected. In the past they have proved very helpful.

LAY-OFF AT AIRCRAFT REPAIR LIMITED, EDMONTON —QUESTION OF REEMPLOYMENT

On the orders of the day:

Hon. HUMPHREY MITCHELL (Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, I should like to answer a question asked on Monday last by the hon. member for Battle River (Mr. Fair), concerning the placement of employees laid off from Aircraft Repair Limited, Edmonton. At that time I was not able to give full information concerning the disposition of these employees. I have now received a report from selective service officials in Edmonton, giving the information for which the hon. member asked.

Between January last and May 23, 1944, there was a series of lay-offs at Aircraft Repair Limited, Edmonton, affecting 624 male employees and 523 females, making a total of 1,147. I find that 31 men and 42 women were placed with Canada Car and Foundry Limited at Fort William; 150 men and 330 women were placed in high priority industry in the Edmonton area, and 220 men joined the armed forces. Of those who were not immediately placed in employment the men were farmers who were returned to their farms, and the women returned to homes away from Edmonton and would be placed in employment through their local offices. Edmonton office reports a total of 3,785 unfilled jobs, so that it is evident that there is no shortage of work in that area.

FISH

OUTLET FOR PRODUCTION OF EASTERN CANNERS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. GORDON B. ISNOR (Halifax): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the Minister of Fisheries whether, in view of the need for food in Europe and elsewhere some assurance can be given to the canners of fish in eastern Canada that they will have a guaranted outlet for their production.

Hon. ERNEST BERTRAND (Minister of Fisheries): Mr. Speaker, there is no doubt in my mind that canned flaked fish, mackerel, herring and sardines will be needed in large amounts during the coming year. My department has been pressing for a conclusion of definite arrangements whereby all such canned fish as are able to pass inspection can be procured for this purpose, and I hope that these definite arrangements will be concluded within the next few days.

WAR APPROPRIATION BILL

PROVISION FOR GRANTING TO HIS MAJESTY AID FOR NATIONAL DEFENCE AND SECURITY

Hon. J. L. ILSLEY (Minister of Finance) moved the second reading of bill No. 132, for granting to His Majesty aid for national defence and security.

Mr. STIRLING: Mr. Speaker, may I draw the government's attention to the fact that this order was not forecast on Tuesday evening? Certain other business was forecast at that time, but we did not anticipate that it had been arranged to go on with this first.

Mr. CRERAR: May I say that it should have been mentioned on Tuesday evening. However I understand that the leader of the opposition (Mr. Graydon) and the leader of the C.C.F., at any rate, had expressed a willingness to proceed with this order this afternoon.

Mr. STIRLING: The leader of the opposition was not in the house.

Mr. CRERAR: That is true. The information was conveyed to me that the leader of the opposition had expressed his agreement to proceeding with this order. Perhaps it was my oversight that it was not mentioned Tuesday evening. However the matter has been discussed at great length. I do not know whether hon. members wish to resume discussion.

Mr. GRAYDON: Since my name has been mentioned in connection with arranging the agenda, perhaps I should say that prior to my leaving the house early on Tuesday evening I spoke to the Minister of Finance and indicated my desire not to delay the second reading of the bill. The hon. member for Yale (Mr. Stirling) and other hon. members, however, understood on Tuesday evening that the second reading would not be proceeded with, because it was not mentioned at that time. Our arrangements have been made without taking that into consideration, because I thought the government then had decided not to go on with second reading. We left it at that.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Is there any objection to going on now, or does the hon. member wish to wait until eight o'clock?

Mr. GRAYDON: Perhaps in view of the misunderstanding, and the fact that the government did not mention this order of business on Tuesday evening, it should stand until to-morrow. I know some of the members were anxious to follow the government's proposal in this respect. I am sorry I happened to mention it to the Minister of Finance. It did not occur to me that what I had said would alter the situation.

Mr. KNOWLES: May I offer a suggestion? While it is incorrect for the Minister of Mines and Resources to refer to me as leader of the C.C.F.—I am only the whip—it is true that I suggested to him after eleven o'clock the other night that I thought it proper to go on with the second reading to-day. I cannot of course speak for members of the official opposition. The suggestion I would make now, if they are not ready, is that this item be called at eight o'clock.

Mr. ILSLEY: It is whatever the house wants to do, but I suggested the other night that we put it through then, and the hon. member for Yale said, "Oh, perhaps it had better go over." I thought there was a general agreement that it would be taken up at the earliest possible moment. If it was inadvertently left off the government list, it was because of the general understanding, and I am content to take it up under the present order.

Mr. GORDON GRAYDON (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I have consulted with some of my colleagues and I think perhaps we have no special reason for delaying the bill. Perhaps we had better consent to the second reading. But I want to make just one observation before that is done.

Last session there was some criticism made of members of the house with respect to the debate on the second reading of a similar bill. This criticism by the press and the public largely centred around the fact that a huge sum of money had been passed by parliament on the second reading of a bill with little or no debate. I want to indicate to-day the importance of the country understanding that we have already spent some forty-seven days or parts of days debating these war appropriations. I think it may properly be said that diligent care and attention has been paid by the members of the House of Commons to the various items.

I think the time consumed in this debate is exactly the same time as was consumed in a similar debate last year. That debate occurred at a different stage of the house sittings, because last year the budget preceded the war appropriation resolution. But suffice it to say that approximately the same length of time was consumed. I should like to point out also that when we speak of time being consumed I think that only the minimum should be consumed in a war period. I remember well in the first session that I was in the house, in 1936, there was a substantially heavy agenda of legislation, but we dealt with only one-eleventh of the appropriation now being voted by this parliament. However, in doing that we took up almost six months of our legislative time. So that one can understand, I think, the delays which sometimes come with such heavy war expenditures, eleven times what they were in a preceding period.

I rose only for the purpose of establishing our position with respect to the question of the speedy passing of the bill. There was an arrangement in the house agreed to by all parties and groups, under which, instead of the discussion taking place on the second reading or in committee on the bill, it would take place at the resolution stage. Having said this, I have no objection to the motion. I fancy the government is anxious to get the bill into shape so that it may go to another chamber as soon as possible.

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I should like to make the government's position clear along lines similar to those expressed by the leader of the opposition. It was definitely understood I think before we agreed to consider the resolution that the main debate would take place on the resolution and not on the bill. For that reason there has been wide latitude given to the discussion on the resolution which otherwise would not have been given.

I should like to take advantage of this occasion to say that I think the proper procedure in regard to all bills which are money bills should be to have a short discussion on the resolution with a full discussion on the bill. That is what was intended by the rules of the house, but this house has got into the habit recently, I think quite wrongly, of discussing resolutions at great length and then at times repeating the whole or much of the discussion on the bill itself. The resolution preceding a money bill is in the nature of a notice to the house that an important bill is coming down. It was never intended that a debate in any detail should take place on the resolution. This particular bill has been discussed on the resolution perhaps even longer than it would have been discussed on the second reading.

Mr. S. H. KNOWLES (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, before the second reading is given to this bill, and apropos of the remarks of the Prime Minister just now, I should like to say a word about some of the items which I referred to the other night just before the chairman of the committee of the whole asked that the committee rise and report the resolution. I suggested that there were three or four items which had not been called and the chairman felt that I was mistaken. The items to which I referred appear on page 400 of Hansard and he stated that they were called when we were discussing items under the Department of Transport. Since then I have made a further search through Hansard and I feel sure that I was right when I pointed out that there were a number of items which were not called. These items are:

Government employees compensation act—
Administration, $79,500.
Provision for contingencies, $3,732,364.
Purchase of railway equipment, $24,726,460.
Canadian Wool Board Limited, $5,500,000.

REVISED EDITION

Those items total $34,038,324. I understand quite well that when the committee reported the resolution we reported favourably on the total amount of money involved, namely, $3,650,000,000. Technically speaking, that means that the committee of the whole gave its concurrence to all that money and thereby to all the items involved. But as hon. members will recall, during the debate in the committee stage there were a number of occasions when hon. members wished to discuss matters not directly relevant to the item before the committee. A member would point out that we were really discussing the resolution which granted this total amount of money, but each time the reply was made that for the sake of convenience the total amount had been broken down into items and that it was more appropriate to stick to the various items. The house agreed to that procedure, but I think every hon. member will agree that involved in such a procedure was the responsibility to call every item.

I do not suggest that there was anything intentional about the failure to call these items. As a matter of fact I have no particular desire to discuss the items to which I have referred. But I think we should be very careful in following a procedure of this kind to see that every item is called. Despite the fact that we are accustomed to voting huge sums of money in this house I do not think we should treat lightly a sum of money which, if my observations are correct, totals more than $34,000,000.

Unless someone can show me in Hansard where these items have been discussed I should like to make two suggestions. The first is that when we are in committee on this bill hon. members should have the opportunity on an appropriate section to ask questions about any of the items that were not called and that the appropriate minister be prepared to answer. The other suggestion I would like to make is in keeping with what the Prime Minister said just now. I would hope that in another year, whatever government may be in power, the procedure for handling this bill will be studied before we come to it. I would hope that we might have a proper schedule, with the items properly numbered, so that what seems to have happened this time need not occur again.

This is no new suggestion; it has been made frequently during the course of this debate; but what has happened underlines, I suggest, the necessity of studying the whole question of procedure in a bill of this magnitude when we deal with it as we have, at the committee stage. This sum of money is very large. We realize that there are other things at this time which are more important than matters of technical procedure, yet I think hon. members will agree with me that when we are voting sums of money we should do it correctly all the way through, and in accordance with parliamentary practice.

Someone may suggest, as I believe an hon. member to my right said a moment ago, that we had discussed the Canadian wool board. I would remind him that we discussed under the Department of Finance an item of $500,000 for the administration of the Canadian wool board; that item is to be found on page 395 of Hansard; but I am referring to an item of $5½ millions which is found on page 400.

Another reply which might be made is that these items may have been called but since there was no discussion they would not appear in Hansard. In reply to that I would point out that, at least on pages 3578 and 3579 of Hansard, items were called, there was no discussion, and the items were immediately agreed to, but that agreement is recorded in Hansard. I suggest that if that is the case with some items, items which do not appear in Hansard at all were not called.

I make my two suggestions in this matter; first, that if any hon. members wish to ask questions about items which were not called, they be permitted to do so when the house is in committee on this bill; second, that close study be given to this whole procedure before another year rolls around. I offer in particular the suggestion that an attempt be made to draw up a proper schedule with the items properly numbered, as is done with respect to the civil estimates, so that we may know where we stand throughout the debate.

Before I take my seat I would like to take two or three minutes on another subject, although I shall not go into it at any length. Before this bill passes I appeal to the government in connection with a matter which comes under war appropriation and which was discussed at some length while we were in the committee stage. Perhaps the simplest thing for me to do is to ask the government, particularly the ministers concerned, to study an editorial found in the Winnipeg Free Press on Monday of this week, June 5, dealing with the whole question of the desirability of greater coordination of our medical services. The Free Press is perhaps the most pro-Liberal paper in the country, yet its criticism of the government on this score is so marked that if I attempted to read this editorial in the house I am sure I would be ruled out of order; therefore I shall not attempt it. But the point the Free Press makes, and has made, in fact, through the years, and the point which some of us have tried to make in this house, is that what is important in the matter of providing the best possible medical service to our armed forces and to our civilians is not only the total number of beds, but the coordinating of the various medical services, with particular reference to specialist services. Not long ago the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Ralston) laid on the table an interesting and extensive report on this whole subject. The gist of it, as I gathered, was that an attempt should be made to arrive at a better coordination of our medical services; and the Free Press—which I am not very often able to quote in support of a position I may take—suggests that in view of what is now happening overseas, in view of the necessity of our being ready to provide, not just for a short term but perhaps through the years, the best medical and hospital treatment and care for the members of our armed services, now is the time to study again more seriously this whole question. I will not take longer on it, because it has been presented to the government before; it was presented a few days ago by the hon. member for Pardale (Mr. Bruce) when he asked certain questions as a result of statements made by the director of the Montreal Neurological Institute. I may say that I was not satisfied with the reply which the Minister of Pensions and National Health (Mr. Mackenzie) made on that occasion. I urge that one of the things we must do for the men now engaged in action is to make sure they have the best medical care and the best provision for hospitalization, and I hope that the government will give further consideration to this matter. We feel, notwithstanding arguments which have been put forth such as the upsetting of procedure which has been followed and the danger of establishing new precedents, that this thing has not been properly handled. I make this appeal at this stage of the war appropriation bill, raising only this point on second reading, that the government give further consideration to the recommendations in the report of the medical procurement and assignment board, and that it move in the direction of better coordination of our medical and hospital services.

Hon. J. E. MICHAUD (Minister of Transport): The hon. member is certainly labouring under a misapprehension if he thinks that some of the items to which he has referred were not called and approved in committee of the whole. On most of these items I happened to have been in charge, as they were expenditures under the Department of Transport; for example, on page 400 of Hansard, the item referring to Government Employees Compensation Act administration, $79,500; then the item relating to purchase of railway equipment, Canadian National Railways, $24,726,460; also, loan to the Canadian National Railways for the development of the Vermilion, Alberta, oil field.

Mr. KNOWLES: I am sorry to interrupt, but I did not include that last item.

Mr. MICHAUD: Well, the other two items were certainly called on May 16, and were not discussed, and possibly for that reason do not appear on Hansard, or perhaps they escaped the attention of the Hansard reporter. I may state that Hansard is not the official report of the proceedings of the house; it is the official report of the debates of the house; the journals of the house are the official report and record of what takes place in the house, as reference to rule 252 will show. If it happens that something escapes the attention or the hearing of the official reporter and does not for that reason appear on Hansard, that is not to say that an item which has been before the committee of the whole has not been approved or has not been passed. For that reason I state that all the items chargeable to the Department of Transport appear in the resolution and have been submitted to parliament, and the last of those items were submitted on the evening of May 16.

Mr. JEAN-FRANÇOIS POULIOT (Témiscouata): The other day some questions were asked about what had been said by Major-General Pearkes in Vernon camp. The Minister of National Defence (Mr. Ralston) did not disagree with what was said then. To-day in the Montreal Gazette I read the report of a broadcast made by Brigadier Mess. I wonder if he is the man who was formerly appointed with Mr. Leon Trepanier of Montreal to look after the farmer's side? At any rate, he made a mess of his broadcast, and I will read it to you, sir, to show you the state of mind of that gentleman:

"Petticoat Slackers" from Army Scored in Plea for More Recruits

Ottawa, June 7. Speaking of the "vital and urgent need" for "more and more" fighting men to reinforce Canada's invasion army, Brigadier James Mess, deputy adjutant-general in charge of recruiting, to-night criticized several classes of young men who he said were waiting "God knows what for."

In an address prepared for broadcast on the "headquarters report" programme over a Canadian Broadcasting Corporation national network, Brigadier Mess said:

"I want to appeal to several classes of young men in Canada who are still waiting—God knows what for. They are to be found in industry. They are pretending that their conscience is clear because they prefer to consider themselves as indispensable. They have been deferred for this or that reason, or are hiding away in the bush and making themselves scarce.

"I challenge each and every one of those men to stand before a mirror, look at himself and put the questions 'Is my conscience clear?' 'Am I really indispensable?' 'Should I not take my proper place at the side of my brother Canadians and let some older man, some woman, do this job that may not, after all, be very intricate or very important?' 'What shall I answer when this war is over when I am asked where did I serve?' 'What shall I say—I didn't have to go, I wasn't needed, I was indispensable behind a plough or in a factory'."

And this is said ironically by that Brigadier.

Brigadier Mess, addressing his remarks to this class of men, asked them what their wives would think of them. "Now she may deter you in a weak sort of way from doing what she knows is your sacred duty, but in the final analysis it is your decision to make. You are the man. You cannot hide behind a petticoat, whether it be your wife's or your mother's."

He added: ". . . Your decision to get into the King's uniform for general service to become trained, skilled and tough is yours to make in this hour of dire emergency."

Sir, I am second to no one in the help I can bring to the armed forces in my humble capacity as a member of parliament.

Mr. SINCLAIR: Second to no one in wasting time.

Mr. POULIOT: I will ask my hon. friend to keep quiet if he wants to be reelected the next time; otherwise he will be badly defeated.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: That is all you care about, being reelected. What do you care whether he is reelected or not?

Mr. POULIOT: I shall reply to hon. members one at a time. I will deliver the goods to them one by one. My hon. friend knows that he is in very bad shape in his constituency.

Mr. SINCLAIR: You are the biggest single waster of time in the House of Commons.

Mr. POULIOT: The hon. gentleman's laughter sounds false.

Mr. SINCLAIR: As false as your tears.

Mr. SPEAKER: Order.

Mr. POULIOT: This is shameful. I have here another statement and I am sure hon. members will applaud this. These people are short-sighted—

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: They are not afraid to fight for their country, though.

Mr. POULIOT: I am short-sighted, Mr. Speaker; I wear glasses but I am short-sighted only physically.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: Mentally too.

[Mr. Pouliot.]

Mr. SPEAKER: Order.

Mr. POULIOT: The other day I put a gem on Hansard, at the last sitting—a gem. It was one sentence that was uttered by a man who occupies an official capacity as parliamentary assistant to the President of the Privy Council.

Mr. SINCLAIR: And a very estimable gentleman.

Mr. POULIOT: I have put it on the record.

Mr. SINCLAIR: It is a reflection on you, not on him.

Mr. POULIOT: Mr. Speaker, I cannot understand the abnormal state of mind of the hon. member for Vancouver North. He has not done half as much as the hon. member for Broadview (Mr. Church) and myself for the soldiers.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: Nonsense.

Mr. SINCLAIR: What do you think of your French Canadians?

Mr. POULIOT: You cannot feed soldiers on raspberries.

Mr. SINCLAIR: Will the hon. member permit me one question?

Mr. POULIOT: No. Mr. Speaker, this is a very serious matter. I wish the constituents of hon. members were in the gallery to see what is going on now and who are the members who are defending the people. This is not a time to make jokes. We are talking seriously about the policy of the government and of those who enunciate that policy. Let me read to you the statement that has been made by the hon. member who is the parliamentary assistant to the President of the Privy Council, otherwise known as Prime Minister. Here is what he said, at page 3592 of Hansard:

I deny that the job we are doing here in this parliament—

In that regard I agree with one hon. member from British Columbia who will be reelected, the member for New Westminster (Mr. Reid). The other day he said something with which I agree. I continue the quotation:

I deny that the job we are doing here in this parliament or in our factories or on our farms is just as vital as the job being done by those men who are offering their lives in France for our freedom to-day.

Mr. SINCLAIR: That hon. member has done both. What do you know about the other job?

Mr. POULIOT: I will sign a petition and send someone—

Mr. SPEAKER: Order.

Mr. SINCLAIR: You are still worrying about winning elections, not about winning the war.

Mr. POULIOT: Sir, this is shameful.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: It certainly is, to listen to you.

Mr. SPEAKER: Order.

Mr. POULIOT: When we see some people who cannot listen—

Mr. SINCLAIR: Nonsense.

Mr. POULIOT: Now, sir, leaving aside all the frills, this is the statement made by one who was speaking on behalf of the President of the Privy Council in answer to questions put to him. He was dealing with items in the war appropriation bill and speaking with authority. I want to know if it is the policy of the government. If it is the policy of the government it will be easy to understand that the farmers and those in industry cannot expect consideration from the government. In a case like this the statement should be put on the record. I am sorry the Prime Minister is not here, but I would ask whether he approves that statement or not. That is the question. I do not want any answer to that from the deputy prime minister; I want an answer from the Prime Minister himself. I deny the deputy prime minister the authority to give the answer, to decide the case of the parliamentary assistant to the President of the Privy Council; it is none of his business, and ministerial solidarity does not go as far as that.

Mr. GLADSTONE: We will keep our soldiers supported before all else.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: You will not be elected again.

Mr. SPEAKER: Order. The hon. member has the floor. While he has the floor he is entitled to it without interruption, and I would ask hon. members not to interrupt.

Mr. POULIOT: I hope that the Minister of National Defence will tell us if he approves the statement of Brigadier Mess regarding those who are behind the plough or in the factories. I want to know if the Prime Minister approves the statement made by the hon. member for St. Lawrence-St. George (Mr. Claxton) in his official capacity as parliamentary assistant to himself as President of the Privy Council.

The premier of Quebec has said that the majority of the Conservative opposition is composed of gentlemen who are in favour of conscription, and that is so. As to the majority of the cabinet, I do not know, and I am not going to start a Gallup poll to know the present views of each minister on the matter. But we have to know what is the policy of the government and if those who contribute to the war effort on the farm and in industry are considered as doing a useless job during this war.

I have several things to say, but I have here some cases of soldiers; I shall take them up one by one. To-day I heard the Minister of Labour (Mr. Mitchell) make a statement about man-power. He is going to speak over the radio to-night. I did not catch very well what he said from his seat this afternoon, but it is a matter of great concern. We do not know how long the war will last. Will it last one month or two? Will it last six months, a year or two years? No one knows. The head of the government, who is well informed, told us that we are facing a long war; therefore, sir, we must be prepared for it, and if everybody follows the unwise advice of Brigadier Mess there will be nobody left to look after the farm or industry.

Mr. SINCLAIR: The hon. member for Témiscouata will still be here talking.

Mr. POULIOT: Nobody to look after that. Brigadier Mess is totally ignorant of agricultural conditions and agricultural problems. He thinks that the work on the farms can be done by women and old men. A little part of the farmer's work can be done in that way. Men may milk cows, as the Minister of National Defence has done for three months, as he wrote on his registration form in 1940 that he had been milking cows. Women can do that; it is their job. But there is hard work on the farm that can only be done by able-bodied men. Everybody knows that; and everybody knows that a man who has reached fifty and who has been working continually on the farm often suffers from rheumatism and that he cannot make the same physical effort as he did before. One has only to live in the country to know that. I understand that the gentlemen who live in cities are ignorant of the problems. They think food grows on the shelves of the grocery store and that meat hangs itself on the hooks of the butcher stores. Of course, that is an unfortunate state of mind. They do not inquire about the causes of the growth of food. It is very hard work. Besides that, sir, you know that farmers go out in the woods cutting timber. I do not know how an old man or woman can do that.

I will tell you what it is: it is that in the province of Quebec—and I am not afraid to speak because my county has supplied the largest number of men to the army, the largest of any other rural county—

Mr. SINCLAIR: And the largest number of draft dodgers, undoubtedly.

Mr. POULIOT: Well, sir, I resent that. I do not care what is said about me, but I resent profoundly what has just been said by the hon. gentleman who is not himself when he speaks that way, and I will not tolerate it. When I think of the boys of Temiscouata who have been at Dieppe, Hong Kong, in Italy and Sicily, especially Major Triquet, who was there—I am sure that both those noisy colleagues of mine from British Columbia were honoured to shake his hand—and others who have died, and others who may die to-day, and some who died yesterday perhaps; I will not tolerate anyone in this chamber casting aspersions on my electors. I will tell the hon. gentlemen—honourable in so far as they are members of parliament—that—

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: What about the last war?

Mr. POULIOT: —the Minister of National Defence must have known from Major General Murchie that the eastern part of Quebec has done more than any other rural part of the country to supply men to the army. I can say that of all the other counties of eastern Quebec. But, sir, I will not be distracted from what I have to say; and if I speak for my people it is because I have no feeling of animosity toward anyone. I have not the time to waste on that. But I think of the future; I think of the Sunday before last when I went with my neighbour, who is a farmer, into the back country of my county. He is alone. He has a large farm, with cattle, horses and all that. He wanted to secure farm help. I went with him to many places, but we could not find a man to help him on his land; and when I was coming back from St. Eloi to Riviere du Loup in the private car of a railway official with Major Triquet, V.C., who had accompanied him, one of the colonels told me that my county had been denuded of men, that there was no one left, and besides that a large number of girls are in the forces; some of them are here in Ottawa and others have gone to larger cities to work in war industries. I cannot say anything too fine about my own people.

Mr. FRASER (Northumberland, Ont.): Would the hon. member permit one question?

Mr. POULIOT: Surely.

Mr. FRASER (Northumberland, Ont.): Would the hon. member concentrate and tell the house just what he is talking about?

[Mr. Pouliot.]

Mr. POULIOT: If the hon. gentleman will be kind enough to listen to me he will be satisfied.

Mr. FRASER (Northumberland, Ont.): I have been listening now for twenty minutes.

Mr. POULIOT: But I have been disturbed.

Mr. FRASER (Northumberland, Ont.): I have not disturbed you.

Mr. POULIOT: Not by the hon. member. I am satisfied now to have had this opportunity to tell the house what my people have done for the war effort in many ways.

In connection with the matter of man-power I have to complain very greatly about one thing; that is, the jingo and junker spirit which is shown by those who preach that no man does his duty unless he is in the army, ignoring completely the hard work, the suffering and the trouble of those who work on the farms, on the railways and in industry. They are all slackers, according to Brigadier Mess, the parliamentary assistant to the President of the Privy Council, the Canadian legion, and some others. One must live in the country to realize what this means. Not so long ago the Minister of Labour informed the premier of Quebec that there was no conscription for farmers. That is untrue; conscription does exist for farmers. There are two classes of farmers, those who have had no training at all and those who have had some training. To-day those who have trained even for only a short time have no chance when they appear before the mobilization boards. I have asked several questions in this regard; I have tried to learn the number of applications for draftees submitted by the army, as far as farmers are concerned, in which cases as far as my knowledge goes applications for postponement were almost always turned down by the mobilization boards, but I could not get the information. I have before me the names of many men who formerly were engaged in agriculture, lumbering, or some similar industry. I shall mention only a few. The first is E-57830, Q-39-C-1884-F; E-622,202, who was a cheesemaker; E-620546, a farmer badly needed at home; E-629045, a farmer badly needed; E-630023, also a farmer; E-555036, a man who has a mill and a farm, and who is badly needed there. These men had no chance before the board, and there are many other cases. Here is another, E-615779, a flax grower who had a degree as an agronomist, and who is now in British Columbia; he did not have a chance. Then there is the case of I. Mignault, E-627375, who was told by his commanding officer that he would be given leave. The day his leave was to begin he was sent somewhere else; his application was never considered, though he was very badly needed at home. His father had only young children to help him, and he had to take them from school in spite of the compulsory education act and though they could not help him as much as this young man could have done. The father was ill in hospital, operated upon for a rupture. He is a good farmer, with good land and a good business, but it was not considered. He went to British Columbia; his requests were not considered. He was sent to defend that fine, beautiful province. When these men in Quebec ask for farm leave they are sent far away.

Here is the case of another man who had everything in order. He was a farmer's son who worked in the forest during the off season. He notified the unemployment insurance people and the selective service officer; he got his papers; he notified the postmaster, and then went to the forest to work. There he was arrested by the mounties, who put handcuffs on him and brought him to Sorel. That case was so bad that selective service intervened and the army released this man. This is not fair treatment for these fellows. They act according to the law; they are not conscientious objectors; they are told by selective service that wood is needed, and they go to work in the forests; then they are treated in this way.

I have another bad case, D-41583, who went to camp at Petawawa, where he was very badly treated. I tell the minister that the treatment of French-speaking soldiers in certain places, especially Barriefield. Petawawa, Camp Borden, and one or two others, is not worthy of the government. Because they do not speak English fluently, even men who have taken classical courses and have received a fine education are ordered to do fatigue work, to scrub floors, wash dishes and things like that. It is most discouraging. They can have no ambition; they are treated just as the negroes are treated in the southern states. There may be no orders from headquarters to this effect, but just the same these men are treated as though they had no right to be ambitious.

I hope the department will increase the allowances to the soldiers. They are not high enough. A room for an officer is $1.70 a day, and for a soldier it is $1.25. A room costs at least $6 for a week. Seven breakfasts at 20 cents amount to $1.40. Lunches and suppers at 40 cents amount to $5.60, making a total of $13. The allowance is $8.75, leaving a deficit of $4.25. When they try to manage with what is offered them by the Department of National Defence they have to pay $6 for a room. In the mornings they have coffee and toast, costing $1.05. Then, seven hot-dog meals cost $1.40, and seven other meals at 40 cents cost $2.80, making a total of $11.25. The allowance is $8.75, leaving a deficit of $2.50. That is when they feed themselves with hot dogs and eat only toast in the morning. This is a problem for them. I submit it to the minister, and I hope he will see to it.

There are some painful cases. These are men who are ill and deserve to be well looked after. Very often men are not examined by the doctors as they should be at the reception centres. There are many unbelievable cases. The report of the examination made by a specialist is sometimes changed by the president of the board. This has happened in some classic cases. The sergeants and the corporals find what is wrong with the health conditions of the men as soon as they report to their unit. For instance, in Quebec city the doctor in charge of the specialists is a young man of about twenty-five years who was admitted to practice in June, 1943. He is a captain. I have before me the case of E-630952, with respect to private L. P. Beaulieu, deceased. This man died when he was in camp near Quebec. He was examined by the heart specialist, who mentioned that the soldier was suffering from his heart. This was struck out by the president of the board. It is the reason the sergeant told him he was a "faker," when he complained that he was sick. When he asked for a doctor the doctor was refused him. He asked for a priest, and was told there was no need for a priest, although a chaplain was in camp. He stayed two days in bed, during which time he could hardly speak, and was finally found dead in bed. This is a very bad case. There is surely something wrong. I know the parliamentary assistant to the minister is looking into the case now, and I rely upon him to find out who is guilty, in order to protect other people. I am informed also that Doctor Trempe, of St. Sacrament hospital in Quebec city, has sent a report that the man was suffering from acute appendicitis, and was given a purge. He then died. An autopsy was performed, and they found the salt outside the bowels, in the abdomen. I have been told by some friends who are not in the army that the report sent by Doctor Trempe to the Department of Pensions and National Health was very severe.

That is not the only thing. Sometimes hon. members seem surprised that I take an interest in people outside my constituency. I have been deeply touched by a letter written me by Mr. and Mrs. Horniblow, of Toronto. They wrote me with respect to their son, regimental number B-621503. This was also a bad case.

I have also been told that at a camp in Ontario there was the practising of jiu-jitsu, and that at that camp was a young man from the Matapedia valley. He did some wrestling with a professor of jiu-jitsu, and was strong enough to bring the professor to the floor. The professor was enraged, and said, "I will fix you up." Then they continued wrestling, and the professor turned the foot of the young man and broke it. He has been discharged from the army and will be an invalid for the rest of his life.

I have many cases, so that my hon. friends should not be surprised. I was a pioneer in defending the health of soldiers, to improve their lot. Life is much more pleasant for them, naturally, and parents have less to worry about.

Mr. SINCLAIR: I wish to ask a question. Why does not the hon. member take these cases back to the minister, without wasting the time of parliament upon them?

Mr. POULIOT: If I had done that at first I would have got nowhere. I wish to show to my hon. friends opposite, including the hon. member who has just spoken, what has happened in the army, in some cases, so that there may be no repetition. If one case is settled, it is all right for that case; but what we need is a change in personnel in certain places, so that the bad condition may be improved in a general way.

Here is the case of E-621922. This young man was suffering from pleurisy in one lung, but was admitted to the army as fit. He was of weak constitution, and while in the army contracted pleurisy in the other lung. He is now sitting in a chair, unable to work. I wish to pay special tribute to the parliamentary assistant to the Minister of National Defence, because he has done a lot to correct abuses and to improve conditions. I can remember one afternoon, however, that I mentioned similar grievances of the soldiers, when the hon. member for Vancouver North (Mr. Sinclair) was not yet back from overseas—and in passing may I congratulate him upon his share in the war, and upon what he has done for us. He has done very well, and we are glad to see him among us, provided he is a little quieter.

Mr. SINCLAIR: Provided I keep my mouth shut.

Mr. POULIOT: No. I am always glad to applaud the hon. member when he has the floor. But I remember one afternoon last year when I brought up some cases like this to lay before the house a serious grievance that had to be corrected, so as to improve the morale of the army, and keep it good. This is being said not to be unpleasant to anyone, but just to straighten everything out. You must have order in the army, you must have justice and fair play in the army in order to have things as pleasant as possible for the men. It is also important that the soldiers should be well cared for, and I would be remiss in my duty if I did other than I have done just now. It is important that these things be done in order to improve the morale of our people. For all these reasons I hope that such a condition in the army will not exist any longer and that what is wrong will be corrected in the immediate future.

Mr. JAMES SINCLAIR (Vancouver North): Mr. Speaker, I should like to apologize to you, and to any hon. members of this house who have listened to the hon. member for Temiscouata (Mr. Pouliot), for having interrupted. I did so perhaps out of unpardonable anger. Two or three days ago we heard the Prime Minister ask that in view of the seriousness of the situation the business of the house be expedited. I cannot help but think that the fighting men from Temiscouata, and I am quite sure there are many good men from there engaged in the invasion, and all the other fighting men, would not be very much pleased if they had listened to what has just been said by the hon. member for Temiscouata, who has redoubled his efforts to waste the time of parliament and obstruct legislation in this house.

Mr. J. W. NOSEWORTHY (York South): Mr. Speaker, I do not wish to delay the second reading of this bill, but I want to take advantage of this opportunity, since it will probably be the only one available, to call to the attention of the Minister of National Defence a question which I raised in committee on February 24 with regard to the amount of dependents' allowance paid to dependent mothers and the ceiling placed upon their earnings before a dependents' allowance is paid. I think the matter is important and I should like to quote what the Minister of National Defence said as reported on page 826 of Hansard:

> My hon. friend asks me to reconsider this matter. He makes his request of one who is most sympathetic to the mothers of these men.

It is because I believe sincerely every single word of that statement that I raise the question a second time and again make an appeal to the minister. He went on to say:

> If there are cases or situations which really justify intervention, then we endeavour to intervene.

My point is that in so far as possible the regulations should be such that it will not be necessary for any mother to have to ask the minister or the department to intervene in her special case. The minister continued:

What we are endeavouring to do is to take the place of the sons with regard to mothers' earnings.

I merely want to point out to the minister that the government or his department are not doing that so long as they limit the payment of dependents' allowances to $25. I am confident that if the matter were brought to a vote in this house there are few if any members who would thus limit the allowance paid to mothers whose dependency upon sons in the armed forces has been established. I can see no reason why there should be any discrimination, why this allowance should not be $35 instead of $25.

In the second place, I can see no reason why the government should place a ceiling of $65 upon the earnings of a mother. If a mother earns more than $40 a month she cannot receive the full $25. It is argued that the assigned pay of the son is not counted in that $65, but many of the mothers with whom I am personally acquainted are anxious to set aside this assigned pay for the sons should they be fortunate enough to be spared to return. They do not want to have to depend upon that assigned pay if they can avoid doing so.

I feel that the government has no moral right to place a limit upon the earning capacity of these mothers. Nature itself and age have placed sufficient restrictions upon their earning capacity. The government should remove this restriction so that these mothers may earn more than $40 a month without having their dependents' allowances reduced. From the correspondence I have had with him and from the interest that his department has taken in cases I have referred to them, I am confident that there is no member in this house more anxious to see that these women should be treated fairly than the Minister of National Defence. I cannot understand why this situation is allowed to prevail, and I want to make this plea to the minister to see that it is remedied.

Mr. JOSEPH ARMAND CHOQUETTE (Stanstead) (Translation): Mr. Speaker, my purpose in taking the floor at this time is to remind the government that, in spite of the protests voiced by the hon. member for Portneuf (Mr. Gauthier) against the rank discrimination of which the farmers of the province of Quebec have been the victims through rulings given by Mr. J. K. Smith, director of trucking in that province, the authorities have not taken the energetic action we might have expected from them. Protests have been voiced in the Quebec legislative assembly last week and Prime Minister Godbout himself stated that Mr. Smith was incompetent. On May 22 last, in answer to a question placed on the order paper by the hon. member for Portneuf, the parliamentary assistant to the Minister of Finance (Mr. Abbott) said:

Mr. Smith's services are quite satisfactory and he has several French-speaking assistants.

From what I shall have to say in a few moments, it can be judged whether Mr. Smith's services are as satisfactory as they are represented to us. On duty since May 1, 1942, Mr. Smith was loaned to the wartime prices and trade board by the Montreal board of trade. It is inconceivable that in a province where more than eighty per cent of the people are French Canadians the government should appoint an official who cannot and will not speak French. That man is incompetent and he cannot fulfil his duties to the satisfaction of a very large majority of the people.

As regards the organization of his office, the man in charge is a Mr. Desgroseiller, who was loaned to the board by a powerful company, the Smith Transport Co. The official in charge of the truck transportation of cream is Mr. Chevalier who, before joining the board's staff had been for seventeen years in the employ of a Montreal financial company headed by Mr. Stuart, a former director of the board, which fact shows that he has all the required qualifications for such a position. The staff supervisor, Miss Mary Chapman, has no knowledge of the French language; it is even said that she does not know shorthand or typewriting. However, she draws a monthly salary of $150.

I shall point to this house a few of the decisions taken, in order to show to what extent Mr. Smith's rulings are in opposition to the interests and the clearly expressed wishes of the farmers. In a Shefford county parish, a range has been split in two. The people who are on the right are compelled to deliver their cream to a butter maker who operates his own factory, while those who are on the left must go to the cooperative society's factory.

Some happenings may afford a farmer good reasons for dealing with a certain factory rather than with another, but this does not mean anything to Mr. Smith. He gives a ruling and the matter ends there. Another cooperative society is not allowed to collect its new members' cream on the same runs as last year. I even know that the members have decided, at a mass meeting, to ignore Mr. Smith's rulings, because they are so absurd. Another farmers' cooperative society is not allowed to collect the cream of its members, while the owner of a factory has four or five trucks which cover the whole county. On two occasions, another farmers' cooperative society has sent representatives to meet Mr. Smith in Montreal, but it could not obtain a permit for the purchase of a truck needed for the collection of its members' cream. Those facts clearly show what kind of sympathy Mr. Smith has for the farmers, and the development and progress of the cooperative movement in Quebec are thereby greatly hindered.

Mr. Speaker, the result of such a situation is that Mr. Smith's rulings are not always obeyed and that the price board has lost all control. No wonder that the Quebec government, which cooperated with Mr. Smith's office last year, has now withdrawn its support, because of the absurdity of Mr. Smith's rulings.

I may mention another case. Last fall, Mr. Smith spent a weekend in the Laurentians, as the guest of a butter factory owner and his truck driver. On his return to the office, on Monday morning, Mr. Smith cancelled the permit that had been issued to the cooperative society operating in competition with that buttermaker.

Mr. Speaker, it is said everywhere in the province that no one may obtain a permit for the purchase of a new truck without paying fifty dollars. I cannot vouch for the accuracy of that statement, but it is heard everywhere.

Following all those acts of discrimination, the union of eastern townships cooperative societies affiliated with the Coopérative fédérée de Québec, which includes 17 cooperative societies, having been made aware of the difficulties that are now experienced in connection with trucking in rural areas, has decided, at a meeting held in Granby on May 10 last, to request the proper authorities to remedy the present situation, especially as regards the transportation of dairy products by truck.

The house can be sure that if I now protest on behalf of all farmers who have been the victims of such discrimination, it is not merely for the sake of indulging in criticism, but rather with a view to bringing the matter to the attention of responsible authorities and trying to obtain redress. Let those who are really in favour of Canadian unity first eliminate such causes of friction.

For all the reasons I have given, we demand a judicial inquiry on Mr. Smith's administration. The public is entitled to some protection.

[Mr. Choquette.]

Mr. R. W. GLADSTONE (Wellington South): I should like to support what was said a few moments ago by the hon. member for York South (Mr. Noseworthy) relative to the dependents' allowances for mothers. There are situations where a son of a widowed mother has enlisted, leaving a sister or brother to be supported in that home; likewise there are situations where the husband has enlisted, leaving the wife to care for a son or daughter. Surely these situations are identical; and while there may be variations, as a matter of general policy I cannot see that the treatment accorded by the government should be different. I would say also that the privileges relative to earning power of the mother should not in any case be different from those of the soldier's wife. It seems to me that the appropriate minister and his department could very well take up the suggestion which has been made for a more generous consideration, in some cases at least, of the dependent mother.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time, and the house went into committee thereon, Mr. Bradette in the chair.

On section 2—Appropriation, $3,650,000,000, less $850,000,000 voted under 1944, c. 6.

Mr. KNOWLES: May I ask the Minister of Finance whether it is his recollection that we have dealt with the items which I was speaking about earlier to-day? I ask him particularly with reference to the items that would come under his department.

Mr. ILSLEY: I understood from what the Minister of Transport said that the item of $24,726,460 was called and passed. I made inquiries about that item myself, and was informed that this railway equipment item was agreed to without questions being raised, and is not referred to in Hansard but was passed. I am also informed that the same remarks would be applicable to the item of $79,500, Government Employees Compensation Act administration. With regard to the provision for contingencies I have not made inquiry, but I think that item was called and passed as well. There does not seem to be any procedure by which the Clerk can be interrogated directly in the house, but I might ask him about that.

The CHAIRMAN: On that point, if I may be allowed: I have been very careful indeed in checking and rechecking all the items that were put under the war appropriation resolution before the committee of the whole; and I know the items which were mentioned and dealt with by the Minister of Transport were checked off. The same statement applies to the item respecting wool. I vividly remember that I called the item and it passed without discussion. I might say that I was almost astonished at this; however, it was called and considered as passed. The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre has mentioned the fact that it is not recorded in Hansard. That point has been covered by the Minister of Transport; Hansard is not the real record of the work of the committee. As far as I am concerned I have been very careful in this matter; and I repeat, though I recognize it is not the intention of the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre to throw any reflection on the Chair, that I have been very careful indeed to check and recheck all these items. Hon. members realize how difficult it is to deal with them all, because in some instances summaries were brought in to supply further information on items; in other cases they were dealt with in the form of the resolution as reported in Hansard in February last.

Mr. KNOWLES: May I explain, Mr. Chairman, following what you have said, that I made it very clear when I spoke before that I was casting no reflection on anyone. I believe the words I used were that I was satisfied that there was nothing intentional about this in any quarter whatever. But I think the comments which are being made indicate that there is no way of actually checking this; it is a matter of the memories of those concerned; there is no record of the calling of these items either in Hansard or in Votes and Proceedings; and that, it seems to me, underlines the desirability of a different and more proper procedure for this very matter another time.

While I am on feet I should say again, in reply to the Minister of Transport, when he makes the statement that Hansard is only a record of speeches made, that while that is correct, there are also, as I pointed out before, instances of items which were called and not discussed but which are mentioned in Hansard. I refer particularly to items on pages 3578 and 3579. It may be that earlier in the game that practice was not followed. There is, of course, no record of individual items in the Journals. In any case, I leave it as an example of the desirability of a different procedure the next time we come to this matter, and I take this opportunity again of urging that it be done by providing the house with a proper schedule.

Mr. STIRLING: I had reason to check with the hon. member occupying the Chair two or three days ago something with regard to one of the items and my attention was drawn to the fact that each item in front of the Chairman is initialled as it is passed.

Section agreed to.

On section 3—Government may act as agent.

Mr. NOSEWORTHY: Can the Minister of National Defence tell us whether any further consideration has been given, as he indicated would be given, to the question I raised a few moments ago?

Mr. RALSTON: I can say that the matter is having study along with a number of other matters raised in connection with the work of the dependents board and the trustees dependents' allowance board. I cannot say anything further at the moment.

Mr. FAIR: May I ask whether officers of equal rank in all forces are getting the same pay at the present time. I do not want to hold up this bill; but since the estimates were before the house on a previous occasion, I have been advised that officers in the army and air force at headquarters receive fifty cents a day which is not paid to officers of the navy.

Mr. ILSLEY: Probably I am not the one who should answer the question; there are three defence ministers. I may say, however, that from the beginning of this war to the present time there has been application after application to equalize the position as among the three services. It is something that goes on endlessly. It is impossible to say when the rank is exactly the same as between persons in the army and in the navy and as between either and persons in the air force. The circumstances vary; all sorts of considerations vary. Claims are continually raised by one or other of the services that in some particular rank or position certain persons are getting a a little less than somebody who is of no higher rank and who happens to be in another of the services, and the treasury board is called upon time after time to try to equalize the position. I should be surprised if inequalities amounting to anything now prevailed.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): In answer to a question of mine in the course of the debate the Minister of National Defence said that some consideration was being given to the rehabilitation allowance and clothing allowance given to soldiers on discharge. Is that under review at the present time?

Mr. RALSTON: Yes, it is.

Mr. FAIR: Perhaps the question to which I have just referred has been rectified since it was brought to my attention. If not, it would seem that the navy has a claim. If staff headquarters officers are receiving a certain rate per day, the men of the naval service are entitled to it as well.

Section 1 agreed to.

Bill reported, read the third time and passed.

FARM CREDIT

LIMITED GUARANTEE OF BANK LOANS FOR IMPROVEMENT AND DEVELOPMENT OF FARMS

The house resumed from Tuesday, June 6, consideration in committee of the following resolution—Mr. Ilsley—Mr. Bradette in the chair:

That it is expedient to introduce a bill to encourage the provision of intermediate term and short term credit to farmers for the improvement and development of farms through bank loans, guaranteed with limitations, by the crown; moneys payable under the act including expenses of administration to be paid out of the consolidated revenue fund.

Mr. ROSS (Souris): While I think the principle of the proposed bill for guaranteeing individual farmers up to a maximum of $3,000 may be a step in the right direction, yet at this stage I have one or two observations to make and some questions on which I desire some enlightenment. When the parliamentary assistant was completing his argument on March 14 on the Industrial Development bank bill he said:

I find it a little difficult to see why the credit requirements of agriculture should be so different from those of industry that they should require a government central farm bank to operate in cooperation with private lending institutions.

The parliamentary assistant thought these two desires were very much in common at that time. In the first place, I believe that legislation with respect to floor prices for agricultural products have a great deal to do with the success or otherwise of this proposed bill, and I think it is unfortunate that the proposed legislation has not been before the house earlier than this. Had it been, it would have been very useful, when this proposed bill is being considered by the banking and commerce committee, which I believe is the intention. These two will be very closely associated if this proposed bill is to mean anything to agriculture.

If farm credit is to be on a sound basis the interest rate should be considerably less than five per cent. Many farmers are to-day receiving credit from the banks at five per cent. True enough, credit was not procurable at this rate of interest in many sections of the country some years ago, but many good farmers to-day are procuring such credit at five per cent. I have not been able to learn yet why it is necessary to have a separate industrial bank, supplementary to the activities of the existing lending agencies, while this proposed bill is for a limited guarantee of farm credit through the existing chartered banks, as I have pointed out; and the parliamentary assistant expressed himself similarly in winding up his argument on the industrial bank on March 14.

I am not able to recollect whether any suggestion as to interest rate in connection with the industrial bank has been mentioned. If the minister could enlighten us in that regard it would be appreciated. I should like him to tell us what the proposed rate of interest will be in that connection because it has a bearing on this bill. I have pointed out before that the Veterans' Land Act does provide an interest rate of 3½ per cent in connection with land for these settlers.

This proposal to guarantee the banks is really just an extension of the provisions of section 88 of the Bank Act. In my opinion that is all it amounts to. I know personally a number of old people with substantial farm homes in areas where the Canadian farm loan board would not lend money a few years ago. These old people found it necessary to apply for old age pensions. These pensions are now a lien against these farm homes and in some cases the farm is now operated by the younger members of the family. I would ask the minister whether these people now operating these farms will be allowed the credit guaranteed under this proposal for home improvements while the lien applies against the farm home. I would also ask him whether this guarantee of ten per cent will cover the total loans of each chartered bank or each branch which carries individual loans or the individual loans themselves.

I have heard arguments about the interpretation of the wording. It is pointed out in the minister's statement that:

It is proposed that the guarantee should be effective in respect of a maximum of $250 million of loans made within a period of three years. Apart from this over-all limitation on the government's liability, there will be provision for termination of the guarantee after due notice on loans in any particular category or made by any particular bank. This will ensure effective control over lending operations.

I am not very clear on that. For instance, there will be quite a number of loans taken out and loans may be repaid in a very short time. I wonder whether those loans will be included in the total, or whether it is the total over the given period, or whether it might be pro rated eighty-three and a third million dollars a year. On that point may I say to the minister that when we entered the war there was a backlog of requirements of farm implements alone of $200,000,000. I am sure it will be all of $250,000,000 now. In fairness I do think many farmers will not have to take advantage of this guarantee in order to purchase implements, but we have been slipping away back in requirements of farm implements every year during this war and there will be a tremendous amount of money required for that alone, apart from the fact that there is a very great need for an improvement in live stock in this country.

With respect to live stock, I was surprised to note that in this great dairying province of Ontario butterfat production among Holstein cattle alone had declined on the average from I think 3·3 to 2·6 per cent over the past period of some years. I was amazed when I learned that. It certainly proves that we have to do something about the improvement of live stock. Many people in the west have never had an opportunity to procure better type sires to improve their stock, as they should have done.

A question was asked the other evening as to the interpretation of what was a farm. The minister said:

> It is intended that a farmer shall mean a person who is in possession of a farm, and whose principal occupation consists of farming such farm. Then "a farm" is defined to mean land used for the purpose of farming, which term includes live stock raising, dairying, fruit growing and all tillage of the soil.

This brings to mind the fact that in past years many difficulties were encountered in the administration of the Prairie Farm Assistance Act as to just what was considered a farmer by the treasury board. Many payments were held up at times because of the difficulties connected with a proper interpretation of what was forthcoming from the treasury board. I trust this matter will be very carefully taken care of in the drafting of the bill, because it is most important and many unnecessary inconveniences have been created.

As I said, I think this bill is a step in the right direction. I am sorry that we did not have the bill before us, but there was some little misunderstanding the other evening between the minister who was leading the government and others as to where we could properly ask questions. I did not want to lose the opportunity to raise the questions which I have asked of the minister. I hoped in the earlier discussions in the house when the proposed legislation with respect to agricultural credit was mentioned, that it might have been on a broader basis which would permit many agriculturists to rewrite their obligations at a lower rate of interest. I realize that we have other measures such as the Canadian farm loan board. I think they make provisions for loans on lands and chattels. The minister has pointed to the success of the national housing plan. Might I remind him that in most sections of rural Canada, in the west at any rate, that plan never applied, and there is a great need of something of that kind in the rural sections. Therefore the success of this measure can hardly be based on the success or otherwise of the national housing plan.

I trust I may have an opportunity to ask further questions when the bill is before us, but I should like to have an answer to the questions I have already asked, if I may.

Mr. WEIR: The resolution which is now before the committee on which the bill is to be introduced later is a proposal for a measure that has for some time been looked for by Canadian farmers. If we understand the intention of the government with respect to this measure I think it is to fill a need in agriculture that has been looked forward to for a long time.

The principle of the bill, as I understand it, is that loans are to be made for improvements on farms, taking in practically all activities of the farm, but more particularly having in mind improvements with respect to buildings, machinery, fences, live stock, improved seed and even buildings such as homes and other permanent structures. I note that emphasis has been placed on electrical equipment. Electrical equipment is one thing farmers are looking forward to with particular interest at this time. If that is what is intended by this measure then it can be considered as filling a place that has been needed for some time. The rate of interest is five per cent. I understand that repayments are to be made on a basis that will be suitable to the particular type of agriculture for which the loan is being made. That is one of the important things that should be kept in mind—the obvious ways and means over a widespread type of agricultural activity either by regulations or otherwise that will permit the type of repayment suitable to the particular industry that is being undertaken.

I point out, however, in considering this measure which is to be administered through our regular chartered banks, that there is a little difficulty in this country in the service which this type of loan will give to certain communities. We have not been doing very much to increase the banking facilities, particularly in western Canada. In fact there has been a substantial reduction in the number of banks in the west. I find in the report of the reconstruction committee that this is substantially the case and that our banks have been reduced from 4,620 in 1920 to 3,300 in 1941. Our banking facilities are largely centred in the larger towns and cities. I wonder whether the minister has taken into consideration the outlying areas where banking facilities are not provided by our chartered banks as they exist at the present time. That is one matter to which consideration should be given. The other point to which consideration must be given is with respect to the administration. I quite appreciate that loans of this kind will depend a great deal upon the personal element, both from the point of view of the encouragement given by the bank manager to these loans and from the point of view of the individual who may borrow under this scheme. I do not know what the minister has in mind, but I hope he can draft some sort of regulation that will meet this problem, because it is going to be one of the most important that will have to be considered.

As the hon. member for Souris has already pointed out, the farmers are supplied with one type of credit through the Canadian farm loan board; that is long-term credit and, in some cases, short-term credit as well. I do not think we should get away from that system for the more substantial, permanent requirements of agriculture; that is, having long-term loans repayable on an amortization basis over a period of years at a rate of interest as favourable as that provided in this measure. The other type of credit that has been available in the past, of course, has been whatever loans farmers could make from their banks. I take it that the credit now proposed is to fill the gap between these two, and to take the place of the credit previously provided by merchants, lumber dealers, implement dealers and people of that kind. I point out that this is a new avenue of approach with respect to legislation of this type, and I believe it should commend itself favourably to agriculture.

Some people may ask whether this type of credit is needed at this time in the history of Canadian agriculture. In that connection I should like to make just two references. One was made by the minister in introducing this measure the other evening, namely, the report of the agriculture committee on reconstruction which, after making a general survey of the needs of agriculture, in the closing subparagraph recommended:

> That the dominion government make a careful survey of the schemes for providing short-term and intermediate credit now in force in other countries, with a view to making provision for adequate credit at low rates of interest to deserving farmers, using as far as possible existing facilities, including the chartered banks of Canada.

[Mr. Weir.]

I presume that recommendation was brought forward after very careful study, and after hearing representations made by a large number of people. If the policy can be made to operate successfully, using the banking institutions, as we hope it may, then we shall have the advantage of not being required to create any additional facilities for this purpose. I find also that in the spring of this year, in the representations made to the government, the Canadian federation of agriculture also referred to this matter, and I should like to read part of the introductory paragraph dealing with farm credit:

> The first is the subject of farm credit. The international food conference at Hot Springs recognized the importance and necessity of adequate credit facilities in any soundly conceived programme of farm improvement. It recommended that every effort be made to ensure an adequate supply of credit for agriculture at low rates of interest.

I point out that the Canadian federation of agriculture, which takes in all the farm organizations of Canada, not only adopts this recommendation as its own but refers to the conference held at Hot Springs early this spring, which would indicate that the need for credit of this kind apparently is recognized even outside our own country. Then, after some reference to the work of the Canadian farm loan board, and the possibility of reconsidering the introduction of the central mortgage bank, the federation goes on to recommend:

> That a plan be developed suited to the nature and requirements of agriculture in Canada for short-term and intermediate loans. In this connection it must be remembered that there has been a steady reduction in the number of branches of chartered banks in Canada. At present, for example, there are only 170 branches in the whole of the settled area of Alberta. After taking into consideration the numbers in the cities and larger towns, it is evident that such a number cannot adequately serve such a large area. The very nature of farm production in Canada makes short-term and intermediate credit a necessity in the post-war years.

I merely mention this to indicate that the Canadian federation of agriculture have been urging the adoption of a policy which would provide a type of intermediate credit. In the pamphlet they have sent out, dealing with their activities as an organization, they make further reference to the need of some type of short-term or intermediate credit.

There is no doubt in my mind that during the period of transition from war to peace agriculture will afford a great deal of employment and a means of rehabilitation, so that anything we as a parliament can do to assist agriculture undoubtedly will help our rehabilitation programme. I doubt if there is a farmstead in Canada which does not need repairs of some kind. Buildings require paint; fences need repair; new buildings are necessary. Then when we look at the other side and see the encouragement that has been given to the use of electrical equipment on the farm, I think we begin to realize the importance of a measure of this kind. I would point out that in regard to the purchase of new equipment alone agriculture will be of great benefit as far as employment is concerned, which in turn will be of untold advantage in stabilizing agriculture itself.

A moment ago I mentioned that to a degree at least the credit facilities largely used in agriculture in western Canada have been provided by implement companies, lumber dealers and country merchants. The hon. member for Souris referred to the backlog of agricultural implement requirements in 1937, at which time it was estimated to amount to more than $200,000,000, plus an annual requirement of about $50,000,000. That situation may have improved to some extent in the years following 1937, but I doubt if it can be very much better to-day because of the shortage of farm implements due to war conditions. Therefore I believe that we have at the present time in this country a very great need for new agricultural implements, which doubtless will be the reason for a great many loans of this kind.

Just here I should like to say one thing to the minister, to which I hope he will give particular attention. I go back to the inquiry in 1936 and 1937 into the cost of farm implements. One of the matters particularly looked into at that time was the cost of credit sales and collection costs by implement companies in connection with the sale of farm implements, and a great deal of criticism was expressed. I do not wish to repeat the figures which were quoted at that time; I do not think they would be applicable to-day, and for that reason might be misleading.

The committee ended its report by stating that the cost of credit to farmers purchasing farm implements on time is excessive, and that the companies—meaning the implement companies—should take immediate steps to reduce credit charges. My point is this, that if through this measure the government is to provide a type of intermediate credit, and assume a risk through a ten per cent guarantee to banks, then the implement and lumber companies, and those who have provided goods to farmers on credit and who now have the advantage of this type of credit, should be called upon to reduce their distribution costs as far as possible. I say that because they will be able to do business on a cash basis without much risk.

So I say to the minister that in this regard I think he should go a long way, if there are no other means available, towards putting it up to implement and lumber companies, the two groups which will likely receive a very large share of the advantage from this type of credit, so to adjust their businesses that will reduce their cost to a lowest possible minimum for the advantage they will secure under this type of credit.

The same applies to suppliers of electrical equipment. In Manitoba at the present time we have under way a survey for the extension of the hydro electric system of that province to a greatly enlarged area. This measure should assist in the development; I hope it will. If it does, I believe a further step should be taken to see that the goods so provided will be provided on the basis of a cash sale, with the lowest possible cost to the farmers concerned.

I note with satisfaction, too, that this measure is to provide loans which will permit even the building of a house up to a value of $3,000. Here I believe is an opportunity to offer a suggestion which in my view would go a long way toward assisting in the stabilization of agriculture, particularly in western Canada. My suggestion is to encourage the building of a second home for hired help on many of our western farms. There is no doubt that hired men have been more or less transients in western Canada. They have summer employment, but they have never been given a permanency such as an industry like agriculture should provide for its workers. I believe that the hired man has not been treated as well as he should have been, and that as a result the industry has suffered because of its not being able to maintain in employment experienced labour. I therefore offer this suggestion in the belief that it would be a permanent development and should be given sympathetic consideration, so far as the regulations and other governing factors in connection with these loans are concerned.

The same should apply with respect to water development in farm homes. However, at the moment I shall not deal with that feature in detail.

Another point which I suggest should be kept in mind when dealing with this measure, and one which I believe would be of great assistance, is that connected with the cooperative movement. Cooperative movements in western Canada have been making sound and rapid progress. For the most part they have operated in a wholesale of bulk type of business, but they are rapidly entering the retail field. There is no doubt at all that these cooperative organizations have demonstrated that they have lowered many of the costs of distribution. Some of them are trying to get into the farm implement business, and I hope they succeed. In the type of business they have undertaken they have, in my judgment, reduced substantially the costs of distribution and, for that reason, should be encouraged. So that, in so far as this type of credit may be made available to people who are associated with cooperative organizations, I think it is commendable.

I am also wondering with respect to our credit union movement, which is also a wide and, I think, a sound development in many areas. It does not, of course, cover the western provinces to the extent of providing the general credit facilities that would be required. Nevertheless the credit unions have made fairly rapid progress. Their idea is partly one of thrift; but on the other hand they are also providing a type of community credit which is of particular advantage to the communities using it. I hope the type of credit indicated in this measure can be made to fit in with the type I have just mentioned, because I believe there is something in common between them, and something which should be encouraged.

I have no further suggestions to make to the minister at the moment, except to point out again that in my view this is a measure which will fit into a place for which there is a need. It will fit into a place between the long-term loan, such as is given on a farm mortgage, and the short-term seasonal borrowing. If we are to have this type of credit to meet the intermediate needs of agriculture, I think it is desirable. This is just another example of making national credit available to meet the needs of a certain branch of agriculture—national credit, in the first instance, through the Canadian farm loan board, and now national credit by way of a guarantee of this type of intermediate loan.

I think, when one considers what has been made available to agriculture, it will be realized that considerable progress has been made in meeting its credit requirements. When one reviews the situation, particularly as it obtains at this time, one cannot help realizing that the credit facilities now offered are much more readily available to meet the needs of the industry than they were heretofore. I point, for instance, to the Canadian farm loan board. I look, as well, at the wide development of the credit union movement. I look at the wide distribution of victory bonds, a further evidence of the available credit and now this new type of intermediate credit. So that, if, along with these credit facilities we can develop added security, through the establishment of floor prices, the credit needs of agriculture should be pretty well taken care of.

At the same time a word of caution might be voiced. I am not one who thinks we should take steps to give an endorsation or an invitation to go out on a borrowing expedition, merely for the sake of borrowing. To my mind debt is a serious thing, and so far as possible should be avoided. So that while this measure is desirable and needed, it should not be taken as an invitation for farmers to go into debt. That is not the intention of the measure. I desire to commend this legislation, because in my view it will fill a place of great importance in the post-war period in helping to establish agriculture on a sounder basis.

Mr. DORION: Mr. Chairman, the first observation I should like to make is closely connected with one of the questions raised by the hon. member who has just taken his seat. I should like to know what will happen in the case of farmers in remote areas, such as I have in my constituency. In many of these places there are no bank branches, and I contend that these farmers should be helped just the same as those living in other places. This bill should provide relief for these farmers.

There is another matter I should like to take up. The minister told us the other day the purpose of this bill, and I quote from page 3608 of Hansard as follows:

> With this in view, it is proposed that the guarantee should apply to loans made for the purchase of farm implements and farm equipment, for rural electrification, for the purchase of live stock, for fencing and drainage, for the repair, alteration and construction of farm buildings and for other farm improvement purposes that may later be specified in the regulations. The categories are very broad and include nearly every kind of permanent improvement to a farm or farm home.

Will loans be made to farmers for purposes other than those mentioned by the minister? For instance, when spring comes around, many farmers need money with which to buy seed and fertilizer in order to carry on until the fall. I know many of them borrow a few hundred dollars which they pay back in the fall, and I should like to know if this scheme will provide for small loans like that.

Mr. ILSLEY: Mr. Chairman, I will deal with the questions that have been asked in so far as I can remember them. The hon. member for Souris (Mr. Ross) asked if I could give the rate that would be charged on money borrowed from the Industrial Development bank. No rate is specified in the act and the rate will vary with the risk and type of loan. The hon. member asked whether the advantages of this legislation will be available to those occupying farms on which there are liens with respect to old age pensions. The answer is yes; the advantages of this legislation will be available to the occupants of those farms. This does not mean that everybody who comes to the bank for a loan will automatically get it. That will be a matter for the judgment of the bank. It is hoped that the fact that the government is assuming part of the risk will make for freer and wider lending for these particular purposes than the banks have been prepared to enter upon up to the moment.

The hon. member for Souris also asked whether $250,000,000 is all that may be lent, subject to the guarantee provisions of this measure. The answer is in the affirmative. The banks may not expand that to the extent of the repaid loans. That is, if they lend $250,000,000 and $100,000,000 is paid back within three years, it would not be considered that they had lent only $150,000,000; it would be considered that they had lent $250,000,000. That is a lot of money, but if the plan was working well and the money ran out I assume that future parliaments would take such steps as they thought were in the public interest to increase the amount available.

Mr. ROSS (Souris): There was the question of whether the guarantee applied to a bank, like the Royal Bank of Canada, or just to a particular branch or to an individual.

Mr. ILSLEY: It applies to the bank, not to the branch.

Mr. ROSS (Souris): Ten per cent of their total loans?

Mr. ILSLEY: That is right; ten per cent of the total loans.

The hon. member for Macdonald (Mr. Weir) expressed the hope that in districts where branches have been closed down or where there are inadequate facilities, necessary facilities will be supplied. I cannot give any undertaking on behalf of the banks. I dealt with this matter in the speech I made on the Bank Act, and I quote from page 2556 of Hansard as follows:

> It also seems to me the reasonable expectation that the banks will only be too ready to reopen branches in any community where there is any prospect of the branches being self-sustaining.

If as a result of this legislation the banks are able to increase their business and have a prospect of doing a reasonably profitable business, I am quite sure that there would be every reasonable expectation that they would establish branches in those communities where they have been closed or where branches are not now established.

The hon. member for Macdonald expressed the hope that one result of this legislation would be a reduction in the cost of agricultural implements. That is our hope and expectation. The cost of credit for the purchase of agricultural implements from the implement companies is higher than the cost of credit to be extended under this measure. It is expected and believed that one of the most beneficial features of this measure will be the reduction in the cost of credit for the purchase of agricultural implements.

The hon. member for Macdonald also expressed the hope that credit would be made available for the building of homes for hired help. That is an objective we had in mind, an objective which I think will be attained.

The hon. member for Charlevoix-Saguenay (Mr. Dorion) suggested that something should be done to bring the advantages of this legislation to farmers who live in districts far distant from bank branches. I do not know what can be done and the hon. member has made no suggestion. He will have to deal with the bank in that connection. As I say, he has made no suggestions.

Mr. DORION: We will make some when the bill is before us.

Mr. ILSLEY: I shall be glad to receive them. Money for seed is normally obtained on a short-term loan and no further facilities are required. For the most part the type of loan contemplated under this legislation is the intermediate loan, the loan which, as the hon. member for Macdonald said, comes between the short-term and the long-term loan which is secured on real estate, the ordinary mortgage loan.

At six o'clock the committee took recess.

After Recess

The committee resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. BRYCE: The two hon. members from Manitoba who preceded me have asked some questions I had intended to ask, and the minister has already answered them. I should, however, like to know whether the minister intends to include a crop failure clause in the bill which will shortly be introduced. Such a clause is absolutely essential. Because of the troubles which the western farmer has experienced, not only in the distant past but right up to the present time, he has had to pay some small loans three and four times over. The situation which the minister mentioned with reference to cream separators is pretty well taken care of to-day by the farmer himself, by the establishment of credit unions; but so far as other loans are concerned, which are perhaps a little larger and extend over some time, I am sure the minister understands the difficulty a farmer finds himself in when, having agreed to pay for something in three years, he gets two bad crops in succession, and has nothing with which to pay, no matter how anxious he is to meet his debts. There should be added to the proposed bill or incorporated in it a crop failure clause whereby things would stand until a crop comes along.

Regarding interest rates, I am disappointed that the figure of five per cent has been mentioned. Mr. Donald G. McKenzie, of Winnipeg, speaking before the reconstruction committee, asked for adequate credit at low rates of interest to deserving farmers. To-day I or any other farmer in Manitoba can go to a bank and get credit at five or six per cent.

Mr. ROSS (Souris): Five per cent.

Mr. BRYCE: This part of the measure will be of no advantage unless the interest rate is lowered. I do not know what amount of research the minister has done into conditions in other countries which have established cheap agricultural credits; but, as Mr. McKenzie pointed out, it is essential that we have cheaper credits, or service at cost, the government providing for what profit is necessary. The minister said that "earnings must be sufficient to cover the bank's costs of operation and to give them an incentive to go out after business." The banks are to have their profit first.

The minister also said that this is a thorny problem and that the government intends to initiate discussions with the leading companies at once so that suitable agreements can be worked out in advance of the coming into force of the act. The minister there refers to the agricultural implement companies and the banks. I am sure that these organizations not only see the writing on the wall, but see it in neon lights—that the farmer, by organizing and building up more and more strongly his credit unions, is going to be a menace to the banking system in the operation of short-term credits. The implement companies at the same time see the threat of Cooperative Implements Limited coming along after the war. No doubt the banks and the implement companies are anxious that legislation of this kind shall go through.

I ask the minister, where do tenant farmers come in on this list? Most of them are men who lost their farms in the thirties and are anxious to be reestablished in the various provinces. I understood the minister to say some time ago that a measure would be introduced to cover the case of farmers and fishermen. Will the farmer who fishes in the winter come under this measure, or will he have to wait until the legislation with respect to fishermen becomes law?

Regarding live stock, I hope that when the arrangements are put into motion they will apply not only to pure bred live stock but also to grade animals; because it would be all right for sires to be pure bred, but so far as dairy cows are concerned it would have to apply to grade animals.

Those are all the questions I have at this time, although I may speak on this subject at a later date.

Mr. ILSLEY: There is no crop failure provision in the bill as drafted. That matter can be considered by the banking and commerce committee. I do not know whether such a provision would be practicable or not. I think it is a matter which would have to be provided for by regulation under the powers to be conferred by the bill rather than by a provision of the bill itself.

Another question was, does a farmer come under this legislation if he fishes in the winter? I think the definition of "farmer" would be wide enough to cover that case. The bill will be before the house, of course, after this resolution goes through.

The hon. gentleman also asked whether the tenant farmer would be eligible for the loans to be made under this measure. The answer is that if he is a dirt farmer he will; and that raises a very important question of principle, because we have gone that way rather than the other way in the bill; we have provided that the occupier rather than the owner of the farm will be entitled to the provisions of the bill. That shuts out the landlord and lets in the tenant.

The hon. gentleman made some other observations, but so far as I know those are all his questions.

Mr. CHURCH: While I support the principle of this measure for the provision of intermediate term and short-term credit to the farmers of this country, I believe it would have been better if the minister had not written it into the Bank Act. In my opinion the proposed bill will be serviceable in a great many cases, but it looks to me as though the guarantee principle of ten per cent will make the chartered banks of this country a farm development finance corporation. Every good citizen has always supported very liberal terms for the farming community, protection all along the line; measures such as the Farmers' Creditors Arrangement Act, and many other forms of assistance, through bonuses, subventions and subsidies, have commended themselves to the country. The provisions of the Farmers' Creditors Arrangement Act were afterwards applied to fishermen. I contend that the measure now before us should also have included provisions for industrial workers. The experience of the minister has borne out what I felt from the start would be true as regards the home improvement loans, of which the banks advanced $55,000,000 from November, 1936 to October, 1940. The government guaranteed up to fifteen per cent, but in fact every dollar was paid. It was a very wise proviso, and I hope it will now be extended because it is of particular value in urban and suburban areas, whereby also financial aid by the banks was promised for the stocking of fuel by consumers, the consumers placing orders with the coal dealers and the bankers advancing the money repayable each month. That has been a magnificent success; there has been only one bad debt. The minister gave a very fine statement on Tuesday night as regards these new forms of loans.

As hon. members know, I have contended for many years that there has not been very liberal treatment to the man who has a small retail store which is subject to war-time controls, or to the small manufacturer or small wholesaler. I have very little hope after the discussion in this chamber that the proposed industrial bank will ever meet the situation so far as the retailer, the manufacturer and the wholesaler who are in a small way of business are concerned.

I am sorry that the minister has not seen fit to announce a liberal extension of the Home Improvement Act. Thousands of houses are needed not only in the urban and suburban areas but in the country as well, and we are not going to catch up with the shortage unless we do something definite about it. When this measure goes to the banking and commerce committee I should like to see this matter considered so that arrangements can be made for small house building on a long term policy for advancing money through the banks or by means of some amendments to the Home Improvement Act, whereby an equivalent amount of $250,000,000 could be provided for a period of from three to five years, for the purpose I have indicated, as the government is providing under the amendments to the legislation before us.

At page 3608 the minister said:

> For these reasons it is proposed that the guarantee should be effective in respect of a maximum of $250,000,000 of loans made within a period of three years.

I should like to see that extended to take in small houses for soldiers, and white-collar workers and industrial workers, a large number of whom are soldiers, so that they might be enabled to acquire small houses under the Home Improvement Act, at a reasonable rate of interest of 5 per cent. The minister said further at page 3609:

> It is interesting to observe that the subcommittee on agricultural policy of the advisory committee on reconstruction, headed by Donald G. McKenzie of Winnipeg, in its final report recommended:
> "That the dominion government make a careful survey of the schemes for providing short-term and intermediate credit now in force in other countries, with a view to making provision for adequate credit at low rates of interest to deserving farmers, using as far as possible existing facilities, including the chartered banks of Canada."

I quote again from the minister's remarks, at page 3608:

> First, as to purpose: the object of the scheme is to provide the credit needed by farmers to increase the efficiency of their farming operations and to enable them to make their farm homes more comfortable and attractive. With this in view, it is proposed that the guarantee should apply to loans made for the purchase of farm implements and farm equipment, for rural electrification, for the purchase of live stock, for fencing and drainage, for the repair, alteration and construction of farm buildings and for other farm improvement purposes that may later be specified in the regulations. The categories are very broad and include nearly every kind of permanent improvement to a farm or farm home.

Then he goes on to speak of eligibility for loans. I submit that instead of writing paragraphs f, g, h and i, of subsection 1, into the new Bank act, the same arrangement could have been made, as in the case of the home improvement act, and the same purpose achieved by making an agreement accordingly with the chartered banks, which are now before parliament seeking a ten-year renewal of their charters.

I am glad to see that something is being done with regard to the electrification of the farms. One of the greatest achievements of the Ontario hydro electric scheme, under Sir James Whitney and Sir Adam Beck, was that it brought the joy of living to the farmers of that province through the electrification of the rural areas. In Sir Adam Beck's own barns, on almost the first power secured, I saw the use of electricity fully illustrated. As I say, the electrification of the farms in Ontario brought to the farmers the full joy of living that electricity gave to the people in the cities. Now that that has been accomplished on a large scale in Ontario with rural lines by direct subsidy, the rural sections of the province have been given at very low cost electrical service for all the requirements of the farm.

I am sorry to see the proposals with regard to the Bank Act so far as real estate is concerned. I refer particularly to sections 82 and 88, the latter being amended by this particular resolution. By section 82 it is provided that no bank shall hold real estate or movable property except such as is required for its own use. The building must be commensurate with the size of the business, and no bank is allowed to erect a building of thirty or forty stories. This provision, however, is circumvented by having some lawyer draft an agreement for some kind of holding company, indirectly and, as I said, illegally. In that way the section is got around. By section 82, with regard to real estate, any bank property such as I have described is held for seven years and after that it reverts to the crown and anyone can bring action to have that section enforced. But there are large buildings and skyscrapers all over Canada.

As regards section 88, I think it is very dangerous to open up the Bank Act to the extent proposed. We have the Macmillan report for guidance, and I can find in that report nothing that would justify the very wide open door we have here. Many of the provisions of the proposed legislation will alter the whole basis on which these loans are made. In Toronto there are seventeen trust companies, many loan companies and corporations, insurance companies, the chartered banks and the shark loan companies. Under this legislation I should like to see every industrial worker, small retailer, small wholesaler and small manufacturer given some relief from the system of shark loans. I should like to see the shark loan companies wound up and liquidated and the work they are carrying on transferred to the chartered banks or the industrial bank or come under a new measure like this one, or under the Home Improvement Act, so that there might be equality of treatment as between farmers and urban and suburban workers and the small manufacturer and retailer, in regard to credit. If that were done there would be no more two per cent per month, or twenty-four per cent per annum, for all these small people to pay. The shark loan companies are exploiting the small man, and I submit that we should also do everything in our power to protect from these agencies the soldiers who are coming back. I suggest that an agreement could have been made with the banks.

I hope the banking committee will consider what I have said here and elsewhere many times and put the people to whom I have referred on a basis of equality with other classes in the community, who are now preferred. There is one thing about the present Minister of Finance, and I will say this in his favour. I am glad to see that he has not overlooked committees of the house, as the Minister of Munitions and Supply (Mr. Howe) does. That minister seems to be a law unto himself when it comes to some of the bills in which he is interested. The Minister of Finance, on the other hand, is quite willing to meet a committee of the house and he does not mind having the proposals of his technical officers examined by any committee. Not so the other department to which I have referred. The rules of the house should be amended accordingly to apply to all such large proposals.

I will say this in conclusion, that there is great demand that something be done by the banks and by the government in connection with housing, including the farms. Under the definition of land everything is included up to the sky—buildings, farms, everything else. No doubt the same definition will be given under the amendments to the act. I venture to say that when some of those loans are applied for, the chartered banks will insist, under section 88 and others, on collateral security. They will insist that agreements for sale, mortgages and other forms of collateral, such as deeds and insurance policies, be deposited with them, so that in the event of the loan not being paid those deposits can be liquidated. I believe that will prove to be so, and it will be so in so far as the Industrial Development bank is concerned.

When the committee considers this measure I hope that it will consider whether we should open this door wide open for real estate investments by banks and make what should have been arranged by agreement, part of the Bank Act. Once this gets into the Bank Act you will never get it out; it is there to stay. In any revision ten years hence paragraphs (f), (g), (h) and subsection 1 and so on included in this measure will remain.

Mr. BLACK (Cumberland): I am in general agreement with the purposes of this legislation and I wish to commend the minister for introducing it. I think all parties are in agreement with the purpose. Most agriculturalists from my part of Canada have not so much difficulty in getting credit, although in many instances it is needed. What they require more than credit is a satisfactory market for their production. Our farmers should have earnings at least fifty per cent greater than they have been able to obtain over a period of years in order that they might be prosperous enough to avail themselves of the new credit facilities that will be provided by this measure.

I notice that it provides for the financing of agricultural implements. Costs of agricultural implements in Nova Scotia are too high.

I believe they are greater than in other parts of Canada. I know they are greater than in central Canada. Central Canada gets the benefit of producing those agricultural implements, the benefits of wages, material, and all the incidental business that goes with them, while we pay the higher cost. On Monday a return was brought down at my request with respect to the higher cost of bicycles in the maritime provinces. What applies to bicycles applies to agricultural implements as well. I would say that, in fairness to the maritime provinces, prices of bicycles and prices of farm machinery should be uniform. The people of Nova Scotia should not have to pay a higher price than the people of central Canada.

The return to which I referred shows that a man's bicycle costs in all parts of Ontario and Quebec $42.50. Some parts of those provinces have just as expensive a freight rate as the maritime provinces. A lady's bicycle costs $43.50. What do we find in Nova Scotia, New Brunswick and Prince Edward Island? A man's bicycle costs $45, and a lady's $46, or $2.50 per bicycle additional, about five and a half per cent more.

It is my view that farmers and others in the outlying parts of Canada who do not have the benefit of the labour, material and business that go with the production of farm implements, bicycles and articles of that kind they require, should at least be accorded the same price when they have to buy them and they should not have to pay higher prices.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: You will never get that from Ontario.

Mr. BLACK (Cumberland): This measure will also provide for additional financial facilities for the improvement and construction of new buildings. That is fine. We are all in favour of that; but I would suggest to the Minister of Finance that he should at the same time take the sales tax off the cost of lumber, paint and other supplies that go into the cost of these farm buildings. Interest on the loans will amount to five per cent; the sales tax is eight per cent. That means a cost of thirteen per cent added on to the materials that go into these farm buildings; therefore the farmer is not able economically to borrow the money and make such investments, because the cost is too great, unless the sales tax can be removed. If the farmer wishes to build a henhouse or an addition to his barn or his house or to supply storm windows the cost is eight per cent for sales tax, and if he has to borrow the money he must pay five per cent, which makes a charge the first year of thirteen per cent. I would say, Mr. Chairman, that an undertaking on the part of the minister that the sales tax will be removed on farm improvements should go hand in hand with this measure. If that cannot be done during war time an assurance should be given that the sales tax will be removed immediately on the termination of the war when we expect these new financing provisions will be made use of to assist the farmer and give employment to help reestablish many returned men after the war. This legislation will be a benefit not only to farmers all over Canada but to workingmen and merchants in the towns and cities and to manufacturers generally. I make that suggestion to the minister. I am in favour of this legislation. And I think it will be appreciated by the agriculturists, but I think it should go farther than the terms of the proposed bill.

Mr. BLACKMORE: I think all hon. members of the committee will support the general principle of this legislation. It is advisable to provide for allowing farmers easier credit conditions for medium and short-term loans, but I think we must not overlook this important fact, that the fundamental difficulty we are going to face in the years during the war and in the post-war period is that of purchasing power in the hands of the people to enable them to buy the goods which the farmers are able to produce. Thus far the minister has not brought in any measure designed to provide such purchasing power. That is an exceedingly important matter. If there is not sufficient purchasing power in the hands of the people of Canada to enable them to buy the goods which the farmer produces, then there will be the grievous danger of a fall in prices; and if the prices of the product that the farmer produces, and the markets fall low enough, then these loans will be unrepayable. All that they will do is constitute a millstone round the necks of the farmers. All through the western Canadian provinces we are suffering grievously because the farmers obtained credit when there were reasonable prices for products and then were required to repay the loans when the bottom had fallen out of the market. Thus far there is simply no provision before parliament to prevent the bottom from falling out of the market. Of course it is suggested that the government propose floor prices. We have no idea how high those floor prices are to be. What precaution is to be taken against the floor prices being so low that the farmers, after they have paid the cost of production, will be unable to make a living on the farm?

My general criticism of all the minister's measures thus far is along the line I have indicated; there is not sufficient provision for internal purchasing power to enable the people to buy the goods which the producers of Canada will be able to produce in abundance, and there is no adequate provision for fixing prices which will be remunerative to the producers.

May I now turn to a matter which came up just before the dinner recess The minister asked what could be done to make sure that the farmers in any given area would be able to obtain loans, following the remarks of the hon. member for Charlevoix-Saguenay who asked how the government were going to provide that farmers in every area would be able to obtain loans. I should like to offer this suggestion, that one good way to help attain that objective will be to permit the creation of provincial banks. No governing body in the Dominion of Canada is more concerned about seeing that the farmers in Nova Scotia obtain loans than is the government of Nova Scotia, and the same is true with respect to every province in this dominion. If you want to be sure that the farmers in any particular area are going to have the opportunity to get the credit they need, one way to bring about that result will be to allow the provinces to have provincial banks. Let the minister bear that in mind when he comes to consider the petition of Alberta for a provincial bank. I believe one great difficulty that has been developing during the last three or four generations in Canada is the centralization of the control of credit. That control must be decentralized. The credit union has done a good bit toward helping farmers in local areas to get credit, but the credit union is too small to accomplish the total objective, and its development is rather too slow. I have all respect for those who advocate credit unions; I know something about them and appreciate their value, but this whole matter of the control of credit must be put into the hands of the people whose interests are directly concerned. I submit that to have the control of the credit of Saskatchewan placed in the hands of a group of men living in Ontario and Quebec is not likely to provide the credit needed in Saskatchewan.

Perhaps anything else I have to say can be said at a later stage of the bill.

Mr. GILLIS: I want to ask the minister one question in order to determine what will be my attitude in this debate. As I understand it, all that the minister is asking now is the right to introduce a bill.

Mr. ILSLEY: That is correct.

Mr. GILLIS: In my opinion to attempt to discuss a bill before you see it or know anything about it is a wrong procedure.

Mr. ILSLEY: Hear, hear.

[Mr. Blackmore.]

Mr. GILLIS: The memory of some hon. members is very short. Every afternoon at three o'clock the leader of the opposition rises in his place and pleads with us to expedite the business of the house, because the war is so serious; and that is right. This afternoon the Prime Minister pointed out specifically, I thought, the bad habit that has grown up of doing exactly what we have been doing all day and so far this evening. Therefore I should like to know if it is the intention of the minister to put this resolution through and give the bill second reading to-night, if that should be possible.

Mr. ILSLEY: It is my intention to introduce the bill and move first reading, and then move second reading after hon. members have had a chance to read it.

Mr. GILLIS: Then I shall defer my discussion until such time as I know something about what I am discussing.

Resolution reported, read the second time and concurred in, Mr. Ilsley thereupon moved for leave to introduce bill No. 134, to encourage the provision of intermediate term and short-term credit to farmers for the improvement and development of farms, and for the improvement of living conditions thereon.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

DOMINION ELECTIONS

MEASURE TO ENABLE WAR SERVICE PERSONNEL TO VOTE IN GENERAL ELECTION

Hon. N. A. McLARTY (Secretary of State) moved that the house go into committee to consider the following resolution:

That it is expedient to bring in a measure to provide regulations enabling persons (to be described as Canadian war service electors) to exercise their franchise and the Canadian prisoners of war to vote by proxy at any general election held during the present war; and also to provide amendments to the Dominion Elections Act, 1938, consequential to such regulations; and to provide further that any expenses incurred in the carrying out of the said measure shall be paid out of unappropriated moneys in the consolidated revenue fund of Canada.

Motion agreed to and the house went into committee, Mr. Bradette in the chair.

Mr. GREEN: As hon. members know, a special committee was appointed to consider the whole question of the best method to provide votes for the men and women in the forces. That committee brought in a report which will be found in Votes and Proceedings of April 28, and which contains various recommendations. Will the minister tell us whether or not the recommendations have been accepted in full and, if not in full, in what way they have been varied?

Mr. McLARTY: I wonder if the hon. member is referring to the specific regulations adopted by the special committee dealing with war service electors. If he is, they have been adopted in full, as have the provisions which were recommended by the special committee in connection with granting votes by proxy to prisoners of war and those interned in neutral countries. I wonder if that answers the hon. gentleman.

Mr. GREEN: Apparently the regulations have been adopted in full?

Mr. McLARTY: That is correct.

Mr. GREEN: Without any variation?

Mr. McLARTY: There might be the change of a word, but nothing material.

Mr. GREEN: What about the other recommendations? One was that the regulations should apply to any election held during the war or within six months thereafter.

Mr. McLARTY: That has been adopted.

Mr. GREEN: I notice that in the resolution as it appears on the order paper there is no reference to the period of six months after the war.

Mr. McLARTY: Perhaps the reason is that the bill itself contains certain provisions. Schedule A to the bill will be found to contain the regulations as passed by the special committee. Schedule B is also attached. That deals with the resolutions which, in effect, were dealt with by the special committee, but were not considered verbatim by that committee. The regulations of themselves provide that they will be operative only during the period of the present war, and within six months of its termination.

Resolution reported, read the second time and concurred in. Mr. McLarty thereupon moved for leave to introduce bill No. 135, to provide regulations enabling Canadian war service electors to exercise their franchise, and Canadian prisoners of war to vote by proxy, at any general election held during the present war, also to provide amendments to the Dominion Elections Act, 1938, which are consequential to such regulations, or have become necessary by the advent of the said war.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

Mr. GRAYDON: Is this bill printed?

Mr. McLARTY: Yes, it is.

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS

PROVISION TO MEET CERTAIN EXPENDITURES AND GUARANTEE OF SECURITIES AND INDEBTEDNESS

Hon. J. L. ILSLEY (Minister of Finance) moved that the house go into committee to consider the following resolution:

That it is expedient to bring in a measure to authorize the Canadian National Railway Company to issue securities not exceeding $10,549,500 in principal amount to provide the moneys necessary to meet capital expenditures made or capital indebtedness incurred during the calendar year 1944; to make provision for the purchase or refunding of capital obligations of the company, or of any company comprised of the Canadian National Railway system, during the said calendar year and for the issue of substituted securities for such purpose; to authorize the governor in council to guarantee the principal, interest and sinking funds of securities issued by the company for the purpose aforesaid; to authorize the making of temporary loans to the said company secured by such securities and not exceeding $10,549,500 in principal amount to enable the said company to meet such expenditures and indebtedness; with authority to give financial aid and assistance to other companies of the said national system.

Motion agreed to and the house went into committee, Mr. Bradette in the chair.

Resolution reported, read the second time and concurred in. Mr. Ilsley thereupon moved for leave to introduce bill No. 136, to authorize the provision of moneys to meet certain capital expenditures made and capital indebtedness incurred by the Canadian National Railways system during the calendar year 1944, and to authorize the guarantee by His Majesty of certain securities to be issued by the Canadian National Railway Company.

Motion agreed to.

Mr. ILSLEY moved the first reading of the bill.

Mr. KNOWLES: Would the minister make an explanatory statement?

Mr. SPEAKER: The first reading is not debatable.

Mr. KNOWLES: I merely asked for an explanation of the bill.

Mr. ILSLEY: Mr. Speaker, I would have been in order, on motion for leave to introduce. However, if I am in order now I would say that this is just the annual bill which provides the Canadian National Railway Company with capital requirements for the year.

Mr. BLACK (Cumberland): Has the minister details of those capital requirements?

Mr. ILSLEY: I am not in order if I give that now. I can do that in committee on the bill.

Mr. SPEAKER: The motion is on the first reading.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first and second times.

Mr. ILSLEY moved that the house go into committee on the bill.

Mr. GORDON GRAYDON (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, before you leave the chair, may I say that the minister has suggested that we should have second reading of the bill. I have no objection to that, but I should like to have the bill in the hands of every member before we go into committee. The principle involved is one which requires little or no discussion in the house, but perhaps the details will require discussion in committee of the whole. For that purpose it would be necessary to have a bill before us. I have grave doubts as to whether or not it has been printed.

An hon. MEMBER: It is on the desk.

Mr. GRAYDON: I do not know how that can be, because it was introduced only a few minutes ago. I am sure it could not be on our desks.

Mr. ILSLEY: I do not see how it could be, either.

Mr. SPEAKER: Then the house will go into committee at the next meeting.

Mr. GRAYDON: I think that would be sufficient, if we have the bill by then.

Mr. SPEAKER: It is the pleasure of the house, then, that the house will go into committee at the next sitting?

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes.

Mr. GRAYDON: Could the minister not make his statement now? It is important that that should go on the record.

Mr. ILSLEY: We can do this: We can go into committee on the bill; I can make the statement and then move that the committee rise, report progress and ask leave to sit again. Is that satisfactory?

Mr. GRAYDON: Yes.

Motion agreed to and the house went into committee, Mr. Bradette in the chair.

Section 1 agreed to.

On section 2—Power to issue securities for capital expenditures.

Mr. ILSLEY: This bill is for the purpose of providing authority for the capital expenditures of the railway system and the retirement of miscellaneous maturing obligations, either by way of loan from the dominion or by the issue of securities of the company to the public and guaranteed by the dominion. The total amount to be provided for this purpose is limited to $10,549,500, divided as follows:

Additions and betterments (less retirements)	$18,611,500
Additions of securities	1,921,000
Retirement of maturing capital obligations, including sinking fund and equipment principal payments	9,117,000
	$29,649,500
Less: Available from reserves for depreciation and debt discount amortization	19,100,000
	$10,549,500

The capital budget as set out above was approved by the standing committee on railways. While total loans, if all expenditures are made, will aggregate $10,549,500, the net increase in the debt of the railway company will be only $1,432,500, since $9,117,000 will be used to retire obligations at present outstanding.

Loans have been made under similar acts in previous years for capital purposes and retirement of maturing obligations as follows:

1934	10,747,973 98
1935	7,293,065 84
1936	7,011,230 75
1937	11,035,032 61
1938	10,737,216 07
1939	12,442,552 40
1940	7,572,579 77

The loans made from the years 1932 to 1937 and $9,019,207.17 of the advances made in 1938 have been repaid out of the proceeds of dominion government guaranteed railway issues. The remainder of the advances under the 1938 act, namely, $1,718,008.90, and the advances in 1939, 1940, 1941 and 1942 have been paid out of the cash surpluses of the Canadian National Railways. No advances were required in 1943 because the total disbursements were less than the amount available from reserves for depreciation and debt discount amortization. Accordingly, the railway company refunded $5,877,327 to be applied to loans from the dominion government under the Refunding Act, 1938.

The general procedure followed in issuing Canadian National Railways dominion guaranteed loans is that loans outstanding under various authorities—the government is authorized to make loans to the railway under certain other legislation in addition to the Financing and Guarantee Act—are determined and such of these loans as it is deemed advisable to repay in view, among other considerations, of the total amount in relation to the condition of the bond market, are lumped together in one round sum; a railway issue is sold in that amount, and the proceeds are applied to the repayment of the loans.

No railway issues have been sold since the outbreak of war. The last guaranteed issue was that of January 15, 1939, in the amount of $50,000,000 This issue was comprised of two maturities: $15,000,000 seven-year 2¼ per cent bonds sold at 99·00 to yield 2·40 per cent and $35,000,000 twenty-year 3 per cent bonds sold at 97·25 to yield 3·19 per cent.

I have a list of the loans outstanding which I can give if desired, but I think that will be sufficient to give anyone who desires to study the bill an idea of its purpose.

Mr. FRASER (Peterborough West): You might put the list of the loans on Hansard without reading it.

Mr. ILSLEY: I will put them on Hansard at this stage.

The CHAIRMAN: By unanimous consent.

Mr. ILSLEY: The following are the loans outstanding from the government to the railway company at April 15, 1944, under various authorities:

Canadian National Railways Refunding Act, 1938.....	$ 94,841,705 71
Financing and Guarantee Act, 1940, purchase of G.T.R. 4 per cent perp. con. deb. stock....	107,596,832 25
Financing and Guarantee Act, 1940—purchase of securities from Canadian holders.....	8,643,331 44
Financing and Guarantee Act, 1942—purchase of securities from Canadian holders.....	18,262,597 75
The War Appropriation (United Kingdom financing) Act, 1942—repatriation of securities..	255,035,927 81
The War Appropriation Act, 1941—working capital advances	13,906,927 81
	$498,287,322 77

Mr. ADAMSON: This does not include any equipment trust funds?

Mr. ILSLEY: I had better leave the answer to that question until the next day in order to make sure.

Progress reported.

SURPLUS CROWN ASSETS

PROVISION FOR CORPORATION AND ADVISORY COMMITTEE

Hon. C. D. HOWE (Minister of Munitions and Supply) moved that the house go into committee to consider the following resolution:

That it is expedient to introduce legislation:

To confer authority upon a corporation to be established thereunder, to sell, exchange or otherwise dispose of, hold, manage, recondition, or otherwise deal with surplus crown assets, and to confer certain powers upon the Minister of Munitions and Supply and the governor in council in relation thereto including the power to establish an advisory committee;

To provide also that authority be given the governor in council to authorize the Minister of Finance to pay or advance to the corporation, from time to time. working capital from unappropriated moneys in the consolidated revenue fund; with provision for the deposit by the corporation to the credit of the consolidated revenue fund of Canada of all moneys received by it, except moneys paid or advanced to it on account of working capital and such percentage of all other moneys received by it as the governor in council may from time to time determine as being necessary to defray the administrative costs or other expenses of the corporation;

And to provide further for the payment of the salary of the president of the corporation and the chairman of the committee, and fees and salaries of persons in the employ or service of the minister, the committee or corporation.

Mr. GORDON GRAYDON (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, before you leave the chair I should like to say a few words. This resolution presages a piece of legislation as important as almost any piece of legislation we shall have passed this session, outside the war appropriation bill itself. If the minister is in position to give some statement while the legislation is in the resolution stage, the house would appreciate it as well as the country. We should have a statement with respect to the government's policy and what the bill proposes to do. The question of the distribution and sale of surplus crown assets is one which is engaging the attention of the whole nation at the moment because of the present situation. Could the minister oblige the house by giving a full statement at this stage?

Mr. HOWE: Mr. Speaker, the procedure for the disposal of surplus crown assets has been worked out over a short period. It was set up by order in council and we have had some three months in which to assay the efficiency of the programme. First, there is the determination of surplus property. This determination is made by a surplus crown assets committee which is made up of representatives of each of the departments of government which is concerned with the disposal. The membership of the committee consists of representatives of the three armed services, of the Department of Public Works, of the Department of Pensions and National Health, of the Department of Munitions and Supply, of the Department of Trade and Commerce, of the Department of Finance and of one or two others. In addition there are representatives of the farmers, of labour and of the consumer. The committee is a policy committee.

Anything that any department may declare to be surplus is reported to the committee. The representatives of the government on the committee are senior civil servants of the rank of deputy minister or assistant deputy minister. The material is reported as surplus to the committee and the committee decides, first, whether the material should be disposed of and whether it is really surplus to government requirements. The various departments of government are represented and if a department can show that it can usefully use the material, this is noted by the committee.

The committee represents various walks of life and various departments of government and it recommends the policy that shall be followed in the disposal of the article. The matter is then referred by the committee to the Minister of Munitions and Supply with the recommendation, first, that the property should be disposed of and, second, as to what priorities should be given. These may include the provinces, the municipalities, and the various public agencies or otherwise as a means of disposal to the public. The recommendations of the committee are noted and an order in council is prepared.

The recommendation is made by the Minister of Munitions and Supply to council that the property should be disposed of, and as to the various priorities that should be recognized in the disposal of the property. If council approves the disposal of the particular property the title passes to a corporation known as War Assets Corporation. This is a corporation in the ordinary form. Its directorate includes business men of varied experience and a representative of labour, whose composite judgment cover the field of disposal in many avenues. The president is a man who has been with the Department of Munitions and Supply as director general of its Washington office since the commencement of the war; before that he was an experienced contractor and president of a steel company, a man with wide experience in purchasing various materials and one who has a good knowledge of the avenues of disposal.

The material or equipment passes to this corporation. The corporation is bound by the recommendation which goes forward to it from the committee at Ottawa, as to priorities. It may be material or equipment which should be rendered into scrap; if so, it is rendered into scrap through the agency of the corporation and sold as scrap. If it is possible to recondition the material or equipment and sell it in its original state, that is carried out.

The corporation will have a number of advisory committees. These will be formed as required, and the advice of the industry within which the material falls is asked. It may not always be followed, but at least it is at hand as a guide. If the material can be used in its original form, the purpose of the corporation is to make that material available as widely across Canada as possible. Motor cars, for instance, are not offered for auction in one city; a price is placed upon them and they are shipped to various centres in Canada and sold, so that each section of the country may have the same opportunity as any other to buy. If it is scrap it is sold on the scrap market at a ceiling price imposed by the wartime prices and trade board. That board, by the way, is represented on the disposal committee, and its advice is sent forward together with the advice of representatives of the department and representatives of the public that I have named.

The experience to date is on a limited scale. Hon. members will realize that, while disposal in future will be a job of the greatest magnitude, at the present time it is fairly limited, but experience is being built up through such use as is being made of the machinery at the present time. When the bill is before the house for second reading I will table a report of the disposal on machinery up to the end of May which will give hon. members a fair idea of the methods used to date and the results obtained. Our experience so far is such that I believe that the machinery provided by the bill which is now being brought before the house will be the best that can be devised for the huge job of disposal which will follow the end of hostilities. When the bill is before the house we shall be able to discuss the machinery in detail. I may say that the study of disposal in this country runs parallel with the studies being conducted in the United States. Our machinery was set up some months before the machinery was established in the United States, but it is a matter of interest to me that the disposal in that country operates almost exactly in the manner which had previously been established for Canada. Those responsible for the disposal in Canada work closely with those similarly responsible in the United States. The methods are compared, and if it is a matter of export the opinion of the United States is obtained, just as the United States obtain the opinion of Canada if they have material to export.

We have exported a considerable amount of surplus material under very satisfactory arrangements. Later on, the scope of the disposal must be extended to the United Kingdom. Obviously a great deal of Canadian material will have to be disposed of in that country, and we are conducting studies with the United Kingdom government to make sure that the methods for disposal of Canadian materials shall parallel the methods which will be established in Great Britain.

I do not know that I can usefully say anything further. I shall be glad to answer any questions, but I suggest to hon. members that we can most profitably discuss this subject when the bill is before the house.

Mr. J. R. MacNICOL: According to a dispatch in one of the evening papers, a debate took place in the old country parliament to-day, when an hon. member called the attention of the Prime Minister to what happened after the last war in the matter of purchase of German ships, an operation which, according to the hon. member, resulted in great disasters to employment in the British shipbuilding industry. The hon. member asked the Prime Minister if such a condition would prevail after the present war. The Prime Minister intimated that many mistakes were made after the last war, but this was one which would not be repeated.

In looking over the resolution, I notice that the corporation which is to be set up is to be authorized to "sell, exchange or otherwise dispose of, hold, manage, re-condition, or otherwise deal with surplus crown assets." I have been wondering whether such a committee should not have some authority over the buying of scrap material or other material from other countries, because we shall have a large amount of material to be sold in this country, and we have plants here with a capacity far beyond our peace-time requirements, plants which will have to be demobilized in an orderly way. This I know from what I personally have seen in the plants I visited, and it seems to me that the proposed bill should call for some control over buying, too, whereby dealers in Canada would not be permitted to purchase huge stocks of cheap material, whether in Great Britain, the United States or elsewhere, and throw them on our home market. After the war, our own plants will return to their normal peace-time production; their own workmen will have to be protected, and I cannot see any other way to do so than by some control over buying. The minister said nothing about that, or I would not have risen. But I remember clearly what happened after the last war, when the business with which I was associated bought many steel boilers which were used in this and that plant, and then—

An hon. MEMBER: You had better be careful.

Mr. MacNICOL: I am always careful. I do not say anything I do not know. The firm bought many steel boilers and afterwards sold them at prices below those for which boilers of a similar capacity could be purchased from the home manufacturers. That must have had an effect on boiler production and naturally on the employment in our boiler plants. So that as far as I can see, unless there is some control over buying as well as over selling munition materials, the situation as a whole will not be taken care of. As the minister has said, in the United States they are planning and setting up a body which will to the best of their judgment carefully watch that the market is not glutted in any way and that employment is not retarded through the placing on the market of equipment which will have such effect.

The minister said something about cars. It would be an exaggeration to say that there are hundreds of thousands of motor cars stacked up across the country, but undoubtedly there is a large number. The minister did mention motor cars distributed across Canada, and we shall all be anxious to get the motor car companies engaging in that line of manufacture and everything associated with it, and the thousand and one concerns making equipment for motor cars must be got back into peace-time production as quickly as possible. If the market throughout Canada is to be glutted with thousands of war motor cars, which naturally would be sold cheaper than would cars made in the regular plants, that, too, will affect employment, will it not?

I for one will support the proposal. I have heard the names of the men who will head the company. I am not at all in favour of government companies, but I believe that this is one that possibly could manage to do a good job. In any event it will be expensive, and it will call for control to see that the market is not glutted with war material. Having heard the names of the men who are to look after the affairs of the company, I have confidence in them. They are men of great experience. The chairman, whom the minister mentioned, has had vast experience. I doubt if you could select a more capable man in the country. The others also are good men, and I have no doubt they will do the best job they can.

I do not remember clearly what programme operated after the last war. I do not think it was very good, but perhaps it was not very bad. I will not say anything against it apart from what I have said about buying used equipment for resale. But may I ask the minister this question: Has he in mind any control over the buying of material from the United States or Great Britain or from any other producing country, Australia or elsewhere, so that our market shall not be flooded with competition of surplus war goods? The minister spoke of sending our surplus goods to Great Britain. According to a debate in the British House of Commons to-day, they will take care that their market shall not be glutted with goods from other countries, and I presume that our cousins to the south of us will do the same. I am anxious that Canadian plants will not have their production retarded through competition with huge used stocks from other countries, because I want the Canadian workmen to be given the best possible opportunity to produce when the war is over. I ask this question: Has the minister in his mind some control over buying outside war surpluses?

Mr. HOWE: In answer to the hon. member, I may say that a gentleman's agreement has been arrived at with the United States, who have also set up machinery, that they will not dump their surplus goods in Canada and we shall not dump our surplus goods in that country. It is a matter of agreement between the disposal agencies in both countries. I fully anticipate that similar arrangements will be made with other countries which will be having the same problem. It is a reasonable arrangement as between countries with a common problem and I am sure it can be worked out. In the matter of disposal, there are many interests to be considered. We cannot concentrate on protecting—

Mr. SPEAKER: May I interrupt the minister. The house is considering the resolution and these questions can be answered better in committee.

Mr. HOWE: Yes, Mr. Speaker, I see that. I am sorry.

Mr. J. A. ROSS (Souris): With regard to the statement of the minister on the war assets disposal board, I want to make one observation.

An hon. MEMBER: Why not wait until we get into committee.

Mr. ROSS (Souris): This is rather important and I wish to make this statement before we get the bill.

An hon. MEMBER: Not on the resolution.

Mr. GRAYDON: He can make the statement now.

Mr. ROSS (Souris): I was pleased to hear the minister state that in the matter of priorities the provincial governments and the municipalities would be represented on the committee to which he referred and, I believe, he said the farmers as well. As a humble representative, I have had many inquiries from rural and urban municipalities as to the disposal of equipment. They would like to have road equipment and machinery at airports and other places connected with the war effort, and such things as fire-fighting apparatus. The rural municipalities would like to have the first opportunity to procure this road equipment and other machinery. Various urban centres would like to have the first opportunity to procure fire-fighting apparatus and other equipment that is of vital importance to them, and rightly our provincial governments and municipal units should have the first consideration ahead of speculators.

If these articles which this committee may decide should be disposed of could be listed with the municipal department of each provincial government, and they in turn could notify the municipal units under their jurisdiction, it would be all to the good and would be greatly appreciated by the taxpayers of the country. I wish to make that proposal at this stage of the proceedings.

Mr. T. L. CHURCH (Broadview): The experience the government will have in connection with these crown plants will follow the experience we had after the great war and other wars the world over in connection with a venture like this. I do not hesitate to say, Mr. Speaker, that the country will never get any reasonable return on the investment involved and some crown plants should have been left to private enterprise. The minister hopes to make a deal with regard to the surplus assets and he confers on the corporation power to spend more capital and to dispose of, hold, manage and re-condition these plants. Again I say they will never have any reasonable return on investments in the past or from the proposed policy of the government in the future in regard to captial advanced. Many of these undertakings have been constructed in an uneconomic way and they have dragged in some municipalities in the building of certain roads, sewers, pavements, water supply and all that sort of thing. I have seen some of the crown plants and I do not believe that business of this kind can be run on an economic basis. When the war is over, a great many of them will be obsolete and not worth much from a commercial point of view. They will be uneconomic, and it will not be possible to operate some of them commercially. Many of them will be worthless. We had an experience of that in the last war with the merchant marine. We constructed many plants throughout Canada and some ships cost $1,750,000. They ran all the way from $1,000,000 to $2,000,000 What was the result? About a year before Munich the present minister of the department sold without tenders some of them for $50,000, although they cost $1,750,000. There was a return with a list of them made to an order of the house along that line. I doubt very much whether we shall ever get any reasonable return on some of these investments. If more capital is put into it after the war I venture to say that less will be got out of the total investment in the future than in the past.

Mr. C. E. JOHNSTON (Bow River): I am pleased that the minister is forming this Crown Assets Corporation to take charge of this material after the war, because I can see where a company of this kind can be of good service to the country. I do not agree with some of the suggestions that have been made here to-night to the effect that this material should be turned over to private concerns to sell at prices which they may set. It is government property and the government should take the proper steps, as the minister has indicated, to dispose of it.

I want to join in what the hon. member for Souris said a few moments ago about the disposal of some of this machinery. I received a resolution passed by the board of trade of the city of Drumheller with regard to this very thing. I am sorry I have not the resolution here to put on Hansard or read to the minister; but its contents are to the effect that these municipalities are desirous of obtaining some of this machinery, especially road machinery, from the assets corporation. They figure, and I think rightly so, that they will be able to get this machinery at very reasonable prices. They are of the opinion that some of this machinery will be of use to them in the construction of roads and for other purposes, and they are quite concerned about it. It may well be that some of this machinery will be practically new, or it may be, as the minister has indicated, that some of it can be repaired with very little trouble and be made very useful to the municipalities and other organizations of that kind.

I think it is proper that arrangements should be made with other countries, as the minister has indicated, so that there will be no dumping of great quantities of machinery into Canada from the United States or from Canada into other places. Let each country dispose of its own surplus material in its own way. I just wanted to mention this and to give what support I could to it along with what other hon. members have said, because municipalities are very much concerned about getting possession of some of this machinery which will be useful to them. I think the minister should indicate in a circular letter, or something like that, to the municipalities or cities that such action is being taken and, if they wish to get in touch with him, he will acquaint them with the methods of obtaining the desired material. I think that would be of great assistance to them and would give relief to what means a great deal to them.

Mr. D. G. ROSS (St. Paul's): I am very glad to see that the minister is setting up this corporation. If we did not have some corporation of this kind we would have chaos in this country. It depends to a great extent on how it is managed. The minister has said that up to the present time the machinery has been successful. I think it has been only moderately successful. There is a great deal of improvement necessary. I have great faith and confidence in the manager who, I understand, is Mr. J. B. Carswell. I have known him for many years. He is a man of great patriotic spirit, a man who could have looked after himself much better in this war if he had not been patriotic. He is a man of great ability. He is a Scotsman, by the way.

I want to see this government corporation get back to private enterprise as quickly as possible. There is only one way to judge efficiency and that is by competition. At the present time we know that some of our government plants have done splendid jobs, but we do not know at what expense. We are bound to have extravagance in war time; there is no question about that. But in peace time you cannot have efficiency and extravagance; it just does not work out. The only way you can gauge the efficiency of a firm is by the competition it meets. There are so many controls of one thing and another to-day that private enterprise no longer obtains. There is only one thing that is worth while in the production of ordinary goods and that is private enterprise. That is the way to do it. I do not say that everything should be private enterprise. We must have a combination of private and public enterprise. After all, the government is here to help private enterprise, not to run private enterprise. The sooner we get these industries back into the hands of private enterprise after the war, and not run them as government concerns, the better it will be.

Mr. M. J. EDWARDS (Calgary West): I am pleased with the acclaim with which this legislation has been received on all sides of the house, but I think lurking in the back of everybody's mind is the desirability of this, and primarily that is because of the hon. gentleman whom we all know or hope and believe will be the responsible minister of the crown administering this measure, and the company which is being set up. I refer to none other than the Minister of Munitions and Supply (Mr. Howe). It is the fact that he has done such a remarkable job in his present capacity and is likely to have charge and supervision of this measure which gives us so much confidence in what this company will be able to do in the disposal of our surplus assets. In my own home city we have already had concrete proof of what a government department can do in converting a war-time asset into civilian use and employment. Nothing could give us more confidence in Calgary as to the future success of this corporation than the demonstrated ability of the present minister who is responsible for this legislation.

But there is the thought to which the hon. member for Davenport gave expression, which was uppermost in my mind, namely, the possibility of the disposal in this country of surplus assets of other countries to the detriment, if you like, of our own corporations or to private industry in Canada. We are all well aware of it. I personally have had brought to my attention already the difficulties which may be encountered in that respect in Alberta, I believe that certain surplus assets of a friendly neighbouring country are being offered for sale. I have already had it brought to my attention that certain associations in the United States are encouraging or bringing pressure to bear to have surplus assets of that country disposed of as second-hand material in Canada, to use Canada as a dumping ground to get rid of those assets so as to clear the field for their activities in their own country. I am very much concerned as to what effect that is to have, and while I well understand the anxiety of municipalities, provincial governments and local authorities to get equipment and machinery especially, after all, private enterprise, the people who have been handling and dealing in machinery and equipment and who will be expected to maintain it and to provide repairs for it in the years that are to come, would like to know what position they are to be left in.

We in this country are now educated to look to the manufacturer of any implement or machine to guarantee performance. The trade mark, trade name or manufacturer's name, when impressed upon a machine, does mean something; and the person who buys that machine looks to the manufacturer to maintain it in good working order. Take a piece of road building machinery, for example, that has been used on the Alaska highway under most trying conditions, operated by inexperienced or perhaps incompetent workmen, without proper maintenance, because speed was the prime consideration. That piece of equipment may look all right, but it may be full of defects not apparent to the ordinary purchaser. Is that to be put on the market as a bargain and sold to the highest bidder for whatever it will bring in its present condition, under the principle of caveat emptor, or let the buyer beware? That piece of equipment may look to be worth $5,000, while in reality it may need repairs or replacements costing $2,000. Who is to service it; who is to be responsible for it? I can see the possibility of great harm and damage to Canadian industry unless this matter is very closely supervised. The minister said that at the present time there is a gentleman's agreement with other countries. I hope there will be something a little more definite than that; otherwise I fear we may have this country flooded with the surplus used material of a friendly neighbour, who will be glad to get rid of it at prices which we in this country cannot afford to meet.

[Mr. Edwards.]

Motion agreed to and the house went into committee, Mrs. Casselman in the chair.

Mr. KNOWLES: I should like the minister to make it clear whether crown assets include buildings and crown companies as well as such movable things as automobiles, jeeps and so on, which have been mentioned already. Perhaps I could come straight to one point that I have in mind. Is there any likelihood of a company such as the Polymer corporation being turned over to this board for disposal?

Mr. HOWE: What is to be disposed of is a matter of government policy. As I explained, if any department of government decides that it has anything surplus to its requirements, that fact is reported to the committee I have described to the house and that committee recommends what shall be done. One recommendation is as to whether or not it shall be disposed of, and further recommendations deal with how that disposal is to take place. Then that recommendation comes back to the government, and nothing can be disposed of except by the decision of the cabinet. Therefore, whether the Polymer corporation or any other corporation will be disposed of depends entirely upon the government of the day, and as long as we maintain good government in Canada I hardly think the Polymer corporation will be disposed of.

Mr. MacNICOL: There will be a good government after the next election.

Mr. HOWE: I said as long as we maintain it. Referring to the discussion that took place before the house went into committee, I should not like hon. members to believe that the sole duty of this disposal corporation will be to prevent surplus material from interfering with the manufacturers of this country. That will be one duty; but it must be remembered that the surplus material from this war is the property of the people of Canada, and must be disposed of in the interests of the people of Canada, having due regard to the situation of the manufacturer and the effect on employment. The practice is to price the material reasonably, having in mind the value of similar material newly manufactured. None of this will be sold as a pig in a poke; it will be sold either as scrap or as usable material. It will be properly priced and distributed as well as possible, so that if it is useful to the people of Canada it will be obtainable in all sections of the country at a price representing fair value in comparison with the article when new.

I may say that an effort is being made to give priority to various users. For material such as road-building equipment, which has been mentioned, and which I may add has not come on the market as yet for the reason that the limited quantities in Canada are still needed for war production work, the first option would go to the provinces, then to the municipalities and then to any other public use for which there might be a requirement. However, the price is the same for all. That has been determined as a policy, and I think it is the only sound policy. We have resolutions coming in suggesting that certain users should obtain property as a gift, or at a lower price. All we can give any user is a first claim on the material; but once the price is fixed that will be the price to all. I am glad to have this opportunity of making that fact known to all those who have written me, and others who say we should offer one price to one and another price to another.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): Would that price be the same all over Canada irrespective of freight?

Mr. HOWE: The matter of freight differentials will be considered in the light of the situation affecting the commodity in question. For instance, motor cars have one ceiling price in one area and a different ceiling price in another area. Disposal will take into account the question of freight, though that will not necessarily be the governing factor in all parts of the country. It will follow the practice of the trade.

Mr. BLACK (Cumberland): I think the least we in the outlying parts of Canada should expect is that the price will be uniform. In the earlier discussion this evening I mentioned bicycles and farm implements and said that we in Nova Scotia certainly are discriminated against in the prices fixed by the wartime prices and trade board, since we have to pay five and a half per cent more than is paid in central Canada, though we do not get the benefit of the employment which is incidental to the manufacture of these articles. I would protest if we are not to get the advantage of at least a uniform price on these surplus war articles that are being sold.

I should also like to ask the minister if any agreement or understanding has been entered into with manufacturers of motor vehicles, tractors or jeeps that such articles would be made into scrap and not placed upon the Canadian market, in order that they would not interfere with the post-war manufacturing output of these industries. There have been reports current to that effect. I appreciate that there will be a clash of interest between manufacturers and those who can make use of these articles. I would say that farmers should be entitled to a chance to secure motorized machines suitable for their requirements when they are placed on the market at a reasonable price. I feel strongly that the outlying parts of Canada, such as Nova Scotia from which I come, which do not benefit from the manufacture of these articles, certainly should have an opportunity to purchase them at the lowest possible prices. If these articles have value they should be able to get the articles they require at the lowest possible prices, instead of their being scrapped.

I ask the minister, has there been any understanding, or agreement, with manufacturers, in any instance, that their production would be scrapped rather than utilized in the post-war period.

Mr. HOWE: Madam Chairman, I am glad to have an opportunity of saying that no such agreement has been arrived at. A story wholly without foundation was published in Vancouver papers to the effect that by agreement with automobile dealers the government had decided that certain vehicles, such as jeeps, would not be sold in Canada. I may say that the government never heard of any such arrangement, and upon inquiry from the automobile association, whose convention was being held at the time, I was assured no such proposal had come from them.

I repeat that the government intends to dispose of government property in the widest and best interests of all the people of Canada, and that no association of dealers, no association of manufacturers or no other association will have any deciding voice in what is done with the surplus war materials of this country.

As for the differential in the price of bicycles as between central Canada, where they are made, and Nova Scotia, may I say that that principle works both ways. I lived in Halifax for several years, and while there I found that the lobster served at the club cost twenty cents a helping. When I came to Ottawa I was astonished to find that lobster at the club in Ottawa cost ninety cents a portion. Then, when I went to Winnipeg I was more than astonished to find that it cost $1.50 a portion.

Mr. GREEN: The minister should have had Winnipeg gold-eye.

Mr. HOWE: We cannot get away from the principle that the source of production usually has the lowest price.

Mr. BLACK (Cumberland): Then the minister is opposed to giving the outlying portions of Canada, the maritime provinces, equal opportunities to secure these surplus materials at uniform prices? Do I understand the minister is making such a declaration of policy? If he is, then I am certainly protesting against it.

Mr. FRASER (Peterborough West): I call the minister's attention to an order in council dated May 29, 1944, directing the transfer to War Assets Corporation Limited of any material or article having value not in excess of $15,000, and reported as surplus by any government department or agency. What happens to surplus over $15,000?

Mr. HOWE: Surplus over $15,000 is reported to council, with the recommendation of the disposal committee. The action taken is the action of council. Under $15,000 the material is reported by the committee to the minister, and over his own signature the minister can carry out the recommendations of the committee.

Mr. FRASER (Peterborough West): Then the committee would look after ships, and other articles valued at more than $15,000.

Mr. HOWE: That is correct.

Mr. HAZEN: The minister has just made a comparison between prices paid for raw materials or primary products, and prices paid for manufactured goods. He referred to the cost of bicycles, and also of lobsters in different parts of Canada. I doubt very much if that is a fair comparison. In a case of that kind I think one has to compare a manufactured product with a manufactured product.

I do not wish to go into this matter fully, but I would point out to the minister that some goods manufactured in the maritime provinces are sent throughout Canada. I have in mind particularly Ganong's chocolates, sardines put up by Connors Brothers, and shaving brushes put up by Simms. I understand that these articles are sold throughout Canada at the same prices. It seems to me some consideration might be given to manufacturers of other goods in other parts of Canada being obliged to sell their products throughout Canada at the same price, particularly when they receive the benefit of the tariff.

Mr. HOWE: My statement was that the practice of the trade is followed. For instance, if we are selling surplus shaving brushes they may very well be sold at the same price throughout Canada. We are bound to follow out the ceiling price set by the wartime prices and trade board. Or, if there is a differential, we follow the differential in ceiling price. Obviously we cannot sell above the ceiling price in any community, and there is a ceiling price for used goods in all parts of Canada. As I say, the ceiling price of to-day follows the practice of yesterday. And if the practice of yesterday was to sell at a uniform price across Canada, then the ceiling price of to-day follows that practice. We are more or less bound to follow the practices which have grown up in Canada through the years.

Mr. GREEN: What is done with regard to automobiles which are being sold now?

Mr. HOWE: Automobiles being sold now are being sold at ceiling prices of automobiles for the year in which those were produced.

Mr. GREEN: I mean by way of comparison between Ontario and British Columbia, for example.

Mr. HOWE: If they are sold in British Columbia, they are sold at the ceiling price in British Columbia; if they are sold in Ontario, they are sold at the ceiling price in Ontario.

An hon. MEMBER: Plus certain charges.

Mr. HOWE: No, not "plus" anything.

Mr. GREEN: Would it be fair, in the case of army equipment on the Pacific coast, that it be sold for more there than would similar equipment in Ontario?

Mr. HOWE: I suggest that army equipment on the west coast stands the government more than army equipment at Oshawa. They have already paid freight on it, and it seems fair to sell it at the ceiling price in that area.

Mr. GREEN: I suggest that that should be given further consideration.

Mr. HOWE: All right.

Mr. NOSEWORTHY: I was interested in the personnel of the war allocations committee, as mentioned by the minister. There are two classes of purchasers which I think should receive representation on that committee, and which I find have no representation. The first is the educational interests of the country. It is true the minister said there would be municipal representation.

Mr. HOWE: No, I did not say that. I said that there would be the department of government, the farmer, labour and the consumer.

Mr. NOSEWORTHY: But the minister did mention that the municipality would receive priority?

Mr. HOWE: Just what the committee gave them in respect of a particular article.

Mr. NOSEWORTHY: I would call the minister's attention to the fact that there will be enormous quantities of this material which would be invaluable to the technical schools and vocational schools of Canada. I am satisfied that they should have high priority in the disposal of these materials. I feel that there should be some one representing the educational interests of the country on this war allocation board, so that the school boards across Canada may have an opportunity of securing some of this material. The federal government has undertaken to bear a proportion of the cost of vocational training across Canada and some means should be provided to make this material available to schools, at least in the outlying and smaller areas, without undue regard to price even if the difference must be charged to the federal government's share of the cost of technical education.

I have had a number of representations from men overseas in regard to this matter. Only last week I received a letter from a boy in Italy. Before he went overseas this boy had been in the garage business, which he gave up in order to enlist. He realized that there would be considerable material salvaged after the war, particularly from some of our factories, and he felt that this should be made available to men such as himself. My first question is: will this material be disposed of before the men overseas have had an opportunity of securing what they want? My second question is: will the government make provision for the disposal of this material to men who are now overseas at prices and terms with which they will be able to comply? I ask the minister to give consideration to the two classes of potential purchasers of this material I have mentioned.

Mr. HOWE: I may say that due regard is being given to the educational institutions. They have a very high priority on any material that they require. As for the soldiers overseas I may say that we have hardly touched the fringe of this disposal problem. I suppose that the whole programme will run into at least three or four billion dollars, whereas the materials offered to date amount to hardly three or four hundred thousand dollars. The main disposal problem will come after the end of hostilities when the soldiers overseas will have ample opportunity to obtain anything they require.

Mr. NOSEWORTHY: I am asking that consideration be given to this class of purchaser in disposing of this material and that they be granted terms and prices so that they may be able to avail themselves of the opportunity of securing it.

Mr. MacNICOL: When I spoke a few moments ago I said I was in favour of the resolution, and I am yet, but I am a little alarmed at what the minister has said about the disposal of this equipment. Both in England and the United States the cardinal principle has been to ensure the orderly marketing of the material. If that is the minister's idea, then I am for it. But I am not in favour of marketing along the lines of what has been suggested by two or three hon. members.

I can see what will happen to young men coming back who have worked in the road-making plant at Plessisville, Quebec, or in the Sawyer Massey company at Hamilton or in the John T. Hepburn company at Toronto. The markets of these great road-making machinery plants will be obliterated if the market is flooded with the road machinery being used in the war. Our primary purpose after the war will be to provide jobs, but if the markets of these companies are destroyed by disorderly marketing, then we shall have nothing but chaos, just as we had after the last war.

I had hoped that this committee or company or whatever it is to be called—I have heard great things about the personnel and I have great confidence in them—would take over some of the strategic war plants across Canada and store this war material and equipment therein for orderly marketing so that it would not interfere with the reemployment of the boys coming back from overseas in the plants in which they formerly worked. I realize that if this equipment is used to make roads, men will also be given work. I have confidence in the men whose names I have heard and I feel sure they will bring about orderly marketing without dislocating industry.

A large number of the young men overseas went from the five thousand and one plants across Canada and they will be looking for their former jobs when they come back. I understand that after the last war vast quantities of shell-making machinery were just smashed up and made into scrapiron. They were single purpose machines and they could not be used for anything else. I imagine that after this war a great deal of the heavy iron equipment which was made to produce some special war equipment would be better scrapped than an attempt made to alter it and use it in some other way. I would rather see the plants whose business it has been to make machinery for civilian use permitted to do that instead of attempting to alter war machinery. It is always a costly procedure when it is not done by private interests.

The minister has mentioned equipment of an amount of three or four billion dollars, but I suppose it may be twice that before this war is over. Prior to the outbreak of war the total production of Canada in a year was not much more than that. If this material and equipment is flooded on the market it will shut up every plant in Canada. I am sure the hon. member for York South (Mr. Noseworthy) does not want to see the fine plants in his riding closed up. There are too many of his supporters working in those plants, and there are many others overseas who will be coming back and wanting their former jobs. I think the same applies to every representative of an industrial area. I want to be sure that the marketing of this vast quantity of material will be done in an orderly manner and that no effort will be made to glut the market simply to provide cheap material.

Mr. KNOWLES: I should like to explain the interjection I made a moment ago. The minister was speaking of the price at which the government sells cars to-day. He said they were sold at the ceiling price at the time of the manufacture of the car.

Mr. HOWE: No; the ceiling price at the moment.

Mr. KNOWLES: I interjected the remark, "plus certain charges." It may be only a matter of a difference of definition, but I had in mind the charges allowed, such as carrying and storage charges, from the time of manufacture to the time of sale.

Mr. HOWE: No; I meant ceiling prices for used cars. There are ceiling prices for new cars and ceiling prices for used cars. There is a differential allowed which represents the cost of laying down the car in the area. I am very sorry to say I must take the train in twelve minutes from now. Would hon. members object if my able parliamentary assistant carries on? I may advise hon. members that he tells me the answers anyway, and he may as well give them to the committee direct.

[Mr. MacNicol.]

Mr. GRAYDON: Open confession is good for the soul.

Mr. KNOWLES: I believe that on a former occasion—

Mr. GRAYDON: Do not let the minister miss the train.

Mr. KNOWLES: He can go or not, as he wishes. On a former occasion the question was asked whether priority would be given farmers' organizations such as cooperatives in the matter of distributing among the farmers of Canada war material which will be useful to them. Earlier this evening the minister indicated that priorities may be given to provincial and municipal governments on materials useful to them. I wonder whether the consideration which the minister said would be given has been given, and with what results.

Mr. CHEVRIER: I do not think there will be any difficulty as far as priorities are concerned. I know that one of the members of the board—I think it is Mr. Purdy—is well conversant with the pool interests of western Canada, and the representations which those organizations may make will receive consideration when the question of purchase comes about. There is too, of course, the question of government policy; the cabinet will make recommendation to the committee, who will also pass them on to the corporation. I believe that in that way the interests which my hon. friend has in mind will be protected.

Mr. FRASER (Peterborough West): The hon. member for Souris mentioned fire-fighting equipment. The A.R.P. at the present time have closed down a number of their units across Canada. In these units they have what they call trailer pumps. The small villages are anxious to get those small pumps; in fact I wrote in to the director of War Assets Corporation asking about trailer pumps; and I wonder if these are going to be disposed of. Are they being packed up now and being disposed of, or are they being held in those cities which have them?

Mr. CHEVRIER: That is an individual case with which I am not familiar. I shall be glad to ask the chairman of the allocation committee and tell my hon. friend; but I may say that, following the general principle of the legislation, the practice would be, after the recommendation has gone to the committee, to give a preference or a priority, as the minister has pointed out, first to the municipality, then to other organizations in the community —farm organizations, I would take it—and lastly, I suppose, to the general public. But the particular case which my hon. friend has mentioned and other like cases have been brought to the attention of the department. If my hon. friend wishes, I can obtain information on that particular case for him and pass it on to him.

Mr. FRASER (Peterborough West): I wish the parliamentary assistant would do so. These small villages are handicapped at the present time owing to the fact that they cannot get proper equipment, and they have had a number of fires. If the parliamentary assistant could find out what is being done, and whether these municipalities which have written have priority over the others, I should like to know that also.

Mr. CHEVRIER: I do not think that because a municipality has written in, it should have any priority over another, but I believe it is the intention of the corporation, after it has been set up under the powers contained in the measure, to see to it that a priority be given to a municipality in a case such as my hon. friend has mentioned.

Mr. FRASER (Peterborough West): Where they need it.

Mr. CHEVRIER: In any event I will look into the matter and get the details.

Resolution reported, read the second time and concurred in. Mr. Ralston (for the Minister of Munitions and Supply) thereupon moved for leave to introduce bill No. 137, respecting surplus crown assets.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

NAVAL SERVICE ACT

AMENDMENTS AND CONSOLIDATION—ADAPTATION OF UNITED KINGDOM NAVAL DISCIPLINE ACT, 1866

Hon. ANGUS L. MACDONALD (Minister of National Defence for Naval Services) moved the second reading of bill No. 112, respecting the naval service of Canada.

Mr. STIRLING: Does the minister propose to make a statement at this stage?

Mr. MACDONALD (Kingston City): I should be glad to make a short statement on the principle of the bill. This is a measure to amend and consolidate the Naval Service Act, which was first passed in 1910 and which now appears as chapter 139 of the Revised Statutes of Canada, 1927. In all the years since the first Canadian naval legislation was passed there have been but three very minor amendments of the act; and that, I think, is a tribute to the vision of those who laid the foundation for the service we know to-day. However, needs and conditions have changed, and under the acceleration provided by war conditions some changes are necessary and some of those changes ought to be made, I think, immediately.

The existing act was passed before Canadians had any extensive knowledge of naval warfare and before Canada had any fleet of her own. We can now lay claim to some considerable practical knowledge of naval affairs and naval administration. We find that some procedures required by the present act are rather clumsy; certain other procedures are inconvenient; still others are obsolete entirely.

The passage of the amendments which are proposed to the house will enable the naval authorities to reduce the great mass of legislation in one form or another which is now applicable to the naval service of Canada. At the present time the service is governed by a complex body of Canadian and British acts, regulations and orders which can be integrated only with the utmost difficulty even by legal specialists. I may say that there is no comparable complexity in the Royal Navy or in the United States navy, the two services with which we are best acquainted, and that is so mainly because the legislation applicable to these two great services is designed to fit their own requirements. With these amendments we hope to accomplish a similar result for the Canadian naval service.

The house probably will be surprised to know that the provisions applicable to the Canadian service are to be found in no fewer than eleven different sources. Eight of these are Canadian and three from the United Kingdom. Thus to understand properly the conditions governing the naval service one would have to know first of all the Naval Service Act. In the second place, one would have to be familiar with the Canadian naval regulations, then with Canadian naval orders, three volumes, then with the Canadian confidential naval orders, then with the regulations affecting the fleet reserve, then with the regulations affecting the Royal Canadian Naval Reserve, the regulations affecting the Royal Canadian Naval Volunteer Reserve, and finally the regulations affecting the W.R.C.N.S., or the Wrens as the organization is usually called.

There is a total of eight different sources to which one would have to look for the Canadian authority governing the naval service. But that is not all. Through the operation of section 45 of the present Naval Service Act, the following laws and regulations of the United Kingdom are in operation in so far as they are applicable to the Canadian service, and these United Kingdom regulations and laws are superimposed on all the Canadian laws and regulations which I have mentioned. These United Kingdom laws and regulations are: The Naval Discipline Act of Great Britain passed in the year 1866, a fairly extensive act in itself; then there are King's Regulations and Admiralty Instructions, which are to be found in three volumes, and which contain something like 2,000 odd sections; and finally there are the Admiralty Fleet Orders, which up to the present are comprised in eight volumes.

That is a tremendous bulk of material for the personnel of the Canadian naval service to become familiar with, and in addition to that there is always the problem of deciding the application of this British legislation to situations that arise in the Canadian navy. There exists, as a further and very practical and pressing problem, the question of the constitutional right of Canada to adopt any part of the laws and regulations of the United Kingdom merely by future reference, as section 45 of the Naval Service Act of Canada proposes to do. Section 45 of the Naval Service Act states that the Naval Discipline Act of 1866, and the acts and amendments thereof passed by the parliament of the United Kingdom "for the time being in force," and so on, shall apply to the naval service. Now that phrase "for the time being in force" has given rise to considerable constitutional discussion in this country, and opinions have been given that no amendments or regulations passed since our statutes were revised in 1927 can be applicable at this time.

That is a brief outline of some of the difficulties. How do we propose to cure them? It is hoped that once the Naval Service Act of Canada is amended we shall be able to embody the Canadian law and the Canadian regulations in two volumes. First of all there will be the King's Regulations and Instructions for the government of the Canadian naval service, and that will be known by the short title of K.R. Can. (Navy). Then there will be, secondly, the Naval General Orders.

The amendments I am proposing by this bill will accomplish two general purposes. First, the amendments will affect some of the sections of the present Naval Service Act. These amendments will leave as much as possible of the present act untouched, and the changes suggested will merely be to simplify the administration of the act in the light of practical experience.

The second purpose that we have in mind is to provide Canadian legislation comparable with the British Naval Discipline Act of 1866. That purpose is carried out in part II of the bill, and the sections in this regard are to be found beginning on page 11 and going on to the end of the bill. They are largely, almost entirely, simply an adaptation of the provisions of the British Naval Discipline Act, with a few minor changes to make the British provisions conform to Canadian terminology and Canadian legal practice.

I am of course in the hands of the house with regard to this bill, and I shall be glad to have any suggestions that may come from any quarter as to the proposals advanced.

Hon. GROTE STIRLING (Yale): I have read the bill and have listened to the minister's brief remarks. It is hardly to be wondered at that after thirty-four years the Naval Service Act of Canada requires revision. The purpose of the first part of this amending bill is thus to revise that act. The Royal Canadian Navy has passed through so many exigencies in that time, it has grown so magificently, particularly in these latter years, that I can well understand the difficulties which have been entailed in endeavouring to administer the navy under the succession of pieces of legislation such as the minister has announced.

The introduction of the second part, in which the Naval Discipline Act of 1866 is replaced by part II of this bill, appears to me to be an admirable way of dealing with the situation. There is no reason at all, since the passing of the Act of Westminster, why we should turn any longer to the legislation of the United Kingdom, useful and helpful though that has been to us in the past. It is the minister's proposal that we shall dispense with all of that and incorporate in one bill, the Naval Service Act, all the necessary legislation. Any further remarks, notes of which I have made in many places in this bill, I shall reserve to the committee stage.

Mr. HAZEN: I understood the minister to say that when this bill passes, the law regarding the naval services of Canada would be embodied in two volumes: King's Regulations, which he described as K.R. Canada (Navy), and the Naval General Orders.

Mr. MACDONALD (Kingston City): Yes.

Mr. HAZEN: Are those two volumes in existence now, or do they become effective after the act is passed?

Mr. FRASER (Peterborough West): The minister cannot answer that now.

Mr. SPEAKER: We are on second reading now. That question may be asked when we get into committee.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time, and the house went into committee thereon, Mrs. Casselman in the chair.

Mr. HAZEN: May I now repeat the questions I addressed to the minister? I do not know whether I made them clear or not.

Mr. MACDONALD (Kingston City): Yes; I think I understand. Perhaps if my hon. friend will look at the last clause of the bill, 124, he will find that:

> This act shall come into force on a date to be fixed by proclamation of the governor in council published in the Canada Gazette.

That has been inserted for the very reason my hon. friend has in mind, namely, that after the bill is passed the regulations must still be drafted, and until the regulations are drafted we cannot do other than proceed in the old way. Once the regulations are finally drafted and approved by the governor in council it will then be time, and properly time, to bring this bill and regulations into effect at one and the same time.

Mr. HAZEN: In addition to the two volumes already mentioned, a considerable part of all of them regarding naval services will be contained in this bill we propose to pass. I see that there are two kinds of offences provided for and penalties imposed.

Mr. MACDONALD (Kingston City): Yes; that is quite true. But I might say to my hon. friend that now the Canadian regulations are contained in a book of some 493 sections and there have been quite a few amendments to it; therefore there is a great deal of work to be done on the regulations when this bill becomes a statute.

Mr. STIRLING: That does not cover K.R. Navy?

Mr. MACDONALD (Kingston City): That does not cover a great many other things that we now get by reference to the British Naval Discipline Act and the King's Regulations and Instructions.

Mr. HAZEN: After these regulations are finally completed, hon. members will have no opportunity to pass upon them at all, as I understand it. It hardly seems to me that that is quite right.

Mr. MACDONALD (Kingston City): The regulations, of course, under this bill will be made and agreed to either by the governor in council in the main matters or by the minister in certain other matters. They will not be formally passed by the house, no.

Mr. STIRLING: They will be published in the Canada Gazette?

Mr. MACDONALD (Kingston City): Yes.

Mr. HAZEN: I am more or less at sea in these matters. I do not know what these regulations will contain, but, of course, under our democratic form of government the members of this house are supposed to make the laws. These regulations are going to provide for offences and impose penalties. I think the members of the house should really have some say about it.

While I am on my feet I should like to refer to another matter. I am glancing hastily through this bill this evening. I see that it provides for courts-martial and for naval discipline or some other form of court, courts-martial and disciplinary courts. In addition to the courts-martial and the disciplinary courts, has any ranking naval officer authority to deal with any offences set out in this bill?

Mr. MACDONALD (Kingston City): Yes.

Mr. HAZEN: Where do we find that?

Mr. MACDONALD (Kingston City): There is a provision that the captain of a ship can impose punishments.

Mr. HAZEN: I might call the minister's attention to section 88. I do not know if that has anything to do with it or not. I do not quite understand it.

Mr. MACDONALD (Kingston City): No; section 88 is a general section, simply stating that unless there is some other express penalty provided the man shall be punished in accordance with the customs of the sea. If my hon. friend turns on he will find that the clauses dealing with courts-martial and disciplinary courts are sections 103 and 104. Section 103 deals with disciplinary courts and section 104 with courts-martial. If he follows down he will find that there is authority in one clause giving the master of a ship the right to deal with offenders and to impose imprisonment up to, I think, a term of three months; therefore, there is provision outside the courts-martial and the disciplinary courts.

Mr. HAZEN: Would the minister give us the number of that section?

Mr. MACDONALD (Kingston City): Section 101, subsection 2, reads as follows:

> Any offence not capital which is triable under this part, and (except in the cases by this part expressly provided for) is not committed by an officer, may, under such regulations as the minister from time to time issues, be summarily tried and punished by the officer in command of the ship to which the offender belongs. . . .

And so on. My hon. friend also asked about the regulations. Of course the regulations are laid before parliament within ten days after being enacted, if parliament is sitting or, if parliament is not sitting, within ten days after the opening of parliament.

Mr. HAZEN: That does not give members of parliament any control over them.

Mr. MACDONALD (Kingston City): That is correct, but I do not think it would be possible to do so. If my hon. friend would look at the present Canadian naval regulations he would find that they deal with matters such as these, taking a few items at random: allowance for uniforms; transfer of personnel; arrangements for transportation; sick leave; stewards' fees; stoker ratings; specialists' allowances; shipwrights' pay; schoolmasters; repairs; retirement of officers; retirement of ratings, and so on. Those matters, while important in their own way, are hardly of sufficient importance to be in the statute. They belong properly in the regulations.

Mr. HAZEN: I appreciate that there would be no point in laying regulations of that kind before members of the house; but if any of these regulations provide for penalties and impose punishment, I think they should be laid before members of the house.

Mr. MACDONALD (Kingston City): The scale of punishments is set forth under the Naval Discipline Act, where the offences are described and the punishments set out, and that will become part of the law of this country if this bill is passed. At present, however, we are invoking the traditions of laws made outside this country, with the passing of which laws we have had nothing whatever to do. As I say, the regulations will deal with minor matters such as pay, clothing, leave, retirement, promotion and so on, but the great, vital matters will be dealt with in this bill.

Mr. KNOWLES: I wonder if when this bill was drafted any consideration was given to lessening the severity of the penalties set out. From what the minister has said I take it that this legislation is pretty well copying the British practice, but it does seem to me that the death penalty occurs a great many times in the pages of this bill. I recognize instantly the necessity of discipline in a service such as the navy, but at the same time it seems to me we should realize that with the march of history our armed services have become much more democratic. These armed services are now people's services, to which citizens go perhaps more than was the case years ago, and I suggest that some consideration might be given that point. As the minister has just said, these penalties are included in this bill and will become part of the law of this land if parliament passes this measure. I am asking if any consideration was given to lessening the severity of the penalties, at least in certain cases.

Mr. MACDONALD (Kingston City): Certain penalties found in the British act have not been included here. For instance, there is penal servitude; that is a form of punishment unknown in this country. The punishment of flogging is not provided in this bill; but the other offences to which my hon. friend refers, those punishable by death, I think are treated in most services as very serious offences which may render the offender liable to the death penalty. Treason, for instance, is a capital crime under the laws of this country. So is murder; so is rape; so are certain other offences, such as desertion in the face of the enemy and perhaps one or two others. Generally speaking, I think this bill is in no respect more severe and in some instances is less severe than the British act.

Mr. FRASER (Peterborough West): When we were on the war appropriation resolution in 1942 I asked the minister if he had considered the possibility of this country having a seaman's manual of its own, instead of the out-dated manuals the boys have to use at the present time. At page 2295 of Hansard for that year I went on to say:

> They are now using volume 1, 1937, and volume 2, 1938, and these volumes are unrevised.

Those are the British volumes, and I went on to say:

> In the United States the navy department is issuing "Knight's Modern Seamanship", which is revised right up to March, 1942. That manual is right up to date; it covers everything, oil burners, depth charges, torpedoes, bombs, up-to-date anti-aircraft guns, and everything else.

The minister replied:

> It is true that the seamanship manual used is the manual of 1937, as prepared by the British admiralty. It is not up to date, but after all is said and done we have turned out some pretty good seamen with this manual.

I acknowledged that fact, and later on the minister thanked me for my suggestion. I bring this matter up now because I want to ask the minister if he will not bring in a seamanship manual absolutely Canadian, to correspond with the regulations he is bringing in under this measure.

Mr. MACDONALD (Kingston City): I shall be very glad to take that matter into consideration.

Mr. GREEN: In various sections of the bill additional powers would appear to be given to the minister to make regulations.

whereas under the old act that power could be exercised only by the governor in council. Will the minister explain just what is the trend in that regard? Is it a fact that additional powers have been given to the minister?

Mr. MACDONALD (Kingston City): In certain respects the minister is given more power than under the old Naval Service Act, but they are in what I would call very minor particulars. For example, in connection with regulations governing target practice, formerly the power was given to the governor in council. I think that matter is too trifling for the governor in council to bother with, and now it has been transferred to the minister. In a few other cases that will appear as we go along with the bill, power has been transferred; but I think in all major cases where power formerly rested with the governor in council, that power is retained.

Mr. GREEN: Section 9 deals with the terms and conditions of engagement of officers and seamen, and that is now left to the minister himself rather than to the governor in council. In section 38, which is a general section providing for regulations for carrying out the measure, and for the organization, training, discipline, efficiency, administration, and good government generally of the naval service, power to make those regulations has been taken away from the governor in council and given to the minister. Those sections go much farther than just passing regulations for target practice. It would seem there is a definite change by way of giving the minister much wider powers. I have nothing against the present minister, and I do not wish him to take my remarks that way. But we are finding this trend quite often nowadays. For example, in connection with the aeronautics bill we find the same position. There the Minister of Munitions and Supply is becoming a dictator. This practice goes one step farther even than running the country by order in council. This bill has the same trend, the running of things by the minister, himself, without having even the steadying influence of the whole cabinet. Why are these changes made in the case of the navy?

Mr. MACDONALD (Kingston City): First of all, in connection with section 9 of the bill, the old section read that the governor in council might authorize the engagement of officers and seamen in the naval service upon such terms and conditions as may be prescribed, without stating definitely who was to do the prescribing. The words "by the minister" have been inserted to clarify that situation. It does not mean that a power which formerly resided in the governor in council is taken away from them. It means that a power which was more or less implied has now been placed in the minister.

Then, with regard to section 38, the hon. member says that there, again, the minister is given additional power. I do not think a careful reading of the section will bear out that contention. The section states:

> Except where by this act the governor in council is empowered to make regulations, the minister may make regulations . . .

And so on. Any place where the governor in council has power or authority under the act on major matters, he still retains it. But there may be some cases where authority is expressly vested in nobody, and in such cases it is felt that the minister should have power to deal with such matters.

Mr. GREEN: Is not the effect of the section that of cutting down the number of instances in which the governor in council will make regulations? As the section read formerly, all the power was given to the governor in council. But now the governor in council has only certain specified powers. Whatever powers are not specified as being exercised by them are now exercisable by the minister. In other words, he exercises all the residual powers. Surely it is true that that means that the minister will have a great deal more power than he had before.

Mr. MACDONALD (Kingston City): It depends upon how closely the powers have been divided. I think they have been divided very carefully. This bill has been drawn up by expert draftsmen, and the powers have been specifically apportioned, some to the governor in council and some to the minister. Then, to make abundantly sure, it was felt that there should be a general section in case some power had to be exercised without any particular authority being named to exercise it. That power was given to the minister.

I can say to the hon. member, however, that I think governors in council and ministers are bothered too much with detail. If we expect the governor in council, particularly in this time of war, to deal with petty matters such as it has to deal with, involving $2 here or $5 there, it seems to me totally ridiculous.

Mr. GREEN: Of course this bill will carry over into peace-time.

Mr. MACDONALD (Kingston City): Yes, but at no time should the governor in council or the cabinet have to sit down and trouble themselves with trifles. They have to deal with great and important matters. Minor regulations should be dealt with by the departmental head, deputy ministers, or even officials lower than that. I am afraid the tendency to-day is to throw too much on cabinets, instead of placing responsibility where a lot of it ought to be, namely, on the ministers and departments.

Mr. GREEN: What power has the minister now to make regulations—before the passing of this measure?

Mr. MACDONALD (Kingston City): Under the present act certain powers are not specified to anyone. Under section 5 the minister is given control and administration of all naval affairs. Under section 6 he is given control and management of all naval establishments and ships. Then he is given further powers under section 34.

Mr. GREEN: That is the old section. What does it enable him to do?

Mr. MACDONALD (Kingston City): Sections 5 and 6 give the minister general control and management of naval affairs, naval establishments and naval ships. Then section 34 is the one which deals with target practice.

Mr. GREEN: None of them gives him power to make regulations.

Mr. MACDONALD (Kingston City): This book of Canadian naval regulations contains many regulations now made by the minister. Some are made by the governor in council, and others are merely copies of sections of the statute which are considered applicable. But there are a great many regulations here which the minister has made by himself.

Mr. GREEN: Perhaps he has been making them without authority.

Mr. MACDONALD (Kingston City): I hope not.

Section agreed to.

On section 2—Definitions.

Mr. STIRLING: I notice that paragraph (f) changes "seaman" to "man", for reasons explained on the opposite page. I am wondering if there is any reference to the Women's Royal Canadian Naval Service, or whether they come under the composite title "man".

Mr. MACDONALD (Kingston City): I am glad the hon. member has raised that question. If he will look at section 22 of the bill he will find under the heading "naval volunteer reserve" these words:

> 22. The naval volunteer reserve shall consist of officers and men raised by voluntary engagement from among seafaring persons—

The word "persons" is used there deliberately to permit the inclusion of the WRCNS.

[Mr. A. L. Macdonald.]

Mr. FRASER (Peterborough West): Paragraph (a) states:

> (a) "active service" as applied to a person in the naval forces means service or duty during an emergency.

Then, further down:

> (d) "emergency" means war . . .

And so on. Does this apply to boys in training in the different camps or training centres in Canada, or does it apply to those who are on ships?

Mr. MACDONALD (Kingston City): What section is my hon. friend reading from?

Mr. FRASER (Peterborough West): Section 2, paragraph (a).

Mr. MACDONALD (Kingston City): Every one in the navy is now on active service.

Mr. FRASER (Peterborough West): Whether they are in a training camp or on a ship?

Mr. MACDONALD (Kingston City): Yes; that is right.

Mr. MacNICOL: Why is paragraph (g) not in the same position as paragraph (c)? Paragraph (c) refers to deputy minister, whereas paragraph (g) refers to minister, and it strikes me that the minister ought to come first.

Mr. MACDONALD (Kingston City): They are arranged alphabetically.

Mr. STIRLING: Does the minister consider that the women in the Women's Royal Canadian Naval Service are taken care of by the explanation he has given? Over and over again the word "man" appears in the bill; does he suggest that the use of the word "persons" in section 22 gives the necessary authority to deal with these women where a man, a petty officer or officer is referred to throughout the bill?

Mr. MACDONALD (Kingston City): The draftsmen advise me that under the Interpretation Act, which applies to this bill and to all the regulations under it, the word "man" would be taken to include women, apart altogether from the use of the word "persons" which, of course, includes both men and women.

Mr. GRAYDON: If that interpretation is to be carried out then the provision for equal pay for women would automatically come in. If the minister is going to give us that definition now, perhaps we may expect that from now on the Wrens will get equal pay with the men.

Mr. MACDONALD (Kingston City): I expected that my hon. friend would take that ground, since he has taken it consistently throughout the session. The matter is one I must discuss with my senior colleagues, the Minister of National Defence and the Minister of National Defence for Air.

Mr. GRAYDON: Perhaps this will be an easy way for both the ministry and the opposition to let the women in the forces in on an equal basis?

Mr. GREEN: Paragraph (e) in section 2 reads:

"general orders" means orders and instructions issued to the naval forces by the minister or under his authority.

Who would be able to issue orders under the authority of the minister? Why should that not be done by the minister himself or someone acting as the minister?

Mr. MACDONALD (Kingston City): There are many cases where the minister must delegate to someone, perhaps on the coast or in Newfoundland or in Londonderry, the power to do something. He, of course, would have to confine himself to those things which he had the right to delegate. There might be cases where it would be very convenient to the minister to delegate powers to make certain orders.

Section agreed to.

Sections 3, 4 and 5 agreed to.

On section 6—Rates of pay.

Mr. STIRLING: The explanation reads:

There is no corresponding section in the present act, but rates of pay and allowances have always been and should, it is considered, continue to be fixed by order in council.

Mr. MACDONALD (Kingston City): Rates of pay of ratings and officers have been the subject of order in council. I think that is one responsibility that should rest there. When you begin to regulate the pay of thousands of men—it is now about 90,000 men and officers—it is perhaps well that the governor in council should be the one to fix the rates. That has always been the case and it is being continued.

Mr. KNOWLES: That is subject to treasury board now.

Mr. GRAYDON: That is the shadow that falls over everything.

Mr. MACDONALD (Kingston City): The treasury board considers the matter and passes its minute which is approved by the council as a whole. The treasury board has not the final word in these matters.

Section agreed to.

On section 7—Chief of the Naval Staff.

Mr. MacNICOL: Is the chief officer in the British service and in the United States service a rear admiral?

Mr. MACDONALD (Kingston City): No; they are of higher rank. It says, "not lower in rank than rear admiral." His title is now changed to "chief of the naval staff" instead of "director of naval services." That has been the title ever since I came here and I think it is a much better one.

Item agreed to.

On section 8—Permanent naval force.

Mr. GREEN: Is the minister in a position to give us any more details than he did during the discussion of his war appropriations, with regard to plans for a permanent navy after the war?

Mr. MACDONALD (Kingston City): I think I intimated at that time that there was authority from the cabinet to have a navy of some eight or nine thousand men after the war. That is the only authority we have, and I cannot add anything to what I said when the war appropriation bill was under discussion.

Mr. GRAYDON: I suppose it will depend upon how far Canada commits herself in connection with the world organization with respect to an international police force?

Mr. MACDONALD (Kingston City): I fancy that would have some bearing.

Mr. STIRLING: That was the understanding arrived at some years ago, was it not?

Mr. MACDONALD (Kingston City): The complement was arrived at in 1941.

The house met at three o'clock.

CANADIAN FORCES

DISTRIBUTION OF MAIL TO SERVICE PERSONNEL ON THE BEACHHEADS IN FRANCE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. GORDON GRAYDON (Leader of the Opposition): I should like to ask the Postmaster General whether arrangements are being made for the distribution of mail to our troops on the beachheads in France. If so, what progress has been made in this regard?

Hon. W. P. MULOCK (Postmaster General): All arrangements were made long ago in connection with the handling of mail in the event of invasion. There is no report at the present time. The leader of the opposition will realize that it is a matter of available space in crossing the channel. I am expecting information in due course, and as soon as it is available I shall be glad to advise the house.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

DOMINION ELECTIONS ACT AMENDMENT—WAR SERVICE PERSONNEL—PRINTING OF BILL

On the orders of the day:

Mr. GORDON GRAYDON (Leader of the Opposition): I have a question to ask with reference to the war-time elections bill. I point this out to the house only because yesterday I inquired of the Secretary of State as to whether or not this bill had been printed. It was a formal question which I very often put because I have found that on occasions bills are given first reading before they have come from the printer. I suggest that the Secretary of State must have been in error when he said yesterday that the bill had been printed, because in making preparations for the debate on the bill to-day I found that none of our members had been able to get copies. I made inquiries and learned that the bill had not yet been printed. I thought the Secretary of State would like to know that his informant had been misinformed. It is difficult for us to proceed with our preparations unless bills are in our hands before second reading.

Hon. N. A. McLARTY (Secretary of State): Before taking up the motion on the resolution I made inquiries and was advised that the bill had been printed. Much to my own surprise I found this morning that though it had been printed it had not been bound. Copies of the bill are now available for distribution. I regret very much any inconvenience that has been caused to my hon. friend or any other member of the house by reason of the information I gave last night as to the bill having been printed, but I made the statement in good faith on the basis of information which I thought was accurate.

Mr. GRAYDON: I have never questioned the minister's good faith or that of any other member.

JAM BERRIES

REQUEST FOR TABLING OF ORDER SETTING PRICE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. G. A. CRUICKSHANK (Fraser Valley): I asked the Parliamentary Assistant to the Minister of Finance a question with regard to jam berries. I am sorry he is not in the house, but I would direct the question to the Minister of Finance and if he cannot give an answer to-day I would appreciate it at the next sitting of the house. This may be taken as notice of the question. When will the order be brought down regarding the price of jam berries?

Hon. J. L. ILSLEY (Minister of Finance): I will make inquiries and give the answer on Monday.

FARM CREDIT

LIMITED GUARANTEE OF BANK LOANS FOR IMPROVEMENT AND DEVELOPMENT OF FARMS

Hon. J. L. ILSLEY (Minister of Finance) moved the second reading of bill No. 134, to encourage the provision of intermediate term and short-term credit to farmers for the improvement and development of farms, and for the improvement of living conditions thereon.

Mr. J. A. ROSS (Souris): There will not be a chance to discuss the provisions of this bill after it gets second reading because it will be referred to the committee on banking and commerce, and only this morning we received the printed bill. I wish to make a few observations on it.

As pointed out in the discussion of the resolution, I think it is very important that we should have been able to discuss the legislation pertaining to floor prices of agricultural products in conjunction with this bill. The matter of a central agricultural bank in connection with floor prices will have a distinct bearing on the success or otherwise on the operation of the proposed act.

Paragraph (h) of section 2, the interpretation section, defines "farm improvement loan" as meaning a loan made by a bank to a farmer for the purpose of financing—

(i) the purchase of agricultural implements;
(ii) the purchase of live stock;
(iii) the purchase or installation of agricultural equipment or a farm electric system;
(iv) the alteration or improvement of a farm electric system;
(v) the erection or construction of fencing or works for drainage on a farm;
(vi) the construction, repair or alteration of, or making of additions to, any building or structure on a farm; or
(vii) any work for the improvement or development of a farm designated in the regulations.

I do not see among these items any provision for seed grain. It will be readily realized that the farmer who needs assistance under this legislation may have had a crop failure through no fault of his own. That failure may be caused by hail in the district, and he may not have proper coverage of insurance to protect him. It may be caused by a grasshopper plague or drought in certain sections of the country. There is no provision made for that man to purchase his seed grain.

There is another matter that has been brought up by a colleague of mine in banking and commerce committees of other sessions, namely, a guarantee for binder twine in harvest time. It is recognized that in the prairie provinces binder twine must now be purchased on a cash basis. The farmer must make provision to pay cash for it, but there is no provision in this legislation for that. I am wondering whether those two items should not be included in this bill when it comes before the committee.

I go on with the clauses of the bill. Paragraph (i) of section 2 reads as follows:

"Farmer" means a person who is in possession of a farm and whose principal occupation consists of farming such farm.

When the resolution was under consideration I pointed out that there has been much trouble with the treasury board in the administration of the Prairie Farm Assistance Act in the past few years as to what properly constituted a farmer. I think it is important that that should be clearly understood in this measure.

Then, going on to section 3, "Guaranteed farm improvement loans," paragraph (d) subsection 1, reads as follows:

The principal amount of the loan did not at the time of the making of the loan, together with the amount owing in respect of other farm improvement loans previously made to the borrower and disclosed in his application, or of which the bank had knowledge, exceeded the sum of three thousand dollars.

That means, of course, that all other liabilities will be taken into account at the time. In many instances this will prevent a farmer from obtaining credit under this legislation, particularly farmers who have extensive liabilities on their farms.

Paragraph (e) is as follows:

the loan was repayable in full by the terms thereof in not more than ten years.

That allows ten years for repayment.

Paragraph (f) states:

the rate of interest charged by the bank on the loan did not exceed five per centum per annum simple interest as long as the borrower was not in default.

In the resolution stage I pointed out that I was distinctly of the opinion that the rate of interest of five per cent was too high. I have pointed out that to-day many good farmers are receiving credit for five per cent. When the resolution was before the committee several other speakers stated that the rate of interest should not exceed the cost of the operation. I have already pointed to the Veterans' Land Settlement Act, where land is being purchased and resold to the veterans and is costing them three and a half per cent. I suggest that the rate of interest in this bill should not exceed four per cent.

Section 4 deals with the limitations of the amount of the liability to the bank. It is as follows:

The minister shall not be liable under this act to pay to a bank a total amount in excess of ten per centum of the aggregate principal amount of the guaranteed farm improvement loans made by such bank.

In my opinion that guarantee of ten per cent will not produce the result that we have in mind. The guarantee should be higher. I am not sure, but I am of the opinion that in the case of national housing it was at least fifteen per cent.

Mr. ILSLEY: It was fifteen per cent on the home improvement loans.

Mr. ROSS (Souris): Yes. To make this bill as effective as I hope it will be, I think the guarantee should be twenty per cent rather than ten per cent. If the government guarantee the banks twenty per cent and they charge the creditors four per cent, we may achieve the purpose the government has in mind in this bill. I think these are two important points. I am not satisfied that ten per cent is a sufficient guarantee to make this bill effective.

Section 5 states:

The minister shall not be liable under this act to make any payment to a bank in respect of loss sustained by it as a result of a farm improvement loan made after the aggregate principal amount of guaranteed farm improvement loans made by all banks exceeds two hundred and fifty million dollars or made more than three years after the commencement of this act.

I dealt with that and received answers from the minister yesterday. With regard to the maximum guarantee of $3,000, that is all to the good; but we must bear in mind the fact that when a man applies for this credit he will have to give to the banks the security to which they are entitled. The banks always ask for all the security they can obtain, but it will cut off the applicant's security with other creditors.

In the past two or three years we have had information brought down which proves that under existing conditions it is much more economical to operate a large farm than a small one. Speaking on the budget on March 11 of last year I put on Hansard figures which I had obtained from the officials of the Department of Agriculture, pointing out that at least in the prairie provinces the most economical farm to operate to-day is the two-section farm unit on a diversified basis with certain power equipment. Most of those farmers would be precluded from coming under this measure. Notwithstanding that, I am satisfied that when a man starts to operate on a larger scale it is his duty to make his own financial arrangements, but I do point out that the most efficient operator will not come under this legislation.

Section 6 has to do with regulations. Paragraph (b) of subsection 1 reads as follows:

to designate works for the improvement or development of a farm, in addition to those specified in subparagraphs . . .

Then the paragraphs are named. I think this is an important clause, because it will give the government—I presume the minister, or by order in council at least—powers to designate other works. In that connection I want to make a suggestion, namely, that with respect to any works which shall be designated, proper agricultural authorities shall be consulted. I have in mind officers of the federation of agriculture, producers and the officials of producers' organizations. In order to make alterations such as these, to designate other works not provided for, such officials as the representatives of agricultural producers in this country should be consulted and their advice taken.

Then subsection 2 states:

No regulation shall be effective until published in the Canada Gazette and upon such publication shall be effective and shall have the same force and effect as if it had been enacted in this act.

I think this is rather a new procedure in the last few years. A great deal of this has been done by the wartime prices and trade board officials, and the Minister of Agriculture has taken advantage of this in each of his orders in council in the past few years. I do not think that is good. We should have our statutes and we should put them into effect.

I now come to section 7, which is as follows:

Notwithstanding anything contained in the Bank Act or any other statute, if a bank makes a guaranteed farm improvement loan the principal amount of which exceeds two thousand dollars and the period for repayment of which is longer than five years, the bank may at the time of making the loan take as security for the repayment thereof and the payment of interest thereon—

[Mr. J. A. Ross.]

(a) a mortgage or hypothec upon the farm in respect of which the proceeds of the loan are to be expended;

(b) an assignment of the rights and interest of a purchaser of the farm under an agreement of sale.

And there is further information in that connection. I think that will prove to any of us who have had experience in these matters that if full advantage is taken of this provision, and I think probably we would take advantage of it if we were in the place of the bankers, practically all the normal credit will be transferred to the banks, and any further credit will be cut off once an applicant comes under this bill. It is important that people should realize this fact. Then section 9, subsection 2, provides:

Any document purporting to be a receipt in the prescribed form and purporting to be signed on behalf of the bank shall be evidence of the payment by the minister to the bank under this act in respect of the loan therein mentioned and of the execution of such document on behalf of the bank.

This is a phrase which has come into being under our war-time legislation of the past few years, and I think it is a little lax. I would have no fear of what might be done under the present minister, with the present set-up, but I do believe the wording might be tightened up a little to safeguard the future.

There are four more sections in the bill, with which I do not propose to deal at this time. I would point out to hon. members that the mortgage debt of Canadian agriculture is approximately $700,000,000 to-day, and that this bill provides for a maximum of $250,000,000 or one-third of that total. When you remember that the present mortgage indebtedness will have to be taken into consideration when these people ask for loans under this measure; when you remember that once they come under it further credit will be cut off, I am not so sure that the bill will serve the purpose we have in mind. At the same time I heartily agree with the principle of the measure. I believe it is a step in the right direction, but if it is to be effective it seems to me the government guarantee should be increased to twenty per cent, while the rate of interest should be not more than four per cent. These two changes should be made in order to have this legislation as effective as we would like to see it, in the interests of the average farmer of Canada. I hope these matters will be taken into consideration when the bill is dealt with in the banking and commerce committee.

Mr. G. A. CRUICKSHANK (Fraser Valley): I think perhaps I am better fitted to speak on this bill than any other hon. member of the house, because of my long experience with overdrafts and promissory notes; I am certain my friends in the banks will not dispute my knowledge in that connection. I am going to be very brief; for once I am going to outdo the Progressive Conservatives. I want to support everything that has been said by the hon. member for Souris (Mr. Ross), except that I believe four per cent is too high.

Mr. ROSS (Souris): I said not more than four per cent; I believe it should be lower, too.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: I am glad the hon. member agrees with me. It has been admitted by the banking and commerce committee—and if they admit anything that is going some—that Canada's greatest hope for the future lies in increased agricultural production, but I do not think we will have that increased production unless money is made more readily available to the primary producers at very low rates of interest. It seems to me that in agriculture, a basic industry, three and a half per cent is ample; and in addition I believe the minister is killing his own bill when he limits the government's guarantee to ten per cent. Perhaps this is not a popular thing to say politically, but I have never had any difficulty in borrowing money from the banks. Probably what I have borrowed would seem a small amount to the many millionaires in this house, but to me it seemed a great deal. I have not had any difficulty in borrowing it, but I have had a great deal of difficulty in paying it back. As long as I did pay it back, however, I could always borrow more. But in limiting the guarantee to ten per cent, I believe the minister is making a mistake.

I agree with the hon. member for Souris that it is very unfair to place this bill in our hands to-day and immediately ask us to put it through. Since I have been in this house I have always heard that agriculture is the most important industry in Canada, yet here we have a bill affecting agriculture which we are asked to endorse or criticize on very short notice indeed. As a matter of fact I have had this bill for exactly five minutes. It seems to me the minister is defeating his own purpose in restricting the guarantee to ten per cent. Any bona fide farmer, as far as I know, would have no difficulty in borrowing to that extent from the chartered banks. As I understand this procedure, the banks lend the money and the dominion guarantee their losses to the extent of ten per cent. Any chartered bank in the beautiful Fraser valley will take the chance of a loss up to ten per cent even now. I would go the hon. member for Souris one better, because our crop is not exactly the same as wheat; I do not think a guarantee of twenty-five per cent would be too high, and I believe the maximum rate of interest should be three and a half per cent at most.

I am not in a position to go into this bill clause by clause. I agree with everything said by the hon. member for Souris, but I should like to see those two changes made if the bill is to be of any use to the farmers of Fraser valley, the main agricultural district of British Columbia. That is, I should like to see the interest rate reduced and the guarantee increased to at least twenty per cent.

Mr. HARRY LEADER (Portage la Prairie): Perhaps a real dirt farmer might be allowed to say a word or two on this bill, though I had not intended to do more than commend the government on at least attempting to make credit available to farmers at low rates of interest, which I believe is the purpose of this legislation.

I agree with the hon. member for Fraser Valley (Mr. Cruickshank); I do not think anyone has difficulty in borrowing money from the banks provided he has repaid his previous borrowings; and after all I do not think any man, any corporation or any company should borrow from a bank without fully intending to pay back the amount borrowed. A great deal could be said about the high interest rates that farmers have paid in the past. Personally I have paid as high as twelve per cent, and I know of others who up to at least two years ago were paying eight per cent on machinery they had purchased. This bill, I believe, will do away with a great deal of difficulty in that connection.

I do not believe it is a good move to empower the banks to take additional security; I think it will have the effect suggested a moment ago by the hon. member for Souris (Mr. Ross). If a farmer gets into difficulties and the bank takes additional security, that farmer will be placed at a disadvantage if he wishes to get any further benefits from the bank or any other institution. However, that is not why I rose. I want to say that I believe the government is wise in restricting its liability to ten per cent, though most of those who have spoken previously have said that this percentage should be increased. The hon. member for Souris would increase it to twenty per cent, and I believe the hon. member for Fraser Valley mentioned twenty-five per cent. I believe that easy credit has ruined more farmers—and I am speaking only for farmers, though perhaps this applies to other trades and professions—than have been put on easy street by bank borrowings. Get the idea into a farmer's mind that he must pay this money back, and he is going to be very careful when he asks for credit. I think that if the government increases the liability they are going to encourage the banks to be more liberal in their loans. Do not for one moment think that I am condemning the banks for lending money to needy borrowers. That is not my intention at all. The point I make is that easy credit is going to ruin many men. And if the banks accept a liability higher than ten per cent it will mean easy credit for many of our farmers.

The other point I make is one where I take issue with the hon. member for Souris—and I have had to do so on several occasions. However I think I know whereof I speak. I have heard men declare—not farmers, so often, but the men who farm the farmers, as we have heard it said—that it is more economical to grow wheat on a large farm than to grow it on smaller farms. I will not agree with that. And when the hon. member for Souris says that a two-section farmer is the economic unit, I disagree with him entirely. I think that that is the class of farmer that got us into trouble with our big wheat surplus—a condition we have now overcome because of the war. In my opinion the economic unit is the smaller farmer on the half section or three-quarter section of land. He may have three or four sons, and in that event could probably have a section. The men on those smaller farms are diversified in their farming operations, and do not depend entirely upon the growing of wheat and other grains. They do not build up big surpluses to depress the prices for the smaller farmers.

Mr. ROSS (Souris): I referred to a diversified farm.

Mr. LEADER: Well, some might call two sections of land a diversified farm. But the smaller farmer must practice diversification, because he cannot put all his eggs in one basket. He has to keep live stock, and that live stock will build up any farm, whether it be one of 2,000 acres or only a quarter section. I know that the farmers who stood the stress of the years of depression were the smaller farmers. You can find that in every province of Canada. And when we are encouraged to build up larger farms, or what are called more economic units, I believe we are making a mistake. What do we want? With less than one-third of Canadians living on the farms in Canada to-day, what we want is more farmers on the land. The 2,000-acre farmer is perhaps living in a city or town, and has his farm operated by a hired man who runs one or two tractors. Get the farmers out on the smaller farms. Build the country in that way, and we will build from a proper foundation, not only in Canada but, I believe, throughout the world.

Mr. ROBERT FAIR (Battle River): Mr. Speaker, farmers are always thankful for small mercies, and I think they will appreciate a rate of interest of five per cent, particularly if they had to start out, as I did, by borrowing at eight per cent. And that eight per cent was compounded every three months. If they had crop failures for four years in succession, as I had when I started out, then I think they will appreciate this rate all the more. I know my interest bills, like those of many others, had piled up so high I was not able to stand them.

The fact that this money is being made available will help out, provided that other steps are taken as well. I am thinking particularly of the mention made yesterday of the prices of farm machinery—and what I have to say about farm machinery will apply with equal force to a number of other products. I believe it was in 1936 and 1937 that the committee on agriculture investigated farm machinery prices. In one instance the committee found that one implement company was following up the practice now followed by the banks, that of having a secret reserve. In that instance it was one of $40,000,000, which had been piled up from excess profits they were receiving. I do not know whether the other implement companies did the same thing, but at least one company under investigation was found to have a secret reserve of the amount I have mentioned. Those prices will have to be investigated, and they will have to be placed upon a sounder basis. If purchases are made for cash it is only reasonable to expect that the prices charged to-day might well be considerably reduced.

This programme would also relieve unemployment. It took the present war to relieve the unemployment of 1939. What I have suggested would also provide an outlet for the factories located in central Canada. Before going further I would point out to the minister that he is starting entirely at the wrong end. If a person has a sore on his hand or on his face he may put salve on it, but he will find that that will not do much good. He must go to the root of the trouble. Remove the cause and the sore will usually take care of itself.

For the information of the minister—and I assume he knows this already—I should like to place on record the percentages of national income received by agriculture over a period of years. I do this because about one-third of our population is engaged in that industry. I do it, too, because the workers in agriculture work from one and a half to twice as many hours as do those engaged in other industries. For these reasons I feel satisfied we should receive at least one-third of the national income. Beginning with the year 1926 the following are the percentages of national income received by the agricultural population:

Year	Percentage of national income
1927	16·4

It will be noted that in that wonderful depression year, 1932, the farmers of Canada, comprising one-third of our population, received only five per cent of the national income. These percentages work out to an average of 11·3 per cent over the fifteen-year period. Instead of extending this credit to farmers, some action should be taken to give them the percentage of the national income to which they are entitled. If that were done the necessity for this bill would be eliminated. I am not saying the bill should not be put into effect, for the time being. But I do say that even at the expense of those who are farming the farmers and profiteering to an abnormal extent to-day, steps should be taken immediately to place agriculture on a sound footing, for the first time since Canada was Canada.

I am, of course, in favour of the bill. I may have something further to say later on, but I would repeat, for the benefit of the minister and his colleagues, that until agriculture is placed upon a sound footing we are going to have an unending succession of farm debts.

Hon. GROTE STIRLING (Yale): Mr. Speaker, as has been said, this bill has been in our hands only since this morning. Since receiving it I have been trying to ascertain whether an irrigation farm may benefit under it. It is not clear to me, and I should like the minister to explain whether it does or does not. Section 2, paragraph (h), subparagraph (v), refers to the erection or construction of works for drainage on a farm, but there is no reference to machinery or equipment such as would be used on an irrigated farm. Section 6, regulations, states:

> The governor in council may, on the recommendation of the minister, make regulations:
> (a) to define for the purposes of this act the following expressions:
> (ii) "works for drainage".

A considerable amount of farming in Canada is carried on under irrigation, and there are signs that this will be increased in the near future. It is a common thing for the farmer growing crops under irrigation to require assistance to purchase pumping machinery and various items of equipment required for the carriage of water to his land. When the minister replies I should like him to be good enough to say whether or not such requirements will be included in the clauses of this bill.

Hon. W. E. ROWE (Dufferin-Simcoe): Mr. Speaker, as the hon. member for Yale (Mr. Stirling) has said, this bill has not been very long in our hands and it is difficult to discuss it on such short notice. However, the need for the bill may be defined in many ways. The previous speaker referred to the disparity in the prices of farm products and other things. That is one of the basic reasons, not only for the depression in agriculture but for unemployment generally in this country, and it no doubt creates one of the needs for farm credit. However, I believe that even over and above that one of the needs for this bill has been created by the fact that we have farm loan boards in the different provinces; we have the Farmers' Creditors Arrangement Act which was passed by the dominion, and we have other efforts being made to extend credit to the country but not serving the purpose for which they were initiated. I fear that with this bill we are going to create further embarrassment for the farmer who wants to borrow money. If parliament sanctions a bill which goes so far in granting credit to farmers and then fails to go far enough to make it practicable, it is obvious to all of us who have had experience with farm loans, who have had experience in agriculture enterprises generally, that there are grave dangers hidden behind the inadequacy of the bill.

I believe it was the hon. member for Souris (Mr. Ross) who said that ten per cent was not sufficient. I find myself in full agreement with that. I believe the farmer should have his loan at four per cent if possible, and I hope there will be an amendment to that effect. If that is done, I doubt whether the ten per cent risk guaranteed by the government will make these loans sufficiently attractive to the local bank managers to make them want to extend the credit required.

The hon. member for Portage la Prairie (Mr. Leader), who preceded me, stated that easy credit is not sound credit. There is no one in business and I doubt if there is any one in this house, who does not realize the dangers of easy credit for the young or the old, for the business man or the farmer. We all know it is sometimes ruinous, and to that extent I agree with the hon. member for Portage la Prairie. But I think he will agree with me, and I believe you will also, sir, when I say that there is a need for essential credit. There is a difference between easy credit and hard credit and essential credit.

We are living to-day in an age of advancement. I realize the good motives behind the statement of the hon. member for Portage la Prairie when he said that what we need are small farms, such as fruit farms, poultry farms and mixed farms. As the hon. member knows, for many years in this house I have urged the diversification of agriculture. He will recall that I twitted the western farmers for developing a lopsided agriculture. However, I have been in this house long enough to see the western farmer become almost as diversified in his production as the farmer in the east. The only difference is that he is farming larger units.

Progress knows no retreat. You cannot stop advancement. There is no enterprise in this dominion which offers greater possibilities for research in the use of modern equipment and advancement in general than agriculture. I have farmed all my life, and my forefathers before me. I will admit that I do not know all about agriculture. I have heard some speakers in this house who knew more than I, but I have heard one or two speakers who I am convinced knew less. With all respect to those who have the same motives as the hon. member for Portage la Prairie, may I say that after this war is over I would like to see happy families on small farms, but I would hate to see a bill that retarded the general progress of agriculture itself.

I have farmed on reasonably sized farms. My main experience has been with farms of around four hundred acres, but I have had experience on farms ranging from one hundred acres up to four hundred. Some of the smaller farms have done better than mine, but just as many of the larger farms have done better. I am convinced that with the march of progress that is obvious to us all, with the modern machinery that will come out following this war, no matter how desirable it may be to have small farms with the old team and the single furrow plough, the small cultivator and the—

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: Race horses.

Mr. ROWE: Some race horses add a little bit of mirth to a class which is just as much entitled to it as any other class in this dominion. When you have the experience of seeing a boy of twelve or fourteen years go out and plough more in one day than three hired men can with high-class teams of horses in a full week, you begin to count the cost. You then realize that you cannot stop progressive development. It is not easy credit; it is essential credit.

While it is true that the man on the small farm may not need more than the limit of $3,000 provided in paragraph (d) of subsection (1) of section (3); while he may not need $2,000 or perhaps no more than $700, in progressive times like these a limit of $3,000 is pretty small for the large farm. My hon. friends may say that in general that is enough, but there is something I want to place before hon. members who I know are just as much interested as I in this great industry. Once you have a credit of x dollars as the limit, you automatically destroy the chances of the farmer getting a loan anywhere else. I well recall that the government which I was supporting brought in the Farmers' Creditors Arrangement Act. I discussed it at great length privately with the government of the day and also in the house. That act may have helped in some respects.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: Of course it did.

Mr. ROWE: My hon. friend says it did, but it was the general opinion of farmers throughout Ontario that the Farmers' Creditors Arrangement Act seriously injured the credit of the farmers of Ontario. The old retired farmer or the lawyer in the village who was handling a widow's estate and had money to lend would say to an applicant, a young couple perhaps who came in for a loan of $2,000 to buy a $10,000 farm, "No, I am sorry, George, I cannot lend you the money because I got a trimming under the Farmers' Creditors Arrangement Act."

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: Don't call him George.

Mr. ROWE: The hon. member for Fraser Valley looks so prosperous that I do not think he would ever need credit, and if he did, I am sure he could get it without any trouble. I have had scores of men come and ask me where I thought they could borrow money. I have sent them to the old line creditors, perhaps a retired farmer or a lawyer handling a widow's estate, and they would come back to me afterwards and say that they were refused the loan because the Farmers' Creditors Arrangement Act had frightened creditors off. We have had a farm loan act in Ontario and money was not being lent under that act for a good part of the time; I say that without reflecting on any government. At times the government was collecting more than it was lending under the act, and I believe that that is the case to-day. I am not saying that from any political point of view. I merely wish to emphasize the fact that because that act was on the statute book it frightened the normal creditor away.

Mr. ILSLEY. I do not see that at all.

An hon. MEMBER: I do not believe it.

Mr. ROWE: I have seen it; I believe it; I have felt it; I have evidence of it. There is not a member from Ontario who does not know that that is so. If the minister sets up a farm loan agency under this act, he is going into the field of lending money to the farmer, and if the farmer cannot get enough money from him and applies to somebody else, he will be met with the reply, "The government has a lending agency, and if you cannot get the money there, do not expect me to take your risk."

I submit therefore that the bank must be in a position to consider freely the risk it is asked to carry, and it must be in a position to be reasonably lenient to the farmer, because almost every other line of credit will have been eliminated. I say this in fairness to our local bankers. The local bank manager is usually a good citizen. I do not believe he is going to take an undue risk even with the government taking twenty per cent of the loss, but he will be more sympathetic and will feel freer to sit down in his office with the farmer who needs a loan, knowing that twenty per cent of any loss is guaranteed by the government. But if the local banker under these circumstances is not sympathetic and refuses the man a loan, where else can he get credit? The old retired farmer who might have lent him money will say, "Have you been to your bank and borrowed money under this new act?" and if the man says, "Yes, but the fellow down at the bank was never friendly to me and he will not let me have the money," the retired farmer will say, "Have you any implements?" I am simply bringing out the point that if the local banker does not give the borrower a sympathetic hearing, he has nobody else in the village to whom he can go to borrow money.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: If my hon. friend will allow me, my understanding is that this is not to take the place of mortgages but is providing for loans to enable agriculture to carry on.

Mr. ROWE: I was just coming to that. It guarantees the bank ten per cent of its loss on loans on improvements and implements.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: To enable the farmer to carry on.

Mr. ROWE: Yes, to carry on. Section 3(1)(d) says:

> the principal amount of the loan did not at the time of the making of the loan, together with the amount owing in respect of other farm improvement loans previously made to the borrower and disclosed in his application, or of which the bank had knowledge, exceed the sum of three thousand dollars.

Another section of the bill provides that the bank may take a farm mortgage up to $3,000, and I was just coming to that feature.

Mr. ILSLEY: Only if the loan exceeds $2,000 and the period for repayment is longer than five years.

Mr. ROWE: Yes. I come to the other angle, in reply to the hon. member for Fraser Valley. Under this bill you are in almost the same lending field on mortgages as you are on loans. A loan of $3,000 may be sufficient for the small farmer, but $3,000 is not a very big loan to a farmer who is farming with mechanical equipment. But when you have a mortgage on his land he cannot get credit anywhere else, no matter how big his farm may be.

Mr. WEIR: Would not that man utilize the Canadian farm loan board for a longer term loan, which would not affect his credit to the same extent?

Mr. ROWE: I agree. The Canadian farm loan board takes mortgages not only on the ground but on the chattels. You have already used the mortgage on the chattels. On the other hand, if the farm loan board can take mortgages, why put mortgages in this bill at all?

Mr. WEIR: Just for special cases.

Mr. ROWE: That is the very point I am endeavouring to make. I want the minister to think this over seriously. We should not touch the loan field in any one of these cases unless we can go as far as it is economically sound to go, because, whatever field you touch, for that particular field you will detract from the attraction of the ordinary normal creditor. Personally I would rather see this bill go through the house guaranteeing twenty per cent instead of ten per cent. I hope it is possible. I realize that there are many difficulties. I hope it is possible to make loans at four per cent; I think it is desirable; and the banks could be assured of twenty per cent. I say this in all seriousness. To my mind there is little more risk being taken. Your bank managers are sound business men, and can help the farmers and business people generally across the dominion by sound advice. I am not so sure that if you gave them sufficient backing you would not get the best protection for the treasury and the dominion that could possibly be secured in Canada. But give them sufficient backing, or support, or guarantee, whichever term you choose to use, to enable them at least to function. If you do, they will be more apt to deal sympathetically with the farmers' requirements.

So far as the farm mortgage part of it is concerned, I think that should be eliminated. Either eliminate it or leave it to the discretion of the banker to fix a higher limit. In other words, you should not enter that field at all to disturb the possibilities of the farmer getting the loan from the farm loan board.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: What does the hon. member mean by a higher limit—ten per cent, or twenty per cent, or what?

Mr. ROWE: A higher guarantee. It should not be restricted to $3,000. I realize that our farm land prices, especially in Ontario, through the years of depression from 1930 to 1940 have gone to a pretty low level at times, but I am convinced that there were literally scores of farms that would have been sold and sold at reasonably good prices and young men would have started on them had they been able to find credit. In ninety per cent of these cases, in the province of Ontario, the reason why they could not find credit was that the Farmers' Creditors Arrangement Act frightened the old line lenders.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: I do not want to interrupt the hon. member. He states that in ninety per cent of the cases he mentions the reason why loans could not be secured was that the Farmers' Creditors Arrangement Act frightened lenders. Will he not agree that the reason was in large part the fact that the economic situation was such that the prices of agricultural products were too low?

Mr. ROWE: That is quite true, and I thought I said that at the outset. But I am speaking of Ontario. Let me put it this way. Ninety per cent of the old normal type of creditor, the retired farmer or the lawyer who had money in trust, were eliminated because the Farmers' Creditors Arrangement Act ruined credit. I do not think this will ruin credit, but it will restrict the extension of credit and take it out of that field.

I would urge the minister therefore to reconsider first the ten per cent guarantee and make it twenty per cent. I would ask him to reconsider the mortgage clause and either make it adequate so that it will work in practice, or eliminate it so that it will not be required, and allow the farm loan board or other mortgage agencies to deal with mortgages as required. I would much prefer a mortgage of $10,000 on some farms to a mortgage of $3,000 on some other farms. It depends on the ratio. It is better for the government to extend through their bank a mortgage of $10,000 on a $15,000 farm than a mortgage of $3,000 on a $4,000 farm, and I see no reason why it should be fixed at any particular figure. Certainly if it is fixed at a figure, that figure should not be the arbitrary amount of $3,000, because in my opinion that would be only a nuisance mortgage.

An hon. MEMBER: Would you not put on any limit at all?

Mr. KINLEY: There is no limit except ten per cent; you can get all you want.

Mr. ROWE: A limit of $2,000 or $3,000 on implements, or to assist in improvements, might well stay at that level. Even $3,000 is not a reckless risk to take in connection with general equipment required on the average successful farm, where that includes live stock and farm implements. But when you go into the other field you find that the amount proposed is too small. It is too small to assist and therefore becomes a nuisance mortgage. And it is the first mortgage. I would like to know if there is any member in this house who would find anyone to take a second mortgage under these circumstances when it is so difficult to get the first.

I suggest therefore that the minister consider either the elimination of the mortgage clause or the desirability of making it sufficiently flexible to enable it to work. I am convinced that there is not a single feature that will endanger the credit of farmers more than allowing the government to take the first mortgage and leaving it to doubtful lenders to take the second.

Mr. ILSLEY: Under this act it is not necessarily the first.

Mr. ROWE: It may not necessarily be the first, according to the letter—

Mr. HOMUTH: Would they take a second?

Mr. ROWE: That is the question. I say to the minister: Is it going to be your practice to take a second?

Mr. ILSLEY: The government is not going to operate it. The government will be supervising it, but not operating it. The banks will operate it.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: Will the banks take a second?

Mr. HOMUTH: They will never take a second.

Mr. ROWE: With the government supervising and the bank operating it, and knowing the present Minister of Finance, as I know him, and it is only to his credit to say so, I am sure he will be very leery about a second one. Even he, in all his kindness, will leave it to John Jones, the retired farmer in the district, and John Jones will shake his head, as an hon. member over there is doing, and will decline to touch it. The farmer will then go to the farm loan board and someone will come and examine his farm. He will then say to the farmer, "You went to the bank, did you not?" The farmer will say "Yes." Then the other will say to the farmer, "You could not get it from the dominion?" "No." Well, whether it might be politic or not, the other man will say to the farmer, "You could not get credit from the government, and there must be some reason for that, because they can throw billions around here and there; they are not so small in their loans. If your credit were good they would have given it to you."

I am not critical of the bill, but I am throwing this out as a warning. I know the purpose is to help the farmer with reasonable credit rather than to injure him, but I fear that the purpose in view will not be achieved, and in the end, crude as this may sound, despite our good intentions, we may simply be adding insult to injury and depriving the farmer of other credit which he might have been able to obtain.

Mr. E. G. HANSELL (Macleod): In discussing this bill providing short term credits to farmers for the improvement of their farms I do not do so as an agricultural expert. I will admit, of course, that I know very little about farming and agriculture in general. I might dip one of my hands in one sack of wheat and the other in another and compare the two, and I would not know that there was very much difference, except that one might look a little bigger than the other.

Mr. KNOWLES: They may both be oats.

Mr. HANSELL: They may be something else. I may look at two cows and I think I would know the difference between a Holstein and a Jersey. Once upon a time I did see a picture of the leader of the Progressive Conservative party milking a cow; I knew then which was the cow, but I do not claim to be an agricultural expert. I do not think it requires an abundance of knowledge about agriculture to discuss this bill. I do not know how much the Minister of Finance (Mr. Ilsley) knows about agriculture, but I do know that he knows something about finance, about banking, about credit institutions, about mortgages and related subjects, and he is the man who brings down the bill. It is purely a bill which concerns those who are interested in monetary affairs.

I do not think we can very well oppose the measure, because after all Canada's orthodox Minister of Finance is bringing it in for the purpose of helping the farmer to get credit on easier terms. While we may support the bill, what is actually needed is more fundamental legislation, legislation that would have the effect of putting the farmer in such a position that he would not have to borrow money for the improvement of property, buying machinery and things in general on his farm. Of course I am not saying that industry ever operates without certain credit facilities; whether it is secondary industry or primary industry they all find it necessary to borrow money, pay overdrafts, and so on. But I do say that what is needed is some legislation that would fundamentally change the present system of financial operations. When that is done, agriculture will have its chance, and secondary industry, though a bit better off in past years than agriculture, will also be in a better position. The fact of the matter is that fundamentally industry is never self-liquidating under the present system of borrowing.

This bill is a measure to provide loans for improvement of farms. Anything that will improve the farm will make it more valuable. I agree with the hon. member for Fraser Valley (Mr. Cruickshank) when he says that the difficulty is not borrowing money but being able to pay it back. The difference between agriculture and secondary industry is that when secondary industry borrows money for the purpose of production those borrowings are written into the costs of its production. The result is that when the goods are sold the loans are retrieved and paid back. But that is not what happens with agriculture. The main difference is that secondary industry puts a price tag on its production that meets the requirements of the debt, but the farmer never puts a price tag on his production. He is a gambler—not that he wants to be, but the very nature of his business makes him one. He has to accept the available price for his production and take a chance on whether or not that available price will enable him to retire his debt.

I should like to see a crop failure paragraph in this bill, because the farmer operates on a yearly basis. If he has a crop failure one year his loan is still held intact, and he finds it necessary to continue to pay the interest on that loan—

An hon. MEMBER: Compounded.

Mr. HANSELL: As my hon. friend says, compounded. That happens whether he has a crop failure or not. The fact of the matter is it does not cost the bank anything to carry that loan for another year. That may be subject to a lot of discussion. As a matter of fact the banks do not lend the farmer anything, in reality. The banks lend debt. When the farmer goes to the bank he gets a debt in the form of financial figures. The only obligation that is imposed upon the banks—and I am using a crop failure year as an illustration—is what it costs to carry that debt, which is very little. When I say, "costs to carry the debt" I suppose I shall have to include the interest of one and a half per cent that the banks have to pay when that debt becomes deposits in the savings accounts of the people. Therefore I say there should be a debt paragraph in the bill which in a crop failure year would stay the increase of the debt in so far as interest is concerned. There would be no interest in a crop failure year.

The hon. member for Portage la Prairie (Mr. Leader) has told us of the danger to farmers by reason of their being able to obtain easy credit. I may agree with him there, but I would also say that any credit is a danger, whether it be easy credit or hard credit. Any credit is a danger because credit given to farmers by banks is a debt, and any credit is a danger in that sense. There is only one credit that is not a danger, and that is social credit.

I wonder if the minister, in discussing this bill, took the various agricultural organizations into his confidence. I do not know that it would help him very much, I must confess, because in reading much that is published by agricultural organizations I notice that they tackle almost every farm problem except the problem of farm debt. They deal with almost everything affecting agriculture, including markets, but somehow or other they do not seem to deal with the problem of a proper fiscal policy for the farmer. They may think they do, but I must confess that I find a sad lack in their literature in this regard. For instance, may I quote from a pamphlet issued by the Canadian federation of agriculture, which is rather enlightening. This is an address which was broadcast by Mr. Pearson, who is our representative on the United Nations Relief and Rehabilitation Administration, with respect to the Hot Springs conference. I heard the broadcast, and thought it was very good. This statement is very significant:

> The application of science to agriculture has for the first time in history now given man the physical means for conquering want. Whether he has the economic sense and the social wisdom so to apply his scientific and productive knowledge that the food which is grown gets to all the people—well, that is another question.

[Mr. Hansell.]

That is the question, and Mr. Pearson does not go into the problem of how the food is to be distributed to the world, which I claim is a fundamental difficulty that has to be solved. If it is a matter of distribution, then it is a question of money. Then I have an address by Mr. Paul Appleby, which is also issued by the Canadian federation of agriculture. In these remarks I am not criticizing the federation; I am simply suggesting that while they have attempted to solve many problems of agriculture they do not seem to have tackled the most fundamental problem of all. I have mentioned this address by Mr. Appleby; I do not find any of my markings in this pamphlet, so I fancy I need not comment on that. In any case these people will know that I read their literature. Another publication by the federation is entitled "Farmers Meet the Cabinet," and it is very interesting. I do not know whether they got very far, but the pamphlet contains a paragraph on government subsidies. I am not going to read it, because I do not want to take the time of the house in doing so, but it gives the psychological impression that they are more or less apologizing because the government have given subsidies to agriculture, and they argue that after all the subsidy is given to benefit the consumer. That argument is right; I have no quarrel with it, but let me say that agriculture has no reason whatever to apologize for government subsidies. I agree with them, and I have no particular criticism to offer of the financial policy of the government in respect to subsidies. I do say, however, that agriculture is not self-liquidating under the present debt-creating system. The hon. member for Battle River (Mr. Fair) said he wanted agriculture put on a proper footing. So do I; so do we all. We want agriculture in such a position that with parity prices it will be able to pay its way. But let me add that in my humble opinion if one branch of Canadian industry is self-liquidating, it is at the expense of another branch of Canadian industry almost going into bankruptcy.

I am not going to say anything more about this matter of government subsidies, Mr. Speaker, because I am afraid you are apt to say it is a bit out of order, though as a matter of fact when we come to discuss a bill of this kind we are almost bound to discuss the operation of agriculture in respect to prices. Now I have another pamphlet issued by the Canadian federation of agriculture which deals with the federation itself; what it is, how it works and what it advocates. On page 11 they talk about farm income, and the concluding paragraph reads:

> The federation believes that until the principle is accepted that farmers are entitled to a fair exchange value for the products of the farm with the products and services of non-farm groups, there can be no secure future for agriculture.

In reality all that is said in this paragraph is that there must be parity prices; but if I am correct in saying that industry is not self-liquidating under a debt-creating system, parity prices of themselves will not do the trick for agriculture. I should point out, however, that on page 14 of this pamphlet I find one short paragraph dealing with farm credit. I do not think I need read it, for it simply says that farm credit should be available. With all that, however, they do not seem to recognize what is inherently the fundamental problem of all industry.

I shall close, Mr. Speaker, simply by saying that it seems to me such an organization as the Canadian federation of agriculture should have within itself a body or a committee of economic advisers. And may I suggest that if they ever have such a committee, it is of no use to have economic advisers who have not been able to advise in days gone by. They must be economic advisers with a new idea, advisers who know what is wrong and who will advise as to the right way out.

As I have said, I am going to support the bill. It is purely and simply an orthodox bill. It will not do the trick; do not think it will. It will not save the farmer completely; it will help to lengthen his suffering days, but just the same I will vote for it.

Mr. A. W. NEILL (Comox-Alberni): I think the general opinion of hon. members is that this is a good bill. Any criticism that has been offered has been in an endeavour to make the legislation more useful, and has consisted of two suggestions; first, that the rate of interest should be reduced, and second that the government's share of responsibility should be greater. The hon. member for Dufferin-Simcoe (Mr. Rowe) introduced a new angle along this line. He pointed out something which is no doubt correct—although I do not give it the emphasis that he did—that under this bill it might be possible for a bank to take a mortgage for a small loan. They have that power under the act. That would to a large extent cut off a man's credit. He would not be able to get credit otherwise, once it was discovered that the bank had a mortgage on his property, even for a small amount.

However I do not anticipate the trouble anticipated by the hon. member, and for two reasons. The first is that this is primarily intended to be a small loan bill to help farmers in a small way and, as I understand it, for a comparatively temporary period. The purpose of the bill is not to finance a farmer, but rather to help him. And unless a farmer has some stake in his land, and some reasonable assets, it is not proposed that this bill will enable him to start farming and finance him for his land, implements, stock and everything else. This is regarded more as a temporary matter.

On the other hand there is this feature, that even if he had a small loan for two or three hundred dollars, if he afterwards deemed it advisable to get a larger loan he could always get it under the Canadian Farm Loan Act, and he could repay this temporary loan.

I agree with those who have advocated that the rate of interest should be reduced. That would only bring it in line with the interest charged under the War Veterans' Allowance Act. I have had long experience with farmers, and I know that the less mortgage a farmer has, the better. He cannot afford to pay the high rate of interest which perhaps it would be fair enough to charge those engaged in some other lines of activity. If he is going to have any mortgage, then he should be able to get it at a low rate of interest. In my view four per cent, or even three and a half per cent, would be reasonable.

That, of course, would require consideration of the other objection which has been raised, namely, that the government should take a larger share of the loss, if any. It has been suggested that it be raised from ten per cent to twenty per cent. This would be essential if the lower rate of interest is conceded. Because even at five per cent I doubt if the average bank would be bothered. They are getting only a ten per cent repayment from the government, and their loans would be small. They can lend money at as much as six or eight per cent, and they are not going to be bothered with it. You can lead a horse to water but you cannot make him drink. And our appeal will not make them lend money if the proposal is not a reasonable one. Therefore, if we are to compel them to lend at four per cent it would be reasonable to expect the government to assume a greater responsibility of the ultimate loss, if any.

One other point, and it is this. According to the bill the governor in council may make regulations dealing with so many different matters that they extend over a page and a half. Well, I suppose that is necessary, but it entails great danger. For heaven's sake let the government use its power to make these regulations as simple as possible, and make the process of getting loans under this measure as rapid as possible. The government passed a reasonably simple act in respect of old age pensions, and gave power to somebody to make regulations. Those regulations made a completely new bill; one would hardly recognize it as the same bill. I hope the government will exercise its control in the present instance and prevent anything of that kind—because it is quite possible to condemn the bill entirely by way of regulations. They can go all over the shop with these regulations, and if that is done inadvisedly it will mean that the bill would be of no use at all.

Following out that idea I would impress upon the government the fact that a great deal of the advantage in connection with loans of this kind is that a man can get a loan quickly. If he cannot get it quickly it is not worth much to him. There may be an auction sale, or a man may have a chance to buy sheep at a low price. If he can get money in a few hours or in a few days, well and good. If not, a provision of this kind is of very little use to him.

A few years ago a man came to my office wanting to borrow $200. I told him all about the Canadian Farm Loan Act, and about the procedure he would have to follow. "But", he said, "I want the money now. I do not want to wait three or four weeks, or perhaps six weeks, while they go all through the red tape three thousand miles away. I want the money now." It was of no use to him if he could not get it right away. Instead of borrowing from the government at four per cent or five per cent I lent him the money at six per cent, and he later repaid it. The point I make is that he was willing to pay six or eight per cent to get quick action. That is the main thing in connection with these small loans, when a man goes to buy a bull, a horse or something of the kind. The regulations may say, "You have to write to Jones." Then Jones sends you a form. You fill out the form, and you sign your name. Then in the fulness of time you are advised that you have misspelt a word and you have to begin again. Then it is sent to Ottawa, and the man at Ottawa is on holidays —and I have seen this happen—and the usefulness of the loan has passed.

This is a good bill, and a good principle, but it should be made as simple as possible and the interest rate should be cut down. Make it worth the bank's while. I am not advocating the interests of the bank—it is most unpopular to defend the banks these days; one would think they were the spawn of the devil. But we cannot compel the banks to lend money, and if we do not give them a reasonable deal they will not be bothered. Therefore my suggestion would be to reduce the interest rate and make the regulations simple.

Mr. ANTHONY HLYNKA (Vegreville): Mr. Speaker, I object to the second reading of the bill this afternoon. We received a copy of it as late as eleven o'clock this morning, and have had only two or three hours to look over it. I suggest to you that members did not have enough time to digest the contents of the bill or to analyse what it contains. Therefore they are not in a position to discuss intelligently an important measure of this kind.

I do not wish to reflect upon those who have already spoken, but I say that any measure affecting approximately a third of our population should be printed a few days before it is debated in the house, and should be distributed to members of parliament so that they may be in a position to give it study before being asked to comment upon its merits or demerits. This measure will affect approximately thirty per cent of the people in this country. Agriculture has been our fundamental industry, and upon its success depends the success of people in many walks of life. I agree with the hon. member for Macleod (Mr. Hansell) when he says that agricultural organizations should have been consulted. In my opinion the bill should have been printed a few days ago and distributed both to agricultural organizations and to members of parliament, so that they might be properly prepared to make their comments.

Divorce bills are usually printed well in advance, bills which most of us hardly read, but a measure of this sort is rushed through as quickly as possible and we have little or no time to look it over.

I would draw your attention to section 7, special powers of bank, which reads:

—if a bank makes a guaranteed farm improvement loan the principal amount of which exceeds two thousand dollars and the period for repayment of which is longer than five years, the bank may at the time of making the loan take as security for the repayment thereof and the payment of interest thereon—

(b) an assignment of the rights and interest of a purchaser of the farm under an agreement of sale.

To me this section indicates that if a bank takes a mortgage upon a farm home and the farmer fails to meet his debt on time, he will be forced to give up his land. In 1938 the province of Alberta passed the home owners' security act which was later disallowed by this government. The purpose of that act was to prohibit the foreclosure or sale under mortgage of any farm home. I suggest that ten years from now many of our western Canadian farmers will find themselves in a position similar to the one they were in from 1929 to 1939 and the financial institutions will proceed to foreclose upon their homes.

I intend to support the bill, but object strongly to any provision which would permit a lending institution to foreclose upon the home of a citizen of this country. The family is an important institution in our nation, and we must have high regard for its welfare. Every family should have a home. If a mortgage is given upon land by a farmer I say that the home of the family should not be allowed to be sold for a debt. The time will come when the farmers of this nation will demand from the government that such a bill be passed so that they may be sure that at least they will have a home from which no one can evict them.

I notice that the bill provides for a total of not more than $250,000,000 in loans over a period of years. At the end of 1941 the private debts of our Canadian farmers amounted to $629,000,000, which works out to $2,372 per farm. The $250,000,000 provided in this bill is only a fraction of the money which the farmers of this nation owe to-day, and that does not include the debt written off and other private debts not covered by mortgages.

On a previous occasion I gave the house the details of the indebtedness as it stood in 1941 and as it affected the farmers in each province. I do not intend to repeat the remarks I made previously, except to say that forty-eight per cent of all owned farms in Canada are mortgaged. To me that is an indication that there must be something very much wrong. I have just received a pamphlet from the national farm radio forum and it has this to say under the heading of "The Federal Intermediate Credit Banks":

> The present rate in effect in the continental United States is one and a half per cent and in Puerto Rico two per cent.

Why is it not possible for Canadian banks to make credit available to our farmers at one and a half or two per cent interest? The hon. member for Comox-Alberni referred to the fact that we shall be providing credit to our returned men at three and a half per cent. Why should we not be able to provide our farmers with lower rates of interest?

The government promises to guarantee certain losses up to ten per cent. I do not know that I can say much about that at this time. May I say, however, that no matter how honest and efficient a farmer may be, if he is forced to sell his production at below the cost of production, if he is not given protection from the hazards of nature, he will fail to meet his debt obligations. This has been proved by the experience of the past, particularly in the period from 1929 to 1939. The farmer must get parity prices for his products, and not on the 1926-29 level which is used by the Minister of Agriculture.

It should be a parity price which will constitute a proper relationship between the prices which the farmer gets for his products and the prices which he has to pay for the goods he buys. Again, the farmer must be protected from the losses caused by hail and frost and other hazards of nature so that he may be in a position to meet his debt obligations as they fall due.

The minister knows very well that the government has no say as to the amount of credit in circulation, and as this power rests in the hands of the banks, I suggest to him that the banks will restrict credit in the future and then proceed to foreclose on the homes of the farmers. I wish to underline the necessity of amending section 7 (1) (b) and so give protection to the banks in lending to the farmer and at the same time protect the home of the farmer from foreclosure.

Mr. W. G. WEIR (Macdonald): Mr. Speaker, after listening to the hon. member for Vegreville (Mr. Hlynka) condemn this measure I am surprised that he stated earlier in his remarks that he would support it.

I think we sometimes overlook just what the purpose of this bill is. It is not designed to take away or remove entirely the facilities that now exist for people securing credit from other sources. For instance, the farmer who has victory bonds, as no doubt many of them now have, would have one of the best sources of security with which to go to a bank and borrow money, and he would be able to borrow it at a lower rate than is proposed in this measure. This legislation to me is merely a step in advance of what we already have. It is to meet the particular requirements of a class who have perhaps experienced some difficulty in the past in securing the credit which they need. We have had in existence the Canadian farm loan board which provides for a particular type of long term credit. We have, in addition, banks and private individuals lending for other purposes. The type of loan provided for by this measure fits in between these two other types of loans, and the bill is designed, as I see it, to meet a little more than the ordinary seasonal requirements of farmers, and to take care of requirements that continue beyond one season into another.

Let me illustrate by taking the case of a man who wants to buy a farm implement and has not sufficient money to pay for it in cash. Heretofore we all know that the farm implement companies have provided a good deal of the credit facilities for that type of business. They have naturally been obliged to protect themselves by perhaps adding to their prices and by securing a rate of interest sufficient to cover that type of business. I look upon this measure as designed to meet that type of requirement, so that a man who wants to buy some farm implement will be able to go to the bank and secure a loan, giving security on the implement he is about to buy, and receiving a loan at a rate of 5 per cent, enabling him to make a cash deal with the implement company.

The hon. member for Dufferin-Simcoe (Mr. Rowe) appeared to be afraid that the entry of the government into this field of lending might have the effect of drying up other sources of credit. I do not think his fears in that regard are well founded. I think that other sources of credit have been affected for reasons other than government lending. Governments have come into the picture and have provided credit, it is true, and in the matter of farm mortgage loans, particularly in western Canada at the present time, it can be assumed that the government agency is making most of the loans and that private loans have largely dried up. That is to be regretted, and I agree with the hon. member to that extent; but other conditions have been partly responsible for that. The Farmers' Creditors Arrangement Act, as the hon. member suggested, has undoubtedly played a part as well in drying up other sources of credit. Other forms of security have taken a prior position to the farm mortgage as first-class security, but the same credit facilities will still be available for the man whose assets make him in the eyes of the bank a credit-worthy risk. That is all I want to say with respect to that particular feature.

I wish to draw the minister's attention to the banking facilities that are available in most parts of western Canada. I look at the area around Winnipeg. The banks are naturally located there and they do a considerable country business. There is not a rural bank in the area with which I am familiar within forty or fifty miles of Winnipeg. This is the point which the hon. member for Comox-Alberni (Mr. Neill) made, that the banks are not conveniently located to meet the needs of those requiring this type of loan.

There is another thing I have in mind in regard to this measure as it will be operated by the banks. I am not suggesting that it should be handled by any other means, but city banks, for example, are managed largely by the city type of banker, not by a rural banker, and I am just wondering if that type of banker would give the same attention to farm loan requirements that the experienced country banker would. I have all kinds of confidence in the country type of banker so far as the requirements of the farmer are concerned, but since our country banking facilities are very limited, full account should be taken of this aspect of the matter. If the city banker does not like doing farm business, the position of the farmer in getting accommodation under this legislation is going to be weakened. I shall be obliged if the minister when he is making his reply to the observations that have been made this afternoon will make some comment on that.

Mr. CLARENCE GILLIS (Cape Breton South): Mr. Speaker, I am not a farmer and I am not a banker.

Mr. ROSS (Souris): Why?

Mr. GILLIS: Nevertheless I am going to express my opinion on this measure. As I understand the bill before the house, it is merely a repetition of the Industrial Development bank bill applied to agriculture and my hope is that the banking and commerce committee will have sufficient sense to consider carefully the whole matter of banks as they now exist and will refrain from recommending any extension of bank charters, from making any decision on the extension of charters, on the industrial development bank, or with regard to farmer's intermediate and short term credit, or the Quebec savings banks until such time as the picture is more clear. The world to-day, in my opinion, is in a fluid state, and those who are thinking in terms of regulating the currency and credit of this nation or of any other nation as it was prior to the outbreak of this war are not cognizant of the world situation. To-day international organizations are now talking about developing currency and credit in the international field for the exchange of goods and commodities between the different countries, and when that body lays down its mandate in that field it will affect the internal economy of every country, I do not care who is in power.

As I see the present proposals which the minister has brought in, and as I listen to and read the controversy that is taking place in the banking and commerce committee, it is all an indication to me at any rate, as a layman who makes no pretence at being an expert, that the whole matter of currency and credit is confused and requires a good deal of clarification.

The bills themselves and the discussions that I have listened to in the house are a clear indication that we require a lot of serious thinking on this matter of currency and credit, because, in my opinion, it is the kernel of the whole economic system, and unless that is sound we are in for much confused post-war planning. I think, and I believe the minister does also, that the measures are not going to be of very much value now during the process of fighting the war; they are designed to take care of some of our post-war problems both in the field of reconstruction and industry and in the field of the stabilization of agriculture. If that is the purpose for which they are designed then I suggest that until such time as the international picture and the national picture as well are clearer than they are at the present moment, the banking committee would be well advised, instead of definitely deciding that this is the cure for our post-war ills, to undertake a close study and to come to a clear understanding of post-war problems. I suggest that they might take that view instead of deciding that this is the remedy.

Of course I realize that these measures can always be changed; but it must not be forgotten that this government is on the eve of an election and while they may have these measures passed now—

Mr. McILRAITH: Do you know the date?

Mr. GILLIS: No, I do not, but I am reasonably sure it is not too far away.

Mr. HANSELL: October 15.

Mr. GILLIS: They may have these measures passed and become law, but they may not be here to administer them. I have in mind, for example, the passing of the National Housing Act in 1936—I believe it was in that year but I am not sure—and I am afraid of the latitude given the minister in this bill. My fear is based on that National Housing Act, because the minister had a good deal of latitude under that measure, and I remember distinctly that when we tried to have the act implemented in the eastern end of Nova Scotia, the city of Sydney was informed at that time by the then Minister of Finance, Mr. Dunning, that it was not considered that there was sufficient prosperity in that end of the country to warrant the expenditure of public moneys in a building programme. The then minister exercised his authority under the act. Under this bill the minister at his own discretion can terminate any form of loan covered thereby. Section 3 clearly states that the minister may, with the approval of the governor in council, by notice to a bank, terminate the operation of that section with respect to any class of farm improvement loan, and so forth. Suppose the next minister is not a very conscientious fellow—

Mr. ILSLEY: He will be.

Mr. GILLIS: The minister says he will be.

Mr. ILSLEY: All finance ministers have been.

Mr. GILLIS: Well, none of us is sure he will be here to-morrow. As I read this bill, I may be suspicious, and perhaps my suspicion is based on experience, since I am a graduate from the school of hard knocks. At any rate, it seems to me that it is not a bad bill on the eve of an election, though I cannot see any solution for the farmer who requires money under it. The minister is in a position, after the election is over, to curtail or restrict or change or terminate this thing completely.

Mr. MacNICOL: There may be a change of ministers.

Mr. GILLIS: I am not a prophet but I am taking this bill as it reads. Personally I cannot see any redress for the farmer under the bill, though I have read it carefully. What is the experience in Norway, Sweden, Finland and France in connection with agricultural credits? They have endeavoured to solve the problem, and I know the machinery now being set up, both in the field of industrial development and in the field of agricultural credits, is not new. It was tried in the countries I have mentioned. The idea is merely to endeavour to extend and to build for the future on a machine which in my opinion has crashed and is beyond repair. That is why I do not want to pin our post-war plans in either field on this kind of machinery. You are not making any changes. You are still vesting in the chartered banks the right to issue or to withhold loans if they so desire. On the other hand, the government is going to accept a certain percentage of risk on the aggregate loans. As I heard the matter discussed here, I was led to believe by some members that the government would accept ten per cent of the individual loan. According to the bill, it is the aggregate loan. I presume at the end of the year the banks would file a statement with the minister that the aggregate loans under the measure, in their particular branch, amounted to so much. They may have defaulted to the extent of such and such an amount and the department then assumes ten per cent of the liability of the total loans outstanding in that branch. Well, that might run into a considerable amount of money. However, I am not concerned about that. What I am thinking about is this, that the government guarantees the loan and does so with the taxpayers' money; and if the taxpayers' money is to assume the risk either under the Industrial Development bank bill or under this legislation, then I think they should expect to receive some benefits from it.

My Tory friends to the right and some of the Conservative members on the other side are very much concerned when one speaks about government control or the socialization of finance. They get all hot and bothered about that. The solution of the problem of reconstruction and rehabilitation has been handed to the minister and the government. Industry says, "You accept the risk and allow us to make profits." There is nothing that smacks so much of that so-called enterprise as that. That is not a system, because if the system under which we have lived in the past has lacked anything it has lacked system. It is the most haphazard, grab-as-you-go system that has ever been or could be evolved. Their reason for existing and for wanting to perpetuate their future is that they take risk in the field of investment. Neither in the field of industry nor in the field of agriculture are they going to assume any risk in the future.

As I see it, what we have here and what we are evolving is a managerial form of society with the government managing the country, taking the risk, providing the services and guaranteeing the profits to the fellow who is not obliged to do even the thinking in his own private enterprise.

Mr. FRASER (Peterborough West): If we had that it would be a terrible country.

Mr. GILLIS: That is exactly what we have. If the hon. member cannot see it that is not my fault. That is exactly what we are building up. We are not so far away from it.

I said I was not an expert on banking or finance. I read these things and I try to apply some common sense to them. What I am afraid of is that we may do this in a hurry and make a mess of it. When the Industrial Development bank bill was before the house I said that we of this party want to see the people of Canada benefited by the future activities of our government. I have reiterated time and time again that the thing we quarrel with is not what somebody else owns; that is immaterial. We have quarreled with the fact that the control exercised by the banks and industries of this country is complete control over the initiative and the wealth-creating means of the people themselves. Because of that control they are restricted. It is that control we want to unharness. We are not concerned with what the banks and industries have, but it is a fact that they can hold back the creative energies of the people in developing the country's resources for themselves.

The hon. member for Macdonald (Mr. Weir) talked of being afraid of the approach of the city banker to the problem of the farmer who may require credit in a hurry. I absolutely agree with him, because you do not have to go back very far into history in so far as the banking field is concerned to see that. The province of Nova Scotia is a very good illustration. Not so many years ago we had our own banks there. They were owned and managed by Nova Scotians to do Nova Scotia business. We had no difficulties. Then they were merged into a central institution, and to-day if you want to start a small factory or get a loan over $500 you have to go to some central headquarters and clearly define the purposes for which you require the loan. If you are starting something that comes in competition with something that is already tied in with that centre you do not get the money. You have lost control.

When I spoke on the Industrial Development bank bill I tried to focus attention on the possibilities of supporting and developing the credit union organizations across Canada. I think the hon. member for Macdonald struck the nail on the head when he expressed his fear. If there is any institution in Canada that could come to the rescue of the farmer it is the credit union institution, which has been established on a community basis. If the government of this country are prepared to use the taxpayers' money to subsidize or guarantee the loans of the chartered banks in this field, what is the matter with giving some assistance to a movement that is already established in the field?

Mr. ILSLEY: We have no control over them.

Mr. GILLIS: No; you have no control over them, but you have no control over the chartered banks.

Mr. ILSLEY: Oh yes.

Mr. GILLIS: Yes, in theory.

Mr. ILSLEY: And in practice.

Mr. GILLIS: Not in practice.

Mr. ILSLEY: We certainly have.

Mr. GILLIS: I am not going to argue with the minister. The institution to which I refer is already well developed. Thousands and thousands of members have studied the movement. The farmer will require his immediate credits on a community basis. Short-term or intermediate credits are not the solutions of the farmer's problems. That is what has hamstrung him in the past. What he requires is long-term mortgage credit. If short-term and intermediate credit were the solution hundreds of farmers across the country would not have lost their properties. They lost their properties during the depression because they had short-term credits. If the government can protect them I think it should have protected the soldier settlers. It is only two weeks ago that we had a delegation from Manitoba and Saskatchewan in this city pointing out to the Minister of Mines and Resources (Mr. Crerar) that since the outbreak of this war approximately 606 soldier settlers a year for the four war years in those provinces have lost their properties because of their inability to meet their payments. That has happened during this war. If there was a solution of the credit needs of the farmers of Canada the loss of property by farmers across the country would not have taken place. What the farmer needs is long-term and mortgage credit, not short-term and intermediate credit, which has been the evil of the system in the past.

Many people think credit unions are small. They are not. Those unions consist of a large number of members, and the movement is a national one. There are 129 credit unions in Alberta, 108 in British Columbia, 78 in Manitoba, 146 in New Brunswick, 204 in Nova Scotia, 163 in Ontario, 47 in Prince Edward Island, 749 in Quebec and 128 in Saskatchewan, making a total of 1,759 across the country. These are only branches. There are thousands of members in this association pooling their resources on a community basis. To-day they control considerable finance across the country, and they have developed the field of credit to a very great extent. They have linked up the industrial worker and the rural worker on that basis. They meet together. They iron out their problems together. They are beginning to understand each other's problems.

What militates against that movement to-day is the lack of some central tie-up with the different provinces. It is tied up to some extent in Nova Scotia. It is coordinated with a credit union league, but it is not functioning to lend money on long-term loans or on mortgages. I emphasize the necessity of a national organization that would not only utilize the finances they have now but make use of the brains and the stamina that have been given by those who have voluntarily developed that organization across Canada in a completely new field.

They are not looking for anything for their services. The whole movement is voluntary. It aims at uplifting the intelligence of the people and solving this community credit problem which developed as a result of the failure of the banks to do anything about the matter back in the thirties. This organization has made wonderful progress, and I would suggest that when the banking and commerce committee come to study this bill they get the statistics which are available in connection with this movement and call in the people at the head of it to see if this organization cannot be utilized on a national basis for the purpose of providing long-term mortgage credits for the farmers of this country. If the movement is not large enough to take care of the whole problem on a national scale it could be assisted and developed.

No money will be lost under this movement. I happen to belong to this organization, which I helped set up in Nova Scotia. I have here a note from the manager of the credit union to which I belong. In the ten years during which the movement has been in operation in Nova Scotia it has not had one bad loan, and loans of up to $3,000 have been made by the local branches. This is just one branch, located in one ward of the town of Glace Bay, and the manager states that at the present time their assets amount to $60,000; that they have a savings account of $52,000, a loan balance of $41,000 and victory bonds to the extent of $8,200. This was just a note to let me know how the thing was going, since I was a member of the board of directors until I came here. As I say, this is just one small branch in one section of that community, and there are many others. In my opinion this offers a solution of the problem of farm credit in Canada. Under this set-up the farmer is dealing with his own people. If he meets adverse conditions and cannot live up to the terms of his agreement 100 per cent, he is not called in by a banker who is responsible to a board of directors in some distant city. Whether or not the bank manager is sympathetic—as I believe most of them are—he has no alternative but to squeeze the borrower, for the terms of a loan with a bank cannot be altered. Under this set-up, however, a man deals with his own people, who are not subject to a board of directors in Montreal or Toronto. His board of directors lives right in the community; they know him personally, and can extend his loan and perhaps waive his interest, simply because they are not paying salaries to people whose only function is to scrutinize the balance sheet at the end of the year.

Loans made through this medium are also protected by insurance. These unions insure their loan balance and share capital. According to this letter, which I am not going to bother reading but which I can show to the minister at any time he cares to look at it, their share capital is insured for sixty-five cents a hundred dollars and their loan balance for seventy-five cents a hundred dollars. The way it works, and the way it would work for the farmer, is this. If a man had $500 of share capital and wanted to take out that money as a loan, he would do so. Then he would make his purchase for cash, which means a saving of up to perhaps fifteen per cent. Supposing something happens in the meantime; the man dies. That $500 is outstanding, but while he used that money that amount remains to his credit as share capital. In Nova Scotia at any rate that loan balance and share capital are insured through the Cuna Mutual Cooperative Insurance Company, which now has offices in Canada and is well established in the United States. That company pays off the loan balance and doubles the share capital to the beneficiary of the person involved in that loan. Many of the insurance companies cannot understand how they do it, but they do; we have had such cases ourselves. Under a set-up like that, with some assistance and encouragement from the federal government, a national organization could be developed to take care of the credit needs of farmers across Canada on a community basis. With this protection by insurance you cannot lose anything, but you will bring about a brand new economic reform in Canada in the field of finance and credit, while each individual member of the organization will benefit.

I am not going to discuss this matter longer; I am sorry to have taken up so much of the time of the house. I only want to emphasize that in view of the unsettled international situation, which is reflected in the situation of each country, with such important questions coming up for discussion as the renewal of the charters of the banks, the development of some form of credit for the farmers, the Industrial Development bank in connection with industry, all looking to the post-war period, it is my opinion that with the picture as confused as it is at present the banking and commerce committee would be well advised to take a year or so to study the set-up and bring in necessary reforms to the whole banking and credit structure, rather than make decisions now while the situation is in such turmoil. In my view this measure does not touch the problem at all; it will not do anything for the farmer as far as his credit needs are concerned. In the first place, short-term and intermediate credit caused many farmers to be dispossessed of their land in days gone by. What they require—and this is not my opinion but the opinion of men who have studied this matter—is long-term and mortgage credit if they are to be given an opportunity to utilize any lending institution in order to rehabilitate and maintain their farms. Short-term and intermediate credit is not the answer; it must be long-term and mortgage credit. There is a possibility of developing that field through the credit union set-up which now is organized nationally, and which has given this question a great deal of study.

[Mr. Gillis.]

Mr. ILSLEY: Just for information, would the hon. gentleman tell me what rate of interest the credit unions charge?

Mr. GILLIS: The rate of interest works out at six per cent per annum. It is one per cent a month on the unpaid balance. If you carry your loan for twelve months it works out at six per cent, but if you pay off the loan sooner you may get your money for two per cent.

Mr. ILSLEY: But it is at the rate of six per cent per annum?

Mr. GILLIS: Yes, but of course the answer is that you are paying it to yourself. At the end of the year they declare a dividend, and you may get three or four per cent on your share capital. You pay six per cent on your loan but you may get back three or four per cent.

Mr. ILSLEY: If you borrow from yourself you are lending to yourself.

Mr. GILLIS: That is right, and it comes back to you.

Mr. SLAGHT: Did I understand the hon. gentleman to say that the insurance at seventy-five cents a hundred dollars is insurance with a recognized company against the possible loss by the union of that hundred dollars?

Mr. GILLIS: That is right. It is a cooperative insurance company. It is seventy-five cents a hundred dollars.

Mr. W. F. KUHL (Jasper-Edson): Perhaps almost everything has been said on this bill that can be said, Mr. Speaker, but there are one or two thoughts which may not have been emphasized as much as I think they should be. I should like to give expression to a few of the facts which I think should be emphasized a good deal more, in the consideration of a matter of this kind. I do not think there is any division of opinion as to the farmer's need of additional equipment, improvements and alterations on his farm. However, what is the consequence of enabling him to make these provisions? I think that is something most hon. members have not followed through in their discussions on the bill.

This is a bill to give the farmer more ready access to credit, so as to enable him, for example, to acquire more farm machinery. Certainly if he is able to acquire more farm machinery and other equipment, he will be able to increase his production in proportion to the amount of equipment acquired. In other words, the result of this legislation, as well as the legislation setting up an industrial bank, and other similar legislation, is to stimulate to still great heights the production of this country, whether it be primary, secondary or anything else.

The question I would ask at this point is this: Was the problem which faced the people of Canada before the war one of inability to produce? Were we lacking in production of anything? Was there any lack of production of farm commodities? Was there any lack of any commodities produced in Canada? The answer is obvious. We were being told on every hand before the war that our problem was one of overproduction. Everyone was saying that our problem was not one of production; rather it was the reverse.

Yet to-day we have before us a bill the purpose of which is to stimulate production to still higher levels in the post-war period. If the problem is one of production, or if the distribution could be accomplished by the system of production we had before the war—and it was not accomplished—how do we expect it will be accomplished after the war, with the same principle involved? Before the war the people of Canada were not consuming all the production they desired. For example, lumber was sixth on our list of exports, prior to the war. Yet I am sure that every stick of that lumber could have been used in Canada, had the people been in a position to buy it. That applies not only to lumber, but to many other products, which were exported.

The point I make is that in the discussion on this bill, as in most discussions pertaining to the post-war period, the emphasis has been placed on the wrong aspect of our national life. Hon. members always emphasize the production end of our economy. That is absolutely wrong, because production has never been a problem with us. The problem has been one of distribution and consumption. As some of my colleagues have already indicated this afternoon, if a measure of this sort is to be of any real benefit to the farmers, or if any similar legislation is to be of benefit to any other section of our community, it will have to be accompanied by legislation of a different kind altogether, something far more fundamental.

I contend that this measure will be of practically no avail in helping farmers in the post-war world. There are some who have said that the legislation should be accompanied by other legislation providing floors under agricultural prices. I am heartily in accord with any action which would guarantee a higher income for the farmer. But the point we must not overlook is that if there are floor prices under the products of the farm, and if there are minimum wages, all those factors are again reflected in prices. All costs enter into prices. As far as the aggregate is concerned, in those circumstances the people as a whole are no farther ahead. The mere setting of floor prices and minimum wages will not be sufficient. We shall have to go a good deal farther than that.

The Minister of Finance (Mr. Ilsley) and his colleagues, along with members of the Progressive Conservative party, and all other orthodox thinkers will have to acknowledge the fact that since the industrial revolution, and particularly in the last twenty-five years, no primary, secondary or any other industry ever distributed purchasing power sufficient to buy back its own production. One finds that demonstrated if he examines the balance sheet of any industrial concern. Prices of commodities which come out of an institution are always in excess of the buying power coming from that institution. Therefore the aggregate for the nation as a whole is identical with that of one institution. It follows that the emphasis in respect of post-war legislation should be placed on the consuming end of our economy.

If consumption is taken care of, production will take care of itself. The house constantly concerns itself with the production end; but I am satisfied that if the government would introduce legislation enabling consumers to buy up to the limit of their desire to consume, we would have no problem at all in connection with financing production. But so long as we constantly hope and anticipate that our present income, or the income which will obtain after the war, will distribute the goods produced from industry, so long as we base all our hopes on that kind of thinking, all legislation of this kind is bound to fall far short of what is anticipated.

The hon. member for Cape Breton South (Mr. Gillis) made some observations respecting the ability of credit unions to provide what he considered was the type of credit farmers require. I believe he went so far as to suggest that the credit unions principle was the solution of farmers' problems. Perhaps he would go so far as to say that it would also be the solution of the problem of many other members of our society.

I support the idea of credit unions, but not for the same reason as that offered by the hon. member. I believe he is labouring under a delusion in respect of what is accomplished by credit unions. After all, a credit union is just a savings bank, or a reinvestment of savings. If I take $100 out of my earnings and put it into a credit union, that $100 is represented by $100 worth of goods somewhere on the shelves. If I do not buy that $100 worth of goods and pay my money into the credit union, then that $100 worth of goods remains on the shelf. If someone else uses my $100 and puts it into new production, that $100 produces another $100 worth of goods. So that there are now two lots of goods, but only one lot of purchasing power. That is the result of the use of the credit union. I agree that it is good as far as it goes, but I certainly cannot grant that it is the solution of the problem of the farmer, of the labouring man or of other world problems.

We should emphasize the consumer end of our economy. Take care of the consumer and the production side will take care of itself. What we need is new credit and not the redistribution of old credit. We are short as it is. In normal times we are short at least forty cents or perhaps fifty cents on the dollar. When we consider the degree to which machinery will be substituted for man-power when the war is over we must realize there will be a further deficiency in our purchasing power.

If the government, or the Progressive Conservative party for that matter, rely on legislation of this kind as a means of coping with the problems of the post-war world, they will be sadly disillusioned before many days go by. They will eventually come to the place where they will agree that the only solution is that which has been advocated by the Social Crediters of Canada and of the world, namely, to supply the consumer with buying power to enable him to buy up to the limit of his desire to consume. Until that is done, we shall fall far short of arriving at a solution of our problems.

If the members of the government and those who are like-minded want to continue bumping their heads against a stone wall until they learn, that is their right, but personally I can see the handwriting on the wall and I am satisfied that there will be no solution of these post-war problems that will provide individual liberty as well as security unless it involves new credit to stimulate consumption rather than production.

Mr. WILLIAM BRYCE (Selkirk): Mr. Speaker, I understand from my colleagues that this is the last opportunity I shall have to speak on this matter, and I should like to add a few words to what I said yesterday. I said yesterday that it was absolutely necessary that legislation of this kind should contain a crop failure clause. If we analyse conditions we find that on many occasions the farmer has been accused of not paying his bills. That is wrong because the farmer more than any other person in this country is gambling with the elements. If he does not get a return for his labour, how can he pay his bills?

The banker is protected because when a man cannot pay his bill in the fall he is carried over to another year and he has still more to pay. He is faced with compound interest. The farmers are willing to pay. I am a farmer, and a small one at that. I know that you cannot pay your debts if you do not have money coming in. It is the business of the farmer to gamble with the elements all the time.

A man may decide to put in a concrete floor or some other improvement and spread it over three years, as is suggested in the bill. But if he does not get a crop, he will not be able to pay. I have the assurance of the minister that he will consider including a crop failure clause in the bill.

Mr. ILSLEY: What I said was that I would see it was given consideration in the banking and commerce committee when this bill is referred to that committee.

Mr. BRYCE: I would suggest that the provision with regard to live stock should include bees. A number of years ago I could buy bees for $1.95 a package, and to-day I must pay $5. If I bought a hundred packages before, I paid $200, but to-day I must pay $500. The farmers need assistance there and I ask that that be included.

If a man borrows money to buy a binder and because of crop failure he is unable to repay it, I do not think it is right that the bank can come along and take a couple of cows to pay for the binder. If I make a deal on a binder, the binder should stand by itself. I do not think I want to take up any more of the time of the house as long as I have the assurance of the minister that he will look after these two points.

Mr. M. J. EDWARDS (Calgary West): Mr. Speaker, I have one or two thoughts I should like to leave with the minister for his consideration. This bill has reference to farming operations from the man's point of view. There is nothing in it that looks at the problem of farming from the woman's point of view. If you are to have successful, contented and happy farm people, the farmer's wife must feel that way about farming. I suggest that section 2, paragraph (a) should cover not only electrical equipment but plumbing and heating and modern sanitary facilities. These things play a large part in the contentment of the people who farm.

The next paragraph should make provision for washing machines, modern stoves and heating equipment. Why provide all the facilities for the male side of the partnership and not give some consideration to the female side of the farming operations? I am also concerned about paragraph (i) of section 1, which defines "farmer" as follows:

"Farmer" means a person who is in possession of a farm . . .

Does that mean physical possession or legal possession? A similar term has been the subject of a great deal of controversy and it seems to me that this paragraph ought to be clarified. I think actual residence on the farm is what is contemplated. I believe it is intended that this legislation shall benefit the man actually on the farm, the man who is working at farming as such. Then I would refer to section 3, subsection 1, paragraph (f) which reads:

the rate of interest charged by the bank on the loan did not exceed five per centum per annum simple interest as long as the borrower was not in default.

I think there ought to be some limitation to cover the situation where the farmer is in default. Most of the trouble of our farmers in western Canada in buying machinery and equipment has been that the lien note stated "five per cent until default." Then what? It read all the way from eight to twelve or fourteen per cent. I think there ought to be some limitation, some ceiling, on the rate of interest which the bank can charge when the note becomes in default.

The other point is as to the limit of the liability. Section 3 states:

The minister shall, subject to the provisions of this section and of the two next following sections, pay to a bank the amount of loss sustained by it as a result of a farm improvement loan . . .

And it provides for the government paying ten per cent of the loss sustained. But what is to be included in the term "loss"? The principal sum advanced? The principal, plus accumulated interest? Are legal costs to be included? Are fire, sickness or accident insurance premiums that may have been paid in connection with the loan to be included? I think the term "loss" ought to be clarified to a much greater degree than it now is.

Then section 3, subsection 1, paragraph (b), states:

the application stated that the borrower held an interest in the farm of the nature prescribed for the class of farm improvement loans to which such loan belongs.

I cannot for the life of me make out what is the nature of the interest. Is a tenant to be entitled to borrow? Does he state his interest as a tenant? Is a purchaser under an agreement for sale entitled to borrow? Does he state his interest as a purchaser under an agreement for sale? Are you to have your loans classified according to the nature of the interest held; that is to say, that a tenant will be able to borrow up to a certain amount or on certain things and that the holder of possession under an agreement for sale will be able to borrow certain limited sums and for certain specified purposes? The section is not clear to me, and I should be glad if the minister would elucidate just what is contemplated by that phrase "held an interest in the farm".

Mr. SPEAKER: May I point out to the minister that some consideration has been given in the course of this debate to sections of the bill now before us. The debate should really have been restricted to the principle of the bill and not have dealt with the sections because, if this bill is going to the banking and commerce committee, it will be discussed in detail there, and then come back to the house for further consideration. I suggest to the minister that in replying he confine himself to reviewing the principle of the bill in the light of the discussion which has taken place this afternoon.

Hon. J. L. ILSLEY (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, we have had a very interesting discussion of this bill and, as I understand it, all the members who have spoken are either mildly or strongly in favour of the principle of the bill. I do not know if that applies to the hon. member for Cape Breton South (Mr. Gillis). He perhaps would be an exception, but I do not think he will carry his objection to the bill to the point of voting against it; I would hope not. Other hon. members supported the bill in principle but objected to details here and there, and some did not object to any part of the bill at all.

Mr. GRAYDON: I imagine they wanted to help the farmers, but there is a difference of opinion as to how they can best be helped.

Mr. ILSLEY: Probably that is the situation. I do not know whether I should deal with all the speeches in succession. Perhaps I could answer some questions in such a way as not to depart from the rule that I should deal with the principle of the bill.

The hon. member for Yale (Mr. Stirling) asked me if pumping machinery and other equipment for carrying water through the land of a farmer were covered by the bill. I think I can say that they are under agricultural equipment, but if there were any question about that, it could be dealt with in the banking and commerce committee. Certainly any work for the improvement of a farm is included by the language of section 2, paragraph (h) (vii).

Mr. GRAYDON: Does that include also what the hon. member for Calgary West (Mr. Edwards) suggested?

Mr. ILSLEY: It includes part of it. The hon. member for Calgary West asked whether plumbing and heating—

Mr. EDWARDS: And washing machines.

Mr. ILSLEY: There is a difference. Plumbing and heating would come under paragraph (h) (vi):

the construction, repair or alteration of, or making of additions to, any building or structure on a farm.

Household chattels are beyond the scope of the bill, and are intended to be; but if some good reason were adduced for including them, that would be a matter for the consideration of the banking and commerce committee. The principle of the bill is to enable loans to be made on farm implements, machinery and equipment, live stock and so on, as part of the business of the farm; also on improvements to buildings. But it does not go farther and include furniture or household chattels. Perhaps it should. That is a matter for later consideration.

Mr. GRAYDON: There is the argument that the implements of the women folk on the farm should be put in the same position as the implements of the men folk.

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes; there is an argument there. That is a matter that can be considered in committee.

Several members have taken exception to the rate of five per cent and suggested that the rate should be four or three per cent, but five per cent is lower than the ordinary rate charged at the present time and, as I indicated in a previous debate, if the limit is too low I do not think we can expect the freedom to lend that we otherwise could on the part of the banks. As one hon. member said, you can ask the banks to lend but you cannot make them lend. A fair rate of interest will have to be fixed, having regard to the protection which the government gives to banking institutions.

That raises the other question as to whether ten per cent is too low and whether it should be twenty per cent. In practice there comes a point beyond which one might as well make it 100 per cent as anything above that point. In other words, if the principle of the bill is to be to eliminate risk entirely from the banks and say that they should lend to anybody who applies for a loan, and that we shall make good any loss that is sustained, then the banks take no risk whatever. I do not think the house will approve a bill of that kind; I do not think I would be in favour of it; in fact I know I would not. The banks must exercise some real judgment in the selection of risks under the scheme. It is a matter of judgment on the part of parliament as to where they should put the percentage of guarantee. We put it at fifteen per cent in the home improvement plan and found that considerably higher than necessary, and we thought ten per cent was ample for this scheme. The losses under the home improvement plan were less than one per cent of the total amount lent, and we would be exposing ourselves to severe criticism, I believe, if we placed the percentages so high that the banks would not be taking any risks at all.

Mr. GRAYDON: There must be a happy medium somewhere.

Mr. KNOWLES: After all, this is still private enterprise.

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes. That is a very just observation. The banks are carrying on under the system of private enterprise and they must take some risk. The total removal of risk from private enterprise is justified only if there is a very strict limitation of profit indeed, perhaps the elimination of profit. I have not just thought that through.

There have been various suggestions that the banks should not be empowered to enforce security on the loan. If they are not to be empowered to enforce it they should not be empowered to take it. If they are empowered to take it they should be empowered to enforce it. The one follows the other. The hon. member for Vegreville (Mr. Hlynka) did not object to the taking of security so long as they could not enforce it. That is a very happy and irresponsible position to take. It is popular with everyone. The borrower could get a loan because he could offer security, but when it came to making good on his obligation nothing could be done against him because the banks could not enforce security. That, of course, is not a matter that needs to be argued about further. If the banks are not empowered to take security fewer loans will be made than otherwise would be the case.

It is a question how far we think we should go in facilitating and encouraging lending to farmers in the period ahead of us. We had a feeling that we should facilitate it to a considerable degree. The farmers would be needing a lot of intermediate loans, and short-term loans are pretty well provided for now under the Bank Act as it stands; long-term loans are provided for in other ways by the Canadian Farm Loan Board Act, by the lending institutions of the country, the loan and trust companies. But there is a gap in the credit structure for farmers just as there is for industries, and we are trying to fill the gap in the case of industries by setting up the Industrial Development bank, and for the reasons I state we felt that rather than set up an agricultural bank, with thousands of branches and a large personnel, it would be better to meet the problem in the way we have attempted to meet it by this bill.

The hon. member for Dufferin-Simcoe (Mr. Rowe) advanced an interesting theory, that because we were supplying these facilities for loans other lenders would withdraw and perhaps we would hurt the farmer more than we helped him. I cannot follow that. I think he was mixed up between the operations of the farm loan board and the operations of the Farmers' Creditors Arrangement Act. It is probably true that the operations of the Farmers' Creditors Arrangement Act in eastern Canada discouraged lending by persons who otherwise would be lending money on mortgage on farm properties. I think it did. I believe that was the case in eastern Canada, but I do not think the existence of the Canadian farm loan board has done that. I do not think the existence of these facilities would do it.

I have noted the observations with regard to the credit failure clauses and have given the assurance that these suggestions will be considered in committee.

The hon. member for Macdonald (Mr. Weir) asked a question as to whether the bankers would give the farmers good service. Before the banking and commerce committee the general managers of the banks, or most of them, will undoubtedly appear, and will give evidence. That committee ought to get just as definite a forecast as they can from the general managers as to how they propose to act in the operation of the scheme, and I think they will be able to get convincing assurances.

While probably it would not be possible for the head office to dictate in detail the action which the managers would take, I think that, with efficient institutions such as the chartered banks of Canada, the spirit in which the measure is to be administered would be pretty well known before very long and all managers would conduct themselves accordingly.

The hon. member for Cape Breton South (Mr. Gillis) suggested that the credit unions should have the same privileges as the banks. He touched on that. I interjected the remark that they are not under our jurisdiction at all. I do not believe that they are under federal jurisdiction. They are organized under provincial jurisdiction and are not subject to inspection by the federal insurance department or by the finance department, and we have no way of supervising the system of loaning of this kind. The hon. member went on to say that, apart from assistance by the government, the credit unions were the people to solve the problem and that they could solve it. I do not agree with him. I think that if we wait until the capital goes into the credit unions to supply the needs of the borrowing farmers of Canada we shall wait a good deal longer than the year he suggests—a great many years. Moreover, the credit unions charge more in the way of interest rates than is proposed under this measure. I do not think it is a practical suggestion.

Mr. GILLIS: I do not want to get into an argument with the minister, but you are setting up new machinery for the chartered banks and you could set up enabling machinery to link up the credit unions on a national basis. You are going into a new field anyway.

Mr. ILSLEY: It opens up a big field that we are not in now and over which I think we have no jurisdiction.

The hon. member for Selkirk (Mr. Bryce) made two or three suggestions which are proper for consideration by the banking and commerce committee rather than by me in the concluding speech on the bill. If he sees that they are not getting consideration in the banking and commerce committee I suggest that he communicate with the chairman or secretary of that committee. One of his suggestions is a fairly minor one.

The points made by the hon. member for Calgary West (Mr. Edwards) are entitled to respectful consideration. Those points had to do with the question about possession and the rate of interest chargeable after default, the definition of loss and what is meant by classes of borrowers and so on. That representation will be given most serious consideration when the bill is before the committee.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and referred to the standing committee on banking and commerce.

At 6.15 p.m. the house took recess.

After Recess

The house resumed at eight o'clock.

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS

PROVISION TO MEET CERTAIN EXPENDITURES AND GUARANTEE OF SECURITIES AND INDEBTEDNESS

The house resumed from Thursday, June 8, consideration in committee of bill No. 136, to authorize the provision of moneys to meet certain capital expenditures made and capital indebtedness incurred by the Canadian National Railways system during the calendar year 1944, and to authorize the guarantee by His Majesty of certain securities to be issued by the Canadian National Railway Company—Mr. Ilsley—Mr. Bradette in the chair.

On section 2—Power to issue securities for capital expenditures.

Mr. KNOWLES: I should like to ask the minister a question, and I want him to understand that I am seeking information only. When he spoke on this matter yesterday, as reported at page 3645 of Hansard, he pointed out that no railway issues have been sold since the outbreak of war, and also that these securities might be sold either to the government or to the public. I have in mind the information given in answer to questions I asked when we were dealing with another Canadian National financing matter, when the minister's parliamentary assistant pointed out that during the course of the war the practice has been to increase the amount of debt held by the government in the consolidated revenue fund and decrease the amount held by the public. Is there any change of policy or any conflict as between what the parliamentary assistant told me was the case and what is now proposed? A supplementary question would be: after this has been carried through, what will be the comparative relationship as between the amount owed to the government and the amount owed to the public?

Mr. ILSLEY: No change of policy is foreshadowed by this legislation. What my parliamentary assistant said was correct. Section 2 is in the same form as last year, and authorizes either method of financing.

Mr. KNOWLES: It is a matter of government policy as to what is done under the provisions of this bill?

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes.

Mr. JACKMAN: As I understood it during the hearing by the railway committee, the money borrowed by the Canadian National from the government bears an interest rate of 3½ per cent, whereas if they were to go to the open market, particularly on some of their equipment obligations, most likely they could borrow at a considerably lower rate of interest. On short-term equipment obligations they could borrow at less than the three per cent going rate on Dominion of Canada securities. I would suggest to the minister that in order to keep the Canadian National on a proper accounting basis, and in order to be able to compare it with the accounts of the other railway, consideration should be given to allowing the Canadian National to borrow in the public market rather than from the government at the higher rate, which puts the publicly-owned company at a disadvantage as compared with the privately-owned company. Would the minister express an opinion on that?

[Mr. Ilsley.]

Mr. ILSLEY: I understand that the rate charged by the government is 3½ per cent, but recently that has been reduced to 2½ per cent on some of the larger loans.

Mr. JACKMAN: When did that reduction take place?

Mr. ILSLEY: On February 15 of this year, on new loans only.

Mr. JACKMAN: Then does the minister agree with me on the question of policy?

Mr. ILSLEY: As to whether we should let them go to the public for money?

Mr. JACKMAN: Yes, the same as the private company does.

Mr. ILSLEY: I do not know; I would have to think that over. It is always a big question whether it is desirable from the government's point of view to have anybody going to the public for money in times like these, when they compete with the victory loan campaigns. I am not in a position to give a considered answer to that inquiry.

Mr. JACKMAN: Could the minister state how much the retirements were? In the first item I see, "additions and betterments (less retirements)", and I understand that those were by way of depreciation of equipment or assets which have been written off, and that an amount of money is available for the purchase of new equipment or the acquisition of new assets.

Mr. ILSLEY: The retirements referred to in that item amounted to $1,034,100.

Mr. KNOWLES: I should like to ask another question, and again I assure the minister I am merely seeking information. Last night, at page 3645 of Hansard, he tabled a statement showing the amounts owing to the government by the Canadian National Railways as at April 15, 1944. The total of those amounts was $498,287,322.77. When I was questioning the minister's parliamentary assistant on this matter on April 17 he gave the funded debt in the hands of the public as of December 31, 1943, as $744,232,472.60 and loans from the government as of the same date, totalling $537,323,765.07. The two figures I am asking the minister to compare are the last figure I have just read for December 31, 1943, and the somewhat lesser figure he gave last night. Does that represent a reduction, or are those figures dealing with slightly different matters?

Mr. ILSLEY: The equipment loans are not in the $498,000,000 figure, and were in the $537,000,000 figure. It includes loans from the dominion government for the purchase of railway equipment. This amounted to $52,247,214 at March 31, 1944. Those were not included in the $498,000,000 figure given last night.

Mr. KNOWLES: So that if that figure is added it will give a figure comparable with the other one?

Mr. ILSLEY: That is correct.

Mr. KNOWLES: And it would show a slight increase?

Mr. ILSLEY: Correct.

Section agreed to.

Sections 3 and 4 agreed to.

On section 5—Power to aid other companies.

Mr. BLACKMORE: What other companies would be included?

Mr. ILSLEY: The Minister of Transport tells me that the Canadian National Railways have ninety-four or ninety-five subsidiary companies. Those are the companies here referred to.

Mr. KNOWLES: There is reference to those other companies at line 15 of section 2.

Mr. ILSLEY: That is right. As the hon. member has said, we find this expression at the point he has indicated:

Any company or railways comprised in the national railway system.

Therefore "companies" in section 5 means companies or railways comprised in the national railway system, as defined in the Canadian National Railways Capital Revision Act, 1937.

Mr. JOHNSTON (Bow River): The companies, and other subsidiary railways of the Canadian National Railways system are different. What other companies are there under the Canadian National Railways? It would not be other railway companies or subsidiaries.

Mr. ILSLEY: "Companies" means companies or railways comprised in the national railway system. That is clear, if one reads section 2. "Companies" as used in section 5 means companies comprised in the national railway system.

Mr. JOHNSTON (Bow River): What type of companies? I do not want the minister to name them, but would he give the type?

Mr. MICHAUD: The list appears at pages 26 and 27 of the annual report of the Canadian National Railways. It includes subsidiary railways, hotels, elevators, docks, and so on.

Mr. JOHNSTON (Bow River): It is not necessary to give the list, so long as I understand what it means.

Section agreed to.

On section 6—Guarantee.

Mr. GRAYDON: I am not sure that this is the proper place at which to ask the question which I have in mind. However, I think it would make very little difference where the question is asked, because it applies to the principle of the bill itself. I believe there is some uncertainty in the public mind, which might be readily answerable but which, on the surface, causes some conflict of opinion. Here we have enabling legislation for the giving of a loan of something more than $10,000,000. If a loan is to be made to the Canadian National Railways, or if provision is to be made to enable the railways to obtain such a loan, why is it that the Canadian National Railways is at the same time taking a large block of victory bonds from the government from which it now seeks the loan. May I make it clear that I do not wish it to be understood that I am opposing the company's procedure of subscribing to the victory loan. From a public point of view, however, there may be some confusion as to why on the one hand the government gives the railway company $10,000,000, and at the same time the company is giving back to the government a large amount in the purchase of victory bonds? It seems to me there must be a clear, complete and concise answer, and possibly this would be a good time for the minister to give it.

Mr. ILSLEY: The investment in victory bonds is an investment to provide for pension funds, insurance and deferred maintenance which will be required shortly after the war. Therefore the railway company must have that investment in something that is liquid.

Bill reported, read the third time and passed.

DOMINION ELECTIONS

MEASURE TO ENABLE WAR SERVICE PERSONNEL TO VOTE IN GENERAL ELECTION

Hon. N. A. McLARTY (Secretary of State) moved the second reading of bill No. 135, to provide regulations enabling Canadian war service electors to exercise their franchise, and Canadian prisoners of war to vote by proxy, at any general election held during the present war, also to provide amendments to the Dominion Elections Act, 1938, which are consequential to such regulations, or have become necessary by the advent of the said war.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and the house went into committee thereon, Mr. Bradette in the chair.

On section 1—War services electors voting at a general election.

Mr. GRAYDON: I think the minister ought to make a statement at some stage of the bill and perhaps this would be an appropriate time to hear what he has to say.

Mr. McLARTY: Mr. Chairman, when one bears in mind the fact that concurrence in the committee's report was waived and that the bill passed its second reading without debate I think I should accept the invitation of the leader of the opposition and say a few words at this stage. As the committee is aware, this bill is the result of some labour on the part of a special committee. I believe it will be gratifying to the committee to know that the report of the special committee was unanimous. I believe it was unanimous for two reasons. First, we had as chairman the hon. member for Spadina (Mr. Factor), and I think all members of the committee were impressed with his industry and above all the fair-minded attitude with which he approached the problem.

In the second place, I think I can say that every hon. member of the special committee approached his task with only one object in view, to ensure the fullest opportunity being provided to those in the service forces of Canada to exercise their franchise. I know that all those who sat with me on the committee will agree when I say that there was no effort on the part of anyone to secure any petty political advantage, that politics in the narrow sense of that word were not even considered in the result arrived at.

I believe that this report represents as fair and intelligent a solution of this problem as has been presented in any democratic nation. The committee had the benefit of the services of Mr. Harry Butcher, K.C., once an esteemed member of this house and one who I believe is generally regarded, along with the chief electoral officer, as probably knowing more about electoral matters than any other citizen in Canada. The committee went at its work with considerable care.

It had the advantage of the legislation passed in Great Britain. It also had for consideration the legislation passed in the various provinces of Canada where such legislation has been enacted. Consideration was also given to the legislation passed in Australia under which the last federal election in that commonwealth was held and to the legislation of New Zealand and South Africa.

In addition the committee considered the legislation now being discussed in the United States. While that was a matter of interest, its actual benefit on account of different electoral methods was not so great. I recall that some method was placed before the committee dealing with the federal election held in 1864 during the civil war when the votes were actually taken upon the battlefield.

Mr. GRAYDON: You did not neglect the past.

Mr. McLARTY: We were very careful to consider both the past and the present, although perhaps the present was more in our minds. But because of their different electoral system, the practical advantages of the United States legislation was very small.

Perhaps I may now deal with the bill itself. As will be noted, the bill is not an amendment to the elections act of 1938; it is a new bill. It deals with matters of immediate importance in connection with active service voters, and to that extent it will be in force and effect for the duration of the war and six months thereafter. But it deals also with a number of matters which will be operative after that period of time, and for those reasons it was felt it would be better to have a new bill rather than amendments to the elections act, 1938.

The bill has two schedules, A and B. Schedule A deals with those in the armed forces and in the auxiliary services, while schedule B deals with prisoners of war. Schedule A was gone over word for word and approved by the special committee. At the time the committee reported and suggested that the voting of prisoners of war be done by proxy schedule B had not been considered section by section, but it is the result of the committee's recommendations and now appears in the form of fifteen sections in the schedule.

I believe the definition of war service voter will be found to be very broad since it covers not only those in the navy, army and air force but also, subject to conditions which the committee will want to discuss, those in the auxiliary services. It covers those in the mercantile marine and any Canadian on any ship of Canadian or British registry or the registry of any country allied with His Majesty in the present war. The question of age is immaterial as far as an elector serving in the active forces is concerned. Only one qualification is required, namely, that the elector be a British subject. In the case of certain auxiliary services and organizations it is necessary that the electors be stationed outside the boundaries of Canada. In other words, it was felt that there should be the widest possible definition in order that everyone who is contributing to the defence of Canada and the prosecution of this war shall be ensured the right to exercise either his or her franchise.

It was necessary to provide machinery for the taking of the direct vote, in the one case, and the proxy vote, in the other. There is one quite material change being made in the elections act. Instead of seven days elapsing to permit papers as well as the names of candidates to be forwarded to the special returning officers, there will be a period of twenty-eight days allowed. In other words, there will be twenty-eight days between the official nominations and polling day.

The bill provides for the appointment of special returning officers in each major district, there being five in Canada. It makes provisions also for special returning officers in Newfoundland and Great Britain. Power is given to the chief electoral officer to recommend to the government, and to the government to appoint special returning officers in such other theatres of war as may be thought necessary. This machinery can be more fully dealt with when we come to the particular sections.

I am told by the chief electoral officer that notwithstanding the fact that the votes will have to be counted and taken in widely separated portions of the world, the time that will elapse from the issue of the writs of election until election day will not be more than sixty days. In addition to that, whereas in the last war it required at least two months to get results from the ballots overseas and three months before a definite declaration as to the successful candidate could be made, under the procedure adopted by the committee it will be possible for these results to be secured within eight days.

There may be other points that I might have dealt with, but I believe I have indicated the general features of the bill that is now before the committee. It is not claimed that this bill is fool-proof. It will require a certain measure of cooperation and a large measure of intelligent work in its operation. What is claimed, however, both in the breadth of its definition of those who can vote as war service electors and in the plan for giving votes to prisoners of war is that it is probably the broadest measure adopted by any country in the British commonwealth of nations.

It is also claimed that the special committee set about its task for the sole purpose of securing that no one would be deprived of his or her vote if it was humanly possible to enable him to register it and that each would preserve the right of franchise in determining who would form the government of Canada for the duration of the war and, we trust, for the years that follow after it.

Mr. MacNICOL: In order to conduct an election within sixty days after dissolution, is it not the government's intention to ask for the right, if they have not the right at present, to arrange for the naming of special returning officers at once so that everything will be in readiness to carry out the election within the short space of sixty days after dissolution?

Mr. McLARTY: Yes; the hon. member for Davenport is quite correct. As soon as the bill passes the house and becomes law there is no reason why the ballot papers and the various forms provided for by this measure should not be printed and delivered, and there is no reason either why the special returning officers should not be appointed immediately. But that, of course, will have to await the passing of the bill. It is not the intention to wait until the writ of election has been issued before these steps are taken by the chief electoral officer.

Mr. GRAYDON: May I ask the minister if the urgent speed which he indicates in the appointment of returning officers and the printing of the ballot papers presages an early appeal to the people?

Mr. McLARTY: I do not know myself any more than the hon. member when that appeal will come, but I can assure him that nothing that I have said and nothing contained in this bill in any way presages an early election or a late election. This is simply ensuring that adequate provision will be made as and when an election comes.

Mr. GRAYDON: Nothing in the bill would retard an appeal either.

Mr. McLARTY: We hope not.

Mr. KNOWLES: Mr. Chairman, our group was represented by the hon. member for Cape Breton South on the special committee to which the Secretary of State referred. My colleague whom I have mentioned may be here before I conclude my brief remarks, in which event I shall resume my seat and let him speak, because it was our desire that he would say a few words on our behalf at this time.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Here he comes now.

Mr. KNOWLES: Mr. Chairman, I should like to retire in favour of my colleague.

Mr. GILLIS: Mr. Chairman, what remarks I am going to make will be directed not to the bill but rather to what is not in this bill. I was a member of the special committee and I am in accord with the regulations as drafted and embodied in the bill. The committee itself was a very agreeable one, very efficient and cooperative. The one desire uppermost in the minds of the whole committee was to bring forward the best regulations possible, keeping in mind the needs, desires and hopes of the armed services in casting their ballots.

There was one matter, however, which I think the committee should have included in its deliberations, though perhaps not in the regulations as drafted. I think the committee should have presented a recommendation to the house with respect to acquainting those in the armed services with the issues upon which they would be called upon to ballot. With the war situation as it is now in Europe, with things pretty much uprooted and a very confused picture over there, this is not just the kind of setting that I would choose to discuss this matter. It may be some considerable time before conditions are such on the European continent that we can say definitely that we are going to place a ballot in the hands of those for whom these regulations were designed to give them an opportunity to vote. But the regulations are here. I think one of the most important things is that those in the services who are to cast their ballots should have some knowledge of the issues on which they are to vote. Most of those who are in the armed services overseas have been out of Canada for the past two or three years and there have been some considerable changes in political thinking in this country during that time. New parties have sprung up and the programmes of probably all parties in this house, with the exception of our own, have changed considerably.

Mr. ROSS (Souris): How many times a day does your's change?

Mr. MacNICOL: Have you a programme?

Mr. GILLIS: You see, Mr. Chairman, most of these men recognize that statement is correct and they are merely laughing at themselves.

Mr. FRASER (Peterborough West): We are laughing because you have a different policy in every province.

Mr. GILLIS: We have not changed our name in the last ten years. We drafted a manifesto in 1932—

Mr. SINCLAIR: And you are stuck with it.

Mr. GILLIS: —and it is still the policy of the C. C. F.

Mr. GRAYDON: Why don't you progress a little?

Mr. GILLIS: And it is the basic policy of the people of Canada from coast to coast. They have accepted it.

Mr. SINCLAIR: What is it worth?

Mr. GILLIS: Well, thirty-four members in Ontario was not a bad demonstration that the people there understand it.

Mr. GRAYDON: That was before Harold Winch, though.

Mr. GILLIS: And driving the two old machines in British Columbia to come together, and establishing an opposition there, is not a bad job either. It is a demonstration of the intelligence of the people. It shows that they are progressing all across the country. We have not had to repaint the old buggy at all and give it a new name.

Mr. GRAYDON: You are whistling going through the cemetery.

Mr. GILLIS: I am not delving into the realm of prophecy, but you will get another demonstration on the 15th of this month.

Mr. GRAYDON: We had one in Haldimand-Norfolk.

Mr. MacNICOL: And one in Toronto last New Year's.

Mr. GILLIS: We started the debate on the regulations as applied to the armed forces when my hon. friends over here, political contortionists I would call them—

Mr. KNOWLES: Is that what "P.C." means?

Mr. GILLIS: —began this sideline.

The thing I was concerned about in the regulations, as I started to say, was to give those in the service who were to ballot some idea as to what they were to ballot on. The regulations themselves are clear and specific in so far as the candidate is concerned, his occupation and so forth. I did think, however, the committee might have recommended to the house something similar to what was done in New Zealand. I proposed that to the committee, but they did not see eye-to-eye with me on it. The drafting of a manifesto giving each party who may have candidates in the election an opportunity of briefly setting out the basic principles for which they stand is something desirable; and failing that, if the committee were not prepared to recommend it I thought, and some of the members of the committee agreed, that there was a possibility of utilizing the Canadian Press service. There is now established by the Canadian Press a news service in the form, I believe, of an eight-page paper which is widely circulated throughout the different services both in England and in the Mediterranean, and I presume that when lines are established it will be on the European continent; that is, if we do not go through there very fast, as I hope we shall. I thought there might be a possibility of taking the last four or five weeks prior to the election and, by some arrangement with the Canadian Press, each party who may have candidates in the field could be privileged to use a column or so for the purpose of setting out what they stand for in this election and developing the issues as they saw fit. In that way there would be no cost; there would be no responsibility on the part of the government. The Canadian Press would disseminate each party programme, and the parties themselves could be responsible for any expenditure necessary or any charge that the Canadian Press might make for that service.

I thought in connection with the regulations I would raise that matter in the house in order to determine whether hon. members were desirous of going to that extent at least in informing those in the service as to what they were balloting on. I believe that those in the armed services to-day are fighting for something; every man there is fighting for social objectives in addition to defeating those who would lay down a totalitarian system throughout the world. We in Canada are framing legislation to which they are to come back. The kind of Canada we build here, through the medium of this House of Commons and our provincial legislatures, is the framework into which these boys will fit when they come back. It is not going far enough simply to lay down regulations, and as far as possible put the ballot into the hands of the service personnel, unless at the same time we are prepared to give information, in so far as it is possible for us to do so, as to what each candidate they will ballot on stands for.

There are half a dozen parties in the country each with a programme and philosophy of its own, and it is a prerequisite to the ballot that the members of the forces should have some understanding of what each of these political organizations stands for.

To the regulations themselves as they are contained in the bill I have no objection. I think they are about as well drafted and as fair as they possibly could be.

Mr. FAIR: As another member of the committee dealing with these regulations, I can only say, as some others have said, that the idea of giving every possible opportunity to the men and women in the services to cast their vote is a good one. I am quite satisfied that we have done just as good a job as it was possible to do and the Secretary of State told us yesterday that the bill is based entirely on the recommendations of the committee. I have not had time so far to read the bill through, but taking the minister's word for it I feel that, as far as I can see, it is all right.

With regard to the point raised by the hon. member for Cape Breton South, I am not quite satisfied as to the benefits to be derived from his suggestion. First of all, I am not sure that the programmes of the different parties will be set out as they are, because, with the rapidly changing programmes of some parties, it would be impossible to give accurate information, and with the limited finances of some parties some of us could not take advantage of the advertising programme that would be necessary.

As regards holding up the bill, I do not think it is the intention of any member to delay it for any length of time, because I understand that the Prime Minister has D-day fixed for some time in October, and I am sure we do not want to knock him out in any plans he has made along that line. An hon. friend back here says it may be earlier than that; I do not know; as far as we are concerned, we are ready when the Prime Minister throws his hat into the ring.

Mr. HLYNKA: May I ask the minister if there is any member in the house who has read the bill from cover to cover.

Mr. McLARTY: I presume that is just a hypothetical question, because I have not made any examination of the members to determine that.

Mr. FAIR: There does not happen to be a cover on this bill.

Mr. NEILL: Do I understand that if we pass this clause we automatically pass schedule A? When you pass clause 7, does that mean that we have no debate with reference to schedule A?

Mr. McLARTY: That is purely for the committee to determine.

The CHAIRMAN: I called clause 1 and I shall call all the other clauses. There is a schedule A and also a schedule B.

Mr. NEILL: Shall we have an opportunity of discussing schedule A?

Mr. McLARTY: Ordinarily, where there is a schedule to a bill, we do consider it clause by clause. That is the ordinary practice—

Mr. NEILL: With the schedule?

Mr. McLARTY: —in committee, and I presume the Chairman will follow the same procedure in connection with this.

Mr. NEILL: I want to know exactly where we stand, because this bill consists of a page and a half while the schedule consists of some eighteen pages, and I do not want to be deprived of an opportunity of discussing the changes, if any, in the schedule when the bill itself consists only of half a dozen sections. We shall be allowed to discuss the schedule?

Mr. McLARTY: Yes.

Mr. NEILL: All right.

The CHAIRMAN: The rule is explicit on that point.

Section agreed to.

Sections 2 to 12 agreed to.

On schedule A.

The CHAIRMAN: We now come to schedule A. Is it the wish of the committee that the chair call every one of the sections of the schedule?

Mr. NEILL: Yes.

Mr. GRAYDON: Yes, because the bill is of little consequence. It is the regulations that are the meat of the whole legislation.

On section 2—Application.

Mr. MacNICOL: The sections are very short; I think the chairman should read them.

Mr. McLARTY: There are sixty-four of them. I think the chairman should read only ones which are specifically required.

Mr. MacNICOL: If the chairman will delay calling "carried" for a moment it will enable each member to read the section. That will be satisfactory to me. I know what they are; perhaps others do not.

The CHAIRMAN: Shall section 2 carry?

Mr. NEILL: Let us get some information about this. What about a by-election?

Mr. McLARTY: Because of the nature of a by-election these regulations could have no application to it. In the case of one particular by-election it would be impossible to put all this machinery, such as the appointment of special returning officers all over the world and the segregating of electors to a particular riding, into effect. It would be so impractical as to be impossible; consequently in a by-election this would not apply. I might say that it specifically states it is referable only to a general election.

Mr. GRAYDON: I take it there will be no by-election before a general election in any event.

Mr. McLARTY: I could not give my hon. friend any undertaking like that.

Mr. CRERAR: Do not assume too much.

Section agreed to.

On section 3—General direction—special powers.

Mr. NEILL: Give us an opportunity to read it.

The CHAIRMAN: It would be quite satisfactory to me to read it, but it would be quite an ordeal on the committee.

Section agreed to.

On section 4—Definitions.

Mr. MacNICOL: Just there may I say something about the inner envelope. The minister has likely received quite a number of protests from members of the legion as to the inner and outer envelope method. I have had quite a number of protests. Personally I cannot understand what the objection is. I have written to quite a few. I have not been able to understand the real objection to the outer envelope, and the inner envelope being put in the outer envelope. Has the minister any reason to doubt that this will not be, as we all hope it will be, fair and above board?

Mr. McLARTY: It would be hardly fair to say that I have had protests about the procedure with respect to the inner and outer envelope; I have not. I have had suggestions that the ballot be made a secret one, but no suggestions that the procedure contained in the bill is not the most secret and practical one that has so far been evolved. The same procedure was in operation in the regulations of 1940 and as far as I am aware there were no objections raised to them at that time. Nor have I heard any objection to these except the expression of the hope, which we all share, that the ballot will be made a secret one.

Mr. GRAYDON: The minister seems to have some little doubt and hesitation in his own mind as to the secrecy of the ballot.

Mr. McLARTY: I have none.

Mr. GRAYDON: Is it definitely understood and are there sufficient guarantees and assurances that no one will be able to know how a serviceman casts his ballot?

Mr. McLARTY: There may be the possibility of one exception where a serviceman is unable to write. Then someone may be in a position to know, but otherwise I am assured by the chief electoral officer that the secrecy of the ballot is maintained to the utmost extent possible.

Mr. GRAYDON: In other words, it is foolproof as far as secrecy goes?

Mr. McLARTY: In so far as it can be made so.

Mr. FAIR: I am quite satisfied that the system of voting is now just as good as we can make it, and it is perfectly secret. I believe if the Secretary of State would give the committee an explanation of the procedure it would probably do away with a lot of trouble a little later on. Could he tell us what actually happens in the polling booth and deal with both the inner and the outer envelopes? If he did that I believe it would be a help in getting rid of a lot of trouble that may come up later.

Mr. McLARTY: I shall be able to do that, but unfortunately the memorandum I have—I would not want to trust my memory to do it—is perhaps a little longer than should be required, but if it is the wish of the committee, I shall read it. It is as follows:

There appears to be some misapprehension with regard to the secrecy of the ballot paper prescribed by the proposed regulations for use by war service electors at the next general election.

The procedure prescribed by the said regulations is similar to that followed for the taking of the votes of members of the active service forces of Canada at the 1940 general election and at the 1942 dominion plebiscite. On each of these occasions, not a single complaint was received that the manner in which ballot papers were marked by any active service electors was ascertained by voting officials or other persons. It may even be stated that it was generally considered that the prevailing special voting procedure afforded a higher degree of secrecy than the procedure prescribed for taking the vote of civilian electors.

I might explain that this is a memorandum of the chief electoral officer, and was not dictated by myself. It continues:

The proposed regulations prescribe that each war service elector before being allowed to vote will be required to make, before the commissioned officer designated to take such vote, a declaration on the back of the outer envelope in which his ballot paper will be transmitted by mail to the appropriate special returning officer. In such declaration the war service elector will state his name, rank and regimental number, together with the name of the place where he ordinarily resided prior to his enlistment, and other necessary particulars.

When the above declaration has been completed and signed by both the war service elector and the commissioned officer concerned, a ballot paper will be handed to the elector who will be allowed to mark it in private. The ballot paper will then be folded and placed in an inner envelope and after this envelope has been sealed by the elector, it will be handed to the commissioned officer who, in full view of the elector, will place the inner envelope in the completed outer envelope above referred to. When the outer envelope has been sealed by the commissioned officer, it will be handed to the elector who will himself dispatch it by mail to the special returning officer whose full name and address are printed on the face of such outer envelope.

When the outer envelopes reach their destination, they will be received by the special returning officer and his staff, mainly composed of six scrutineers nominated by the leaders of the various political parties.

Each outer envelope will then be sorted to its proper electoral district, according to the place of ordinary residence given by the elector in his declaration, by a pair of scrutineers consisting of persons representing different and opposed political interests, and no such envelope will be opened until the time has come to count all the ballot papers sorted to such electoral district. When the correct electoral district of a war service elector has been ascertained, the scrutineers will write the name of such electoral district on the back of the outer envelope and affix their initials thereto before sorting the outer envelope to its electoral district.

Voting by war service electors will take place on the twelve week days immediately preceding polling day and it is expected that outer envelopes containing the ballot papers cast by war service electors will be received by every special returning officer during a period of between twelve and fourteen days. At the end of each of such days all the outer envelopes sorted to a given electoral district will be placed, unopened, in a large envelope which will be specially sealed. At least two scrutineers will be required to affix their signatures to such seals.

These specially sealed large envelopes will remain in safe custody, unopened, until the ballot papers enclosed in them are counted, and the scrutineers are authorized by the regulations to inspect any or all such envelopes when they so desire.

The counting of the votes of war service electors will not begin until six o'clock p.m. on polling day. Then each pair of scrutineers will count the ballot papers, but for only one electoral district at a time. All the specially sealed large envelopes belonging to such electoral district will be opened and the outer envelopes contained therein will be placed on a table. After having ascertained that each of such outer envelopes belongs to the electoral district for which the ballot papers are being counted, the scrutineers will open each of such outer envelopes and place the unopened inner envelopes contained therein in a locked ballot box.

When all the inner envelopes sorted to a given electoral district have thus been placed in the ballot box, the ballot papers contained in the inner envelopes lose their identity, as these inner envelopes are absolutely plain.

When all the inner envelopes sorted to a given electoral district have been placed in the ballot box, the box will be unlocked by the special returning officer, and its contents will be placed upon a table. The scrutineers will then proceed to open such inner envelopes and count the ballot papers cast for each candidate officially nominated in such electoral district.

It will be observed that outer and inner envelopes containing ballot papers cast by war service electors are kept very carefully sealed up until the counting of the votes commences in the electoral district for which such envelopes have been sorted.

It will be observed also that every operation in the office of the special returning officer relating to the sorting and counting of the votes cast by war service electors will be performed exclusively by scrutineers representing different political interests under the supervision of the special returning officer. A procedure of this kind should provide a maximum of secrecy to the ballot papers cast by war service electors.

Mr. NEILL: May I ask what the minister is reading from?

Mr. McLARTY: I am reading from a memorandum prepared by the chief electoral officer; I thought I made that clear.

Mr. NEILL: Is it part of the schedule?

Mr. McLARTY: No. I may say to the hon. member for Comox-Alberni that I was requested to explain the procedure in connection with the actual marking and transmission of the ballots, in order to preserve their secrecy, and what I have read is a memorandum prepared by the chief electoral officer in connection with that procedure.

Mr. NEILL: Then it is not binding upon this house?

Mr. McLARTY: I did not suggest that it would be.

Mr. NEILL: Do you not think all that should have been in the schedule itself, with which we are dealing, because it is to the schedule we look to see what shall be done.

Mr. McLARTY: These instructions will be given to the officers but will not appear in the regulations, which do not deal in such detail with the matter of actually handling the ballots.

Mr. NEILL: I do not want to delay the minister at all; I want to get on, but I cannot understand the situation. When the soldiers come to cast their ballots will they be governed by what is in the bill before us or by what the minister has just read, which apparently is the opinion of the chief electoral officer? I want it to be in here, so that we may know for what we are voting. I am not concerned with or interested in what the chief electoral officer says; I want to know what is to be in this bill. Here we have something like thirty-five pages of this schedule, which is detailed and technical. Has this bill or this schedule ever been referred to a committee of the house, or are we dealing with it for the first time? If so, I say it is utterly impossible for us to do justice to it, because we cannot intelligently discuss the technical and involved phraseology of the schedule without some study. It should have been sent to a committee, before which the chief electoral officer should have appeared to give his opinions.

Mr. STIRLING: It was considered by a committee, every bit of it.

[Mr. McLarty.]

Mr. NEILL: What committee was it sent to?

Mr. McLARTY: Does the hon. gentleman wish to ask any other questions?

Mr. NEILL: I should like those two points settled.

Mr. McLARTY: As to the first question, about placing the instructions from the chief electoral officer to the returning officers in the regulations, as my hon. friend knows, in the election act of 1938 no part of the instructions from the chief electoral officer to the returning officers is contained in the regulations. In other words, there is an instructional power given to the chief electoral officer, which he may exercise, and there is nothing in these instructions which conflicts in any way with the provisions of the regulations. This is merely the appropriate machinery by which those regulations can be best carried out.

As to the second point, I imagine that the hon. member was not in the chamber when I made my introductory remarks. Schedule A was discussed clause by clause by a special committee, and with the exception of perhaps three or four typographical errors it is in the form approved by that committee, which was appointed on February 1 of this year. That committee held a large number of meetings—

Mr. MacNICOL: And called witnesses.

Mr. McLARTY: It called witnesses and went over this schedule word by word and clause by clause, discussing it fully. I believe five of the meetings were reported, but I do not think there is a report of the meetings at which these regulations were considered. That does not apply to schedule B. The recommendation of the committee, dealing with that portion we have included in schedule B, was as follows:

Your committee further recommends that every person who, while on active service with the naval, military or air forces of Canada, became a prisoner of war and is officially recorded as such at headquarters, shall be entitled to vote by proxy, on a special certificate issued by the chief electoral officer. Such certificate shall be issued not earlier than two weeks before polling day to the person officially recorded at headquarters as the next of kin of such prisoner of war, provided such next of kin is qualified to vote as a civilian elector.

The fifteen clauses contained in schedule B were not considered word for word by the committee, but I believe they will be found to be a fair interpretation of the recommendation of the committee to enable the next of kin of prisoners of war provided they are qualified electors, to vote by proxy in the particular riding in which the next of kin is a qualified elector at the time of the election.

Mr. NEILL: Was the report of the committee adopted by this house?

Mr. McLARTY: No.

Mr. NEILL: Was it referred to this house?

Mr. McLARTY: It was tabled but no motion was made for concurrence in that report.

Mr. NEILL: Was the committee unanimous?

Mr. McLARTY: The committee was unanimous.

Mr. JOHNSTON (Bow River): The minister has outlined how the balloting will take place. The elector will mark his ballot and place it in the inner envelope, which he will seal and then give to the officer commanding, who will put it in a large envelope in the presence of the elector. That large outer envelope will be sealed and given back to the elector, who will mail it. Now comes the point about which I want to ask. How is that envelope mailed? Is it sent by the elector in an open mail bag, or is it put into a ballot box like those we use in the general elections here, on which there are locks?

Mr. McLARTY: I must say that I cannot answer that question; I do not know. I presume the procedure may be different in various areas. You see, there will be the special returning officers. Then a commanding officer is appointed who will look after the local polls. I presume the procedure may not be absolutely uniform as between those serving with the air force in Burma, let us say, and those fighting in Italy. I presume in each case they will do the best they can, and I know the chief electoral officer will send the same supplies in each case. Whether or not there will be a lock on the mail bag, or whether it will be a special pouch, I regret that I cannot advise the hon. gentleman.

Mr. JOHNSTON (Bow River): That is an important point, because it may be possible—I am not suggesting that it will be—that there will be interference—

Mr. BLACK (Yukon): Look at form 10 on page 37; the information is contained there.

Mr. JOHNSTON (Bow River): I am not suggesting that it will be, but I say it may be possible that there could be interference from the time the ballot is dropped into the mail bag, if it happens to be an open mail bag. A good deal of misrepresentation may occur because of that. Some uniform regulation or practice should be adopted. It may be a mail bag which is locked, with some sort of opening which would just permit the envelope to go in. I feel, however, that some way should be devised whereby there could be no interference whatsoever with the ballot, once the elector drops it into the mail bag. I am sure there will be some objection or some complaints made after the election, especially if it is just an open box into which the ballot can be dropped by the elector. After he has gone there might be some interference, or it might be possible for someone to interfere.

Mr. McLARTY: I do not think I can usefully add anything to what was suggested by the hon. member for Yukon (Mr. Black). I would ask the hon. member who has just spoken to refer to form 10 on page 37, where it states that after placing the inner envelope in the outer envelope—

> The war service elector shall then mail the completed outer envelope in the nearest post office or mail box.

I doubt if it would be of advantage to insist upon the Post Office Department providing certain equipment for the transmission of mail from the various points. I think we would have to rely upon the honesty of the postal officials to see that the mail is duly transmitted. I doubt if we can expect to go any farther, bearing in mind that it is not the easiest task in the world to take votes in an actual theatre of war.

Mr. HAZEN: Section 35 of schedule A deals with the matter and sets it out clearly.

Mr. MacNICOL: I think it is only fair to give a report of what certain members of the legion feel about the outer envelope. I, myself, am in favour of it. I think it is a safeguard and a protection. Certain members of the legion seem to think the outer envelope would permit the ascertaining of how a soldier might cast his vote. The outer envelope has his name and rank, and all particulars on it. Men who have written to me seem to think that would enable one to find out how a soldier voted. If the authorities take time to examine the envelopes, the outer envelope containing the inner envelope, I should imagine it would take a year to do so. I do not think anyone would do that. The argument used is that all that should be required of the soldier is that he come forward with his pay book. Hon. members on this side of the house who are in the armed forces will be familiar with the pay book. Each soldier carries a pay book, and it is said that presentation of same should be sufficient to obtain his ballot.

Mr. SINCLAIR: Airmen in Canada do not have a pay book.

Mr. MacNICOL: I refer the committee to form 8 on page 35 that pertains to the outer envelope. The hon. member for Vancouver North, lately back from the front, served on the committee, and it paid a good deal of attention to what he said. He was in accord with these regulations. I listened to him carefully, and after his presentation I thought that what the committee adopted, namely, the programme of having an outer and inner envelope, was the best one.

May I say further that I have implicit confidence in the chief electoral officer. He has held that post for some years, and on any occasion I have made inquiries from him I have found him 100 per cent above-board. I am prepared to accept what he has presented. I believe it is the best elections act of any country in the world to-day, and I am convinced the chief electoral officer deserves more credit for it than does anybody else. He was always open to reason or to argument, and did not try at any time to influence the committee. The committee asked him on various occasions to explain details, and at all times, in my judgment, his explanations were satisfactory. I cannot see the objection to the inner and the outer envelope. Once the inner envelope is taken out of the outer envelope and placed in the ballot box, there is no possible way of telling whose ballot it might be. The outer envelope is certainly a check to control the voting, and a check against spurious voting, and against any stuffing of ballot boxes, or anything like that. No one has convinced me thus far that the procedure of using outer and inner envelopes is not a satisfactory one.

Mr. GILLIS: As I pointed out a moment ago, I think everything that could be thought of for the protection of the service personnel is contained in these regulations. An hon. member expressed doubt as to whether any member had read the bill. I say to him that every member of the committee read the bill at least four times, because the regulations were drafted and re-drafted on at least four occasions.

I do not think there is an argument or an objection which could be raised which is not covered in the regulations, if we read them through carefully.

Then, with respect to suspicion in some quarters, or the apprehension that the ballot may not be a secret one, may I say that I had two letters asking me—

Mr. MacNICOL: And the hon. member is a returned soldier, himself.

[Mr. MacNicol.]

Mr. GILLIS: Yes, that is right—and a very suspicious one. I received two letters inquiring as to whether I thought the ballot as prescribed by the regulations would be a secret ballot. Someone was leading the people in my section of the country to believe that the ballot would not be secret. I wrote back giving an explanation, and I recieved no further objections. They said, "If you are satisfied with it, it must be all right."

Mr. MacNICOL: I will admit that the hon. member was a real watch-dog.

Mr. GILLIS: The memorandum read by the minister and prepared by the chief electoral officer sets out the procedure in detail. It is rather lengthy, however, and could be misunderstood. That is, anyone who might read it, and who might not understand the background of the committee's deliberations, might not understand it.

May I say, as a member of the special committee that the members belonging to this group after checking this over—and I discussed it with them as we went along—are perfectly satisfied with the regulations. In so far as the secrecy of the ballot is concerned, I am convinced there is no way of interfering with that ballot. The regimental number, the name of the voter and the constituency to which the ballot is directed will be written on the outside of the envelope and this leads some people to believe that when the envelope is opened the ballot can be checked. That is not true. When the outer envelope is opened there will be a small envelope inside without any marking on it containing the ballot. That smaller envelope will be placed in a locked ballot box and it may be a week before the ballots are reshuffled and checked. When the ballot comes out of the ballot box there will be scrutineers representing each political party present and there will be nothing on the small envelope to indicate who has marked the ballot. There is no way in which it can be checked. I wanted to say this because I think it is the duty of the members of the committee to give the public and those in the services an assurance that this will be an absolutely secret ballot.

Section agreed to.

Section 5 agreed to.

On section 6—Special returning officers and their staffs.

Mr. BLACK (Yukon): I object to the wording of paragraph (d) of this section which groups together the provinces of Manitoba, Saskatchewan, Alberta and the Yukon Territory. As the section is worded these constitute a voting territory with the headquarters of the special returning officer at Edmonton. It is not proper to group the Yukon with the three prairie provinces. They are across the mountains away from us. If the Yukon is to be grouped with any province, British Columbia is the natural one. Therefore, I move:

That the words "and the Yukon Territory" in subsection (d) of section 6 be struck out and the words "and the Yukon Territory" be inserted between the word "Columbia" and the word "shall" in subsection (e) of section 6.

If that amendment carries, paragraph (d) will read:

The provinces of Manitoba, Saskatchewan and Alberta shall constitute a voting territory, with the headquarters of the special returning officer located at Edmonton.

Paragraph (e) will then read:

The province of British Columbia and the Yukon Territory shall constitute a voting territory with the headquarters of the special returning officer located at Vancouver.

That is the natural place at which to have the headquarters of the returning officer for British Columbia and the Yukon Territory.

Mr. SINCLAIR: May I answer that? Of course, as a British Columbia member it was quite a blow to me to see the Yukon divorced for the first time from British Columbia and attached to the prairie provinces. However, as far as the men in the armed services are concerned—these are mainly air force men—they do not go to the Yukon through Vancouver, they go through Edmonton over what is called the northwest staging route. This route provides the quickest mode of transportation into the Yukon. Both airmen and men in the army go through Edmonton for the new northwest air command. This is the reason why for the first time in Canadian history British Columbia and the Yukon have been divorced. Despite the fact that I am as British Columbian as any British Columbia member here, I agree to this grouping of the prairie provinces and the Yukon with headquarters at Edmonton.

Mr. BLACK (Yukon): So far as speed in transportation and communication goes as between the outlying districts in the Yukon and Edmonton and Vancouver, there is a daily plane service between Whitehorse and Vancouver, both ways, except on Sundays. The same applies as between Edmonton and Whitehorse. Therefore Vancouver is no more remote from the Yukon than is Edmonton. If the hon. member for Vancouver North has aeroplane service in mind in his reference to the northwest staging route, Vancouver is as close to us as Edmonton. If he is referring to motor service on the Alaska highway, I hope we shall never have to depend on that for communication.

Mr. McLARTY: I think the hon. member for Vancouver North has answered this question much better than I could, but I should like to say a couple of words. I think it will be fair to say that the hon. member for Yukon is more definitely affected by the particular territory to which the Yukon is attached in these regulations than any other member. I am not going to repeat what the hon. member for Vancouver North has said, but I understand that this was the provision contained in the regulations of 1940 and also of 1942. If we change them as the hon. member suggests we shall be going back a considerable number of years because Edmonton was the headquarters for the election, in the one case, and for the plebiscite in the other.

I am advised that the facilities for getting material into the Yukon are more convenient when the headquarters are at Edmonton rather than at Vancouver. I have no prejudice one way or the other; it is just a matter of facilitating the collection of votes.

Mr. BLACK (Yukon): The most natural communication for the Yukon is with Vancouver rather than with Edmonton. Until the Alaska highway went through, Edmonton was as far away from the Yukon as Montreal or Toronto. We had no communication with the country on the other side of the Rocky mountains because the natural course of trade and communication was down the Pacific coast to Vancouver. I hope the committee will see its way clear to group the Yukon Territory with British Columbia.

Amendment negatived.

Section agreed to.

Sections 7 to 14 inclusive agreed to.

On section 15—Promulgation in orders.

Mr. MacNICOL: Did I understand the minister to say a few moments ago that there were a few errors that had to be corrected?

Mr. McLARTY: No; the question was asked whether this was identical with that passed by the committee, and I said that apart from any typographical errors I thought it was an exact reproduction.

Mr. NEILL: Under which section of this schedule is provision made for advising the soldiers of the names of the candidates?

Mr. McLARTY: Under section 22.

Section agreed to.

Sections 16 to 21, inclusive, agreed to.

On section 22—List of names and surnames, et cetera, of candidates.

Mr. MacNICOL: This is the section that the hon. member for Comox-Alberni inquired about. Perhaps it would be well to read it, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. NEILL: I was only asking for information because I could not find the section. I see that what I had in mind is provided for.

Mr. FRASER (Peterborough West): This section says in line 42:

> Upon such list shall be inserted after the names and surname of each candidate the designating letters currently used to indicate his political affiliations.

Some of the men overseas might not just know what those letters stand for.

Mr. KNOWLES: They know what C.C.F. means.

Mr. FRASER (Peterborough West): Yes, Constant Cackling Flip-Floppers.

Mr. WEIR: They might not know what Prog. Con. meant.

Mr. GRAYDON: I could understand the hon. member for Macdonald being confused over that. Of all men he is the one who would ask that question because at one time he was a Progressive himself.

Mr. McLARTY: There will be a key giving the names of the parties or groups in full. While only the initials will appear on the ballot paper, if anyone is in doubt he can consult the key.

Mr. FRASER (Peterborough West): I do not want P.C. after my name because I am not a privy councillor. The name of the party should be written out in full.

Sections 23 and 24 agreed to.

On section 25—Before whom votes to be cast.

Mr. GRAYDON: I am not sure that this is the section on which I desire information, but I fancy it is. There is one little loophole which I think we should close. As I understand the regulations, a service man who is on leave and away from his unit, in order to cast his ballot must go to his unit or to some special station where service men are allowed to vote. I am thinking of the man who is on leave in some far distant part of Canada. He may be home on furlough from overseas. Under these regulations, in order to reach the polling booth he might have to travel a great distance. There is a difficulty there which might easily be cured by a slight change in the regulations. I recognize at once the difficulties which might ensue from the opening up of the civilian polling booths to all men in the armed services who happen to live in that district and who are there on a short leave, but surely there must be some way by which a service man on leave in some far distant part of Canada will not have to travel a great distance to cast his vote, while civilians in the district might have to go only a mile or so to reach a polling booth. Has that situation been considered? Perhaps the difficulty is not as great as I now see it, but as I read the regulations that does seem to me to be a difficulty.

Mr. McLARTY: Would the hon. leader of the opposition refer to section 35 of the regulations? He will see that there the committee has gone about as far as it is humanly possible to go. In the first place, if the man is on leave and at home he can vote as an ordinary civilian voter.

Mr. WEIR: Whether on the list or not?

Mr. GRAYDON: No; I do not think he can. That is the difficulty.

Mr. McLARTY: I beg pardon. That can only be done in the rural polls. He would have to be over twenty-one to vote as a civilian.

Mr. GRAYDON: Then that would cut out the men between the ages of eighteen and twenty-one.

Mr. McLARTY: Subsection 2 of section 35 provides:

> A war service elector who is absent from his unit, on leave or on furlough, during the voting period prescribed by paragraph 15 (2) of these regulations, and who has not already voted at the pending general election, may, on production of documentary proof that he is on leave or furlough, cast his vote elsewhere before any commissioned officer of the same force, designated to take the votes of war service electors, when such commissioned officer is actually engaged in the taking of such votes.

Mr. GRAYDON: That is exactly the situation I want cleared up. Suppose a man who is nineteen years of age is on leave in a far distant part of Canada. He cannot be sworn in as an ordinary civilian voter because he is not twenty-one. He has no way of voting at the civilian poll because he is under twenty-one and cannot take the oath, so that he must cast his vote elsewhere before a commissioned officer of the same force designated to take the votes of war service electors. That place might be a hundred miles away. That is the difficulty, and this does not cure it.

Mr. ROSS (Souris): A great many chaps in the air force are under twenty-one, and unless some special provision is made whereby they can make a declaration, a great number of them will be disfranchised. I think we should provide for them.

Mr. McLARTY: I wonder if I might answer one question at a time. With regard to the question raised by the hon. member for Souris, would those persons who are in the air force and are on leave be in municipalities where there is a closed list or an open list?

Mr. ROSS (Souris): They would be in both, but I am thinking particularly of the open list.

Mr. McLARTY: Under twenty-one?

Mr. ROSS (Souris): Both.

Mr. McLARTY: All I can suggest is this. The committee thought that in framing this bill they would draw it as broad as it could possibly be made. If the leader of the opposition has some practical suggestion that would overcome the difficulty, I know this committee would have no hesitation in adopting it. But I would ask him to bear this in mind. There have to be some definite limitations somewhere. We wish to make it as convenient as possible for every war service elector to vote, but on the other hand, as I say, there must be come practical limitation. You cannot make a regulation to suit every possible condition that might arise. The committee felt it was going as far as it possibly could be expected to go in making that arrangement. You could not phrase any clause which would cover every possible contingency that might arise. For instance, a man might be on leave in Muskoka and be a resident of Windsor. He might have many miles to go. Unfortunately, you could not provide that a man could go and cast his vote before a postmaster, because there has to be some check. While a situation might arise such as the leader of the opposition envisages, I do not believe that it would often arise. The cases would be widely exceptional, and I would be apprehensive if you made a special rule to cover those exceptional cases, because the difficulty that would ensue might be much greater than the difficulty that you are trying to overcome.

Mr. ROSS (Souris): Now that you have made provision for an open list in certain sections, could you not provide for a declaration in cases of persons under twenty-one years of age in the service? It is the wording of the declaration that must be taken care of; that is the only thing you have to alter. Any persons who are not on the voters' list and who are entitled to vote could make a declaration that they were British subjects, resident so long in the constituency. All you have to do is to provide a declaration that a member of the services should so affirm rather than a declaration that he is of the full age of twenty-one. That is all you have to provide for.

Mr. SINCLAIR: The committee should remember that there is not a single day for men in the services to vote but a period of twelve days, and at some time or another during those twelve days, if a man is keen to vote, he is sure to be near some camp or another. The objection here is that, with the voting taking place in advance, if a man is on leave and he is extremely conscientious and overwilling to do the best for his party, he might go to a civilian booth and vote as a civilian, so that there is a possibility, from that point of view, of having plural voting, and in the absence of pay books it would be difficult to make a check-up. There would be very few men on leave, however, who at some time in the two weeks afforded could not get to a camp somewhere and cast their vote, as they can under this measure.

Mr. ROSS (Souris): I agree with the hon. member, but suppose there is an election in harvest time. There might be thousands of members of the armed services home on harvest leave, and they would be entitled to vote in those districts if they were at home with their relatives harvesting.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: Or home sick.

Mr. ROSS (Souris): Yes; but there would be many thousands at home at harvest time.

Mr. SINCLAIR: As regards the air force, there are air force stations all over the prairies. Every town in the prairies has an air force station.

Mr. GRAYDON: There might readily be considerable hardship with respect to this. It would take a good deal of travelling for some in my constituency to go to the nearest service voting place. Perhaps the city of Toronto or Hamilton would be the nearest but there would be none in the constituency. This is one section of the bill which I suggest might stand until some consideration can be given it. It may be that I am picturing a condition which would exist in such a very small number of cases that it would not be proper to open the bill for them. As I see it, however, with the consideration that I have given it, I think it is sufficiently important that this bill should be amended to make provision in the way I suggest.

Mr. McLARTY: Would not the proper section to stand be 35, if you are to let a section stand?

Mr. GRAYDON: I should like to have the proper section stand, whichever it may be, so that we may give the matter due consideration. I do not feel like withdrawing my objection until some consideration is given the matter and I suggest that we should allow that section to stand.

Mr. McLARTY: When we come to section 35 we shall let it stand.

Section 26 agreed to.

On section 27—War service electors in non-Canadian units.

Mr. FRASER (Peterborough West): What about naval men who have been transferred to British ships? How would they be looked after? There are some Canadians who have been so transferred.

Mr. McLARTY: I refer my hon. friend to section 37 of the regulations.

Mr. FRASER (Peterborough West): I see it. It is all right.

Mr. GRAYDON: Take those who are training in special lines of military work in the republic to the south. What happens to their franchise? Do they lose it entirely?

Mr. McLARTY: The chief electoral officer advises me it is not necessary for them to lose their franchise. It would not be humanly possible to cover every individual elector, but on the last occasion personnel in the city of Washington were covered from Ottawa. It would be a matter of the chief electoral officer working out a satisfactory plan, but there is no reason why they should be disfranchised or why it should be assumed that they would be.

Mr. GRAYDON: I am thinking of Fort Benning in Georgia, where under normal circumstances there would be a number of our people. Would they lose their franchise?

Mr. McLARTY: No.

Mr. MacNICOL: Or take a young Canadian lad training at Pensacola for flying off airships. There are quite a number of them there. Would they be taken care of?

Mr. McLARTY: Is the hon. member referring to Pensacola?

Mr. MacNICOL: I know a number of young lads in Canada who are training there. I understand they are training to fly off airships.

Mr. McLARTY: I presume the same principle will apply to Pensacola as to any other place. If there is any group and the chief electoral officer is aware that there is such a group, or made aware of it, then there will be no difficulty in arranging that, but the arrangement would be made from Ottawa.

[Mr. Graydon.]

Mr. NEILL: There are a large number of our young Canadians in the Royal Air Force. Is any provision made for taking care of their votes?

Mr. McLARTY: Would the hon. member refer to section 37?

Mr. NEILL: We are on section 27 now?

Mr. McLARTY: Yes.

Mr. NEILL: Once we pass it we cannot go back. The minister referred me to section 37?

Mr. McLARTY: Yes.

Mr. NEILL: I want to try to connect the two. Section 27 states in a casual sort of way that the special returning officer shall endeavour to get in touch with them. It does not seem definite. This is how it reads:

> The special returning officer shall endeavour to secure the cooperation of the commanding officer of such unit.

That is where it is reported to the special returning officer that there are war service electors attached to a unit not distinctly Canadian. It does not suggest any more than mere activity on his part. It says: "If it is reported to him." Who is to do the reporting? The minister refers me to section 37, which states:

> Every person on active service in any of His Majesty's United Kingdom forces, who enlisted in such forces . . . who is a British subject . . . shall be qualified to vote . . . and may cast his vote . . .

If this suffices, of what use is section 27? If section 27 is the governing one it is not definite enough.

Mr. McLARTY: There is a difference. Section 27 refers to war service electors as defined by the regulations. Section 37 refers only to active service voters.

Mr. NEILL: Does "war service electors" mean active service?

Mr. McLARTY: Not necessarily. If you read section 5 you will see what constitutes a war service elector. It is much broader than those on active service.

Mr. BLACK (Cumberland): How will it work in actual practice? Take the case of R.C.A.F. personnel serving in R.A.F. units in Wick, Caithness, Scotland. My information is that there are not more than three or four Canadians in the unit. In actual practice how would these three or four R.C.A.F. personnel be able to cast their vote?

Mr. McLARTY: It must be assumed that that would be the duty of the special returning officer at London. They are presumably supplied with the names of everyone enlisted in the forces in the R.A.F. and the locations in which they are established. It is the duty of the special returning officer to make some provision whereby the vote may be cast. Just what procedure he will follow will have to be left to his own ingenuity, I am afraid. But we have gone as far as we can in the regulations in seeing that the right to vote is there. It is up to the returning officer to see that the voter is given an opportunity of exercising that right.

Mr. BLACK (Cumberland): How would the returning officer get information that there are Canadians located for the time being in this special place serving in association with the R.A.F.?

Mr. McLARTY: He would get it from the R.A.F. itself.

Sections 28 to 34 agreed to.

On section 35—War service elector voting as civilian.

Section stands.

On section 36—Voting by merchant seamen.

Mr. GRAYDON: It has been drawn to my attention by the hon. member for Kootenay West that a large number of Canadian nurses are in the forces in South Africa. I am personally interested because one of the personnel there comes from my own town and a neighbouring family. I think she is stationed at Pietermaritzburg in South Africa. I take it that some provision will be made for recording the vote of the nurses there. I certainly would be very much interested in having this particular young lady's vote recorded in the next election.

Mr. McLARTY: There will be a great deal of work to be done after this bill is passed and becomes an act. Since the leader of the opposition has called attention to the fact that nurses are in South Africa, and he is particularly interested, I know the chief electoral officer will endeavour to see that provision is made so that they will be able to vote.

Section 37 agreed to.

On section 38—Elector must vote only once.

Mr. STIRLING: It occurs to me that at this time there are civilians, perhaps professional men, carrying on what might be called semi-war duties in various parts of the world. There are members of the press, and if one exercised one's ingenuity one could think of a great many such people who are not war service electors. Will they be able to vote?

Mr. McLARTY: War correspondents are entitled to vote. I do not think it is quite as broad as perhaps the hon. member for Yale suggests. If the hon. member refers to paragraph (f) of subsection 1 of section 5, he will see that the following appears:

> Persons attached to overseas forces.
> Though not mentioned in the foregoing clauses, is subject to naval, military, or air force law, as the case may be, by reason of his or her being attached to or accompanying, outside of Canada, any of the naval, military, or air forces of Canada on active service.

That would hardly be as broad as what the hon. member for Yale suggested. He suggested a person in some country doing important official work for the government, although he is not connected with the services. I am afraid if you broadened it to include such individuals then you might as well say whoever wants to vote may vote as long as they are Canadian citizens. I think it must be borne in mind that the committee wished to be very broad in its interpretation. I think it has been and to extend it would be extremely dangerous.

Section agreed to.

Sections 39 to 57 inclusive agreed to.

On section 58—Procedure; penalty for offence.

Mr. GRAYDON: Are these penalties perfectly in order, having in mind the military discipline to which a service man is normally subject?

Mr. McLARTY: Yes; I understand that no exception has been taken by the military authorities. These provisions were in the 1940 regulations as well as the regulations governing the plebiscite. Perhaps that is not the most satisfactory answer in the world, but no exception having been taken, I imagine we can assume that they are not very objectionable.

Mr. GRAYDON: That is a better answer than none but perhaps not as good as some.

Section agreed to.

Section 59 agreed to.

On section 60—Procedure on death of candidate.

Mr. MacNICOL: This may be the clause the minister had in mind in reference to a by-election. If a candidate died between nomination day and election day, the election would not take place as far as that constituency was concerned; there would be a by-election, in which the soldiers would not vote.

Mr. McLARTY: I do not quite follow the point the hon. gentleman is making.

Mr. MacNICOL: This bill applies only to a general election. If a candidate died during the campaign there would be no election as far as that seat was concerned. Then when the by-election would be held afterwards the bill would not apply.

Mr. McLARTY: That is right.

The CHAIRMAN: Now follow ten forms, which may form part of the schedule, but I do not think they should be called.

Schedule A stands.

On schedule B.

Sections 1 to 14 agreed to.

On section 15—Offences and penalties.

Mr. GRAYDON: Before we leave this entirely I just want to make sure that I understand the situation with regard to votes of prisoners of war. From reading the regulations I take it that no instructions came from a prisoner of war to enable the next of kin to vote. In this respect, therefore, it is different from the procedure followed in the Ontario election, in which the next of kin or the person designated who cast the vote had to have something official by way of proxy from the man concerned. I take it that under our procedure, whether or not a prisoner of war wants to vote, his next of kin may exercise the franchise for him if they so desire, without any direction or instruction on his part as to whether or not he desires his ballot to be cast. I raise no objection to that; I merely point out what appears to be the dissimilarity between these regulations and those which were promulgated in connection with the Ontario election. As the minister knows, that experiment in the province was rather an unhappy one, and I am glad no suggestion has been made during the discussion of this bill that proxy voting, as it was carried on in Ontario, should be repeated during the federal election as far as our active service voters are concerned.

I hardly see how the regulations could be drawn differently, because of security matters and so on which might be involved if prisoners of war were asked to take some part in an election in a democratic state. I presume that point had some bearing and was a factor in the decision reached by the committee in regard to this point. I do not rise to complain, but only to point out the difference.

Mr. WEIR: I should like to ask one question about the next of kin voting. Supposing a soldier goes overseas and marries, and is then made a prisoner of war. Who is then his next of kin, as far as this vote is concerned?

Mr. McLARTY: The wife is the next of kin.

Mr. WEIR: But she is in England.

Mr. McLARTY: It is the one appearing as next of kin on the records at headquarters.

Mr. SINCLAIR: And a resident of Canada.

Mr. McLARTY: And who is a qualified elector in the constituency in which the proxy wishes to vote.

Section agreed to.

Schedule B agreed to.

On schedule A.

On section 35—War service elector voting as civilian.

Mr. McLARTY: We have covered everything except this section. I have been giving the matter some little consideration, at least as much as could be given while dealing with the other sections. I realize that, as the leader of the opposition points out, there may be some cases—I should say they would be isolated cases—which will not be covered by the provisions concerning voting as a civil elector and the wide provisions covering voting as a service elector which, as the hon. member for Vancouver North pointed out, allow twelve days. It may be impossible to have polling booths as conveniently located for service electors as for civilian voters. On the other hand I must urge, as has been pointed out by the hon. member for Yale, that hard cases make bad law. If one tries to cover too many exceptional cases he might stretch the bill to an unreasonable length.

I suggest to the hon. member that the number of exceptions there will be, in the instance to which he has directed attention, are not numerous. On the other hand, in considering just how to give effect to those few odd cases, I must say frankly that unless we are prepared to enlarge greatly the number of polling subdivisions for war service electors, I do not see that there is any possibility of doing it. Consequently I feel that unless my hon. friend insists, not seeing any way out of the difficulty, and believing that the difficulty will be met with only in most exceptional cases, we might proceed. I am wondering if it is of sufficient importance to hold up the committee.

Mr. GRAYDON: Perhaps we can dispose of it readily. I take it that the minister has indicated the government's position. If the government desires to take the responsibility —as it must, in the end, in any event—and feels that the section must go through as it is, then I can only say that I can accept no responsibility whatsoever for agreeing to a section of this kind. I must confess that I think we should have taken much more time. The bill was presented only this afternoon, and I think we ought to have had some time to consider the matter raised. So far the bill has passed with very little discussion, the reason being that the Votes and Proceedings have carried the general provisions.

I say that the minister and the government are asking far too much when they ask the opposition to give consent, without further consideration. If the government decides to take that stand, and accept that responsibility, then it may do so. But it certainly is carried over the most vehement and vigorous protest, so far as I am concerned.

Mr. McLARTY: I am quite agreeable to allowing the section to stand.

NAVAL SERVICE ACT

AMENDMENTS AND CONSOLIDATION—ADAPTATION OF UNITED KINGDOM NAVAL DISCIPLINE ACT, 1866

The house resumed from Thursday, June 8, consideration in committee of bill No. 112, respecting the naval service of Canada—Mr. Macdonald (Kingston City)—Mr. Bradette in the chair.

Sections 9 to 15 inclusive agreed to.

On section 16—Organization.

Mr. STIRLING: Would the minister explain the reference on the explanatory page to the "Royal Canadian Fleet Reserve". I never heard of it.

Hon. ANGUS L. MACDONALD (Minister of National Defence for Naval Services): In point of actual fact, Mr. Chairman, the fleet reserve has no personnel. There is an organization on paper, and regulations are drawn for a fleet reserve; no such reserve, however, has been organized. When organized it would consist of men who have served in the Royal Canadian Navy for at least seven years, but who have then left it.

Mr. STIRLING: As apart from the Royal Canadian Naval Reserve.

Mr. MACDONALD (Kingston City): That is right.

Section agreed to.

Section 17 agreed to.

On section 18—Naval service may be at disposal of His Majesty in emergency.

Mr. MacNICOL: It is my understanding that in the event of an emergency, where the Canadian naval force would be called into action, there would be nothing in that force which would compare with what is known as the zombie army. Everyone in the navy is subject to active service.

Mr. MACDONALD (Kingston City): That is the way it is to-day, yes. The navy is composed entirely of volunteers, who are all on active service.

Section agreed to.

Sections 19 and 20 agreed to.

On section 21—Naval volunteer reserve.

Mr. STIRLING: It would seem that sections 21 and 23 repeat section 16. Is that necessary?

Mr. MACDONALD (Kingston City): Section 16 is for the naval reserve, and these sections, to which the hon. member has referred, refer to the naval volunteer reserve.

Mr. STIRLING: And it is necessary that it be repeated.

Mr. MACDONALD (Kingston City): They are different, yes.

Section agreed to.

Sections 22 and 23 agreed to.

On section 24—Naval college to be established.

Mr. STIRLING: The Royal Canadian Naval college is, of course, the one at Royal Roads?

Mr. MACDONALD (Kingston City): Yes.

Mr. STIRLING: Is that the only one that can be designated as a naval college? I am thinking of King's, near Halifax, and certain other establishments which train officers and ratings for specialized services. Do they not come under the head of colleges?

Mr. MACDONALD (Kingston City): No; I think not. King's, as a college, was not a naval college.

Mr. STIRLING: Does the minister say it is a college?

Mr. MACDONALD (Kingston City): As a college, King's was not a naval college. It was an institution under the control of the Church of England. But when it passed over to the navy we simply called it His Majesty's Canadian Ship King's, without using the word "college." The name Royal Canadian Naval college is properly applicable only to the institution at Royal Roads.

Section agreed to.

Sections 25 and 26 agreed to.

On section 27—Requirements for admission.

Mr. STIRLING: Why is it necessary to speak of the engineering branch as separate from the military? Do I take it that the term "military" includes all the specialized branches in the navy and for some reason or another the engineering branch is kept separate?

Mr. MACDONALD (Kingston City): That was the old wording of the section. If we were rewriting it we would probably use the words "executive and engineering branches," but we wanted to change the old section as little as possible.

Mr. STIRLING: I do not quite follow why signals, navigation, gunnery, torpedoes and so on are left out and the engineering branch is mentioned particularly.

Mr. MACDONALD (Kingston City): In the navy to-day we have the executive branch and also the engineering branch. The executive branch includes all those branches to which the hon. member has referred. I think if we were drawing the section anew we would use the word "executive", but thirty-four years ago the word "military" was used. I think it is well understood in the service that it means the executive branch as distinct from the engineering.

Mr. STIRLING: We are amending the Naval Service Act, so why retain the word "military" when another would be better?

Mr. MACDONALD (Kingston City): I see no objection to simply saying:

The age of candidates on admission to the Royal Canadian Naval College shall be as prescribed by the governor in council.

We would not designate any particular branch.

[Mr. Stirling.]

Mr. STIRLING: I do not see why it is desirable to retain the word "military" simply because it was in the act thirty-four years ago.

Mr. MACDONALD (Kingston City): Let us change it then. The words to be taken out would be "for the military and engineering branches of the naval service" and the words to be substituted therefore would be "to the Royal Canadian Naval College". The section would then read:

The age of candidates on admission to the Royal Canadian Naval College shall be as prescribed by the governor in council.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): I move accordingly.

Amendment agreed to.

Section as amended agreed to.

Section 28 agreed to.

On section 29—Target practice.

Mr. ISNOR: Can the minister give us any assurance with regard to compensation for damage to equipment? I have in mind the damage which has been caused to fishing equipment along the Atlantic coast. Thousands of dollars of damage have been done, particularly during the past few months. This has been on account of the patrol work carried on by the navy, but as far as I know no provision has been made to pay for this damage.

Mr. MACDONALD (Kingston City): I doubt if there is any provision in this bill dealing with the matter to which my hon. friend refers. I know the department has paid many claims for damage to nets along the coasts of Canada and I assume the practice will be continued. When we have had proof that a man's net has been damaged by one of our ships, some compensation has been made, but that matter is not specifically covered in the bill.

Section agreed to.

Sections 30 to 41 inclusive agreed to.

On section 42—Officer or man serving in another navy.

Mr. MacNICOL: I do not quite understand this subsection which reads:

Where any officer or man belonging to the naval forces is borne on the books of a ship or establishment of another navy, he shall for all purposes of command and discipline be subject to the laws, regulations and customs applicable to that ship or establishment.

How can a man be serving in two navies?

Mr. MACDONALD (Kingston City): A member of the Canadian navy might be in a British ship or establishment on loan to the British navy, in which case he would be subject to the laws of that ship or establishment.

Section agreed to.

Sections 43, 44 and 45 agreed to.

On section 46—Court-martial witnesses.

Mr. STIRLING: I do not quite see the necessity for subsection 2.

Mr. MACDONALD (Kingston City): I think that is not an unusual provision. It is to ensure that witnesses will attend and that the court martial may proceed.

Section agreed to.

On section 47—Persons subject to this part.

Mr. STIRLING: In paragraph (c) certain portions of the commonwealth are mentioned, but India is omitted and so is Southern Rhodesia. India had a Royal Indian Marine. I am not sure whether it is still retained as a separate force.

Mr. MACDONALD (Kingston City): It is.

Mr. STIRLING: Then should it not be included? Southern Rhodesia is a dominion, although so far as I am aware it carries no naval service. Kenya does, but it would come in under His Majesty's forces of the United Kingdom, I presume, but not India. Why should India not be included?

Mr. MACDONALD (Kingston City): The origin of this part of the section is to be found in the Visiting Forces Act passed here in 1933 and in other parts of the commonwealth at the same time. The places mentioned in that act are the very same places that are mentioned here: the United Kingdom, Australia, New Zealand, South Africa, the Irish Free State and Newfoundland. That is why they are the only ones mentioned in this bill.

Mr. GRAYDON: Has the neutrality of the Irish Free State no effect upon this section?

Mr. MACDONALD (Kingston City): They are members of the commonwealth. If they have a navy—

Mr. GRAYDON: Have they?

Mr. MACDONALD (Kingston City): If a member of their navy should be attached to our Canadian naval forces, certain consequences would follow. So with the Royal Australian Navy. That is all that that means.

Mr. STIRLING: Cadets of the Royal Indian Marine join our cadets and the cadets of Australia and of the other dominions in a training cruiser. I do not understand why India should be omitted.

Mr. MACDONALD (Kingston City): The discipline of commonwealth troops attached to a force of another part of the commonwealth is settled by the Visiting Forces Act, and I would assume—I am not sure that this is exactly so—that India is not a partner to the Visiting Forces Act for some reason or another. Therefore we make no provision for her in this subclause.

Section agreed to.

Sections 48 to 73 inclusive agreed to.

On section 74—Suffering ships or aircraft to be improperly lost.

Mr. GRAYDON: As one goes over these consequential penalties it seems to me that the boys of our Canadian navy would not be guilty of many infractions of this kind, although I can well understand that the minister has to have them in.

Mr. MacNICOL: On the right hand page I see this note, "Corresponds to section 28"—"Corresponds to section 29"—"Corresponds to section 30"—and so on. What does that mean? To what act does it refer?

Mr. MACDONALD (Kingston City): That refers to sections of the British Naval Discipline Act which are in effect in this country. They are made applicable in Canada because a certain section of our act says that they are to be applicable. We propose, as I stated last night, to put them in our own act, which makes for a more compact arrangement.

Mr. MacNICOL: Our new bill is largely the British Act made applicable to the Royal Canadian Navy?

Mr. GRAYDON: It is a change from indirect application to direct application?

Mr. MACDONALD (Kingston City): Yes.

Section agreed to.

Sections 75 to 80 inclusive agreed to.

On section 81—Endeavouring to stir up any disturbance on account of unwholesomeness of the victuals or other just grounds.

Mr. GRAYDON: I hope the penalty would not be too great for that kind of infraction!

Section agreed to.

Sections 82 to 85 inclusive agreed to.

On section 86—Breaking bulk on board prize ship with a view to embezzlement.

Mr. STIRLING: Does prize money still exist in the navy? Have some of our officers and ratings been benefiting by some of the captures that have been made?

Mr. MACDONALD (Kingston City): I have heard some doubt as to whether there is to be a distribution at the end of the war. I do not know just why the question has arisen. The fund would not be distributed in any event until the end of the war. It is all pooled. I do not know why the doubt has arisen but I have heard it expressed. In the last war there was a prize fund in which Canadian sailors participated.

On section 104—Constitution of courts martial.

Mr. STIRLING: I have read this section with a good deal of interest and I see that certain regulations, certain methods, and certain points in connection with courts martial are laid down here, but a great deal is omitted with regard to the conduct of courts martial, and I must presume, therefore, that they come under the regulations. But could the minister assure me that there is at some stage provision for the charge to be handed to the accused or stated in court or given him in such a way that he can prepare his defence? A good many years ago there was a rather famous court martial in which a sailor of admiral rank was court-martialled and the charge never made—

Mr. MACDONALD (Kingston City): Never read?

Mr. STIRLING: It was never furnished him. In the course of the court martial it was quite obvious what the charge was, but it created a good deal of attention and indeed is quoted all these years after.

Mr. MACDONALD (Kingston City): As set out in section 109, the officer is allowed to object to any member of the court and he may raise any other objection regarding the constitution of the court. That is a vital provision for the accused. There is a provision in the King's Regulations and Admiralty Instructions that he must be given a copy of the charge twenty-fours in advance.

Mr. STIRLING: That is it.

Mr. MACDONALD (Kingston City): That will be incorporated in our regulations.

Mr. STIRLING: And also provision for the prisoner consulting his friends?

Mr. MACDONALD (Kingston City): Yes. There is provision now that the accused person shall have full opportunity of preparing his defence, free communication with his witnesses and with any adviser whom he may wish to consult, and he may also have with him any person whom he wishes to conduct his case, a legal officer or adviser.

Mr. BLACKMORE: What would happen if a court martial were proved to have been conducted without regard to one or more of these provisions? Suppose a man had been declared guilty though any of these provisions had been disregarded. What recourse would he have?

Mr. MACDONALD (Kingston City): The finding of the court martial, of course, would have to be approved by the minister. It must be reviewed by the judge advocate of the fleet, and any irregularities of that kind, I should assume, would be detected by one or other of these persons. As a matter of fact, I have had to quash some proceedings in the last three or four years.

Mr. BLACKMORE: Suppose a court martial's finding got past all these officials and still was allowed, notwithstanding that it was deficient in respect of two or three of these provisions. What recourse would the victim have?

Mr. MACDONALD (Kingston City): Of course, if the error were of the kind my hon. friend states the accused would have the right to appeal to the civil courts, if he failed to get justice anywhere along the line in the naval service.

Mr. BLACKMORE: Would the same apply to other branches of the service?

Mr. MACDONALD (Kingston City): Oh, yes.

Mr. BLACKMORE: What would be the nature of the case which the accused would bring to the court? Would he sue someone for damages?

Mr. MACDONALD (Kingston City): There are several remedies open. One would be the ancient and well known remedy of habeas corpus. He would demand that cause be shown why he should be punished. There are certain other remedies. There is the writ of mandamus which might issue in certain cases, and the proceeding known as certiorari, where the whole matter is brought up, might also be available. There are several opportunities.

Sections 105 to 123 inclusive agreed to.

On section 124—Coming into force.

Mr. GRAYDON: Before the last clause carries and in order that I shall not be deprived of an opportunity of asking a question that did not seem to present itself while the sections were being read, may I say to the minister that there does not seem to be anything in the bill with respect to the naval board. Is there a section or paragraph that actually covers the naval board?

Mr. MACDONALD (Kingston City): No; that has not been put in the bill. There is at the present time an order in council establishing the naval board, and it is proposed to put that in the regulations. It is more or less a matter of internal administration in the department which, perhaps, at some future time may be changed. Some other minister might prefer some other title for his advisers; consequently it was not thought right to incorporate that in a statute. It will be in the regulations.

Mr. GRAYDON: I understand that there has been acquiesence on the part of the government with the criticisms which were made last year by Commander MacLean with respect to the suggestion of the inclusion of two extra members from the Royal Canadian Naval Volunteer Reserve on the naval board. Could the minister advise us whether or not there was an addition to the board, and, if so, were naval volunteer reserve men appointed?

Mr. MACDONALD (Kingston City): In the first place I would not say that it was because of Commander MacLean's protestations or statements that the change was made. I think the hon. member for Lake Centre, my hon. friend's colleague, made a well reasoned plea on that point at one time in the house when my estimates were up, which impressed me considerably. But apart from that, the naval reserve and the naval volunteer reserve have now grown to such proportions that it was felt we should give them fuller representation on the board, and that was done by means of an amendment to the original order in council establishing the board.

Mr. GRAYDON: I was not trying to assess the position in which the minister found himself as regards the representations which were made. I was merely inquiring, because I have just read in the magazine edited by Commander MacLean of a suggestion of that kind.

In conclusion, may I say that a very interesting situation may have escaped the notice of the members of the committee to-night. While we were discussing the Naval Services Act the navy was represented by the minister who was sponsoring the bill. One of the chief critics on our side of the house was the former Minister of National Defence, and the acting chairman of the committee was no less than a flight lieutenant of the Royal Canadian Air Force (Mr. Sinclair); therefore, the three services were represented on this particular occasion. I thought the committee might like to have that drawn to its attention at this time.

Mr. MacNICOL: Before the last section passes, may I ask a question with reference to section 115? I realize that the section has already passed. According to this section the minister may order a penalty remitted or suspended. I presume that would be a sentence passed by the judge advocate, or whatever is the proper name. Would the minister have the power to override a judge's decision?

Mr. MACDONALD (Kingston City): The minister always has power to reduce a sentence, yes.

Mr. KNOWLES: May I ask a question about another section that has been passed? Should there not be a qualifying phrase in section 2 (b) similar to that found in paragraphs (c) and (g)? My point in asking that question will be obvious. Provision is made in paragraphs (c) and (g) for the occasion when under the Department of National Defence Act there is a minister and deputy minister of national defence for naval services. I wonder whether paragraph (b) should not have a similar qualifying phrase, so that the department under that same circumstance would mean, not the Department of National Defence but the Department of National Defence for Naval Services?

Mr. MACDONALD (Kingston City): The hon. member raises an interesting point; but I am advised, and I think my advice is correct that the draftsmanship is right. By looking at the National Defence Act itself and the amending act of July 12, 1940, I conclude that the paragraph is in proper form.

Strictly speaking, there is only one Department of National Defence. My colleague, the Minister for Air and I are merely named as ministers of national defence for air and national defence for naval services. No special department is named. Consequently I think it is better that we should be correct and have the word "department" defined as it is now, to mean only the Department of National Defence. It is a good point; I am glad my hon. friend raised it, but on reflection I think the paragraph is correctly worded.

Mr. KNOWLES: I just wanted to be sure it was not an error.

Mr. BLACK (Cumberland): Mr. Chairman, the leader of the opposition has made reference to you, with your very distinguished service in the air, taking part in the passing of this naval bill, and also to my colleague the hon. member for Yale, a former Minister of National Defence. I should like to complete this record of distinguished personages who have played a part in drawing up and dealing with this bill by mentioning my fellow townsman, Commander Horace Read, R.C.N.V.R., of Amherst, Nova Scotia, who has had a distinguished career in the legal profession; who was a professor at Dalhousie college and who, because of his high qualifications, was secured to head the department of legislation in the law school at the university of Minnesota. He returned to Canada in order to contribute his services to the naval department, and I believe was largely responsible for the drafting of this bill as well as other very important work. He also had a distinguished career in the last war, first enlisting in the 219th battalion and later transferring to the air force. Those were early, pioneering days in the air, as compared with the period through which we are now passing.

I might also mention, as among the distinguished personages to take part in our proceedings to-night, my fellow townsman the Minister of National Defence. As we all know, he distinguished himself in the last war. Now he is carrying a very great burden in administering the Department of National Defence during this struggle and has assumed the additional responsibility of leading this house during the absence of the Prime Minister in Great Britain and, at times, since his return. It gives me very great gratification, Mr. Chairman, to make these additions to the record of which you were reminded by the leader of the opposition.

Mr. KNOWLES: I do not know whether or not I am in order, but I should like to draw attention to the presence in the gallery of a naval rating. I do not know who he is, but he has been here throughout the discussion.

REAL ESTATE

PROPERTIES PURCHASED BY GOVERNMENT IN PRAIRIE PROVINCES

Hon. T. A. CRERAR (Minister of Mines and Resources): I desire to table parliamentary return, reference No. 193, asked for by the hon. member for Lake Centre (Mr. Diefenbaker), a statement showing location of and prices paid for all properties purchased by the government during 1941 to 1943 in Manitoba, Saskatchewan and Alberta.

I should like to make this comment, if I may: The preparation of this order involved a great deal of work. I have in mind the possibility of similar questions being asked as to the acquisition of properties under the Veterans' Land Act, with details of purchases, locations and descriptions. A great deal of work would be involved in that; therefore this should not be taken as a precedent.

CANADIAN FORCES

ANNOUNCEMENT AS TO NEW SYSTEM FOR SUPPLYING CIGARETTES TO PERSONNEL OVERSEAS

Hon. W. P. MULOCK (Postmaster General): I wish to advise members of the house that, as a result of the combined efforts of the Minister of National Defence, the Minister of National Defence for Air, and myself, a new system has been developed for the sending of cigarettes from Canada to members of the armed forces in Italy which will result in the equivalent of air mail service.

It is hoped soon to have a similar system in operation for the members of our forces serving in Britain and France. The new system of handling cigarettes addressed to members of the forces in Italy goes into effect on June 19, and simply described, involves the sending by air mail of addressed labels, representing cigarettes ordered as at present in Canada to a Mediterranean depot, where they will be drawn against a large reserve of cigarettes which has been built up over a period of time by bulk shipments.

Under the new arrangement, the individual sending the cigarettes is relieved of the possibility of loss between the tobacco company in Canada and the cigarette depot in Italy, as the Post Office Department is assuming responsibility for loss, if any, of the bulk shipments. In addition, it is expected that the new plan will result in a marked speeding up of deliveries. From the standpoint of the mailing public, there is no change in procedure. Orders will be placed in the same manner as at present, either with the tobacconist or direct with the company. When the company receives the order, a label covering each standard package of three hundred cigarettes ordered will be prepared, complete with postage and particulars. The labels will then be recorded by the Post Office Department and sent overseas by air transport. Upon arrival at the tobacco depot, the labels will be attached by members of the postal corps to parcels of the particular brand of cigarettes ordered and will then be dispatched to the addressee. The scheme has a particular advantage in that if any plane carrying labels is lost the labels can be quickly duplicated and the orders filled as if no loss had occurred. Replacement stocks at the depot in Italy will be forwarded in bulk shipment.

I have referred to standard packages of three hundred cigarettes. The efficient operation of the plan makes it necessary to adopt this size of a parcel, and after June 19 all cigarettes forwarded for men overseas must be in this size. The plan will not affect the present practice of certain auxiliaries, associations or other agencies sending bulk shipments of cigarettes for impersonal distribution to units or generally throughout the forces.

Orders for delivery under the new plan will be accepted for Sweet Caporal and Winchesters of the Imperial Tobacco Company, British Consols and Exports of W. C. Macdonald Incorporated; and Buckinghams and Wings of Tuckett Limited.

Persons wishing to order cigarettes from tobacco companies other than those mentioned may continue to do so, but in these cases the individual parcels will continue to be handled as at present. These orders also, however, must conform to the three hundred cigarette standard package.

As a further result of the scheme, it is anticipated that later on, possibly within a month, a system will go into effect whereby members of the armed forces overseas will be able to purchase cigarettes direct from the overseas tobacco depots at the rate of three hundred for the equivalent of one dollar.

CANADIAN WOMEN'S ARMY CORPS PIPE BAND—DRESS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. JAMES SINCLAIR (Vancouver North): Mr. Speaker, I have a question to ask the minister of National Defence of interest to all the Canadian Scottish regiments, and one which I believe will be of interest also not only to your Honour, but also to the other seventy hon. members who, like yourself, are either of Scottish birth or of Scottish descent. On Saturday afternoon I had the pleasure of hearing the very excellent pipe band of the Canadian Women's Army Corps when it appeared on parliament hill. I was surprised, however, to find that they were not attired in the dress characteristic of a pipe band. The members of the British Army Women's Corps Pipe Band wear tartan kilts; indeed, any recruits to the corps enlisted in Scotland may wear the kilt. I would ask the minister whether consideration will be given to outfitting in a similar fashion this fine pipe band, made up of members of the Canadian Women's Army Corps.

Hon. J. L. RALSTON (Minister of National Defence): I can assure my hon. friend that I shall be glad to consult him in the matter. Having been myself a member of a Highland battalion, I agree with him that all possible steps should be taken to see to it that there is strict observance of the dress regulations of the Highland clans.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Why should not the minister consult other Scottish members of the house? Why pick out the hon. member for Vancouver North?

QUESTIONS

(Questions answered orally are indicated by an asterisk.)

SOUTHERN ALBERTA DROUGHT AREA POLICY

Mr. GERSHAW:

1. Will the government get a report from the P.F.R.A. officers regarding the conditions of the grain and grass crops and the stock watering places in southern Alberta?

2. What steps are being taken to make use of the available water in the streams from the hills and mountains in working out some long term drought area policy in the above area?

Mr. CRERAR:

1. Through the field staffs under the Prairie Farm Rehabilitation Act and the Prairie Farm Assistance Act, and other departmental officers, the Department of Agriculture is kept informed of the crop and moisture conditions in Alberta. At the present time the district engineers under P.F.R.A. are making a check to determine the extent of the water reserves in the dams and dugouts in the Lethbridge and Medicine Hat areas.

2. It has been recognized for a great many years that the best way to make use of the water supply of the streams of Alberta is by a series of storage reservoirs on, and adjacent to, streams where high flows and flood flows occur periodically, in order that such water can be held over and used beneficially when the stream flows are low.

The dominion reclamation service, recognizing the necessity of storing the high flows, made preliminary surveys of a great many storage sites in the foothills and mountains. The prairie farm rehabilitation organization have access to all of the information and plans made by the reclamation service and it has been the policy, as funds and staff have become available, to make detailed surveys of those various sites.

Until tests have been made to determine foundation conditions it is not possible to determine the feasibility of reservoir sites. This is the information now required in connection with all of those sites which have been already investigated by the reclamation service and the P.F.R.A. The policy of the P.F.R.A. is to continue investigations of storage sites on the mountain streams particularly with regard to foundation conditions.

In addition to these major works, planned for future construction, the sum of $366,384.66 has already been expended in Alberta under the Prairie Farm Rehabilitation Act on projects designed to conserve and use the water of rivers and streams in Alberta.

R.C.A.F.—EQUIPMENT DEPOTS—STATIONERY AND PRINTING DESTROYED

Mr. BENCE:

What was the total cost value of stationery and printing destroyed in R.C.A.F. equipment depots, in each of the provinces of Manitoba, Saskatchewan, and Alberta, during the twelve-month period from May 1, 1943, to May 1, 1944?

Mr. POWER:

No. 7 equipment depot, Winnipeg, Man.	$2,630 42
No. 11 equipment depot, Calgary, Alta.	1,689 60
Total	$4,320 02

There is no equipment depot in Saskatchewan.

CANADIAN ARMY—ACCIDENT ON BIG BEND HIGHWAY, B.C.

Mr. GREEN:

1. Has there been any investigation into the fatal accident which occurred on the Big Bend Highway in British Columbia on or about the 23rd May, 1943, when an army truck crashed through a bridge over the Goldstream creek?

2. If so, what was the result of such investigation?

Mr. MACDONALD (Halifax):

1. Yes. The matter is being investigated by a court of inquiry.

2. The result of the investigation is not yet available.

STEVENSON AIRPORT WINNIPEG

Mr. KNOWLES:

1. Has the Department of Transport received from the St. James-Winnipeg airport commission, since May 22, 1944, a further proposal for the enlarging of Stevenson field?

2. Is consideration being given by the government to the granting of official approval to the plans proposed by the above commission?

3. Is consideration being given by the government to joining with the local, provincial and municipal governments in supporting the foregoing proposal?

4. If not, has the government any alternative plans for the enlarging of this airport?

Mr. CHEVRIER:

1. Yes. Letter dated May 28 has been received.

2, 3 and 4. The St. James-Winnipeg airport commission have been advised of the government's desire to cooperate fully with the commission in the further development of Stevenson airport when conditions necessitate its extension. No commitment for any financial assistance under present conditions has been made.

BRITISH COLUMBIA STRAWBERRY AND RASPBERRY PULP

Mr. CRUICKSHANK:

1. Was the strawberry and raspberry pulp, or So2 production of British Columbia placed under allotment for sale to manufacturers in 1943?

2. If so, what was the total quantity of each exported from British Columbia for this purpose?

3. What was the average price paid for strawberries and raspberries under this order?

4. Could shippers export as the pack became ready?

5. Who financed the pack being held for export to eastern manufacturers, and to the order of munitions and supply?

6. What other provinces came under this order?

Mr. ILSLEY:

1. Yes, except the pulps packed for the packers' own use in British Columbia.

2. Strawberries, 647 barrels; raspberries, 2,505 barrels.

3. Strawberry pulps; approximately 18½c. per pound of fruit, f.o.b. plant in B.C.
Raspberry pulps; approximately 17½c. per pound of fruit, f.o.b. plant in B.C.

4. No.

5. The packer.

6. None.

CANADIAN ARMY—SOLDIER ROY, CHAUDIÈRE REGIMENT, SUSSEX, N.B.

Mr. POULIOT:

1. Was a soldier by the name of Roy, blind in one eye, placed in category "A" in the Chaudière regiment, while that regiment was at Sussex, N.B.?

2. If so, was he sent overseas?

3. Was he placed in another medical category while in England, and was he sent back to Canada because his medical category had been lowered?

4. Was he retained in the army in Canada?

5. If so, where, and what are his duties?

6. What is his present medical category?

7. In what medical categories was he placed, on what dates, and by what physicians?

Mr. MACDONALD (Halifax): With the information available it has been found impossible to identify this soldier. I have spoken to the hon. member for Témiscouata, and I would ask that this question be dropped.

Question dropped.

CANADIAN ARMY—SOLDIER PARADIS, CHAUDIÈRE REGIMENT, SUSSEX, N.B.

Mr. POULIOT:

1. Was a soldier named Paradis who was totally deaf placed in category "A" while he was in the Chaudière regiment at Sussex, N.B.?

2. Was he sent overseas and, if so, when?

3. Was his medical category lowered while he was overseas, and was he sent back to Canada as unfit for military service and, if so, when?

4. Afterwards, was he sent back overseas?

5. If so, was he cured of his deafness, and when?

6. Is he now a staff sergeant in the Quebec regiment overseas?

7. In what medical categories was he placed, on what dates and by whom?

Mr. MACDONALD (Halifax):

On the assumption that the soldier referred to is E11014, Sgt. Joseph Paradis, the information is as follows:

1. No. He was not totally deaf. He was placed in category "E" at Sussex, N.B., and later placed in category "A" at Quebec, P.Q.

2. Yes. 20th July, 1941.

3. His medical category was not lowered overseas and he was not sent back to Canada as unfit for military service, but was returned in March, 1942, for instructional duty with the newly mobilized 6th and 7th divisions.

4. No.

5. Answered by No. 4.

6. No. He was discharged as medically unfit on 5th January, 1944.

7. Category "A", 12th September, 1939, medical board, Quebec, P.Q.; category "E", 24th April, 1941, medical board, Sussex, N.B.; category "A", 6th June, 1941, medical board, Quebec, P.Q.; Pulhems 1115111, 7th December, 1943, medical board, Dartmouth, N.S.

DEPARTMENT OF LABOUR—EMPLOYMENT SERVICE AND UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE BRANCH

Mr. COTE:

1. Who is the officer appointed by virtue of order in council P.C. 7994 to take charge of the employment service and unemployment insurance branch in the Department of Labour?

2. What control, if any, does he have, (a) on the officers and other staff of the unemployment insurance commission; (b) on the regional and local offices of the said commission?

3. To whom is this officer referred to in the preceding questions directly responsible for his administration of the employment service and unemployment insurance branch?

4. Who are the executive officers of the said branch and what is their respective representative capacity in relation to, (a) the employer; (b) the worker; (c) the Canadian taxpayer?

5. Has the unemployment insurance commission any responsibility whatsoever and, if so, what is the nature of that responsibility, for the administration of the employment service and unemployment insurance branch?

Mr. MITCHELL:

1. Mr. Allan M. Mitchell, U.I.C. commissioner.

2. (a) The control as outlined in sections 1 and 5 of P.C. 7974; (b) see (a).

3. Defined under sections 1 and 5 of P.C. 7994.

4. H. F. Caloren, chief executive officer; W. K. Rutherford, chief employment officer; R. G. Barclay, chief insurance officer; T. R. Walsh, chief of the legal division. (a), (b) and (c) All are civil servants.

5. The responsibilities of the unemployment insurance commission are those described in section 1 of P.C. 7994, and those of the individual commissioners are as set out in sections 2, 3 and 4 of the same order.

WHEAT MARKETED BY FARMERS, 1935-36 to 1942-43

Mr. FAIR:

How many bushels of wheat were marketed by farmers in each of the crop years, 1935-36 to 1942-43 inclusive?

Mr. MacKINNON (Edmonton West):

	Marketing Prairie provinces [1]	Millings Ontario wheat [2]	Total
	bushels	bushels	bushels
1935-36....	216,273,373	3,687,710	219,961,083

[1] Including receipts at internal private and mill elevators from 1940-41.

[2] Only figures available on marketing of wheat in eastern Canada.

COORDINATION OF PRODUCTION

Mr. FACTOR:

1. Is Mr. H. J. Carmichael, coordinator of production and chairman of the production board, a dollar-a-year man, and what is his per diem or expense allowance?

2. Is he in the employ of General Motors of Canada, Limited?

3. Is he on the payroll of the company?

4. Is he a director of the company?

5. Has he severed all connection with General Motors of Canada, Limited?

Mr. CHEVRIER:

1. Mr. H. J. Carmichael, coordinator of production and chairman of the production board, was invited by the Minister of Munitions and Supply to join the department and on January 13, 1941, he accepted the position of director general, gun production branch. Since the date of his appointment he has accepted no salary, per diem allowance or expenses.

2. No.

3. No.

4. No.

5. Yes. Mr. Carmichael resigned his position as vice-president and general manager of General Motors of Canada, Limited, on January 13, 1941.

SOLDIER SETTLEMENT—ALBERTA

Mr. HANSELL:

What lands south of township 20 in the province of Alberta have been purchased since 1939, for the purpose of rehabilitation of soldiers under the soldier settlement scheme?

[Mr. Mitchell.]

Mr. HANSELL: In view of the information asked in the question immediately preceding this one on the order paper, in the name of the hon. member for Battle River, (Mr. Fair) which has been allowed to stand, I would ask that this question be dropped and I will reword it. Part of the information I desire may be found in the answer to the previous question when it is brought down.

Question dropped.

MOBILIZATION ACT—PERSONNEL IN NEWFOUNDLAND—FARM LEAVE

Mr. POULIOT:

1. Under the mobilization regulations, are conscripts stationed in Newfoundland deemed to be overseas?

2. If not, are they entitled to farm leave?

Mr. MACDONALD (Halifax):

1. N.R.M.A. soldiers serving in Newfoundland are serving outside of Canada and the territorial waters thereof, but are not serving overseas in the sense that they are not serving under the administrative control and direction of Canadian military headquarters in Great Britain but are serving under the administrative control and direction of national defence headquarters, Ottawa.

2. Canadian army routine order 3456, appearing as an appendix to Hansard, dated 20th March, 1944, which deals with farm leave, does not apply to army personnel serving in Newfoundland. They are, however, eligible to be considered by national defence headquarters for the grant of compassionate leave on the same basis and subject to the same considerations as apply to the grant of such leave in the case of army personnel serving under the administrative control and direction of Canadian military headquarters in Great Britain.

QUESTIONS PASSED AS ORDERS FOR RETURNS

R.C.A.F.—USE OF LAKE ERIE FISHING GROUNDS FOR BOMBING AND GUNNERY PRACTICE

Mr. CORMAN:

1. How many fishermen lost all or part of their fishing grounds on lake Erie to the Royal Canadian Air Force for the use of bombing and gunnery practice?

2. What compensation was paid each pound net fisherman per year?

3. What compensation was paid each gill net fisherman per year?

DOLLAR-A-YEAR MEN

Mr. KNOWLES:

1. How many one-dollar-a-year men have been employed by the government, or any department thereof, subsequent to the information contained in sessional paper No. 139, dated January 28, 1944?

2. What are their names, addresses, and qualifications, and on what date was each appointed?

3. With what firm or company was each of the above employed before entering the service of the government?

4. Which of the above are still employed by the said firms or companies?

5. Which of the above are still on the payrolls, or are directors, of the said firms or companies?

6. Have any of the above firms or companies received contracts from the government since the outbreak of the present war, apart from the information contained in sessional paper No. 139, as noted above?

7. If so, on what date or dates, and for what amount or amounts, in each case?

SYDNEY FOUNDRY AND MACHINE COMPANY

Mr. GILLIS:

1. Who are the owners of the Rhodes Curry wharf at Sydney, Nova Scotia?

2. Has the Sydney Engineering and Drydock Company the right to refuse any other company the right to use this wharf in necessary war work?

3. How much money was paid the Sydney Foundry and Machine Company for refits for the corvettes Regina and New Westminster, in 1943?

4. Was the corvette New Westminster, tied up from May 3, to October 1, 1943, at the Sydney Foundry and Machine Company's plant? If so, for what reason?

5. What is the total value of capital assistance, equipment, grants or subsidies, given the Sydney Foundry and Machine Company or the Sydney Engineering and Drydock, during the years 1940, 1941, 1942, 1943, and to June 15, 1944?

MOTIONS FOR PAPERS

MONTREAL CUSTOMS AND EXCISE—BRUNO FORCIER

Mr. FONTAINE:

For a copy of all telegrams, letters, correspondence and other documents exchanged since January 1, 1943, between all persons and the Department of National Revenue regarding transfer of Mr. Bruno Forcier, customs and excise employee at Montreal, to the customs and excise office at St. Hyacinthe.

Mr. GIBSON: Mr. Speaker, this motion has been on the order paper since April 27. I understand that each time motions for papers have come up in the house the hon. member has been absent. I have no objection to its passing if someone would move it on his behalf.

Motion agreed to.

MONTAUBAN, QUEBEC, ZINC-LEAD MINE

Mr. GAUTHIER:

For a copy of all correspondence, letters and telegrams exchanged between the Department of Munitions and Supply, the Wartime Metal Corporation and the Siscoe Metal Limited, pertaining to the opening, operation and closing of the Montauban zinc-lead mine, in the county of Portneuf, a mine formerly operated by the British Metal Corporation and the property of Tetrault Mines.

Mr. CHEVRIER: Return tabled.

FRENCH-CANADIAN APPOINTMENTS TO BOARDS, ETC.

Mr. RAYMOND:

For a copy of all telegrams, letters, correspondence or other documents exchanged between the premier of the province of Quebec, Mr. Adélard Godbout, and the dominion government, or any member of the dominion government, since the month of November, 1939, to the effect that French Canadians have been unfairly treated in the creation of, and the appointment of members to, the various dominion boards, commissions and organizations.

PENSIONS AND HEALTH—NEUROLOGICAL HOSPITALS OR INSTITUTES

Mr. BRUCE:

For a statement from the Department of Pensions and National Health showing the neurological hospitals or institutes in Canada, together with a copy of correspondence from the authorities controlling these institutions, addressed to the government or any minister or official of the government, regarding the need for additions or extensions to such neurological hospitals or institutes; also a statement showing the number and location of other hospitals where surgical treatment of neurological cases is carried out; also the number of neurological surgeons in Canada who confine their practice to neurological surgery.

BRITISH COLUMBIA STRAWBERRY AND RASPBERRY CROPS

Mr. CRUICKSHANK:

For a copy of all letters, telegrams, protests and other documents in the possession of the department, regarding the disposal and processing of the 1943 strawberry and raspberry crops in British Columbia, and concerning administrator's orders A-794 and A-1200.

LABOUR CONDITIONS—CARPENTERS AND JOINERS, WINNIPEG—CANADA PACKERS

Mr. KNOWLES:

For a copy of all records of proceedings and records of decisions, dated since April 20, 1944, with reference to the appeal of the United Brotherhood of Carpenters and Joiners of America, Winnipeg local union No. 343, from the action of the national selective service office, at Winnipeg, in directing one or more members of said union to accept employment with Canada Packers Limited, of St. Boniface, Manitoba, at a wage rate of 54½ cents per hour. Also for a copy of all communications and memoranda, to and from the Minister of Labour, dated since the hearing of the above appeal, with reference to the implementing of any recommendation respecting the payment of supplementary allowances to the aforesaid union members; also for a copy of any orders in council relating thereto.

UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE COMMISSION—PROVINCE OF QUEBEC

Mr. COTE:

For a copy of all correspondence, letters, telegrams, petitions and other documents exchanged between the dominion government and any person or persons, organizations or societies, or between the dominion government and the government of the province of Quebec, concerning the establishment of a district office of the unemployment insurance commission in the city of Quebec and any municipality other than Montreal within the province of Quebec.

NATIONAL WAR SERVICES REGULATIONS

Mr. POULIOT:

For a copy of each one of the amendments to the national war services regulations.

MOBILIZATION ACT—REGULATIONS

Mr. POULIOT:

For a copy of all amendments to the mobilization regulations, (a) of the Department of Labour, and (b) of the Department of National Defence.

INTER-AMERICAN DEVELOPMENT

INQUIRY AS TO RECENT MEETING OF COMMISSION IN NEW YORK

On the orders of the day:

Mr. GORDON GRAYDON (Leader of the Opposition): I understand that at the recent conference in New York of the Inter-American Development commission a resolution was adopted favouring the organization in Canada of a similar commission. I should like to know if Canada was represented at this conference officially or unofficially; if so, by whom, and also whether any report has been made by such government representative. I should like to ask also whether the government is in a position to indicate its policy with respect to the organization of such a commission in the dominion.

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): Canada was represented at the recent conference of the Inter-American Development commission by Mr. H. D. Scully, who is our consul general in New York. Mr. Scully was present as an observer. At the conference a resolution was passed suggesting that a similar commission be established in Canada, but thus far the invitation to establish such a commission has not been received. Until it is received and the implications examined I think it would be well not to make any statement of policy.

CONFERENCE WITH PROVINCES

INQUIRY AS TO PROGRESS IN MAKING ARRANGEMENTS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. GORDON GRAYDON (Leader of the Opposition): What progress has been made since the Prime Minister's return from London with respect to arrangements for the dominion-provincial conference, and is the Prime Minister in a position to give any indication as to the date of the conference?

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): As my hon. friend knows, in preparation for a conference of this kind a great deal of data has to be assembled, particularly on financial matters. I understand that considerable progress has been made in that connection, and in the gathering of information that would be useful to those present when the conference meets. The question of meeting the convenience of all the provinces as to the exact date of the meeting is one that presents difficulties, though not insuperable ones. At the moment I am unable to say when the conference will meet, but every effort will be made to have it assemble just as soon as all the provinces have indicated when they will be in a position to attend.

THE WAR

INVASION OF WESTERN EUROPE—CASUALTIES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. GORDON GRAYDON (Leader of the Opposition): Is the Minister of National Defence in a position to make any statement with regard to the extent of the casualties that have been suffered by the Canadian forces in the campaign in France?

Hon. J. L. RALSTON (Minister of National Defence): As my hon. friend will understand, I am not in a position to make any statement, to the extent of giving numbers or anything of that kind. I think the most I can say, in view of the messages which have been received, is that our losses are moderate, and that is particularly so when all the factors entering into operations of this magnitude are considered.

I believe it was the hon. member for Macleod (Mr. Hansell) who asked me the other night whether or not casualty lists would be furnished to members. Arrangements have been made to see to it that members will receive those casualty lists, and it is my hope that they will receive them at about the same time as the lists are given to the press. This would be a complete list periodically of army casualties.

FRANCE

GOVERNMENT OF LIBERATED AREAS—RELATIONS WITH GENERAL DE GAULLE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. S. H. KNOWLES (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask a question of the Prime Minister. He will understand, from the nature of the notice I sent him, that I am seeking information which I believe would be of interest to the house and country. Is he in a position to make a statement as to arrangements made for the government of liberated areas of France, including any information as to relations between the allied military authorities and General de Gaulle?

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I may say that I know these matters have been the subject of consideration between Mr. Churchill, General de Gaulle and the President of the United States, but I am not in a position at the moment to make any statement as to the present position.

DOMINION ELECTIONS

MEASURE TO ENABLE WAR SERVICE PERSONNEL TO VOTE IN GENERAL ELECTION

The house resumed from Friday, June 9, consideration in committee of Bill No. 135, to provide regulations enabling Canadian war service electors to exercise their franchise, and Canadian prisoners of war to vote by proxy, at any general election held during the present war, also to provide amendments to the Dominion Elections Act, 1938, which are consequential to such regulations, or have become necessary by the advent of the said war—Mr. McLarty—Mr. Bradette in the chair.

On schedule A, section 35—War service elector voting as civilian.

Hon. N. A. McLARTY (Secretary of State): Mr. Chairman, it will be recalled that all other sections of both schedules were passed on Friday night. This was allowed to stand at the request of the leader of the opposition. The hon. member expressed apprehension that there might be a considerable number of men on furlough or on leave, and that if wider facilities could be given to enable them to vote, even though they might be some distance away from their ordinary voting places, it should be done.

I know it was the intention of the special committee which considered these regulations not to put any stumbling block in the way of those on leave or on furlough, exercising their franchise, and it was the committee's intention that they should vote in the most convenient manner. Over the week-end consideration has been given to the suggestion made. It must be remembered that the special committee broadened this regulation as widely as it thought possible, and there has been no suggestion of any attempt to curtail the right to vote of any war service elector. However, the chief electoral officer has given the matter consideration, and it is our belief that, without unduly complicating the machinery, through a slight amendment we can broaden it. Whereas under present circumstances a man in the army, the navy or the air force who is on furlough must report to the polling division of the particular branch of the armed services in which he serves, the schedule can be broadened so as to make it permissible for such member of the forces to vote before the election officer of any of the services, irrespective of the particular branch in which he serves. This change can be effected by striking out the words "of the same force" where they appear in line 44 of section 35 in the schedule, and inserting after the word "electors" in line 45 the words "by the commanding officer of a Canadian naval, military or air unit." I am advised by the chief electoral officer that this is about as broad as the provision can be made, if it is to remain practicable and workable. I believe in this we have gone some distance to meet the wishes of the leader of the opposition. To go further would make the provision impracticable.

Mr. MacKINNON (Edmonton West): I move:

That section 35 of schedule A be amended by deleting the words "of the same force" in line 44 thereof, and by inserting after the word "electors" in line 45 the following words, "by the Commanding Officer of a Canadian Naval, Military or Air Unit."

Mr. GRAYDON: Hon. members will realize that this amendment is the result of discussion which took place in committee on Friday night. It appeared to some of us that men who were on furlough for any extended length of time, during an election campaign, might be discriminated against because of their being at distant points, and their not being able to reach the places designated by the act as being the proper places at which to vote. I believe finally the matter came down to a consideration of those under twenty-one years of age who, by reason of the war services voting regulations, would have the right to vote.

Those over twenty-one years were, of course, covered by the general civilian provisions permitting their being sworn in in rural areas. I believe it may be said properly that the only possibility of inconvenience would be in rural polling divisions, because at urban points the possibilities of service voters obtaining their right to exercise their franchise conveniently would be greater. Therefore the discussion dwindled down to a consideration of those under twenty-one years of age in rural areas. The difficulty is one of covering only a small group so as to avoid discrimination against those in rural areas.

Although I realize that there is still a possibility of some discrimination and inconvenience, at the same time I believe the suggested amendment will meet the situation, and should reduce to a minimum any possible inconvenience to service voters on furlough. No matter where a man may be, there is apt to be a camp of one of the armed services nearby where a polling booth would be within his reach. Previously that might not have been the case, and great hardship would have been worked upon some who desired to exercise their franchise and who were under the civilian age limit for voting. So far as I am concerned the amendment is satisfactory, although in some instances inconvenience may be suffered. However, I cannot see how it can be opened any wider without causing difficulties of a practical nature.

Mr. ROSS (Souris): I supported the leader of the opposition the other night when he raised objection to section 35. In my province there are three adjoining rural ridings in which there are no training centres of either of the armed services. Am I right in supposing that any soldier at home on leave would go to the nearest training centre of any one of the armed services in order to poll his vote?

Mr. McLARTY: That is right.

Mr. MacNICOL: On Friday night I listened carefully to the leader of the opposition state his case. As I remember, he raised the question of a soldier on furlough or on leave under twenty-one years of age who might be in the village of Palgrave, for instance, in the northern end of Peel. That man would have to go to some camp, such as the exhibition grounds at Toronto or a camp at Hamilton or elsewhere. I cannot see where this proposed amendment is going to improve the situation. I do not know whether it can be improved, but I do not see that we are going to improve it by taking out the words "of the same force" and substituting "or the commanding officer" and so on. Will the minister explain just how this proposed amendment will meet the situation suggested on Friday night by the leader of the opposition? If it does not, we may as well leave the section as it is.

Mr. McLARTY: As I have suggested, no matter how willing this committee may be and no matter how willing the special committee was, we cannot avoid some inconvenience. Prior to this amendment any man in the army would have had to go to army voting quarters; a man in the navy would have had to go to navy voting quarters, and an air force man would have had to go to the air force. The purpose of this amendment is to permit a man to go to any one of these.

I might point out further, as was suggested the other night by the hon. member for Vancouver North, that there are twelve days for polling available to a war service elector. You can only carry the matter to the point where you have done everything that it is practicable to do to meet the situation. If this does not meet it, I must say it is hopeless to think that any measure could be adopted to meet it unless you make the 32,000 returning and deputy returning officers throughout Canada special returning officers in order to do it. There may be some inconvenience, but in the very nature of things the war service electors will generally be in concentrated areas, and this amendment is simply to meet the exception, namely, the man on leave or on furlough or the man under twenty-one years of age. I suggest that this is all that we can safely do.

Mr. GRAYDON: Perhaps I might just interject a word to satisfy the hon. member for Davenport who is showing such solicitude for the people in my riding, for which I am extremely thankful. The situation in that particular area is this. Previously a man would have had to go to Toronto, and some of our people may not want to go to Toronto. But now, if he is an army man, instead of having to go to the exhibition grounds in Toronto to record his vote he can go to the air observers' school at Malton, which is not more than half way.

Mr. SINCLAIR: The average leave is only two weeks, and, with the twelve days provided by the bill, a man would be back at camp in time to poll his vote. This will apply only to men who have been repatriated from overseas or who are on one month's leave, men who are away out in the country far from any service polling station. I doubt whether there will be a hundred men affected by this.

Mr. ROSS (Souris): That all depends upon what time of year the election takes place.

Mr. FAIR: I was a member of the special committee set up to deal with the elections act amendment, and I feel satisfied that when we presented the report to the house everything possible had been done that could be done. As has been suggested by the hon. member for Vancouver North, these service men and women are allowed twelve days before election day in which to vote, and very little inconvenience would be caused. While I am glad this amendment has been made to broaden the provisions, I do feel that we did a pretty good job in the special committee.

Mr. ROSS (Souris): In view of the remarks of the hon. member for Vancouver North I should like to repeat what I said. There is a block of three rural constituencies in southern Manitoba where there are no training camps. Should the election be held during harvest time when many men are home on harvest leave, it will mean that they will have to get together and drive to either Brandon or Winnipeg in order to poll their votes.

Mr. SINCLAIR: The election will not be held in harvest time.

Mr. ROSS (Souris): I do not know a thing about that.

An hon. MEMBER: How far is that?

Mr. ROSS (Souris): These constituencies are all in southern Manitoba, and the men would have to go to either Brandon or Winnipeg.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: How far?

Mr. ROSS (Souris): Some of them would have to drive 150 miles.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: People drive 500 miles to vote for me.

Mr. ROSS (Souris): They probably will for me, but I am thinking of the other fellows.

SURPLUS CROWN ASSETS

PROVISION FOR CORPORATION AND ADVISORY COMMITTEE

Hon. C. D. HOWE (Minister of Munitions and Supply) moved the second reading of bill No. 137, respecting surplus crown assets.

Hon. R. B. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Mr. Speaker, this is a very important measure and one which I think deserves a substantial amount of consideration before it receives second reading. I regret I was unable to be here late last week when the minister introduced the measure. I am not as familiar with the subject matter as possibly I ought to be, but I am aware of the immensity of the problem that confronts the government and the nation in respect to the disposition of surplus crown assets. Some six months ago or so announcement was made of the establishment, by order in council, I assume, of a body termed the Crown Assets Allocation committee, and of the setting up by letters patent of a corporation charged with the responsibility of the disposition of these surplus assets. If that structure was already established by order in council with respect to the committee, and by letters patent with respect to the crown corporation, under I believe identical nomenclature, why was it necessary to come to parliament for legislation to do the same thing?—unless it be that the powers conferred by order in council in the case of the committee and by letters patent in the case of the corporation were not in the opinion of the government wide enough to take care of the situation.

Has the minister taken the house and the country fully into his confidence as to the immensity of the task, measured in terms of dollars and cents, which is before the corporation in the disposition of these goods? Has he told us why it has become so large as to be measured in terms of what I believe to be hundreds of millions of dollars—

An hon. MEMBER: Billions.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Then I suggest to him and the country that there has been default on the part of the crown in over-purchasing, in over-building and in over-supplying.

My understanding of the purpose of the Department of Munitions and Supply was that it was to be the one channel through which all requisitions for supplies from any of the spending departments were to be filled. I think that that principle is a sound one. It would never do to have government departments competing with each other for the purchase of similar classes of goods, or different classes of goods for that matter. Therefore I approved the principle of having one department set up to be responsible for the purchase of all supplies required for the great national effort of the country. There would be, I thought, coordination under that system, and there was a prospect, I hoped, of getting value for the money expended. But the weakness of the system as it developed was that the Department of Munitions and Supply has never had anything to say, or at least never assumed any jurisdiction, as to whether or not a given quantity of this, that and the other thing was actually required. I believe that is borne out by the position which now confronts the minister, when he finds that he has on hand, not hundreds of millions of dollars' worth of goods, as I suggested, but, as I heard interjected, billions of dollars of surplus assets.

It must be remembered that all these goods have been purchased with funds obtained from two sources, either from heavy taxation imposed on the people of Canada, or from the heavy loans, amounting to six and a half billion dollars, which the Canadian people have contributed to finance the war effort of the nation. If it is now revealed that there are surplus assets which are not required to the tune of billions of dollars, then someone is in default.

An hon. MEMBER: Not at all.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I am not setting up a straw man. I am proceeding on the basis of what I understand to be the facts. I may be exaggerating when I say billions of dollars, because I can scarcely bring myself to believe that there are surplus assets to that amount.

An hon. MEMBER: Large capital expenditures.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Capital expenditures are in an entirely different category. I have never complained of the expenditure of large sums of money by way of capital expenditure for the building of war plants, because we did not have the plants and they had to be established if there was to be production. The only complaint I ever made in that regard, and the minister I am sure will bear me out, was as to the allocation of some of the plants. We in the eastern part of Canada and in other parts have been denied them. But that is water over the dam. That is not the immediate subject of investigation. Apparently this thing got out of hand to the extent of hundreds of millions of dollars. The minister ought to give a full and frank explanation of the why and wherefore of that. I have heard that there were astonishing surpluses of some things. One day I happened to mention here in the house to the Minister of National Defence that I had heard of a surplus of 300,000 greatcoats. He questioned that severely, but he never gave me the figures of what the surplus was.

Mr. RALSTON: There was no surplus at all. There are in the army about 450,000 men, which makes it less than one additional greatcoat for each man in the army.

[Mr. R. B. Hanson.]

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): The minister admits that there was on hand a supply—

Mr. RALSTON: A supply, but that is quite different from a surplus.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): —of 300,000 greatcoats—and how many more? I have heard that there was on hand a surplus—I am going to call it that—of literally thousands of dozens of tooth brushes, which we should know something about. Before this bill gets its second reading, and certainly if the minister cannot do it then he should do it when the bill comes into committee, the house and the country is entitled to have from the minister a detailed accounting to enable the public to determine whether value has been obtained for the money expended in days gone by.

We have had this question up before the house on more than one occasion, and the minister told us with a good deal of pride of what had been accomplished in the way of production. I think he is entitled to some degree of pride in the production of this country, and I am going to give him that credit. But he has never told us about the headaches which they have suffered in that department of his and of the losses that have been sustained—I shall not say by any improper intent, because I do not mean that at all, but by lack of foresight, by lack of coordinating ability to determine what actually should have been done in a given case. There must have been many of these cases. I referred on a previous occasion to one of them. I am not going to refer to others that have come to my attention. But I do think that the minister ought to give us some information with respect to the huge volumes of money that have been spent in connection with these war expenditures and should indicate whether the country has got value for them or not.

Having read this bill, I have come to the conclusion that there must have been something in the order in council setting up the allocations committee, and in the letters patent creating the corporation, which was set up months ago and is now to be superseded by the corporation established by this bill—I come to the conclusion, I say, that there must have been something lacking, or something which in the opinion of the minister and his advisers ought to be in this bill. I find on reading the bill that this corporation and this committee is merely an instrument of the minister himself, that he is a dictator under this bill. There is nothing that this committee can do, or refrain from doing, there is nothing that this corporation can do or refrain from doing, unless it has the imprimatur of the minister. That constitutes him the sovereign controller over the allocations committee and the corporation. Why was there any necessity at all for a committee?

Certainly we are not given much information with respect to this bill in the explanatory note which will be found opposite page 1. The bill starts out by saying that the several clauses contained in it are self-explanatory. I deny that statement. Of course, that is very general. The bill proposes, according to this note, to confer authority upon the corporation to be established thereunder, to sell, exchange or otherwise dispose of, hold, manage, recondition or otherwise deal with surplus crown assets and—this is the kernel, the reason for the bill—to confer certain powers upon the Minister of Munitions and Supply and the governor in council in relation thereto, including the power to establish an advisory committee.

Why the necessity of this crown corporation and advisory committee? The corporation is to be headed by Mr. Carswell, of whom everybody speaks well. I have not heard any criticism at all. The general manager of the company is a man who is well known, a man of managerial ability, who is being lent to or drafted into the organization, and who has had experience in merchandising and so forth. There is no criticism at all. A board of directors has been submitted, I believe, and approved by the ministry, the names of some of whom are well known to me and to most Canadians, and some of whom are perhaps not so very well known. I offer no criticism of the personnel of the corporation. If left alone I think they will do pretty good work. But what I am afraid of is that with the pressure, the political pressure—I might as well say at once what is in my mind—which is bound to be exerted on the minister just in the forefront of an election, this corporation will not be free from the pressure of the minister. Why is it necessary to have an allocations committee at all, unless it be for the mere purposes of assembling the information from the different departments? I can understand that that would be a profitable service and perhaps one which ought to be rendered.

I have grave fears about the working out of this committee, and I wish to devote a few minutes' attention to that. It is all related to the problem of the transition period between war-time industrial production and peace-time needs.

Certain broad principles ought to be laid down here by those in authority and be the subject of discussion, and be not only a guide to this corporation as to what they shall do with these surplus assets, but, may I suggest, and very properly so, a guide to private industry and as a method of control over this government agency.

The first thing I suggest to the minister is this, that through the agency of the committee, or by whatever other agency may be established, there should be an early inventory of accumulated stocks of materials. We ought to know exactly where we stand. The country should know—and there should not be anything secret about it—what are the accumulated surplus stocks of material on hand and what they cost.

There should be laid down as a second principle in relation to war-time production the reduction of production where all danger of shortage is past. We in this house do not know what the situation is, but I suggest to the minister, with respect, that he ought to provide parliament with a statement as to whether there is now any longer any danger of shortage.

The third principle I suggest is the cancellation or reduction of war contracts where it is evident that supply is ahead of anticipated demand and—this is for the benefit of the Minister of Labour (Mr. Mitchell)—the diversion of man-power to industries where there is still pressing demand.

I see the minister has announced over the radio and in the press that there is to be a searching inquiry into the man-power situation, which has now reached an acute stage, and I can well understand that. But—this is by way of digression—he omitted in his statement to take into consideration the thousands of draft-dodgers in this country.

Mr. MITCHELL: There are not thousands of draft-dodgers in this country.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): There are draft-dodgers by the thousand in this country, and I will give an instance of this. I am coming to it and if he wants details I will give them to him privately.

Mr. SPEAKER: Order. May I call the hon. member's attention to the fact, as to the relevancy of the argument—

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): It is only a sentence or two, but if Your Honour thinks I am out of order I will not pursue it. I will give it privately to the minister. What I have in mind in dealing with this question of man-power, which is relevant—

Mr. MITCHELL: If my hon. friend does not know, he should know that there are not thousands of draft-dodgers in this country.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): There is a lost legion, and I can tell the minister where some of them are.

Mr. MITCHELL: There is not a lost legion, either.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Mr. Speaker has ruled me out of order, and I do not want to pursue that.

Mr. MITCHELL: You are not only out of order; you are wrong.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): You are out of order in the first place, and in the second place I am not wrong. You are like the Bourbons; you neither learn anything nor forget anything. You are always right when you are wrong.

Mr. SPEAKER: Order.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I should address the Chair. I apologize to the Chair, but the minister provoked that. I will return to the thesis I was trying to advance in a constructive way.

This question of man-power is important. There should be, and I believe there will be, if Mr. Carswell and his general manager are left alone, a definite policy for handling surplus materials. I am glad to hear the announcement that a convention has been arranged between the two adjoining countries so that there will not be any dumping, one with the other. That is important and I congratulate the minister upon having made that arrangement. But what I am endeavouring to draw his attention to is this. The greatest care should be taken in the disposal of certain of those surplus assets—I refer particularly to tools, machines and the like—so that small plants shall not be crowded out of the picture for the benefit of the large plants. From time to time the Canadian people have allowed a great centralization of industry to grow up, and I believe it is not to the benefit of the body politic that that should have occurred. It has occurred to a much greater degree in the United States than here.

I remember travelling many times through the New England states. I have seen, and I am sure the Minister of Munitions and Supply has seen, because he comes from New England, the situation there. The three northeastern states, Maine, New Hampshire and Vermont, have been practically at a standstill because of the withdrawal from the confines of those states of small industries into the great industrial development of New England. They have been the hinterland of New England in the development of concentrated industry in the states of Massachusetts, Rhode Island, Connecticut and elsewhere. That has not contributed to the development of those three states, and the same thing is true in Canada. I realize, of course, as every thinking man or woman in this country must realize, why it has been so in Canada. Geography has to a large extent been the cause of the centralization of industry in Canada, and it may go on, but an honest attempt at decentralization ought to be made.

One of the things the minister can do—and I offer this to him with the best of good will as a constructive suggestion—is that in the disposition of machinery, in the distribution of equipment in government-owned factories, care should be taken to see that the small economic unit which will be on the market for new tooling and new machines is given an opportunity to buy some of this material. This must be done if they are to survive. Nearly every small industrial unit in this country will have to retool after the war because their machines are worn out after a long period of use without replacement. Then there is the question of obsolescence and the like. I do beseech the minister and his company to see to it that the small plants are not crowded out by the big baron with the ready money who will be able to outbid the other fellow.

Of course it is axiomatic—and I need only mention this general principle to the minister because I believe he is as fully seized of it as I can possibly be, and perhaps more so, since he has had a wider degree of business experience than I have had—that the disposition of surpluses should be made in such a manner and over such a period as to cause the minimum of disturbance to the normal market. If there is anything like a tendency to throw stocks on the market beyond the power of the market to absorb them, there is bound to be great disturbance to the normal business of the country.

The next principle that I suggest to the minister—and it has to do with something that is very near to government policy—is that stocks of materials should be utilized in such a manner as to reduce the danger of inflation. They should not be sold too readily. This principle ought to envisage a wide and equitable system of distribution of materials which have been definitely short for consumer goods because of war priorities. Above all, any attempt to corner the market by huge purchases of goods released from war uses should be prevented. Just imagine what might happen if one of the huge departmental stores in this country could go out and make a bid for one entire class or type of goods that the government have on hand. They would have the market for that class of goods. It should be prevented at all costs.

I am putting my next statement in the form of an interrogatory to the minister. What have the government and the Department of Munitions and Supply done to keep a check on these goods? Has there been integrated throughout in the rapid development of the department and the multiplicity of requisitions that have come from the three war service departments any system of inventory control so that they would know what was on hand at any given time? Has there been any compulsory reporting of supplies on hand from time to time? Is there any danger—I mention this without the idea of making any assertion with regard to it, because I do not know—of the existence of suppressed or hidden surpluses that nobody knows anything about? This has become so huge that it is quite possible there may be large hidden surpluses that the public does not know about. The allocation committee or the corporation itself should make a widespread and intelligent survey of the demand for materials for consumer goods, and wherever possible, owing to the shortage of consumer goods in Canada—I hear it spoken of everywhere I go—there should be an immediate diversion of surplus war stocks to civilian uses. We should not wait until the war is ended, when an unfavourable condition might be created. Of course if the war goes on for any appreciable length of time it is always possible, I suggest, to cancel all such diversions to consumer goods which may be required and return production to war needs.

Above everything else I warn the minister and his set-up—I am using the word "set-up" in no improper or derogatory sense—against sales to promoters or speculators. The minister will find the thrifty, the wide-awake man who will care more about making money than winning the war, ready to purchase these goods, and having in mind the scavengers in this country who are always looking for this sort of thing, he will find the man who will be out to buy these stocks on a speculative basis or promotion schemes. Sales should be made only to those who require such materials as are available or those who are creating plants to use them.

I wish to make another suggestion to the government. All this surplus war material was paid for out of the war appropriation funds. It has mostly, if not all, been added to the debt of the country. The net proceeds of all sales should be used to reduce the national debt. It should not go into current revenue. Any other method of allocating the funds to be derived from this source would be shocking to me. To say that we will take the money that is derived from the borrowings made from the public and put them into the consolidated revenue fund, or make any other disposition of them save and except the reduction of debt, would not be prudent, would not be sound fiscal policy.

If I have time I should like to say a word or two about these war plants. Some have been closed down and reopened. To me that was significant, because it indicated at all events that the war was not quite over as some people seemed to imagine. I am glad that those plants were available for reopening and that they will supply the necessary munitions, let us say, to turn the scale in the last stages of the war.

A day is coming when these war plants will not be required for production purposes in the interests of the government. Of course many of those war plants are ephemeral in their nature; some, I hope, are substantial. Some I should think could be converted to peace-time pursuits. I do suggest to the minister that all these plants are not mere scrap, and any who get that idea into their heads should be disillusioned. These plants cost a great deal of money. They ought to be of great value, particularly their equipment, and they should not be sold at ridiculously low prices. They should be disposed of so that they may perform a useful purpose. I suggest, too, that careful consideration be given by the minister, in making sales of war plants, to the question whether they are adapted to conversion into peace-time industrial plants. There should be some planning in that connection on the part of the administration.

I do not desire to pursue this line of thought any further; I have given the minister some of the ideas that are running through my mind. I hope they may be of a constructive character, and that he will give consideration to them. At the risk, perhaps, of being misunderstood by some hon. members of this house I do suggest that there must be large quantities of surplus goods which would be of inestimable value to some of the occupied countries of Europe in the days that are to come. These goods have been paid for, and these people are destitute. There are those who lack food, clothing and other things. Canada has done much with respect to helping Britain. Canada now is doing something for parts of destitute Europe, and I think consideration might be given to the diversion of some of our surplus supplies from what might be glutted markets to lands overseas where there is to-day a crying need. In that connection the greatest care should be taken to see that these goods are not exploited by any international speculators. Let us take canned goods as an illustration. No doubt large reserve stocks have been built up for the armed services. Canned goods are in very short supply for ordinary consumers; I was at home over the week-end and that fact was brought forcibly to my attention. I suggest that strict control ought to be maintained over these reserve stocks of canned goods so that they may be fed out to the consuming public and not to those who would make a profit by large purchases at small prices. They ought not to be thrown on the market in large quantities, which would bring about the ruin of that portion of the agricultural population of this country which produces these commodities. There are very many pressing civilian needs to-day. Some of them can be met by wise operation on the part of this corporation, to which, as far as I am concerned, I would be prepared to give very substantial authority.

There is one point, however, I should like the minister to justify in connection with these two bodies he is setting up. Why are they subjected to such strict ministerial control? If these men are worthy; if they are good business men; if they are given some guiding principles, then they ought to have freedom from ministerial control and authority which might very quickly degenerate, and I think hon. members will know what I mean. I dislike to see such dictatorial powers as are given in this bill conferred upon any minister in connection with a peace-time activity. It is a delegation of authority we are making here to-day. The minister keeps all this authority in his own hands, and I think he ought to justify that position before this house. Then I believe he ought to tell us in some degree of detail the quantum of surplus goods they have on hand, their nature, variety and kind, and why such a tremendously substantial reserve, in terms of dollars and cents, has been built up. We ought to be assured that the money of the Canadian public has been wisely spent and not wasted, and that there will not be substantial loss. My fear is that because of over-purchases and because of what I believe to be a lack of jurisdiction on the part of the Department of Munitions and Supply to restrict quantities in the requisitions which it receives, there may be the possibility of some loss. It was like the old wartime information board when Mr. Lash was here. Information was fed in to him from a dozen or more departments, but he had no jurisdiction to edit any of it. That was a most unsatisfactory position for a trained publicist like Mr. Lash; he had no jurisdiction. Whether or not this department had the jurisdiction, and I do not think it had, it did not exercise any by cutting down requisitions for what might appear to be inordinately large quantities of supplies. The minister should explain the position to the house before we accept this bill.

Mr. S. H. KNOWLES (Winnipeg North Centre): In listening to the opening remarks of the hon. member for York-Sunbury (Mr. Hanson) I could not help but think what fun it must be to be a cabinet minister. A few months ago, when the Minister of Munitions and Supply (Mr. Howe) set up the War Assets Allocation Committee and War Assets Corporation Limited by order in council, he was roundly condemned by the opposition for proceeding in that way. The opposition said it should have been done by legislation and rightly so. Now, when the minister decides to supersede that action by order in council by bringing in a bill, doing this very thing by legislation, he is again condemned by the opposition.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): That is our privilege, is it not?

Mr. KNOWLES: It is not only our privilege; I think it is a good thing the minister has yielded to the criticism of the opposition on this point and has brought in this legislation so that it can be discussed in the house. But on that point I offer him my congratulations.

With regard to the argument the previous speaker sought to make in criticizing the bill because it placed too much authority in the hands of the minister, I want to say that this is a feature I welcome in the bill. I may be critical of the Minister of Munitions and Supply on many occasions; I may be critical of the government of the day, but I am much more anxious to see the democratically elected government which represents the people of this country control our economic affairs than to have control of those affairs improperly delegated to private business men outside this house and outside the government. So I say that on that point, too, I congratulate the minister; because it seems to me that what he has written into the bill is not some dictatorial powers for himself, but simply the principle of responsible government with respect to our economic affairs.

Having said this, Mr. Speaker, let me turn to the other side of the picture and express some of the criticisms I should like to offer. I confess that those criticisms are directed not so much against the bill as against the policies that I fear may be carried out by the government under its terms. The other evening I was sitting in my office studying this bill, and had decided that of itself it was pretty much to the good. For a little diversion I turned on the small radio set I have in my room and, lo and behold, there came over it a familiar voice. It required only a moment to recognize the voice of my good friend the Minister of Munitions and Supply speaking from Port Arthur. I had been studying his bill, and thinking of all the good things the minister had done for the war effort following the principle of public ownership; then I had to listen to his voice telling me over the radio that after the war is over that principle must be discarded—

Mr. MacNICOL: And in that he is absolutely sound.

Mr. KNOWLES: —and full control given back to private enterprise. An hon. member to my right says, "Hear, hear." But I am sorry the Minister of Munitions and Supply is not prepared in peace time to stick to the principle he has found so necessary to meet the demands of war.

There are two or three points in the bill I would question. Perhaps it would be more appropriate if I were to wait until we reach the committee stage, later in the day, to make those observations. In general there can be no question as to the necessity for setting up some machinery to handle surplus war assets, which inevitably have been accumulated. I do not share the alarm of the previous speaker as to the quantity of supplies on hand. After all, these supplies had to be produced and made available if we were to carry on an all-out war effort. I imagine it is also true that a large portion of the huge figure to which the minister referred the other night would constitute plant and equipment financed by the government. When one realizes that there are huge surpluses valued at perhaps three or four billions of dollars, as stated by the minister last Thursday night, it is obvious that some machinery must be set up to handle them. That in itself is just occasion for parliament's passing such a bill as the one now before the house. The question in my mind however, is as to what policy the government is going to pursue under this measure when it becomes law. Is it to be the first concern of the government to protect the kind of economic system we had before the war, one which gave us the sad story of the thirties; or is the government going to realize that the demands of peace are just as compelling as have been the needs of war? In the house, and throughout the country, that is the basic post-war issue.

I view under two headings the disposal of surplus assets. First of all there is a quantity of movable goods, such as automobiles, clothing and other supplies. Secondly there is the matter of war plants, and crown properties such as the Polymer Corporation Limited and Research Enterprises Limited. In the same category there are certain aircraft factories, and there are many places where the government has part ownership of plants. That applies in respect of some aircraft establishments, and I believe applies also to the plant in Montreal which is to produce penicillin.

It seems to me that the disposal of the movable goods which will be surplus at the end of the war should be dovetailed into a national plan for the maximum production of peacetime goods. I feel that plants such as those to which I have referred, and some others, should be retained and operated by the government as part of a comprehensive national plan for the provision of full and useful employment and a maximum standard of living for our people. In other words, if I may repeat what I said a moment ago, we in this group feel that once the war is over, the needs of our hard-won peace must be faced with the same determination with which the country has faced the demands of war.

I know there are many in the house who insist that private enterprise can do that. When the Minister of Munitions and Supply spoke over the radio the other night he seemed to be suggesting that to the people in his constituency. But I hold in my hand a copy of a publication called Headlines; it is by no means a leftist publication. It is published weekly by the national association of real estate boards with offices at Chicago and Washington, D.C. This issue of May 15, 1944, contains an article dealing with post-war employment. The whole of it would be interesting, but I shall take time to read only one paragraph:

> Who will find them jobs, especially returning soldiers? Private enterprise cannot by itself underwrite an employment programme which can be counted upon. No group of business men can assume responsibility for the entire national economy. We may want the government out of business, but whether we like it or not, mass unemployment is something that the government has to take care of.

Mr. BLACKMORE: And the government cannot do it unless they can sell their goods.

Mr. KNOWLES: In contrast with the statement I have just read, I have noted some interesting quotations in connection with the setting up of War Assets Corporation Limited. In its issue of January 29, Saturday Night made this comment:

> The business community must be gratified that Mr. Howe (Minister of Munitions and Supply) has placed the disposal of surplus war assets in the hands of business men and set them up in trade, not in political and official Ottawa, but in metropolitan Montreal.

The Financial Post of the same date, January 29, quotes an address given just prior to that date by Mr. Carswell, the president of the corporation. This is what he said, in part:

> Since the key job of the corporation is to protect the going economy against impingement of war surpluses, it stands to reason the corporation should never get into competition with industry—which is another way of saying it should not sell direct to the consumer but rather to those whose legitimate business it is to deal with the article concerned and on a basis that, within the corporation's powers, will ensure reasonable profit to dealer and reasonable price to consumer.

I suggest to the Minister of Munitions and Supply that despite what his political or social or economic philosophy may have been when he was called upon to undertake the tremendous tasks of his present position, he took the view that the demands of war had to be met no matter how many readjustments were necessary in the economic set-up in order to fulfil that end. I contend that when peace comes the same attitude is necessary. When we are faced with the need of full and useful employment and the need of maintaining a high standard of living among our people, the primary purpose of a corporation such as the one being set up under this bill should not be simply to protect the going economy against impingement of war surpluses; its key job should be to meet the needs of our people.

There is one other thing that worries me a little, and I shall be quite happy if the minister can set aside my fears. I hold in my hand sessional paper 360 of May 28, 1943, dealing with optional purchase clauses in government agreements with private corporations. I shall read one or two paragraphs from this sessional paper which indicate terms of disposal. The following refers to one of the plants of Defence Industries Limited:

> Defence Industries Limited is to make an offer if it desires to purchase the plant or any part thereof. If an agreement is not reached in sixty days, the government shall have a reasonable period to dispose of the plant to any other party on condition that it must be removed within ninety days from sale. If it is not sold to other party, the government shall remove the plant and level the site, or surrender ownership to the company without payment. The land is to be resold to the company for $1.

There is nothing significant in the last sentence, because I understand that in the first instance the land was bought for one dollar. But the rest of the terms seem to me to suggest that government policy with regard to the possible continued operation of a plant such as that is hamstrung by the authority given to Defence Industries Limited under the terms of the contract. Here is another one with the Electric Reduction Company of Canada Limited:

> The government shall offer the plant to the company at a fair and reasonable price. If not sold to the company within ninety days the company may dismantle the plant and deliver to the government at the plant gate.

That is an interesting way to put it.

> Notwithstanding the foregoing, the company may purchase electrolytic perchlorate cell at a price equivalent to the market value of used platinum therein.

There are several other similar paragraphs in this sessional paper, but I shall not take the time to read them. When the minister speaks either on the second reading or in committee I hope he will refer to the question I have raised in connection with these terms of disposal. My desire is that plants in which public money has been invested for the purpose of meeting the needs of war may continue to be operated by the government to meet the needs of our people in times of peace. My fear is that these terms block the carrying out of such a policy—if perchance we can persuade the government so long as it is in power to carry out such a policy.

This question cannot be handled on a piecemeal or patchwork basis. The house and the government should realize, as probably the government has, that the whole question of disposing of three or four billion dollars' worth of assets is not something isolated that can be handled without regard for the whole economic set-up of the country. When one contemplates the magnitude of these surpluses that are to be disposed of, and thinks of them in terms of trying to fit them into the whole economy of the country, he is brought right up against the necessity of our getting a vision of really rebuilding our economy and remaking Canada once this war is over. It ranges out into the whole question of a tremendous housing programme, the rebuilding of our cities, the seeing to it that there is work for those who come back from overseas and for those whose services in the making of munitions will no longer be necessary. To hope that private enterprise will be able to do that is, I suggest, sheer folly. I have given at least one instance in which a private enterprise journal realized that that is the case. The government looked at the needs of war and realized that they had to be met, and my contention is that the people of Canada will expect that same approach and that same attitude when peace comes.

This is indeed a most important measure. I look upon the bill itself as being in the nature of enabling legislation. It does not indicate just what the government's policy is going to be. Perhaps that is correct in the nature of things. As I said earlier, I welcome the fact that the final say in these matters will be in the hands of the government of the day, that that is not being delegated to private business interests. However, because of the importance of the policy that will be carried out under this bill when it has been passed, I hope that during the discussion the minister will give us some indication of the policy the government will follow. I still hope he will say something a little more encouraging than the remarks I heard from him over the radio the other night.

Mr. J. H. BLACKMORE (Lethbridge): Mr. Speaker, I think the minister is to be congratulated upon introducing this bill at the present time. I believe the majority of the Canadian people will agree that there is a need for such a bill. Certainly it would be inadvisable in the highest degree to allow the situation to run wild, so to speak, when peace is declared. We must take every precaution to see to it that there is a return to as nearly normal as we shall probably be able to get after so colossal a conflict as the one in which we are engaged.

Reading through the bill I find it on the whole quite satisfactory. The principle is sound, as I have said. Before making the few comments upon it that I think it fitting I should make, I probably should revert to the remarks of the hon. member who has just taken his seat (Mr. Knowles), for whom I have a very high degree of respect. As I gathered the general purport of his contribution, it was that since the government had found it so necessary to take over control of industry in large measure during the war, and because of that measure had been able to attain so high a degree of success, it argued automatically that government ownership in peace would solve our problems. I think that some extremely important factors are being overlooked when any such conclusion is drawn.

May I point out to my hon. friend and to those who are disposed to think as he does that in war our primary problem is production. In peace our primary problem in an age of plenty is distribution. Government ownership will enable the government to produce with the greatest success. But government ownership will not enable the government in time of peace to distribute; for distribution depends upon the amount of purchasing power which goes into the hands of the people and the degree to which that purchasing power is spread out among the people so that they can consume the goods which are being produced by industry. That mere fact should give all people who are socialistically inclined in their thinking cause for a good deal of serious reflection. In war time not only is the government obliged to get quantity of production but it must have design, and many times the particular design which the government wants is not a profitable type of production for any industry to be engaged in fabricating. The government must have design, and it must have special quality; it must also have an exceedingly high degree of speed in the production of the items that are being brought into existence, and at the same time there has to be a high degree of secrecy. All these things make it so that government ownership is probably the best producer in this field in time of war.

But in peace time these factors are not nearly so important. There is no need for secrecy. There is no particular need of a high degree of speed unless people are buying goods faster than the goods are being produced, and that is not likely in an age of plenty. There is no particular worry about quality, because if people have the money they will simply leave unpurchased the goods that are unsatisfactory in quality. Quality therefore will take care of itself. If there is a sufficient demand for goods, industry will provide the speed, because the faster they produce the goods the more money they will make. So that those who argue for government ownership in time of peace are falling into error; for all these factors will be taken care of by industry itself. The solution of the problem of distribution is to provide purchasing power for the people. If we can manage to give high enough wages, good jobs, good enough prices for the things which are produced and reasonable prices for the things which people have to buy, pensions and allowances and all that kind of thing which will allow the rank and file of the people to buy abundantly of the goods which industry stands ready to produce, then we shall be successful in distribution, and the ownership of the industries will simply make no difference at all, provided that industry manufactures the goods, which it will, and sells them, which it certainly will.

Having dealt with that matter in some measure, may I turn to certain aspects of the situation which I think it is well to point out to the minister. I remember that when I first came into parliament I received in the mail one day a fine shoe which had been cut all down one side with a razor so that it was impossible to repair it and make it fit for use. The shoe came to me from somewhere in Nova Scotia, and the man who sent it to me wrote an exceedingly indignant note in which he said, "There are literally thousands upon thousands of shoes which have been treated like this and thrown on heaps, while thousands of people in this area need even shoes such as this and are denied the privilege of obtaining them." That kind of wanton waste I am sure the minister wants to put himself in a position to prevent. We certainly do not want anything like waste or sabotage after this war. The people need the goods, either people in our own country or people abroad, and provision must be made for allowing the common people who have been deprived of these good things to get them after the war. Never mind if that will be competing with private industry. Some provision must be made to protect private industry if that is necessary. But the goods simply must not be destroyed.

There is another aspect of this whole matter to which the hon. member for Bow River (Mr. Johnston) referred the other night and which I should like to mention briefly. I think it is in a high degree desirable that provincial governments should have the privilege of buying these war assets in so far as they may desire to do so. I can conceive that great numbers of tractors, trucks and the like might be of much value to the provinces in their public works programmes. They ought to be made available to the provinces at a very reasonable rate, and the country ought to know that that is going to be done. The provinces should be able to buy enough of these assets for a future supply if need be. I use tractors and trucks merely as an illustration.

Again, municipal governments ought to be able to obtain their needs of such equipment and machinery in so far as they may desire to do so. They should certainly have a chance to bid along with the governments of the provinces.

I think that after the last war there was far too much secrecy with respect to the disposal of surplus war material. I speak subject to revision of my opinion after learning more about the situation, but at the moment I fail to see why at the close of the war the government should not publicize in the widest and freest and frankest fashion the exact amount of goods which they have for disposal, telling the people where these goods can be obtained, how they can be obtained, at what prices they can be obtained, so that everybody may know all about them. It seems to me that that would avoid the possibility of the scavengers, to whom the hon. member for York-Sunbury (Mr. Hanson) referred, having a field day. With the radio facilities at the disposal of the government and with newspaper advertising it ought to be an easy matter to conduct a campaign of publicity so that everybody will know all about a thing which is everybody's business.

May I turn for a moment to the degree of control which has been placed in the hands of the minister. I am not a friend of centralized control. I think we have far too much of it. I was sympathetic with the words of the hon. member for York-Sunbury when he advocated decentralization of control. I think that the time has come when the whole country must study means of the decentralization of industry, the decentralization of credit control and of responsibility with respect to everything that pertains to our public wellbeing. So I say that I am not in favour of having too much power centralized in the hands of the minister. Yet in this case I believe it is a good thing. I notice at least four clauses in the bill which give the minister great power. I think, with certain reservations, that that is sound under the circumstances. It is sound because it centralizes executive capacity and is likely to work for greater efficiency in the disposal of this material, which will be a titanic job, I think. Then, it will centre responsibility on one man so that we can get at him and parliament will be able to get control of the situation much better, inasmuch as the minister will have that responsibility. At the same time, I think the minister will agree that there should be provision for establishing checks against his power. I am not saying that this will be necessary in the case of the present minister, but no one knows who the next minister will be and I am sure that the minister as a citizen of Canada would feel much better if this tremendous power were safeguarded with adequate reservations which would reassure the people that such power would be exercised wisely and in the public interest.

I suggest that some such set-up as this might be introduced into the bill. I would not go so far as to suggest that the minister modify the present bill, although, if he saw fit, he might do that; but some such measure as this I do suggest—that each provincial government should be given a considerable amount of influence in controlling the whole policy. The minister would do what members of the government in large measure have done during the war; he would invite into his confidence the representatives of the provinces for advice and counsel and put a certain amount of work on them in carrying out the purposes of the act. If that were done the minister would be in a better position to carry on. If he were to ask each province to appoint a committee to work with the war assets corporation and with him, and if then each provincial government were to ask the main municipalities in the province to appoint committees to work with it, we would have once more an opportunity for the widest measure of publicity and understanding regarding the matter.

I believe that in the days following the war there will be great necessity for maintaining confidence amongst the people. They must not be permitted to get the idea that they are being "sold down the river," or that things which are not in their best interest are being done behind the curtains. I believe that the making of such an arrangement as I have suggested, under which the provinces would work with the central government and the municipalities would work with the provincial government, would serve as a sort of safeguard against undesirable public attitudes regarding the whole matter of the disposal of war assets.

I have said all that I care to say at the present time. Such other observations as I have I will make when the bill is in committee.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time, and the house went into committee thereon, Mr. Bradette in the chair.

Section 1 agreed to.

On section 2—Definitions.

Mr. MacNICOL: I wish to ask a question with regard to subparagraph (i) of paragraph (f), "included in a report made to the minister under section 3". Has the minister had any reports from the hundred and one companies—I am using an arbitrary number—which have been set up in connection with the making of munitions, in regard to stocks and various lines of materials that have not been used and which there is no likelihood of using?

Mr. HOWE: The committee itself is closely in touch with every department of government. Munitions and Supply have a representative on the committee, and it is the duty of that representative to know the situation in every plant in Canada, regardless of whether it is a crown plant or a private concern using government materials, and to watch for surplus inventories. That is done now, and was being done before the corporation was formed. Material was being transferred from one plant to another. The department goes further than most private firms in keeping inventories of all materials. On the termination of contracts the department moves quickly to arrange that surplus raw materials from the contract are removed from the plant and disposed of to other plants. Now surpluses will be reported to the committee, and disposed of through War Assets Corporation. I receive eight or ten recommendations from the committee each day. I understood the hon. member to ask whether there were any reports under section 3.

Mr. MacNICOL: Am I right in assuming that there are large quantities of material the purchase of which was ordered and which are in store in various manufacturing companies—goods that would have been used for making munitions had changes not been made in certain munitions equipment, which changes rendered obsolete large stocks of material?

Mr. HOWE: There are occasions when changes of specification make obsolete certain materials, either semi-manufactured or raw material. It has been the practice throughout the munitions programme to dispose of these surplus materials as rapidly as possible. If they are capable of use for any other purpose they are used for that purpose. If they are not, they are converted to scrap and sold back to the primary producers. That has been going on constantly. Within the last six weeks arrangements have been made to the end that the War Assets Corporation will handle all disposal of scrap, and all rendering back into scrap. Before that, the director of scrap metal, in the organization of the Department of Munitions and Supply, did that work. All surplus material or material rendered obsolete was reported to the director of scrap material, and it was his duty to have it rendered back into scrap and sold to primary producers.

Mr. MacNICOL: I have in mind some first-class material which has been rendered obsolete in certain plants owing to change in the design of munitions they are making, but which could be used in various other plants or to fill civilian requirements. Is someone specifically charged with the duty of salvaging obsolete material instead of scrapping it?

Mr. HOWE: Yes. The director general of production has taken that duty on himself. He has general knowledge of the programme of the department, and he decides whether material of the type the hon. member mentions can be successfully used by another plant. If so, the production schedule is arranged in the other plant to use that material. That work has been going on under careful direction.

Mr. MacNICOL: Or disposed of for civilian requirements.

Mr. HOWE: It can be, yes. We have not been selling material outside the department, except scrap. We have been transferring material from one programme to another, but we have refrained from selling to the public.

The purpose of this bill is to authorize the selling of any surplus material to the public. It is a very serious responsibility to sell government property to the public. Public property is always regarded as in a class by itself, and any wrongful disposal of it is regarded as much more serious than ordinary mishandling of materials; therefore, great care has been taken to safeguard the sale of such material.

At the present time all surpluses of the type that were previously handled by transferring from one contract to another will be reported first to the committee, and by the committee to the minister, and then transferred to the Crown Assets Corporation for expert disposal which the machinery of that corporation can apply.

Mr. SHAW: What type of inspection is carried on to determine what shall be scrapped and what shall not be scrapped? I had a very disturbing report from a responsible individual employed in a government-owned plant operated by a private company. I would not care to mention either the individual or the company at the moment but I can do so to the minister. This individual reported that in a great many instances machine parts which could have been readily repaired were relegated to the scrap heap and sold as scrap. I should like to know just what type of inspection is utilized to guard against a condition of that kind developing, provided that the condition does exist?

Mr. HOWE: The acceptance of war material is in the hands of the United Kingdom and Canada inspection board. The rejections by the board become, of course, the property of the contractor. I cannot imagine what a contractor could gain by putting rejected parts into scrap if they could be reworked and put into finished work. I cannot think of any contract where such action would not work to the detriment of the manufacturer.

Mr. SHAW: I was not speaking of parts delivered from the factory where they are manufactured, but rather of parts that had become damaged as a consequence of use and discarded when they could be repaired. That was the nature of the complaint. As an example, let us take a part which has been damaged—this individual mentioned that case—and which could have been repaired without much difficulty. Instead of that he contended it was thrown on to the scrap heap and a new part used in its place.

Mr. HOWE: My hon. friend is talking of a machine tool?

Mr. SHAW: I am not talking of a plant engaged in the repair of machine tools.

[Mr. Howe.]

Mr. HOWE: Is my hon. friend talking about a part of a machine tool?

Mr. SHAW: Part of a machine, yes. My question is: What type of inspection is carried out to guarantee that what is called scrap is actually scrap?

Mr. HOWE: That problem has engaged the attention of the department. We have a company called Cutting Tools and Gauges. The purpose of the company is to take worn parts of machines or damaged parts of machines into the plant, recut them or refabricate them and send them back for further use. The controller of machine tools has a staff constantly circulating among factories investigating breakages and uses of cutting tools. Great savings have been effected by the Cutting Tools and Gauges Corporation. As regards the salvage of cutting tools alone—at least those that would have been discarded in the ordinary process—through the work of this company in refabricating them and shipping them back as good as new, estimated savings to the government now amount to between two or three million dollars. I can assure the hon. gentleman that the point in question is not being overlooked. I cannot say that occasional cases of wastage do not occur; but every possible precaution is being taken to see that wastage is kept to a minimum.

Mr. FRASER (Peterborough West): Will the board set a definite price on each article?

Mr. HOWE: Yes.

Mr. FRASER (Peterborough West): There will be no tenders called; there will be a definite price?

Mr. HOWE: That is right.

Mr. FRASER (Peterborough West): Will the different articles for sale be advertised in the papers, or will there be a definite list sent out?

Mr. HOWE: It is difficult to answer that question; it depends on the article. For instance, the method of disposing of an over-age destroyer or an over-age corvette may be different from that of disposing of a number of kitchen utensils. I do not think I can make any general statement. The purpose will be to sell the goods as directly as possible from the government to the ultimate consumer. As a matter of practical administration there may be commissions given to a group of dealers, but there would be no outright sale to dealers for re-sale at any price the dealer likes to charge to the ultimate consumer. The purpose is to work directly from the government to the ultimate consumer.

Mr. FRASER (Peterborough West): What I had in mind was that some garage men may want machine tools after the war is over. I wondered if they would have any knowledge that the machines they require may be for sale?

Mr. HOWE: Machine tools are listed. They are in a class by themselves. The disposition of them is an important problem, because the government's purchases amounted to about $100,000,000. Definite scales of prices have been placed on used machine tools, depending on the age of the tool and the hours of use to which it has been put. The same scale of depreciation is applied as is allowed by our income tax department on machine tools used in a factory. The price is definite, depending on the history of the tool. These tools are listed as they become surplus and the lists are widely circulated. Small plants are given preference. One condition of sale is that if the plant is being sold to replace an old tool then the old tool must be rendered into scrap and disposed of. The purpose of selling machine tools is to improve the equipment of small plants first of all and not to put a lot of obsolete and inferior tools on the market in consequence.

Mr. FRASER (Peterborough West): Some of those tools have been imported from the United States and other countries?

Mr. HOWE: That is right.

Mr. FRASER (Peterborough West): Duties have been paid and perhaps refunded. When they are sold by the government will they be sold duty free? The purchaser will not be asked to pay the duty?

Mr. HOWE: In pricing the article, the question of duty, whether paid or not, will be taken into account, and the article will be priced accordingly. But by arrangement with the income tax department, it has been decided that the price of the article will take care of the duty; and since all the funds recovered from the sale go to the receiver general of Canada in any event, the tools will not be subject to further duty if sold by War Assets Corporation Limited.

Mr. STIRLING: The minister did not speak on the second reading of the bill, but I hope he will take an opportunity to reply to some of the points raised in the speeches that have been delivered. I remember that the hon. member for York-Sunbury referred to the short life of War Assets Corporation Limited, and he wondered what the main reasons were, why that method was changed to this one based on legislation. Perhaps it might be appropriate under this section for the minister to give us some description of what has been accomplished in the seven months during which War Assets Corporation Limited has been in existence, what it has handled, what it has disposed of, the methods it has used and whether those methods will be continued under this corporation.

Mr. HOWE: In the order in council setting up War Assets Corporation Limited it was stated that a bill would be presented at the next session of parliament providing legislation to replace the order in council. The purpose of the legislation is, first, that the principle involved may be discussed in this parliament. As I said before, the sale of government property is a serious matter, and I believe hon. members should be made well aware of the procedure. I think it was stated in Bernard Baruch's report that the disposal of government property should be conducted in a gold-fish bowl; that it should be open to public view, and that will be the procedure of War Assets Corporation Limited. Another reason, this is a continuing job. The powers of the government under the War Measures Act will expire shortly after the war ends, but the work of disposal will continue for a long period thereafter. An act of parliament is desirable to provide continuity.

It was suggested by the hon. member for York-Sunbury that great surpluses are now available for disposal. Of course that is not the case. It was thought desirable to provide the machinery for disposal while the problem was on a small scale, and to build up an organization to cope with the larger problem whenever it might confront the government. I mentioned the amount of $3,000,000,000. I arrived at that figure having regard to the fact that my department has purchased about $10,000,000,000 of munitions and supplies, and I estimated that perhaps one-third of this would be subject to disposal at the end of hostilities. Many of these munitions may be outside Canada, in the United Kingdom, on the continent or in other allied countries. Mutual Aid material is subject to recall after the war, if it has any value. We have ships around the world, being operated by various people, and these will be subject to recall. We have warships, not all of which will be required for our peace-time navy, and that will become a problem of disposal. We have guns and other weapons used by the armed forces, and a wide variety of other supplies. To give hon. members an idea of one problem, this country has produced over six hundred thousand automotive vehicles. Many of these will not return, but a considerable proportion will be brought back, and that will be one great problem which will have to be faced by the War Assets Corporation. That corporation is charged with keeping in mind that it is disposing of the property of all the people of Canada, and its first duty is to see that the material is distributed in such a way that all the people will share in any benefit that may accrue to our economy through the sale of this used government material.

Mr. STIRLING: What has the corporation accomplished so far?

Mr. HOWE: The real work of the corporation started about two months ago, and to date the net proceeds of sales have been as follows:

Aircraft	$69,100
Automotive equipment	18,361
Machine tools	23,809
Scrap metal	17,580
Miscellaneous scrap	1,007
Sundry small sales	1,890

Those were sales by the corporation directly.

Mr. STIRLING: Directly to consumers, does the minister know?

Mr. HOWE: Yes, directly to consumers. Then the scrap and salvage division, which has been under the direction of the corporation for the past month, sold $88,000 worth of scrap, while another agency of the department, which is also being transferred to the corporation, disposed of $132,000 worth of scrap. So that in the past six weeks the business of the corporation has netted the treasury some $350,000.

Mr. MacNICOL: At reasonable prices?

Mr. HOWE: Yes, I would think so.

Mr. JACKMAN: Could the minister give the original cost to the government of the assets from which $35,000 were realized?

Mr. HOWE: No, I have not that information. A considerable part of the total is represented by aircraft, and my hon. friend will realize that the recovery price on trainer aircraft that have been used in the air training programme bears very little relation to cost. I believe that the aircraft in question were made in Canada at a cost of $6,000 or $7,000 each and were sold to Mexico for about $1,400 or $1,500, as is and where is. In the meantime their useful life in the air training plan had been exhausted, so that I would consider that a very good recovery.

Mr. JOHNSTON (Bow River): How many motorcycles have been disposed of already? While I am on my feet I should like to ask the minister what method of identification is used in connection with government-owned property. I have in mind such machines as lathes. I am not blaming the minister for this; I am just drawing it to his attention. I recall having visited some aircraft and shipbuilding factories, and I was told that the only government identification was a number painted on the machine. To remove that number would require only a little gasoline or something of the kind. For their own protection I should think the government would have some metal stamp on each machine, so that in days to come, after this disposal is completed, no one may be accused of possessing property to which he has no right. If the government had a permanent identification mark a check could be made, which would eliminate the possibility of anyone getting possession of government property to which he was not entitled. I refer to motorcycles, because not long ago I was told by certain people, who I thought were in a position to know, that quite a number of motorcycles in good condition had been sold for very small sums. I remember that in one case $250 was mentioned. I was surprised, because I did not know that there had been permission given to sell the motorcycles. I was in doubt as to whether the government had gone so far as to sell them. Apparently, however, this Indian motorcycle with sidecar was sold for $250, a reasonable price for anyone to have to pay.

Mr. HOWE: The hon. member has spoken about the identification of machine tools. He will be aware that it is difficult to steal a motor car and then to camouflage it in such a way that the ownership cannot be ascertained. Machine tools are just as well protected. I think the hon. member could assure anyone who has a government machine tool that it would be only a matter of time when the owner thereof would catch up with him. Careful registration is kept of every machine tool. There are several identification marks, including the name of the manufacturer, on each tool. The government will not hesitate to prosecute for theft anyone who illegally possesses any unit of crown property. We have had one or two cases of theft, and in those instances have prosecuted and recovered. That will be our policy, and it is one which I believe is generally known. I would be surprised if there is any wholesale illegal transfer of crown assets. Then, so far as motorcycles are concerned, I believe the only motorcycles handled by the committee have been transferred from the army, through mutual aid, to Russia. I know of no sale to the general public. I must point out, however, that there was in existence an army disposal board, before the corporation was formed, and it is possible that that board sold motorcycles to the public. If so, I have no knowledge of it.

Mr. KNOWLES: When I questioned the minister the other night I understood him to say that property, as defined, includes crown plants, as well as other kinds of equipment. In the event—and the minister knows I hope this will not happen—of the decision being made to dispose of a crown plant, what course would be followed? I understand that most of these crown plants are held in the name of the Minister of Munitions and Supply. Does that mean that he would report to the committee and that committee would report back to him, or what procedure would be followed?

In that same connection, would the minister give some indication as to what would happen in connection with plants where expansions have been made, with government financial assistance, and where the plant managers tell us there is no clear line of demarcation between privately-owned and government-owned property.

Then, will the settlement of terms of disposal, such as I read a while ago from a sessional paper, No. 360, come under the jurisdiction of the machinery we are now setting up?

Mr. HOWE: The machinery for the disposal of crown plants is that the department responsible for the plant declares it surplus to the requirements of that department. This is reported to the board, and the board examines the situation to see whether any other department of government can utilize the plant in question. If not, recommendation is made to the minister with respect to disposal. That is, if no use can be found for it for government purposes, a recommendation goes to the minister that it be turned over to War Assets Corporation, as surplus crown property. The minister, in turn, would receive the report and, after consideration, make a recommendation to council. It will be remembered that every decision involving values over $15,000 must be reported to the governor in council. If council decides that the plant in question should be disposed of, such plant would be turned over to War Assets Corporation for disposal.

My hon. friend suggests that every plant owned by the government should be operated by the government. The leader of the Social Credit party said, very properly, that in war time the problem is one of manufacturing, while in peace time it is one of disposal of output. He suggested that if there were plenty of money in the hands of consumers there would be no problem of that kind. I can assure him that the problem would still be there, because Canada is capable of producing almost anything in quantities far in excess of the ability of her own population to consume. Our exports always represent a very considerable part of our annual production.

I believe there are certain plants which the government could operate to advantage; but there are a great many plants the government could not possibly operate in competition with private industry. When those plants become surplus to government requirements, the option will be either that the plants be closed or that they be put into hands which can operate them successfully. The decision is, as I say, first in the hands of the committee, and then in the hands of the minister. The matter is then considered by council and, if disposal is decided upon, the actual disposition will be handled by the corporation.

The hon. member has referred to certain types of construction where the method of disposal is specified in contracts. The situation is not as serious as he believes. It arises where a special war munition or a product required for war munitions can be built much more cheaply as part of an existing plant turning out a commercial product. The option usually is to spend a fairly small amount of money in building a publicly owned addition to a privately owned plant, or spending a large amount of money in duplicating the privately owned plant, and adding to it a unit required for war production.

The hon. member referred to one plant which I recognized as Defence Industries Limited. That was a case where the raw material in question was chlorine. A plant to manufacture chlorine is expensive to build. While I forget the product to which the hon. member refers—although I recognized it at the time—I remember it was a product used wholly for war explosives. The best way of obtaining it seemed to be that of building a unit inside the plant of D.I.L. The unit built by the government had no relation to the private business of D.I.L.; it was not a commercial product. Therefore D.I.L. had a perfect right to say, "This may be all very well for the war, but the material you are making will not be used after the war, and we want that unit removed from our works. It does not fit in with an integrated chlorine plant." A proviso was made to the effect that D.I.L. would make us an offer for the unit, with such conversion as might be possible. If we were not satisfied with the offer we could then sell the unit where we liked, and under that condition remove it from the property. That type of transaction has been made only when it was the cheapest way to provide the particular war material. I am satisfied, and

I think the committee will agree, that the procedure taken was the cheapest way for the government to achieve the required result.

Mr. KNOWLES: In the case the minister has just described I take it that the War Assets Corporation would not have anything to do with arriving at the price; that would be determined already by the terms of the contract?

Mr. HOWE: Oh, no, the contract would be transferred to Surplus Assets Corporation, and the experts of that corporation would decide whether it would be better to accept the price offered by Defence Industries Limited, whether the plant should be offered elsewhere or whether it should be torn down and sold as scrap.

Mr. MATTHEWS: Mr. Chairman, I was sorry to be out of the chamber when the hon. member for York-Sunbury was speaking, but with most of the arguments I heard and with the suggestions offered by others who followed him I readily agree. I am not going to discuss the question of war plants because I shall leave that to those who know more about it than I, but I should like to say a word with regard to training centres and other places where there is not much in the way of equipment but where there are many buildings.

Farmers all over this country have been in dire need of lumber for several years. Their buildings have gone into disrepair and are becoming worse every month. They have accepted all this in good spirit because of the war. I suggest that in the disposal of buildings at the training centres the farmers should have preference in every possible case. I do not think any jobbery or speculation should be permitted in the disposal of these buildings; if possible, they should be sold direct to the consumer; that is, to the farmer. Just how this is to be done is perhaps outside my knowledge, but I wonder if a selling agent could not be posted at each of these centres to have control of the sale of the building. He could deal direct with the individual where possible, or perhaps auctions could be held. But in any event, the sale should be direct to the consumer and the farmer should not be asked to pay tribute to any other firm or dealer. I urge this suggestion upon the department.

Mr. HOWE: The hon. member has described the exact method contemplated for disposing of that type of equipment by Surplus Crown Assets Corporation. Very few buildings have been turned over to the corporation, but the machinery is such that sales will be made on the ground to users in the vicinity, who can get greatest value from the salvage.

Mr. JACKMAN: This new corporation will not be confined to war assets; I take it that it will handle all surplus property?

Mr. HOWE: Of the government.

Mr. JACKMAN: And also that it will be continuing in its nature. That is to say, it will not have to do only with surpluses that arise after the armistice is signed; it will continue to operate indefinitely as long as there is any use for it. I take it that the minister or his department will be the chief provider of information, although there will be some obtained from the various defence departments.

Mr. HOWE: Each member represents a department which is likely to have material for disposal. In the long run the Department of Munitions and Supply will perhaps be the smallest source of material. At the moment we are perhaps the principal source. The termination of contracts is a function of the department, but any scrap or salvage arising out of the termination of contracts will be for disposal by Surplus Crown Assets Corporation. The departments of national defence will ultimately be the largest sources of material to be handled by the corporation.

Mr. JACKMAN: What about goods still in process of manufacture under contracts with munitions and supply? Is this section broad enough to cover material in process?

Mr. HOWE: Yes.

Mr. JACKMAN: I notice that the report must be made to the minister, but there is nothing to say that the minister must report to Surplus Crown Assets Corporation. I presume it would be automatic, but we may find ourselves in the position where a minister receives a report which he does not care to pass on to Surplus Crown Assets Corporation. Why should that not be provided against?

Mr. HOWE: Is the minister to be allowed no discretion?

Mr. JACKMAN: I am just wondering whether all surplus assets should not be made known to Surplus Crown Assets Corporation. As one hon. member has said, we may have a different minister.

Mr. HOWE: Surplus Crown Assets Corporation is represented on the committee by the president. The committee may recommend that assets be declared surplus, but the government may know of reasons why it does not wish to declare those assets surplus. It may be a matter of government policy.

Mr. JACKMAN: Unless the minister felt it wise to pass the information on, the committee might not know. There is nothing in this section which makes it mandatory upon the minister to pass on that information which is given to him by the various departments. I should think the minister would have no objection to giving the information filed with him to Surplus Crown Assets Corporation.

Mr. HOWE: In theory it is given to the minister; in practice it is given to the committee.

Mr. JACKMAN: As long as the minister is satisfied. I do not see anything in the bill which would relieve the minds of those in business which might compete with products declared to be surplus. Business should know whether these surplus assets are to be held off the market or whether they are to overhang the market for some indefinite time until the government or Surplus Crown Assets Corporation decides to dispose of them. For instance, there might be thousands of yards of duck and business might not know just when the ultimate disposal would be made. That material would be overhanging the market and would have a depressing effect on trade.

Mr. HOWE: The only protection the businessman can have is the calibre of the management of Surplus Crown Assets Corporation. The business of the corporation is not solely to protect trade; it is to recover government money, and to distribute the goods turned over to it to the best interest of all the people. It must combine all three interests in a reasonable way. It has power to hold or reconvert and operate as well as to sell. The matter of disposal requires the broadest judgment of almost any problem. My hon. friend will know that after the last war, material was sold by auction, and much of it got into the hands of speculators and second-hand dealers, with a tremendously destructive effect on industry and without any real benefit to the crown or to the public. We believe that the machinery now established will bring to bear on the problem the best judgment that can be found. The purpose will be to bring about a balance between the various interests that must be considered.

Mr. JACKMAN: What is the fundamental philosophy behind this bill. A short while ago the minister said that in Canada we can produce far more than we require and that therefore we have to export a great deal. Now he is saying that the chief purpose behind this bill is to get as much out of the surplus assets as possible, whereas many of us will feel that the main thing after the war will be, not to try to salvage what we can out of the surplus material, but to create jobs. That will be in the minister's mind also. So that in relation to the question which I asked before, I should like to know whether industry will find that there will be in some cases huge surpluses of material overhanging the market and awaiting a buyer at the best disposition which can be made of it by a government company, or whether industry will know definitely what the policy of the government is to be in regard to this material. Will prospective buyers know that they cannot get this material below a certain price? Will the government even hold some of these surpluses as strategic materials or something of that kind? It seems to me that we ought to know what is to be the prime essential, whether it is to create jobs or to salvage to the last dollar, because the two may conflict with each other. So that it is well to know what is behind this bill in that regard.

Mr. HOWE: The purpose of the bill is to bring the best balanced judgment that can be had to bear on problems of that kind. My hon. friend would hardly expect me to say now that we would do one thing or another thing as a matter of general policy. Business will be able to discuss its problems with the management and directors of the corporation, just as will public interests. I think business generally believes that the machinery now being established will serve the purpose as well as any that can be devised.

Mr. MacNICOL: If Surplus Crown Assets Corporation follows the policy which the minister outlined a few moments ago in reference to the disposal of crown plants, that policy will create a lot of jobs and I support the minister's policy in that regard exactly 100 per cent. I wholly disagree with the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre. I should like to tell him as one who was through a lot of this following the great war and has seen the results that followed the disposal of government plants and their purchase by private capital just what happened, for instance, in one case. We have to get back to private enterprise just as rapidly as possible, and I hope that this example of the results which followed from the disposal of one government plant after the last war will make some impression on my hon. friend. I have had a lot to do with business, and with big business, and I am afraid my hon. friend has not. The minister spoke of the disposal of plants. Immediately following the last war—I do not just remember what agency was set up for the disposal of crown plants, because it is quite a few years ago now—there was a very large plant on Dufferin street, Toronto, in which aeroplanes had been made. It was a substantial, well-built brick plant, well proportioned, well engineered and well machined in every particular. That plant was disposed of in some way, together with much of the goods and equipment therein. Some private company of investors, as I remember it—I am not just sure of the financial set-up—purchased that big plant, with the result that in a short time perhaps fifteen different new industries started up in that plant. When I say fifteen, that is an arbitrary number; there might have been a few more or a few less. But about fifteen new industries started up in that plant, some of which are perhaps there to-day, and they gave much employment.

The minister is right in his policy of disposal of crown plants, enabling private investors to buy them or in any event to use them and start up scores and scores of new industries. We want all the new business we can get, and there are many, many businesses which are not started simply because they lack the plant in which to start. The plant I have in mind is one I know very well. It was next door to the plant with which I was associated. I saw the results of the disposal of that plant. My hon. friend the member for York South is thoroughly familiar with the plant I am speaking of and with the facts I am presenting to the committee. Ever since the last war a large number of men and women have been engaged in different lines of industry in that old plant. It is old now but it was not old at that time. That is what we want, to get back to private industry as quickly as we can and produce the requirements of the people. It cannot be done economically by government plants, as the minister very well said.

Besides, a large number of these plants have been built along lines which private industry would not follow. It did not make a fig of difference if it took one thousand tons or one hundred tons of coal a week to heat some of these huge government plants, because they were put up for a temporary purpose, and no doubt the cost of heating in many of these plants is excessive. I am not finding fault with the government for that, because the plants were put up for a special purpose, to help win the war. But the cost of heating is excessive in many cases because the buildings are not of brick. Private enterprise, when it puts up a plant, counts upon occupying it for an indefinitely long period of time and figures on the cost of maintenance, heating and so forth. We did that in the business with which I was associated. We put up a substantial plant, because private enterprise always looks to the cost of maintenance and heating, coal to-day being a very large part of the cost of production.

So that I say to my hon. friend the member for Winnipeg North Centre that I do not want him to feel that I am basing my disagreement with him on anything but sound argument and many years of experience. My experience has been that many government plants would not be purchased by private industry. Shell constructed plants, for instance, would not be purchased by private industry because the buildings are not substantial enough. A substantial building might be purchased by private enterprise, just like that big aeroplane plant that I mentioned on Dufferin street, Toronto. That is the kind of thing we want. We want to give more employment, and I know of no place where we can get more jobs more quickly than by getting back to private enterprise as quickly as possible after the war and by the government disposing of substantial plants.

Mr. KNOWLES: Why did private enterprise not do it before the war?

Mr. MacNICOL: Everybody knows the conditions before the war. It would take too long to get into that argument. My hon. friend cannot possibly know about production, about who is going to produce. Every man to his own business. If I stick out a sign with "lawyer" or "doctor" on it, that does not mean that I am a lawyer or that I can practise medicine. Every man to his own business. A man must know what he is talking about.

Mr. NOSEWORTHY: They did not know it in the nineteen-thirties.

Mr. MacNICOL: A man has to know something about a subject he is talking about. If he is engaged in industry all through his lifetime he should know something about production and business; he would know much more than the man who has merely a theoretical knowledge of the subject. I speak from practical experience.

Mr. ROSS (Souris): Where there is surplus equipment in one of the armed services and it is turned over to the corporation and they have a request from another department not directly concerned in the war—I have in mind certain road equipment and equipment that might be used in connection with water conservation projects under the Prairie Farm Assistance Act, and in many other places in the west in connection with experimental or reclamation farms—I suppose application could be made for such equipment under this set-up.

Mr. HOWE: It is one of the duties of the committee.

Mr. ROSS (Souris): I should like to know how a municipal corporation wanting fire-fighting apparatus or road equipment which might be turned over from one of the airports would get into touch with the committee if it wanted to purchase such equipment. I know several municipal units who desire to obtain fire-fighting apparatus and other equipment which they know will become surplus in communities adjacent to their territories. I believe that the government have received resolutions from the automotive trade of the country protesting against the direct sale of jeeps. They suggest that this should be reserved for the normal trade. What would be done in connection with the sale of jeeps? Would they be advertised and sold direct to consumers or through the normal trade? These are questions I had in mind.

Mr. HOWE: As regards the first question of transferring from one government department to another, that is handled by the committee. Interested departments are represented on the committee and are given a first priority in regard to any article being handled by the committee. As regards municipalities, they are given a priority after the provinces. The province is given first priority and the municipality second on any equipment that is likely to be of service to either. The municipalities will be circularized if material of that type is available, and inquiries will be handled as well as possible by the corporation.

Mr. ROSS (Souris): What about the sale of jeeps and surplus automobiles?

Mr. HOWE: My hon. friend is mistaken when he says that representations have been received from the automotive trade. That statement has been published in the newspapers and has been denied by the trade, and certainly no communication has ever reached the department from the trade. The jeep, I may say, is greatly overestimated as a civilian instrument. It is expensive to build and operate, and its tractive qualities are much below those attributed to it by public opinion. It will be disappointing.

Mr. ROSS (Souris): I think the public should know that now.

Mr. HOWE: If all the facts are known, and we are trying to make them known—the national research council are preparing a careful study of the jeep as a civilian vehicle—and if after the facts are disclosed the public still wish to buy jeeps, I have no doubt they will be made available to them.

Mr. STIRLING: With regard to the difficulties of getting away with the theft of government material, has Canada anything comparable witih the broad arrow of the United Kingdom which is placed on everything made and owned there?

Mr. HOWE: Every machine handled has the stamp and painted insignia on it. The Citadel brand and number are stamped in the machine. There are several identifying marks on machine tools.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): What about supplies as distinguished from equipment?

Mr. HOWE: I cannot say, but I should think it would be difficult to steal government property, making a business of such theft, and get away with it.

Section agreed to.

On section 3—departmental reports of surplus property.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Is any running inventory kept? How do the various departments handle the situation? As the minister knows, in a wholesale house they have day-to-day reports of sales and purchases, and running inventories are kept, so that they know exactly what stock is on hand in their warehouses at any given period of time. How does the government handle that sort of thing?

Mr. HOWE: The government has its own central inventory. Everything of a capital nature bought by the government is carried on inventory, billed in when purchased and billed out when disposed of.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): That is capital.

Mr. HOWE: Yes. Machine tools are carried on a central inventory. Machine tools may be lent to the Inglis plant in Toronto and later transferred to General Motors in Oshawa, or to any other plant, but they always appear in a central register, the transfer being recorded. Similar inventories are kept for materials in government-owned plants. Each plant has its own inventory, a record that is carefully checked.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): That is, material?

Mr. HOWE: Yes.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Or is the minister speaking of equipment?

Mr. HOWE: No; raw material. Inventory records are carefully checked. Rules are put out from time to time as to how much inventory can be carried on government account.

For example, in the aeroplane industry inventory is confined to two months' requirement. Various limits are put on various types of production in order that excessive inventories will not be accumulated. I know of no plant where the inventory position cannot be quickly determined either by the records of the plant itself or by those in Ottawa.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): It may be the part of wisdom to have supplies of more than two months. It is in the case of consumer goods. That is very important, because they cannot always be reached. What I have in mind is what I referred to in my remarks on the second reading. Has the government been supplied with any inventories? Has it any over-all picture of surpluses, and will the minister give a break-down of that, so that the country will know the nature, extent and quality of those surplus assets which we shall dispose of? That, after all, is the main reason for the bill.

Mr. HOWE: When my hon. friend was out of the chamber I explained that the surplus—

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I cannot be in two places at once.

Mr. HOWE: I explained that the surplus assets referred to are not at present surpluses, but are rather anticipated surpluses. The surpluses of the present day are comparatively small, arising out of the cancellation of contracts. They are current scrap that is purchased in government-owned plants and a few materials coming back now in the way of used aircraft no longer required, or a few used vehicles. But the problem is not of large proportions. My hon. friend spoke of millions of dollars of surplus. I know of no such surplus, but we do anticipate that a large part of everything made in the war will eventually return to the government as surplus. I suggested, when the hon. member was out of the chamber, that the orders placed by my department at the moment total around $10,000,000,000, and I said I would guess that a third of that material would come back to be handled by the corporation as surplus assets.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): That is what the minister means by anticipated surpluses?

Mr. HOWE: Yes. It will not all come back to Canada. It will be in Britain or France or a good many countries of the world, but the ultimate disposal will be in the hands of the War Assets Corporation.

PRIVATE BILLS

ETHEL SANGSTER MUIR

The house in committee on bill No. 12, for the relief of Ethel Sangster Muir—Mr. Factor—Mr. Bradette in the chair.

Mr. KNOWLES: I wish to take only a minute to register a protest on behalf of the group I represent, in view of the fact that nothing has been done as yet to find some place where these divorce bills can be dealt with other than in the parliament of Canada. This is not a new protest on behalf of our group or other groups and other members of the house. We do not propose to take up any time but I feel the protest should be stated.

Mr. GRAYDON: Since we have come to the end of the list of divorce bills for this evening, may I make this observation. I do not want to repeat what I said on a previous occasion with respect to these bills, but I listened with some interest to the protest of the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre. I do not consider a protest of much use at this stage except to repeat the statement that I made on a previous occasion, namely, that it is not sufficient to say that these bills should not be before the house. I think we must make some concrete suggestion as to how divorce bills should be handled. I think the government might well consider referring these matters to the Exchequer Court of Canada. I suggested that when the debate took place some time ago. I think most hon. members of the committee are pretty well tired of these divorce proceedings. It is a thing that cuts through party lines and it does seem to me that the exchequer court is the place to which people who are entitled to relief may go without infringing upon either the constitutional rights, or any other rights, that the provinces may have. If that were done, parliament would be rid once and for all of this business which comes up periodically and which is not always acceptable to hon. members generally.

THE GENERAL MISSIONARY SOCIETY OF THE GERMAN BAPTIST CHURCHES OF NORTH AMERICA—CHANGE OF NAME

Mrs. CORA T. CASSELMAN (Edmonton East) moved the second reading of bill No. 118, respecting the General Missionary Society of the German Baptist Churches of North America, and to change its name to the North American Baptist General Missionary Society.

Mr. GRAYDON: There was a collection of divorce bills, Mr. Speaker, which went through in the usual way, and I intervened because I did not think this bill should be included with them. I thought it should be dealt with separately.

[Mr. Graydon.]

Mr. SPEAKER: Does the hon. gentleman wish the second reading of this bill moved?

Mr. GRAYDON: Yes.

Motion agreed to and bill read the second time.

UNITED NATIONS MUTUAL AID

APPROPRIATION OF $800,000,000 FOR WAR SUPPLIES TO UNITED NATIONS AND OBLIGATIONS UNDER RELIEF AND REHABILITATION AGREEMENT

Hon. J. L. ILSLEY (Minister of Finance) moved that the house go into committee to consider the following resolution:

That it is expedient to introduce a measure to provide:

1. That sums not exceeding eight hundred million dollars ($800,000,000) be granted to His Majesty for the purpose of making war supplies available to any of the united nations, other than Canada, and of fulfilling any obligations arising out of the united nations relief and rehabilitation agreement;

2. That the governor in council may determine the terms and conditions upon which such war supplies are made available to any of the united nations and may require in certain cases payment or repayment in kind of property or reciprocal action or provision of supplies or other direct or indirect benefit as may be deemed appropriate;

3. That the Canadian mutual aid board be authorized to carry out the purposes of this resolution;

4. That the governor in council be empowered to raise by way of loan under the provisions of the Consolidated Revenue and Audit Act, 1931, such sum or sums of money not exceeding in the whole the sum of eight hundred million dollars ($800,000,000) as may be required for the purpose of defraying the expenditures herein mentioned and for purchasing or otherwise acquiring or procuring war supplies in Canada through the agency of the Minister of Munitions and Supply, the principal and interest of any such loan to be a charge upon and payable out of the consolidated revenue fund.

He said: Mr. Speaker, the essential purpose of this resolution and the bill which will be based on it is simply to extend the scope of the Mutual Aid Act to include the provision of relief supplies to UNRRA and to appropriate $800 million to carry on our mutual aid programme. The borrowing powers which are added are normal provisions of all our war appropriation measures.

Parliament last year overwhelmingly approved the principles of our Mutual Aid programme. Parliament has already this year—with practical unanimity—approved Canada's participation in UNRRA and the principle of using Mutual Aid funds to make this possible. I believe parliament and the vast majority of Canadians approve these principles now more than ever before. The events of the last few days have brought home to all of us the critical nature of the present phase of the war and the vital importance to all our forces of full supplies of the best fighting equipment. Our Mutual Aid programme has helped substantially to arm the British forces that fight side by side with our men in Normandy, in the channel, and in the skies of France. Mutual Aid has been helping to arm the Russian forces whose achievements have made victory possible and kept many Germans from being ready to destroy our forces landing in France. Mutual Aid is helping to rearm the French forces, so that they may fight effectively alongside our men and others—as in Italy—in the liberation of their countrymen whose spirit has stood fast against many terrors during the last four long years. Mutual Aid has been helping the Australians to drive the Japanese back from island to island in the Pacific. Mutual Aid supplies for our long-suffering friends in China have recently arrived in India and will go through to China by air or by land, as soon as that is possible. Mutual Aid supplies are flowing to all the major fronts. They are enabling Canadians working here at home to give the strongest possible support to our men in uniform by strengthening their comrades in arms and thereby contribute most effectively to the speeding of victory.

The essential purposes and principles of Mutual Aid remain as they were determined by this parliament last year, with only the addition that we propose to include in Mutual Aid the provision of essential relief supplies to our liberated allies. These will be contributed through UNRRA, the democratic, international organization that has been created for this purpose.

The general principle of mutual aid is now well established among the united nations. The United States pioneered in the field with the enactment of the lend-lease act even before she entered the war. The lend-lease principle has now become not only a great "weapon for victory," but a household word and a landmark in relations between nations. Britain has applied the lend-lease and mutual aid principle in providing military supplies to various allies requiring aid from her. Australia and New Zealand, while originally on the receiving end of lend-lease, are now providing reverse lend-lease to the United States on a scale which is very large in relation to their population and resources. The acts of our own parliament occupy an honourable place in the evolution of this new and sensible form of inter-allied relationship. Our Mutual Aid programme is an important part of a larger whole.

The main purpose of Mutual Aid is to ensure that Canada's war production—made possible by the bounty of nature, the hard work of our people, and our good fortune in being far from battles and bombs—is used most effectively in the common cause, in accordance with the strategic needs of the war. It is intended to make this most effective use of our production possible without the creation of huge inter-allied debts, which would burden commerce after the war and prejudice a just and enduring peace.

The ways in which these purposes have been accomplished and the principles of Mutual Aid put into practice are made evident in the report of the Mutual Aid board, covering its operations up to March 31 last, which my colleague, the Minister of Munitions and Supply (Mr. Howe), as chairman of the board, has tabled this afternoon. I shall not attempt to recapitulate the detailed information in the report, nor to summarize it, in moving this resolution. I wish to refer to some parts of it, however, in commenting on a few of the major questions that are relevant to our present discussions. The Minister of Munitions and Supply, as chairman of the board, is in charge of the administration of its work and will be able, if necessary, to provide further information to the house.

The Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King), on March 16 of this year, tabled in the house the general Mutual Aid agreements which Canada had entered into with Britain, the Soviet Union and Australia. Later the agreements with China and the French Committee of National Liberation were also tabled. These agreements, which are practically identical in form except for minor adaptations to fit special circumstances in the case of the Soviet Union, set forth the general terms and conditions upon which Mutual Aid supplies are furnished by Canada to her allies. The Prime Minister himself explained the nature and purport of these agreements when he first tabled them, and called attention to several important aspects of them. A copy of the agreement with Britain is appended to the report of the board, and the others are in practically the same terms. This agreement itself is short and quite easily understood. I believe, therefore, that I need not attempt to enter now upon any exposition or explanation of these agreements, or of the terms and conditions upon which Mutual Aid supplies are furnished.

By the time the Mutual Aid Act was finally passed in May of last year, the government had already begun to establish the administrative organization necessary to put it into effect. The board began immediately to work out the new arrangements with other countries which would be necessary as a consequence of its operation. However, it took longer to put the Mutual Air plan into effect than we had expected, because of two essential features of the plan. The first was the principle that we would contribute actual supplies rather than money to the countries receiving aid. The second principle was that we would make arrangements directly rather than indirectly with countries receiving aid. In order to contribute actual supplies, it was necessary for the board to arrange to have these supplies produced and purchased on its direction and for its account, and then to transfer the supplies to the recipient nation. The principal changes required were in the operations of the Department of Munitions and Supply, which had formerly been acting as an agent of the British and other governments, and which now had to become in effect a dealer in war supplies, having them produced at the direction of the board, which took title to them, paid for them on delivery, and then turned them over to the recipient country. To put those new principles into practice it was necessary for the Department of Munitions and Supply to take over the great bulk of all the thousands of war contracts placed by the British government with Canadian producers through the agency of the department in the past. This was a formidable task, involving much legal, administrative and accounting work. The take-over of these British contracts went into effect on September 1. The corresponding date for the take-over of Australian contracts was October 1.

To establish direct arrangements with Russia, China and the French Committee of National Liberation has also taken considerable time. Not only was it necessary to secure details of the supplies required—which it has been difficult for the French to furnish—but it has been necessary for the board and its various administrative officers and agencies to make inquiries and hold many consultations to verify the essentiality of the requirements, the possibilities of supply and of transport, and to avoid duplication with the programmes of Lend-Lease and Mutual Aid supplies being furnished by the United States and Britain. This administrative work and organization of the board, necessary to carry out the purposes and meet the conditions of the act, are described in the report and I need not go into it here. I would like to assure the house, however, that care is taken to ensure continuing consultation not only with the military and supply authorities in Canada, but also with the various combined boards and other international military and civilian agencies concerned with these questions in Washington and London.

War supplies have been furnished as Mutual Aid to Britain, Russia, China, Australia, India, and the French Committee of National Libertion. Detailed information on the actual supplies furnished to these countries up to March 31 is given in the report—particularly on pages 15, 22, 26 and 29. There is no simple way to summarize those many physical items. In the case of Britain they cover the great range of our production of munitions and military equipment, ships, and food and farm products. In the case of Australia they include air training services for Australian airmen, munitions and aircraft supplies, metals, timber, automotive equipment and other items, as well as the services of Canadian ships required to transport supplies to Australia. In the case of Russia, the major items have been metals, explosives, vehicles, repairs and services to merchant ships and in particular wheat flour, to which the Russians have given a high priority. For China the outstanding items are guns and ammunition—both small arms and light artillery—together with the signal equipment and motor transport necessary to complete the artillery batteries. We have also provided Canadian shipping services to deliver these supplies to the Chinese authorities in India. Supplies had only begun to be provided to the French committee by March 31, but at the present time there are substantial shipments ready in depots to be despatched to the French as soon as final shipping instructions are received from them.

The figures for shipments up to March 31 are not representative of the proportions in which supplies are now moving to the various countries. It took longer to arrange Mutual Aid supplies for Russia, China, the French and even Australia, than it did for Britain, and consequently their total share in shipments has been increasing in recent months. Countries other than Britain will, therefore, receive a larger share of the total Mutual Aid supplies this year than last year.

Mutual Aid expenditures have inevitably lagged somewhat behind the shipment of goods, as the board makes payment to the Department of Munitions and Supply only after delivery, and it takes some time for the invoices to come in and for the necessary verification of accounts. Of course, under war conditions the actual shipment of goods is not held up until the accounts are settled. As a consequence, the value of the war supplies furnished up to March 31 is in excess of the expenditures made—particularly in the case of supplies for Russia, Australia and China—and there were, of course, outstanding accounts at March 31 remaining to be paid.

The expenditures up to March 31 out of the Mutual Aid appropriation are shown in the table on page 7 of the report. It will be noted that, when rounded off, the figures are approximately as follows:

Expenditures for war supplies transferred to Britain amounted to 724 million dollars, to Russia 23 million dollars, to Australia 21 million, to China 4 million. Relatively small sums of $874,000 were expended to send essential supplies of flour to the West Indies and $482,000 to send wheat to India, to help relieve the famine which developed there last autumn.

In addition, expenditures for war supplies held by the board in transit or storage and to be transferred in future to recipient countries were 139 million dollars.

Expenditures for administration were approximately 25 thousand dollars.

The total of all the expenditures was approximately 913 million dollars.

Out of the billion dollars provided by the original act, there remained therefore at March 31 approximately 87 million dollars. Most of this was expended during April in meeting commitments previously incurred. Ten million of it had been set aside for UNRRA, in accordance with the authorization of parliament in the UNRRA Act which the house passed on April 21.

Considerable detail is given in the report for the expenditures made for supplies for each of the recipient countries. As it is conveniently available to the house and the press, I will not burden the house with it now. In the case of Britain, it will be noted that expenditures of $555 million on munitions and military supplies are classified under 13 headings, while expenditures of $169 million on farm products and foods are classified under 19 headings. In the case of Britain, estimates are also given of the funds which Britain herself has spent in Canada during the year, which exceed quite substantially in total the Mutual Aid expenditures on supplies for Britain. These figures cannot be given in such detail as those for Mutual Aid expenditures, because we do not have the detailed information. I would also like to emphasize strongly that these figures for British expenditures in Canada and the similar figures for British receipts from Canada are only estimates, subject to a margin of error.

I would like to emphasize clearly that these Mutual Aid shipments are not by any means the only war supplies going to the United Nations from Canada. All the countries receiving Mutual Aid, with the possible exception of China, purchased supplies in Canada during the past year. Those able to pay for substantial amounts of supplies have been making substantial purchases. Some nations have been able to pay for all their requirements in Canada, and as a consequence they have not requested assistance under the Mutual Aid Act. Our sister dominions, South Africa and New Zealand, though obtaining substantial quantities of war supplies from Canada, have not asked to secure any portion of them as Mutual Aid. It is possible that some countries, because of new developments—perhaps because they will need more from Canada or because their ability to purchase will be less—may make application for the first time this year.

The board has followed the policy of providing as Mutual Aid only what the recipient countries were unable to pay for in Canada. As far as a country is able to pay, it buys what it requires. In the case of Britain and, indeed, in the case of all the other nations in the sterling area, their purchases during the year ended March 31 have substantially exceeded the value of supplies provided to them under Mutual Aid.

Mr. GRAYDON: Do we determine which country can pay and which cannot?

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes, we know pretty well.

Figures are given, as I have already indicated, in the report to show how this has worked out in the case of Britain. The table on page 19 shows the estimated payments to Canada by the United Kingdom in the year in question under various headings. It will be noted that payments for munitions and military supplies amounted to 353 million dollars. A further quantity of munitions, as indicated in the footnote to the table, estimated to amount to about 90 million dollars in value, was purchased in effect by Britain through drawing upon the funds which she had previously paid into the munitions production revolving fund, which was used for financing the production of munitions in government-owned plants in Canada. I will not burden the house with the other items in this table, but I would call attention to the fact that Britain purchased from Canada during the year a larger value of foodstuffs than we provided to her under Mutual Aid. I would also point out that metals, lumber and certain other products for Britain were all purchased rather than included in Mutual Aid supplies, mainly because of administrative reasons. It was not considered desirable to extend the Canadian procurement machinery, particularly that of the Department of Munitions and Supply, unnecessarily into the purchase of goods which Britain had previously been obtaining directly from Canadian contractors.

The sources from which Britain derived the funds to make the purchases which I have described and other payments to Canada are shown in the table on page 19 of the report. It will be noted that roughly half of the funds Britain obtained during the year and used in Canada came from payments made in Britain and to the British government by the Canadian forces overseas. These payments, as the hon. members will note if they compare this table with the one given in Hansard last year, were more than double the corresponding payments made in the previous fiscal year. I would expect a further substantial increase in the current year now that our forces are engaged in intensive operations. I should also call attention to two other sources of funds which enabled Britain to purchase supplies in Canada. It will be recalled that last year we undertook to buy out the interest of the British government in Canadian war plants. Part of the transaction took place before April 1, 1943, but 165 million dollars were paid to the British government in the early months of the last fiscal year. There is another and somewhat more complicated group of transactions described in the report as "Cash withdrawals from working capital funds formerly advanced to the Department of Munitions and Supply and contractors". When the Department of Munitions and Supply was acting as the agent of the British government in placing contracts in Canada, the working capital required for the production of supplies for Britain was furnished by the British government, and amounted to quite considerable sums. When, however, the various British contracts were taken over by the Department of Munitions and Supply and became Canadian contracts from which deliveries could be made either to Britain, or to Canadian forces, or to any others of the united nations, the Department of Munitions and Supply took title to all the goods in process and itself provided the working capital funds required to finance the production of the goods in question. The British government was therefore able to use the working capital which it had formerly advanced to make current purchases during the year.

The new element in this year's mutual aid bill, which will be based upon this resolution, is the extension of Mutual Aid to cover Canada's contribution to the united nations relief and rehabilitation administration—or UNRRA, as it is called. The house is already familiar with the nature, purposes and activities of UNRRA, which were discussed in April when the house passed the act approving Canada's participation in UNRRA and ratifying the international agreement by which the organization was established. I do not propose, therefore, to attempt to explain to the house the way in which UNRRA is organized nor any details of its operations or proposed operations. The parliamentary assistant to the President of the Privy Council, who dealt with many of the questions in the earlier debate, will be able to answer further inquiries regarding UNRRA which may come up in discussing this resolution or the bill.

From what has already been said in the house, I think we are all—or nearly all—agreed upon the essential importance of providing aid and relief to our allies, who have suffered so greatly under the occupation of the enemy and from the immediate effects of hostilities in their homelands. We recognize, too, that we in Canada have food and clothing and medical supplies which can be furnished to our liberated allies to help them over the very difficult period before they are once again able to provide for themselves.

It is appropriate to note here certain points concerning the size and nature of Canada's contribution to UNRRA. While some of the countries receiving relief will be able to pay for it in foreign exchange, many will not be able to do so—and what they are able to pay to UNRRA in their own currency will likely be needed in part for local expenses and in any event cannot be converted into dollars, or used to purchase supplies abroad. Consequently it was provided in the agreement establishing UNRRA, which the house has approved:

> In so far as its appropriate constitutional bodies shall authorize, each member government will contribute to the support of the administration in order to accomplish the purposes of article 1, paragraph 2 (a) (i.e., the provision of relief). The amount and character of the contributions of each member government under this provision will be determined from time to time by its appropriate constitutional bodies. All such contributions received by the administration shall be accounted for.

At the first meeting of the council of UNRRA last November, the method of determining the contributions of members was carefully considered and the council made the following recommendation, which was supported by the Canadian delegates who had consulted the government on this matter:

> As to the amount and character of the contribution of each member government, to be determined by its constitutional bodies as provided for in article V of the agreement, the council recommends that each member government whose home territory has not been occupied by the enemy shall make a contribution for participation in the work of the administration, approximately equivalent to one per cent of the national income of the country for the year ending June 30, 1943, as determined by the member government.

The council recognizes that there are cases in which the recommendation above may conflict with particular demands arising from the continuance of the war or may be excessively burdensome because of peculiar situations, and therefore recognize that the amount and character of the contribution recommended is subject to such conditions.

In accordance with this recommendation, we are proposing to make a contribution to UNRRA equal to one per cent of our national income for the twelve months ended June 30, 1943. I have obtained from the dominion bureau of statistics an estimate of our national income—and I would emphasize that it can be only an estimate—for this period, which they have compiled in such a way as to be as comparable as possible with the estimate prepared for the United States by the United States department of commerce, on which the contribution of the United States is to be based. This estimate of our national income turns out to be approximately 7,615 million dollars. Based upon this estimate, we are proposing to make a contribution to UNRRA of 77 million dollars. Already parliament has authorized the government to provide an amount up to ten million dollars from the Mutual Aid appropriation of last year, and the appropriation now being asked under this resolution will enable us to make our total contribution in the figure I have indicated. I should point out to the house that the council of UNRRA has recommended that not less than ten per cent of the amount contributed by each member government shall be in such form of currency as can be expended in areas outside the contributing country, and that the balance shall be in the form of a credit in local currency which will be available for the purchase of the contributing country's supplies and services. Therefore we shall be providing to UNRRA ten per cent of our contribution in a form which UNRRA can transfer into foreign exchange if it so desires.

In extending our Mutual Aid Act to include the provision of relief supplies to our liberated allies we shall be extending the purpose for which supplies are furnished under Mutual Aid to include not only the effective prosecution of the war but also the securing of a just and enduring peace. Already Mutual Aid, as I have shown, has contributed and is contributing to the winning of victory. We can look forward with hope and confidence to the role which Mutual Aid will play, through our contributions to UNRRA, in relieving the human suffering which the war has caused and in helping by constructive measures truly to secure a just and enduring peace.

Motion agreed to and the house went into committee, Mr. Bradette in the chair.

Mr. GRAYDON: What yardstick does the government employ in arriving at the amount of $800,000,000? I take it that the $800,000,000 asked for by this resolution will, of course, be reduced so far as Mutual Aid is concerned by the amount which is included for UNRRA. I was curious to know how the government arrived at this particular figure when on the previous occasion the figure was some $200,000,000 more than that. The UNRRA provision I fancy would run from somewhere between $90,000,000 and $100,000,000, provided that one per cent of the national income was the basis, as the agreement called for, on which this country was making its contribution.

Mr. ILSLEY: Our contribution to UNRRA will be $77,000,000.

Mr. GRAYDON: I have read somewhere that it might reach something like $90,000,000, which would mean, of course, a reduction from the $800,000,000 in the actual amount spent for Mutual Aid. Would the minister enlighten the committee on this point?

Mr. ILSLEY: I cannot give nearly as satisfactory a reply as I should like to. The amount of $800,000,000 was decided upon some months ago, after taking into account a large number of uncertain factors, such as the probable requirements for the next twelve months or thereabouts of Great Britain, Russia and Australia, which are the large recipients of Mutual Aid. Their requirements in Canada may fall off sharply or they may not; they may increase.

Another factor in the situation—I cannot pretend to give all the factors now—is the expenditures which we shall be compelled to make on account of our forces in Great Britain and on the continent of Europe. If those expenses are very great; if they go up to a very considerable extent, then to the extent that they do, that increases the amount required under the War Appropriation Act and reduces the amount required under the Mutual Aid Act. The situation is one of those very uncertain ones where it is impossible to select a figure that will be mathematically or scientifically correct. I think about the best I can say is that we thought at the time we were giving consideration to this, $800,000,000 would be as appropriate a figure as any. There is no doubt that our expenditure will go up owing to the intensive operations of our services overseas and therefore there will be a big drain on our war appropriation, which should relieve our Mutual Aid, but I am not prepared to say that there will not be a gap there. This is not one of the finance department's accurate estimates at all, because no accurate estimate is possible.

Mr. GRAYDON: You would not want to say that it is one of their inaccurate estimates?

Mr. ILSLEY: I have not heard of any of those.

Mr. GRAYDON: I do not think you have.

Mr. KNOWLES: Mr. Chairman, I understand that it is the desire of the minister to introduce to-night the bill based on this resolution, but that he is quite prepared to wait until to-morrow for the second reading.

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes.

Mr. KNOWLES: In that event I shall defer any general remarks that I have to make until that time, but at this stage perhaps this might be said. We believe that Canadians generally are proud of the ability of our country to do the things provided for under this measure. It is true that the measure highlights certain principles to which we shall call attention when the bill is before us, but we are quite prepared to agree to the passing of the resolution now.

Mr. ADAMSON: Who passes on the essentiality of the shipments?

Mr. HOWE: The combined chiefs of staff have that responsibility under the legislation. If it is army material a certificate is given by the chief of staff of the army, and if it is navy material, by the chief of staff of the navy.

Mr. ADAMSON: Does all material, irrespective of whether it is for the United Kingdom or for other of the united nations such as Russia, China, Australia or other dominions, have to pass through the chiefs of staff committee, and is the chiefs of staff committee the Ottawa or the Washington committee?

Mr. HOWE: I am referring to the Ottawa chiefs of staff committee. The Mutual Aid board in Ottawa works very closely with the Lend-Lease administration in Washington, the purpose being to see that shipments to a single country are not duplicated as between our two countries. The shipments are cleared by all interested agencies. There have been occasions when the chiefs of staff committee in Washington has been consulted, as in the case of China; but ordinarily, particularly with respect to theatres where Canadian troops are fighting, essentiality is certified by our own chiefs of staff.

Mr. ADAMSON: The minister mentioned China. Who passes on the essentiality of a shipment to China? Do we have an agreement that the chiefs of staff committee in Washington or Ottawa shall pass upon that? Incidentally, can the minister say if we have made any shipments to China in view of the tremendously upset state of that country since the Japanese advance?

Mr. HOWE: Yes; China is a Mutual Aid country. We have made three shipments altogether. The shipments are made to India with the understanding that the material will be flown into China, and they have met with the approval of Lend-Lease administration in the United States.

Mr. ADAMSON: Is Stettinius the chief?

Mr. HOWE: He was the chief. He is no longer. I am not sure who occupies that position to-day. In any event, we have a joint committee in Washington, composed of men from United States agencies engaged in similar work, who meet with our own committee charged with that responsibility in Washington. The combined chiefs of staff pass on shipments to China, in view of the disturbed situation mentioned by my hon. friend.

Mr. ADAMSON: I am anxious to understand the machinery. Suppose we have a shipment to China or Russia; how does the machinery work? The question is interesting. We co-ordinate our shipments with the Washington committee on Lend-Lease, so that we do not either duplicate or ship too much of one material, and we ship independently of the Washington committee. Is that the procedure?

Mr. HOWE: I hardly understand my hon. friend. After the material has been certified as suitable for shipment; after our own armed forces have agreed that there is strategic necessity for the shipment, and after the Washington committee has found that it is not a duplicate shipment, and that the material is required, it is shipped by Canada.

Mr. HANSELL: This resolution is very similar to those that we have passed in bygone years since the introduction of the Lend-Lease principle has come into our economy, and, of course, particularly in time of war we all desire to aid other countries by supplying them as far as we possibly can with necessary munitions of war and foodstuffs. On that account it seems to me that the measure is admirable. As we have passed the bills in days gone by, and coming now to this resolution, I cannot help thinking that there is involved here a principle which we so often hear opposed, namely, the idea of giving something for nothing. I wish I had thought of this Mutual Aid resolution when talking the matter over with the Minister of Labour the other day when he referred to the principle and said that he had held all his life the belief that one should never give something for nothing. The fact of the matter is that in this $800 million provision what we are actually doing is giving a large part of it away to other countries. Of course, it has to be bought, but it is bought by ourselves through a certain process of lending. As I understand it, in the passing of this resolution, and of the bill which will follow, we are giving the government power to raise by way of loan under the provisions of the Consolidated Revenue and Audit Act an amount in the neighbourhood of $800 million. It means that a very large portion of that will be an expansion of our own credit here and will be a bill chalked up against the Canadian people.

I am not going to oppose that either. As far as I am concerned, perhaps there should be more of it done, because we all recognize that after there is an expansion of credit in our internal economy it is reflected in the prosperity of the people, since the people share in that expansion of credit. It goes into their pockets in one way or another and they are better off. Where the rub comes is that if it is ever to be paid off the people of Canada will have to pay it. If it goes into the debt structure of the country and is handled by a process of refunding, the debt may remain for centuries, and even then the Caandian people will be called upon to foot the bill, so far as interest is concerned.

I hope we shall not hear so much, in connection with any proposals made from this group, about the principle of giving something for nothing, because this is a measure which entertains that principle. It is giving something for nothing to other countries. We could reverse the order, if this country ever found it necessary to do so, and do the same thing, only instead of shipping goods out, we could make them available to our own people.

I am quite conscious of the fact that many of these goods may be regarded as surplus. If we have a very fine crop of wheat this year I do not know whether that commodity will be included, but there is no harm that I can see in giving away goods to these countries that need them. The only thing is that we pay for them here in one way or another. As a matter of fact, when we do something of this kind the country is richer financially though, of course, it is poorer as far as actual wealth goes, because whenever you export you send out real wealth. You may expand your credit and be financially better off, but when you do so there is a corresponding debt.

I would ask the minister a couple of questions. Just what is the meaning and what is the force that he attaches to the word "mutual"? I do not think I have that properly analysed in my own mind. Do I understand that it is a Mutual Aid bill in relation to other countries doing the same thing? If that is so, I would couple another question with that one. I should like to compare anything we are doing with what perhaps the United States is doing, and to know how it works out on a per capita basis, if that is possible. We have twelve million people in Canada who are now offering to supply $800,000,000 worth of goods to other countries. How does that work out on a per capita basis, and what is the United States' share in this Mutual Aid idea? If twelve million people in Canada are responsible for the sending out of the country of $800,000,000 worth of goods and if it is really Mutual Aid, it would appear to me that the United States would have to send a lot more than that. The hon. member for Red Deer reminds me that it would amount to something in the neighbourhood of $8,000,000,000. I should like the minister to answer these questions. I am pleased to concur with others in allowing the first reading of the bill to go through, provided that we discuss it on second reading to-morrow. That will give us an opportunity to read, analyse and digest the statement made by the minister and the report which was tabled to-day.

Mr. ILSLEY: It would appear to me that the use of the word "mutual" is justified in two ways. In the first place, assuming that nothing was to be returned in a material way, I would consider that if this country contributed $100,000,000 worth of supplies to the Soviet Union, and the Soviet Union carried on a joint and effective prosecution of the war, we would be aided by the Soviet Union and we would be aiding the Soviet Union. Therefore I think aid is mutual. It will be remembered that the carrying on of the joint and effective prosecution of the war by a recipient of Mutual Aid was to be regarded as sufficient consideration for the furnishing of the aid, and therefore mutuality is established. But mutuality may be established in another way. I think that will be apparent from the agreement which is found in the appendix to the report of the Canadian Mutual Aid board, which was tabled this afternoon. The recipient undertakes certain obligations in respect of the supplies and in respect of the attitude, and I was going to say policy which he will follow.

Mr. HANSELL: That will be explained in the report?

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes.

Mr. HANSELL: I shall read it over.

Mr. ILSLEY: That would be my explanation of the word "mutual". It is used in two senses, both of which justifies its use. The amount of total Lend-Lease aid by the United States of America from March, 1941, to March 31, 1944, is $24,224,806,000.

Mr. STIRLING: To all countries?

Mr. ILSLEY: To all countries, yes.

Mr. STIRLING: If I understand page 19 of the report aright, it is an attempt to balance what Canada supplies the United Kingdom against what the United Kingdom supplies to Canada. That is right, is it not?

Mr. HOWE: Britain pays all it can for its procurement in Canada. Mutual Aid is intended to take care of the remainder. It did that last year. This year it will fall somewhat short of doing so. Britain pays all the Canadian dollars that are available in the sterling block, including Canadian payments for provisions and weapons for our troops and capitation charges involved in keeping our troops in Europe, as well as the cost of aeroplanes that we buy from Britain. Those funds are used in Canada to purchase food and weapons for Britain; but in addition to that, Britain has a share of Mutual Aid funds. There the quid pro quo is the fact that Britain is actively prosecuting the war in defence of the empire.

Mr. STIRLING: Does that not tail on to what I have just said, that an attempt is made on page 19 to balance certain items? Besides that, on pages 17 and 18 we have those other amounts to which the minister has just alluded, $554,720,000 and $169,034,000 for food supplies. I take it that those are the amounts outside the mutual feature of this arrangement that the United Kingdom has not succeeded in paying for; is that not so?

Mr. HOWE: The position is that the United Kingdom purchased for cash munitions and military supplies to a value of $353,000,000, and received, under Mutual Aid, munitions and supplies including ships to a value of $554,720,000. That is the story of munitions. The story of food is that Britain purchased in Canada food supplies to a value of $252,000,000, and paid cash for those purchases. She received, under Mutual Aid, foodstuffs to the value of $169,034,000.

Mr. STIRLING: The $353,000,000 and the $252,000,000 at the top of page 19 form the first two items of what I take to be an attempt at balancing?

Mr. HOWE: No. Those are two items. Britain bought munitions and military supplies to the value I have indicated; food supplies to the value I have indicated. Britain also bought and paid cash for base metals to the value of $150,000,000; lumber and other wood products, to the value of $96,000,000.

Mr. STIRLING: Making a total of over $1,000,000,000?

Mr. HOWE: Yes; that is right.

Mr. STIRLING: Then the next set of figures appear to be an attempt to balance that?

Mr. HOWE: Yes; that is right.

Mr. STIRLING: The mutual one is $534,000,000. The wording attached to it is what puzzles me. This is the way it reads: "From payments by Canadian forces overseas." I thought the $534,000,000 represented the expenditures that the United Kingdom took care of for our troops overseas.

Mr. HOWE: That is correct. The table on page 19 of the report shows the sources from which the United Kingdom gets the Canadian dollars to pay Canada. It gets them from British exports to Canada, $101,000,000; receipts of Canadian dollars for freight services, $38,000,000; from interest and dividends, $59,000,000; from other current receipts, $38,000,000; from capital receipts, less capital payments not shown elsewhere, $27,000,000; from payments by Canadian forces overseas—

Mr. STIRLING: That is the one.

Mr. HOWE: That is money that we pay into Britain's account here in Canada to offset the account for sterling in the United Kingdom, which sterling is used to look after our troops, feed them, provide them with munitions, arising out of the capitation charges for the troops in the field.

Mr. NOSEWORTHY: On page 8 of the report I find this statement:

> In the agreements which the nations receiving Mutual Aid have concluded with Canada there is provision for Canada receiving such reciprocal aid as may be determined from time to time in the light of the development of the war.

What is the meaning of this at the present time?

Mr. ILSLEY: The agreements provide that Canada may obtain as reciprocal aid such articles, facilities, services or information as the nation receiving Mutual Aid is in a position to supply and as may be determined by common agreement in the light of the development of the war. This provision will be of benefit to us should the war develop in such a way that at some time in the future we require a greater value of goods and services from any of the countries receiving Mutual Aid than they require from us. In such circumstances we would be able to request reciprocal Mutual Aid. Up to the present, however, we have not needed to obtain reciprocal aid in goods and services, because all the countries with which we have been concerned have needed a much larger value of supplies from us than we have needed from them. To have requested them to provide us, as reciprocal aid, with part of the supplies we purchase from them at the present time would only reduce their ability to buy from us and increase the size of the excess to be provided by Mutual Aid.

Mr. NOSEWORTHY: What was the year on which the minister said the bureau of statistics based our national income at something over seven billion dollars?

Mr. ILSLEY: For the twelve months ended June 30, 1943. I should have made it clear that this basis as nearly as possible is the same as that which is used by the United States in regard to their national income, on which their contribution to UNRRA is based.

Mr. NOSEWORTHY: It is for the same year?

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes. In connection with reciprocal aid I should say that we have obtained some. At page 8 of the report of the Canadian Mutual Aid board the hon. gentleman will find the following:

> The United Kingdom on its own initiative has given Canada reciprocal aid in the form of six destroyers for the Royal Canadian Navy, and has announced its intention to provide Canada with two cruisers and other ships in the near future. The United Kingdom since early in the war has been providing without charge the armament for many of Canada's merchant ships.

The general picture, however, is as I have stated it; the requirements of the other countries from us have been so much greater than our requirements from them that the reciprocal aid provisions have not been brought into play to any extent.

Mr. NOSEWORTHY: Does the minister know if any Mutual Aid has been requested by or granted to Newfoundland under this arrangement?

Mr. ILSLEY: Neither requested nor granted.

Mr. NOSEWORTHY: Does the minister know whether aid has been granted by the United States under Lend-Lease?

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes, I understand there has been some.

Mr. ADAMSON: Have any goods been supplied under the Mutual Aid plan for the rehabilitation of devastated areas? I have in mind particularly Russia, where I understand some rebuilding is now going on. This is one of the problems we shall meet in the rehabilitation of the devastated areas. Would the equipment for that work, which we shall have to do or at least help and support, come out of this fund?

Mr. HOWE: The Mutual Aid is purely for war, material and supplies used for war purposes. There are other provisions for looking after devastated countries. Of course the UNRRA provision is definitely for that purpose. In addition, there is military aid, which will be given during the period when the army will be in charge of relief and rehabilitation; in the months immediately succeeding the occupation. Canada participates in UNRRA, as my hon. friend knows, and arrangements are being made to the end that Canada will participate in fair proportion with other countries in the work of military relief.

Mr. JACKMAN: Would the minister explain exactly how the shipments to these various countries originate. Is it by application from these countries; does that application go to the joint board of which the minister spoke? I ask this question because I understand some offers of assistance were made to certain areas, perhaps in particular to Bermuda and the West Indies, which offers were refused by those countries because they had means of their own and wished to pay for whatever they got. I should like to know exactly what procedure is followed in granting this largesse, if I may so call it, to other countries.

Mr. HOWE: The usual procedure is that the country desiring Mutual Aid makes application to the Department of External Affairs. The qualifications for Mutual Aid are checked by external affairs and by the treasury department and the country is approved as a recipient of Mutual Aid. After that, applications for specific items are filed with the administrative officer of the Mutual Aid board. Such items are cleared by him with the agencies in Washington and with our own chiefs of staff as to essentiality, and if approved in both quarters they are submitted to the Mutual Aid board in Canada for approval. After that, orders are placed through the Department of Munitions and Supply in the case of munitions, or through the Department of Agriculture or the Department of Trade and Commerce in the case of foodstuffs. In most cases deliveries are made at a port in Canada. Goods for China, however, are delivered to their destination by Canada.

Mr. JACKMAN: The information I had came to me from quite good authority and I should like to know from the minister—

Mr. HOWE: As to the West Indies? I may say that the West Indies are purchasers of supplies in Canada, particularly wheat and foodstuffs, which they have purchased year in and year out. The increase in shipping rates from Canada through the Mediterranean added greatly to the cost of those foodstuffs in the West Indies. Looking at the problem as a whole; bearing in mind that Canada was sending flour to the United Kingdom and that the United Kingdom was sending back a certain amount of flour to the West Indies, it seemed reasonable that instead of Mutual-Aiding all the flour to Britain, we could Mutual Aid a certain amount of flour to the West Indies. The offer was made to the West Indies as a whole and was gladly accepted by most of the islands. One or two felt that they did not require the aid and declined, but we did ship a fair amount of flour to the West Indies under Mutual Aid, and I think we were quite justified in doing so under the circumstances.

Mr. JACKMAN: I am not objecting to Canadian flour being sent to the islands which need it and are not in a position to pay for it in dollar currency. Nevertheless the minister has just admitted that we offered flour to certain of the islands in the West Indies, which offer was declined. I do not see how that ties in with his former statement that these supplies are delivered after an application is made by the requesting country, which application must be cleared by external affairs, then by the finance department, and finally approved by the joint council. Here we have actual instances of the money of the Canadian taxpayers being offered, in the form of our good wheat and other supplies, to certain recipients who have said that they were quite able to take care of themselves, that they did not wish any free gifts but were quite prepared to pay for what they got. I do not know why the administration of Mutual Aid should adopt such a procedure with the taxpayers' money.

Mr. HOWE: Perhaps I was not quite correct in my facts. The first approach from the West Indies came from the largest of the islands of that group. There was a request for Mutual Aid by way of flour from Canada. We have the same relationship to all the British West Indies, and it was felt we could hardly meet one request without making an offer to all the West Indies.

Mr. JACKMAN: Even if you have a request from one, and not from the others, you decide you must make the same offer to all?

Mr. HOWE: We felt that way. Perhaps my hon. friend would have done it differently. However, that does not alter the fact that we did it in that way.

Mr. ILSLEY: I would point out that the taxpayers of Canada were not adversely affected by the offer, nor would they have been by an acceptance of the offer.

Mr. JACKMAN: As I understand it, a particular island, or islands, actually paid for it. Whether they paid for it in United States currency, which they had available, or whether they preferred to pay for it by giving us sterling credits which would eventually be available for spending by Canadians in that area, I do not know. But if it was paid in either of those currencies, certainly the Canadian taxpayer is much better off.

Mr. ILSLEY: It would be paid for in Canadian dollars obtained from Great Britain, thereby lowering the pool of Canadian dollars in Great Britain, and necessitating a larger amount of Mutual Aid to that country.

Mr. RAYMOND: To what countries have we contributed in connection with Mutual Aid?

Mr. ILSLEY: Great Britain, the United Kingdom, the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics, Australia, China, India, the West Indies and the French Committee of National Liberation.

Mr. RAYMOND: Could the minister explain in what way Great Britain has contributed to Canada? I understand it is Mutual Aid?

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes.

Mr. RAYMOND: Then, as the hon. member who sits next to me said a moment ago, if it is Mutual Aid it should be mutual. Otherwise it would be just on one side. What is the contribution by Great Britain toward Canada?

Mr. ILSLEY: I do not think we have done any more for Great Britain in this war than Great Britain has done for us. The hon. member may have a different view about it, but I do not think so. I explained fully to the hon. member for Macleod, I thought, the basis for the use of the word "mutual". It is based upon the fact that when a nation sends its men out, and those men lose their lives, they are doing something for the common cause—just as we are, when we make machines, and so on, and contribute them to the war. If the hon. member suggests that it must be machine for machine, then it is the same as dollar for dollar, and the whole principle of Mutual Aid or Lend-Lease disappears from the picture entirely. Nations have been trying to get away from this idea of cash on the barrel-head, and material value for material value. They have reached the place where they think that if we are to win this war we have each to do everything we can in our own countries.

Mr. RAYMOND: So that when Canadian soldiers are fighting in Europe they are still contributing to Mutual Aid. It is another kind of contribution; is that correct?

Mr. ILSLEY: They are making a contribution to the joint cause, of course.

Mr. RAYMOND: And if I understand correctly, the minister said that the Mutual Aid coming from Great Britain or from Russia is because they defend liberty, and so on. Is that correct?

Mr. ILSLEY: That is part of it; but they also undertook certain obligations under the agreement.

Mr. RAYMOND: Well, when Canadian soldiers are fighting on the other side, they are still contributing to Mutual Aid—

Mr. ILSLEY: Oh, well—

Mr. RAYMOND: —besides this item of supplying munitions and goods; is that correct?

Mr. ILSLEY: They are contributing to the common cause; there is no doubt about it.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): To our own defence.

Mr. RAYMOND: But this is another contribution, is an additional contribution; is that correct?

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes.

Mr. RAYMOND: That is all I want to know; I just wish to have it clear.

Mr. FRASER (Peterborough West): In the event of a country asking for Mutual Aid in respect of food products, how does the government, or the board in charge go about procuring those products? Let us suppose that one or two companies advertised in the country to which the food was to be sent. Would the board ask the companies which made that food, to supply it, or just those companies which had exported it in the past?

Mr. HOWE: The combined food board, and our Department of Agriculture handle purchases of that type. I may say, however, that so far as the United Kingdom is concerned, all trade names have been barred for the duration of the emergency. The packages are all stamped with the Canadian Mutual Aid emblem, and, so far as the board is concerned, that is the only emblem required.

Mr. JACKMAN: What is the emblem?

Mr. HOWE: The maple leaf, with the name of "Canada" printed in four languages.

Mr. ADAMSON: There is no consideration, is there, with respect to Italy so far as Mutual Aid is concerned while she is theoretically a co-belligerent?

Mr. HOWE: No. She is not an ally.

Mr. NOSEWORTHY: At page 24 of the report of the Canadian Mutual Aid board we find a chapter dealing with the French Committee of National Liberation. We find this statement:

> Shipment of these army stores is scheduled to commence early in the fiscal year 1944-45.

Have shipments gone forward?

Mr. HOWE: There was some delay in making contact with the French Committee of National Liberation, with the result that only one or two shipments, comprised chiefly of naval guns, have gone forward. However, a major shipment is about to leave at this time.

Mr. JACKMAN: I was interested in the remarks of the Minister of Finance a few minutes ago, and I may have something further to say later on. Would it be convenient for him to give the specific item and the total amount of securities, gold and other assets we took over from Great Britain in order to pay for what is now called Mutual Aid. I think we started by taking over $250,000,000 in gold outside the ordinary trading account. Could the minister give the items, showing the securities in gold, and other forms, taken from Great Britain since the war started.

Mr. ILSLEY: The hon. member knows that the main item is the repatriation of securities.

Mr. JACKMAN: Yes.

Mr. ILSLEY: He wishes to know what there is in addition to that?

Mr. JACKMAN: Yes, just the major items.

Mr. ILSLEY: There was about $700,000,000 worth of securities officially repatriated; that is, by the British government and transferred to Canada officially. There was an unofficial repatriation of about $100,000,000 more; that is, the sale of securities in Canada. There was some gold as well.

Mr. JACKMAN: $250,000,000.

Mr. ILSLEY: There was $250 million in gold in 1939 and 1940 and $165 million in gold in 1943.

Mr. JACKMAN: What was the total of Canadian government and government guaranteed securities? Was it just $700 million? I think it ran to larger figures than that. Then you have the loan from Canada of $700 million against the pledge of specific collateral. How much was that and what was it worth?

Mr. ILSLEY: The figures about the securities are approximately correct, $800 million altogether.

Mr. JACKMAN: That is government and government-guaranteed securities.

Mr. ILSLEY: There were $700 million of government and government-guaranteed, and $100 million would be something else.

Mr. JACKMAN: War assets.

Mr. ILSLEY: There were the British investments in factories in Canada, $205 million.

Mr. JACKMAN: What is the status of the $700 million loan which we made to Britain against the pledge of certain collateral securities, which, if sold, were to be returned to Canada?

Mr. ILSLEY: This obligation of $700 million which Canada holds has been reduced to some extent by the sale of securities by the United Kingdom. It was agreed that the proceeds of any sales or redemptions would be applied to the reduction of the loan.

Mr. JACKMAN: What is the approximate market value of the $700 million to-day? I understood it was made up of stocks rather than bonds. I presume that the collateral has fluctuated in value.

Mr. ILSLEY: It is not exactly collateral; it is not a pledge; we have the agreement from the United Kingdom that if they dispose of any of the securities—

Mr. JACKMAN: We would not take more than $700 million.

Mr. ILSLEY: Oh, yes.

Mr. JACKMAN: Nothing over $700 million.

Mr. ILSLEY: Perhaps I do not understand the hon. gentleman.

[Mr. Ilsley.]

Mr. JACKMAN: As I understand it, our government made a loan of $700 million or gave Britain a credit for that amount against the pledge of certain specific securities.

Mr. ILSLEY: That is not it.

Mr. JACKMAN: They were vested in the government of Great Britain by nationals in Great Britain who held them. If any were sold, the amount would go to Canada to redeem the $700 million loan. I may be surmising, but I understood that one reason why we took them over was that owing to our taxation policies the values of these securities, which were mainly stocks, were greatly depressed at the time and it was considered unfair to take them over at low prices. Therefore we agreed upon what was the approximate market value in figuring this loan. Since then, the value of the securities may have increased substantially and I merely wish to know if that is the case.

Mr. ILSLEY: I might be able to get the present market value in Canadian dollar securities, now held in Great Britain.

Mr. JACKMAN: I remember there was some talk last year about Great Britain still having a billion dollars worth of Canadian securities and that they were pledging some of those against the $700 million loan. What is the situation now with regard to Britain's holdings of Canadian securities? I believe the minister said a moment ago that the amount outstanding is still $700 million.

Mr. ILSLEY: That is right.

Mr. RAYMOND: I should like to verify the point I raised a moment ago. This resolution is for the purpose of introducing a bill to provide a sum of $800 million in order to supply war materials to the united nations. Is there any other country which contributes in the same way as we are doing at the present time?

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes. An outstanding example is the United States of America. To date their Lend-Lease contributions amount to $24 billion. In my remarks when the resolution was introduced I referred to the fact that other parts of the British empire furnished large sums by way of reciprocal aid. That is true of Australia, New Zealand and the United Kingdom. The United Kingdom also extends Mutual Aid of her own production to certain other countries, such as Spitfires to Russia.

Mr. RAYMOND: Do I understand that Great Britain uses war supplies received from Canada or the United States to supply Russia?

Mr. ILSLEY: No. The transfer of supplies is referred to in the agreement and it cannot take place without the consent of Canada. It is not taking place to any extent, although it might be impossible to prevent some from going out. Probably it ought to because it might be the most advantageous use of the goods, but they are not being sold.

Mr. RAYMOND: Were they not sold to Australia a year ago?

Mr. ILSLEY: I think that is so. I think in the first year of our arrangement Great Britain charged Australia sterling for some of the goods that went there, but we regarded that as an internal arrangement in the sterling area. That is not going on now. I understand that that transaction is not completed; it is not finalized, as we say.

Mr. ADAMSON: The goods are not irrevocably earmarked for shipment? If goods are shipped to one country and another country needs them, they can be transferred to the second country?

Mr. HOWE: We can transfer them.

Mr. ADAMSON: Suppose we are making a shipment to China which goes to India and that shipment is needed by the United States authorities; can they take that shipment, or what is the machinery for transferring it? If we had a shipment to Great Britain and Great Britain found she had ample supplies of that particular article but that Russia was short, could the shipment be transhipped to Russia or to any other of the united nations with our consent, without our consent, or by what machinery?

Mr. HOWE: In the case of a shipment to the United Kingdom which the United Kingdom wishes to divert to Russia, the consent of Canada must be obtained. The charge would then be transferred from Britain to Russia. In other words, we would regard it, not as a Mutual Aid transaction with England, but as a Mutual Aid transaction with Russia. The provision of our several agreements is that goods sent to one country under Mutual Aid cannot be transferred by that country to another country. In the case of the last shipment to China, for delivery through an Indian port, an arrangement was made with the Chinese government to the effect that if the material is required for the war in India, Canada shall have the right to divert it.

Mr. ADAMSON: That is an agreement between the Chinese and Canadian governments?

Mr. ILSLEY: I do not want to give a wrong impression about the dealings of the United Kingdom with Australia. I do not know what they are. Since I made the reply that I did, I have been informed by the officials that the goods for which Great Britain charged Australia were goods of Canadian origin purchased by Great Britain in Canada. I am also informed that the transaction is not completed, that there are mutual claims and so forth between the United Kingdom and Australia. I do not want it to go out from this parliament that I am making any statement about these transactions, because I do not know what they were as between the United Kingdom and Australia.

Mr. STIRLING: A good deal of information is given with regard to our dealings with the United Kingdom, what the United Kingdom received and what the United Kingdom gave; but as far as I can make out, similar information is not given with regard to the transactions with other countries. The minister did refer to Australia's contribution being considerable for a country of her population and resources; but in the case of the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics, Australia, China, the West Indies and India, I do not find in this report the contributions which they may make to Canada under their part of the Mutual Aid Act.

Mr. ILSLEY: We have not for Australia and the other countries nearly as complete figures as we have in the case of Great Britain.

Mr. JACKMAN: In regard to brands on any goods shipped abroad under Mutual Aid, I understood the Minister of Munitions and Supply to say that it was the policy of our country and perhaps of other countries under Mutual Aid to ship the goods without any specific brand on them. I do not know that I hold any particular opinion as to the rightness or wrongness of that policy. Where competition either now or post-war may exist as between respective allied countries, there may be very good reason for not putting any brand on, but where the potential competition is between one of the united nations and perhaps another country—let us take the case of Canadian bacon against Danish bacon—I should like to know the reasons behind the government's policy in not being willing to have any of these articles branded for which we are developing new markets in Great Britain and elsewhere and where the brands may be of considerable importance post-war, vis-à-vis some other country which is not one of the united nations. Would the minister state the reason?

Mr. HOWE: The brand that goes on all these goods is the brand shown here—the maple leaf with a circle in which the name

"Canada" is printed in large type in English and in French, in Russian and in Chinese. That is the brand on Canadian Mutual Aid shipments. It was the decision of the British government that the material bought by the British government for distribution in time of distress should not bear the name of the firm from which the material was purchased. I hope my hon. friend will not ask me why, because I cannot tell him. But the fact is that large shippers from this country are not permitted to put the brand of their firm on their shipments of foodstuffs.

Mr. FRASER (Peterborough West): That is just a new ruling?

Mr. HOWE: No; it has been in force for the last few years.

Mr. JACKMAN: The reason why I asked the question was that the information which came to me quite a year ago was that the Americans, for instance, were sending over powdered eggs in little cartons that held the contents of half a dozen with the Lease-Lend Blue Eagle mark on the package, whereas our powdered eggs were in large cartons and were used in the bakery trade rather than by the small consumer. I had that on good information, although it is by no means fresh now, and I should like to know what we are doing at the present time to identify our goods not only with the Canadian Maple Leaf but whether we are packaging them in such a form that they will go to the large body of consumers rather than to a specific few? In other words, while we are in a joint war and everyone is willing to make sacrifices in the common cause, nevertheless where it is fair I think we must also keep a weather-eye out for post-war trade. I would ask the minister if he knows how powdered eggs from Canada are going over at the present time.

Mr. HOWE: The combined food board purchases British requirements in Canada and in the United States, and I am told that the specifications in each country as to packaging are the same. The United States puts on its packages the Lend-Lease emblem and Canada puts on the Mutual Aid packages the Canadian emblem. That is the only difference betweeen the two. I think we are supplying large packages and small packages. I am told that we do, and that the United States has the same range of packages.

Mr. HANSELL: There is just one point I should like to make clear in my own mind. Giving this Mutual Aid to the united nations is an admirable gesture, but I would ask the minister if there is any difference between giving aid in this form and in trading with these nations in the ordinary way and then cancelling $800,000,000 of their debt to us. It seems to me that that would be less complicated. Would it result in any difference? Does it not amount to that after all?

Mr. ILSLEY: It is hard to know just what the hon. gentleman means when he asks whether it is the same? It obviously is not the same.

Mr. HANSELL: Does it not have the same effect?

Mr. ILSLEY: So far as I can see, the ultimate economic effect is identical; that is, if we wanted to do it another way; if we wanted to get out a book and charge up each of these countries with so many dollars worth of goods and then, after they get the goods, burn up the book.

Mr. SHAW: Would that not be cheaper?

Mr. ILSLEY: No, certainly not.

Mr. SHAW: Under the present set-up you have various organizations handling Mutual Aid, and a great many more employees would be necessary than to do it as the hon. member for Macleod suggests by simply cancelling the $800,000,000 worth of goods received by the recipient countries.

Mr. ILSLEY: That is the reason why I asked what my hon. friend meant by asking whether it is the same. Does the hon. member suggest that there should be no checking by this country of essentiality, that we should leave all that to the purchaser? It may be that he is suggesting that we should allow any country to have whatever it asks for? That would be a very different matter.

Mr. SHAW: Trade is never done in that way. Does this country not exercise some authority in ascertaining what we shall sell?

Mr. ILSLEY: I will tell the hon. gentleman how trade is done. A person buying pays for the goods, and that is a salutary check on what he orders.

Mr. SHAW: I doubt that the statement is absolutely correct, because, if that were the case, there would never be one outstanding debt between two countries because of one country exporting a greater volume of produce than it imported from the other. The minister says they simply pay for what they secure. Technically speaking, that is not correct. If it were, there would not be international debts, in the sense of one country owing another more because of excess purchases.

Mr. ILSLEY: I do not know what the hon. gentleman is driving at. I foolishly took on an answer to a theoretical question the purport of which I did not understand. I am sorry; that is all I can say.

Mr. HANSELL: I must be satisfied with the answer I have received. Evidently in time of war, with such international complications as exist in connection with goods, perhaps it is the government's way of doing it.

Mr. ROSS (Souris): On page 15 of the report there is a reference to farm implements provided:

Ploughs	2,898
Drills	1,000
Binders	1,845
Threshers	205
Hammer mills	731

With regard to the question raised by the hon. member for Rosedale, that certain goods were offered some nations who were in a position to pay for them, I am wondering if there is really a demand for these articles. The reason why I bring this question up is the fact that in Britain with one-third of the cultivable land that we have in Canada they have as many tractors as we have, and at the commencement of the war one-third as many. That may be good business; I do not know. At any rate, reference is made here to a number of different pieces of machinery. With the great shortage that exists in this country—and, as I have pointed out many times before, many people in Canada had orders and permits passed for drills for this spring which they have not been able to receive at this date, some time after seeding is over—I am wondering how these requests are arranged. Are they done through the Department of Agriculture in the old land, and is there a check-up to ascertain whether these commodities are essential at this time when production is hampered in consequence of man-power shortage and the shortage of labour-saving machinery?

Mr. HOWE: During the past two years it has been thought that, solely from the viewpoint of winning the war, it is more advantageous to have foods grown in the United Kingdom than in Canada. My hon. friend knows that when the submarine war was at its height, shortage of shipping was very serious. For that reason, during the past two years we have shipped a considerable amount of agricultural machinery to the United Kingdom. We did so because we believed that this would prevent the British people from starving, and if it caused some inconvenience to our own people, that is not a very serious impact of the war on Canada.

Mr. ROSS (Souris): Does the minister think that the same demand exists for this type of implement?

Mr. HOWE: No; we are not shipping implements now.

Mr. McGEER: I understand that the Lease-Lend programme started with the $700 million loan to Britain against which no securities were actually taken; following that there was a gift of one billion dollars to Britain, and following that, a gift of one billion dollars in Mutual Aid, without any arrangement that anything should be returned; and the present basis upon which this resolution will be passed, with the bill succeeding it, is the same. Is it not a fact that this was an arrangement agreed upon as part of the general war programme, where Canada did embark on a course peculiar to Canadian economy and Canada's war programme, and quite different from all the rest? The $700 million no doubt was similar to the Lease-Lend programme of the United States, because that $700 million was used to buy goods in Canada; but the remainder, totalling now roughly three billions in three years—two billion up to date and an extra billion now—is an out-and-out gift from Canada in Mutual Aid, without anything being expected in return. Is that correct?

Mr. ILSLEY: If our requirements from Great Britain exceed her requirements from us she is obligated under these agreements to furnish Mutual Aid to us. That may be a very remote contingency; nevertheless the obligation is there. What the hon. gentleman says is substantially true, namely, that from the material point of view we are contributing, as I would say, to the common cause—

Mr. McGEER: And as best we can.

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes. It goes to Great Britain, a lot of this, but it is really a contribution to the common cause rather than a gift to the United Kingdom.

Mr. McGEER: Well, of course, the significance of that contribution of Canada to the common cause is that with the $700 million lent to Britain and the two billions already given in Mutual Aid, that comes roughly to three billions. Contrasting that total contribution from Canada with the total from the United States, our Lease-Lend programme is much more substantial proportionately to our population than the Lease-Lend programme to the south of us. There may be some people who feel that Canada should not make that kind of contribution. I believe that the great majority of Canadians will be proud of the fact that Canada is making that contribution and will be glad to continue it so long as we can make it to the common cause and the struggle in which we are engaged. The only thing about it is that there are not many people throughout Canada who appreciate, in addition to the war programme that Canada is carrying on, the enormous contribution that Canada is making in this programme to the common cause, in proportion to her population and her industrial wealth.

There is one more observation in regard to the common contribution which I desire to make, and that is the fact that we are financing it ourselves. That is true, is it not? We are financing it without any aid either offered or expected in so far as the goods are produced and in so far as they are prepared for shipment to wherever they are going. The financial responsibility of providing the capital and the medium of exchange required is a purely Canadian enterprise. Is that correct?

Mr. ILSLEY: That is correct.

Mr. McGEER: And in that, I believe, we have found an indication of Canadian financial independence of all the world. If we can do that in war time and use our own financial power to make an enormous contribution to the cause of world freedom, we must never forget, when peace comes, that we Canadians do not have to go hat-in-hand into the financial markets of the world to borrow foreign capital to build Canadian institutions.

Mr. JACKMAN: Vice versa.

Mr. McGEER: My hon. friend says, "vice versa." I realize that it would be extremely difficult to get any lessons of this kind across to that side of the house. Just what "vice versa" means, I do not know; but when I am talking about Canadian financial independence I am talking not about something that has any vice versa about it.

Mr. JACKMAN: All vice.

Mr. McGEER: This is one definite Canadian programme that has nothing to do with anything else. We have been taught for a great many years by that kind of nonsense that we did not have the means to finance ourselves. We had to borrow in Berlin; we had to borrow in London; we had to borrow in Paris. We were a young country and we had no means that comes out of the accumulated wealth of the ages; but when this crisis came it was not the wealth of London that counted. We happened to be the rich uncle right here in Canada.

There is another observation I should like to make to the minister. If we could only speak as boastfully of what we are doing for old age Canadians as of what we are doing for Mutual Aid in the cause of common freedom there would be a great many Canadians just as proud of that—

The CHAIRMAN: Order.

Mr. McGEER: —as they are proud of the splendid contribution we are making. I do not want to traverse that subject any farther, but I did rise in my place to emphasize the fact that our Mutual Aid programme is something of which every Canadian has good reason to be proud.

Resolution reported, read the second time and concurred in. Mr. Ilsley thereupon moved for leave to introduce bill No. 138, to amend the War Appropriation (United Nations Mutual Aid) Act, 1943, and for granting to His Majesty aid for the purposes of the said act.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

SURPLUS CROWN ASSETS

PROVISION FOR CORPORATION AND ADVISORY COMMITTEE

The house resumed consideration in committee of bill No. 137, respecting surplus crown assets—Mr. Howe—Mr. Bradette in the chair.

On section 3—Departmental reports of surplus property.

Mr. KNOWLES: I should like to ask the minister a question with respect to subsection 3 of this section. It is not a critical question; I am simply seeking information. Why is it that the two departments named are the only two excepted from the provisions of this paragraph?

Mr. HOWE: The reason is that any live stock or agricultural products held by the Department of Munitions and Supply or the Department of National Defence would have been bought for consumption. They are not producers of those materials. Other departments such as the Department of Agriculture are producers of live stock and ordinary sellers of live stock, and producers and ordinary sellers of food products. My hon. friend will know that the government through its agencies has a great many experimental farms which produce agricultural products.

Mr. KNOWLES: I can understand that in so far as the Department of Agriculture is concerned, and perhaps the Department of Pensions and National Health, and maybe some others. But what about the Department of Finance and the Department of the Secretary of State?

[Mr. McGeer.]

Mr. HOWE: Neither of those has anything to sell. They have no surplus assets.

Mr. KNOWLES: According to the wording of this section, if any of those departments have any live stock or agricultural products, it looks as if they would not have to report them.

Mr. REID: Could the minister tell the committee why he does not include fishery products as well? I take it that the Department of National Defence and the Department of Munitions and Supply may have in one of their departments surplus supplies of canned goods which would properly come under agricultural or dairy products. There is no doubt that the Department of National Defence, if not the Department of Munitions and Supply, would have supplies of canned salmon and fish as well. I am therefore wondering whether it should not be included in the bill. Perhaps the minister can explain the reason why it was left out?

Mr. HOWE: The Department of Fisheries is not a producer of fish in the sense that the Department of Agriculture may be a producer of live stock or of wheat. It may buy fish but it does not catch them; therefore, if it had any stock of fish to dispose of, it would be quite proper to report it under section 3, subsection 1.

Mr. REID: The Department of Agriculture does not grow any live stock; it gets them from the farmers.

Mr. HOWE: No; they are owners of experimental farms.

Section agreed to.

Section 4 agreed to.

On section 5—Crown assets allocation committee.

Mr. KNOWLES: I have a question I should like to ask the minister. I tried to locate it in Hansard, but I did not manage to do so in time. I recall that the minister indicated on Thursday evening that the crown assets allocation committee which was set up previously under order in council consisted mainly, if not exclusively, of senior civil servants. I believe he said that they were of the rank of deputy ministers or assistant deputy ministers. Is that to be the policy under the provisions of this bill, and, if so, is there any place in the bill itself where it is provided?

Mr. HOWE: The departments specified in the bill are entitled to representatives on the committee. At the moment those representatives are high ranking civil servants from those departments. The chairman is a full-time appointee, and there are three members of the committee who are not associated with government work. There is a representative of the farmers, a representative of householders and a representative of labour. The full-time chairman and the representatives of the several departments with the three special representatives compose the committee.

Mr. KNOWLES: I am sorry, but I do not seem to be able to find where that composition is specified in the bill. Would the minister point it out to me. It seems to me that all we have is the simple statement that the minister with the approval of the governor in council may establish the committee.

Mr. HOWE: Apparently the governor in Council determines the composition of the committee by order in council. I had forgotten that it was not in the bill; but each department is to be represented, and in fact all appointments to the committee are recommended by the minister and approved by the governor in council. Naturally the minister responsible obtains recommendations from the several departments entitled to representation.

Mr. KNOWLES: Then there is no guarantee in the bill itself that this procedure will be followed. I am not arguing that it is necessarily the only procedure to be followed; I am just pointing out that the minister said, and has just repeated, that this is to be the practice. The purpose of bringing in this bill was to supersede the order in council and put the matter on a legislative basis, and I point out that this particular feature has not been provided for in the legislation.

Mr. HOWE: That may be true; probably it was not provided in the order in council which established the machinery. A separate order in council set up the committee; but that would be on the recommendation of the minister, which would include the names and designations of the members of that committee. Another government could change the composition of the committee if it wished to do so.

Mr. KNOWLES: As I see it, there is nothing in the bill that would prohibit the crown assets allocation committee and the board of the War Assets Corporation from being the same personnel.

Mr. HOWE: They could be, if the government wished.

Mr. GRAYDON: Is there any special motive in using the languge of this section, which says that the minister, with the approval of the governor in council, may do certain things? My understanding of the draftsmanship of bills of this kind is that usually power is given to the governor in council. In this case, however, it seems that the minister is the initiating authority and the governor in council comes in later by way of reference. Is there any special reason why that should be?

Mr. HOWE: I think it only puts the actual procedure into words. The governor in council does not originate anything itself; everything is recommended by some member of council. It may be the Prime Minister, but usually it is the minister in direct charge of a particular effort. In this case the minister recommends and the governor in council approves. In the bill the minister is given certain powers which he may exercise of his own volition, while certain other powers must have the approval of the governor in council.

Mr. GRAYDON: I take it that the personnel of the present crown assets allocation committee will be continued when this legislation takes over and the order in council ceases to operate?

Mr. HOWE: That is correct.

Mr. STIRLING: As I understand it, the principal duties of the crown assets allocation committee is to advise the minister after having ascertained what there is to sell. Does that committee advise at all as to how it shall be sold, or where?

Mr. HOWE: Yes.

Mr. STIRLING: Then what is the function of the board? What does the board do?

Mr. HOWE: The board does the selling.

Mr. STIRLING: It merely does the selling?

Mr. HOWE: The committee can recommend to the minister a scale of priorities. For instance, if it is dealing with road machinery, it can recommend that first priority be given to a province, second priority to a city and third priority to someone else. It cannot recommend prices, which is the function of the corporation, but it can attach any recommendation it wishes to any item it refers to the minister. Ordinarily the minister will pass on that recommendation to the corporation. It might come as an instruction from the minister, passing on the recommendation to the board.

Mr. STIRLING: But this committee is the really important body?

[Mr. Graydon.]

Mr. HOWE: Oh, no; the functions are different. Each has its own function, and I could not say which is the more important. Certainly the corporation has a tremendously important task in determining the methods of sale, in pricing the products and in setting up an organization for distribution across Canada.

Mr. STIRLING: Does the minister anticipate that holding some of this material will be a very considerable operation?

Mr. HOWE: Oh, yes.

Mr. STIRLING: The storage?

Mr. HOWE: Yes.

Mr. STIRLING: Does the committee decide that?

Mr. HOWE: No; the board will decide that. The committee may recommend that a certain item be held off the market. For example, the wartime prices and trade board has a representative on the committee. The committee may take the view on the recommendation of the wartime prices and trade board that it would not be beneficial to the Canadian economy to place a certain article on the market at this time. That recommendation would be passed on to the board, but ordinarily the board would be responsible for deciding when the material should be sold and at what price.

Mr. MacNICOL: Is provision made in this bill for the control and disposal of crown assets in Europe or anywhere else?

Mr. HOWE: Yes.

Mr. MacNICOL: In what way?

Mr. HOWE: The board has jurisdiction over Canadian surplus materials wherever they may be. It has power to open bank accounts abroad, to appoint representatives or committees abroad, and to open offices abroad. As a matter of fact the board is represented in London; one of our munitions and supply officers in London is the representative of the board for any disposal in the United Kingdom.

Mr. MacNICOL: How about Italy and France and North Africa?

Mr. HOWE: That will come later.

Mr. MacNICOL: Is not the government of the United States setting up separate boards in those countries—

Mr. HOWE: I dare say they are.

Mr. MacNICOL: —to dispose of their surplus stocks after the war, particularly to rush the disposal? And should we not be doing that also?

Mr. HOWE: We have no problems in those countries at the moment. Any supplies we have in Italy are in the custody of the Canadian army in that country, and they are not surplus. If they should become surplus I daresay the army will find some way of disposing of them for value.

Mr. JACKMAN: At page 3646 of Hansard the minister said this crown assets allocation committee would review the statements of the various government departments in regard to surplus assets, as to whether or not they were really surplus to the requirements of the particular department.

Mr. HOWE: Not of the particular department; of the government as a whole.

Mr. JACKMAN: Very well. I should think there would be just as much need for a corresponding provision for review as to whether or not certain departments were holding back in reserve assets which were not needed. It might be that certain departments of national defence would find themselves with a great deal of material which in the eyes of some of their officers would be useful as a reserve, but if they were reviewed by a proper authority—perhaps this board or perhaps some other committee of the cabinet—they would be found to be surplus. I am wondering whether it would not be well to insert in this bill some provision whereby not only the assets reported would be reviewed but it could be found out exactly what assets which might be surplus were still in the hands of various departments.

Mr. HOWE: The minister of each department must be the judge of whether or not he has surplus material in his department. The officer representing the department on the committee is impressed with the desirability of not carrying surplus material, and I have no doubt he will exercise any influence he may have in the department in the direction of having surplus material reported to the board. But a committee of this type, or any outside authority, can hardly go inside any particular department of government and instruct the minister or the department as to what should be disposed of and what should be kept.

Mr. JACKMAN: Where will policy be made in regard to the operation of the Crown Assets Corporation? We have the minister, and it would appear from a reading of the bill that he has great power in a large number of cases. In fact, much of the decision seems to rest with him personally. Then we have the crown assets allocation committee, and then the officers of the War Assets Corporation.

Reverting to the question I asked this afternoon in regard to government policy with respect to the three billion dollars worth of surplus war assets which we may have after the war is over, will that amount or parts of it be withheld from the market so that ordinary business may go ahead? That is a question of policy. That amount of three billions of dollars works out to about $300 for each man, woman and child. Many of those assets will, of course, be of a military nature, and of no possible civilian use. At the same time there will be a great deal of clothing and other items which could be converted to civilian use, and it will be a question of great concern to business men in this country to learn what is going to happen to those supplies, because on what is to happen to them will depend much of their planning for post-war employment. The minister gave me his answer, one which was not satisfactory to me. However I cannot force him to give a different one, if he does not care to do so.

Nevertheless I should like to learn from him this: With whom will that policy in connection with the disposal of surplus assets rest? Who will decide whether or not they will be thrown on the market, with the resulting dislocation of ordinary industry and ordinary workmen, or whether those surplus assets will be withheld from the market? Where would one expect to find that policy declared, as it must be declared, it seems to me, if business is to go ahead in the post-war period?

Mr. HOWE: The Minister of Munitions and Supply has absolute authority over every purchase that is made, or has been made since the war began. But the Minister of Munitions and Supply has not made every purchase—has not made any purchase. He must see that he has an organization which functions reasonably, and along reasonable lines.

The Minister of Munitions and Supply bears the same relationship to the Crown Assets Corporation. He is responsible for the work of the corporation, and he exercises that responsibility through a board of directors of his own choosing, which he supposes to be competent to advise him in that relation. The board represents a cross-section of industry and consumers. I should think, if he were a wise minister, he would accept the judgment of that board on the larger questions of policy as well as on details. I think that should satisfy my hon. friend, if he will reflect on the whole situation.

Mr. JACKMAN: Which board will be advising? Is it to emanate from the minister, backed by the decision of those whom he considers worthy of advising him, or is it to come from the crown assets allocation committee? Or is it to come from the officers of the War Assets Corporation? I want to know where business men will find out the policy of this government at some time in the future, in regard to the disposal of surplus war assets.

Mr. CHEVRIER: It is contained in section 9 of the bill.

Section agreed to.

On section 6—Term of office.

Mr. MacNICOL: Section 6 states that the term of office of the crown assets allocation committee members shall be one year. Then the directors of the War Assets Corporation shall hold office for three years. In the United States their whole programme is based upon as short a term as possible. Is it expected that these gentlemen are to be in office for three years? It states that they are to be reappointed. Surely to goodness there will not be a long time intervening between the end of the war and the final disposition or final control of assets left over from the war. If it is to take a long time, then there will be a terrific cost by way of salaries of one kind and another.

Mr. HOWE: The committee is appointed for one year. The reason is that it is an advisory committee, composed largely of government officers. The corporation is appointed for three years, with terms of two years and one year for certain directors. The purpose of that is to obtain continuity.

I feel certain that the work of the corporation will last for at least ten years. The last war ended in 1918, and we are still disposing of surplus material from it. Only the other day we sold some harness left from that war.

Mr. MacNICOL: But we did not keep a committee in office for ten years after the war.

Mr. GRAYDON: May I point out to the minister that there seems to be strange incongruity between sections 6 and 7. Although we have not yet reached section 7, I refer to it for purposes of comparison. It states that "the committee shall advise the minister". In other words, this is an advisory committee. I suggest that subsection 2 of section 6 destroys the position of the advisory committee, because it says:

(2) The committee shall be responsible to, and subject to the direction and control of the minister.

I do not know whether the minister sees the humorous aspect, but it does seem to me that if ever there was a committee which was thoroughly under the control, guidance and direction of the minister, this is certainly the one. It ceases to have that independence which an advisory committee should have.

I point this out to the minister in the thought that he might wish to have subsection 2 deleted. I should think that would be done, if the committee is to serve any useful purpose in an advisory capacity. How can a committee advise the minister when the minister himself, according to the bill as it now stands, exercises over that committee complete direction and control? It seems to me that is not the relationship which should exist between an advisory committee and the minister in charge. So as to relieve himself of any charge of having taken a dictatorial attitude, I suggest that the minister might well reconsider subsection 2, if, indeed, he has not already done so.

Mr. HOWE: I take it that the committee must be responsible to someone.

Mr. GRAYDON: I have no objection to its being responsible.

Mr. HOWE: I point out that the minister takes advice from a great many officers, for whom he is responsible. My hon. friend always likes to suggest some independent body that is responsible to no one. I could mention one or two organizations of that type, but I do not think they would be very helpful. The minister must take the responsibility. The government must take it ultimately, and the minister is responsible for advising the government.

Mr. GRAYDON: That is all right.

Mr. HOWE: The minister must get his advice where he can get sound advice. He forms this committee, which he believes is capable of advising him as to whether material is really surplus to government requirements. It may be surplus to the requirements of one department, or it may be material that another department can use. However, it is the duty of the committee to make sure that no department of government requires that material. That is their first duty. Then the committee looks into certain aspects which are purely governmental. Is it required for relief purposes? Is it required for Mutual Aid? Is it required for any purpose allied with government? Then it has regard to other governments. Is it material of a class that the provinces should have first option on, and the municipalities second option? It calls all these matters of general policy to the attention of the minister. The committee makes a recommendation to the minister on each item. The duty of the committee ends there. I might point out that there is no relationship between the committee and the corporation. My hon. friend asks to whom business would go to deal with. It would go to the corporation; it would have nothing to do with the committee. The committee looks at things from the government viewpoint and the policy viewpoint. The actual selling is done by the corporation, and the corporation will be the only agency that will have any relationship with the public, or with business, or with anything else. The duty of the committee is to advise the minister.

Mr. GRAYDON: I think the minister missed my point with respect to the question of responsibility. I did not intend to convey that criticism to the minister. If I did not succeed in making myself clear, perhaps I may do so now. I think it goes without saying that the committee would be responsible to the minister and I should think no one would raise an objection about that. My objection was that under subsection 2 the committee would be subject to the direction and control of the minister. That was the part of the section to which I objected. I can rightly understand that there must be responsibility, but when you give direction and control it seems to me that that takes away the real effect of an advisory committee.

Mr. KNOWLES: I would point out to the leader of the opposition that there might be objection if it were the other way around. The minister could come into the house some day and say, "I am sorry; I have no control of the committee." If he said that, we in the opposition would state pretty clearly that we considered he was responsible.

Mr. HOWE: I think the wording is correct. The minister may ask the committee to investigate any aspect of a transaction and the committee is bound to do so. The minister is responsible for the salaries paid the chairman, and to those members outside the government service.

Section agreed to.

Section 7 agreed to.

On section 8—Secretary and officers.

Mr. MacNICOL: Will the secretary and other officials be taken out of the present civil service, or will this mean the establishment of a new staff?

Mr. HOWE: The section states that the staff shall be appointed or employed in the manner authorized by law; that means through the civil service commission. In addition, the minister may temporarily employ such persons of technical or professional attainments as he may deem necessary, as well as other temporary employees.

Mr. NOSEWORTHY: The words "authorized by law" would bring these employees within the scope of the civil service?

Mr. HOWE: Yes.

Section agreed to.

On section 9—Ministerial powers.

Mr. GRAYDON: I want to raise objection to the wording and the language of this section. I wish to know what was in the minister's mind, because I am quite sure that this bill bears the mark of the minister's handiwork. I should like to know his motive in phrasing this particular section which states that he may do certain things with specific or general authority from the governor in council. I am afraid the governor in council may be tempted or invited by this section to give a blanket cheque or blanket authority to the minister. If I may say so, I think the minister has already clothed himself with wider powers under this bill than are normally given to a minister of the crown. I should like to have the minister's answer on that point.

Mr. HOWE: There is certain general authority given to the minister. For example, he can exercise his own authority in transactions amounting to not more than $15,000. He has general authority to turn over to the War Assets Corporation material which is classified as scrap. But if he wishes to dispose of a building costing more than $15,000 or any item costing more than $15,000, he must have specific authority from council. That is why specific and general authorities are both mentioned.

Mr. STIRLING: Where is the reference in the bill to the $15,000 limitation?

Mr. HOWE: That authority is given by order in council.

Mr. STIRLING: The minister receives tremendous powers under section 9, and I notice that, later on, powers similar in nature although not quite as extensive or numerous are given to the board. Would it not be possible under this section for the minister to set aside the board if he chose to do so?

Mr. HOWE: Certainly.

Mr. STIRLING: He could then proceed to exercise these powers.

Mr. HOWE: Yes. Strangely enough, the authority is with the government. If the board makes a bad decision, the minister could certainly overrule it.

Mr. MacNICOL: This section certainly embraces a lot of territory, as anyone who is acquainted with the complexities of industry will realize. I have heard an hon. member—not a member of the government—advocate that his town should be permitted to buy road machinery cheaply. That particular town happens to be a coal producing town which ships coal to Ontario. If such a policy were pursued I wonder how the employees here would be able to buy the coal which would be shipped from that town. I hope that in the disposition of all this material the question of jobs which may be affected thereby will be considered. Those who are familiar with production know that since the war broke out the iron industry has increased 100 per cent, which means that there will be tremendous stocks of iron goods for sale. It will take almost dictatorial powers to control the sale of those surplus iron goods so as not to interfere with reemployment which will be very important after the war. The total capacity of electric power plants has increased very largely. The capacity is twenty-five per cent greater now, and before the war is over, production will be still higher. It is greater to-day than ever before. If machines are thrown on the market in a disorderly way—that is a very good expression—it would, of course, affect employment in the electric production business. The same applies to the aluminum business, which has gone up 500 per cent since the war broke out.

Mr. HOWE: By 1,100 per cent.

Mr. MacNICOL: The official United States report which I have here says 500 per cent, but the minister may have later information. The figure I gave is for 1942. The magnesium business, new in this country, has grown by 100 times greater in the United States, and perhaps it is more than that now. I am not greatly opposed to dictatorial powers if they are required to prevent the flooding of the market with cheap material.

Mr. HANSELL: It does appear that there is great power being placed in the hands of the minister by this section. I do not know whether all that is necessary or not. I am not a business man, and I do not understand very much about crown corporations. But when you read of all the power that is being given to the minister, and give him power "to do any other thing", that means he is all-powerful.

Mr. GRAYDON: Omnipotent.

[Mr. Stirling.]

Mr. HANSELL: However, I will content myself with going on record with that observation. May I ask this question? By paragraph (a) the minister may:

> . . . sell, exchange, lease, lend or otherwise dispose of or deal with surplus crown assets either gratuitously or for a consideration.

Apparently something is to be given away, so that once again the government believes in something for nothing. Could the minister give us a case where that might be done? I can understand that obsolete machinery might be given to provincial governments or something like that. But it does seem to me that this section may lay the minister or the government open to a good deal of criticism. That seems to me quite a loophole in this bill. I do not suppose that the government would do anything that they should not do, but this does leave it open to somebody to carry on quite a racket. I do not think the minister would. I think the government is sincere in this legislation, but it does seem to me that there are quite a few loopholes in the bill. Certainly it does not seem to be water-tight. I do not want to get out of bed on the wrong side in the morning, but equally I do not like to get into bed on the wrong side at night. Would the minister throw some light on paragraph (a)? What example can he give of where it might be advisable to give any assets away? I might like to get in on that.

Mr. HOWE: The army in Italy might very well have surplus foodstuffs or surplus equipment that might be very badly needed by the starving people of Greece just across the Adriatic, and under this paragraph the minister would have authority, if he received that advice, to instruct that the material be transferred to Greece as a gift to the Greek people. That is one application. It would be a matter of charity on a national scale.

Section agreed to.

On section 10—War Assets Corporation.

Mr. KNOWLES: I want to ask a question, and if I may refer to a subsection of another bill I can put my question more quickly. Section 7 of the bill to amend the Aeronautics Act provides:

> No member of the board shall either directly or indirectly engage in manufacturing or selling aircraft or in the transport of goods or passengers by aircraft for hire or reward.

And so on. I am wondering if there should not be a parallel clause in this bill. My hon. friends to the right, particularly the hon. member for Rosedale, are quite concerned lest business has not proper connections with this War Assets Corporation. My fear is that the connections of business with it will be too good for the welfare of the country as a whole. I should like to see some independence on the part of the members of this very important board comparable with the independence which the minister prescribes in the act for the aeronautics board to which I have just referred. Would the minister make a statement on that?

Mr. HOWE: The two are quite different. The aeronautics board is a judicial board as well as an advisory board. It has certain judicial functions to perform which would be prejudiced if any member of the board were interested in the operation or manufacture of aircraft. In the case of this corporation the minister is responsible, and the board is responsible to the minister for exercising its best judgment. It is a type of judgment that can best be exercised if a man has practical experience in that line. For instance a mining man would be the best adviser on the disposal of mining machinery and a merchant would be the best adviser on the best method of merchandising. It is just as in the operation of war plants we obtain the services of a man familiar with the type of operation required. He may also be operating a plant of his own in a small way.

Mr. KNOWLES: But it does seem to me that the powers of this corporation are greater than the functions of the committee. I felt, as the minister was speaking, that he was referring more to the work of the advisory committee than to the work of the corporation. Wider powers are set out in section 12.

Mr. HOWE: If my hon. friend does not mind postponing this discussion, I will ask that the committee rise and report progress so that my colleague may introduce another item of business.

Progress reported.

SUPPLY

Hon. J. L. RALSTON (Minister of National Defence) moved that the house go into committee of supply.

Mr. S. H. KNOWLES (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I do not intend to take more than a minute or two, but I should like to make a request of the government. As a matter of fact, I made my request in the form of a suggestion to the Minister of National Defence this morning, so that what I am about to say will not come as a surprise to the government. On Friday night when the house was adjourning he indicated that the government would call supply to-day and that, if we went into supply, items would be called in each of two departments. It was indicated that this would complete the list so far as going into supply was concerned. I suggested that since the session may last for a number of weeks yet and hon. members, on the opposition side at any rate, and private members on the government side, would like to feel that it was possible later on in the session for them to raise certain matters on going into supply, we might go in to-night and call an item in one department, leaving one last department open for a later date.

Mr. CRERAR: We had already anticipated the hon. member's request and it was the intention to call only one item to-night. That leaves one remaining, on which my hon. friend and his associates can make all the speeches they wish. They will have that opportunity.

Mr. GRAYDON: I hope it will not be taken advantage of too fully.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): So do we.

Mr. CRERAR: I am only saying that the opportunity will be there.

Mr. KNOWLES: I did not promise a speech.

Mr. GRAYDON: No; you threatened one.

Motion agreed to and the house went into committee of supply, Mr. Golding in the chair.

The house met at three o'clock.

THE WAR

INVASION OF WESTERN EUROPE—PARTICIPATION OF CANADIAN NAVAL SERVICE—NORTH ATLANTIC TRADE CONVOYS

Hon. ANGUS L. MACDONALD (Minister of National Defence for Naval Services): With the permission of the house I should like to make a short statement. I have much pleasure in advising the house that men and ships of the Royal Canadian Navy continue to fare well in the invasion of northern France. Losses in personnel thus far have been almost negligible.

Losses in ships have been confined to a few landing craft. Canada is represented in these operations by more than one hundred ships and almost ten thousand naval officers and men. Almost every type of fighting ship in our navy is included—destroyers, frigates, corvettes, minesweepers, landing ships, landing craft and motor torpedo boats.

At the same time we have assumed considerably increased responsibilities in respect of trade convoys in the north Atlantic. There, too, we and our allies have not been without success. Loss in allied merchant shipping is now at the lowest point in the whole war. This morning it was announced that one of our frigates, H.M.C.S. Prince Rupert, had shared with British and United States planes and two United States warships in the destruction of a German submarine. This is the fourth enemy submarine the destruction of which I have had the pleasure of announcing within the last ten weeks.

PUBLIC WORKS

FIREMEN—SALARIES AND WAR SUPPLEMENTS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. GORDON GRAYDON (Leader of the Opposition): On May 16, during the debate on the war appropriation resolution, I called to the attention of the Minister of Public Works certain inequalities with respect to salaries and war supplements paid to firemen working under the jurisdiction of the minister's department. At the time he was good enough to indicate that he would inquire into the matter to see if any injustice was being done, and undertook to remedy it if he found that to be the case. The war appropriation bill having been passed, and no answer having so far been made, I should be very glad if the minister would acquaint the house with the result of his inquiry and tell us what he proposes by way of remedy for the situation.

Hon. ALPHONSE FOURNIER (Minister of Public Works): Mr. Speaker, the leader of the opposition was good enough to give me notice of this question. He is right in saying that during the discussion of my war estimates he inquired about the salaries paid to the seasonal firemen employed by the Department of Public Works. I intended giving the information when my civil estimates were before the committee. However I have now before me a report concerning the 118 firemen employed at Ottawa.

The salary range of these employees is from $1,140 to $1,260 a year, plus the cost-of-living bonus and in certain instances a war duties supplement. In the case of firemen it was found that some fourteen employees, due to the increased work caused by the war, were now filling positions which under the rating schedule I have mentioned would qualify them for stationary engineer grade 1, and these employees were recommended to receive the minimum of that class.

In addition, statutory increases not ordinarily accorded to firemen were granted. These were authorized on recommendation of the department by order in council P.C. 144/2200 of March 28, 1944, effective April 1, 1940; and these increases are now in effect and also apply to firemen outside Ottawa.

Of 118 firemen at Ottawa, fourteen received war duties supplements, three received $120 statutory increases and twenty-four received $60 statutory increases. Thirty-two will receive stautory increases in 1944, when they will have served two seasons, and thirty-eight in 1945. Thus there are only seven firemen who have not been benefited, and they were already at the maximum of their class.

CANADIAN FORCES

POSTAL SERVICES—ISSUE OF LETTER FORMS TO PERSONNEL OVERSEAS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. GORDON GRAYDON (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I am not certain whether the question I desire to direct to the government comes within the purview of the Department of National Defence or that of the Postmaster General. I fancy it should be brought to the attention of the Department of National Defence.

A member of the auxiliary services, recently returned from overseas where he worked among the men of the armed forces, is reported to have stated yesterday before a service club in London, Ontario, that men overseas, including those in hospital, were limited to one officially issued letter form per week. He is reported to have pointed out that there is no limitation on the numbers of letters allowed to go from Canada to the armed forces, and he made a plea that steps should be taken to remove limitations on the letters coming from overseas to Canada. I should be glad to have the minister's comments in the matter, and at the same time, if the situation is as described, I would ask the government to take steps to rectify it.

Hon. J. L. RALSTON (Minister of National Defence): I received notice of the question only after coming to the house, and I have not any first-hand information about it.

I believe what is referred to would be the blue air mail letter form. I know when I was in Italy there was a limitation of one per week issued. That was changed about that time, however, to two, if I remember correctly. I had not heard anything about any limitation in the United Kingdom—at least no limitation causing any complaint. I have asked the director of auxiliary services to get me a report in the matter, and I shall endeavour to inform the house as to the situation. Of course I accept the suggestion offered by the leader of the opposition, that if there is any limitation of the kind he has mentioned which can possibly be lessened having regard to existing conditions, I am sure all the services will put forth every possible effort to have it removed or at least to have it reduced.

DOMINION ELECTIONS

MEASURE TO ENABLE WAR SERVICE PERSONNEL TO VOTE IN GENERAL ELECTION

Hon. N. A. McLARTY (Secretary of State) moved the third reading of Bill No. 135, to provide regulations enabling Canadian war service electors to exercise their franchise, and Canadian prisoners of war to vote by proxy, at any general election held during the present war, also to provide amendments to the Dominion Elections Act, 1938, consequential to such regulations, or made necessary by the advent of the said war.

Mr. MAXIME RAYMOND (Beauharnois-Laprairie) (Translation): Mr. Speaker, before this bill is read the third time, I wish . . .

(Text):

Some hon. MEMBERS: Louder.

Mr. RAYMOND: The whips of the various parties have decided to place me in the farthest corner, so that I am sometimes forced to speak louder than others have to speak.

(Translation): I wish to point out certain injustices contained in this bill. Unfortunately, it was moved at the last minute last Friday, and by referring to the record it is found that it was passed almost without discussion and without, I believe, reading each section of the bill. It might be claimed that the bill had been discussed in committee, but I have noticed that this time, as in several other instances, a group which, notwithstanding the small number of its members, represents a large section of the population, has been completely ignored and no member of my group was invited to sit on the committee appointed to examine this bill.

I do not propose to take up the time of the house, but I wish to protest against the discrimination shown to certain classes of soldiers. Thus I find that the members of the reserve army will not have the right to vote unless they have reached the age of twenty-one, whereas the members of the active army will be entitled to vote if they are British subjects even though they are only eighteen or nineteen years old. I am glad that the right to vote has been granted to all those who are serving in the army, regardless of their age.

Besides, in connection with the debate on the plebiscite, I had moved an amendment to grant the right to vote to persons eighteen years of age, but the amendment was rejected by the house. Why bar the members of the reserve army, who are only eighteen and nineteen years of age, from voting, when they are being called up for military service? Why prevent them from voting when they are being mobilized at eighteen, under a hypocritical legislation, which has been called mobilization act while it is a conscription act, and when they are liable, as the minister of National Defence (Mr. Ralston), stated, to be called up for service overseas; indeed, they have been sent to Kiska, Jamaica and Newfoundland. This group of enlisted men are discriminated against and I wish to register my protest before this bill is passed.

Another unfair stipulation is that referring to the appointment of scrutineers. It states that "two of such scrutineers shall be nominated by the Leader of the Government, two by the Leader of the Opposition and two on the joint recommendation of the Leaders of political groups having a recognized membership in the House of Commons of eight or more." I lead a group which, as I stated a moment ago, has not a large membership in this house, but represents a large proportion of the people of this country. A proof of this statement is the fact that, last August, when two by-elections were held in the province of Quebec, the government candidates were badly defeated by representatives of the group of which I am a member.

One of our candidates was elected, and if the other was not successful it was because of the manipulation of lists. In spite of the representations we made to the Secretary of State (Mr. McLarty)—and I must say, by the way, that he is usually most courteous—he did not heed our protests under the circumstances. The lists were prepared in such a way that the names of quite a number of voters from the constituency of Montreal-Cartier were left out. We asked for representatives of our own, but our request was denied under the pretext that it had come too late. However, the candidate of the labour-progressive party, which had no member in this house, was allowed to have some one watch the preparation of lists on his behalf. I am quite glad that such a privilege was granted to him, but why should not—I would not say the same privilege—but the same right, have been granted to a much more considerable group which has members in this house, a group that expresses the views of a large proportion of the Canadian people? It was claimed that our request was belated; well, I have here some documents and telegrams, showing that some kind of revision was ordered but that a sufficient number of officials could not be found, and they were denied to us so that the revision was a comedy; thus hundreds of thousands of names were left out of the lists for the special purpose of preventing the election of the candidate representing the group which I have the honour to lead in this house. The same thing will happen again.

Something similar did happen in connection with the proposed revision of the standing orders of the House of Commons. A change was recommended whereby no division could be recorded unless requested by twenty members, instead of five as at present. The purpose of that change was to prevent a minority which represents a very large body of opinion to demand a vote on certain occasions. In the next general election, we shall have a very large number of candidates in the field, and we are not even going to have the right to have some one look after our interests. What happened in Montreal-Cartier in the 1917 election during the Great War, shows the extreme importance, if we are to have a political party, of having such a representative.

It is said in the bill that a person may "act as representative of a political party at the taking of such votes". But what is meant by a political party? Obviously, an endeavour will be made to interpret the expression "political party" in the light of another section which says that a party must, in order to enjoy that right, have at least eight members in the House of Commons. But a political party which has less than eight members in the house may have in the field, in the next election, more than one hundred candidates and that party will not have a single representative to look after its interests. Such is the discrimination made under this bill. Consequently before its third reading, I wish to voice my protest once more. Since it is claimed that we are fighting for freedom and the protection of the rights of minorities, I say that those minorities should be given the rights for which they are called upon to fight elsewhere.

[Mr. Raymond.]

Motion agreed to and bill read the third time.

Mr. ILSLEY moved that the bill do now pass and that the title be as on the order paper.

Mr. RAYMOND: On division.

Motion agreed to and bill passed.

UNITED NATIONS MUTUAL AID

APPROPRIATION OF $800,000,000 FOR WAR SUPPLIES TO UNITED NATIONS AND OBLIGATIONS UNDER RELIEF AND REHABILITATION AGREEMENT

Hon. J. L. ILSLEY (Miinster of Finance) moved the second reading of Bill No. 138, to amend the War Appropriation (United Nations Mutual Aid) Act, 1943, and for granting to His Majesty aid for the purposes of the said act.

Mr. J. S. ROY (Gaspé): Mr. Speaker, on two previous occasions I have given my reasons for opposing the making of gifts to England, and I should like to put myself on record once more as being against this bill which provides for a gift of $800,000,000 to the united nations. Apparently the government intends to keep on enforcing measures such as this one despite the fact that the people of this country are opposing its stupid policy and are giving warning of their opposition. In the by-elections which were held last summer the people of this country condemned the enforcement of such a policy, but the government does not seem to want to listen to them at all.

It may be that if the results of the Saskatchewan provincial election were known certain people would open their ears and listen to these warnings. Only last summer when a provincial election was held in Ontario the two old parties were nearly wiped off the map. This indicates that the criticism and discontent of the people are coming not only from the province of Quebec but from all over Canada. If the government does not change its policy pretty soon, ultimately we shall have that socialism which makes everyone so frightened. I shall not make any further comments except to say that I strongly oppose this gift to the united nations.

Hon. P. J. ARTHUR CARDIN (Richelieu-Vercheres): Mr. Speaker I have no intention of delaying for any time the consideration of this bill which has been moved for second reading by the Minister of Finance. On previous occasions I have expressed my personal views as to this method of assistance to people who in my opinion enjoy a better financial position than the people of Canada.

I do not need to advance any reasons additional to those I have previously expressed in opposition to a similar measure. I only want to repeat that it seems strange, to my humble judgment, that a small country like Canada, with a population of a little over eleven million, should be called upon to make a contribution or a gift—the name does not matter; the name was changed by the last legislation on this subject but it does not affect the principle at all—of one billion dollars last year and now eight hundred million dollars to a country which is many, many times richer than Canada is or will be for many generations to come. Let us not forget the facts to be considered in these circumstances.

The British empire, which has been directed for many years by highly gifted and talented diplomats and financiers, has developed to a point where it has become one of the greatest empires the world has ever known. Canada is a small country compared with the British empire. Canada is a very small country compared with the British isles. The people of Britain control directly or indirectly almost one-half of the civilized world, and they are in control financially speaking, commercially speaking, economically speaking, of over one-half of the population of the world. Canada is making a gift to that rich country, which for a long time has been the money market of the world, and which has not yet decided to abandon it.

We were told a few days ago, if not yesterday, that the British empire, or England, had been buying for cash to a larger amount than is represented by the gift that we have made in the past and the gift we propose to make under this bill. Is that not an indication that that great country is quite capable of taking care of her obligations and that there is no necessity for a small country like Canada, not a member of the Big Four, to be called upon to make a contribution of $800,000,000? It is said, it is true, that that money goes to other countries as well, but if one looks at the report that has been made by the Minister of Munitions and Supply (Mr. Howe), it will be ascertained that the British empire received of our gift last year three-quarters of a billion dollars. They are capable, financially speaking and economically speaking, of paying, if not at present, at least later, for the purchases they are making in Canada. Why should we be called upon to make such a gift now?

Let us not forget, Mr. Speaker, that at present the cost of the war to the Canadian people is as high as the burden it has imposed upon any of the allied nations of today. The daily cost of the war has risen, according to a recent government publication, "Canada at War", from three cents per head of the population of Canada to $1.16 per head in 1943. That means about $425 a year for every man, woman and child in Canada today. The burden is heavy enough, and I do not think we should be called upon to make an additional contribution in this form.

Far from my mind is the idea that we should not supply what the allied nations need to carry on the war. We should continue to supply the materials they require, the armaments and the food that we have been supplying up to the present time. But why not at least keep a record of it in our books as an advance made to a country which is ten times, a hundred times, richer than Canada? Why not have an open account in order that when the war is over, when all the difficulties and consequences of the war are to be settled, when advantages are to be divided amongst the nations, Canada will have on the ledger something to offset claims that might be made against her or to justify any claim that Canada might see fit to make when the settlement of debts is being made. What harm would it be for Canada to keep a ledger account showing the advances we are making to Britain, if she is not at present in a position to pay in cash for the goods we are sending her? What objection could there be to having that recorded in a ledger in order that we shall have a clear account of our disbursements for the day of final settlement?

An argument has been made which to my mind has no value. It is said: What is the use of having debts on the books that will never be paid? Mr. Speaker, is it not a reflection on the credit of British institutions and on the credit of Britain to say that she will never be in a position to pay for the materials and goods she needs at present and that we have to make her a gift in order to prevent Britain from finding herself later on in the humiliating position of not being able to pay the price of the goods we have sent her? I think that argument is of no value at all. Suppose the debt is not going to be paid, as is argued. There is no objection to keeping an account of that debt in order that we may be able to show after the war is over what Canada has really done in this war, what her contribution to the war has been. It will be interesting then to have that figure, showing the amount we have advanced to the British empire in order to help the British empire to carry on a war that has been started, we will say, for the sake of saving the liberty of the world.

It has been argued, on the other hand, that we should remember that by making these supplies available to the British empire we are providing our workmen with work through the manufacture of the weapons of war and providing our agriculturists with work in supplying foodstuffs. That is a poor argument in my judgment, a very poor argument, Mr. Speaker. If we have that amount of money to spend on manufacturing materials of war and procuring foodstuffs to be given away in the form of gifts, we could very well use that money and that power of production to produce things which are needed in this country and could be consumed here. We could spend this money on articles which would be useful to Canadians, not merely to make goods on the pretext that the purpose is to provide business for our manufacturers and our industrial and agricultural producers. These arguments, in my humble judgment, are no good, and I contend there is no justification in the world for the attitude we have been taking, and are taking at the present time. Without desiring to be unfair or to use unduly severe language, as I was accused of doing last year when I advanced this argument, I would repeat that this is a colonial tribute. Last year it was argued that there was no tribute because our act was voluntary. Well, even if the payment is voluntary, even if these goods are voluntarily given, none the less it is a tribute which we are paying to a country or to a people far richer at this time, and likely to remain so for long after the war is over, than is Canada herself.

The example of the United States may be cited. We may be told that the United States have had for a long time a similar measure on their statute books and that they have been acting under that measure. Surely nobody will seriously make a comparison between Canada and the United States; nobody will compare our wealth, our power of production or our facilities for production with those of the United States. There is no comparison possible either in the economic field, in the matter of population, or in the field of external authority or international authority. Whether we like it or not, we have to recognize that our status as a country cannot be compared internationally with the status of the United States. The United States is an independent country. I know that some hon. members and some newspaper men will say: Well, is not Canada an independent country? I have no hesitation in saying: No, she is not an independent country. This fact was established with the full approval of the government, when the late Minister of Justice argued in this house that Canada could not be neutral in this war, that Canada had to go into the war the moment that one part of the British commonwealth was in the war. I conclude from that argument that we are not an independent country. I agree that we went into this war voluntarily, and I am not ashamed of the action I took at that time. But we went into the war because Britain was at war. Justification can be found for this statement even in the recent speeches made by the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) in London and here in this House of Commons. We went into the war because we were a member of the British commonwealth of nations. This is a society or group of nations, each of which is committed to the defence of the interests of the others; otherwise there could be no such society of nations; there could be no commonwealth without a responsibility on the part of one of the members of the commonwealth toward the interests of any other member which might be endangered. We are not an independent country. We may, if we choose, make a subtle argument on points of law, on texts of jurisprudence and on statutes, but in reality and in practice we have never acted as an independent country, and from the point of view of responsibility and action we are not independent, far less a sovereign nation capable of disposing of herself.

So that we are not in the same position as the United States. Further, the United States have another reason for having entered into the war as they did, two years after Canada declared war. They were attacked. They are on the defensive. They had been assailed by Japan and they are fighting in this war because, having been attacked by that powerful empire, they have a much greater interest in the war than Canada has.

Our position therefore is not at all comparable with that in which the United States find themselves, and we should not be expected to do everything that has been done in that country with regard to this war. We are doing a mighty effort. Canada deserves the credit and praise of all the nations of the world for what she has been doing, because in reality she is doing more than she was ever expected to do in a conflict like this one. After all, this war, according to an English-speaking writer, is a war first of all for power, with liberty and freedom as a result of obtaining power. One has only to go into the library of parliament to find several books by English-speaking writers, Canadians and others, indicating that this war is a war for power. I do not object to that. We have to fight force with force. But I contend that Canada has been doing a lot more than she was expected to do, a lot more than it was thought she would be capable of doing.

We are not among the Big Four. What is the use of our boasting and making all the propaganda which is being issued? We are not going to be consulted when the peace terms are drafted; we shall be informed what the decision has been after the four great powers have met, and Canada will have to accept their decisions and the consequences. With that I find no fault. Canada is not one of the great powers of the world. We are a small nation with great aspirations and with very strong hopes for the future, but we have not yet realized our hopes; we have not yet achieved what we think we are capable of achieving by the development of all our resources. We are still a small nation of eleven millions and we should not load ourselves with too many debts, because we do not know what the situation is going to be when peace does come.

I repeat, I am not objecting so much to the fact that we are spending money in the manufacture of armaments and the production of food in order to help the allies, but I want a statement to be kept of what we are giving to the British empire so that when the time does come to divide what there is to be divided, if there is anything to be divided, something will be there to represent in totality what is the share of Canada.

These are my views, which I have expressed as calmly as I could and in all sincerity, though without much hope of making any change in the minds of the hon. members sitting in this house. They are entitled to their own views, their own opinions, as I am entitled to mine. They are as free as I am to express their views openly and to voice their sentiments; otherwise what are we fighting for, if not for the liberty to express our opinions, whether it pleases or not the majority or the minority in Canada? I am under no misapprehension as to the effect of my observations. I feel that they will not convince the supporters of the government; they will not convince the members of the opposition and other members in the house; they will not even shake the conviction of a large section of the representatives of the province of Quebec in this House of Commons. Those members will continue just the same to support the government in this measure, as they have supported the government on other measures. But I thought that I should again speak openly on the subject. This question to my mind is one of the important matters we have to deal with in debating matters relating to the war.

I have the satisfaction at least of having voiced the views and the thoughts of the majority of the citizens of my province. I will go farther than that and say that they are also the views and the thoughts of many citizens living in other provinces.

Mr. S. H. KNOWLES (Winnipeg North Centre): The views of the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation on this important measure have been expressed on previous occasions when comparable bills were before the house, so that it is not necessary for me to speak at any considerable length. However, I feel that our position should be restated. First of all, we accept the indivisibility of the common cause in which we are all engaged at the present time. Acting from that premise, we agree with those who feel that we should make to the fullest of our capacity whatever contribution we can, whether it be in service on our own behalf or whether it be a contribution to our allies over and above what they purchase from us, as is proposed in this bill.

I know that the government, perhaps I should say members of the party on the opposite side, do not often give us credit for some of the things we do; but I think this should be said, that we in this group, despite the fact that in some quarters there is misunderstanding of this measure, despite the fact that there is some criticism of it, definitely avoid making any political capital out of that criticism. In fact we go to the other extreme and do our best to set aside misunderstanding and to explain just what this bill involves. I know that efforts along that line have been made in particular by the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell), who leads this group, and I would hope that further efforts might be made by a number of parties in this house, and that still further efforts might be made by the government to allay the misunderstandings that exist in certain quarters. The Minister of Finance (Mr. Ilsley) has done a pretty good job along that line in some of the statements that he has made in this house. I would suggest to the government that through its propaganda agencies of one sort or another, this is a job that should be undertaken throughout the country, to help our people realize that what we have in this measure is not some mark of colonial subjugation, not some means of bankrupting the country, but rather a means whereby we are enabled to make a contribution of which I feel Canadians generally are proud.

I repeat that, as we see it, this bill—the whole concept of mutual aid legislation—is based on the principle of the absolute indivisibility of the struggle in which we are engaged. I may say at this point that we feel that that principle should be kept in mind for the years that lie ahead. Never again, I hope, shall we think of the world in which we live as one which can be divided up into small sectors. We are engaged in this war as one set of united nations. When the struggle is over, if we are to have peace, it too must be recognized as indivisible, and some of the principles we are seeking to carry out in this bill, such as those involved in UNRRA, we feel, must be carried over and extended in the post-war period.

It warms my heart to talk at times with members of this house from other parties and to find how general, how sincere, how earnest is the desire of members, whatever their political or social philosophy may be, that we may not have to go into another world war some years after this one is over. I earnestly plead that we should recognize, as one principle upon which we must act if we are to avoid another war, the indivisibility of peace and the necessity of being concerned about the lot of our brothers the world over. I hope we shall never forget the principle upon which we have acted in passing these mutual aid bills from year to year.

Another principle which I feel is highlighted by the passing of this bill was stated particularly well by the Minister of Finance on March 3, 1943, at page 931 of Hansard. I should like to quote a sentence which I feel is very significant:

No country goes bankrupt in this way;—

And I emphasize the remainder of the sentence:

—no country goes bankrupt by increasing its production and devoting part or all or more than all of that increase to a supreme cause.

The minister was answering arguments advanced by certain opposition members to the effect that the country was being bankrupted by the huge sums of money being spent on the war. He made certain other comments at that time as well, which I feel might be quoted again, though I do not wish anyone to think I agree with everything said by the Minister of Finance because I am giving these quotations. I quote now from page 930 of Hansard for last year:

We do not pay for the war out of some hoard of money that we have accumulated in the past. We pay for it out of the taxes and savings that we obtain from the current income of the whole nation. We shall not run short of money.

I emphasize that; the minister said, "We shall not run short of money."

Indeed, our danger is the very reverse of that, namely, that we may pile up too much money in the pockets and bank accounts of Canadians, unless we strive with every effort to promote the sale of victory bonds and war savings certificates.

If we are bankrupting the nation, is it not indeed a strange type of bankruptcy? How can we use such a term to describe the process under which this country has doubled its national income in three years, has wiped out unemployment, has multiplied its production of many things and learned many types of new skills, has expanded and diversified its production equipment, has multiplied its governmental revenues by more than four times, has enabled millions of its citizens to acquire a nest-egg for the future, has mobilized its full strength as a producing machine, and has developed a sense of productive achievement not hitherto known?

Immediately following that the minister used the words I have quoted already. It seems to me that at that time he laid down a principle which underlies mutual aid, which underlies the mobilizing and organizing of our productive capacity for the war effort, and which should stand before us as a principle to be carried into the post-war period. Many of us are criticized, and some hon. members attempt in their criticism to make us appear ridiculous, when we advocate a much higher standard of living for the Canadian people after the war, when we suggest what at present seem rather high figures for old age pensions, and matters of the kind; yet on that same day the Minister of Finance said:

We can and must make use of that increased capacity after the war. We must develop that potential to the maximum. If we do, we can develop a far higher standard of living for the average Canadian than he has ever known before. . . .

My point is that I believe the Minister of Finance is absolutely right when he says we do not bankrupt a country by tremendously increasing our productive capacity and devoting a huge portion of that increase, or more than the increase, to a great cause. That is what we are doing at the present time, and that is what many of us hope we will do after the war. We maintain that we are not advocating something ridiculous, that we are not advocating bankruptcy when we say that following the war the economy of this country should be organized on a basis of full, all-out production to meet a great cause then, just as we are called upon to meet a great cause now. At the present time the great cause is the defeat of nazism and the preservation of our liberties. When the war is over the great cause will be the demands of peace, of a better life for all our people. I am sure the hon. members who preceded me will agree that this principle should be acted upon in the post-war period, and I had hoped that perchance this year they might have reached the point where they would have some hope that this would be done—that after the war we would continue the policy of organizing our production on a high level and devoting a large portion of it to the great cause of peace. My hope was that some of those who have opposed these measures previously might come to understand them in those terms and be prepared to support the measure this year, realizing that the struggle in which we are engaged is a great task, and having the hope and assurance that the same principle would be carried over into the post-war period; for that is our position.

During the past several days references have been made on a number of occasions to getting certain things free. I feel that the hon. member for Macleod (Mr. Hansell) perhaps chose the wrong word when he spoke of getting things for nothing, even with respect to mutual aid, for example. Nothing in this world is had for nothing. The world is not getting free the supplies that we make available. We in Canada, as part of the united nations, are contributing the effort, the energy and the work necessary to produce those supplies. But what is involved, if I may again use the language of the Minister of Finance, is this: that on a national scale, indeed on a united nations scale, we are planning for the greatest production possible. Then, by a national decision, we take a portion of that great production and devote it to a great cause. What we are asking in the post-war period, when we suggest there should be better old age pensions and other forms of social security and a higher standard of living for our people, is not that something be given for nothing, not that something be plucked out of thin air, but that this same principle be carried over; that we organize our production on a national scale on the highest possible basis, and then, by a national decision, take a large portion of that increased production and devote it to a great cause.

Mr. BLACKMORE: If the hon. member will permit a question, would he propose to pay for that portion with increased debt in Canada, as we are doing during the war?

Mr. KNOWLES: The minister, in the passages to which I referred, pointed out—although I am afraid he did not really follow it through—that we are paying for this war, not out of some hoard, in other words not out of something that has to be put back, but out of current income, current production. That is our contention—that no matter what the financiers and the bookkeepers may think, the war is being fought to-day, not out of dollars that will be paid out in the future, not out of future production. The planes, guns, tanks, food and clothing we are using in this war are being provided out of present production.

Mr. HOMUTH: Who is going to buy the bonds?

Mr. KNOWLES: We are carrying on the war out of goods that are being produced at the present time.

Mr. HOMUTH: We are also committing ourselves to billions of dollars of indebtedness to our people.

Mr. KNOWLES: We are committing ourselves, unfortunately, to the principle of taxing future production, and of paying a portion of that future production to certain people who are getting control of the debt of the country.

Mr. HOMUTH: Oh, no. The indebtedness is with the people of the country. That is nonsense.

Mr. KNOWLES: We have had plenty of statistics tabled in the house to show how debt in this country is divided, where the national debt will be held in the years which lie ahead, and who will benefit mostly from that.

Mr. HOMUTH: It is held by insurance companies—and that is the money of the people.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): There were 30,000 people in my constituency who bought victory bonds.

Mr. KNOWLES: Another point I wish to speak about is that this bill has highlighted the principle that it is undesirable to build up inter-allied debts to be carried over into the post-war period. That is the principle which underlay lend-lease when it was initiated in the United States, and I regard it as one of the principles underlying mutual aid in Canada. I have re-read with interest the debate which took place on this point last year when the Mutual Aid bill was before the house, and I think I know what answers the Minister of Finance might make. But it still seems to me that if the principle is valid that we should not increase our inter-allied debts because of the war, then that principle should be extended to the point of our endeavouring now to clear the decks of such inter-allied debt as we had before the war.

I feel it should be stated again on behalf of this group that now is the time to be discussing the repatriation of Canadian securities still held in England. We do not feel, and we are not prepared to accept the charge, that that is demanding cash on the barrel head. The position we would take is this. We support the bill, and we support the view that this contribution should be made, even if there is a refusal on the part of the United Kingdom government to consider the proposal to repatriate those securities. In other words there is no demand, there is no insistance that there must be cash on the barrel head. But we are suggesting that if it is recognized as a principle that inter-allied debts should not be built up, then it is an equally valid principle that such debts as now exist, which call for the diversion of a great portion of the wealth of this country to individuals in other countries after the war is over, should be cancelled. I say that now, when we are pooling our resources, thinking of the indivisibility of the common cause, and working together as a partner with the united nations, is a good time to suggest that there should be repatriation of those securities, so that some of the great corporations of Canada, the ownership of which is now to such a large extent outside this country, might come to the people of the country.

Mr. ILSLEY: If my hon. friend will permit me, when I used the term "inter-allied debts" I meant inter-governmental debts. So that the hon. member is announcing a new principle. He is not applying my principle when he extends the definition of inter-allied debts beyond inter-governmental debts.

Mr. KNOWLES: I accept the statement made by the minister as to his position, but it seems to me that debts which have to be paid to people in another country, after the war, out of wealth produced in this country, have the same effect on the economy of this country and on the standard of living and welfare of our people. I am quite prepared to accept his statement as to his understanding of the principle involved in the bill. But the principle should be carried farther, as I have suggested.

Mr. ILSLEY: Does the hon. member not sacrifice the first principle, the indivisibility of the common cause, if he requires payments in securities? The hon. member could only be proceeding on the basis of the supplying of goods being a sale to a nation whose cause was separate from the cause of the supplier of the goods. If the hon. member applies his principle of the indivisibility of the common cause he cannot require payment in cash or securities.

Mr. HOMUTH: They have always left off the "in"; it has always been "divisibility."

Mr. KNOWLES: There seems to be a good deal of misunderstanding in many quarters around here. I think I made it quite clear a moment ago that we feel that payment in these securities should not be demanded. In fact, it is not payment we are talking about, but cancelation of debt. My statement was that we support this measure, first and foremost; and we say that this contribution should be made on the basis of the indivisibility of the common cause. And even though the minister is not prepared to go that far with me, we feel that as part of that indivisibility of the common cause it is a good idea to clear the decks of debt as between nations, between governments and between individuals in those various nations. We suggest that now is a good time to discuss that matter, so that when the war is over we shall not find ourselves with these barriers between us; barriers which were there before the war started. During this war we have realized that trade among nations, particularly with respect to war supplies, but also with respect to food and other civilian goods, must be planned. We have developed the concept of bulk purchases. We even had an announcement in the house not long ago from the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) respecting a plan for the sale of bacon to Great Britain over a period which we hope will extend into the post-war years. Our contention is that these principles, which the war has forced us to recognize, are good.

Thus I emphasize the indivisibility of the common cause, and the fact that when we devote a large portion of increased production, or more than the increase, to a great cause, we are not bankrupting our people. I suggest also that the principle of clearing the decks of debts which have been barriers between us is a good one, and should be carried over into the post-war period.

Mr. HOMUTH: In 1939 and 1940 how were you contributing to the common cause?

Mr. KNOWLES: It was not my intention, Mr. Speaker, to speak at length, but I have been kept going by the interesting interjections which have been coming from various quarters. However, I was anxious to make clear our position in respect of this measure. We feel that the principles to which I have pointed as being part of this bill should be highlighted, should be remembered and should be acted upon, not only now but after the war. We feel, too, that at the present time this measure should pass.

Mr. E. G. HANSELL (Macleod): Mr. Speaker, I made some comments on this matter yesterday when it was in the resolution stage. There is not a great deal more that I care to say, but since the bill is up for second reading and some hon. members have preceded me, I am prompted to say a few things further. This group was in favour of the principle embodied in this bill as far back as when we first began to give aid to Britain a few years ago, and has consistently favoured it throughout.

On the surface the bill appears to be a magnanimous gesture on the part of Canada toward the united nations, but it may not be so magnanimous when all the details of the intricate financial operations are understood. I do not claim to understand them all. On the surface it appears that we are producing so much goods and are taking $800,000,000 worth of them and giving them to the united nations. That is the general and broad principle; that is why it appears to be a magnanimous gesture. When it comes to the financial operations and all the details of how the thing is handled, that is another matter, and one which requires a good deal of study. I do not claim to be a financial expert. As a matter of fact some of us have been studying some of these things for a good many years and even now I must confess that I feel I am only beginning to touch the fringe of a tremendous and vast subject. That is the thought that strikes me when I begin to go into all the intricacies of the machinery of our financial operations.

However, it does not take a great deal of study or a superabundance of intelligence to understand a few of the outstanding principles embodied in a measure of this kind or even in the general economy of the country or of nations as a whole. I said that on the face of it this bill appears to be a magnanimous gesture to the united nations, and I do not see how one can oppose it on those grounds. I have heard the remarks of one or two speakers this afternoon and it seems to me they might benefit from an imaginative illustration of what the government is doing. Let us suppose I find myself mixed up in a sort of brawl, that I am faced with a parade of rebels coming down the street with torches, sticks, guns, axes and clubs and my neighbours come running to me saying: They are going to burn down your house; they are against us! My friends step out and try to disperse the mob, and in doing so they use my axe, my gun and my pitchfork. After they have dispersed the mob should I turn to them and say: Thank you, gentlemen; that was a wonderful thing, but you have destroyed my axe, you have broken my pitchfork, and I will have to charge you for them; you have destroyed my land and my garden, and you must pay me so much money?

Of course you would say that would be a foolish thing to do; you would say it would be senseless to do that. But in principle that is exactly what is happening. I am certain that if it had not been for many circumstances the nazis might have completed their march of the continents. Some things have happened in this war which were considered impossible when it started. When we see that happening which was thought to be impossible, there is no reason to sit back and say: We are far away from the scene; the nazis can never get over here. They might have got over here; we do not know.

For instance, what happened to Great Britain? That country took the greatest possible punishment that any nation could take. The hon. member for Wetaskiwin (Mr. Jaques) was in England a few months ago, and he told me the other day that one out of ten people you see on the streets of England is in uniform. We know that England took it. What are we doing now? We are simply saying: We want to share in this; and we take measures such as this to carry out that wish.

However, as I said, it may not be such a wonderful thing when we consider the details of its operation. The minister may correct me if my diagnosis of these operations is not the right one. There are a lot of intricacies about the way this proposal operates. I cannot go into the minister's department and discover this, that or the other thing, although I might be welcomed there. It seems to me that the net result of all this kind of legislation is simply that we are giving Great Britain a credit of $800,000,000. That is reflected in the goods that we ship over there.

I do not know whether the minister will answer this at some future time, but I should like to ask whether it makes any material difference, whether $800,000,000 will go into the Canadian debt structure or $800,000,000 into the British debt structure. The hon. member for Richelieu-Verchères (Mr. Cardin) said, as I understood him, that he wanted to know the goods that went over there, that there should be a sort of inventory made of what was shipped out. To my mind in an operation of this kind it does not make a particle of difference what is shipped out. As a matter of fact I have some doubt whether the government can tell us what goods will actually come under this particular measure. So far as I can see, in the end it only means that Great Britain will not have to pay Canada $800,000,000. In other words, $800,000,000 is lopped off Great Britain's debt to Canada.

There is another aspect of the matter which, while it has not confused me, has given me occasion for some little thought. While this may appear to be a gift to Britain, in reality it is not a gift of goods to the Briitsh people.

In other words, the British people are not getting their goods for nothing. They have to pay for them just the same. A million sacks of flour, we will say, go over to Great Britain. Suppose there is a label on those sacks of flour, "Gift to Britain" or "Mutual Aid to Britain—milled in Canada." That does not mean for a moment that the people of Britain can go to the retail stores and say: Oh, this is a gift to us; I will take one of those sacks of flour. No, the people of Great Britain when they want to buy that flour must pay, to use the expression of the Minister of Finance, cash on the barrel head, whatever that may be—I do not know why barrel head is brought into it. I would like the minister or some other competent authority to trace that money through. Here are half a million people buying half a million dollars' worth of our goods. The money comes out of their pockets. It passes over the counters. The retailers get the money and pay their debts, and where does the money eventually repose? I ask that question. I have not been able to follow it through. Does it repose in the British treasury, or does it repose in some purchasing board or in the banking institutions of Great Britain? That may be a small matter, but it is something I would like to have made clear. So far as I can see, the only result is that $800,000,000 of credit is cut off from the debt owed by Great Britain to Canada.

May I put it in this way? We pass this bill, and we send to Great Britain $800,000,000 worth of goods. Those goods have to be paid for in Canada; the $800,000,000 to pay for them comes out of either borrowings or taxation, and I think it will be discovered that most of it comes out of borrowings. The people of Canada then owe the greater portion of that $800,000,000; for it is chalked up as part of the national debt. Personally I do not believe that Canada's debt will ever be paid off; it may be, but I do not think so.

Mr. HOMUTH: Not with this government.

Mr. HANSELL: I do not think it will be paid off with any government, and when I make that statement let me say emphatically that I am not breaking down any confidence which the people of Canada have in the victory bonds they now hold. They will be paid, certainly. They will be paid through some sort of refunding scheme; we shall continue to refund every so many years and the debt will still remain. This $800,000,000 will go into our debt structure, and it can remain there, so far as I am concerned, for centuries to come. The burden on the people of Canada is to pay the interest on that $800,000,000.

Let us transplant our thoughts for a moment to Great Britain. Suppose Great Britain handles her debt as we handle ours, and retires her maturing obligations only by postponing them through a process of refunding. If my premise is right, why cannot the $800,000,000 go into the debt structure of Britain instead of into ours? That is a question I should like to have answered if possible.

Some who have spoken this afternoon have referred to the merits of this bill with respect to the post-war period. By this bill a certain principle is established, I agree; and what is the principle? The principle that is established is that it is possible to pay for something, and then after you have paid for it or borrowed to pay for it—I do not care how it is done—it is possible to give it away.

The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) has stated that what we need in the post-war period is to organize our production on a very high level, perhaps on a higher level than that of to-day. I have no fault to find with that, except that if that is all you do, you do not solve the problem; for the problem that Canada faces now is not the problem of production at all. That problem has been solved. As the Minister of Munitions and Supply said last night, our present productive genius has reached the point where we can produce everything in Canada. The problem now is how to get the goods to the people. You cannot get them to the people through the amount of money that goes into the pockets of the people in wages, salaries, dividends, interest and profits, because there is not enough money coming out of that process to buy back all the goods that can be produced, and so you will always have a surplus of goods. As the surpluses pile up, you are going to put men out of work. The problem is not to find everybody jobs. As a matter of fact in a very high order of civilization the cutting down of the working hours, reducing the number of man-hours, giving people more time to themselves—that is the ideal objective. If by a process of using purchasing power as a free gift to our people, starting with old age pensions if you like, you can buy the surplus goods and get them into the hands of the people who need them, I ask, is there anything wrong with that? Oh, somebody may say, that would be something for nothing. My friend says it does not come out of thin air. Let me change the terminology and say that by the use of free purchasing power the money will come out of the end of a fountain pen; for that is the way the money comes out now, and it stands as a debt.

If the principle of this bill is right—and evidently it is, for it is working—there is no reason why the principle of the bill cannot be applied in the post-war period. There is no reason why we cannot produce and buy the goods, do the same thing we are doing under this bill, but give them to our own people instead of to the people of other nations. That is my position.

I agree with the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre that an important principle is involved here, and the charming thing about it is that it is a principle that is working. Let us put it to work inside Canada when peace comes.

We in this group, Mr. Speaker, are in favour of the bill.

Mr. KARL K. HOMUTH (Waterloo South): Before we carry this bill there are one or two remarks I would like to make with respect to it. I listened attentively to the remarks of the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles), acting leader of the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation, this afternoon, and his enunciation of great principles touching what we should do and where Canada should stand. My memory went back to the years 1938, 1939 and 1940, when the principle enunciated by the hon. member's party was that the only attitude Canada should take in the war was, how much profit could we make out of it and how many jobs could be provided in this country by supplying materials for overseas.

The one matter about which I am alarmed is as to what materials are being purchased with the money voted under this and like bills. No one doubts that, regardless of all the resolutions which are passed and all the committees which are set up, when the war is over there will be strong economic competition between countries. In the little yellow book containing the report of the Canadian mutual aid board I note a list, running only to the end of March, 1944, of of some of the things we are purchasing and providing for Russia. That country has always been represented to Canadians by members of the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation party as a land flowing with milk and honey, with an ideal diversity and divisibility of effort, where nothing is wrong, where collective farming and every other activity ordinarily associated with socialism is practised; and in this list I observe that large numbers of machines and quantities of other equipment are being dispatched to Russia under this mutual aid arrangement. If my information is correct, orders from Soviet Russia to the value of millions upon millions of dollars are now being worked on in various factories of the dominion. I think the people of Canada would like to know whether these products, particularly these machines, are for war purposes. Personally I think they are not, because the orders I have in mind cannot be completed before the end of the war if the war should end within the next two or three years. How much of the money allocated to mutual aid is going in payment of these machines? It must be assumed that these machines are to go into the economic set-up of Soviet Russia and will be operating in the economic war which will follow this war; and unless the Russians raise their standards of living to those of Canada—which, however some may criticize them, are the highest of any country in the world—these machines will be operated against the interests of the working men of Canada.

Mr. ILSLEY: The hon. gentleman is mistaken. No non-war machines are being supplied to Soviet Russia on mutual aid.

Mr. HOMUTH: I am willing to take the minister's word for that, but it does not wholly reassure me. If Russia has money to pay for these millions upon millions of dollars' worth of orders which are being given in Canada for the advantage of their future economy, they should be able to pay for some of the things which come under the mutual aid scheme. I do not know how the matter is worked out. I doubt if the minister knows; I doubt whether anyone knows except Russia herself. It is a serious matter, and we should see to it that whatever money we freely give or whatever equipment is provided without charge is given in such a way that the interests of Canadian working men will not be jeopardized when the war is over.

Mr. H. R. JACKMAN (Rosedale): I not only support the administration in the $800 million mutual aid bill, but, as the minister probably knows, I go somewhat farther. I did not have the pleasure this afternoon of hearing the remarks of the hon. member for Richelieu-Vercheres (Mr. Cardin) or all the remarks of the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles); but knowing the tenor of the remarks of the first-mentioned hon. member I should like to say a few things with regard to what I consider mutual aid to be.

The present resolution calls for an additional $800 million, which is $200 million less than last year. As to the part of the $800 million which goes to Britain, we know that Great Britain has virtually no Canadian assets with which to pay for the war material which she receives.

Last night the Minister of Finance (Mr. Ilsley) put on the record the various amounts of Canadian securities held in Great Britain which were taken over, the amount of gold, and also the amount of $205 million in war assets owned by Great Britain in Canada, some of which represented plants constructed here before the war for the purpose of producing shells and other necessary munitions. There are to-day virtually no Canadian assets held by Great Britain, and if we are to supply these various munitions to that country so that she may use them in the fighting, they must be given to her, or provided; and it is not considered good policy on our part, even good business, to take back a note which might be payable some time in the future—not considering for one moment what the equity or the morality of the case might be.

However, I should like to point out what the Minister of Finance said on March 18, 1942, in answer to some of the allegations made by the hon. member for Richelieu-Vercheres. He said, as reported in Hansard, page 1423:

> I should also mention that the arrangements proposed in this resolution do not alter the amount of money we must raise in Canada for war purposes.

In other words this so-called gift is a horrible misnomer; it is not a gift to Great Britain, as I shall hope subsequently to prove; it is in reality, although this may sound strange to some, a gift to Canada. The minister went on, referring to the amount of money which Canada must raise:

> That is determined by the scope of our effort and not by the method of settling the accounts. Whether we lend the money to Britain, or give the goods to her, we must continue to find the funds to pay Canadian farmers, fishermen, lumbermen, miners and munitions workers who produce the goods. All that is really in question in this resolution, and the bill which will follow it is the means by which the accounts are to be settled—who is to be charged for them and what form the international balance sheet will take.

So that we have it on the highest financial authority in the house that this so-called gift is at no cost whatsoever to Canada, because we would be producing the goods in any case, or incurring the costs which are involved in these goods, whether in the manufacture of the goods or in some other form of man-power which I shall subsequently illustrate.

So far as the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre is concerned—and I assume he is speaking for the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation party—we find that on September 9, 1939, during the short war session, the following statement by the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell), the leader of that party. Reading from the platform of his party he says:

> Canada should be prepared to defend her own shores, but her assistance overseas should be limited to economic aid—

Now I assume, Mr. Speaker, that that economic aid was not going to be something with a dollar or sterling sign attached for which we were going to bring back money. I presume that the leader of the C.C.F. party meant, when he said that Canada's contribution should not be man-power but economic aid, that it was to be at least a free gift. If I am wrong in that, I hope that whoever speaks for the C.C.F. will correct me. Then he goes on:

> —and the aid must not include conscription of man-power or the sending of any expeditionary force.

Furthermore, in section 3 of their declaration, he states:

> No military participation overseas: Any attempt to send a force abroad would rob us of the man-power necessary for the defence of our shores and for home production.

I assume that home production does not just mean necessary foodstuffs and clothing to look after the Canadian population, but home production of that economic aid which the leader of the C.C.F. was willing that we should give to our ally fighting in the cause of humanity.

So that we find that both the Minister of Finance, acting for the government and the party he represents, and the C.C.F. at the present time in their suggestions that we take back not only what we have in the way of Canadian securities held by Great Britain, but also any small amount of securities, relatively, which they may still have but which have been in effect pledged against the $700,000,000 credit—both wish to take back these very securities at a time when Great Britain is, to say the least, at a disadvantage if not down as far as financial bargaining and fair treatment are concerned.

What I want to point out is that when Canada declared war, we declared an all-out war. We were not holding back some of our man-power for our own purposes. We decided that we would go into the war because we felt it was our war, that Canada would be ultimately in danger and that we must contribute everything possible. Because of the protection which this country was afforded by the Royal Navy and by the battle line which was held so well by Great Britain, we have been privileged to produce goods in this country, and if we had not been able to produce goods in this country we should have been in a very sorry plight. And may I suggest that it was unfair of Canada to take back from Great Britain any of the Canadian-held securities in that country, because, if we were waging an all-out war, it was impossible for us to build up a debt against one of our allies who was in turn using those munitions and foodstuffs in order that she might more effectively fight the enemy, who was also our enemy, but which enemy happened to be at our ally's front door. If we had not sent the goods, whether foodstuffs or munitions of war, which have been sent under the billion-dollar gift and under the subsequent mutual aid measures to Great Britain and the other united nations, we would not have produced those goods in Canada, because in an all-out war we produce only enough to look after the necessary supplies and requirements of our own people, and the surplus man-power over and above the number necessary to produce those supplies will be put into the fighting services in order that the enemy shall not come to these shores.

But what did we do? It may have been the best policy from the point of view of high strategy to keep a larger number of men in this country producing these necessary goods and materials for our allies instead of having this extra number of men in the fighting services, whether it be in the navy, in the army or in the air force. We were allowed to keep these men here producing these goods and still come under the scope of an all-out war effort. Had we done less, we should not have been able to consider ourselves as fighting an all-out war—and I am not suggesting for a moment that we did not do the right thing, because our material contribution has been most effective. But it has only been a substitute for sending more men overseas. We in this country, as we hear so frequently, are a most productive nation and have produced far above the amount necessary for our own consumption. We have enjoyed a standard of living, since the war, which the people as a whole have never enjoyed before. But on top of that production we have been enabled to send foodstuffs and munitions to Great Britain and the other united nations. I suggest that not only should we not ask for payment, but we should not have taken the last Canadian dollar from Great Britain or any other of the united nations. Just because they had some Canadian money, we took it to the last cent. We did not take more because there was no more to take. But if the policy of the present government had been followed through and there had been more money I assume there would not have been any billion dollar gift, nor would there have been any mutual aid. We took the last drop, and no more, because there was no more.

What has been the effect of this privileged position in which Canada finds herself? It simply means that we have been enabled to keep more men at home producing these necessary goods and still have an all-out war effort. If we had not been able to do that and had had more men in the armed services, those men would have been available to fight. Go through our aircraft factories and you will find young men, from twenty to thirty, receiving the highest priorities because they are working on essential war material. But if we had not been sending these articles over, these young men would have been in the services; many of them unfortunately would lose their lives or come back maimed, and we would have a pension bill to pay and allowances of one sort and another, which would be more costly than the few hundred millions that we contribute annually by way of mutual aid.

I say therefore that mutual aid is not a contribution or a gift to Great Britain. It is a gift to Canada, and if I were of the same mind as some of my colleagues in this house—and I presume the speech of the hon. member for Richelieu-Vercheres was along the same line as it was in former sessions—I should be in favour not of $800,000,000 to the united nations through mutual aid; I should be in favour of a $5,000,000,000 gift, because this money symbol which we talk about merely confuses the issue. The $800,000,000, or $5,000,000,000 is merely a sign which, as the Minister of Finance has said before, measures the extent of the man-power effort; and if we were privileged to make the $5,000,000,000 gift of munitions and foodstuffs to the allied cause we would have to have more men retained in Canada. So that if we are giving $800,000,000 it means that we in Canada are privileged because of our position, because of the protection afforded us by the air forces of the united nations, and particularly by the Royal Air Force and the Royal Navy, to make a most valuable contribution by keeping a certain number of our young men at home working in essential war industries and on farms. I point out again that the so-called billion dollar gift, originally, and now mutual aid, is nothing more than self-aid to Canada. I do not think, sir, anyone needs to point out that no country has made a greater contribution relatively and perhaps absolutely to the whole war effort than has Great Britain. Certainly the battle of Britain made it possible for the nations on this side of the ocean to arm and gird themselves for the conflict, so that they might fight for their self-preservation. We see the happy results of that preparation in the attacks which are going on to-day, notwithstanding the fact that we must at the same time also suffer the loss of many of our loved ones.

I should like to answer one of the arguments of the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles), who said that since we have taken back all the Canadian government and government-guaranteed debt held by Great Britain, we should also take over the shares of certain corporations, particularly if they have a strategic value in implementing the policy of the party to which the hon. member belongs, with which policy few of us agree. I say that to suggest such a thing now, in the face of the arguments I have put forward, is nothing but—I do not want to use a word for which I should be sorry later, but to my mind it would be very low dealing. We are participating in a common cause, and that participation cannot be measured in dollars and cents. We must all do our utmost, and we ought not at any time to have taken from Great Britain the securities which were repatriated, because Great Britain was at a disadvantage and had to make any agreement necessary in order to get the supplies she needed. I am not suggesting that we would not have given them to her anyway; as the Minister of Finance said, it has not cost us anything because we would have spent the money anyway. I do not know who advised the action, but because Britain had those securities we took them back, and it was unfair. What I have said applies not only to our own country. I think of our good neighbours to the south, who under lend-lease have made most valuable contributions to the various united nations. In the early days of lend-lease, however, before the United States became an active participant in the war, United States securities held by British nationals were taken over and there were also forced sales of British-owned American plants, such as the American Viscose company and others. And that was exactly what we did, to a certain extent. There may have been some excuse for this action on the part of the United States, because she was not an active participant in the war, as we were almost from the very beginning, and she had to placate a large body of isolationists among her people. Those circumstances did not apply to Canada in any way. I believe the principle of lend-lease should be extended in its entirety, and I do not think there should have been any improvement in the position of any country as a result of the war. It was said by the Prime Minister of New Zealand, and heartily endorsed by our friends of the C.C.F., that no man should be better off because of the war, and I would extend that principle by saying that no nation should be better off because of the war. When one country fighting in a common cause with another takes advantage of that position and acquires certain assets which the other country possessed, and now has them in her own treasury, certainly that is taking advantage of a country during a crisis and while a common cause is being prosecuted.

I believe the whole idea of mutual aid has been confused by the dollar sign. I find that some people who should be in a position to know better, because of their handling of financial affairs, do not fully understand this matter. I have tried to point out that we have not been making a gift to anyone except to our own people, and I am thankful that we have been able to do so, that we have been able to keep some people at home here and put them to work effectively helping to win the war without having to risk their lives. However, I suggest that in the post-war period, when the largest purchaser of Canadian products can no longer buy our goods so extensively because she will not have the Canadian exchange with which to pay for them, the effect on Canada's trade will be bad. So that perhaps in the long run we have not helped ourselves by trying to balance the accounts by taking over some of these securities. Certainly it is my reasoned judgment, and within my conception of the nature of mutual aid and the financial consequences attendant upon it, that this country should return to Britain the Canadian securities which were taken from that country, because we are all fighting in a joint effort. No one will rise in this house and suggest that Great Britain's effort has been less than ours, or that our effort has been less than that of any other nation. We are all engaged in a common cause, and these financial considerations should not be taken into account, nor should adjustments be made at the present time or perhaps at any time. We are all involved; we are marching together along the road to victory.

Mr. MAXIME RAYMOND (Beauharnois-Laprairie) (Translation): Mr. Speaker, I have listened carefully last evening to the remarks of the Minister of Finance (Mr. Ilsley) in support of the present bill which he calls a mutual aid bill. According to the statement of the Minister of Finance and the explanation of the meaning of the words "mutual aid," the assistance which the other nations give us in return consists in their fighting efficiently at our side. But if it be true that they fight with us, we also fight with them. Therefore, if, according to the Minister of Finance this is what mutual aid means, then we have done our share. However, the Minister of Finance seems to forget the speeches made by the Prime Minister, by the ministers of national defence for air, for naval services and for the army, in which they claimed that our war effort was greater than that of any other country. Therefore, since our contribution in men, war materials and supplies of all kinds, in proportion to our population and to our means, not only equals but exceeds that of any other country, why, then, this additional contribution in the form of a gift, of a gift in disguise. Indeed, we have been hoodwinked long enough. Words are used in an attempt to mislead us as to what is being done.

This morning I was reading the debates of the British House of Commons on the budget as presented, and here is what Sir William Smithers said on April 25 last:

(Text):

The right hon. gentleman also referred to the help that we get from overseas. I wonder if the country realizes what that really means. America is sending us not only munitions of war but food and raw materials on lend lease principles. I do not know of any account that is being kept of this. I have not seen any published.

Canada in 1942-43 made us a princely gift of £225,000,000—

That means a billion dollars. And do not forget—"a princely gift". It is a gift. Then:

—in 1943-44 a further gift to the allied cause on lend-lease principles of the same amount, and she is going to do the same this year.

They call that a gift. And then he says:

I understand that Canada is also supporting the cost of her own forces wherever they are.

We are paying for them—for every soldier we send overseas. We are supplying them with munitions. And now we are asked to give another gift of $800,000,000.

(Translation): How is it that Canada, of all the members of the British Commonwealth, is the only one to make such gifts? Since the beginning of the war, Great Britain, Australia, New Zealand nor South Africa have never included such items in their budgets. I defy anything to compare with this gift we are making. And I am not alone of that mind. On February 11 last, the hon. member for Parry Sound (Mr. Slaght) called the attention of the Minister of Finance to this fact and requested him:

To eliminate entirely an allowance by way of mutual aid this year.

And he added:

No other of the commonwealth nations makes any such allowance. Our own contribution in maintaining our own armed forces and our other obligations is heavy indeed. We can be proud of that, aside from an additional mutual aid allowance.

Such were the words of the hon. member for Parry Sound, in this house, on February 11 last.

In his statement yesterday, the minister said that the principle of mutual aid or lend-lease would not hold if we were to demand a machine for each machine, a dollar for each dollar we supply. However, the Canadian Mutual Aid Board, in their report, state that:

Up to the present Canada has not sought such reciprocal aid, because she has had funds to pay for what she required in the countries receiving mutual aid.

In other words, when we enjoy any aid, from Great Britain or the United States, for example, we pay machine for machine and dollar for dollar, and this is borne out in the report. Why this discrimination? On the one hand the aid is granted free if we are on the giving end, on the other it is costly, if we are on the receiving end. The official report of the Canadian board goes on to state that this is due to the fact that we had funds to pay for what we required in the countries receiving Mutual Aid. Well, does not Great Britain, as the hon. Minister of Finance stated last night, still hold $700,000,000 in Canadian securities? We pay for the aid we receive because we have funds to do so. Why should not the countries who receive aid from us and who have funds to pay for it follow our example? We have contributed a billion dollars in 1942, a further billion in 1943 and now, we are requested to supply an additional sum of $800,000,000. I claim it is an excessive contribution for a small country like ours which is still in the stage of development. In terms of our national income, our war expenditures, our federal revenue, our national debt, this expense is not justified. Do you know what the amount of $2,800,000,000 represents? Twelve per cent of Canada's national income for the past three years, 38 per cent of our federal revenue in the same period, 50 per cent of the increase in Canada's funded debt from March 31, 1942, to March 31, 1944. Canada, moreover, since 1942, has given away, as a present, an amount nearly double the cost of the last war; and that is exclusive of all we are doing in this war, exclusive of our war effort which is greater than that of any other country. According to a government publication, Canada at War, issue of last January, the war of 1914-1918 cost us $1,700,000,000, including demobilization expenses. The amount of $2,800,000,000 which we have spent in the past three years represents a debt of $250 per capita upon Canada's 11,600,000 inhabitants.

Apart from Canada, only the United States has given mutual aid, but the wealth and income of that country are far greater than our own. Their present national income amounts to the tremendous sum of $180,000,000,000 per annum, which is about twenty times higher than ours, and their revenue for 1944 will come to $42,578,000,000, that is, about twenty times our figure. According to a preliminary report submitted by the Lend-Lease Board and put on record in the American senate last April, the United States between March 31, 1941, when they adopted the lend-lease bill, and March 31, 1944, delivered, under lend-lease, various goods amounting to $21,794,000,000.

That represents, mind you, only 5 per cent of their national income for the last three years, whereas our gifts equal 12 per cent; that also is only 25 per cent of their federal income for the same period, as compared with 37 per cent in the case of Canada; in fact, that represents an increase of only 15 per cent in their public debt since 1942, as compared with 50 per cent in the case of Canada. On the other hand, we have had nothing in return, absolutely nothing. Yet, our war effort is greater than that of any other country; we are making gifts which no other country makes. Here is what the United States receive for the mutual aid it gives in the form of lease-lend loans. It has obtained naval and air bases in British colonies on this side of the Atlantic and industrial and commercial advantages in latin America, Africa and the Far East; for instance, in Australia, lease-lend assistance serves to pay the cost of the maintenance of American troops in the Pacific zone, which reduces to that extent the apparent amount provided in the form of mutual aid. Until now, Canada has not benefited from mutual aid, or at least the government have never disclosed anything in that connection.

Now, is any thought being given to what these sums represent for Canada; is it realized which use this country could have made of the $2,800,000,000 it has distributed outright? In the first place, a better salary could have been paid to our workers. According to the Marsh report, in 1941 the annual income of about 62 per cent of Canadian wage-earners was under $950; yet, a gift of one billion dollars was made! At this time the annual income of nearly 60 per cent of Canadian wage-earners is lower than $1,400 which is the minimum on which a family may enjoy a decent standard of living.

To what other uses could that money have been put? It could have helped to raise the public health standard. The medical examination of draftees shows that about 55 per cent of these men are unfit for active service. Those gifts could have been used for the elimination of slums in our larger cities. Let it be remembered that to-day in the city of Montreal some families have to live in garages. People were living in shacks where children suffered from cold last winter under conditions that are absolutely unsanitary and where those children are exposed to tuberculosis. That is what could have, but has not, been done. It was deemed preferable to achieve a war effort greater than that of any other country, and to make further gifts, amounting to billions of dollars.

Mr. Chairman, those are some of the reasons why I oppose this new gift of $800,000,000.

(Text):

Mr. NORMAN JAQUES (Wetaskiwin): Mr. Speaker, since it was my good fortune to spend several months last winter in Great Britain I feel I should pay a humble tribute to the people of that country for the contribution they have made and are making to the common cause of winning the war. Mention has been made of Canada's gift to Great Britain and the allied cause, but may I remind some hon. members that those gifts had to be taken by sea and distributed to the various countries. I travelled to Great Britain in a convoy last December and I was two weeks on the Atlantic after leaving Halifax. I talked to the officers and men of the ship I was on, and I learned a lot and heard a lot about the business of convoying which I had not heard before and which I doubt very much the majority of people know to-day.

Unlike battles on the land or naval engagements, the convoys are more or less secret. Losses are not reported. I was unpleasantly surprised to hear that at the time I was crossing sinkings were quite frequent. I do not think there was a man on the ship, and if there was I did not meet him, who had not been torpedoed at least once. The captain had had three ships sunk under him and most of the officers and the crew had experienced more than one sinking. I must confess that I found those two weeks rather trying, not knowing from one minute to the other whether the ship might be suddenly blown up. Mine was a voyage of only two weeks, but the merchant seamen of Great Britain have been undergoing this strain since the beginning of the war nearly five years ago and will continue to undergo it until the end of the war. I do not think any words of mine are capable of conveying the debt that we owe these men.

I should like to say one word about the convoys to Russia. I was told by some of the officers who had been on Russian convoys that losses of thirty per cent were not uncommon and that on one occasion every ship in the convoy was destroyed. The situation became so bad that for a time that route was discontinued and supplies were sent around the cape of Good Hope and through the near east to Russia.

The people of Great Britain are contributing by means of a reduced standard of living. The ship I was on carried 4,000 tons of Canadian bacon. When I got to Bristol I went into a refreshment room in the station and I suppose the Canadian bacon suggested a ham sandwich to me. I asked the girl at the counter for a ham sandwich and she looked at me and said, "What did you say?" I said, "I just want a ham sandwich." She said, "Here are the sandwiches." I said, "What are they?" She said, "Paste." I said, "What do you mean by paste?" She said, "God knows, it is coloured and flavoured; that is all I can tell you." I do not think she was far wrong.

In all the weeks that I spent in Great Britain I never saw a piece of beef, let alone taste it. Beef was not for the civilian. I was in some of the best clubs in London and the best they could provide was some curried rabbit. There was no beef or steak, none of the things we are accustomed to here. Even the glass of sherry had become unprocurable. I had some wine that came from Algiers, but I was advised to put salt in it which might improve the flavour.

Then Great Britain has had her air raids. I saw several air raids and I saw the evidence of former raids in a number of the cities, such as London, Southampton, Bristol, Liverpool and one or two smaller places. In Southampton, for instance, the whole of the central part of the city has gone. It is as though in Ottawa all of Sparks street and Bank street had disappeared. I was told that the situation in other cities was worse, even for instance, in Plymouth, Hull and Coventry. It was bad enough in the cities that I saw.

Then there is the blackout, which we are spared but which they have to endure. The blackout by itself is bad enough, but when you add fog to it you have a situation that is positively alarming. I was caught one night in the blackout and a London fog. I thought I knew what a London fog meant because I had seen plenty of them before I came to Canada. But I had never seen fog combined with the blackout. There I was in the very centre of London, at six o'clock in the evening, with not a light visible, not a sound to be heard. I was going from the Overseas club in Dean's yard, Westminster, to Victoria station and the only way I could get along was by tapping my stick along the edge of the pavement. I passed a convoy of about eight buses crawling behind a man carrying an oil flare, getting home the best way they could. The people of Britain have had to put up with those conditions for years, which we in Canada fortunately have been spared.

Travelling by train is another hardship. The trains are terribly overcrowded. I remember going from London to Scotland between Christmas and New Year's. I took the precaution to take a first-class ticket and I was in the station an hour and a half before the train started, but that did not help me very much. I should have known better but I had been asked to go and I could not very well refuse. I was caught between two armies at King's Cross. One army was returning to Scotland from Christmas leave and the other army was going to Scotland to celebrate New Year's. I was in between the two armies. The railway officials just threw up their hands and left us to it. I stood there for an hour and a half before the train came in, and I was very lucky to be able to get on board, let alone get a seat. The windows of the train could not be opened because of the blackout; in a very short time the air became difficult to breathe, and I wondered if I was going to survive. I knew I could not stand the whole twelve hours to Edinburgh and I said to myself, "Eventually, so why not now?" And I lay down on the floor and then realized that I had a carpet to lie on at least for the extra first-class fare.

Those are some of the things which, if you look at it in the right way, the people of Great Britain are contributing and have been contributing to the war effort. We have been spared these hardships and inconveniences. Our standard of living is practically as good as it was before the war. There is some inconvenience but not much. You can always with a little trouble get a berth on a train in Canada, but you cannot do so in Britain. You have to stand, and you are lucky if you can get on the train.

Finally, I should like to mention the battle of Britain. In my opinion and in the opinion of most people the war would be over had Britain gone down then. No aid would have been possible to our allies, no invasion of France, no bombing of Germany. Long before this the war would have been over for the greater part of the world. Whether the Germans could have extended their operations to the western hemisphere I do not know, but there is no doubt about this, that had it not been for the sacrifices and the achievements of the Royal Air Force Britain would have gone down. With the R.A.F. and the R.C.A.F., of whom Churchill said, "Never was so much owed by so many to so few", I should like to link the Polish air force, which fought superbly in the battle of Britain. I was told over and over again that the Polish air force had played a very great part in winning the battle of Britain, that possibly they turned the scale. I was told that in skill and daring they were not surpassed even by our own air force. I mention that because I have not seen it in print and I think our debt to the Polish air force and to Poland should be acknowledged.

These are just a few remarks, Mr. Speaker, that I thought I should like to make as a personal tribute to the sacrifices which the people of Britain have been making ever since the war started and which I observed in the short time when I was over there. I felt that I should take this opportunity to pay that tribute.

Mr. BROOKE CLAXTON (St. Lawrence-St. George): Mr. Speaker, our attitude toward this bill depends on one thing and one thing alone, namely, whether or not we regard this war as our war, as Canada's war, a war in which Canada as one of the allies must put forth its utmost effort. On that score the attitude of this house and of the people of Canada since the outbreak of the war leaves no room for doubt whatever. This is Canada's war, and that means, if we are honest with ourselves and regard our responsibilities seriously, that we must do everything we can to assist in winning the war. We have been fortunate in Canada. We have been spared a great deal of what other nations have suffered. We have been fortunate because of geography, because the United Kingdom stood between us and our common enemy, because she had the spirit and the will to resist when the odds were terribly against her. We have also been spared in Canada because of our own contribution, and if we are sometimes told that that contribution made a crucial difference to Britain and the cause for which we are fighting, then we should be happy that we were in a position to make that contribution when we alone were in a position to make it. What we did with our aid to the United Kingdom and what we have done with our aid to the other allies fighting on our side was to put arms into the hands of those who could best use them for us as well as for ourselves, whether they were our soldiers or the soldiers of our allies and of the sister members of the commonwealth.

[Mr. Jaques.]

The hon. member for Beauharnois-Laprairie (Mr. Raymond) suggested that we should get machine for machine and dollar for dollar. I would have thought that he would be one of those who would recognize that you cannot measure everything in material terms, that you cannot measure everything in terms of machines and dollars, that there are human and spiritual and moral values, and that we are not only fighting for those values but fighting with those values. We cannot match our contribution in terms of minerals and metals and munitions and money with the contributions of other nations such as China, Russia and the United Kingdom, that have made such tremendous sacrifices in lives.

In fact that kind of argument leads to comparisons which not only have no validity but actually are definitely harmful to the cause of the united nations. The united nations depend for their success—and they have a long way to go—on their staying united, on their having trust in each other, on their sharing the burdens in proportion to their ability to bear those burdens. We shall not stay united if we begin to compare sacrifices in terms of so many men, so many lives, so many dollars, and try to strike that kind of impossible balance. All that we can do, if we recognize that this is our war, is to do our utmost in every direction.

It so happens that Canada is one of the few nations on the face of the earth which to-day have an exportable surplus of munitions of war. That is because of our natural resources, because of our geographical position, because of the way in which farmers, industry, management and government have combined to make those resources available when they were needed to make the utmost contribution to the allied cause.

But also, Mr. Speaker, it is important in our discussions in the difficult days which lie ahead—they are going to be difficult—that we should not compare the contributions of different classes and groups in the community with those of other classes and groups, any more than we should make comparisons between the contributions of different nations. No one can measure the contribution of Britain in any measurable terms; no one can measure the contribution of Russia in measurable terms; and I suggest that that kind of comparison should be left out of our discussion if we are to stay united. But also we must stay united not only on the international front against the enemy, but, in order to make our utmost effort, we must stay united on the national front at home.

Consequently, I am sure that all hon. members deprecate comparisons between different parts of the country and different classes. I am sorry in a way that I was drawn into making such a comparison, or followed someone who did, in the discussion on June 6, when the hon. member for Témiscouata (Mr. Pouliot) said that industry is just as vital to the war effort as what is being done by the soldiers. Well, it did not seem to me that that particular day, when our soldiers had just landed on the shores of Europe, was a good day to make that remark, and I denied its validity. I think I was right in doing that. But I recognize, of course, as do all hon. members, that it is only by the combined efforts of our farmers, our workers, our soldiers, of all our people, of all our organizations and governments, that we can make not only the effort of which we are capable in the war—and which has won the admiration of the world—but also the effort we should make to win the peace after the war.

Unity at home and unity abroad are two things we need to have above everything else. I most sincerely hope that hon. members and others outside will agree with me that comparisons, except for the purposes of decent emulation, are not only invidious but are likely to divide us and divide our allies and assist the enemy, whether that enemy be Hitler or Japan, or the enemies we shall have to meet after the war in the form of poverty and ill health and the other foes we shall then have to face.

The Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King), speaking in London, said:

> Canada's fight for freedom will be a fight to the finish. It is clear to our people that this war is all one war: a monstrous conspiracy of the fascist powers to dominate and enslave the world. Having taken up arms of their own free will, the Canadian people will not relax until freedom is secure. Canada's effort will be an enduring effort.
> We have also sought to look beyond the war; to make our effort a long-range effort. The Canadian people, no less than the people of Britain, whose sacrifices have been so great, need the promise of a brighter future. To sustain us in our endeavours, we all need the vision of a new world order.
> By coordinated action, by mutual aid, by continuous cooperation, the united nations are achieving military victory. The widest measure of cooperation will be no less needed in the making and keeping of peace. While our primary aim, like yours, is military victory, our ultimate aim, like yours, is a better future for mankind.

This bill and the great purpose it aims to carry out are part of our work to win the war. It also provides that funds shall be available to pay Canada's contribution to the work of the united nations relief and rehabilitation administration, a work which has captured the imagination of civilized people everywhere throughout the world. UNRRA, as it is called, is a partnership of the united nations—the first to be formed. Its aim is to form a community chest to help the nations that are liberated from the enemy to help themselves. UNRRA naturally follows mutual aid, and that is why the two are dealt with in one bill. Victory cannot be won only with the defeat of the enemy. The provision of relief to the people of Europe and Asia who are liberated by the arms of our soldiers and our allies is part of the victory for which we are fighting. Their rehabilitation is part of the victory for which we are fighting. These two great objects form one part of the total defeat of our enemies in this war and in the peace—in war our enemies are Germany and Japan; in the peace, the enemies are fear and poverty and want.

Mr. FRED ROSE (Cartier): Mr. Speaker, the sum of $800 million suggested for the provision of war-time mutual aid may seem to some too large, while others believe that it is not enough. I hold the view that this amount falls far short of what it is Canada's interest at this time to give her allies. In fighting this war we pay for the clothing, the food and the weapons of our soldiers. This is a fact that is obvious to everyone, but what has not yet become clear to many is that we also have to supply these needs to those people who are fighting the common enemy. A Canadian fighting in France to-day, having beside him a British soldier or a Frenchman, would be only too happy to see that man with the finest equipment, to help him in the battle of liberation. That is the way we have to look at the problem of mutual aid.

I appreciate the words of the hon. member for St. Lawrence-St. George when he spoke of the humanitarian approach rather than the approach of those who give us cold figures to show what we could do with the money. There is one little thing they forget, that there is a war on and that the war has to be fought to the end, to victory; otherwise we shall have very little. War business as usual, I am very happy to see, is not making the grade in this war, and because we refused to allow the old methods of the last war to act as a brake on our war effort we naturally decided on mutual aid. Our population is 11,000,000 in three million square miles and we are short of military man-power for its defence, but we have a very large productive capacity to aid others who are fighting the same enemy. What was physically possible had to be made financially possible and this mutual aid was our answer, a war-time necessity.

According to the statement made by the Minister of Finance (Mr. Ilsley), expenditures for war supplies transferred to Britain in the course of last year amounted to $724,000,000 out of a total of $913,000,000. According to the same statement, a further quantity of munitions amounting to $90,000,000 was purchased by Britain through drawing on the funds she had previously paid into the munitions production revolving fund, and another $165,000,000 of equipment was purchased by the British government through selling their interests in Canadian plants. Thus, we actually sent to various united nations munitions and other materials amounting to a sum away beyond the one billion dollars. The present figure is $800,000,000, allowing $77,000,000 for UNRRA—quite a reduction.

I ask the house, why the reduction at this time? When men of the united nations are involved in the hardest of the battles, why should we at this time decide that this reduction is justifiable? Materials will be expended at a great rate and we should have no illusions. We have still to learn the amount of material that will be needed. We have learned the lesson of Cassino. At Cassino we learned that planes are good but that we need more and more guns and shells; hence we had suddenly to step up production of guns and shells. We learned at Sicily that we need a lot of automotive equipment. We were short of trucks and many other vehicles and we decided to step up production.

It is better to have more than less. We cannot afford to start learning lessons at this time. The nazi war machine has not yet unleashed its full counter attacks. We do not know what it will be, but we expect that it will come; and the Germans, who still have the European production machine at their disposal, must be met with more powerful material. For that reason the reduction is not justifiable.

The report of the minister notes that war supplies transferred to Britain amounted to $724,000,000; to Russia, $23,000,000; to Australia, $21,000,000, and to China, $4,000,000. In view of the enormous scope of the Soviet and Chinese war efforts, what was allocated to the forces of those nations appears remarkably small. It is natural, because of our closer relations with the British and of earlier placements of war orders in this country, that they should receive the largest share of mutual aid. It scarcely seems logical, however, that Canada should continue in the position of debtor to Britain. In the matter of this indebtedness, I want to quote from a statement of the Minister of Finance to this house on March 18, 1942:

I have not the accurate figures, but there are Canadian dollar securities still owned in the United Kingdom having an approximate value of $700,000,000. Also there are certain sterling securities on or in Canadian property and enterprises which may have a value of something like $300,000,000.

Prior to the billion-dollar gift to Britain which preceded last year's Mutual Aid bill, this country financed British purchases of munitions by repatriating $700,000,000 of Canadian securities. Without stinting anything to the British, I still cannot see why we stopped short there, why we stopped repatriating Canadian securities.

In connection with our expenditures on mutual aid, I wish to say a few words about certain isolationist elements in the province of Quebec who are loud in their condemnation of any contribution to help the allies in fighting the common enemy. They cynically call themselves nationalists, although they should be the first ones to know that if the nazis had won the battle of Europe, even if they had not crossed over here, the situation for all peoples would have been a terrific one, and French Canadians would have been among those to lose all the rights they have at the present time. What is more, I have heard them here on a number of occasions complaining of a few workers having been sent away from a war factory somewhere in a town in Quebec. I do not understand such logic. If you do not want any war orders; if you do not want to give help to anyone, why do you complain when a few people have to be laid off because of curtailment in production or because of certain changes in types of shells in Bouchard or somewhere else? What gives work to some people in Montreal and elsewhere in the province of Quebec? What gives work to aircraft workers at Noorduyn, Vickers and Fairchild?

At six o'clock the house took recess.

After Recess

The house resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. ROSE: Mr. Speaker, mutual aid has given work to many people in the province of Quebec. The aluminum sent to our allies came from the Arvida area, the guns from Dominion Engineering and Sorel Industries, the shells from the Cherrier and Buochard filling plants, wireless apparatus from Marconi, RCA-Victor and Northern Electric, the tanks from the Angus shops and Montreal Locomotive, and clothing from many of the clothing plants throughout the province. Yes, mutual aid has given work to the people, and they have no kick coming in that regard. Are they opposed to the idea of this aid, as some of the isolationists try to make out? I should like to give this house an example to show that the people of Quebec are just as conscious of the need of aiding the allies on behalf of Canada as is anyone else. Some time ago there was a campaign in aid of Russia, during which a collection was taken up at the Angus shops in Montreal, where the greater percentage of the workers are French-Canadians. In the course of a few days they gave, out of their own pockets, some $3,400. They have no complaints about mutual aid.

Unfortunately, however, there is a small but loud group whose hatred, I would say, of the British people and whose love for isolationism blind them to the realities of life. The great patriots of Quebec were not anti-British. I recall the letter sent by the committee of patriots, signed by Louis Joseph Papineau, in which he told the British people that he had no quarrel with them. He differentiated between certain ruling groups and the British people themselves. Unfortunately some people in my province fail to make that distinction at the present time. They claim to be anti-imperialists, but they never had any objection to Mussolini's conquests. Less than two years ago Henri Bourassa spoke of Mussolini's Italy as the great Christian nation. Our troops now in that country have since found out what poverty and corruption exist there. So that I submit, Mr. Speaker, that these people, these so-called nationalists, are doing the people of Quebec a great injustice when in their name they try to oppose the idea of mutual aid.

There is another aspect of mutual aid this year; that is, the aspect of UNRRA, to which our contribution will be $77,000,000, much of which will be spent in this country in addition to other cash purchases by our allies made with the approval of UNRRA. These purchases should not be limited to wheat but should include clothing and other articles in order that employment may be given to people in the province of Quebec.

We know that mutual aid is necessary for victory, but mutual aid also can become a pattern for the post-war period, a new relationship between nations. In this connection I should like to quote from a radio speech by the United States under-secretary of state, Edward Stettinius, who said:

> Lend-lease operations, as we know them, now, will some day draw to a close, but we know already that the principle of mutual aid in mutual self-interest that is embodied in the lend-lease act must live on. To-day there is more unity of purpose and of action among freedom-loving peoples than ever before. In that unity we can find the strength to build the peaceful world in which freedom and opportunity will be secure for all.

It should be remembered that UNRRA does not cover reconstruction of the devastated regions of the world. When this stage is reached our country will be well prepared. We are well equipped to play a leading role, since traditionally we are a great producer of the raw materials necessary for the reconstruction of devastated industrial areas and the tremendous industrial development that is impending in countries such as China. This war has enormously increased our capacity as a builder of capital goods and machine tools. These goods and these tools will be required in vast quantities by China, the Soviet Union and great sections of western Europe. The United States and Great Britain have already obtained some of that business.

In this connection I wish to deal with the idea advanced by the hon. member for Waterloo South (Mr. Homuth). Shades of R. B. Bennett! We will provide our people with employment through tariffs! We will start hollering about dumping! We did it before, in 1930. We will say that we are protecting our workers through tariffs! No; if we cannot find a better relationship, for which the pattern has been provided by mutual aid, we are heading for bankruptcy. However, I am very glad that the vast majority of the Canadian people do not think the way the hon. member has expressed himself. Countries that buy machines from us and become industrialized will become good customers of Canada. In the past our best customers have always been the more developed countries, not the backward ones. By helping to develop these countries we will help the people who will buy from us. The hon. member was afraid that the $23,000,000 spent on mutual aid to Russia might have covered some machinery which might be used to dump goods in Canada. In a country that has fought on a two thousand mile front, that has used vast numbers of tanks, planes and other equipment, our $23,000,000 worth of equipment which could not have included very much machinery, is not going to change the situation to any large extent. If we are fearful of that little, how can we have the correct approach to a better, more united world which will give employment to the people of Canada? In connection with this new pattern I mentioned and the new approach we must have, I should like to quote from the New York Times of May 5, which contained this report:

> A soviet trade commission is at present conducting negotiations with British business interests for large post-war deliveries similar to those for which orders totalling two and a half billion dollars already have been placed in the United States. It is understood, furthermore, that these United States orders are only the beginning of what Russia hopes to do.

Russia's population is so great, the devastation of war has been so vast and the country's supplies are so exhausted that two and a half billion dollars will not even begin to meet her needs. . . .

As to how Russia intends to pay for these purchases, it is understood that the soviet government intends to collaborate fully in the creation of post-war machinery designed to facilitate international trade and monetary payments.

We must take part in this trade and not stand aside. It is not going to wait for us; it will take place just the same. The mutual aid of to-day, but mutual aid to a greater extent, is the path along which we must travel in order to cement relations that will give us a share of such necessary foreign trade. There can be little doubt that when we come to trading, after victory, which I hope is close, we shall be trading with countries in such a state of disorganization that it will be found practicable to deal with governments in stricken countries, rather than with firms. Mutual aid, again, shows the way.

I have dealt with this process of transition, because I sincerely believe that in mutual aid and UNRRA we have that thread which leads on to the next stage—peace-time trade. There are two sides to mutual aid. The all-important one is that of providing our share in the war against the axis. And, next, it provides one of the most important means of achieving for Canada, and to a considerable degree for other countries, that volume of international trading required for a higher standard of living in the post-war world, a world where Canadians foresee a fuller life than has ever before been theirs. The people of Quebec, with the trades that they have learned and the technique and skills that they have acquired, want to participate to-day through mutual aid, and to-morrow in time of peace in the building of such a world.

I have made these remarks, sincerely believing that we have to find a new and broader approach. The thinking of the past is obsolete. People who refuse to change will be left far behind by the locomotive of history.

Hon. L. S. ST. LAURENT (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, I venture to suggest that, in spite of some of the speeches we have heard this afternoon on second reading, this bill will not consecrate any new principle. It is my suggestion that the bill is merely one more step in carrying out the policy which has been that of this country since the early days of September, 1939. If I may be permitted to say so, shortly after I became a member of the government I sat in the Speaker's gallery, and listened to the exposition of the policy of the government with respect to the war effort of this country.

If I may refer to Hansard of those days, I would recall to members what was then enunciated as the policy the government intended to follow. I would first of all direct the attention of hon. members to page 33 of Hansard for January 26, 1942, where the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) said:

At the very outset of the war, the Canadian government considered with the British government the broad lines of development and of our war effort. We tried to envisage all the possibilities of a conflict, which we realized might last for years, and which might spread throughout the world.

The Prime Minister then went on to say:

As I have said already, the policy of the government is, and from the outset has been, the achievement of a total national effort for total war. I propose, now, to explain exactly what I understand by the total effort of a nation. It involves two fundamentals.

The first of these is the devotion to the prosecution of the war of all the available energies and resources of the nation in excess of those required to maintain the health and efficiency of the people.

And a little further down:

The foundation of the total effort of any country is a correct decision as to the minimum requirements of the civilian population. Once that is determined, production and consumption except for war, must be steadily and progressively cut down to the minimum. Waste must be eliminated; the manufacture of all luxuries and many comforts must cease. The surplus of man-power and resources thus secured must be used to make war.

. . . Indeed, the most difficult task in total war is the decision of the correct balance between different aspects of the war effort.

Then the Prime Minister went on to enumerate the activities of the armed forces of the country. If I may quote again, from page 34:

The Canadian navy has a share in this primary responsibility for our territorial defence. . . . We know, too, that the possibility of finally crushing Hitler depends upon keeping open the sea lanes from North America to Britain and Europe. From the outset, the government has placed no limit on the expansion of Canada's navy.

Then, dealing with the army:

The army shares with the navy the responsibility for our territorial defence. It shares also with the navy in the defence of Newfoundland and other islands in the Atlantic. Its main task, however, has been its contribution to the defence of Britain. Every Canadian will remember with pride what Mr. Churchill has said on more than one occasion, of the sense of security which the presence of our troops has given to the government and people of Britain.

And a little further down:

While prepared to send overseas as large an army as Canada can support, without failing in other directions, the government is even more anxious to see that every man, every unit, and the army as a whole, will have the greatest possible striking power.

Then with regard to the air force:

The Royal Canadian Air Force, like the navy and the army, has its part in our territorial defence and the defence of Newfoundland. Its responsibilities on the Pacific coast have been increased by the outbreak of war with Japan. But its main task is the administration of the British commonwealth air training plan. The battle of Britain in 1940 completely justified the emphasis which, from the opening days of the war, Britain and Canada alike placed upon the achievement of air superiority. . . .

The safety of Britain, and Britain's capacity to strike back at the enemy, depends alike upon the air strength concentrated in Britain.

Then, going on with the other aspect of the total war effort:

A vital aspect of Canada's war effort is our contribution to the food supply of Great Britain. This contribution has grown steadily in importance. Britain cannot feed herself, and her own great and growing armed forces. Still less can she feed the ever-increasing numbers of men we are sending from Canada.

Then, with respect to the implements of warfare:

It is well to remember that every battle which has been lost in this war has been lost because of the lack of machines; of planes, or tanks, or guns, or ships. The cry we continue to hear from every front is not so much for numbers of men as it is for tanks, for planes and for ships.

In making the machines of war, Canada's productive task has only begun when our own armed forces have been supplied. Except for planes, Canada has been a main source of British supplies, outside Britain herself.

Then, a little further on we find this, at page 35:

While it cannot be said too often that total war demands total effort, it cannot be too strongly emphasized that total effort means using men and resources, where each will count for most, not where their employment will fit in with individual wishes or the wishes of those who have failed to see the needs of our effort as a whole.

That was the programme put before the house, before parliament and the country, and on February 19 I had the privilege of making my first bow to you, Mr. Speaker, of taking my seat in the house, and within an hour of voting with those who supported the administration—among them, and then a member of the administration, the hon. member for Richelieu-Verchères (Mr. Cardin)—on the programme which had then been enunciated to the house.

It is my submission that the bill now before the house is merely one further step in implementing that programme of total warfare. It is unnecessary to repeat what has been so well said by other hon. members who have spoken in the debate—notably the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles), and the hon. member for Rosedale (Mr. Jackman).

This bill does not provide for a gift to anyone; it provides for the financing of part of the productive capacity of this country in order that that capacity may be devoted to the making of instruments and implements which will serve our cause in overcoming our enemy. Because it is our enemy. In 1939 Canada went to war; the whole of Canada went to war. The hon. member for Richelieu-Vercheres will allow me to refer to as perhaps as eloquent words as were uttered at that time about Canada's going to war. I should like to quote from page 895 of Hansard of June 18, 1940, on the occasion of the second reading of the National Resources Mobilization Act, where the hon. member for Richelieu-Vercheres is reported as follows:

It has been stated just now that if we are now called upon to vote on a measure of this kind it is because we have made the mistake, in the past year, of taking part in the European conflict. I cannot understand anyone expressing such an opinion and I cannot understand how, when attempting to voice the opinion of the province of Quebec, one can so give the lie to the vote given during the recent provincial elections and during the last federal election. . . .

The hon. member went on to say:

The people of my province possessed enough vision, enough intelligence to realize that by restricting their participation to the defence of the Canadian soil only, their participation should prove of no avail, that it would prove fruitless whenever Britain and France were crushed. At such a time, rhetorical, high-sounding speeches and empty words concerning the defence of Canada shall partake only of the theatrical and shall be devoid of any quality of true patriotism to be found among men whose main preoccupation is to forestall possible threatening dangers and to prepare, as intelligent men, for the defence of the country.

The hon. member then discussed whether or not the mobilization act provided only for the marshalling of the man-power of the country or of all its resources, and in dealing with objections raised in these words:

. . . with this extravagant war effort on the part of our country, we are going to bankrupt Canada, and to jeopardize our financial stability, we shall run into considerable difficulties and perhaps put ourselves in the position of being unable to provide for the reestablishment of our soldiers after the war.

The hon. member commented as follows:

I have much respect for the hon. member, but I cannot have much respect for such an argument. . . . What will be the value of our petty chattels and even of our great assets, what will become of our accumulated wealth if Germany succeeds in crushing under her blood-stained boot the combined strength of France and England? What will become of our savings, and of the money deposited in the banks or invested in industrial plants if the military power of France and England is annihilated? Our so-called wealth will be worth as much as that of Poland, of Czechoslovakia, our so-called assets will have just the value that those of Holland, Norway and Belgium have to-day.

That is how the problem should be faced. During the last election I stated many times, in the province of Quebec something which I am not afraid to maintain before the people, before every one of my fellow-citizens: Money is of no importance when the freedom of a nation is at stake.

This afternoon the hon. member said that he found it strange that a little country like ours should be called upon to make gifts to a country much older and much richer. He described the power and influence of the British empire and asked if that great empire were not capable of taking care of its obligations. I submit that the obligation of that country to mankind and to the cause of humanity has been well taken care of since the days of Dunkirk.

But let us come down to the plane of material things. The hon. member says that possibly that country has expended its dollar credits in the purchase of the things required to make war in the cause of all freedom-loving people, but that later on it might be able to pay. Have we not all learned that the things called dollars or sterling or pounds are merely symbols, that any true payment can be made only in material things which would have to be exported from the British isles to this country if there were a debt to be repaid to us?

Do we as representatives of the Canadian people want to see the stagnation of our own productive capacity in order that we may use things made and provided by countries beyond our borders? During the years of war, in addition to the self-respect of freedom-loving men throughout the world we have acquired a much better knowledge of our own productive capacity and of the things that we can make available for our own people and even for export to others. Would it not be a major disaster if anything should occur after the cessation of hostilities to make it impossible to use the productive capacity, the experience and the skill we have developed during this war to provide those things which can be used to the advantage of our population.

I should like to refer again to the words of the hon. member, as reported on page 897 of Hansard of 1940. Speaking of the purchase and sale of implements of warfare, he said:

> I have no use for that kind of patriotism which would limit itself to selling produce, materials and arms, in short, to making money without accepting the responsibility of a free and independent people.
> Doubtless we can help the cause of liberty and democracy by supplying arms to England and her allies; doubtless we can help them by sending them as much as possible in the way of munitions and foodstuffs; but I ask those who bring forward this argument: Do you not in your heart feel a bit ashamed of thinking only in terms of money while abandoning to your neighbours the protection of your life, of your possessions and of your rights!

Knowing the hon. member as it has been my privilege to know him, knowing what a doughty fighter he has been throughout the whole of his brilliant career, I ask myself whether he would pull his punches in the midst of a critical fight. I do not think so, and I do not think in all sincerity he would ask this country to pull its punches at this time.

The hon. member dealt with some of the arguments which he said had been put forward to support other measures of this kind and said that he could not put much stock in the argument that by making this amount available to the treasury in order to pay for munitions and supplies purchased in this country we were providing markets for our farmers and work for that part of our population which labours in our factories, in our shipyards and in our other war plants. He suggested that this might be done as well by devoting their energy to the production of the things we could use at home. That may be quite true. But would that be making total war? And are we or are we not at this stage going back on the policy which was endorsed by the whole Canadian people, which was for a total war effort?

The hon. member says, where else are measures of this kind being adopted? They are being adopted, of course, in the United States. They had been adopted there even before the American people became engaged in shooting warfare. But where else could they be adopted? Where else were there opportunities for producing more than the armed forces of the country engaged required? To a certain extent that was true of Britain and it is true also of New Zealand and Australia. But is it not, as was suggested by the hon. member for Rosedale (Mr. Jackman), the privilege of this young nation that it was so placed by Providence that a very effective part of its effort in the war was performed in its forests, on its farms, in its mines and factories and plants? If it be true that this country had pledged to itself as well as to the other united nations a total war effort for the safety and security of its own population, was it not required that everything which was not necessary for the maintenance of the health and productive capacity of our population be devoted to the common cause?

The hon. member says that we were not attacked, as the United States were, that there was no Pearl Harbor which brought us into the conflict. May I suggest that the actual entry of our neighbours to the south into the war was just as inevitable from its very outbreak as it appeared to the majority of the people to be after the onslaught of the Japanese on Pearl Harbor in December, 1941. It requires no effort of imagination now to understand what the President of the United States had in mind in 1936 when he proclaimed that the United States was a peace-loving nation, that they were at peace with their nieghbours but that they were capable of defending and willing to defend themselves and would defend themselves and their whole neighbourhood; when he repeated the same warning in 1938 and even more pointedly said that if any other foreign country ever attempted to dominate any part of Canadian soil the American people would not stand idly by. Was that not a warning to the whole world that the government of the United States recognized the imminence of possible warfare and was endeavouring to deter the aggressors from their bellicose designs by warning them that no part of this continent could become a prey to their cupidity without their first overthrowing the combined might of the United States and of Canada and of those who might be allied to Canada?

The hon. member says that it was argued by my predecessor in this house that when Great Britain was at war Canada could not remain neutral. It is quite apparent to every Canadian that when the United Kingdom is in the kind of war that this is, self-respecting Canadians cannot remain neutral. But technically is there any difference in the legal position of this dominion and that of the Irish Free State, where those who feel so inclined can remain neutral when the United Kingdom and the rest of the British commonwealth are at war? But I put it to this house, and fearlessly put it to this country, how many in this country prefer the attitude adopted in the Irish Free State to the attitude that has been adopted by the Canadian people?

Mr. MacNICOL: Not very many.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: The hon. member for Richelieu-Verchères goes on and says that he does not object to the producing of food and the implements of warfare, but that he would insist upon accounts being kept. Within the last few days the allied forces have been able to liberate the city of Rome, something which has a very special meaning to a great many of the citizens of this country, whether they be of my faith or of other Christian faith; the allied forces have now set foot on the western shores of the continent of Europe and we can foresee the liberation from the nazi yoke of the peoples of that continent.

In the same address the hon. member, whose eloquence I would not attempt to approach, spoke of France, in these words:

> Allow me to tell him, Mr. Speaker, that France, poor France, is agonizing at the present time.

May I suggest that France is, four years afterwards, "hoping," at the present time.

He went on:

> She has always stood, down the course of history, as a shining beacon illuminating the progress of ideas and principles throughout the world, and has spared neither sacrifice nor the life of her sons in the defence of freedom, in protecting the weak and the humble. She has ever been in the forefront of spiritual progress, of intellectual development and of liberty. Poor France, she has suffered down through the ages because of her principles and of her noble feelings of humanity. She has just put up such a valiant struggle as to prove even the humblest soldier of her powerful army a hero. One after the other, by the hundreds and by the thousands, they have fallen on the battlefields and have been crushed by the barbarian Hitler's powerful war machine. They have fallen in defence of humanity, in defence of human liberties, yours and mine, my friends.

France is now at the dawn of the day when she will rise again and continue throughout the ages the noble traditions so eloquently spoken of by the hon. member. That I suggest is not the day when accounts should be kept. Has France kept account of the sufferings she has undergone since her Gethsemane of four years ago? All those sufferings and sacrifices of freedom-loving peoples constitute a part of the assets placed in the common pool for the redemption of free mankind, and I suggest that the first lines on page 9 of the report of the Canadian mutual aid board express the true situation in this regard:

> The sacrifices of allied soldiers, sailors and airmen transcend any form of material aid. The weighing of lives against munitions cannot be made in a report. It must be made in the heart and conscience of every Canadian.

There is not that unanimous degree of unity throughout this country that all of us here in this house would wish for, but there is a considerable degree of unanimous feeling in that regard, and in my own city of Quebec it was expressed by two eloquent voices immediately after the opening of the invasion on the west coast of France. The newly-appointed Anglican Archbishop of Quebec, His Grace Archbishop Phillip Carrington, said, on June 7:

> We have a right to pray to God for a blessing upon the terrible work which we have undertaken. Let us pray that it may be done wisely and firmly. Let us pray that it may be done quickly. Let us pray that we may remain true to those ideals for which we have banded ourselves together; let us pray that the evil may be overcome, the oppressed set free, justice and freedom established, peace and prosperity restored.

And the night before, His Eminence Cardinal Villeneuve had broadcast throughout the country and caused to be published this message:

At this moment, as allied forces, after having liberated the Eternal City, are establishing a foothold on French soil preparatory to unburdening the continent of the four-year nazi yoke, I invite all Catholics in Canada to offer their sacrifices and prayers in order that God may inspire our leaders and help our soldiers in this supreme phase of the war. . . .

Let us take confidence in the message of Saint Augustine: may our prayers be heard by He who governs all, for, in time of battle, the gates of heaven are open, and God looks upon the battle-fields, reserving victory for he whose cause is just.

We believed in 1939 that the cause of the allied nations was just. We believed it to the extent of pledging our people to a total war effort until a total victory; and the second reading of this bill is merely designed to implement our continued determination that this country shall make total war until total victory has been achieved.

Mr. JOSEPH ARMAND CHOQUETTE (Stanstead) (Translation): Mr. Speaker, in 1942, this government made to England an outright gift of one billion dollars. In 1943, they gave a further gift of one billion dollars to the United Nations and again this year they are about to give $800,000,000. If we add to that the loan of $700,000,000 made to England without interest we have a grand total of $3,500,000,000, or $67,000,000 more than the total debt of this country from confederation to August 31, 1939, when war was declared. What a far cry that is from the 1940 pledges according to which we are to confine ourselves to a moderate war effort. We have been giving billions of dollars since 1942. Well, Mr. Speaker, I say that the government have no right to give away the people's money, they have no mandate to do so, because it was through the promise of a moderate war effort that they were returned in 1940. Now, strangely enough, on May 11 last, our prime minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) said in a speech delivered before the Westminster Parliament:

Our objective has been a total effort for total war, and we believe that objective is being attained.

Mr. Speaker, I wonder what thoughts such gifts suggest to workers who have large families to support, who lack some of the necessaries of life, who are not properly housed and who reflect that a sum of $800,000,000 represents $70 for each member of their families. And our farmers are no more in a position to make such gifts; they were requesting the government's help during the depression years of 1930-1939, but they always had the same answer: "We have no money." They will be surprised to hear that since 1942 the government have given outright $2,800,000,000, which represents $240 per capita and $1,920 for a family of eight persons. We believe that such a policy is prejudicial to the interests of Canada and we unequivocally oppose it. No other nation within the British empire votes such appropriations. Our contribution in maintaining our armed forces is quite considerable and Canada has such a large debt that it cannot afford to make such gifts to countries very much wealthier than ours.

Mr. Speaker, the honourable member for Montreal-Cartier (Mr. Rose) has seen fit to lecture the French-Canadian members from the province of Quebec who are opposed to gifts of $1,000,000,000 and $800,000,000 to other nations. I for one believe that the province of Quebec has done its duty in the past to preserve Canada for Canadians on each occasion when the country was threatened. The French Canadians are just as patriotic as the other citizens of this country and they will remain so in opposing any policy that is prejudicial to Canada's interests.

Mr. J. EMMANUEL d'ANJOU (Rimouski) (Translation): Mr. Speaker, I shall contribute but a few words to the current debate on the bill under discussion. I have already condemned the tribute we are requested to vote, in my speech on the address, on February 3rd last. I shall quote some of my remarks as recorded on Hansard of that date:

The speech from the throne again hints at the government's intention to authorize, in the course of the present session, the payment of another tribute of a billion dollars to Great Britain. I state right now, Mr. Speaker, that I shall oppose this measure with all my strength, as I have done on two previous occasions.

Instead of paying an annual tribute to England, the government would be far better inspired in endeavouring to relieve the distress which is to be met all over the country.

Once more I state my opposition to the present bill still more forcibly, if that is possible. I oppose the measure submitted to the house at this moment as I have the last two similar bills. Indeed, Mr. Speaker, I deem it would be wiser on the part of the government to endeavour to assuage the sufferings of our own population than to give, at each session, gifts to England, a country which, at the time we paid our first tribute, was making interest bearing loans to China.

In my constituency, there are sections where destitution is prevalent. The government would evidence a greater concern for the interests of the country in attempting to alleviate the poverty of these people. When we paid our first tribute to England, I denounced it with the utmost energy; I held the same attitude in connection with the second tribute and I am still of the same mind on this third occasion. Therefore, if we are called upon to vote on this measure, I shall vote against it, as I have done in the past.

I was listening, a while ago, to the speech delivered by the hon. member for Montreal-Cartier (Mr. Rose). He criticized the members from Quebec who oppose war measures and especially the bill now submitted to the approval of the house. The representatives from Quebec who, in this house, show enough courage to fulfil their duty, to discharge their responsibility toward the electors of their constituencies, have no lesson to learn from the hon. member for Montreal-Cartier.

At a time when the country admits Jewish refugees, when families land here 70 or 80 at a time, the hon. member for Montreal-Cartier should not assail the hon. members from Quebec. The hon. member for Montreal-Cartier said: "We must win the war, and if we lose it, it will be the fault of the dissident members of the province of Quebec; if we lose the war, the rights of French Canadians might be imperilled".

I do not think Jewish rights are threatened because under the constitution of Canada, they are guaranteed none. To my mind, it ill behooves the member for Montreal-Cartier in parliament to disparage French Canadians of the province of Quebec when in his own constituency the French-Canadian population is quite numerous, and when a few of our fellow-citizens, probably misguided, voted for him in the last election.

I will add nothing further, Mr. Speaker. As I said before, I am opposing the bill now before the house; I want to be logical, and I believe my constituents will admit that, since 1940, I have maintained a logical stand and have fulfilled the pledges given to the electors of my constituency. The hon. Minister of Justice (Mr. St. Laurent) said a while ago that we had to fight an all-out war. I remember that in 1940, during the last election, the predecessor of the present Minister of Justice, the lamented Mr. Lapointe, told the province of Quebec: "Participation in the war will be free, voluntary, and moderate". In 1940, total war was not advocated in the province of Quebec. It was stated that participation would be free, voluntary and moderate. To-day, we are told that the country has approved total participation in the war. The people were trustful and they gave their allegiance to the Liberal party believing that party would keep its pledges and promises honourably; but they were odiously deceived. Mr. Speaker, I will add nothing more; once again, I condemn this measure and I will vote against it.

(Text):

Mr. JEAN-FRANÇOIS POULIOT (Témiscouata): I listened with great attention to the eloquent speech made by the Minister of Justice (Mr. St. Laurent). We must not be under the impression that those who discuss this measure are not in favour of the prosecution of the war and of helping the allied nations. Not at all. The only thing, and it is a legitimate feeling, is that the Canadian taxpayer expects that as soon as the armistice is signed the burden of taxation will be less, that it will not be so heavy; and that is the very reason why Canadians have agreed to bear the heavy burden of taxation which is now imposed upon all of us. It is in the expectation that after the war that taxation will become less. One way to achieve such a result is precisely by discussing this matter with other nations on business terms.

There is no one in this house who refuses to give credit to the allied nations. The only thing that is asked for is an acknowledgment. On June 2, 1941, the hon. member for Témiscouata spoke as follows:

> My last remark is that we should not consider taxation as though the war were being lost. We are all determined to win the war, but taxation must be related to our needs. At the present time taxation is just the same as though the deluge were coming to-morrow—"after us, the deluge." Taxation should be clear, progressive and in accordance with the means of the people.

Now let us see what the Minister of Finance (Mr. Ilsley) said about the record regarding the past:

> . . . when we are proposing to open a new chapter in our financial relations—

With Great Britain and the United States.

> —the record regarding the past should be made quite clear.

That statement of the minister was made on March 18, 1942, when the house was considering for the first time the billion dollar gift, United Kingdom financing. The Minister of Finance said:

> To the United Kingdom alone our shipments increased from $331 million in 1939 to $532 million in 1940 and $702 million in 1941. To the rest of the British empire, including Egypt, our shipments rose from $104 million in 1939 to $157 million in 1940 and $300 million in 1941. . . . But notwithstanding some increase in our imports,—

The minister did not mention what our imports were then. I had to make a calculation and I sent him my mathematical work on the matter.

—the empire as a whole had an aggregate merchandised defieit with Canada of $445 million in 1940 and $723 million in 1941.

What was the financial assistance of Canada to the British empire? The Minister of Finance went on:

Nor does this empire deficit of nearly $1,200 million on trade account in the past two years tell the whole story. In addition, large sums have been required for expenditures not reflected in the trade statistics.

And I have numbered each one.

(1) The most important of these have been the British capital investments in war plants in Canada, amounting at the end of 1941 to $238 million, and (2) British expenditures in connection with air training activities in Canada. (3) In addition, of course, there have been other expenses, such as for freight and (4) storage connected with the movement of goods within Canada.

Without going into exhaustive details, I may inform the house that after making allowance for all the sterling area's receipts of Canadian dollars of a current or ordinary nature—such as (a) the proceeds of exports, (b) interest and (c) dividend receipts, (d) shipping receipts and (e) Canadian governmental expenditures in sterling incurred in connection with the maintenance of our troops in the United Kingdom—the sterling area's net deficit of Canadian dollars from the outbreak of the war until the end of February, 1942, amounted to approximately $1,770 million.

What was the financing by Canada of the sterling areas net deficit of $1,770 million? Let me quote the Minister of Finance again, but before coming to that I may say that the minister's summary of Canadian expenditures was incomplete because it did not include payments for prisoners of war, et cetera. I quote the minister:

This deficit has been financed in three ways. In increasing order of importance they are: (1) gold payments from the United Kingdom to Canada; (2) redemption or purchase, mainly in advance of maturity, of Canadian security obligations held in the United Kingdom; and (3) the accumulation of sterling finances held by the foreign exchange control board on deposit in London.

Then the minister spoke of the whole of the sterling area deficit having been financed by Ottawa out of its own resources, which is almost incredible. He said:

Gold payments by the United Kingdom have amounted to $250,000,000 over this whole period. As the house is aware, the last payment was received in December, 1940, and since that time the whole of the sterling area deficit has been financed by Ottawa out of its own resources.

Think of that.

Over the period as a whole gold payments have covered less than fifteen per cent of the sterling area deficit in Canada.

[Mr. Pouliot.]

Not only have gold payments by the United Kingdom been kept to relatively modest proportions, but every ounce of gold we obtained from the United Kingdom was promptly converted into United States funds and used to pay for United States goods needed to complete war orders for the United Kingdom.

That is what the minister said; and he went on:

Exact statistics are not available, but there can be no doubt whatever that the amounts we have paid out in United States exchange in connection with British war orders in Canada are very greatly in excess of the amount of hard currency settlement received from the United Kingdom.

It was neither the leader of any opposition group nor any private member who might be accused by the imperialist press of being an isolationist; it was the Minister of Finance who declared that gold payments by the United Kingdom had covered less than fifteen per cent of the sterling area deficit in Canada, and commented that they had been kept to relatively modest proportions. And think of this, sir. Since December, 1940, according to the word of the Minister of Finance, we have taken the whole burden on our shoulders. He said:

Until December, 1940, the United Kingdom shared with us the burden of providing the necessary hard currency. Since then we have taken the whole burden on our own shoulders. The burden has not been a light one.

Those were the words of the Minister of Finance. That date, December, 1940, is of the utmost importance. First, it was the month in which Canada received the last gold payment from the United Kingdom; second, it was when the United Kingdom ceased "to share with us the burden of providing the necessary hard currency," and, third, that was when we "took the whole burden on our shoulders." Then the minister added that the burden had not been a light one. Naturally the burden of financing the whole sterling area could not have been a light one. Here is another important quotation from the speech made by the Minister of Finance on that occasion:

. . . our United States dollar problem and our need of foreign exchange control are in part a direct consequence of our assistance to Great Britain.

Then a most unusual thing occurred; the minister went so far as to express deep concern about the result of the financial policies he had been sponsoring. He said:

I warned the house in introducing the budget last April—

That was 1940.

—that the need for United States exchange conservation had not passed . . . and lest anyone should think that the Hyde Park agreement has solved our United States dollar exchange problem, I should like to say that our official reserves of gold and United States dollars fell by $142,000,000, United States dollars, in 1941. . . Moreover, although the outlook is far from clear, it must be recognized that, failing remedial action, we appear to be faced with another sizeable loss of reserves this year. . . .

Our United States dollar position is, therefore, still a major cause of concern. . . .

I stress this point because our United States dollar problem and our need of foreign exchange control are in part a direct consequence of our assistance to Great Britain.

At this point the minister made this remark:

When we are proposing to open a new chapter in our financial relations, the record regarding the past should be made quite clear.

It is very important that we understand the statements and the attitude of the Minister of Finance in the matter. The "new chapter in our financial relations" with Great Britain was not "opened", to use the minister's expression, on March 18, 1942, when he made that speech on the United Kingdom financing scheme; it dated back to fifteen months before, to December, 1940, when Great Britain made its last gold payment and when we took "on our own shoulders" the whole burden of financing the sterling area deficit. The minister did not try to escape any responsibility, but he did not make the record regarding the past clear enough. On November 7, 1940, Mr. Purvis was named by the United Kingdom to the new war purchasing mission. The Montreal Gazette of November 8, 1939, carried this item:

Ottawa, November 7—C.P.—Appointment of Arthur B. Purvis, prominent Montreal industrialist, as director general of British war purchases in the United States, was announced here to-night by the British purchasing mission which has been in Ottawa since early September. . . .

It has already been expressed as a matter of British policy that Canada will be looked upon as a first and primary source of supply to the full extent of the manufacturing and industrial capacity of the dominion.

It is believed purchases in the United States will be limited by the amount of foreign exchange available for that purpose, the extent to which Canada can supply British needs in raw and manufactured materials, and of course the length and proportions of the war.

Replaces Previous Board

The war supply board reached its full status last Wednesday when it took over the functions and personnel of the defence purchasing board set up last July under chairmanship of R. C. Vaughan, vice-president in charge of purchases for the Canadian National Railways.

Created under authority of the War Measures Act, the war supply board will have extraordinary powers to mobilize and regulate industry, production and other resources in Canada for a concentrated war effort.

To what extent these powers will be exercised has not yet been indicated, but a statement covering the board's plan of procedure is expected shortly. Not only Canadian purchases but those for the British government will be handled by the board as agent. Presumably the same would be true of any French orders that might be placed in Canada.

If the task of the supply board assumes proportions indicating the necessity for creation of a ministry of munitions and supply the government is empowered, by an act of the special war session of parliament in September, to set up the extra portfolio with a full-time minister.

The defence purchasing board was set up under the then Minister of Finance in July, 1939, a short time before Mr. Dunning's resignation and departure for London. It was under his successor in that capacity, the present Minister of National Defence (Mr. Ralston) and the perpetual Acting Minister of Finance, when it was replaced by the war supply board, with—

. . . extraordinary powers to mobilize and regulate industry, production and other resources in Canada for a concentrated war effort.

When Mr. Purvis was appointed the news appeared in the press more than eight months before the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) introduced the mobilization act in June, 1940.

On November 15, 1940, the Minister of National Defence, who was then Acting Minister of Finance, left for London. On November 15, 1940, the sixth sitting day of the session, the then Minister of National Defence, and also perpetual Acting Minister of Finance, concluded as follows a lengthy speech on the address:

Let me emphasize again that our plans and preparations are and must be made in conjunction with those of our predominating partner, the United Kingdom, and of the other dominions. Since the front line is on the English channel, it is vital that we maintain the closest contact with that crucial sphere of operations. There must be not only unity of purpose but unity of planning and execution. Our strength multiplies by integration. It is teamwork which wins. For this reason I expect before long to visit the United Kingdom, accompanied by some of the headquarters staff, to consult on many matters of common interest. I want to make sure that our own programme will be developed in closest relation to the needs, and I am sure we all desire that plans and preparations will be such that we will be contributing not only all our strength, but our most effective strength, to help defeat and destroy this menace to freedom and to life itself which hangs over the world. It will be a task of years. May we have the courage, the perseverance and the unshakable resolution to see it through.

He left early in the following week.

In December, 1940, he spent a most useful evening with the late Arthur B. Purvis. This appears in Hansard of June 11, 1941, where the Minister of National Defence, and perpetual Acting Minister of Finance, said:

Mr. Purvis was good enough to give me, in the way he can give it quickly, concisely and comprehensively the fullest statement possible with regard to production in the United States and with regard to the needs of Britain with regard to munitions and supplies. I do not know when I spent an evening which was more useful in connection with the work that I was doing, and it gave me an idea of how we could integrate our production with that of the United States, and our needs with the needs of Britain.

He added that he kept that information for his colleague the Minister of Munitions and Supply (Mr. Howe). Neither of them said any more to the house about Mr. Purvis' statement.

The record regarding the past, read in the house by the Minister of Finance on March 18, 1942, makes it clear beyond doubt that the late Mr. Purvis' statement to the Acting-Minister of Finance was the suggestion to finance the whole of the sterling area deficit by Ottawa, out of his own resources. And we may draw the conclusion that it was because it was so promptly accepted by the Acting-Minister of Finance that the Minister of Finance expressed so much concern about it, and went so far as to state that our United States dollar problem and our need of foreign exchange control are, in part, a direct consequence of our financial assistance to Great Britain. He specified that we have taken the whole burden on our shoulders, from December, 1940, the time when the Acting-Minister of Finance spent his most useful evening with the late Mr. Purvis.

Now, sir, this is not the day to speak outside the record. The record is there. I have quoted some of it, and I have more to quote in due course, because I have made a special study of it. There is no one more ready to do anything to assist the united nations in this terrific struggle; but it is a good thing to have an acknowledgment of what is done, because otherwise it will be forgotten. No one is refusing to let the allied nations have all they need from Canada, provided there is acknowledgment of it. I do not find it honest to establish trade balances with gifts made to other countries. Besides that, the government went to all countries both in and outside the British empire, countries which did not need any help of any kind. That help was flatly refused by Bermuda, for instance. Until last year and this year there was no income tax legislation in Bermuda, and the Bermudians were in much better financial condition than we are. They were offered a gift. I wonder how many nations have been offered gifts by this government, nations which do not need it.

There are three kinds of united nations. There are those who need help, and there are those who do not need help or assistance. They are in a class by themselves. The others need assistance, but some of them have means to pay. If they cannot pay now, they should at least give an acknowledgment. Those who have no means to pay now should also give an acknowledgment for the future. That, I believe, should be the position of all when the rehabilitation of all countries is under consideration. That would apply even to those countries which are occupied by the enemy but which have temporary governments in England at the present time.

We have done a great deal to help Great Britain, and it has been acknowledged in some quarters. I was not a stranger to it, because I missed no opportunity to publicize what has been done by Canada for other countries. Some people, however, have a very strange turn of mind. To-day I happened to see the kind of propaganda issued by the British information services, an agency of the British government with offices at 30 Rockefeller plaza, New York city. This article is headed "The British Commonwealth and Empire," and appears at page 6 in a folder describing the British empire in terms which each member will find insulting. Here is what I find in connection with dominion status.

> Thus dominion status is the most advanced stage of a process of political evolution or change—like the change from the frog's egg through the tadpole stage to the complete frog. If we had some sixty frogs, tadpoles and frogs' eggs of various ages in a pond, they would change and grow; the eggs becoming tadpoles; the tadpoles frogs; the frogs growing bigger and perhaps leaving the pond. At any moment, of course, some would already be changed into frogs; some would still be in the egg, some in the early tadpole stage; and some nearly transformed, but with a rudimentary and fast disappearing tail. Some might be very slow to hatch out of the egg, and others might stay too long in the tadpole stage—but in the end they would all change and grow up. This is a parable of the British commonwealth and empire.

What do you think of it? If we could help the British people, directly, as we have the people of Greece, it would be a very good thing. I have not the least objection to helping those who need help, especially those who are in hunger in occupied Europe. It seems to be the concerted plan of Germany to destroy whole countries. But where a nation is able to pay there should be an acknowledgment. Canada is the only country that is making such gifts, and we have not the means to do so. Taxation is heavy. We are ready to help in the prosecution of the war as far as our means will permit, but now we are doing much more. This legislation is taxing future generations to the limit without any hope of having anything in return. What we want is an acknowledgment of what we are doing, and if it is secured Canada will be in a much better position when the nations meet at the peace conference after the war.

Hon. J. L. ILSLEY (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I do not think it is necessary for me to say very much in closing this debate. I made a fairly comprehensive statement upon the resolution upon which this bill is based. I have listened with attention and much interest to the speeches that have been made during the debate on the second reading and I feel that there is very little that requires answer. I did propose to devote some attention to the remarks of my former colleague, the hon. member for Richelieu-Verchères (Mr. Cardin), but my colleague, the Minister of Justice (Mr. St. Laurent), has dealt somewhat fully with the remarks of the hon. member and I think there is very little I need to add.

However, when the hon. member represents Great Britain as being an excessively rich and powerful country and this country as being a small and poor country I think he shows a tendency to exaggeration in both particulars. Great Britain has assumed an enormous task in this war and I think to a greater extent than any other belligerent she has seen her foreign investments go down and down. I should like to read to the house two or three extracts from the budget speech of the chancellor of the exchequer, Sir John Anderson, delivered on April 25 of this year in the House of Commons in Great Britain. I quote from page 654 of the British Hansard of that date as follows:

> Overseas disinvestment—and I apologize again for the word—(Hon. Members: "what does it mean?") It means realization of overseas investments and addition to external debt. Overseas disinvestment, which includes the still increasing sterling balances which the dominions and other overseas countries leave in this country, was slightly higher in 1943 than in 1942. In was £55,000,000 higher than the figure of £600,000,000 assumed in last year's budget.

The chancellor deals with the situation for the current year on page 683, as follows:

> How far may we expect to finance our expenditure in 1944-45 from the sources of borrowing to which I referred in my review of the past year? Any estimate of overseas disinvestment must be very precarious, and I propose to put it at practically the same figure as for the calendar year 1943, namely £650,000,000.

And on page 664:

> There is another side to the story—the drain upon our resources of the external costs of the war. We have to meet vast and growing cash expenditure in other countries for military operations and supplies. To finance our purchases in the United States before lend-lease, and to meet these external costs, we have already parted with overseas assets to the extent of £1,000,000,000, and we have incurred undischarged overseas liabilities amounting to £2,000,000,000. We are not yet at the end of this tale. We have parted with all this, not to neutrals, but nearly all of it, some 90 per cent, to our allies and associates, most of whom will emerge from this war with their overseas financial position greatly strengthened as a result, just as our is greatly weakened. I make no complaint of this, for we are in this war with all we have got, but no one must suppose that a country can wage a war on this basis for several years and emerge at the end without a price to pay. We have not yet paid that price.

The suggestion by some hon. members is that this country should not proceed upon the principle of considering war supplies and materials a contribution to the common cause. They say that we should not proceed upon the principle so eloquently expressed by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) as being the indivisibility of the common cause. They argue that we should abandon that principle, although more and more the countries have come to an adoption of that principle. They say that we should put it on the basis of sale to the country to which the goods are sent. If that country happens to be Great Britain, they say that we should exact something in payment for those goods. If there is nothing to get, they say that we should make a charge in some books that we keep or take sterling for the goods or something of that kind.

Mr. POULIOT: The same as they do with us.

Mr. ILSLEY: Great Britain does not do that with us and I am inclined to think we should not do it with her. I do not think there is much use in arguing the economics of this matter. It is just a matter of principle; it is the way the people feel. I believe I know how most of the members of this house feel about it and how most of the people of the Dominion of Canada feel about it; I think they believe in the indivisibility of the common cause. They believe that this is not a gift to Great Britain, a gift to Russia, a gift to Australia or a gift to China. It certainly is not a gift to enrich any of those countries. If it could be regarded in any sense as a gift, it is a gift to enable them to fight a war which is our war just the same as it is their war, and I prefer not to call it a gift at all. I would prefer to consider it a contribution to the common cause. If we believe that in our hearts and minds, there is not very much more to be said on the issue.

I can, I think, dispose fairly quickly of any argument that there would be any economic advantage in taking a lot of sterling from Great Britain or in establishing a huge claim on the books against Great Britain after the war. I believe I could establish pretty well that the only way that a huge intergovernmental debt of that kind could ever be paid would be by vastly decreasing our exports or vastly increasing our imports, or both, and that both these would have to be on such a scale that it is something that we cannot envisage because it would so dislocate and destructively impair our economy that no government would undertake it. If I wanted to put it on an economic basis I could make a good case. But even though I am dealing with finance most of the time, which perhaps is not the very highest plane, I want to put this question on the plane on which the Minister of Justice put it, which is the plane on which a good many members have discussed the question this afternoon and this evening. Certainly I do not believe that this nation could remain a self-respecting nation if it took a course very much different from the course it is taking. It is not an argument to come along and say that some of the other British dominions are not doing this and that we should not follow the United States because the United States is so much wealthier than we are. Let us examine the facts.

I was greatly struck in listening to the hon. member for Richelieu-Verchères this afternoon by his tendency to talk about our smallness, our dependence, our insignificance, although he did not use that word, as a nation. He was picturing Canada as so small, dependent on Great Britain, and not able to assume large and important obligations. I do not think of Canada in that way. I admit that Canada has not a large population. It has a population of eleven or twelve million people. But this country, it must be remembered, is the oldest and largest of the British dominions. It is a country of great potential wealth and great resources. Moreover, it is a country far removed from the scene of conflict. It is a country which has an opportunity of great production, and certainly it is the duty of this country in time of war to develop that production and contribute it to the common cause.

The other countries have done what they could. The United States of America has, as I said last night, devoted $24 billion to lend-lease up to date, which is a substantial sum. It is not profitable, it is really futile, to compare the per capita expenditure for mutual aid or lend-lease as between countries, because the situation in the different countries varies so greatly that it would be difficult to make an effective comparison. To take just one phase of a country's war expenditures and compare that with what some other country is doing is not fair. But we do have that very large expenditure for lend-lease in the United States of America.

Then I find from a British white paper which has been issued, called "A Report on Mutual Aid," that the various parts of the British empire have been doing what they could. It would be unreasonable to expect Australia, situated as she is, to make the same per capita contribution as Canada. But let me read paragraph 11 of this British white paper, "A Report on Mutual Aid," presented by the chancellor of the exchequer to parliament by command of His Majesty, November, 1943:

> 11. His Majesty's government in the United Kingdom are, of course, not responsible for reciprocal aid as between the dominions and the United States. The Australian and New Zealand governments signed reciprocal aid agreements on the 3rd September, 1942, simultaneously with our own, and have given reciprocal aid at their own expense on a scale which is large in proportion to their resources. The South African government is giving reciprocal aid without any formal agreement; and the same is true of the government of India, who bear the cost of reciprocal aid given to the United States forces in India.

On the general question of the pooling of resources I find this in paragraph 4 of this same British white paper:

> 4. His Majesty's government in the United Kingdom have recognized how greatly mutual aid assists the efficient prosecution of the war and good relations between comrades-in-arms. The principle of the transfer of goods and services without charge or calculation is a necessary part of the efficient planning of the war from the point of view of strategy and the economical use of man-power and shipping. It is, therefore, the policy of His Majesty's government to apply that principle themselves wherever possible, not only to the United States, but also to other allies, and they think it proper to satisfy the public interest in the subject by now reporting to parliament in some detail on the scope of the various arrangements which are in force.

In other words, a great international system of mutual aid has been established in which this country took an early part and an honourable part, to the great credit of this country and to the great benefit of all concerned in the prosecution of this war. No party in this house has ever opposed it. There has been the odd member who has expressed opposition to what we are doing, but I have been struck in this debate by the mildness of the opposition and by the strength of the support which the mutual aid principle has received in the parliament of Canada. I think that is greatly to the credit of the parliament of Canada, just as the support which this principle has received from the Canadian people is greatly to the credit of the Canadian people.

The house divided on the motion (Mr. Ilsley) which was agreed to on the following division:

Bill read the second time, and the house went into committee thereon, Mr. Bradette in the chair.

On section 1—Short title.

Mr. POULIOT: On March 17, 1942—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

The CHAIRMAN: Order.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Shame.

The CHAIRMAN: Order.

Mr. POULIOT: Do you know, sir—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. POULIOT: I am not surprised to hear Aeolian harps, because the amount is $800,000,000. It is something to consider, and during the election of 1935 I visited Essex South in the campaign against the late Eccles Gott, who was a staunch supporter of the Bennett government and who interrupted me at times. That trip was a very satisfactory one and I also went into Essex county to the support of the present Secretary of State (Mr. McLarty). I am calm. I have something to say and I will say it. On March 17, 1942, speaking of the billion dollar gift, the Minister of Finance spoke as follows:

> All I am asking now—and I am putting all my cards on the table—is this: I am saying that for tremendously important reasons I want interim supply, the supplementary appropriations and the one billion dollar bill passed. If the house will do that, they can take the rest of the time, so far as I am concerned, on this matter before the house.

On March 18, 1942, the Minister of Finance introduced a measure to finance the United Kingdom. Canada's net accumulation of sterling balances in London banks from the outbreak of the war to the end of February, 1942, had amounted to $992,000,000. The Minister of Finance stated that the sterling area's, the whole empire's deficit of Canadian dollars for that period amounted to $1,770,000,000, of which $250,000,000 was "financed" by the United Kingdom and nearly $125,000,000 "was privately financed by discharge of private Canadian debts to the United Kingdom including certain sales in the Canadian market of securities vested by the British treasury." The $250 million gold payments by the United Kingdom to Canada and the $125 million sales of Canadian securities vested by the British treasury formed a total of $375 million to be subtracted from what he described as a $1,770 million deficit. He adds that $1,400 million had been "directly financed by the dominion government—about $400,000,000 through repatriation of securities and nearly $1,000,000,000 through the accumulation of sterling balances in London".

He repeated twice, but with different figures, the same amount of sterling balances: $992 million as a Canadian asset and $1,000 million as a sterling area liability to Canada. Then he explained that Canada had previously purchased British-held Canadian securities amounting to $400 million. Therefore, at the end of February, 1942, Canada had repatriated $400 million securities "to make Canadian dollars available to the British government for its purchases and other expenditures in Canada." That amount of $400 million should also have been subtracted from the balance of sterling area's deficit, leaving a net balance of $1,000 million, or $992 million, which was credited to Canada by the London banks.

His measure was threefold. It provided, first, for the outright gift of $1,000 million for war purchases in Canada; second, for the acceptance by Canada of a $700 million United Kingdom obligation, without interest until the end of the war "in exchange for an equivalent amount of deposits in pounds sterling held in banks in the United Kingdom; third, for the purchase of unmatured dominion or Canadian National Railway securities held by the government of the United Kingdom. The Canadian government was empowered to borrow $1,000 million to purchase said securities. Was it sensible to raise by way of loan $1,000 million to repatriate those securities? Could it not have been done as a matter of course with the idle Canadian credit of a similar amount in the London banks?

With regard to the $700 million United Kingdom obligation, the Minister of Finance said:

> It has also been proposed to the British government, and they have agreed, that the funds arising from any redemption or repayment during the war of Canadian securities owned in Britain will be applied to the reduction of the loan.

The dominion government made a distinction between the securities, first held by the British government, and second, those owned in Britain. Why was not a similar policy applied to both kinds of securities? Those held by the British government were bearing a low rate of interest of three and four per cent. We repatriated a considerable amount of such investments. Those owned in Britain were C.I.L., rayon companies, Enos Fruit Salts, Red Rose Tea, Hudson Bay Company, International Nickel, Lever Brothers Soap, et cetera. They were in the hands of a few financial wizards close to the Bank of England and Barclay's bank. Naturally, the latter were much more profitable than the former. They were not repatriated.

Mr. HOMUTH: I rise to a point of order. Is the hon member quoting, or is he reading a speech?

Mr. POULIOT: I am referring to my notes and I am reading quotations from past debates, which I have a right to do.

Mr. HOMUTH: Mr. Chairman, I object. If the hon. member is reading his speech I have an objection. If he is making a quotation, all right. I do not like members rising in this house and reading their speeches.

The CHAIRMAN: On the point of order, there is no doubt that the rules do not permit of any member reading his speech, but a member could read quotations if he wishes to put them before the committee.

Mr. POULIOT: My hon. friend will be satisfied with what I am reading.

Mr. HOMUTH: I am not satisfied with what the hon. member is reading. I do not like it.

Mr. POULIOT: These are quotations from past Hansards.

Mr. HOMUTH: I beg your pardon.

Mr. POULIOT: I have a perfect right to read them and it is merely to be accurate that I do so; otherwise I could speak easily without notes, following the example of the hon. gentleman on many occasions.

If the repatriation policy was the right one for a certain category of securities, was it not for all of them? South Africa easily secured the approval of the British government for the transfer of ownership of the stock of Diamond Gold Mines, which was paid with the credit which that country had in the London banks. But the financiers associated with those banks feared that the Canadian government might follow the South African precedent. They had a flea in their ear. They succeeded in convincing the Canadian government to adopt the following scheme to leave their profitable commercial investments untouched. The dominion government accepted from the United Kingdom a $700 million obligation without interest and payable after the war, to be financed with the sterling credit account of Canada in London, which was to be more than covered with a further credit of $1,000 million.

The year before Canada had supplied Great Britain with all the foodstuffs and munitions that we could produce.

> The Canadian government long ago advised the British prime minister that the United Kingdom could continue to buy in Canada all essential supplies that could be procured and transported without any fear of the shortage of dollars. . . . I believe that all Canadians approved the assurance thus given to the government of the United Kingdom. . . . The continuance of these purchases and expenditures, however, involves a continuance of the huge deficit of the sterling area in its balance of payments with Canada which must be financed (very largely at least, perhaps wholly) by Canada itself.

Those were the words of the Minister of Finance. That high finance deal did not benefit the soldiers, nor the British people nor the British government, which had previously received the same assistance in the matter of food and munitions that they received afterwards, but it gave to a small number of London capitalists the privilege of escaping Canadian taxation on their choice commercial investments. Here is another quotation from the Minister of Finance:

> We have realized for some time that the accumulation of sterling balances . . . was appropriate only as an interim or transitory form of assistance. It involved the growing up of what was nominally a demand liability by Britain to Canada, the future of which was bound to involve uncertainties, particularly as the amount grew far beyond anything which could be repaid by Britain in Canadian dollars, except perhaps over a very long period of time.

Then he went on:

> The indefinite growth of this obligation, if permitted to continue for years, would have led to the existence after the war of what would be in effect a huge and unmanageable war debt owed by Britain to Canada.

If Britain could not manage a war debt owed to Canada, how could the dominion government manage a huge war debt owed by the Canadian taxpayers? The measure was praised by several parties in the house, and was opposed by some. I was persistent in asking for detailed information, and on May 10 of last year I said:

> If we want information it is not only with regard to what has been done in the past; it is for the purpose of having a guarantee for the future. It is the only check we have, now that responsibility is taken out of our hands.

The following day the minister tabled a summary of Canadian dollar requirements of Britain and the rest of the sterling area and how they were financed, as follows:

(In millions of dollars)

	Calendar year 1942	Fiscal year 1942-43
A. Canadian dollars required by Britain and the rest of the sterling area for payments to Canada.
1. For purchases of munitions in Canada	873	896
2. For other exports by Canada	695	706
Among other things these exports included candy, fox, mink and seal skins.
3. For war activities in Canada, including air training, etc	127	132
4. For freight payments to Canada	113	113
5. For fixed capital expenditures in Canada for the production of munitions	58	31
6. For other capital payments to Canada	5	5
7. For interest and dividend payments	12	10
8. For other services and miscellaneous	16	15
Total	1,899	1,908

Then the minister gave a list of commodity exports, with the following totals:

1. Agricultural and vegetable food products	$101,775,618
2. Tobacco and its products	3,203,198
3. Animal and fish products	158,646,446
	$263,625,262

That was not even one-half the total of exports by Canada, other than munitions. The minister also tabled a summary of the sterling area purchases and other payments in Canada during the period of use of the billion dollar contribution. It amounted to $1,659 million, leaving a difference of $240 million and $249 million respectively, with the totals of $1,899 million and $1,908 million of the summary of Canadian dollar requirements of Britain and the rest of the sterling area, and how they were financed. Apparently much more was financed than was purchased or accounted for. He also gave a statement of how those Canadian dollars were obtained by Britain and the rest of the sterling area, which included two "balancing items" of $17 million and $41 million, respectively, and explained that these were "apparent errors and omissions due in part to the use of preliminary figures." I was far from being appeased and said:

Once more I challenge the leader of the opposition, the ex-leader of the opposition and everybody to your left—

Mr. Casselman: Challenge your own side.

Mr. Pouliot: —I will ask them why they have not complained of the fact that the Bank of Canada cannot reach a balance in the account—

Some hon. members: Order.

Mr. Pouliot: We are discussing lend-lease legislation. How is it that at page 5 of the statement tabled yesterday by the minister there is $17 million for which it is impossible to render account by reason of the mix-up that exists at the Bank of Canada for the calendar year 1942, and $41 million for the year 1942-43? This is relevant to the bill. How is it that the ex-leader of the opposition with his magnifying glass did not say anything about it, although he rises so easily and is always so full of indignation? Why does he not support me—

Some hon. members: Order.

Then the minister said:

On the point of order, Mr. Chairman, we must either have the rule established or disregard it, that the discussion must be relevant to the item before the committee. The item under discussion is section 2 of the bill, which is an interpretative section defining certain terms. It is quite within the right of any hon. member to object to those definitions or ask questions about them, advocate other definitions or point out undesirable results that would follow from defining those terms in that way. But I submit it is not in order to deal with documents that were placed before the house, not under this item at all but as a matter of accounting for the disposition of last year's billion-dollar gift.

There was some argument, and finally I said that I hoped the discussion would be resumed later. Why should anyone worry? The Minister of Munitions and Supply (Mr. Howe) had informed the house the day before that—

. . . we maintain a large staff of chartered accountants in England to determine exactly what the costs are.

There was also the united nations mutual aid bill, which was introduced on May 6, 1943. The hon. member for Richelieu-Verchères, spoke on that occasion, and spoke well. The hon. member for Gaspé also made a good speech. Some members voted for, and others voted against. The hon. member for Laval-Two Mountains moved the six months' hoist. The hon. member for Bellechasse and the financial critic of the New Democracy group made very able speeches on that occasion. The speech of the hon. member for Bellechasse was well reasoned, and he stated in it that Canada had a right to expect something in return for mutual aid.

Now, sir, we have the same thing. We have protested about financing which we believe is wrong. We protest, too, against the wrong interpretation given to our remarks. At the present time we are fighting the cause of the taxpayer. We do it in all earnestness, and believe the time has come when we must protect ourselves by asking for some security, or at least for some acknowledgment, from countries receiving assistance from Canada. That was the view even of some members who voted for the bill.

Opinions are free. I will stand by the will of the majority; I will respect it. But to say that anyone is a bad Canadian because he does not swallow every piece of legislation brought forward by the financial wizards of the Department of Finance, is going too far. It is not fair for any member to cast aspersions upon or to impute motives to other members who protest against unsound financing.

It is presented in a strange way. I remember that at the time of the election of the Minister of Justice in Quebec East the people were put under the impression that it was a gift, something like that received at Christmas time. They were told that gifts were sent overseas, and that we were not sending money. Reasoning like that is childish. The money comes from the pockets of the Canadian people, and it is a mortgage on the future generation. That is the money with which all those goods are purchased and delivered. In order to be fair to the future generation, in order to alleviate their burdens and to give them an opportunity to start business as most of our fellow Canadians have done before the war, we should have acknowledgments for what Canada has done for other countries.

Apparently it is most unpatriotic to ask for them. Who knows who will be at the head of government in Great Britain after the war? Who knows if shadow governments will still be in office when the war is over and when Europe is liberated? We have seen what has happened in connection with Yugoslavia. That country had a government in Cairo, and then another one was established in Yugoslavia. The government in Cairo, which had the support of the British government for a time, was afterwards denied that support. No one knows with whom we shall be dealing after the war is over, when we have treaties and agreements to sign with other nations in the world. Therefore it is difficult to leave it at that, and to trust those who have assumed the task of forming governments to remember what Canada has done for those countries. I shall not insist any longer. I have said what I wanted to say. I find the principle of the legislation unsound, although the purpose may be good.

Mr. FRASER (Peterborough West): In the report of the Canadian mutual aid board of May 20, 1943, to March 31, 1944, I find this:

The following tabulation shows the quantities of the chief types of supplies provided to Britain on mutual aid up to March 31, 1944.

In that list I find 411,373,555 pounds of bacon and meat. If that is a gift to Great Britain, then what do we understand from the statement by the Minister of Agriculture to the effect that we have a contract with Great Britain to supply bacon and meat, and especially bacon. Was that contract in connection with this, or something else? The same applies to butter and cheese. We find in this list 7,048,506 pounds of butter and 73,502,482 pounds of cheese. Would the minister say if that is included in the contract mentioned by the Minister of Agriculture?

Mr. ILSLEY: Some of the bacon is sold, and some of it is delivered under the provisions of the Mutual Aid bill. The settlement with the suppliers is at the same price in both cases.

Section agreed to.

On section 2—War supplies.

Mr. FRASER (Peterborough West): Is this in addition to the other contract?

Mr. ILSLEY: No.

Mr. FRASER (Peterborough West): This is part of the contract?

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes.

Mr. FRASER (Peterborough West): Well, then, this should not be a contract at all, should it?

Mr. ILSLEY: The contract covers the amount to be delivered. I am not familiar with its terms, but those contracts say that it shall be not less than a certain amount, or at least a certain amount, or something of that kind. At any rate, a contract is made. Then the question comes up as to how it will be financed. In practice, part of the bacon sent to Great Britain is sold and paid for under that contract, and part of it is paid for by the mutual aid board. It is delivered under the provisions setting up the mutual aid board. However, the amount the suppliers get is the same. They are paid at the contract price.

Mr. CARDIN: Has there been any repatriation of Canadian securities since last year?

Mr. ILSLEY: There has been no repatriation of securities since last year. There have been some odds and ends of previous repatriations which required cleaning up, but those were very small amounts.

Mr. CARDIN: What is the amount of securities at present held in England?

Mr. ILSLEY: It was estimated that at the end of 1942 and excluding the securities later repatriated by the Canadian government, residents of the United Kingdom held Canadian stocks and bonds to the value of approximately $1,070,000,000. This was composed, as I said last year, of about $590,000,000 in Canadian dollar securities and $480,000,000 in sterling securities. Since that time, slightly over $70,000,000 worth of these securities have been redeemed or sold outside the United Kingdom. Over the same period it was also estimated, from an examination of security prices, that the increase in the market value of the remaining securities would add about an equal amount to the value as estimated at the end of 1942. Consequently, it is still true that residents of the United Kingdom hold Canadian bonds and stocks to the value of approximately $1,070,000,000.

Mr. CARDIN: Can the minister tell me if the information given to me is correct, that the United States under lend-lease have repatriated practically all United States securities held in England?

Mr. ILSLEY: They repatriated nearly all, but not all. I do not know the amount left unrepatriated, but they did that before they became belligerents. If I am correctly informed, they have repatriated none since they entered the war.

Section agreed to.

Sections 3 to 6 inclusive agreed to.

Bill reported.

Mr. ILSLEY moved the third reading of the bill.

Mr. RAYMOND: On division.

Motion agreed to on division and bill read the third time and passed.

QUEBEC SAVINGS BANKS ACT

DECENNIAL REVISION

Hon. J. L. ILSLEY (Minister of Finance) moved the second reading of bill No. 131, to amend the Quebec Savings Banks Act.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and referred to the standing committee on banking and commerce.

SURPLUS CROWN ASSETS

PROVISION FOR CORPORATION AND ADVISORY COMMITTEE

The house resumed from Monday, June 12, consideration in committee of bill No. 137, respecting surplus crown assets—Mr. Howe—Mr. Bradette in the chair.

Section 10 agreed to.

On section 11—President, vice president.

Mr. STIRLING: Should not the quorum be mentioned?

Mr. CHEVRIER: I think it follows that the decision of the majority of the members of the board attending the meeting would constitute a quorum. If one looks at subsection 2 of section 10 he will find that the corporation is to consist of a board of not less than six directors appointed by the minister with the approval of the governor in council. I am informed by those who have drafted this bill that a quorum will consist of a majority of those who are present.

Mr. STIRLING: Just what does that mean? Supposing four of the six are present, would that be a quorum?

Mr. CHEVRIER: As the section reads it is:

A decision of the majority of the directors present and constituting a quorum shall be a decision of the corporation, and in the event of a tie, the president or other director acting as chairman shall have the casting vote.

I am informed that a quorum will consist of a majority.

Mr. STIRLING: Surely that will not do. Supposing only three of the six were present, would that be a quorum?

Mr. CHEVRIER: With the chairman breaking the tie, yes.

Mr. STIRLING. The chairman is one of the six.

Mr. CHEVRIER: He may vote in case of a tie.

Mr. MacNICOL: There would still be a tie.

Mr. CHEVRIER: I am informed that over and above the mention of a quorum in subsection 6 of section 11, there is in the bill another section which provides for the setting up of by-laws by the corporation and those by-laws will provide the number which will constitute a quorum.

Mr. STIRLING: Would it not be reasonable to refer to the quorum in the bill itself?

Mr. CHEVRIER: If the hon. member will look at section 13, he will see there that the corporation may provide for the calling of meetings of the board or the executive committee and the number of persons who shall constitute a quorum in each case.

Mr. STIRLING: I think that answers it.

Mr. KNOWLES: When we broke off the discussion on this bill last night I was calling attention to what I thought was an omission from either section 10 or section 11. I was referring to the fact that in another bill before the house there is a clause providing for independence of the members of the board from the particular industry concerned. I was referring in that case to the bill to amend the Aeronautics Act, and I suggested that in the bill now before us there should be a similar provision so that the members of this board would be independent financially of the industries interested in the work which this board and corporation will carry on.

In the reply which the minister made—it was only a partial answer because the discussion was interrupted to take up another item of business—he referred to the desirability of securing the services of men who have had experience in a particular line. I believe it is well known, Mr. Chairman, that we have never objected to that principle, namely, the securing of the services of men who know the business involved. Throughout the course of the war we have objected to the dollar-a-year-man principle, but we have not objected to calling upon men to do the jobs of which they are capable. We have objected to what we regard as an expensive policy, namely, the employing of men for a dollar a year, with the result that they have to maintain their private business connections. We contend that for the full protection of the interests of the people as a whole, men directing such important works as have had to be directed during the course of the war and the men who will now direct this important task should be independent of the interests of private enterprise and private business. As hon. members know, we have objected for several years now to the dollar-a-year-man policy with respect to the controls and measures by which sections of the war economy have been run. We now object to the carrying over of that principle into the post-war period in so far as the set-up of this board is concerned.

I repeat that in my view there should be in this bill, in either section 10 or section 11, a provision for the independence of the board comparable with the position of the board to which I referred last night under the bill to amend the Aeronautics Act.

Mr. HOMUTH: Once more the acting leader of the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation is raising the question of the honesty of the men who are asked to enter the public service. Never does the acting leader of the C.C.F. or any member of his party rise in this house to criticize a measure without questioning the honesty of people administering it and sneering at people who at least have some idea of the business with which they are dealing. The acting leader of the C.C.F.—

Mr. KNOWLES: Not acting leader; just whip.

Mr. HOMUTH: —has just said that they objected to the dollar a year men because they did not think they could serve honestly; at least that was his implication. Yet if those same men were taken into the government service and paid substantial salaries the acting leader of the C.C.F. and his party would feel that those same men would be honest in the administration of their duties. Does the hon. member, for instance, suggest that some school teacher or college professor or a minister of the gospel, if you will, should be asked to handle the disposal of machinery? Does he suggest that that type of gentleman should be asked to dispose of war plants?

Mr. GRAYDON: Sometimes they tamper with political machinery.

Mr. HOMUTH: They always throw a monkey-wrench into it and get ground up.

Mr. KNOWLES: Wait till Thursday.

Mr. HOMUTH: I am not worrying about Thursday. Wait till the general election comes and we will show you where you stand. I am not being facetious. I am serious about this, because we have hundreds of millions of dollars worth of war assets to dispose of, and I would hate to think that schoolteachers, ministers of the gospel and gentlemen with socialist ideas imported from Russia and other countries with socialist governments are to handle the business of disposing of these war assets. I should not like to see this business placed in the hands of that type of men when the war is over. I know it will not happen because the people of this country are coming to their senses. I was just giving an inkling of that danger.

Mr. KNOWLES: Have you ever heard of democracy?

Mr. HOMUTH: Yes, I have heard of democracy, and it is so foreign to the C.C.F. that they do not know the meaning of it. Democracy is a system where people have the right to work out their own destinies, while the C.C.F. stands for regimentation, socialization and all the rest of it. I could recite their whole platform if there were time.

What I rose to ask the parliamentary assistant was this—having disposed of the argument of the acting leader of the C.C.F.—what effect will the passing of this bill have on the activities of the salvage disposal board?

Mr. KNOWLES: Oh.

Mr. HOMUTH: My hon. friend says "oh", because I happen to be in business and do some business with that board. I have always found them to work on a strictly competitive basis, and if anybody puts in a bid one-quarter of one percent higher than mine that person gets the business. I do not think there ever was a more honest salvage disposal board in the history of this country than the one we have at this time, and I give them credit for that. Will the salvage disposal board come under the jurisdiction of the War Assets Corporation? To some extent it is a different line of business. There is a line of demarcation between their work and the work of the War Assets Corporation. The War Assets Corporation deals with factories, machinery and equipment that have been paid for or financed by the government. The salvage disposal board deals with things that are no longer of use to the services, such as metal of all descriptions, vehicles of all descriptions, things that might be classed as second-hand or scrap material. Let me repeat that these people have been doing a great job in the air force, the army and the navy, and they have been getting perhaps the highest prices possible. I know they are getting higher prices than would ordinarily be paid for salvage materials, because they are very competent men. I think of Major Stooks, for instance, who is head of the army salvage disposal. He is a man who has had a great deal of experience with the Red Cross, not only purchasing for them but selling a lot of things for them. Would the salvage disposal board pass out of the picture, or would they be incorporated in this organization?

Mr. CHEVRIER: It is not the intention to have the salvage and disposal board disappear. It will continue to operate as it does, and the War Assets Corporation will use it as an agent to make sales. It has done that already, and with great success. It will continue to do so; and one section of the bill which has already been passed makes provision for the using of that board as agent.

Mr. HOMUTH: What I was getting at was, will they continue to act independently, or will they be part and parcel of the War Assets Corporation? Will the corporation take over their activities? For instance, with regard to the disposal of motor vehicles, I can understand the War Assets Corporation saying to them, "As a disposal board you can handle this business." Or would they take them in and say, "This is all one organization"?

Mr. CHEVRIER: At the moment it is the intention not to take them over, but to use them as agents. When the problem becomes much more serious and the surplus is much larger than it now is, it may be necessary to take the board and make it an adjunct of the War Assets Corporation. But at the moment that is not the intention.

Mr. GRAYDON: Will the present personnel of the War Assets Corporation be continued as at present existing under the order in council?

Mr. CHEVRIER: I do not think there is any doubt that it will. However, the statute which will set up the War Assets Corporation will set up an entirely different creature from that which has been set up by order in council. I think the minister indicated in the discussion last evening that it was the intention to carry out the same policy with reference to this corporation set up by statute as with relation to that under the order in council. In other words, what he intended to convey to the committee was that the minister, with the advice of the governor in council, will set the policy. I think I am safe in saying that the same procedure will follow under the statute as under the order in council.

Mr. GRAYDON: The reason why I raised the question is that I wished to follow it up by asking whether, in the directorship of the War Assets Corporation, labour and agriculture will be represented.

Mr. CHEVRIER: Labour is already represented in the corporation, and I am sure that it will be under the statute.

Mr. GRAYDON: Is my hon. friend certain that labour is represented in the corporation? I know it is represented in the allocation committee, but is it represented in the War Assets Corporation directorate?

Mr. CHEVRIER: I understand that Mr. J. B. Ward, who is a director of the corporation, represents labour.

Mr. GRAYDON: In what way is he qualified to represent labour? I am only seeking for information.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): He is a very well known railway man.

Mr. GRAYDON: The railway brotherhood? That is a good brotherhood.

The CHAIRMAN: Shall the clause carry?

Mr. GILLIS: No. This matter we are now discussing is in my opinion one of the most important matters with which the committee can deal. The personnel of both the war assets allocation committee and the War Assets Corporation are very important as regards the equipment which may be used in the post-war period. The matter is so important that we should have a general understanding. The hon. member for Waterloo South seems very touchy on this point.

Mr. HOMUTH: I am not touchy, but I am honest about it; and I have some faith in my fellow-man.

Mr. GILLIS: He tries to create the impression that, while he has great faith in his fellow-man, nobody else has.

Mr. HOMUTH: Certainly you people have not, if he makes more than a dollar or two a day.

Mr. GILLIS: He tried to create the impression that the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre had questioned the honesty of the people who are now being suggested for this work. The fact of the matter is that we do not know who will constitute the personnel of either the war assets allocation committee or the War Assets Corporation.

Mr. HOMUTH: "O ye of little faith."

Mr. GILLIS : We do not know who they will be.

Mr. FRASER (Peterborough West): He was talking about the dollar a year men.

Mr. GILLIS: As I understand the question we are now discussing, it is that of setting up machinery with authority to dispose of approximately $800 million which the Canadian people have invested in war plant and equipment.

Mr. MacNICOL: Three or four billion dollars.

Mr. GILLIS: I am talking about the actual war plants and equipment now functioning in this country. Those are the figures the government gives us.

Mr. GRAYDON: I think your figures are low.

Mr. GILLIS: I am talking about the actual assets, fixed in this country, which may be used in the aftermath of the war. This actual plant and equipment we are discussing in relation to the machinery we are setting up is the only thing, as I see it, on which we can pin our faith for the creation of employment after the war for the returning service personnel and the million or so workers now employed in war industry. I am concerned, as is the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre, that we shall select men for both the allocation committee and the War Assets Corporation who will be free from influence or pressure from any group, so that they may make an examination of the assets which are being handed to them, and their approach to the problem shall not be that of scrapping the machinery because it may interfere with private enterprise, but rather that of how it may best be utilized in the national economy in the aftermath of the war to create employment for those who are now fighting the war. That is what we are concerned about.

As far as dollar a year men are concerned, certainly we object to that principle. I believe that any man whom this government selects to do a job which is a full-time job during the process of fighting this war cannot devote his time and his interest to some organization in Montreal, Vancouver or elsewhere and at the same time sit here and direct an important department of government. It is from the viewpoint of efficiency that we have quarreled with the arrangement in the past and we are quarreling with it now. We are not unmindful of the fact, for instance, that you brought in Mr. McTague, one of our chief judges; you handed him the job of regulating labour relations, setting up a labour jurisprudence, doing something which was bound to be important in the future labour relations of this country; and we thought his work would be continued into the post-war period. He walked out—

Mr. MacNICOL: But he did a good job.

Mr. GILLIS: —and he is heading up the Tory party.

Mr. MacNICOL: And he will do a good job there.

Mr. GILLIS: He could not have been very much interested in the future when he could slide back into the party of the feudal lords and go to a museum for the solutions of the future.

Mr. GRAYDON: Do not become a "little Canadian".

Mr. GILLIS: I am telling the truth. If the hon. member cannot take it he can go behind the curtains.

Mr. GRAYDON: See if I do.

The CHAIRMAN: Order. I would ask that the discussion if possible be relevant to the item.

Mr. GRAYDON: We are entitled to a little humour, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): We are not getting it.

Mr. GILLIS: I am discussing dollar a year men in relation to the principle of setting up this war assets allocation committee and the War Assets Corporation.

Mr. GRAYDON: Well, leave Charlie McTague out of it.

Mr. GILLIS: You brought in Sir Henry Borden.

Mr. GRAYDON: Are you standing for titles now?

An hon. MEMBER: "Coming events—"

Mr. GILLIS: Henry Borden of Barclay's bank, and you made him chief coordinator of controls.

Mr. MacNICOL: He did a good job too.

Mr. GILLIS: You handed over the fuel emergency programme to him and he made a good job of that, so that you are exactly where you started, worse off if anything. Now you have to appoint a royal commission to clean up the job he made a mess of, and when he is finished with that he goes back and slides into the seats of the past. This is the history of that calibre of people. They are not interested in developing this country; they are more interested in something for themselves, individually and personally.

Mr. GRAYDON: Well, now, Mr. Chairman, surely there is a limit to this type of thing. I rise to a point of order.

Mr. GILLIS: Who has the floor?

Mr. GRAYDON: On a point of order. Normally my hon. friend calmly analyses any situation he discusses, but to-night for some reason or another he has accused the member for Waterloo South of being touchy and then he proceeds to exhibit the same traits himself. May I ask him to continue to show the same consideration that has always characterized his conduct heretofore.

Mr. GILLIS: Is that a point of order?

Mr. GRAYDON: I would ask him to see to it that, so far as honourable citizens of this country are concerned, he does not take a pail of black paint and start to do a job on them at this time.

Mr. GILLIS: Who has the floor?

The CHAIRMAN: I must ask hon. members to stick to the clause which is under consideration.

Mr. GRAYDON: Put your black-paint brush under the seat.

The CHAIRMAN: Order.

Mr. GILLIS: I sat in this house this evening and listened to the discussion and I had no intention of taking part in it. I thought the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre made a very conservative understatement of this matter, but when the member for Waterloo-South rose and started this business of throwing things around—well, we can throw them back, and I have no intention of taking a lecture from the leader of the opposition.

Mr. GRAYDON: I did not expect you would.

Mr. GILLIS: I am quite capable of looking after myself. The thing we are concerned about in the setting up of this committee to dispose of assets created by the war is that the taxpayers of the country by and large should be represented. And when I say taxpayers, I mean your farmers and working people throughout the country who are paying the taxes that have created these assets—

Mr. GRAYDON: Now you are talking.

Mr. GILLIS: —and who will be depending, in the aftermath of the war, on the utilization of the assets they are creating. If we are to look after those who are returning from the war, and approximately a million and a half war workers who will be out of industry, we must make sure this is done. We have a fairly clear picture to-day of where those who pin their faith exclusively on private enterprise in the future stand in this matter. The chamber of commerce, in the presentation to the reconstruction committee, definitely state that this machinery must be taken out of circulation and under no circumstances be utilized in competition with private enterprise. The assets that are now being handed over to this corporation are, I am afraid, already tied up with agreements and understandings that will not conduce to the best interests of the Canadian people. For example, it is some months ago that I received a letter from a soldier of this war routed into a war industry, and under the fuel emergency order he was sent back to a coal mine, to a town where there was no housing. In that town there are barracks that are not being used.

The CHAIRMAN: Order. In my opinion the present discussion is not relevant. If the hon. member will read the clause that is under consideration I think he will agree with that.

[The Chairman.]

Mr. GILLIS: I am sticking to the setting up of the committee.

The CHAIRMAN: We are on clause 11 and I must rule that the present discussion is not relevant to that clause.

Mr. GILLIS: If it is not relevant to clause 11, then you cannot discuss anything. I am pointing out the necessity of placing on this committee men who are independent, who represent the community at large, and not any particular interest; and if they are to be free and independent, then, as suggested by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre, the clause should contain some provision such as is contained in the bill on the aeronautics board that is being set up. This particular clause is wide open and I think that before the committee adopts this clause it should have more information from the parliamentary assistant to the Minister of Munitions and Supply as to the entire personnel of both the allocations committee and the War Assets Corporation. We should see to it that they are free and independent, because the asset that they will handle when the war is over is an asset that belongs to the Canadian people as a whole, and the government in power to-day is the custodian of that property. Not only is it the obligation of the government to the people to see that the committee are free and independent and that their duties and responsibilities are clearly defined in the bill, but the government should also place in the hands of that committee some definite instructions with regard to the utilization of the assets they are to handle in the future economy of the country.

I consider this whole matter a very important part of our whole post-war programme, and before I am prepared, as one member of the committee, to allow the bill to go through I want more definite and specific information on the asset as it now stands and as to what agreements or understandings the government has with the people who own the land where the plant and equipment are now located. I was going to cite the experience of that barracks because definitely that committee will not have any say in the disposing of that particular property, since it has already been disposed of by agreement with the company that own the land. There is a first option, and when it is taken over, the soldier coming back from the war is not permitted any of the lumber or of the building to provide a roof for himself and his family.

Progress reported.

At eleven o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

Wednesday, June 14, 1944

The house met at three o'clock.

VETERANS' AFFAIRS

ESTABLISHMENT OF DEPARTMENT TO DEAL WITH THE CARE, TREATMENT, TRAINING OR REESTABLISHMENT OF MEMBERS OF THE ARMED FORCES

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister) moved the second reading of bill No. 83, to establish a department of veterans' affairs.

Mr. SPEAKER: Is it the pleasure of the house to adopt the motion?

Some hon. MEMBERS: Carried.

Mr. GORDON GRAYDON (Leader of the Opposition): Well, Mr. Speaker, my understanding of the arrangement was that on the motion for second reading the Prime Minister would make some introductory remarks, and then that the Minister of Pensions and National Health (Mr. Mackenzie) would make a statement. I rise only to draw attention to that understanding.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I think my hon. friend is misinformed in respect of any understanding. When the resolution was before the house the minister made a lengthy statement respecting the measure. I too made a statement at the time. That was on April 17. At that time it was made clear that the bill was introduced for the purpose of establishing a new department of government, and I think all agreed on the principle. In committee the Minister of Pensions and National Health, who had most to do with the preparation of the bill, and who indeed some time ago suggested the creation of the department, took charge of it, and made a full statement.

Mr. GRAYDON: I have no desire to urge my understanding in the matter. I do know however that some members are prepared to speak on the motion for second reading, and I understood that because of that the minister wished to make a statement before those speeches were made. That is the reason I raised the point.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Does the hon. member not want the motion for second reading to pass at once?

Mr. GRAYDON: That is it.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: If any members wish to speak on the second reading, they should feel free to do so. Probably the house will excuse me, as I find it necessary to attend a meeting of the war committee. I came in only to be present at the opening, and to move second reading.

Mr. GRAYDON: The arrangement we made was that the Prime Minister would not have to be here.

Mr. SPEAKER: Then the motion is for second reading.

Mr. JAMES SINCLAIR (Vancouver North): Mr. Speaker, my first speech upon returning to this house from overseas was in respect to veterans' affairs, so that perhaps it is only fitting that my last speech before returning to service should also be on the same subject. I am grateful to the air force for not only giving me very generous leave, but extending it so that I can discuss this bill.

I am most heartily in favour of the consolidation into one department of all branches of government activity relating to soldiers' affairs. Nothing is more disheartening to persons seeking information or help from the government than to be passed from department to department to department. That is what now happens in connection with veterans' affairs, which are now handled by five departments. When the new department is established every ex-service man in Canada will know exactly where to apply for help or for assistance. Such consolidation will also make possible something which every veteran believes highly desirable, namely, that all the officials of the department shall be returned soldiers who know the affairs and circumstances of returned soldiers.

One thing that concerns me somewhat in respect of the new department is its name. It is to be known as the Department of Veterans' Affairs. Since the last war the word "veteran" has been used a great deal in Canada, and as the years have passed there has attached to it an association of age and disability. Yet the greatest part of the work of this new department will be for men who are neither aged nor disabled. On the contrary they will be the youngest and most vigorous of our manhood. The dictionary confirms this definition of the word "veteran". I do not know whether a more applicable single word exists. "Ex-service men" is too much of a mouthful, and "soldiers" is not applicable as they are no longer soldiers when the new department takes over their affairs. While accepting the name "Veterans' Affairs", I sincerely hope there will be nothing aged or disabled about the approach by the new department to its work. In this connection I feel it most important that the department recruit a considerable percentage of its officials from among the young veterans of this war. I am not referring to the brass hats; rather I have in mind the junior officers and men in the ranks, men with a fresh and sympathetic approach to the problems of the new veterans.

Most of the officials of the present department of Pensions and National Health have been handling veterans' affairs for the last twenty-five years, and are pretty well set and hardened in their ways. Some time ago the Minister of National Defence for Air (Mr. Power) announced retirements from his service of senior air officers, so as to keep his air force "young, virile and dynamic." I think that this principle would be most desirable in the new department of veterans' affairs.

I intend now to comment briefly on some phases of the activities of the new department. I did not enter into the debate when the pensions estimates were before the house, because I felt I could add nothing to what was being done so well by senior members in all parts of the house. Most of those members who did speak were old returned soldiers themselves, and have been fighting the cause of the old soldier in parliament and through veterans' associations for the last twenty-five years. Most of them know the Pension Act line by line.

I have found, and I am sure most hon. members have found that the most distressing part of our duty is that of dealing with pension cases. Members of parliament get those cases only as a last resort, when all other processes have failed. It is perhaps only natural that we should have few successes in these cases. I find it particularly heart-breaking to have to write to men who, I know, are aged, disabled or crippled, men who, in the prime of their lives, offered everything to their country, life itself, and tell them that they have been denied that pittance which would mean security to them in their time of need. It is not as though any great saving were effected by this policy, because these men generally have to be supported by public funds, from some source or another. How much better, for the self-respect of these men and of their dependents, and, what is more, how much better for our self-respect as Canadians, that they receive this help as a right, in gratitude for their services and not as public relief or private charity because we are too Christian to see them starve.

I do not wish this to be taken as too broad a criticism of the Department of Pensions and National Health. I know our legislation is as good as any in effect anywhere. I know that for every one of these pitiful borderline cases the department handles hundreds of cases successfully, and about which we hear nothing. This merely adds weight to my observation that it is so petty to be niggardly to so few because the cost would be so little, especially at a time when we think nothing of spending billions for the implements of warfare. Yet we are hesitant about spending just a little more to bring security to the few casualties of warfare whose disabilities cannot quite be proven to come within the scope of our present pensions legislation.

Whenever I get too despondent about how impotent my efforts are in these cases I think about the load carried by the Minister of Pensions and National Health. He carries the load of every single member multiplied by the two hundred and forty-five ridings. I know he has done his best to liberalize the pensions legislation, and I know that throughout his long career in public life he has fought very hard for his old comrades. It is not because of any lack of sympathy on his part that these borderline cases fail. It is rather because of the economies of the treasury board in the background. I intend to speak more fully on that in a moment.

At this time perhaps it would be appropriate for me to thank the minister's secretary, Miss Dixon, for all the help she has given, through me, to the old soldiers in my riding. Her courtesy, her patience, her willingness to help in every way, and her wide knowledge of departmental affairs have been of great help to me, and I am sure also to many other members of this house.

The whole problem of the return and the proper reestablishment of our fighting men after the war is a secondary one. It depends on one prime consideration, that the programme of reconstruction shall eventually provide adequate employment for all those who are willing and able to work. Included in this programme must be the war workers, but any plan big enough to provide employment for our veterans will certainly include the war workers. After all they are a preferred class, having practised civilian trades throughout the war in civilian life. Therefore, our entire programme of rehabilitation should be based on the assumption that adequate employment will be available. If that is not so, our programme of rehabilitation will be nothing but a programme of glorified relief, with a little training thrown in to pass the time away.

The object then is to return those who had civilian jobs to those jobs, to find jobs for those who have trades and skills, and to provide training for those who will need or want such training to fit themselves for employment. The training aspect is especially important because so many of our fighting men are young men who joined up before they had learned a trade or profession. If this training is not given they will be condemned to a life of unskilled labour because of their war service.

There are some who deprecate any talk of post-war planning, reconstruction and rehabilitation at this time, because, they say, our whole energies should be concentrated on winning the war and that such talk gives the impression that the war is practically won. The tragedy of the united nations in 1939 was that we were unprepared for war even though it had appeared on the horizon since Munich. It will be a much greater tragedy if we are unprepared for peace, if having won the victory on the battlefield we lose it in chaos at home through unpreparedness. No better lift to the morale of the men now fighting can be given than the assurance by the government that it is now planning how to rehabilitate and reestablish them in civil life when the war is won.

The task is scarcely one just for the government. No soldier is going to be rehabilitated and reestablished just by government legislation or government enactment. It is up to the government to lay the foundation and from then on it is up to the soldier himself, to the community to which he returns and to private industry. May I here pay a tribute to the very fine work being done across Canada by the citizens' rehabilitation committees. After all, the first job of rehabilitation is to fit the veteran back into the social life of the community to which he returns, and these citizens' committees are doing a very fine work.

Very little has been said about the part industry must play in this programme of rehabilitation. The Reinstatement in Civil Employment Act of 1942 lays down the bare minimum, a minimum a great deal less than many soldiers realize. While the act provides that any man who left a civilian job to enlist shall get that job back after the war under conditions not less favourable than those that existed when he enlisted and with his old seniority, it does not mean that every soldier who had a job when he joined up is going to get his job back. When industry has had employees who enlisted, and who were replaced by others who later enlisted, it cannot be expected to have these junior service men displace senior civilian employees who have stayed with the industry throughout the war and who have seniority.

Another major factor is that a great many of our men do not want to go back to their old jobs. They have advanced in the service and in their knowledge of trade skills and in ambition, and they have no wish to return to their old jobs. If private industry tries to get by by doing only the minimum required under the act, it will be of very little help in the programme of rehabilitation. However, if private industry tries to carry out the spirit of the act in the most generous fashion it will prove an important factor in the reestablishment of our fighting men.

In this regard I should like to mention one company and what they have done. When I last spoke on rehabilitation I was treated very kindly by the gentlemen of the press, and as a result I received a considerable volume of mail from soldiers, soldiers' organizations, unions, service clubs and so on. I received one letter from the president of the Canadian branch of one of the largest companies in the world, Lever Brothers. He enclosed a booklet which they had sent to all their employees who had enlisted. I was very much interested in what they were doing, and took the opportunity of visiting their main plant at Toronto, where I met men who had been discharged and reemployed, and I was told what this company were doing in an effort to reestablish their employees who had enlisted.

When a man leaves this company he receives the same sort of send-off that a man leaving any other company would receive. The employees in his section wish him well and the company tells him that his job will be there when he gets back. During his absence he receives parcels, cigarettes, news, and so on. The management of this company believe that when these men return it will be much of an anti-climax if they have to go round to the time office and tell some junior bookkeeper whom they have never seen before, "Here we are; we want our old jobs back because the government says you must give them back to us." This company feels that the man returning should have as personal a welcome as he had a send-off, and so they have set up a welcome and placement committee consisting of a director, the personnel manager and a senior employee who is a veteran. They meet the returned man by appointment in a comfortably furnished office; they talk with him informally about what he has done in the war, where he has been and what he would like to do. Their aim is not to fit him into the job he had before the war, but into the job for which he is now best qualified. They intend to place every employee who enlisted, whether or not he is legally entitled to his job back. Other jobs will be provided for men who are disabled and cannot take over their old jobs, and their pay will be made up to their old rates.

They have found one serious difficulty in carrying out this policy. When a man comes back, the company knows everything about him before he joined up, how he worked, where he worked, and so on. They had a full record of how he had served them, what his education was, and so on. But when a man comes back, so far as the company is concerned his years in service are an utter blank. All the man has is his discharge certificate, which gives his name, number, rank, his physical description, his character, which is given in two words, and his trade assessment, which is also covered by two words. During his period of service the man may have taken many courses and obtained valuable training. His record may show that he had a real flair for leadership, but of this the company knows nothing. If they are going to place him in a proper job they should know this.

As an example, a boy who wrapped soap before enlistment has risen to the rank of captain in the army. The company does not want him to go back to wrapping soap, nor does the man want to do that. As far as the company is concerned his record is a complete blank. Of course, all this information is on file in the Department of Pensions and National Health and the Department of National Defence on one of those many, many forms by which paper wars are fought. That information is at headquarters, but it is not given to the man, on the ground that there is considerable confidential information such as his medical categories, his pulhems profile, whatever convictions or courts martial he had, and whatever punishment he may have received.

The employer is not interested in these negative factors. What he wants to know are the positive factors, how the man has improved himself during his service career. In the United States they gather the same information on the same number of forms, but they make a distinction between what they call the positive factors, which are of help to the man in getting employment, and the confidential factors. The man is given a complete record of his service for himself so that when he meets his employer, his employer will know exactly what he has done in his period of service. I have already raised this question with the minister and his department, and I hope that the Canadian authorities will soon take similar action.

I now turn to what is to me the most important feature of our entire programme of rehabilitation, and that is finance. I spoke on this earlier in the session and I do not intend to weary the house by repeating my arguments of that time. I said then that I thought the programme was very fine but that few soldiers could afford to take the training, and four months' study has confirmed me in that belief. No returned man can say that training to fit him for any desired vocation or profession was not prepared. My criticism was that few soldiers could afford to take this training, and figures given right in this house since that time certainly have confirmed that criticism. The minister of pensions, when the pensions estimates were up, said that over 135,000 men and women have been discharged from the services. The Minister of Labour (Mr. Mitchell) said that less than 3,000 of these have taken training—less than 2¼ per cent. It is no answer to say that most of them have chosen to go direct into war industry and intend to take training at some later time. I have made it my business to talk to every man I could who wears a discharge button and asked him about this, and almost inevitably the answer has been, "I would like to have taken some training but could not afford to take it under the present allowance, and so I took the first job I could get." These men are sufficient realists to know that if they are ever going to take training for the jobs they would like to have, the time is now, so that they will be trained and in those jobs before the great flood starts at the end of the war. But they cannot afford to take the training. I am very glad that since I last spoke the basic allowance has been raised from $44.20 for men to $60 for trainees, and $50 for veterans who are unemployed because the government's reconstruction plan cannot yet absorb them, and $20 for a wife. While this is an improvement I say quite flatly that it is still not enough. I want to make my position quite clear in this respect. I am not the sort of soldier's advocate who, no matter what is given, will still howl for more. I desire to make my position clear. It is the position of most of the soldiers and sailors and airmen overseas, in what they think is a very reasonable request, and that is that when they return after having served their country to be trained for peace they should do so under conditions not less favourable than those under which they were first trained for war.

There is quite an agitation in this country at the present time for full pay and allowances in the service until a man gets a job. I do not believe that that is either desirable or attainable. First of all, as far as keeping a man in the service until he gets a job is concerned, most of our soldiers and sailors and airmen who are serving overseas are not professional soldiers but citizen soldiers who joined up to defend their country because it was their duty, and they are anxious to return to civilian life as soon as they can. The most common war aim over there is, "We want to get this bloody war over as soon as possible so that we can get back home." Any attempt to keep the majority of our fighting men in uniform one day longer than is required for military reasons will meet with the most violent opposition from the troops themselves. Full pay and allowances sounds very attractive, but I think it is unreasonable and undemocratic. In the army a man may be a major, a sergeant or a private, according to the job he does, but when the war is over and these men come under the Department of Veterans Welfare for rehabilitation training they are no longer majors or sergeants or privates but Canadian citizens who have done their bit on a common basis and they should get an allowance on that common basis. The same argument holds with regard to the payment of gratuities, which I mentioned last time and I shall not repeat what I said then.

I believe that the government is quite generous in setting a year as the maximum period for rehabilitation with the exception that those going to university will get a month additional for each month of service. That is exactly double what the United States allows under their bill passed a day or two ago. If our programme of reconstruction is successful, the great bulk of our returned men should be rehabilitated and reestablished within the year, and the problem of those who are not established will be a very different one, to be dealt with then in the light of the experience gained in the year. If our programme of reconstruction does not succeed in absorbing the bulk of these men by the end of a year, the country will probably be demanding a new government with a fresh approach to both reconstruction and rehabilitation.

To turn again to actual figures, the greenest rookie entering the army, air force or navy to-day gets $1.30 a day, plus board, lodging, medical care, clothes, et cetera. To those who have to live in lodgings during this training, as do the war emergency training plan entries to the air force, and as will all our peace-time trainees, an allowance of $37.50 for board and lodging is paid, which has been criticized by the hon. member for York-Sunbury (Mr. Hanson) and others as inadequate.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I do not think I did.

Mr. SINCLAIR: You did. I heard the hon. member, and he was quite right, too. Adding those two together makes $76.50 in cash, plus clothing and medical care, and of course all tuition costs, plus $39.12 dependents' allowance to the wife and the standard children's allowances.

In the case of the veteran taking training, the government does give him an inadequate clothing grant, which will not tide him over the year. It also provides medical care for the year of rehabilitation, and tuition costs. But it pays only $60 to the trainee, $50 to those who cannot secure employment because the government's reconstruction plan is not ready, and $20 to his wife, with children's allowances the same.

I should now like to speak for a moment or two on the plight of soldiers' wives—a thing about which little has been said. A soldier's wife to-day gets $39.12 a month dependents' allowance, plus $20 a month assigned pay from her husband, plus $12 apiece for her first two children, and lesser amounts for other children. Wives without children who get jobs in industry are comparatively well off and can save their allowances and assigned pay. Officers' wives, with their allowances ranging from $49.10 to $64.12 and much larger assignments of pay, can also get by. It is the young soldier's wife with children who cannot work who has such a difficult job getting by on these allowances. Few of them had homes before the war, and with rentals the way they are to-day and landlords able to pick and choose and most reluctant to take a soldier's wife with small children, it is seldom in the better districts of towns that we find these soldiers' families. They struggle along in the poorest and most crowded of quarters, soldiers' families doubling up to cut expenses so that they can make both ends meet. Others fall back on living with their parents or in-laws, thus forcing them to carry part of the burden which should properly be carried by the government. Every newspaper in Canada has carried desperate advertisements from soldiers' wives seeking the cheapest sort of accommodation.

Added on top of all the worries and trials of a young mother bringing up children without the help of a father; on top of all the troubles coming from poor accommodation and crowded quarters; on top of all the loneliness from separation and the ever-present fear of injury or death to her husband overseas—on top of all this is endless penny-pinching just to scrape by. There must be times when the bitter thought has crossed the mind of many a young soldier's wife, how much better off her family and she would be if her husband had not seen his duty and volunteered, but had stayed safely in Canada and got a job in some exempted priority industry and let others do the fighting.

What now is to be the position of these gallant wives—the real unsung heroines of our home front—when their men return from war and must fit themselves for peace-time jobs? There will be all the emotional difficulties of picking up family life after a long separation; all the strain of getting their men to settle down and accept the quiet routine of civilian life after the excitement of war; all the problems of fitting men used to barrack life into their already crowded family quarters.

The same woman and family, the same cost of food and clothing and lodging, an extra mouth to feed, her husband dropped from his service pay down to the rehabilitation allowance; and a grateful country now rewards these women by reducing their dependents' allowance from $39.12 to $20 a month. It is the old, old story of a man with an axe to grind. It is, I think, an ominous indication of a return to the relief standards of the pre-war period. This house will excuse me if I do not sound paeans of praise over the government's recently announced increase of this allowance from $18.20 to $20 a month.

All my objections to the present plan trace back to one feature—finance. It is not that the people of Canada themselves want to be niggardly to our returned soldiers. Every section of Canada has urged on the government that our returned men be treated in the most generous fashion possible. Not that the suggestion I am making can be classed as generous; if I were to suggest that they should come back on double pay that might be called generous. But all that I and the soldiers I know are suggesting is the most modest of arrangements, that they get the lowest pay and allowances they got when they were training for the army.

What will be the cost of this? If, as at present, only two and one-quarter per cent of our service men take this training, on the basis of the 800,000 now in service it would cost the government an extra $3,250,000, not each year but in total. If the more optimistic figure of the Canadian Legion proves justified, and 200,000 take training for a full year, it will cost the government an extra $36 million—a lot of money, but less than one per cent of what we are spending on war alone this year. I believe the people of Canada would very gladly subscribe one peace loan at the end of the war if it were necessary to finance this rehabilitation programme.

Earlier I said that I believed that only veterans should handle veterans' affairs, a thing which certainly all soldiers believe. I am not one who claims that veterans should have every preference everywhere. After all, this war is being won not only by the fighting men, but by the war workers at home, and those who are keeping the wheels of everyday life turning in this country. I repeat, however, that everything connected with veterans' affairs should be in the hands of officials who themselves are veterans, because only men who have been soldiers realize the problems of soldiers. Yet the final control over all this great programme of rehabilitation is not in the hands of the Minister of Veterans' Affairs; it is in the hands of treasury board; and I find that of the six on the board, one only is a veteran. Here is the real stumbling block. Here is the inability to distinguish between the right of a veteran and the need of a relief recipient. I feel that if the minister could take problems to a special treasury board consisting of the eight cabinet ministers who are veterans, these old soldiers, knowing the problems of their former comrades, would see that justice was done to the fighting men of this war.

The Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King), in his memorable address to the British parliament at Westminster, mentioned that in the past the sacrifice of human life has been commemorated in monuments of stone and bronze. This time, he said, we should seek a more fitting memorial, and he suggested that it would be found in securing for others the more abundant life.

No one can deny that this is a glorious objective, well worthy of the sacrifices made, but it is an objective which may well take many, many years to achieve. I would suggest that a more immediate memorial, one closer to the hearts of those who have fallen, one within the immediate power of this government to achieve, would be to secure a more abundant life for the dependents these men left behind them, and to ensure that their comrades in arms who survive and return will be treated in the most generous fashion possible and have a real chance to reestablish themselves in the life of the country they have defended so well.

Throughout the whole story of warfare runs one familiar pattern. The men who fight the wars at cost of life and limb are lauded in the loftiest terms when the battle rages—one has only to recall our last victory loan advertisements or remember our last victory loan speeches to hear the old refrain—yet how the tune has always changed when the battle is won. Our leaders say, perhaps rightly, that our legislation in respect of rehabilitation is the finest in effect anywhere so far. This, I submit, is not the proper criterion at all, because the historic treatment of all soldiers, after wars, by all countries at all times has been very poor. Our standard should be a simple one, a Canadian one. Are we to treat our men as well, when they return to be trained for peace, as we did when they trained for war in our hour of need?

A great deal is said about Canada becoming the leader of the small nations after the war. I do not think the quality of leadership is at all dependent on size; rather is is dependent on courage, resourcefulness and imagination. No country in this war is in a better position to be generous to its fighting men than Canada, a country of tremendous natural resources, which has had enormous industrial development in the war and has been absolutely untouched by the physical devastation and destruction of war. She is one country that can afford to live up to the fine promises now being made to our soldiers. If we do so, such a course will have repercussions far beyond Canada. In every one of the united nations, soldiers' advocates will point to what Canada is doing for her fighting men as an example of what should be done for their own soldiers, and every soldier now fighting for freedom will have cause to bless Canada's leadership. It will be a real memorial to those who have fallen.

I do not propose to touch now on the dispute about whether a voluntary effort or a conscripted effort is best in this war, other than to say this. Those who express such pride in the fact that every Canadian overseas freely and voluntarily gave his services have a double obligation to see that this country is as free and generous to them when they return.

There is one more good reason why I feel that the government should immediately raise the rehabilitation grants to the basic level of army trainees, and this reason is almost entirely a civilian one. At the present moment in this country there are over two million people who can see no future for them or theirs when the war is ended—the war workers and their families; the soldiers who have no jobs to which to return, and their dependents, and the many extra workers in our war-swollen government services. Ahead of them they see no jobs, no security.

It is true that great plans for reconstruction are under way, that a new ministry of reconstruction is to be formed, that out of the agony of this war a brave new world is being planned, a world in which the unlimited resources of this country will be properly developed and there will be employment and social security for all. These, however, are but plans, and it takes more than plans to construct reality.

In this country there are Cassandras, almost entirely of one political group, who prophesy nothing but chaos in the post-war period, who loudly proclaim that our whole present economy will collapse in the greatest of all depressions after the war. Nor are they content merely to limit prophecies of gloom to the post-war period. We already heard their leader proclaim last winter that this April would see 100,000 unemployed in the land. But his voice was strangely still in April.

There are others who believe that this country can surmount the difficulties of the post-war years with the same courage, resourcefulness and united effort which we have shown in our war effort. I subscribe to this faith, and I believe that this government, which has led this country in such magnificent fashion in war, can do the same in peace, provided that its slogan is unchanged: what is physically possible will be made financially possible.

Since my return I have spoken to this effect in many parts of the country, but everywhere I have found a curious apathy to this contention. Deep in the minds of the little people of Canada, the people who have given their sons and husbands and brothers and fathers to the armed services, the people who have toiled in the factories and the fields, the mills and the mines, the people who time and again have oversubscribed our victory loans and our Red Cross drives, the people who have borne without complaint a heavy load of taxation—deep in the minds of these people there flows a dark current of fear and mistrust of the future. Whilst they acknowledge the great achievements of the government on the production front; whilst they realize that what has been physically possible for this country to do has been done, they can remember a time when finances were not forthcoming for what was both physically possible and highly desirable. They read of the great post-war public works projects, but they can remember that long-sighted men suggested identical projects to bring badly needed employment and security to the people in the great depressions of the thirties; yet nothing was done because there was no money. They remember the days of relief camps, of mass unemployment, of so much to do and so little being done, when only the wages of money were sacred; and now they wonder, are we to return to those conditions after the war?

It is idle just to promise otherwise and to expect these people to believe. Public faith in the spoken word is at an all-time low throughout the world. The Canadian public has always been somewhat sceptical of political promises. The barefaced disregard of promises and treaties by European dictators weakened still further public faith, and now the wholesale use of high-powered propaganda as a mighty weapon of warfare has brought public faith in the spoken or the written word to its very lowest ebb throughout the world.

Belief to-day is founded not on words but on actions. People in days of old might be content with some strange portent in the sky to foretell the future. People to-day want some tangible token of what is to happen. There is to-day one sure way for this government to allay this mistrust and fear that after the war we shall return to the economics of scarcity, and that would be for the government to announce immediately exactly how it intends to finance its great programme of reconstruction. We in this house, however, realize just how difficult that might be at the present moment, when no one knows how long the war will last or what new great drains there may be on the public purse. But there is one phase of post-war finance which must be faced now because it is occurring now, and that is the financing of the rehabilitation programme.

While the great bulk of this work will not come up until the war's end, we must face it now, because every day we discharge men from the services unfit, maimed and crippled. Here, therefore, is a golden opportunity for the government of Canada to give real proof to the people of Canada that it will face the post-war period with the same courage and vision that it has displayed in its conduct of the war, that henceforth no financial obstacle will stand in the way of what should be and what can be done.

Nothing could at this time convince the people of Canada of the government's post-war intentions more than for the government to announce that when our men return to train for peace they will be treated as well as when they trained for war, that the day of niggardly and parsimonious treatment of the fighting men, when the war is ended, is ended forever as far as Canada is concerned. Such an act will capture the imagination of all those who view the post-war period with fear and misgivings. It will be a real pledge, a pledge which will be accepted and believed, a pledge which will spur the people of Canada to face the great problems of the post-war period with the same courage and determination that we showed when we stood alone in 1940.

Some weeks ago I heard over the radio a speech one paragraph of which summed up everything I have tried to say this afternoon. I quote:

> The support of our fighting men and our debt to all who are near and dear to them must extend beyond the theatres of war. It must look beyond the end of hostilities. We owe it to all who bear the heat of the strife; we owe it to those who are crippled and maimed; we owe it to the many homes that are bereaved; we owe it to the memory of those who give their lives; to do all in our power to ensure that their service and their sacrifice shall not have been in vain.

[Mr. Sinclair.]

These words were not said by some impassioned orator speaking before a veterans' gathering. They were not said by some small-time politician seeking soldiers' votes. They were not even said by the leader of an opposition endeavouring to goad a government into action. They were said by the leader of a great country, the one man in that country who has "all the power to ensure that their service and their sacrifice shall not have been in vain." They are the words of the Prime Minister of Canada, speaking in the British parliament at Westminster last month.

If the government persists in its present relief standard of financing the programme of rehabilitation, these words will be rightly regarded by all the fighting men as just another empty political promise made to fighting men at war, on a par with Lloyd George's declaration to the British troops in the last war that they would return to "a land fit for heroes," on a par with Borden's declaration to the Canadian troops that "the pick of the land would be theirs on their return"—what the soldiers call just a bit of the old malarkey. If, however, the government does announce to the world that it will treat its fighting men as fairly and as generously when they return to train for peace as when they trained for war, then these words of the Prime Minister will go ringing down through Canadian history as the declaration on which Canada paid her debt of honour and gave leadership to the entire world in her treatment of her fighting men.

Mr. G. S. WHITE (Hastings-Peterborough): I would first like to congratulate the hon. member who has just taken his seat (Mr. Sinclair) upon the many fine and constructive suggestions he has made on behalf of the veterans in connection with reestablishment and rehabilitation after the war. Members of this house will recall the last time the hon. member spoke on veterans' affairs and the very fine picture and the information he gave to members from the troops overseas. There are one or two matters which the hon. member emphasized which I should like to concur in and to mention briefly.

One of the first points was that the officials and staff who are administering the new veterans' department should be veterans who have served, and in particular young veterans. We must consider the age of veterans in this war and the standard of their education, which is much higher than that which existed in the last war. It has always struck me that one of the chief difficulties in the past administration of veterans' affairs in this country, and in particular the administration of the pensions' aspects, was that many of the officials are what the average soldier calls brass hats, that they lacked on these boards and committees men who had served as private soldiers and therefore had the private's point of view. I certainly concur most heartily in the remarks made by the hon. member who has just taken his seat, that when these various boards and offices are filled the minister should bear in mind and should see to it that veterans who have actually served in a theatre of war are given the majority of appointments.

The hon. member also mentioned the great question of finance, and he referred to the fact that in so many cases there is petty penny-pinching, which is quite true. Yet we have just had the experience this week in this house of this parliament having voted somewhere around $75 million to the body known as UNRRA, and last night we passed the Mutual Aid bill involving several hundred million dollars—to be precise, $800 million. So often, however, when we come to deal with the private soldier, we return to this petty penny-pinching.

The hon. member gave figures to show that as far as the number of returned soldiers taking training is concerned, the mere expenditure of some $36 million represents the further assistance that could be given in the way of allowances to their families. I am sure that all members of this house, and in particular, all veterans, will agree that the setting up of this department is a step in the right direction, because ever since the last war veterans' affairs have been scattered about in several different departments; and now for the first time we shall have one department which will have complete control over all matters relating to the veterans.

I would point out to the minister that I sincerely hope one of the first acts will not be the tieing up of this department with endless miles of red tape which so often exists in all matters having to do with veterans. I would suggest further to the minister that probably now, when the new Department of Veterans' Affairs is being set up, when a new minister and new staff is to be appointed, is the time for the government to review all acts, orders in council and regulations that have been passed and are now in existence that have to do with veterans and their dependents, with the object of bringing them up to date, modifying or changing them in any way that would be of further assistance to the veteran and his dependents. I suggest that because I feel that the manner in which we deal with the veteran and his dependents after the war will determine in a large measure the future of this country. When the soldiers come back and take their place in the peace-time efforts of this country we cannot afford to have the conditions which existed after the last war, and which in many cases exist up to the present time, return. It is not good for the country to have continual complaints from individual veterans, veterans' organizations and other societies that are interested in the welfare of these men.

Without question these men and women are entitled to certain grants and assistance from the government. This assistance should be given as a matter of right. These men and women are not looking for or expecting charity of any kind. They do not want that. All they want and ask is an opportunity to become reestablished in civilian activities and given a decent opportunity to earn their living and not to be penalized in any way for the time that they have spent in the service of their country.

Up to now the house has not been advised as to the method and the manner in which demobilization will take place. When the minister speaks I think it is most important that he give some indication as to how the troops are to be demobilized, because if demobilization is to be carried on in the same way as was done after the last war I, for one, fear that there will be serious difficulties. Perhaps the government have plans well advanced to take care of demobilization and how they are to place all these men in civil life. I would suggest to the minister that he outline to the house just what is to take place.

I believe it has always been a matter of keen disappointment to many citizens of Canada that the government did not undertake some system of insurance for the troops early in this war, such as exists in the United States.

Since this new department will administer the Veterans' Land Act I ask the minister whether consideration has been given and is being given to the request made to the government some time ago, namely, that in all cases where soldiers who came under the old act and are still paying on their property, they be given a clear title without making any further payment. Surely at this late date, where veterans have been paying on their land for over twenty-five years, it would be a very nice gesture for the government to hand clear title to these people. When the new act is administered I sincerely hope that there will not be loaded on to the soldier settler the same type of land that many were induced to buy after the last war. All hon. members have had cases in their own districts of soldier settlers re-established on land which was from the very start hopeless, and that no doubt led to much of the grief later on.

This new veterans' affairs department will administer pensions, and it will probably be the most important part of the department. The question of pensions for men and women in the armed forces has been before the house on many occasions. Recently when the minister's estimates under the war appropriation bill were before the house there was a long discussion on the desirability of including the insurance principle in the Pension Act. I was very sorry that the minister did not announce that this most important clause would be reinstated in the act. The only reason given by the minister that I can find as to why this principle was taken out of the act is that early in 1940 there had been certain abuses under the act, which were most regrettable. I do not think that explanation was very satisfactory, nor is it acceptable, because the minister must know that under every act and under every regulation there will be certain abuses. I think it is most unfair that many serving men and women are deprived of the benefit of the Pension Act. I would suggest to the minister that now, when his new department is being set up and they are starting with a clean sheet, one of the best things he could do would be to recommend that the insurance principle be reinstated in the Pension Act.

There was much said in the same debate as to the question of onus of proof in pension cases. The minister in his reply in that debate tried to make out a case to the effect that the onus of proof was not on the soldier but on the pension commission. I would point out to the minister that in all too many cases where a soldier has enlisted and placed in "A" category, has served overseas, returned to Canada, been discharged as medically unfit and placed in a low category, the pension commission or the medical advisers have found that his disability was pre-enlistment. I say to the minister that as long as that condition exists the onus of proof is still on the soldier and not on the pension commission. I think it is only fair to say that with regard to any soldier who enlists in "A" category, serves overseas and is later discharged, it should be assumed and taken as prima facie evidence that the disability complained of was owing to his war services. I would ask the minister, in setting up this new department, if he would see to it that the pension commission make that one of their standard regulations. That would be another fine gesture for the government to make. As the war progresses further and more soldiers are returning, more and more cases are brought to the attention of members of parliament. The hon. member who spoke a moment ago mentioned that cases came to a member only as a last resort. I have always felt that it should never be necessary for any soldier to have to consult his member of parliament, a lawyer or his reeve, or anyone else, and ask them to use their influence—if we may call it that—or their help to assist him to get from the dominion government something which should be his as a matter of right.

While I do not like to mention personal cases, the one I have before me is so distressing, and points out so many of the matters of which I have complained before in the house in connection with the pension board, that I am going to ask the indulgence of hon. members to give the particulars. This is the case of a young man who enlisted on April 3, 1940. His discharge certificate shows that he was discharged on April 25, 1944, after service in Canada, England, North Africa, Sicily and Italy. During the fighting at Ortona he was serving in a tank. The tank was hit, and as a result he suffered a compound fracture of his right leg below the knee, severe chest injuries and injuries to his face. After months in hospital he was returned to Canada, and was discharged in April, 1944, so that he had well over four years' service.

This man, with a record which would be hard to equal, received a discharge certificate which gave, as the reason for discharge, the one that his services were no longer required. To me that is an insult to place on the discharge certificate of any soldier from this country who has served in Canada, England, North Africa, Sicily and Italy. This man, as I said, was discharged in April, 1944, and, up to date, has not received a pension.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): Has he applied?

Mr. WHITE: Yes, he has.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): When?

Mr. WHITE: I will come to that.

Mr. MACDONALD (Brantford City): The discharge would not come from the Department of Pensions and National Health.

Mr. WHITE: All right; do not get hot under the collar about it. I think the hon. member for Brantford City will quite agree that any soldier who has served overseas should not have on his discharge certificate the notation, "his services being no longer required." The hon. member is an old soldier himself, and he knows the type of soldier who has that notation placed on his discharge certificate. I do not need to tell him that.

Mr. MACDONALD (Brantford City): I agree with that, but I did not think it should go on the record that this was the responsibility of the Department of Pensions and National Health. As I understand it, that department has nothing to do with issuing discharge certificates.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): Not the slightest.

Mr. WHITE: I understand that.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): And he did not say that.

Mr. WHITE: I am just mentioning that that is one of the indignities this man has suffered. He was discharged on April 25, 1944. He is a married man. One of his legs will be considerably shorter than the other. He still suffers considerable pain, and finds it difficult to walk in an upright position. As yet he has not been able to secure employment, because he is not physically able to work.

He came to see me about the matter, and I wrote the pension commission. I have their reply under date of June 9, 1944, in which they give, as a reason for the delay in pension, the statement that the documents have not yet been received. They say that the documents have been urgently requested and that the case will be placed before the commission for decision, immediately they come to hand. The letter closes by saying that the case is being referred to the welfare division of the Department of Pensions and National Health in order that Mr. So-and-so may be considered for benefits, assistance and so on.

My complaint is this: Why is it necessary for the Department of National Defence to be in such a hurry to discharge a man from the armed services? Is this another example of penny-pinching, so that they will save his pay and allowances? Why should the man of whom I have been speaking be discharged from the armed forces, with pay and allowances cut off, when he is not able to work, and his pension application has not yet been adjusted?

I say to the minister in all fairness that it is cases of this kind which cause dissatisfaction and bitter feeling toward the pension officials. And I may say that if there are many cases like this such feelings are entirely justified. It would seem to me, from the date of the discharge, which is well over six weeks ago, that that is a long time in which to transfer the papers from the Department of National Defence to the pension board.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): Will the hon. member give me the name, privately?

Mr. WHITE: I shall be glad to send the minister the letter, yes.

I would say something further to him in connection with the rehabilitation grant. I know that probably there will come before the house at this session something through which grants will be increased; at least I sincerely hope they will be increased. I point out to the minister that between 100,000 and 125,000 men have been discharged, to date, and they have received pay and allowances for one month, as their rehabilitation grant. The point is that these men and women want that grant when they are discharged. If it is to be given to them within six, twelve or eighteen months after they are discharged, it will not be of the same benefit to them, because the grant is to assist in their reestablishment.

There are one or two other matters I would mention, which have been before the minister on many occasions. One has to do with the same allowance for the mother as for the wife. I have in mind, in particular, the case of a widow whose husband had been in receipt of a pension of less than fifty per cent disability. On the death of her husband she does not continue to draw pension. If such a widow cannot qualify under the provisions of the act she is often left in a most serious condition.

In regard to those two matters I would point out to the minister that under the Pension Act the government realizes that there is a responsibility to a soldier's wife, because if a soldier has a thirty per cent disability he receives a certain amount of pension for himself, and an additional amount for his wife. Therefore it should be recognized that there is some liability so far as his wife is concerned. It is only logical, therefore, to assume that after the husband dies the widow would surely be entitled to more consideration than ever. However, instead of the government continuing to pay her a pension that pension is cut off.

True, if a soldier had a disability of fifty per cent or over his wife would receive a pension. Perhaps there is some good reason for placing the line at fifty per cent. I am sure the minister will agree, however, that the result is most unfair. The wife of a man who had a forty per cent disability receives no further pension, but the wife of a man who had a fifty per cent disability will, upon his death, continue to draw pension for the rest of her life. I make that suggestion to the minister for his serious consideration, because I know of many cases where there has been great hardship. I am sure that other hon. members know of similar cases.

In conclusion, I should like to refer again to the benefits conferred by the Sparkman act in the United States. The provisions of this act have been incorporated in a provincial act in Ontario, but I suggest that legislation should be passed by this house which would apply to all Canada and continue in force for a certain period after the war. One of the provisions of the Sparkman act was that soldiers' insurance would be protected. It is quite easy to understand what may happen to soldiers' insurance after they have been discharged and are no longer receiving pay and allowances. That will be one of the first things that will have to go and there should be some provision to protect this insurance. We should also have the other provisions of the Sparkman act in order to give assistance to these men.

Mr. ROBERT FAIR (Battle River): Mr. Speaker, like the two hon. gentlemen who have preceded me I am glad to see bill No. 83 introduced. I am in favour of this bill because I believe a new deal is being brought about for the veterans of the last war and of this war. However, I think before we begin to construct a new, modern building it is absolutely necessary that we clean up the slums which are now on the site on which the new building is to be erected. I was interested in the remarks of the two hon. gentlemen who preceded me, particularly those of the hon. member for Vancouver North (Mr. Sinclair) and his reference to the treasury board. I feel quite satisfied that many of the good things that would be brought about for Canadians have been blocked because of the control by the treasury board, which in many instances is not in accord with parliament. On another occasion when the bill is in committee I shall deal with the Veterans' Land Act and other matters in connection with pensions and so on, but on this occasion I want to clean up if possible some of the slums that exist at the present time.

I referred to the veterans of the last war, and in order to build up their case on a solid foundation I should like once again to quote an address by Sir Robert Borden, then prime minister of Canada, to the Canadian expeditionary force in June, 1917. At that time certain promises were made to the men of those forces, and it is the duty of this government to carry out the promises of its predecessor. Sir Robert Borden said:

> You are men actually facing the enemy day and night. You are suffering greatly from fatigue, overstrain, and lack of rest. The marvel of it is that men could undergo such a strain without breaking; but you have never yet broken, and history will appreciate that in days to come.

[Mr. White.]

> You men are about to enter one of the most serious engagements that ever faced the Canadian corps. I cannot, at this moment, give any information as to where this attack will be staged, whether it be successful or not, it is to be borne in mind that it will not be an easy success. . . . We feel confident that you will succeed where others failed; for you have never yet failed in anything you have set your hand to, as a Canadian corps.
> You can go into this action feeling assured of this, and as the head of the government, I give you this assurance; that you need have no fear that the government and the country will fail to show just appreciation of your service to the country and empire in what you are about to do and what you have already done.
> The government and the country will consider it their first duty to see that a proper appreciation of your effort and of your courage is brought to the notice of the people at home, and it will always be our endeavour to so guide the attitude of public opinion, that the country will support the government to prove to the returned man its just and due appreciation of the inestimable value of the services rendered to the country and empire; and that no man, whether he goes back or whether he remains in Flanders, will have just cause to reproach the government for having broken with the men who won and the men who died.

Something similar was said to our men just before the invasion of a little over a week ago. It is our solemn duty to the men of the invasion of years ago and those of the invasion of just over a week ago to see that our promises and pledges are kept.

I said a few moments ago that I intended to deal with the soldier settlers of the last great war. A number of injustices exist in general, but on this occasion I shall deal specifically with a matter which affects the soldier settlers of the last war. I am not going to go into it in any detail, but I want to give the house some information to bring my former presentation up to date. In order to do this it will be necessary for me to give a few figures. Some people do not like to deal with figures, but I think they are necessary in order that the house may have a full appreciation of the situation facing the veterans working under the soldier settlement board.

As in this war, during the last war a number of soldiers were recruited from the land, and for that reason a number of them wished to return to the land after the battle had been won. After some considerable time and sifting out, 25,017 of those men were settled on the land. The government advanced $109,034,331 for the benefit of those settlers at a rate of five per cent on current debts and seven per cent when a man went into arrears, as happened in most cases. I believe an injustice was created right there. There was no need of having a rate of five per cent, and there was still less justice in having a rate of seven per cent imposed upon these settlers who got behind with payments. People had a different idea of money at that time from that which they have to-day, and this injustice was imposed upon those men whom we praised and lauded but who were treated in an entirely different manner as soon as they came back.

I should like to give the standing of the board at the end of the last fiscal year, March 31, 1944. The amount of principal repaid, which covers payments by soldier settlers and civilians who bought land after the soldier settlers had either vacated or given it up for other reasons, amounted to $50,507,493.20. The amount of interest repaid was $25,381,060.13. This totals $75,888,553.33. It will be noticed that one-third of what was paid back by the settlers was used up in interest. A number of measures were introduced to reduce the indebtedness of these settlers. The soldier settler scheme had been poorly and I believe hastily thought out, and many poor deals were made on behalf of the settlers. Land was bought at high prices as was live stock and machinery. These things were bought on the basis of wheat ranging from $2 to $3 per bushel, but in a short time it had dropped to as low as twenty cents per bushel. Because of the unsatisfactory conditions under which the board got started we find that substantial amounts were cancelled under different schemes, which I am not going to enumerate, because I have done it before on other occasions. The amount of principal cancelled was $24,867,637.64, and of interest, $19,234,239.77, making a total of soldier settler cancellations alone of $44,101,877.41. The cost of administration up to the end of last March, so far as the soldier settlers are concerned, amounted to $27,340,763.64. The total of cancellations and cost of administration was $71,442,641.05.

Other cancellations under that same board for civilians, British families and others, in principal and interest amounted to $13,389,338.10, and administration costs, $3,832,126.32. That makes a grand total of cancellations and cost of administration of $88,664,105.47. It will be noted that these items are far above the total amount that was paid in principal and interest, which was $75,888,553.33.

I was interested in getting certain information dealing with soldier settler cases, and just over a year ago I placed certain questions on the order paper. My question was passed as an order for a return on July 1, 1943, and on March 6 of this year the return was brought down. I do not know why the return was held up, because other orders for returns that had been passed at the same time were tabled on January 28 of this year, but apparently somebody did not want the information contained in this return brought down. As a result it was held up until other information I had asked for, dealing with soldier settlement board matters, was tabled on March 6 of this year. In tabling this return the Minister of Mines and Resources (Mr. Crerar) made some apologies, which I did not ask for. I think he made those apologies for the purpose of destroying the sting of the information contained in this return. I shall deal with the return itself in a moment.

This return is supposed to have cost $2,180 to prepare. The minister's information to the house in tabling the return was that two senior members of the soldier settlement staff were engaged upon it for two months at an average monthly salary of $230; four members of the clerical staff were engaged for two months at an average salary of $125; three typists were engaged for one week, at $60, and one senior clerk was engaged for one month at $200. It has been very interesting to me to note that all these high-priced members of the staff have been engaged upon the return for a period of months or weeks. I cannot understand why it should have taken that long. While my business has been farming, if I could not have had my files in better shape than that, I think I would have closed that department long ago. If I could not do that work myself in less than the time that has been taken by all the members of the staff mentioned, I would quit farming. I do not see any reason whatever why it should take all this time, and if the report given by the minister with regard to it is correct, which I very much doubt, I would say that it is about time he dusted off his files and closed up that department.

The newspapers took up this matter and quite a number of them criticized me, but with that I am not concerned at all because I had some better idea in mind than these newspapers had. Other newspapers were more reasonable, having in view what I had in mind when I asked for this information. One newspaper was very critical. The Calgary Herald of March 7, 1944, just one day after the return was tabled, had an editorial headed, "Member's curiosity costs great deal of money." It goes on to say:

> A question asked in the House of Commons by the Social Credit member for Battle River cost the government, which means the Canadian taxpayers, the sum of $2,180 to answer. This amount is over half the annual sessional indemnity drawn by this member. The question required a great amount of research on the part of government accountants and clerical work by stenographers and typists over a period of several weeks.
> This incident calls attention to a growing nuisance in parliament. Much information which could be procured by a little energy on the part of members in scanning the records of departments, is sought in the Commons through questions on the order paper. It saves the members' time and energy but puts a lot of work on civil servants, and in many cases the information when produced is of little public interest.

The Alberta member in question may have been justified in demanding complete records on soldier settlement since the beginning of the war to the end of last year, but in this time of war when government departments are faced with many new burdens it is a question that might have been delayed for a more convenient season.

Some of the questions submitted in the house bear a strictly political complexion rather than a desire to produce information of a public nature, and there is common sense in the declaration of Prime Minister King that questions should be as concise as possible in order to avoid unnecessary expenditure.

This editorial, which does not for one moment affect me—I am carrying on anyway—gives the point of view of the writer. I had in mind only one thing, the welfare of the veterans of the last great war, and having their interests at heart, I thought I would be doing a service also to the veterans of this war, because if we can clean up the slums of the last war we shall be able to build a much better structure for those who return from the present war.

I have here an editorial from the Edmonton Bulletin of March 8, which I shall not take the time to read, but which justifies the stand I took in asking for this information. The Calgary Herald would seem to be much more interested in politics than in the welfare of our men and women who returned from the last war and those who will return from this war.

Dealing with the return itself, one of the questions asked was the valuation of the property when it was taken over by the soldier settlers, and in answer to the last question the return gives the value attached to the land when the soldier left it. There are 301 cases altogether, covering the period from April 1, 1941 to March 31, 1943. I shall refer to only a few. One of these properties, in British Columbia, was valued at $4,500 when it was taken by the soldier settler, and its value at the time of rescission of the contract was $2,000. Another one was purchased for $3,825 and sold for $1,000. Another was purchased at $2,900 and sold for $1,000. Those were in British Columbia. The same conditions applied all across Canada. I shall not take time to read the details but I have made a summary of them which with the permission of the house I would like to have put on Hansard.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER: With the consent of the house.

Mr. FAIR: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. The summary which I now put on Hansard gives the information I wish to convey to the house at this time. It shows that 301 soldier settlers were put off their land during that period of two years, that the land was purchased at a price of $816,955.25 and sold for $506,676, which is $310,279.25 less than the price actually paid for the land. The summary is as follows:

QUIT CLAIM DEEDS AND 30 DAY NOTICES—APRIL 1ST 1941 TO MARCH 31ST 1943.

—	—	Original Purchase Price	Amount advanced for implements, stock, etc.	Paid by settler	Amount written off	Acres new land brought under cultivation	Value of land and implements at time of rescission of contract.
		$ cts.	$ cts.	$ cts.	$ cts.	acres	$ cts.
28	British Columbia	79,933.09	46,820.46	53,916.76	84,552.20	213·60	52,788.00
99	Alberta	268,949.79	255,626.64	214,637.09	353,154.15	5,433	180,814.00
117	Saskatchewan	290,212.02	287,166.05	255,580.93	373,989.09	7,343	187,139.00
35	Manitoba	107,180.97	82,138.91	77,313.97	128,809.72	950	53,910.00
14	Ontario	53,579.38	26,364.80	43,229.05	42,577.86	12	24,600.00
8	Maritime	17,100.00	5,154.02	9,320.02	16,228.85	39	7,425.00
301		816,955.25	703,270,88	653,997.82	999,311.87	13,991	506,676.00
		310,279.25

Carrying on this statement, the total amount outstanding at the end of March, 1944, the period with which I was dealing a moment ago, is as follows:

Soldier settlers	$ 7,715,954 01
Civilian settlers	6,999,197 40
British families	1,895,612 66
N.B. families	122,333 98
Total	$16,733,098 05

The total amount of arrears is distributed as follows:

Soldier settlers	$1,054,269 30
Civilian settlers	616,235 77
British and N.B. settlers	205,794 91
Total	$1,876,299 98

I might say that I am not here interested particularly in civilian settlers; I am very much interested in the veterans of the last war. The number of those still on the land is 6,153, and their average indebtedness when they bought the land, approximately twenty-five years ago, was $4,358.40. After putting in twenty-five of the best years of their lives, with their wives and families helping them, the health of many of these individuals having broken down in the meanwhile, we find that the average debt of the settlers to-day is $1,254, or 29 per cent of the original debt, and this after all the cancellations to which I referred a moment ago, totalling $44,101,877, are deducted. You will see therefore the impossibility of these men, many of whom are now over seventy years of age, paying for their lands unless something drastic is done, and that drastic thing is to wipe off the indebtedness and give them clear titles now.

Again, these contracts are in as good a position as they are to-day largely because members of the settlers' families have in many cases gone into war industry or other branches of business and have sent home money to keep the sheriff away—because that is exactly what has been happening during the years since the war broke out. Anyone who takes the trouble to find out how many settlers have had to vacate their land because of cancellation notices or, in some cases, through being forced to sign quit claim deeds, will realize how necessary it has been for young men and women in a number of cases to come to the help of aged parents.

We find also that in a number of cases the pensions of soldier settlers went to make good a part of these payments. I do not intend to go into detail in connection with orders in council which were passed. One was adopted in 1941 on the advice of a committee which was set up at the instigation of the Minister of Finance (Mr. Ilsley), I suppose on behalf of the treasury board; it was recommended that up to $20 per month should be deducted from dependents' allowance of men who had enlisted in the second great war and were indebted to the soldier settlement board. I do not believe that such action can be justified under any circumstances. But the programme still goes on. I resent it, as do thousands of other Canadians. Another order in council made provision that settlers who were in debt could apply to the director to have their debts reduced; and in a number of cases, I believe, extensions were granted for another twenty years. You can visualize the man who is now seventy years old signing up another contract for twenty years, giving himself a job until he is ninety years old in order to get clear title to his land, enabling him after forty-five years to obtain title to a quarter section or perhaps a half-section.

When I took up this question a year ago the Minister of Mines and Resources (Mr. Crerar) seemed to think that I was fighting on behalf of a few settlers around Saskatoon who had organized up there. The minister's final reply to my plea, as reported in Hansard of July 24, 1943, page 5377, was:

> I repeat that to meet the hon. member's request and wipe off the outstanding indebtedness of soldier settlers would be unjust to those settlers who paid off their debts and to-day have title to their land. Why, during the last year several hundred of these soldier settlers have paid off what they owed on their land and acquired title to it. I can assure hon. members that the government has no desire to deal harshly with any of these men. We recognize what they did from 1914 to 1918 but, after all, governments have to shape their policies in line with the general good. If to-day we took the action urged by my hon. friend and wiped off the existing indebtedness of soldier settlers, it would be a gross injustice to those who have met and are meeting their obligations.

I suggest that if that is so, you have to go back to the debt adjustment board and replace all these cancellations. I do not feel that the minister's argument holds good; if we have imposed an injustice on a number of men, we should clear our skirts to some extent by relieving those on whom the injustice is still being imposed.

At that time the little organization at Saskatoon was supposed to be the only body backing this programme. I am glad to say that we have many more backers of the request that clear titles be granted to these men. The Canadian Legion of the British Empire Service League of Alberta and British Columbia have endorsed this request, and on May 23 a delegation of nine, representing the Soldier Settlers Association of Canada, came here from the prairie provinces and presented a brief to the government. I must say that that brief was very well received, and the delegates went home much encouraged and well satisfied with their trip to Ottawa. They feel that something will now be done, and are living in hopes.

The last two paragraphs of the brief are as follows:

> In conclusion, we present this petition with its thousands of signatures as indicative of a cross section of veteran and civilian opinion from the four western Canadian provinces. It has entailed during the past winter the travelling of thousands of miles under adverse conditions. In addition we have secured the unanimous support of the Alberta legislature, the 20,000 members of the Alberta Farmers Union, the Saskatchewan Association of Rural Municipalities, the Saskatchewan Wheat Pool, the United Farmers of Canada (Saskatchewan section), and the United Farmers of Alberta.
> And so, gentlemen, we rest our case, believing that we have right on our side and hoping that we shall receive justice.

I will not deal any further with the brief. The Minister of Pensions and National Health was one of those very much interested and in favour of doing the right thing. In addition to this brief, with the support of the organizations I have mentioned, petitions were circulated and signed by no less than 12,500 citizens of the four western provinces. So far as I have been able to learn, not one person who was approached refused to sign the petition, and many people chipped in with their nickels and dimes in order to send the delegation to Ottawa and defray other expenses incurred in the circulation of the petition.

I do not want to take up much more time; as I said, I intend to deal with the Veterans' Land Act when the bill goes into committee, and I shall then have something to say on other matters connected with pensions, et cetera. I believe that the minister in charge of this bill is sympathetic to the general point of view I have expressed. I plead with the treasury board not to delay this measure of relief. These veterans have suffered enough in the past, and their sufferings should be ended right away. I am asking that clear title be granted in view of the fact that twenty-nine per cent of the original loan remains unpaid after deductions amounting to $44 millions have been taken off.

A number of the settlers are over seventy years of age. The conditions that caused their inability to pay for their land were man-made. If our economy had had regard to the interest of agriculture and of other groups in Canada these debts would have been paid off long ago. The low prices for goods sold were not justified, nor were the high prices charged for the things that these settlers and other agriculturists had to buy. The sons and daughters of the veterans on whose behalf I am speaking now are overseas doing that magnificent job which we hear praised here day after day, and in a very short time they will be coming back. Perhaps to-day they are wondering whether, when they do come back, their fathers and mothers will be on the roadside, having been put off the land. Let us give them a home to come back to, and by so doing we shall save the government money. I think we have a bunch of hard-headed men in the government, and if they figured this out on a financial basis it could be shown that it would be actually a saving of money to the government and to the country.

As a last reason I would say, build up the morale of the veterans coming back who will settle on the land under the Veterans' Land Act. There is nothing more destructive to the well-being of any of these settlers than to see men who were placed on land, under a scheme similar to that which is being put into effect at the present time, still struggling in debt, in poor health, living in poor homes and unable under present conditions to pay for their land.

Hon. R. B. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I had no intention of speaking on the bill until I heard over the radio the broadcast of the minister's statement at noon as to the passing of a new order in council, revoking regulations heretofore established and substituting new regulations, a copy of which he has been good enough to send me since the house began its session this afternoon. These are quite voluminous and require at the hands of hon. gentlemen a substantial amount of study. That study should be given before we are asked to vote for the second reading of the bill, because, when we pass the second reading, we agree to the principle of the bill and thus are left in a restricted position with respect to the regulations, which are most important, and which, according to the press release which the minister has been good enough to send me, establish some new and far-reaching principles.

I think it is fair to say that the minister's intentions are to simplify and consolidate the existing regulations and to remove certain inequalities with respect to discharge allowances and so forth of ex-servicemen. Therefore I am going to ask the minister, before the second reading of the bill is passed, to give an exposition to the house and the country of the scope and nature of the new regulations which he was able, only yesterday, to get passed, or which I am advised he was able to get passed, through the much-abused treasury board we heard something about this afternoon.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): Perhaps my hon. friend will allow me to interrupt, and perhaps the house will give its consent to enable me to table the order in council at the present moment.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I am going to ask the minister to follow that up by giving instructions that copies of these regulations be distributed immediately to all the members of the house, and I will ask hon. members to read the regulations, because there is not one of us who has not from time to time, and in many cases extending over a long period of years, been confronted with the necessity of advising on pension matters. I have never felt competent to do this because, in the first place, I cannot claim to be a veteran, and in the second place I have never sat on any of the pension committees that have operated in this house since 1920, of which there have been many, so that I have not had an opportunity to make any extensive study of the pension law and the regulations that have been passed. But there is no branch of the duties that are imposed upon members of parliament which has given me more trouble and sometimes anxiety than in the case of applications from my constituents for the extension of pensions. I have always been at considerable loss and disadvantage as to how I should proceed in a given case, and many times I have met with frustration for reasons which I could not really understand. Therefore I am going to ask hon. members who are interested, especially all veterans in the house, to read the regulations thoroughly. I myself have only had a chance to have a hasty glance at them, and I can recognize one or two modifications of situations which certainly appeal to me. One of them is this. A man returns discharged, not in a good medical category and not pensionable; yet he needs hospitalization, and he has always been denied that. He must be a pensioner before he can get hospitalization. In my files I have a case of a young officer returning from overseas, discharged, who has made serious allegations against the Department of National Defence, which allegations are at present the subject of investigation. They allege, not the alteration —of his medical sheets, but additions to his medical sheet. I myself am not in a position to judge as to the accuracy of the position, but certainly at my request a court of inquiry is being held, and it is a serious matter.

That, however, is not what I started out to effect; what I tried to get was hospitalization for this man who has never applied for a pension, who may or may not be entitled to a pension, but who, under regulations which are included in these new regulations, will be able to get hospitalization. I will not say more about that, because I believe a thorough inquiry will be held into the situation to which I have referred, which will be elucidated to say the least.

What I wish particularly to speak about is this. In the course of the past twelve months there has come to my notice personal application from veterans of this war who have been discharged and who, on applying for pension, are met with a more or less blank wall arising out of this situation. They are told, "Oh, yes, you have a certain disease; you are suffering from a certain diminution of your physical powers; there is no doubt about it that your category is low, and that is one of the reasons why you are being let out of the army." And the reason for refusal is given in a few terse words or sentences: "This is a pre-enlistment condition."

In each one of those cases I have perused the medical sheets and all the other papers that were available to me. I have gone through them with a microscopic eye, and in every case that I have examined—and it is not one, two, three or four, but nearly a dozen—on the medical sheets and on the documentation assembled and handed to me on behalf of the applicant there is not an iota of evidence to show that he had a pre-enlistment condition. He was taken into the army in category "A"; and presumably he had a proper medical examination when he was inducted into the army or air force or whatever the case may be. He is discharged after fifteen, eighteen, twenty-four or thirty months' service. These discharges take place mostly overseas. In the cases that came before me, I think one or two had not gone overseas. He is discharged with a lower medical category. He is no longer suitable for service. On his application for a pension—suffering now as he is from a disability—a statement in effect is made to him: "Yes, you have this disability, but it is a pre-enlistment condition." There was not a single iota of evidence on the face of the documents to support the statement.

If I understand the basic principle of the law, the burden is on the applicant in the first instance to show that he had the disability and that it arose under certain circumstances and conditions before pensionability is allowed. I understand that. But where it is admitted that a man has been in service and that he has a physical disability and his medical sheets are produced, the documentation is there, and where pension is refused on the allegation of the medical staff of the board of pension commissioners that it is a pre-enlistment condition, I assert with every degree of confidence that the burden of showing that is on the pension commission.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): That is correct.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): It is an axiom of law that he who asserts an affirmative proposition must prove it.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): That is the case now.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): That is the case, but in every case that I have had anything to do with I have sought in vain for evidence in support of the affirmation of the proposition and it has not been given to me.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): May I have those cases?

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I can give them, yes. I have two in my mind and I shall get them for the minister. The files will show that I have written in each one of those cases for the supporting evidence to substantiate the claim that this was a pre-enlistment condition. That is the situation which has arisen. There may be a good reason for it; I do not know. But I assert with every degree of confidence that when a situation exists such as I have indicated and tried to indicate by general statements something should be done about it. A man is taken into the armed services and given category "A". He served in a theatre of war or as the case may be as the law now stands. He now suffers from a disability which presumably he did not have when he enlisted in the armed services. He was released because of that disability. He is no longer of any service to the nation or to the army. He applies for a pension and is met with a stone wall. They say to him: "Yes; you have this disability." In effect, it is said, "You are not fit for army service. Presumably you are not fit to go out into the markets of the world and sell your services at 100 per cent, because this is a pre-enlistment condition." He is met with that without the slightest evidence in support of that affirmative proposition. I wish to call the minister's attention to that. Judging the matter purely as one of evidence and with as much judicial ability as one can summon, when the commission takes that attitude it does seem to me that it is an impossible position for it to take without supporting testimony. I do not understand that the law goes that far, and in a given case such as I have tried to outline briefly, there must be supporting reasons for the judgment given.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): Absolutely.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I find it wanting in many cases. That is all I have to say.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): Those are the cases I want to see.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I shall endeavour to get them for the minister as soon as possible.

Hon. H. A. BRUCE (Parkdale): I should like to express my appreciation of the remarks made by the hon. member for Vancouver North (Mr. Sinclair), in which he traversed ground that I think needed to be gone over, and with which I am in accord. I wish also to express my approval of what the hon. member for Hastings-Peterborough (Mr. White) said on this subject, and incidentally the point which the hon. member for York-Sunbury (Mr. Hanson) made a moment ago is one that needed to be dealt with. I could never understand the position that has been taken heretofore in regard to that matter. I may also say that I am heartily in accord with the wisdom of creating a separate department of veterans' affairs. I know this has been urged by the various veterans' associations and I am glad that the government has now agreed to bring in a bill to set up a separate veterans affairs' department. These veterans have earned our undying gratitude, and it is our simple duty to do everything we can to ensure that when they return they will find that their opportunities for rehabilitation have been well taken care of by those of us who have benefited from their services and who have remained in security at home. Not only that, but I think we should make sure that the dependents of those soldiers are given the most generous treatment that it is possible to give them.

With regard to this bill to establish a Department of Veterans' Affairs I should like to emphasize the importance of a man, before being discharged or demobilized, having a complete medical examination and that the examining board should decide at that time the question of eligibility for pension. This would have the effect of sending men to this department who otherwise might feel, as happened after the last war, that their chances of pension were too slight to be pursued. While this may be true at the moment of discharge it is highly important that a complete medical history be on record in the department, so that if there is a subsequent deterioration in the veteran's health this will form a basis for a later pension claim. I am informed that at the present time many discharged men are not given any definite instructions about their rights with respect to pensions.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): That is not correct.

Mr. BRUCE: The minister nods his head. I am glad he agrees with me in that.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): No; I am sorry to say I cannot agree with that.

Mr. BRUCE: I was so informed, but I am glad if it is not the case.

The present practice of discharging men while undergoing active hospital treatment is so inhuman that it should be discontinued forthwith. A man should be kept on the strength during the whole of his initial hospital treatment. Of course this will mean that in a few cases men who will spend the rest of their lives in hospitals will be considered members of the active forces until their death. This I believe will have a decided moral value, while entailing very little additional expense.

The setting up of this department will in my judgment ensure that veterans will receive better consideration than has been the case heretofore. At present their interests are divided among a number of departments. This offers too many opportunities for passing the buck. My veteran friends know what that means. By having one minister responsible for all the interests of veterans, which would include directing them to suitable hospitals for medical care, they will undoubtedly receive more consideration than under the present situation.

In passing I may say, since I have not taken advantage of the opportunity to say it before, that I consider the clothing allowance of $65 on discharge to be quite insufficient, and I think this should at least be doubled.

The rehabilitation grant of one month's pay and allowances is also quite inadequate to bridge the gap between discharge and the resumption of civilian employment. This gap is bound to be governed to a great extent by the length of service, since a man who has lived for three or four years under army routine will not adapt himself quickly to civilian life. I do not think the rehabilitation grant should be considered in any sense a reward for service; it should merely be designed to effect, as soon as possible, its avowed purpose of reestablishment.

The provisional routine order No. 1079 which debars men discharged at their own request, or members of the permanent force, from receiving rehabilitation grants, should be washed out, because this class, more than most others, require this grant.

On March 20, the Prime Minister moved two resolutions which had the effect of setting up two separate ministries to replace the present Department of Pensions and National Health. The first of these measures is bill No. 83, which we are considering to-day, to establish a Department of Veterans' Affairs. The bill which will set up the other division, namely, the Department of Social Welfare, has not yet been brought down.

In the process of expanding the Department of Pensions and National Health into two departments, under separate ministries, unfortunately the word "health" disappeared. This, I venture to say, is a mistake. After all, the promotion of good health is the most important function that any social service could render. The Department of Veterans' Affairs will be responsible for care and treatment, and training for reestablishment in civil life as it affects members of the armed forces.

I think it might be well at this time to give the committee the opinion of the Canadian Medical association, which gave careful consideration to this whole matter at its recent 75th annual meeting in Toronto, and which sent to the Prime Minister on May 29 certain observations, of which I have a copy and which, for the information of the house, I should like to read into the record. I should say in passing that this organization represents a great majority of the medical profession in Canada, and has been in close touch with all recent developments in the provision of health services. It has had five of its members sitting on the Canadian medical procurement and assignment board, which was established by order in council in July, 1942.

The Canadian Medical Association desires to make the following observations:

1. Following upon the organization of the Department of Soldier reestablishment in 1919 the present Department of Pensions and National Health was established in 1928, after much discussion and many representations made to the government by groups and individuals concerned not only in problems relating to the care of veterans, but also with the wider conception of a national health policy, in respect of all health matters properly falling within the scope of national jurisdiction.

2. The proposal to set up in Canada for the first time such a department was warmly welcomed throughout the country and regarded as a procedure of national importance.

3. In the present resolutions the provision for a department of health under that name, either alone or in combination with other similar interests, does not appear.

4. If a directorate dealing with national health is to be retained, it would appear that it would be one of several departments within the proposed new Department of Social Welfare.

5. If eventually a plan for health insurance be devised requiring federal assistance and a degree of federal oversight and guidance it will presumably be administered within the new Department of Social Welfare.

6. Inasmuch as the health of the people depends to a great extent upon the environmental conditions under which they live and work, upon security against fear and want, upon adequate nutrition, and upon their opportunities for exercise and leisure, as well as upon a health service which will ensure that everybody in the country irrespective of means, age, sex or occupation shall have an equal opportunity to benefit from the best and most up-to-date medical and allied services available, the term national health, in its modern implications, appears to be broad enough to include most, if not all of the functions of the proposed Department of Social Welfare.

7. Abundant evidence supports the view that the nation is more conscious than ever before of the importance and scope of developments which are anticipated within the health field, and that it is desirable to emphasize in all reasonable ways the importance of the health programme.

8. For the reasons cited, and having regard only to the best interests of the Canadian people, we would respectfully suggest that the new department for which the name of social welfare is now proposed might well be called the department of national health.

9. As we understand the present proposals, the medical and hospital care of veterans and their dependents as now carried on in the Department of Pensions and National Health would be transferred to the new Department of Veterans' Affairs.

10. A great national plan for health care is being devised, and it may be assumed that when and if it comes into operation a large number of our people, consisting of the veterans who with their dependents, will constitute 12 to 15 per cent of our population, might reasonably expect to have access to these services.

11. Again most respectfully we would urge that in the interests of sound administration, careful consideration be given to placing all government health services in time of peace within one department.

12. In order to concentrate the expenditure for veterans' care within one department, the Department of Veterans Affairs could arrange to purchase the "medical care"—using the term broadly—for this group of people from the department of national health.

13. We believe that if the health services were so organized, there would be a notable conservation of medical and technical personnel and equipment and that there would be provided a finer type of service to this very important group.

14. Summarizing we would most respectfully suggest:

(a) That the title "department of national health" is preferable to "department of social welfare."

(b) That all federal health activities be incorporated in the department of national health, including the health and care of veterans.

All of which is respectfully submitted on behalf of the Canadian medical association.

T. C. Routley,
Secretary.

I should like now to give a brief outline of the qualifications of this association to indicate that their opinions are deserving of respect and careful consideration. May I recall that the primary function of the medical procurement and assignment board was to secure physicians for the armed forces and at the same time to endeavour to preserve adequate medical services for the civilian population. As time went on, it became apparent that the health services of the country as a whole required to be studied, and this involved physicians, dentists, nurses, medical schools, public health, medical research, industry and the community generally. The personnel of the board consisted of three directors of the medical services, army, navy and air force, a representative of the Department of Pensions and National Health, the medical director of national war services and a representative or director of national selective service. There were also the director of the dental service and five members of the Canadian medical association advisory committee to which I referred a moment ago.

The scope of the character of the board's activities was widened to make possible a national survey which was completed in January, 1943. The report which they published about two months ago consists of ten parts and constitutes a fairly valuable compilation of the available civilian man-power, the war medical man-power, medical nurses, public health, hospital personnel and facilities, industrial medicine, nurses, dental services and concludes with certain recommendations. I am mentioning this to indicate the wide knowledge at the disposal of the Canadian Medical association when it made the proposals which I read a moment ago and which, therefore, I venture to suggest deserve careful consideration. Speaking for myself as a surgeon, I am entirely in accord with those proposals and I hope that when the new department is created it will be called the department of national health.

May I point out that at the present moment the social security committee has about completed the consideration of the national health insurance bill which, if enacted into law, will provide an all-inclusive health service for our people. There is no reason why our veterans should be excluded from the benefits which will be provided under that bill. The federal government will be called upon to pay a large sum of money annually to provide these services which will include additional hospital, diagnostic and treatment centres equipped with all modern facilities, as well as skilled specialists in all departments.

From the report which is available to members of the house it is made clear that we have not a sufficient number of these specialists at the present moment to go around and therefore we must conserve our available skill. I ask the minister to consider whether it would not be economically sounder as well as in the best interests of the veterans themselves to do as the Canadian Medical Association has suggested, rather than set up another hospital service for veterans in addition to that existing at the present time.

I should like to refer to the question I raised a week ago following an item in the Montreal Gazette in which Doctor Penfield, an internationally known neuro-surgeon, made certain statements which I did not then give but which I propose reading now. This statement made on May 30 appeared in the director's report presented at the annual meeting of the Montreal neurological institute, and it is as follows:

It had been suggested to the Department of Pensions and National Health, Doctor Penfield said, that if the government wished to use the institute as a treatment centre, an annex for the treatment of service patients should be constructed. The plan had been turned down, he added, and the official reason given was "fear of the establishment of an embarrassing precedent."

"It is not for us to question this decision," Dr. Penfield continued, "but four and a half years of the war have now passed, and the Canadian government has done practically nothing to establish special centres for the care of war injuries of the nervous system; nothing at all in Quebec and the maritimes."

"It seems possible that returning service men with wounds of nerves and spine and head may think little of embarrassing precedents, and much of their chance to regain their health."

Dr. Penfield declared that the institute should at once enlarge its bed capacity by rapidly building a permanent addition. This would depend, he said, on securing public support through McGill university, as well as the co-operation of the city of Montreal and the provincial government and from Ottawa "at least" construction priorities.

And again:

"In England there are twelve specialized neurosurgical hospital units in the emergency medical service system, and a head injuries hospital for army and air force in Oxford and other centres for the treatment of nerve injuries. The R.C.A.M.C. has psychiatrists in large numbers to deal with functional disturbances in Canada, but strangely lacks provision to restore organic sufferers."

The Minister of Pensions and National Health (Mr. Mackenzie), in reply to this, described Doctor Penfield's statement as unjustifiable and exceedingly inaccurate. He then stated the number of hospital beds that were available in Canada. I venture to say that in giving the number of beds the minister disregarded entirely the point at issue. These general hospital beds had nothing to do with beds specially arranged or services especially provided for neurological surgery.

I put certain questions on the order paper and I have had some replies which are not sufficiently illuminating, so that I shall have to answer some of them myself.

I asked how many neurological institutes there were in Canada. As far as I know, there is only one surgical institute of that kind in this country, namely, the Montreal neurological institute, which was built largely by money donated by the Rockefeller foundation some years ago in order to provide a place in Canada where Doctor Penfield, an internationally known neuro-surgeon, could operate and carry on certain investigations into various diseases of the nervous system for which the Rockefeller committee considered him to be especially competent.

It is true that we have neuro-surgical work being done in a hospital in Toronto. I hesitate to mention its name. It is Christie street hospital. I may say that the work there is efficiently done by Doctor C. P. McCormick, who is an eminent neuro-surgical specialist. I think they have perhaps fifty beds there, and I am told that they could do with another fifty.

There is also a neurological centre at Vancouver, at Shaughnessy Heights, where Doctor Turnbull, who is also a skilled neuro-surgeon, does the work.

I have mentioned the only three places where this particular class of work, I am informed, is being done in Canada at the present time. I think there should be another centre in Winnipeg so as to make it geographically easy for friends of patients to visit their relatives who are being taken care of in these institutions.

At present a distinguished neuro-surgeon, Brigadier Botterell is in England, in charge of the Canadian hospital at Basingstoke. He comes from Winnipeg and therefore, I think, would be available later on to carry on that work quite efficiently in Winnipeg when a centre is created there.

I also asked how many neuro-surgeons there are in Canada. I think I can answer that question. Besides Doctor Penfield in Montreal, there are Doctor Cone and Doctor Elvidge. In Toronto we have an able neuro-surgeon, Doctor Kenneth Mackenzie in addition to Doctor C. P. McCormick. Then there is Doctor Turnbull in Vancouver and Doctor Botterell in Winnipeg when he returns from overseas. That makes seven. There may be one or two others whom I have neglected to mention, who have perhaps undertaken this specialty recently. But I think that constitutes the entire number. The number engaged in this specialty is limited because of the limited field for such work, and therefore it is highly important that we make use of the services of these few skilled specialists to the full extent possible for our returned men.

I remember fifty years ago when I studied in London with Sir Victor Horsley, that he was about the only neuro-surgeon in England who was devoting himself to brain surgery. Later on, one of his pupils, Doctor Harvey Cushing, carried on this specialty first at Baltimore and subsequently in Boston, and at that time he was one of the first neuro-surgeons in America. The reason was partly due to the limited field, that no surgeon would care to devote himself exclusively to that work because he would probably not make a living. I mention this to indicate to the members of the house the great importance of using to the full, for the benefit of our returned men who will need them, the services of these men with special skill and the importance of spending anything that is necessary to provide them with easily accessible beds.

When Doctor Penfield offered the department space for an addition to the Montreal neurological institute I think the offer should have been jumped at, but instead it was peremptorily turned down on the specious and totally unwarranted ground that other hospitals would ask for similar concessions. It is obvious that no hospitals in Canada other than those situated in the places I have indicated, close to medical schools where they have a specialist in this department of work, would be likely to ask for a similar concession. But if they did, I would grant them all the money necessary to provide that accommodation.

The committee of consultants of the three armed services, army, navy and air force, together with the Department of Pensions and National Health, began work about a month ago in regard to the establishment of special centres in Canada for the three most essential services—neuro-surgery, orthopaedics and plastic surgery. It was thought that these might be combined with advantage, perhaps with economy. Colonel R. I. Harris, of Toronto, an able surgeon, is chairman of that committee. I understand that Doctor Penfield and his associates, by an addition to the neurological institute, could take care of the work originating in St. Anne's and possibly for Quebec and the maritimes. What a pity that the department did not envisage years ago the kind of cases for whom such centres would be needed so that the buildings would now be completed and ready to receive patients who may be soon arriving. Another year or two must necessarily elapse before these centres can be ready, unless they are proceeded with more rapidly than the Sunnybrook Park hospital in Toronto.

In case any of my recent remarks should be considered prejudiced, I should like to quote from a paper which heretofore has not been unfriendly to this government—the Winnipeg Free Press. I believe the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) has already referred to certain portions of this editorial. I do not intend to read it all, but there are two or three points which are worth recording. Speaking of the Deer Lodge hospital the writer states:

> It was then urged that if more beds had to be provided they should be in a building placed as near as possible to the Manitoba Medical College, that is to say, near the General hospital which provides the clinical background for all the teaching of medicine in Manitoba.

With that statement I entirely agree.

> The basic reason for this suggestion was that efficiency in the treatment of patients is greatly enhanced by there being available for them as high a concentration as possible of medical and surgical skill and knowledge. Good specialists are not and never will be plentiful. At the present time they are even scarcer than usual, largely because of the stubborn and ill-judged determination of the three defence departments each one to create and maintain their own medical service, with virtually no coordination between them. Hence the need always present and now acute to create new hospital facilities as near to existing key institutions in order to make available over as wide a circle of patients as possible the rare and delicate skills of the specialist.

The editorial goes on to refer to the reply of the minister in regard to the "embarrassment" of which I spoke a moment ago, and continues as follows:

> Mr. Mackenzie proudly cited the large increase in the number of beds in hospitals operated by this department, but typically omitted any mention of what happens to the men who are put into the beds, which is the only point which interests Dr. Penfield. Mr. Mackenzie then had the nerve to remark that Dr. Penfield had displayed a remarkable lack of knowledge of the preparations that were being made to look after the service men. We venture the suggestion that Dr. Penfield knows more about them and of their efficiency than Mr. Mackenzie does and that it was this knowledge which made him speak out as he did. . . .
> Hospitals, as we have said before, are not mere masses of bricks and mortar. They are concentrations of medical skill and knowledge. If they are not that they are nothing but shells and the patients in them suffer and die accordingly. Elsewhere in his annual report, Dr. Penfield remarked that in the last analysis intimate cooperation in the treatment of disease depended upon the proximity of pooled specialist skill. We recommend the wisdom of this remark to Mr. Mackenzie and his colleagues in the government.

I do not think I could have written a better editorial myself, and I commend it to the attention of the members of the house.

Mr. KNOWLES: What is the title of the editorial?

Mr. BRUCE: The title is "Stubborn Incompetence". I forgot to mention that.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): That is the peroration, is it?

Mr. BRUCE: That is so that it will be identified. The date is June 5.

Mr. CLARENCE GILLIS (Cape Breton South): I listened with a great deal of interest this afternoon to the hon. members who have preceded me in this debate. The thing which struck me about the discussion so far was the non-partisan attitude which most of the hon. members have taken with respect to the measure before the house.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): Except the last one.

Mr. GILLIS: I said "most of the hon. members."

Mr. BRUCE: I was entirely non-partisan.

Mr. GILLIS: I view this bill as one which should receive careful consideration by every hon. member in the light of its importance to our rehabilitation plans. As I see it, the subject matter of this bill is the coordination of the different bodies which have been handling veterans' affairs in the past, and it can mean either that we shall have an orderly transition back to civilian life of our service personnel, or chaos in the aftermath of the war. Upon the personnel of this particular department of government will largely depend which of the situations I have mentioned will develop.

On several occasions I have spoken in the house and placed on record the opinions of myself and the members of this group with respect to rehabilitation generally and the mechanics we shall have to employ if we are to achieve the social objectives for which we are fighting the war. In the time at my disposal this afternoon I am going to deal specifically with the bill itself; I shall not enter into all the ramifications of rehabilitation.

First, to my mind the bill is a step in the right direction, in that the government propose by it to concentrate under one department all the problems of the service personnel. I think that makes for more efficient administration and will guarantee to the service personnel the implementation of the regulations as written; because the real test of any legislation—at least that has been my experience—is the administration, as to whether those whom the legislation is designed to help will receive the benefits provided, or otherwise. Now the bill does in my opinion change to some extent matters which in the past have been pretty well fixed. In the hands of the minister, under the terms of the bill, we are placing practically dictatorial powers. He has the privilege under the bill of determining contracts with institutions for the care of persons. He is permitted under section 6 on page 2 of the bill to make regulations, contracts and so forth. I am not quarrelling with that principle, but we shall have to be mindful of this fact. The present minister of pensions, with whose department I have had a great deal to do since becoming a member of the house, is an old soldier to the subject, knows the regulations, and in my experience has been sympathetic, and if at any time a problem is brought to his attention, as soon as he possibly can he sees that any matter complained of is rectified within the scope of the regulations. But when we are setting up a system giving powers to a minister or any other individual we must be mindful of the fact that the competent and efficient minister who now heads the department may not be there in the aftermath of the war.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): May I be permitted to spoil my hon. friend's remarks. I intend to move two amendments, one deleting section 6 and the other amending section 7.

Mr. GILLIS: I will drop my criticism of both sections.

Mr. GRAYDON: Don't drop your prophecy.

Mr. ROSS (Souris): What about the compliments?

Mr. GILLIS: I am glad the minister intends to move amendments to these sections. It shows the necessity for amendments in these directions. I hope it will be part of the minister's amendment to change the regulations with respect to employment of staff. That is one of the amendments, so that there is no necessity—

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): That is the objection mentioned by my hon. friend before, raised by the amalgamated civil servants. Provisions for appointment under the Civil Service Act have been in the statutes since 1919, and objections have been raised to the removing of them.

Mr. GILLIS: I am glad to hear the minister say that. My next objection is with reference to page 3. The section sets out reciprocal or other arrangements with governments. In that section there is complete omission—

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): Which section?

Mr. GILLIS: I am referring to paragraph (h) on page 3. In that section of the bill no reference to the merchant navy is made; it is completely omitted. It makes provision for the government to deal with governments outside of Canada for services rendered in the army, the navy, or the air force, providing medical benefits, et cetera, but it completely omits any reference to the merchant navy. That particular branch of the service is one which in my opinion has been discriminated against right from the start of the war, while every member who has had cause to refer to them has pointed out that were it not for the services rendered by the merchant navy, with very little glory, without the benefit of uniform, or of the other attractive measures which the other services enjoy, the invasion of Europe to-day would not be possible. I suggest that in this clause the provisions now made for the other branches of the service should be extended to the merchant navy.

Again, at page 4, paragraph (i), which is a carry-over from page 3, there are words which I fail to understand, and I do not think that at this time they have any right to appear in a bill which is being presented to the Canadian House of Commons. Let me read these words:

> . . . for the provision of measures of unemployment relief to former members of such forces and their dependents.

In reading that section of the bill I anticipate, and anyone will who reads it, that under the regulations to be administered by this department of government provision is being made for unemployment relief for members of service personnel fighting at the present time in Italy and in France. I cannot understand why those words should be there. Under the terms of the government's rehabilitation proposals, as contained in many documents, they have set out a programme that looks attractive on paper.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): To what line is the hon. member referring?

Mr. GILLIS: The paragraph starts at the bottom of page 3 and carries on to page 4. It is in line six of page 4, starting about the middle. It definitely sets out that provision is being made for the payment of unemployment relief to members of the forces and their dependents. It looks very attractive on paper. It provides for vocational training, out-of-work benefits, hospitalization, pensions, gratuities, and covers everything imaginable. But, as I said before, the test of any programme is its administration, either by design or otherwise, and the thin end of the wedge is being driven in through the provision of this clause for the payment of unemployment relief.

Further on in the section provision is made for the administration and disposal of canteen funds. I do not like to find the other provision so closely related in that paragraph of the bill to the disposal of canteen funds because, as I remember, the canteen committee that sat under the chairmanship of the hon. member for Brantford City (Mr. Macdonald) made recommendations to the house for the disposal of canteen funds, and one thing we very definitely set out in the report—I have a copy of it here but I will not take up the time of the house reading it—is that we disagreed completely with the principle of using canteen funds for the purpose of paying unemployment relief to any member of the services serving in the present war. The funds should not be used in any way, shape or form to enable the government to shirk its responsibility to the service personnel fighting in this war. If I am wrong in my supposition with respect to the wording of the bill I hope that when the minister speaks he will clarify it.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): It is the same as the last time exactly, except as to the canteen funds.

Mr. GILLIS: Is it? A member is at a disadvantage in discussing this bill because the minister did not open the debate with a statement. I think that the minister should have made a statement before any debate took place. The hon. member for Vancouver North gave a very good analysis of the department of veterans' affairs. He mentioned several principles that should be kept in mind, in my opinion. When the department of veterans' affairs is set up I hope that the government will not completely uproot all of the personnel now handling war veterans' allowances, the Pensions Act, national health problems, the treatment branch of pensions and national health, and so on. It may be the desire, for reasons other than efficiency, of people who I have heard discuss the problem to lead the returning personnel to believe that all jobs connected with the department of veterans' affairs are to be reserved for and allocated to personnel serving in this war. Yet I feel that while they are entitled to representation on every board that has to do with the handling of their problems, so that the point of view of men serving in this war may be understood, there are hundreds of service personnel from the last war, men who have already fought a war and won it for this country regardless of the fact that someone stole the peace, who are now serving on boards administering the different measures that I have indicated. They are efficient; they know the problems, and they know the machinery. I hope it is not the intention of the government to weed out the people now serving in that capacity, because it would be a mistake to head up this department with brand new men and to lose the experience of men who have sat in, studied and administered these problems for the last twenty years. It may be that they have not administered them as we should have liked; nevertheless they have done a good administrative job within the scope of the regulations.

In dealing with the department my experience has been that the administration has not been wrong but that the regulations require expanding and correcting in many respects. I believe there is now more scope and latitude being given and we should be very careful not to throw out the hundreds of men who are now employed in those capacities and who are at an age where they cannot go out and compete in the labour market. In our rush to try to promise jobs to everyone coming back from this war let us not forget the old soldier and the contribution he has made, both in the last war and in the subsequent period of peace. I think there is growing up in Canada a tendency to disregard completely the obligation that the country owes to the old soldier who has already made his contribution.

I listened with interest to the remarks this afternoon of the hon. member for Battle River (Mr. Fair). I wish to join with him in the plea that he made to the government on behalf of the soldier settlers of the last war who are now appealing to the government for the wiping off of the financial obligation that they still have against their lands. I think that should be done. It was a distressing and depressing situation to find in Ottawa a few weeks ago a group of veterans from Saskatchewan and Alberta who pointed out that since the outbreak of this war some six hundred odd veterans a year have been dispossessed of the land on which they were placed after the last war.

As some encouragement to those coming back at this time, whom we expect to place on the land under a scheme similar to that of the last war, attention should be paid to the agitation that is being carried on across the country by veterans of the last war with respect to the obligations still standing against their homes and farms, and the request that those obligations should be cancelled. I think we all are more or less in agreement on that.

The machinery that is to be set up in this new department to administer its activities will be very important. One of the most important parts of it will be the welfare department work in conjunction with the selective service and unemployment insurance offices. I think they are totally understaffed at the present time, and the machinery is completely inadequate. I do not care how efficient the Ottawa machine is or who the personnel is, because we must remember that the soldier is not going to be settled in Ottawa when he comes back. He is going to be settled back in his own community; and if an efficient staff is to be appointed then we must have men who are sensible and who understand the regulations and the problems of the soldiers back in the communities. These are the men with whom the soldiers will have first contact, and they are the ones who are going to sell them the whole reconstruction programme of the government. If the minister intends to carry out the programme that has been outlined he should lose no time in establishing a welfare officer in each of the different communities. This should be done now, not after the war is over when we have wholesale demobilization. That welfare officer should be back talking to the boys when they come home. He should have some contact with national defence. He should be endeavouring to get from national defence and the different military districts a precis of the file of each soldier in the service from his community and should endeavour to determine the soldier's employment possibilities, what training he has received in the army, and how he can be routed into the economy of the province. Those files should be ready before general demobilization takes place. Then when the men start coming back they will meet someone who is efficient, who has contact with industry and is in a position to guide the men into vocational training and to disability pensions, if that is necessary, and to route them to some employment in the community. Unless that is done I certainly fear the results of demobilization as affecting my own particular section.

On motion of Mr. Gillis the debate was adjourned.

At six o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

Thursday, June 15, 1944

The house met at three o'clock.

EXCHANGES OF NOTES

CANADA-NEWFOUNDLAND—LANDING OF SALT AND FISH FOR TEMPORARY STORAGE

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I wish to table an exchange of notes between Canada and Newfoundland recording permission for Canadian fishing vessels to land salt and fish in Newfoundland for temporary storage in bond during the calendar year 1944, dated respectively at St. John's, May 1, 6 and 15, 1944. Treaty series 1944, No. 14.

CANADA-BRAZIL—CULTURAL RELATIONS

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): On June 5 the leader of the opposition asked me a question with regard to an announcement that had been made with respect to the exchange of notes between Brazil and Canada on cultural relations. I now beg to table an exchange of notes between Canada and Brazil constituting an agreement for the promotion of cultural relations between the two countries, dated at Rio de Janeiro, May 24, 1944. Treaty series 1944, No. 15.

CANADIAN WHEAT BOARD

REFERENCE TO AGRICULTURE COMMITTEE OF REPORT FOR CROP YEAR 1942-43

Hon. J. A. MacKINNON (Minister of Trade and Commerce) moved:

That the report of the Canadian wheat board for the crop year 1942-43 be referred to the standing committee on agriculture and colonization.

Motion agreed to.

CRIMINAL CODE

AMENDMENTS—THEFT FROM POST OFFICE—FRAUD IN SALES OF MILITARY STORES—APPEALS FROM SUMMARY CONVICTIONS IN QUEBEC

Hon. L. S. ST. LAURENT (Minister of Justice) moved for leave to introduce bill No. 139, to amend the Criminal Code.

He said: The purpose of this bill is to provide three amendments to the Criminal Code. The first is to do away with the provision under which the minimum sentence for theft of an article from a post office is three years' imprisonment. We are taking out the minimum because it has been found by experience that in a great many cases it is difficult to get a conviction when the conviction would necessarily entail a minimum penalty of three years.

The second is to increase the maximum penalties provided for defrauding the government in sales to the government of miltary stores. The maximum penalty was two years imprisonment or a fine of $5,000. It is proposed to increase that maximum to three years and a maximum fine of $50,000. The third is to substitute the Superior Court of Quebec for the Court of King's Bench for the hearing of appeals from summary convictions. The Court of King's Bench is the court which hears criminal cases with a jury. The sittings of that court in the rural districts are quite infrequent, sometimes more than a year elapsing between one sitting and the next, but the Court of King's Bench is presided over by the same judge who presides over the superior court, which is the high court of original jurisdiction. The amendment would substitute the superior court for the Court of King's Bench so that appeals from summary convictions would be more speedily disposed of. It has been found in some cases that when appeals were taken from summary convictions, the appeal was abandoned when the court sat many months after the appeal was entered. This amendment will be in the interests of the expeditious administration of justice, because appeals may be heard at the ordinary term of the high court in each rural district.

Mr. CHURCH: Mr. Speaker, when a similar amending bill was before the house last year the minister said he would consider suggestions from the bar and chief constables' associations and my own proposals to curb highway motor accidents—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. CHURCH: —and other matters of criminal negligence.

Mr. SPEAKER. Order. Leave is being asked by the Minister of Justice to introduce this bill. Does the hon. member wish to speak to it?

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

QUESTIONS

(Questions answered orally are indicated by an asterisk.)

BOARD OF PHYSICAL FITNESS

Mr. CHURCH:

1. Who are the members of the board of physical fitness to administer the act herein of 1943, by provinces or otherwise, and what provinces are now under it?
2. Who are the chief officers and what are their qualifications, salaries, living allowances, travelling expenses and all other emoluments?
3. Are any of them returned soldiers of this or the last war and in what theatres of war did they actually serve?
4. Why are not these positions reserved exclusively for those who were overseas in a combatant area?
5. Who selected them, how were they appointed and what are their duties?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre):

1. Members of the national council on physical fitness: W. A. Wellband, Regina, Sask.; A. A. Burridge, Hamilton, Ont.; Dr. J. Gilbert, Quebec, Que.; J. Mathison, Vancouver, B.C.; J. H. Ross, Calgary, Alta.; Dr.

W. C. Ross, Halifax, N.S.; M. Brewer, Fredericton, N.B.; R. W. Youmans, Winnipeg, Man.; Major I. Eisenhardt, Ottawa, Ont.

Agreements under the National Physical Fitness Act have been signed by authorities of the following provinces: British Columbia, Alberta, Saskatchewan, Nova Scotia, Prince Edward Island.

2 and 3. Of the members of the national council on physical fitness, Mr. W. A. Wellband had service in France and Dr. W. C. Ross had service in England during the great war. They receive travelling expenses while attending meetings at Ottawa.

Of full-time paid officers, there is only one. Major Ian Eisenhardt, army sports officer, has been seconded from the Department of National Defence to the Department of Pensions and National Health as national director of physical fitness, effective June 1, 1944.

Major Eisenhardt is a graduate of universities of Rennes, France and Copenhagen, Denmark. The field of physical education has been his life's study and work. From 1932 to 1935, he was supervisor of playgrounds for the city of Vancouver; from 1934 to 1940, he was director of physical education for the province of British Columbia; from 1940, he has served as an infantry officer and, during the last year, was given the responsibility of developing an army sports programme for the Canadian soldier, a programme which has been accepted by army authorities. His salary is $5,000 per year, and he is allowed actual expenses while travelling on duty.

4. It was in the public interest to make an immediate appointment and Major Eisenhardt was selected from a group engaged in the field of sports, games and recreation, as the person whose training and experience, together with his actual achievements, qualified him best for the post.

5. Appointment: by order in council on the recommendation of the Minister of Pensions and National Health; duties: to develop a national physical fitness programme in conjunction with the provinces, which will eventually improve the general state of health of all Canadians.

UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE

Mr. COTE:

1. How many district offices has the unemployment insurance commission throughout the country?

2. At what date was each of the said offices opened?

QUESTIONS PASSED AS ORDERS FOR RETURNS

HON. MICHAEL DWYER

Mr. O'BRIEN:

1. Is Honourable Michael Dwyer of New Glasgow, N.S., employed by the government or any board of the government, with headquarters at Moncton, N.B., or elsewhere?
2. If so, when was he employed?
3. What are his duties?
4. What sum is paid him per month and to date for salary, expenses and office equipment and help?

CANADIAN FORCES—OFFICERS—DAILY PAY RATES

Mr. HAZEN:

1. What are the basic or regimental daily rates of pay for the following officers of the armed forces: (a) navy—captain, commander, lieutenant-commander, lieutenant, sub-lieutenant, executive, engineer, accountant and medical branches; (b) army—colonel, lieutenant-colonel, major, captain, lieutenant, medical and other than medical branches; (c) air force—group captain, wing commander, squadron leader, flight lieutenant, flying officer, general list, non-flying list and medical branch?
2. What daily rates of staff pay are paid to the officers of the armed forces listed above, (a) in addition to basic or regimental daily pay; and (b) as an alternative to basic or regimental daily pay?
3. What daily rates of headquarters pay are paid to the officers of the armed forces listed above; what percentage of the officers of the armed forces (individual) receive such pay; is such pay paid in addition to basic, staff or regimental pay?
4. (a) What is total daily pay rate, including all allowances other than dependents' allowance, subsistence and living allowances, of the officers of the armed forces listed above, who are serving at National Defence headquarters, Ottawa; (b) if different rates are in force for some or all ranks, what percentage do the officers receiving the different rates bear to the total number of officers of the same rank?

GASOLINE—METHOD OF PURCHASE

Mr. HOBLITZELL:

1. Does the government call for tenders in purchasing motor gasoline?
2. Does the government call for tenders in purchasing aviation gasoline?
3. If not, what method is employed, and what is the reason for not inviting tenders?

VETERANS' AFFAIRS

ESTABLISHMENT OF DEPARTMENT TO DEAL WITH THE CARE, TREATMENT, TRAINING OR RE-ESTABLISHMENT OF MEMBERS OF THE ARMED FORCES

The house resumed from Wednesday, June 14, consideration of the motion of Mr. Mackenzie King for the second reading of bill No. 83, to establish a department of veterans' affairs.

Mr. CLARENCE GILLIS (Cape Breton South): Mr. Speaker, when the house adjourned last evening I was discussing the mechanics of the organization which this bill proposes to set up. I was endeavouring to point out to the minister the importance of the organization in the welfare offices in communities which were recommended by the pensions committee some considerable time ago. I had emphasized the fact that while we may have an efficient organization in Ottawa, it is not in Ottawa that the returning service personnel are going to demobilize, but back in the home communities. The machinery for dealing with this matter through the welfare offices is in my opinion entirely inadequate. Across Canada to-day there is one such office in Prince Edward Island, one in Nova Scotia, one in New Brunswick; there are two in Quebec, four in Ontario, two in Saskatchewan, two in Alberta and two in British Columbia. The most important machinery at the time when demobilization takes place will be these welfare offices. Returning service personnel being discharged to-day and going back to their home communities know very little about the programme of rehabilitation which the government has set out on paper, and unless there are efficiently staffed offices in their local communities it will be quite a problem for them to find out what their rights are under the demobilization and rehabilitation regulations. In Nova Scotia, for example, as I have already pointed out on many occasions here, while the office has a very capable person in charge, it is completely inadequate for the routing of returning service personnel into vocational training or securing for them the employment preferences which exist under the regulations. That office is located in the city of Halifax, at the extreme western end of the province. The largest percentage of service personnel from that province will be returning I think to the other end of Nova Scotia. I have endeavoured to impress upon the minister on one or two occasions the difference between that end of Nova Scotia and most of the rest of Canada, in that there is a complete heavy industry set-up there. A man returning from the service with any kind of disability, even if it be only five or ten per cent, is completely unemployable; there is nothing for him. Only this morning I received a protest from the Army and Navy Veterans of the town of Glace Bay, and I have had letter after letter from returning service personnel to the effect that when they seek employment and go to unemployment insurance and selective service offices they are routed into the regular channel of the unemployed, and unless they are physically capable of taking employment underground or in a steel plant there are no openings for them. On many occasions I have referred to the necessity of the appointment of a welfare officer at the Sydney unemployment insurance office. The appointment has been vacant for the past two years. A year ago the Minister of Pensions and National Health (Mr. Mackenzie) assured me in this chamber that the appointment was to be made immediately, and I felt very happy at this announcement.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): All these appointments are made by the civil service commission.

Mr. GILLIS: That is correct, and I am just coming to that. I believe the minister was quite honest in making that statement, and that so far as he was concerned the appointment would have been made; but while several persons who I feel are qualified in every way have made application—and it is immaterial to me which one gets the appointment; my concern is to have someone there actually doing the work—the civil service commission, I understand, take the position that they are having difficulty in securing a suitable person in that area. In my opinion that statement does not hold water, because a year ago I recommended someone who was qualified in every way and who at that time was prepared to go in and try to do the job. To-day, of course, he would not take the position. I am afraid, and I want to leave this thought with the minister, that in the filling of these positions it is not a matter of making a selection based on merit, but local patronage committees are interfering and retarding the machinery which the minister desires to set up. I have reason to believe that that is correct so far as the area I am discussing is concerned.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): Does my hon. friend suggest that local patronage committees have any influence with the civil service commission?

Mr. GILLIS: Yes, I certainly suggest that; because, as I pointed out to the minister a moment ago, the plea that it is not possible to secure a suitable person in that area is not well founded. The person to whom I referred, who applied a year ago was, I know, qualified in every way, but he was never given the opportunity of an examination. If there is no local interference, something is wrong in Ottawa with the civil service commission, and it should be rectified and this machinery set up now. While only yesterday I stated that all these appointments should be made on the basis of merit and under the Civil Service Act, the civil service commission will have to see to it that there is no interference with the application of the act.

The most important function of the new Department of Veterans' Affairs is to be the organization of these welfare offices back in the communities. Service personnel now coming back from this war are not being interested in this vocational training programme, because there is no one to sell it to them; there is no one back in their communities to whom they can go who can point out the advantages which they can obtain from it if they utilize it to prepare themselves for employment in the future. I think the minister should endeavour as far as possible to set up welfare offices in every section of the country, so that the official who has the first approach to the soldier in the field of employment shall have had sufficient training to enable him to sell this programme of rehabilitation with particular reference to vocational training. It is only in this way that the programme which the government has mapped out will be implemented.

I also emphasize the necessity of vocational training facilities. In the province from which I come there are no such facilities adequate to handle the post-war problem if we are going to be realistic about it. Almost the only facility in Nova Scotia is the technical college in Halifax, expanded very little beyond its peace time basis. There was a training centre located at New Glasgow connected with the Clark Ruse Aircraft plant, but since that plant has been closed the school, too, has ceased to operate. It should be immediately taken over by the Department of Veterans' Affairs and made available to returning service personnel of our province for vocational training purposes. When you approach the average ex-service man to-day and suggest that he take vocational training, the first question he puts to you is, "Well, I am paid about $14 a week; I am obliged to go to Moncton, to Montreal or some other distant place in order to take vocational training, and with the amount of money which I am paid it is not possible for me to maintain myself in some other province during the process of vocational training." If there were an establishment in the centre of the province it is possible that more returning service personnel would take advantage of the vocational training.

The same consideration applies in the matter of routing men back to jobs. While under bill No. 5, which I hope will be administered by this new department—it is now, I believe, handled by the Department of Labour—a man has a right to the job he held prior to his enlistment, if a man in our province is leaving the army to-day, it is because he is physically unfit, and that being so, he is also physically unfit for the job he had prior to enlistment, because, as I stated before, ours is a heavy industry section and there is no light work. When application is made to the selective service offices for employment, the selective service or unemployment insurance officials have no authority to implement the rehabilitation regulations as applicable to ex-service men. One man came to me and told me that when he suggested that something might be done for him by way of lighter employment than shovelling coal underground, the selective service official in Glace Bay remarked to him, "Well, if you can turn that discharge certificate into a light job, that is the thing for you to do." That is not selling the programme of the government; and while you have a programme on paper, unless you also have the machinery to give effect to it there is absolutely no use in having it.

In the matter of hospitalization, pensions, et cetera, I am pleased that the minister has taken the necessary steps down in my end of the country to establish a suboffice. I hope that is not just a hope also. I am hoping that in the near future the personnel will be selected and the machinery put into operation. But I want to leave this thought with the minister. In my opinion, across Canada to-day, hospital facilities provided by the Department of Veterans' Affairs will be totally inadequate to meet the post-war problems, and I suggest that an expansion of hospital facilities will be necessary. The second thought I want to leave with the minister is that we do not repeat the performances of the last twenty years in the staffing of pensions and national health hospitals, putting them under the guidance of part-time medical officers, where the medical officer strolls in at eleven o'clock in the morning. He has his tea and he is in a rush to get out, and he has a line-up on the bench for a couple of hours waiting for him, so that it sometimes takes two or three weeks before the medical officer can discuss the case of a patient who is waiting for him.

I think the job of the pensions and national health hospitals across the country is to make a complete examination of the patient, and it is the obligation and responsibility of the staff of the hospital, including the medical representatives, to see to it that the best treatment is provided and that every means at their disposal be utilized in order to get the man well and in a position to go out and take his place in the economy of the country. But that cannot be done with part-time representatives. That was one of the evils of the hospital set-up, as I saw it, after the last war and in the period between the two wars. I know that at the present time with so many of our doctors out of the country that may not be possible. On the other hand, there may be many doctors under national defence who have not very much to do and could be utilized in these hospitals until such time as a regular organization is provided.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): We are doing that.

Mr. GILLIS: I am glad to hear it.

I have no intention of discussing all the ramifications of the rehabilitation programme at this time. I merely wish to stress the importance of the welfare organization as it applies to the whole demobilization period and to suggest to the minister not to pin too much faith on the voluntary committees that have been set up across the country We have had a good deal of experience with voluntary committees. They have nice honorary jobs and they get their names in the papers occasionally, but they have not the facilities to do the job which is necessary in guiding and routing ex-servicemen back to gainful employment after the war is over. In some sections of the country the voluntary committees do a good job with such machinery as they have to work with, but in Nova Scotia, to the best of my knowledge, these committees have not even made a start on getting into contact with industry and accepting the responsibility for guiding the service man back to gainful employment. The thing we have to do now in every section wherever possible is to have a competent man in an office preparing files, getting in contact with national defence, securing relevant data on every service man in the country who will be returning to that particular area, and selling the vocational training programme, advising them on their rights under the whole scheme. Unless that is done, I see a good many headaches in store for the personnel who may be handling the national administration of the programme.

Mr. T. L. CHURCH (Broadview): From the district which I represent over fifty thousand volunteers took part in the last war, and therefore I want to say something with reference to the new consolidated board to be appointed by the government to handle the problem of the returned soldiers of this war and to suggest a cure for a great many of the defects that have existed in the various pension acts since the last war.

At last, after twenty years, we are apparently taking a forward step in the way of a national policy and a consolidated department to look after veterans' affairs, something long overdue. Between the two wars we had five or six separate departments handling the various phases of the work. I do not wish to offer any criticism of those who have to do with one of the most important offices of government, under the head of this particular department. They have done good work, but red tape and technical small decisions have defeated the purpose of the act.

One of the reasons why I came to Ottawa in the first place in 1921, after the close of the last war, was the fact that callous indifference had been exhibited by all the authorities towards those who had fought the battles of the country in many wars and thus had saved it. But it was the same in the South African war and in the Red River rebellion of 1885. The veterans who in 1885 marched across the territory of lake Superior in the rebellion of that year did not get what they should have been given, or anything since. The same is true of those who took part in the Fenian raid. Grants of land were no doubt given them, but the lands were so far from the scene that they were practically valueless.

I am glad to note that the discussion on this subject is non-partisan, and I hope it will continue on that level. No doubt a forward step has been taken on the basis of service, in that the onus of proof will rest on the government. Every soldier who went overseas should per se be entitled to qualify for a pension. No means test should be applied, and what is given should include full compensation for the services he has rendered so as to enable him to take care of his family and put them back where they were before the war started.

Many of the very same points that were dealt with yesterday by the hon. member for Vancouver North (Mr. Sinclair) were brought up and discussed by myself in the debate that took place on soldiers' reestablishment and pensions when I first entered this house in a debate on June 21, 1922. Some nine or ten of the questions referred to yesterday, which are still unsolved in this country, and which have been raised in various applications that have been made with respect to proof of claim, callous indifference to soldier families, and so on, were brought up by me at that time. The work that has been done speaks for itself. We all know that but for the soldiers who are serving in this war we would have had the awful horrors of war perpetrated right on our own soil and we would not have been able to restore the country. Indeed, all the money that has been spent on the soldiers is only pin money compared to the money spent on material things, the building of railways, public works and many other things of that description. In the great war these men went away voluntarily. A million men went voluntarily from the dominions overseas and 130,000 died on the field of battle in the common cause and changed the whole history of the world.

While we have had a pension act, there have been many defects in it and proper treatment has not been given either the soldiers or their dependents. I wish to refer to one or two matters which are not covered here. First of all, the housing situation; what is to be done regarding housing for returned soldiers? In the city from which I come there are only ·62 vacant houses, less than one per cent. I go around the city of Toronto; I visit the homes. I find soldiers and their families living in cellars that are not fit for human habitation, according to some of our local soldier authorities.

Let me mention one of the first things to be done by the government in conection with this veterans' department—and by the way, that is mysterious wording—veterans—to give to a department that will have to do with boys just out of high school. In the city from which I come, 896 boys who came from the secondary schools have been killed overseas. They are not veterans. Some of them had cadet training in the schools. In that connection may I say that the cadet services throughout the country have done magnificent work in the three branches. I suggest that the cadets in the high schools associated with the navy, the army and the air force be given a dollar a day, three days a week while they are training as cadets for this war.

I would rather see this department called the Soldiers' Aid Department than Department of Veterans' Affairs. When the hon. member for Vancouver North (Mr. Sinclair) was speaking yesterday he referred to an industry in my constituency, Lever Brothers, that great British company. They have put out a very fine red book. They see all the soldiers' off. They are willing to take them back at their old jobs and give them a better job. They send them parcels, cigarettes and supplies, and they do a great deal in looking after the women and children while the men are overseas. They have carried on most glorious work in that connection. The president of the company is Mr. Nairn, a patriotic worker and great citizen. The hon. member for Vancouver North also visited this industry. The president told me and yesterday the hon. member also said, that they have some difficulty in connection with this work in getting a complete record of the soldiers' services, et cetera. It is true that they have their attestation papers, the unit to which they belong and all that kind of thing; but there is no record of the soldier during the time he is away from the industry. I have pleaded with the government for over twenty years to reorganize the records office from top to bottom. I have referred to this on many occasions.

In connection with the victory loans, income tax collections and other matters they have a proper record. The victory loan headquarters can tell within twenty-four hours after the closing of a day's campaign how much was subscribed by a particular village, town or city. Our records office is very largely a relic of the South African war. We have made, so far as I can see, no progress. We cannot tell how many soldiers enlisted from any particular municipality, town or city. Our industrial employers are not interested in many of the small details. They are not interested in primary matters, in finding out something about the work of the soldier while he is away. That was referred to yesterday by the hon. member for Vancouver North. I have in mind a young boy in Lever Brothers who wrapped soap and who was given a decoration at the front, and has risen to the rank of captain. On his return he should not have to go back to the job he had before he enlisted. His company want to use his services, perhaps, in an executive capacity, not at his old job, because with training he would go from the bottom to the top of any industry if he had a chance. They will give him a chance yet. The industries are not giving the protection that they should. In that connection I should like to refer to the various local boards, women's organizations, welfare boards and others who are doing so much for the soldiers in the different municipalities. They have helped every war effort. In addition to that, our clergy of every denomination in Canada have done magnificent work in this war.

So far as the $65 clothing allowance is concerned it is utterly ridiculous. I see some of the veterans coming back from the front going around in winter clothing, because they cannot afford to buy a proper suit of clothes. Some of these men have been overseas for over three and a half years. This is the seventy-fourth day of the session. Surely the government can come to some decision. If it is a matter of money, what does money amount to when compared with seeing that these young people, many of whom have borne the heat and burden of the war and some of whom—those not yet home—will be over there the sixth Christmas next Christmas, are properly clothed when they do come home. I do not like to see them on the streets in the civilian clothes they are wearing; and it is a bad advertisement, and unjust and unfair for the country, the way those soldiers are also housed. I do hope that something will be done along that line.

Ever since the outbreak of the war I have had on the order paper a resolution relating to the protection and treatment of the returned soldiers as follows:

That, in the opinion of this house, the government should immediately consider the advisability and urgent necessity of adopting improved measures for the better protection of all soldiers who serve in His Majesty's forces, and more particularly—(a) that a system of life insurance on all soldiers be established, to include provision for their dependents, both during and after the war, and to include, for three years after the war, provision for their insurance against unemployment and want, and free hospitalization; (b) that a daily allowance be made for local car fare and for free fares on Canada's railways, under the Railway Act (R.S.C.); (c) provision for a revision and improvement in rates of pay, subsistence and other allowances of all ranks, especially privates and non-commissioned officers and removal of existing inequality between all ranks; (d) a high-cost-of-living bonus to be paid to all dependents of soldiers, adjusted from time to time and to include better allowances for their children; (e) provision for a moratorium from foreclosures, eviction and certain other immunities from debt while absent on war duties, and for six months after the war, and more adequate and improved housing for themselves and their families at low cost; (f) a better and more adequate and quicker system of paying the dependents of those reported missing.

I also brought to the attention of the house, first, a national policy of soldiers' insurance the month this war broke out, and the need of a Sparkman act adapted to Canada's circumstances. I immediately sent copies of this United States act to the three ministers of the forces and the finance minister, and frequently dealt with it here. First, some of it was adopted in the last war insurance measure. After Pearl Harbor I still advocated it here, and others have also done so since. I was glad to see that at the last session of the Ontario legislature two bills were passed along this line, one providing financial protection for members of the armed forces and the other providing protection for life insurance policies of those members who are insured. I am glad to see that some progress has been made in that connection.

With regard to transportation, I shall read a return made to an order of the house, on my motion, in that connection, as follows:

Department of National Defence—Army

The total yearly (not monthly) payments made to Canadian Pacific Railway Company and Canadian National Railways for the transportation of His Majesty's forces for the calendar years 1941, 1942 and 1943.

The information is as follows:—

	Canadian National Railways	Canadian Pacific Rly. Co.
1941	$ 6,286,115 32	$ 6,687,317 45
1942	9,328,845 47	7,509,741 59
1943	11,450,816 25	9,920,643 54
	$27,065,777 04	$24,117,702 58

The above figures comprise navy and army payments for the full period and R.C.A.F. payments for calendar year 1941. It is understood R.C.A.F. have reported separately for the calendar years 1942 and 1943.

Department of National Defence for Air

	1941	1942	1943
Canadian National	To be included in army returns	$5,613,151 89	$8,359,765 27
Canadian Pacific Railway	To be included in army returns	4,914,713 41	7,064,854 26

Surely, if all this money has been made, more in one year than in the whole four and half years before the war, the railways can afford to give some measure of relief to the soldiers by way of cheaper fares and better transportation all along the line than they are now doing.

With regard to this bill, the proposed veterans' affairs act, I may say that we should adopt more human rights regarding this particular problem and that bonuses, subventions and subsidies should be given all along the line to soldiers and their dependents. I hope the Industrial Development bank will do something in this connection. Civil aviation, if properly utilized, will become one of the most important agencies for providing employment. I doubt whether we are going to get the benefit we should from the policy of the government. With regard to jobs, I believe the soldiers' children should be put back in the position they were in before the war. Why should the soldiers' children be penalized because the father has enlisted and gone to the war? Why should there not be a provision in the rehabilitation programme which would give an opportunity to these young people, the children of soldiers, to go to the high schools and complete the courses that the soldier father intended for them before the war?

Three years ago a return was made to an order of the house in my name showing a survey of hospital accommodation in Canada. It showed that there was not enough hospital accommodation to provide for the condition of affairs that existed three years ago. What is to be done with the heavy casualties that are occurring in Italy and other theatres of war? In the city from which I come it is hard for a civilian to get into hospital. It is true that the present minister has made some start in acquiring the east general hospital, but there will be ten or twelve times the hospital accommodation needed in that city before many days pass. I do hope that some more active proceeding on Sunnybrook will be taken regarding matters such as these.

There are some other matters which are covered by the proposed act. For some twenty years a great many deserving people have not been able to get the help they required. I agree with the policy that in making appointments to this department those who have seen overseas service during this war should receive the preference. It is true that there are in the present department a great many experienced men of other wars who should not be set aside, but as far as possible these positions should be given to returned soldiers.

I wonder if I could have the attention of the minister for a moment; after all, this is not the banking and commerce committee, and dear knows it is nearly time that committee made a report. I can wait, if necessary, but after all we are discussing perhaps the most important problem this government has to face at the present time. I have a case here of a veteran who was a forty per cent disability after the last war. I saw perhaps 350 people at his funeral, veterans of the last war and post office employees. He had two sons, one seventeen who has enlisted in the navy already, and the other a younger boy who has joined a cadet corps. His widow is very nearly helpless, but she will be turned out on the street unless something is done for her. Yet when a matter of this kind is referred to the department nothing but callous indifference is shown. I am not going to give the name, but this man's number was 348266. His policy number was 8888. I am going to send this letter to the minister for his attention. I am sorry to interrupt him; he is courteous, but I would like the minister to look into this case, because he has given every consideration to numerous matters I have referred to him.

Many matters may be dealt with in this debate. Most of them were referred to yesterday, so I need not detain the house very much longer. In passing, however, I should like to refer to the great difficulty being experienced in this country in regard to domestic help. Many of these mothers have to go out and work; others have young children at home, many of them are now with child, and they cannot get domestic help. I hope something may be done about this matter, and I propose to put a question or two on the order paper concerning it. Reference was made to this situation not long ago in Britain by Sir Edward Grigg, a great soldier who has done so much for the empire. In a recent letter to the Times he had learned from a doctor that during the previous fortnight he had attended three miscarriages—

> —for which he could find no cause but grave domestic over-strain. The mothers were young and strong. They and the children they lost were just victims of an anti-domestic mania under whose influence all-powerful officials are instructed to act as though mothers, homes and children were of no account to the nation by comparison with factories and canteens.
> Many of those officials do their utmost to help; others are hostile to domestic claims. But whether they be sympathetic or not, the result is that mothers and their children, born and unborn, are going to the wall. If race suicide is to be a national policy, firing squads would be more merciful.
> Many maternity and child welfare clinics with their voluntary helpers are also struggling against blind official indifference or discouragement. I gave a disgraceful example to the Minister of Health a short time ago. But the official sabotage of maternity goes on, more destructive than German bombs.

Then at page 375 of the National Review for last May, where reference is made to this letter, it is stated that this correspondence drew letters from many people, and the Review goes on to say:

> There was a general consensus of opinion that "something ought to be done" to relieve the over-strained mothers. But what? Mr. Bevin has from time to time let it be known that he has it in mind to organize, at some future date, a vague corps of domestic helpers. This reminds us of the little boy who pulled the wings off the flies and then, surprised that they could no longer fly, tried to stick them on again. What Mr. Bevin and his brother socialists do not know is that it is easier to pull down a social structure than to rebuild it. They are slowly acquiring this information at the expense of the community—in this particular case the price is paid in the lives of young women and their children. There is a remedy for this almost desperate situation, and that is to release from the factories and workshops the women who are finding that work too heavy for their strength and who are therefore unsatisfactory workers, wasting their own and other people's time. A recent report on absenteeism in the war factories shows that there are a great many women who stay away from work they do not like. If they were released it would not be necessary to "direct them into domestic work," they would find it for themselves either in their own families or in other people's. Once the strait-waistcoat into which women have been forced is relaxed the domestic situation will get better automatically. We may add that the women's services strain the health of all but the very robust, and that it can be of no earthly good to the country to keep young women in uniform when they are perpetually in hospital.

I believe that if an investigation were made here, as it was made in Britain, it would be found that many of the young women in the three services are in hospital or not able to carry on for a great many days during the year. The women's army services and organizations have done glorious work in this war; there is no doubt about that. They have released many men for the army, the navy and the air force, but I think this situation should be looked into by the department in view of the lack of domestic help for the families both of soldiers and civilians. I know the hospitals and rest homes throughout the country are suffering from this lack of help, and I think that situation should be remedied.

To make a long story short, the key to the whole problem lies in the choice of men to administer this department. We have had an example before us now for twenty-four years, and we hope things will be conducted differently in future. Now I believe a number of very fine returned men both on this side and the other side of the house, who have taken a great interest in this work, wish to speak on this bill, so that I shall conclude my remarks.

Mr. FRED ROSE (Cartier): Mr. Speaker, I rise to support bill No. 83 and the principle of establishing a department of veterans' affairs. This bill is vital both to the people at home and to our men now fighting overseas. Some people suggest that perhaps we are talking too much about the post-war period and the problems of rehabilitation, but I suggest that now, when our men are in action, is the time we should make them believe that we are sincerely trying to make sure that their wishes and desires, their hopes and aspirations will come true, and that we will not have a repetition of what happened after the last war. I have in my hand a book called "The Aftermath" by Right Hon. Winston S. Churchill, which I have read a number of times, particularly certain chapters. At page 16, dealing with the immediate post-war period and the men returning from the war, he said:

> The boundless hopes that had cheered the soldiers and the peoples in their tribulations died swiftly away. The vision of a sunlit world redeemed by valour, where work would be less and its recompense more, where justice and freedom reigned together through centuries of unbroken peace—that vision which had flickered over the battlefields and beckoned from behind the German or Turkish trenches, comforting the soldier's heart and fortifying his strength, was soon replaced by cold, grey reality.

And then later on:

> A cruel disillusionment was at hand for all. All men, all women, all soldiers, all citizens were looking forward to some great expansion, and there lay before them nothing but a sharp contraction.

The same sort of vision that the men in the last war had while they were in the trenches in France and Turkey is being had to-day by the men overseas. They are all looking forward to something better. They want to be sure they will come back to a Canada where they will have jobs at good pay. They are not asking for too much. But they do look forward to a Canada that will not be the same as the Canada after the last war. There must be no contraction, as Mr. Churchill said was the case after the last war. While we can discuss the affairs of the veterans it must be understood that they are connected with the whole project that we have in mind for Canada, a project that will lead to expansion instead of contraction.

This bill proposes the setting-up of a separate and strong department of veterans' affairs which shall be responsible for the care, treatment, vocational training, reemployment and reestablishment in civil life of the veterans of the armed forces and the care of their dependents now and after the war. With those principles I fully agree, but there is one proposal lacking, and that with regard to the men of the merchant navy. We hear glowing reports about their heroic deeds at sea under difficult conditions. Many of them have had their ships blown out from under them three or four times. These men should have the same guarantee given to them as is being given to the men in the armed forces. It is true that they come under some of the provisions of the Pension Act, but this is not sufficient. In his little book, "When the Boys Come Home," Mr. Senior says:

> Since merchant seamen are engaged in a normal civil vocation—presumably the one of their choice—the question of rehabilitation into civil life after the war does not arise as it does in the case of a member of the armed forces who has been taken away from his normal occupation.

That is not altogether true. Many of these men left trades to join the merchant marine believing that they were needed, believing that they were doing their patirotic duty to Canada. I do not believe it is fair to separate them as Mr. Senior has done. No doubt he means well, but at the same time it is not helping the men of the merchant marine.

We have three responsibilities to the men and women of the armed forces. First, we must realize that the war is not yet won, that hard battles are ahead and that weapons of war must be given to these men in greater and greater flow. Our second responsibility is to plan for the kind of Canada that these men hope to come back to. Third, we must set up that streamlined machinery which will guarantee civil reestablishment and jobs to the men and women returning home.

The bill now before us is a good contribution in that direction. However, in itself it is not sufficient. We must have the broadest approach to this problem facing the men and women of the armed forces because we owe them everything. In order to show the aspirations of the men in the armed forces I should like to read something of what has been proposed by the men themselves. After a lengthy discussion, a document known as the charter of the Loyal Edmonton Regiment was prepared. This charter, which was submitted to the Minister of National Defence while on tour in Italy, states:

> 1. The Canadian government has a moral responsibility for the return of the fighting forces into civilian life, with jobs.
> 2. Security and livelihood for every citizen should be assured by all means available, notably minimum wage, health and hospital insurance, and national security measures along the lines of the Beveridge plan.
> 3. A large standing army, navy and air force sufficient to meet Canada's international obligations for the maintenance of world peace should be established and the active army should be given preference there.
> 4. Out of the existing overseas army a Canadian group for attachment to the allied military occupation army should be established on a voluntary basis but maintaining Canadian identity and officered by Canadian reinforcements to be drawn from trainees.
> 5. Preparations to be made forthwith to let men waiting discharge begin trades and other training as soon as possible to obviate the necessity for purely parade square routine. Existing educational personnel and trades school staff could be used as a nucleus for this purpose.

[Mr. Rose.]

None of us knows as well as these men exactly what they want and what they expect to find in Canada once they come back, and by all means those proposals should be considered most seriously.

There are still some shortcomings in our treatment of these men which should be overcome. In this connection I agree fully with a statement made by Mr. Walter S. Woods, associate deputy minister of pensions and national health, when speaking to the Winnipeg veterans' welfare committee on March 7. He said:

> I don't think our democracy will survive another experience like the thirties. These men returning from overseas must get jobs. The man who has seen service should be given special recognition by employers.

The fulfilment of what is contained in those words of Mr. Woods is the responsibility of government and parliament, of industry and labour. All must collaborate and work together to see that it is possible to give these men a better Canada. Organized labour is collaborating with the men of the armed forces to a much greater extent, I would say, than in the last war. In the memorandum submitted on February 25, 1944, to the cabinet by the trades and labour congress there is a full section dealing with matters affecting the armed forces. They recommend better treatment, and they deal with the problem of clothing allowance and emphasize the fact that $65 is insufficient. The memorandum of the Canadian Congress of Labour submitted to the government on February 21, 1944, says this:

> The congress recommends that demobilized members of the armed forces be continued on full pay and allowances until they can be gainfully employed, and that the clothing allowance on demobilization be increased to at least $125.

Recently at a conference held in the city of Vancouver, organized labour, together with representatives from the legion, considered the problems of the returning men, the problems of the armed forces and the problems of labour, because they realize that you cannot separate one from the other.. They considered a master plan that would provide employment for the workers and for the returning men.

I want to refer especially to parents in connection with the problem of dependents and pension allowances. Since I have been in the house I have received letters from parents whose sons have been killed overseas, and in all cases the parents have been unable to get any pension whatsoever. There is one case which I particularly want to mention. Here is a man, the father of twelve minor children. His boy overseas, an air gunner, was killed. The father is blind in one eye, and has rheumatism, but he cannot get anything at all, despite the fact that it is recognized that the boy had supported the family to quite a substantial amount before he went into the forces. He sent $40 a month home to his parents, and now the family cannot get a single penny. Surely it should be possible, by an amendment to the pension act, to provide for helping the family in cases such as this. The father may earn $25 a week, but how does that help a man with twelve minor children?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): How old is the oldest child?

Mr. ROSE: Less than sixteen.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): Will my hon. friend send me the details of the case?

Mr. ROSE: I shall gladly do so.

Then there is the problem which has been mentioned by everybody, that of the clothing allowance. Organizations and individuals have all agreed that there should be an increase in the clothing allowance up to $125. I for one find it very hard to understand why $35 was ever fixed upon in the first place. It is true that it has been increased to $65, which is a step in the right direction, but it is still insufficient. I think I cannot do better to show how the men and the parents of the men in the armed forces feel about the clothing allowance than by reading this letter which appeared in the Ottawa Journal of February 29, 1944. It is as follows:

> As the mother of two boys at present in the battle of Italy, may I say one went overseas in 1940 when he was 21, the other in 1941, when he was 19. I wonder if our law makers realize that many boys like ours went overseas at the youthful age of 19, 20 or 21, still growing, and the clothing they laid aside to don their country's uniform will be outgrown, which means when they return to civilian life they will require a whole new wardrobe. How far, Mr. Law Maker, do you think the sum of $65 will go towards an overcoat, a dress-up suit, an everyday or work suit, shoes, shirts, etc., etc.,? It would not much more than buy an overcoat or one suit much less all the other articles they require.
> It is a disgrace to Canada to suggest giving these boys anything less than $200.

A number of organizations as well as individuals have asked that the clothing allowance be increased to $125. It would be good news to those now fighting overseas if the minister were to announce publicly that this question had been settled once for all and that the clothing allowance is to be $125 for all men honourably discharged from the armed forces.

I shall not take more time, Mr. Speaker. A number of other speakers have dealt with the problems of returning men, and there has been unanimity almost amongst all groups. All that we need now is action on the part of the government to make sure that our returning men will receive the finest of treatment, which is a debt we owe to them.

Mr. FREDERIC DORION (Charlevoix-Saguenay): Mr. Speaker, I am glad to give my support to this measure in favour of the veterans. I wish to draw the attention of the government to some special aspects of veterans' problems.

Mr. DORION (Translation): Mr. Speaker, I must say, at the outset, that I have had the opportunity to come into contact with the veterans of the last war and to become acquainted with them. I have had the privilege of working with them since 1918, because they did me the honour of requesting me to become their legal adviser and I was pleased to accept. I deemed it my duty to help them in their distress and to give them my assistance during the depression that affected so many people. I have known a great many veterans, as well as their wives and children. I have seen on all too many occasions, the distress undergone by those men who had brought great credit on themselves from 1914 to 1918 and who, on their return home had certainly not received the help and the support to which they were entitled. I have all too often noticed, for instance, that because a veteran was in receipt of a small monthly pension, he was denied employment opportunities, preference being given to others. He was then left to shift for himself, and he was only getting $5, $10 or $15 a month from the department of pensions. That is why, after living among them, and witnessing their distress, I cannot but support any action that may be helpful to those who are veterans of the last war and to the men who are fighting in this war.

Evidently, the legislation now before the house deserves all our support because, as I said a while ago, its purpose is to help the veterans and, in itself, it is a very good enactment. I want to add, however, that it is not sufficient, as everyone knows, to have excellent legislation—this statement is almost a truism—since the main thing consists in having the law suitably applied, and in all fairness which implies that there will be no discrimination.

Therefore, Mr. Speaker, whatever legislation we plan or pass, I submit that we will not achieve our purpose unless this act is applied fairly. We all know that it is not enough to admit the existence of certain evils, not enough to make laws allowing us to establish such facts and then pretend we are trying to improve conditions if, in truth, we do not apply the remedial measures needed to root out the anticipated evils. I would like to add that, knowing the veterans, as I said a while ago, I realize that what they ask is not so much a pension—they want no charity from the government, from individuals or from companies. Those people have their pride like other citizens, and they want the right to say like everyone that they are able to earn their living.

Obviously a wounded man, one who has lost a leg or an arm, cannot, in civilian life, render as efficient services as a physically fit man. On the other hand, it is a well-known fact that there are in our industrial plants and elsewhere all kinds of jobs which wounded or crippled war veterans could fill. Our dominion, provincial and municipal governments should pay special attention to the cases of wounded men who will return home after the war as well as those of the veterans of the last war who are still living. I am convinced that our governments could readily find, for a large number of them, jobs which would enable them to earn a decent living. Moreover, our industrialists, tradesmen, business firms and even private business men should realize the obligations that we will have to fulfill towards veterans after the war. If it is true—as has been so explicitly stated—that they have retained their possessions, that our system has stood the test, that companies and business men can continue their activities, thanks to those who have fought overseas for five years or more, and some of whom will return home wounded after enduring untold hardship, I claim that all these industrialists and business men should make it their duty to find easy work for all these crippled veterans, so they may honourable earn a living. I shall go even further and state that it is the duty of the government and the new minister who will be directing this department to organize a liaison service between the department and the industrialists and business men of the country. Thus they would be in a position to locate all positions available to veterans, and when I use this expression I mean especially the crippled veterans. The minister should undertake a thorough investigation through the whole of Canada, in order to find work for all those who have given their blood to safeguard our industries, and to preserve the institutions we enjoy at the present time. The minister should, after this comprehensive investigation, invite these industrialists and business men to offer employment for the crippled veterans.

The same pitfalls that we had to avoid after the last war may well be met again at the end of the present armed conflict. We must avoid any method based on political patronage. I am unfortunately aware that politics have often played an important part when a veteran was in need of a job. Let us avoid such partiality this time and let us make sure that every veteran shall enjoy the full measure of consideration he deserves, no matter what may be his political affiliations.

This week, Mr. Speaker, we have voted quite a considerable sum in order to provide help for the united nations. We have voted much money for that purpose during the last two years. The soldiers who are now fighting know it. The veterans of this war will remember the gifts we are making to-day. The men who have fought for five years will, on their return to this country, remind us who are now sitting in this house, of what we have done during this war, the gifts we have made. Will they not have a right to ask us to afford them a decent livelihood for themselves as well as for their wives and children? It is therefore imperative that we should now devise some plan for taking care of the large number of men who are now returning to this country and of the still larger number of those who will come back after the war.

In closing, I assure the government that I shall always regard it as a duty to collaborate with any government to help the veterans; and I hope that when good suggestions are made, even by members of the opposition, the government will not put them aside for the simple reason that they come from hon. members belonging to opposition groups.

Mr. HARRY LEADER (Portage la Prairie): Mr. Speaker, I always contend that when a man makes a public statement he should have knowledge of his subject. I was greatly interested in the speech made yesterday by the hon. member for Vancouver North (Mr. Sinclair); he spoke as a soldier, and concern for the betterment of the conditions of our soldiers after the war was the thought uppermost in his mind. I did not hear the speech made yesterday by the hon. member for Battle River (Mr. Fair), but I read part of it, and I wish to pay tribute to him for his tenacity in maintaining that the indebtedness still owing by veterans of the last war to the soldier settlement board should be cancelled. I agree with the request which was presented the other day by a delegation from a western body of soldier settlers, that these men now be presented with free title to their lands. I say that, knowing full well that there are those who would not make a success of farming if you gave them another fifty years to pay for their land. But we cannot legislate for that sort of farmer. The great majority of these men, I believe, did the best they could under very difficult circumstances. Therefore I am pleased, if it is going to help any, to support the resolution which asked for the cancellation of soldier settlers' debts and the granting of free title to these returned men.

I want to speak in this debate from my experience as a farmer. I support the legislation which has been enacted and the proposals now under consideration for the rehabilitation of returned men who must resume civil life when the war is over. As a farmer I am interested in the Veterans' Land Act; I believe that it is a good measure if properly administered. I do not think I can do better than to read some provisions of the act as contained in this little booklet called "Back to Civil Life". I quote:

The Veterans' Land Act, which is administered by a director under the Minister of Mines and Resources, gives a new meaning to the term land settlement in the rehabilitation of ex-servicemen. The main purpose of the act is to assist suitably qualified ex-servicemen to buy and own a farm to be operated on a full-time farming basis or to buy and own a rural or semi-rural home (small holding) with the main income earned from industrial or other employment in the community. To give practical effect to this purpose, the act provides:—three distinct types of establishment; that the state shall bear a substantial part of the cost of each establishment by means of a conditional grant; that each ex-serviceman assisted shall be qualified for the particular type of settlement; and that he shall pay down ten per cent of the cost of land and buildings at the time of his establishment.

For veterans who have practical experience in farm operation assistance is available to engage in farming as a full-time occupation. Encouragement will be given to sustain the "family farm" as a Canadian institution.

For veterans whose normal sphere in Canadian society is in industry or commerce or in the field of agricultural employment, provision is made for assistance to be established in a good home, with small acreage of land outside the high taxation areas. Mechanics, carpenters, masons, electricians, factory workers and white collar men may benefit. It is believed that seriously disabled veterans in receipt of substantial pensions may be especially interested in this type of semi-rural settlement.

And then there is an inducement to fishermen to follow along the same line. I quote:

Small holding (coupled with commercial fishing). For the veteran whose normal occupation is in the commercial fishing industry provision is made to assist him to purchase a comfortable home, a plot of ground and fishing equipment required for his occupation.

Let me now read the financial provisions:

The act provides a maximum of $6,000 to cover cost of land, improvements, live stock and equipment, including fishing equipment. The maximum for land and improvement is $4,800; maximum for live stock and equipment or fishing equipment, is $1,200.

As to terms of sale to qualified veterans:

At the time he makes application to purchase, the ex-serviceman must deposit in cash ten per cent of the cost of land and improvements, namely, $480. He then signs a contract to repay only two-thirds of the cost of land and buildings, or $3,200 over a period of 25 years, with interest at 3½ per cent amortized. The annual payment including principal and interest is $194.14. The entire $1,200 cost of stock and equipment, plus $1,120—the difference between the cost of land and buildings and what the veteran pays—is borne by the state. In this case the state conditional grant is $2,320 or 38 per cent of the total cost of the farm establishment.

It goes on to say that in order to take advantage of this assistance the position of the farmer must be maintained for at least ten years, and if you wish to sell or assign your property, you lose the benefits I have enumerated. Let me now read another short excerpt from these conditions:

The veteran may select his farm or small holding in any location in Canada but the farm must be such that in the opinion of the director of the act it offers reasonable opportunity for successful rehabilitation.

Here is another interesting provision I should like to read:

Provision is made for the granting of loans at 3½ per cent interest rate to veterans who own farm land and may require funds to resume farming operations. Advances not exceeding 60 per cent of the value of the land, or a maximum of $3,200, may be made to pay off a mortgage, effect improvements, or buy live stock and equipment. If an advance for live stock and equipment only is desired, the total may not exceed $2,500, or fifty per cent of the value of the land.

I have been much interested in this phase of the rehabilitation programme. Owing to circumstances over which I have no control, I have never been able to offer a word in this house in regard to these projects. I am very glad to have this opportunity to support what I think is commendable in the government's actions. About two years ago, before the act was being considered, and anticipating that I might not be back in the house for some time, I presented a submission to the minister of pensions in which I outlined my ideas of a land settlement act. I pointed out in these submissions that farmers with experience should be the only ones allowed to come under this scheme. I pointed out that returned men should have the choice of location, and that it was desirable that they should select good land in good districts. I did not think there was need of going beyond the boundaries of our organized municipalities; I believed that there was plenty of land available for the settlement of these soldiers right in our organized districts, where they could have the benefit of good roads, schools, churches, and the advantage of electricity, which goes with any properly constituted farm. I sent this submission to the minister, and he replied kindly by saying that I would find that some of the recommendations would be contained in the bill. I think perhaps that is so, although I am not taking any credit

I wish to deal with another phase of this important measure. Let me call attention to section 33 of the War Veterans' Land Act, which provides:

> No person, firm, or corporation shall be entitled to charge or collect, as against or from any other person, firm or corporation any fee or commission or advance of price for services rendered in the sale of any land made to the director whether for the finding or introducing of a buyer or otherwise.

That is contained in section 33 of the War Veterans' Land Act. Now let me read my submission in that regard, which I made to the minister:

> In my opinion, whatever measure is devised it should be administered in cooperation with the provinces and the municipalities. Especially, I would say, the municipalities. Municipal officials could keep on file a list of the lands available for resettlement, location, price per acre and other information required by the land inspectors. This information kept on file in the municipal office would tend to speed up transfers and guarantee a better deal for all concerned.

I added:

> I am sure that you will agree with me that the legislation proposed should not be enacted as a relief for the mortgage holders, either corporate or private, but for the reestablishment of our returned men in happy homes after their release from army life.

That was my attitude at that time, and I still adhere to it.

I was interested in receiving a short time ago a notice from a real estate firm stating that a meeting had been held by the Canadian association of real estate boards in Niagara Falls and that a committee had been appointed to interview the government and that a resolution had been submitted. I shall read the resolution:

> Be it therefore resolved, that the members of the Canadian association of real estate boards in session at Niagara Falls, Ontario, this fifth day of April, 1944, petition the Right Honourable W. L. Mackenzie King, Prime Minister of Canada: that section 33 of the War Veterans' Land Act be amended by adding the words "save and except to a duly licensed real estate operator," thereby permitting real estate agents to deal for remuneration in all lands required in this connection.

It will be noted that this resolution emphasizes the words "save and except." If this resolution were given effect to, that one body would have the sole right to buy this land for the soldier settlement board. That seems to me to be bordering on a monopoly. I do not think that any association should have the right to be the sole agents of any company. Especially am I against any action of this kind being taken by the government. Our returned men will be coming back after offering their all in our defence and in the defence of our homes and families. Here is an association asking for their pound of flesh in securing lands for their rehabilitation. I know that the government has not granted any rights to any real estate agent or association. I want to bring this forward to the minister and to the government and to tell them that I support them in the action they have taken so far. I hope that they will not weaken. I do not want to be taken as being antagonistic to any legitimate business. I believe the business of real estate dealers is legitimate and that there is a place for them in this country; but in this one particular where we are fighting for proper treatment of our returned men I do not believe that this association should get its finger in this particular pie.

Now I wish to deal with another phase of the land act which I mentioned a while ago, namely, small holdings. These small holdings would be secured adjacent to industrial centres. I believe the provision is an excellent one. I believe that the families will be all the better off in a semi-rural home and surroundings, but I am thinking of how it will affect returned men from western Canada who have volunteered and offered everything. As the house knows, in western Canada, and particularly in the prairie provinces, industries are conspicuous by their absence. We hear a good deal these days about the decentralization of industry. I think that it is long past due. If we are to have a balanced economy, both east and west and in our country as a whole, we must have industries in the prairie provinces. Very few industries are located there at the present time. The hon. member for Davenport (Mr. MacNicol) has contended that thus far the industries of eastern Canada have not been fair to western Canada—and I hope I am not misquoting him. Along with many other hon. members I agree in that. We have had industries in western Canada but they were subsidiaries of the big industries in the east. They came out to further their own business. They established industries or assembly plants in different cities throughout western Canada when times were good. But when we had the depression period in the thirties, most of those industries—and I know whereof I speak, because this is exactly what happened in Portage la Prairie; I could enumerate several of them—closed down because business was not good and they went back to the parent company. Some of the employees who were raised in the west went back with them. We lost not only the industries themselves but part of our population. I think that government measures should be enacted which would compel, if not those parent industries which I mentioned, other industries, to establish themselves in the west. If that is done, if we have industries in our cities or larger or smaller towns where a returned man can get a job and have his family living in a semi-rural district, this provision dealing with small holdings will be all to the good. But if that is not done, farmers from western Canada who want to establish themselves in a rural home adjacent to an industrial centre will not be able to do so and they will go back east. I do not think that is good for Canada. I think it militates against the interests of the whole country.

I did not intend to take up much of the time of the house, but in conclusion may I say that no government policy can bring the desired result without the whole-hearted co-operation of the returned men themselves. I think that these men must have the will to win and the desire to work. I believe if they have these two requisites that we shall establish them in happy homes throughout Canada, with benefit to the whole country. I hope that these men will not come back and find their interests unprotected. As the hon. member for Vancouver North (Mr. Sinclair) said yesterday, a political promise is not going to satisfy these men who have offered their lives in our defence; they want these promises redeemed. After reading the different provisions in the Veterans' Land Act and the other measures which have been passed by the government, I feel confident that the government have the best intentions in the world and that our returned men are going to be established in the country to which they belong.

Mr. J. A. ROSS (Souris): I have always urged that all veterans' affairs should be handled under one department. I think it is fitting that while our thoughts and our prayers are very much for the welfare of our men and women now engaged in the invasion and liberation of overrun Europe, and, yes, of their dependents, we at home in this parliament should be giving consideration to bill No. 83, an act to create a Department of Veterans' Affairs.

First of all I should like to endorse the remarks of the hon. member for Vancouver North (Mr. Sinclair) and the hon. member for Hastings-Peterborough (Mr. White) with respect to this measure. I should like also to concur in what was said by the hon. member for Battle River (Mr. Fair) with respect to titles to the land of settlers under the old soldier settlement board. I think the great problem is going to be the matter of rehabilitation; and as has been stated on different occasions, I know of no better lift that could be given to the morale of the men who are now fighting than an assurance by the government that we are now planning on how properly to rehabilitate and reestablish them in civil life when they return.

The minister has pointed out that up to the present some 135,000 men have been discharged, while another minister has stated that so far only some 3,000 have taken vocational training. That is a very small percentage, and I think is proof of the fact that the allowances are not sufficient to enable these discharged men to take the training they would like to get. On several occasions I have pointed out that I thought the insurance principle should apply to those on active service anywhere. That should be our basic principle. I have said also that the pre-enlistment physical condition of a man or woman for all future purposes should be considered to be that obtaining at the time of acceptance by the armed services. That would make it much simpler for the officials of this board to carry on its administration. On several occasions I have asked that the widow of a soldier who received a pension of less than fifty per cent should be entitled to hospitalization and medical care on the same basis as the widow of a veteran receiving a war veteran's allowance. Yesterday the hon. member for Vancouver North very ably pointed out the difficulty experienced by many young wives, with their little families, in getting along under somewhat harassing conditions while their men are away fighting for all the worth-while things we in this land enjoy. I believe a great deal of consideration is due these young women and their families.

There is also the matter of the $65 clothing allowance, which I think everyone will agree is not nearly sufficient to equip properly a man who is discharged after having seen service for several years. There is also the matter of the Sparkman Act. I believe Canada should have had similar legislation to protect the legal rights of the men serving in the armed forces. If that had been done it would have been much simpler to rehabilitate many of these men who are carrying on under many handicaps in the matter of life insurance and other obligations which they are not able to discharge with the remuneration they are receiving. I say that instead of leaving this matter of legal protection to the various provincial legislatures a measure should have been passed by this federal parliament, or it could have been handled under the War Measures Act.

Something has been said already about land settlement by veterans. The hon. member for Portage la Prairie (Mr. Leader) quoted from the little green booklet dealing with that subject. I do not know whether or not he entirely agreed that the matter was sufficiently covered, but I was privileged to be a member of the committee which dealt with the Veterans' Land Settlement Act. It was a very interesting committee, and many worth-while recommendations were advanced. On one point I do agree with the hon. member for Portage la Prairie; that is, that commissions should not be paid to real estate men. I agree that these people have a rightful place in this country, but I have some recollections of personal experiences under the soldier settlement board following the last war, when, I am sorry to say, many of these soldiers were settled on submarginal land. I have tried to point out, as have many other hon. members of that committee, that every possible safeguard should be adopted so that we shall not make that same mistake again.

A little booklet entitled "Back to Civil Life" sets out the three types of establishments under the Veterans' Land Act. They are for the full-time farmer; for urban and other workers desiring small homes near their employment, and for commercial fishermen. Provision is made for a government grant of $2,320 on land and buildings costing $4,800 and stock and equipment costing $1,200, with loans to ex-service personnel owning farms and repayment over twenty-five years at 3½ per cent. Briefly that sets out the three forms in which this land settlement may be carried on. I believe this is a very worth-while act, because I do not know of any occupation in which a man can better quiet his nerves and raise a young family than in farming, under proper conditions.

If I may be permitted I should like to refer to what I said in discussing the Veterans' Land Act on July 20, 1942, as reported at page 4386 of Hansard:

> As has been stated, it was the purpose of the dominion government to provide a measure of financial assistance to veterans, upon their performance of the prescribed settlement conditions, in order to permit of their engaging in agricultural pursuits, either as a full-time occupation or as a part-time job coupled with some other employment.

[Mr. J. A. Ross.]

May I say at the beginning that if it were not for the fact that I have some faith in the future, and a hope that agricultural parity will eventually be established in Canada, I would not have been able to support the bill even in principle. In the great nation to the south of us, the United States, there has been parity between agricultural and other products for a year now, and under the Washington wheat agreement of June 27, 1942, signed by the Argentine, Australia, Canada, the United Kingdom and the United States, the representatives of these nations have recognized the basis of a parity price for wheat which will return a fair remuneration to the producers as well as being fair to the consumer. On the basis of these agreements, and having regard to what has been done in the United States, I think we may hope that we are doing these settlers justice by establishing them on the land, because we hope that they will be able to carry on under parity prices, in the future at any rate. As I say, if it were not for that hope I for one could not have supported the bill.

This bill is distinctive. It is different from the soldier settlement act, both in name and in principle. It provides for the granting of a loan, and refers to ex-service men as veterans rather than settlers. In connection with section 5 of the act, I have felt some concern because in the early years, under the old act establishing the soldier settlement board, the municipal authorities had very many difficulties owing to tax arrears. I remember our western municipal union executive having to make trips to Ottawa on several occasions to have these difficulties ironed out. I am happy to say this was taken care of under section 5, which reads:

> "5. The main purpose is to establish the legal entity and corporate powers of the director."

Then at page 4387 I said:

> A great difficulty under the old soldier settlement board was that the authorities allowed these settlers to settle on a great amount of submarginal land. We cannot take too many precautions to prevent a repetition of settlement even in small numbers on submarginal lands, because it is detrimental both to the settler and to the country as a whole. We must guard against that at any cost. I should like to recommend that to avoid such difficulties our regional or provincial advisory committee should include a provincial soil expert from the university of that province, a representative of each provincial municipal organization of the province—because I do not know of any organization which would be more interested than the municipality in which the settler is placed—and a member of the provincial command of the Canadian Legion. Without their approval no settler should be settled on any land.

I believe the approval of a soil expert is most important, because the vast majority of the difficulties under the old settlement board came about as a result of the settlement of submarginal lands. In most provinces, certainly in the three prairie provinces, much has been accomplished during the past few years in connection with soil surveys by the experts of the provincial governments, and I believe any settlement under this scheme certainly should be guided by the findings of these surveys. It is all-important in connection with any land settlement scheme that these men should be placed upon the very best land available. In making his statement on this bill the minister said:

> The Department of Soldiers' Civil Reestablishment was responsible for many services in connection with the placement of discharged men in civil life with one definite exception, that of land settlement, which was placed under the Minister of the Interior. The measure to be based upon this resolution will place both the Veterans' Land Act and the other soldier settlement system under the Department of Veterans' Affairs. That was one of the recommendations hon. gentlemen will recall that was made to this house by the same select committee which studied the question of land settlement and which was responsible for the amendments to the Veterans' Land Act adopted by the house at that time.

I want to compliment the minister upon making a step in the right direction, upon doing something for which many of us have asked for many years. Let me repeat that I think it is all to the good that all veteran matters are included in the one department.

As has been pointed out in other arguments, probably the minister does not have his own way in these matters. It has been stated that the great difficulty in this matter, as in many others, rests with the treasury board. It has been pointed out that of the six members of the treasury board, only one is an ex-service man. It has been very difficult to get matters through the treasury board, but I trust that those people and the government will realize that they owe—I was going to say a debt of gratitude, but it is not a debt of gratitude—something which is due to the service man as a right, that they owe him proper rehabilitation and reestablishment after the war.

These service men made the worth-while things of life possible for us all. In many cases their wives and children have undergone hardship quite apart from having to put in many years without the guidance and assistance of the good husband and father. I know the government will be supported by the people of this country in the proper spending of money for the rehabilitation, reestablishment and general welfare of these people and their dependents.

Mr. A. W. NEILL (Comox-Alberni): Mr. Speaker, yesterday the hon. member for Vancouver North (Mr. Sinclair) in speaking on this bill expressed satisfaction at the consolidation of various departments into one. He said he was heartily in favour of that and then he went on to say:

> Nothing is more disheartening to persons seeking information or help from the government than to be passed from department to department.

He said that now he would be able to go to this one department, go to one man so to speak, in order to deal with any soldier troubles. I heartily endorsed his belief in that expression. I, too, thought what a beautiful thing it would be to be able to go to just one man, whether you wished to take up the case of a soldier wanting to get out of the army, a soldier who wanted a pension, or a soldier who wanted to be buried. No matter what it was in connection with the returned man, it could be dealt with in one place. However, I am afraid the hon. member for Vancouver North is due for disillusionment as I was. That is not the picture as it now presents itself.

On May 30 I wrote to the department about a man's case. Like many other cases, there were several things to be taken up. There was the question of pension, for one thing, as well as other matters. It had been stated that this man had been discharged as being unable to meet required military physical standards. This man had suffered considerably in Sicily, Algeria and Africa; he had been wounded and had contracted a serious disease. The man's wife or somebody thought that was a rather cold way to treat him, to discharge him as being unable to come up to the military requirements. There was some other stuff like that.

It was stated also that while in a mental hospital he had been asked to sign a discharge which contained as a condition the release of the government from all liability. That did not make sense to me. I do not believe that such things are true, but those were among the things I took up with the department. I got a letter back from the pension commission dealing with the pension angle and saying that they would try to get me replies to the questions which were outside the province of the pension commission. I got another letter a fortnight later which dealt with the pension case, but dismissed the rest of the matters with this language:

> The other questions referred to in your letter are matters which come under the jurisdiction of the Department of National Defence.

So that I have to begin all over again the weary trail of discovering which of these gentlemen is the man to deal with, which is the man to put the matter before and have it pushed along. Some of them are not too ready to exert themselves too much to push matters along unless they are exactly down their own alleys. A couple of years ago I wrote to an official about a certain matter. I said, "Possibly this does not come immediately within your jurisdiction, but, if not, would you be kind enough to send it along to the offiicial whose business it is?" It was all in the one department. He wrote back after a time—I lived three thousand miles away—and said. "The person to whom to address your letter is Colonel So-and-so and you had better do that."

When I came to Ottawa I found out that Colonel So-and-so was not only an official in the same branch, his office was not only in the same building, his office was not only on the same floor, but was in the same corridor as the office of the gentleman who had written to me about this urgent matter to tell me to take it up with Colonel So-and-so. I hope that there will be a marked improvement in this condition. I hope that in its operation it will turn out better than it seems to be.

When some other matters were up the other day and we asked some questions we were told that the matters would be taken care of in the regulations. I am not so sure just what the regulations will contain, and I should like to deal with this aspect of the matter for a moment. Section 7 of the bill states:

> Subject to the approval of the governor in council, the minister may make such regulations, from time to time, as he may deem necessary and advisable.

Then follows a couple of pages outlining the subjects to be covered by regulations. We must admit that most bills require a section of that kind. For convenience in carrying them out most bills must grant the power to make regulations. A man once said: "Let me write the songs of a nation and I care not who writes its laws." I would paraphrase that and say, "Let me make the regulations, and I care not who makes the bill." It is quite possible under that power to make a new bill and largely vitiate the original one. There seems to be a trend to pass a sort of skeleton bill—

Mr. GRAYDON: It is more than a trend.

Mr. NEILL: I am always moderate in my language and I want to give the government the benefit of the doubt. The first time it is a mistake; the next time it is an accident, and the third time it is a habit. It has become a habit to pass a sort of skeleton bill which readily goes through the house because we are in a hurry to go home. When we ask about things we are told that they will be fixed up in the regulations. Then, when the regulations come down we find that substantially a new bill has been introduced. I am thinking, for instance, of the Old Age Pensions Act. By means of regulations they created practically a new bill, and that sort of thing is going on all the time.

By whom are the regulations made? They are made by the officials. We do not suppose that the minister sits down and makes them because he has a lot of other things to do. Officials are apt to get into a rut. The way it works out is that these regulations contain perhaps the minister's ideas, perhaps the deputy minister's ideas and then the ideas of some of the officials. The great temptation is for the officials to draw up the regulations in such a way that they will be convenient to carry out. I have been a government official myself and I know my instinct was to stall off the man who wrote me the first letter.

There is another department—it is not the minister's—where they are definitely inclined to draw up regulations that will be convenient to carry out rather than to meet the interests of business or of the common people. There is no control over these regulations. Of course it will be said that I am quite wrong, that they have to be laid on the table within fifteen days after they are made if parliament is then sitting, and, if not, then within fifteen days after the commencement of the next ensuing session. But have we any control over that? Not at all. They are to be laid on the table. Last session we left here at the beginning of August and came back at the end of January, and any orders in council passed during that interval remained more or less unobtainable by us until we came back here in January. The section says that they shall be laid on the table within fifteen days if parliament is then sitting. We seem to be sitting a great portion of the time, and one might think we can get these orders in council. This "laid on the table" has a wonderful sound to our constituents. It sounds almost as if it were laid on our breakfast tables. But that is not at all what it means. It may mean nothing. The Minister of Pensions and National Health was kind enough yesterday, when he brought down his order in council, to lay it on the table and to give orders, quite without legal justification so far as I know, that it should be printed at once, and I got a copy of it a couple of hours ago. That was very fine. But ordinarily when an order in council is laid on the table it is sent down to Mr. Boulet's office and you can go down there and see it. Ordinarily only one copy of it is made, although in some cases there are two copies, and you can keep one of those copies for twenty-four hours. Then Mr. Boulet's staff telephones you and says that somebody else wants it. It is true that you can demand a copy, but there is only one solitary stenographer in that office and there are 245 members of the house, and if only half of them asked for a copy it would be a big order for one stenographer. Are we to put on extra staff for that?

The other day I asked for an order in council that had been passed. It consisted of forty typewritten foolscap pages, and I had not the audacity to ask that one girl to sit down and copy those forty pages, with perhaps Mr. Jones coming along the next minute and asking for another copy. I said to myself that this order in council must be available in a certain department and perhaps I can get a copy from the minister. I was told by an obliging secretary that I could, but he telephoned later and said he was sorry that only six copies had been made and I could not get one. Suppose half of us had wanted a copy of that forty-page order in council. Laying it on the table is more or less—I will not say it is a farce, but it is unworkable, so far as being available to the members.

The minister of pensions was kind enough to order this particular order in council printed, which he had no legal authority to do, and we have all got it. He has done a grand thing. The principle is sound. He has wiped out all orders in council which have been passed in days gone by and has made a new record. We can now study it and when an ex-soldier comes along we shall be able to discuss the section that refers to him. But it should be arranged, so to speak, that we can get copies of orders in council and get them readily. Even if we have the orders in council, perhaps we do not like the look of them. They have not been passed by this house and perhaps we may feel like kicking. Surely the government has some control. I say without hesitation that these regulations are more comprehensive and more difficult to handle than the bill itself. Is there any control? Oh, yes, there is control because the minister has to get them passed by council. That means the cabinet. I never was in the cabinet, but I have a vague idea that each member of the government has his own troubles and when he brings down regulations and places them before the council the others are not going to oppose his regulations for fear he might do the same to theirs. There is no parliamentary control.

Most of these things happening nowadays have happened before. I want to read a short paragraph from the London Daily Mail, which has the same credence perhaps as its namesake in Toronto, possibly more. The article is headed "Stop on Delegated Legislation", and reads:

> The British government's acceptance of a check on delegated legislation will be welcomed by the country.
> Delegated legislation is, of course, the system under which general laws are made—

Like this one here.

> —and the details left to be filled in by the departments in the form of orders and regulations.
> The new check is to take the form of a scrutinizing committee, which will examine every order and, if necessary, report on it to parliament. It will then be for members to take what action they think fit.
> It would be wrong to regard this move as a victory for legislature over the executive. Both, under the crown, form the government of the country.
> We may look upon it as just one more example of how the British unwritten constitution, "broadening down from precedent to precedent," is elastic enough always to serve the needs of the times.

That is just where we fall down. We are too prone to statute legislation, to passing laws that do not work. We ought to have a scrutinizing committee applying not only to these regulations but to all regulations. I submit that to the minister and to the government. I am quite certain that it will not be accepted because they never do. It would be too much for them to yield to democracy as against bureaucracy.

There is another phase. Be the regulations good, bad or indifferent, there is one thing we ought to know about them, and know quickly. We ought to know what they are and when they come into effect. That we can achieve by an amendment to the bill. What publicity do they get? Subsection 2 of section 7 says:

> All regulations made hereunder approved by the governor in council shall be laid before parliament within fifteen days after they are made if parliament is then sitting, and if not, then within fifteen days after the commencement of the next ensuing session thereof.

The next ensuing session is a long time away, and if the house is not sitting the regulations are practically unobtainable. The only publicity apparently is to lay them on the table. I might put in a modest kick right here. I do not know if I should, because he is a good friend of mine, but I should like to know why the hon. member for York-Sunbury (Mr. Hanson) enjoys the privilege which I do not have of getting an advance copy of the regulations. He said on June 14 that the minister had been kind enough to send him a copy, "since the house began its session this afternoon". I have great respect for the hon. member's legal erudition and his ability to handle these matters, but for that very reason he is not entitled to any more privilege than I am in this matter because I have not his legal mind and so on, and people in the far corner of the house and myself are therefore entitled to get the information before him. Why should he get it twenty-four hours before we get it?

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I think it is only fair to the minister for me to say that I asked him for a copy because I had heard his radio broadcast.

Mr. NEILL: Then I here and now ask the minister and all the other ministers to send me a copy of all orders in council as soon as they are passed, beginning from this day on.

I give the minister notice that I am going to move an amendment when the bill comes into committee. I have it here, and he can think it over. If he does not like one, he is open to accept the other. I suggest the following:

That section 7, subsection 2, be amended by adding at the end of it the following words: "That such regulations immediately on being approved by the governor in council shall be printed or mimeographed in sufficient numbers to provide a copy for each member of parliament and for such bodies of veterans or individuals representing veterans as shall apply for a copy."

I do not want to put the government to any great expense; they have only to print or mimeograph a few hundred copies and let interested people get them. If the minister does not like that, I suggest this amendment:

That such recommendations immediately on being approved by the governor in council shall be printed in the next issue of the Canada Gazette.

It would not cause a great deal of expense to print these once so that everybody—lawyer, soldier and everyone else—would know exactly where to go to find them. A lot of these pension cases are handled by members of parliament who are not lawyers—

Mr. REID: That is to their credit.

Mr. NEILL: —and who have not a legal library; also by legion secretaries, who, too, are not legal men; and when they get a regulation or amendment, for instance, that order in council No. 4978 is amended by striking out the words "and when" in the third line and substituting "together also," they are supposed to know all about it. But where is that order in council which is to be amended? They have not got it, they do not know where to get it. If they write to the clerk of the privy council he replies, "I cannot tell you unless you give me the date," because these orders are kept according to the dates. It has been suggested that there is no occasion to make all this fuss. I wrote to the department, and they were kind enough to explain how these orders in council are circulated. They said that they were laid on the table; that was one thing; and then they stated that they were also expressed in what they called "press releases"; that these were taken up by the press quite generally and printed, and that, therefore, we could get our information in that manner. But we all know, even though our knowledge of press work is extremely superficial, that a newspaper man cannot go into the whole thing; he cannot record the entire order, and if he puts in less than the whole he is providing only a summary. He may leave out some important stipulation which changes the whole situation as regards some particular case. I have received some of these press releases, and have seen them in the newspapers. They lack definiteness.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): They are mere propaganda.

Mr. NEILL: No; they are not propaganda, but they are just a brief, sketchy summary. Here is how one reads:

Honourable Ian Mackenzie, Minister of Pensions and National Health, to-day tabled in the House of Commons three orders in council—

There is no date.

—dealing with veterans' affairs.

Then it goes on to say:

The first order—

Which is the first order? There are three, and he does not name them.

—substantially increases the maintenance allowance.

That is a grand thing, but these people want to know, when? And what is the answer? A man comes in and says, "How much more does my wife get under this order in council"? I do not know which order in council it is. It is the "first one" referred to in this release, and it "substantially increases" the allowance, but I cannot tell him by how much. Other releases are along the same lines. They are very good and interesting, and to people who have no immediate personal interest in the subject they provide a general outline. But what the man who is trying to do something for the returned soldier and what the returned soldier himself wants to know is, exactly where he is at, and he can find that out only if the order in council is put in such language, right in front of him, that he will know where he stands.

I believe there is a rule regarding the drawing up of bills that you have to put an explanation on the right-hand side of the page. If a section is to be amended, it is not sufficient to say, "strike out the words 'so-and-so' in the third line and put something else in"; you have to quote the whole section to which it refers. You can then read what the old section was and learn what the bill proposes to do; you have the whole thing in a nutshell. But with these orders in council you have to go back and look for other orders to find out what the amendments mean. I have one here, upon which I commented as follows:

I refer to P.C. . . .

So-and-so.

It would be only possible for a man having the original Pension Act and all the subsequent amendments to dope out what is meant by this P.C. To begin with the original Pension Act and look through every amendment since then . . .

It was passed, I think, in 1919 and was incorporated later in the Revised Statutes of 1927. You have to have every one of those statutes in front of you and then see if the particular section has been amended. It is quite a job, and it has to be done every time there are references to the order in council.

For instance, subsection (d) refers to something provided in subsection 10 of section 22 of the Pension Act. There is no subsection 10 of section 22 of the original Pension Act as passed in 1919. Therefore, one has to look through every amendment that has been made to the Pension Act from that time—

Twenty-five years ago.

—until now to find out when this subsection 10 was enacted.

It would be quite a job for a competent lawyer, and utterly impossible for a man who has not access to all these amendments and has no legal training.

What I suggest is that we follow the example which we are compelled to adopt in bringing in a bill, namely that when an order in council is passed dealing with any matter and amending another order in council, the previous order in council be set down there in black and white so that it will be seen what the proposed amendment is. Does that not suggest itself as a common-sense proposal? It would greatly expedite the work of members of parliament, secretaries of boards of trade, secretaries of the legion, and many a man who does a lot of unpaid work trying to push through soldiers' cases. Some of these cases require only an explanation; others require adjustments. If we made this work so much easier it would not cost anybody anything and it would certainly facilitate the labours of everybody connected with soldiers' cases. In this way, when an order in council was passed, we would see what it really meant, and not that it just meant striking out the first three words on line seven or something of that kind. I hope the minister will give way on this point, and on the other matter I suggested. I was going to move, when the bill goes to the committee, either that these regulations be printed in the Canada Gazette, or that a few printed or mimeographed copies should be made. I am sure that this would facilitate the work of the department, and I am equally sure that that is what he wants—to make his department work with the greatest ease, not only for the benefit of the soldiers but for the sake of himself and the various officials of his department.

Mr. W. F. KUHL (Jasper-Edson): Mr. Speaker, I believe this is the stage at which it is usual and customary to consider the fundamental principles involved in any bill under discussion. While I am concerned, of course, about the details of the bill, I wish at this time to occupy a few minutes in considering the fundamentals and the objectives which are involved in it. The explanatory note indicates that its object is the reestablishment in civil life of ex-members of the armed forces and of persons otherwise engaged in pursuits relating to the war, and for the care of the dependents of such persons. The object is the reestablishment in civil life of these various persons mentioned.

I have listened to all the speeches which have been made thus far, and I have been endeavouring to ascertain what, in the minds of hon. members who have spoken, constitutes reestablishment and upon what premise reestablishment is based. I think it is conceded by all that the success of any undertaking, whether it be on the part of a government or on the part of an individual, is dependent upon the soundness of the premise upon which the action is based. I should like to examine into the soundness of the premise that has been laid down or suggested by practically all hon. members who have thus far spoken. What is to be the means by which members of the armed forces, and those who have done their share in the war industries and in industries related to the war effort, are to be reestablished? What is the means suggested by hon. members thus far for reestablishment? I would say that in every case hon. members have implied and stated that the means to reestablishment is employment, jobs, full employment. Every member in turn who has thus far spoken has repeatedly stated that reestablishment of members of the armed forces and of others is dependent upon providing jobs and employment for them.

At this stage of our economic history and life it is imperative that we make absolutely sure we recognize, in contemplated action, a sound premise, and I wish to put the question to hon. members who have spoken, to the government, to the minister and to those who are still to speak: Is employment, jobs for all, full employment a sound premise upon which to base any proposal?

First of all, before we can even intelligently discuss the subject we must have an understanding of what is involved in full employment. I would ask hon. members, when they say that we must have jobs for all, that we must have full employment, that we must have employment for everyone, exactly what do they mean by that term? All intelligent discussion commences with a definition of terms, and we shall make no progress in this house or anywhere else until we define our terms. I have put this question on previous occasions in this house, asking hon. members, when they discuss the question of full employment, to indicate what they have in mind with regard to that term, and I have not heard anyone so far define the term "full employment". We see the term used in newspaper editorials and articles published everywhere these days: "Our objective in the post-war world must be full employment." But I have not yet seen anyone indicate what he understands by full employment. Do those who have suggested full employment as the objective mean that none of the people of Canada, the armed forces and those in civilian life, shall enjoy the standard of living they ought to enjoy at this stage in our economic history, unless they put in eight or ten or twelve hours of work a day? Is that what hon. members understand by the term "full employment"? I should like to hear them indicate so.

Will they suggest that it is impossible for the people of Canada to enjoy a high standard of living unless they put in eight or ten or twelve hours a day? I should like to hear a commitment on the part of the minister, or of the government, or of hon. members, or of anyone else who discusses the subject, whether that is what they believe. We ought to know. It is imperative that we should know what they understand by that term. Or do those who suggest full employment as the means to reestablishment mean by that term that no one is entitled to live unless he puts in eight or ten or twelve hours a day? Is that what they understand by the term "full employment"? Or do hon. members understand by that term that the people of Canada shall not be obliged to do any more work than what the machines are unable to do? Or, to put it another way: Do hon. members believe that full employment means that the people of Canada shall be permitted to enjoy all the production of Canada up to the limit of their desire to consume? It is imperative that we have some discussion of that aspect because it is fundamental to the question under discussion at the moment and to all similar questions.

This question arises again and again. There is scarcely a department that is considered in this house in reference to which the question does not come up. The hon. member for Vancouver North (Mr. Sinclair) said some excellent things yesterday, and he is well aware of that fact, for he said:

> Therefore our entire programme of rehabilitation should be based on the assumption that adequate employment will be available. If that is not so, our programme of rehabilitation will be nothing but a programme of glorious relief, with a little training thrown in to pass the time away.

I do not think one needs to be a prophet to say that that is exactly what is going to happen. The present government had five years prior to the war in which to find jobs for all, and our friends the Conservatives had a term of five years in which to endeavour to find jobs for all, and they both failed miserably.

Mr. FRASER (Peterborough West): During a great depression.

Mr. KUHL: Do not pass the buck. The same was true in every other country. The same conditions obtained elsewhere.

Mr. FRASER (Peterborough West): And there was unemployment in every country of the world.

Mr. KUHL: If I allow the hon. member to pass the buck to other countries he will finally end by blaming some other planet—Mars or some other planet—for the ills of this world. Where will he stop? I have discussed this question in the past and, though I dislike repetition as much as any other hon. member, I must say that there is no indication on the part of the government or of the majority of members that they recognize what I regard as the truths in connection with this subject. And until that is done I intend to keep on repeating ad infinitum, ad nauseam.

The hon. member for Vancouver North, as do most other hon. members in this house, made a statement which implied that it is the duty, the obligation of industry to employ people. I think one of the strongest proponents of that philosophy in this house is the hon. member for Davenport (Mr. MacNicol), but he has plenty of company. The statement is made that it is the duty of industry, the obligation of industry, to employ people. I wish to challenge that position.

Mr. MacNICOL: My hon. friend would not understand what industry is, much less employment.

Mr. KUHL: The hon. member—

Mr. MacNICOL: I am not a preacher; I could not go and make a speech in a church; but I do know a lot about industry, having spent twenty-five years in it.

Mr. JOHNSTON (Bow River): You have said that a lot of times.

Mr. KUHL: That is all the hon. member knows.

Mr. MacNICOL: It needs to be said a lot of times to get something into the hon. member's head.

Mr. JOHNSTON (Bow River): Do not pat yourself on the back.

Mr. MacNICOL: I do not need to pat myself on the back; I have done things.

Mr. JOHNSTON (Bow River): If you sit there and listen to things you will get along much better.

Mr. KUHL: All the hon. member knows is that which he has seen inside his own little shop.

Mr. JAQUES: You have not done it all.

Mr. KUHL: To come back to the subject—

Mr. JAQUES: If you are willing to learn a little—

Mr. MacNICOL: It was not a little shop.

Mr. KUHL: The hon. gentleman had five years in which to do something.

Mr. MacNICOL: I did a lot in those five years.

Mr. KUHL: He failed miserably as far as employing people is concerned. The hon. gentleman has made the statement again and again that he is a great employer of people. I want to tell him that if that is the premise upon which he runs his business he may be a good philanthropist, but he is a poor business man. No business man operates his business for the sake of hiring people. Let him put that in his pipe and smoke it.

Mr. MacNICOL: The only person my hon. friend has ever employed was likely someone to run a lawn-mower.

Mr. KUHL: The only reason the hon. member ever hired any man was to make the greatest possible profit for himself.

Mr. SPEAKER: The argument should be addressed to the Chair.

Mr. KUHL: The point I am endeavouring to make, Mr. Speaker, is that we must have a sound understanding of what constitutes a sound premise, and unless we base our actions on sound premises we shall get nowhere; we shall end up in chaos. I am satisfied we are not going to be helped by any such measure as this so long as it is predicated on the assumption of employment. I repeat that a large number of hon. members assume that it is the duty of industry to employ people. I say that I challenge that position. It never was the duty of industry to employ man-power.

Mr. MITCHELL: What is its duty?

Mr. KUHL: The only sensible, sane and sound function of industry is to produce goods, and that alone, whether it takes man-power or not.

Mr. SPEAKER: Order. I have been looking through the bill that is before the house. I wish the hon. member would refer me to the section of the bill which deals with unemployment; I cannot find it.

Mr. KUHL: Mr. Speaker, the relevancy is this. The bill proposes to reestablish ex-members of the armed forces and others. It has been indicated by all hon. members thus far that the means of reestablishment in civil life is to be employment. I am endeavouring to indicate that if that is the only means to be used to reestablish ex-members of the armed forces and others we are going to fail in achieving our objective. That is the relevancy. I was saying that I challenge the statements and the proposition that it is the duty of industry to employ ex-members of the armed forces or anyone else. I said that the only logical function of industry is to produce the greatest possible quantity of goods and services with the least amount of work and trouble. I challenge anyone to refute the soundness of that premise.

Mr. MacNICOL: Nobody will be bothered answering.

Mr. KUHL: Because the hon. member has no answer; it is too sound, that is why.

Mr. FRASER (Peterborough West): It is not a question of duty; it is a question of consumption after it is produced.

Mr. KUHL: The hon. gentleman is learning fast. He is much more advanced than the hon. member for Davenport in that respect. I grant what the hon. member has indicated, and we in this corner have pointed out on innumerable occasions that the problem which will confront the nation in the post-war world is not one of finding employment for the ex-service men or any others, but one of distribution. We did not have the problem of production prior to the outbreak of the war. There were goods on every hand and the shelves were filled up with them. There were ample supplies of every commodity. The problem we were faced with was one of distribution. That will be much more the case when the war is over. That is the problem to which both the government and the official opposition ought to be directing their attention. Thus far in this bill as well as in others the only means of distribution which has been suggested is employment of people. The term used is, "work-creating jobs". I am endeavouring to point out that the distribution of goods which will be available in Canada after the war can not be accomplished by providing employment; for in the first place I say it is impossible, and in the second place I say it is undesirable.

I wish to put one or two figures on the record, particularly for the benefit of the hon. member for Davenport and of all others who think like him, with regard to the situation that confronts us in industry. I have repeatedly made the statement that we are living at a stage in our economic history in which the power machine has displaced human labour to the point where the number of hours of work necessary to produce a high standard of living in Canada is far less than what is indicated by most people to-day. Most people to-day think in terms of working an eight-hour day. The fact of the matter is that the substitution of solar energy for human energy has taken place to such a point that the number of hours necessary to produce a high standard of living could be much less than eight hours a day.

Mr. SPEAKER: I have directed the attention of the hon. member to the fact that we are dealing with a bill to reestablish soldiers, and I asked him the degree of relevancy he attributed to the remarks he made in regard to employment. He is now going farther afield in what he is proposing to do. I have already given an indication that it has no bearing whatever upon the terms of the bill. The explanatory note of the bill reads as follows:

> The purpose of this bill is to establish a department of veterans' affairs under the direction of a minister of veterans' affairs who shall be responsible for the care, treatment, training, or reestablishment in civil life of ex-members of the armed forces and of persons otherwise engaged in pursuit relating to the war, and for the care of the dependents of such persons.

It does not deal with the question of unemployment. Therefore I must rule that the remarks of the hon. member are entirely out of line with the terms of the bill.

Mr. KUHL: Do you not agree, Mr. Speaker, that the question of reestablishment involves the employment of members of the armed forces in the post-war world? Is that not the case?

Mr. SPEAKER: Their reestablishment in ciivl life, yes. The board will be charged with the responsibility of reestablishing veterans in civil life, but I take it that the board will not be responsible for the employment of these men, nor will it have anything to do with the question of industry being capable of absorbing them. That is a subject which may be discussed on some other occasion, not in connection with this bill.

Mr. KUHL: I am sorry, Mr. Speaker, but really I cannot follow your reasoning, because if the reestablishment does not depend upon employment it must depend upon something else.

Mr. SPEAKER: I cannot allow any discussion of my ruling. I may say that I gave a great deal of consideration to the point while the hon. member was speaking, before I interrupted him.

Mr. KUHL: Well, sir, I shall conclude that portion of my remarks simply by saying that I am heartily in accord with the objective of this bill. No one could be otherwise. Those members of the armed forces who will be so fortunate as to return to Canada, one of the greatest countries in the world, certainly will be worthy of a way of life the like of which we have yet to see. But I must say with regret that I am convinced that neither this bill nor any other measure either on the order paper or on the statute books will provide such a standard of living. I believe that we must raise our sights as to what constitutes a genuine way of life far higher than anything we have done in the past. In years gone by our life has consisted of the somewhat sordid task of merely making a living; and I sincerely believe that the nation's heroes, as well as its civilians, should be permitted to enjoy life as an art. We must reorganize our whole national life so that our efforts will be directed to the art of living rather than to the mere making of a living. At this stage of our economic history it is not only possible for the people of Canada to enjoy a high standard of living as far as material things are concerned; if we organize our national life properly it is physically possible for people to enjoy a good deal of leisure time, during which they may give expression to their creative instincts. That is an aspect of our national life which I am afraid has been greatly neglected. Through the laws which have remained on our statute books we have obliged our people to spend most of their time in merely thinking about the next meal. In the post-war world this country should provide a very high standard of living in material things with a much shorter work day, perhaps as low as four hours, with a per capita income much higher than it is at the present time. Certainly this country can provide in material things an income of well over $4,000 a year for a family of four. In addition, I believe that not only members of the armed forces who return but all people should have a much greater opportunity to become a cultured, leisured people than they have had in the past.

I should like to have developed this point more fully, but I may have the privilege of doing so on another occasion.

At six o'clock the house took recess.

After Recess

The house resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. A. J. BROOKS (Royal): Mr. Speaker, the bill which is before the house for consideration is evidently of great importance and, I think, meets with quite general approval by the members of the house, judging from the speeches already delivered. I have not had an opportunity of studying the bill in particular, having arrived only yesterday in the house, but I have read it over and from what I can see I believe it will meet not only with the general approval of hon. members but with the approval of the public.

As was said yesterday by one hon. member, the establishment of a Department of Veterans' Affairs is possibly long overdue. All the legislation in connection with veterans' affairs passed since the last war has met with change after change. It has been a sort of evolution. I am satisfied that this department will be one of the most difficult departments to administer. It will have to do with human affairs, and we all know that when you are dealing with such matters you run into more difficulty than when you are dealing with more abstract things. I think it is wise to have all possible plans made as soon as possible. On many occasions criticism has been offered in this house because of the lack of preparation after the last war. But we should remember that the last war came to a very sudden end in 1918; it ended much more quickly than was expected by the contestants or by the people generally. That may happen in this war, although that is something we can only hope for rather than expect.

I have heard it said at different times that the men in the armed forces are thinking keenly of what is to happen when the war is over. I have had considerable to do with the armed forces during the last four years, and personally I do not think I can state what these men are asking for or what they are thinking as far as the after-war period is concerned. But I do know that what is uppermost in the minds of the men of the forces at the present time is the winning of the war. That is their first consideration and great determination. Another matter which is giving them considerable thought is the question of reinforcements, or whether or not well-trained men will be available to give them sufficient backing in the great task which lies ahead of them.

The men in the armed forces are prepared to give some advice and they are giving splendid advice at the present time. But they realize, as do hon. members of this house and the country in general, that a great responsibility rests upon the members of parliament. They expect us to make proper provisions. They realize also that a responsibility rests upon the people of this dominion. I was surprised to hear one hon. member say this afternoon that the returned men are not looking particularly to industry for jobs.

The men in the armed forces hope that when this war is over there will be jobs for them. They know that the only way in which jobs can be provided is through industry. As the hon. member said, industry is for the production of goods, but goods cannot be produced without work. These men are hoping to obtain this work from industry. They believe that the government should see to it that they are given preference as far as work is concerned, not only by the government but by industry as well.

We who served in the last war remember how difficult it was for some to obtain positions after that war was over, but I believe that at least eighty per cent of the men who served in that war found employment when they came back. I do not think they were any burden upon this country. They did not want to be a burden. They were satisfied if they could obtain work through their own energy. I am sure that eighty or ninety per cent of the men in this war will come back and will rehabilitate themselves to as great an extent as did their fathers before them.

But there is always a minority which must be looked after. There are many men who give splendid accounts of themselves when they are fighting the enemy, but who do not seem to have the same success in fighting the battle of life. This country owes a great debt to those men and we must see that they suffer in no way. The question of pensions has been discussed fully in this house. A pension is not compensation, and I do not think the country or the government looks upon it as compensation to the men who have served in war.

I would ask this question of hon. members: How many of you would be willing to accept $50,000 for your right leg or right arm? How many hon. members would accept $100,000 for their eyes, or for the complete destruction of their nervous system? There is no price that would pay us for the destruction of our mentality. How many of us would accept any amount of money as compensation for the loss of a limb or any of our faculties? Therefore I say that a pension is not compensation to these men who have been wounded or disabled, because nothing compensates a man for the losses I have just mentioned. The men are hoping that if they have losses the pensions given them will provide a decent living, decent homes and decent opportunities for their wives and children. That is one of the things they feel should and must be provided for them.

Then, so far as the men themselves are concerned, they feel—and I say the country should feel—that they should be made as comfortable as possible under the circumstances in which they find themselves. Men returning wounded and maimed do not live normal lives. Most men like to join in certain activities such as sports, fishing, hunting, camping and so on. The wounded men are denied these privileges. For this reason we must, we should—and I know we do—take a very sympathetic attitude. We realize we owe a great debt.

The legislation which has been brought down in the house in the twenty-five years following the last war, and during the four years of the present one, should be good. There is no question about that. I believe that if one were to compare the legislation in Canada providing for rehabilitation, pensions and the like, with similar legislation in other countries he would conclude that we have done very well in this country. If there has been any weakness—and I know there has been—it has been in the administration of that legislation. The men who have been acting in administrative capacities have not always approached their task with what might be described as a humane approach. Possibly they have carried out the letter of the law, but they have not always carried out its spirit. Nor have they carried out the intention of members of parliament—and I believe we are all humane in this respect—or the intention of the public in general.

I should like to pay a tribute, if I may, to the Canadian Legion and to the other war organizations which have done so much for returned soldiers from 1919 until the beginning of this war, and during its progress. In those years the men in these organizations have picked out the flaws in whatever soldier legislation has been brought before the house. I know the Minister of Pensions and National Health (Mr. Mackenzie) and other ministers have been helped immeasurably by the contribution these organizations have made.

Someone has said that men who were in the last war are getting old, and that the younger men who have taken part in the present war will have to take their places. That, of course, is a natural conclusion; but I know the men in this war will feel that the advice of many of the men who fought in the last one can be used to good advantage, and I am sure advantage will be taken of it.

There have been difficult cases; we hear about them in the house. But of the hundreds of cases which are not difficult we hear very little. I am sure that only the difficult ones are brought to the minister's attention, and that he hears very little about the cases which have been worked out successfully under our legislation. This, again, to a great extent is due to the hard work performed by men in the Canadian Legion. I have had to handle many pension cases, but when I find a difficult one I usually send it to a representative of the Canadian legion, or to some other veterans' organization. I find they look after such cases much better than I can.

Another organization which comes under this legislation is the soldiers' land settlement board. Much has been said in this debate about the inequalities brought about by this board, and unfortunately, most of what has been said is true. The greatest attention should and must be given to settling men on the land. I think we might say, speaking generally, that the act passed at the time of the last war was not a success; there were many failures. Possibly there were reasons for those failures. No one could foresee what was going to happen. While failures occurred, still I am satisfied that those who tried to formulate the act did the best they could at the time.

After the last war I happened to be engaged for a few years in my own province as school inspector, and as such I had good opportunities to see how the act was working. In many cases good land, buildings, stock and machinery were provided. But the price paid, was too high, and the men could not make a success. Another question which entered into the matter was the lack of farming experience of the men who were undertaking the work. Then, these men were also placed on farms in isolated districts. They were away from schools, telephones, churches and other social organizations. If we have learned from the experience of the past we shall see to it after this war every consideration is given to placing these men on farms where they will have at least the social amenities and that they will have an opportunity of living normal lives.

Another mistake that was made was that, not only were the men inexperienced in farm life, but their wives were girls who had come from cities and towns. Many of them had come from the old country, and had not had experience either in working or in living on our Canadian farms. The hon. member for Battle River (Mr. Fair) spoke about giving clear title to the men who are in debt on the farms. I believe that matter was also discussed by the hon. member for Portage la Prairie (Mr. Leader). I agree wholeheartedly with what both these hon. members said.

Another matter upon which I should like to touch for a few minutes is the rehabilitation grant. I do not think that at the present time a sufficient grant is being given to the men who are discharged. A man is asked if he has a job, and if he says that he can go back to work he is given one month's rehabilitation grant, and is discharged from the army. I contend that no matter whether he was a carpenter, a farmer, a lawyer, a barber, a painter—no matter with what profession or craft he may have been connected—one month's rehabilitation allowance is not sufficient. Those men, upon returning, must enter into competition with others who have been doing that work for the three or four years the soldiers have been in the army. Their tools may be considerably worn, and they are not given enough money to buy new ones. If they turn to farming work they will have to purchase stock. Some of the men would have to stock farms which they had left three or four years ago and which have not since been cultivated. All these things would take more than one month's pay. In some cases two or three months' pay would be required, and in my view some provision should be made to give the men a larger grant than is permitted at present.

Yesterday the hon. member for Parkdale (Mr. Bruce) spoke eloquently about hospitalization. That is a subject he is well qualified to discuss. Apart from his criticism respecting some of the hospitals, it is within my knowledge that in Canada hospitals which have not been satisfactory have been used in the last twenty-five years. An hon. member spoke to-day of men going to hospitals and having to wait for doctors. I do not know whether, as the hon. member suggested, they were having afternoon tea or morning tea, but I agree with him that there has been a good deal of difficulty in this connection and that men have had to wait.

I suggest to the minister that these hospitals should be located in the finest surroundings it is possible to find. For men who are under hospitalization, the hospital is their home; it may be their home for years, and the very best conditions are none too good for them—not in some crowded urban area, but in a beautiful location, preferably where men can enjoy, in part, country surroundings and, in part, the amenities of city life.

I should like to know from the minister whether the care of war graves is provided for under this measure.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): It comes under the department now. We have a special director of war cemeteries, who was appointed within the last six months.

Mr. BROOKS: Is that for overseas graves?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): No; for graves within Canada.

Mr. BROOKS: Why not also for graves overseas?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): After the last war the matter was placed under the Imperial War Graves commission, upon which body we had a representative or two from Canada.

Mr. BROOKS: Is that arrangement still in force?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): It is. Colonel Osborne is on that commission.

Mr. BROOKS: It seems to me that overseas graves might well have been included in a measure which relates to soldiers' affairs.

In past years in this chamber I have listened to considerable criticism concerning what has been done for returned soldiers and their dependents. We realize that not sufficient has been done in the past, but we also wonder whether hon. members or others who have criticized, during the past twenty-five years, the provision which has been made, could have done any better. The Pension Act and other measures on behalf of returned men have been in course of evolution; they have been tested and improved throughout all these years. I wonder whether twenty-five years ago those who are so critical to-day could have produced a perfect act. We know that the Pension Act has been amended time and time again; other acts in the interests of returned men have also been amended a great many times.

The treatment of soldiers after the great wars of recent times has been far from generous. As a matter of fact the veterans of Greek and Roman times were probably treated better than the fighting men of later days.

Kipling points out that men are acclaimed as heroes during war time, but when the war is over, little attention is paid to them. After the Crimean war many soldiers were reduced to begging for a living. We know, too, the appalling conditions under which they lived during that great campaign. After the South African war, land grants were given to the volunteers who returned, but these men were exploited so far as their grants were concerned and very little money reached them from the sale of their lands. The great war was the first occasion when any real effort was made, at least by the parliament of this country, to see to it that the soldiers received justice and fair play. As I have said, a great many mistakes were made, but I believe that the people of this country and parliament representing the people made a real effort to deal justly with the veterans. As far as this war is concerned, there can be no excuse for this parliament or for the people of Canada if everything is not done that should be done with regard to the rehabilitation of returned men.

I ask the indulgence of the house to illustrate and emphasize the fact that in the past men who should have received great consideration were neglected. I have before me a copy of a soldiers' magazine, published in Yarmouth, Nova Scotia, called On Parade, June, 1944, edition. It contains an article dealing with the first V.C. in British America. I wonder how many members of this house know that the first Victoria Cross awarded to a Canadian was won by a man of the name of Hall, the son of a slave. Hall was born in April, 1827, at Newport, Hants county, Nova Scotia. The article, which is written by Robert B. Blauveldt, describes how, in 1852, Hall became a Royal Marine on board His Majesty's Ship Rodney, on which he served throughout the Crimean war. In 1856 he joined the British ship Victory, and, after the outbreak of the Indian mutiny, he served in India, where General Sir John Inglis, also a native of Nova Scotia, was besieged in the Residency at Lucknow by an army of 50,000 sepoys. The garrison, reduced to a mere handful, were in desperate straits when help arrived. General Sir John Campbell, in charge of the relief force, decided to send from one of the ships a gun close under the walls in an effort to open a breach in the walls. The crew proved to be one man short, so that Hall, in charge of another gun, volunteered to fill his place. One after another the gun crew were killed under the murderous fire of the natives, until only two men, Hall and a Lieutenant Young, the latter badly wounded, remained to serve the gun. In the recital of the circumstances under which Hall won his V.C., it is said:

[Mr. Brooks.]

Finally, in one of the most supreme moments in all the age-long story of human courage, Hall fired the charge which opened the walls and enabled the British forces to push through to the relief of the garrison and, ultimately, to the quelling of the mutiny and the restoration of peace and order to India.

For this signal courage and devotion to duty Hall was recommended for and received the Victoria Cross.

In 1901, when the late King George V visited Halifax, Hall was honoured by being given a carriage in the procession, but soon afterwards he was forgotten. Three years later, in August, 1904, he died, and was buried in Hants county, Nova Scotia. The writer of the article goes on to say:

But to the everlasting shame of his native province—and, in fact, of the great empire which he had so nobly served—his mortal remains lie in an unmarked and neglected grave, under a tangle of bushes and briers, its exact location unknown except to the very few who have taken a personal interest in preserving the memory of one of an ungrateful country's greatest heroes.

I bring this to the attention of the house simply to show that we have come a long way as far as attention to our fighting men and recognition of our heroes are concerned. But I also bring this incident to the attention of the house in the hope that a great wrong, in the disregard of the memory of this brave man, will be righted. I hope that some historical society or some other organization in Canada will see to it that his memory receives fitting attention.

I think we should look to the future and not to the past as far as building up our institutions is concerned, so that our post-war world shall be built on a firm foundation. We must provide greater services, greater leisure, greater security, greater opportunity for our returned men and also for the people of our country.

Mr. J. W. NOSEWORTHY (York South): I associate myself with hon. members who have spoken in favour of this bill to coordinate all the work pertaining to the veterans of this and the former war. Since the war began, more than 2,000 young men and women who passed through my classes in two schools in the years immediately preceding the war joined His Majesty's forces. As I listened to the news of the invasion last week I could not help thinking of the care-free life which those boys and girls lived, of their ambitions and their hopes, which they were forced to abandon on receiving a higher call to duty for their country. For their sake particularly, I am keenly interested in any legislation that will provide for their future welfare. I never see or hear from one of them without being asked what we at Ottawa are doing to prepare for their return to Canada. A great responsibility rests upon us here at this particular time. In no way can we show our gratitude for the work which they are carrying on at the present time better than by passing legislation that will grant them security after they return.

Two things are required of us: first, that we do everything humanly possible to contribute to their success during the war; second, that we do everything possible to make conditions in Canada worthy of the sacrifices they are making.

I should like to join with other hon. members in complimenting the hon. member for Vancouver North (Mr. Sinclair). In the light of the grand fighting speech which he made on behalf of our men in the forces, I am quite ready to overlook even his political gibes at this party. If the effect of his speech upon the members of the treasury board were anything like its effect upon the private members of the house, I would say he did a good day's work for his comrades.

I associate myself also with the hon. member for Battle River (Mr. Fair) in his fight for those veterans who secured land in western Canada after the last war, to obtain for them a clear title to that land. I had the privilege of meeting and talking with a deputation representing those veterans, and as I studied their brief, it appeared to me that the government would have been just about as far ahead if it had given those men free titles to the land to start with. The cost to the government has come very close to eating up all the income that the government has received from that project.

I think a good point from which to begin my speech would be to go back to a resolution adopted by the Liberal convention on August 7, 1919, a resolution on pensions moved by the present Minister of National Defence (Mr. Ralston). I think the house should recall that resolution:

> That such pension or allowances be granted as shall enable the soldiers or their dependents as the case may be to maintain a liberal standard of living sufficient to guarantee health, education and all the necessities, comforts and amenities which go to make up a standard of living worthy of Canadian citizenship.

Incidentally, I may say that the word "liberal" in that resolution is spelt with a small and not a capital "l". That was on August 7, 1919. We have only to contrast with that resolution the facts regarding the treatment of men in the last war as borne out by history. I know of many scores of veterans of the last war to whom I would be ashamed to show that resolution to-day. What are the facts? Can we wonder that, as the hon. member for Vancouver North stated, the confidence of the people in promises of governments and political parties is at a very low ebb at the present time. Governments since 1919—and this goes for both Liberal and Conservative governments—failed to provide adequately for the rehabilitation of able-bodied men who returned from the last war or to take ample care of those who came back incapacitated and disabled.

We talk about conditions under which no one who takes part in this war shall be worse off for his having done so. I wonder how many there were who took part in the last war who did not suffer by reason of the fact that they served their country. I need not dwell at length on the extent to which both governments failed to rehabilitate the men who returned, nor need I elaborate upon the extent to which both governments failed to provide adequately for those who were disabled. The fact is that vast numbers of men who fought in the last war are to this very day in need of the necessities of life. I know of instances in my own riding. I have taken some of those men to the chairman of the pension board, who was ready to admit that the men were entitled to more than they were getting, but said that there were cast-iron regulations which prevented him from doing for those men what he felt was the country's moral obligation.

Mr. BLACKMORE: Liberal regulations too.

Mr. NOSEWORTHY: More than, that, there are men, scores of them, who have returned from this war who are this very day in need of the necessities of life, in need certainly of that which would give them a standard of living worthy of a Canadian citizen. I know some of those men personally. I have sent some of those cases to the minister's department.

Hon. members have already referred to the fact that the act, as most acts do, provides for the setting up of regulations by the governor in council. In the days when I taught school I thought I knew what governor in council meant. Since coming to Ottawa I have come to the conclusion that governor in council, in most cases, means a group of civil servants or members of a regulatory board. I wonder how many of those regulations are actually made either by the minister or by his colleagues. I thought again during the years when I taught Canadian history that government was subject to the will of the majority of parliament. I have been forced to reach the conclusion that this is scarcely true; that regulatory bodies can make regulations and that these regulations can remain in force, although every member of the cabinet must know that the desire of the majority of the members of parliament are opposed to some of the regulations. I cited a couple of instances a few nights ago; I am going to refer to them again. I doubt if there is a private member who would support on the floor of this house the practice by which an old age pensioner's pension is reduced because his son overseas has assigned pay. I doubt if any private member in this house would support that principle; yet that practice, because it is a regulation, remains in force from day to day and many pensioners suffer thereby.

I wish to make a few general observations. We should realize once and for all that we cannot discharge our obligations to the men who are serving in this war by granting some cash pittances and then leaving them to fend for themselves. I think we all realize that at this time our obligations go much farther than that. To care for those disabled in the war and the rehabilitation of those who return able-bodied is, I believe we all recognize, the responsibility of the government. The cost of that care and rehabilitation must be considered as a part of the cost of the war. We shall not have paid for this war so long as an active participant in it or one of his dependents requires aid or rehabilitation; and just as we have been generous in providing all the material needs that it is physically possible for us to provide for the winning of the war, so we must be equally generous in providing for the human needs that arise out of the war. Just as we have never held up the production of anything material to the war on the excuse that there was no money for that job, so must we never permit one who has suffered because of participation in the war to go in want of any of the necessities of the life on the flimsy excuse that we as a nation cannot afford the expense. The country that can afford to spend $25,000, $35,000 or $40,000 for the training and equipping of young men for war can ill afford to let that man come back to civil life and go in need of anything that is essential to a standard of living worthy of Canadian citizenship.

Other hon. members have already referred to the word "pre-enlistment." I suggest that that word be deleted completely from the pension department's vocabulary. Thousands of veterans in this country to-day will recall their disappointment when on coming before the pension board they were informed they were non-pensionable because their physical disability was a pre-enlistment one. It is unfortunately true that men coming back from this war are still being deprived of pensions for the same reason. I have in mind one man in particular who was declared by the pension board to be non-pensionable because his disability was a pre-enlistment one. The man had a back ailment. I saw certificates, statements from former employers, showing that that man had been employed in firing a railway locomotive, working on a dock, working in a lumber yard, and they all bore evidence to the fact that in no case had he been unable to work because of any illness or weakness; yet his disability is declared to be pre-enlistment. I wish to join with those hon. members who have stated already that we should accept the principle that where a medical board has given a recruit the classification A-1, when that man comes before a pension board there should be no question of any pre-enlistment disability.

For a few moments I should like to deal with the training and educational programme of the government. I would suggest—I think there is need of this—that the department prepare a statement setting forth all the educational opportunities in every field, vocational and academic, to which a returned man or woman is entitled with government assistance. There may be such a record already, though I have been unable to find one. I am asked constantly by boys who are interested in improving their educational status whether this or that course is available to them and for how many years they may hope to get assistance in connection with their education. I believe that these educational opportunities should not be limited too rigidly, either because the young man or woman concerned did not give evidence of a desire to follow a particular course before enlistment, or because the length of service was not sufficient. Many of these boys have now spent four years away from Canada. Thousands of them left high school to enlist; others had not gone beyond public school. To-day who is to say what courses these young men would have followed in those four years if they had been permitted to live normal lives in normal times? We cannot give them back those four years which, from the point of view of gaining an education, are the most precious years of their lives. We can, however, give them every encouragement to make good that loss as far as that may be possible, and we should see to it that it is financially possible for them to do so. I urge that we should place no obstacle in the way of their getting whatever education they have the ability or the desire to obtain.

The hon. member for Vancouver North (Mr. Sinclair) made it quite evident that in his opinion no returned man should be required, either while undergoing training or until such time as he could get a job, to live on less than the pay and allowances he received while in the forces. This should be the case particularly in connection with all those up to army lieutenant or equivalent rank. I want to join with the hon. member in asserting that until the country is able to provide that man with a job, under no circumstances should he be required to live on less in peace time than we were willing to pay him in time of war.

I shall not delay the house by taking time to go into further detail. As other hon. members have said, very little research is required to discover that even the present $65 clothing allowance—which is so much better than the previous $35 allowance—is much too low to enable a returned man to secure a complete outfit of clothes at present prices. I am sure any investigation would show that anything less than $125 or $150 is inadequate. I should like to relate the rehabilitation programme to the entire reconstruction programme, but Your Honour ruled that discussion out of order when a previous speaker attempted to deal with it. Therefore I shall close with a couple of quotations, the first from General Sir Archibald Wavell, spoken in Cairo on January 1, 1941:

> Have you ever thought what a world we could make if we put into peace endeavours the same energy, the same self-sacrifice and cooperation as we use in the wastefulness of war?

The second quotation is by the Vice-Premier of Czechoslovakia, Jan Masaryk, as reported in the Saturday Evening Post of January 3, 1943:

> Sooner or later we shall have to adjust ourselves spiritually and intellectually to the changes produced by this material revolution and reshape our institutions accordingly. In the field of economics the supremacy of the common good, as contrasted with selfish gains by a few, must be recognized and furthered by concerted national and international, private and public action.

Mr. E. G. HANSELL (Macleod): Mr. Speaker, I wish to add my contribution to this debate which has to do with the setting up of a Department of Veterans' Affairs. I shall not detain the house at any length, because I am not going to repeat what has been said already during this debate by other speakers and in other words; what I wish to say is along perhaps somewhat different lines. I could never figure out why there should be any extended debate on the question of giving anyone security. I could never understand why there should be any argument to it, and this is particularly true in connection with those in our fighting forces who have offered their lives on the altar of sacrifice. Surely, if anyone in this country deserves security, it is these men who have offered their lives for their country. There should be no argument about it. This sort of bill and subjects of this kind seem to involve a tremendous amount of debate. There can be only one reason for that. As far as I can see the government are not prepared to go as far as the members of this house think they should go in giving to these worthy men of our fighting forces the adequate security we think they should have.

I have listened to hon. members who have preceded me and I was much taken with the speech yesterday of the hon. member for Vancouver North (Mr. Sinclair). I could not help feeling that perhaps he should be with this group over here. He manifested some of the attitude toward monetary matters which this group has been recommending for a good many years. However, I think he was a little bit off in one or two things he said. For instance, he said that the policy of the government, his government, this government in power to-day, was that what is physically possible and desirable should be made financially possible. That never has been the policy of the Liberal party of this country.

We have been preaching that policy in this house for a good many years. As a matter of fact I think I can say without any fear of contradiction that that phrase was coined by none other than Major C. H. Douglas, one of the great world exponents of social credit and, I think I can say also without fear of contradiction, one of the greatest economic minds of the age. The hon. member for Vancouver North said that that was the policy of his government. If there was any semblance of truth in that, it has not been because this is the policy of the government; it is because the circumstances of the war have forced the government's hand to do financially what they were never able to do before. At least if they were able to do it, they refused to do it. The hon. member for Vancouver North also said that no financial obligation should stand in the way of the government giving our returned men that which is their due. I think we shall all agree with that. When the hon. member made that statement, by whom was he applauded? He was applauded by all the members on the opposition side. I noticed particularly that that statement was not applauded by members on the government side of the house.

Mr. REID: Oh, yes, it was.

Mr. HANSELL: Someone over there on the Liberal side says, "Oh, yes, it was." I shall have to take his word for it, but all I can say is that I am not hard of hearing and I did not hear it.

Mr. REID: All I can say is that I am speaking the truth.

Mr. HANSELL: I accepted that. May I suggest to my hon. friend that it is the one lone voice crying in the wilderness.

Mr. REID: No; there were two of us. You are wrong again.

Mr. HANSELL: Well, there were two. I am sure that is a glorious record. What was the statement? The hon. member for Vancouver North said that no financial obligation should stand in the way and I am told now that two Liberals applauded that statement. If there was ever a truer statement made than that I should like to know what it is. Applying that statement to this bill to establish a Department of Veterans' Affairs, I contend that if that department is established and is to be subjected to financial limitations, it will end where all other departments have ended, far short of the objective the people of this country want.

We know what happens under the present administration. We know that when a department desires to put over a programme—I am not complaining about its desires—it is subjected to the dictates of the treasury board. If the treasury board say, "We are sorry, we have no money," that ends it. It does not make any difference if the programme is physically possible or if it is desirable; if they say, "We have no money," that settles the question. I am wondering if a thing of that kind should be. As far as I am concerned, the whole thing is wrong. The fact of the matter is that the government should be able to do anything that is physically possible. Anything that parliament desires and moves that is physically possible, then the department or the government should say, "Very well; we are the servants of the people; you represent the people and we will do this; we will not let any financial limitation stand in our way."

One or two speakers have said that if this department is to be set up it must be provided with the proper machinery. I have no argument to offer there because I think that is so. But if that is all that is so, then it will fall far short of the mark. If it is administrators that we want I declare that you can get them in Canada for a dime a dozen. You can get the best administrators in the world. You can get the men who are at the head of industry, at the head of our financial institutions; if you like you can get the men who are at the head of our political movements. Put them all together; give them charge of this department, and if they do not have enough money they will fall down absolutely on the job.

I have not heard a great deal of criticism about the administrative ability of the present Minister of Pensions and National Health (Mr. Mackenzie), and I have no criticism to offer of him as an administrator. However, I do not know that he is doing any better than any other cabinet material, either in the Liberal party or in any other party. We go to the Minister of Pensions and National Health and we say to him, "We notice that you are giving so much for clothing to our soldiers; we notice that you are giving them so much for allowance on demobilization; do you really think that is enough?"

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): Neither of those two allowances is from this department.

Mr. HANSELL: All right. Whether it is the minister's department or not, we will suppose it is for the sake of illustration. We go to him, and say, "Do you think that is sufficient?" He may say "yes," or he may say "no." I fancy he would say "no."

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): I will say "no" now.

Mr. HANSELL: However, I will not put words in his mouth. My next question would be, "Would you not like to give them more?" Of course he would say "yes." He has said he did not think it was enough. Then he would say, "Of course, I would like to give them more." "Well," we say, "why do you not?" What is the answer to be? There is only one answer, and that is, "Well, I am sorry, but the fellow higher up won't supply me with enough money."

The trouble is not in the administrative machinery. There may be a cog loose here, or a cog loose there, but I do not think the trouble is with the administrative machinery. The trouble is, always has been, and always will be under this or any old-line party administration, or any other administration subject to the present financial power, "Where are you to get the money?" That will be the trouble with any administration working under a debt economy.

There is not a great deal to offer when we talk about the kind of administration we should have. If my car stalls on the road I do not get out to see if the bumper is on wrong, or if the licence plate is hanging straight or if the windshield wiper is working. If the car stalls I want to find out what is fundamentally wrong. I want to see if the ignition works or if the gasoline is flowing properly. In examining legislation of this kind —and this applies to all post-war reconstruction, and matters of that kind—if there is anything wrong with it when it is set up there is no use in going to this man or to that man or to the other man. Look for the fundamental error; and if the error is that there is not enough money, then let us admit that fact and either supply the money or put someone in power who knows where to get it.

I have just one further observation to make. I trust that people are not going to be fooled by this new department, or by the government's action in setting it up. There is a tendency to say, "Oh, this is a great thing; we are to have a new department of government, and it is to be known as the Department of Veterans' Affairs. That is a great thing; now we shall begin to go somewhere." I think I had better say that you are not going anywhere you have not been before. The setting up of a new department does not for one moment guarantee that our returned men will be cared for adequately. It is just another piece of machinery. The best way to show that the government means business is to start with the soldiers of the last war, many of whom are still in need, and with the soldiers who are now coming back from the present war. This does not need another department. Let us see that the government means business. When we see that the soldiers are treated better we shall know that the government means business. All the new departments in the world are not going to convince me or the legion or anybody else, unless they can show the people that this thing is being done.

I say, in closing, that it will not be done until the vital principle of the social credit philosophy, namely, that of making that which is physically possible and desirable financially possible, is accepted. Make the figures fit the facts.

Mr. JEAN-FRANÇOIS POULIOT (Témiscouata): Mr. Speaker, the purpose of this bill is to create a department which will be responsible for the care, treatment, training and reestablishment in social life of ex-members of the armed forces, and of persons otherwise engaged in pursuits relating to the war, and for the care of dependents of such persons. This is a laudable purpose, but it is entirely covered by the present act. The unfortunate thing is that the present act is not applied as it should be. There were legitimate grievances of the returned men and the men who have been discharged for one reason or another, and instead of those grievances being corrected we are told that a new department will be established. It is an old wagon with a new coat of paint, and with the old driver in the seat. There is practically no change, except that the matter has been studied very carefully by some zealous members.

But, sir, there is an easy way to correct these wrongs. To do so one has to come down to earth, come down from the clouds and try to improve the conditions of the returned men. I regret having to repeat the same thing so many times. I have a soft thought for the minister, a congenial and likable man, much more so than some of his colleagues. In fact, he is so congenial that he could share that quality with them, and still keep enough to be well liked by all. How many times must I repeat that it is absurd not to give pensions to men who deserve them, or to men who have been promised pensions by the minister?

I hold in my hand data respecting regimental number D-554528, C. H. Pelletier, of Rivière-du-Loup. This man was riding a motorcycle in the bush for the first time, in process of doing some commando training. He was in company with a corporal. The motorcycle was then put on the road in high gear. The man in question sat on it, and as soon as he was in the saddle the corporal removed the clutch, with the result that the motorcycle went off at full speed and struck a tree. The man's leg was broken in three or four places, and he also suffered injuries to his spine. My understanding is that the leg was badly broken, and one or two inches of it were broken like dust. He went to the hospital, and his leg was in a plaster cast for several months. Then I had the promise of the department that he would have a pension in August. He went several times to Quebec. He can hardly walk; his wife asked for a pass, but it was refused. Finally, upon my advice, he reported to the doctor, came back, and got nothing. He repeated this several times. It is evident that this man was badly hurt while in the service through the guilty carelessness and criminal negligence of a non-commissioned officer, and is entitled to a pension. I have the promise of the minister, who writes me very fine letters about the matter, but nothing comes from the pension department for this man. It is a sad case. When I meet him I give him something. Although my means are limited I try to help him, but what I can give him is negligible. The other day he came to my office and asked me to write a letter to his bank manager to say that I am working to obtain him a pension. "Tell him," he said to me, "that you are trying to get me a pension. I owe him $25 but I cannot pay it. My wife works a little; I cannot work at all. I hope that, with a letter from you, the bank manager will grant a renewal of my note."

At a time when we hear so much about what is to be done for the veterans, why not begin now? There must be a start. When will the start be? Will it be made only after the war is over? That is absurd. A beginning should be made now. There is no excuse for the pensions branch not paying a pension to that man. To-day is June 15; I was told by the minister in August last that the man would have a pension; but the board are so stubborn and their attitude is so unbelievably absurd that, as recently as last Monday, when I met this man on the street, walking with difficulty, and asked if he had got anything, he said, "no." One reproach which was made against him was that he did not go to the hospital when the doctor told him to. But he had been there for months. He had a conversation with a doctor in Quebec city who, having told him that it was useless for him to take hospital treatment, afterwards told him that he should go there. So that soldier said, "If it is useless for me to go there, why should I go?" He needs the means wherewith to live, but so far he has got nothing.

Here is another case, of E-621922. I have a big file here dealing with this case, which is that of a man named Yvon Belanger. He had pleurisy in one lung. While he was in the army he contracted pleurisy in the other lung, imputable to his service, since it occurred while he was in the service. He was told to resign from the army, and that he would have an opportunity to go home right away. This is the policy of some doctors, especially of the pensions branch.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): Oh, no.

Mr. POULIOT: It is not the pensions branch, but it is the practice in the army. As I said, this man was told to resign, and that he could then go home immediately. Upon my suggestion he refused to do that. I advised him not to resign, that he had full rights to a pension, and that it was a crime to deprive him of it under the pretext of saving money for the country. He is now at his home in Rivière du Loup. He is sick; when he leaves his bed he has to sit in a long chair on the verandah or in the sunroom, and he cannot work. He has received no pension, and how long it will take for him to get a satisfactory answer from the department I cannot tell. But here is a man who is surely entitled to a pension. I have a letter from the pension officials in which it is admitted that the man suffers from pleurisy, but it is said to be an affection of anterior origin; that is, prior to enlistment, aggravated during service in Canada but not entitling him to a pension under article 11 (2). The interpretation given to that section by the pension board is inhuman. They say that his disability was incurred prior to enlistment. That is perhaps true as regards one lung, and it is a reason why this man should never have been accepted in so high a health category. But the pleurisy in the other lung was contracted during his service, and for that reason he is entitled to a pension and also to all the care necessary to restore him so far as is humanly possible to the same condition he was in prior to his enlistment. His case was turned down by the pension board, with the right of appeal, but when any man appeals from the board he has no success.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): That is not right.

Mr. POULIOT: It is my experience.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): That is not correct.

Mr. POULIOT: I will ask the minister not to speak like this, because—

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): I state facts.

Mr. POULIOT: I have here the case of a veteran who could not walk and who was given no more than $3.75 a month as a pension, an amount so small that he had to get a special allowance by way of compensation. I brought this case to the attention of the minister, who agreed that the ruling was absurd, and helped the man to get a small allowance which gives him a chance to live. This case is on record. How can a man who is sick, who can hardly walk, live on $3.75 a month? The minister understood the situation. I do not blame him; I blame the system, and I want a change. I do not see why there is no change there. I have received letters from doctors who have protested that I have been uncharitable to them on some occasions, but when I say what I do I have no interest at all either in praising doctors or in saying that they are unworthy of their jobs in the army. The only ones I am interested in are the soldiers, the sailors and the airmen who come to me wanting to be cared for. They will not wait for the millennium to be well looked after. It is now they have to be looked after. When a man is in the army, and when one considers the money that is spent for the war, there is no excuse for not affording that man, for not affording every man in the army, the treatment he has a right to expect there.

I have discussed the matter with friends, in the most friendly way possible, in the expectation of securing satisfactory results; and if a medical doctor finds that I am exaggerating in complaining of the way in which soldiers have been dealt with there is the case of E-630952, Private L. P. Beaulieu. I have taken that case up with the parliamentary assistant to the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Macdonald), who is most helpful, and I say that with great pleasure. It is one of my great satisfactions to tell my hon. friends the good I think of them. But here is the case of a man who suffered from his heart. He was a fellow in delicate health, an accountant for the Fraser company at Cabano, but the doctors decided that he was fit for the army, although, as I say, he suffered from his heart, and when he passed before the board—I have the information here—the specialist mentioned that he was suffering from his heart. But that was erased by the chairman of the board.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): Which board; the discharge board?

Mr. POULIOT: It was the first examination before going to the army. It was the army, and I mention that fact to my hon. friend the junior member for Halifax.

Mr. MACDONALD (Halifax): That case is under investigation.

Mr. POULIOT: I know, but there is a pension attached to it. That is why I mention the case now, and I thank the hon. gentleman for what he has done already and will, I hope, continue to do. The situation is something unbelievable, and when some members express surprise at the fact that members of the army in the Quebec district leave their unit, very often there is a reason for it. That man was ill, and yet on account of the fact that the note from the specialist was erased, his record was white, and he was sent to his unit. He said that he was tired and the sergeant told him that he was all right, that he was just a faker, just because the fact that he was suffering from his heart had been erased by the chairman of the army board. He was sent to bed. He asked for a doctor. He could hardly speak, but he asked for a doctor and they refused him a doctor. He asked for a priest. They did not have a priest; the chaplain was in the camp. The next morning they found him dead. They may say that these men are not sick, but when they are dead they cannot be resuscitated, and that is what I complain of. I complain bitterly that there are some doctors who are kept in employment, and I was insulted by the Minister of National Defence because I was defending the underdog, a soldier. I was insulted by the penguin of Vancouver and the Eccles Gott of Fraser Valley because I was fighting for my men. There is no power on earth that would prevent me from defending my people and trying to get better treatment for them, and when I say that I say it with the knowledge of my responsibility. There is no reason for such treatment as I have mentioned.

The other day I referred to the case of young Horniblow in Toronto. His number was B-621503, a classical case. I was deeply touched, because his father and mother took the trouble to transcribe the whole file in their own hand. There is a case where the doctors of the camp in Halifax should be punished, should be demoted. We should get rid of them. Why at times do I express the idea that I do not believe in some of the so-called measures for the future? It is because I do not see how the civilian population will put up with the medical treatment from some of the blacksmiths that are in the army. There are some good doctors, but those good doctors never miss an opportunity to defend and protect those who are no good. There must be an end to that unbelievable solidarity. I trust the parliamentary assistant to the Minister of National Defence, and I am ready to pass all these files to him. He will be impressed by the fact—

Mr. MACDONALD (Halifax): There was a very full investigation of the particular case to which the hon. member is now referring.

Mr. POULIOT: I know that, but it was a whitewash, the same as there was a whitewash in Fredericton.

Mr. MACDONALD (Halifax): The conclusions reached were quite proper and I have no doubt, with reference to that particular case, that the medical officers had acted quite properly and that there was no negligence attributable to them—if that is the case to which the hon. member is now referring, the Horniblow case.

Mr. POULIOT: I will not discuss it now.

Mr. MACDONALD (Halifax): That case has nothing to do with the department of pensions.

Mr. POULIOT: No; it may be so, but to show my good faith I will lend the file to the hon. member.

Mr. MACDONALD (Halifax): I have seen the file.

Mr. POULIOT: In spite of what my hon. friend has said, that case has a bearing on the discussion, for this reason. It is my view that when a man is put in category "A", when he is admitted into the army and is afterwards put in a lower category, it means that he has contracted some disability in the army, and it is most important that that examination should be made with care. In my humble view, a man who is in good health when he goes into the army, and who is not so well, or is disabled, when he is discharged has a right to be compensated by the government for that.

There was the case of another man who suffered from lung trouble. He contracted a cold that was not well looked after. He received no pension. His number is E-621251. There was also the case of Alfred Levesque, No. 23203. He is a veteran of the last war. I shall send this file to the minister. Parts of it are in French. I have letters from the parish priest. I have no secret to keep from anybody. This is an open book. I prefer to handle the matter in this way in order to put the least possible on the record. I still expect that some improvements will be made.

Then I have the case of Moise Robillard, C-10542. He was at Christie street hospital. He has been discharged. He has had very little. There is a connection between the medical examination in the army and the right of a soldier to a pension. Then I received a letter from the Canadian Anti-Vivisection Society, Victoria, British Columbia, with regard to the case of a man named Reuben W. Carlier, who died at Neepawa, Manitoba, after an injection of toxoid. He was a British airman. These cases come from all over. I am sending a copy of this letter to a doctor who complained that I was too hard on the medical faculty. I hope that the minister will take up these cases and will see to it that the thing is corrected so as to give the soldiers some faith in the future, and so that they will not lose confidence. At the present time such treatment has a very bad effect. All those men who are not treated as they should be have relatives and friends. This is all known to them. It has a very bad effect on recruiting and on the morale not only of the unit, but on the people who are at home, the relatives of those men.

What about other cases? There was a man who was totally deaf. He was put in category "A" in Quebec on September 12, 1939. He was put in category "E" at Sussex, New Brunswick. He was again placed in category "A" on June 6, 1941, and in category "E", five pulhems at Dartmouth in December 1943. When he was examined in Quebec city he was O.K. But when he was examined more carefully at other places such as Dartmouth and Sussex on two occasions he was placed in category "E". Those are many things that require correction and I hope that it will be done at once.

The minister has the power to instruct the officials of his department to do their duty properly to the men in the service, and to notify his officials that if they do not do so, if they do not act in accordance with the letter and the spirit of the law, he will fire them. I do not want the death of the sinner; I want his conversion. It is the last time that I shall say that with regard to the department of pensions.

The men in my county have been treated very badly. When I spoke to some hon. members from Ontario they said that they were satisfied with the treatment the men had received here. How is it that it is only in the province of Quebec that the men do not get the treatment they have a right to expect from the pension board? There are reforms to be brought about in the army and in the department of pensions, as well as in many other places. Reforms in the department of pensions are the most urgent and I trust that the minister will see to it that those men are better treated.

Before concluding my remarks I wish to refer to another case which seems to be unusual. There was a big man that I have known, and unfortunately I have already mentioned this case without any success. His number is E-100257. He was a very strong and powerful man. He was on guard in Quebec city. He was given shoes that were too small for his feet. He could not wear other shoes. He asked for some but did not get them. He had to wear the regulation shoes. He tried to wear them for some time, and they hurt his feet so badly that he can hardly walk and sometimes he cannot work for two or three weeks in a month. This is cruel and inhuman. What did that man have? It was true that he suffered very much; it was true that this came on during his service. His disability was assessed at five per cent for bronchitis and five per cent for a scar on his right foot. However, the commission ruled that the bronchitis was of pre-enlistment origin, not aggravated during service and that, therefore, no pension was payable in respect of it. The pension was paid at five per cent, effective from the day of his discharge in respect of the disability from the scar on his right foot. The letter from the commission reads:

> As you, of course, know the assessment of disability is on direction of the medical advisers of the commission. In Mr. Cloutier's case we consider the award of pension in accordance with his degree of disability. I regret I cannot give you a favourable reply.

That is unfortunate. It is not true. Imagine what this poor fellow who enlisted voluntarily had to suffer! He was there on guard voluntarily. He had a right to have shoes that were fit for his feet. He asked for the shoes. Evidently they had some, but he could not get any. He could not buy regulation shoes anywhere. He did not want to steal any. He made an effort to remain on guard wearing shoes that were too small. He thereby injured his feet, which is acknowledged by the commission. Finally he received a small amount as a pension, although at times he cannot work for two or three weeks in a month because his feet swell and he cannot wear any shoes. The minister is a kind-hearted giant—I say that very seriously. I hope that he will be moved by these facts which deserve full consideration. Those men are well known to me. I have tried to help them, and I am getting tired of repeating the same things over and over again. However, I do it for a good cause and in the hope that these wrongs will be redressed in the near future.

Mr. L. A. MUTCH (Winnipeg South): Mr. Speaker, the success or failure of the Department of Veterans' Affairs has depended in the past and will depend in future on the understanding of the problem which such a department is designed to meet. We cannot hope to accomplish very much if we attempt to legislate for personal and individual cases. Perhaps in connection with no subject commonly discussed in this house is it easier to dramatize the discussion, because whoever speaks has lying ready to his hand all the elements of tragedy, and we must always guard against drifting into emotional fields. But we have twenty-five years of experience to guide us and, as a result of that experience, a classification of the problem, an understanding of which I think is essential if any discussion with respect to veterans' problems is to be helpful.

The indisputable fact is that from the outset it is essential to separate veterans' affairs into two divisions. The first division is that concerning responsibility for those members of the services who have suffered disability in mind or body and who are or in the course of time will become pensioners. The record of Canada with respect to veterans disabled in the last war has been good. It is not good enough to say, as one hon. member said the other afternoon, that it is good only in comparison with previous experiences, which were exceedingly bad. The treatment of pensioners in Canada, with those unfortunate and inglorious exceptions with which we are all familiar, has been better than the treatment afforded to disabled veterans by any of our allies in the last war, and represents a type of world leadership of which we can be very proud. The second division includes all those who were on active service in any of the services. Following the last war that was a particularly vexed problem, because we had no experience. Even at that we produced the veterans' allowance board, which I submit was the most advanced legislation in the world dealing with the responsibility of government for those who had not suffered disabilities which could be established and pensioned.

Not only did we lack experience in the period following the last war; but those veterans who had not suffered noticeable and easily detected disabilities began to fail in their attempt to provide for themselves, just about the time this country entered the greatest economic depression which Canada and, in fact, the world had ever seen. Throughout that period we had discussion as to where the responsibility lay for those veterans who were not pensionable but who were destitute. In the beginning the responsibility was held to be local. As the problem became progressively greater, the responsibility became provincial and eventually, when it reached its full magnitude, there came a realization that the primary responsibility lay with the federal authority. All through that discussion, which dealt with the problem of destitution generally, it was argued—and with that argument I agree—that the responsibility for those who had been on active service was indeed federal, since the soldiers of Canada did not fight for a province but fought for the dominion.

This principle of governmental responsibility having been accepted as to the first division, relating to pensions, it seems unreasonable that the same general principle should not apply in the second division, dealing with all those who were on active service. By the same token, then, the loss of seniority in a job, the loss of a skill, the sacrifice of productive years and the invisible wounds of the spirit, though they be not pensionable, are indeed the responsibility of the national government. In a desire to spur successive governments following the last war, and particularly in recent times, to avoid the errors which occurred then and the failures; we have had expressed in this house great concern and fear for the future, fears which to my mind are not warranted by the record of the past. As a result we have induced in the minds of many of our people who are serving, and many of our people at home, a degree of trepidation which is not warranted by the history of our legislation. Approximately 600,000 Canadians served in the last war, of whom about 225,000 were Canadian born. The remainder fought as Canadians and brought imperishable honour to Canada as Canadians. Those who survived returned to Canada, and the history of how they became absorbed into the life of this country is not such as to warrant the oft-repeated criticisms of that post-war period. When we consider what the veterans of this war will return to I think it is worth while to study for a moment or two the conditions to which those who came back from the last war returned. Thousands of them had been less than five years in Canada. They had no homes, no jobs, and many of them had but very few friends. In my own experience I know of a little town where, of the first eleven men who enlisted, ten were not Canadian born. They had no homes and, in reality, no stake in the community. Seven of them returned, all of whom after a little time, with no other inducement than their own determination to be independent and to have a stake in the country of their adoption, succeeded in reestablishing themselves. All in all, in spite of the conditions that existed, we did not do badly.

The situation which will greet our returning soldiers this time is vastly different. More than ninety per cent of those in the services to-day were born in Canada and will return to their own homes. I have said that those who returned from the last war did not do badly. The proof of that statement is to be found in every community, in the long list of veterans of that war who are now the leaders, the backbone of business, of church and of state. It is to be found in the record of their children, their sons and daughters who serve in every branch of Canada's war effort to-day. I know there were those who fell short of the achievements I have mentioned, some through their own fault. Some were exploited commercially, some were exploited politically, some were caused to suffer by bad legislation, and more perhaps by the poor interpretation and administration of good legislation. Well-meaning people who might have helped to alleviate the situation were cowed by the depression and the period of economic scarcity, and much less was done than we think could have been done under those conditions. But the conditions which prevailed in those depression years were more than a veteran problem.

The shadow of those years still darkens the hearts of parents and it dulls the hopes of youth in the service. I am sure it haunts the minds of honest employers who turn their attention to these problems in industry and consider what is to come again. The other day the hon. member for Vancouver North (Mr. Sinclair) suggested a policy and practice by which any veteran would be allowed to train on the same economic level as that on which he was trained for war. I venture to say that that suggestion is unanswerable; yet before we concur in it in its entirety there are questions to be answered, and I should like to propose some of those questions to-night.

How and by whom is the veterans' aptitude for training to be measured? We must remember that in the service he was trained for a specific job. Will his training be geared to his own desire or to his measured aptitude for the task? Will he be obliged to commit himself as to where he plans to use his newly acquired or retrained skill? Will his choice be governed by information made available by adequate surveys of the opportunities in his chosen locality? If it is to be a question of, "What would you like to do and what would you like to train for; here is a living while you train," how will the job balance be maintained not only in the community in which he lives but throughout Canada as a whole?

Something is being done with respect to this problem. To-day the soldiers returning to the various depots to be discharged from the Canadian services are interviewed first by the army examiners with whom they became familiar in the service. Part of the document known as WD-12 is prepared in conjunction with the officers of the Department of Pensions and National Health. This is a positive document which records the man's achievements in the service. It fills in the gap mentioned the other day by the hon. member for Vancouver North when he was referring to Lever Brothers, and their problem of getting information about the man's service. I am glad to say that this particular document is available in most districts to those officers of selective service whose duty it is to classify these returned veterans for positions in civil life in their community.

I should like to think and I would hope that that information, the appraisal part of that document, will be part of the record of the soldier which goes into selective service in the district to which he desires to go. Better still, I should like to see discharged veterans, both male and female, carry with them a record of the skills they have acquired, the training they have had and the advancement they have undergone during the period of their active service.

Not so long ago the Minister of National Defence for Air (Mr. Power) stated that the returning personnel from the services did not want to be pampered. He might have added that they are not going to be fooled by demagogues who dishonour them by bidding for their support. Fortunately, between the two wars we in Canada have been singularly free from that kind of political jobbery with respect to veterans. It is my hope—and I see some indication that this hope may be realized—that this condition will continue in Canada and that we shall not have that type of bidding which dishonours but does not fool the people at whom it is directed.

Before we go into the second division dealing with the responsibilities of governments to the returning personnel who come back without having suffered actual disability or damage in body or mind, we should perhaps make some estimate of the service they have performed. It is idle to say that everyone who volunteered did so with the idea of giving his life for his country. The man who volunteered no doubt realized that he might be called upon to make the supreme sacrifice for his country and he expressed the courageous willingness to do so, but that is not the only thing that motivated the men who enlisted. They went active for a variety of reasons. Sometimes there was a patriotic urge to do something about the despoiler of civilization; sometimes they did so through sheer boredom; sometimes it was hunger; sometimes there were other personal reasons. I once interviewed a man who was doing his one thousand, one hundred and seventy-first day of detention over a period of three years. Rather abruptly I asked him, "Why on earth did you join the army?" He said, "Frankly, to get away from my wife."

That was an exceptional case, but I think it illustrates the danger we may get into if we consider this problem from the purely sentimental point of view of enlistment. There is a debt upon us to every one who volunteered for active service, no matter from what impulse, a debt which can never be repaid. Consequently it is more important that we should concern ourselves with those debts which can be repaid rather than to try to assess one man's or one woman's service as against another's with lesser service or in a different theatre of war. I should regret to see anything get into our legislation which would tend to create that discrimination.

This question of the obligation of the state to those who perform the highest duties of citizenship involves more than that. It has been raised already in this house. It involves some attempt to fix the differential between those citizens who do their duty in active service and those who do their duty in any other capacity for which they were capable and to which they were physically limited. I think it is hopeless to try to do that by legislation. This is one place where we must trust administration to attempt to draw the line between common sense and sentiment.

This department which is being set up—it is really not a new department—must cooperate in a large way with local committees and local employers. I think this can be illustrated by giving the details of a case. A boy at the age of nineteen was making $90 a month as a valued employee of a large concern. To-day he is a lieutenant in the army; he has reached the age of twenty-four, is married and has one child. He leaves the service and desires to go back to the firm where he worked previously. However, he has no skill or training which would make him valuable in any better capacity than the $90 a month job he had before.

This department, in conjunction with the employer, or, where there is no employer, in conjunction with selective service, should devise some system of part work and part training. I know that is being done. With that cooperation a chap of this kind could work while training himself for a job which would be suitable to his capabilities and which would support himself and his family in adequate fashion. For such procedure I, for one, would hold up both hands for the suggestion of the hon. member for Vancouver North. In the case of planned training for a specific job there can be no reason and no excuse for paying less to the man in training for that job than he received when he was being trained for a specific job in active service. Unless this training is tied up to a specific job-opportunity, or at least based on established knowledge as the result of known opportunities in the locality in which he elects to live, then I am apprehensive that few more than the two or three per cent who at present take advantage of training will really be willing to take the training.

I think we talk too much in general terms when we speak of change, training and adjustment. We speak as though only by some upheaval of the conditions in which these men lived before they served could we hope to accomplish anything, or could any good come. I am inclined to think that if as many Canadians were looking boldly forward to-night as there are looking fearfully behind, this shadow of fear for the future of rehabilitation and reestablishment would pass from us. And, if by being fearful we inculcate fear in the minds of our returned youth in Canada we are doing them a great disservice.

If we train our returning youth to grasp security with both hands we shall never reach, or rise to the heights which some of us, at least, may have visualized for the future of Canada. Let us then care first for those who have suffered damage, and enable them to establish themselves in a way that they may not suffer as a result of that disabling incapacity. Having assured this, then perhaps if we fight and work for a new Canada which will give new opportunities as well as security, and, if we meet to-day's problems in an adequate and satisfactory manner such as will give hope and confidence to those who are returning, those who will return and those who wait for others to return, we shall have undertaken for the moment the main duty and the greatest opportunity of the newly-reconstituted department. At a later time, when we are in committee on the bill, I shall have something further to say with respect to some of the problems which arise because of the difference between the conditions in the last war and those in this one.

Mr. H. C. GREEN (Vancouver South): Mr. Speaker, this bill is described as an act to establish a Department of Veterans' Affairs. My understanding of the work of this new department is that it is to be responsible for all matters concerning war veterans. The Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) made that very clear when he moved the resolution preceding the bill. These were his words, as they are reported at page 2102 of Hansard:

Parliament is anxious to make the fullest provision for all matters that are likely to arise which may have a bearing upon their interests—

That is the interests of the veterans.

—through the period that is to follow at the conclusion of this terrible war.

Then the Minister of Pensions and National Health (Mr. Mackenzie) used words to the same effect, and in the same debate, as follows:

. . . the idea being that all measures affecting generally the welfare and rehabilitation into civil life of the members of our forces will be embraced within the ambit of the measure which will follow upon the resolution which is now before the committee.

So that I propose this evening to review this bill, having in mind that question, as to whether or not it is broad enough to enable the new department to deal with all matters of concern to war veterans.

I believe the house is unanimous in wishing to make the bill broad enough and modern enough and realistic enough to accomplish that purpose. This is one of those occasions, which are not so rare as the public believe, when all members of the house are trying to do a good job, and are cooperating to see that this bill is the best possible measure that can be enacted by the parliament of Canada.

Looking at the bill, and having in mind the test as to whether or not it meets the problem, I find several weaknesses which I consider fundamental. I believe they are serious weaknesses, and I urge upon the minister and the house that amendments be brought in to strengthen these weak spots in the bill. The first weakness, to my mind, is that the bill seems to have the approach of the last war. It reads as though it had been drawn by men who fought in that war. I am one of those men myself, and I think there is a grave danger that those of us who served in the last war are apt to judge everything by what happened to us. The fact is that conditions in the present war are vastly different, and there is need of a new approach.

I say that this bill has been drawn, having in mind the war of 1914-18. If members go through it carefully they will find that it closely resembles the Soldiers' Civil Re-Establishment Act, which is chapter 187 of the Revised Statutes of Canada, 1927. That was a measure which set up the first department to deal with soldiers after the last war. Furthermore, this bill is almost identical with part I of the Department of Pensions and National Health Act, passed in 1928 as chapter 39 of the statutes of that year.

Then, the duties, powers and functions given this new department under the bill are not wide enough. They are set out in section 5, the opening words of which are these:

The duties, powers and functions of the minister shall extend and apply to the administration of statutes enacted by the parliament of Canada, and of orders of the governor in council, as are not by law assigned to any other department of the government of Canada or any minister thereof—

And these are the key words:

—relating to the care, treatment, training, or reestablishment in civil life. . . .

Those are the key words. They do not go far enough. I say that the section should cover such things as rehousing the men in the present war. That is a very serious problem, and one which presents one of the greatest difficulties for the men returning from the war, particularly those who are married. As we know, many thousands of Canadian sailors, soldiers and airmen have married overseas. I have here a clipping from the Vancouver Province of June 7—about a week ago; it is headed, "Soldier Looks for House", and then, in quotation marks, "Sorry I Ever Came Back". The article goes on to say:

"I'm sorry I ever came back to Canada," is a familiar lament at the national housing registry these days, say officials here as 63 discharged servicemen and their families look for a place to live.

Most of the men have seen service on the battlefield. One was a prisoner in a Japanese prison camp.

The article then refers to one discharged man who belonged to our famous Seaforth Highlanders of Canada and who had been disabled overseas. He came back with his wife and three-year-old daughter, had been in Vancouver since May, and, the article states:

. . . since then they have been living in damp housekeeping rooms or separate boarding houses.

"We were happy in England," he said. "We had a little cottage in Surrey, with a garden, and chickens and rabbits."

A card telling about post-war rehabilitation plans was given to him on discharge. "But how do we get them?" he said.

He is only one of the hundreds who are having the same difficulty.

Therefore, I say, Mr. Speaker, that power should be given to the new department under section 5 of the bill to deal with the re-housing of soldiers. It will never be adequately dealt with by any other department.

Another matter is that of the repatriation of the dependents of our men from Great Britain. This will be one of the great problems affecting veterans of the present war. Already men are being sent back and discharged as unfit; yet their wives and children cannot cross the sea to their new homes in Canada. That, too, should be handled by this Department of Veterans' Affairs. It will never be adequately handled if it is the responsibility of any other department, because with another department the operation would be only a side-show, and if it did not get the last consideration it would be very close to the last.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): May I ask my hon. friend a question? Does he not think that repatriation is essentially a function of the defence services?

Mr. GREEN: No; I think the rehabilitation—

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): No; repatriation.

Mr. GREEN: The repatriation of the dependents of our men in the forces should be under this Department of Veterans' Affairs rather than one or other of the defence services, or the Department of Mines and Resources, where it is now—the immigration branch.

As to gratuities, the speech from the throne this year stated that during the present session a measure was to be brought down to provide war service gratuities. The session is drawing to a close; yet that legislation has not been introduced. Each day is important, because each day men are being discharged in Canada, and discharged without an adequate gratuity, with the result that they are handicapped just that much in settling back into civilian life. I suggest that these war service gratuities should also be handled by the Department of Veterans' Affairs, and that power so to handle them should be set out in the present bill.

I come to the question of employment. There is nothing in section 5 which gives the department power to deal with the matter of employing veterans. It is true that power is given to deal with their reestablishment, but that is only the beginning. A man may be reestablished when he comes back, and then in a year or two he may be faced with unemployment. Those of us who were in the last parliament know what a terrible problem that was in the years from 1935 to 1940; and as the hon. member for Winnipeg South (Mr. Mutch) has said, most of us became convinced that the care of these men was the responsibility of the dominion government. Sooner or later the question of who is to be responsible for finding work for unemployed veterans will come up again; and I suggest that power to meet that difficulty should be conferred in this bill upon the Department of Veterans' Affairs.

Also there should be power under section 5 to advise veterans. That is not set out here. At the present time there is no adequate provision for advising them either as to their rights and privileges or as to their opportunities. I know there are government officers whose duty it is to find out what jobs men are most likely to be suited to, but we must go farther than that. This department should be responsible for advising the men as to the occupations which are most likely to be open; and that, of course, would mean close collaboration by the various departments of government—munitions and supply, which would have to give some idea as to what types of manufacturing are to be carried on after the war, and other government departments. At the present time, I understand, these men get no idea of what types of jobs are likely to be available; they are simply asked what they would like to be and then, perhaps, given training for that particular calling. But we must go very much farther, and must advise them where there are most likely to be jobs.

Strangely enough, the one change made in section 5 is to delete from that section the power to care for the dependents of these men of ours who are coming back from the forces. In the Pensions and National Health Act of 1928 the last words of section 5 were, "and to the care of the dependents of such persons." I can only believe that these words were left out of this section by an oversight. Certainly that power should be given to the new department. Allusion to the care of dependents does appear in several other sections of the bill, but not in this key section 5.

Strangely, too, there is no mention in section 5 of pensions—no power given to the department to deal with pensions. That was not in either of the other acts to which I have referred. I do not suppose it is material, because the department will have to deal with pensions, anyway, but I suggest that words giving the power to deal with pensions should be inserted in section 5. If that change is made, perhaps the minister would consider using, instead of the word "pension," the words "war disability compensation," or words to the like effect. The use of the word "pension" may convey to some people the notion that the recipient is getting something for nothing, whereas if the words "war disability compensation" were used, one is reminded of the workmen's compensation, and it gives an entirely different idea

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): Would that terminology apply as well to dependent's pension—for instance, to a widow?

Mr. GREEN: Well, perhaps different words would have to be used in that case, but the minister understands the idea I am trying to convey.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): Yes.

Mr. GREEN: So much for suggestions with regard to the powers of this department. I think they can be made adequate only by an amendment of section 5 of the bill.

Then I suggest that in the bill provision should be made for the honorary committees which have already been appointed across Canada to assist in the rehabilitation of the men coming back from the war. I believe that these committees are doing good work. They are serving on an honorary basis, and I know that in my home city of Vancouver these men are trying very hard to help in the reestablishment of the soldiers who are coming back. But there is no mention of such committees in the bill, and I would point out that in the Veterans' Assistance Commission Act, which is chapter 47 of the statutes of 1936, provision was made for these honorary committees. The minister will find it in section 7 under the heading, "Honorary Local Committees". It provided that the veterans' assistance commission—

. . . with the approval of the minister, may appoint honorary local committees, composed of persons resident in any locality willing—

(a) to assist the commission in obtaining information relating to veterans which may be required for classification of unemployed veterans.

This act, by the way, was passed when we were faced with the need of finding employment for many thousands of veterans of the last war.

(b) to investigate and report to the commission upon measures and means in respect to the employment of veterans;

(c) to assist the commission in enlisting the cooperation of employers' and employees' associations as well as of such other public and private agencies as may be in a position to provide employment for veterans;

(d) to aid the commission in any other way in carrying out the provisions of this act.

[Mr. Green]

We already have honorary committees established to aid in rehabilitation, and I suggest that they should be given statutory recognition.

Provision should also be made in the bill giving the minister and the new department authority to cooperate with other governmental bodies and agencies. Similar power was given to the veterans' assistance commission. The minister will find that in section 9 they were given the job of investigating and reporting to the minister upon—

. . . ways and means of cooperation between the commission and

(a) any other commission or department of the government,

(b) any provincial government or agency thereof,

(c) any veterans' association,

(d) any commercial, agricultural or industrial group or organization.

The act went on to say that it was the duty of the commission to cooperate with these various other bodies. I am confident that if some such provision is inserted in this bill it will make it all the easier for us to get results. The Department of Veterans' Affairs will certainly have to cooperate very closely with such other dominion departments as national defence, munitions and supply, and labour, and, I think, also with the provincial governments and the veterans' associations, and with commercial, agricultural and industrial groups across Canada.

These suggestions I submit for the purpose of meeting the first great weakness in this bill, and I hope that the minister will see fit to adopt at least some of them before the bill becomes law. The second weakness in the bill is this, that the new department is not limited to veterans' affairs. I think it should be limited to looking after matters that concern war veterans. Goodness knows, these matters are going to be numerous and difficult enough without giving this new department any other job to do. When I refer to veterans, I include men of the merchant navy. I heartily agree with the statement made to-day by the hon. member for Cape Breton South (Mr. Gillis) about the merchant navy being treated as a fourth arm of the service. They are so considered by His Majesty the King, and all of us feel that they are in the war just in the same way as the navy, the army and the air force.

Mr. MUTCH: Except that they cannot shoot back.

Mr. GREEN: Yes; that is correct. We would have lost the war without them. I am of the opinion also that such men as those in the auxiliary services and the Canadian corps of fire-fighters should be given similar treatment; all those men who are really serving with the forces should be included in the bill. They should be treated in the same way as the men in the forces. I was very much struck by a letter received from one man in the auxiliary services actually serving with the troops in Italy. He came back from a tour of the line to find a notification in regard to his income tax. All the men in the forces overseas are free from income tax, but these other men in the merchant navy, the auxiliary services and the corps of fire-fighters are not. This is the letter this man wrote:

> The information in regard to payment of income tax was conveyed to me in December, 1943, while serving on the battlefront. It was imparted to me at a most grotesque time, when I had just returned from a point where the fighting was desperate, where the dead were lying by the side of the road and in the streets of a certain town and everything was foul and there was a terrible stench everywhere. I came back and was told that because I was only a camp follower I had to pay income tax. It might be a good idea to ask whoever was responsible for the issue of the decree to come out with me and share my work for a month or two.

These men of the legion, the Y.M.C.A., the Knights of Columbus, the Salvation Army are with the Canadian troops in France to-night, and yet they have to pay income tax. That is not right. These men, and the other groups to whom I have referred, should be treated as the men of the forces are. But this bill goes farther. Hon. members will find in the explanatory note the following words:

> The purpose of this bill is to establish a Department of Veterans' Affairs under the direction of a Minister of Veterans' Affairs who shall be responsible for the care, treatment, training, or reestablishment in civil life of ex-members of the armed forces and of persons otherwise engaged in pursuits relating to the war, and for the care of the dependents of such persons.

In section 5 we find the words "of any person" after the words I have quoted previously in my remarks. The similar section in the Department of Pensions and National Health Act referred to men who had served in the forces. This goes farther and refers to "any person". And by the way, the section might be considered broad enough to make the new department responsible for all vocational training of civilians, soldiers and anybody else. It could be construed in that way.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): Is it not the intention to protect the very services my hon. friend mentions?

Mr. GREEN: That may be, but if that is the intention they should be named in the Pension Act and in this bill, so that there can be no uncertainty about what their rights are. Then the same words in effect are found in section 7, subsection 1, paragraph (b). This paragraph is entirely new. The section gives the minister power to make regulations; paragraph (b) reads as follows:

> . . . respecting the care, treatment, or training to be furnished in any such hospital, workshop, home, school or other institution and providing for the care, treatment or training therein of such other persons as may be deemed advisable.

That could not be wider. I submit that the bill should be confined to veterans. The same thing is found in paragraph (g) of subsection 1 of section 7. This is the way it reads:

> . . . for the payment of pensions out of moneys provided by parliament for the purpose to persons who, while rendering service to Canada in the prosecution of any war, suffer any injury or disease or aggravation thereof resulting in disability or death not otherwise pensionable or to the dependents of such persons.

I clearly realize that the men and women working in our war factories have to be reestablished; that their need is great. But that should be done by another department, probably by the Department of Labour. I do not think it will work out to have the reestablishment of veterans and civilians put under this new Department of Veterans' Affairs.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): That is not the intention.

Mr. GREEN: The minister says that it is not the intention. I suggest that he change his bill so that the next minister, who may be in office within a few months, will not be led astray by the terms of the paragraph.

Mr. GRAYDON: He has to be a little more careful now.

Mr. GREEN: The third serious weakness in this bill is this paragraph (g) of subsection 1 of section 7, which I have read. It, too, is entirely new. It provides for pensions by regulation of the minister approved by the governor in council. That is a dangerous provision. Any right to pension should be statutory. It should not depend on any order in council or the whim of any minister. Furthermore, it may go so far as to enable the minister or the department to give a pension to favourites or to people who should not be entitled to them at all. I cannot understand why the government brings down a bill which contains this entirely new principle. I submit it is a very dangerous one. The Pension Act should clearly define who is entitled to a pension; it should not be left to any order in council. We have a good illustration of just what happens when there is this type of provision in the working out of section 11, subsection 3, of the Pension Act. That is the section which enables the pension commission to give a pension when a man cannot prove entitlement to it under the act because the insurance principle was taken out of the act, but where he is hard-up and has suffered a certain type of disability.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): Will my hon. friend read the first few lines of the paragraph, which are:

. . . for the payment of pensions out of moneys provided by parliament for the purpose to persons who . . .

In other words, it is sanctioned by parliament before the minister can act.

Mr. GREEN: Paragraph (g) is a new principle and should not be brought into the pension legislation of Canada, but I was referring to the—

Mr. GRAYDON: Parliament has to authorize the payment of all moneys. That is not what the hon. member is referring to.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): For specific purposes.

Mr. GREEN: I suggest that the minister should not close his mind to this—

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): No.

Mr. GREEN: —but should give my suggestion careful consideration. If he did that, I think he might find that he is wrong.

Mr. GRAYDON: I think he is weakening a bit now.

Mr. GREEN: I am not so sure. I was mentioning how this business of being indefinite as to who gets a pension works out under section 11, subsection 3 of the Pension Act. When the minister's estimates on the war appropriation bill were being considered he told us, as reported at page 3068 of Hansard, that up to the end of December, 1943, 977 pensions had been awarded under section 11, subsection 3. In practically all cases that applies to men who had served only in Canada. The total number of pensions awarded to men who had not served outside Canada was only 2,658, and that figure was up to February 29, 1944, some two months after the prior figures; all of which shows that a large proportion of the pensions awarded to men who have served only in Canada were not granted as of right, but granted under this clause which gave the commission discretion; between one-third and one-half were granted under the discretionary clause. I consider it an escape clause for the department of pensions from obligations which should be undertaken by them.

The fourth fundamental weakness in this bill is that it leaves the door open for appointments to the staff of the department on a patronage basis. That is found in section 7, subsection 1, paragraph (c).

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): I announced yesterday that that was to be amended.

Mr. GREEN: It may be amended, but will it be amended to remove the possibility of these appointments being made on a patronage basis?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): Absolutely.

Mr. GREEN: Then we shall see when we check the new amendment as it is brought down.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): That was announced yesterday.

Mr. GREEN: As the bill now reads, this provision is another blow at the merit system in the civil service of Canada, a blow in the case of a new and important department which will have many employees, which will face frightfully difficult problems, a department which we hope will be staffed by young Canadians, men of high ideals, men who are willing to sacrifice their lives for the country.

In connection with this fourth weakness in the bill may I suggest to the minister, as several other members have suggested this afternoon, that young men of the present war should be appointed to responsible posts in the new department. I think they should be given some of the executive posts, and some of them should be made members of the Canadian pension commission. Perhaps we old soldiers are good enough to deal with the problems of the men of the last war, but I think something more will have to be provided to meet the problems of the men of the present war. I strongly recommend to the minister that he see to it that many of these young men are included in the staff of the new department. Provision has been made by the civil service commission for the calling for applications from men overseas for government appointments. I think they should be used particularly in the case of this department.

Those are the weaknesses that I see in the bill and the suggestions that I have to remedy them. In closing, I would point out to hon. members that the re-settling of our men from the forces is a very broad and difficult problem. The possibilities for good or ill to Canada in connection with the work of this department are almost boundless. I believe that one of our main responsibilities as a parliament is to see to it that these young men get a proper start upon their return to civil life. I believe, further, that the future of this nation will shortly be in the hands of these young men and women from our forces.

Mr. SHAW: Mr. Speaker, there is not the slightest possibility that I shall be able to conclude my remarks this evening. That fact, together with the tremendous strain under which both the government and the official opposition must be labouring this evening, justifies me in asking you to call it eleven o'clock.

On motion of Mr. Shaw the debate was adjourned.

On motion of Mr. Mackenzie (Vancouver Centre) the house adjourned at 10.55 p.m.

Friday, June 16, 1944

The house met at three o'clock.

ALCOHOLIC BEVERAGES

REFERENCE TO EDITORIAL AND CARTOON IN TORONTO "GLOBE AND MAIL"

Hon. C. W. G. GIBSON (Minister of National Revenue): Mr. Speaker, my attention has been drawn to the editorial in to-day's Globe and Mail entitled "An Unfair Basis." The editorial is the latest move in what appears to be an organized campaign of misrepresentation of the federal government's wartime alcoholic beverage order—

Mr. GRAYDON: Are you charging that?

Mr. GIBSON: —by representing that the federal government is responsible for the fact that the monthly ration of spirits, authorized in Ontario is thirteen ounces, and in Quebec eighty ounces.

No detailed reply to its allegations is required.

On June 5 I gave to this house a statement showing the exact quantities of liquor allocated to the provinces of Ontario and Quebec, and showed that there was a difference of only 1·2 per cent between the quantities available in those provinces. It was also shown that the quantity available for Ontario had permitted a ration in that province of 160 ounces a month on the basis of permits outstanding in January, 1943, but that the increase in the number of permits issued by the Ontario Liquor commission from 155,295 in January, 1943, to 1,282,938 in March, 1944, had necessitated a reduction in the individual ration.

The federal government has nothing whatever to do with deciding what the ration shall be in each province. Each province is entitled to receive 70 per cent of the quantity of spirits released for sale in the year which ended October 31, 1942. In other words, each province receives exactly the same proportion of the quantity consumed in the base period.

While it is true that the per capita quantity of spirits available is very slightly higher in Quebec than in Ontario, the editorial entirely ignores the fact that the per capita quantity of beer available in Ontario is considerably higher than it is in Quebec. The unfair basis, in other words, proves to be the editorial itself.

I have also had my attention drawn to a cartoon entitled "Federal Dispensary" which appeared in the same newspaper on June 13, and which suggested the same idea. Under the circumstances, it can only be assumed that the editorial and the cartoon have been published with the deliberate intention of distorting the facts and misleading the public. The Globe and Mail cannot consider that it is assisting the war effort of this country by falsely representing that one province receives preferential treatment over another province, and it can only be assumed that its anxiety to obtain political advantage overrides its interest in our national welfare.

Mr. GRAYDON: Mr. Speaker, may I ask the minister a question with respect to the statement he has just made?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): This is on motions.

Mr. GRAYDON: Is the government going to take the position that I must not ask a question? Surely, Mr. Speaker, I have the right to do that. The government know they are wrong on this question and that is why they are so touchy about it.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. GRAYDON: If I cannot make myself heard, I think Mr. Speaker will protect me, and this is not the first time that I have had to ask for his protection. Surely I have some rights in this house. I am going to ask the minister why there is a difference between the system of rationing liquor and the system of rationing other commodities throughout the dominion. That is the basis of this editorial, if I read it correctly. Why is there this difference?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): The minister has just told you.

Mr. GRAYDON: No, he did not, and he is not telling me now.

Mr. GIBSON: The system of issuing permits is based on the amounts consumed in the base period.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): That ignores the question entirely.

Mr. GRAYDON: For some reason or another there is a distinction made by this government between the rationing of liquor and the rationing of other commodities.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): That is conceived by Tory minds.

TREATIES AND CONVENTIONS

CANADA-UNITED STATES—AVOIDANCE OF DOUBLE TAXATION AND PREVENTION OF FISCAL EVASION

Hon. C. W. G. GIBSON (Minister of National Revenue): Mr. Speaker, as was announced by the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) last week, a tax convention was signed at Ottawa on the 8th of June, 1944, between Canada and the United States of America having for its objects the avoidance of double taxation and the prevention of fiscal evasion in the case of estate taxes imposed by the United States and the succession duties imposed by the parliament of Canada.

I am now tabling the convention, and in the course of a few days a bill will be introduced for the purpose of ratifying the convention by parliament.

For the information of the house I will give a brief outline of the convention.

Both countries have in the past applied the principle of the deceased's domicile as well as the principle of the local situation of the assets of deceased persons in the taxation of estates. The result has been that in many cases the personal property of deceased owners has been subject to dual taxation—once by the country in which the deceased was domiciled at the time of his death and again by the country in which some or all of his assets were situated at that time.

Real property was the only type of asset which escaped this dual imposition, as both the United States and Canada make no attempt to tax realty situated outside the boundaries of the taxing jurisdiction.

The problem of double taxation was intensified by the fact that the rules applied by the United States of America in determining the local situation of shares and stocks of corporations differ from those applied in Canada. In the United States the principle applied was that this class of property was subject to taxation if it was in any way regarded as being under the control of the taxing authority. For example, the shares of companies incorporated under the laws of the United States or any of the states and owned by a non-domiciled decedent and physically situated outside the United States at the time of death were deemed to have a situs within the United States regardless of whether the certificate was in the name of the deceased, or in street name, or other bearer form.

In Canada, on the other hand, stocks and shares were regarded as being situated where they could be effectively dealt with, namely, at the place of registration of the securities. Although this principle was much less sweeping in its operation than that in force in the United States, it nevertheless gave rise to considerable trouble in relation to companies having duplicate or multiple share registers.

Some cause of complaint has arisen in the past as to the method of determining the rates of taxation applicable to estates of non-domiciled decedents by reference to the entire value of such estates. Representations have been made that each country should fix the rates of taxation in such cases by the value of the property situated in the country which imposes the tax.

While Canada grants exemptions from taxation in estates of non-domiciled decedents in the proportion that the value of the property in Canada bears to the total value of the deceased's estate, this method of exemption has not been applied so far in the United States. That country grants only a nominal exemption of $2,000 in all cases of non-domiciled decedents, notwithstanding that an exemption of $100,000 is granted in the case of domiciled estates.

With a view to removing these causes of complaint, and particularly in order to avoid double taxation of estates in future, conversations recently took place between the taxing officials of both countries with the result that the tax convention was finally agreed upon.

The main features of the convention may thus be summarized:

Real property is to be taxed exclusively by the country wherein it is situated.

The country of domicile to have the right, at the outset, to tax all the personal property of the deceased, as heretofore.

The country of situs to have the right to tax the property situated within its boundaries.

The taxes paid in the country of situs are to be allowed as a credit against the taxes payable in the country of domicile which includes the same assets for tax purposes. The credit, however, is to be limited to that portion of the tax in the country of domicile that the value of the taxable property abroad is of the total value of the deceased's estate.

There is to be a uniform rule in determining the situs of shares of corporations. These shares are to be deemed to be situated and taxable in the country where the corporation is organized.

While the rules as to situs of other properties vary somewhat in the two countries, it is agreed that for the purpose of the convention, the situs of such other properties is to be determined by the laws of the country imposing the tax.

Each country is to take into account only the property therein situated when taxing the property of persons dying domiciled in the other country.

Exemptions to be granted estates of non-domiciled decedents are to be the same as those granted to estates of domiciled decedents, reduced, however, in direct proportion that the value of the property taxed abroad bears to the total value of the property wherever situated. Canada will benefit considerably by this provision, as, at the present time, the United States only allows an exemption of $2,000 in the case of persons dying domiciled here, but this benefit is now only reciprocal to the benefit Canada always granted to the United States.

Articles VII to XIII of the convention are designed with a view to the exchange of information to prevent fiscal evasion. They are quite similar in scope to the provisions already in force with respect to income tax. By article XIV the convention is given a retroactive operation to 14th June, 1941, being the date when the original Dominion Succession Duty Act came into force. The convention is to remain in force for a period of five years from that date, and indefinitely thereafter, but may be terminated upon six months' notice at the end of the five year period or at any time thereafter.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): May I ask the minister a question arising out of this statement with respect to the taxation of shares? If I gathered correctly what he said, they were to be taxed in the jurisdiction in which the corporation had its head office?

Mr. GIBSON: No, where the corporation was organized.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): That is more correct. Does that mean that in the case of a United States corporation organized, we will say, in New Jersey, those shares in the hands of a domiciled Canadian would not be taxed here too?

Mr. GIBSON: That is right. An offset is allowed on account of the tax paid in the United States.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Will you have an interprovincial agreement to give effect to this as well?

Mr. GIBSON: This does not affect the provinces.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): With the permission of the house, may I ask the minister whether his department is taking any steps to effect some reciprocal arrangement between the dominion and the provinces under which duplication and triplication of succession duties may be avoided? Let me illustrate. Those of us who live in the small provinces, owning we shall say shares in a joint stock company with head office in the province of Ontario but with stock listed on the Montreal stock exchange, which under its rules requires that the transfer office shall be immediately available, say, in the city of Montreal, are obliged to pay not two succession duties on the same share of stock but three. I have always regarded that as a grave injustice and something that ought to be remedied at the earliest possible day. Has the Department of National Revenue taken any steps to eradicate that injustice on a reciprocal basis or otherwise, and on the gross value?

Mr. SPEAKER: That question should certainly not be asked on the orders of the day.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): It is on the record now and the minister can answer later.

CANADIAN FORCES

POSTAL SERVICES—DISTRIBUTION OF MAIL TO PERSONNEL IN FRANCE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. GORDON GRAYDON (Leader of the Opposition): Has the Postmaster General anything to add to his previous statement, made a short time ago, with respect to the distribution of mail to our troops in Normandy?

Hon. W. P. MULOCK (Postmaster General): I may advise the leader of the opposition that daily distributions of letter mails have been made since the beginning of operations. On June 7 all letter mail was dispatched, but was returned due to shipping difficulties. However, on June 8 all letter mail was dispatched and landed in France. On June 9 and 10 mail was dispatched but due to shipping difficulties was returned. However, on June 11 all letter mail was dispatched and landed in France. On June 12 also letter mail was landed in France.

In regard to parcel mails, these are to be dispatched daily, with the first dispatch expected to be on June 13. As yet I have no report as to whether that shipment was made on the 13th of June.

POLITICAL ACTIVITIES—CLOTHING ALLOWANCE TO DISCHARGED PERSONNEL

On the orders of the day:

Mr. GORDON GRAYDON (Leader of the Opposition): I desire to ask the Minister of National Defence if he will table the order in council which was passed yesterday in connection with the regulations covering the political activities of members of the armed forces.

I wish to ask a further question. Last week the minister indicated that consideration was being given by his department to increasing the clothing allowance to members of the armed forces on discharge. Can he inform the house when we may expect a decision to be made by the government on this point?

Hon. J. L. RALSTON (Minister of National Defence): As regards the first question, I received a copy only just before I came in. The order in council to which the leader of the opposition refers, regarding regulations covering political activities of members of the service, will be laid on the table on Monday.

In reference to the matter of clothing allowance, it has been under consideration along with certain other matters respecting rehabilitation. It affects the whole three services, and I would hope that the situation may be such that an announcement can be made very shortly.

INVASION OF WESTERN EUROPE—CASUALTIES

On the orders of the day:

Hon. R. B. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I wish to ask the Minister of National Defence when this country may expect some report of the casualties in the invasion areas. The invasion has now been on for ten days and so far as I am aware no report has been received by anybody in Canada. I understand that reports have been made in the old country. I think we are entitled to know the nature and extent of the casualties up to date, and immediately.

Hon. J. L. RALSTON (Minister of National Defence): I assure my hon. friend that nothing whatever but security considerations prevents the announcement of casualties, both the number and the names.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): It will have to come sooner or later.

Mr. RALSTON: The names will not be announced publicly until, under the usual arrangement, about thirty days after the casualties occur. As to the numbers, I shall be glad to communicate with our allies and make an announcement as soon as that is found practicable having regard to security conditions.

RESERVE ARMY AND MOBILIZATION ACT PERSONNEL —REFERENCE TO REMARKS OF MR. RAYMOND IN DEBATE ON JUNE 13

On the orders of the day:

Mr. VINCENT DUPUIS (Chambly-Rouville): On June 13, as reported in Hansard of that date, the hon. member for Beauharnois-Laprairie (Mr. Raymond), speaking on the bill enabling Canadian war service electors to exercise their franchise, stated, at page 3763 of Hansard:

> Why bar the members of this reserve army, who are only eighteen and nineteen years of age, from voting, when they are being called up for military service? Why prevent them from voting when they are being mobilized at eighteen, under a hypocritical legislation, which has been called mobilization act while it is a conscription act, and when they are liable, as the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Ralston), stated, to be called up for service overseas; indeed, they have been sent to Kiska, Jamaica and Newfoundland. This group of enlisted men are discriminated against and I wish to register my protest before this bill is passed.

This speech is undoubtedly based on a falsehood or at least on a complete misunderstanding of section 5 of the bill, and, if spread among the population, it is bound to give ground for an unjustifiable discrimination.

Mr. SPEAKER: Order. The hon. gentleman must not volunteer his opinions. He has laid the basis for his question. Will he now ask the question?

Mr. DUPUIS: I think it is in the interests of hon. members to see that our war effort is not handicapped and that is what I am doing. The Ottawa newspaper Le Droit, in its edition of June 15, and the Montreal newspaper Le Devoir, in its edition of June 14, basing themselves on the hon. member's speech—

Mr. LACOMBE: Mr. Speaker, I rise to a point of order—

Mr. DUPUIS: —have published articles which will have the effect of spreading such a harmful blunder.

Mr. LACOMBE: Mr. Speaker—

Mr. DUPUIS: Will the hon. gentleman wait until I am through, and then he can speak. With a view to giving a chance to the hon. member (Mr. Raymond) and to these newspapers, who no doubt acted in good faith, to rectify their mistake, may I ask the hon. Secretary of State to make the appropriate correction.

Hon. N. A. McLARTY (Secretary of State): The hon. member for Chambly-Rouville (Mr. Dupuis) was kind enough to advise me of his intention to ask this question, and perhaps it is desirable that the confusion which has existed should be cleared up in the public mind. It doubtless arose from the remarks already quoted which the hon. member for Beauharnois-Laprairie made on the third reading of the bill. There was apparently in his mind some confusion based on the difference between those who were called up under the mobilization act and those who were in the reserve army.

As the matter is somewhat technical I believe this house will agree that, in fairness to members, and for the advantage of those in the country who will be affected at the next election, it should be definitely cleared up.

Perhaps I should give a definition of the two forces, not that practically every member does not know it, but apparently the hon. member for Beauharnois-Laprairie was labouring under a certain amount of confusion.

Reserve personnel of the Canadian militia, who are generally described as reserve army personnel, are members of the Canadian army who have not been placed on active service or who are not deemed to be on active service. They are not in full time military employment but are only required to perform a certain number of days training per annum, part of which is carried out in summer camps and the remainder throughout the year in their own localities.

On the other hand a National Resources Mobilization Act soldier is a soldier who has been enrolled and is undergoing training or performing service or duty under the National Resources Mobilization Act or the regulations passed pursuant thereto. Upon his being enrolled in the army a National Resources Mobilization Act soldier is deemed to be and is placed on active service pursuant to the Militia Act. In this respect and because he is in full time military employment his position is entirely different from that of a member of the reserve army as mentioned above.

Bearing in mind those definitions, provision is made that everyone called up under the mobilization regulations who is performing training, service or duty in any of the naval, military or air forces, regardless of age, may vote as a war service elector wherever he may be stationed and whether it be within Canada or elsewhere.

On the other hand, one serving in the reserve army may also vote as a war service elector but requires to be of the full age of twenty-one years, absent from his ordinary place of residence while undergoing training at a duly authorized training camp or school established for full-time courses, or has been called up on service by the Minister of National Defence. This includes a member of the university air training corps or a member of the air cadet corps who is at present in the course of duty at a Royal Canadian Air Force unit.

This will, I trust, remove the confusion which might otherwise be created by the remarks of the hon. member for Beauharnois-Laprairie.

Mr. GRAYDON: It provides a good subject for a speech, anyway.

VETERANS' AFFAIRS

ESTABLISHMENT OF DEPARTMENT TO DEAL WITH THE CARE, TREATMENT, TRAINING OR REESTABLISHMENT OF MEMBERS OF THE ARMED FORCES

The house resumed from Thursday, June 15, consideration of the motion of Mr. Mackenzie King for the second reading of bill No. 83, to establish a department of veterans' affairs.

Mr. F. D. SHAW (Red Deer): During the past few days a great many members of the house have engaged in debate on the motion of the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) to give second reading to bill No. 83, an act to establish a department of veterans' affairs. I think we can agree that practically every aspect of rehabilitation, especially as it applies to the ex-servicemen, has been touched upon by the members. I realize therefore that in speaking upon the measure at this time one is likely to engage in a certain amount of repetition. I shall endeavour as far as possible to avoid that fault. It is quite obvious I think that the members of the house generally speaking are agreed upon the desirability of establishing a separate department for the express purpose of handling those measures relating to our ex-servicemen. I believe I am quite correct in saying also that that feeling is shared by the people of Canada and would also be supported by the service personnel. I would hasten to add however that the mere establishment of a department of this nature does not of necessity guarantee that our ex-servicemen will be given that complete consideration which some of us believe they deserve. If this were a department for any other purpose I might have a tendency to oppose it. I say that for the reason that generally speaking the tendency of government to expand, grow and take in new territory, increase its payroll and so forth, is something that must be guarded against; but I propose to deal with that on another occasion.

Between 1914 and 1918 the constituency which I have the honour to represent gave very generously of its men to the armed forces. Following the cessation of hostilities at that time many of our men returned to that constituency, but unfortunately there were men who did not. Of those who did return a few things might well be said at this time. First, we have those who were partly, and in some cases, almost totally disabled. We realize that because of the involved regulations and restrictions many of those who did return in that physical state found themselves without pensions. Just how general that may have been I do not propose to hazard a guess, but suffice it to say that a great many of them did return in a disabled condition, and because of some harsh restriction or because of some technicality they were deprived of their just due.

Then again we had a number of those who were disabled who were fortunate enough to secure a pension. History records that in all too many cases those pensions were hopelessly inadequate. The result was that many of those partly disabled veterans endeavoured to find employment in the labour market in competition with those who were physically fit. Then there were many of our ex-servicemen who were established under the Soldier Settlement Act. My colleague, the hon. member for Battle River (Mr. Fair) did not leave anything unsaid in dealing with those soldier settlers. I wish to say that I concur in what he said. I heartily endorse his remarks and subscribe fully to his claim that these settlers should be granted clear title to their homes.

If I may just go back to the commencement of the operation of that scheme, in my constituency we found, as was found everywhere in Canada, these veterans were placed upon land which was valued at, I dare say, twice its present-day value. Machinery and stock was provided at inflated prices and, as was stated by the hon. member for Battle River, the interest charge of five per cent on the debt was out of line, as was the seven per cent charged on the arrears. It is not necessary for me to trace the history of that settlement programme during the subsequent years. We know that of the total only a few were successful in acquiring clear title to their property. Many of them paid more than the property was ever worth in the first place, and yet were in the position of still owing more than the price at which the land should have been sold to them in the beginning.

As one travels about in his constituency or elsewhere and has occasion to visit with and talk to these veteran settlers of the first world war, ones heart is torn because in many instances they are men of fifty-five, sixty-five, and, yes, seventy years of age. They have tried; they have worked hard, and while it is true you may find the very few who could have done better, that cannot be said of the majority. They did their best, and, as I said a moment ago, paid more than the land was worth. And yet they are faced with this situation: periodically they are threatened with cancellation of the contract and offered a lease agreement made for a period of one year. In other instances they have been given new contracts for a period of twenty years. I am bound to say that it is fantastic to offer a man sixty-five years of age a twenty-year contract and imply that at the end of twenty years he will have paid for the property and will become the owner of it.

I wish to repeat that there is a general feeling in my part of the country at least that unless we are prepared to do justice to those veterans of the first world war there is little hope for the right thing being done for the veterans of this war. Some may say that that feeling is not justified, but it exists, and in a measure I feel the same way. I do not like to deal with individual cases of pensions, and I shall not do it by name, but I have encountered a large number of cases where a man was expected to subsist on a pension of $4 or $5 a month. I recall one case in particular, that of a man who attained the rank of sergeant-major. During the last war he spent almost four years in France. He suffered a concussion and was gassed, and as a result was sent to hospital. After a number of months in hospital he was returned to Canada and discharged. For a period of seventeen years he was obliged to try to get by on $3.75 a month. It is true that he was able to work part-time, but he probably worked for three or four days and then was sick for a couple of weeks. I would not mention that case if it were the only one of which I have information. It happens so frequently that I hope no one will ever be able to say that out of this war will come veterans who are obliged to try to get by on pensions of that type.

I have also had brought to my attention a number of cases in which, upon discharge, the soldier was refused pension outright, regardless of the fact that he produced all the affidavits and other documents necessary to prove that there had been a very serious deterioration in the state of his health as a result of his service. He was refused repeatedly; then, probably nine or ten years after the cessation of hostilities, he was finally conceded a small pension. One case still stands out in my memory. The veteran himself is now dead; it is a wonder he lived as long as he did, considering the treatment he received. This man was discharged in 1919, but not until 1927 did they finally agree that he was deserving of a pension, or, in other words that his disability was attributable to war service. It seems to me a remarkable thing that it should take any commission nearly ten years to determine that fact. This man died in 1939, after which his widow received nothing. The pension was very small, only $15, but with the loss of it the widow was obliged to go out into the labour market and endeavour to obtain employment in order that she might live. I have a number of cases of the kind, and I sincerely trust that as a result of these experiences we may learn and, more important, that we may make good use of that knowledge.

Again in this war my constituency has given generously of its men and women. Many of them are the sons and daughters of veterans of world war No. 1. In instances to which I could refer specifically I have fought the cases of their parents; yet, regardless of the unfortunate deals which their parents received, these young people were prepared to and did answer the call of their country for help. In one or two cases it was surprising to me that this should be so, bearing in mind the unfortunate experience of their parents. Men from my constituency have served in every theatre of war in which the Canadian forces have served. We have had our causalties, unfortunately, but so have the other parts of Canada. We have had men killed; we have had men permanently disabled. Some men whom I know personally are in German prison camps, and I am very proud to be able to say that a number of our men, from my home town and elsewhere, were with the third division when it stormed the coast of France. I know those boys are standing up to their responsibilities in magnificent fashion. I was quite impressed by the remarks of one hon. member who spoke yesterday, I believe one of the Winnipeg members, who said in effect that no material consideration can repay these heroes of ours for the sacrifices they are making to ensure the freedom and security of this nation. I hold the view quite firmly, Mr. Speaker, that money cannot make up for the loss of life. I do not believe that anything we can give a man can make up for the loss of a limb or any other serious physical disability. Much less can we make up with money for the ravages of spiritual and mental anxiety, which may be the highest price he has to pay.

During the months and years which have gone by I have had a good deal of correspondence with men in the services. I read their letters with the utmost care, for one reason because I want to ascertain what they may be thinking with respect to their post-war possibilities and opportunities. Sometimes it is said that these boys who are engaged in battle are not concerned about the future, that they know they have a job to do and that they believe the future will take care of them. I do not entirely subscribe to that view, from the correspondence I have received. I am going to repeat one or two sentences from a letter I received from one of our young men in an overseas theatre of war. These may not be his exact words, but they are as close as I get them, not having his letter immediately at hand. He said:

> We are supposed to be fighting to safeguard the democratic ideals and to preserve the sovereign integrity of our nation. When war ends and I return—

I recall so well that he had in brackets "if I do return"—

> —shall I be given the opportunity to share in the wealth which I fought to save? Shall I be given an opportunity to own part of the land which I fought to save?

I want to emphasize that he seemed to lay stress on the word "opportunity." He was not asking that everything be handed to him when he returned; all he asked was an opportunity. In my reply to that boy among other things I said:

> In my opinion the least Canada can offer is a chance to share in the wealth and in the heritage of culture and scientific progress which you and your comrades are saving from the clutches of aggressor nations.

Probably I should have added, "not only to share, but to share on a fair and equitable basis with all others." These boys in the service who are doing a job, and doing it well, are quite properly looking to us at home to see to it that when they return it will be to a country worthy of their magnificent courage, of their sacrifices and of the ideals for which they are fighting. In my opinion this obligation constitutes an essential responsibility confronting every last Canadian. I know that there is a tendency on the part of some to look to a government or to a particular group of people to bring about the very desirable results to which I have referred, but I really feel that this great problem of taking care of our service men and women when the war is over is the responsibility of all Canadians in all parts of Canada.

In 1939 Canada entered this war with a great deal of determination. At that time total employment in Canada amounted to about 4,000,000—I am speaking only roughly. Within a period of four years we had increased our employment to approximately 5,000,000. Out of that number approximately 2,000,000 were in the armed services, or were engaged in providing the machines of war, or were producing those things necessary for war export purposes.

The point I wish to emphasize in that regard is this: We did enter the war with great zeal and determination, and we accomplished things which only a month or so before the outbreak of war were regarded as being utterly and completely impossible. We also took our men from the streets—and from the mines, the farms and the factories. We pointed out to them their duty, and they responded cheerfully and magnificently. We took that boy from the street, the boy who had never been able to find employment, the boy who could not secure a decent wage while he was on the street—if, indeed, any wage at all—and we provided for him not only his clothing, but dental, medical, optical, hospital, educational and other services. We armed him and paid him. We also transported him to the theatre of war. Those boys are well aware to-day that, because of our determination to utilize—and I shall use an oft-used term—the wealth and the production of the country, we were able to attain that degree of achievement which was most desirable.

In some parts of Canada we hear it said, and we read it in publications, that it was only because of the great need and because of such unusual determination that we were able to accomplish the things it was necessary to accomplish in war-time, but that after the war we cannot hope to be able to accomplish so much in the field of non-war activities. I do not subscribe to that view at all. I say that when the war is over and when our lads return we shall have a country poorer only in the sense that we have lost so many of our youth. But we shall have a country developed as it has never been developed before, with a productive capacity not dreamed of in days gone by. All we must do is accept it as our responsibility, so that when these lads come back we shall be able to say, "We have that which is necessary to give you what you have earned because of your contribution."

During the course of the debate several members have pointed out, in definite terms, the things we must guarantee to our boys upon their return.

Mr. SPEAKER: I must point out that the hon. member is not dealing with the principle of the bill. I would consider that he is discussing social reconstruction, but not dealing with the terms of the bill, which, it seems to me, are definite. I point out to hon. members generally that in the first instance we must deal with the principle of the bill and, having accepted the principle, the details may be discussed when the house is in committee.

Mr. SHAW: Mr. Speaker, I thank you for your leniency up to the present point. I had really completed what I wanted to say in that regard.

[Mr. Shaw.]

In my opinion when these lads return we should be prepared to guarantee them full pay and allowances of the rank of private until such time as they are able to fit themselves into the economic life of the country. By that I do not mean that our boys returning from overseas should of necessity be retained in uniform. One hon. member indicated a day or two ago that the boys were anxious to get this whole thing over and get out of uniform. In advocating that we guarantee to them full pay and allowances to the rank of private until such time as we absorb them into the economic life of the country, I am not advocating that they be retained in uniform against their will.

I say, too, that to those same men we must guarantee hospitalization and treatment for illness, without the application of the previous policy of deducting pay for such attention from their incomes. Further than that, it is most essential that in respect of the dependents of those killed while in service we should make full and adequate provision for pensions at a figure no less than the full rate of pay of a private, including dependents' allowances. Then, in respect of children more than eighteen years of age, to supplant dependents' allowance there should be an educational grant of a sum sufficient to enable them to secure the education which their parents might have been able to provide had the father been at home.

What I say in that regard must also apply to the men of the merchant marine. To my mind it is a tragedy that those men, who are probably playing just as important a part in the prosecution of the war as are our troops—and I do not say this in any disparaging way at all—find themselves extolled in song and story but almost entirely forgotten when it comes to the securing of benefits received by members of the armed services. I had brought to my attention not long ago the case of a man who had served two years in the merchant marine, and who was discharged only recently because of his physical condition. He had reached the age of sixty years. That man had served in the north Atlantic, the south Atlantic and the Indian ocean, and yet, following his discharge, when I pressed for consideration in connection with having the interest rate on his soldier settlement contract reduced from 5 per cent to 3½ per cent, I was told that unless he was pensioned, favourable consideration could not be given to his application. The hard part in the letter I received in reply was the statement by the minister to the effect that after all, the process of reducing his interest rate from 5 per cent to 3½ per cent would mean a saving of only $20 a year. I thought that was cold, and perhaps just a little brutal. In other words, they said that since it was only $20 a year—which might mean a great deal to that man—they should not be too greatly concerned about granting it to him.

I should like to say a few words in connection with the present policy for establishing our soldiers on the land. The hon. member for Battle River indicated that he proposed discussing this matter at some length at the appropriate time. Let me say that I agree the present Veterans' Land Act is an improvement over the old Soldier Settlement Act. But this is a thought which repeatedly passes through my mind, and has been brought to my attention on many occasions: Provide the veteran with a parcel of land, provide him with an equity in that property, provide him with a lower rate of interest than he has ever enjoyed before, and yet after you have done all those things, he is still left at the mercy of an internal economic system which may ruin and crush him completely. Even under the Veterans' Land Act the man so established cannot possibly weather the gale if he is subjected to the conditions to which the soldier settlers of the last war were subjected during the early thirties. It would be utterly and completely impossible.

And so I assert that hand in hand with all the schemes for the rehabilitation of our soldiers after the war there must be a complete and full realization that unless we give careful thought and consideration to the making of very necessary changes in the economic structure of this country, we shall find that we have failed in our attempt to bring about the results which I think we are all agreed are so necessary.

I have not endeavoured to go into any details, Mr. Speaker, in connection with the veteran measures which the government have proposed. I do not think it should be necessary that we should press, for instance, for an adequate clothing allowance. The government should know what is an adequate and what is an inadequate clothing allowance, and that principle applies to the whole field of reestablishment. Just let the officials put themselves in the position of the individual who is coming back after the war; consider all the benefits and consider all the obstacles; and then ask themselves the fair and square question: Would I regard this as being adequate? I know that if the present inadequate clothing allowance is increased to $125, some may press for $150. I know it is completely impossible to please everyone. But if the government themselves would do that thing which they themselves would be satisfied with if they were in the position of the returning service man, many of the disabilities which crop up under these different types of reestablishment measures would probably never occur.

In conclusion, may I express the hope that after this war we shall not have a repetition of what occurred after the last war, that we shall have nothing not even remotely resembling the conditions which developed after the last war. We owe that to our men. They are looking to us for it, and I think, Mr. Speaker, that we are big enough to do the job. This does not constitute any utopian dream—I hear that phrase used so frequently. When I advocate what I regard as being only limited justice to the veteran, I always hear someone expressing the idea that it is just another utopian dream. In my opinion there is nothing more potent in building up morale among the service men than the knowledge that the ideals for which our boys are fighting to-day are on the way to becoming the realities of to-morrow.

Mr. THOMAS REID (New Westminster): Mr. Speaker, it is perfectly true that all our thoughts are centred on the invasion front at this time and what is happening there. While it is most desirable that the business of the house be expedited, nevertheless it is only natural that any measure affecting the men and the women in our armed forces, especially those who are at the moment fighting our battles overseas, will create considerable interest and discussion in the house. While, generally speaking, Mr. Speaker, on the second reading of a bill only the principle may be discussed, one cannot discuss intelligently the many changes that have been made in the measure now before us unless one deals with more than the mere principle of the bill. With the principle I am in hearty accord.

First of all let me say that the grouping together of all the various departments dealing with veterans' affairs under one ministry will I believe meet the wishes and the points of view of all our citizens. Let me here express one personal wish regarding that ministry. It is my hope, and I believe I speak the thought of many members of the house and many people outside, that the present Minister of Pensions and National Health (Mr. Mackenzie) will be left long to carry out the duties that it will be necessary to perform under the new set-up. I was pleased to see that in the act national health is separated from pensions. The national health of our people has become a most important subject, and we are taking such notice of it that to separate this subject from pensions is to my mind certainly a step in the right direction.

A little later I wish to deal with one aspect of the bill relating to the Veterans' Land Act, as I have one or two matters to discuss with regard to its operations.

The other day one of the members—I think it was the hon. member for Vancouver North (Mr. Sinclair)—suggested when speaking to the house that in the setting up of a new department and the appointment of new officials every consideration be given to the young men of this war. With that view I think we are all in accord. But as one who has taken a great interest in pension matters may I say that what is more particularly desired is that the officials appointed should have a sympathetic frame of mind rather than one seeking to conform too strictly to the letter of the act. It is not generally known and recognized throughout the country, and many members of parliament still fail to recognize, that even the minister himself will be governed and is governed by the Pension Act. Therefore it seems to me important that the officials who are handling the administration, those behind the scenes having to do with the appeals coming before them, be men of sympathy and understanding. There is not a great deal of complaint in that regard at the present time, but such was not always the case. I well remember, and so will every member of the house, that during the years from 1930 to 1935 or 1936 there were officials in that department who were not always as sympathetic to the appeals and requests made by returned men as many of us thought they should be. In those days, too, the pension advocates were not always as vigorous as they might have been. It was my impression after presenting many claims on behalf of returned men that some of the pension advocates were a little hesitant in putting forth all the fight within them on behalf of the cases they had in hand. I got that impression after observing their efforts at some of these hearings. They were perhaps a little afraid that those in authority at Ottawa, not particularly the minister, but the officials in authority, might not wish that too many favourable decisions be given.

Mention was made by one member speaking yesterday of the members of the treasury board. I have a severe criticism to make regarding the treasury board. After all, it is not the minister who will handle the pension cases. Once the act is in effect, appeals go before the pension commissioners and their officials. They sit as a court, and after their decision is given in a case it is my opinion that their decision, if favourable, should be final. I have personal knowledge of case after case where, after the decision had been given, officials of the treasury board undertook to look over the case and either reduced the pension or declared that it should not be given. I believe the country is tired of that kind of control.

Mr. MARTIN: That has not been done recently, has it?

Mr. REID: I know of one recent case in which it was done. It is true that there must be some control over expenditures; but surely, after a man's history file has been looked into, after the entire case has been investigated, no official from some other department or branch should sit in judgment upon that man's case and act to his detriment. I ask the minister to endeavour at least to see to it that treasury board officials keep their hands off the cases, especially in which, after the circumstances have been gone into, a favourable decision has been given.

One matter I would ask the minister to take note of in the new set-up relates to the provision whereby pensions can be granted under what is known as the meritorious clause. I was surprised to find how few pensions had been granted under this provision. No pension commissioner with whom I have discussed the matter has been able to define what the meritorious clause really means. I mention this particularly because the present war is entirely different from that of 1914-18, and there will be many men coming back who have flown planes over Germany, and who may have to outward appearance no bodily injury, but who must have suffered; so in the handling of cases under the meritorious clause a new interpretation will have to be given to it in order that those appealing under it may have a chance of obtaining a pension.

Despite what the hon. member for Macleod (Mr. Hansell) said the other day, I believe that every member of the House of Commons and the people generally are agreed that no monetary considerations should be placed in the way of providing our returned men with pensions. That principle is generally accepted. Although hon. members may not always applaud it in the house, I think it is only fair to say that every one of us is agreed that financial conditions shall not be allowed to obstruct adequate provision for those men who have given so willingly and freely of their lives, and but for whom we of this House of Commons might to-day not be here.

May I also draw the attention of the minister to the desirability of building or procuring smaller hospitals apart from the general hospital which is usually designated as that to which all returned men must go. I believe that a condition we have in British Columbia is not dissimilar to conditions in other provinces. I know how difficult it is for a man say in the Fraser Valley to reach the Vancouver Shaughnessy hospital; in fact, from so short a distance as forty miles it will take him at least the entire day to go to Shaughnessy hospital and return. I recognize that it is desirable to assemble in one large building all the paraphernalia, the up-to-date equipment and machines required to examine and treat men who are sick. Nevertheless it may be well to give some thought to the setting up of smaller hospitals to which men with minor complaints, requiring perhaps only one or two days' treatment, could resort instead of having to spend a great deal of time in going to and attending at larger institutions. There are indeed cases wherein the time element may mean the difference between life and death.

The desirability of providing work was mentioned the other day as important, and it is important. I suppose every hon. member has had much the same experience as I have. From 1930 to 1939 the number of appeals received by members of parliament from men who either wanted a pension or wanted it increased was enormous, but after 1939 the number dropped, proving to me at least that if suitable work could be provided, many of the economic ills from which these men were suffering or thought they were suffering would disappear. So that to my mind at least, the provision of useful work is most important, particularly to our returned men, who should come first.

There are one or two things I want to say with regard to the Veterans' Land Act. I would point out to the house that if those of us from western Canada take up the time of the house on this subject it is because the four western provinces, including British Columbia, had more applications for settlement on the land than did the other provinces. It is interesting to know that of the 25,000 who applied for help to go on the land under the soldier settlement board after the last great war, over 20,000—to be exact, 20,736—were from the provinces of Manitoba, Saskatchewan, Alberta and British Columbia.

As regards the new Veterans' Land Act, it is an improvement upon the old Soldier Settlement Board Act, but I believe that one factor which will militate against the successful carrying out of this measure will be that many of the old sores which arose from the last Soldier Settlement Act still remain. I am not going to take up the time of the house on this occasion in reading personal letters, but when one realizes that only 3,833 claims have not been paid, I do not think it is too much to ask that these be cleaned up and that we have a new deal and a fresh start all round. I was one of those who advocated this when the Veterans' Land Act was before the house, and I still believe that what I then advocated is the proper policy. I do so after twenty years of experience amongst returned soldiers in British Columbia, and I know that one of the things which put most of them out of business was the load of interest. Of 25,000 men who recently made applications to go on the land, 13,550 did not make good. I use these words advisedly because I do not think it is proper to say that they failed. In the words of the man in the street, the cards were stacked against them before they went on the land.

I do not wish to rehash the past, but it is well known that the government at that time, not having any plan, were not particular where the men went so long as they did not congregate in the cities and were spread out in the rural communities throughout most of the provinces. When I look over the financial statement and realize that over $25 million has been paid in interest, it is to me staggering indeed. The exact amount of interest paid to the present time is $25,381,060. When one realizes that only 3,883 have repaid their loans, which is equal to only fifteen per cent, it means that interest payments made by all who participated in the scheme from the inception of the act to the present time must have averaged between $1,500 and $2,000 each, plus of course cost of administration. Total administration cancellations, as pointed out yesterday by the member for Battle River (Mr. Fair), amounted to $88 million, which also is a staggering amount of money.

I still believe that even at this late date, before placing these men on the land we consider placing them on property that is interest free, because if the man did have a few lean years he would know that his debt would not increase. One can produce case after case where men paid more than their whole principal amount and still owe at least fifty per cent of the original debt. What effect will the condition of these men have on the new settlers going on the land? I say it will have a disastrous effect.

The government of British Columbia have set aside one million acres of land which they are offering to the dominion government on which, if desired, returned men can be settled; but there is one proviso in it which does not make the offer so good, and that is that the men settling on the million acres shall be soldiers who left British Columbia. That means that soldiers from other provinces will not be allowed to settle on any of the million acres in the interior. I have been in British Columbia from 1909, quite a number of years, and from my experience of that province I would say that not many who were born in British Columbia would care to go and live anywhere on that million acres offered by the provincial government; they would prefer to be nearer the larger cities on the coast.

Then there is the cost of clearing. When the new department is set up, the minister, I suggest, might have the whole area surveyed, because first of all there are no men from the outside provinces to be allowed there, and secondly the men who will go there, if any men who do go there, will be very few indeed, and the land has to be cleared. A scheme could be brought about whereby those from the services or others could be utilized to clear the land to make it habitable. But what is more important—and this is the proposition I put to the government—is that instead of centering most of our energies and thoughts on land and farms for the men coming back we should centre our thoughts and activities on the providing, for the men who come back, of modern homes. I think that it will be generally agreed that one of the things first desired by most of us is that we should have a house to live in, and many of the ranches and properties which the men will be asked to go on have not the proper houses. To my mind nothing will make a man more discontent with his lot than to be compelled to live in some old shack.

I would ask the minister to consider providing houses, and I suggest that that should be made the first requirement, instead of concentrating on putting the men on the land. I would point out to the minister, and he knows it as well as I do, that so far as British Columbia is concerned, the fight which the men will have to put up there if they are to do well is going to be harder than in some other provinces, owing to the fact that in that province we have little or no industries.

What has happened since 1939? It is evident that what is required is some financial help if one is to maintain oneself on one of the ranches or farms in the Fraser valley or in British Columbia. Since 1939 hundreds upon hundreds of our citizens have left those places. Why? First of all, they wanted to help in the war effort, and, second, they needed financial assistance, or wages or salaries on which to live, which they did not have prior to the commencement of the war.

I mention these thoughts because I am a little fearful that the present Veterans' Land Act, good though it may seem to some, will not be all that some people claim it to be or hope it will be. After the experience we have had in British Columbia, and after the heart-breaking scenes I have witnessed, I would urge that the minister, even at this late date, give further consideration to the whole matter, and in the light of some of the thoughts I have expressed this afternoon.

In closing, I want to add one word in praise of the present Minister of Pensions and National Health (Mr. Mackenzie) for the interest he has taken in, and the work he has done on behalf of, the returned men and for the good of the department as well. I believe that a word of encouragement is due him and I am voicing it on this occasion, feeling sure that many members will agree with the views I have just stated.

Mr. LIGUORI LACOMBE (Laval-Two Mountains): I have followed with a great deal of interest the last two speeches delivered by my colleagues who have resumed their seats, but the anxiety is always the same: What shall we do with the hundreds of thousands of our young men and women after the war? How will it be possible to re-establish in civil life all these veterans with broken careers and often broken lives in this terrible conflict? No one can answer this tremendous question, not even the government; nevertheless it will be the great task of the authorities to give all possible assistance to the veterans not only of the present but also of the former war.

(Translation): Notwithstanding the devotion and efficiency of the army medical units and nursing services in this war which, through its terrific speed and mobility, is causing the death of thousands and thousands of men, let Canada be prepared for the return of disabled, wounded and crippled soldiers in still greater numbers than in 1918.

While I was alone, with the hon. member for Quebec-Montmorency (Mr. LaCroix), in opposing to the utmost our participation in this war and the mobilization of our manpower and financial resources, even before those two grievous mistakes had been made, I cannot at this time shrink from the duty of urging the government which declared war to help the veterans of this war and the last conflict.

Let us see the results of a policy that I have repeatedly condemned. Canada will have to assume the task of reestablishing in civilian life an army of one million men and women. They will have to rehabilitate, in entirely new occupations if that is still possible, hundreds of thousands of young men and women. Those of our veterans who had positions in the public service will be fortunate indeed if they are not displaced by newcomers from the British isles and Palestine. That is what happens now. At a time when our sons are shedding their blood in the invasion of the European continent and many are fighting on other theatres, a large number of people are entering this country under the protection of an unspeakable policy. I should like to know what the government are doing and will do on behalf of our own people?

The Selective Service is already unable to absorb our demobilized soldiers, just as the government was unable after the last war to find for our veterans jobs worthy of their sacrifices.

I have received numerous complaints from veterans of the last war even during this conflict. Such complaints have come to me from all provinces. In many cases, our veterans were established with their families on lands that were unfit for cultivation, while bureaucrats newly-arrived in this country, were taking the best positions in the Canadian civil service. That was greatly to their advantage, of course, but what a shame for us! Let room first be made for our own people. Since the government want to establish a department of veterans' affairs and this bill provides for a considerable increase in the number of government positions, let them reinstate without any formal procedure the mobilized civil servants who, having undergone a few months of training in the army, are looking for employment because they have been rejected. The oft-stated policy in this regard is not respected. What is the use of establishing a new department if we merely mark time?

As regards national health, I wish to quote an excerpt from page 12 of the publication Canada at War for April, 1944, under the heading "Health Service Survey":

An over-all picture of Canada's existing health services is given in a report of the Canadian Medical Procurement and Assignment Board, tabled in the House of Commons on March 13, 1944. The primary function of the board, which was set up in July, 1942, was to determine the number of medical personnel available to the armed forces and at the same time to try to preserve adequate medical service for civilians. The resulting complete and detailed survey of all branches of medical service together with recommendations for the improvement of existing conditions will enable the government to tackle present problems and plan for the future.

In all branches of medicine civilian demands have increased in inverse ratio to services available. The war has recruited only the healthy and left the physically weaker in disproportionate numbers. The birth rate has considerably increased, and the old age population is increasing. (The Dominion Bureau of Statistics estimates that the number of persons 60 years of age and over will increase by 20 per cent in the next ten years.) The old and the very young require most medical care. During war-time there is a greater threat of epidemics, especially in the crowded industrial centres. At the same time the increase in national income and economic means has boosted the demand for medical service.

Did the government recognize the invaluable services rendered by civilian physicians to the public and to the army? Quite the contrary, scorning their devotion to duty and their ability, after over-burdening them during the first three years the Mobilization Act was in effect, it cancelled their examination reports and summoned the draftees anew before army physicians and a small number of civilian physicians assigned for that purpose. Not satisfied with having shown itself so ungrateful towards these professional men who gave up both their time and their practice for the benefit of the state, the government now plans to strike the medical profession in Canada a deadly blow by installing state medicine. Let us beware! The day when politics shall interfere with the medical profession, we will witness not only a most disastrous act of injustice but also the decline of national health. When the federal government undertook to legislate on national health, it infringed on provincial prerogatives. It has been doing so for almost thirty years. That sphere does not belong to the Ottawa government. If we read the constitution of the country—

The CHAIRMAN (Translation): Order! I do not believe that the hon. member who now has the floor is entitled to discuss the matter of physicians or state medicine. We are now discussing the veterans of the first great war and of this struggle.

Mr. LACOMBE (Translation): The present debate is concerned with the setting up of a veterans' and national health department. In any case, I have very little more to say. If we read the constitution of the country, provided we do not have to go to London for it, we will find that the bill providing for the establishment of a department of veterans' affairs is unconstitutional as it infringes upon the rights of the provinces.

One word more. Due to the war, misconduct and immorality are permeating our youth. Hence, diseases oft incurable are on the increase and the deadly germs already undermining our present generation will afflict our descendants. It will take more than legislation to prevent such a calamity from spreading to the manpower of a whole nation.

The evil must be warded off by all preventive means at the disposal of medical science and the governments. Otherwise, the disastrous effects of permanent epidemics, pointed out by the highest medical authorities, as reported in the April issue of Canada at War, will be equalled only by the improvidence of our government. I require no other proof than the unfortunate wrecks who live on the State and by the State. Are they to be blamed? No. They are rather to be pitied. Heaven knows what efforts the public authorities should expend in this field, the most important for the maintenance and the survival of the nation.

In conclusion, I wish to state that centralization is not the remedy to our worst evil. Let the federal authorities be free to cooperate as far as possible with provincial administrations to this end.

Mr. D. G. ROSS (St. Paul's): Mr. Speaker, the explanatory note in this bill states:

> The purpose of this bill is to establish a department of veterans' affairs under the direction of a minister of veterans affairs who shall be responsible for the care, treatment, training, or reestablishment in civil life of ex-members of the armed forces and of persons otherwise engaged in pursuits relating to the war, and for the care of the dependents of such persons.

I do not know who are the "persons otherwise engaged in pursuits relating to the war," but perhaps at some future time the minister can advise us. In the past hon. members of this house had a great deal to do with the matter of pensions. My first suggestion to the minister is that when the new department is set up, a proper, comprehensive directory of all the subdepartments and branches be compiled and published, because I believe in that way a great deal of time can be saved. Certainly I am in favour of setting up this new department of government. As I have indicated, all hon. members of this house have had to do with difficult pension cases from time to time, and I believe generally our experience has been that when these cases have been brought to the attention of the proper authorities they have been dealt with satisfactorily. However, I do not think it should be necessary to do that, and I hope that with the setting up of this department that situation will be remedied. I believe a department of this kind should have been set up a long time ago; certainly it would have saved us all a great deal of trouble.

There has been much official propaganda designed to create the impression that Canada leads the world in connection with the rehabilitation and treatment of returned men. No doubt this is so in regard to many aspects of the matter, but in my opinion it is not a question of comparison with any other system in the world. I know all hon. members have tried to offer constructive criticism when veterans' affairs have been under consideration, and have put forward their views in a non-partisan spirit. But it seems to me that up to the present in connection with veterans' matters everything has been done on the basis of a reluctant, half-hearted acceptance of proposals advanced by the opposition and supported by public opinion. I cite, for example, the attitude of the government in connection with Christie street hospital and new military hospitals in general, as well as the matter of the clothing and rehabilitation allowances. There we saw a reluctant acceptance of our proposals. That was also the case in days gone by in connection with the discharge of these men and their pay during hospitalization. There has always been a reluctance to comply with our requests, which I believe has caused the veterans great hardships in the past.

As I have stated, the government seem to have been working on a basis of comparison with other countries instead of making up their mind on a definite policy as to what is right and just for the men returning from overseas. Now, in this preelection session, we see many improvements being put forward by the government. Almost it seeems as though the government have held back the announcement of these improvements until just before an election, to the detriment of the returned men. Well, that did not seem to do much good in connection with the election we heard about only the other day in Saskatchewan, and in view of the results of that election I doubt very much whether a federal election will be called within the near future. In any case the reluctance of the government in connection with these matters will not be overlooked.

We all know that many mistakes have been made in the past. Following the last war there were mistakes that were due to lack of experience in the handling of these matters, but many injustices were brought about by an endeavour on the part of various governments to save a little money for the taxpayers. Many examples of the petty paring of pensions and allowances could be mentioned, but the money saved amounted to only a drop in the bucket as compared with the suffering endured by many of our returned men. As an instance I might mention the reluctance of the government to increase the pensions of widows. Each year we have brought up the matter; each year the pensions have been increased slightly. Again, mistakes were made in the past by discharging men from the army too soon, and through the lack of proper papers. No man should be discharged until he has been given a full account of himself by the proper authorities; with his enlistment papers completely filled out, with his physical condition on discharge completely set out, and in short with his full record for the future. Hon. members will recall the difficulties they have had in connection with pensions, arising from the fact that applicants for pensions did not supply sufficient information. Care must be taken to give instructions to the men with regard to their rights, and as to what they should do to have mistakes corrected in their papers at the time of discharge from the army; it should not be left until later. Many heartaches and hardships can thus be avoided.

Regulations are to be set up in connection with this legislation. The regulations should be promulgated and published at the earliest possible moment, because, after all, the bill is comprehensive and covers many features of pensions legislation. Certainly a consolidation should be made of all the regulations, so that in fairness to the returned men, and those who are endeavouring to look after them, justice may be done.

Then, is there any reason why men who have served in the forces, but are discharged before the date set for the various increases and benefits, should not have those benefits made retroactive? If they make proper application, it seems to me they should be included. If the benefits and allowances were too low before, they are still too low for men and women whose applications have come in before the deadline. I cannot understand why they should not be treated the same as men and women who have applied after the deadline.

Much has been said in connection with the setting up of the organization. Some hon. members have suggested that the personnel of the board should consist of returned men, both from the last war and from the present war. This suggestion I heartily support, because the mature judgment of the older men will be most useful when combined with the more recently acquired knowledge of the younger men.

The new department will be faced with many problems. It will have many decisions to make, and I urge that they be made promptly. This is a point I cannot emphasize too strongly. Much of the unrest which has occurred has been due to delays. All hon. members know about the suffering which has been caused through delays in the handling of pension applications. I realize that some of these delays are unavoidable, but carelessness and inefficiency should not be tolerated.

May I refer to one or two matters which have been discussed, and which will no doubt be discussed later in connection with the payment of pensions to the returned men. I press now for a reasonable clothing allowance. The first allowance was set at $35, and it has now been increased to $65. I say that $125 is not too much for any men who have to refit themselves. Not only do they have to secure civilian clothing, but in addition they have to obtain working clothes. I would ask any hon. member to try to refit himself, even for $125. Certainly that figure is low enough, and undoubtedly $65 is entirely inadequate.

We note that an order in council has been issued by the government, indicating that it has yielded to pressure from members of the House of Commons, and public opinion. Pay and allowances according to rank are to be allowed for one year, two years, or more if necessary, for hospitalization. This is to date back only to May 1, 1943. I am wondering why that date was set. If the allowance originally made was too small, and if the principle was wrong after May 1, 1943, why was it not wrong and the allowance too small before that date?

All hon. members who have spoken in the debate have urged that every effort must be made to see to it that upon discharge the men are given every opportunity to get jobs. I should like to ask in passing, the meaning of these words as they appear in earlier and very important legislation:

> A man shall be reinstated in a position not worse than that he would have been in if he had not enlisted.

These are fine words, but what do they mean? Is it possible to reinstate a man under those circumstances? Can that be enforced? I say it is necessary for the government before long to give us a definition of just what they mean by that wording. There is no use in keeping it there if it is just a bit of camouflage. There should be an accurate definition, so that the men will know exactly what it means, and what they may expect. At the present time they do not know what to expect, and I have heard many complaints in this regard.

Some of our men will have been out of a job, and in the army, for three, four, or possibly five or six years. Some of them never had a job. I believe it is the view of all hon. members that they should be given a proper opportunity to refit themselves for civilian life.

Why does the government propose to pay the men less while they are training for peacetime occupations than they were paid to prepare themselves to fight? It takes one or two years to train a man for warfare; yet these men who are coming back and who will have to train themselves for civilian life are expected to refit themselves and to become good citizens for less pay than they received while they were in the army. That also applies to their dependents. Besides, the training will probably extend over a shorter period. This does not add up. If it was good policy to give pay and allowances while they were training to fight, certainly it is good policy to pay them equally well while they are fitting themselves to play their part in the kind of life for which they fought overseas. If these men are treated properly it will mean a great saving in money later. We must not be picayune now.

There are many other matters I shall discuss when the opportunity arises, but on this occasion I shall not take up more of the time of the house. I support the principle of the bill. As I said before, we should have had a department of this kind long ago.

Mr. E. E. PERLEY (Qu'Appelle): Mr. Speaker, as other hon. members have said, this is a very important measure. It establishes a Department of Veterans' Affairs, and puts in the hands of the minister of that department almost everything concerning not only men who have returned from the last war, but also those who will return from this one. We all realize that winning the war is our first task, but the rehabilitation and reconstruction period after the war is also very important. No greater responsibility faces the Canadian people at home to-day than to see that the armed forces when they return get a square deal, and nothing that we can do to assist them in those post-war days will be any more than what is due to them and what they have earned many times over.

I am sure the house will agree that since 1914-18 no subject has been treated with more unanimity among all parties in the house than the problems of the veterans. Those problems have always been beyond the scope of party politics, and I am sure we are all looking at this measure with only one thought in mind, namely, to do what is right and just for our men when they return.

If this new department is wisely directed—and I think it will be because I presume the present Minister of Pensions and National Health (Mr. Mackenzie) will be the new minister—it will be of great service to the men of the last war and also to the men returning from this war. Some of the members who have spoken in this debate have mentioned the deal that was handed out to the veterans of 1914-18. I am one of those who have always thought—and I have so expressed myself—that the veterans of 1914-18 should have been given a better deal. I have not hesitated to say so on many occasions, and I refer particularly to the veterans who settled on the land. May I recall to you, Mr. Speaker, that even last session, in speaking on the budget on March 15, I repeated a suggestion that I had made on previous occasions, that the debts of the soldier settlers on the land should be written off. I am going to quote what I said on that occasion. I said at page 1238 of Hansard:

> For years I have consistently urged in this house that if the government had written off the debt arising from soldier settlement in respect of the last war, the country would have saved money. I advocate that, as part of the proposed debt adjustment, the soldier settlers' debts be written off. After all, this concession would do no more than repay these men in some small measure for what they are doing in the present war. Their sons were the first to enlist and their daughters have followed—they are in the army too.

Many of the veterans of the last war have joined up in this war. If the policy I have consistently advocated had been pursued it would have been more just, more fair and would have saved the country money.

Undoubtedly the members of the armed forces when they return will demand the right to have an opportunity to earn a decent living and to make their own way on a just and equitable basis. As other hon. members have said in this debate, the men who are fighting our battles to-day overseas—and some of them are already returning from Italy—are not looking for charity or pity. All they want is a square deal. They want a chance to resume their life work, to follow perhaps the course which the war interrupted in some university, or to take up vocational training of some kind. All they want is a fair chance to fit themselves to earn a decent living, and that is certainly no more than their due.

The question of pensions both old and new has been discussed in this debate. Pensions will be the responsibility of the minister who is appointed to this department. Too often in recent years the applicant for a pension has been treated with doubt, if not distrust. The burden of proof has rested on the applicant. All that should be reversed by this new department and the burden of proof rest, not on the applicant to prove his case, but on the department to prove that the applicant is not entitled to pensions.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): That is done definitely now.

Mr. PERLEY: I have always maintained and maintain now that a soldier who was found physically fit by a medical examination when he enlisted should be entitled to a pension when he is discharged if he is found not physically fit upon discharge. The department should take the positive and not the negative stand. The great bulk of our Canadian people have played a great part in war industry and in agriculture, producing the munitions and the foodstuffs required to win this war. But no matter how much they have done, their achievements cannot be compared with the services and the sacrifices of our men at the front.

I shall not deal now with the bill clause by clause because we shall have an opportunity to consider the individual clauses in committee. Those providing for vocational training I find commendable. There are other clauses which should be of service to our returned men; there are many good clauses in the bill and, if it is properly administered, as I trust it will be, it will help in seeing that our men get something near a square deal. I might refer to clauses 7 and 9, to mention only one or two. The minister should see to it that the men as they return get jobs for which they are fitted. Many of them will want to go back to the farm. I think it is very important in this connection that a real survey of a man's qualifications should be made to determine whether or not he can make a success of farming. Every man will not make a successful farmer. We know what happened after the last war, and nobody wants to see a repetition of that.

I trust that the minister will welcome advice and suggestions that come from the Canadian Legion. The Canadian Legion has done great work throughout this war. It encouraged men to enlist and has continued to make most commendable efforts on behalf of our men and women in the armed services. It is one organization that is deserving of every consideration. It is always ready to cooperate and I trust the minister will appreciate its suggestions and cooperation. Too much cannot be said in favour of the Canadian Legion.

Something has been said about the rate of allowance for the men when they return. One month's allowance is perhaps not sufficient because many of our men will require many months to be rehabilitated and get a job. The boys and girls from the west deserve every consideration. I make a special appeal for them because we have a record as far as enlistments are concerned, and I am sure the minister will heed that appeal.

I will not prolong further the discussion of this bill. It is in many respects, I believe, commendable. Its success will depend upon whether it is wisely and properly administered, and I trust that the minister will see to that.

Mr. GORDON B. ISNOR (Halifax): Coming as I do from Nova Scotia, which has made such a splendid contribution of its men and women to all branches of the armed services, I wish to make a few brief observations in respect of this bill, a bill which has as its purpose the establishment of a Department of Veterans' Affairs under the direction of a Minister of Veterans' Affairs who shall be responsible for the care, treatment, training and reestablishment in civil life of ex-members of the armed forces and of persons otherwise engaged in pursuits relating to the war, and for the care of the dependents of such persons.

It must be gratifying to the minister who is piloting this measure through the house, as well as to the officials who have had the framing of the measure, to hear such warm commendations of the efforts being made by this government to take care of those who are fighting our battles overseas, our young lads, our men and our young women, who are engaged in maintaining that liberty we now enjoy. Splendid tributes have been paid not alone by members of this house, but by others throughout Canada, including leading newspapers and magazines. I have particularly in mind a eulogistic article appearing in the American magazine entitled, "Canada Cares For Its Heroes." I feel that portions of this article are entitled to a place on the records of the house.

Mr. Sumner Blossom, in an editorial in this magazine, states:—

> A most urgent problem facing the American people at home to-day is that of rehabilitating our returning soldiers and reestablishing them in civilian life. As this issue goes to press, our nation's plans in this respect are still in course of formation. President Roosevelt's recent proposals for blanket insurance for all veterans are still in the blue-print stage. There is already in operation however, one system which is probably the most generous, definite, and enlightened yet adopted by any member of the united nations. It is that of our neighbour, Canada. It assumes that every man or woman who returns from the battle front, whether disabled or not, is entitled to careful assistance and guidance back to stability and self-sufficiency.

The writer then refers to the fact that he invited the Hon. Ian Mackenzie, who planned and directed the system, to describe it for readers of the American magazine. Then the writer remarks that this achievement is a challenging yardstick for our neighbour, the great republic to the south, to follow.

I think that is one of the finest tributes which has been paid to the splendid work which is being carried on by the present Minister of Pensions and National Health in this important department. Not only do members of this house appreciate his efforts and those of his officials, but so also do the parents of those who are serving in the armed forces. I have had letters from a great many mothers asking as to the future of their children; and, because of publications which have beeen issued, I have been able to write them intelligently as to the plans being formulated by this government to take care of their boys and girls when they return; I have also been able to advise the wives of men overseas as to the opportunities of rehabilitation for their husbands. So that this is indeed an important measure, and one which, if carried through upon the lines suggested, will be well received by all the people of the dominion.

I was interested in the very fine approach made to this question by the hon. member for Vancouver South (Mr. Green). He dealt with the subject in the broad manner in which he always approaches such questions. I was also interested in the references made by the hon. member for Royal (Mr. Brooks). I was pleased that he brought the attention of the house to the case of William Hall, a coloured gentleman from Nova Scotia who was the first man in North America to win the Victoria Cross. I am thoroughly familiar with the case, and was delighted, having already put the story on the record on a previous occasion, as was also done by the Minister of National Defence for Air (Mr. Power) some time ago, to have so full an account of this brave man's deed placed on Hansard in so eloquent a manner by the hon. member for Royal. I agree with what he said, and I support his suggestion that some society, the Historic Sites Society or some other, should undertake to erect at or near Windsor a tribute of respect to this brave man who has gone to the great beyond. Possibly the hon. member for Royal is not aware that we have in Halifax a branch of the Canadian Legion named after this hero—the William Hall, V.C. No. 57 branch, composed entirely of coloured men. It was my privilege and honour when that organization was first formed to provide them with a flag known as their legion flag. The branch is composed of some of our finest types of citizens—coloured men, certainly, nevertheless true and loyal and willing to do their utmost to bring about the victory and the peace for which we all hope.

I was surprised at a remark made by the hon. member for Cape Breton South (Mr. Gillis) when he was asking that additional employment offices or selective service offices and welfare offices be opened throughout Nova Scotia. I am in accord with this proposal, but his reference to Halifax, the capital of Nova Scotia, was a little out of place. He made the statement that Halifax is situated in the extreme western end of the province. I sincerely hope that he has not created the impression that we are located somewhere down in the woods. Halifax, as he must know, and as the minister well knows, is at about the centre of the province; it is the logical place for the welfare office. If it is decided to establish additional offices, that is fine, but we do not want the minister or his department to do anything which would deprive us of the Halifax welfare office, which is so efficiently operated by Colonel Mackenzie, D.S.O. To prove my point let me give some figures as regards distances. From Yarmouth to Sydney, that is, from one end of the province to the district which the hon. member for Cape Breton South represents, is 538 miles. From Sydney to Halifax is 288 miles, and from Yarmouth to Halifax, 250 miles; so that it will be seen that we have a central location so far as the welfare office is concerned. While Halifax is the logical place for the welfare office, we have a very fine type of man looking after the returned soldiers, a man who has been an outstanding figure in veterans' affairs in Nova Scotia. He is well-known to practically every ex-serviceman who served in the last war, and he has already made himself well known to a large number of those who are serving in the present war.

I rose more particularly to express my approval of the general principle of the bill. I will not refer to any particular clause or clauses. They have been already dealt with, and in my opinion the proper time to consider them in specific detail is when the sections come before the committee of the whole. I endorse, and I feel that the people will endorse, the general principle of the bill, but I would bring to the attention of the minister this consideration. I feel that the men who are serving at the present time—and the same goes for the women—are not familiar enough with the benefits that will accrue from this measure. In my opinion every one of them should receive a pamphlet of some kind outlining the benefits of the measure, the rehabilitation grants which will be provided, the scheme of vocational training, the medical treatment to which they will be entitled, pensions, the plan for soldier settlement and the efforts that are being made to take care of their future employment and reestablishment in civilian life. With that thought in mind I bring to the attention of the house, as I understand the hon. member for Trinity (Mr. Roebuck) did on a previous occasion, a very fine book which I purchased in a book store. I was not as fortunate as the hon. member, for I did not receive a copy with the author's compliments, but this is an excellent book entitled, "When the Boys Come Home", written by C. N. Senior. It is a book that everyone will enjoy reading. It is easy reading and is very informative. If this book or a similar one could be placed in the hands of every member of the armed forces it would do much to satisfy them about their future welfare. More than that, I believe that the parents and members of the families of those serving should also read the book. It would show them what the government is trying to do for the members of the armed forces.

I will not go into details, but I might say in passing that the book touches upon a variety of interesting topics such as the post-discharge reestablishment order, Veterans' Land Act, historical background, pensions, hospitals, medical care, time of discharge, the boys in the merchant navy, and so on. The whole thing is well written, and the interesting point about it is that the author's royalties are pledged to the disablement fund. In other words, this well known official of the Department of Pensions and National Health, in his own time, has written a very fine book which I suggest should be placed in the hands of all members of the armed forces.

I desire to bring to the attention of the house one matter which I regard as very important, namely, the treatment of totally disabled veterans. I am sure every hon. member knows of some particular case, but I do not propose to deal with a number of complaints. We are bound to get complaints. When I first became a federal member I was besieged with requests to have cases reopened. It is hard to establish continuity in many cases. I went into these cases and, like other members, I have a file, not an inch or two inches, but many inches high, dealing with different cases. I could quote, as did the hon. member for Témiscouata (Mr. Pouliot), individual cases, but I do not think this is the proper place to do that.

I have had satisfaction from the officials of the department. Any cases that I have brought to their notice they have carefully considered and have taken the trouble to point out to me wherein certain cases did not come within the terms of the regulations, and as gracefully as I could I accepted the decision. I went back several times to make sure that no point was overlooked, and I always found them very willing to make a full review of cases in an effort to see that justice was done.

I said that I was anxious to bring this matter before the minister and to discuss the question of totally disabled veterans. I do not think I can do so better than by dealing with one individual case. The one to which I refer is well known to seventy-five per cent of Nova Scotians. It is known to a very large number of men and women who are serving overseas at the present time, because of the activities of the gentleman in question on behalf of those persons. He personally supervises the sending of 125,000 cigarettes every month. Through his efforts millions of cigarettes have gone overseas. When I describe this man to hon. members they will realize that the request I make to the minister in this public way should receive his sympathetic attention.

I have in mind one who has suffered for something like fourteen years, and I have committed to writing the thoughts I have in this regard. When I think of those who are prone to complain, my thoughts turn to a veteran of the last war and compare his attitude with that of those who complain. The veteran to whom I refer is Walter Callow, known as "the human log," a patient at Camp Hill hospital, Halifax. This man exemplifies in true fashion the virtue of patience so well shown in the Bible story relating to Job's afflictions. Callow, as before mentioned, is a veteran of the first great war. He was injured in an airplane crash. He is well known to the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Ralston), the Minister of National Defence for Naval Services (Mr. Macdonald), the Minister of National Defence for Air, and also the Minister of Pensions and National Health, who have all at one time or another visited this veteran at Camp Hill hospital. I have on many occasions called to see him and I wish I could depict to you, sir, in fitting terms the spirit of this man, the frame of mind and the cheerful greeting which he extends to his many visitors. Think of a man who has lain in bed for fourteen years, unable to move or turn; his arms and legs are twisted, he cannot move them; his neck is as stiff as steel. He cannot move his jaws, and now he is also blind. While he cannot turn his head he seems to know the footstep of every visitor. His mind is ever working, planning things to do to help our veteran soldiers, writing poetry on cards, raffling this and that to buy cigarettes for boys now serving overseas. With this picture in mind I just wish to recall that I knew him as a boy who played hockey games, who took his bumps, and it made no difference how big they came, they always found him tough. Do you think he complains about controls and restrictions? No, he never complains.

I have photographs of this man here which I wish I could pass around to hon. members so that they could see how deformed every joint is, and how they are out of shape. It is this man that I am asking the minister to bear in mind when he is building new hospitals throughout Canada and when he is building that fine new addition which he has promised to Halifax, as an extension to the present Camp Hill hospital. I am asking him to provide suitable quarters in a separate portion of the building for this man who from day to day is compelled to lie and suffer. I am asking him to provide this accommodation so that this man may have some quietness of mind and that comfort by orderlies may be extended to him to make his remaining days just a little easier.

In conclusion, I hope the minister in his sympathetic way will take this into consideration when building future hospitals and particularly see if arrangements can be made whereby this veteran will enjoy the privacy of a small place that he can call his own and not have to wait for a new hospital.

Mr. GRAYDON: The minister will have plenty of support with respect to that plea.

Mr. J. R. MacNICOL (Davenport): I am sure the minister must feel highly gratified at the unanimity with which bill No. 83 has been received from all corners of the house. I am not rising to discuss the bill at any length. As other speakers have done, I wish to register my support of the bill. Had I not received two or three letters recently—one of them to-day—I would take my seat after having made these few remarks in order that the bill could get into committee more quickly and through the house. However, I am not going to apologize for speaking even briefly on this bill. Like the hon. member for Broadview (Mr. Church), who is known throughout the country as the soldier's friend, I in my time have had to do with a large number of soldiers following the last war. The section of the city of Toronto that I have the honour to represent sent a large number of soldiers overseas. It is true that the hon. member for Broadview received a title that so far as I know no one else in Canada received. It was conferred on him by royalty and none other than the present Duke of Windsor, who was Prince of Wales at that time. His Royal Highness visited Toronto immediately following the end of the war, and during the term of the hon. member for Broadview who was mayor of Toronto for seven years. At that time he conferred on the hon. member the title of "the soldier's friend." He richly deserved it for the service he had rendered to the soldiers. I left a life of what would have been leisure at that time to come here to serve the soldiers, having had so much to do with them following the last war, at which time I was president of the British Imperial association, as I had been during the war. That is a title I have always been proud of; it is a great organization.

When I heard the hon. member for Vancouver South (Mr. Green) say last night that this bill conferred wide powers on the minister I said to myself, I am glad to hear it. Quite frankly everybody in the house may not be glad, but on various occasions when I have spoken to the minister about certain veterans he has said to me, "If I had the power I would see that that man received redress." On many occasions I have heard that from the late chairman of the pension commission, General Macdonald. I happened to be in Banff on the day he died or the day after. In any event I went to pay my respects to Mrs. Macdonald. The body was not in view at that time. I should like to say here and now that this country was never served by a more sympathetic commissioner or chairman than the late General Macdonald. On many occasions he said to me, "If I had the power and was not circumscribed by those regulations I would grant relief." Therefore I am hoping that the minister, now having that power, will be able to transfer it to the new chairman, whom I have always found very sympathetic, and that is what one would expect from a man who comes from Glasgow, Scotland, the land of the minister. Therefore I am looking for great things from the minister since he has the power that the hon. member for Vancouver South referred to in his able speech last night. It was one of the best speeches delivered in this house in this debate. It was delivered in his usual capable way.

I am not going to deal with the whole of the bill but with section 7, paragraph (g). I think it covers what I wish to bring up. Section 7 reads:

(1) Subject to the approval of the governor in council, the minister may make such regulations, from time to time, as he may deem necessary and advisable.

I am glad the minister has the power. He is a returned soldier himself. I have always found him sympathetic to returned men. I hope the cases I shall mention will receive his special consideration. Paragraph (g) of section 7 reads:

for the payment of pensions out of moneys provided by parliament for the purpose to persons who, while rendering service to Canada in the prosecution of any war, suffer any injury or disease or aggravation thereof resulting in disability or death not otherwise pensionable or to the dependents of such persons.

Under that section I desire to mention one case of the present war. This is a letter I received from Sergeant R. Haire, of 19 Afton avenue, Toronto. I might say that in that part of the city of Toronto there are two men who are of the type that render eminent service to returned soldiers. I really do not know what this country would be like without men such as the man to whom this letter refers, Thomas Baldwin, and another gentleman around the corner on Northcote avenue, by the name of Truman Meriam, also a returned soldier. Both men are the type of men to whom people in distress go, and they are never turned down. So the Thomas Baldwin referred to in this letter is the man I have just described:

Dear Sir,

I have recently returned home from overseas, and I was in a quandary as to what I should do in order to get compassionate leave, and of course I got in touch with Thomas Baldwin, whom I have known for this past ten years, who immediately wrote to you—

Being in my riding, of course they write to me.

—and explained my case, and in return I received a reply from you.

You stated in your letter that I should make out an application form for my release, which I did, and up until now I have had no word as to whether I am going to get this release or not. I was overseas for the last four and a half years, in which time the little cartage business I had has practically become extinct, and of course I would like to build up this business so as I could have something to return to whenever this war is over.

That is all I need read from that letter. This man's address is 19 Afton avenue, and what I have read will appear in Hansard. I should like to ask the minister whether he will have any power, through some of the ramifications of his big, new department, to assist a man like this to start up some little business such as he had before the war? That question need not be answered now; the minister can give me the information at another time.

The next letter I wish to read is from a returned soldier who served in the last war, who I believe was overseas for four years or more. I have taken up this case with the department many times, and this man has been here to see the department officials, whom he found, as I have always found them, to be courteous, considerate and sympathetic, but who under the present arrangement do not appear to have the authority which the minister will now have. Therefore I bring this man's case to his attention in the hope that when he reviews it some way will be found to help this man. This man, William Robertson, No. 534262, also was born in Scotland, I believe somewhere near Glasgow; his brogue is so good it is hard to understand him, and he always signs himself "Scotty". I know the minister will give fair play to everyone, of every race, and I only mention in passing that this man is from the old country. He has been in Christie Street hospital several times, and I have seen him in the most distressing circumstances. The last time I saw him he was in a very distressed state, but he has not been able to get more than a small pension, which I believe amounts to $22 a month. In fairness to the department I must say that they offered to put him on veterans' allowance, but he is a man of the sternest principles. He feels that if his physical condition is such that he is entitled also to the equivalent of veterans' allowance he is entitled to pension of that amount extra, and he feels that the only honourable way he can accept pension is for disabilities received in the war. I wrote asking for the name of his doctor, and in reply he says:

Sorry for delay in answering your letter. Just got over severe vomiting spell.

I have seen him vomiting very severely, when I would not have been surprised if he had passed out in his distress.

Well, Doctor Smith's address is Doctor Orminston Smith, 3 Regal road, corner of Regal road and Oakwood avenue, Toronto. No operation for the present. Strict ulcer diet—medicine—sunshine—complete rest and quietness. So I am leaving for Wasaga beach; a friend of mine has a cottage there. So I am going there to beat the white corpuscles, the reds are on the weak side.

I suppose that is a medical term; the white corpuscles destroy the red ones.

But the reds will win out when old man sunshine gets after them, and I hope to come up stronger than ever.

I have known this man for years. For reasons I am not going to mention there has been some conflict between him and the department, but then everyone cannot present his case in the nicest way. I have always found this man very reasonable, and I am going to ask the minister to have his case especially reviewed. If he is entitled to war veterans' allowance, why not increase his pension? Certainly his physical condition is such that if something is not done he cannot live very long.

I should like to mention one more case which I have taken up with the department many times. It is the case of George Stevens, 416 Salem avenue, Toronto, whose regimental number was 57727. This man draws a pension of $20. Some days ago I wrote Mr. Stevens asking him to restate his case, so that when the proper time came I might present it to the minister and the house, and I am taking advantage of this opportunity to do so. He writes:

I enlisted in Toronto on November 11, 1914. I landed in France in September, 1915. I was gassed in April, 1916, by shell gas at Kemal and was sent down the line to Etaples, No. 18 general hospital, where I was for six weeks. Instead of me going on leave to England, which was due me, I was sent up the line again into the Ypres salient and in less than a week the action took place, on the 2nd of June in Ypres, where I was taken prisoner. The Germans lined me up with several more to shoot us—

I might digress here to say that I have heard him tell how he was lined up in the trench with some of his fellows after having been taken out of a dug-out. I doubt if any human being can picture the agony a man would be going through watching other men lining up ready to shoot him.

—but a German field marshal came along and intervened and told the guards to take us prisoners. Through the terrible mental ordeal I went through carrying four of our own wounded men out under our own shell fire. The German doctor at our dressing station commended me for my courage but said I was badly shell shocked. This doctor asked me to take off my tunic; he held one end and I held the other; we wrung it out and the perspiration rolled out of it as though it had been in the river, through this mental agony under fire. I was kept behind the lines for three days carrying out wounded men, and ammunition up to the line under our own heavy shell fire; and then we started our march into Germany which took three days, with the Uhlans as our guards, driving us along until we reached the first prison camp, Dulman, where we lived for the first six months on black bread and watery soup, until the food packages came through.

I presume he means packages from Canada.

Our next move was to a munition factory in Munster, where we refused to work on munitions, so they punished us by putting us in a detention camp and then taking us into a large room where they put high pressure steam on, with very little ventilation. Our clothes were taken away from us and we were in there for forty-eight hours on a diet of water. The air was so humid the perspiration just oozed out of us. When we came out we were almost too weak to stand. We were also clubbed with the butt of a rifle on several occasions. We were beaten with a rubber pipe. Our next move was to Minden where we worked in the camp and on the roads. We were there for about four months. Our last move was to Friedrichsfeld where we worked in the coal mines for nineteen months. We were maltreated there many times. The innocent had to suffer for the guilty, for if one prisoner done any wrong you were all punished. This punishment was standing in the pouring rain with your hands above your head for so many minutes, and then in another position with your hands outstretched for so long that you had not dare bat an eyebrow or the sentry would butt you in the back with his rifle butt. We were released three weeks after November 11, 1918.

[Mr. MacNicol.]

Now, just a word. I do not think any physician could possibly accurately diagnose the disability accruing from the distress suffered by a soldier under those conditions. It is a very difficult picture to describe. I present to the minister this case, one which the former chairman had before him on many occasions. That chairman is not here now, but he called me on the telephone at one time, asking me to tell Mr. Stevens that he was going to see that his pension was increased, as it should have been. Later, however, when it was not raised he informed me that because of the regulations he could not increase it. Had he lived I am sure he would have found some way to make the increase. Now that the minister has the power described by the hon. member for Vancouver South, I hope that this case, and the other one I mentioned, will come under his personal review.

I have had long contact with Mr. Stevens, and I can say that at times I have seen him in conditions of the utmost distress, almost unable to breathe. I have seen him sitting at the edge of the sidewalk, because of his heart condition. I cannot understand why a condition of that kind would not show up upon investigation. Some things have been found wrong, because he has been given a certain amount of pension, although not very much.

With the presentation of these cases I have completed what I wish to say at this time. May I compliment the minister upon the introduction of the bill; the whole house is behind it. With the new authority he now has—and I do not like to see him shaking his head, because I am taking the word of the hon. member for Vancouver South who, on no occasion, would exaggerate—

Mr. GREEN: Perhaps the hon. member had better read my speech again.

Mr. MacNICOL: I hope that the minister will make a personal investigation to see if adequate redress cannot be given to these two suffering returned soldiers, each of whom rendered conspicuous service in the last great war, and who now deserve infinitely more than they have been given.

At six o'clock the house took recess.

After Recess

The house resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. J. S. ROY (Gaspé) (Translation): Mr. Speaker, this measure, which is based on a principle of justice and a feeling of gratitude, is most timely. I believe it should be passed and carried out at once.

It certainly behooves the authorities and the people of this country to give serious thought to ensuring the reestablishment of veterans and the care of the wounded after the war, when the time comes to demobilize all those stout-hearted men who are now fighting in defence of an ideal. But it often happens that the worst measures are applied with the utmost strictness. On the other hand, measures that are infinitely better are applied neither so effectively nor with so much eagerness. Ever since the beginning of the war, that is in 1939 and 1940, when a campaign of voluntary enlistments was launched, we have heard members of the government and many people in Canada state that after the war on the return of those young men who had been called upon to uphold our cause on the battlefields, action would be taken with a view to ensuring them a better treatment than was given to the veterans of the great war, who were not, as we readily admit, treated as they should have been. I wish to quote, as an illustration, a case where that promise was not immediately implemented. In 1941, the veterans from the city of Quebec, organized into an association, requested me to point out to you and to the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Ralston) the serious grounds for complaint which they had in Quebec. Those veterans, after two years of war, could not obtain employment in arsenals. They claimed to be the victims of political discrimination and they voiced many other complaints of a rather serious nature. Following a pretty sharp debate with the Minister of National Defence, a board of inquiry was sent to Quebec with instructions to deal with those complaints. Its work had very good results. Such an incident shows that, two years after promises had been made to the men who are fighting in this war, no thought had been given to the matter of a fair treatment for the veterans of the last war. Therefore, I hope that we shall not be satisfied with making speeches, drafting an act and writing it into the statute books, but that the kindly feelings we entertain will move us to action, that this very necessary legislation which has the approval of everyone to-day, may find an echo in our minds and hearts, and be carried out at once.

(Text)

Mr. Speaker, notwithstanding the capital importance of this bill, I have been asked by Jubilee branch, No. 59, of the Canadian legion of the British empire service league, Gaspé, Quebec, to bring to your attention and to that of the proper authority in the house a matter which is of direct concern to the veterans. The following letter will explain the whole matter:

Gaspe, County Gaspe,
Quebec,
May 9, 1944.

Mr. J. S. Roy,
M.P. for Gaspé,
Parliament Building,
Ottawa, Ont.

Dear Mr. Roy:—

Major deGruchy of Cape-Cove, who is a member of this lodge, has sent us a copy of a letter which you sent him, from Mr. Macdonald, Parliamentary Assistant, to the Minister of National Defence, regarding the Canadian volunteer service ribbon.

In fairness to all who served whether for one or eighteen months, we, members of this lodge, feel that this matter should be brought to the attention of the ministers of national defence, and we would deem it a great favour if you, as our representative, would bring this matter to the attention of the house.

We are enclosing copy of an article which we are sending to the legion at Ottawa, and also a resolution from this lodge asking that in fairness to all those who volunteered and served and who were, for medical reasons or otherwise honourably discharged, that they be entitled to this ribbon as all volunteers who served eighteen months or more. These men who were not fortunate enough to complete this length of service showed their willingness by volunteering to serve their country in the time of need, and therefore, the least the Department of National Defence can do is to award this ribbon to all who volunteered, and make no distinction as to length of service. We trust that your representation may be the means of having this rectified.

We feel that we can safely say that anything which you may be able to do regarding this will be greatly appreciated by all concerned.

Thanking you for your kindness, I remain,

Yours respectfully,

Reg. R. deGruchy, Captn.,
President Jubilee branch, No. 59,
Canadian Legion.

I am pleased to say that I have had the cooperation of the parliamentary assistant of the Minister of National Defence, the hon. member for Halifax (Mr. Macdonald), who has devoted a great deal of his time in the course of two weeks in helping me straighten out this matter and to bring justice and satisfaction to these volunteers for active service who have been discharged for reasons of health. I should like to put on the record his letter to me dated Ottawa, June 6, 1944:

J. S. Roy, Esq., M.P.,
647 House of Commons,
Ottawa, Ontario.

Dear Mr. Roy,

Re: Canadian Volunteer Service Medal

I am now informed that the question of amplifying the eligibility provisions of governing order in council to include persons of any rank who have voluntarily served on active war service and have been honourably discharged or retired as a result of injury or disease or aggravation thereof, attributable to or incurred during such active war service, is under active consideration at the present time.

I understand that the proposed extension contemplates persons honourably discharged for medical reasons and the question of awarding the medal to personnel of less than eighteen months' service honourably discharged for other reasons is not now under active consideration.

I think this will give you all the information that you need in order to answer the inquiries of the Jubilee branch (Gaspé) of the Canadian legion.

Yours truly,

W. C. Macdonald,
Parliamentary Assistant.

There is a ray of hope, but it looks to me as though a long time will elapse before satisfaction is given to these volunteers who have been discharged for honourable reasons, such as their condition of health. I again ask the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Ralston) to comply with the request of these volunteers who have shown earnestness and willingness to serve their country. They are entitled to recognition of the attitude which they took at the beginning of the war, the same as those who are still serving at the present time.

Mr. G. A. CRUICKSHANK (Fraser Valley): I do not intend to deal at any length with the bill now before the house. The minister has one thing in his favour; he comes from British Columbia and therefore he should know something of what he is doing.

I believe I can indicate my attitude to the bill in general by saying that I thoroughly endorse practically everything that has been said during this debate by Liberal, Conservative, Cooperative Commonwealth Federation and Social Credit members. I wish, however, to reiterate one or two points to which I think more attention should be paid by the minister, especially in his new department.

A reference was made by the hon. member for Vancouver North (Mr. Sinclair) to the attitude of the treasury board in connection with the claims of returned soldiers. It is a position which I have never been able to understand. I believe that the government would be well advised, particularly in view of some of the things which have taken place in the last forty-eight hours, to take measures whereby more members, if not all the members, of the board which handles any matters connected with soldiers shall be themselves returned men. I have every respect for the members of the treasury board. I do not know who they all are; I do not know what they are for; I do not believe they always know themselves what they are for; but I think the veterans are entitled to better consideration from them, particularly in view of what has been said by the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) as to what we as Canadian citizens owe our returned men.

I would particularly impress upon the minister that in the past the whole onus of proving the veteran's case has been placed on the veteran. I saw the minister shake his head this afternoon when the statement was made by one hon. member, but it cannot be denied. I agree with a statement made this afternoon, which probably has been repeated by other hon. members who have spoken with reference to this bill, that if a man is accepted for service as A-1, he should be the government's responsibility in the category of A-1 from the time they take him into the army and for all future time.

Another suggestion I would make to the minister is that he eliminate red tape. As a member of the legion, and having been interested for many years in veterans' affairs, I know it requires a lawyer to understand the Pension Act and much of the other legislation having to do with returned soldiers. I am sure the minister is interested in doing everything possible to simplify all that concerns the veterans. It should not be necessary for them to have an advocate every time they approach a departmental official.

When the bill is in committee I should like to speak in some detail on the Veterans' Land Act, the subject in which I am particularly interested. Coming from British Columbia and from a large rural riding in that province, I am naturally more interested in the land act than in any other portion of the bill which has been so well discussed in this chamber, especially by hon. members who themselves are ex-servicemen. I do not believe that the Veterans' Land Act in its present form is of any value, at least in the lower part of British Columbia on mixed farms. In my opinion, which is endorsed by every organization I know of, from boards of trade down, in the Fraser Valley, it is absolutely impossible for a soldier, no matter what his training or his knowledge of agriculture, to start operations and look after his family, meet ordinary living costs, let alone pay any principal and interest, if he has only $1,200 worth of stock on a mixed farm. I believe that any agriculturist will bear me out in that contention. If the government wants to make the act effective, at least in the Fraser Valley and the lower mainland of British Columbia, it must give consideration to a larger grant for stock and equipment. Further the government have reserved some 700 Japanese farms for the men who are coming back. I am sorry that the Minister of Finance (Mr. Ilsley) is not in his place, because this is more his responsibility than that of the Minister of Pensions and National Health (Mr. Mackenzie). It is out of the question for any veteran to settle on a strawberry or raspberry farm—that is what they all are—so long as he allows some bureaucrat who does not know a strawberry from a toadstool to set the price of these berries. I hope the Minister of Pensions and National Health will be the soldier's friend when it comes to endeavouring to put some pressure on the minister who is responsible in this connection.

I turn now to another matter. As I have said, I endorse practically everything which has been said by all hon. members in connection with the bill, and shall have more to say about it when it is in committee. I did not happen to be in the house last night; I was on other business with my room-mate, who has left to join his unit. I had the privilege during the two years he was overseas of looking after his riding; and we were checking over files and various matters which he wishes me to look after now that he is returning to active service. But I have discovered that an hon. gentleman with a wonderful military record took occasion to make an attack on my room-mate and colleague, the hon. member for Vancouver North. He also made some remarks about myself. I am not worrying over what he said about myself; he has said these things a few times before, and any time the hon. member for Témiscouata says anything about the member for Fraser Valley, Cruickshank gets some more votes. I should like to read a letter I have received from one of the most prominent members of the Co-operative Commonwealth Federation party in British Columbia. It is dated from Hatzic, April 27. This warrior friend of mine from Témiscouata has some favourite expressions which he likes to level at the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Ralston) and Barclay's bank and the civil servants; he also likes to tell me that I will not be re-elected. But here is the letter from Hatzic:

Dear George:

I have just read a couple of clippings in a Vancouver paper, which I enclose. I certainly approve of the method you have of addressing such men as herein indicated, J. F. Pouliot, for instance. You surely let them all know B.C. can speak for itself. The Speaker evidently knows his business too.

And this part I should like to bring to the notice of the hon. member who says to each member he does not like, "You won't be elected." I want him to hear this line from a past president of the C.C.F. association in my riding:

The next election may also prove Pouliot to be a false prophet.

So that I am not particularly worried about what the hon. member for Temiscouata may have said about myself last night or at any other time. The more he says, the more certain I am of being returned to Ottawa.

I think every hon. member will give me credit for the fact that I do not often either follow notes or read anything, but in order that there may be no misunderstanding about this I want to follow my notes fairly carefully.

I should like to turn now to the cowardly attack made by the hon. member for Temiscouata on the hon. member for Vancouver North. I say "cowardly" advisedly, for the hon. member waited until the hon. member for Vancouver North had left the house to return to his duties in the Royal Canadian Air Force before he made his slur. If the hon. member for Vancouver North were here he would be able to take care of himself.

That there might be no mistake to-day, I wrote the hon. member for Temiscouata as follows:

Ottawa, Ontario,
June 16, 1944.

Mr. J. F. Pouliot, M.P.,
House of Commons,
Ottawa, Ont.

Sir:

As I intend making reference to yourself in the house during the day, as a matter of courtesy I am writing you to this effect in order that you may, should you so desire, be present during my remarks.

I want it to be perfectly clear that I never say anything that I am afraid to say in front of a man; I never have done so and I never will. I want to quote the facts about the hon. member for Vancouver North because I want them to be accurate. The hon. member enlisted as aircrew on September 4, 1939, but because of his age he was not called up until the spring of 1940. He was then called as an administrative officer rather than as aircrew because the services felt that with his training he would be of more value in such capacity.

He bitterly resented this and attempted to remuster as a navigator in the fall of 1940 but was turned down on medical grounds as unfit for tropical service, which is amusing in view of his later service in the desert. He went overseas in 1940 and served with two Canadian fighter squadrons as adjutant. When the Royal Air Force raised the age for aircrew he applied and was accepted for aircrew, but this was stopped by the Royal Canadian Air Force. He then volunteered for service in Libya, reverting from squadron leader to flight lieutenant in order to do so.

He served from Alamein to Tunis, then in Malta, and he was the first Canadian airman to wade ashore from a barge in the invasion of Sicily. Yet he is referred to as a penguin by the warrior of Temiscouata. All any hon.

member need to do is to ask any airman what he thinks of Flight Lieutenant Jimmy Sinclair. They need only read Hansard of the past two days to see the many fine things which have been said by members of all parties about his efforts in the house for his comrades in the service.

Now let us examine the military record of the hon. member for Temiscouata. According to the Parliamentary Guide, which is issued to every hon. member, the hon. member for Temiscouata was born in 1890. On August 4, 1914 he would have been twenty-four years of age and in 1918 he would have been twenty-eight years of age. That is, during the last war his age would range from twenty-four to twenty-eight years. As an old soldier I know that is the ideal age at which to be a soldier. The Parliamentary Guide shows no record of service in the first great war.

According to Hansard the record of service of the hon. member in the second great war would appear to be to discourage the enlistment of farmers' sons and in no way to have encouraged the purchase of victory bonds to buy supplies for a gift to battered Britain. He has done more than anyone else to hurt the cause of unity by putting Quebec before the eyes of the rest of Canada in a light which in no way is the due of a province that produced the famous Twenty-Second Battalion, a unit which I had the honour to serve alongside in the first great war. No; the hon. member for Temiscouata who fights so courageously against civil servants or members of the armed forces who cannot fight back is not in a position to know what a slit trench in the bombed desert means, to know of sleepless nights on the sands, to live on iron rations, to share with his comrades the cruelties of war. How could he when he has never seen war, never known war other than that of endless speeches with an eye always on the battle front of the Temiscouata elections.

Unfortunately the rest of Canada judge the great province of Quebec by the utterances of such men as the hon. member for Temiscouata. When I go home to my riding, I am not asked, "What is the price of milk? What have you done about farm labour?" I am asked, and I am sure many other members from western Canada are also asked, "What are you going to do about Quebec?" I want to say to hon. members from Quebec that it is extremely unfortunate that their spokesman is apparently the hon. member for Temiscouata. I know he does not express the feelings of many fine members from the province of Quebec. Every time I go back home I defend the province of Quebec.

[Mr. Cruickshank.]

Quebec is a wonderful province and has made a great contribution, not only to the present war but to the last war. But unfortunately such men as this broadcast their remarks across Canada as representing the soul of Quebec. I do not think it is the soul of Quebec to call an airman who volunteered in 1939 a penguin when he served throughout the Africa-Sicily campaign, to call him a penguin when one son of the Minister of National Defence for Air (Mr. Power) is serving as adjutant of the squadron in which the hon. member for Vancouver North served. Another son of the minister is a prisoner in Hong Kong, and yet this so-called spokesman for Quebec calls my room-mate, a soldier in this war like Flight Lieutenant James Sinclair, the hon. member for Vancouver North, a penguin.

I want to tell the hon. member for Temiscouata that I think I speak not only for my province but for all members in this house when I say that they bow their heads with shame that any member should defame a fighting man from Africa and Sicily by calling him a penguin.

Mr. W. K. ESLING (Kootenay West): Mr. Speaker, the placing of veterans' affairs under a separate department is not only acceptable to the men of the armed forces but I know it will be very desirable to the administration especially when these men are returning from overseas in greater numbers. The bill makes provision for the care and training of veterans, especially disabled veterans who, I take it for granted, will be cared for and treated under the Department of Veterans' Affairs. I assume also that the blind veterans will come under the care and direction of the Canadian national institute for the blind. Certainly they could get no better care. I notice that one section of the bill gives the minister direction and control over the workshops of the institute in which the blind will be trained, but I take it that there will be an arrangement made between the Canadian national institute and the administration.

There is not much that can be said on this bill without repetition, and the debate has been a series of repetitions. In the regulations issued under a recent order and which became effective on June 1, reference was made to the members of the forces who served in the northwest rebellion. The hon. member for Broadview (Mr. Church) has been most persistent in his plea on behalf of the members of those forces. He has asked that they be brought under the War Veterans' Allowance Act. Pensions are provided for the disabled, but unfortunately these men do not come under the benefits of this act.

There are not a great many of them. A man who enlisted at the youngest age of eighteen in 1885 would be seventy-seven years old to-day, so that I think it will be admitted by all hon. members that if the treasury board showed a little generosity it would not make much of a dent in the federal exchequer to permit these men to have the benefits of this act which would give a man $30 a month if he were single and $60 if married. These men were looked upon as being heroes in the days of 1885. It was a long arduous march which they made and they encountered considerable exposure. The answer made to the hon. member for Broadview was that in order for them to come under the War Veterans' Allowance Act it was necessary that they have served in a theatre of war, were sixty years of age and in necessitous circumstances.

I have had cases before the war veterans' allowance board and they were disposed of promptly according to their merits. I had one case of a man who had not gone out of Canada and another one who had not gone any farther than England. The board very rightly said: "By no stretch of the imagination could England be considered as a theatre of war in the last war." Neither could Canada be declared a theatre of war at that time. Therefore that disposed of the contention that these men could not be granted an allowance. There was another reason given, namely, in order to accommodate these men the territory covered by the north and south shores of the Saskatchewan river where the uprising took place would have to be declared a theatre of war. It was not a theatre of war such as we know to-day. But there were four or five battles fought there and some four hundred men were wounded. There were also twenty-six killed. In the battle of Batoche fifty-one rebels were killed. The five battles are recorded in the archives. They were the battles of Frog Lake, Fish Lake, Batoche, Cut Knife and so on. There were five places in which there were encounters. Many were killed and wounded and many more suffered from exposure. Some six hundred mounted policemen joined that force. Those who were wounded were pensioned. The minister will remember that a few years ago a cash gratuity was given to the survivors, but none of them have come under the War Veterans' Allowance Act. In my own town I have three or four of those old veteran mounted policemen. There were some who were not in the police force. There were five thousand members of that force. There were infantry, cavalry and artillery forces from the cities of Quebec, Montreal, Ottawa, Toronto, Kingston and Calgary. As I say, it is all recorded in the archives of this country. By the way, very little of the history of the rebellion comes to the attention of readers of to-day, but correct reports are kept in the archives branch. I believe that the government would be justified—and I appeal to the minister to give thought to it—in bringing the members of the forces of the northwest rebellion within the benefits of the War Veterans' Allowance Act.

Another matter which has been mentioned in connection with this new department is that of bringing the soldier settlement board within the terms and the orbit of this act. So much has been said about it that this is one case in which there is real repetition. The hon. member for Battle River (Mr. Fair) and other hon. members from all parts of the house have suggested that the indebtedness be wiped out entirely. It was a hazardous and uncertain game to start with. Twenty-five thousand soldiers took advantage of the Soldier Settlement Act. We all know the adversities with which they were faced, so much so that thirteen thousand, according to the reports issued just prior to the outbreak of the war, had abandoned their venture entirely. A few have paid up and acquired titles. Some eight hundred had traded or disposed of their equity. But the point to remember is that many of them were able to secure reductions; as a matter of fact they all secured certain reductions. They had reductions of interest, bonus payments and so on two or three times. But there was one point that they did not all take advantage of and that is the only point on which I am going to make my plea on behalf of the soldier settlers. Many of the soldiers took advantage of the Farmers' Creditors Arrangement Act to such an extent that they materially reduced their indebtedness. Far more did they reduce their indebtedness than did many who paid their principal and interest. The reason why they did not all take advantage of it was that they were not all in the same financial straits. As I said, they had paid their interest and principal and were not called upon to make a settlement; whereas the field men, in some instances at any rate, when they went around and tried to make collections from those settlers who were in arrears actually suggested that they take advantage of the Farmers' Creditors Arrangement Act and materially reduce their indebtedness.

The Farmers' Creditors Arrangement Act was nothing more than a method of permitting the farmers to go through bankruptcy, a method which did not apply to them until the act had been brought into force along about 1930. As I say, there were those who did not pay but who took advantage of the re-arrangement of their indebtedness when the Farmers' Creditors Arrangement Act came into the picture and they were far better off than those who paid. Therefore my one appeal to the minister, since he is taking over this new department, is to start with a cleaner sheet by putting every man on a level and allow those who have not had the benefit of reducing their indebtedness through the Farmers' Creditors Arrangement Act to take that advantage. At the present time it applies only to Alberta and Saskatchewan, and since the end of the year to Manitoba. It should be made retroactive to British Columbia. I think it would be doing a gracious act and it would be cutting down the indebtedness of the soldiers. You would be putting them more on an even basis if you were just to all of them, and you can only be just to all of them by relieving those who did not apply for that re-arrangement under the Farmers' Creditors Arrangement Act and reducing their indebtedness to the equivalent of those who benefited.

Hon. J. L. RALSTON (Minister of National Defence): I want to take the opportunity which this debate affords to say a word or two to the house in explanation of the organizations which have been set up in the three service departments, which organizations have to do with what we call discharge affairs. I trouble the house to listen to me in this matter because there has already been some misapprehension with regard to the office which these organizations have to fill in the service departments. I want it understood at the outset that those services which I shall describe in a moment are purely intended to be supplementary to the services which I believe, and I am sure ex-servicemen generally believe, have been so efficiently rendered by my colleague and his Department of Pensions and National Health with respect to returned men's problems. But it has seemed to some of us that there is a tendency—and this happens in connection with not only ex-servicemen's affairs but other matters as well—to separate governmental departments into water-tight compartments and, as some of the public have flippantly described it, for one department to "pass the buck" to another.

There is a clear line of demarcation between the objects and functions of the Department of Pensions and National Health and those of the three defence services represented by the Departments of National Defence for Army, Air and Naval Services. That clear line of demarcation is that theoretically and perhaps legally, the three defence departments have nothing to do with a man after he is discharged from the defence services. From that time on the Department of Pensions and National Health takes him on, and some people might say that on this account the three defence services have nothing to do with a man who is prospectively to be discharged, because, after all, whatever is eventually to be done with respect to him must be done by the Department of Pensions and National Health. So that the impression has gone abroad that the appointment of the three officers who were mentioned in the press announcement a week or so ago was in some way infringing upon the Department of Pensions and National Health. I know my colleague and his officials understand perfectly that this is not so. I want to say that there is the closest cooperation between us, and I should like this house and the country to understand that there is neither any intent to infringe nor any infringement of any kind. I have believed that instead of departments working in water-tight compartments—not, as it were, not letting the right hand know what the left hand does—it is necessary—and this applies not to departments alone but to branches of departments—that departments, instead of working on their own, should integrate, should mesh or gear into each other in their activities—I do not like the word "coordinate" so much—and that is exactly what the organization of which I shall speak in a moment is intended to do. That is, it is intended to gear into the activities of the Department of Pensions and National Health, but to do so in advance of the man leaving the service, so that he may have the benefit of a certain amount of advice, a certain amount of knowledge, a certain amount of training and a certain amount of planning by the defence services themselves, of which he is a member. In this way he may be better prepared, and have better facilities provided, to return and take up his position in civil life.

While I am speaking of the Department of Pensions and National Health, I want to remind the house that when the time comes for a man to be discharged or, even more important, when the time comes for general demobilization, you will find that there will be interested in that man not only the three defence services but also the Department of Pensions and National Health, which has had to do primarily with pensions and treatment of disabled men; the department of reconstruction, which will have a tremendous amount to do with the matter of providing employment, I mean by way of the conversion of war industries to civilian production—

Mr. GREEN: Will that department have anything to do with the individual man in the forces?

Mr. RALSTON: It will have to do with the provision of work which will be available to the individual.

Mr. GREEN: But it will have nothing to do with the actual individual?

Mr. RALSTON: Of course the department of reconstruction has not been set up, but it will have a very real job to do at least in connection with ex-service men in the mass, to provide and assist in providing employment which may be useful in helping them to return to civil life. Then there is the Department of Labour—perhaps I should have put it in the second place—which will have a great deal to do with the placement of men in various industries, subject, of course, to the right of those men to receive their old jobs back under the provisions of the legislation already in force. So that there are the armed services and these three departments particularly, and there may be others, all of which will have something to do with the ex-service man.

This is what the armed services have done. I am not going to use the word "discharged" any more than I can help, because I am not particularly enamoured of it. I like to think of the transition, shall I say, of a man from service to civilian life simply as the "change-over" from war service to peace service. Looking forward to that change-over, the defence services do not take the position that they are not concerned with a man after his discharge. Neither do they take the position that they are not concerned with the man who prospectively will be discharged. They believe that they have some duty and responsibility to him in both those aspects. The reason is that it is felt that the defence services know something about the work that man has done. He has been a member of the fighting forces which have been under the administration of these departments. He has assisted in carrying out the duties of fighting men, in carrying out the duties laid upon these departments to maintain Canada's armed forces. So that it does seem desirable that the point of view of those men with regard to what provision should be and can be made for their return to civil life, or their "change-over", should be represented by someone who knows something of the difficulties which they have had to meet. By that I mean the point of view should be represented by someone who has been in the fighting services and, more than that, someone who has been in the fighting. That is the first principle, that the point of view of the man himself or of the body of men should be represented by those who know that point of view, either by direct experience of their own or by learning from those who have had direct experience; I mean their point of view in connection with the measures which must be considered for the purpose of helping to rehabilitate ex-service men. The list of such measures or at least of subjects dealt with in that way is really a long one.

I have an opportunity, as probably many other hon. members have had, of reading the resolutions and reports on rehabilitation in the proceedings of the Canadian Legion convention in Vancouver a very short time ago. Those resolutions, on various subjects which vitally affect ex-service men, cover page after page. I am sure I do not need to say, for hon. members of the house and the country will agree, that the Canadian Legion all down through the years has represented the ex-service men in a very fine way in connection with legislation and individual measures which might be for their benefit. On the whole I think one can say that their attitude has been very tolerant, helpful and considerate. With many of the resolutions, of course, I may not agree entirely, but the tone, temper and general nature of those resolutions are such as to commend them to the public generally, I should think, and would indicate that they took a serious view of their responsibilities in helping to represent the ex-service man. But I am sure they would be the first to agree that men in the fighting services and on the fighting fronts to-day would be glad also to have the benefit of the representations which come from those fighting fronts, from men who are there and men who come from there, that they may help in moulding the legislation and measures which are to be for the benefit of those men when they come home.

That is the first office which the three fighting services wish to help perform. Flowing from that, as hon. members will see, is this point, that there is a real matter of military efficiency involved. That comes about in this way, that the more assured the men in the fighting services, who are on the beaches of France or in Italy to-night, and the more assured their dependents are that their interests are being and will be looked after by those who know something about the situation, and less their worry and consequently the better for military efficiency. That also is a factor which the defence services, I think quite properly, consider important in connection with this activity which they are undertaking. They consider that the morale of the fighting men, the morale of the dependents of the fighting men, and the morale of the country generally, benefits from an active interest being shown and active and effective work being done to help see to it that the measures taken are worthy of the men and women themselves and of the service they are giving overseas. So that each department has set up an adviser on discharge affairs; in two departments they are called advisers, while I believe the Department of National Defence for Air calls the officer the director of demobilization.

They have not a large staff, but they are charged with the responsibility in two different aspects. First let me say this, that they are not charged with the routine of demobilization of the soldiers. By routine of demobilization I mean the sort of medical examination they shall take, where the examinations shall be held, the make-up of the boards, the matter of pay, the forms to be used on discharge or demobilization, the arrangements regarding transportation. They do not deal with these matters of routine. At the present time they would not deal with the order in which demobilization shall take place. That is to say, that for the present at least they do not advise on the formula which will be adopted to decide when men will be demobilized first when general demobilization is attained.

It is not routine that they are dealing with. That routine will involve, when the time comes, putting the branch of the adjutant-general, which has been getting men into the services, into reverse, and taking the men out of the services, by making the change-over to civilian life. That routine is not anything that any two or three or half a dozen men can do. It will require the activities of the whole man-power side of the adjutant-general's branch, and probably more.

What those men are dealing with is not merely routine. That is to say, it is not simply the mechanics of turning men out into civil life, through the use of certain procedure and forms. But what they are dealing with is the welfare of the men who are being discharged, the matter of the amenities which can be provided for them, and the matter of the aid which can be given to them, in order that they may be absorbed, and absorbed properly, into civil life.

I just wish to deal here with two phases of that activity. First, it will take the phase of activity within the service, activity while men are still serving. That involves, some day, the matter of vocational training. There will come a time in the war when operational activities will cease—and pray God it may come soon. I, as Minister of National Defence have very little hope that it may come soon, but we must plan for it when it does come; I wish the house and country to understand what we are trying to do. What we will face at some time is a period of inactivity in the army, because there cannot be general demobilization all at once. And when that period of inactivity comes we will have to arrange that those periods are utilized to give useful vocational training while men are still in the army, training which will anticipate the training which will be given later by the Department of Pensions and National Health, or by the Department of Veterans' Affairs, and which will gear into that. That is a matter for planning and advice by those officials.

They will also have to be in close touch with the educational activities of the respective defence services. That education is being carried on to-day, for the primary purpose of making the man a more efficient soldier and, secondly, to be useful in helping the man to be a better and a more productive citizen. It is in connection with this latter objective that these officials will help to plan. Then there will be measures for their assistance in connection with their discharge.

The matter of clothing allowance has been mentioned. That matter of clothing allowance is one which is looked after by the three defence services. That matter of the assessment of or the fixing of a clothing allowance and advising on it, and comparing it with those of other countries, and seeing what is fair and reasonable, is a matter which would be within their purview, I would say. The matter of leave which a man gets on discharge is another thing which would come directly within the defence departments, the army, the navy and the air force. These officers would advise on that. Then there is the matter of war service gratuity. Here again these officers will study and advise, taking account of the various representations and suggestions made, and the conditions in this country affecting such assistance.

I could go on to discuss other matters, but I do wish to say further that their job will also be to plan and advise on arrangements to inform sailors and soldiers and airmen while they are in the army, and while they are still serving, and while they are still fighting, of the provision which is being made for them when the time comes for discharge.

Those are the activities in the army. While they may, and do, refer to general demobilization, we must not forget that discharges are taking place continuously. In the last sixteen weeks, for instance, we have discharged from the army about 11,000 men. Those men being discharged from day to day have to be discharged properly and have to be looked after when they are discharged from the three services. We would like to have the activity of these officers to begin early and not wait for general demobilization, in order to take in the large numbers of men who are discharged from time to time. Those are activities which are taking place within the armed services.

The other activity is one which perhaps the house may think may be apt to infringe upon the Department of Pensions and National Health or the Department of Labour. Those activities have to do with the measure which would take effect after discharge. I mean, for instance, how much we will allow a man, or how much the Department of Pensions and National Health will allow a man while he is on vocational training. Or it may be the matter of veterans' homes, or many other post-discharge benefits.

You may say that the fighting services have not anything to do with those matters. But they do have ideas, and those ideas are from the men in the armed forces themselves.

Measures of that kind, as I said a moment ago, are referred to in the resolutions passed by the legion. They are very many in number, and the items covered a great many objectives. All those matters are things on which these officers will help to plan and advise.

I am not going to talk about the merits of these matters. I think most members will agree with me when I say that the most important and the most outstanding measure, either of benefit or right, which the government could provide for in the interests of the men and women of the services when they are discharged is the matter of full employment. And if full employment is provided, a great many problems may never arise.

In that connection, obviously, there will arise questions in connection with civil service employment. Then there will be questions of the status of ex-service men in respect of government industries which have been converted from war-time to peace-time activities. What shall the status of ex-service men be in respect of those? Then there are questions of administration in connection with the service man's right to employment in their own jobs, and so on. There will arise questions involving the Department of Reconstruction and the Department of Labour. There will arise questions in connection with the Veterans' Land Act, which has already been passed. There will arise questions of vocational training, and the allowances which will be made and the facilities which may be provided. There will be questions with regard to the men engaged in the fisheries. The measures to deal with these subjects will be proper matters for planning and advice by these officers in the three defence services, sitting in with the officers of the Department of Pensions and National Health.

There has been a great deal of discussion about small business, and other occupations and professions, in respect of which assistance has been suggested. Then there will be the question of pensions and treatment, which is always with us. And there will be questions regarding allowances for ex-service men on training or treatment. We believe that the officers of the three services can help in planning and advising on such matters.

I wish to close by repeating that the desire of the service departments is—and it is fully understood by the Department of Pensions and National Health, and by the Department of Labour, and I am sure will be agreed to by the Department of Reconstruction—that these officers function in integration with and geared in with the activities of these other departments, not to take over or infringe on any of their functions, but to help by planning and advice, with a knowledge of the point of view of those who serve in the armed forces. You will find that most of their work will be done by way of interdepartmental committees or boards on which the officers representing the armed services will sit down with the officials of other departments and endeavour to work out common problems, bringing to all concerned the point of view of the men and women in the fighting forces.

I have taken longer than I had expected, but I just wanted to make that explanation. I have spoken particularly of army activities, but I have endeavoured to represent the point of view of my colleagues, the minister for air and the minister for naval services. We feel that in this way we may be able to furnish some assistance to the men and the women in the fighting services and their dependents who are bearing the real burden and paying the real cost of this war in separation and anxiety and sorrows, in wounds and in life itself.

Mr. NEILL: Would the minister say a word about the merchant marine?

Mr. RALSTON: I am not in a position to say a word about the merchant marine. I purposely refrained from doing so because I thought that is something on which these officers might not be of very much help. They would be very glad to sit down and consider their problems but would certainly not be regarded as representing the point of view of the merchant marine, except to this extent, that they can at least bear testimony, if testimony were needed—and I know it is not in this house and in the country— to the vigilance and faithfulness and loyalty and outstanding work which these men, perhaps almost the forgotten men, have done and are doing in keeping the sea lanes open and in carrying across the seas the munitions and supplies that are required to win the war. I am sure that all would realize the worthiness of any representations which they might make for proper and just recognition. I hope the explanation I have made with respect to the three services and what they are trying to do may help to clear the situation slightly with regard to these activities.

Mr. KINLEY: I might suggest to the minister that the education of navy men to become officers of the merchant marine might very well come under a committee of this kind.

Mr. RALSTON: That is why I said I was speaking for the army. I did not attempt to cover all the activities which these advisers might undertake. I am quite sure that the representatives of the naval service might well have in mind the activities of the men of the merchant marine.

Mr. KINLEY: I had in mind it was an integrated service.

Mr. C. E. JOHNSTON (Bow River): Mr. Speaker, I am sure that the house will be pleased to know that the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Ralston) is going to set up this new organization, representative of the three fighting services, to cooperate with this new department which is being set up. I quite agree with him that such an organization was lacking in the last war, and I agree with him also as to the possibilities of such an organization being of great assistance in this war.

There is no doubt that when the men are about to be discharged from the armed services they are in a great hurry to get home, and they do not understand all the regulations and all the provisions that have been made for their benefit until it is too late. Then they are sorry that they were not a little more cautious in the first place. This new organization which the Minister of National Defence has spoken of will be of great assistance. He mentioned that it would be its duty to look after the welfare of the men and that it would contain men of experience with army life who would be in a position to advise the men of the armed forces as to their new associations in civilian life.

The minister also referred to the matter of clothing and said that it would be part of the duty of this new organization to advise the new department on the amount of clothing that would be required upon discharge. I wish to say a word about that and I think this is about as good a time as any to say it.

I am sure that if this new organization is conversant with the needs of the soldiers when they return to civilian life it will realize that the amount of $65 which is now allowed for clothing allowance is certainly not sufficient for the soldiers to make a change-over from active service to civilian life. I would suggest to the Minister of National Defence that this new organization would be well advised to make out a list of the essential items of clothing required by the men upon discharge in order that they may start out decently clothed in civilian life. Let this organization figure out if it requires one suit or two suits of clothes, a couple of pairs of shoes or more, an overcoat, a hat and so on, whatever they think may be required, and then, when they have the list complete, find out what it would cost at modern prices and then say: This is the amount that we recommend for a clothing allowance. I am quite sure that the minister of this new Department of Veterans' Affairs will find out that $65 will not be sufficient to provide the clothing required.

I have received I do not know how many letters on this subject. I have a file of them here. They all complain of the inadequacy of the clothing allowance. I received one such document this afternoon. It is really a petition with sixty-five names attached of men in the Canadian armed services. They are petitioning us now, pleading with members of the House of Commons to give them a greater clothing allowance than the $65 which is now provided. I do not think there can be any argument in that regard. If we were living in a country which could not provide these things it might be justifiable for us to say that we can allow only $65 for clothing, but we are certainly not living nor shall we be living after this war in a land where these things cannot very easily be produced. We have wonderful potentialities of production when we change over from war-time to peace-time production and we can produce far more than is required to satisfy all our wants. So why be niggardly about this clothing allowance? This petition which I received has names of men from Drumheller, Calgary and various other cities. The men in the armed forces are very much concerned over this clothing allowance. I hope that the Department of Veterans' Affairs will not be limited by any miserly outlook in this matter but will provide a decent clothing allowance for the men upon discharge.

I wish to associate myself with the remarks made by the hon. member for Battle River (Mr. Fair) in regard to giving to the returned soldier settlers clear titles to the land on which they are now settled. I am not going to go over the ground that he covered so thoroughly and ably, because he put the case in such a way that it needs no further argument. I am quite sure that the minister of pensions, the minister who will be presiding over this new Department of Veterans' Affairs, is quite conversant with the facts and is sympathetic toward the men getting clear title to their land.

In this regard I think the evidence is clear, not only in the communications which have been sent to various hon. members, including the minister himself, but in the presentations which have been made in person to the minister and his officials. I met the delegation who came here to interview the minister. The meeting with the minister was arranged by the hon. member for Battle River. The delegates were courteously received and patiently listened to; they were well pleased with their reception, and the only thing which remains is for action to be taken as a result of their interview. If no action is taken these men will be very much concerned. I am not going to argue the subject now, because I am convinced that serious consideration will be given to granting clear titles to these men. Certainly this concession should be made. It would have been much more economical if we had given the land outright at first. I am not so sure, in spite of the provisions of the new Veterans' Land Act, but that the department would be farther ahead to take a lesson from the experience we have had since the last war and give these men titles to their lands. Administration costs would be saved; departmental headaches would be avoided, and none of the difficulties which attach to the proposed operation would arise. I shall rest my argument at this point, and when the bill is under discussion in committee I may have something further to say about it.

Mr. A. R. ADAMSON (York West): Before the question is put, I should like to go on record as congratulating the hon. member for Fraser Valley (Mr. Cruickshank) upon what he had to say to-night. I hope that chivalry and honour are sufficiently alive among us that we in this house will not allow to pass unchallenged slurs against a member who has served his country well, and served it in actual combat duty. One can only hope, also, that chivalry as well as honour are not dead in the province of Quebec.

I suggest to the Minister of Pensions and National Health (Mr. Mackenzie) that he call the department to be set up under this bill the department of warriors' affairs. I recommend that for two reasons. First, I have had a number of letters concerning the term "veterans" and what it meant after the last war; second, the name "warrior" is a good English word. Its definition is, "one who is experienced in war." We have in Toronto a warriors' day at the annual exhibition, and the use of the term "warrior" has always been considered favourably. It does not denote age in the way that "veteran" does.

In this connection we have to deal with a very different problem at the end of this war from that which faced us at the end of the last war. The problem is different psychologically; we are dealing with a different kind of man. It is not that he is any braver or more patriotic than the soldier of the last war, but he has had a great deal more technical training. In the last war the fundamentals of service were that you should be able to march, that you should be able to shoot, that you should be able to keep yourself clean and that you should keep your head down. There was really only one weapon that you had to understand and that was the rifle; later on, the Lewis machine gun. An hon. member adds "trench mortar", but trench mortars were a specialist weapon, and it was not until quite late in the last war that they became plentiful. But in this war the infantryman has to know at least seven weapons; he has to be pretty well informed about tactics, and he has to be able to carry on and think for himself as an individual. No more is it true—and this is, I think, one fundamental difference between this war and the last—that a sergeant-major may get up and say, "You are not supposed to think", as sergeant-majors used to do in the last war. In this war you are supposed to think, and you are given a great deal of intensive training.

When the men who served in the present war are discharged they will be trained men; they will have been trained to use a number of weapons and to think for themselves, and this will be a great asset, because many opportunities will arise in Canada in the shape of new industries. The radio industry, the science of electronics, the plastic industries, the aircraft industry are examples; all these will require many men, but the men they will require will be those who will be trained in the new sciences. Those sciences are not taught at the technical schools or the universities; they are taught only in the plants which are established to produce these new materials—some of them still on the secret list. They offer to our men a great future, and I suggest to the minister that he make a survey of these industries and arrange with them to take for training men discharged from the army.

There has been a great deal of talk about education; but after a man has been in the army, the air force or the navy for four or five years, he is not psychologically prepared to go back to school or university. He wants to start out at once to earn a living. This point of view is, I think, well expressed in a letter I received from an airman serving in the far east. I will quote one paragraph because it seems to me significant. He says:

I don't think that the average man, in the service which, I know, wishes or expects any sort of a handout after this war is won. Yet I believe that, for our own and the dominion's protection, some method of placement should be adopted just so long as no compulsory placement is attempted. A great "to do" is being raised about the educational opportunities the government will provide. Very good for a few but hardly a plan which will affect the many. For example, of the forty or so Canadians with whom I am in touch (all rather above average in educational standards) only two are seriously able to consider future education at the government's expense—and it is doubtful if even one of those will take advantage of the offers.

That is an individual case, but I consider it symptomatic of the position of the majority of the members of our armed forces to-day. I do not think there will be a strong desire on the part of many to go back to school or to go back to the university. Let us look at the position in which these men will find themselves. First of all, despite what critics may say, they will have had the priceless opportunity of knowing armed combat. Furthermore, they will be four or five years older. If they go back to the university they will find themselves men in classes along with mere boys. That is one of the psychological problems which we cannot overemphasize.

The next and very important question is the economic one. Many of these men have married; a great many of them are considering marriage, and they are four or five years older. At that age it becomes necessary for them to consider, not education but the immediate earning of a living. Therefore I believe that the first problem, as the minister has intimated, will be to provide employment in industry where expansion is most likely to take place. I make this suggestion because I understand it has been carried out elsewhere, as I shall mention in a minute.

Let me say a word with regard to the development of the farm. If there was criticism to be levelled against the administration after the last war it was because they put men on the farm who did not know the problems of farming. Not only did they not know the problems of farming, they were psychologically not attuned to life on the farm, particularly after life in the armed services. I know of several cases where they found the loneliness of life on the farm a very serious drawback. They found the change-over from being looked after for twenty-four hours a day to being completely on their own too great a psychological change to be undergone. Many of them became unhappy because of that change.

I suggest to the minister that before he puts men on the farm he give them an opportunity to know rural work. I speak for southern Ontario, the part of Canada I know best. We have there a serious problem of soil erosion, the destruction of our forests, the depletion of our agricultural resources, caused by a lack of water through the drying up of our streams. Only an infinitesimal part of the job has been done in tackling the problem. Of the many hundreds of thousands of acres in this rich agricultural belt, only King township and the interlobate moraine of the Ganaraska valley have been adequately surveyed.

I suggest that immediate steps be taken to create survey parties to make a complete study of the reconstruction and rehabilitation or the bringing back of this great agricultural belt of southern Ontario to the state in which it was before we and our ancestors did it such grievous damage by cutting trees, destroying streams and so on. No one who knows that part of the country can underestimate the seriousness of the situation. Let me give one example. In the Peel plain, the great fertile belt represented by the leader of the opposition, seventy per cent of the water in the streams has been lost from the early days. That is a serious situation we must face.

I suggest that one of the first things that men who want to go on farms after the war should be asked to do is to make up survey parties to study the conditions of the land. This would do a number of things. First of all, it would provide an essential service. I stress that because it is essential. We have to understand, we have to have much more knowledge of the problems of the land than we have at the present time. Second, it would give these men coming out of the army an opportunity to know what rural life was like, what farm life was like and what the problems of farming were. They would be given that opportunity at first hand immediately on coming out of the army. They would not have to take the irrevocable step of deciding to go on the farm before they realized what rural life was like. I think this is very important, particularly when we consider the type of man being discharged to-day from the army, navy and air force and the type of man who will be discharged at the end of the war.

Another suggestion I should like to offer is that if this country is to fulfil its destiny, that destiny is closely associated with the development of our minerals. I shall not go into the state of our mineral resources to-day, but let me say just one thing. Of our present splendid production eighty-four per cent comes from mines discovered over twenty-five years ago and only five per cent from mines discovered since 1930. That is an extremely dangerous, even perilous, situation not appreciated, I am afraid, by this government or its predecessor.

One of the immediate problems of the post-war period will be the discovery and development of our mineral resources which now are merely indicated. I again suggest to the minister that he, in conjunction with the Minister of Mines and Resources (Mr. Crerar) undertake now the establishment of numerous survey parties. Subcommittee No. 2 which has to do with reconstruction said that thousands of prospectors would be needed. Professor Wallace used the word "thousands". That number will be needed if we are to take any recognition of what Russia, a country less blest with mineral resources than ours, is doing. Immediately before the war they had something like three hundred thousand men actively engaged in exploration for minerals. I suggest that here is an immediate opportunity for men being discharged from the army. It does two things. It gives them a waiting period in which they are actively employed doing useful and essential work. It gives them an opportunity to know the mineral industry; whether they want to go in for it or not, it gives many men who may be psychologically not adjusted to civil life an opportunity to work for a year or two to adjust themselves to the slower tempo of civilian life in Canada.

This is very important, because in our age of mass production many men will be asked to do factory jobs which are repetitive. Any hon. members who know the large automotive industry will know what working on an assembly line means. I ask them to put themselves in the position of a young airman, who comes out of combat after having flown a Lancaster bomber with five thousand horse-power at his finger-tips, with bomb bays filled with weapons capable of producing acres of destruction, who is asked to go to a factory and told that his job is to do one of these routine jobs for eight hours a day. I do not think he is going to like it. I do not think it is fair to ask him to do it. That will be one of our problems. There is one thing more. Before the war many men were engaged as salesmen. They were selling mundane things, such as breakfast foods, soap and other household articles. Put yourself in the position of a young man from Normandy who is told that his job is to sell goods to this grocery store and that grocery store. I do not think he is psychologically prepared on discharge to do so. Some recognition must be taken of that fact.

I have seen a scheme in California which I believe is working quite satisfactorily to a degree. The major industries of California have set up a board. They have a central office in the larger towns. I think they have one in Los Angeles and one in San Francisco. I am sure of San Francisco, but I am not sure of Los Angeles. Every manufacturer, every industrialist and some of the larger growers send to this central board their requirements for labour and those they can employ. They tell the type of man they want and the type of work to be done. There is an opportunity for men awaiting discharge to go to this clearing house and be interviewed by this organization. A man who has been a mechanic may be offered certain work. A man is asked what he wants to do, whether he wants to go back to the university, and so on. The manufacturers cooperate in putting him at the type of work for which he thinks he is best suited.

I know the minister will say that we have selective service, but at the present time our selective service is interested in one thing and one thing only, namely, getting men. I know of an incident that took place in Vancouver the other day. A young man who was an engineer wanted to do a special type of work for which he was fitted. He went to selective service and they told him that men were wanted in the shipyards. They said to him: "The only thing we can suggest to you is that you go to the shipyards." They did that because men were needed in the shipyard at that time. Probably they still need them there. This is not a criticism of national selective service. That is their function, and that is what they are doing. In my opinion this other system is working out extremely well in California. They do something else. They visit the hospitals. Every manufacturer with a plant, growers and all other people interested, keep a list of the men who are wanted. The board says, "here is a man who has lost his leg", or, "here is a man who has had a serious back injury". Each individual searches his operation and says, "I can use a man with one leg in such and such a way; I can use a man with a back injury." The man in the hospital is interviewed, and in many cases he is guaranteed employment even while he is undergoing treatment there. That has a tremendous psychological effect on the well-being of that individual and it is an important factor in his cure.

These comments are by way of suggestion. The problem of the reemployment of our men is probably the major difficulty we shall have to face after the defeat of the axis powers, and in that connection I think two things should be kept in mind. First, we should remember that warfare is the science of destruction; that men are trained—magnificently trained—to destroy the enemy instantly, whereas in peace time the opposite factor is paramount. In warfare it is a question of kill or be killed; the cost is unimportant. In peace time it is a matter of conservation, and the cost is very important. That will be a definite problem in the changeover. The next point, and with this I close, is that these men do not want gratitude. They want to feel that they are doing something useful for this country for which they have fought, and it is important that the work they are asked to do shall be essential to the future of Canada, just as essential as the magnificent work they are doing to-day on the beachhead in Normandy.

Mr. D. K. HAZEN (St. John-Albert): Mr. Speaker, in looking over this bill, which is to establish a Department of Veterans' Affairs, the first thing that strikes me is that the word "veteran" or the term "ex-service man" does not appear anywhere in it. Instead we find such words as these: in section 5, "any person"; in section 6, "persons"; in section 7, "persons who served with the naval, military or air forces of His Majesty", and in section 7(b), "such other persons as may be deemed advisable," and so on. Last evening the hon. member for Vancouver South (Mr. Green) said that he did not think it would work out to have the reestablishment of veterans and civilians put under the new Department of Veterans' Affairs, and the minister replied, "That is not the intention." If that is not the intention then I ask why such powers should be included in this bill. I am not an expert on the drafting of statutes, but I believe that this bill as drafted is open to a great deal of criticism; in fact it is my feeling that it should be redrafted; that the powers of the minister should be more clearly defined; that they should be limited to veterans; that the word "veterans" should be defined in a clear and broad way, and that these other extensive powers which are given to the minister should be cut out of the bill.

In that connection there is one other matter I should like to mention. Section 7(d) provides for the marking or stamping of artificial limbs or appliances. I should like to ask the minister why both those expressions should be used. I have looked in the dictionary and I find that the word "appliances" means, "a thing applied as a means to an end."

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): Both expressions are taken from the old act.

Mr. HAZEN: I wonder if it is correct to use them both. It occurs to me that the section would be much clearer and broader if the words "artificial limbs" were left out. I should like to know if hearing devices would come under this section, or if the words "artificial limbs" limit the meaning of the word "appliances," under what one might call the rule of ejusdem generis. I believe that we should cut out the words "artificial limbs" and leave the word "appliances" alone, if it is the intention to give this clause a wide meaning.

In the forceful, eloquent and sane speech made by the honourable and gallant member for Vancouver North (Mr. Sinclair) during the course of this debate he asked a question which I though very pertinent and which I believe must be answered. This was the question: "Are we to treat our men as well when they return to be trained for peace as we did when they were trained for war in our hour of need?" That question cannot be lightly brushed aside; it deserves and must be given an answer. It has been pointed out already, but I am going to refer to it again, that when a man enlists he is paid $1.30 a day in cash, or about $39 a month. If he has to live out he receives, in addition, $36.50 a month. His wife receives a dependents' allowance of $39.12, with additional allowances for children. This makes a total family income of $115.62 a month, plus allowances for children. But when a man comes out of the army or, to use the words of the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Ralston) this evening, when a man changes over, which is perhaps a better term, and takes up vocational training for the purpose of improving his position in civilian life, under the regulations he receives $60 a month, while his wife receives $20, with similar allowances for children. In other words, when he begins to train in the army he receives a total of $115.62 a month, but when he begins to train for civilian life he and his family receive only $80 a month, a reduction of about thirty per cent. Personally I do not believe this is good enough. I do not believe it is too much to ask that returned men who want to qualify themselves for positions in civil life should receive the same rate of pay as they received when they first entered the army. We must be just before we are generous; we must pay our debts before we make gifts, and I say that we owe to these returned men a debt which we should pay in full before we vote $76,000,000 a year or some similar amount to that institution we call UNRRA. Our duty to our returned men is one of our first responsibilities. This evening the Minister of National Defence said that certain directors or advisers were to be appointed, and when that is done I hope these gentlemen will give this matter some consideration.

Mr. RALSTON: They are appointed now.

Mr. HAZEN: Now that they are appointed I hope they will give this matter some consideration with a view to bringing the allowances awarded to returned men during the time they are taking vocational training up to the amount they received when they entered the army.

There is one other matter to which I should like to refer. I wish to support what has been said by the hon. member for Battle River (Mr. Fair), the hon. member for Hastings-Peterborough (Mr. White) and a number of other members when they asked that veterans of the last war who took up farms under the soldier settlement scheme be given a clear title, although they have not paid for their farms in full.

I believe that a man should live up to his agreements and should meet his obligations. But there are some cases when this is quite impossible, and I think the situation in which these men in the prairie provinces find themselves is one of those cases. I met a delegation that came to Ottawa not long ago from the prairie provinces to speak on behalf of those soldier settlers who have been unable to pay in full for their farms. I must confess that I was not greatly impressed by a considerable part of their brief, but I was impressed by the men themselves. One could not look at them and talk with them without being impressed. One could not look them over without realizing that for many years past they had had a tremendously difficult task, that they had fought against very hard odds, and that they had done the best they could under the circumstances. It was clear, however, that fate was against them. Someone has said that the cards were stacked against them.

I think these men might be given a clear title to those farms on the ground that a mutual mistake was made. The mistake was this, that the soldier settlement board overvalued those farms. Then the veterans who went on the farms made a mistake in that they thought the farms would produce a great deal more revenue than they did. That mistake, in both cases, was owing to the fact that the farms had been purchased and arrangements made in boom times. I would urge the minister and the government to give this matter their most serious consideration. After talking to those men I felt that we could not afford to let them go off the land, and that we would be making a great mistake if we let men of their character leave their farms.

The figures show that from September 1, 1939, to December 31, 1943, 2,418 of these settlers left their farms, or an average of 606 a year in the last four and a half years. If we let men of that kind get off the land we are making a great mistake. They are men who volunteered to do their duty at the commencement of the last war. They went overseas and their sons are overseas to-day. Their sons, and their daughters, too, are in the services, and they look forward to coming home. If their homes are disappearing at the rate of 606 a year a great many of them will have no homes to return to when the war is over.

As I said before, I think people should meet their obligations and live up to their agreements, even if those agreements are hard ones. But this is a case in which I believe that an exception should be made, not only in the interests of the men and their families, but in the interest of the country at large. I would urge as strongly as I can that the request of the men to have clear title be granted. I realize that there are difficulties in the way, but I think they could be overcome and they should not prevent the government from granting this request and giving those men clear titles to their land.

Mr. J. J. KINLEY (Queens-Lunenburg): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member for St. John-Albert (Mr. Hazen) who just took his seat made a suggestion which I thought would circumscribe the work of this department, and would limit the theatre of action.

He made objection to the words "such other persons" appearing in the bill. Coming from the coast, this seems to me a good provision, because it looks like the place where the merchant marine might be brought in under the bill.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): That is one reason for it.

Mr. KINLEY: I regard that as important. I was particularly interested in the speech of the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Ralston) where he talked about an integrating service that would look after a man even before he left the service and give him, as it were, a start so that he could make better progress under the care of the new department. I think this is very important to the navy because it seems to me that outside the Royal Canadian Naval Reserve officers, or the men who are real sailors, and who learned their vocation on the sea, the place of navy men in the merchant marine after the war is open to question.

There must be many men in the navy who will want to follow the sea after the war. Canada was not always sea-conscious. But with so many men from all parts of Canada joining the navy, and with the enthusiasm that exists throughout Canada to-day in connection with the navy, also in view of the fact that with the building of the St. Lawrence waterways Canada will be a sea-going country as far as the head of the lakes, there will be a greater opportunity for many men to continue their vocations on the sea.

I am not speaking with full knowledge at the moment, but it appears to me that in Canada especially a naval officer will have little standing in the merchant marine after the war. He will not have a certificate. He may not even have the service that is required. In my view, some provision should be made whereby men who are now naval officers will be able to fit themselves to be officers in the merchant marine. And, with regard to ratings in the navy, it seems to me that any boy who wishes to follow the sea in Canada should be given that chance to fit himself to advance in the service during peace time. He should be able to advance in what is now known as the merchant navy. The education is different. A naval officer in the navy is taught to destroy, and his education is that of destruction and of defeating the enemy. On the other hand, the man in the merchant marine is taught differently; he must preserve property and overcome the elements, and he must know certain principles of business in order that he may operate profitably and successfully. So that there is here a great chance for co-ordination. Also there is a great chance to find employment. This will be the right kind of employment for men who were sea-going in the navy during the war.

Then, with regard to merchant sailors, it is true that for the first time in our history the government by order in council has legislation which enables a man in the merchant marine to get a pension or to be compensated if he is hurt in connection with direct or indirect action against the enemy. However, after discharge there is not much provision for a member of the merchant marine, and some consideration should be given to the care of those men who are in the merchant marine and who, after discharge, will have a claim for service rendered.

I have heard considerable complaints from men and officers of the R.C.N.R. that they were at a disadvantage in being in the navy during the war; being in a minority. A naval reserve man does not feel at home behind a desk. He is perhaps not so well qualified to work in an executive position on shore, but he is a real man upon the sea. At the start of the war they were the men you had to depend on to carry on the sea work until such time as other men could be trained to go on board ships, and their direction and knowledge was invaluable. Hon. members will see that the merchant marine and the navy are almost one in their interests. Their future is entwined, and I trust that this department will regard the men of the merchant marine as worthy of its consideration. In that way we shall be not only helping the men of the service but helping the marine and helping to build up the country in the future; because, Mr. Speaker, no country was ever great that did not have a big marine trade. Canada is eminently suited to developing a big marine trade if our people will only make the effort. On the east, west and north we have the ocean, besides the great lakes and waterways, and we can develop a great marine. So that I hope that these men who are serving in the merchant marine, with little glory and no glamour, will get the consideration they deserve. That to me is an added reason why I would enthusiastically support the bill which is now before the house for the creation of this new department.

Mr. GORDON GRAYDON (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, just a word before the second reading passes. I think this debate has provided a very good example of the heights to which parliament can rise on certain occasions in discussing vital subjects in a war-time period. While considerable time has been taken up in discussing the problem which is now immediately confronting parliament, the creation of a ministry of veterans' affairs, I cannot conceive how in a period such as this parliament could spend its time to better advantage than in hearing the comments, views and constructive criticism of the men and women present representing the 245 constituencies of Canada, speaking on behalf of the men who are giving so much by way of service and sacrifice that we may continue as a free parliament in this land. I think it has been time well spent. I think we can take some pride in the manner in which this parliament has risen to its task. The unity of purpose and of thought and of opinion which has characterized this debate may appropriately provide an example for our discussion of many other subjects which parliament in war time might tackle and attempt to solve.

I believe that most of us recognize our responsibilities to the men and the women who will come back. Primarily, of course, this is the government's responsibility. But I want to go a little farther than that and say that coincidental with the responsibilities and the duty of the government, parliament has an obligation to the men and the women who come back. There is, too, a definite responsibility resting upon the individual civilian toward these men and women who, upon discharge, will be rehabilitating themselves into normal civilian life. The meshing of these men and women into the social and economic life of our country is not going to be an easy task, but it will be made a little easier for them, a little easier for the government and a little easier for the whole officialdom which will be handling these delicate problems of great magnitude if all the citizens of Canada will do their part, as it is their bounden duty to do. Our citizens on the home front have suffered inconvenience, of course, in a certain fashion through these war years, but their sufferings have been small in comparison with the services and the sacrifices which have been made by the men and the women whom we must rehabilitate upon their return. This is one way in which the civilian population of Canada can make a further contribution to those who have already contributed so very much more than we have who have not been privileged to serve. So that I say to you, Mr. Speaker, to-night that nothing less than the best for those who served will be good enough for this government and this parliament and for the Canadian people to give to rehabilitate these men and women when they return.

I rose to-night largely to pay a tribute to a group of citizens in Canada who are shouldering in a masterly way the responsibilities which devolve partly at least on our citizen community. The Department of Pensions and National Health has set up, as you know Mr. Speaker, rehabilitation committees across Canada. I have already had the privilege of having had something to do with these committees. A week from to-night I am leaving Ottawa to go nearly three hundred miles to attend a meeting of the rehabilitation committee in the south end of my own constituency, after having refused a good many of what I thought were much less important obligations, because I thought this was something we owe to our men and women who are serving, no matter whether we are members of parliament or private citizens. If we cannot do that much to help those who have been doing so much for us, the problem of rehabilitation becomes more serious, more critical and more dangerous perhaps than we had at first considered it.

I am glad to-night to pay my tribute to these men who are serving on these rehabilitation committees across Canada in a voluntary capacity. They are coming to grips with the present day problems, because they are closely in touch with local conditions and are concerning themselves with admitting these men and women of the armed forces into our civilian life again in a way which is probably more practical than some of the suggestions which have been made in the course of this debate. I am hopeful that by virtue of the work of these committees the first step will have been taken toward a revived consciousness on the part of our citizens generally of their obligations to those who return from this war. With that I might leave the work of these rehabilitation committees, on which I am hopeful that so many of our citizens will find an opportunity to serve and take part in solving the problems that lie ahead. I hope that the work will be continued. I trust that it will include the problems of veterans generally. I do not like the word "veteran" very well; I trust the minister may be able to find some better terminology.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): I tried to and I failed.

Mr. GRAYDON: After all, one failure never means much to a Scotsman. I still have hope.

Mr. RALSTON: Bruce did the same; he tried again.

Mr. GRAYDON: That is so. I see that the Scottish historians have the floor.

I was impressed with the suggestion of the hon. member for Vancouver North (Mr. Sinclair) regarding this problem. I hope that so far as possible veterans' affairs and problems will be handled by one department. The Minister of National Defence (Mr. Ralston) made this evening a clear, brief and eloquently delivered speech on this matter; but I would emphasize the importance of not giving an opportunity for one department to "pass the buck" to another, as these people are sometimes suspected of doing, but that all the machinery relating to veterans' affairs shall be gathered within the department now being set up. It should be not merely a trend but the purpose of the government so to co-ordinate the machinery that the returning veteran will be able to say, "It is this department which will look after my rehabilitation problems." While some limitations, conditions and reservations must necessarily be placed upon the putting into effect of this suggestion, I trust that it will be, as it should be, governmental policy as far as it can possibly be practised.

Speaking for those who felt that their opinions had been well aired by the suggestions already made by members who have spoken on this side and, indeed, from all parts of the chamber, I would array our party, both in this house and outside it, squarely in support of a square deal for those who have served. That is the policy of our party and other parties, which means that there is a ring of unanimity and unity, from one end of Canada to the other, in the conviction that here is a job for us to do. We have been able to do a job in the war; the task which lies ahead is almost equally important, and it will not have been done just when the peace treaties have been signed.

Mr. S. H. KNOWLES (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I should like to add a word in support of what the leader of the opposition (Mr. Graydon) has just said regarding the unity of the house with respect to this measure. Your Honour may feel that you have given considerable latitude to the debate, in view of the rule with respect to second reading, but I am sure all hon. members will agree that it is a case where latitude was highly desirable in view of the great importance of this subject.

However, I may say this, that looking at the bill itself, bearing in mind the rule with respect to second reading, it seems to me that its principle is very simple. It is to the effect that veterans should be the concern of the government, that this nation owes the veteran the very best it can provide for him, and that the best machinery to give effect to that responsibility can be had by bringing all matters relating to veterans under one department.

With that threefold principle we in this group are in active agreement, and we are glad to give support to the second reading of the bill.

Mr. GREEN: Is the minister not going to make a statement before the bill is given second reading?

[Mr. Graydon.]

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): It will be made in committee.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and the house went into committee thereon, Mr. Golding in the chair.

On section 1—Short title.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): I refrained from entering into the debate on the second reading of the bill, for the specific reason just mentioned by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre. To my mind the principle of the bill was so simple that it did not involve at all the comprehensive discussion on pensions and treatment and hospitalization and rehabilitation which we have had for the last three days. It was purely a change of the method of administration from the old-established method to the contemplated method. However, I agree with the hon. member and definitely with the leader of the opposition that the time has not been wasted, that it has not been spent in vain, because this house has lived up to its old tradition of a splendid unity of thought, and, I trust, a unity of action, in regard to the problems of our returning ex-service men. I think the history of legislation in this house for the last twenty-five years is not and has not been the effort of any one party; it has been the result of the conjoint sympathies and work and efforts of every single party in the dominion. That is the spirit of the debate which has just been concluded. I wish to thank hon. members in all parts of the house for their sympathetic attitude toward the department over which I temporarily preside, and the kindly references made from many sources to the humble minister of that department.

There was one reference, however, which was made that I must take exception to: it was in regard to there being "too many brass hats" in the Department of Pensions and National Health. In the rehabilitation work of our department, the associate deputy minister served in the ranks. The superintendent of vocational training served in the ranks, winning the military medal and bar, and subsequently obtained his commission in the field. The superintendent of educational training served in the ranks. The deputy minister, being a medical officer at the time of his enlistment, naturally held commissioned rank. The assistant deputy minister also served in the ranks. In fact all other senior officers, some twenty of whom enlisted in the ranks, held rank not above that of major, with the exception of the present chairman of the Canadian pension commission, whose present rank was obtained during service overseas in the present war which followed outstanding service in a junior capacity in the great war. The chief of the orthopaedic and surgical appliances division, that branch which has the most intimate contact with those casualties which require and deserve the most sympathetic and active attention, the amputation cases, was a sapper in the last war during which he suffered amputation of both legs and the loss of one eye. Of the nine pension commissioners, six served in the ranks. While the reference to brass hats may be proper in some direction, it is not justified by the facts with reference to the staff of this department. Practically eighty or ninety per cent of these men went through the ranks during the last war.

I had intended to make a certain analysis of the various aspects of the problems with which the Department is concerned, but on reflection I think our duty at this time is to examine the particular sections of the bill when we reach them, and to discuss questions of policy affecting pensions, the effect of treatment, the effect of hospitalization and the effect of rehabilitation when the civil estimates of the Department of Pensions and National Health are up for consideration.

I think it was the hon. member for Vancouver South (Mr. Green) who yesterday gave a brief resume of the history of this department, commencing with the old Department of Soldiers' Civil Reestablishment in 1918 and coming down to 1928 when the Department of Pensions and National Health Act was passed. My hon. friend suggested that the privileges granted under the sections of this bill are possibly based upon the soldiers of the old war. Possibly there is some element of truth in that, but I say that it is vital to protect the privileges of those who served in the great war as well as to do what we are doing under this measure, to establish new opportunities and to grant new privileges to those serving in the present war.

Mr. GREEN: I had not the slightest thought of interfering with the rights and privileges of the men who served in the last war.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): I am not casting the slightest imputation; my hon. friend knows me too well to think that. The function of that department will be to provide for the discharged member of the forces the services which are considered necessary. First, to remove, diminish or compensate for any handicap, physical or otherwise, arising out of military service. Second, to give the member of the forces a fair start in civil life. Third, to have permanently available those services which the country can and should render to its war veterans throughout their lives.

Perhaps I could give my hon. friends the latest figures with regard to pensions as it may be of interest. On April 30 of this year the grand total of pension awards made by the commission for all classes of pensions arising out of service in the present war was 13,215, and the total annual liability amounted to $6,795,593. With respect to members of the armed forces, 7,591 awards were for disabilities and 5,158 were for dependents of those who have given their lives. There were twenty-six disability pensions awarded to women members of the forces.

The commission have awarded 410 pensions with respect to death or disability sustained by members of the merchant marine, fishermen, members of the auxiliary services, civilian government employees, R.C.M.P. special constable guards, members of civilian defence forces and members of the corps of firefighters for service in the United Kingdom. The number of awards of pensions under section 11, subsection 3 of the Pension Act is 1,028, including 611 awards for disability and 417 for death. Up to December 31, 1943, Canada had augmented to the Canadian scale 1,192 pensions awarded by the British government to Canadians serving in the imperial forces.

I should like also to deal, but not at the present time, with the question of hospitalization because it has been raised in this debate and I feel that at some time I should give a complete answer to the questions raised.

I come now specifically to the points raised last night by the hon. member for Vancouver South who dealt with certain sections of the bill. As I said before, it was considered whether there should be two parts, one dealing with great war veterans and the other dealing with veterans of the present war, or one bill embracing all veterans. The present bill covers all veterans. It was necessary to retain all language relating to former rights and privileges lest some right or privilege of the former veterans be sacrificed. These have been extended to the present war veterans, so that they would have the same rights, but provisions have been added to ensure ample extension to meet future requirements.

My hon. friend suggested that re-housing should be included in the measure. In the opinion of those who have been advising me—and this measure has been very carefully reviewed, not only by our own officials but by the officials of the Department of Justice—the phrase "reestablishment in civil life" is broad enough to cover practically all the suggestions made last night. If special legislation is decided upon, the bill provides that the functions of the minister shall extend and apply as well to all such other matters as may be designated or assigned to the minister by the governor in council.

Then my hon. friend referred to the repatriation of dependents. Extensive and successful repatriation of soldiers and their dependents was efficiently carried out after the last war by the cooperation of three departments. First, there was the Department of Immigration which controls the admission into Canada of all persons. Second, there was the Department of Militia and Defence which still actively controlled the serving soldier whose dependents were accompanying him. Third, there was the Department of Soldiers' Civil Reestablishment which was directly concerned with the establishment in civil life of the soldier and his dependents after discharge.

Then my hon. friend referred to the payment of gratuities. This is and must remain the responsibility of the services since they alone have the service records upon which the gratuities are calculated, and the actual administration will be carried on either by the Department of National Defence or that department along with the Department of Finance.

Mr. GREEN: Which departments did the minister say?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): It would not be the Department of Veterans' Affairs that would have the administration because we do not have the records of the men serving either at home or abroad. Then, with regard to the employment of veterans, I am advised by my legal advisers that the words "care and reestablishment in civil life" are broad enough to give jurisdiction for operation of any employment projects for veterans for which parliament may make provision. The department would, however, for lack of the necessary machinery, require the cooperation of some other department, such as the Department of Public Works, or, as just mentioned by my colleague, by the Department of Labour. At this time I wish to express my appreciation of the fine contribution to the debate made by the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Ralston).

Then the hon. member for Vancouver South referred to reinstatement in civil employment.

[Mr. Ian Mackenzie.]

Mr. GREEN: I did not mention that.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): In any event that is at present administered by the Department of Labour, but it could conceivably be transferred later on to this department.

Mr. GREEN: Is it not to be transferred?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): It can be done, because the word "minister" in that act can be made to apply to both departments. It can be done quite simply. My hon. friend said that no mention was made of dependents, but the department is made responsible for the care, et cetera, of any person. The old act limited benefits to persons who served with military forces and their dependents. By the War Measures Act provision has been made for the merchant marine, salt-water fishermen, fire-fighters, A.R.P. workers and many other groups. The phrase "any person" was used in the present bill deliberately as being language broad enough to include all these groups, as well as dependents. There has been no intention in the world to neglect or ignore them.

Then my hon. friend said that there is no mention of pensions in the bill. I would direct his attention to section 9, subsection 1, which states that wherever in the Pension Act reference is made to the Department of Pensions and National Health it shall be deemed to mean Department of Veterans' Affairs.

My hon. friend said also that there was no mention of the honorary citizens' rehabilitation committees, to whom such eloquent tribute was rightly and properly paid a few minutes ago by the leader of the opposition (Mr. Graydon). I can assure my hon. friend that the work of these committees is appreciated by myself possibly more than anyone else because I am in very close touch with this splendid voluntary work all across Canada. Provision is made for them by P.C. 6282 of November 27, 1940, passed under the War Measures Act and setting up the veterans' welfare division.

The new bill gives the minister ample authority to reenact such regulations and also similar regulations for cooperation with provincial governments, veterans' associations, commercial, industrial and agricultural groups, as mentioned by the hon. member.

Mr. GREEN: Is there any objection to including them?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): There is definite objection. The legal advisers held that it was not desirable to mention every aspect or detail of the business likely to come before the department lest other desirable activities be excluded. If my hon. friend would look up the Department of Trade and Commerce Act, chapter 200, of the Revised Statutes of Canada—I am sure he knows it well—for the jurisdictional clause, he will see it is very similar to the clause in the present bill. If the Department of Trade and Commerce can carry on its many ramifications under that clause, surely the business of the Department of Veterans' Affairs can be carried on under clause 5.

Then my hon. friend mentioned, I think, paragraph (g) of section 7. The draftsman introduced this to enable the department to act as the agency for payment of any moneys in the nature of pensions which parliament may at any time in the future authorize. That was set up last year when we had allowances for widows by special appropriation vote. I am now advised that under the Pension Act the pension commission is required to deal with any kind of pension referred to it by the governor in council, and that any award so made must be paid by the department. I thank the hon. gentleman for drawing my attention to his paragraph. I really think it is not necessary, and I propose to have it deleted from the bill when we reach it in committee because there might be an improper imputation placed in regard to it. Therefore I think it is better to have it removed from the bill.

Then the provision carried over from the original Department of Soldiers' Civil Re-establishment Act, authorizing the establishment of staff is to be withdrawn. That provision has been there since 1919. It was reinserted and reenacted in 1928, and when we reach that section I shall give some correspondence with the civil service commission in regard to it. In any event there will be four amendments moved in committee. The hon. member for Comox-Alberni made some observation last night in regard to not publishing the regulations. I must say that I am in full accord with what he said. I understand that he is moving an amendment to that effect, and I shall be glad to adopt it on behalf of the government.

There is also another amendment to section 4 which has been advised by the Department of Justice to be necessary for the transference of staff. There will be the deletion of section 6 as we have it now in the bill and the amendment to section 7. These are the four amendments that I can see at the moment. Therefore the observations made by hon. members have been very useful to us. In the limited time we have had since the speeches were delivered, we have acted upon two. Some of the suggestions that were made are being accepted and adopted. In the spirit of the discussion on second reading we shall discuss every clause of the bill, and if it appears to us that we can improve any one of these sections I shall meet the suggestions with the most—I can say Liberal frame of mind possible—in the most accommodating frame of mind possible.

Mr. GRAYDON: Quite a difference there.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): Progressive. All of us have the same idea in our minds, which is to produce a piece of legislation here that will stand the test of time, improved as it must be from year to year when new activities show that these improvements are advisable. This will be done, of course, to serve the purpose we all have very close to our hearts, namely, to establish an administration for the boys who are overseass to-night, and also those who have been discharged already, 136,000 of them, and who are now back in Canada, those who shall have saved Canada by their heroic fortitude and their wonderful example. Therefore in the spirit of the debate which has just been concluded I trust we can as soon as possible finish the sections of the bill and have them enacted into legislation, so that we can have at least one permanent monument to those who are doing so much for us to-night.

Mr. GILLIS: I should like to ask the minister one question before the bill carries. In his reference to the merchant marine he seemed to think they are now taken care of by the present legislation and it is merely a matter of carrying on. I should like to ask, what provision there is for the merchant marine? Only to-day I received a letter from two men in my section of the country who were torpedoed on March 22. They are still without compensation of any kind. Evidently in the section of the country from which I come there is no machinery through which these men can receive the benefit of the legislation that now exists.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): Where were they, in Nova Scotia?

Mr. GILLIS: Yes, Louisburg, Nova Scotia.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): Would my hon. friend give me those names to-night. I cannot understand any reason for the delay there.

Mr. GILLIS: Yes, I shall give the names. Every time I run into these men there does not seem to be any machinery set up in my section of the country through which the merchant marine can work to get what is their due.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): There is no pension office or welfare office there?

Mr. GILLIS: No.

Mr. GREEN: Is there any reason why the men of the merchant marine should not now be specifically covered in the Pension Act instead of having to depend on an order in council? It does seem to me that they and the other groups, such as fire-fighters and men of the auxiliary services, should be expressly covered in the Pension Act. If that were done they would not have to rely on some doubtful orders in council which may or may not continue after the war.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): They will all be in the act. All amendments passed by orders in council during the war must be consolidated in the Pension Act, as was done in the last war, and all those amendments inserted therein. There will be no possibility of endangering the security of those men who have received benefits during the war, such as the auxiliary services and the merchant marine. As a matter of fact I think the auxiliary services are now part of the services by order in council.

Mr. GREEN: I am using the merchant marine as an example. The difficulty is they are not recognized as the fourth fighting service.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): That is true.

Mr. GREEN: They only have recognition by order in council.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): They will have by statute the same rights as they now have by order in council.

Mr. GREEN: Why cannot they be put under the Pension Act? This question would then not be cropping up every session. We are all in favour of having them treated as the fourth arm of the services, and the public feel the same way about it.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): I can assure my hon. friend that there is every intention in the world of securing by statute every right they have received by order in council, and it will apply to all the other services as well.

Mr. FAIR: On Wednesday afternoon I had an opportunity of speaking on the second reading of this bill. On that occasion I found it necessary and desirable to devote my time to the veterans of the last great war. I made my plea on behalf of the applicants who came here and those whom they represent. I wish to thank the six ministers of the cabinet who received that delegation, and I also wish to thank those hon. members who have expressed the desires of the delegation that came here, and particularly my hon. friend here who spoke so eloquently in that connection, and who stated that the appearance of the men themselves was better evidence of what they had gone through than anything else. I feel that the members of this house who had the opportunity to meet that delegation felt exactly the same way. I had intended to speak on pensions and other matters to-night but will accept the suggestion of the minister to take them up when the civil estimates are before the committee; but I wish to say a few words on the Veterans' Land Act.

In connection with the Veterans' Land Act I was very glad to see the increase in the amount granted as credit for land. It has been extended from $3,600 to $4,800. I am now going to make a suggestion to the minister that the amount for implements and equipment be also increased. At the present time it stands at $1,200. When one considers the present prices that the settlers will have to pay I feel that is not nearly sufficient. I hope the government will give that matter their earnest attention.

The next point I should like to touch on is that of interest. I believe that could be reduced a little more as well. There is no necessity for the settlers to pay three and a half per cent interest as suggested. Another lesson we learned with regard to the treatment of the soldiers under the old settlement board act is the price at which they were compelled to sell their products. It does not make any difference if the land and equipment are given as a gift if the settlers are compelled to sell their products at as low prices as were the settlers under the old Soldier Settlement Board Act, they are bound to go broke. I suggest to the minister and to the government that the cost of the land and equipment should have some relation to the price that the farmers are receiving for their produce. I am going to suggest to the government that any year the prices at which farmers sell their product are lower than the prices obtaining to-day, the government should give the settlers credit for the difference between present prices and those at which they are compelled to sell. I believe that this suggestion should meet with the approval of the government, because in my opinion settlers who are buying land at to-day's prices should be protected to this extent and should be credited with the difference between the prices of to-day and those that may prevail five years from now.

As I said before, I appreciate very much the courtesy which was extended to the delegation that came here to represent the soldier settlers, and before we go home I hope that the minister, on behalf of the government, will tell us that these men are being given clear title.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): Much as I appreciate my hon. friend's remarks I must point out that the Soldier Settlement Act and the Veterans' Land Act are not yet under the administration of whoever is to be Minister of Veterans' Affairs. They come under my colleague the Minister of Mines and Resources.

Mr. FAIR: I am suggesting that before we leave for home they will be under this department.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): I shall bring my hon. friend's remarks to the attention of my colleague.

Mr. BLACKMORE: Is it the intention of the government to bring those two measures under the control of the new minister?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): Yes, definitely; both the Soldier Settlement Act and the Veterans' Land Act will be under the control of whoever is appointed Minister of Veterans' Affairs.

Mr. BLACKMORE: In a general way I should like to commend the minister or whoever is responsible for this move. It is high time responsibility is centralized, so that one may know where to go in connection with these matters.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): That recommendation was made a year or two ago by the committee on land settlement.

Mr. BLACKMORE: I hope that committee goes to work on several other departments of the government.

Section agreed to.

On section 2—Definition.

Mr. STIRLING: This bill deals with veterans' affairs. Should it not, therefore, define what is a veteran? It appears to me quite wrong to have to go to some other act for that definition. I suggest that this section should contain a definition of a veteran.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): I am told that except for the title of the department and of the minister, the word "veteran" is not used for any purpose in any section of the bill. I suppose the definition of a veteran would be one who has been engaged either in the great war or the present war. I understand that in the other acts which will come under the control of this department later on, the word is defined, and probably that is why no definition was put in here.

Mr. STIRLING: It does not seem reasonable to me. We are setting up a department to deal with veterans' affairs, and certainly I should have expected that the public could turn to this act, as it will become, and ascertain what is a veteran within the meaning of this legislation.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): I understand that the interpretation of a veteran varies in the different measures.

Mr. STIRLING: That is just why there should be a definition in this bill.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): That is why it might be impossible to have it defined here, because it must apply to the various measures coming under the control of this department. I am told that matter was considered very carefully.

Section agreed to.

Section 3 agreed to.

On section 4—Deputy minister.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): I have an amendment to this section, suggested by the Department of Justice, which I shall read to the committee. It will be subsection 3:

(3). Notwithstanding anything contained in the immediately preceding subsection of this section, the governor in council may, by order, designate persons who, prior to the commencement of this act, were members of the staff of the Department of Pensions and National Health, to be members of the staff of the department, and, upon such designation, such members shall be deemed to have been transferred to the department on the date of the commencement of this act, but no person shall by reason of such designation be eligible to be certified as permanent by the civil service commission.

This is a technical amendment which is suggested by the Department of Justice as being desirable, and I move accordingly.

Mr. HAZEN: Is the effect of that amendment to bring them under the civil service commission?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): They are under the civil service commission. I am going to move an amendment to section 7 when we reach it, which will meet the point my hon. friend has in mind.

Mr. STIRLING: I believe that in the amendment the minister read the words, "the commencement of this act." I suppose that means the coming into force of this act?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): Yes. The act comes into force by proclamation. That is so for the reason that the other cognate bill has not been passed, dealing with social security or health, and you cannot have one in force without the other. They should come into effect simultaneously.

Mr. STIRLING: I should think "coming into force" would be better phraseology, because "commencement" does not mean anything.

Amendment agreed to.

Section as amended agreed to.

On section 5—Duties and powers of minister.

Mr. GREEN: This is one of the key sections of the act, and I should like the minister to give consideration to an amendment which will describe "person" more fully than the word is described in the section at the present time. Incidentally I should like the minister to make some further extensions that I recommended last evening, but apparently he is not prepared to do so.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): We gave hours of consideration to every suggestion made by my hon. friend last evening. I thought they were very constructive, but after full consideration with legal and other advisers we decided that the section was all right, with the exception of the deletion which I announced.

Mr. GREEN: It will help a bit to have the statement by the minister to-night that it is the intention to cover all these different activities, though I think it would have been better if they had been included in the bill. However, I am not satisfied yet with the words "of any person." I think it would be far better if the wording followed more closely the explanatory note, which says:

> The purpose of this bill is to establish a Department of Veterans' Affairs under the direction of a Minister of Veterans' Affairs who shall be responsible for the care, treatment, training, or reestablishment in civil life of ex-members of the armed forces and of persons otherwise engaged in pursuits relating to the war, and for the care of the dependents of such person.

I think the latter part of that explanation could be used in section 5 to show the group of people we want to have dealt with by the new department. It would also remedy the other defect, that dependents are not mentioned, and I think would state far more clearly the purposes of the bill and the type of work the new department is to carry on.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): Would my hon. friend permit me to have this section stand until Monday, so that we may look carefully into the suggestion he has just made?

Mr. GREEN: Yes, if that could be done.

Section stands.

On section 6—Contracts with institutions for care of persons.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): I desire to move the following amendment:

> That clause 6 be deleted and that paragraph (b) of subclause (1) of clause 7 be amended by deleting the word "such" where it appears in the 2nd line thereof, and by deleting the words in such paragraph after the word "of" in the 4th line and adding in substitution therefor the words "persons entitled thereto under any statute or order of the governor in council administered by the minister.

Mr. GREEN: Could the minister read us the paragraph as it will be when it is amended?

The ACTING CHAIRMAN (Mr. Golding): That will be section 7.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): The explanation of the change is as follows: When the drafting officers examined the legislation in consultation with officers of the Department of Justice, it was considered that the former act did not confer upon the minister specific authority to arrange for the care, treatment or training of persons in hospitals and institutions other than those owned or acquired by the department.

As the committee is well aware, the department only operates institutions in a few of the larger centres in Canada and, as a consequence, it has been necessary, and I may say highly desirable, that patients be cared for in municipal, religious and other institutions throughout the country, which practice has been followed since and during the great war.

During the fiscal year just ended some 2,431,000 patient days treatment were furnished by the department. Of these over 908,000 were furnished in non-departmental institutions.

The general custom has been that the department should enter into a contract with these larger non-departmental hospitals whereby the hospitals undertook to give service to patients and the department undertook to compensate the hospital at an agreed rate per patient per day. Although, as stated, many such formal contracts have been entered into, there are many hundreds of hospitals throughout Canada, and those used outside of Canada, with which no such formal contract has been made by reason of their location, size or the limited extent to which patients may be admitted as the occasion demands.

When the drafting officers appreciated that there was no specific authority in the statute authorizing the minister to make such arrangement, they considered that the present bill would be strengthened by the inclusion of a definite clause conferring this power. Clause 6 as it appears in the bill was the result.

When, however, the administrative officers of the department had had an opportunity of considering the implications of clause 6 as it appears in bill No. 83, they found it might impose a great hardship upon numbers of individual ex-service men, apart altogether from the increased administrative complications.

Let us consider the case of a veteran living in a remote part of the country where the department has no hospital but where there is a small municipal or other institution which serves the requirements of the area.

In the event of this man becoming suddenly ill from a condition with respect to which he is entitled to treatment from the department, our desire would be to arrange for his admission to the nearest hospital and to have medical services provided by the nearest qualified practitioner.

Such an arrangement involves an undertaking to pay and is in effect a contract between the department on the one hand and the hospital and the doctor on the other hand. It has been customary to make such agreement by telegram or telephone in emergency cases for many years. In fact, under the present regulations, the department may accept responsibility for a limited period preceding the reporting of the case to the department if the serious illness of the patient was the reason for his not making application.

Clause 6 as now before this committee would, if adopted, preclude the department from making these informal arrangements for treatment in such emergent or far-removed cases until the department had entered into a contract with the hospital and the doctor and until such contract had been ratified by order in council.

This effect was not anticipated by the legal officers who drafted the clause nor, I am sure, is it the desire of parliament and of the people of Canada that there should be any such cumbersome procedure prohibiting the prompt extension to the ex-service man of necessary medical or hospital care.

I illustrate the point with an extreme condition which, however, arises with a fair degree of frequency. This clause would hamper administration in many other ways.

For example, when an ex-service man requires dental care, it is the department's practice as an economy measure to arrange, where feasible, for his treatment by a dentist in his own locality rather than put the country to the expense of bringing the patient to a centre where the department has a salaried dental officer and of incurring further expense to reimburse him for loss of time from work which otherwise could be avoided.

The present clause 6, if adopted, would require the department to enter into contracts with every dentist in Canada or would prevent us from continuing the present economical procedure which is regularized through the medium of regulations which permit the department to establish schedule of fees for services performed by non-salaried dental and medical officers.

Mr. STIRLING: Would the minister read section 7 (1) (b) as amended?

The ACTING CHAIRMAN (Mr. Golding): Could we first deal with the deletion of section 6.

Mr. GREEN: What is the change?

The ACTING CHAIRMAN (Mr. Golding): As I understand it, the amendment is to section 7. Section 6 would be deleted, and section 7 would be renumbered as No. 6.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): In paragraph (b) the word "such" goes out, and—

Mr. STIRLING: Would the minister read it as amended?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): It would read:

> Respecting the care, treatment or training to be furnished in any hospital, workshop, home, school or other institution and providing for the care, treatment or training therein of persons entitled thereto under any statute or order of the governor in council administered by the minister.

The ACTING CHAIRMAN (Mr. Golding): Section 7 will now be section 6. Shall subsection 1 carry?

Mr. GREEN: I should like to ask a question about paragraph (a). Can a man get training in his own home? Take the case of a man who is disabled and cannot be helped by further hospitalization. Is this section wide enough for him to get training in his own home?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): Yes, it is.

Mr. GREEN: It does not read that way.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): I am informed by my associates that it is wide enough.

Mr. PERLEY: The minister has said that he knows one or two workshops or schools for training have been established prior to this. Will this section include such schools? He will recall that I brought this matter to his attention a little while ago.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): Yes, it will, definitely.

Mr. PERLEY: It will include that?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): Yes.

Mr. PERLEY: Carried on similarly?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): Yes.

Mr. PERLEY: With certain assistance which they were not assured of?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): Yes.

Mr. JOHNSTON (Bow River): Does the word "home" mean an institution or a home? I should think the word "home" would cover the point raised by the hon. member for Vancouver South (Mr. Green).

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): That is the interpretation which would be placed upon it, I am told.

Mr. JOHNSTON (Bow River): Either definition would apply, then. It is either a private home or an institution.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): Yes.

Mr. HAZEN: Then it should be so defined, because that is not a correct interpretation of the word. If it will mean both an institution and a private home it should be so described.

Mr. GREEN: The difficulty is that section 7 (1) (a) is not being amended. It reads:

> For the control and management of any hospital, workshop, home, school or other institution . . .

And so on. Then we take the very same words, namely "hospital, workshop, home, school or other institution" and put them in 7 (b). I do not think they can be considered as including a private home. I do not think the word "home" can be understood as meaning a private home.

[Mr. Green.]

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): We shall have the section stand so that we may look further into the wording. There is another amendment to section 7, is there not? I have an amendment that paragraph (c) of subsection 1 of section 7 be deleted. That deals with the possibility of appointment not being made through the civil service commission. We had correspondence with the chairman of the commission in which he gave us the assurance that in cases of emergency we would get prompt appointments. The department was afraid it might have to wait too long at the time of demobilization for appointments to be made. That is why this section was put in in this way. There was some objection raised by the civil service commission, so that we are striking it out.

The ACTING CHAIRMAN (Mr. Golding): Shall paragraph (a) carry—just so that we may have it in order?

Mr. GREEN: No; it stands.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): That stands, and paragraph (b) stands.

The ACTING CHAIRMAN (Mr. Golding): And there is an amendment to paragraph (c).

Mr. STIRLING: Paragraph (c) is deleted.

The ACTING CHAIRMAN (Mr. Golding): Shall the motion to delete paragraph (c) carry? The motion is:

> That paragraph (c) of subsection 1 of section 7 be deleted.

Amendment agreed to.

Progress reported.

QUESTIONS

(Questions answered orally are indicated by an asterisk.)

WARTIME PRICES AND TRADE BOARD—D. G. MACKENZIE

Mr. KNOWLES:

1. What amounts of money have been paid to Mr. D. G. MacKenzie by the wartime prices and trade board?

2. What are the details of services rendered for the amounts indicated in the answer to question 1?

1.

Fiscal year	Fees	Travelling and living expenses	Total
1942/43.....	$ 1,685 71	$ 367 43	$ 2,053 14
1943/44.....	10,257 10	3,309 19	13,566 29
1944/45.....	485 69	143 14	628 83*
	$12,428 50	$3,819 76	$16,248 26

* Payments April 1, 1944, to June 14, 1944.

2. Mr. D. G. MacKenzie serves with the industrial division at headquarters of the wartime prices and trade board. A consulting engineer, Mr. MacKenzie has been carrying out these duties on a fee basis, receiving payment for such time as he actually spends on board business.

Effective July 1, 1944, Mr. MacKenzie will become a full-time member of the board's staff as chief of the industrial division, and on a salary basis of $8,000 per annum.

MOUNTED POLICE—SEIZURE OF ILLICIT STILL AT STE. THERESE, QUE.

Mr. ROY:

1. Did the Royal Canadian Mounted Police seize a still at Ste. Therese, county of Terrebonne, Quebec, in the section known as "les cent maisons"?

2. If so, (a) when; (b) what was the capacity; (c) what was its value; (d) how many houses were used in connection with such industry; (e) what are the names of the owners or tenants of such houses; (f) what is their occupation?

3. What are the names of the person or persons involved in this matter?

Mr. ST. LAURENT: The hon. member informed me that this question was intended to have to do with events subsequent to January 1, 1944, and on that assumption I have prepared an answer, as follows:

1. Yes.

The seizure of an illicit small drip-type still was effected by the Royal Canadian Mounted Police at Ste. Therese, P.Q., but it is not known if 23 Bertrand street is in the section known as "les cent maisons".

2. (a) May 10, 1944. (b) Two-gallon boiler capacity. (c) Approximately $2. (d) One. (e) Tenant—Norman Notter. Owned by Wartime Housing Limited. (f) Norman Notter has been employed for approximately two years as general supervisor of Defence Industries Limited, Bouchard Plant, Ste. Therese, P.Q.

3. Norman Notter previously mentioned.

QUESTIONS PASSED AS ORDERS FOR RETURNS

BRODER CANNING COMPANY, LETHBRIDGE DEHYDRATING PLANT

Mr. BRYCE:

1. What amounts, if any, have been advanced by the government to the vegetable dehydrating plant operated by Broder Canning Company at Lethbridge, Alberta, in respect to, (a) buildings; (b) machinery; (c) other purposes?

2. Is the said plant in operation at the present time?

3. If it is not in operation, why is this the case?

4. What arrangements have been made by the government in respect to repayment of advances, or future disposition of plant or machinery?

RASPBERRY AND STRAWBERRY PULP

Mr. CRUICKSHANK:

1. In what provinces is raspberry and strawberry pulp placed under allotment for sale to manufacturers in 1944?

2. Can fruit pulp be shipped as pack becomes available? If not, who will finance the pack until shipment?

3. Are manufacturers compelled to pay a minimum price for jam strawberries and raspberries?

4. Are the maximum prices allowable for strawberry and raspberry pulp lower than 1943? If so, how much and why?

ROBERT FOWLER

Mr. TUSTIN:

1. Was Robert Fowler engaged on the royal commission on dominion-provincial relations?

2. If so, what amount of money did he receive in, (a) salary; (b) expenses?

3. Was Robert Fowler engaged on the Hong Kong commission?

4. If so, what amount of money did he receive in, (a) salary; (b) expenses?

5. Is Robert Fowler employed by the wartime prices and trade board?

6. If so, what amount of money does he receive in, (a) salary; (b) expenses?

MOTIONS FOR PAPERS

SUBSIDIES ON POTATOES

Mr. NOSEWORTHY:

For a copy of the order in council providing for payment of a subsidy on Canadian grown potatoes, together with a copy of authorized press, radio and food bulletin notices advertising this subsidy; a copy of all forms on which application for subsidy were to be made to the Commodity Prices Stabilization Corporation; of all correspondence between the corporation and those who were paid subsidies, together with a copy of any reports made to the corporation by officials of the corporation or government charged with the responsibility of investigating the conditions on which subsidies were received.

Mr. ABBOTT: Mr. Speaker, this motion will have to pass with some reservations. The first part is all right; but the hon. member has asked for "all correspondence between the corporation and those who were paid subsidies, together with a copy of any reports made to the corporation by officials of the corporation or government charged with the responsibility of investigating the conditions on which subsidies were received." As I pointed out in the house the other evening at some length, the reports referred to are confidential interdepartmental reports and privileged, and similarly the correspondence is privileged in so far as it reveals the private competitive position of different firms. With these reservations the motion may pass. I spoke to my hon. friend about it the other day.

MUNITIONS AND SUPPLY—CANADA COMFORTER COMPANY

Mr. KNOWLES:

For a copy of all correspondence, memoranda and reports, in the possession of the Department of Munitions and Supply, leading up to the launching of a prosecution against Canada Comforter, Limited, as indicated on page 3616 of Hansard for June 8, 1944.

Also for a copy of any correspondence, memoranda or reports, in the possession of the Commodity Prices Stabilization Corporation, made available to the Department of Munitions and Supply in connection with the above case.

Mr. CHEVRIER: There is an objection to this motion also, on the ground that the correspondence and reports sought by the hon. member concern a matter which is now before the courts. It is the practice of the house to refuse to produce papers under these circumstances, and I am objecting to the passing of this motion for that reason.

Mr. COLDWELL: Has this case been proceeded with?

Mr. CHEVRIER: Yes.

Mr. COLDWELL: Is it in the courts?

Mr. CHEVRIER: It is now before the courts. Charges have been laid.

Mr. COLDWELL: And not withdrawn?

Mr. CHEVRIER: My understanding is that they are proceeding.

Motion dropped.

BEDDING PRODUCTS—SUBSIDIES

Mr. KNOWLES:

For a copy of all correspondence, memoranda, reports and other documents in the possession of the Department of Finance or the Commodity Prices Stabilization Corporation regarding the recovery by the said corporation of subsidy payments, or any portions thereof, made to manufacturers of mattresses or other bedding products.

Mr. ABBOTT: A similar reservation will have to be made with reference to this motion as was made to the motion of the hon. member for York-South (Mr. Noseworthy); that is, that interdepartmental reports will not be produced, as being privileged, and correspondence or other documents which reveal the total amounts of subsidies paid to individual firms will not be produced. Subject to these reservations the order may pass.

Mr. COLDWELL: Since this is the position of the government, may I suggest that this case should be referred to the war expenditures committee? The information I have would warrant that proceeding.

Mr. GRAYDON: It had better go to the public accounts committee rather than the war expenditures committee.

CANADIAN FORCES

INVASION OF WESTERN EUROPE—CASUALTIES

On the orders of the day:

Hon. R. B. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I desire to direct to the Minister of National Defence a question of which I have given him verbal notice. What are the reasons of security which prevent the Canadian people from knowing the extent of the casualties in France, having regard to the fact that Lieutenant General Bradley, at a press conference on the beachhead on June 17, disclosed to the war correspondents present that American casualties for the first eleven days of the invasion totalled 15,883, including 3,283 known dead, and 12,600 wounded? If there is to be one rule for the people of the United States and another for the Canadian people, I think the position should be clarified, and we should be given convincing reasons why they disclosed the casualty figures and the Canadian government refuses to do likewise.

Hon. J. L. RALSTON (Minister of National Defence): In the first place, Mr. Speaker, I wish my hon. friend and the house to note that it was not the United States government that made the statement which was given; it was the field commander. As a result of arrangements which were made prior to operations in the Mediterranean in July last year, it was agreed that the actual number of casualties would be released only if and when the commander in the field who is responsible for the conduct of the operations feels that such release will not prejudice the progress of the operation. I have always considered this arrangement binding, and I have never permitted a release of casualty figures which might be regarded as in any way endangering the security of our forces. Any releases authorized by me have been the subject of prior consultation with our allies.

When the hon. member asked the question on Friday I told the house that nothing but security reasons prevented these figures from being announced, but that I would have to consult our allies before an announcement could be made. I must say I was very much surprised to learn on Saturday morning that an announcement had been made from the field respecting United States casualties. The house will recognize, I am sure, that I would want to take instant action in respect of it. I cabled Canadian military headquarters, as I indicated on Friday that I would do. I stated that since the totals had been announced for the United States I did not see why we could not announce the Canadian casualties as well, and I asked that communication be made with the appropriate officers so as to ensure concurrent statements on matters of this kind in the future. The reply I received this morning gave the circumstances under which the announcement was made by the field commander, which I will not disclose. The reply does, however, state that there is an agreement that no additional statement will be made public at present and that we shall be advised regarding any further announcement so that a simultaneous release can be made in Canada.

When I received this reply this morning. I telephoned to Canadian military headquarters and pointed out to them the incongruity of one country issuing a statement and others not doing so. And questioning whether an agreement should be made under these circumstances, they advised that the request had come from responsible officers connected with the combined operations, and very strongly advised that it would be definitely regarded by those who are in charge as a breach of security if figures were released by Canada at this time. I may say that figures have not been given by any of the other principal allies, that I have heard of.

I have given full consideration to the matter and under the circumstances I am not prepared to overrule the judgment of those who are on the spot, who are closer to the position than we here can possibly be. They know the detriment which might be caused to the troops —and that includes Canadian troops—and to the success of the operation itself by the giving of this information. I can only ask the house and the public to accept their judgment, as I do, and to await the announcement of the number of casualties whenever it is considered, by those in charge, that they may be safely released.

May I say further that casualties, no matter how limited they may be, are always too many. However, there are two statements I can make which I think should afford considerable relief. In the first place, in these almost two weeks of fighting in France, the Canadian casualties are moderate and below the total number estimated for the initial phase of the operation. That is gratifying and must be given at this time without amplification. The numbers will gradually disclose themselves by the publishing of lists as time goes by; but, as they explained to me, what they want to avoid is the giving out of the number of casualties for any particular phase of the operation.

The second point is that in this operation the system of reporting individual casualties is functioning, I think, with maximum efficiency. I can assure the house that almost every casualty sustained up to Friday last has been reported directly to the next of kin, and they are being kept informed of the progress of those who are wounded. It is proposed that this service shall continue to be given to the next of kin without interruption. I think we can be sure that they as well as the public are conscious of the security restrictions and would not insist that casualty figures should be given out if responsible authorities on the ground consider it inadvisable.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

REFERENCE TO PARTICIPATION OF MAJOR HUGUES LAPOINTE, M.P., IN LIBERATION OF FRANCE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. G. A. CRUICKSHANK (Fraser Valley): I wish to direct a question to the Minister of National Defence on behalf of the rump. Has it been brought to the attention of the minister that one of our members, Major Hugues Lapointe, M.P., son of the late Hon. Ernest Lapointe, former Minister of Justice, has distinguished himself in the liberation of France?

Hon. J. L. RALSTON (Minister of National Defence): I have noted the statement which has appeared in the public press to the effect indicated by the hon. member. I may say that we all join in congratulating our fellow-member on this recognition of the success he has achieved and on the fine service he has rendered to the allied cause.

LABOUR CONDITIONS

DOMINION COAL COMPANY—NON-OPERATION OF MINES ON SATURDAY

On the orders of the day:

Mr. CLARENCE GILLIS (Cape Breton South): I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Munitions and Supply arising out out of a telegram received from Local 4530, United Mineworkers of Nova Scotia, protesting against the action of the Dominion Coal company in leaving their mines idle on Saturdays. In view of the anticipated fuel emergency in the coming winter, as exemplified by the minister's warnings to the public to get their fuel stocks early, will the minister check with the Dominion Coal company as to the possibility of continuous employment in the mines, including Saturdays? Secondly, is he in a position to take any action with respect to the second part of the telegram, namely, the miners demand for remuneration for the time lost through the company's action in keeping the mines idle?

Hon. C. D. HOWE (Minister of Munitions and Supply): The hon. member was good enough to give me notice of the question, and I have obtained the pertinent facts, which I think should be placed before the house. I must give them at some length.

I must say at once that every ton of coal that can be mined in Nova Scotia is required to meet the present coal shortage. The record of coal production in Nova Scotia during past months has been anything but satisfactory. The Department of Munitions and Supply and the Dominion Coal company as a whole are making desperate efforts to improve the situation. The salient points remain and can be noted as follows:

1. Daily production is declining from a normal 18,000 tons per day; the average at the present time is nearer 12,000 tons per day.

2. The output per man per day has decreased from 2·67 tons in 1939 to 1·73 tons per man per day for April of this year.

3. Absenteeism has increased from 14·9 per cent in January of this year to 29·7 per cent for the month of May.

As a further example of the difficulties encountered, when retroactive wages were paid out on May 15, 1944, covering the order of the national war labour board, absenteeism reached a high of 41·4 per cent. This figure has not been included in the above averages.

Another case is at No. 24 colliery (Caledonia); the mine was idle for four days, the reason given that the miners were looking for a woman who had wandered away from home. It was found that the number of men looking for this person, out of a total labour force at this mine of 468, did not amount to more then twenty on May 11 and about eight on May 12. There is no record of any men seeking the lost person on May 13 and 15, and the mine was idle for the four days and not one man asked permission to absent himself from work.

A recent survey of mining labour in the Cape Breton area indicates that there are over 600 men who are either qualified to obtain second class certificates as miners or who already have certificates but will not transfer from datal work to contract work at the coal face. The management have not to date induced these men to take over the actual productive labour in the mines, yet a substantial number of alternate workers could be found to take the place of these qualified miners now on non-productive mining work.

In an endeavour to remedy the situation the management sought permission to establish a five day week at certain of the collieries to see whether or not it would improve matters. This resulted in a telegram sent me by the Caledonia local asking that the government pay them for the shifts lost on Saturday, June 3, and Saturday, June 10.

The facts of the matter are: the company have attempted to work Caledonia mine on Friday afternoon and Saturday morning shifts against increasing absenteeism indicative of the reluctance of the producers to work on these two shifts. The average week-end absenteeism producers during May at the Caledonia collieries on Friday afternoon amounted to 64·5 per cent and on Saturday morning shifts 45·5 per cent.

All mines work a shingle shift on Saturdays. Caledonia could produce one thousand tons in that shift, but during May the Saturday morning shifts averaged from 337 tons to 581 tons. On May 27 only 63 producers out of a possible 120 reported for work. The tons produced per man on that day amounted to three-quarters of a ton compared with over two tons on a normal day.

Week-end absenteeism is but a more acute condition of non-attendance at work affecting the whole week. If producers would work steadily five days weekly, output could be increased 22 per cent over actual six day performances during May.

As indication of the attitude toward Saturday work, I may state that No. 16 colliery has worked only on two Saturdays this year because men did not turn out for work. Sydney Mines collieries, Princess and Florence, have not worked on a Saturday since February 13, 1943, for the same reason.

Mr. GILLIS: May I inquire where the minister got his facts?

Mr. HOWE: I got them from the coal administrator.

Mr. GILLIS: I thought so. That is not a statement of facts; it is a propaganda statement. I hope I shall have—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. GILLIS: There is no "oh" about it. I hope I shall have the privilege of putting the other side of the story on the record.

Mr. HOWE: Will my hon. friend promise to do that, covering exactly the same ground?

Mr. GILLIS: Yes, I will.

Mr. REID: May I ask the minister whether the men were successful in their search?

VETERANS' AFFAIRS

ESTABLISHMENT OF DEPARTMENT TO DEAL WITH THE CARE, TREATMENT, TRAINING OR REESTABLISHMENT OF MEMBERS OF THE ARMED FORCES

The house resumed from Friday, June 16, consideration in committe of bill No. 83, to establish a department of veterans' affairs—Mr. Mackenzie (Vancouver Centre)—Mr. Bradette in the chair.

On section 5—Duties, powers and functions of minister.

Hon. IAN A. MACKENZIE (Minister of Pensions and National Health): Section 5 was stood over on Friday evening. When the section came before the committee for consideration the hon. member for Vancouver South expressed the opinion that instead of the words "of any person" being used to give general jurisdiction, it would be more appropriate to specify the particular persons with whom the bill is concerned, namely, former members of His Majesty's forces. As a result of this suggestion this section was allowed to stand. Since then the matter has received further study, and I am now advised that there would be no difficulty in attempting to meet the suggestion of my hon. friend. The following amendment has accordingly been prepared:

That the words "of any person" as they appear in the seventh line of section 5 be struck out and that there be substituted therefor the words "of any person who served in the naval, military or air forces of His Majesty, any person who has otherwise engaged in pursuits relating to war, and of any other person designated by the governor in council, and to the care of the dependents of any such person."

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Wherein do they differ?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): The suggestion made by the hon. member for Vancouver South is a broadening out of the terms of the words "of any person" included in the draft bill now before the committee. I am accepting the suggestion and move the amendment accordingly.

Mr. BROOKS: Are munition workers included?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): Yes.

Mr. STIRLING: And the designation?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): If they are designated they would be included.

Amendment agreed to.

Section as amended agreed to.

On section 7 (renumbered 6)—Power to make regulations.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): In discussing this section in committee on Friday it was suggested that paragraph (b) of subsection 1 thereof was hardly wide enough to allow for the provision of care, treatment and training of a person in his own home. I appreciate this suggestion and I feel that it has considerable merit. Accordingly the following amendment is proposed. That this section be amended by striking out the words "other institution" where they occur in the third line thereof and inserting in lieu thereof the words "or elsewhere".

I have already given notice of my intention to move an amendment of this particular paragraph in other respects. Therefore the paragraph as proposed to be amended will read as follows:

Respecting the care, treatment or training to be furnished in any hospital, workshop, home, school or elsewhere, and providing for the care, treatment or training therein of persons entitled thereto under any statute or order of the governor in council administered by the minister.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): That is in lieu of present paragraph (b)?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): That is right.

Amendment agreed to.

Mr. MacNICOL: On Friday last I made some observations in reference to paragraph (g), under the impression that if the minister had the power under the bill which I was given to understand he had, relief would be given to numbers of veterans who for one reason or another have not been granted pensions. I should like to know if the minister is going to have increased powers in that connection.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): When this subsection was drafted it was the intention that in special cases, such as widows' allowances, which are governed by special appropriations by parliament, the minister would have certain powers as a result of that action by this house. But the hon. member for Vancouver South pointed out, I think very properly, that this might lead to possible abuses; that the minister would be given powers to which really he was not entitled, because the pension commission is an independent body and I think should remain so. I do not believe any minister of pensions should have the power to award pensions; I say so very sincerely and very directly. So that after listening to the suggestions of the hon. member for Vancouver South, and after talking it over with my departmental officials, we are going to move to have that subsection deleted from the bill.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I think everyone will be in agreement with that declaration of policy by the minister, that no minister should have power to grant pensions. Not only is it in the interests of the minister's peace of mind, since it will relieve him of a tremendous burden that otherwise would be cast upon him, but I think it is in the interests of the whole spirit of our pension legislation.

What I rise to speak about and protest against is the growing practice of ministers, in bringing down new legislation, to take authority to legislate, because that is what they are doing. In the bill referring to the disposal of war assets—and I hope hon. members will consider this when we come to discuss that bill in committee—tremendous power is vested in the Minister of Munitions and Supply to do almost anything. He can override the corporation and the associated committee which is set up—

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): To which section is the hon. gentleman referring?

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I am directing my remarks to section 7 of the bill; at the moment I am giving an illustration. That makes the minister a dictator. If hon. members will examine the aeronautics bill which is now before this house they will find that again the Minister of Munitions and Supply is arrogating to himself all the powers of a dictator, when as a matter of fact the whole subject matter of the regulations in connection with aeronautics ought to be vested in an independent board.

Having said that may I refer to section 7(1), which reads:

Subject to the approval of the governor in council——which of course is very largely a formality, since the minister makes the recommendation.

[Mr. Ian Mackenzie.]

—the minister may make such regulations, from time to time, as he may deem necessary and advisable—

If the section were to stop there of course it would be impossible for parliament to delegate such power to a minister, and I am sure no minister would ask for it. In the succeeding subsections (a) to (l) both inclusive there is an attempt to limit the subject matter in connection with which the minister may make regulations. I invite hon. members to read carefully the provisions of those paragraphs. They will observe, I think, that they cover practically the whole gamut of the powers that are to come under this new department of veterans' affairs, save and except the awarding of pensions.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): They have been there for twenty years.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Well, its antiquity does not make it any better. This, Mr. Chairman, is just a repetition of what Lord Hewart many years ago eloquently described as "the new despotism," and this practice has gone unchallenged until now members of parliament are accustomed to having ministers bring down legislation of this kind, and to being told that because it had been done previously times without number, therefore it was all right. That doctrine does not appeal to me, and I do not think it should appeal to the membership of this house. It is a rule of law, of course, in delegating powers, especially in the municipal sphere, the municipalities being creatures of the provincial legislatures, that authority may be granted by the provincial legislatures to cities and incorporated towns to make by-laws and regulations respecting certain subject matters. If hon. gentlemen have had any experience in municipal law, and I presume there are members of the legal profession here who have had such experience, they will know that the courts always construe those delegated powers very strictly; that unless the thing was within the ambit of the delegated authority, it does not become legal. Many by-laws have been passed by municipal legislators under such delegated authority which have not stood the test of the courts. But I venture to suggest that there is no such restraining power on whoever may be minister under this bill. Who will come into court; what opportunity will there be in any given case to test the validity of the powers exercised by a minister under this delegated authority? There will be no one. In the first place, these regulations are usually applied to veterans—which, by the way, is not defined in the act, and before this bill passes I should like to know who is to be a veteran—and these men are in no position to contest regulations made by the minister which might have detrimental effects upon their fortunes. Certainly the taxpayers of this country, who have to foot the bill, have no locus standi in the courts to contest the validity of any regulations the minister may make. The result would seem to be, and I think this is apparent, that within the ambit of section 7 of this bill the minister becomes a law unto himself, and he is passing legislation. In principle I condemn that practice. It ought never to be delegated by parliament, except in its most plain and administrative features.

Here the minister is granted authority. Authority is delegated to him to exercise not only administrative but also executive functions, and, I venture to say, judicial functions. Has the minister ever looked into that situation? Did his advisers, when they drew up this bill, have in mind the fact that once it passes parliament they are given full control over everything and can do about it as they please in the days to come, in respect of the great responsibilities of the situation which will be created after this bill becomes law? The well-being of numberless men is left to the tender care—I am willing to use that expression in its proper sense; I am not satirical when I use it—of the minister. That means it is left to his advisers.

I do not like this type of legislation at all. I do not think the country will like it when it is fully seized of its implications. And I do not think any administration ought to ask parliament for authority of this kind. It is on a par with government by order in council, which never sees the light of day until after its enactment into law under the War Measures Act.

The whole thing is bad in principle; it is wrong in practice, and it ought not to be followed out by parliament without at least a protest. That is what I am making to-day. I make that protest against the underlying principles and theories of this legislation. I hope I shall receive some support. I do not for one moment, of course, hope to change the minister's opinion. And yet I know that in his heart he will admit that the theories I am trying to advance are sound in law, in fact, and in principle.

Therefore I do protest as strongly as I know how against parliament's delegating to ministers, not merely the powers of administration—because I think they have to have those powers—but powers executive and judicial which should never be vested in an individual minister.

This is a repetition of what has gone on for more than twenty years, by all governments, and it is time to call a halt. I could illustrate by an analogous case I have in mind, going back many years ago to the time when the government of this country was operating Canadian government railways, among which was the old Intercolonial Railway. This was before the days of the board of railway commissioners, now known as the board of transport commissioners. A man who was opening up a new class of shipments—to be exact, the first movement of pulpwood from New Brunswick to the state of Maine—applied to the traffic manager of the Intercolonial railway to fix rates. The rate was high—even in those days it was so considered, despite the low level of wages, salaries and operating expenses. It was so high that having regard to the price of the commodity at its destination this would-be shipper could not see his way clear to move the goods. What did he do? He went to the minister of railways of that day, who happened to be a good personal as well as a good political friend. The minister of railways, under the authority vested in him under the old act, fixed a rate which was below the cost of operation to the railway. I give that only by way of illustration.

The minister is going very far in asking for the authority which would be vested in him under section 7. If the request were limited purely to administrative matters, I would not have so much objection to it. But I do object to giving the minister executive authority to legislate, and authority to exercise judicial functions.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): I am really and truly amazed at the remarks of the hon. member for York-Sunbury.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): You are?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): Anyone in the committee would think that the Minister of Pensions and National Health was introducing something drastic, something new, something revolutionary, in this legislation. Except for the removal of restrictions in regard to persons who served in the great war which commenced in August, 1914, this provision is identical with the language which has been used in legislation in the last twenty-five years of parliament. It is identical with language which my hon. friend has supported time and again in the House of Commons and in committee.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I do not think I ever did.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): This legislation is not partisan legislation.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I know it is not.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): Then why introduce this new principle in connection with a non-partisan bill? The fact is that these regulations are going to be necessary. They are almost entirely for the purposes of administration. The minister must have this power; otherwise a bill would have to be passed at each session. He must have power of regulation if he is to administer. Any minister must have that power—I do not care what government is in office. This is not a new principle. There is no departure from theory which has been accepted in parliament for the last twenty-five years. And this tirade by my hon. friend takes me absolutely by surprise. It is a most amazing departure, even by my hon. friend. The wording here is identical with the wording used in the past, by the union government of 1919, and other governments since.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): That does not make it sound.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): Why did not my hon. friend change it in those years?

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I was not here then.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): He has been in the house and outside the house for many years. Why become an eleventh hour convert in regard to principles which he refused to recognize in former years, when he had the power to make changes?

No matter who the minister of pensions and national health is going to be, he must have power to make regulations. I have known the ministers for the last twenty-five years, and I know that not one of them has abused that power. This provision is for the purpose of helping out those who are going to help, through this legislation, the veterans of the first great war and those of this war. Ministers must have that power, and this will give it to them.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I resent the suggestion that I entered upon a tirade. I was simply endeavouring to explain some honoured principles. The fact that this power to make regulations has been in pension legislation, and other acts the minister mentioned —or did not mention—does not create any great impression upon my mind. I was striving to establish a sound principle. And the fact that there is antiquity behind this procedure does not impress me at all.

When the minister accuses me of having supported this kind of legislation I can say to him that in the last four or five years, and on every occasion I can remember, I have protested against this procedure in connection with the delegation of authority.

The minister referred to what was done by the union government. Certainly I am not going to be called upon to answer for their sins. Neither the minister nor I was here at that time. But the position would be exactly the same, no matter who it was, because I believe it is bad in law and bad in principle to delegate the ministers anything but the merest powers of administration. That is the objection I take. It is in respect of the judicial position, or the judicial examination of a given case, and the exercise of judicial authority and executive authority, that I contend the bill goes too far. The fact that a thing has been done before and some people have not protested against it is no answer at all. It is just a tu quoque argument; it does not get us anywhere.

I should like to see the minister defend these regulations one by one. I never suggested that he would exercise the powers in a partisan way. Nothing was farther from my mind. So far as I know, the present pensions ministry, including the commission charged with responsibility has not been partisan. I do not for one moment think there has ever been any suggestion—certainly I have never made it—that there was anything partisan about the administration in this respect. Suggestions have been made as to appointments made to the commission. I have not altogether agreed with them. I remember a certain gentleman who was appointed as chairman of the pensions commission and charges of partisanship were made with which I did not agree. I thought a man of high character had been appointed. I do not know anything about the members of the present commission, and I am not suggesting for a minute that there is partisan administration of the commission or of the department itself. I will go that much farther.

I think the minister has really misapprehended the position I am taking. I want to reaffirm the principle of the supremacy of parliament; that is all I am seeking to do. It is about time that somebody in this house, some member of some group on this side or, if I may make so bold as to say, some member on the other side, protested against the continued practice of delegating parliamentary authority to ministers.

Mr. McIVOR: Mr. Chairman, not being a lawyer I do not see the same difficulties that the hon. member for York-Sunbury has referred to, but practical common sense tells me that everything should have a head and that somebody should have responsibility. I hope the minister will be the minister who will have the opportunity of putting this legislation into practice. Ever since the resolution was introduced I have been grateful for this legislation.

However, there is one thing that makes me a little anxious. I hope that the district pensions advocate will still hold his position. I should like to ask the minister if it will be possible for the Department of Veterans' Affairs to instruct the pensions advocates to advocate in the interests of the pensioners and not in the interests of the government or the taxpayers of Canada. Some years ago I sat in when a committee was in session in Fort William, and I must say that I became very anxious for the pensioner. These pensions advocates should be instructed to advocate in the interests of fair play. That is all the returned man wants. If he gets that he will be a happy man. This is the information I was going to ask for the other day.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): I assure my hon. friend that the definite duty of every pensions advocate in Canada is to argue and fight for the returned soldier and not for the government or the treasury in any way whatsoever. If there is any doubt about the situation we can certainly issue further instructions to every pensions advocate in Canada to that effect.

Mr. McIVOR: Thank you.

Mr. COLDWELL: Mr. Chairman, I am sorry I have not had time to go into this bill, because I have been away for two or three weeks. The minister has been entirely sympathetic to the veteran and to the returned man generally. During my visit to Saskatchewan I ran across some cases on which I expect to have notes in a day or two. These would seem to indicate that perhaps some of the officials are not giving the sympathetic treatment to the veteran of the present war that I think the minister would wish. I find that there has been great delay in the cases of men who have been discharged because of wounds, in obtaining the necessary treatment and pay.

I ran across a lad from my own constituency called Tony Woodbine. He had been wounded in Italy in the hip and had lost an eye. He came to me after my meeting in Saskatoon and told me that he had not been able to get what was required to maintain himself and his wife in decency. The legion in Saskatoon had taken up his case, but so far they had not been able to do anything. I notice that this has been contradicted in the papers, but people who knew this lad at Lucky Lake in my constituency told me that he was a reliable boy.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): I will look that up right away.

Mr. COLDWELL: There was another case, that of a man whom I met in Tisdale. He told me he had been let out because of rheumatic fever and a heart condition, following which he had received a pension of $30 a month for some few months. He was then reexamined, told he was fit for work, and given a card for a position in the penitentiary at Prince Albert. When he presented the card he had to undergo another medical examination, whereupon it was found that his heart was in such a bad condition that he could not be employed. The result is that this lad is without a pension and without a job. There would seem to be some lack of consideration in a case like that.

One of the aldermen met my train at Winnipeg and told me that at the present time there are some eight men on relief in Winnipeg who are veterans of this war.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): I am sure that that is not correct, because I checked up every single case in Winnipeg.

Mr. COLDWELL: I am glad to know the minister has checked that up, but that is the information I was given. I just take this opportunity to bring these cases to the attention of the minister. I am convinced that in this particular instance it is not the minister who is at fault, because I think everyone in this house realizes that the moment a case is brought to his attention he has it investigated, and if there has been any injustice in the case of a veteran, it is looked after immediately. I think perhaps the minister might go into this matter with some of his officials and see what is wrong. These returned men should not be subjected to any delay, and I think it is delay rather than anything else.

A word about the placement of these men, which would come under the Minister of Labour. A young man in Regina was let out after a double hernia operation. He went in with category A-1 and came out with category E. Yet he was given a heavy job in a warehouse for which he was entirely unsuited. I hope to have an opportunity of saying something more about the placement of these men by the selective service branch. What we need are placement officers who really understand human nature.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): The placement of disabled men is entirely our responsibility, and we are having great success in that regard. Other cases would come under the Department of Labour, and that department is cooperating most effectively. They are establishing veterans' sections in various offices, and this should meet the point raised by my hon. friend.

Mr. COLDWELL: The placement officers should be thoroughly trained, something that we have not had in the past. There are so many categories of jobs that this work is entirely different from what it was a few years ago.

Mr. BROOKS: Section 7, subsection 1, paragraph (e), reads in part as follows:

. . . and in the case of insane persons who are being or have been so cared for under this act, the assumption or authorization of guardianship in whole or in part in respect of such properties or moneys, and for the disposal of such properties or moneys to such persons or their dependents, or as may be deemed expedient or the disposal thereof to the estates of such persons if deceased.

I was wondering whether this would not interfere with the courts of the different provinces. People who are insane and are placed in these institutions usually have parents, brothers or other relatives who could very well act as guardians, just as they would if the man had not been in the army. There is no question that the department should look after these men, but just why it should take on the guardianship of any property I cannot just understand. Perhaps the minister could give us an explanation. It certainly looks like interference with the jurisdiction of the courts and provincial rights.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): Where there is a recognized relative we immediately admit that he is the proper guardian and cooperate in every possible way. We might have to assume guardianship of a citizen from another country, or a veteran without near relatives, who would be placed in such an institution. But of course if there were a relative in Canada we would cooperate in every possible way with that relative.

Mr. BROOKS: The statement is so general, it looks as though there might be some interference.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): No; it has been there since 1919.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I am glad to see that the minister recognizes that this is a question of property and civil rights and that there is another jurisdiction. He says that in a case where there are relatives—who are fit, I assume, to handle an insane person's estate or affairs—the department would in every case authorize them to apply to their proper jurisdiction for appointment.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): That is right.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Of course that is not implied in the section as it is now, and consideration might be given to including that principle in the latter part of the relevant subsection. I can well understand why the minister states that in the cases of nationals from other countries or those who have no dependents or relatives in this jurisdiction someone ought to have the authority to take charge, but may I point out that in nearly every jurisdiction in the common law provinces of Canada that I know anything about, there is an official, sometimes called the official guardian, who performs this very function. I do not myself see any great objection to having someone authorized to do this.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): We use the services of the official guardian in every possible case.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I think that is proper. The practice then is not as one would assume from reading the bill. I suggest that in the case of a man with dependents and relatives within a given jurisdiction, the provincial courts upon proper application would exercise that jurisdiction and displace any appointment that might be made by this department. It may not be a practical question. I would not think that many cases have arisen since 1919 where the department had to have one of its officers constituted official guardian for the estate of an insane person. Therefore the matter may be purely academic; for that reason I would not stress it very much. I merely want to supplement what the hon. member for Royal has said. This is to be an invasion of a distinct provincial jurisdiction, which ought not to be invaded without proper cause and in a proper case.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): So far as I know there have been no cases of conflict at any time with regard to this section. The main purpose of it is in cases where there are no guardians to administer funds on behalf of the man himself.

Mr. HAZEN: If there has been for years a section in the previous act similar to this section I assume there has been a regulation made under it. Would the minister give the wording of that regulation so that we may see just what it does say?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): There is a three-page order in council which I would like to table for my hon. friend. It is lengthy; I do not think he wants it to be read now.

Mr. HAZEN: I would not insist on it.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): With the consent of the committee I table the order in council.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I notice that in the Pensions and National Health Act, chapter 39 of the statutes of 1928, there is a whole clause—paragraph (d) of subsection 6 of section 1—regarding the detention of properties and as to moneys and receipts therefor and guardianship of the insane. Is there any change between that and the present bill.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): There is no change from the old act.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): No, I did not think so.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: In connection with section 7, and the general omnibus clause which is given in paragraph (l) for the purpose of carrying out the provisions of the bill with respect to any matter placed under the control and management of the minister, could a provision be included under which the war veterans' allowance would be made payable to imperial soldiers? I raised this point before, and I was not able to get an answer at the time. There are quite a number of ex-imperials in this country who find themselves in a destitute position and for whom no provision is made for payment of any allowance similar in nature to the war veterans' allowance. I should like to find out from the minister whether consideration has been given to the inclusion of these men and their dependents. Only to-day I received a letter from the widow of an imperial not in receipt of a pension at the time of his death. She is in destitute circumstances, and I know of no provision to-day whereby her condition may be alleviated. Is consideration being given to some award in the nature of the war veterans' allowances to such persons, or to their dependents?

There is another matter in connection with which I consider there should be an addition to the powers contained in section 7 to make regulations; I refer to a form of soldiers' insurance similar to that now in effect in the United States. So far as our pension department is concerned—and I am not inclined to hand out commendation unless I believe it is due—any matters I have brought to the minister's attention have received at all times sympathetic consideration. If there is one thing more than another which we must endeavour to achieve in connection with veterans' matters, it is to remove them entirely from partisan consideration, and it is in that spirit that I discuss matters which I bring before the committee to-day.

In the United States there is in effect an insurance system under which any man who joins the army of the United States is entitled under the national service life insurance act of 1940 to apply for life insurance up to $10,000, for which the soldier pays at the rate of $7.70 per $1,000 per month for the period of hostilities. Should that soldier be killed in action or die while in the service of his country, payment is made for the period of two hundred and forty successive months at the rate of $5.51 per thousand dollars of insurance to the dependent or whoever is named. It would not be costly to bring in this system of insurance for the soldiers, and it would be conducive to the improvement of the conditions of the relatives of those who are killed in action. Many of those who die in the service of their country leave relatives —mother and father, we will say—who were not dependents but who in the later years of the soldier's life, had he survived, would have had the benefits which all sons confer upon their parents. I know of two families who in this war have each lost sons. To-day these people are almost in destitution, although they were not dependent upon their sons. Had there been in effect a system of national insurance such as there is in the United States, those parents would have been assured for a period of twenty years of a reasonable monthly payment.

I again bring this matter to the attention of the minister and the committee. It is not yet too late to bring into effect this system of national life insurance. I have endeavoured to ascertain in the past from various ministers what is being done, and each has taken the stand that the matter is being considered but that it does not come directly under his department. To-day, however, with the unifying of functions under a veterans' department, the matter will rest squarely on the minister. I would appreciate it if he would place before the committee the attitude of the government towards the establishment of a system of insurance similar to that in effect in the United States. I have here a pamphlet issued by the war department of the United States entitled "Personal Affairs of Military Personnel and Aid to Their Dependents" in which is set out in detail the rights of men and women in the armed forces of the United States and among other things it gives full particulars of the insurance scheme. A similar kind of booklet might very well be considered by the minister and published here in Canada for the benefit of the troops.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): Is that the G.I. bill?

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: It was published on April 1, 1944. It is an unusually useful book. It deals with suggestions for preparation, transportation of dependents and military personnel, medical assistance, emergency relief, shipment of household goods—in the United States where personnel are moved from one place to another the dependents are entitled to free transportation as well as freight on their household goods to one change of place during the period of the war—pay and allowances, and so on.

There is another matter to which consideration should be given. There is a hiatus between the death of the soldier and the payment of any allowances made. In the United States, regardless of whether a man is entitled to a pension or not, immediately he appears in the casualty list as killed in action a death gratuity of six months is made payable, the purpose being to ensure that there shall be no hold-up in monthly payments to his dependents. Up to the present various publications have been issued by the Canadian government, but it is surprising the number of men in the armed services who write to members of parliament asking what their rights are to-day and what they will be after the war. No one can complain that there is any political or partisan significance in a pamphlet or booklet such as this. It is written dispassionately and objectively, and contains information that ought to be available to the men in the forces.

To sum up, I would like the minister to advise of his attitude toward the question of making war veterans' allowances available to imperial soldiers. Secondly, I would ask what decision has been arrived at as to whether there should be available to our soldiers in Canada insurance for veterans at cost only for the period of the war.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): I am grateful to my hon. friend for the constructive suggestions he has made. The first point was the question of veterans' allowance for imperial soldiers. This has been a contentious question in Canada for a number of years. It has been a subject of discussion at all Legion conventions, all conventions of ex-service men, and in the last four or five parliamentary committees dealing with pension problems, veterans' allowance, and similar questions. The great difficulty of course is that it is limited at the present time to Canadians who saw service in a theatre of actual war, except in a limited number of cases where pensions are paid.

Speaking personally and not as a member of the government, I think the first step to be taken is to broaden the scope of veterans' allowances to Canadians who serve elsewhere than in a theatre of actual war.

Mr. GRAYDON: Is that the policy of the government?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): I am speaking as member for Vancouver Centre. I think that before you extend the veterans' allowances to imperials who have served in the front line in a field of actual war, you must extend it to Canadians who have served anywhere. I think it will be necessary to do that.

Mr. GRAYDON: Does the minister think he will be able to induce the government to do that?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): If my hon. friend will help me, I am sure.

Mr. GRAYDON: I have tried before to help the minister.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): The second point was the question of soldiers' insurance. This is of two kinds, insurance for those in the service and insurance for those who have returned from service. In regard to the latter, we had a returned soldiers' insurance act after the last war, and we have now a committee—that is part of the demobilization plan—who are giving careful consideration to measures to be recommended for returned soldiers' insurance.

In regard to the legislation in the United States mentioned by my hon. friend, who made a very fine speech a year ago, which I recall very well, there are two different methods of approach. One is the actual initiation of national policies, which has not been very widely accepted in the United States. As a matter of fact, we had figures on it about two months ago, and I was surprised that the principle had not been more widely accepted than it was.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: Were there not 770,000 policies taken out?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): That may have been my hon. friend's information. The alternative method would be the protection of premiums on policies already in existence. That is one of the greatest dangers I see for those who are serving, and that should receive definite consideration. As a matter of fact we have given it a good deal of consideration, but what the ultimate policy will be I cannot say at the moment. We have been considering both these phases of insurance. The third point was in regard to the hiatus between the death of the soldier and the payment of benefits, and that should receive every possible consideration from any government.

I can only assure my hon. friend that the matters he has mentioned will not be forgotten. Indeed they are now actively receiving the attention of various departments, and I trust that before the session is over some announcement will be made respecting some of them at least.

Mr. GILLIS: When I spoke on this question before I emphasized the importance of the welfare officers located in the different communities across Canada. I wish to direct attention for a few minutes to another phase of that particular problem. I understand now that the R.C.A.F. are giving courses with a view to men acting as personnel counsellors; I believe it is their intention to train certain personnel back from overseas on the station with the end in view of sending them overseas to meet returning personnel and to give them certain instructions before they come back to Canada. I think that that arrangement is all to the good; it is exactly what should be done. However, there is one exception I have to take to it. It would appear to me that the men selected by the R.C.A.F. for training as personnel counsellors are exclusively officers. They are confined to the office branch. I have had two specific complaints.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): Is that so? I did not know that.

Mr. GILLIS: That is right. I can give the minister two cases. The first was that of a warrant officer No. 1. He had been overseas since 1940. He returned and was actually taking the course. He had all the educational qualifications necessary. He was very popular with the men. He was notified that he must discontinue the course because he is not of officer rank.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): I must say I have never heard that before.

Mr. GILLIS: They are not appointing any new officers because they have sufficient. In my opinion that is bad legislation. It is class legislation, and should be corrected immediately. Whether it comes under the Minister of National Defence for Air or not, this bill seeks to set up a department of veterans' affairs that is to be all-inclusive. It is going to take the responsibility of directing the whole show regardless of the branch of the service the men are in. If a warrant officer, a pilot who has been overseas for some years, or one who served in the capacity of an air gunner, comes back and has all the necessary qualifications, he should be allowed to take the course regardless of the rank he held.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): There will not be the slightest doubt about that.

Mr. GILLIS: It is not being done now.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): After discharge?

Mr. GILLIS: It is not done now, and it is creating terrific resentment. Within the last few days I have had men at the station at Rockcliffe who recently returned from England come to me in a very bad state of mind because they were being refused the right to take a course of that kind. They were already on the course and were being taken off.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): That is before discharge?

Mr. GILLIS: Yes, before discharge. I suggest that the minister should consult with the ministers of national defence for navy, army and air and have it corrected.

Mr. ADAMSON: I should like to discuss a question which comes under paragraph (g), section 7—

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): That paragraph is being deleted.

Mr. ADAMSON: Is it? Well, the general remarks I was about to make are applicable to the whole bill. I take exception to the use of the word "pension" as applied to members of the armed forces who have suffered disability on service. I do not think the word "pension" is the accurate one to use in that case. I know that there is great difficulty in finding another word; but generally speaking, a pension is something that is paid to an individual after long service. After men in the permanent service have served thirty-five years or have devoted their entire life to the services of their country, they receive a pension, whereas a citizen soldier who enlists and receives a wound or disability also receives what is called a pension. I have heard some people criticize the use of the word "pension" there. It is not really a pension in the sense of a pension for long service; it is a compensatory grant for a definite disability caused on service. I wish the minister would give some consideration to differentiating between a definite pension for long service and the grant for disability caused by actual wounds or injuries in combat service.

My next point has come up before in this committee. It has to do with the differentiation between the rates of the United Kingdom pension and the Canadian pension. I have taken up with the minister several cases of imperials who were rated on a definite percentage of disability. I have had correspondence with him in respect of one case where the individual was rated a hundred per cent disability. He was badly gassed and suffered from tuberculosis. He was able to do only light work and was just getting by. He fought with the imperials in the last war. Although he had some claim to Canadian domicile before that war, it has not been allowed either by the United Kingdom authorities or by the Canadian authorities. Because he served in the United Kingdom forces his pension is on the United Kingdom basis. There is no complaint about his being a hundred per cent disability. All the Canadian pension boards who have seen him have agreed that he is a hundred per cent disability; but because he happened to serve in the United Kingdom forces the actual cash pension that he receives per month is on the United Kingdom rate, which is very much lower than Canadian rates; consequently he finds great difficulty in getting by. Although he has not had to appeal to charity, he is almost in that position. There must be hundreds of cases of the kind. The first thing that the minister who is in charge of this department should do is to make some reciprocal agreement with the United Kingdom authorities so that when a veteran emigrates from the United Kingdom we may be prepared to take on the differential between the United Kingdom pension and the Canadian pension.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): Was this man domiciled in Canada before?

Mr. ADAMSON: This man was domiciled in Canada. I have corresponded with the minister about it. I shall not mention his name to the committee, but he had some domicile in Canada. Actually he had served in the Canadian hydrographic survey. There was some question about his domicile, and the authorities ruled against him. However, he was definitely living in Canada prior to the last war. I bring up this case as an example. He had a greater claim than many others have. We should pay the same rate to these men as we pay our own.

I should like to know how much insurance held by members of the Canadian armed forces has lapsed.

[Mr. Adamson.]

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): In this war?

Mr. ADAMSON: In this war. Is there any way of getting that information? Several men who have quite large insurance policies, definite obligations towards their families, have come to me after enlisting, and nearly all have expressed worry about whether or not they would be able to continue the premiums on their life insurance. What are the figures in that respect? I take a strong stand against the lapsing of any man's insurance policy because he joined the armed forces. One of the things this measure should guard against is the lapsing of a man's life insurance because he has joined the army. That is only the minimum of fairness we must hold out to our service men. I should like to know if the minister has any figures in that regard.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): In reference to the last point raised by my hon. friend, I think that is the key point in regard to insurance, the protection of the premiums of those serving overseas. We took up that question some two months ago, in regard to these lapsed policies, but we were not able to get the information referred to by the hon. gentleman. We had a conference with some of the insurance company heads in regard to this whole question.

Another point raised by my hon. friend was in regard to the use of the word "pension". I am quite aware that for years the amputations association has advocated that a different word be used, something like "disability compensation" or similar words. The difficulty would be that you might have a word which would apply to a disability pension but not to a dependent's pension. I know there is a substantial advocacy of the point raised by my hon. friend in that regard, but I am afraid it would be difficult to get a suitable word.

The third point raised was in connection with an imperial who had been living in Canada, but who must have left this country before the war with the intention of residing in the old country. If he had been domiciled in Canada and had intended to maintain his domicile here, he would be entitled to the higher rates of pension given by the Canadian government.

Mr. ADAMSON: I shall resubmit the file to the minister.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): Thank you. It is very interesting to note that pension payments by the British government to 1,192 Canadians who were serving in the imperial forces during this war totalled $365,360, while the amount added by the Canadian pension commission to bring those pensions up to the Canadian scale was $775,974, or more than twice as much. That shows that the people of Canada have been very considerate in their pension scale as compared with the old land, and I say so with respect to my native country.

Mr. ADAMSON: But could not some reciprocal arrangement be worked out in connection with the imperials? I think we all admit that living is more expensive in Canada; at least it always has been considered more expensive to live on the continent of North America than in Europe. I believe we should take that into consideration and work out some arrangement for the imperial veterans.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): We have been giving a great deal of thought to that very point, not only in connection with the United Kingdom but also in connection with the United States. The associate deputy minister, Mr. Woods here, and I, went to Washington some months ago to try and get some reciprocal arrangement with the government of that country in regard to certain treatment for their men here and for our Canadians down there, but you will never get reciprocity in pension matters until you have social security legislation in the various parts of the empire more or less on the same pattern. That is the only way you can get reciprocity in connection with pension treatment and consideration.

Mr. ADAMSON: That is one reason why I think we should have an imperial council; that would be one of the questions to be discussed.

The CHAIRMAN: I must remind the committee that we are on paragraph (e) of section 7 of the bill, and I would ask hon. members to keep within the ambit of that paragraph, if possible.

Mr. JACKMAN: Following up a question asked by the hon. member for Cape Breton South, the minister may have given this information previously, but since unfortunately I was not here all the time I should like to know exactly where the department of veterans' affairs takes over and the Department of National Defence leaves off.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): On discharge.

Mr. JACKMAN: Would the minister say something about the coordination of the activities of the various defence departments and of this veterans' affairs department? I understand, and it was mentioned also by the hon. member for Cape Breton South, that the air force in particular is outlining certain extensive preparations which are being made to deal with the men before they are demobilized; the Minister of National Defence for Air made certain suggestions when his war estimates were before the house. I should think that this would certainly duplicate, if not conflict with, many of the plans envisaged by the department of veterans' affairs. Would the minister say exactly whether or not there is duplication in the air force, and perhaps in the army and navy as well?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): I do not know whether my hon. friend was here last Friday when we were discussing the second reading of this bill. At that time the Minister of National Defence (Army) dealt at length with the very point the hon. gentleman has raised, in regard to the service committees now functioning in relation to what might be called some of the predischarge and rehabilitation preparations, and also as to what would be the functions of the inter-service committee. There is also an inter-departmental committee, on which pensions and national health is represented together with the services, to coordinate the work of the various service departments and what I might call the post-discharge department, pensions and health or, as it will be before long, veterans' affairs. There is no duplication. As my hon. friend has suggested, some personnel counselling is done in the service, and it is the responsibility of the service departments during the transition or waiting period, before repatriation is effected, to render all possible service by educational courses and otherwise to prepare the men for rehabilitation. Once a man reaches the demobilization centre or depot in Canada, however, the officers of this department will be there to advise in regard to vocational training, land settlement, educational training, and the various other activities of the department. They will be able to advise the men who have made up their minds already as to what they intend to do. So that there is no duplication; the one is preparation before discharge, during the time of transition, while the other is the post-discharge work of the Department of Pensions and National Health.

Mr. JACKMAN: But it would seem that the failure to discharge a number of men from the air force has been due to the fact that they were not prepared to take up their projected civilian occupations, and therefore had to be given certain schooling and training while still on the active strength of the air force. I should think that would come more properly under the department of veterans' affairs, so that there is duplication in that connection. I understand the men are being intentionally held in the air force, and not being demobilized, because it is desired to give them certain specific training. I am given to understand further that the air force feel that because of their youth, and because of the hazardous occupation they have been following for the last three, four or five years, their men are entitled to special treatment. I have no particular objection to that, as long as the men of the other services are treated fairly, as long as all efforts are coordinated, and as long as no unnecessary expense is entailed. It does seem to me, however, that at the present time men are being purposely held back from demobilization in order to give them training.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): I have not heard that suggested before. On March 2 the Minister of National Defence for Air fully described the policy of his department.

Mr. JACKMAN: Yes, but I think he mentioned four or five alternative proposals, and I do not believe any conclusion was reached at that time.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): I do not think they have been retained for training purposes only.

Mr. JACKMAN: The regulations should be as definite as possible. My general criticism of this bill is that it is sketchy in its various sections, instead of outlining matters with more particularity.

Mr. BRYCE: I should like to ask the minister a question with regard to members of the women's services who may require pensions. At the present time they are paid eighty per cent of what the soldiers are paid. Will that ratio be applied when it comes to granting a pension to one of these women; will she receive only eighty per cent of the pension that would be paid a man?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): The pension now paid is on the basis of the army pay, which was two-thirds and is now four-fifths of a soldier's pay.

Mr. BRYCE: That is unfair. It costs a woman as much to live as it does a man.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): I am inclined to agree.

Mr. BRYCE: The argument has been that a woman did not do as much work as a man in the army, that she did not carry a bayonet or anything like that. However, it seems to me that if a woman is good enough to offer her life to take the place of a man, at least she should receive the same pension that is paid a man. Does the minister not agree with me?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): In a personal way I do.

Mr. BRYCE: Then, if the minister agrees, he should see to it that such a provision is put in the regulations.

Mr. McLARTY: I move.

That paragraph (g) of subsection 1 of section 6 be deleted.

The CHAIRMAN: That is the new number—section 6.

Mr. STIRLING: How does the minister purpose handling the cases which were to be handled under paragraph (g)? He referred to the way in which merchant seamen, fire fighters and various others would be cared for under that paragraph. How will he now do it?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): Merchant seamen are now protected by order in council, and will be protected by a statutory provision in the Pension Act as soon as that act is consolidated and all these orders in council are embodied in it.

Mr. STIRLING: And they will be taken care of by orders in council until such time as the Pension Act is amended?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): Yes; they are cared for in that way now.

Amendment agreed to.

Mr. JACKMAN: With respect to paragraph (i), is it the intention of the government to bring down any additional legislation in connection with sheltered employment, or is it going to do the whole thing by regulation? I understand that in Great Britain they have a disabled employment act which provides for workers who are unable to use all their limbs, or who have not ordinary facilities. This act also applies, I believe, to civilians. It is an important measure, and I think the committee in this instance should know exactly what the government intends.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): This does not deal with any new project; it is just to continue the power of the department to carry on the old vetcraft work, which we had been doing for years—work in connection with the manufacture of poppies, and the like. If there were further legislation for sheltered employment it would not necessarily come within the ambit of this paragraph.

Mr. JACKMAN: Is it the intention of the government to consider bringing down further legislation to provide sheltered employment?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): I am not in a position to say, one way or another.

Mr. BROOKS: Under this paragraph does the department intend to take over the administration of the Last Post fund?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): That is covered now by order in council through this department, and the arrangement will continue. There are the most friendly relations, and splendid cooperation exists in connection with that fund.

Mr. BROOKS: The other day I spoke to the minister about war graves overseas. I understand the matter is looked after here in Canada by the imperial war graves commission. Under this measure will the work be done here by the department in Canada, or will it be handled by the imperial war graves commission?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): It will be handled by the imperial war graves commission, unless there is some change in policy. We have in Canada a director of military cemeteries. That is in Canada only. Then there is a committee which meets from time to time, on which the services are represented, and which looks after securing proper accommodation for the burial of those who will be interred in Canada.

Mr. BROOKS: That will be connected up with this department, will it? At the present time it is under the Department of National Defence. I understand that in future this new department will look after the matter.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): No; but we have an association with that commission.

Mr. ADAMSON: We are rapidly approaching the time when we shall have a large number of veteran warriors in Canada who will not be able to undertake regular work. In many instances they will not have dependents to look after them. In other instances it would be unfair to expect the dependents to look after those men, who have served their country so well. As is well known, there is in England the Royal Hospital at Chelsea. The Chelsea pensioners are well known, both in peace-time and war-time London. It occurs to me that in years to come we must give some consideration to finding a location for the old veterans who cannot be left—as they are in many cases—as a burden upon their children or their dependents. The minister might give consideration to the establishment of such an institution, whereby these old veterans could be looked after and could maintain their self-respect, in the same way as have the veterans at the Royal Hospital in Chelsea.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): I entirely agree with the hon. member in what he has said respecting homes for old soldiers. We have two of them now, one at Toronto and the other at Vancouver. I wish hon. members could see what is done in the one at Vancouver. I know that those men received good care—the very finest treatment in the world. It is my hope that these homes may be extended across Canada. We should have possibly two in every province. If hon. members could see the work done in these homes they would be tremendously impressed.

In connection with handicapped veterans, we are cooperating with the amputation society and the institute for the blind. They have specialists who act as placement officers on our behalf, and they see that these men are properly adjusted into civil life. Generally speaking these handicapped cases prefer being absorbed into industry rather than being placed together at any central point. The work that is done by amputation cases is nothing short of amazing. Their courage is wonderful, and what they are able to do industrially is almost startling. Possibly the keynote of accommodation of this kind is found in what I have said. There might, first, be accommodation for old soldiers—but not necessarily for the purpose of sheltered employment. Then, secondly, there would be absorption into industry of men with disabilities but who are anxious to do industrial work.

Mr. ADAMSON: That is a scheme similar to the one I described on Friday, as it applies in California.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): Yes.

Mr. ADAMSON: What machinery have we? Do industries cooperate?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): Yes, they do.

Mr. ADAMSON: Is there a pool or clearing house? For instance, what happens to a man with a single amputation, or to one with a double amputation?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): We have a special officer in each hospital under our jurisdiction in Canada to handle cases of that kind, and have them properly placed.

Mr. ADAMSON: And do industries cooperate?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): Yes, a hundred per cent.

Mr. ADAMSON: With the officers?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): Yes, the cooperation of industry has been magnificent in the last two or three years.

Mr. JACKMAN: Paragraph (i) deals among other things with free transportation. It has been brought to my attention that this free transportation should be extended to the immediate dependents of the veterans. Would the minister give consideration to the matter? —because this paragraph mentions free transportation to those who have suffered certain disabilities.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): It is only for the escorts of those who are totally blind or totally incapacitated. A man's wife might be acting in that capacity.

Mr. JACKMAN: She would be acting as an escort, but I am thinking of the case where it is necessary to move a disabled veteran from one section of the country to another. It would also be necessary to move his family; should not the transportation expenses be provided?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): We do not do that now, but it is something that might be considered.

Mr. JACKMAN: I understand that there are cases of hardship in that connection.

Mr. STIRLING: The minister has referred more than once to orders in council which will take care of certain situations until the amending of the Pension Act. Under what act are those orders in council passed?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): They would be passed under the War Measures Act. Some day when the war is over there will have to be a complete consolidation of the Pension Act, so that the rights of these people can be permanently protected. They should not have to continue under the uncertainty of the War Measures Act.

Mr. BROOKS: Paragraph (j) is a very important one. I think it was in 1942 that a special committee on canteen funds was set up. That committee made a report, and I should like to ask the minister if any plans have been formulated to look after these canteen funds after the war, and whether those plans have the approval of the united services.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): In drafting bill No. 83 the officers felt that the reference to the administration and disposal of canteen funds should be taken out of the section and placed separately, inasmuch as the matter was not one subject to an appropriation of parliament. The only reason for continuing it in the new bill is that the Canteen Funds Act, chapter 34 of the statutes of 1925 and the Canteen Funds (Canada) Act, chapter 14 of the statutes of 1928, contain the provision that a report shall be made at the end of each year to the minister of soldiers' civil reestablishment—now the Minister of Pensions and National Health—by the provincial boards of trustees and by any other bodies or organizations to whom allotment has been made, under the acts, or organizations to whom allotment has been made setting forth the work accomplished during the preceding twelve months, the amount expended and the balance in hand.

Inasmuch as this provision was placed in the Department of Pensions and National Health account, even after the canteen funds arising from the great war had been disposed of by the acts of 1925 and 1928, it was decided to retain the clause in this bill, but the action was not taken with any view to having any canteen funds arising from the present war necessarily administered by the minister of veterans' affairs. I recall the report of the committee but I do not think they recommended that any immediate action should be taken. The advice that I received from my officers was rather against taking immediate action before the termination of hostilities.

Mr. BROOKS: I think that is correct.

Mr. BLACKMORE: Could the minister give us a general idea of what the canteen funds from the last war were used for?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): Allotments were made to the various provinces, I believe on the basis of enlistments. If I recall correctly, committees were set up. I know in British Columbia the committee was made up of three returned soldiers who administered the funds and used them for cases of hardship among old soldiers. I believe the funds were all exhausted some years ago. My hon. friend will recall that in one province there was unfortunately maladministration of the canteen funds, but with that one exception the administration has been constructive and helpful, generally speaking, in assisting cases of hardship and distress.

Mr. BLACKMORE: Who set up the committees?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): The provincial governments.

Mr. BLACKMORE: Was that done with the advice of the soldiers' organizations?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): I cannot speak for the other provinces, but I know in my own province the soldiers' organizations were consulted by the provincial government.

Mr. BROOKS: The special committee suggested that the disposal of canteen funds remaining from the war, either from profits or from the salvage of stock and equipment, required intensive study before any policy could be laid down. I assume that the minister intends to wait until some definite decision has been made.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): That is right.

Mr. SENN: Am I right in assuming that the Veterans' Land Act and the Soldier Settlement Act come under the provisions of this bill?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): That is correct.

Mr. SENN: Paragraph (l) reads:

For the purpose of carrying out the provisions of this act with respect to any matter placed under the control and management of the minister.

Why could it not read, for the purpose of carrying out the provisions of these other acts?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): I think section 9 will answer that question.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): Referring to subsection 2, on Thursday last the hon. member for Comox-Alberni suggested that these regulations should be published.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): I was just going to suggest an amendment, as follows:

That subclause 2 of clause 7 (now clause 6) be deleted and the following substituted therefor:

"(2) Such regulations shall forthwith, after approval by the governor in council, be published in the Canada Gazette and laid before parliament within fifteen days after they are made if parliament is then sitting, and, if not, then within fifteen days after the commencement of the next ensuing session thereof."

Mr. McLARTY: I move accordingly.

Amendment agreed to.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): On Friday I moved that section 6 of the existing bill be deleted but there is no record in Hansard. Perhaps I had better make a formal motion now.

The CHAIRMAN: It was passed.

Section 7 (renumbered 6) as amended agreed to.

Sections 7 to 11 inclusive (as renumbered) agreed to.

Bill reported.

SURPLUS CROWN ASSETS

PROVISION FOR CORPORATION AND ADVISORY COMMITTEE

The house resumed from Tuesday, June 13, consideration in committee of bill No. 137, respecting surplus crown assets—Mr. Howe.—Mr. Bradette in the chair.

Sections 11 to 16 inclusive agreed to.

On section 17—Accounting system.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): Will all this information in connection with the corporation's dealings be made public? It seems to me that further on the report of the minister is limited, and the whole thing does not seem just to "add up." I am anxious to know whether we are to have a full report, or whether the report is to be dictated solely by the minister, without parliament having anything to say as to the information we should receive.

Mr. CHEVRIER: Section 18 provides for a report such as my hon. friend suggests, a report which must be made as soon as possible after the 31st day of March in each year, and in any event within three months, and tabled in parliament.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): Yes, but I would point out that in the clause to which the parliamentary assistant refers the wording is that the corporation shall "submit an annual report to the minister in such form as he may prescribe and the minister shall lay the said report before parliament." I do not think parliament is interested in having merely the information which the minister may prescribe; it should be a report as laid down by the parliament of Canada.

Mr. CHEVRIER: If the hon. member will look at subsection 4 of the section we are discussing, he will see that "The accounts of the corporation shall be audited by the auditor general of Canada and the audited statements of such accounts shall be included in the corporation's annual report."

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): Yes, that is all very well; audited reports will be given to parliament, but we shall not get them until two years after the transactions have taken place.

That will be too late. What we want is a yearly report, really, before the auditor general gets it.

Mr. CHEVRIER: I can think of no greater protection than the two sections to which I have referred: section 18, which we have not reached yet, and section 17, subsection 4, which I think answers the hon. gentleman's objection.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): Then I will have a suggestion to make when we come to the next clause.

Mr. HANSELL: With respect to this section 18—

The CHAIRMAN: We are still on section 17.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: Mr. Chairman, this has gone rather fast. The minister was not even here in time, since the bill has been proceeded with so quickly. There are some references which I should like to make; and while I dislike having to suggest it, I wish to refer, with the leave of the committee and your permission, to some of the sections which have been passed.

Mr. MacNICOL: Without any discussion.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: If I may now make some references to those sections, I should like to do so.

Mr. CHEVRIER: May I suggest to the hon. member that he could make his remarks on section 23, which is a sort of all-inclusive clause. However, if he wants to make them now I do not think there is any objection.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: It is immaterial. The suggestion of the parliamentary assistant is acceptable to me.

Section agreed to.

On section 18—Annual report.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): I suggest that the wording of this section be altered to require the corporation to submit an annual report to the minister in such form as "the parliament of Canada" may prescribe and the minister shall lay the said report before parliament. I do not think the minister should have the power to prescribe the report; that power should belong to parliament.

Hon. C. D. HOWE (Minister of Munitions and Supply): I ask the hon. member to state exactly the machinery which parliament would use in specifying the kind of report it wanted. There is no great objection to his proposal, but I hardly see how it would be practical.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): The only thing I have in mind is this, that often in days gone by, when members of parliament asked questions, we were told, "It is not in the public interest that this information be disclosed." I do not think it should be within the sole discretion of the minister as to what shall and what shall not be reported.

Mr. HOWE: I may say, as I stated earlier in the debate, that the operations of this company will be carried on as in a goldfish bowl, with full disclosure of every transaction. I can assure the hon. member that any question which any hon. member may care to ask about the operations of the company will be answered in full by the government.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: I am glad to find that the minister has reached the point where he is actually going to answer in parliament when questions are asked. Everything is to be wide open and answers are to be given. It was because of a tendency that he has adopted in so many cases in the past of refusing parliament information that I scanned this bill carefully. The minister says that the intention is now to have all these transactions under this legislation follow the principle of the goldfish bowl. That is most commendable. Furthermore, he says that he is going to answer for the transactions that take place and give full information. That certainly is an advance, a statement far beyond anything that has characterized the minister's attitude heretofore. It is only four or five weeks ago that I asked a question in this house as to the price of coal per ton sold to the Dundurn camp and the answer given was that it was not considered in the public interest to give unit prices. Very often members have received the answer that it is not in the public interest to furnish information, and it is natural therefore that we should go through the bill and scrutinize it carefully to assure that parliament shall insist on a full accounting.

As to the necessity for this legislation, we on this side of the house accept as a fact that it is necessary, in other words, that a War Assets Corporation should be set up. But we do decry the method whereby this corporation is being set up, for in effect it constitutes a body appointed by and responsible to the minister. I point out first that under section 10, subsection 2, the War Assets Corporation:

> . . . shall consist of a board of not less than six directors appointed by the minister with the approval of the governor in council.

To show the powers of the corporation, section 11 says:

The board, with the approval of the minister, shall designate one of the directors to be the president and one of the directors to be the vice-president of the corporation.

And section 12 says:

Subject to general or specific instructions given by the minister the corporation may, when so directed by the minister, (a) sell, exchange, lease, lend or otherwise dispose of or deal with surplus crown assets either gratuitously or for a consideration and upon such terms and subject to such conditions as the board may consider desirable.

In other words, this board, purporting to be an independent board carrying out the activities prescribed by the legislation, is in fact an automaton under the control of the minister. It will have no extensive authority unless it has the approval of the minister.

Let me pass on to section 17:

The corporation shall establish and maintain an accounting system satisfactory to the minister.

Then subsection 4:

The accounts of the corporation shall be audited by the auditor general of Canada and the audited statements of such accounts shall be included in the corporation's annual report.

I pause here to mention that the auditor general's audit, however, would not carry detailed references to transactions; it would deal with amounts without dealing with individual transactions. Then section 18 says:

The corporation shall . . . submit an annual report to the minister in such form as he may prescribe and the minister shall lay the said report before parliament.

However good the intentions of our present minister may be in regard to giving full answers to parliament, under this bill, parliament having abdicated its rights, could properly be refused any detailed information with regard to the transactions. In fact, looking over this bill and taking it in conjunction with the Aeronautics Act, I see a trend which I believe is dangerous, and the abdication, by legislation passed by parliament, of parliament's right to full information. People want to know that this legislation will be administered fairly, definitely and openly or, so that all who run may read.

We believe that the principles under which this measure should be administered—and they represent the attitude taken by the government of the United States—are that sales should be made as early as possible without disrupting normal trade; that there should be no sales or rentals of crown property to speculators and certainly none to promoters; that sales should be made in the goldfish bowl manner, with records always available to public inspection. Furthermore, in the disposal of these assets the public should be so protected that the assets shall not fall into the possession of monopolies, and all businesses should have equal access to the surplus.

I believe, too, that in order to protect the rights of the people of Canada in some four billion dollars worth of assets there should be a representative of the Department of Justice on the board. In fact, I think this is one board upon which either the Minister of Justice or the deputy minister of justice should be a member so as to prevent monopoly in the disposal of these assets.

As I look over this bill, full as it is of loopholes, I think it should be submitted again to a committee for changes to be recommended. As a nation we have accepted bureaucracy in war time. This measure has to do with the activities of a government corporation to operate in peace tme, and as at present constituted it does not provide for control by parliament. It purports to do so in the letter of the law, but according to any strict interpretation, if at any time within the next three or four or five years any member of the house rises in his place and asks how a particular plant was disposed of, what was done with a certain surplus, the answer that the minister can give, if this measure is passed, may be that all the information he is required to place before parliament is the annual report of the corporation and no more, and in any event that as he is not a member of the corporation, the informaton asked for is not available. Before we grant power to the minister to take such a stand I feel that this committee and the country should realize the purport of the legislation as it now stands.

As I look over this bill and examine it together with the aeronautics bill I believe I can safely say that these two bills are deliberately or unintentionally colliding head-on with parliamentary and responsible government. We have accepted bureaucracy for the period of the war. This bill shows that bureaucracy is to be continued in time of peace. I believe that the time has come when parliament must limit and check government in manifestations such as these that indicate a trend toward the exercise by government corporations of unlimited power and a failure to recognize their responsibility to parliament. The minister says to-day: "I will furnish the information at any time." The bill does not indicate that some subsequent minister not so well-intentioned as the Minister of Munitions and Supply would do the same thing. Put in its simplest form this bill permits of the establishment by parliament of a corporation designated by the minister responsible not to parliament but to the minister, with the minister in the position of being able to say, when questioned in parliament, that what was done was done by a corporation and that he had no knowledge of what that corporation had done.

I suggest that this bill as it now stands requires that certain further provisions be added to it to curtail the powers of this corporation, to require it to account to parliament, and to permit and to demand in fact, that this corporation shall make a report to parliament fully setting out in detail each and every transaction. If the minister is prepared to accept a suggestion I would say that any objection to this bill can be removed by making provision in section 18 whereby in the annual report that is laid before parliament full details shall be given of all transactions that have taken place during the year being reported. If the minister will accept that suggestion then I feel the other objections I have raised will not be as tenable as they otherwise are.

What the members of this committee want is to control the activities of corporations that are nominated by the minister to the end that the people of Canada shall be assured that in the administration of the disposal of billions of dollars' worth of assets, the property of this dominion, proper principles shall be followed and that preference shall not be given by the corporation in favour of anyone; that the largest possible returns shall be insisted upon and that the War Assets Corporation shall not be vested with absolute power by reason of parliament abdicating the right to demand a full and proper accounting.

Mr. HOWE: I stated a few moments ago that it would be the policy of the government to make full disclosure with regard to any and all transactions of the corporation being created by the bill that is now being considered by this committee. My hon. friend stated that he doubted whether a full disclosure was to be made because the department had refused to give the unit prices for the purchase of coal at Dundurn camp. May I point out to my hon. friend that the difference in the two transactions is that the government is a buyer of coal. It buys coal by open tender. The objection to giving the prices is that the prices could be of no value to a member of parliament, but they could be of great value to another coal dealer. The Department of Munitions and Supply is a buyer of a vast number of things, and has adopted the policy of not disclosing tenders. That I think has saved the government money. Any coal dealer who desires to obtain the Dundurn contract must sharpen his pencil and put in the lowest price that he can possibly put together. If he does that he has a chance of getting the business. If the unit prices of the lowest tender were disclosed, they would be a guide to any dealer, and the chances are that that dealer would not sharpen his pencil as much as he would if he did not know the objective he was trying to reach. That is the difference between the government as a buyer and the government as a seller. As a seller the government should gladly make known its prices, because there the position is that the government desires to get the highest possible price for its equipment and there is everything to be gained from disclosure, whereas nothing is to be gained by disclosure where the government is a buyer.

The hon. gentleman objected to the responsibilities imposed upon the minister. At that stage I thought he was making a speech in favour of bureaucracy, for he seemed to object to the minister setting the policy of the corporation, and to the provision that all transactions should be made either by direction of the minister or with his approval. The latter, of course, is parliamentary responsibility. A corporation cannot be responsible to parliament; there is no machinery for that, except through a minister of the crown. Under this bill the minister must keep himself advised of all major transactions and must direct the selling policy of the corporation. The minister sits in parliament and is subject to questioning by parliament. Under the terms of this bill he can never fall back on the answer that the corporation is not directly answerable to parliament through him. I believe that is made clear in the bill, and I think those who read the bill will agree that is does not set out to establish a bureaucracy. Then my hon. friend said that the bill followed the United States practice, but I think he has the sequence wrong there.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: I never made any such statement.

Mr. HOWE: I understood the hon. gentleman to say that this bill followed the United States practice.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: I never did; it is quite a different thing.

Mr. HOWE: Then I will simply say that the Canadian practice was established before the United States practice. Those responsible in the United States visited Canada and discussed with us the system that had been established here. We felt rather complimented when the practice established in the United States followed so closely the practice that had been established in Canada previously.

Then the hon. gentleman denounced the bill as another example of bureaucracy. As I said before, the bill is drafted with the thought that bureaucracy will not be in control. A great many technical problems are involved in handling the multiplicity of items that will be included in the requirements surplus to the needs of the Canadian government, and the purpose of the corporation is to combine a number of talents and experiences in the directorate of the corporation, which will be a guiding force to the corporation and the minister in working out the various problems involved. The personnel of the corporation covers a wide field of activity, including labour, farming, merchandising, real estate, mining and a number of special types of knowledge. We believe that gathering together experienced men as directors of the corporation and giving them responsibility under the minister will ensure that the best possible advice will be brought to bear on the problems that will confront the corporation. The hon. gentleman suggested that a representative of the Department of Justice should be added to the board. Certainly we would have no objection to that, but the Department of Justice drafted the bill, and I am sure that if they felt they should be represented on the board, provision would have been made accordingly. The corporation will retain legal counsel, possibly an officer of the Department of Justice or possibly private counsel, and will take such precautions as are common with business men to make sure that its transactions comply with all legal requirements. I see no reason why the bill should not be passed. It has been thoroughly considered and discussed in this committee, and I think the consensus is that it is well designed to carry out its purpose.

Mr. MacNICOL: Has the United States liquidating agency finally been set up, with all powers and regulations?

Mr. HOWE: I am not sure whether the legislation has been finally approved. The agency is functioning now; Mr. Will Clayton occupies the position in the United States that Mr. J. B. Carswell holds in Canada.

Mr. MacNICOL: And they are in conference occasionally?

Mr. HOWE: Yes; but I cannot say whether or not the legislation in the United States is complete.

Mr. MacNICOL: Then the minister would not know whether the regulations of the United States liquidating agency call for the submission to congress of the accounts and all the various acts of liquidation?

Mr. HOWE: I cannot say as to that. The term "all transactions" is rather difficult to follow. There would be a great many buyers of these materials, probably many thousands of buyers, and I cannot say just what break-down would be required to give a statement of all transactions. If a lot of goods, such as blankets, for example, were sold to a great many buyers, I do not know whether the report of each individual transaction would be important. If they were all sold at the same price I presume one report of the transaction would be sufficient. I hardly think we can be more specific than the statement in the bill, which will bring about the desired result.

Mr. MacNICOL: I have not looked at any particular section of the bill in reference to this question, but does it contain provision for submitting to parliament all the transactions carried on by the corporation we propose to set up?

Mr. HOWE: It calls for a report to parliament in such form as the minister may prescribe, and it would be my thought that this would be a complete report; perhaps not of every individual transaction, but certainly a report showing the nature of every transaction.

Mr. MacNICOL: In the report of the meeting of the United States chamber of commerce at Washington in 1943, the statement in reference to a United States liquidating agency contains this sentence:

> This liquidation agency should be placed in operation as soon as possible, and should be accountable to congress. Only in this way will there be sufficient precaution against repetition of mistakes made after world war one.

I am inclined to agree with that statement. That is one provision in our legislation which I do not like; the minister has overwhelming control, and apparently under the bill a report to him would be sufficient. That does not seem to be in line with the consensus of the United States chamber of commerce, which asked that the liquidating agency should be accountable to congress.

Mr. HOWE: The report to the minister, to be tabled in parliament, is a report to parliament, so far as I know. I know of no other machinery for making a report to parliament.

Mr. FRASER (Peterborough West): The minister mentioned the sale of blankets to a number of firms. Would it not be the intention of this corporation to sell to as many people as possible, instead of to one or two individuals?

Mr. HOWE: Yes.

Mr. HANSELL: With respect to this section, which deals with the annual report to parliament, it appears to me that this is the usual section which one finds in legislation of this kind. So far as I am concerned, I do not think it amounts to very much. The procedure is that a report is placed upon the table of parliament by the minister responsible. The fact of the matter is, however, that the report is never opened for discussion, unless at some future time an opportunity may be afforded when some other item is under discussion.

We have a number of government corporations or institutions. Sometimes they are called arms of government. Sometimes they are described as government corporations, and sometimes as institutions. These various institutions make reports to parliament, and have in their acts sections such as the one now before us. The Canadian National Railways is a government organization, and reports to parliament. Its report is placed upon the table of the house. In respect of that institution a special committee of parliament scrutinizes very carefully its operations.

Then we have the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation, another government institution. While there is no standing committee on radio broadcasting, radio has grown to a place in Canadian life where it has been found advisable to have a special committee to deal with the annual report of that corporation.

We have another institution known as the Bank of Canada, which lays its reports upon the table, through the appropriate minister. But when is that report discussed by parliament? It is never discussed. It is all very well for the minister to say, "There is an opportunity to discuss it when the budget is under consideration." I say we cannot scrutinize a report in that way. I mention the report of the Bank of Canada, because I believe the same thing would happen under the section now before us. When was the last report of the Bank of Canada scrutinized by parliament? It has not been scrutinized.

Here is another government corporation about to be set up. Its report will be made through the appropriate minister. I agree with the hon. member for Lake Centre that the report should contain everything possible in respect of the company's operations. Even if it does that, still I say the provision is not wide enough. Parliament will not be able to scrutinize the report. True, one may put a few questions on the order paper; but that is not discussing a report.

I say that the only sensible way to do this is to have a special committee of parliament charged with the responsibility of scrutinizing the annual report of this company. If we wish to include further terms of reference, and permit the committee to look after several such corporations, all well and good. But to my mind that is the only way it can be done.

The standing committee would make its report to parliament on the basis of its findings. Concurrence would be moved, and a discussion could take place. To my mind that is the only sensible procedure. I do not know that a provision of that kind could be put in this legislation, or that we could add anything to this section which would set up a committee. I suggest, however, that the government should bring down the appropriate legislation having for its purpose the setting up of a standing committee for the purpose of scrutinizing the activities of corporations of this kind. That would be my suggestion for the solution of this matter.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: There was one question the minister did not meet when he replied to me, namely, whether he would consent to an amendment to section 18 whereby parliament would be assured of full information. At the present time, as the section now stands, parliament is not assured of that degree of information to which it is entitled. War Assets Corporation is to be the greatest corporation in Canada, administering property of the people of Canada to a value of four billions of dollars. The people expect us to assure them of something more than is provided for under section 10 (6), which states that the corporation shall be responsible to, and be subject to the direction and control of the minister. It must be made responsible to parliament.

What is the position under the section as it is now drafted? The corporation set up by parliament, and appointed and directed by the minister, shall submit an annual report to the minister in such form as he may prescribe. Let us suppose that the corporation might render a report condemnatory of certain proceedings, or a report which contained information which the minister might feel might not wisely be brought before parliament and the country. Would parliament receive that report? It would not, if the section remains as it now is; because the report which comes before parliament from the corporation set up by the minister, and responsible to him, will contain only those things which the minister himself prescribes.

Human nature being what it is, one can well understand that the prescription would not consist in having placed before parliament and the country such information as the minister might feel might not be in the interests of either himself or the department presided over by him.

I asked the minister the simple question as to whether he would consent to an amendment which would assure parliament and the country of full information and that the minister did not answer. He said that the design and purpose of this bill was to assure that bureaucracy should not be in control. Bureaucracy is in control when its actions are not subject to the direct control and scrutiny of parliament. I therefore move:

That all the words after "report" in line 36 of section 18 be struck out and the following substituted therefor:

"to parliament which shall contain full particulars of each sale, disposal or other transaction completed by the said corporation and that said report shall forthwith be referred to the public accounts committee."

The section would then read:

The corporation shall, as soon as possible after the thirty-first day of March in each year, and in any event within three months thereof, submit an annual report to parliament which shall contain full particulars of each sale, disposal or other transaction completed by the said corporation and that said report shall forthwith be referred to the public accounts committee.

Mr. HOWE: There is some objection to the form of the amendment. All boards report to the minister and through the minister to parliament, as is provided in this bill. It is not customary for a board to by-pass the minister and report direct to parliament. Committees of both houses sometimes do that, but it is not customary for a board to handle business in that way. It is suggested that the report be referred to the public accounts committee, but the purpose traditionally of that committee is to investigate wrongdoing.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): No.

Mr. HOWE: That would be practically placing an open charge.

Mr. GRAYDON: I think the minister will recall that last year I asked that the public accounts and the auditor general's report should be submitted automatically each year to the public accounts committee. That suggestion was accepted by the Prime Minister and the report and the public accounts were submitted to the committee. This year the Prime Minister, acting on behalf of the government, referred the auditor general's report and the public accounts of Canada to the committee and suggested that from now on that would be done automatically. There was no suggestion of making charges of wrongdoing. The minister will find that the public accounts committee has met from time to time to go over the auditor general's report and the public accounts.

Mr. HOWE: It is true that the public accounts committee examines the auditor general's report and the public accounts. When this report is presented to parliament, any member may move that it be referred to any standing or special committee. I am anxious to meet the wishes of hon. members in any reasonable suggestions they may make, and I have written down the amendment I would suggest. It reads:

That all the words after the word "thereof" in the third last line of the section shall be deleted and the following substituted therefor:

"submit an annual report to the minister in such form as the auditor general may prescribe, containing in reasonable detail particulars of surplus crown assets, sold or otherwise disposed of during the accounting period, and the minister shall lay the said report before parliament."

Mr. GRAYDON: Has the minister the opinion of the Department of Justice on the form of the amendment?

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): That is a very innocuous amendment.

Mr. HOWE: My hon. friend is all for parliament and against the minister having responsibility. That is a new kind of British administration. He wants to change the entire British parliamentary practice in this particular bill.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I think I know as much about parliamentary practice as the minister. We ought to have the balance sheets.

Mr. HOWE: The report would give the balance sheets.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: Does the minister intend that the section will still retain the words "and the minister shall lay the said report before parliament"?

Mr. HOWE: Oh, yes, I intended that.

At six o'clock the committee took recess.

After Recess

The committee resumed at eight o'clock.

The CHAIRMAN: I understand that the parliamentary assistant has a subamendment to move to the amendment of the hon. member for Lake Centre.

Mr. CHEVRIER: I have given some thought during the recess to the amendment moved by the hon. member for Lake Centre, and my contention is that the amendment, in the last part thereof, is out of order. The amendment as I have it would strike out in line 36, section 18, certain words and substitute therefor the following:

. . . submit an annual report to parliament which shall contain full particulars of each sale, disposal or other transaction completed by the said corporation and that said report shall forthwith be referred to the public accounts committee.

It is the latter part of the amendment which, I submit, is not in order.

Mr. MacNICOL: What part?

Mr. CHEVRIER: That part which would refer it to the public accounts committee. My authority for that is citation 679 of Beauchesne, third edition, clause (a), which reads:

Amendments are out of order if they are
(a) irrelevant to the bill, or beyond its scope, governed by or dependent upon amendments already negatived.

I submit, Mr. Chairman, that while the first part of this amendment is in order, the latter part offends against the words in citation 679, "beyond its scope." It is the practice in this house at the beginning of each session to set up standing committees and by special motion to set up the public accounts committee, to which are referred by this house certain matters from time to time; and to include in a motion amending a section of a bill that the latter be referred to the public accounts committee is, I submit, not in order.

I wish at the same time to refer to citation 528 of Beauchesne, third edition, the fourth and fifth paragraphs, which read as follows:

The motion for the appointment of the special committee to prepare the lists of the standing committees is made as soon as the speech from the throne has been reported by the Speaker on the return of the house from the senate.

This committee reports the selection of the standing committees without delay and the report is generally adopted immediately after its presentation.

This is the relevant portion of the citation:

It is then moved that the said standing committees be severally empowered to examine and enquire into all such matters and things as may be referred to them by the house, and to report from time to time their observations and opinions thereon with power to send for persons, papers and records.

If we were to include the latter part of the hon. gentleman's amendment, I submit, with deference, that this house would be tying the hands of any future parliament or session of parliament with reference to this particular report. On the construction of citation 679, read concurrently with citation 528, I submit that the latter part of this amendment is out of order.

[The Chairman.]

Mr. GRAYDON: I have listened with some degree of intentness to the argument which has been advanced by the parliamentary assistant to the minister, but for reasons which I shall now attempt to describe, I have not been greatly impressed with it. First, he speaks of the tying of another parliament's hands. If this were to be accepted as a logical argument, of course it could be applied to any single item of the bill which is now under discussion. No parliament is bound by the decisions of a previous parliament, because legislation passed by one parliament may be, and frequently is, amended by another. The point raised by the parliamentary assistant seems to me an ingenious method of attempting to rule out an amendment which has as its aim to give parliament some supervision and some powers of inquiry and investigation with resepct to the matters under review.

The difficulty which most hon. members, I think, find in section 18 as it stands is that the report is almost entirely in the hands of the minister, and that of course is what the hon. member for Lake Centre is attempting to obviate. In order that members of the committee may refresh their memory of the wording of the section, I will read it:

The corporation shall, as soon as possible after the thirty-first day of March in each year, and in any event within three months thereof, submit an annual report to the minister in such form as he may prescribe—

I ask the committee to consider carefully the purport and ramifications of the words "in such form as he may prescribe".

—and the minister shall lay the said report before parliament.

That section as drawn is capable of interpretations which, I believe, would render null and void the effect which this parliament desires to give to the corporation and to the report, because if the minister is to prescribe the kind of report which is to be made to him, the question arises as to what is the use of making a report to the minister in that form.

As the hon. member for Lake Centre very properly pointed out, we are not dealing just with this minister. This ministry is a continuing thing, and this minister may not be the minister—as has been pointed out, probably will not be the minister—by whom the report will be presented to parliament. For that reason the section should be strengthened to give protection to parliament and the public, because as the section now stands there is nothing to prevent the minister from prescribing any kind of report he likes. It might contain only three or four paragraphs; it might give little or no particulars; and with these possibilities in mind we should not give the minister the powers which are here provided.

Mr. CHEVRIER: May I interrupt the hon. member for a moment? He is, of course, aware that before the committee rose at six o'clock the minister suggested that he was prepared to amend that portion of the latter part of section 18 so that the auditor general might prescribe further details of sales made by the corporation.

Mr. GRAYDON: The parliamentary assistant has not yet made it clear to us whether he intends to move such an amendment.

Mr. CHEVRIER: Yes, I intend to move this amendment after the amendment of the hon. member for Lake Centre has been disposed of. But my contention is that the latter part of the hon. member's amendment is not consistent with the bill and is out of order. However, so that there will be no misunderstanding, it is my intention to move this amendment, a copy of which I shall be glad to let my hon. friend see.

Mr. GRAYDON: Perhaps the parliamentary assistant would give the terms of the amendment now before moving it so that we might be in a position to know just where we stand in the matter.

Mr. CHEVRIER: I think the committee should dispose of the hon. gentleman's amendment first.

Mr. GRAYDON: I have no objection to the parlimentary assistant taking that position, but he cannot have it both ways. I am asking him a question with respect to the only clause that is now before the committee. I do not know what he proposes apart from the suggestion that was thrown out by the minister before six o'clock, which the parliamentary assistant and he both said would be considered in the meantime.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): If the parliamentary assistant will read the suggested amendment perhaps the hon. member for Lake Centre (Mr. Diefenbaker) may be disposed to accept it.

Mr. GRAYDON: I suggest that he read it.

Mr. CHEVRIER: The amendment I have would read:

That section 18 be amended by striking out the words:

"submit an annual report to the minister in such form as he may prescribe and the minister shall lay the said report before parliament", appearing in the last three lines thereof and by substituting in place thereof:

"submit an annual report to the minister in such form as the auditor general may prescribe, containing in reasonable detail particulars of surplus crown assets, sold or otherwise disposed of during the accounting period, and the minister shall lay the said report before parliament.

That is in exactly the same words as the minister read to the committee before the six o'clock recess.

Mr. GRAYDON: Is there any objection to the inclusion of the further protection that the report shall be referred to a parliamentary committee. Listening to my hon. friend's argument a moment ago, I was not able to see his point with regard to reference to a parliamentary committee. I know of no reason why this cannot be done. The citations he gave were not strictly to the point. He took certain parts which he then applied to this question to show that the suggestion was out of order. I was unable to follow that, because I am quite certain that an appropriate standing committee of the house could consider the matter. This parliament has a right, I contend, to submit to another parliament any statute, as we have suggested here.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): I support the point taken by the parliamentary assistant. I suggest that from the point of view of appropriateness, next year you might have an entirely different parliament and a different public accounts committee, and here you are embodying in a statute a direction to have certain matters referred to a committee which is not set up. It is not a committee of this year but will be a committee next year, whatever the parliament, or whatever the public accounts committee at that time may be. The practice of this parliament has always been to have a specific motion to refer specific matters to the public accounts committee or to any other standing committee, and that is the proper procedure. Here by way of amendment in a specific statute it is proposed that something shall be referred to a committee. The house is supreme and it is the house that refers these matters to the public accounts committee. Here is a parliament which is possibly in its last session directing a new parliament in a manner of this kind, directing the public accounts committee of a new parliament in a matter that should be within the supreme authority of that parliament, to have that matter referred to the public accounts committee if it so chooses. As a matter of procedure, it is obvious that it is entirely unnecessary to do as is suggested, because the house is seized of its own powers, and the house next year can take immediate action on the first report submitted by the corporation. By its own supreme judgment the house can then refer reasonable details to the public accounts committee. I am appealing to the common sense of the house and asking hon. members if that is not the proper procedure to adopt.

Mr. GRAYDON: So far as the reference of this matter to the public accounts committee is concerned, our objective ought to be well known to this committee. We do not want to have this report simply lie on the table of the house. Having been once reported to the house—

An hon. MEMBER: That will be the time to deal with it.

Mr. GRAYDON: We know what is happening in connection with many reports, and so does the minister. As the hon. member for Macleod (Mr. Hansell) has well pointed out, these reports simply lie on the table and are never dealt with. For that reason, unless the government so decides—

An hon. MEMBER: Not the government.

Mr. GRAYDON: Well, that is what it amounts to, because the government has a majority of the members behind it and nothing can be done in the House of Commons unless the government supporters agree. The result is that the report may lie on the table and be never investigated. We are trying, however, to incorporate some sort of directive in the bill to ensure that a committee shall have an opportunity of going into the matter. More than that, we do not want to have it dealt with by a committee such as the war expenditures committee, if you like, because if you leave it to that committee, the minister knows what the temptation will be; the whole thing will be sent to the war expenditures committee and I ask hon. members what will happen then. It is for that reason that we desire to see to it that the activities of this corporation shall be submitted to a committee where the light of day will be let in and there will be a public inquiry. That is our objective and that is what we are pressing for. For that reason the amendment was worded as it was.

Mr. HOWE: My hon. friend must have precedents for this action. Can he tell me of one piece of legislation in the whole history of the Canadian parliament that provides that a report shall be automatically submitted to a committee?

Mr. GRAYDON: The minister, with all his constitutional precedents, is a new-found convert to parliamentary procedure, and if he expects that I am going to dig up all the statutes in a few minutes he is proposing something rather onerous. The parliamentary assistant has not taken that attitude. He has pointed out what is the normal course, in his opinion, namely, that the rules prevent this sort of amendment being moved. I must ask the minister not to attempt to put me on the witness stand just yet. If he subpœnas me on some occasion I shall be glad to give evidence.

The CHAIRMAN: On the point of order, this is a bill. It is not like an ordinary resolution. I have listened fairly attentively to the arguments advanced pro and con on the second amendment. The parliamentary assistant (Mr. Chevrier) has referred to citation 679, subsection (a), on page 233 of the third edition of Beauchesne's:

(a) irrelevant to the bill, or beyond its scope. . . .

There is no doubt that the first part of the amendment is relevant to the bill. As to whether it is beyond its scope, the parliamentary assistant made an argument in which he cited paragraph 4 of citation 528 at page 194 of the same edition of Beauchesne. Of course, this being a bill, the committee certainly has a right to make its own amendments, which may eventually become law. In the circumstances I feel that the first amendment is in order. The question is on the amendment moved by the hon. member for Stormont.

Mr. CHEVRIER: No.

Mr. GRAYDON: No.

The CHAIRMAN: There are two amendments.

Mr. CASSELMAN: There is only one before the committee.

Mr. CHEVRIER: There is only one before the committee. At the request of the hon. member for Peel I read an amendment which had been suggested by the minister before the committee rose.

The CHAIRMAN: The question is on the amendment moved by the hon. member for Lake Centre.

Amendment negatived: yeas 21; nays 57.

The CHAIRMAN: There is another amendment before the committee.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Not yet.

Mr. HOWE: My hon. friends opposite were rather insistent on the wording, but I do not know why I should offer the substitute wording. However, we have no objection to doing so.

I move:

That section 18 be amended by striking out the words: "submit an annual report to the minister in such form as he may prescribe, and the minister shall lay the said report before parliament", appearing in the last three lines thereof, and by substituting in place thereof:

"Submit an annual report to the minister in such form as the auditor general may prescribe, containing in reasonable detail particulars of surplus crown assets, sold or otherwise disposed of during the accounting period, and the minister shall lay the said report before parliament."

Section as amended agreed to.

On section 19— Property and assets of War Assets Corporation Limited transferred to corporation.

Mr. MacNICOL: This section reads as follows:

The custody, administration and control of all property and assets belonging to His Majesty. . . .

And so on. If it becomes necessary after the war to dispose of the crown plant at Fort McMurray, will the new control board have complete power to dispose of that plant?

Mr. HOWE: The governor in council has the right to transfer to the corporation any crown asset that is declared surplus to the requirements of the government. My. hon. friend referred to the Abasand company at Fort McMurray?

Mr. MacNICOL: Yes.

Mr. HOWE: The government does not own that plant.

Mr. MacNICOL: Who owns it?

Mr. HOWE: It is owned by the corporation that has always owned it. My hon. friend knows that company very well; perhaps he will tell me the name of it.

Mr. MacNICOL: Now—

Mr. HOWE: The Abasand company.

Mr. MacNICOL: I certainly am at sea as to who does own it. If the minister says that the government does not own it, who owns it? It was taken over wholly from the Abasand company. I am not finding any fault with that at present, but the government has spent a lot of money on it and we may be asked to vote a lot more this year. Who owns it?

Mr. HOWE: The plant was taken over from the Abasand company with the consent of that company in order to permit the government to test out a process. Such changes have been made in the plant as are incidental to the testing out of the process. The test found that the process then in use was not suitable. Improvements have been made in the process, and the volume of the plant has been improved to such an extent as to permit large-sized samples being obtained. That work has been done at government expense. The government is entitled to the products of the operation for a period, and at the end of the period has the option of either buying the plant or returning it to its owners.

Mr. MacNICOL: This new crown company will have nothing to do with the disposal of the Abasand plant?

Mr. HOWE: That is right.

Mr. POULIOT: What legal firm has incorporated that crown company or will incorporate it?

Mr. HOWE: This bill incorporates the crown company and this bill was drawn by the Department of Justice.

Mr. POULIOT: No legal firm in Toronto will incorporate it?

Mr. HOWE: No.

Section 20 agreed to.

On section 21—Civil servants' status preserved under Civil Service Superannuation Act.

Mr. MacNICOL: I should like to ask a question on subsection 3 of section 21. This subsection refers to salaries. I realize that at the present time the War Assets Corporation would have to pay substantial salaries in order to obtain men capable of doing the work that is expected of them. I am not opposed to good salaries; in fact, I am in favour of them. I know a good deal about salaries at the moment. I know they are much higher now than they were before the war or may be after the war in private institutions. May the salaries that are now set for capable men who are to do a good job not be wholly out of line with the range of salaries after the war, or will the salaries now set continue after the war, or will they be subject to revision as salaries fluctuate up or down when the war is over?

Mr. HOWE: The corporation is only being formed now, and there are not many salaried employees. I think all present employees came from other branches of the department and the salaries they are obtaining at the moment are the salaries they obtained in the department. I would remind my hon. friend that salaries as well as wages were frozen in the early stages of the war. They are not by any means excessive to-day.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): This corporation is now being set up and therefore the minister can set any salaries he likes.

Mr. MacNICOL: This is a brand new corporation and has not been in existence heretofore. As I said a while ago, I am not opposed to paying good salaries, but I would not want to see the country seven or eight years from to-day having to pay salaries that may be twice as high as the scale. That may be the situation unless the position following this war will be wholly different from what happened after the last war.

Mr. HOWE: I think we can leave it to the corporation and the government to make sure that the salaries paid are not out of line with the services rendered.

Mr. BURTON: If I understand this section correctly the minister is making provision for certain civil servants who may be taken from other departments to assist in the work of this corporation, and at the same time is leaving the way open for other appointments which will not go through the civil service commission. Is that correct?

Mr. HOWE: This is a corporation the employees of which are not subject to the civil service of Canada. But if an employee is already in the civil service his position is maintained; he is allowed to continue under the pension fund and to enjoy all the privileges of a permanent civil servant. This clause is usually inserted in acts of the kind we are considering this evening.

Section agreed to

On section 22—Execution of deeds, contracts or other documents.

Mr. HAZEN: What is the reason for inserting the words, "other than a grant of land"?

Mr. HOWE: It is a rule of government that land cannot be acquired or disposed of in the name of His Majesty without an order in council.

Mr. HAZEN: Earlier in the section the word "deeds" is used, and usually we associate that word with the conveying of land. What was in mind in inserting the word "deed" in this section?

Mr. HOWE: A deed is any document under seal; I do not think it refers necessarily to land. Land is always transferred by deed, but I believe that other assets as well can be transferred by deed.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: Why are specific powers given to the minister or any one authorized by the minister to execute documents conferring title, in addition to the power which necessarily would rest with the officers of the corporation? What is the reason for giving the minister or anyone designated by him that power in addition to the ordinary powers which the corporation itself would possess?

Mr. HOWE: It may be contingent upon the status of the property being dealt with by the corporation. It is not mandatory to have title pass to the corporation and then from the corporation to the buyer. The title might very well remain in the government while the asset is being disposed of by the corporation, and the asset might pass direct from the government to the buyer.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: That does not explain the situation as far as the minister is concerned. The section reads:

> Either the minister or any person or persons thereunto generally or specifically authorized by the minister or the corporation under its corporate seal and the hands of its duly authorized officers may execute——the documents named. Why is power given the minister to act on behalf of the corporation, of which he is not a member?

Mr. HOWE: Perhaps I should give my hon. friend another illustration. Surplus material might very well be disposed of to China without passing through the hands of the corporation. It might be included in mutual aid to China or to Russia, in which case the minister should have authority to transfer the title.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Is not this the answer, that this is an additional control by the minister in the disposal of the goods?

Mr. HOWE: Yes.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Rightly or wrongly the minister keeps control; even though the corporation itself might be willing to dispose of the property in a given case, if the minister said "no," it could not do so.

Mr. HOWE: Yes; he is responsible to parliament.

Section agreed to on division.

On section 23—Governor in council.

Mr. JOHNSTON (Bow River): I believe this is the section which was indicated by the parliamentary assistant as the one upon which general discussion might take place. I wish to say a few words on this section, in view of several letters I have received, some of them by air mail, since the first statement was made in regard to the disposal of these assets. I thought the minister made the point quite clear when he said, as reported at page 3728 of Hansard:

> The purpose will be to sell the goods as directly as possible from the government to the ultimate consumer. As a matter of practical administration there may be commissions given to a group of dealers, but there would be no outright sale to dealers for re-sale at any price the dealer likes to charge to the ultimate consumer. The purpose is to work directly from the government to the ultimate consumer.

I take it that the minister meant that there would be no direct sales from this corporation to individuals; that the corporation would sell through dealers but at controlled prices. Would that be the purpose of it?

Mr. HOWE: Yes. I think it is hardly correct to say that there would be no sales direct from the corporation to the consumer. In connection with certain types of articles such sales would take place, but in connection with consumer goods probably it would be necessary to use dealers to obtain proper distribution. For example, we were considering a large consignment of safety razors surplus to requirements. Obviously safety razors could hardly be sold by the corporation direct to consumers; the logical way would be to place them in the hands of distributors, but to have the selling price to the consumer and the margin to the dealer agreed upon. That type of selling will be an important feature in certain lines. On the other hand sales of scrap have already been made direct from the corporation to the user; that is, to the primary producer of steel.

Mr. JOHNSTON (Bow River): I think there is a little confusion in the public mind, probably owing to a press report which appeared in this connection.

Mr. HOWE: Yes, the press report is not a correct interpretation.

Mr. JOHNSTON (Bow River): I believe that gave people a wrong understanding. The report says:

> Sell War Assets to Consumers as Far as Possible.
> Surplus war assets will be sold directly from the government to the ultimate consumer as far as possible and not through intermediate contractors or dealers. . . .

Shortly after that statement came out, I had three letters from municipalities in Alberta in regard to this matter. I dealt with it in part the other day, when I was speaking about the disposal of these surplus crown assets. There is a good deal of concern among the municipalities in regard to the disposal of some of these crown assets. That is especially true in regard to those municipalities, which I think would include most of them, who have contributed generously to the war needs of the government by turning over municipal machinery for use in the construction of airports, by turning over buildings to be used as hospitals, and by giving services in many ways completely gratis to the government. They figure that now they should be entitled to obtain some of these war assets which would be useful to them on a lend-lease basis, or under some other satisfactory arrangement. In these letters they point out that, having made these contributions to the war effort, as local self-governments, they should be given first consideration when it comes time to dispose of buildings within their jurisdiction, perhaps hospitals or storage buildings or air training buildings, or perhaps road machinery which a municipality might find useful. They are greatly concerned about this, and I think now would be the time for the minister to give the municipalities some further assurance that the local governments will be given first claim on any machinery or property under the control of this corporation which is now being set up. The property could be transferred on a lend-lease basis or under some other arrangement whereby the municipalities would get satisfactory possession.

Mr. HOWE: I think I covered the subject completely in an earlier discussion. I can say again that it is the purpose of the government to give priority to other governments. For instance, the first claim on material of use to a province would be the provincial claim, and the second would be the municipal claim. Priorities would be given as recommended by the committee, which is a feature of this bill. It is not the purpose of the corporation to give away anything. Its purpose is to dispose of government property in the interests of the people of Canada as a whole, and the only possible procedure is to place a price on the property or equipment and to give priorities where priorities are due, but to sell at one price to all. My hon. friend will appreciate that if the policy were to give materials to provinces, then to cities and then to others, the list of those willing to receive the materials or equipment without cost would be limitless and the distribution would hardly be in the interests of Canada. Governments of provinces and municipal governments have always paid for their equipment; they are well able to pay for it, and I think all that they can reasonably expect is that they be given first choice when the equipment goes on the market.

Mr. JOHNSTON (Bow River): I thank the minister for his very fair statement. The minister mentioned that it was not the purpose to give away any of this property, but according to section 12 of the bill the corporation may

(a) sell, exchange, lease, lend—

That pretty well covers everything but it goes on to say:

—or otherwise dispose of.

There might be cases where certain equipment would be given away. The corporation, for instance, might see fit to give certain buildings or other properties to local governments.

Mr. HOWE: The only circumstances I can think of which would warrant the giving away of anything would be a disaster of some kind, say a flood in a certain area. Then the government might help out by sending away certain materials as a gift. Or the circumstances in a devastated area might warrant a gift from the government. But the usual practice will not be to give material or equipment away.

Mr. JOHNSTON (Bow River): Would not the words: "or otherwise dispose of" cover such a case?

Mr. HOWE: I dare say they would.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: I should like to ask the minister a question under this section 22.

The CHAIRMAN: We are on section 23.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): We have not passed section 22.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Yes.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): It may have been declared carried, but that is all.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: The question I have in mind is this. As I read the bill, powers are conferred on the Minister of Munitions and Supply giving him the right to do as he pleases, regardless of what the corporation wishes or decides to do. I read first section 10, subsection 6:

The corporation shall be responsible to, and be subject to the direction and control of, the minister.

Then section 22 says that the minister, without regard to the corporation, may execute on behalf of His Majesty any deed, contract or document transferring title to any surplus crown assets other than a grant of land, and whenever such document has been so executed it is valid and binding upon His Majesty.

As I read those two sections they confer on the minister the right to dispose of any of the property of the War Assets Corporation without regard to the members of that corporation. If, for instance, the corporation wishes or decides to dispose of certain property to party "A" and the minister does not agree and says that the property should go to party "B", he may not only overrule the corporation set up by this parliament but proceed without regard to the officers of the corporation to execute the necessary documents giving title to the party chosen by himself. I think, with all due respect to the minister, that is conferring a power upon him never before conferred upon any minister in this or any other country. It gives him the absolute right to decide, regardless of the corporation, on the disposal of billions of dollars worth of assets. If that is the meaning, and I can see no other meaning, I think some limitation should be placed upon such absolute power.

When you read the bill generally you see that the corporation is given certain powers, but then when you read section 22 you find that the minister has the absolute and final say, regardless of the wishes of the corporation set up by this parliament. He may himself determine, without control and untrammeled the disposal of these assets. I do not know why such powers must of necessity be conferred upon the minister. It is a tremendous power to place in the hands of any one man. Not only is it tremendous in its implications, but when one considers the assets to be disposed of one realizes that it makes the Minister of Munitions and Supply more powerful than any other minister in any representative government has ever been. I submit, Mr. Chairman, that better reasons than have been given should be given why this power, unlimited in extent and uncontrolled by the corporation, should be conferred upon the minister. If we confer such absolute power on the minister of any representative government we cannot complain in this parliament afterwards if the powers are exercised in a way that we did not expect. I submit that such unlimited power ought not to be conferred upon a minister.

Mr. HOWE: My hon. friend is fair, because first he denounces bureaucracy and then he denounces ministerial control. He made quite a speech against bureaucracy, against giving the corporation complete authority. Now he denounces ministerial control, which is undoubtedly preserved by these provisions, and I think, rightly so. The powers of the minister are only exercisable with the approval of the government of which he is a member. If my hon. friend will read the bill carefully he will see that no assets of more than $15,000 can be turned over for disposal without an order in council, and the order in council specifies the means by which disposal shall be effected. The government must have the authority. If my hon. friend and I cannot agree on that, we have totally different conceptions of what parliamentary responsibility means.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: We have. That is true.

Mr. HANSON: (York-Sunbury): I wonder if this is the position. On reading the bill one would assume at first blush that the government was setting up a corporation and then allocating to it the duty of disposing of surplus assets. When one gets down to cases and specific instances one finds that this corporation is merely a selling agency, that there is an overpowering veto in the hands of the minister who, notwithstanding any recommendation of the corporation, may say, "No, you must not do that; you must do thus and so."

I do not understand why the minister desires to delegate authority, on the one hand, and pull it back, on the other. It may be that he visualizes situations arising where it may be necessary to do that, but if he has a company officered by outstanding business men in whom he has confidence, why should he not allow those men to proceed, once an order in council has been passed, in the case of surplus assets exceeding $15,000, and without an order in council, where they are under that limit? If those men are of the proper type, why not give them free scope to go ahead? I am not going to raise a row about the matter, but on the theories that I have advanced it is simply giving with the one hand and withholding with the other.

I would suppose that it would be better to have the disposition of these goods in the hands of men who are not influenced by any ulterior consideration such as might be imposed upon the minister by his followers or what-not. We know how those things happen. I just wish the minister would go a little farther than he has and state whether or not I have correctly visualized the position, that on the one hand he is designating an agent and on the other he is keeping control over what they will do. They may just as well be considered as factors. That is all they would be as long as the minister keeps his hand on the situation.

I should like to call the attention of the minister to section 23 which contains some of the most extraordinary provisions I have ever seen in a statute of this kind. It states:

> The governor in council may:
> (a) make such orders as he may deem necessary or desirable with reference to the organization, administration or management of the committee or corporation and to confer on the committee or corporation additional powers and duties.

I gather that those are in addition to the powers conferred by the bill itself. What is contemplated by paragraph (a) of section 23? What additional powers and duties are to be conferred on the committee or corporation? The next paragraph reads:

> (b) make or issue such orders, rules and regulations as may be deemed necessary or desirable to assist the minister to exercise and perform the duties conferred or imposed upon him by or pursuant to this act.

If you read it apart from the limiting clause the corporation can do anything. It looks to me as being redundant. The draftsman of this bill must have had something in mind and I am going to ask the minister to tell us frankly why those two clauses are interpolated at the tail end of this bill.

Has the minister given any consideration to the suggestion I made on the second reading that the net proceeds from the disposition of these surplus assets shall be devoted only to the reduction of the national debt? For the most part these goods have been bought and paid for with borrowings which have been added to the public debt, and the proceeds should not go into consolidated revenue fund. I think that is a basic financial principle which the minister will at once recognize and accede to, but there is nothing in this bill to cover that.

Mr. HOWE: In reply to the first point raised by my hon. friend may I say that in my opinion there is nothing worse than authority without responsibility, or the reverse, responsibility without authority. Since the minister must necessarily retain the responsibility for all the acts of the corporation, he should not divorce himself of all authority, particularly the authority of veto. The purpose of the corporation is to gather together men possessing information and experience which no minister could have, to guide the minister in the proper administration and sale of these assets. I think that purpose will be served with the bill as it is drawn to-day.

My hon. friend is inquiring as to what additional authority will be required. Section 12 of the bill gives the corporation powers which are considered to be adequate, but this bill is providing for work of a type which has never been previously undertaken by a crown corporation, and it has been thought well to give the governor in council authority to confer additional powers on the corporation if experience proves that they are required.

The third matter raised is as to how the funds recovered from the sale of the assets will be used. Under this bill the minister is to pay these funds into the consolidated revenue fund. It will be a matter for the Minister of Finance of the day, or the government of the day, to determine how the funds so realized will be used. I do not think my hon. friend can expect the minister designated to administer this measure to decide how the funds shall be used.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I would not suggest that, but I suggest that parliament should now give him a lead. We should put in the bill the provision that that is to be done. I think it would be bad for public financing if the net proceeds from the sales of these surplus assets, either through the agency of the corporation or through the activities of the minister, were to be allowed to go into consolidated revenue fund and then be paid out for any purpose which parliament might subsequently vote. These moneys have been borrowed and interest is being paid thereon. The public debt has been increased. These are capital assets in the true sense of the word, having regard to their origin. The proceeds of the sale of these capital assets should be earmarked for debt reduction and I challenge anybody to contradict the soundness of that theory.

An hon. MEMBER: Move an amendment.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I do not intend to move an amendment.

Mr. HOWE: I do not intend to quarrel with my hon. friend, but I would point out that these assets were created, partly from the proceeds of borrowings and partly from the proceeds of taxation. I agree wholly with the principle he suggests, that the funds obtained from the sale of these assets should be considered as capital, and used for debt reduction. I sincerely hope that that will be the case, but I could not take the responsibility of directing the Minister of Finance in the use of these funds.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Was that position considered in drafting the bill? Did the question arise? I think if it did arise, the minister who now agrees thoroughly with the principle I am trying to contend for, would have had it put in the bill. I think it ought to be mandatory. I am not going to move an amendment because I believe I have done my duty when I point out what I consider a lack of policy in the bill. Having regard to the statement he has just made to me, that he considers the point I have made well taken, I think the minister ought to put it in the bill and not leave it for some future Minister of Finance to determine. Such a minister may need money and this money may be switched to purposes other than those of debt reduction.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: In connection with the point just raised by the hon. member for York-Sunbury may I say that I believe the course being followed in the United States, at least the one recommended in the Baruch report, is that the proceeds from the sales of war assets shall be applied to the reduction of the national debt.

When I suggested to the minister that he was being given limited authority he said that I had lost sight of the fact that in the case of the disposal of assets over $15,000 the approval of the governor in council is necessary. I wish to ask him, where there is any such provision in this bill to that effect? I have not been able to find it; but the minister states that his power is limited, and I can see no provision in the bill before me which makes any reference to the fact that such a limitation is in effect.

Mr. HOWE: My hon. friend will find that the authority for transferring property to the corporation is in the minister with the approval of the governor in council, which involves the obtaining of an order in council. As a matter of practice the same method is followed in the sale of property as is followed in the purchase of property; transactions under $15,000 do not require an order in council in either case. That is simply an administrative arrangement, and can be changed by subsequent governments if they so desire.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): What the minister is saying is that it is a practice which has grown up and has the sanctity of custom; that is all it is.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: The minister has now admitted in effect that there is no legal control on the disposal by himself of property over $15,000. There was a control until recently under order in council P.C. 4013, which had reference to War Assets Corporation Limited, and it provided in that order in council that no consignment or transfer of surplus materials or articles having a value as estimated by the Minister of Munitions and Supply in excess of $15,000 should be made without the prior authorization or approval of the governor in council. No such order in council is now in effect, and there is no limitation on the minister, for by section 19, subsection 3, the charter of War Assets Corporation Limited is cancelled and the company is dissolved. Therefore, Mr. Chairman, I wish to ascertain from the minister where there is to-day any control on his absolute power of disposal. A while ago he answered me that I had not read the bill. I have read it, and there is no reference to any such provision. Now he says that it is the custom that no disposal shall be made or any purchase be made over $15,000 without an order in council. That is not enough. Under this bill as constituted we give the minister absolute control, regardless of amount, to dispose of these assets. If it were felt necessary in March, 1944, to set up a control by order in council to restrict the minister, now that we are passing a statute in the place of the order in council I ask the minister whether he will accept or will suggest an amendment whereby he will be controlled against the disposal of assets in excess of $15,000. If that is not incorporated in the statute, unlimited power is given to the minister. That is the point I made a while ago, and now it appears that the point was well taken.

I suggest to the minister that there must be that limitation; otherwise parliament is conferring rights upon him such as were never before conferred on any minister—absolute power to dispose as he pleases, regardless of the corporation, which he controls. He may even go to the point where he can dispose of assets and afterwards ask the corporation to approve his act, and the corporation, being under his control, must do so.

Mr. HOWE: I was trained as an engineer, but it seems to me that since I came to Ottawa I spend a great part of my time in explaining the law to lawyers. If the hon. member will look at section 9 of the bill he will see that the section outlines the ministerial power. The clause begins:

> With specific or general authority from the governor in council, the minister may. . . .

Then there is a list of the things the minister may do. My hon. friend will note the preamble; the minister must obtain "specific or general authority from the governor in council." As the situation stands at the moment, he has general authority for transactions under $15,000, but he must obtain specific authority for transactions above that figure.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: What is the order in council which makes provision for that?

Mr. HOWE: The order in council which my hon. friend held in his hand a few minutes ago makes provision for the general authority. The specific authority must be obtained as occasion requires.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: No; the general authority is only in so far as War Assets Corporation Limited is concerned and, as I pointed out a while ago, by virtue of section 19, subsection 3, that corporation is no longer in existence.

Mr. HOWE: At the exact moment when War Assets Corporation Limited passes out of existence a new order in council in the same terms will be passed, providing for the new corporation.

Mr. BOUCHER: I might point out to the minister that not only is power left to the minister, but, if he reads section 22, he will see that it is left to "the minister or any person or persons thereunto generally or specifically authorized by the minister." Not only can the minister, I take it, ask War Assets Corporation Limited to do it, but he can, having asked them, do it himself, or he can appoint another person or other persons either specifically or generally to dispose of it. Beyond that how much farther could he go? He has power absolutely to ignore War Assets Corporation Limited and to sell things independently of them or to authorize other persons to do so. There might be some argument why the minister should reserve himself the right to do so, but I cannot see any argument in favour, not only of reserving the right to himself, but also of setting up some other corporation or of giving somebody else specifically or generally the power of disposal.

Mr. MacNICOL: I wish to support the argument advanced by the hon. member for Lake Centre.

Mr. HOWE: What was his argument?

Mr. MacNICOL: It was evident that in his submission to the committee he had made a much more exhaustive inquiry into this bill than any of the rest of us had. I congratulate him upon his zeal and knowledge. I have been thinking over what the minister has said, that an order in council will be passed along the lines of the previous order in council which applied to the present body that will be out of business as soon as this bill is passed, and I have been saying to myself that this new corporation, if I properly understand its set-up, will have to do with the disposal of properties like the Polymer in which the government has invested approximately fifty million dollars, and that is a vast amount of property to dispose of without proposals being submitted to anyone but the minister himself, unless, of course, the order in council to which he referred has already been passed. Why not, as the hon. member for Lake Centre suggested, avoid the trouble of asking for an order in council by incorporating in the bill that the disposal of war assets of a value of over $15,000 must come under the same scrutiny as the disposal of war assets of a value of under $15,000?

Mr. HOWE: It is already provided in the bill that all acts must have specific authority from the governor in council, unless included in the general authority. The general authority covers only small transactions. The general authority is given. It may be varied by governments from time to time; they may wish to cut back to the public works limit of $5,000, or they may wish to go up to the larger limit; that is a matter for the government of the day to determine. The present government has decided that the limit of discretion for the minister should be a transaction of $15,000 and under, but for transactions of over $15,000 the specific authority of council must be obtained.

Mr. MacNICOL: Then why not incorporate it in the bill?

Mr. HOWE: It is in the bill.

Mr. MacNICOL: I understood the minister to say that after the bill is passed the governor in council will pass an order in council to conform with the previous order in council. The hon. member for Lake Centre suggested that that be incorporated in the bill, that such and such would have to take place in connection with a sale of property over $15,000 in value.

Mr. HOWE: The law as now framed requires an order in council for every sale, but makes provision for orders in council general in terms, and an order in council general in terms which was passed with regard to the former corporation provided that the minister had discretion up to transactions totalling not more than $15,000.

The CHAIRMAN: Shall the section carry?

Mr. GRAYDON: On division.

Section agreed to on division.

The CHAIRMAN: Section 24—

[Mr. MacNicol.]

Mr. GRAYDON: Not section 24, Mr. Chairman. I do not think anyone desires to be technical, but some of these sections were passed rather quickly and discussion perhaps was denied because of that. In reference to section 22, discussion did take place and our understanding was that discussion was being held on section 22. It was on that section that the Chairman asked whether it be carried or not and we objected to the carrying of it and called "on division". That was section 22.

Mr. CHEVRIER: The hon. member for Bow River was the first person who spoke on section 23 after section 22 had passed, but the hon. member for York-Sunbury reverted to section 22 and there was no objection from this side. Section 22, however, has unquestionably passed.

Mr. GRAYDON: I have no objection to the section passing, provided that it is designated as passing on division.

Section agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN: Section 25—

Mr. STIRLING: We did not agree to section 24.

The CHAIRMAN: If I may explain, section 22 was carried, and I called section 23—

Mr. GRAYDON: Section 22 was carried on division.

The CHAIRMAN: Yes, on division. When we were discussing section 23, however, the hon. member for Lake Centre stated that he wished to make a statement on section 22 and I asked the committee to revert to that section, so that I did not have to call section 22 again. I called section 23 and declared it carried, and then I called section 24. Does the hon. member wish to revert to section 24? If so, I am satisfied. Section 24—Offence. Shall the section carry?

Some hon. MEMBERS: Carried.

The CHAIRMAN: Shall section 25 carry?

Section agreed to.

Bill reported.

Mr. SPEAKER: When shall the said bill be read a third time?

Mr. HOWE: Now.

Mr. GRAYDON: On division.

Bill read the third time and passed.

AERONAUTICS ACT

CIVIL AVIATION AND COMMERCIAL AIR SERVICES—AIR TRANSPORT BOARD

Hon. J. E. MICHAUD (Minister of Transport) moved the second reading of bill No. 133, to amend the Aeronautics Act.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time, and the house went into committee thereon, Mr. Bradette in the chair.

On section 1—New heading inserted.

Mr. MacNICOL: I wish to speak very briefly on this bill and chiefly with reference to what the minister said in the one or two brief addresses he made on the subject of aviation generally in Canada. As I remember, the import of his remarks was that the present trans-Canada Air Lines are to have priority and full control over air traffic or transport from east to west. Am I right in assuming that? At any rate, that is what I understood, that Trans-Canada Air Lines were to have priority and full control. Here again in this bill, as in the last one, I am afraid we are not following the very best path. In the United States, when war broke out I believe they had twenty-three air lines or more. They had at least that number in operation. Their set-up, I understand, is wholly private.

Mr. HOWE: Canada at the outbreak of war had some fourteen.

Mr. MacNICOL: But they were under the control of the government. I am speaking of absolutely private control.

Mr. HOWE: The government controlled one and the other thirteen were private. I think I am correct in my figures.

Mr. MacNICOL: I know that prior to the war there were a number of private air lines in Canada, but as I read this bill they will be wiped out. Personally, I am in favour of private ownership. It creates competition, and the principle has demonstrated down the years that it results in expansion of business all along the line. The private lines in the United States have done a masterly job. When that country entered the war they were able to provide for war purposes a very large number of thoroughly qualified aviators who had flown back and forth across the continent in passenger and freight movements. They have also done a great job in the war. I fear that if all our private lines are either absorbed or wiped out in Canada, our post-war set-up will not be able to take its place in world affairs in such a manner as it would if we had a private set-up too. My observation has been that businesses carried on by the government are costly to operate. The initiative is not nearly so great in government-operated plants of any kind as it is in privately-controlled enterprise. The United States have been giving a lot of concern to the problem of after the war aviation. The chamber of commerce of that country at a meeting held in Washington in 1943 passed certain resolutions. The one on air transport reads as follows:

> Civil aviation has proved its growing importance in commerce for engineering and scientific purposes and for the national defence.

The reference there being to the fact that when they got into war aviators were available in such numbers that they were able to supplement very greatly the United States war effort.

The quotation continues:

> It should be given all practicable opportunity for further development, and equipment should be made available so far as is consistent with urgent defence requirements.

Then one further paragraph:

> No federal funds should be expended on commercial airports except under plans approved by the commission. Federal aviation funds should be used only for air-navigation and traffic control facilities or other work which meets the test of special national interest in specific cases and on conditions that local interests provide approved landing areas and necessary buildings, and observe proper standards of airport maintenance, zoning and charges.

I read over carefully the United States act of 1939. As far as I can see, that act is designed to assist in every way possible the development of civil aviation under private control. In this bill we are doing just the reverse because our bill gives priority to the T.C.A. I ask myself, how are we to develop private air lines from one end of Canada to the other and north and south across Canada if the T.C.A. is to have such advantage over every other line? That is diametrically opposite to what is being done in the United States. In that country private lines developed through private enterprise to such an extent from 1939 to 1943 that air traffic had arisen to a total of $1,400,000,000 for the latter year. The private companies there are planning to invest hundreds of millions of dollars after the war to develop the United States to take its place in the air picture.

I wish to speak very kindly to the minister. He has given this subject a great deal of thought. I am often amazed at his capacity in so many different lines and along so many different avenues of commerce. But in this case I should have liked to see a wider opportunity for private ownership and private development of air lines in Canada. The minister, in the address he gave on June 6, outlined clearly from his point of view the objects of the present bill. Outside of the present bill being principally in support of government controlled air lines like the T.C.A., it contains much the same regulations as does the United States act. As I see it, the United States act encourages all air lines. Perhaps the minister may say that they have a much larger country in which to develop air traffic because of their great population; but I am convinced that the development of Canada, particularly our large unoccupied areas in the north where air lines will do so much to open up the whole north country, a country filled to overflowing with resources, can be greatly helped by private air lines. This will not be done by the government-owned lines unless they can make a profit out of it. If private enterprise were given the opportunity it would go in and open it up.

I do not wish to hold up the bill; I could not do so if I wanted to. But all over the world every country is giving a great deal of thought to air traffic after the war. I saw a dispatch in the Toronto Globe and Mail of June 14. This dispatch appears under date of London, June 13, and reads as follows:

> Sir Arthur Whitten-Brown, who was navigator of the first direct trans-Atlantic flight with Captain John Alcock, twenty-five years ago, to-day joined the advocates of post-war freedom of the air. At a luncheon commemorating the 1919 flight, he said:
> "We fought in days gone by for freedom of the seas and made it a gift to a somewhat appreciative world. May we hope that freedom of the air may come through peaceful agreement, but that freedom we must have.
> May always our air forces be powerful enough to maintain that freedom in peaceful security from the end of this war onward."

I am not sure whether I understood what the minister said about the control of air lines to and from Canada. I have been wondering what Trans-Canada Air Lines will be able to do in reference to carrying on commerce with Mexico. We shall have to fly over United States territory. The minister may have explained what will be necessary, but I have just forgotten. I doubt if they will be able to fly over the whole expanse, from our boundary to the Mexico boundary without alighting; perhaps they can. If I am wrong, when the minister comes to explain our contact with Mexico or any other South American republic he will set me right. He will tell us whether we have any right to carry on our commerce outside our own country. I should like to know that. Certainly, after the war the passenger and commercial traffic of air lines will be of vital importance to any country and exceptionally vital to Canada. I hope there is nothing in the minister's mind—there is nothing in the bill—that will in any way interfere with that.

When I heard the minister make a speech a short time ago about the position after the war in so far as traffic throughout the world is concerned, I became quite alarmed. I suppose that after the war there will be international meetings to arrange for routes and all other particulars about air traffic that will give Canadian air lines the same free passage in the air that our ships have on the sea to-day. I should think that would be what we would expect. As far as Canada itself is concerned I hope that nothing in this bill will prevent private enterprise from carrying on this work. Take, for instance, Canadian Pacific Railways; that is private enterprise. Are they to be permitted to develop through air routes in every direction? If the minister carries out his plan as I understood him to lay it down when he made his speech, I do not know how the C.P.R. will be able to operate air travel east and west from Montreal to Vancouver or from Halifax to Vancouver and Victoria. If the Canadian Pacific or any other company will not have that right, along with T.C.A., I am afraid the service will suffer. There is nothing like competition. In my experience in business for many years there was nothing like competition to spur the company with which I was associated to turn out the best possible line of goods. If there is not to be competition in air services across Canada I am afraid we shall not have the best service. In my experience competition has created business and made trade.

Mr. HOWE: I should like to make it perfectly clear that this bill does not in any way extend the functions of Trans-Canada Air Lines, nor does it prevent the expansion of private aviation in this country. It does have one effect; it deals with a tendency that has been evident, and that has developed very rapidly during the course of the war, toward the concentration of air service wholly in the hands of Canada's two transcontinental railways. The government entered into the business of air transport in 1936 for the reason that private enterprise was not prepared to go into that field on a scale in keeping with the developments of that day. In going into that field the government made it perfectly clear that it would establish a service from coast to coast which would be non-competitive in character. That provision is contained in the Trans-Canada Air Lines Act, and the bill now being considered does not affect the position of Trans-Canada one way or the other, except in one particular. The act of 1937, I think it was, specified that the ownership of Trans-Canada Air Lines would be in the hands of the Canadian National Railways. That seemed the logical arrangement at the time; but that arrangement has had a tendency to encourage the other competing railroad to acquire all other services in Canada. That is a result which the government believes is not in the best interests of the development of air transport in Canada.

My hon. friend has referred to international aviation and the policy of the government toward aviation generally. The bill does not affect international aviation; it does not attempt to regulate international aviation. The bill expresses the announced policy of the government.

Mr. MacNICOL: Would it not affect international aviation coming into Canada?

Mr. HOWE: No, except that when any air transport line comes into Canada it must conform to Canadian law which will be this bill, when it passes this house. Other than that the position of foreign aircraft lines operating in Canada will not be changed by the provisions of this bill.

Mr. COLDWELL: I was not here when this bill was given second reading, but I do not propose to impose any speech upon the committee because of that fact. I think my colleagues in this party placed our position before the house very well at that time, but I hope the minister is not receding in any way from the position he and the government took earlier in the session. I realize, of course, that this bill does contemplate that there will be not only a national airways system in this country, but that it will leave room for certain other lines to be established. I understand perfectly that the minister is anxious that no monopoly shall be established by a private corporation, and that is why the railways are to divest themselves of the airways plan which they have been following. I think that is wise; in this country, with a population as small as we have, I think we can support only one efficient air line. I would go the whole way and say that except for the small feeder lines, which we might even call taxi lines, the whole of the air transport of this country ought to be under a government organization and a government system. I noticed what the hon. member for Davenport said a few moments ago. I wonder if he would read again the speeches made in this house by the former leader of the Conservative party, Right Hon. R. B. Bennett, when this matter was under discussion some years ago. To my mind it is all very well to talk of private enterprise, but the only transportation that many of our boys had on the Canadian Pacific railway before the war was on the outside of box-cars. I would remind the hon. member, too, that in addition to men being on relief during the depression years the Canadian Pacific Railway Company went on relief to the extent of $60,000,000 without interest.

What I really rose to say is that I think there is something lacking in this bill. Included in the regulations and legislation in both Great Britain and the United States are comprehensive labour codes. We have established what I believe to be very good conditions for our staff on the T.C.A. I believe we have a competent and efficient staff. As one who uses T.C.A. quite often I am amazed at the efficiency, the safety, the comfort and the courtesy one receives on that line. I think it compares very favourably indeed with anything the private companies in the United States can produce: in fact I would go one better and say that I believe the efficiency, speed, courtesy and all the rest of it offered by T.C.A. is superior to anything to be found in the great country to the south. But I point out that both Britain and the United States have included in their legislation and regulations covering aeronautics comprehensive labour codes. As a matter of fact I have here copies of both, which I obtained some little time ago.

Mr. HOWE: Are these in the aeronautics acts of those countries?

Mr. COLDWELL: In section 401 of the civil aeronautics act of 1938 of the United States there will be found this:

(1) Every air carrier shall maintain rates of compensation, maximum hours, and other working conditions and relations of all of its pilots and co-pilots who are engaged in interstate air transportation within the continental United States (not including Alaska) so as to conform with decision numbered 83 made by the national labour board on May 10, 1934, notwithstanding any limitation therein as to the period of its effectiveness.

(2) Every air carrier shall maintain rates of compensation for all of its pilots and co-pilots who are engaged in overseas or foreign air transportation or air transportation wholly within a territory or possession of the United States, the minimum of which shall be not less, upon an annual basis, than the compensation required to be paid under said decision 83 for comparable service to pilots and co-pilots engaged in interstate air transportation within the continental United States (not including Alaska).

(3) Nothing herein contained shall be construed as restricting the right of any such pilots or co-pilots, or other employees, of any such air carrier to obtain by collective bargaining higher rates of compensation or more favourable working conditions or relations.

(4) It shall be a condition upon the holding of a certificate by any air carrier that such carrier shall comply with title II of the railway labour act, as amended.

(5) The term "pilot" as used in this subsection shall mean an employee who is responsible for the manipulation of or who manipulates the flight controls of an aircraft while under way including take-off and landing of such aircraft, and the term "co-pilot" as used in this subsection shall mean an employee any part of whose duty is to assist or relieve the pilot in such manipulation, and who is properly qualified to serve as, and holds a currently effective airman certificate authorizing him to serve as, such pilot or co-pilot.

The British section is slightly different but really to the same effect. Section 18 of statutory rules and orders, 1938, No. 613, made under the navigation act of October, 1936, reads:

It shall be a condition of every licence that the wages, salaries, or other remuneration paid by the holder of a licence to all persons employed in connection with the operation of the services authorized by the licence, or paid to persons employed in connection with the operation of aircraft hired by him for the purposes of those services, and the conditions of their employment shall not be less favourable to them than the wages, salaries or other remuneration which would be payable and the conditions which would have to be observed under a contract which complied with the requirements of any resolution of the House of Commons for the time being in force applicable to contracts with government departments. Provided that if complaint is made to the licensing authority that the above-mentioned condition is not being observed, the licensing authority, if the complaint is not otherwise disposed of, shall request the ministry of labour to seek the advice of the industrial court and the licensing authority shall be guided by the advice of the court in deciding whether the above-mentioned condition is satisfied.

The contracts with the British government lay down certain conditions which must be observed not less favourably by the air transport carriers under the British authority.

It seems to me that we should have in this bill a labour code which would guarantee to those who are engaged in the aeronautical service decent remuneration and proper working conditions. If we are to have private enterprise in this field we should lay down the conditions upon which private enterprise should operate. I believe, of course, that we should have a labour code generally for the various industries in this country. We need a national labour code laying down the minimum satisfactory labour conditions. Here we are starting something which is entirely new in the history of our country, and it seems to me that this is the time when we ought to be legislating to bring about conditions that are desirable in this field. To my mind the bill is defective in that respect.

[Mr. Coldwell.]

There are several features of the bill which I shall discuss when the various clauses come before us. Besides wishing to emphasize what I have already said, I am most anxious to say to the minister that I believe, as the recent Gallup poll showed and as I learn from contacts which I have throughout the country and from conversations which I have had with people with whom I have met quite recently, that the people of this country will view with no favour the granting of permission to establish air transport in this country by private enterprise. We have had enough trouble with our railways. We remember how in the depression years attacks were made upon the railways in this house because of the high expenditures that were made for lines and services that were not being used on account of the depression. To-day, of course, we can be thankful that we have those lines. As I have said once before, the Canadian Pacific Railway Company would give almost anything if the lines which it tore up east of White River had been available for use during this war. Let us not repeat the mistakes of the past. We can have an efficient up-to-date mainline air transport system run efficiently under government authority. No one can say that a government organization cannot operate efficiently after what we know is being done by the T.C.A. I know the minister himself takes a pride in that organization, and I think the establishment of this great service, safe, secure, sound, offering every courtesy and convenience, is one of the worth-while contributions which the minister has made to this country during his tenure of office. I would like to see brought entirely under government control all the long distance air lines in the country, the northwest staging route, the route to Labrador, the routes from Winnipeg, Saskatoon, Edmonton. I believe that the employees would be better off and the public would be better protected if all these lines were under government control.

May I add that when we hear of private enterprise in this particular field, all that private enterprise is doing in this field is running the planes. The air fields, the meteorological service, the teletype, the beacons, the emergency landing fields and all the other facilities are provided by the government. It is just as though we said to the Canadian Pacific Railway Company: We will lay the rails of your system, establish the stations, and do everything else that is required, so that all you will have to do is to put the engines and the cars on the lines, run the trains and collect the revenue. That would be comparable.

Mr. MacNICOL: It is the same way in the United States.

Mr. COLDWELL: I do not care what they do in the United States. I am not worrying about what they do there. I am interested in Canada, and as long as we are interested in Canada let us set up an organization on a sure foundation, without reference to what they are doing in the United States or in any other country.

Mr. MacNICOL: I like to look at what they are doing in all countries.

Mr. COLDWELL: As a matter of fact there is great controversy in Great Britain in regard to this matter, and the point of view expressed by the minister in this house in April is very much the point of view held by a large number of people in Great Britain. I have no doubt that even if people do succeed in setting up privately owned airways in this country and elsewhere it will be only a short time before governments will be compelled to take them over and operate them as great public transportation systems. so that in order to avoid the difficulties which otherwise are bound to arise in the future let us establish now our own publicly owned and publicly operated airways system.

I just want to repeat in conclusion that I wish there were a labour code in this bill.

Mr. HOWE: In regard to what my hon. friend says about a labour code being put in the bill, each country has its own method of handling labour matters. It has not been the practice in Canadian legislation to enact labour codes in bills general in character. For instance, we have no labour code in the Railway Act or in the Transport Act. We have a labour code in this country but it is a separate enactment. I do not think the railroad employees have ever been handicapped because there was no specific labour code in the Railway Act. The railway employees are highly unionized and have been for a great many years. Their labour relations with their employers are perhaps a model for other industries. Similarly the air lines have a collective bargaining agreement with their pilots. All the commercial pilots, I believe, are members of the pilots' association, and the relations between the pilots' association and their employers are happy. The pilots' association has recourse, as all organized labour has, to the duly constituted authorities. In my opinion the addition of a labour code to this bill would neither strengthen the position of the employees nor improve the bill.

Mr. REID: Mr. Chairman, with a great deal of what the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar has said I am in hearty accord, but, after all, there are in this bill certain principles which the members should consider seriously before the bill is passed. My own view regarding the centralization of power at Ottawa is the same as I have expressed on many occasions. Despite the fact that the minister says that under this bill no private company will be debarred from entering into business within a province I cannot help thinking that once the bill becomes operative and the board is set up, it will be given a great deal of power and authority.

We speak of international flying between one country and another. That is quite desirable, but do not let us overlook the fact that under this bill we are putting into the hands of three men the power of making rules and regulations affecting every province. Has it been decided whether the dominion government has power over the air over the provinces? So far as I know, that has not yet been decided. Under this bill the dominion government is to have the say as to what company or individual will be allowed to fly within a province. I think the committee should realize the import of a question of that kind before it passes this measure. Has the dominion government complete control over the air?

Suppose that a man in New Westminster wanted to inaugurate a flight from that city to Victoria or to the northern part of British Columbia. Under this bill he would have to apply to the board at Ottawa. As I said in a speech made in the house not long ago, we from British Columbia have had painful experiences in coming to Ottawa to appear before boards. The provinces are handing over power to the dominion government. We must bear in mind that a lot of the power of the provinces has been filched from them during this war, and I am just wondering if that power is to go back to the provinces. During the last war many of the powers which were filched from the provinces were retained at Ottawa, and I think we had better be careful before giving these powers away to the dominion government.

I am particularly interested in the question of whether the dominion has the right to regulate or prevent the setting up of air lines within a province. We know that in so far as railroad transportation is concerned a railroad may be started within a province, although there have been instances where the dominion, perhaps to get some right on behalf of another railroad, has passed an act of parliament designating such provincial railroad to be for the good of Canada. That is my first question.

The explanatory notes contain the following:

The bill will add a new section to the Aeronautics Act dealing with the powers and duties of the air transport board. The Department of Transport will continue to administer those portions of the Aeronautics Act which deal with civil aviation and do not come within the scope of the board.

What is the scope of the board? I thought this bill was to give the board all power and authority, but apparently there are certain powers left out. They are going to split the power. The Minister of Transport is to have certain powers and the board will have certain powers. That is my second question.

My third question is this: Who is to administer this legislation, the Minister of Munitions and Supply or the Minister of Transport? When I have had answers to these three questions I may have something more to say.

Mr. HOWE: There is no question about jurisdiction over the air. A reference was made, I believe in 1929, to the privy council, in connection with the Aeronautics Act, and it was ruled that the dominion government has complete jurisdiction over the Aeronautics Act and over railways generally. The hon. member asked, who is to administer this legislation? I have explained that on many occasions. This legislation properly belongs under the Department of Transport, but for purposes associated with the war it has been temporarily transferred to the jurisdiction of the Minister of Munitions and Supply under the Transfer of Duties Act. The transfer is temporary and the administration of the measure will be returned to the Department of Transport in the not too distant future.

All civil aviation comes within the scope of the board. Part II comes within the scope of the board; it will be administered by the new board, while certain parts of the bill remain under the direct jurisdiction of the minister.

Mr. FRASER (Peterborough West): I am interested in feeder lines. The city of Peterborough has tried to get an airport but so far we have been unsuccessful. The country around that city is rolling and it is hard to put in an airfield. However, it can be done and I understand that plans are being made to construct an airport after the war. The president of the Toronto transportation commission sent me a letter which I should like to read to the committee. It reads:

June 12, 1944.

Forwarded herewith is copy of a letter which I have written under date of the 9th instant to the Honourable C. D. Howe, Minister of Munitions and Supply, with reference to the air transport bill just introduced in parliament, and its possible effect on the helicopter services which its commission hopes to operate after the war, through its subsidiary, Gray Coach Lines, Limited.

As your constituency is served either directly or indirectly by Gray Coach Lines routes, I thought the foregoing would be of interest to you.

It would be a wonderful thing if we could have a helicopter service to that district. The railway service into our city at the present time is absolutely terrible. If you want to come to Ottawa you must leave at twenty minutes to twelve noon or at 1.45 a.m. To return to Peterborough from Ottawa you must leave Ottawa at 9.20 in the morning to arrive at Peterborough at 5.15 in the afternoon or at 11 p.m. to arrive at Peterborough at 5 p.m., provided that the trains are on time. The letter from the Toronto transportation commission to the Minister of Munitions and Supply is dated June 9, 1944, and reads:

The commission and its subsidiary, Gray Coach Lines, Limited, are owned by the people of Toronto and in addition to operating practically all the local transportation in and about the city they own and operate the largest interurban motor coach operation in Canada.

It is becoming increasingly apparent that the helicopter will shortly become a practical instrument for local air passenger transportation. It is also obvious that existing air passenger travel is not suitable for or equipped to supply local passenger demands. Indeed, the trend is the reverse, its goal being longer trips at faster speeds. Unless completely unforeseen developments arise, this involves longer runways and the maintenance of airports a substantial distance from the centre of the cities served. Obviously this situation makes no appeal to local passenger demand, nor is it likely that it would be commercially feasible for an air line to mix local passengers with its long distance passengers, even if it were willing to accept them and detract from the advantages of its service by making the local stops required.

It therefore follows that the helicopter and the aeroplane will not compete but will serve a totally different constituency. As far as the helicopter is concerned its constituency is almost exactly coterminous with that of the existing motor coach, but its advent will give motor coach patrons a choice of modes of travel and in many cases a quicker, more convenient, and possibly equally inexpensive service.

The motor coach industry knows local passenger travel needs and desires. It has all the local branches, ticket agencies, garages, repair shops and personnel ready to hand. The public will be best served by the coordination of this new travel agency with the motor coach, and this consideration must surely be the decisive one.

It seems to this commission that the air transport bill just introduced in parliament will, if press reports be accurate, prevent the use of the helicopter by the motor coach industry. This may mean the denial of this new method of public transportation to the people of Canada. It certainly will mean a postponement of its introduction in Canada and a costly and unnecessary duplication of function, which duplication, in the last analysis, is always paid for by the users of the service.

It is also important that Canada shall not lag behind the United States in its acceptance of this new mode of travel and what is planned in the United States is best exemplified by the extract from "Aviation News" which we are taking the liberty of enclosing.

This commission has on leave of absence many mechanics now engaged in the repair, maintenance and servicing of aircraft operated by the naval, military and air forces, and who will return to their employment after the termination of hostilities. There are also on leave of absence many employees in the flying services of the armed forces of Canada and allied nations, many of whom, upon their return from service, can be qualified to direct, dispatch, navigate, pilot and operate the aircraft which it is proposed to operate.

The commission, therefore, respectfully submits that the bill in question is too broad in its scope and should be amended to allow for the normal and usual development of this new system of transportation which has such promise of usefulness to the citizens of Canada.

This submission is premised upon the theory that jurisdiction over this new form of travel resides in the dominion. This may be open to some question, as helicopters were not considered in the reference to the courts on aeronautics.

We are taking the liberty of sending a copy of this letter to the local members of parliament.

Yours faithfully,
Wm. C. McBrien, Chairman.

The extract from Aviation News under date of May 29, 1944, is as follows:

Greyhound Plans Helicopter Feeders

Post-war plans of the bus industry "to establish a non-subsidized, multi-scheduled helicopter-bus air service operating between bus stations in the downtown sections of approximately 1,000 cities and towns" were announced by Arthur Middleton Hill, President, Atlantic Greyhound Corporation, before the Institute of Transportation in New York.

Four hundred transportation executives attended the institute, held May 23-24, under sponsorship of the schools of law and commerce of New York university and the Transportation Association of America.

The proposed helicopter service, Hill said, "results from a large demand for air service between 50 and 250 miles which, in volume, is greater than all of the present air and bus travel combined."

He said the helicopters would have approximately the carrying capacity of a small bus, and cost to the traveller would be "no greater than the operation of his private automobile".

He did not touch on the question of when such helicopters might be available but said: "Leaders of the bus industry who have conferred with aircraft manufacturers licensed to build helicopters, and have witnessed demonstrations, are fully convinced that these aircraft are the means through which a post-war coordination of bus and air transportation will become a reality."

The reason why I bring this up is that I feel, as I know a number of other hon. members do, that opportunity should be given to such companies as these to feed the transcontinental air lines. I hope the minister will not exclude these private corporations.

Mr. HOWE: If I may at once answer this comment, I would say that the article read by my hon. friend is a perfect example of the need for taking care not to give out prematurely valuable public franchises. I point out to my hon. friend that the commercial helicopter is yet to be invented, and if my guess is accurate—and I have followed fairly closely the progress of the art—it will be some years before the invention is brought to the point where it can be used commercially. The government has had applications over the last two or three years from, with few exceptions, every bus line in Canada for franchises for helicopter operations between points served by bus systems. I suggest that these applications were probably made in good faith, but a less kindly person might suggest that they represent an attempt to prevent competition with surface transportation.

The position of the government is that if the helicopter has merit—and we hope it will have—it should be permitted to develop as an independent system of transportation and not be limited in its scope or confined in the area which is served by a form of surface transportation. It is with that thought in mind that this bill has been drawn, and the responsibility of the federal government for regulating the use of the airways will be exercised in the matter of the helicopter just as it is being exercised in the control of the aeroplane.

Mr. MacNICOL: Would the present bill permit or prevent the use of the helicopter?

Mr. HOWE: It would make it very difficult for the helicopter to be owned by a bus line, or by any other form of surface transportation.

Mr. FRASER (Peterborough West): I personally feel that towns and cities away from the main transcontinental lines should have some ways and means of getting down to the different points where these transport planes cross the continent. If you cut out these small companies or bus lines, what chance have these cities and towns? They have not any chance at all, because the minister knows that it will be years and years before the service will be furnished otherwise, and if the government try to do it they will in many cases lose money. These firms are willing to see if this form of transportation can be operated profitably; if it cannot, they are prepared to lose the money. That is the chance they take.

Mr. HOWE: It is the opinion of the government, and my own opinion, that the development of the helicopter is much more likely to be sound and its use extended to give the service which my hon. friend desires, if franchises are not given out prematurely, and if its development is separated from the confines of surface transportation.

Mr. FRASER (Peterborough West): Then should it not be put in this bill that provision will be made when helicopters come into practical use? I might mention that it is some seven years ago since I had a trip in one of these gyroscope machines. It landed in a space not half the size of this chamber. I had a very nice ride, and I thought at that time, and I still think, it is a coming means of transportation.

Mr. HOWE: The art of the gyroscope is exactly where it was when my hon. friend took his ride.

Mr. FRASER (Peterborough West): I know, but the helicopter has gone ahead; there are now new patents on it, and I understand that some helicopters have been built in the United States.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): Is jurisdiction over provincial aviation included in this bill? Is there jurisdiction over the helicopter lines which would be in the province of Ontario?

Mr. HOWE: The privy council has decided that the federal government has jurisdiction over the use of the air.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): In support of what the hon. member for Peterborough West has said, I would point out what happened in Toronto in connection with buses. It was up to the city, not because they wanted to do it, but because it was necessary to give service to the outlying districts, and if it had not been for the transportation commission we would not have had that service. We had many bus lines going into liquidation, and the people in the surrounding country insisted on the Toronto Transportation commission giving the service. They lost a lot of money when they started and it will be exactly the same in the helicopter business. How much will it cost to incorporate one of these small companies the minister is talking about, the one running between Toronto and Peterborough? How many machines will they have; what will be the capital investment, and where will they get the money, with all the things that go with it, all the organization that is necessary, and so forth? To my mind this business of small companies is so much eyewash. The work cannot be done as efficiently as it could in some other way. If a big firm like the Toronto Transportation commission wishes to take it on, it should be allowed to do so because it has the organization.

Mr. STIRLING: When the minister was outlining the civil aviation policy some weeks ago he said, I remember, that it was not the intention of the government to entertain applications from those in another country who desire to set up a service in Canada unless the application came through the government of that country. I expected to find that in this bill but I do not find it. Where would such power be found, and is it still the intention of the government to follow that plan?

Mr. HOWE: That arrangement is by international agreement. It has been functioning between Canada and the United States during the last several years. It is purely a bilateral agreement that may be varied by mutual arrangement, but it has no place in this bill. This bill deals with aviation within Canada.

Mr. STIRLING: Is it the case that at the present time no application from an air-line company at present existent in the United States would be entertained by Canada?

Mr. HOWE: That is correct.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): Has Canada received any applications for entry permits into the United States at the present time? How many entry permits have we for aeroplanes into the United States from Canada?

Mr. HOWE: Is the hon. member asking whether we have franchises to operate in the United States?

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): Yes.

Mr. HOWE: We have one from Toronto to New York.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): How many from the United States into Canada?

Mr. HOWE: Eight, I believe.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): Is there some quid pro quo as far as transportation between Canada and the United States is concerned? I submit that there ought to be. Are we to allow them to carry everything by plane, or are we to have some part of that transportation? Something should be done to balance things up a little.

In connection with a report from Washington by Chester A. Bloom, I should like to ask the minister one or two questions. He has probably seen this report, which states:

Simultaneously with the issuance of a long list of prospective U.S. air routes to virtually every big city and capital around the world, the U.S. government's civil aeronautics board on Tuesday gave notice of abandonment of the "chosen instrument" notion.

The board did that by stating it would call for applications from all the private air line corporations to fly the prospective routes—after they have been negotiated with foreign governments.

Does that mean that the United States is just going out to do all this? What position does it put Canada in? The report goes on to say:

The board stated that it had omitted services from the United States and Alaska terminating in the contiguous countries of Canada and Mexico.

I suppose that means border crossing. Further:

Goose airport at the head of Hamilton inlet on the Labrador coast, was built since the war began by Canada on land leased from Newfoundland. During the war it has been used as a "ferry base" and from its 6,000-foot runways the biggest warplanes have taken off for the United Kingdom.

Airmen express preferences for Goose over the Newfoundland airfields since its weather is better, being almost clear of fog.

The C.A.P.—

That is, the coastal air patrol plans.

—plans calls for stops at undetermined points in Labrador or Newfoundland on all north Atlantic flights which it has outlined. So far as is known, Goose airport is the only sizable base in Labrador at present and high R.C.A.F. officers and Canadian government officials have emphasized that Canada intends to keep this military field in operation after the war.

That means, I suppose, that Canada is going to keep that for herself after the war. Could the minister let us know what our position is in connection with this international air travel n view of this statement which was issued rom Washington on June 14?

Mr. HOWE: This bill has no reference to aviation outside Canada; its jurisdiction is confined to this country. There is no reference in the bill to international aviation.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): This board has nothing whatever to do with international aviation?

Mr. HOWE: Except as it may advise the government on aviation, the board has no power to make laws governing international aviation. Such matters are subject to international agreement.

Mr. GILLIS: I do not wish to retard the progress of the bill but I want to emphasize what the member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell) had to say with regard to the inclusion in the bill of some provision that would protect the employees of any company who might be licensed under this measure. As I see the bill, it is intended to regulate the field of transportation in the air in the future; that is all. It is setting up a board which will be responsible through the minister to the house. While the minister's observations in reply to the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar may be to some extent reasonable, at least as applying to companies operated by the government, this board will, in my opinion, be granting licenses to many private companies, and under this bill some arrangement should be made whereby employees of the companies receiving licences should be protected. There should be a clause in the bill making provision in that regard. The minister's remarks on the whole matter of the labour code as it applies to industry throughout the country were not realistic. During the process of fighting the war the one thing that we lacked in the field of labour throughout Canada was some regulation of industry. I do not think the experience of the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation has been too happy. The same can be said of other fields of industry where the government have some control over the industrial set-up. I have no desire to discuss this thing farther than to emphasize that point. Under this bill the board will be granting licences to a lot of people, and in my opinion there should be some clause to protect the employees.

Mr. COLDWELL: The Railway Act has, I believe, some provision governing the issuing of passes to favoured customers and so on. Would it not be wise to have some provision in this bill as well to prohibit the use of passes and cut rates to certain types of customers? I thought I should bring that to the attention of the minister.

Mr. HOWE: There is a section of the Railway Act that governs the matter. The provision here is that the matter will be handled by regulations approved by the governor in council. It is difficult to write in the bill the exact provision. I may say that passes are very much more limited in the air than in the trains, and necessarily so, considering the limited carrying capacity of aeroplanes. The fact is that outside of certain employees who are allowed to ride, provided that the space is available, there are no passes in air transport.

Mr. COLDWELL: I was thinking of the time when a number of private companies are licensed. I know what is done in the Trans-Canada Air Lines, but this is the governing legislation for the future.

Mr. HOWE: Yes, that is right.

Mr. COLDWELL: That is what I was thinking of. These passes may be used by companies for favoured customers?

Mr. HOWE: Yes.

Mr. COLDWELL: And something should be done—

Mr. HOWE: I agree with my hon. friend that the regulations provided for in the bill must govern. I think more study would be required before a clause could be inserted in the bill.

Mr. COLDWELL: But it is under consideration?

Mr. HOWE: Yes.

In connection with the labour clause in the agreement, I may say that during my period as Minister of Transport I was asked to amend the Railway Act on many occasions, but I was never asked to put a labour clause in the act. I feel the position there is similar to the position in the airways. It seems to me that we have general labour provisions which are adequate and which would apply to the airways as well as to the railways and to other employees. I would hesitate to put into an act which is seldom revised provisions that to-day may be in conformity with general government policy, but which ten years from now may not be in conformity. I think there would be a conflict which would be unfortunate. I suggest that employees of the air lines have all the protection that they require in the general labour legislation of the country.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: How many licences have been applied for for routes within Canada by provinces within the last year? In how many cases has the minister directed the board of transport commissioners not to consider applications that were before it?

Mr. HOWE: I could not say the number of applications that have been made; there have been many. The second question was, in how many cases have we directed the board of transport commissioners not to consider the application. The answer is, never, or none, or whichever word is appropriate. I would, however, point out that a new route cannot be granted by the board of transport commissioners under present legislation until the route is established by order in council. In other words, it must be designated by the government as a route under the Transport Act before the route can be allocated and a franchise given. The government has not allocated all the routes that have been applied for in the applications.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: Perhaps the minister will be able to furnish the information to-morrow?

Mr. HOWE: The number of applications, yes.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: I would point out one thing that requires elucidation from the minister in connection with the answer to the second question. It has to do with the application that was made for an airways route between the cities of Saint John and Halifax. The minister was asked a question in regard to that matter early in this session, and at page 125 of Hansard he gave an answer that is not in accordance with the answer that he has just given. The hon. member for York-Sunbury said:

> My understanding is just this—and may I say that that is no reason—that they did not choose to deal with the application. Who told them not to do so?

The hon. member was referring to the board of transport commissioners. The minister replied as follows:

> Mr. Howe: I did.

I should like the minister to explain the circumstances in connection with the application for that route; for apparently when he was asked the question some months ago he said that he told them not to deal with the application. His answer this evening is, in no case did he tell them not to. Could he explain what he meant when he used those words in Hansard in February last?

Mr. HOWE: Perhaps I had better not go into the circumstances. If Hansard reports me as having said, "I did," we will assume that was the answer I gave. As a matter of fact, Nova Scotia is a prohibited area in war time, and new routes would not ordinarily be authorized into that area. They never have been. There have been several applications, made from time to time, to operate a route from Saint John to Halifax. If my memory serves me correctly, the first application was from the line that operates from Moncton to Charlottetown; I think it is Maritime Airways. There was also an application for a route from Canadian Pacific Air Lines. Before either application was filed Trans-Canada Air Lines had announced they intended to operate a route from Blissville to Halifax, with connection from Blissville to Saint John and Fredericton by bus. None of the routes has yet been operated. The route from Saint John to Halifax has never been declared a route within the meaning of the Transport Act.

Mr. HAZEN: May I refresh the minister's memory again about—

The ACTING CHAIRMAN (Mr. Golding): The hon. member for Cape Breton South has the floor.

Mr. GILLIS: I wish to pursue the matter of protecting the employees who may be employed on the airways a little farther. The minister said that in connection with the railways there was no necessity for a regulation of any kind. He must remember that the men on the railways have trade union agreements.

Mr. HOWE: That is what they have on the airlines.

Mr. GILLIS: They fought for those agreements for many years and had a lot of difficulty in regard to them. If the men on the air lines had regular trade union agreements signed by representatives of the employees of the air lines in so far as the Trans-Canada Air Lines is concerned I am quite satisfied. But I am thinking about the future. I do not know who is to administer this bill. It puts a lot of latitude in the hands of the minister. We do not know who the board will be. The minister who will handle this bill will have a lot of authority and a lot of latitude in reporting to this house. We do not know who is to be in this house or who the minister will be. In putting through this bill, I think we should put in the hands of the people who will license air lines in the future something that will protect the employees without any guesswork about it, or any hope, or anything like that; we should be definite and insert the provision in the bill. If Britain and the United States thought it necessary in 1936 and 1938 to write definitely into their aeronautics acts the clauses which were read to-night by the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar, I am sure we would not be doing anything wrong if we inserted a similar clause for the protection of the people who are to operate the lines and for the protection of the employees of those air lines in future.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): Are all cross-border routes to be operated by Trans-Canada Air Lines?

Mr. HOWE: There is no provision to that effect in the bill, but the announcement of government policy made it quite definite that this is the purpose of the government.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): Has the government received any applications for cross-border routes up to the present time?

Mr. HOWE: From Canadians?

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): Yes?

Mr. HOWE: No.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: I should like to ask the minister one general question. Under the Transport Act the board of transport commissioners had very wide powers of a judicial or at least quasi-judicial nature. Now a change has been made, as far as air transport is concerned, and the new board under this bill is to have none of those quasi-judicial powers. In fact the powers of the board are to be very much limited and, in the main, under the control of the minister. What has occurred to make that change necessary? Why has it become necessary to alter the powers of the board as far as air transportation is concerned, to do away with their judicial functions and to place them in a position where their decisions may be limited or controlled by the minister himself?

Mr. HOWE: The board being established under this bill has all the judicial functions of the board of transport commissioners; in fact it has more extensive powers than that board, in that it will work under a measure that is less restrictive than the Transport Act. This measure purposely has been left in an elastic form, subject to regulations which will be drawn by the board itself. The intention is not to set out jurisdiction which is restrictive in character but to allow the board to build up its own jurisdiction. If my hon. friend will read the bill carefully he will see that the judicial functions of the board are not subject to review by the minister. Provision is made for appeal to the minister in certain cases, but that is only an appeal, just as there is provision for an appeal from the board of transport commissioners to the privy council.

Mr. JOHNSTON (Bow River): I wish to ask another question about this labour code. Perhaps we would not be very far wrong if we inserted in this bill some protecting clause with regard to labour. I may be wrong, and, if so, the minister will correct me, but I do not think there is anything in this bill which would prohibit employees of this government-created airways company from belonging to any union of their choice; nor would there be anything in it barring them from signing agreements with any of the unions. I should like that made clear. Is there anything at all which would bar these workers from joining any union of their choice, or from making union agreements with the company? If there is, I think that is wrong.

Mr. HOWE: There is nothing in the bill barring employees from doing anything they wish to do. At the moment they are members of an international union. I think all pilots in commercial work in Canada are members of an international union; they have their agreements with their employers and are in exactly the same position as the railway men. To my mind the position is very happy, and I think we would only complicate the situation if we did what my hon. friend suggests. I doubt very much if the union itself would favour writing into the bill provisions which, as I say, may be out of date if the labour code as a whole should be changed. These employees are certified under the act as members of a union, competent to appeal to the labour relations board of the dominion, and I think that is the position they would prefer to be in.

Mr. GILLIS: They are certified now?

Mr. HOWE: Yes.

Mr. GILLIS: I am afraid that in future they might be classified as technical employees. The engineers across Canada have a claim before the board now—

Mr. HOWE: Does my hon. friend refer to railway engineers?

Mr. GILLIS: No.

Mr. HOWE: Professional engineers?

Mr. GILLIS: Yes; they are tangled up on that basis. Just a short clause stating that they have the right to make trade union agreements and to organize would protect them. Of course, if they are certified now and have bargaining rights under the code, that is fine; but I should like to see it included in the bill. That code can be changed at any time.

Mr. HOWE: I doubt if my hon. friend is speaking for labour organizations now. I have never been asked to include a labour code in an act.

Mr. GILLIS: I doubt if there is anyone in the labour movement in Canada who would not want a clause provided in connection with an industry that will be as important in the future as aviation, stating that the employees of this industry have the right to bargain collectively. That is all it amounts to.

Mr. HOWE: I will say this, that the pilots' organization is very wide awake; the association has had time to apply for the protection my hon. friend suggests, but it has not done so. To me this is an indication that it is not greatly interested in having a clause of that kind inserted.

Mr. GILLIS: They take it for granted that in the government set-up they will have that right. The people I am speaking of are those who may be employed by the feeder lines which this board will license and who will not come under the government set-up.

Mr. JOHNSTON (Bow River): I take it that they have that right now.

Mr. HOWE: They have that right now.

Mr. JOHNSTON (Bow River): Anyone working on the line.

Mr. GILLIS: But this board has the right to license other lines.

Mr. JOHNSTON (Bow River): I should like that cleared up. I take it that all employees, whether they are on the feeder lines or on the government line, will have the right to join a labour organization and to carry on collective bargaining.

Mr. HOWE: Yes, they have the right to collective bargaining; they can be certified by the board, and the provisions of the labour relations act will apply. There is no doubt about that. The idea is firmly established all through the aircraft industry among the airmen, the mechanics and all other branches. It is well understood that there are recognized unions certified as bargaining agents, and that anyone who applies to be certified can qualify. There is no question about it.

Mr. GILLIS: Does that apply to the C.P.A. lines too?

Mr. HOWE: Yes.

Mr. GILLIS: It does not apply to both railway lines. Certain employees of the Canadian Pacific have not bargaining rights, while comparable employees of the Canadian National have.

Mr. HOWE: I cannot say as to that, but certainly the aircraft men of both organizations have bargaining rights.

Mr. GILLIS: The minister is quite emphatic about it as far as the main lines are concerned, but once this board is set up, supposing Maritime Air Lines, for example, a feeder line, makes application. The board grants them a licence to operate the line and they can suit themselves as to the treatment of the employees. That is private enterprise. You are placing the employees in a position where they will have to fight for organization of a union, taking a vote, getting a certificate under the code, and everything else. The code should be put in the bill to protect the employees. It would simply be inserting in the bill a principle which the government is giving effect to on the main line to-day.

Mr. HOWE: Writing a provision of that kind into the bill would place employees of air lines in a position which no other employees in this country enjoy. All employees throughout the country are protected by the government's labour code, under conditions set out in the code. The application of the code to the air lines is well established, and I see no reason why the employees of airlines should be placed in a different position from other employees throughout Canada. If we provide specially for them in the bill, then in years to come that measure might conflict with the general labour act of the federal government.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: The minister stated in answer to my question that the new board would have the same powers as the old board. Looking over the bill, I cannot come to that conclusion. Under the Transport Act the powers of the board are set out in section 13, subsections 1 to 5, as follows:

13. (1) The board may, notwithstanding anything contained in the Aeronautics Act, subject to the provisions of this part, license aircraft to transport passengers and/or goods between specified points or places in Canada or between specified points or places in Canada and specified points or places outside of Canada.

(2) The licence shall be issued in the name of the owner, lessee or other person entitled to engage in transport by air by means of such aircraft.

(3) The licence may apply to one or more aircraft.

(4) The board may in the licence prescribe the route or routes which the aircraft named therein may follow and the schedule of services which shall be maintained.

(5) The board shall not issue a licence without being first satisfied that the proposed service is and will be required by the present and future public convenience and necessity.

As I understand it, this new bill alters in effect the powers of the board. I will refer to the sections in order to bring the matter to the attention of the minister with a view to securing an answer to the questions that I asked.

Under the new bill the only provision for the independence of the board is to be found in section 7, which states:

There shall be a board to be known as the air transport board consisting of three members appointed by the governor in council.

Subsection 7 of section 7 deals with the independence of the board and provides that the members of the board shall not directly or indirectly engage in the manufacture or selling of aircraft, and so forth. The minister has stated that the board to be constituted under this bill has the same powers as the former transport board. The only section that gives it any powers at all is section 8, which provides:

The board may make rules for the regulation of its proceedings and the performance of its functions and duties under this act.

That section simply provides that the board shall have certain powers with respect to its own administration. But when it comes to the exercise of judicial or quasi-judicial powers there are many alterations in the powers. Section 11 provides:

Subject to the approval of the governor in council, the board may make——certain regulations, and I am not objecting to that at the moment. Section 12 is the important section. It states:

(1) Subject to the approval of the minister, the board may issue to any person applying therefor a licence to operate a commercial air service.

In other words, the board has not the wide powers that it previously had. Under the old act it was untrammeled in the exercise of its powers, but under this bill it may only issue a licence subject to the approval of the minister.

Mr. McLARTY: Read subsection 3.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: Subsection 3 of section 12 reads:

The board shall not issue any such licence unless it is satisfied that the proposed commercial air service is and will be required by the present and future public convenience and necessity.

But subsection 3 I would point out, and I am sure the Secretary of State will agree with me, is again subject to subsection 1, where the approval of the minister is required before any licence may be issued.

Mr. HOWE: Not at all.

Mr. McLARTY: It is a definite restriction, as I think the hon member for Lake Centre will agree.

Mr. HOWE: Nowhere in this legislation is the minister given power to compel the board to issue a licence. The issue of the licence is subject to the approval of the minister, but the board can refuse to issue the licence. My hon. friend is trying to confuse the committee.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: I am not trying to confuse the committee. I am trying to ascertain the reason why these changes are being made. I want to know what has occurred to make it necessary to remove from the board of transport commissioners, in so far as air transport is concerned, the absolute power that it had under the old act.

Again subsection 4 of section 12 provides:

> The board shall not issue any such licence unless and until an operating certificate has been issued by the minister to the operator of the proposed commercial air service certifying that the holder thereof is adequately equipped and able to conduct a safe operation as an air carrier over the prescribed route.

In other words, if the minister takes an arbitrary stand and says that in so far as any particular applicant is concerned he will not grant a certificate, the board is powerless to grant a licence.

In so far as the right of appeal is concerned, which the minister has mentioned, no licence can be granted by the board unless there is a certificate by the minister approving the issuing of the licence. Then provision is made for an appeal under subsections 8, 9 and 10 of section 12. After the minister has determined that he will approve the issue of a licence subject, we will say, to certain qualifications there is an appeal to the minister from the board which is responsible to the minister for determining in the first place whether or not a licence should be granted. In other words, what this bill says to-day is that a licence may be issued by the board only, with the approval of the minister, after a certificate has been granted by the minister as to the satisfactory nature of the qualifications of the company.

As I see it, under these regulations the board of air transport will have no independence. In the first place, it will be subject to the control of the minister in the issuance of licences. While the board may draft motions, under the sections I have mentioned it is subject to the final control of the minister. While it has all the outward appearances of being an independent body to administer the law in so far as air transportation is concerned, free and uncontrolled, it is in fact a body subject to the control of the minister. In this connection I should like to refer to the report by the Lord High Chancellor of Great Britain covering the committee on ministers' powers. This committee reported in April, 1932, and condemned the setting up of boards with judicial or semi-judicial functions which were in fact controlled by a minister. I quote from page 78 of the report as follows:

> We are of opinion that in considering the assignment of judicial functions to ministers, parliament should keep clearly in view the maxim that no man is to be judge in a cause in which he has an interest. We think that in any case in which the minister's department would naturally approach the issue to be determined with a desire that the decision should go one way rather than another, the minister should be regarded as having an interest in the cause. Parliament would do well in such a case to provide that the minister himself should not be the judge, but that the case should be decided by an independent tribunal.

The board can grant a licence only with the approval of the minister; yet the appeal sections of the bill provide that where the board refuses to issue a licence, issues a licence which differs from the licence applied for, or attaches conditions to which the applicant objects, an appeal may be made to the minister. If a licence were not granted because the minister would not give his approval, what good purpose would there be in taking an appeal? As I read this new bill, it simply means that parliament is delegating authority to a semi-judicial body, while at the same time it is restricting the use and exercise of its powers. There are no safeguards under this bill against the objectional exercise or abuse of the minister's powers. The minister is being put in the position of being in control over the right of any individual to secure a licence to operate air transportation services. As far as the board is concerned it can act only with his approval. Under this bill, if the minister were to refuse, wrongly or unfairly, to approve the issue of a licence there would be no means whereby the person aggrieved by the decision could have an appeal except to the minister himself. I submit that that is a dangerous principle. The individual would have no recourse to the courts for the preservation of his rights; however qualified he may be to have a licence, the final determinant of his rights is not this board with judicial or quasi-judicial powers, but is in fact the minister.

While the minister glibly brushes aside this argument, the fact remains that the bill in its present form confers power upon him to determine the right of a person to have a licence, however qualified that person may be, however qualified a corporation may be, to operate and to receive a licence. That person or corporation would have no recourse except to appeal to the minister. This is going a long way along the road whereby the minister becomes the determinant as to who shall or shall not operate air lines in this dominion. I should like to know why it became necessary to alter the powers which the board of transport commissioners held with respect to airways. The power of that board was absolute, subject, of course, in war time to the order in council that has been passed. Why is it necessary for the time ahead, for the days of peace which we believe are approaching, for the minister to have such absolute powers? I submit that there is a great principle at stake and a further explanation should be given by the minister.

Section stands.

PENITENTIARIES

CONFINEMENT OF CONVICT PENDING DETERMINATION OF HIS APPEAL

On the orders of the day:

Mr. GORDON GRAYDON (Leader of the Opposition): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Justice and to call to his attention a comment made yesterday by the Chief Justice of Ontario in the appeal court of that province in which he stated that it did not seem to be in the interest of public security to keep men sentenced to penitentiary in local gaols. In view of the recent escape from the Don gaol in Toronto, will the minister give consideration to reviewing section 49, subsection 2, of the Penitentiary Act with a view to meeting the situation mentioned by the Chief Justice?

Hon. L. S. ST. LAURENT (Minister of Justice): I thank the leader of the opposition for calling my attention to this comment of the Chief Justice of Ontario. Of course, men sentenced to penitentiary are kept in local gaols only during the time when they are entitled to appeal from the sentence to penitentiary, but the question whether or not, even during that time, they should be left in the local gaols will be inquired into by the officers of the department. It must be realized that there would be inconvenience in moving to the penitentiary during that period prisoners whose sentence to penitentiary has not become definite. However, the advantages and disadvantages will be given careful consideration.

PETROLEUM PRODUCTS

STATEMENT OF PRESENT POSITION AS TO GASOLINE AND FUELS

On the orders of the day:

Hon. C. D. HOWE (Minister of Munitions and Supply): Some weeks ago the hon. member for Waterloo South (Mr. Homuth) asked me to give the house a complete outline of the present fuel position. I undertook to do so, and accordingly, I will now give the statement on the position of petroleum products, both gasoline and fuels. I have delayed making this statement to observe the effect of the invasion of Europe which was launched on June 6, and the effect on Canada as far as the supply and consumption of petroleum products are concerned. The Canadian position is affected chiefly in the matter of aviation and motor gasolines.

Our position at this moment may be summed up as follows: If the allies are able to win a reasonably quick overpowering victory, our position will probably not deteriorate to the point of further curtailment, due entirely to the conservation measures we have introduced and enforced. If, however, the invasion should develop into a long bitter struggle, there is a probability that we may all have to do with less gasoline in Canada. Our only possible course is to continue to conserve every possible gallon of gasoline. Needless consumption of gasoline robs our fighting men of the fuel they will require for their planes and motorized equipment, and that we cannot permit.

I would ask you to note that the total consumption of gasoline in Canada includes aviation gasoline, the consumption of which has necessarily risen to staggering proportions. And it is this increase, with other war essentials, which has been responsible for any increased consumption shown. None of us can quarrel with any quantity of gasoline properly used for such purposes.

I will now state the position with regard to motor gasoline, and for purposes of comparison I will deal with the four yearly periods each ending on March 31, for the years 1941 to 1944 inclusive.

Motor gasoline consumption in Canada in these periods for all purposes including the armed services, the Alaska highway, agricultural, and other war essentials, was as follows:

Year ended March 31	Gallons
1941	882,216,930
1942	944,178,060
1943	787,710,630
1944	814,248,820

It must be borne in mind that in these four years we had the great growth in our war effort. We had to service the trucks and equipment for the construction of over one hundred and twenty additional airports for the R.A.F. and the R.C.A.F., many far removed from rail head. Also, the trucks and equipment for the construction of the Alaska highway and a greatly increased truck haulage of materials from our widely scattered war plants.

We had to meet ever increasing demands of the armed forces and other essential uses identified with the war. We took care of all of these demands and at the same time reduced the consumption of motor gasoline slightly under the consumption for the year 1939 which totalled 824,997,390 gallons.

Motor gasoline consumption was increasing rapidly in the immediate pre-war years, and on the basis of the percentage increase which was current in those years, we estimate that motor gasoline consumption for the year ended March 31, 1942, would have exceeded 980,000,000 gallons had it not been for the voluntary conservation campaign which was launched in 1941.

In the year ended March 31, 1943—the first ration year—motor gasoline consumption totalled 787,710,630 gallons, or 156,467,430 gallons less than the actual consumption of the previous twelve months, and 192,289,370 gallons less than the estimated consumption of 980,000,000 gallons to which I have just referred.

While motor gasoline consumption at the close of the second year of rationing showed an increase of 26,538,190 gallons over the year ended March 31, 1943, direct sales to the armed forces and sales of marked gasoline used chiefly in agricultural machinery increased by 10,640,000 gallons and 30,940,000 gallons respectively. There was, therefore, an actual decline in consumption of motor gasoline during the second complete year of gasoline rationing of 15,050,000 gallons.

If we assume that consumption for the years ended March 31, 1943, and March 31, 1944, would have reached at least 980,000,000 gallons—which is the actual indicated consumption for the year ended March 31, 1942—the voluntary appeal and two full years of gasoline rationing have effected a total saving of approximately 393,750,000 gallons of motor gasoline, which is about one-third of our total annual consumption at the present time.

I point out that inventories as of March 31, 1944, were 55,000,000 gallons less than at the commencement of rationing, at which time the stocks on hand were uncomfortably low.

Before I deal with aviation gasoline, I would remind hon. members that both motor and aviation gasolines come from the same sources, sources which must supply the tremendous demands of the allied armed forces. When we consider that it requires 2,000 gallons of fuel to move an armoured division one mile, that a fleet of 5,000 bombers and escort fighters raiding Germany uses up some 5,250,000 gallons of aviation gasoline, we can readily see wherein lies our responsibility. These fighting men must not lack fuel for one single instant because of our carelessness, selfishness, or waste.

I will now give you consumption figures for aviation gasoline supplied from Canada, and these figures will indicate the importance of aviation gasoline to the Canadian war economy. Canada could not become the hub of the world's largest air training plan without sending Canadian consumption of aviation gasoline to staggering heights. By way of example, I would point out that in one thirty-day period, aircraft operated by R.C.A.F. in Canada and Newfoundland consumed an average of 548,000 gallons of aviation gasoline per day.

The figures I have for aviation gasoline, including exports from Canada, are for the five calendar years commencing with 1939 and ending with 1943, and for the twelve months ending March 31, 1944. These figures are as follows:

	Gallons
1939	5,453,980
1940	12,661,425
1941	57,181,005
1942	119,740,110
1943	173,208,910
1944 (year ended March 31)	176,298,570

As a further indication of what the balance of this year holds in store for us, I am advised that an estimate made before the invasion indicated that we shall have to move offshore this year four times as much aviation gasoline as we did last year. What this estimate will be now, I cannot say.

I do not think it is advisable at this time to disclose aviation gasoline inventories. Meanwhile, although Canada must provide all the fuels required by its own navy—which, as hon. members know, has expanded from 13 to more than 700 vessels; although we must fuel all the bombers leaving Labrador and Newfoundland for England and leaving Edmonton for Russia; although we must fuel aircraft operating under the commonwealth air training plan, the convoys leaving our shores, the army, war factories, agricultural machinery for food production, and essential transportation, not one aircraft, ship, or machine tool has ever been stopped because of lack of fuel. We have not failed, and we must not fail.

I have pointed out to hon. members on more than one occasion that we are dependent on outside sources for 85 per cent of our petroleum product requirements, 60 per cent of which must be brought in by ocean tanker transportation which has been in short supply since 1941. We are drawing on the same sources, inventories, and transportation facilities as our allies. Coupled with this, we now face a dwindling crude oil supply. The war—particularly now the invasion is in full swing—is making greater and greater demands upon the crude oil and transportation facilities of this hemisphere. We have to continually review our position in order to assure our allies that we are not asking for crude oil and transportation beyond our needs. Our stocks are too far below normal to carry us any distance without replenishment. Motor gasoline coupons outstanding and to be issued are based upon our inventories and projected imports which we estimate are sufficient to honour each coupon. This is not a time for other than the most essential driving. Everyone should let his conscience be his guide in using gasoline of any kind to-day—this applies to the armed forces, the farmer, and everyone else in the country.

Let me repeat: Every barrel of petroleum products we can do without means that much more for the theatres of war and the transportation to get the material there.

I will now discuss light and heavy fuel oils used for heating by Canadian homes and for heating and processing by Canadian industries. As a result of conservation measures taken on this continent, hon. members will note that whereas consumption of heavy fuel oil has dropped slightly, the consumption of light fuel oil has risen steadily since 1940. Without conservation measures our position would have been hopeless long before this, with the likelihood that many schools, office buildings, apartment houses, and homes would have been without heat last winter.

Consumption, including exports, of light fuel oils for the calendar years 1940 to 1943 and for the twelve months ending March 31, 1944, are as follows:

	Gallons
1940	201,613,895
1941	247,578,450
1942	251,388,585
1943	267,139,355
1944 (year ended March 31)	267,166,655

Light fuel oil, such as is used for heating homes, is an important commodity in the war effort, as it includes diesel oil used for propulsion of tanks and other army equipment, as well as oil for special heat treating furnaces for the annealing of metals, and for other essential uses in industry.

Heavy fuel oil consumption, including exports, for the four calendar years 1940 to 1943 inclusive, and for the twelve months ending March 31, 1944, are as follows:—

	Gallons
1940	510,191,850
1941	590,816,485
1942	594,590,360
1943	560,791,910
1944 (year ended March 31)	587,830,460

These figures do not include heavy fuel oil consumed by oil refineries.

At the inception of oil control we did not have in Canada an organization comparable to the American Petroleum Institute; therefore statistics kept in 1939 make no distinction between light and heavy fuel oils, but their combined consumption in that year was 589,921,360 gallons as compared with 711,805,745 gallons for 1940, 838,394,935 gallons for 1941, and 874,383,195 gallons for the year ended May 31, 1942.

Realizing that the consumption of light and heavy fuel oils might reach a point beyond our ability to supply, an appeal was made to the public in the fall of 1941 to convert to substitute fuels, and conversion for certain large groups of users was made mandatory on September 1, 1942. To what heights the consumption of light and heavy fuel oils might have risen without restrictions I cannot say, but in reviewing the increases over the years 1939 to 1944 it is reasonable to assume that a saving of at least 175,000,000 gallons was effected.

Light and heavy fuel oil inventories at March 31, 1944, were 4,650,065 gallons and 17,475,500 gallons respectively higher than a year ago. Because the heavier crudes we now have to run yield larger quantities of heavy fuel oil, restrictions on the use of heavy fuel oil have been lifted in all provinces except British Columbia. The situation on the west coast to-day is more critical than it has ever been since the outbreak of the war. The petroleum product requirements of the fighting forces in the Pacific are such that the oil-producing state of California is unable to meet these demands, and heavy importations are now being made from other points in the United States to California. This, of course, affects our position in British Columbia, and we are to-day moving crude oil from Colombia and Ecuador in South America to Vancouver —some 4,200 miles, or five times the distance of our previous source of supply. This has created a serious transportation problem, and it will be touch and go whether we shall be able to care for the most essential services in British Columbia.

In the winter and spring of 1942, when the supply of domestic fuel oil became acute and I announced on the floor of the house that there was evidence that this country would be short of this commodity, a number of citizens voluntarily changed over from oil to an alternative form of heating.

While no general relief can be made in respect to the use of light fuel oil for any purpose, we have, as a result of the mild winter just behind us and the cooperation of home owners in reducing their consumption to the minimum, built up a slightly better inventory position which will permit owners of bona fide residences who voluntarily converted when requested to do so in 1942, to reinstal oil burning equipment in their homes, provided that the equipment has been continuously in their possession. This does not permit new installations.

In closing, I wish to state once again that our position in the matter of petroleum fuels is not improving, and this in spite of the best efforts we have been able to make toward conservation. Careful planning has provided gasoline available to the public in quantities sufficient to honour gasoline and fuel oil coupons which had been issued. In that respect we are more fortunate than any other country. Possibly the fact that we have kept petroleum products available for legitimate users has led to a popular belief that the supply of these products is not a critical matter. If so, the impression is erroneous and unfortunate. I am happy to say that the misuse of petroleum products has been kept to very small proportions, due wholly to the vigilance of the government's enforcement officers. I appeal for the support of the public in preventing these abuses. With the support of the public, I am hopeful that our supply position can be maintained at its present level. Without public support, I am certain that our supply position must deteriorate. Should war consumption continue at its present level for any considerable period, it is unlikely that we can avoid further curtailment in any event.

PRODUCTION OF ALCOHOL FOR FUEL PURPOSES

Mr. BLACKMORE: I should like to ask the minister whether any measures have been taken in Canada to increase our production of alcohol for fuel purposes.

Mr. HOWE: We are producing alcohol to the full capacity of the available productive plants, but that alcohol is being used for the manufacture of synthetic rubber rather than for fuel.

Mr. BLACKMORE: We are interested in ascertaining whether the government have taken all reasonable measures to increase the capacity of the productive plants in Canada. Have they endeavoured to build factories for the manufacture of alcohol for fuel?

Mr. HOWE: I think so; yes.

Mr. BLACKMORE: Will the minister tell the house whether or not increased factory facilities were provided in Canada in 1943 for the manufacture of alcohol for fuel purposes?

Mr. SPEAKER: The minister may treat what the hon. member has said as a notice of question, to be placed on the order paper.

Mr. BLACKMORE: I will add three more years; I want to know what has been done.

SUGAR

INQUIRY AS TO INCREASE IN RATION FOR HOME CANNING

On the orders of the day:

Mr. M. C. SENN (Haldimand): I should like to address a question to the Minister of Finance or his parliamentary assistant. I am doing so at the request of my colleague from the county of Lincoln (Mr. Lockhart), whose constituency is one of the largest producers of small fruits in Canada. According to an article appearing in The Country Gentleman of May, 1944, the O.P.A. in the United States has eased its rules for home canning this year. They allow sugar totalling twenty-five pounds for each member of the family, and no limitation is placed on the amount of sugar that may be used for jams, jellies and preserves. In view of this change in regulations, has the government given consideration to the advisability of increasing the ration of sugar for home canning in Canada, and, if not, will it do so immediately? This matter is urgent, because strawberries are already in full production and will be followed by raspberries, cherries and so on, in rapid succession.

Hon. J. L. ILSLEY (Minister of Finance): I am sorry I cannot give the hon. gentleman an answer before Thursday. I believe there are reasons for the difference between the systems of rationing in Canada and the United States, and I will present those reasons when I answer the question. My understanding is that our ration goes as far as our allocation will permit, but I will give a more complete answer on Thursday.

COAL

INQUIRY AS TO APPOINTMENT OF ROYAL COMMISSION ANNOUNCED ON MARCH 27

On the orders of the day:

Mr. CLARENCE GILLIS (Cape Breton South): Earlier in the session the Minister of Munitions and Supply announced the appointment of a royal commission to inquire into the fuel industry in Canada and to develop a post-war national fuel policy. Is the minister in a position to inform the house what progress has been made and approximately when the commission will begin its work?

Hon. C. D. HOWE (Minister of Munitions and Supply): Very careful study has been given the terms of reference. It is a complex problem, and the desire is that this commission may help in the solution of that problem. I have the terms of reference drafted, and I hope to place them before my colleagues at an early day.

VETERANS' AFFAIRS

ESTABLISHMENT OF DEPARTMENT TO DEAL WITH THE CARE, TREATMENT OR REESTABLISHMENT OF MEMBERS OF THE ARMED FORCES

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister) moved the third reading of bill No. 83, to establish a department of veterans' affairs.

Mr. GORDON GRAYDON (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I rise with some hesitation and not a little apology for injecting some further observations on this motion for third reading, the matter having been pretty thoroughly debated. I do so, however, because the committee stage passed more quickly than I had expected, and the bill was reported while I was out of the chamber. I shall take only a few minutes to raise the one point I have in mind, which has to do with veterans of world war No. 1.

If my figures are correct, there are 11,000 of these men in the active companies of the veterans' guard alone in Canada. Then there are some 6,000 veterans of world war No. 1 in the reserve of the veterans' guard. A matter which is of concern to these men and to the public is whether or not the new Department of Veterans' Affairs will give adequate consideration to the plight of those who will be veterans of a second war and who, in view of their age, will require different treatment and a different type of rehabilitation from that used in connection with men discharged in their twenties or early thirties. I impress upon the minister the necessity of seeing to it that these men who have participated in two wars, and who have done a magnificent job in the intervening period of peace, are given special consideration in any plans and schemes the minister may have in mind. If I might add just one further sentence it would be that perhaps ex-service men in the House of Commons, in common with those throughout Canada, are a little too modest in their claims in respect of what they did in the last war, in the intervening period of peace, and during the present war. Representing a group of citizens who have been denied the privilege of service in both wars, I take this opportunity to pay tribute to those men, who have not only done their duty in time of war but have also carried a heavy load and made a great contribution in the period of peace between the two wars.

Those who are now giving a third period of service in the present war should receive special consideration of the kind I have asked, and the treatment accorded them should be rendered willingly. I am hopeful that my remarks will not precipitate any further discussion in the matter. I rose only to say what, had I been in the house, I would have said in committee.

Hon. IAN A. MACKENZIE (Minister of Pensions and National Health): Mr. Speaker, I thank my hon. friend for his suggestion, and may say that we have already taken action along the lines suggested by him. We have a special committee dealing with demobilization, and that committee is giving special consideration to veterans of the first great war who reenlisted in this one. My hon. friend may be sure that we will give his suggestion every consideration.

Mr. NEILL: Has this bill been reprinted?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): I understand it has not. I asked just before the house met this afternoon. It is my understanding that it is the practice not to reprint the bill, unless there is special direction to do otherwise, until it passes the house. I might say that the same thought had occurred to me as has occurred to my hon. friend. But the practice is not to reprint the bill except by special order of the house.

Mr. NEILL: That means that we shall have to carry around with us three daily editions of Hansard—big ones—which contain these amendments and deletions.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): Oh, no; it will be reprinted immediately it passes the house, and will be made available to all members.

Mr. NEILL: It will be reprinted?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): Yes.

Mr. P. E. WRIGHT (Melfort): Mr. Speaker, I did not have an opportunity to speak to this bill in the debate on second reading, and I am therefore doing so now. I believe most hon. members are agreed that the setting up of this new department, having for its purpose the concentration in one department of all affairs affecting soldiers, was overdue.

The minister was paid many compliments by various speakers respecting his management of the department of which he is now the head; and while I can agree with much of what was said concerning his attention to pensions affairs, yet I do not think his management of the department is altogether the measure of efficiency in the department. To my mind a proper measure of efficiency would be the number of individual cases coming before him. And if that is the measure to be applied, then I am afraid his department has not done as well as it might have. After all, if these matters were receiving in the minister's department that degree of sympathetic consideration they are supposed to receive, it would not be necessary for members in the house, veterans' organizations and other groups throughout the country to have to deal with individual cases. I believe the minister should be advised of this, and if he is to be the minister in charge of the new department he should see to it that a more sympathetic attitude is taken by certain officials in the department when they are dealing with veterans' affairs. I know that some of those officials are sympathetic, but I also know that others are not as sympathetic as they might be. Otherwise these cases would not arise in the numbers they do.

The matter about which I would speak particularly is the position, first, of old soldier settlers under the Soldier Settlement Act, and, second, of new settlers under the present Veterans' Land Act. I believe I have had as much experience with the soldier settlement board as any other member in the house, because I took up land under the act in 1919, and I believe I have made payments to the board in each of the last twenty-five years. I say therefore that I hold the viewpoint of those settlers who took land under the act. I know something about their problem, some of the reasons for failures and for success under that act. I know, too, some of the points which should be considered under the new act, if it is to be a success.

When the Soldier Settlement Act was first passed, much of the land sold to settlers was sold at inflated prices. I know of school lands held in trust by the dominion government that were put up for sale in 1918 and offered to the public at $10 an acre. A soldier returned within six months after that sale was held and offered the school lands board $10 an acre. He was told that he could not buy the land at that price. Within three months he was notified by the soldier settlement board that under the new act the land was now available, through that board, and they quoted a price to him of $21 per acre on land which had been offered to the general public for $10 an acre less than a year before. The land was bought at $21 an acre under the soldier settlement board. Another quarter on the same section which was held at $23 an acre later reverted to the school lands department and was again offered for sale and bought by the same soldier settler at $15 an acre in 1927. The inflated value placed on lands at that time constituted one of the chief reasons why the soldiers under the old soldier settlement board act were unable to meet their commitments.

This may be past history; there are those who may say that that is not happening now. But it is happening; it is happening to-day. Some of this very land which was taken back by the soldier settlement board in the thirties and was being offered to the general public in 1939 is being held at twenty to thirty per cent over pre-war prices for sale to men coming back and taking up land under the new legislation. That is a wrong example for the government to set. Why land values should be increased to new settlers to-day I do not know. I say it is wrong. The original grant provided by the government for buying land and buildings was $3,600, but it was found necessary to increase it to $4,800 in order that suitable holdings might be secured. That extra $1,200 represents debt as far as the new veteran is concerned; it also represents dollars in the pockets of the land companies. Why the boys who are fighting overseas should be expected to meet this additional charge for the benefit of land companies is something I do not understand. The government should take the matter into consideration. These lands should have been taken over at their 1939 prices and held at those figures for the boys coming back from overseas; no inflated values should have been permitted on account of increased prices during the war.

The same consideration applies to stock and implements. Present prices of stock and equipment are much higher than they were in 1939, but there is no guarantee that high prices will continue during the years in which these settlers are going to be paying for their land. That is one of the reasons why I suggested in the committee that a parity clause should be inserted in the new veterans' land act whereby the year in which the land was bought should be taken as the basis, and any decrease or increase in the value of produce sold should be taken into consideration in fixing the payments to be made in the years to come. If such a clause had been written into the old soldier settlement board act, many of the difficulties which arose under that act would not have occurred.

When land was purchased under that measure in 1919 and 1920 in western Canada, wheat was over $2 a bushel, and other grains, as well as stock and equipment, were selling at proportionately high prices. There was also laxity in the matter of proper investigation as to suitability of the land and stock which were purchased. When I was working for a farmer in western Canada in 1919 I saw a soldier settlement board inspector purchasing for a soldier settler milch cows which were supposed to be fresh cows but were far from being that, and the prices paid were out of line with those which should have been paid. I do not know whether it was ignorance on the part of the inspector or whether it was collusion, but undoubtedly a great deal of stock was bought at that time at unreasonably high prices. The same thing is likely to occur again unless more care is taken than was shown twenty-five years ago; and judging by the way purchases are now being made I am doubtful whether that extra care is being taken.

It is because of such circumstances as I have outlined that old soldier settlers find themselves in their present position. That is why, some three or four weeks ago, a delegation came here to ask that these men be given clear titles to their land before the new statute comes into force. The delegation appeared before the government, or a committee of the government, who listened to their representation and said that consideration will be given to it. What consideration is being or will be given remains to be seen. But certainly those men are entitled to consideration.

In speaking to some of the departmental officials I have heard them express the opinion that if there are yet a number of settlers who have not met their commitments, it is because of lack of will on their part to do so. From personal knowledge of many of these men I say that that is not a fact. Many of them experienced sickness in their families; they had to choose between having sufficient money to provide their wives or children with medical attention, and meeting their payments to the board; and I think they were entitled to put the medical care of their families ahead of their obligations under their contracts. In many of the cases they fell into arrears because they wished to give their children a proper education. I know a number of soldiers of the last war who have families of four, five or six children and had to choose between educating them and meeting their payments to the soldier settlement board. They were making a far greater contribution to the welfare of Canada by educating their families than they would have done by meeting their payments in full to the board, because to-day many of their children are overseas fighting in our forces and able to do so more efficiently as a result of the education which they received.

These are some of the reasons why these settlers find themselves in the position they are in to-day, and I urge that the government give sympathetic consideration to their request to have title granted to their land.

Another point which I commend to the attention of the minister is the writing of a parity clause into contracts under the new Veterans' Land Act. I believe it is one of the elements most essential to the success of this measure. It does not matter much what the contract is to-day; the real question is what relation it will have to the prices of products five or ten years from now when payments have to be made. This will be the deciding factor as to whether the settler can meet his obligations. If he is purchasing land to-day at values related to the present prices of grain, live stock and dairy products, those prices should be taken into account when he is paying for his land. Unless that is done I cannot see how the settler under the new act will be in a much better position than were the settlers under the old act.

I also wish to emphasize the insufficiency of the amount now made available for procuring stock and equipment under the new measure. Our boys are overseas fighting to-day. We place in their hands a bomber costing a quarter of a million dollars or a tank to the value of $50,000 for the purpose of winning the war, but when they come home we give them $1,200 to buy stock and equipment to reestablish themselves. Any farmer knows how far $1,200 will go to-day in buying stock and equipment. It is just about sufficient for two old horses and some second-hand machinery. If that is the best we can do, after we have placed in the hands of our boys at the front equipment worth tens of thousands of dollars, it is time we had another think coming. I do not believe the boys will accept this. I am sure it is not good enough. I certainly think that the amount of money made available for stock and equipment should be increased.

With respect to the amount of money made available for full-time farming purposes, $4,800 to-day just does not buy an economic farming unit either in eastern or in western Canada. Anyone who is engaged in farming knows that in western Canada the economic farming unit must be at least one section of land, or, better still, one and a half or two sections. The sum of $4,800 will buy a quarter-section, and even if the man gets it free he still has not enough land on which to make a living at farming, educate his family and pay for proper health services. I would say that $10,000 is much nearer the sum required to purchase an economic unit for full-time farming anywhere in Canada, and I would ask the minister to give serious consideration to raising the amount of money that will be made available to these men for the purchase of a full-time farming unit. It is better to lend a man $10,000 to buy a farm that he has a chance to pay for than to lend him $4,800 for a farm on which you know and I know, Mr. Speaker, he cannot meet the payments. The larger unit is the economic unit, with the farm equipped with modern machinery.

These are just a few of the matters I wished to bring to the minister's attention with respect to the soldier settler and the Veterans' Land Act.

Motion agreed to and bill read the third time and passed.

RECONSTRUCTION

ESTABLISHMENT OF DEPARTMENT TO FORMULATE AND CARRY OUT RECONSTRUCTION PLANS

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister) moved the second reading of bill No. 82 to establish a Department of Reconstruction.

He said: Mr. Speaker, hon. members will recall that the speech from the throne made mention of three new departments, each of which has to do with some phase of reconstruction in the broad sense of that word. One is the Department of Veterans' Affairs, which is concerned particularly with matters relating to demobilization and rehabilitation of the armed forces. Another is the Department of Social Welfare, the designation of which, by the way, I am going to ask the house to allow me to amend and have it named the Department of National Health and Welfare. I might say that the wording "Social Welfare" was selected because of the comprehensive nature of the term. It was thought that welfare included health. But there have been representations to the government, which I think have been sound, that we have had a department of health in Canada for some time past, the Department of National Health, and that to eliminate that particular designation might cause it to be assumed that the government was paying less attention rather than more attention to the question of national health. I imagine that there will be no objection to the acceptance of the amended designation of that department.

The third department mentioned is the Department of Reconstruction. The first two departments I have referred to grow, in a way, out of the existing Department of Pensions and National Health. The Department of Reconstruction is an entirely new department of government and will be concerned with aspects of government business for which hitherto no one minister has been responsible.

In considering the Department of Reconstruction, it is necessary in the first instance to understand clearly what is meant by reconstruction. There are different interpretations given to the term. Reconstruction in the war zones where there has been a wholesale destruction of property and community life will mean the physical rebuilding of the areas that have been devastated. Fortunately in Canada we have not suffered from anything of the kind. We have not had our homes bombed; we have not had our railways and roads destroyed; we have not had our industries reduced—rather, if anything, we have had our industries vastly increased and extended as the result of the war effort of the country. We are fortunate, I say, in that particular. Reconstruction with us, and, indeed, reconstruction everywhere in the broad sense of the word, means the transforming of a nation that has been carrying on war and has been geared for war and has a war economy, back to a nation that is returning to its peaceful pursuits; to the ordinary life which the community and the nation carry on in time of peace. That broad conception of reconstruction necessarily includes much in the way of the physical rebuilding and development of the country, but it includes also matters which relate to social security, questions of health and social welfare. Of course, above all else, it includes the rehabilitation of members of the armed forces and the finding of new employment in peaceful vocations for those now engaged in war industries.

There is one aspect of reconstruction which might be termed economic reconstruction. That has to do largely with the transforming of industry from making war supplies to making goods for human consumption and with restoring and increasing the capital equipment of the nation, together with the provision of employment for those who are being transferred from the one activity to the other. It is in connection with this economic reconstruction that the new Department of Reconstruction of the federal government will be primarily concerned.

On April 17 last I introduced the resolution on which this bill is based and spoke at some length upon aspects of the proposed bill. I do not wish to repeat to-day what was said then, except in one or two particulars. I indicated clearly the need for a department concerned with the work of physical reconstruction. I should like to quote the words which I then used, which will be found on page 2085 of Hansard:

The problem of reconstruction will involve the reemployment of nearly two million Canadians now in the armed forces, the merchant navy or war industry. Employment must be productive and must contribute to a rising standard of living. The great industrial plant created for war purposes must be transformed to meet peace time demands in Canada or abroad. Markets must be found and retained for our greatly increased food production unless we are not to face an agricultural depression. Railways, highways and other capital equipment which has suffered the strain of war must be reconstituted. Civilian aviation and other new means of transport and communication must be developed. Public works and conservation and development projects will be required, particularly while private industries are being converted to peace time operations. New housing, both urban and rural, improvements to existing housing and community planning can contribute at once to the volume of employment and the improvement of the standard of living.

These are merely a few of the directions in which reconstruction planning requires to be carried on. Obviously most, if not all, of these functions relate specifically to some existing department of government.

I wish first to make it perfectly clear that in establishing the Department of Reconstruction the government is not establishing a department which will be primarily an administrative department to carry on under its own immediate officials the work of reconstruction.

The work of reconstruction will necessarily be carried on in largest part, in fact almost entirely, by existing departments of government, and not merely by departments of the federal government, but by departments of provincial governments and municipalities as well. Indeeed, in changing our national economy from a war-time to a peace-time basis, almost every department of government will have some special work to do.

First and foremost there is the obligation to ensure the establishment of what may be most effective in the way of world organization for peace. That in itself is an exceedingly large task. It will involve consideration primarily by the Department of External Affairs, in so far as one department rather than another in Canada may be concerned. It is a task in which bodies, such as the League of Nations Society and the like, will be interested, a great work requiring the assistance of several agencies of government. Probably more than any other single question requiring attention in the post-war period will be the securing of wider markets and the extension of trade.

One hears the question asked very often to-day, Why is it that we are able to do in time of war, and to do so effectively, many of the things which it seems impossible for us to do in time of peace? I should like to answer that question at once from the two points of view. The first is that in time of war, happily, all the united nations have the same purpose and are prepared to work together toward the furthering of a particular end. There has been little difficulty, since this war began, in effecting among the united nations the most complete kind of cooperation toward a particular end. In time of peace, unfortunately, cooperation among nations has been very far from the rule. Instead of nations seeking to work together, for example, toward the expansion of trade generally throughout the world, many nations have taken the view that the way in which more employment can be obtained is for one country to prevent some other country from having its people employed to the extent that they should be. If, as a group of nations interested in having world peace, we of the united nations can help develop trade throughout all parts of the world we shall perhaps be taking the most effective of all steps in the direction of bringing about those conditions which, for Canada particularly, it will be necessary to establish if we are to have the development of our great primary industries carried to the extent that they should be. What we can do in the way of agriculture, the mining, fishing and forestry industries in this country will depend on the markets we are able to obtain, and the markets we are able to obtain will depend on the extent to which the nations of the world come to a correct point of view as to what it is that makes most for the prosperity of all.

We shall do well, I believe, to bear in mind that prosperity is indivisible. It is not something which one nation can have and enjoy by itself; it is something that has to be shared. We shall have to come to see that we are members one of another and that no nation liveth unto itself. As we achieve this larger conception we shall be furthering the fundamental condition required to ensure the fullest employment for the great mass of the men and women in this country.

The second reason, why we have been more successful in time of war in doing some of the things we are unable to effect in peace, is that, under the War Measures Act, the government has constitutional authority to see that its policies are carried out. It is in a position to act for the whole of Canada in regard to the prosecution of the war. In times of peace, on the other hand, we have to strive, in carrying out any policy, to get the good will and effective cooperation of every province, as well as carrying out our own work. I hope and believe, as a result of what has happened during the past five years, and of the cooperation which the federal government has had in large measure from the provincial governments, that following conferences still to be held between the provinces and ourselves we shall be able to work out some means whereby we can, in the period after the war, secure still greater co-operation for the benefit of all.

These two considerations, I believe, will serve to answer the particular question as to why it is that we do effectively in time of war many of the things which we seem unable to do in times of peace. But in connection with any policy of reconstruction there will be matters that relate not only to trade but also to the development of industry and transportation, the development of aviation, of merchant shipping, of irrigation, the development of all our natural resources, housing and community planning, and also many other matters which have been discussed in this house during this session. At the moment I wish to emphasize that reconstruction is not concerned merely with public works and the carrying out of new undertakings of the kind. They will of necessity constitute one phase of the work of reconstruction, and there will be great need for new developments as well as to make up for what has been postponed in that way during the past few years. But reconstruction, in the broad sense of the term, will involve, as I say, not merely what one department of government is in a position to carry out but to a considerable extent what all departments of government can do in a variety of fields.

What is true of the federal government departments is equally true of the governments of the provinces. Fortunately, in the different provinces, some provision has already been made for the work of planning and development. That work in some respects parallels what is or will be carried out in the federal field. It will be necessary, if both federal and provincial policies are to be carried on without waste and overlapping, and if gaps are to be avoided here and there, which may affect the national structure, that some central agency should have the duty of seeing that coordination is effected in the best manner possible. That cannot be done by leaving it without special responsibility to the ministers of the different departments, each of whom is concerned with a particular work. Moreover, what is the concern of all is very often apt to be the least concern of any. It is desirable, therefore, that there should be in the administration at this time, as the country begins to look forward to reverting to an economy for peace, some one minister who will have constantly before him the duty of seeing that what is necessary in the formulation and the carrying out of policies of reconstruction, is effectively undertaken.

The purpose of this bill, which is now before the house for second reading is, as stated in the explanatory note:

> . . . to establish a department of reconstruction under the direction of a minister of reconstruction who shall be responsible for preparing and coordinating plans and projects for reconstruction, and making provision for carrying out such plans with the authorization of the governor in council.

Personally I should have preferred to see that explanatory note worded somewhat differently to bring out the full intent and purpose of its provisions. I should like to have it read:

> The purpose of this bill is to establish a department of reconstruction under the direction of a minister of reconstruction who shall be responsible for seeing that reconstruction plans and projects are prepared or formulated and coordinated, and that provision shall be made for carrying out such plans with the authorization of the governor in council.

As the explanatory note reads, it might be assumed that the minister himself had to make all the plans and administer them. That is not the intention. It will be the minister's duty to see that plans are made. It will also be his duty to see that plans having to do with reconstruction are carried out. But these duties will be carried on in cooperation with his colleagues of other government departments.

In this particular, the present bill follows the example that has been set by the government of the United Kingdom where one minister of the crown has been appointed minister of reconstruction. As hon. members know, some seven months ago Lord Woollton was appointed Minister of Reconstruction in the United Kingdom. When he addressed the House of Lords and described his functions he began by saying that he had no office or permanent staff; that it was his intention to perform the major part of his duties by thinking over the many problems that had to be worked out and presenting suggestions to his colleagues, discussing them in cabinet council with the committee which would be there for the purpose of assisting him in that work. Lord Woollton has carried on very largely in that way. He heads no department of government; he is not the head of a ministry. He is simply the Minister of Reconstruction. He has associated with him experts on different aspects of reconstruction. He consults with them and with a committee of the war cabinet, of which he himself is a member. Plans are then presented to and discussed by the war cabinet or the cabinet as a whole, and work to be carried out is assigned to the appropriate departments of the government.

It is the intention under this bill to appoint as Minister of Reconstruction in Canada one of the ministers of the crown who holds office at the present time, and who heads one of the departments of government. He will continue to administer the department of which he is now the head, but he will also have the special duty of meeting with experts on reconstruction, of meeting with a committee of the cabinet which will be composed of ministers who will also be expected to give their time and thought to the formulating of plans related to reconstruction, and to seeing that these plans are carried out. As part of his duty there will be also the obligation of keeping himself informed with respect to what has been and is being done by the provinces and municipalities, and, as far as it may be possible through consultation with them, and in other ways, of seeking to combine in the most effective way the work of reconstruction of the federal government and of the provincial governments and municipalities.

The difference in scope and in procedure in the present bill from the British procedure where it exists arises out of the difference in our own country from Britain in the matter of jurisdiction with respect to legislative powers. In Britain the central government has charge of pretty nearly everything, except what the municipalities may be charged with. As an example let me make mention of education. As all hon. members know, education in Canada is one of the subjects specially assigned to the provincial governments. I shall not enumerate the different duties of the federal and provincial governments, or what is reserved to one or to the other. As we know, there are instances where both dominion and provincial governments have jurisdiction, for example, in matters relating to agriculture, public works, and immigration. In all of these fields there is jurisdiction in which both the provincial and federal governments share.

In the reconstructing of the nation from a war-time to a peace-time economy, it is important that departments which are doing similar work should work together in harmony as largely as possible, not only as between the dominion and one province but as between the dominion and all the provinces, and between the provinces themselves. Obviously no minister of the crown could by himself be expected to take that work of coordination completely in hand. He would have to have associated with him not only experts but a considerable staff. He would have to have a deputy minister who is in a position to communicate authoritatively with the governments of the provinces, with municipalities, with business organizations, professional organizations, private industries and individuals. For that reason the present bill contemplates the establishment of a department with a deputy minister and with such staff as may be essential for the carrying on of that class of work—not a large staff, because it is not contemplated that this department is going to last for all time. The department is being set up at this time for a special purpose related to special conditions, just as certain departments of the federal government were set up at the beginning of the war to do war work. For example, the Department of Munitions and Supply was set up to carry on an important phase of war work. When the war ends that department will fade out; but, with the preparation for peace and for developing the national economy to further the pursuits of peace, it will be necessary to have some one department that will be specially charged with that all-important work. The Department of Reconstruction will have that particular duty.

I do not think I need to enlarge upon the duties of the minister or the staff. Questions may be answered in detail in committee. I should however like to say a word immediately with respect to the comment that one sometimes hears to the effect that the government is late in setting up this department. Well, I take complete issue with that criticism. First of all, may I say that in its main task, to do what is possible to ensure full employment in the country, the need for this department is not likely to be felt to any considerable extent for some time to come. During the war, as we all know, full employment has developed in the industries essential for carrying on the war. But the war is not over yet. We do not know how long the war in Europe is going to last, and when the war is over in Europe no one will venture to say how long the war against Japan may continue. Certainly this country will continue to do its full share towards an all-out war effort until the war is won both in the orient and in Europe. There is likely to be a very large demand for war materials as long as that period continues; but once the war is over there will be a new kind of demand for materials and services and supplies, which will be very great. That demand will arise in the transitional period from war to peace in the countries of Europe, as well as in our own, and in all countries that have been affected by the war.

The relief and rehabilitation of the peoples of Europe are certainly likely to create a demand for commodities of different kinds which it will be difficult to meet. We all remember what took place at the end of the last war.

The end of the last war was followed by a boom. There has not been on this continent at any time the same sudden increase of demand for supplies, services and labour, as there was in the years immediately following 1918, the years 1919 and 1920. In other words, a boom situation was created, but it was followed by an appalling depression. That is one of the things that we must certainly seek to avoid in dealing with the post-war period. We have the experience of that time before us, and, fortunately, we have the benefit of the careful research that has been carried on in all parts of the world as to its causes, so that to-day we have the knowledge of the action needed to prevent the recurrence of that sort of thing. There again, if this kind of disaster is to be prevented, it seems to me desirable that there should be some member of the government who will have a special responsibility to see that measures to avoid periods of depression and unemployment are carefully thought out, studied in advance and, as far as possible, given effect. The Minister of Reconstruction will have as part of his obligation to see that in planning a long-range view as well as a short range view is taken. Of necessity, immediately the war ends and people begin to be transferred from one employment to another, some men and women will be out of employment for a short time. There will continue to be occupational causes which will tend to throw men out of work at certain seasons of the year. Unemployment of that kind will necessarily occur. But broadly speaking, looking at mass employment as it presents itself over a period of months and years, the period immediately following the close of the war should be a time in which there will be a large demand for labour. The danger will come after that, and the only way it can be met is by careful planning now and in the period of transition, by seeking to effect that kind of cooperation between the provinces and the dominion in our own country, and between our country and other countries, which will help prevent a period of depression.

Another reason why, up to the moment, it has not seemed essential to have a department particularly concerned with reconstruction, a reason perhaps the stronger of the two in its immediate application is that almost since the very beginning of the war a careful study has been carried on by the government, followed later by committees of this parliament, by provincial governments, municipalities, societies, organizations, business and private interests, of matters pertaining to reconstruction in all its phases. I might give the house, in quick succession, the names of some of these committees and make mention of some of the things which already have been done. The war had scarcely begun before the present administration realized that the demobilization and rehabilitation of the men serving overseas would inevitably be an important question that could not receive attention too soon, and a committee of the cabinet to consider this problem was formed before the end of 1939. We in Canada had a committee on the subject of demobilization and rehabilitation before the British government appointed any such committee. Hon. members will recall that Mr. Chamberlain was Prime Minister of Great Britain at the beginning of the war. He was succeeded by Mr. Churchill, and it was not until after Mr. Churchill had been in office for a short time that the British government appointed a committee of the cabinet to study these problems and to prepare policies which would help meet them. On December 9 the cabinet in Canada appointed a committee on demobilization and reestablishment.

Mr. BLACKMORE: In what year?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: On December 9, 1939, a government committee on demobilization and reestablishment was set up. Members of this committee soon realized that demobilization and rehabilitation was only one of the great aspects of the problem of reconstruction. Subsequently the scope of the committee was enlarged, under an order in council dated February 17, 1941, to include all phases of reconstruction, and at the same time an advisory committee on reconstruction was set up on an informal basis. As hon. members will recall, this advisory committee was headed by Principal James of McGill university. The government was anxious to have associated with it, altogether outside the administration, advisers who would go carefully into the problems of reconstruction. On September 2, 1941, this committee was given formal character by order in council. I need not take time at the moment to speak of the work of the James committee, though up to the present far too little reference I think has been made to it. As hon. members are aware, the committee has published a number of valuable reports. The main report, on reconstruction, was published on September 24, 1943. Then there was a special report on the conservation and development of natural resources; a report on publicly-financed construction projects; a report on post-war employment; a report on the post-war problems of women, and a report on housing. These matters have been studied as well by officials of departments of the government during the past year or two, and the government has had the benefit of their reports and reports of the James committee to guide it in its work.

In addition the government recognized at an early stage the service that might be rendered by members of both houses of this parliament in the study of these questions and in a considering of recommendations which might come from any source in any part of Canada. On March 24, 1942, this house established a committee on reconstruction and reestablishment. That committee was reappointed in 1943 and again this year. In 1943 a senate committee on economic reestablishment and social security was appointed. I should like to pause for a moment to thank hon. members of these committees for the assistance they have given and to say, on behalf of the government, how deeply indebted we feel particularly to the special committee on reconstruction of this house, of which the hon. member for Cariboo (Mr. Turgeon) was chairman. That committee was composed of members from all sides of the house. It is generally acknowledged that the chairman discharged his duties to the entire satisfaction of the committee, and that the committee's work has been not only comprehensive but constructively helpful in the fullest meaning of that term. The fact that the house has not discussed at length the various matters referred to in these reports does not mean that the reports themselves have not been useful and of great service to the government. As a matter of fact they have been of the greatest help; they have served as guides to the ministers in charge of the different departments in taking up some of the subjects, and have been helpful to the government in planning its programme. Indeed, one of the recommendations made by the committee of this House of Commons had to do with the establishment of the very department of which I am speaking at the moment. That recommendation was made a year or so ago. The new department has not been set up until the present for reasons I have given already.

I have mentioned only some of the reports that have been made to the federal government by various bodies connected with it. There has been an advisory committee on economic policy appointed on January 23, 1943, composed of senior officials, under the chairmanship of Mr. W. C. Clark. This committee has since been continuously investigating and studying the post-war problems. At that time the James committee became directly responsible to the President of the Privy Council. It presented its final report on September 24, 1943, at which time the advisory committee on economic policy took over its work.

Since the James committee completed its work the advisory committee on economic policy has also taken over the work formerly carried on by the James committee.

If it were needed to specify the extent to which the reports have served as a basis for legislation, I could refer to many matters which have been discussed in the house already, conspicuous among the number being the bill which received third reading only this afternoon, namely the bill establishing a department of veterans' affairs. There has been a full discussion on that measure during the last few days. There could be no better evidence that the government has not been neglecting the question of reconstruction than the measures already enacted pertaining to war veterans' affairs. We began with the most important of all, namely, those matters which pertain to the demobilization and rehabilitation of the armed forces. I think the house must now be convinced that not only was a very comprehensive programme outlined, but that already in the main it has been enacted and is now in force.

What is true of the Department of Veterans' Affairs, and the work concerning war veterans, is true to no lesser extent of some of the other work of the government pertaining to reconstruction. I might refer, for example, to matters pertaining to the expansion of trade which have been a special concern of the departments of external affairs, trade and commerce and finance. Many of our war policies have been and will prove to be of the greatest possible assistance in connection with the post-war effort. In fact, in shaping all our war policies we have had the post-war situation very much in mind.

Let me deal with some of these policies. We have been seeking not to build up intergovernmental debts between nations. It will be recalled this was the first obstacle that confronted the nations once the last war was over. Our aim there, in concert with other nations, has been to prevent an accumulation and combination of obligations. The system of Mutual Aid has for its object the avoidance of unwieldy debts between governments, as well as helping to effect an all-out war effort, and give maximum employment to our own people. Exchange control and price control policies will also help in trading relations of the future. The work in connection with UNRRA, which has to do with relief and rehabilitation in the devastated areas and starving populations of Europe, is a great work which has been established in this period of war, but all of which relates to the post-war period. It will have much to do with maintaining a high level of employment in Canada for some time to come. All of this will have to do with increasing our production—production in agriculture, mines, fisheries and forests. On the orderly resumption of external trade and its expansion, the prosperity of agriculture, the forest industries, mining, fishing and many of our manufacturing industries depend. So that it is folly for anyone to say that, up to the present time, little or nothing has been done by way of reconstruction, just because one particular department bearing that name, and having the purposes in view I have mentioned, has not been established until now. The establishment of the department is only the latest of a long list of measures designed to further the work of reconstruction.

There have been discussions on monetary matters. We have not waited until the war was over to have those matters explored; they are being explored at the present time. I cannot say how successful they may be. At any rate, wherever in the past experience has shown failure, we have tried to anticipate a similar situation and to meet it before it occurs again. The government will assist wherever it can in the development of international arrangements concerning currency and trade, the government intends to join in a progressive freeing of world trade from the whole network of quotas, payment agreements and other similar restrictions and a progressive reduction of tariffs.

Several measures have been introduced at this session, or are about to be introduced, which relate to reconstruction in the post-war period. They are based in large part upon studies which have been carefully carried out either by government officials or by committees of the house, or have come to the government from other sources. For example, there is a measure to guarantee or ensure export credits, to which reference was made in the speech from the throne. That measure will be introduced shortly. Then there is provision for the expansion of the trade commissioner service, which was also forecast in the speech from the throne.

Hon. members will recall that the house is discussing in some detail matters respecting civil aviation and aeronautics. These are measures which relate to the post-war rather than to the war period. For two years past an interdepartmental committee has been at work on civil aviation. The government's policy—a complete plan—was outlined to the house a year ago. A draft international agreement has been put forward by Canada. There is an interdepartmental committee on merchant shipping actively at work considering post-war shipping policies which will be required.

In connection with the work of industrial conversion, hon. members will recall that in November of last year a crown assets allocation committee and War Assets Corporation Ltd. was set up by order in council. Only the night before last a bill respecting the disposition of surplus crown assets passed the house. That bill dealt with obsolete and unused war materials.

An industrial development bank bill was introduced in February of this year and has since been passed. There has been a constant study by different departments and agencies of government of the general problems of reconversion of industry. These matters have been considered specially by the Department of Munitions and Supply, the wartime prices and trade board and the advisory committee on economic policy. Later, as forecast in the speech from the throne, there will be some tax modifications to encourage industrial conversion, and also there will be an expansion of research.

Only this afternoon an hon. member referred to the government's promise to appoint a fuel commission, to consider problems of the coal industry. That commission has not yet been established; but it will be. Its work will have relation to matters pertaining to the post-war period in that great industry.

I might mention another very important measure already passed, namely the Unemployment Insurance Act. Hon. members may forget that measure was enacted since the war began. It was passed by this parliament in July, 1940. We were not waiting until the war was over to take steps to prepare for possible conditions of post-war unemployment.

Similarly, we have taken action with respect to an employment service, and hon. members know that national selective service has been developed. It will have to work in reverse when we reach the close of hostilities and the return to the pursuits of peace. Much has been done by way of war-time vocational training, which is providing experience and organization for post-war technical training.

The promise was made in the speech from the throne—and it will be implemented, as all the other measures so promised are being implemented—for a floor under farm prices after the war. Again, the government is not waiting until the war is over to make provision for the post-war. Provision is being made for agricultural credits, through the Bank Act as revised, and a farm improvement credit bill which has been introduced.

Similarly, provision for credit to fishermen is being made in the Bank Act, and special study is being given to the post-war problems of the fishing industry.

I should also mention one of the most important pieces of legislation namely that respecting housing. As yet, that legislation has not been brought in, but hon. members are aware that for the last two years the government has been giving special consideration to the housing problem, and has been carrying on active work in that connection. On may 11, a preview was given by the Minister of Finance (Mr. Ilsley) of some features of housing legislation. Recently a national adviser on community planning was appointed by the Minister of Finance.

I could speak further about the public works development and the valuable recommendations of the House of Commons committees in the past two sessions and of the James committee which are being or will be implemented. As I already said, the new Department of Reconstruction will have the duty of formulating policies and coordinating activities of various federal departments and agencies; also the vital task of working out cooperation with the provinces which, because they control natural resources, are largely concerned with this field.

By a further step, we hope to ensure more effective cooperation between the provinces and ourselves through holding, before long we hope, a dominion-provincial conference, to take up some of the questions which must be squarely faced, if conditions in the post-war period are to be adequately met.

Mr. GRAYDON: Is it the intention of the government to wait until this session is concluded before holding the dominion-provincial conference, or is it intended to hold it before?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I cannot say as to that. What I do say is this, that I hope when that conference is held it will be held under circumstances which will permit of the attendance of representatives of all the provinces—not only of a certain number. Meanwhile extensive preparations for the conference are already under way. I also hope that it will meet at a time when it can do effective work. I am not at all sure that, if it were a choice between waiting until parliament had risen in a month's time and having a conference then, that would not be preferable to holding the conference before an adjournment. On the other hand, if parliament is going to continue in session until December I certainly think we ought to have the conference a considerable time before then.

Mr. GRAYDON: I hope that that is not one of the government's objectives.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: No, indeed not.

Mr. BLACKMORE: Will the Prime Minister permit a question?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Yes.

Mr. BLACKMORE: Can he tell us whether any one or all of these committees on reconstruction acting together have suggested to him any source of money with which to do all these things, other than debt or taxation?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: May I say to my hon. friend that I do not contemplate difficulty in carrying on reconstruction work, during the period of reconstruction, on the score of being unable to raise the money that is necessary for it.

Mr. BLACKMORE: Without increasing our debt?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I will put it this way to my hon. friend. In this period of war we have been able to raise money through loans and taxation, for what purpose? For the purpose mainly of spending the money on destruction, on the destruction of property, the destruction of community and national life, and human lives; all of which indicates that instead of having our taxes serve a useful constructive purpose, they are serving, of necessity—it is not our fault, it is part of the penalty of war—the needs of destruction. When the whole picture is reversed, and it comes to be a matter of carrying out constructive work, work for the rebuilding of communities, for the supplying of homes, and the needs of homes, the necessaries and conveniences of life, many of which have been absolutely prohibited in the period of war, there is going to be a demand for employment the like of which has not arisen at any other time, and as one want is satisfied another want is sure to be created. My hon. friend remembers, I suppose, the little fable of the man who cut away at a tree and every time he took one chip out two appeared in its place. That mythical tale has always seemed a bit of a mystery to me, but I think I realize what was meant. I think it applies to human need —or human greed, if you wish it. The minute you satisfy one need or want you create two more.

I will illustrate. The moment a man is fortunate enough to get a house he immediately wants to have the house properly furnished.

Mr. GRAYDON: He wants a wife.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: That is a want that may be satisfied as far as some hon. gentlemen are concerned; I hope it will be in the case of others before too long a time expires.

If he gets a wife, if he is fortunate enough to have a wife, she will have half a dozen demands that he will never have thought of.

Mr. BRUCE: You are optimistic.

Mr MACKENZIE KING: If they are fortunate enough they will have a small family after a time, the needs and wants of all of whom will have to be supplied. And so it goes on. When a man has his house and his grounds and the rest of it he will want to travel by motor car, and when he has travelled by motor car and is free to go where he pleases by motor he will not be satisfied with that; he will want to go to another country and stay at some fashionable hotel, and so it goes. That is the way progress is made, through demands which arise from conditions of peace and prosperity; and where you get demands of the kind which lead to the fuller employment of labour I do not think my hon. friend need fear about the increase of the public debt or taxation to accomplish these things. If we can get a sufficiently large demand for labour through an increasing demand for goods and commodities and things which are constructive and serviceable, I believe the nation can go ahead with the great work of construction and reconstruction and at the same time reduce its taxation and reduce its debt. That at least is what I would hope to do if this government is in office when that period comes.

Mr. BLACKMORE: Were not all these demands in operation from 1930 to 1935? If they were, why did they not result in an increase of production?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I will answer my hon. friend in a word. This government was not in power at that time.

Mr. BLACKMORE: It was in power from 1935 to 1940.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I hope the hon. member will remember that and that the people will remember it when they come to think over the cause of depression and what makes for prosperity. However, I answered a moment ago my hon. friend's question in that regard. I have given him already the explanation, that in large part it has been the mistaken policies of nations believing that one nation's prosperity could be secured by lessening in some way the prosperity of other nations; if that kind of thing is repeated in the world, we certainly are going to have periods of depression again. But I do hope that new ideas, liberal ideas, are gaining ground throughout the world, and that they will have their effect in helping to remove some of these impediments to progress which have been encountered so far.

Mr. BLACKMORE: I am looking for one of these ideas.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I have perhaps gone further afield than I intended to. The success of reconstruction generally will depend primarily upon the achievement of a high level of employment and production, that is so far as reconstruction in the narrower sense of the word is concerned; these things relate largely to economic reconstruction: but it will depend also to a large extent upon adequate provision for the health and welfare of the people, and their insurance against major social and economic hazards. If we are fortunate enough to succeed in getting through this measure which relates to economic reconstruction, I shall hope to bring immediately forward another measure which I trust will be effective in making some further provision for the health and the welfare of the people, and for meeting some of the social and economic needs of our time.

Mr. J. R. MacNICOL (Davenport): When the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) read over the explanatory note he suggested that it would have been better if it had had a few extra words. With that I agree. If I remember, the Prime Minister said that after the word "plans" something like the following should be added, "are prepared and coordinated and must be carried out." I believe that if that suggestion of the Prime Minister is acted upon by the coming minister of reconstruction, something worthwhile will be done.

Before proceeding with what I propose to say I should like to make a short reference to the parliamentary reconstruction committee. I have not sat on any previous committee of which the members, irrespective of party, were as nearly unanimous in suggesting a plan and a programme and more ready to listen to plans and programmes than were the members of this committee. There was no conflict between them. The witnesses who came before the committee were as a whole earnest, capable men and women of high calibre, and some of our advisers may fairly be described as brilliant. I ought to say, too, that we had an excellent chairman. I might say more if he were not sitting in this chamber. He was an indefatigable worker; he must have been sitting up all hours of the night making plans and preparations to invite before the committee those whom the steering committee and himself thought would be best capable of making helpful proposals.

I am glad that the government has accepted the recommendation of the committee and is now setting up a department of reconstruction. I believe that the first report of the committee that asked for the setting up of such a department was tabled in this house on June 23, 1943. The committee's recommendation read:

> In view of all the foregoing, your committee recommends that the Canadian government give immediate consideration to your committee's strong opinion that the government should take the necessary steps either by the establishment of some body, to be organized under ministerial responsibility, or otherwise to provide for the carrying out of works such as those contemplated in the preceding portions of this report.

Then in its fourth report tabled on January 26 the committee through its chairman presented similar recommendations. I rise, Mr. Speaker, to support the motion for the second reading of the bill which has just been introduced by the Prime Minister to establish a department of reconstruction.

Six provinces in all appeared before the committee. The three other provinces have since, I believe, set up their own reconstruction committees. Each one of the provinces that appeared before the committee advanced very constructive proposals for after-the-war rehabilitation of returned soldiers and of those employed in industry. Perhaps I should say a word about the proposals of one or two of the provinces that appeared before the committee.

I did not happen to be present when the maritime provinces appeared before the committee; I had to be away on that occasion. The province of Saskatchewan appeared before the committee and made very constructive suggestions, the carrying out of which would mean a great deal to the province itself and would provide much employment. There is no reason why such a large programme should not be carried out. The Saskatchewan programme covered such matters as public works, universities, schools, roads, the improvement of the telephone system, reforestation, a fire prevention programme, parks, mapping and so forth. The whole programme was estimated to cost between $175,000,000 and $200,000,000. The carrying out of a programme of that magnitude could not, of course, be done within a year or two. I have forgotten the length of their programme but I believe it was to take five years or more. I hope that when the representatives of the Saskatchewan government come down here after the war to ask for assistance in carrying out the programme which the recent government of that province submitted they will receive support from this parliament.

The same thing might be said of the Alberta proposals. I shall give just one example of after-the-war rehabilitation proposals that were submitted by the Alberta government, because I do not want to go into too much detail. The Alberta government did submit a programme of which I personally am strongly in favour, namely an irrigation programme. They set out the programme in detail for irrigating one million acres not now irrigated. Anyone who has travelled through southern Alberta and has seen, as I have seen, the tremendous results that accrue from a policy of irrigation—it is a self-liquidating project, paying for its cost by the returns—could not but support the irrigation programme submitted by the Alberta government. They pointed out that their programme would mean 9,500 new farms receiving water from the irrigation canals, farms which would produce crops such as are now produced on irrigated land in southern Alberta. If that programme were carried out it would mean an increase in population of some 50,000 people in the province. Think for a moment of the increase there would be in employment from the opening up of 9,500 new sure-crop farms. It would mean 9,500 new homes, with all that pertains to the construction of a home and all that is installed within a home, and all the equipment necessary to operate a farm. As was proven by the Alberta submission, and as those who study irrigation know, irrigation projects liquidate themselves by the returns that come from each irrigated acre. The programme of the Alberta government is one that to my mind would provide not only large employment in Alberta but also very considerable employment in factories down here in Ontario, in Quebec and in the maritime provinces. One cannot conceive of an increase of 50,000 in population and the construction of 9,500 new homes and the opening up of that many new farms without realizing the tremendous ramifications of employment that would result from such a programme, extending not only to Manitoba, Saskatchewan and British Columbia as well as Alberta but all across Canada.

These are two examples of the programmes submitted by different provinces that appeared before the committee. Each province had its own problems and programmes, and perhaps before I sit down I shall perhaps make a recapitulation of some of them. I have no doubt whatever that, whoever the new minister of this department may be, he will be seized of the importance of expanding the irrigation systems in Alberta and creating new ones and making available the necessary water as a means of providing a vast amount of employment. It is a project which will cost this country in the long run not a single dollar. When you stop to think that one square mile of non-irrigated prairie has an average of three people living on it—and there are miles of prairie that are bare of population—while one square mile of irrigated land in southern Alberta has an average of twenty-nine people living on it, one can see that every square mile of irrigated land will mean an average increase of twenty-six people, totalling up to an increase of 50,000 in population, it will be realized what a very great increase in employment would come in a number of directions from the development of such projects.

Ontario has set up its own rehabilitation committee, and I am glad to see that the minister of public works of the province has announced within the last two or three days an after-the-war rehabilitation programme which includes a road development programme in Ontario to cost $150,000,000, for widening some roadways, straightening others, making roads run the shortest distance between two points such as the road between Hamilton and Toronto and the road from Toronto to Windsor and building new roads. This programme of shortening and straightening and widening the roads will ensure faster and safer traffic; it will be of great benefit to the province as a whole, and will provide an immense amount of labour.

I agree with the Prime Minister that if we all work together, the dominion, the provinces and the municipalities, and make an honest effort to see to it that not a man or woman is unemployed in Canada after the war, we can do it. There is no reason why there should be any unemployment in this country if only we will put our shoulders to the wheel and work towards that objective. The Ontario government in its announced policy will carry on a programme of reforestation. That is a programme in which every province can engage. We know that at the present time not all lumber men are compelled when they cut down one tree to plant another in its place. That principle should be made universal throughout Canada. When a tree is cut down in a forest another should be planted in its place. The Ontario government's reforestation programme is one line of endeavour that will help.

The Prime Minister will remember that ten years ago, after I had made an exhaustive survey of the flood-proofing works on rivers of the northern United States, and a similar survey in Great Britain, where they have flood-proofing works on the rivers that flow into the Wash—I can think of one river called the Cam or Ouse—I advocated something of the sort in this house during the time of the Bennett government's regime. At that time conditions were bad in this country—not through any fault of the Bennett government, but simply because there was a world depression. At that time I felt we should have a programme of flood control and water conservation works, but my advice was not followed nor was it followed under the present Prime Minister's first government in 1935 when the late very capable and energetic Minister of Labour, the Hon. Norman Rogers, was in office. I advocated a programme of flood control, and I was glad to see, not as a result of my advocacy, although I had some part in it, that the present government and the Ontario government cooperated to build a dam on the Grand river, known as the Shand dam, three miles north of the town of Fergus, the first flood control and water conservation project in Canada, so far as I know. It was designed for that purpose. I recommended—but I do not claim credit for its adoption—that the cost be 37½ per cent to this government, 37½ per cent to Ontario and 25 per cent to the municipalities, and that was the division of costs finally adopted. The Ontario government is now envisioning a flood control programme for the Thames river, and I suggest that this government should encourage in all the provinces similar flood control-water conservation programmes. There again large demands will be made for employment, and not merely for employment at the works, but for making all the material that enters into the construction of such work—steel, cement, stone, lumber, nails and everything else and, where there is water power, dynamos and so forth.

I am convinced that if we can measure up to the stature of this country—and I hope the new minister will prove equal to the task—there need be no unemployment in Canada after the war. In this connection I would point out that the reconstruction committee had the support of the Minister of Pensions and National Health under whom it operated. It had the benefit of the advice which he had submitted to us. Among those who came before the reconstruction committee were the mayors and representatives of municipalities. They submitted a splendid programme to the committee. It showed, as the mayors appeared before us, that they were alive to their individual city problems, and I am happy to say that, as the Prime Minister admits, throughout the country the municipalities are cooperating and making their own plans and programmes.

Toronto has gone a long distance in its programme for the post-war period. On January 26, 1943, the present mayor, Doctor Fred J. Conboy, set up a very large reconstruction body which was subdivided into ten committees, on which there are 118 of the most prominent business men, engineers, educationists and representatives of other callings in Toronto. They have prepared an exhaustive report setting out what Toronto proposes to do following the war. I have no doubt that Montreal, Quebec, Halifax, Saint John, Winnipeg, Calgary, Edmonton, Vancouver, Victoria and other cities, including Ottawa, will do likewise. That, too, will help; so that the new minister will have his hands full in coordinating all the activities that are going on. To my mind there is no time to waste. The plans should be coordinated and the programme got under way. Indeed there are many engineers who are out of employment to-day who could be put to work, and I am sure they would be glad to go to work lining up programmes throughout the country.

The Toronto committee to which I have referred surveyed every conceivable type of post-war construction applicable to that city, covering employment and commerce, rehabilitation of armed forces, and so on and so forth. They went into great detail. I have no doubt the new minister, or the present head of the Department of Pensions and National Health, who headed our own reconstruction committee, will have received from the Toronto construction council a copy of their voluminous report. After careful inquiry into between two and three thousand industrial plants in Toronto, and after making a survey in conjunction with members of the board of trade, chamber of commerce and all the others associated with them, they report in this volume that it will be necessary in Toronto to find employment for between 330,000 and 350,000 men and women after the war, in which number will be included 75,000 to 100,000 members of the armed forces. That will be a big undertaking, but it can be met and the problem solved if, as I say, we all put our shoulders to the wheel and proceed with a firm resolve to see that there shall be no unemployment when the war ends.

The Toronto Transportation commission have a very big programme in view which will give for several years a large volume of employment in connection with reconstruction activity. The Prime Minister has likely seen the plan of extension of their car lines out into the country and of bringing subways down through the city. Fortunately they have a lot of money on hand which they have saved out of their present revenue. They will ask for some support from here; and I have no doubt that the reconstruction minister would use the funds at his disposal and spread them out as far as they can go so that there will be no unemployment anywhere. But it is fortunate that the Toronto Transportation commission have a large sum of money on hand to start with. They are developing another programme which may go a long way in the future toward increasing rapid traffic throughout Ontario. I have seen proposals of certain large stores in Toronto to equip their roofs to receive helicopters when that mode of transportation gets to the point where it can be used. I am told that there is in the United States a large school which has many students at the present time who are training to become helicopter flyers. One can easily visualize what it will mean if they ever reach the stage of perfection, and it looks as if they are getting there now if they have not already arrived there, if one can judge from what they are doing. The Toronto Transportation commission have that service in view. When you add that to their electric transportation and their buses, they would be—I believe they are to-day—the greatest transportation system in any municipality in Canada. They would then be able to carry their efforts much farther and make more business. As the Prime Minister so well intimated, business makes business. We all live off one another. If we shall only be confident and not fold up, but keep going, there will not be any unemployment after the war.

Another committee that appeared before us was the Canadian Construction association. Like every other member on the reconstruction committee I was amazed at and pleased with the fine submission and programme submitted by the Canadian Construction association to our reconstruction committee. May I just touch on one or two items? They had carefully worked out detailed programmes, with all the costs, facts and figures available, based on a thorough survey made throughout Canada by architects and engineers. They submitted to the committee a proposal to the effect that with the expenditure of $3,600,000,000 on a six-year construction programme after the war they could provide work for 787,000 men or women or both for every $800,000,000 expended. This programme envisaged the construction of necessary buildings and works and was based up to $800,000,000 worth of construction work in a year. Therefore, if one divides $3,600,000,000 by $800,000,000 and multiplies the answer by 787,000, a total can be arrived at as to the amount of labour that could be provided in a construction programme of that size. It was very encouraging to every member of the committee to see that these men, who are big men, had gone to the great trouble of not only surveying but of compiling their statistics. I cannot believe that there will be any unemployment after the war if we use our heads, if we all work together and make certain that in this country, a land flowing with milk and honey and with incomparable resources, the like of which no other country in the world has, with opportunities to produce power and everything else that is required, opportunities are afforded to take advantage of our resources, there would be no unemployment in Canada.

We had representatives of labour come before us. We found them very satisfactory and in earnest that there should be no unemployment after the war. If labour cooperates with everybody else, as honest labour always does, they will help materially. Labour has many good sane leaders. I do not know any who are not in that class. With good sane leadership labour can and will assist in seeing to it that there will be no unemployment in this country after the war. We also had representatives from the department of the Minister of Mines and Resources (Mr. Crerar). I was about to say that those representatives dealt with not a big matter, but one that is filled with a good deal of hope. They came before us to explain the building up of the fur industry which the minister himself has been initiating during the last two or three years. That will result in a lot of employment among certain classes of people who do not get much employment. I was greatly pleased with what the representatives of the department told the committee with respect to the proposed fur production programme of the Department of Mines and Resources and how it would result in giving employment. I cannot touch on many items; I mention them as they come to my mind. The one I have just mentioned is only one of many such programmes that were submitted to the committee.

We had the coal men before us. I may say that the hon. member for Cape Breton South (Mr. Gillis) was a great help to us in elucidating the programme presented by the coal people. With a national coal programme in Canada after the war there is no reason why we should not be able to give thousands upon thousands more of coal men work in the coal mines of Nova Scotia, New Brunswick, Alberta, British Columbia and wherever else there are mines. If we would only use our heads, Your Honour, there would not need to be any unemployment in this country. If we all work together, thinking only of Canada, we would prevent an unemployment problem in Canada after the war.

I should like to refer to one gentleman who came before the committee, a humble, capable man from Alberta, from my hon. friend's constituency of Medicine Hat (Mr. Gershaw), Mr. David Hayes. I hope that the new minister will study carefully the proposals made by David Hayes of the Canada Land and Irrigation company. This man has given splendid service to this country in that dry belt. With the expenditure of a few million dollars he could continue his present irrigation programme up to the environs of Medicine Hat. Anyone who wanted to see what a dried-out area is needs only to go west from Medicine Hat. I went over the area very carefully last summer. It would break one's heart to see the abandoned houses and barns and to think of the effect that it must have on that fine city of Medicine Hat. What an effect it would have if those works west of Medicine Hat were completed and, instead of there being 200,000 acres of non-irrigated land growing nothing, they were irrigated, as they could be and made productive if the Canada Land and Irrigation company were given assistance. A non-productive area adds nothing to the national wealth of the country. But an area producing all sorts of crops that could be produced with the help of irrigation water which is available if we would only store it and convey it, means additional national wealth and much employment besides.

I must hurry along. The Canadian Manufacturers' association made a submission to the senate committee. Their submission asked several important questions. I think the Prime Minister alluded to the sum and substance of them. I shall place them on Hansard. No. 1 was as follows:

> To what extent will other countries abolish import and exchange restrictions and quotas and reduce their customs tariffs? There has been some talk of this but as yet no action.
> 2. To what extent will exchanges be stabilized? For example, what might be the effect of the comprehensive proposals announced recently by the British and American governments for the stabilization of exchanges?
> 3. Many of our members have greatly increased their exports through imperial preferential tariffs. What is to be the future of these preferences?
> 4. To what extent will the system of lend-lease be continued after the war?

Therefore the Prime Minister was quite right in referring to conditions that might take place after the war. The members of the Canadian Manufacturers' association submitted those possibilities, and of course everything is predicated upon what can be done. I understand that the two to three thousand manufacturing plants in Toronto have already made plans for about $95,000,000 worth of additions in buildings alone, but to equip those buildings as they should be equipped will mean the investment of another $225,000,000 in machines and tools. Just fancy what that will mean after the war to the tool manufacturing companies throughout eastern Canada, which to-day are running full blast on war production. I have said before, but it is worth repeating, that if we all get together and do our part to see that men and women obtain employment after this war, by developing this country, there need not be any unemployment.

I should like to speak for a moment or two on one other matter. In addition to new buildings and equipment and the development of natural resources, there are in all parts of the country projects which I could name, if it were not for wearying the house, which would provide employment for hundreds of thousands of men. I could mention projects from Cape Breton right across the country to Vancouver and Victoria, east to west and south to north for a thousand miles; just lying there, waiting for the work to be done which will not only provide employment but open up this country. That is what we want.

I wish to say a word about the human element. I was greatly struck by an editorial which appeared in the Toronto Star of May 29. According to the Star it might be inferred that the magnificent performance of the Russians in driving the Germans back from Stalingrad, and the Russians' marvellous feats of fighting, could be the result of the physical training they were given before the war. I am going to suggest that the new minister of reconstruction bring in a programme of sports and physical exercises, and I do not mean sport just for the fun of it but sport for the development of the physique of Canadians, so that they may receive the benefits of good physical training. According to this report, in 1914 the Russians had only 250 sports clubs with about 30,000 members; but as they saw the marvellous contributions made to the life of their nation by strong men and strong women, they introduced physical culture classes into their universities; they began to train instructors, and by 1940 they had 50,000 sports clubs of one kind or another, fifty technical schools training instructors, and physical culture classes in universities. As a result they have been able to do things we never conceived they would be able to do when war broke out. We in Canada can do likewise, and in so doing create a great deal of business. I do not know if we have been told how much business and employment a huge physical programme would give, but just think for a moment what would result if we had 10,000 clubs in Canada training young men in all kinds of good, healthy sports, such as baseball, football, hockey, running, and so on. Think what that would mean in equipment. I saw some figures on this matter, but unfortunately I do not have them with me. In addition to the monetary side of the picture, however, I am sure the country would greatly profit from the development of the physical life of our people.

Then, just to give an idea of what can be done, a short time ago I had the privilege of visiting a very great friend of the Prime Minister, Jack Miner. He suggested a programme of rehabilitation which I have not heard mentioned by anyone else. The work he does at Kingsville, Ontario, in connection with wild life conservation brings thousands of tourists and creates a good deal of employment. He said to me, "Why could we not have all over Canada sanctuaries such as I have here; in Alberta, in Saskatchewan, in northern Ontario, away up in Athabaska, and so on?" That would provide employment; that would give training to the people, and I thought it was a very happy suggestion.

Mr. GRAYDON: He is in a class by himself.

Mr. MacNICOL: Yes, I can tell my hon. friend that Jack Miner is one of the greatest men living to-day, in any country. I have in my hand a pamphlet published by the national association of manufacturers of the United States from which I should like to quote two or three sentences in conclusion. The pamphlet is entitled "Jobs—Freedom—Opportunity" and reads in part as follows:

> By jobs we mean regular employment at productive work for everybody able and willing to work—jobs which provide good working conditions and pay fair wages for the work done, jobs which produce those things and give those services which people need, jobs which we select of our own free will and are free to change if we wish—in a word, jobs which create the welfare and prosperity necessary to protect ourselves, our families, and our nation in the years and generations to come. . . .
> By freedom we mean the right to live under a government which is the servant, not the master, of the people—without fear that a dictator or his henchmen will control us, watch our actions, listen to our words, tell us what to read, where to live, what to buy, where to work, whom to marry, who our friends can be. Freedom, the freedom for which we are fighting, is the freedom which enables us to choose for ourselves, to make our own decisions. . . .
> By opportunity we mean the chance to work and get ahead under our own steam, the chance to plan for our own future, to raise our children with assurance that they can grow and learn and live with that self-respect which is the right of free men.

That is the right of free men. Jobs of a hundred and one different kinds must be available. That is why I rise to support the proposal to set up a Department of Reconstruction. I hope the minister of that department will follow out the suggestion which has been made, that of coordinating his plans, and getting things under way now. Let him engage engineers and draftsmen of one kind and another to have the plans coordinated, so that when the war is over he will be able to send men here and there and everywhere. That does not mean that he must take men from Ontario and send them to the west. No; that would not be necessary. Let him give the west a chance to live. If a number of things are done, one of which I have mentioned—and I shall mention others later on, on another occasion—and if the west is given a chance, the people of the west will become buyers. They will send to the east—to here, there and everywhere throughout Canada—orders which will provide thousands of men in the east with jobs in factories.

Let us give every part of Canada a chance to live. I am one who says that we have not given the west a fair chance. I shall not say anything further on the point at this time. May I state briefly that I am behind the proposal to set up a ministry of reconstruction.

Mr. J. G. TURGEON (Cariboo): Mr. Speaker, speaking to this matter of reconstruction I would be untrue to myself if I were not immediately to put on record some of the thoughts already expressed by me to audiences outside the House of Commons respecting the manner in which the committee on reconstruction and reestablishment has carried on its work.

As has been said before, the members of that committee come from every geographical division of Canada. They are representative of practically every school of political thought in the land; and yet at no time did party politics ever intrude, or cast its shadow across our discussions and deliberations. As chairman of that committee may I express to the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) my appreciation not only of the words he used to-day when referring to the committee, but of the manner which he, as Prime Minister and President of the Privy Council, and his government have given consideration to the various recommendations contained in the reports of that committee.

When the Prime Minister spoke he referred in eloquent terms to the nature of the work accomplished by the expenditure of money during a time of war, and he contrasted the expenditure of money in war time with the expenditure of equal or necessary sums of money for peace-time purposes. In view of what he said I should like to read part of one paragraph from the report of the committee, which was tabled by me in June, 1943. We said:

> When war is over some other definite aim must take its place as a motivating cause of national economic activity. Thoughts of those who return to us from the field of battle and of the dependents of those who die, and of what they fought and died for, will supply the aim. Your committee is certain that the means of doing so will be found in the conservation and proper utilization of our natural resources, and in the decision that markets will be sought for our production by governmental intervention where necessary from time to time. In this respect we welcome the conclusion arising from the united nations food conference that never again will food be destroyed simply because people have not enough money to buy it.

A little later in the few minutes during which I shall address the house—because I intend to close at six o'clock—I shall make reference to the manner in which money may be procured, if emergency should arise. Before doing that, however, I would turn to some other matters, and would deal first with a further statement appearing in the report of the committee in January:

> Your committee feel that it is well within the power of governments and industry to maintain full employment for all Canadians during the period of transition from war to peace-time activities.

Then we went on to deal with the provisions which must be—I was going to say "ought" to be, but I believe "must" is the better word—made for the returning veterans. In that connection I would call the attention of the house to paragraph (e) of section 2 of the bill, where we find the definition of the word "reconstruction". It says:

> "Reconstruction" means the reestablishment in civil life and reemployment on demobilization of the men and women of the armed services, of persons released from war industries, and the reorganization of industry, in order to provide maximum production and full employment during and following the change-over from war-time production of industry to peace-time production, and includes every undertaking by dominion, provincial or municipal authority or by any corporation or other person which may contribute to such reorganization.

I agree with the Prime Minister as to the change he suggested in the explanatory note, but it would be difficult to give to the department duties of a more general or more onerous nature. This, therefore, is a recognition of the fact that the government realizes and is determined to carry out every step necessary to maintain economic activity in the days of peace. The definition includes the two phases set out to-day by the Prime Minister, namely, those of domestic and international economies, depending upon trade and commerce which, in turn, depend upon the relations between Canada and other nations of the world.

The Prime Minister made a brief reference to the fact that the conduct of Canada during this period of war has been a sort of preface to the work which must necessarily be done by Canada in days of peace. I should like to bring to the attention of hon. members the truth of that statement. We have debated, and there has been discussed in the country, the question of mutual aid, and all it implies. I shall not go into details in that matter. This mutual aid policy has built up in favour of Canada an extremely good feeling among those allied nations in the company of which Canada is fighting this war against Germany and Japan—and formerly against Italy.

Then we must consider the conduct of the war, as it is carried on partly by civilians, governmental officials and others, and especially by the youth of Canada who to-day and for some years past have been fighting the battles of those of us who must remain at home. The nature of the struggle they have been carrying on is such that when, the war being over, a minister of the crown or a government official comes to deal with officials of other nations with a view to bringing about trade and commerce or any other interrelation, he will have had the way paved for him by the courage and determination of our young men and women who are fighting our battles overseas to-day and who in the future will be fighting on the Pacific against Japan.

While trade and commerce are absolutely essential to the maintenance of a full economy, I believe that, regardless of the good relations we hope and feel assured will be ours when the war is done, we can never be certain of the nature and course of entangling alliances when the war is over. We hope for the best, and so long as the present Prime Minister is at the helm of affairs those relations will be of the best. My point is that, regardless of what we may attain by international trade and commerce, it is the supreme duty of the government and this house to make certain that in any event our domestic economy will be in proper condition from the time this war ends, and for all the time following.

Mr. BLACKMORE: Hear, hear. Now you are talking.

Mr. TURGEON: Although industry in many lines is essential, the proper development of our national economy depends on the welfare of the foundation industry of agriculture. I sincerely hope, and I feel positive not only from conversations with the Prime Minister and his ministers but from the wording of this bill, from which time will not permit me to quote much, that the government of Canada are determined that the moment the war is over, at long last they are going to give the agricultural population of Canada that for which they have been striving for generations. The evidence of that is to be found not only in this bill, but in the Farm Improvement Loans Act, in all the facilities for credit for agriculturists, in the determination that from now on those who are engaged in agriculture in all its branches shall be put in the same position as men who gain their living in other branches of our economic system.

In speaking of agriculture I must not neglect to say a word for the branch which is concerned with cattle and live stock generally. I throw out this strong warning—if I may use that word—to the Prime Minister, that as soon as the war in Europe is over—by which I mean that we must reach this point before we have finished the war with Japan—this government must act with dispatch and with energy to make sure that the cattle-men of Canada are once more given that free access to the markets of the United States which the Prime Minister, through his own work, secured for them in the late fall of 1935 and renewed in 1938. Those cattle-men have not this market to-day. They are accepting the situation because of the conditions of war, but we must make certain that that market is returned to them at the earliest moment when war conditions are such that there is no reason why the United States boundary should be closed to our live stock producers.

Another thought occurs to me in connection with agriculture; it relates to secondary industry as well, but for the moment I am dealing with farming. A budget is now in course of preparation. I am making no definite recommendations with respect to it, but I call to the attention of the Ministry of Finance (Mr. Ilsley)—and I do so now because in this bill we are preparing for the days of reconstruction—that farmers generally, but perhaps cattle-men especially, have paid a severe ratio of taxation. The period before 1935 was a time when they had no markets; their market in the United States was opened in 1936; and the period of three or four or five years immediately before the war included some very lean years, when they were selling cattle in my Cariboo country for one to one and a half cents a pound, while at the same time we were paying seventy-five cents to eat a piece of that cattle-meat in the way of steak at a meal. The amount of money which our farmers have on hand—or have not on hand—to put into their business is going to make a huge difference to the way in which they can enter the era of reconstruction.

I have mentioned the ability to finance those things which must be done. We all know that we cannot properly build up agriculture without the expenditure of money; we cannot maintain industry at a high level without the expenditure of money either by private industry or by government. So that I shall not be misunderstood, may I state quite definitely, although I do not think it is necessary, that I am not a socialist; I am a believer in free enterprise. I realize, however, that free enterprise is meant to embrace the ordinary common man, whether he be a small business man, a farmer or a fisherman, as well as the operators of big business enterprises and those who derive their profits therefrom. The profits which some of our small business men, some of our fishermen and some of our farmers have obtained from their operations have not been commensurate with what they have put into their businesses. That is particularly true of the farmer, because the farmer not only puts money capital into his business, but he puts into it his whole life and the lives also of his wife and children, and the profits—I use the word advisedly, because those who engage in business must have profits—accruing to the farmer are not commensurate with the work and the capital which he puts into his operations.

In dealing with expenditures of money I have said on many occasions—sometimes I have been laughed at for saying it; sometimes not—that if in the future we were at any particular moment faced with an emergency which would bring about a lack of production and a shutting down of industry through the creation and operation of fear in the minds of the people who are running industry, under our present banking system—and I am not saying anything for or against the banks—if an emergency of that kind threatened in the days of reconstruction, through the operation of the central bank we could without any trouble bring about an expansion of credit which would take care of the situation and drive the emergency from us.

When we bring about that expansion of credit, whether we should accompany it by heavier taxation and heavy borrowings such as is being done during the war would be determined by the circumstances of the case. The thought I am giving out is this, and I am doing so from my place in the House of Commons because I am convinced that there is in the minds of many, many thousands of the people of Canada a dread that when the incentive of war has left us, the conditions that confronted us ten years ago will be back with us again. Many of us who are here know that that will not take place again, but it is one of our supreme duties and responsibilities to make certain that the people of Canada, and especially those of our youth who are overseas in our armed services, know that we have determined that it never shall happen again, and know at the same time that we have at our disposal the means which our good will can put into force to make certain that their fears in that respect will never be realized.

Mr. BLACKMORE: How do we know?

Mr. TURGEON: We do know.

Mr. BLACKMORE: How?

Mr. TURGEON: My hon. friend is a farmer or lives in a farming district—

Mr. BLACKMORE: I have lived there all my life.

Mr. TURGEON: He knows that for generations we have brought about an expansion of credit every season when the western wheat crop is harvested, and taken to the elevators, and transported by the railways to ocean steamers which carry it across the Atlantic to Liverpool. All that is facilitated by an expansion of credit, because sales of wheat are not made as a rule until the wheat reaches Liverpool. I do not hold that out as a perfect analogy, because the comparison is not complete. While it is not a perfect analogy it does point the way to what may be done and can be done if an emergency should come upon us. The harvesting season is an emergency, because the farmers must harvest their crop within a short time. Is it not also an emergency when people are faced with starvation?

Mr. BLACKMORE: Exactly, and it was so in 1932.

Mr. TURGEON: But the appropriate measures were not then taken.

Mr. BLACKMORE: It was not done then.

Mr. TURGEON: I am not talking of the past but of the future. The Prime Minister touched on this matter when he addressed the American Federation of Labor convention in Toronto a year ago and said that we had learned lessons from the experiences of the war, that we now know what we did not know of some things that can be done to avoid a recurrence of such times. I am pointing out now what can be done, provided that those in authority have the will to do it, and then we can rest easy because we have the means at our disposal.

I have not many minutes left, Mr. Speaker. There are several things of which I wish to speak, but I shall mention only two. There has been some discussion to-day of the federal-provincial conference dealing with reconstruction. A conference is a necessary step, and here I want to give a word of warning to the heads of all governments in Canada, federal and provincial. I do so as a citizen and as a private member of the house who through his work on the reconstruction committee, has come in personal contact with many hundreds of men and women from the Atlantic to the Pacific. I warn all governments in this country that they must not let constitutional difficulties, clashes between jurisdictions and ministries, stop them from properly carrying out the work of reconstruction. The people of this land will no longer permit conflicts of jurisdiction between governments and clashing of ideologies to interfere with the people's attainment of a proper living atmosphere.

Just a word on housing. I think the national housing legislation which has been in operation for some time, and particularly before the war, did a great deal of good, but the good which it did was confined largely to the big cities where the lending institutions had their offices or agencies. There were innumerable towns and villages distant from the big cities that did not get much benefit from that housing legislation, because the lending institutions did not have their agencies established in the rural areas. Therefore I hope that when the legislation which I understand is now in preparation comes down it will contain provisions empowering the government to make certain that the good arising from the operation of the National Housing Act will be extended also to families that live in towns and villages in rural areas where the lending institutions do not maintain agencies.

My last thought relates to a matter which I dislike to bring up, but it must be considered and my viewpoint upon it must be given. I am thinking now of the Japanese, and this touches a very important part of the whole problem of reconstruction. I do not intend to say much about the Japanese themselves, except to repeat what I have already said in this house, that I am utterly opposed to the return of the Japanese to British Columbia and I am in favour of sending them to Japan when the war is over.

May I speak in complimentary terms of the government and of the House of Commons and of the Senate for the provisions of the Veterans' Land Act, which was given to us two or three years ago through the operations of a committee appointed by this house, and whose chairman (Mr. Macmillan) I see sitting to my left near the Speaker. The Veterans' Land Act provides that the veterans of this war who desire to go into fishing may receive financial assistance in the same measure as those who wish to go into farming. At the end of the last war an amendment was moved in this house making that very suggestion. It was an amendment to a report from a committee, but that amendment was not accepted. I am proud to say that the mover of that amendment was Colonel Cy Peck, of British Columbia, a Victoria Cross man, then member for my neighbouring constituency of Skeena, and the seconder was my father, from the province of New Brunswick, who in spite of his age is still watching the proceedings of this house. The point I wish to make is this. Had that amendment been accepted and the veterans of the last war been given financial assistance to go into the fishing industry we would not have had in British Columbia the tragic situation of having the fishing industry almost entirely under the control of the Japanese at the time the attack on Pearl Harbor took place; and we would not have had the further circumstance that when Pearl Harbor was smashed the Japanese naval authorities had as much knowledge of the Canadian western Pacific at that time and for a couple of years following Pearl Harbor as our own naval authorities had. I leave this thought with the members of the government and the members of the house, that good attains its own end and brings its own reward. If twenty-five years ago we had given more assistance to the soldiers of the last war we would not have had that tragedy on the Pacific coast of Canada. If during the period between the last war and the beginning of this war we had thought less of money and taxation and more of human values and the welfare of the veterans of that war we would have been in a better position, spiritually and morally as well as industrially, to meet this war when it began. But I know that no further urging is necessary because the ministers and the members of the house are desirous of doing everything they can for the veterans. But when we think of reconstruction the supreme goal must be the welfare of those men and women who have been fighting our battles for us. When I say welfare I do not mean charity. I mean that we must see that upon their return to us, those who do not die in this war will be able to secure employment suited to their ability and their skill, that they will have a decent standard of living, and that those from whom the rigours of war have taken away the ability to work will have the same standard of living through the continuance and the improvement of the system of pensions and allowance which we now have.

At six o'clock the house took recess.

After Recess

The house resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. W. F. KUHL (Jasper-Edson): Mr. Speaker, if we are to enter the period of peace with the least possible confusion and disturbance, it is self-evident that preparations must be made in advance.

I am fully in accord with any measure which will enable the government to discharge its responsibility for whatever post-war preparations the government can be held responsible. Before any such measure is adopted, however, it is our duty to make certain of the objectives that are involved in it. Because of the heroic exploits and noble sacrifices of the youth of our land we shall all have a new lease of life. We shall be permitted to begin life anew. How imperative, therefore, that we begin in such a way as to be worthy of the dearly-bought victory. Let us make certain that whatever preparations we make will be based upon sound and proper objectives.

What are the objectives of the department which this bill proposes to set up? Are they sound? Are they logical? Are they democratic? Are they Christian? Because this department is to play such an important part in the post-war life it is worth as much as life itself to know the answers to all these questions. The interpretation section of the bill indicates the objective of the department which is to be set up. The definition of "reconstruction" reads:

> "Reconstruction" means the reestablishment in civil life and reemployment on demobilization of the men and women of the armed services, of persons released from war industries, and the reorganization of industry, in order to provide maximum production and full employment during and following the change-over from war-time production of industry to peace-time production, and includes every undertaking by dominion, provincial or municipal authority, or by any corporation or other person which may contribute to such reorganization.

It is abundantly evident from this definition that the objective of this department for the transitional period, as well as for the time following, is not only full employment of the natural resources of Canada but full employment of its man-power as well.

I have discussed full employment as an objective on many occasions in the past. The issues involved are so fundamental and so important that I cannot permit this occasion to pass without once more stating my views on the subject. It is my firm belief that the attitude of parliament and the people on this issue will determine whether Canadians in the post-war world will become a race of free men or whether they will revert to a condition of slavery. The proposition that the natural resources of Canada should be developed to the limit of the desire of Canadians to consume is one that I heartily endorse, but I challenge, with all the energy at my command, the proposition that the providing of employment for men and women in Canada as an end in itself is either sound, sane, democratic or even Christian. To say that the economic system exists for the purpose of providing jobs is to repudiate all the efforts of scientists and inventors since the beginning of time. To contend that the economic system exists to provide work for all is to contend that the Galileos, the Farradays, the Watts, the Stephensons, the Edisons, the Marconis and the Fords are all enemies of the human race.

If the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) is sincere in the belief that the economic system exists to provide employment, then I suggest that he should prove the sincerity of his convictions by taking proper action. The first thing he must do is to put the clock back about two hundred or three hundred years. He must as far as possible destroy all our labour-saving machines. Let him disconnect his telephone; let him throw his typewriter out of the window, smash it. Let him prevent the use of power which has been developed and let the people revert to the production of consumers' commodities, and the production of all other goods, by hand labour, and in doing so let them avoid the use of any tools which would facilitate their labour. Let them do everything as laboriously as possible. Having done this and similar things, let the Prime Minister agitate for the imprisonment of all living inventors; let him try them as public enemies number one; and as for the dead ones, dig up their bones and hang them in chains in public places for a warning and an example.

Such are the preposterous conclusions one must be driven to when he lays down the utterly false and illogical premise, that the economic system exists for the purpose of providing employment. Nevertheless, such are the actions to which the Prime Minister must resort if he is to realize his objective of full employment.

The Prime Minister seems to hold that work was divinely instituted as a blessing; but if the story of Genesis means anything at all, it means that our first parents incurred work as a curse. It was a punishment and not a gift. This bill indicates that the Prime Minister fails to realize that mankind for centuries have used their God-given intelligence in making discoveries and inventions which have at last earned them freedom from that curse, and that we of this day and generation must now shake off the ethics proper to an age of scarcity and substitute therefor the ethics suitable to the age of abundance.

This bill, Mr. Speaker, fails to differentiate between two kinds of work, namely, forced labour and voluntary activity. It fails also to recognize that there are two kinds of forced labour. There is work that is forced on man by nature and there is the work that is forced on man by other men, one being natural work and the other artificial work. Natural work is necessary and dignified; artificial work is unnecessary and is positively degrading. Liberty, therefore, can very well be defined as freedom from artificial, man-forced servitude. Progress, on the other hand, can be defined as freedom from nature-forced labour. Man individually has always striven for liberty; that is, for freedom from servile labour. Man collectively has always striven for progress; that is, for freedom from nature-forced labour. Collectively, man has obtained a degree of progress beyond his wildest dreams. This condition of progress warrants a wider extension of liberty than any people have hitherto enjoyed.

The tragedy of the situation is that just at the time when this extension of liberty should take place the world is faced with the threat of an increasing number of individuals being forced into artificial, man-made servitude or, in plainer terms, into a condition of slavery. That is the condition which is possible in Canada under the terms of this bill. Man's success in freeing himself from nature-forced labour through the increasing use of solar energy has been so phenomenal that an extremely high standard of living is now possible for everyone with very few hours of necessary work. On previous occasions I have indicated that those who have compiled statistics on this subject have shown that if our productive system is accompanied by a proper distribution system an income well in excess of $4,000 worth of consumers' commodities per annum, tax free, would be available for every family of four, and that with the effort of those between the age of twenty-five to forty-five working only four hours a day and four days a week. This was possible as long ago as 1929. How much more will it be possible in the post-war days by reason of the tremendous improvements in our productive technique owing to the incident of war?

The collective striving of man against nature has been so successful that the number of hours of freedom from work is now greater than the number of hours of work. This free time or this freedom from work has been described as unemployment, and has been looked upon as an undesirable state of affairs; yes, it is even considered a disease of the economic system which can and must be cured. I protest and repudiate this attitude of mind. The state of freedom from work imposed by nature, a logical consequence of the successful efforts of science and invention to harness solar energy, far from being a curable disease is an incurable blessing. This freedom is falsely named when it is referred to as unemployment. Properly speaking, it is the condition of leisure, but it is not leisure proper unless it is accompanied by security. The modern slave—the power machine—produces not only a superabundance of goods but a superabundance of leisure as well. Hence the problem which faces the people of Canada is not one of finding employment, but rather one of finding and devising a system which will adequately and equitably distribute the goods as well as the leisure.

The people of Canada must reconcile themselves to the fact that empayment can no longer depend upon employment. Men and women must be enabled to claim bread honourably without going through the farcical motions of work which either is unnecessary or can be performed by a machine more swiftly and efficiently. The fact is, Mr. Speaker, that owing to the legacy of the industrial arts to which the present generation has fallen heir, a substantial heritage in the form of goods as well as leisure is due the people of Canada. This cultural heritage or unearned increment in peace time is represented by the difference between national production and national consumption in any one year that one wishes to consider. Part of the price of every article produced in Canada is not represented by money anywhere in the economic system. This unmonetized portion of our national production constitutes the cultural heritage of the people of Canada. This cultural heritage is there by reason of the efforts of scientists and inventors, many of whom have been dead for years. They are the people who are responsible for this heritage and all we need to do is to accept it and enjoy it.

The only vehicle thus far designed for the distribution of this heritage is the national dividend as suggested by Major C. H. Douglas. At the present time our cultural heritage is being given to the enemy at the rate of fifty per cent of our national production, or the equivalent of $40 to $50 a month for every man, woman and child in Canada, and that through the use of debt money. My suggestion is that when peace returns we pay ourselves this dividend through the use of national debt-free money; and to anyone who contends that we can pay this dividend to the enemy in war time but cannot pay it to ourselves in peace time I say that he is guilty of the grossest inconsistency.

The national dividend is not something for nothing. It is a dividend, a dividend on the profits of a solvent and successful trading community, Canada Unlimited, of which every citizen is a shareholder by birth. The national dividend is payable in addition to whatever income people now enjoy. The national dividend is payable to all and is the same for all. The national dividend is payable whether a man works or whether he does not work, and anyone who cannot make that concession does not believe in freedom. To those who suggest that a universal dividend would demoralize I can best reply in the words of Desmond MacCarthy, who said:

> They do not love liberty who fear licence.

It is just as absurd to suppose mankind on the whole uniformly bad as to suppose it uniformly saintly. The evidence is that the more you give people decent conditions of living, the more likely they are to behave like reasonable citizens. To claim that human beings are essentially vile and can be kept within bounds only by being kept so busy that they have no time to get into mischief is positively a pagan conception of life and should not be tolerated in a country calling itself Christian.

The struggle to overcome difficulties is most ennobling, but we have reached the stage in our economic history when it is no longer necessary for man to consume most of his energies in the mere struggle for existence. Rather than cause harm and injury to society the national dividend will grant Canadians their first opportunity to reach the highest possible state of civilization which any nation can attain, namely, a leisure state. The leisure state is a physical possibility in post-war Canada. The leisure state is not a loafer's paradise; the leisure state is the opportunity of opportunities for man to give expression to his God-given creative instincts without any coercion by either nature or man. When a man is free to choose his own form of activity he becomes a man of leisure. When a man is compelled to work, by governments or others, he becomes a slave. Because man was made in the image of his Creator the only important business he has on earth is to create. If he is cheated of this opportunity he goes bad; in time the society which contains him goes bad. Nothing compensates human beings for being maimed in this way. The essential task of a stable and healthy society is to produce conditions in which the creative instinct will have the fullest play. This, not the finding of employment, should constitute the major task of Canada's statesmen in the post-war period.

The whole purpose of the power machine is to save work, to provide us with more goods and more leisure. The power machine is God's gift in response to man's quest. Let us beware how we mishandle it. In thinking on this subject one writer has said:

> To refuse to allow the machine a free hand is to wantonly throw away the fruits of man's victory over the forces of nature, and be guilty of the foul and heartless blasphemy of flinging the bounty of the earth back into the face of Him who is the "Giver of all good things."

I grant, Mr. Speaker, that it is not possible to enter the leisure state overnight. I am as much aware of the need for a transitional period as are any other hon. members. I am quite aware that we shall be obliged, before the transitional period is over, to expend a good deal of our energies in assisting in the rehabilitation of those countries which have been overrun by the enemy. I quite agree that there must be a transitional period. Nevertheless I insist that the leisure state should be made our objective, and should be attained at the earliest possible moment. The proper use of leisure naturally will be preceded by appropriate education. This involves a complete change in our notions of a proper education. Our present methods of education have one aim, largely; that is, to fit children to earn their living. But our present system of education does not give any attention to the training for leisure, the reason being that it is expected of the greater number of the children that they will not have much leisure. The whole of our life suffers from a lack of balance in our civilization. Because the benefits of the power machine are not distributed we suffer from anxiety, the fear of losing our place in the fierce scramble for jobs, the fear of war, the fear that with age we shall be forced out of the race. Few of us lead lives in which work well done alternates with periods of relaxation. We work all the time, and our work brings us no deep satisfaction. Factory hands are no more than hands; the activity of their minds is stunted and killed off. Those who are mental workers neglect the proper care of their bodies. Once the people of Canada have received the appropriate education they will, in their ample leisure, do those things for which their long education has prepared them. They will build cathedrals, compose music, write books, paint pictures, join in acting plays, carry out scientific research, cultivate their gardens, explore jungles, invent a new type of aeroplane, learn to fly, weave rugs, and learn languages. Every human being brought up in conditions of freedom and taught to use his mind and body has something to contribute to the common culture, to be handed on to future generations.

The reason why the ancient civilizations of Babylon, Egypt, Crete, Greece and Rome attained such cultural heights was that the citizens were free from the necessity to work for a living. True, these civilizations rested upon a foundation of slavery, and without this economic foundation none of those ancient civilizations would have been possible. All the menial work, the unskilled work and much of the skilled work was done by the slaves. Thus the citizens were set free for service, both military and civil, for the cultivation of the arts and philosophies, for the dignity of the soldier, the magistrate, the artist or the thinker. The fruits of this system are to be seen in the glory that was Athens, which is the wonder and envy of the modern world. Through the incident of war many of our service personnel have had the privilege of witnessing at first hand some of these achievements. In our own day slavery as it was known in the past is gone, and man is nominally free. He has political freedom but not economic freedom. In these days of mechanical power the machine is fulfilling the function of the human slave of olden times. Just as slavery lifted the burden of toil from the backs of the free citizens of that day, so should the machine do now for all the people of Canada as well as the people of every other country in the world. Not only should the people of Canada be able to attain a state of culture comparable with those ancient civilizations; they should be able to surpass them. It is only by reasoned use of our resources to give all men security, leisure and the power to use it to keep themselves in mental and bodily health and balance that we can be saved. When we do this we restore to life a spiritual meaning; we make reverence for life the principle of our common effort.

Such is the condition of society which ex-service men and others ought to be permitted to enjoy in post-war Canada. Such is the condition of security with freedom which a social credit economy offers as an alternative not only to what Canadians have been subjected to in the past but also to the possible socialistic, communistic or fascist totalitarian state of the future. The way of life which I have pictured in my remarks is not a utopia, unless of course a utopia be defined as a condition of security with individual personal freedom. I have depicted a way of life which is physically possible in the Dominion of Canada. Its realization is not dependent upon factors which are yet to be determined. The modern slave—the power machine—stands at the threshold, awaiting our bidding, to provide all I have alluded to. The national dividend is the ticket of admission to the land of promise, the land which others have beheld from afar, but which is ours for the taking. It is the dividend or chaos; the leisure state or the slave state.

Mr. J. M. DECHENE (Athabaska): Mr. Speaker, in asking for the privilege of speaking to-night from my place in this house, I do so because I am deeply conscious of the possibilities of a part of the country to which I wish to direct the attention of the new ministry of reconstruction. If after the very many able adresses I have heard to-day my remarks appear to be confined to a local issue, may I remind hon. members of the fact that the section of the country I represent is a vast territory in itself, one which has great possibilities and which, furthermore, is the gateway to the great northland extending for a thousand miles or more to the Arctic ocean. A bountiful Providence has filled that area with immeasurable wealth, as a challenge to our young men when they return and to those who have been unable to go overseas, but have contributed their effort through their activities in the war industry of Canada.

I am deeply impressed with the fact that, although my remarks may be considered to be those respecting a certain region in Canada, the possibilities of that region are such that they make matters affecting it a national issue. There can be no doubt that the wealth which can be derived from that great portion of Canada which extends from the city of Edmonton to the Arctic ocean is, indeed, of national importance.

In justifying my mentioning place names which may be unknown to some hon. members, I direct their attention to the fact that every day since the beginning of the war we have learned about new places on the map, places which heretofore were unknown to us but which, because of the advances of our armies, have become vital spots in connection with the winning of the war.

I am impressed by the further fact that, unfortunately, the ordinary private member is unable to acquaint himself, as he might wish, with all parts of this great dominion. Very few of us have the means to travel throughout the length and breadth of this vast territory, in order to become acquainted with its peoples and its possibilities. Therefore I believe I may be pardoned if in the course of my remarks I mention places which may be unknown to some.

In his speech the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) covered the ground to such an extent that it is, of course, impossible for a humble private member of the house to attempt with the same effect to go over the same ground. I am sure all hon. members agree with him when he says that the money with which to carry on this work of reconstruction must come from the disposal on the markets of the world of the great surplus wealth of Canada, whether it comes from the farms, the forests, the mines, the factories or the fisheries.

When I refer to the challenge given our young men and our young women, a challenge which I know they will accept with the same courage with which they accepted the challenge of war, and with the same heroic stand they have shown to-day in redeeming some of the conquered lands of Europe, I know that that challenge will not frighten them. It will frighten them no more than did the challenge which confronted those of us who went out to that great western country fifty or sixty years ago, and under conditions which were very difficult indeed. I am reminded of those conditions by a copy of a painting which I now hold in my hand, and which I should like to show to the house. This print, sent to me by an old friend in the west, describes the first shipment of wheat by stern wheeler on the river from Winnipeg, then known as Fort Garry, on October 21, 1876.

I am reminded of the tremendous strides we have taken since then, of the territory we have covered and of the things we have achieved and are still able to achieve. I know those young people about whom I have spoken are not looking for an easy way out after the war. Using the same courage they are showing to-day, and with the advantage of the training we have given them and are prepared to give them, in order that they may be qualified for the work to be undertaken when they are transferred from the work of war to that of peace, those young people will, I know, succeed. I know that with the training our schools, universities and trade schools are prepared to give, and at this stage are arranging to give those young boys and girls, they will meet the challenge.

Away beyond what is known to-day as productive country in that great treasure house of the northland where, as I say, a bountiful and generous Providence has cast up wealth by millions and billions, those young men and young women will undertake to do their share in redeeming and replacing, in building a competency for themselves in creating new wealth for Canada, and in paying the cost of the terrific struggle in which for the last four or five years we have been engaged.

[Mr. Dechene.]

May I be allowed, as I said in the beginning, to bring some matters to the attention of the new department, and to the minister who may be in charge of it. I ask that minister to give careful consideration to what I am about to say, because I feel it my duty to-night to speak for those people in the far-flung land of the north. I speak for those who know of its possibilities. I would not be fulfilling my duty as I should if I did not rise to-night, when this bill is before the house, and point out to the house and the country, and particularly to the new minister of a new department, the great possibilities offered in that section, a part of which I have the signal honour to represent.

For many years I have agitated for the construction of a new and great artery of transportation in that north portion of the western provinces. I do not wish to weary the house nor do I wish to speak too long, but I must stress the fact that this is not a project which concerns only my constituency or my part of the country. It is one which would tend to develop the whole northwestern section of Canada from Winnipeg and the Hudson bay to the Pacific ocean. This is a plan which was judged good enough to be considered fully by the directorates of the two great national railway companies, the Canadian Pacific Railway Company and the Canadian National Railways, in the years of development between 1926 and 1929.

Plans were made and surveys were completed. Then came that terrible depression which, as was so ably pointed out by the Prime Minister, was caused by the refusal of the nations of the world to trade with one another. That was a time when we had either to keep our surplus of everything being produced in Canada, or to sell it at a ruinous loss. This great development which was about to take place was stopped, and has not been continued since on account of the war, which required all the material that could have been used in the construction of this great transportation system.

There is a plan by the two railway companies together to continue the railroad from Prince Albert to the Cold lake and Lac la Biche country, right through the Athabaska country which I have the honour to represent, connecting at Lac la Biche with one of the northern Alberta railroads, and at the town of Athabaska with another branch to Edmonton, and, further west, with a branch serving the great Peace river country, thereby tapping as it were, important feeders to this great transportation system, and from there on to the Pacific ocean. This will serve northern areas which, I assert, and I do not think those from further south in the west will deny, are the most productive portions of western Canada. They have known no crop failures; they do not depend on one kind of crop, but have the advantages of a diversity of activity in the farming industry. They produce tremendous surpluses of everything which can be raised on the farms of Canada—stock, dairy produce, wheat, and coarse grains of every kind. In that section of Canada will be found valuable timber limits, great inland fisheries, stores of minerals, all kinds of possibilities which guarantee that a railroad constructed through those vast spaces will immediately become a paying proposition and will never be a burden on the taxpayers of this country.

All this is not a figment of my imagination; it is a tremendous undertaking, which was under way when the war broke out and compelled us to wait for its completion. But I submit to the house and to the department that it is one of the first undertakings which should be proceeded with. It will provide facilities for the great developments which I have indicated; it will also make room for thousands of new settlers, whether on land to be purchased by them or on land to be developed according to the taste of the soldier settler. It will provide for the development of very important fisheries. Need I tell this house that if you go to Chicago or New York, let us say, next winter, the greatest delicacy for which you can ask, one to be found on the tables of the best hotels and restaurants, will not be fish from the seaboard of the Atlantic or the Pacific; it will be the great trout from Cold lake, in the Athabaska district, where, in the finest of waters, five or six hundred feet deep, are found these splendid trout, weighing as much as fifty pounds and regarded as the finest eating fish in the world. This trout is a delicacy for the gourmand, and is so much in demand that we are sometimes unable to get it in our western cities because the United States insist upon taking every pound we can produce.

To the west and north are Lake Athabaska, Lac la Biche and many another great lake which I will not stop to name. While the catch of fish is not, I admit, to be compared with that of either the west or the east coast, it is of great importance to the people living in the north, to the farmers who are settling that section of the country, and to the large number of people who are occupied in getting fish out of those marvellous lakes. Once the war is over and the department is ready to operate in a normal way, a hatchery should be established on one of our rivers in the north in order to maintain the supply of fish in those great lakes of the northland.

I have often spoken of the possibilities of the bituminous sands in the district of Fort McMurray, and I will not repeat what has been said, because I do not want to weary the house with repetition. But I feel, and I believe my opinion in founded on facts, that during the present year the Department of Mines and Resources and the Department of Munitions and Supply will have solved the problem of separating oil from the sands, and that a new and vast industry will soon operate at Fort McMurray and Waterways, the point at the junction of the Clearwater and Athabaska rivers, at the headwater of one of the greatest inland fluvial routes in the dominion, continuing clear down to the Arctic ocean. There is enough bitumen to pave the streets of every city in Canada; and when, as I have said, the Department of Mines and Resources solves, during the present year, the difficulty of separation, we should go on, as a work of reconstruction, to build a highway, pave it with the bitumen we get out of our soil at that point—not imported from Trinidad or anywhere else—into the city of Edmonton, in order that traffic and transportation may be ensured at the lowest possible cost for the sale on the prairies of the oil and its by-products obtained at Fort McMurray and Waterways.

Does the house know that at this same point we have one of the greatest—indeed, by far the greatest, but not yet fully developed—salt mine in Canada? It was discovered and placed in operation through the great work of a former minister of mines, a great friend of mine, a great pioneer, a member of a former Alberta Liberal government, the Hon. J. L. Cote. It was he who found this salt mine; to-day one of the most modern mines in existence is being operated there, and the quantity of salt available is limited only by the market. The highway would guarantee a market, because this branch of the Northern Alberta railroad is unable at present to give a competitive freight rate because traffic originates at only one end of it. I hope I am making this clear. There is no local traffic after you go 125 to 150 miles north of Edmonton, with the result that in order to meet operating costs a higher freight rate must be charged than the traffic can carry, and therefore the salt produced as well as the oil which will be extracted from that area in a few months will be at a disadvantage in competing in the markets of the western prairies and Canada in general.

I am speaking in a hurry, but I wish to place these matters clearly before the house and the department. You will notice, Mr. Speaker, that my speech is not read; it is written in my heart and in my love of the north country, that country in which I have lived so long. It is inspired by love of its people, so able and courageous, by love of the boys and girls who are now representing us so nobly and heroically on every field of battle, and who will come back to that great north country. Those young men are going as high in the sky as man can reach. From peaceful Canada, which a few months ago did not have a fighting aeroplane, they are now giving odds to the Luftwaffe. Our sailors traversed the seas in winter, when undersea beasts were lurking everywhere, when their ships were covered with ice. To-day the boys of the army are fighting at the doors of Cherbourg, and to-morrow they will be fighting at the doors of Paris and other cities. Do you think that those boys will be afraid of the challenge to go up north and help us develop that great country? It is to be hoped that they will not have been affected by the idea which, unfortunately, some people in this dominion are scattering around, that we are not doing anything, that we are not preparing to take care of those young men. I say this by the way, but I believe those will stand condemned who for political expediency, for the sake of gaining a few votes, attempt to discourage the man who is giving everything he has, who is risking his life, whose bones, it may be, will lie forever in the soil of Europe because he has sacrificed his all for the sake of his country. Let us do nothing which will deprive such men of encouragement. Let us tell him, as it is the truth to tell him, that this country is prepared to do everything on his behalf, and has been so prepared for some time, and that there will be in this country every opportunity for such young men when they come back from overseas; their experience will be invaluable.

Consider what lies north of Fort McMurray. I mention a spot on the map, but I again remind my hearers of the vast spaces which lie there. Do you know, Mr. Speaker, that it is farther from Fort McMurray to Fort Norman, where the Americans built that pipeline into Whitehorse, than it is from Winnipeg to Edmonton Do you know that up there in the north of Canada there is an empire in the making? There are no better people in this world than our strong men of the north, meeting the challenge of that great country. The time will soon come when the tremendous water powers of that great region can be harnessed for the service of our country. I have seen the Chaudiere falls and have been told by some hon. gentlemen of the tremendous volume of water that flows down the Ottawa river. But it is but a drop in the bucket compared with the mighty Athabaska river, the Peace river, the Clearwater river, with all their tributaries eventually falling into one tremendous river dropping hundreds of feet at Fort Fitzgerald. The power is there waiting to be developed in quantities sufficient to meet the needs of all peace activities in the west. It is now lying dormant, but it will not remain dormant long.

I want to congratulate the government upon taking steps to form this new Department of Reconstruction. I know, as the Prime Minister has said, that a lot has already been done on reconstruction. The provinces have all been working on the problem too. The province of Alberta has presented, as the hon. member for Davenport (Mr. MacNicol) told the house this afternoon, a very fine programme to the committee on reconstruction, and that province will cooperate in every way with the federal government. Before a committee at Edmonton representations have been made for a bridge across the Athabaska river, at the town of Athabaska, to open up that great north country where already about 1,000 people are living and are at present served only by a ferry to get in and out. Another great bridge has been proposed over the Saskatchewan river at a point south of Elk Point. These projects are before the government of Alberta and will be submitted when the time comes for the governments to consider their reconstruction programmes.

I wish the hon. member for Davenport were here. I admire him very much for the able address he gave to the house this afternoon. He mentioned the word "unity". He emphasized how it was necessary for us all to get together both now and after the war. That appeals to me, as it does to every Liberal. It is the one thing we have preached ever since the party existed—unity, unity. We may differ with our hon. friends opposite as to the best means of accomplishing our aims, but there is no need to quarrel or fight among ourselves. There is no need for bitterness. We can all get together with one common aim and purpose. I am too humble a backbencher to pretend to give advice to this honourable chamber. There are too many able men here for me to presume to give them advice. But perhaps I may draw from the experiences I have had, and I would say, Mr. Speaker, that while we might have a market for our wheat at perhaps two dollars a bushel, while we might find a market for all our surplus stock and for all the production of our forests and everything we produce, unless we have that unity which we have been preaching for so long, unless you and I have one common aim and purpose, one love and one love only, the love of the soil of Canada, we cannot have true progress. Surely we should be prepared to spend everything we have to keep the soil of Canada sacred, unsullied by the foot of the enemy. Some may criticize us for spending so much money on the war and for sending our men and women over there, but I wonder how they would feel if the fight were taking place on this soil we love so much. Therefore, let me repeat, let us have one common aim, and one common ambition, the love of our country, no matter whether we were born here or came here and learned to love it. There is one place where we can show our unity, and that is in this new department which is shortly to be organized. I hope that our common aims will be fulfilled one hundred per cent in the reconstruction undertaken under this new department. Again I wish to compliment the hon. member for Davenport upon the noble thoughts he expressed so ably this afternoon when he spoke of unity.

Perhaps I have said enough, Mr. Speaker. It is not very often I take advantage of such an august audience as I have listening to me to-night. I may not be long for this world; we do not know. I may not be long for this house because surprising things happen in politics. We have had a surprise quite recently. But as long as I have the honour and the privilege to sit in this house I shall speak for those who sent me here and give everything I have, every energy and every talent I possess, to this representation.

I have already spoken of the railroad, of the highway, of the power possibilities of the far north. I shall not speak of the gold mines of the north. I am sorry that so few members have visited this great north country of ours. When the war is over and travel is again possible without the Minister of Munitions and Supply (Mr. Howe) scolding us, may I invite the members of this house to visit us, to come to the northland, to the great Athabaska valley and sail down the great Mackenzie river. What a sight that will be for hon. gentlemen! What wealth of knowledge you will acquire; what a knowledge of the possibilities of Canada! Most of us are unaware of the possibilities and the wealth that is to be found in that far north country. Come and visit us. It will be a more enjoyable trip and better for your health than visiting any other place in the world. Do not go and see the battlefields, which would only remind you of every drop of blood that has been shed there and of the quivering flesh of our boys fighting in the struggle for freedom. Come to the peace of the great northland.

May I conclude by saying that I once heard a great orator in western Canada. Some of the old-timers here may remember him. I think the hon. member for Calgary East (Mr. Ross) will, and perhaps the hon. member for Davenport, because he came from Toronto. Apparently many good things come out of Toronto. This great orator once described the beauties of our Alberta rivers and valleys. I shall not attempt to give his exact words, but what he said went something like this: The Beneficent Being who threw the world into space and created the sun and the moon and the stars and the planets and sent them all on their orderly courses, in the presence of which marvels we must all feel so humble, after having taken six days to create this beautiful universe decided to take a rest. And having cast a look upon His work He declared Himself satisfied. I am sure, Mr. Speaker, that He had at that moment overlooked one of the great valleys of the Athabaska river or the Peace river in the northland of Alberta.

Mr. CLARENCE GILLIS (Cape Breton South): As a member of the reconstruction committee I feel it incumbent upon me to express my opinion on this matter. Listening to the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) this afternoon, when he introduced the bill, I think the most significant part of his statement was very brief. He made it when he was answering a question of the hon. member for Lethbridge (Mr. Blackmore), and in doing so I believe he struck the kernel of the whole problem. He stated in that answer that during the process of fighting the war our economy was so organized that many things were possible which might be considered impossible during the days of peace, the reason for that being that all the nations had a common objective while prosecuting the war. I hope that those who will be administering this legislation now before the house, in the period of reconstruction, and similar legislation in other countries of the united nations, will also have a common objective in those days of peace. If we have not a common objective in the reconstruction period, then it is an admission that we are not all fighting the war for the same thing. There is not a reason in the world why in the days of peace we should not carry out the many slogans we hear advanced to-day as regards the reasons for the sacrifices which every nation is making in finance, in materials and in human resources. If those slogans are not realized in the days of peace, then I am afraid that the time is not far distant, in the aftermath of this war, when we shall start another conflict.

To my mind this problem, while many hon. members have advanced different theories which are confusing, and which lead one to believe that the road ahead is difficult and that we have many impasses ahead of us, offers no insuperable obstacle. I have no misconception along these lines because in my opinion the problem is very simple. I believe that if to-day we have difficulties in reorganizing our economy on a peace basis, those difficulties are man-made. They will be difficulties owing to the failure of those in control of the nation and of its resources to recognize the impossibility of returning to the conditions that existed in 1939. The mistakes that will wreck the nation will be the mistakes made in an endeavour to go back to an era that is already dead. I believe that the war has brought one fact very clearly home to all of us, and that is that the reason why we are locked in battle to-day on the continent of Europe is to be attributed to the failure of the leaders of nations, in the period between the two wars, to recognize the inevitable results of trying to hang on to the old machine without making the necessary democratic and social changes which would have brought relief to the people of all the different nations and so averted armed conflict.

In my opinion the world to-day is lined up in two camps and two camps only. On the one side we have the totalitarian nations which represent the era of the past. They are endeavouring to stop the forces of progress, to turn back the pages of history 500 years by giving us dictators. The democratic peoples of the world who believe in moving forward into freedom within the framework of democracy, and making democratic social changes, changes of the kind that would have made a fundamental difference in the structure of every country in the order of society, are the nations which are lined up on the other side and which are fighting to roll back the forces of retrogression. I believe that is true, that on our home front, on the battle front and on every front to-day where people are free, the issue is not the maintenance of the status quo but the bringing about of fundamental changes in the order of society, which will guarantee to every one of the united nations those social objectives for which we are fighting.

If our boys in Europe are dying for anything it is not for a return to the conditions of 1939, and if we are to avoid such a retrogression then those who will handle the problems of reconstruction will have to make drastic changes in their thinking and bring about the necessary changes in the statutes of the country. They will have to change them drastically in order to achieve the social objectives for which, in my opinion, we are fighting this war. If that analysis is true, the only thing necessary is honesty on the part of those who will be implementing the reconstruction programme in the aftermath of the war—no selfishness, no thought of political gain, but merely one desire to give effect to the social objectives for which we are fighting this war.

Mr. McNIVEN: Is that what you told them at Estevan?

Mr. GILLIS: Yes, definitely.

Mr. McNIVEN: You told them it was a capitalistic war.

Mr. GILLIS: The hon. member can make his own speech, Mr. Speaker, while I am speaking as a member of the reconstruction committee, I desire not to be interrupted. If the hon. member wishes me to say what I said at Estevan and if this house is prepared to give me the privilege of saying it, I am prepared to repeat it. However, as I pointed out a moment ago, we must have a full recognition of these social objectives. Those who desired to maintain the status quo, those who feared social changes more than they feared Hitlers, are responsible for the war.

As a member of the committee, I had the privilege of sitting in at almost all the meetings since its inception, and I wish to pay a compliment to the chairman of the committee. I found him fair, impartial, capable and endeavouring to do the best kind of job he could with the machinery at his disposal, and I found the committee as a whole non-partisan, studying the whole problem of reconstruction from the point of view of the evidence presented to it and in the light of what was best for the nation. I have only this criticism to offer. Hon. members will recall that when the committee was set up I said in the house, on the resolution for the constitution of the committee, that in my opinion the machinery provided gave the committee one of the most important jobs delegated by the government to any committee and that that machinery was totally inadequate to handle the problem which they had to undertake. I suggested at that time that there should be coordination between the work of the James committee and the work of the economic advisory committee and the interdepartmental committee on pensions and national health which was handling certain matters pertaining to reconstruction. There should be made available to the general reconstruction committee, as it was to the parliamentary committee, a secretariat through which the evidence presented to the committee could be sifted and a precis given to the members. We could have then perhaps brought in fuller and more explanatory reports and thereby made a greater contribution to the department that is now being set up than we did.

I think the machinery that we had at our disposal was inadequate. I know the chairman of the committee was placed in a position where he had to make a digest of the reports himself. Reams and reams of evidence were presented to the reconstruction committee. In my opinion some of it was the most valuable data that any committee in Canada could get. We met every section of society, from the bankers to the trades unions. We met the provinces. All of that evidence is on file. We have it. There is so much of it that it is impossible for the average member who attends to his work in this house even to read it, much less make a digest of it. I think the committee did as good a job as could be done with the machinery provided for it.

When this bill becomes law I hope that the minister who will administer the department will not fail to take the reports presented to this house, short as they were, and study them. Certain definite recommendations were made with respect to works programmes necessary to the nation in the different sections of the country, programmes that would provide considerable employment in the period after the war. I hope that these reports presented by this committee will be one of the main pieces of evidence that that ministry will study when they are making their recommendations for a programme of works across the country. I am all in favour of setting up the department. I think this is the department that will have most of the headaches in the period of the war. I hope that the machinery will be adequate for the job.

There are many opinions on this matter of post-war reconstruction. I do not pose as an expert on any of the different schools of thought, but I am going to say that I do not agree with those who express the view that all the post-war problems of Canada are dependent upon international machinery that will regulate the economy of this country. I am not in favour of any machinery set up outside Canada that has anything to do with telling the government of Canada what their post-war plans are to be. I think that is the prerogative of the Canadian government and the Canadian people. The government of Canada should organize and arrange the internal affairs of this country in accordance with the wishes of the Canadian people from whom they will receive a mandate to govern in the post-war period, whatever government that happens to be.

I am a little afraid of the school of thought that states that international machinery is to be set up for the purpose of deciding on a monetary unit to regulate international trade, and that a supergovernment is to be set up somewhere which is to arrange the flow of materials from nation to nation. If that is followed through to its logical conclusion, all that it adds up to is the kind of thing against which we are fighting to-day, a dictatorship from the outside superimposed on the smaller nations that are fighting the war at the present time. I am afraid of that kind of thing, and I do not think that, while we are fighting a war, with the picture as it is as between nation and nation, when the war itself overshadows everything, when the future is beclouded, Canada or any other country should commit itself to international machinery that will be able to dictate the internal policy of this country after the war. I agree that during the time of fighting the war, for military reasons, it is the prerogative of those who are handling the military affairs of the nation to sit in conference to develop the machinery necessary to win the war; but when that war is over, the duty of arranging the internal economy of the different countries belongs to the peoples of those countries.

Take this matter of foreign trade. Certainly we need foreign trade; certainly we shall have to sell goods, but I think the foreign policy of any country is merely the reflection of its internal policy. Our job is first to put our own house in order. Nations export only their surpluses, and they import to the extent that they do not develop their own economy or to the extent that they have a shortage in certain commodities. The first thing to do is to put our own house in order, to determine what our surpluses are, what we have to import and what we have to export, to establish a standard of living for the Canadian people. When that is done we are in a position to go to other countries, sit in on international conferences and make the best bargain possible for the people of our own country in cooperation with other nations.

I am a little afraid of those who are rushing headfirst into international agreements without a mandate from the people of this country or the peoples of the other nations who are fighting the war. I do not think anyone has the right, regardless of his military position, to sit in a conference on which we are not represented and about which we know nothing, and decide that certain things are to be done with respect to this country and the other country in the period after the war. It is the prerogative of the Canadian people to advise the Canadian government if and when we get the job of fighting the war off our hands.

I am not going to take advantage of this opportunity to go into all the ramifications of reconstruction, but I wish to say this with respect to my own province. The premier of Nova Scotia made a presentation to the reconstruction committee. In that presentation he did not paint a very pretty picture. He was very realistic about the problems. We hear talk about cooperation of province with province. The limitations of the British North America Act is often mentioned. I merely wish to say this about the British North America Act. If a constitution that was written seventy-six years ago retards progress in this country, then that constitution should be changed to make for progress. The premier of Nova Scotia pointed out that in so far as he and his government were concerned—and it is a Liberal government in that province—cooperation was a thing that was very hard to get. He suggested that if there is any solution for the problems of the maritimes in the post-war period, decentralization of industry will have to take place. He deplored the trend that is taking place during the war of further milking the maritime provinces of established industries, and that has gone on within the last year or so. He pointed to the closing down of the steel plant at Trenton, the scrapping of the shipyard at Pictou, the closing down of the sugar refinery at Dartmouth, and the closing of the Clark Ruse aircraft plants in Dartmouth and Moncton. If that is to be the trend there is not very much hope for the maritime provinces. Unless there is some definite declaration on the part of the government in the post-war period with respect either to the continuation of the industries that I have just mentioned that have been taken out, or to some programme of creating subsidiary industries in the maritime provinces, then we are only wasting our time and fooling ourselves when we are talking about reconstruction. The time has arrived when we should show our people that we have those plans and that we intend to do a certain amount of work.

Another factor that was brought clearly home to us in the three years that the committee sat was the matter of finances. Province after province made a presentation referring to wonderful works programmes, striking at the basic problems in each province. Each of the premiers wound up his statement with the same plea: "This is all contingent upon the federal government making available to each province the finances necessary to carry this through." The construction industry and other industries made presentations, all winding up with the same statement: "This is all contingent upon the federal government making available the necessary finances." What does it all add up to? In my opinion it shows that the trend to-day is toward greater responsibility on the part of the federal government in the matter of finance, in the matter of developing our natural resources. If those natural resources are to be developed by the federal government, as was suggested by various agencies that appeared before the committee, then there is great necessity for some control by the federal government over currency and credit. In my opinion that will be one of the main points in the post-war period; unless you have some say over currency and credit in the country you will not be able to expand the economy of the country. If the chartered banks are to say where the money is going, and in what volume, that will strangle your post-war development. I am not going into that matter; we have discussed it in the house already, but I am leaving that thought with the government. It has been made clear to me that this will be one of the limiting factors in the development of our resources in the aftermath of this war.

When this bill is in committee I intend to discuss it clause by clause, but for the moment I merely wish to leave this suggestion with the Prime Minister and the government. Everyone I hear discussing the problem simply creates more confusion. We hear many platitudes; we are told the things that cannot be done and the limitations that exist. As I said in the beginning, there are no limitations except an honest desire on our part to see this programme through. I have in my hand a newspaper clipping which I wish to read; it is very short, but I think it points the way for us if we are not afraid of social change, if we are not afraid to make the necessary fundamental changes in our order of society, if we are not scared by the name socialism. I said that the old machine had broken down; it is dead, but it refuses to be buried. Personally I believe that the war means the funeral of the capitalist system. I am going to read this newspaper clipping for the benefit of the hon. member for Regina City (Mr. McNiven), because it happens to be from the Regina Leader-Post of May 28, 1944. I do not think anyone would ever accuse the Leader-Post of being a socialist organ; I have read a few of its editorials, and I should be inclined to believe that it was rather capitalistic. I read this because I suggested that definite, fundamental changes must be made, not just patches, palliatives or platitudes. They are not going to change anything. We are living in a world that is real. The problem is an economic problem. The war itself is not theoretical. It is practical; it is real; it is there. It is a problem with which we must grapple, and we are grappling with it. We are fighting it on the battle front. Unless definite social changes are made before the war is over and the eight hundred thousand odd service personnel, the forty thousand women and the million and a half war workers come back to us; if we do not make transitional changes now in a democratic way, while we have the chance, someone will make them for us in a way we may not like. Society will change whether we like it or not; the change will be either evolutionary or revolutionary. While we are wondering, wandering, grasping, debating theories and so on, one country points the way. That country is New Zealand. This little clipping, under the date line Vancouver, May 27, reads:

New Zealand's socialist government is a world leader in social legislation, taking care of its citizens from the cradle to the grave, Hon. David Wilson, New Zealand high commissioner to Canada, said in an address to a service club here Friday.

Benefits were in operation for old age, for sickness, for unemployment, for prenatal and maternity care. Cost of living increase of thirteen per cent during the war time was the smallest of any country involved in the present struggle, he said.

Then he went on to give a list of the services now being given in that country. All the machinery we have on paper; our social security, our health bill, our reconstruction department, which are merely in the preliminary stages in Canada to-day, are working in that country. If we honestly want to do these things, to bring about such changes, and I believe we do, then we require technical advice on how to go about it. Why, then, is not someone from that country here or someone from this country there making an examination of that programme? All the people of this country want is an honest demonstration that we are not repeating the performances of 1914-18. The slogans we are giving to our people to-day are not new to me. I heard them in 1917 and again in 1919, and during the twenty years between the two wars I travelled with a lamp searching for the implementing of any of those promises. You are not going to maintain an order of society that gave its people three wars in one generation—the Boer war, the war of 1914-18 and the present war, together with a depression the like of which the world had never before seen. You cannot keep that up. That has to be changed, and you are not going to change it on paper, by writing bills or resolutions, by broadcasts or through the Canadian press. You have to give a practical demonstration that you mean exactly what you say.

Mr. MITCHELL: How?

Mr. GILLIS: By setting up the machinery.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre) That is what we are doing.

Mr. GILLIS: I do not admit that. We are building machinery from the top, but you do not solve any problem from the top; the machinery must be built from the bottom. If I were the Prime Minister and wanted to be political about it one of the first things I would do would be to establish an old age pension in this country that would offer security to everyone over sixty years of age.

Mr.. MACKENZIE KING: At least I made a beginning, by starting old age pensions.

Mr. GILLIS: Yes, but when we established old age pensions we set the age limit too high. What you get at seventy years of age is not an old age pension; and when you have to declare yourself a pauper in order to receive that pension I think it is an insult to the aged people of this country. I am not going to quarrel with the Prime Minister about that; he established the principle, with the cooperation of the then hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre, Mr. Woodsworth, and the then hon. member for Winnipeg North, Mr. Heaps. This little group takes some of the credit, without going into the history of the thing. My objection now is that the age limit is too high. A man has not long to live after he gets it. Many people do not live long enough to enjoy it. And then before you get it you have to will your second pair of shoes to the premier of the province in which you live. One of the greatest things that could be done at this time, one of the greatest political gestures that could be made by the Prime Minister—though I am not suggesting for a moment that he would be political—would be to establish an old age pension for every person in this country over sixty years of age. The first charge against the wealth of any nation should be the care of the aged; those who built the nation; those who gave us the institutions under which we live, those who raise families which fight wars for us, and come back and work in industry for us.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: In regard to old age pensions, did not the Minister of Finance (Mr. Ilsley) make clear that the government was quite prepared to cooperate with the provinces to bring the age down to sixty-five?

Mr. GILLIS: They are always prepared to do it, but they always throw up a straw man so that we cannot get through it, with the cooperation of the provinces. You hide behind the British North America Act.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I do not wish to interrupt my hon. friend, but he has referred to New Zealand. I wonder if he has brought out the point that they have only one government in New Zealand, a unitary government, which is able to do things. If there were only one government in Canada the lower age of sixty-five would now be in force.

Mr. GILLIS: I appreciate that. I think we also have one government in Canada. We have a national government in Canada, and that national government passes the basic laws of the country upon which the provinces can base enabling legislation. There is nothing in the world to stop the federal government—since the outbreak of war, for example—from passing an order in council with respect to this matter. They have passed about 65,000 of them for other matters, and there is not anything in the world to stop them from saying: "Due to the war emergency, when it is necessary to relieve the minds of older people of the burden of continuation of the war, and because of the misery they are going through, we will relieve their minds of the problem of future security; and in that connection we are passing orders in council, and advising the provinces that we are prepared nationally to advise them to drop the age in each province to sixty, and that that pension should be given to every citizen of this country, by right."

We have not a pension by right to-day in Canada. You go before a board and if you have accumulated anything at all—it is a programme of indolence, the way it is administered—you cannot own anything, and you cannot earn anything.

It is absolutely necessary to have that pension at the age of sixty. In the post-war period there will be thousands and thousands who will be coming back and claiming employment. At that time many who have already done their duty should be relieved.

I have been in industry for a long time, and I say it is a sad thing to see an old man crippling out to work—yes, crippling out to work, and I say that advisedly—at five or six o'clock in the morning, and then coming in around five o'clock at night, scarcely able to drag himself home. During the bad years he may have had two or three boys, twenty-four or twenty-five years of age, who were lying around the house, with nothing to do.

Those old men should have been on pensions, and the boys should have been working. Insecurity in old age is one of the greatest detriments of any nation. I am reasonably sure that a large percentage of the people across Canada who are in industry are working in fear of insecurity. That is one of the things they have in mind—the matter of an old age pension, and knowing that they are not going to wind up their later years on the streets, or in institutions or living on the charity of a son or a daughter, or in the care of friends or relatives.

I am sorry I got into this discussion about old age pensions, but I feel very strongly about the subject. I have seen so many people in the twilight of their lives, people who have made contributions to the nation, left dependent upon charity. Any man who has worked all his life and contributed a family to the nation is a proud man. The workers are proud; they are independent. They do not like to be dependent upon anyone, and they should not be dependent.

We get up and say glibly that the banks are entitled to certain profits by virtue of their making investments with their funds. We say glibly that interest has a right to profits because they sit in their offices and clip coupons. But the worker who goes into the coal mine, or the worker who goes to sea, or the worker who farms the land, and who has put everything he has, including his family, into that work, and who has produced the wealth of the nation, is not entitled to anything. He is not entitled to seek a bite to eat when he is no longer able to work.

You see, that is the trouble with the capitalist system. And all the laws are designed for the capitalist, and to protect him. Nothing protects society itself. That is the difference between socialism and capitalism. Socialism seeks to protect society.

I am sorry I got into this discussion, because I had not intended to do so. I hope that the Prime Minister will pay some attention to and will make some analysis of the thoughts I have tried to express. I am absolutely in accord with the setting up of the department. As a member of the committee on reconstruction I am going to interest myself in that phase of the work; and anything I can do in the post-war period to implement the ideas, recommendations and suggestions which have come out of that committee, I shall consider it my first duty to do.

Mr. PAUL MARTIN (Parliamentary Assistant to the Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, I am sure the house will agree that next to the prosecution of the war no matter is as important as the problem now under discussion. I was not a little surprised, however, in listening to the speech which has just been delivered, to note the suggestion that the reconstruction of the world should proceed upon the primary consideration of giving to each country full supremacy over its economic life. That certainly is not in harmony with the speeches the hon. member, himself, has delivered in this house. Certainly it is not in harmony with the speeches of his leader. Nor is it in harmony with the speech delivered in the city of Ottawa by Mr. Nash, the representative in Washington of New Zealand.

Certainly the kind of doctrine advocated to-night is the very kind of doctrine which provoked, and did more to bring about this war than any other circumstance apart from the mischievous intentions of Hitler himself.

Mr. BLACKMORE: That statement is complete nonsense.

Mr. MARTIN: I am sure that upon reflection the hon. member for Cape Breton South (Mr. Gillis), for whom I have the highest regard, and with whom I have discussed this matter on many occasions, will consider that possibly he was given to enthusiasm to-night, rather than to serious consideration of all aspects of the problem; for let us not to ourselves or to our people raise panaceas which we know cannot be properly fulfilled.

Mr. GILLIS: Shirk our own responsibilities by passing them on to someone else!

Mr. MARTIN: I would ask my hon. friend to give me the same attention which I gave to him. Undoubtedly this country must, by its own effort—through the effort of this parliament, and the efforts of the various provincial legislatures—do everything humanly possible to give the kind of security of which the hon. member has spoken to-night, the kind of security which every member in the house, interested in the subject, would want to see our people receive.

But let us look at the realities of the situation. We are not living in a Canada of 1867; we are living in an interdependent world, a world which has contracted almost beyond conception. It is a world where one point on the globe is sixty hours from not more than the farthest point. It is a world in which this particular country, traditionally, to the extent of thirty-five per cent of its income, has been dependent upon what it could sell to other nations in the world.

In the face of this situation I am sure the hon. member would agree that the only satisfactory guarantee of real reconstruction in Canada is predicated upon the most successful measure of international political and economic collaboration.

Mr. COLDWELL: No one denies that.

Mr. MARTIN: The hon. member was not in the house when his colleague spoke.

Mr. COLDWELL: I heard. I was behind the curtain.

Mr. KUHL: A fine collaboration. Tell us what "collaboration" means.

Mr. MARTIN: The leader of the C.C.F. group has said he agrees with that.

Mr. COLDWELL: Surely.

Mr. MARTIN: Undoubtedly that is the situation, and I am not saying this in any political sense. I have talked this sort of thing for twenty years and in some quarters I have been humiliated for doing so. But we have reached the stage in the development of human history where unless the great powers and small powers can arrive at some understanding, not only in regard to political but as well to economic matters, not only shall we not be able to provide at home the kind of security for our people that we want, but we shall set in being again the kind of situation which has provided insecurity and war. Let there be no mistake about that. And this government, not without having made its mistakes, has as its Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) a man who recently gave expression in London, at a time and under circumstances which were by no means easy or unanimous, to the conviction that as far as this country was concerned it intended in the projection of its foreign policy to contribute the fullest collaboration in both political and economic matters.

Long before that, in our contribution at the food conference in Virginia about two years ago, in connection with the interim food organization which in consequence has been set up, and in regard to the united nations relief and rehabilitation administration, we gave evidence that not only do we want to have security for our people at home but we recognize our obligation in providing security for other countries and other peoples, realizing that in doing so we are at the same time giving a full guarantee of security for our own people. Recently, at the twenty-sixth meeting of the International Labour Conference at Philadelphia, the government of this country, in co-operation with workers and employers, subscribed, along with the united nations and associated powers then assembled, to the kind of policy which my hon. friend has been speaking about to-night, the desirability of giving to the undeveloped areas of the world in addition to the more fortunate nations the kind of social standards and social security which we in this country want and which, I believe, regardless of political interests, we ultimately shall have; recognizing however there, as we did—not only Canada but the forty-three nations assembled —that we wanted to provide a minima of security, and if that could not be obtained by resorting to measures which were traditional, then measures which were untraditional, measures which were not part of the status quo, must be resorted to in order to provide people with the opportunity of full life.

I am sure that the hon. gentleman, on reconsideration, will recognize that he overstated the case or stated it in a way that he really did not intend.

The problem of reconstruction, it seems to me, falls into two broad categories. First, measures for making the transition from war to peace, when the time comes, as rapidly and smoothly as possible and with the least possible social cost. With regard to this transitional period the government has been alive to the problem. First, we have resorted to the very technique which hon. gentlemen opposite have suggested, for many years—the technique of preparation, the technique of planning. The war had no sooner begun than the James committee and ancillary committees were set up to deal with the problem factually, to understand what that problem was. That technique was in harmony with the kind of planning which hon. gentlemen opposite so often espouse and suggest. The time has come, of course, when these studies, these factual presentations, must be borne in mind and implemented. That is exactly what we are doing to-night in the setting up of a ministry to coordinate, to centralize, to harmonize the action of municipalities, of provinces and of the federal government, based upon the studies which have been made. What better, what sounder, what other sensible course could possibly be resorted to?

During the war, with regard to the problem of transition, the government has had in its very war policies this kind of problem in mind. Its war-time fiscal policy, the price ceiling, controls over production and the allocation of commodities—all have been directed to making an orderly transition possible. They have had the effect, in conjunction with unemployment insurance and the fiscal policy, of building up very great reserves of purchasing power to meet the needs of this period. When you consider that the unemployment insurance fund, now a little more than $200,000,000, built up since 1941 on contributions from the state, employers and workers, will provide in this period of transition, when undoubtedly we shall be faced with the difficulty of keeping men in gainful employment, as we must do, a very useful cushion and one which we shall be pround of having set up.

Mr. GILLIS: And it will last for about six weeks.

[Mr. Martin.]

Mr. MARTIN: It would if everybody went out of work.

Mr. GILLIS: If you went back to the conditions of 1939.

Mr. MARTIN: Yes, if everybody was out of work. Of course it is only an insurance fund.

Mr. GILLIS: That is the programme.

Mr. MARTIN: The programme is not one of having men out of work. My hon. friend should be serious. He laughs. I do not want to laugh about this thing, and I am sure he does not. This government is setting up a reconstruction ministry. It proposes to set up measures which the hon. member had in mind when he spoke earlier. To suggest that the unemployment fund will not last six weeks is to suggest that everybody will be out of work, which obviously would not be the case. All I am saying is that this fund, of which we all should be proud, will be one of the cushioning factors in the transitional period. I have said no more about it and no less. Then the work of the Department of Munitions and Supply in bringing about arrangements for the termination of contracts and for eliminating delays in industrial reorganization is all part of this policy. There is the provision for the disposal of war assets, for the Industrial Development bank, for our employment services. Our greatly extended arrangements for the retraining of military personnel and civilian workers which have been undertaken under the Vocational Training Act will be of tremendous value in this transitional period. One contemplates, Mr. Speaker, that over 300,000 people have thus far taken advantage of our vocational training. One considers in that amazing record—excelled, incidentally, by no other country of the united nations—the great possibilities of that kind of training to fit men for particular jobs in industry, both in the transitional and in the long-term period.

So that it is not fair, it is not true to say that this government has not, during the war itself, prior to the setting up of this ministry, devoted itself to the fullest consideration of this problem. Only this afternoon I was reading a publication issued by the Fortnightly Review, an analysis of the work of the various governments of the world with regard to this problem of reconstruction. The Prime Minister held up for our scrutiny to-day the publications of the various committees which have been working on this problem, and these publications have received at the hands of the Fortnightly Review in its summary a tribute that no other studies were as complete or as penetrating or as far-reaching as these.

The job, I quite agree, is to go beyond the period of study, to implement these recommendations, and that is the sort of thing we are dealing with here to-night, and with which I want to have something in a very special way to say.

Before doing that, let me say that I recognize that the second phase of reconstruction is the putting into effect of long-term run measures on the need for which public opinion has crystallized. There I agree with the hon. gentleman, as I think every member of the house does. That was reflected clearly at Philadelphia when forty-three nations representing various governments and various shades of public opinion gathered together, and where underlying the deliberations of that conference as undoubtedly representing public opinion of the peoples of the world there was the thought that what we have been able to do during the war in providing a high level of employment must be done during the peace. But it will not be of any help to say that the problem can be done simply. It cannot be done simply. But it is one that must be done. To say that it is simple is to overlook all the international entanglements and difficulties in a country like Canada with its currently inefficient constitutional distribution of powers. But that it must be done I fully agree. One of the things that must be done is to recognize, as the hon. gentleman has recognized and as I do, that under the present distribution of powers in this country, powers extended to the provinces on the one hand and to the federal government on the other, there do not reside in this parliament at the moment the powers that are necessary for giving us the opportunity of dealing with some of the problems that will have to be faced.

Mr. BLACKMORE: I challenge that statement.

Mr. MARTIN: The hon. member is a better constitutional lawyer than I am. All I can do is to give my humble opinion. But this government has not overlooked the desirability of taking unto itself powers that now reside elsewhere. It attempted that in 1941, the first real attempt ever made in this country, by having a conference with the provinces in this very chamber, to try to bring about some of the recommendations of the Rowell-Sirois report, with the idea of stream-lining, if you like, our legislative machinery, with the idea of rendering our legislative powers more efficient. Then, not having succeeded in that conference, it is now proceeding to another; and as the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) said to-day, steps and preparations are now under way for the holding of another conference between the dominion and the provinces.

While it might be constitutionally possible for us to change the constitution right here and now, one has to consider many other factors. One has to consider that we are a federal state, and if these things can be done by way of cooperation and by way of courtesy, that is the effective way of bringing about the necessary changes. We had a good example of that last December when the dominion Department of Labour met with the provincial departments in a conference, as a result of which certain labour regulations were promulgated. That conference, properly timed and properly prepared, resulted in a great deal of understanding and a great deal of good between the provinces on the one hand and the dominion on the other. I believe that following that model, placing before the provinces the difficulties as we see them and as they undoubtedly see them, it will be possible to arrive at financial measures without which many of these things cannot be done, and at the same time to endow the federal authority with undoubted and undisputed power to deal with matters affecting the social security of our people. That will undoubtedly be one of the matters which will come for the consideration of the future minister of reconstruction.

I should like to say something arising out of my connection with the Department of Labour. I have recognized, as I believe this house will recognize, and I have recognized all during my time in this house the need for a better understanding between labour on the one hand and management on the other. We have recognized officially in this country under the aegis of the War Measures Act the desirability of telling employers that their workers are entitled to sit down with them and to bargain in their own interests. Surely that question has now been removed from the Canadian scene. Any employer who takes the position that he will not bargain with the men who work for him is not only running counter to the law but running counter to what is now the sound social judgment of this country. The disputes connected with union recognition, collective bargaining—all these things I trust are now matters of history.

But there is an opportunity for industry, and in this it seems to me a ministry of reconstruction will have something to do and something to say, or should have. No longer can anyone look upon industry as simply a profit-motive organization. That is not the view of this government. That is not the view of the Prime Minister of this country, the leader of this government. I doubt if you will find any better definition of the place of industry in modern society than the statement made by the Prime Minister in this house two or three years ago when he said:

> Industry is, or ought to be, in the nature of social service. It is not merely a system whereby capitalists may increase profits, or workers find the means of gaining a livelihood through wages. There is the right of the community which makes possible the carrying on of industry and it is reasonable to expect to have the interest and well-being of the community and its members considered in the rewards of industry. In other words, industry exists to serve a social end, as well as to serve the needs of individuals.

That statement represents my feelings as fully as any statement I can find.

Mr. BLACKMORE: What does it mean?

Mr. MARTIN: It means simply this, that industry does not exist and must not in the future be considered to exist as merely an opportunity for providing profit for those whose interest is in the investment class. In other words, it means that industry exists for the production of goods and for the providing of income and satisfactory standards of living for all of those who share in its operations. That is why it seems to me that a ministry of reconstruction should undertake in conjunction with the Department of Labour, which is now in the process of doing that very thing, to extend the principle of management-labour production councils into a greater democratization of industry. There is no reason why the workers in my own community, for instance, in an industrial city, should not have the privilege of sitting down with management to discuss matters that concern not only the workers themselves directly but matters with respect to the operation of industry, with regard to the fixing of prices of this commodity or of that, and going beyond that, in respect of a more satisfactory income, a greater reward for labour because it, too, makes its contribution to the operations of industry. Some may say that that is going very far; others may say that it does not go far enough. But in my personal judgment it is one of the next steps that we shall face, and I am glad to think that in saying that industry represents a partnership, not only in terms of labour and management but in terms of the distribution of the income of industry, I am expressing the view which my own leader, the Prime Minister of this country, expressed and for which he was for many years severely criticized. I feel that we should extend this principle of the partnership of industry to many of the things we do.

I had dinner to-night with a prominent trade union leader from my own city, a director of one of the biggest trade union organizations in this country. He laid before me the plans of his union, plans that are now in process, with respect to the post-war possibilities of a particular industry with which he is connected. It was not an emotional thing. It was not the approach of an amateur. The union had enlisted some good economists, some experts in the field of taxation, experts in the field of export trade, who are helping the union in trying to devise ways and means of improving its lot in the post-war period and making sure that the men work every day, eleven months in the year, allowing possibly for one month of retooling. That is the constructive approach, and I trust that this ministry of reconstruction, along with the Department of Labour, which is now trying to encourage that sort of thing, will find it possible, not merely in one particular plant, but duplicating the same thing throughout the country, to encourage the employers to sit down with the workers, having before them a carefully prepared document on post-war possibilities for industry. The curious thing is that in this particular case the industry went to the University of Toronto to engage certain economic experts to do the very same job, only to find that the union had beaten them by seven months. I mention this only to indicate what I firmly believe to be the function of government in regard to this matter. The ministry of reconstruction, alive to its job, can encourage that sort of thing, and the benefits would be incalculable.

There are other directions which this ministry of reconstruction can take. What will be the situation when hostilities have ceased? We shall find plants now engaging thousands of men cut off from war contracts and faced with the problem of a heavy surplus of labour. These men will have to be given work, and if work cannot be provided for them in the community in which they happen to be located at the moment; if work cannot be provided through the system of selective service and other agencies, then these men should be given opportunities elsewhere, wherever they may be, through a policy of decentralization of industry such as my hon. friend has spoken of, through possibly the industrialization of rural life by means of chemurgical opportunities, and so on. Whether these things are imaginary or not, they are bold enough to capture the imagination and to invite the future Minister of Reconstruction to approach the problem with that kind of desire behind his every act. The job will be not only to give men work but to make sure that they work for a sufficiently long period in the year.

With the technical skill which we have developed in industry, working for a short time in the year will not be tolerated by the people of this or, I believe, of any other country. That is one question which will have to be dealt with.

Then there will be the question of the transfer of surplus labour and the encouragement of industry from the point of view of location. At present, if an industry wants to come into a particular city it goes and sees the chamber of commerce and discusses the matter with the member of parliament or the mayor. It seems to me that in a properly developed community, a community in which proper and adequate preparation has been made, the ministry of reconstruction would be able to give advice to an incipient industry as to where it should locate, where it would be of the greatest economic value to the community and to the country at large, always of course bearing in mind the question of costs. These, however, will be details which I am sure will be borne in mind by the vigilant ministry of reconstruction which I envisage and which will be established.

The new ministry will deal with other problems which will be of vital importance and which will challenge the imagination of the man who happens to be minister. First of all, there will be the necessity of dealing with such questions as the educational and occupational background of the members of the armed forces, because that information will be essential. We are going to give the members of the armed forces that place in our economic society to which they are entitled. Secondly, the ministry will have to consider information as to the workers likely to be laid off for any length of time in the dismantling of war industries. The Department of Labour at the moment is engaged upon some important surveys in that respect which are proving illuminating and which, carried on more extensively, will be very helpful. In the third place, the ministry will have to consider the probable number and occupational distribution of older workers likely to be retired at the end of the war. It will have to determine the question of labour requirements. It will have to consider the use of government plants for peace-time purposes. It will have to consider the adoption of programmes for post-war employment, such as the building industry. It will have to take action with respect to the demobilization of war industries, guidance and the training and employment of disabled veterans, the planning of public works and so on. So that the man to whom is entrusted this tremendous task will be faced with a challenge, but he will also have a great opportunity.

I believe that in the minds of every member in the house is the sincere desire to be able to contribute in some way to the bringing about of what is called full employment or a high level of employment in the country. I am satisfied that no longer will our people go and receive a dole without at the same time receiving work for which they will be remunerated. Our people will not want to subscribe to the doctrine of the hon. member for Jasper-Edson (Mr. Kuhl).

Mr. HANSELL: How do you know?

Mr. MARTIN: Our people believe in the dignity of work. They do not want to be idle. They want to have an opportunity to work so that they can develop their own personalities and help in the development of the personalities of those who depend upon them.

Mr. BLACKMORE: So you gave them box-cars. They rode the rods.

Mr. MARTIN.: The hon. member speaks of riding the rods. I am arguing against riding the rods. If the hon. gentleman will learn the art of patient listening, I have just stated that our people are not opposed to work. We believe in the dignity of work; and no government, no matter what its political affiliations, will stand for one moment unless it is able to provide the kind of work for our people to which they are entitled.

Mr. BLACKMORE: What happened before the war?

Mr. MARTIN: But that does not mean maintenance of the status quo. The hon. member for Cape Breton South seemed to suggest that we on this side stood for the status quo.

Mr. GILLIS: Not all of you.

Mr. MARTIN: I certainly do not, nor does this government.

Mr. BLACKMORE: What change are you making?

Mr. MARTIN: Look over the record of this government since the war and you will find that we are not the champions of that form of so-called free enterprise, which has not existed for eighty-five years. We are in the midst of a form of society in which there is a great measure of free enterprise, but there is also a great measure of collective action. To suggest, therefore, that we are status quo'ists, is neither. truthful nor accurate What we honestly believe is this. We believe that we must provide our people with security of employment. If that means the destroying of old labels, then we will destroy old labels. That is the thing. And the very course that we have taken during the war indicates that this government is not tied down but is prepared to experiment boldly, as few countries in the world have experimented, in a manner that surprises many people in the country.

Mr. BLACKMORE: Plunging into debt, though.

Mr. MARTIN: It seems to me that what we must be prepared to do is to have a very carefully and well planned, well thought out system of public investment working alongside private initiative, taking up the slack where necessary, so that in the days when employment will not, because of its own effort, be up to the highest point, the men and women of the country will be given an opportunity to work, whether it be on the basis of the kind of projects contemplated by the national resources planning board in the United States, or whether it be on the basis of other schemes. I for one, as a member of parliament representing thousands of men, who represent thousands of little children who live in homes that sometimes are not fit to live in, know this. I know they will not tolerate any government or any society that is not prepared to do that.

Mr. BLACKMORE: What will they have to do?

Mr. MARTIN: This government is prepared to do that.

Mr. NOSEWORTHY: They showed it last August.

Mr. MARTIN: The hon. member insists upon being political with a man who is not inclined to be political. This government is determined—and its actions to-night in proceeding with this bill indicates that—to take steps which perhaps ten years ago would have branded the Prime Minister as radical and dangerous. I am not unmindful of the fact that the present Prime Minister of Canada has been branded before by many men in high places in this country, who look upon him as a kind of dangerous Liberal who is inclined to interfere with conditions as they are and as they would prefer them.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh!

Mr. MARTIN: Hon. members may laugh. The leader of the C.C.F. party, who is generally responsible in these matters, would I am sure subscribe fully to what I have just said. Therefore, Mr. Speaker, in bringing to a close what I have to say may I observe that in this parliament and in this country we are faced with a challenge. That challenge can be met if we have the same vigilance, the same initiative and the same incentive that during these four and a half years of war have characterized the actions of our people and of all hon. members. We must persist in that. If we want to justify the tremendous sacrifice of men, treasure, and of property that is now taking place in Europe and in other theatres of war, then nothing but the fullest determination to bring this sort of situation about will satisfy. I believe that this government is taking the first step to-night in implementing a programme which it has been considering and planning for many months. The validity of that programme will depend upon the way in which it is attempted to be realized. I have every faith that that implementing will take place. If it does not take place, then, of course, the judgment of the nation will be definite. But on all of us, regardless of our political affiliations, is imposed the most terrific responsibility ever placed upon the shoulders of any legislature, the recognition that in the doing of these things we may be tearing with the past, tearing with things that we have cherished; but nothing is to be gained by taking a doctrinaire attitude and saying that only by resorting to this particular form of government, only under this particular theory can these things be brought about. By providing, through experimentation, by providing for a willingness to change, if the old methods will not do, can these things be brought about.

I believe that there is much in our society that has to go and is going. I do not believe that it is all bad. I believe that we want to try to preserve much that is in it; but all that I am really concerned with is to see that the job is done. I would trust that whoever the Minister of Reconstruction may be, his one objective will be not to be tied down by labels, but to be tied down by one desire, and that is to give to the people of this country, in collaboration with the other nations of the world, those measures without which the full life is not possible.

Mr. M. J. COLDWELL (Rosetown-Biggar): When I came into the chamber a short time ago I had no intention of speaking to-night, but having heard the last two speeches I thought that perhaps I should like to comment very briefly upon them.

As I listened to the hon. member for Essex East (Mr. Martin) to-night, I thought that the sound of the Prime Minister's voice of some twenty-five years ago echoed from this chamber. I distinctly remember going to a meeting in the city of Regina in 1919, I think it was, sitting in Westminster church and listening to the first speech I heard from the right hon. gentleman who is now the Prime Minister of Canada (Mr. Mackenzie King). At that time he was enunciating to the country the recently adopted programme of the Liberal party. It was immediately following the first great war when in men's minds there was the thought of change and the people thought that the war had been fought for democracy. I distinctly remember that programme. I remember the promise it gave to the young people; I remember the promise it gave to the aged; I remember the promise it gave to the workers and others throughout the country, and I wish to say this, that to-night after twenty-five years most of those promises, as far as social legislation is concerned, remain unfulfilled.

Mr. MARTIN: That is not true.

Mr. COLDWELL: Remain unfulfilled.

Mr. MARTIN: No.

Mr. COLDWELL: We have old age pensions. And as my colleague, the hon. member for Cape Breton South (Mr. Gillis) said to-night, the reason why we have old age pensions is that the late leader of this group, the then member for Winnipeg North Centre, the then member for Winnipeg North, Mr. Heaps, and the hon. member for Comox-Alberni (Mr. Neill) fought for them in this house. One of the treasured possessions of this movement is a framed letter which hangs in our national office, sent by the Prime Minister in 1926 in reply to a query presented to him and to the Right Hon. Arthur Meighen, who was then the leader of the Conservative party, as to what they proposed to do with old age pensions and unemployment insurance. The present Prime Minister gave Mr. Woodsworth the assurance that if he received the support in this house that would enable him to carry on the government, old age pensions would be introduced at that session and that unemployment insurance would be considered. We have that letter hanging in our national office. The reply of the Right Hon. Mr. Meighen was not as satisfactory and history records what happened. We got unemployment insurance in 1940, years and years after unemployment insurance was overdue in every country of the world; and moreover because I believe the revenue was valuable to the country at that time, the contributions made by the individual workers to the unemployment insurance fund were to be not only a cushion when the war ended but one means of withdrawing from circulation the wages that would help to reduce the purchasing power of the nation.

Mr. BLACKMORE: A new taxation scheme.

Mr. COLDWELL: With regard to international trade, I am in complete agreement with those who believe—and we all are—that we must have trade between the nations of the world which is to be. But I would point out that the level of world progress is the level of the sum total of the progress of the nations of the world; consequently, my colleague the hon. member for Cape Breton South is perfectly correct when he says that we ought to be endeavouring to control our own economy in order that we may raise the levels of our own standard of living and thus contribute to the progress and the welfare of the world.

This bill is to set up another department, a department which will be valuable in the future. But what is that department going to do? It is merely going to coordinate; it is merely going to encourage the production of plans of whom; of individuals, of corporations? Mr. Speaker, I wish to say to-night that unless we are prepared as a nation to integrate our resources, to plan our economy, to plan our economic ventures, if you like, then we shall not achieve the objective which we have, which is full employment.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: If I followed my hon. friend aright, he said that the department is only to deal with matters that are put before it by individuals and corporations. He stopped there.

Mr. COLDWELL: No.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: He did not say that the purpose of the department is to deal with government departments in national planning plans made by the government itself—

Mr. COLDWELL: I do not think I said exactly what the Prime Minister says I said; but what I had in mind was that it was a coordinating department.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: It is more than that.

Mr. COLDWELL: What I have in mind is this: It is not a department of government which will organize the development of our resources, to plan our economic activities and to carry them out in the interests of the nation. We still have to rely on private enterprise.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: No. This is a department to get all of the departments of the government to work on anything and everything that will further reconstruction and development.

Mr. COLDWELL: Of course; but the government is not going to take steps to see to it that we develop our resources ourselves, and I will give a concrete reason for making that statement. Yesterday this house passed a bill to dispose of certain war assets, certain factories, machines and equipment, when the war ends, giving a group of individuals the power to get rid of these things. That was the representation made by the chamber of commerce to the reconstruction committee. As I recall their brief—and I am speaking entirely from memory, because I did not intend to speak to-night—they urged upon the committee that when the war ends, the equipment we have gathered together should not be allowed to interfere with the normal activities of industry in this country. Three years ago I sat in the war expenditures committee and heard an outstanding leader of industry in this country suggest that we should set up a committee to see to it that these things were disposed of in such a way that they would not interfere with normal business enterprise in this country.

Mr. MITCHELL: If my hon. friend will permit a question, he would not dump that nine billion dollars worth of equipment on the market at one time?

Mr. COLDWELL: I would not dump it on the market at all. Anything that can be used to develop our resources or to manufacture goods of value to the Canadian people I would have continue to operate under government control, supervision and ownership. That is what I would do with it, but instead it is proposed once more to deliver ourselves and our economy into the hands of the private enterprisers who led us into destruction following the last war and who were responsible for the years of depression through which we went subsequently. It is all very well to say that to-night the government is penitent, that to-night the government intends to turn over a new leaf and do something in the future; but what is the record of this government? Look back at that record over the years. I remember that in June, 1939, my hon. friends to my immediate left rose in this house and asked that $200,000,000 of money be issued to give work and food and relief to the workers and farmers. I saw that the house was not going to accept that amount, and I moved an amendment suggesting $100,000,000. What reception did we get? We were told that the budget had just been passed, that we had made a large appropriation for the nation's finances, and that we could not afford another $100,000,000. I was looking up the debate the other day, and I remember saying that if war came in the next two or three months we would not find one hundred million dollars but many hundreds of millions of dollars in order to prosecute that war, and we have had to do that. We shall continue to do it until this war is won; but let me say, as the Prime Minister said this afternoon, that what we did in war for destruction we shall have to do for construction when the war is over. Do you mean to tell me that those surrounding the Prime Minister to-day, the orthodox financiers and the orthodox enterprisers, will tolerate an argument of that sort when the war ends? I hear from various sources and I read in the newspapers the continuous demands that even in this budget the excess profits tax must be removed and the income tax reduced, in order that industry may accumulate something for the post-war period. That is the propaganda; that is what the Prime Minister, the hon. member for Essex East and all the others are surrounded with at the present time. I see no disposition on the part of the government in this bill, or in any other bill before this house, to grapple with this basic problem. As my colleague said a few moments ago with regard to conditions before the war, I repeat that a government must be judged, not only by its general philosophy but by its actions in the past, as to the sincerity of its intentions in the future.

Mr. MARTIN: Will the hon. gentleman permit a question, just so that the record may be clear? He has said that this government is surrounded by orthodox financiers.

Mr. COLDWELL: Yes.

Mr. MARTIN: I am not aware of any, except possibly my hon. friend to the left—

Mr. BLACKMORE: The Minister of Finance (Mr. Ilsley).

Mr. MARTIN: I ask my hon. friend if it is not a fact that it was this government which imposed the excess profits tax and raised the income tax to the highest level ever known in this country. This government, which is supposed to have orthodox financiers as advisers, did that, and my hon. friend should mention that fact to be fair.

Mr. COLDWELL: I agree that that has been done, under the necessities of war, but I was saying that the whole propaganda at the present time is to remove those taxes in order that industry may proceed in the normal way. If my hon. friend wants to know whether or not the government are surrounded by orthodox financiers, let him attend the banking and commerce committee and he will soon find out that what I have said is perfectly true.

Mr. BLACKMORE: Not a glimmer of intelligence.

Mr. COLDWELL: We have to reckon, when this war is over, with a situation which, as the hon. member for Essex East has said, will challenge the intelligence of every hon. member of this house and of every party within it. The boys who are in the armed forces, the boys who are overseas to-day, are not going to come back to the kind of Canada we knew before. I have just been through an election campaign in which the paraphrased slogan of the friends of the government was: "Put the retiring premier back in office to give you the same kind of administration in peace that he gave you before and during the war." No, Mr. Speaker, that is not what the young men in the armed forces are expecting of us. I am tired of picking up magazines and reading the propaganda they contain; pictures of boys in foxholes saying, "Gee, I hope Canada will be the same kind of Canada that I left." I say quite reverently, God forbid it. That was the kind of Canada we had under this government from 1935 to 1939, the kind of Canada we had under the preceding government from 1930 to 1935, when boys asking for bread were giving tear-gas bombs; when boys who were in this city in February, 1939, asking for bread were described in this house by members of parliament as yaps, as ne'er-do-wells, and as spineless.

Mr. MARTIN: And there were Liberal members who opposed that sort of thing.
