EMBASSIES

CHILE AND PERU—ELEVATION OF LEGATIONS TO THE RANK OF EMBASSY

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I have a brief announcement to make. I am making it on motions because it will be made at three o'clock this afternoon in two other countries.

I should like to inform the house that the Canadian government have agreed with the Chilean government for the elevation of their respective legations to the rank of embassy. No change in personnel is contemplated. Mr. Warwick Chipman, who presented his letter of credence as Canadian minister on March 5, 1943, will remain as Canadian Ambassador to Chile, and Doctor Eduardo Grove, who presented his letter of credence as Chilean Minister to Canada on September 15, 1942, will become Chilean Ambassador to Canada upon his return from Chile, where he is at present on leave of absence.

A similar agreement has been reached with the government of Peru. Hon. members will recall that on January 28 of this year it was announced that diplomatic missions would be exchanged between Peru and Canada, and it has now been agreed that these will be of the rank of embassy.

[Later:]

On the orders of the day:

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Mr. Speaker, on a question of privilege, on May 16 I put a series of questions to the ministry relating to certain prosecutions which have been carried on by the excise branch of the Department of National Revenue in the province of Prince Edward Island—twelve identical questions relating, however, to three different prosecutions. Questions 1, 2, 3 and 4 have been answered to-day, but I am denied the answers to questions 5 to 12 inclusive on the alleged ground that "it is not considered to be in the public interest to answer these questions at the present time for the reason that the case is still before the courts."

I suggest that I am denied the privileges of a member of parliament. I am entitled to have that information notwithstanding that the case may be under appeal.

BASIS FOR UNITED STATES WHEAT VALUES

Mr. PERLEY:

2. Why is it necessary to use the formula of issuing a price for Canadian wheat to exporters and mills that is in force from 1.15 p.m. until 9.30 a.m. the following day, except on Saturdays when they are in force from 12 noon until 9 a.m. the following market day?

Mr. MacKINNON (Edmonton West):

1. The same question by the hon. member for Qu'Appelle was asked in Votes and Proceedings No. 27, page i, and replied to on March 13, 1944 as follows:

The basis is the differential between the values of wheat in Canada and the United States. The prices are issued daily to exporters and mills and are in force from 1.15 p.m. to 9.30 a.m. the following day, except on Saturdays when they are in force from 12.00 noon until 9.30 a.m. the following market day.

2. The prices so established are valid during the period from the close to the opening of United States markets. When the prices are received by the exporter at 1.15 p.m. he has until 9.30 a.m. the following day to contact the United States buyer and endeavour to arrange a sale based on the price established for the period.

On February 11, 1943, Mr. Panos was appointed acting administrator of the Sorel branch of Wartime Housing Limited, owing to the illness of the administrator. PRIME MINISTER CHURCHILL

SUGGESTED PUBLICATION IN VOTES AND PROCEEDINGS OF SPEECH OF MAY 24

On the orders of the day:

Mr. JEAN-FRANÇOIS POULIOT (Temiscouata): I wonder whether the government and the house would be willing to have published in Votes and Proceedings the complete text of the speech made yesterday at Westminster by Mr. Churchill. It is a report of the meeting of dominion prime ministers, and it is the sequel of the speech of our Prime Minister which is already on the same record. What is the intention of the government in that regard?

Hon. T. A. CRERAR (Minister of Mines and Resources): That question, Mr. Speaker, might be allowed to stand, and an answer may be given, perhaps, to-morrow.

LABOUR CONDITIONS

APPLICATION OF EMPLOYEES OF DOMINION ARSENALS AT LINDSAY FOR CERTIFICATION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. GORDON GRAYDON: (Leader of the Opposition): Will the Minister of Labour kindly advise the house as to what disposition the government has made of the requests of the United Electrical, Radio and Machine Workers of America, and others, with respect to the application for certification of the employees of the dominion arsenals at Lindsay?

Hon. HUMPHREY MITCHELL (Minister of Labour): The leader of the opposition was good enough to give me notice of this question.

I am informed that the wartime labour relations board—that is the national board—has not been able to entertain the application affecting the dominion arsenals at Lindsay for the reason that the employees concerned are directly employed by the crown and, hence, are outside the jurisdiction of the board.

As hon. members are aware, the government has a number of employees in the arsenals at Lindsay and elsewhere. Some of these form part of the peace-time establishment of the government service. They have always been classed as civil servants and as such outside the legislation provided for collective bargaining. In that respect they are in the same position as all other prevailing rates employees of the government, that is, employees who are paid on an hourly rate basis.

Consideration is being given to the possibility of having the recently established national joint council of the public service of Canada deal with the matter.

Mr. GRAYDON: If these men are civil servants, do they come under a superannuation scheme?

Mr. MITCHELL: I could not answer my hon. friend off hand. I understand that some do.

Mr. GRAYDON: I think there is quite a distinction. That is why I asked the question.

QUEBEC FARM LABOUR BUREAU

On the orders of the day:

Mr. LIGUORI LACOMBE (Laval-Two Mountains). I gave notice to the Minister of Labour of the following question, which I now direct to him. Is the Quebec farm labour bureau, located at 31 West St. James street, Montreal, a federal organization or an organization of the government of Quebec?

Hon. HUMPHREY MITCHELL (Minister of Labour): The Quebec farm labour bureau, located at 31 West St. James street, Montreal, is a branch of the dominion-provincial farm labour organization in Quebec. A similar office is operated in Quebec city. The administration of these offices is the responsibility of the province and under the dominion-provincial farm labour agreement one-half of the expenses are borne by the dominion. The function of these offices is to recruit and place workers on farms.

POST-WAR CIVIL AVIATION

DISCUSSIONS BETWEEN SOVIET RUSSIA AND CANADA

On the orders of the day:

Mr. H. C. GREEN (Vancouver South): May I direct a question to the Minister of Munitions and Supply arising out of a press dispatch yesterday in which it was intimated that the Soviet ambassador to Canada had stated that it was likely there would be discussions between Russia and Canada concerning post-war air routes and air lines. Will the minister tell the house whether that is correct; and perhaps he can also give us a statement in that connection.

Hon. C. D. HOWE (Minister of Munitions and Supply): We have been advised that a delegation from the Russian government are in the United States, or on their way there, to discuss with the United States government civil aviation problems. The conference will be one of a series of bilateral talks which are being held between various countries interested in civil aviation. An invitation has been extended to the Russian government to send representatives to Canada to hold similar bilateral talks with this government, and we are hopeful that the invitation will be accepted.

THE WAR

ITALIAN CAMPAIGN—PENETRATION BY THE CANADIAN CORPS OF HITLER LINE

On the orders of the day:

Hon. J. L. RALSTON (Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, perhaps I may be permitted to make reference to-day to something which is, I am sure, in the minds of every Canadian, and that is the spectacular advance which has been made by Canadian troops on the western flank of the 8th Army drive.

Hon. members will recall that, after crossing the Rapido river, very stiff resistance was encountered, and a cessation occurred in the advance for something like two days. In the last thirty-six hours there has been what is regarded, I believe, as a brilliant advance of something like six miles, in which the Canadian troops have aided in the capture of Pontecorvo, which had proved of considerable difficulty for some time. As a matter of fact Pontecorvo is one of the important communication points in the Hitler line. Instead of making a frontal attack, the Canadians cut in behind Pontecorvo and breached the line on a five-mile front. I cannot as yet say anything with regard to casualties. I know there has been severe resistance; many temporary obstacles, mines and the like, have been encountered, and quite a number of prisoners have been taken. The advance is still continuing and is well across the Melfa river, six miles from the start thirty-six hours ago, and about twelve miles from the Rapido. At the present time Canadian troops are spearheading the advance up the Liri valley.

Members of this house and Canadians all across the dominion will unite in pride and satisfaction at this fine achievement of the Canadian corps in Italy. I am sure it is of more than passing significance that the operation took place on Empire day and Victoria day.

I have word just now with regard to operations between the Anzio beachhead and the left flank of the 5th Army. Word has come in—although not yet confirmed, I think it is authentic—that the Anzio beachhead troops and the 5th Army have joined forces, and that on the Adriatic side there are signs that the enemy is moving back on the right flank.

Mr. GORDON GRAYDON (Leader of the Opposition): May I join the minister in expressing the pride which I think everyone in Canada has in the splendid achievement of our Canadian forces in Italy. May I say also to the minister that we in parliament hope that from time to time he or the Prime Minister will see his way clear to giving us reports on such important engagements as those which have just been mentioned by the minister. I think it is proper that parliament should have such information; for we in this chamber are of course extremely interested in the progress of these developments.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

CONSIDERATION OF PRIVATE BILLS

On the orders of the day:

Hon. GROTE STIRLING (Yale): May I ask the government whether it will give consideration to the taking up of private bills to-morrow evening from eight to nine? There is standing in my name a bill which is most important and which should be proceeded with if possible.

Hon. T. A. CRERAR (Minister of Mines and Ressources): I am informed that it is the intention to have these bills considered on Monday evening.

MOUNTED POLICE

ARRESTS IN CONNECTION WITH DEATH OF GEORGE GUÉNETTE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. LIGUORI LACOMBE (Laval-Two-Mountains): Mr. Speaker, I gave notice to the Minister of Justice that I would ask this afternoon the three following questions. First: (Translation): Has the Department of Justice been informed that members of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police have been arrested on the order of the attorney general of Quebec, and charged with manslaughter in connection with the death of young Georges Guénette, of St. Lambert de Lévis?

Hon. LOUIS S. ST. LAURENT (Minister of Justice) (Translation): I have been advised by the Commissioner of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police, on Friday last, May 19, that a complaint had been lodged against a constable of the mounted police and against a special constable employed by that body since December, 1943. The complaint was lodged by a member of the provincial police. We have no official information to the effect that he was acting on the instructions of the attorney general of the province of Quebec, but we have reason to believe that such is the case. The preliminary hearing had first been postponed till to-day and I understand that it has been further adjourned to June 1.

INTERNMENTS

CAMILLIEN HOUDE—SITTING OF ADVISORY COMMITTEE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. LIGUORI LACOMBE (Laval-Two Mountains): The second question is this (Translation): Can the minister tell the house on what day of this month will be held before the advisory committee the inquiry which is to take place in Fredericton in connection with the application for release filed by Mr. Camillien Houde?

Mr. SPEAKER (Text): Perhaps the minister will say what the question is.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: The hon. member inquires whether I can state the date upon which the advisory committee will consider the request of Camillien Houde for a review of his case. I am not in a position to state the date. I can say that the advisory committee is on its way to Fredericton, if it has not yet arrived there. It is expected to arrive this afternoon. It has seventeen files to consider, and it is the practice that the members of the committee themselves determine in what order each of these cases will be proceeded with.

WAR APPROPRIATION BILL

PROVISION FOR GRANTING TO HIS MAJESTY AID FOR NATIONAL DEFENCE AND SECURITY

The house resumed from Tuesday, May 23, consideration in committee of a resolution to grant to His Majesty certain sums of money for the carrying out of measures consequent upon the existence of a state of war—Mr. Ilsley—Mr. Bradette in the chair.

MINES AND RESOURCES

Mines and geology branch—development of tar-sands of Alberta. Remodelling and expansion of plant of Abasand Oils, Limited, $500,000.

Hon. T. A. CRERAR (Minister of Mines and Resources): Mr. Chairman, it might be useful and helpful to the committee if I gave a statement, which I shall make as brief as possible, in the nature of a summary of the developments in the tar sands of northern Alberta, which has been receiving the consideration and assistance of the government now for the past few years. When the government first became interested in a financial way in this development it was through the Department of Munitions and Supply. Before I touch upon that, however, it might be useful to look back over the years very briefly and get the background for this development.

These oil sands or, as they were commonly called, tar sands, were first noticed by Mackenzie when he made his trip down the Mackenzie river to the Arctic in 1789, if my memory is correct. At various times since then notice has been taken of them. From time to time a great many stories came out until the tar sands of the Athabaska area became a sort of legend in Canada. I recall over fifty years ago stories circulating on the prairies of western Canada of the wonderful sands that existed in the far northern country. In 1914 some sixty tons of the sands were taken to Edmonton by rather costly means of transportation, and were used for street paving purposes. Later in 1926 and 1927 over 33,000 square yards of roads and paths were paved in Jasper park with these sands. The interesting thing to record in both these cases is that the roads have stood the test of time in the years that have gone by since the material was laid down, which indicates that at any rate these sands have a real practical value for road-making purposes.

In 1915 the government of the day reserved over 2,000 acres from any alienation whatever by the crown, and this was later definitely confirmed by order in council. In 1930, as hon. members of the committee are aware, the resources were transferred to the provinces, and Alberta received the so-called tar sand area in the northern part of that province along with its timber and land. Since that time the complete control and administration of these tar sands in Alberta, with the exception of the few thousand acres that were reserved by the federal government, have been under the control of Alberta.

Beginning in 1922 and in subsequent years the university of Alberta carried on experimental work to determine if possible what practical value the oil sands had in the production of fuel oil. Those experiments resulted in a process by which the oil, or to describe it more correctly, the bitumen, could be separated from the sands. It might be mentioned, too, that about twenty years ago, or a little more, a substantial quantity of those sands was shipped to Great Britain for testing purposes by a company there which was interested generally in the recovery of oil from various kinds of material.

Mr. MacNICOL: In what year was this?

Mr. CRERAR: About twenty years ago, I think, in 1922 or 1923. In 1935 a company known as the Abasand Oils Limited was formed. This company consisted wholly of private capital, and they leased a hundred acres of what was known as the Horse River area in Alberta. I might say that this was leased to them from the portion retained by the federal government. This was a new venture. I think it is important to note here that in a development of this kind new ground has to be broken. I know of no other place in the world where as large a similar occurrence is found, and consequently the matter of the commercial exploitation of these sands quite obviously depended on a great many factors that were at that time wholly unknown. All that the Abasand company had to go on was that a process of separation of the bitumen from the sand had been worked out with a fair, or perhaps I might say, good measure of success.

The shipment to Britain did not result in any particular increase of knowledge regarding the manner in which these sands could be treated. As I recall that case, if my memory serves me rightly, the federal government bore the expense of transporting the sand to Edmonton, and from Edmonton thereafter the whole expense was borne by the British company.

In the initial stages of its operations the Abasand company naturally ran into a good many difficulties. As I stated a moment ago, it was practically new ground. In the initial years, and indeed up to the present time, its work had to be very largely of an experimental character. At any rate they got along to the point where the plant was operating fairly steadily in 1941. But the results they reached clearly indicated that a great deal of work still remained to be done before there could be a successful exploitation of those resources. In the latter part of 1941 this plant was destroyed by fire, and for the time being operations ceased completely. In the early summer of 1942 the plant was rebuilt and operated intermittently for several months.

That is the brief story of the development, apart from any government participation up to that period. In 1942, as hon. members are fully aware, the gasoline situation became increasingly more difficult. I need not here recount the reasons for that. Submarine warfare was at its highest peak at that time. A lot of oil tankers were being sunk by submarine action and the oil, of course, was lost. It therefore became a matter of great concern to the government here how best to deal with that situation. One of the proposals considered was the possibility of exploiting commercially the oil sands in northern Alberta. At that time this work was all under the direction of the oil controller of the Department of Munitions and Supply; and in 1942, through the agency of the oil controller, arrangements were made with the Consolidated Mining and Smelting company to do certain work. This was fully covered in a statement made by my colleague, the Minister of Munitions and Supply, on April 14, 1943.

Under the agreement with the Consolidated Mining and Smelting company three main tasks were assigned to them. It might be useful if I gave them in brief form to the committee. Under the arrangements made with the Consolidated Mining and Smelting company, that company undertook to do the following work:

Test drilling of the bituminous sands areas in the vicinity of Fort McMurray, Alberta, to provide reliable information as to the thickness and richness of the sands and the extent and location of areas which might support large scale developments, including data on depth of overburden and on all other relative factors;

Studies at the plant near Fort McMurray of the Abasand Oils Limited, such as checking costs and efficiency of mining and extractive operations and making test refinery runs;

Inquire into research and development work on the processing of tar sands, to include the utilizing of the facilities of research laboratories and/or commercial refineries in Canada or the United States to discover by actual experiment and trial runs what kinds and quantities of products can be produced from bitumen extracted from the tar sands.

I do not wish to comment adversely upon the work of the Abasand company, but looking in retrospect at the work carried on from the time it first put in a plant about 1935 gives me the impression that they proceeded without full knowledge of the factors involved in making a commercial success. For instance, one of the important things in the successful development of such a project is not only the quality of the sands but the cost of getting them from the beds to the point where they are to be treated. There is an overburden of as much as 150 feet in some cases, although in other cases it is less. These tar sands cannot be mined in the way that coal or mineral ores are mined; you cannot sink a shaft and proceed to take out the sands and bring them to the place of treatment. Apparently the only method by which the sands can be obtained is to remove the overburden and then take the sands to the place where the required treatment is given.

The committee will have noted that there were three points upon which the Consolidated Mining and Smelting company were asked to provide information. I might interject here to state that the total cost of this work was approximately $132,000. After they had carried on the work they made a report which was tabled in the house on April 15, 1943, and was thus made available to hon. members. The Consolidated Mining and Smelting company have been a successful mining organization and they have many high-class technical men in their employ. Naturally their recommendations carried a great deal of weight. I shall not refer to the report at any length, but it contained a number of recommendations as follows:

The continuation of the drilling programme in the Steepbank river area and elsewhere;

Making certain alterations to the plant of Abasand Oils Limited so that more complete operating data can be secured;

The securing of complete data on the kind and quality of products which could be made from Athabaska tar sands;

The preparation of plans and estimates to indicate the capital expenditure, operating costs, transportation and marketing problems which would be involved in the construction of a large scale development.

The oil controller and the technical officers of the Department of Mines and Resources gave careful study to this report. If anything, the need for fuel oil had increased. It was decided after careful consideration to enter into an arrangement with the Abasand company. It had certain works on the ground, although incomplete, which provided a basis upon which a real test could be made. As a result an agreement was entered into with the Abasand company, which was tabled in the house on May 20, 1943. That agreement fully sets out the conditions of the arrangements that were made with the company. I shall outline them briefly.

The government advances all costs necessary to construct a new plant and carry on the operations, on the security of all the assets of the company. Second, the construction and operation remains with the company, but the government has the final word. I may say here that some new directors were placed on the board of the Abasand company, men who had general experience in mining work. The manner in which the Abasand company proceeded from that time on was subject to the approval of the director of the mines and geology branch of the Department of Mines and Resources.

At the expiry of the agreement the government has the first option of taking over the whole enterprise upon fair and equitable terms without any allowance for good will. We took over the assets of the old Abasand company. If the government wishes to retain them and there is disagreement with the original owners as to the value of such assets as may be taken over, there is provision for the matter being adjudicated in the exchequer court. The first step which was taken after this was done was, as I said a moment ago, a reorganization of the company, and the introduction of new management. The first matter which engaged attention after this step was taken was to what extent the existing plant was suitable for carrying on the work required so as to have a complete test made of the commercial possibilities of these sands. It is on this point that a difference of opinion exists, I believe.

All I can say is that the best advice the Abasand company could get was secured. That advice was checked by the technical officers in the mines branch of the Department of Mines and Resources. Every step taken in the alteration of the plant and in the work carried on in connection with it was taken only after careful consideration and after agreement between the technical men of the Abasand company and those of the Department of Mines and Resources. It was found that it was not possible to secure a fair test with the existing plant. In the first place it was not properly designed; in the second place it was out of balance as between its various factors, and, in the third place, it was so constructed that it was practically impossible to make the change over to the kind of plant it was considered necessary to have in order to give a fair test on the whole operation.

There was the problem not only of rebuilding the plant but of getting a water supply to it. First, if there was to be commercial operation throughout the year, then there must be a steady water supply, because the process of separation depends almost entirely on water. That is my understanding of it. These sands are immersed in hot water, agitated over a certain length of time, and in that process of agitation the particles of oil which adhere to the grains of sand are detached, come to the surface, flow off, and form the bitumen, which is the first step in the process of getting oil.

In addition, a water supply had to be secured for fire fighting purposes. I believe there was some criticism by the hon. member for Davenport (Mr. MacNicol) with respect to the removal of some tanks—presumably oil storage tanks—across the stream, for other purposes. One tank was moved as a water reservoir for protection purposes. It can readily be understood that in a plant like this, which processes inflammable materials, it is necessary to have most complete protection against fire.

There have been some exaggerated statements made respecting the town site. If this process was to be given a fair test, it was necessary to provide facilities for the people who would be doing the work. The committee should remember that this whole operation was still very much in the experimental stage a point to which I shall refer in greater detail in a moment. It contemplated operations which might last over a considerable period of time. If employees are working in a plant, particularly one located several hundred miles north of Edmonton, they must at least be given comfortable quarters, or reasonably comfortable quarters, in which to live.

I am not saying that here and there mistakes might not have been made. I confess frankly that I am no more competent than any other member of the committee to judge on that point. But I do wish to dissociate myself fully from any criticism that there was reckless and foolish expenditure of money. There was not.

I have no doubt hon. members will be fully aware of the fact that in the last few years it has been extremely difficult to get the necessary labour to carry on this work near Waterways. There is no place in Canada where labour has been more difficult to secure in the last two years than it has been in northern British Columbia and northern Alberta. There has been work in connection with building the highway for military purposes from Terrace to Prince Rupert. There has been the Canol project in the Mackenzie River valley. Then, the building of the Alaska highway made heavy drafts on labour, and it was very difficult to get the labour required to carry on the work of, shall I say, rejuvenating the Abasand company's plant at Fort McMurray.

Another difficulty arose in connection with the priority on materials and equipment. As hon. members know, materials have been scarce, and this fact contributed to delays in having the work completed. It is now, however, pretty well advanced. The separation plant is practicaly completed, and it is anticipated that the changes in the refinery will be completed by September 1. We shall then have a well-balanced plant, and one which can be efficiently and, we hope, economically operated.

[Mr. Crerar.]

But let me add that this does not provide a commercial plant for commercial purposes, a fact which I cannot emphasize too often. After all, this is an experimental plant, or, if you like, a pilot plant. There are many problems to be solved before the exploitation of these sands can result in commercial success. There is nothing new in that principle. For instance, I remember the facts associated with the formation of one of the larger mining companies in Canada, the name of which I shall not give.

They found a large body of base metal ore of a very complex character, completely new in mining experience. There was no question that the body of ore was there and no question that it had base metal elements in it, but there was no known process by which this ore could be treated to extract the metals from it. The whole project started with experimental work in the laboratories of the department of mines in Ottawa and in a mines laboratory in Denver, Colorado. The company spent approximately one million dollars in building a pilot or experimental plant. After it had been constructed the company found that they had to make changes in it. They found that the experience derived from the laboratory tests did not always carry through when it came to large scale operations. That case is analogous to the plant of the Abasand company. When it gets into operation it will, I am convinced, be on a basis that will afford the fairest possible test of what can be done with the bitumen in these tar sands.

Mr. JOHNSTON (Bow River): When do they expect to get into operation?

Mr. CRERAR: The separation plant will, I hope, commence operations on June 1, and the refinery about September 1. It is necessary if you are going to have a fair test to operate the year round, because you might have a process that might work well in summer and not work nearly as well in cold winter weather. So that in order to have a commercial development you must find a process that can operate three hundred and sixty-five days a year. That I think will be apparent to everyone.

I come now to practically the concluding part of what I have to say, and here I wish to sound a note of caution about the possibilities of these sands. The Consolidated Mining and Smelting company submitted a considerable sample of the bitumen to Universal Oil Products, a firm of oil chemists—I do not know whether I am describing them quite correctly—in the city of Chicago who have had long and varied experience in work of this kind. They tested the bitumen that was submitted to them and reported—it is worth while to note this—that 22 per cent by volume would be recovered as aviation gasoline of 100 octane rating, and 17 per cent by volume would be recovered as motor fuel of from 73 to 74 octane rating, which is about the quality of the gasoline we use in our motor cars.

Mr. JOHNSTON (Bow River): What was the percentage of motor car gasoline?

Mr. CRERAR: They reported that 17 per cent by volume would be recovered as motor fuel from 73 to 74 octane rating. Also 16½ per cent by volume of fuel oil would be available for sale; that is the cheaper fuel oil that might be used, for instance, in diesel tractors. The total saleable products in high grade gasoline, lower grade gasoline and fuel oil would be 55·5 per cent. Some use might also be found for the residue. The percentages I have given and the qualities of these percentages give some indication of what could be recovered from the bitumen on a large scale operation.

Mr. JOHNSTON (Bow River): Would it be a commercial success?

Mr. CRERAR: I shall deal with that in a moment. Assuming that our pilot or experimental plant works out, that you can get the sands from their present beds transported to the plant, get them through the plant and make the separation, and then in the refinery make the breakdown on the basis, let us say, of the report presented by Universal Oil Products, you would then have a large-scale operation, and of course the larger the scale of operation the better the chance there is of reducing the costs.

Universal Oil Products estimate the cost of constructing a refinery to treat 5,000 barrels of bitumen per calendar day at $8,700,000 in United States funds, which, if you include sales tax, duty and exchange, would be approximately $12,000,000 in Canadian funds. Those figures do not include the cost of mining or the cost of a separation plant. The cost of a separation plant is not nearly so large as the cost of a refinery, because it simply provides the vats into which the sand and hot water is poured and an agitation carried on, much as hon. members have seen in gold mining using the cyanide process. Once you get the bitumen off, the real job starts. It is very difficult to give any estimate of cost. In fact I would hesitate to give any estimates of cost because they are really little more than guesses. I do not believe in guessing in a matter of this kind. I have always in my experience wanted the facts before me and then analysed and weighed them, and on such an analysis reached a conclusion as to the wise action to be taken.

That is the story up to the present time. A great deal of information has yet to be secured before any definite conclusion can be reached that the project is capable of successful commercial development. I might mention two or three factors. There is first of all the sands. Drilling is going on, and we propose to carry on that drilling this year under the Department of Mines and Resources, separate wholly from the Abasand company. That drilling is being carried on to determine, first, the amount of overburden on the sands; second, the richness of the sands; third, their quality. Some sands are very coarse; some are fine. As a matter of fact, in a commercial operation the fine sand which may be coated with these oil particles is much more expensive and difficult to treat than is the coarse sand. But the drilling has revealed that frequently when, starting at the top, going down through 40, 50 or 100 feet of overburden, you reach the sands, you may have a layer of coarse sands with oil; then you may have a layer of thin sands. In a good many of the drill holes they have run across layers of sand interspersed with clay seams.

Mr. JOHNSTON (Bow River): That is not the difficulty in their pilot plant now, because they are not even attempting to do that.

Mr. CRERAR: No, but what I am getting at is this, that if you clear off fifty feet of overburden, and you find five feet of sand, and then two feet of clay, and then some lean sand under that, and again below that some coarse sand, you have certain problems in mining the sands and getting them out. I do not know, and as yet, so far as I am aware, no one knows, what effect clay particles in these sands may have on the separation of the oil from the sands. It may not present any problem at all, but that is something which must be and can be worked out in a pilot plant, in the experimental plant which we shall soon have in operation.

Beyond that, there are the tests to be made of whether you can reach the same results as were attained, for instance, by the Universal Oil Products in their laboratory tests in Chicago and in the tests which in a smaller way have been made in our own laboratories in the mines branch. There is the problem of disposing of the overburden. You go out on a level area of sands; you have to scoop off say forty or fifty feet of overburden, where are you going to put it? There is the problem of the disposal of the sands once they are separated from the bitumen in the plant. You pile them up like tailings at a mine; you must get some process, some way of disposing of them, of getting them out of your way. I would point out that all these items are factors in the costs in the final determination of whether the project can be successfully developed or not.

Mr. JOHNSTON (Bow River): What is the total expenditure by the government up to date?

Mr. CRERAR: I am advised that up to the present time we have advanced about $800,000. In addition there is what is estimated in this vote.

Mr. JOHNSTON (Bow River): Has all the $800,000 been spent?

Mr. CRERAR: No, about $766,000 has been spent to March 31 last. I have no hesitation in asking the committee to support this vote. There may be differences of opinion among hon. members whether we have dealt wisely with the project up to the present time. I have endeavoured to inform the committee of some of the difficulties we encountered. I feel assured that this asset is worth a fair test to determine its commercial possibilities. I repeat that the plant on which we are expending this money and the work which is being done at the present time should be looked upon as experimental. It is test work at a pilot plant. Doubtless when you start operating a plant through which several hundred tons will go every day, changes and improvements will be made. But the end to which we are working is the most complete and economical test which can be made, having in mind the possibility of the development of this area.

Mr. JOHNSTON (Bow River): What check has the minister or his department to ensure that there is no wastage of money at the plant?

Mr. CRERAR: All expenditures must be approved by the director of the mines and geology branch, and he has his technical advisers in the department. Also there is a treasury officer who sees to it that the money is spent in accordance with the purposes for which it is allocated. I think there is a very complete check.

Mr. JOHNSTON (Bow River): What check is there down at the plant?

Mr. CRERAR: The accounts of the plant comprising the operations of the superintendent are audited regularly, and can be checked against the allocations of money.

Mr. JOHNSTON (Bow River): But the government has no superintendent right there to see that moneys are properly spent and the work is properly performed. They just take the estimates sent in by the officials, and they are checked here by the minister's department.

Mr. CRERAR: I omitted to say that when it was decided practically to reconstruct the plant, that job was entrusted to the General Engineering Company of Canada. That company has a long and honourable record and a very wide experience. I believe it is associated with companies of a similar kind in Great Britain. They have built and installed the equipment of many of our successful mines.

Mr. JOHNSTON (Bow River): Are they still in operation there?

Mr. CRERAR: They are supervising the construction. Once the construction is completed their task is finished. We engaged them because of their experience; we believed they would build this plant in accordance with the best principles of successful operations, and do it more economically than anyone else could do.

Mr. JOHNSTON (Bow River): Are they on a contract basis, on a day basis, or on salary?

Mr. CRERAR: I am advised that they are on a contract basis.

Mr. JOHNSTON (Bow River): Every building which they put up is on a contract basis?

Mr. CRERAR: They do it on a management fee basis. We check the costs and pay them a certain management fee. That is the basis on which a great deal of construction work done by the Department of Munitions and Supply for war purposes has been carried on.

Mr. McDONALD (Pontiac): What is the daily capacity of this experimental plant which it is intended to build?

Mr. CRERAR: About 600 tons a day of twenty-four hours' continuous operation.

Mr. MacNICOL: I want to thank the minister for his courtesy to me on Monday evening last when I had to leave the city to give an address on the following day in connection with western matters. It was kind of him, because I did want to have something to say about this vote. I am going to support the vote, not oppose it. Apart from the hon. member for Athabaska (Mr. Dechene), who I am glad to see in his place, I do not know of anyone in this house who has been to Fort McMurray. There may be others but I do not know of them. I have been there on several occasions.

An hon. MEMBER: You are forgetting the member for Bow River (Mr. Johnston).

Mr. MacNICOL: I asked the member for Bow River and he told me he had not been there. If he has been there since then, well and good; he will be able to follow what I am going to say. I do not speak from what I read but from observation.

At the outset I wish to assure the minister that there is nothing personal in any criticism that I offer. I hope he will not take anything personal out of the remarks I make. I think a good deal of the minister and I realize that he has had much to do as Minister of Mines and Resources. If he has not been at Fort McMurray he could not be expected to devote his time to this particular item, out of the thousands of matters to which he has to attend. I know that he has been terrifically busy, and so has the Minister of Munitions and Supply (Mr. Howe).

Mr. CRERAR: I have been at Fort McMurray twice.

Mr. MacNICOL: Was the minister at the plant?

Mr. CRERAR: Yes, once—the original plant?

Mr. MacNICOL: Since 1941?

Mr. CRERAR: No; that was in 1938.

Mr. MacNICOL: They were not in operation in 1938; the plant started in 1941. In any event, I am not rising in any critical spirit. I feel it is my duty to do what I can to bring about the production of oil at Fort McMurray from the Alberta tar sands. If a quantity large enough can be produced to be piped down to Edmonton, as I hope it will be, I am satisfied that that fine city will grow to a quarter of a million within ten or fifteen years. I believe that will be possible if the refineries are built there. Edmonton by pipeline to Fort McMurray would be distant about 250 miles; it is 305 by rail.

This is my objective; my purpose is not to criticize but to offer something constructive. As I say, I am going to support this vote, and I will support any other votes intended to promote the development of the Alberta tar sands. But I ask myself just how many millions have already been expended on the tar sands in one way or another. This is not a matter that affects only the present Minister of Mines and Resources. All the ministers who have gone before him, back to 1913, have been interested in the matter, and the same is true of all parties that have governed the country back to that time. It is not a party question, and what I say is not by way of criticism of the minister or of any of the ministers that have preceded him. Nevertheless, I ask myself how many millions have been spent in one way or another to produce oil at Fort McMurray. I was there on a number of different occasions and I surveyed the situation up and down in every direction. I saw the ruins of one plant on the Christine river and one on the Clearwater river, and the plant, or what it is hoped will be a plant, on the Horse river, and the other plant about forty miles down the river built by the International Bitumen company. All these companies must have spent a great deal of money. How did they come to go there? They went there in consequence of reports sent out for the most part by the Department of Mines and Resources. It was through their engineers that these reports and pamphlets were sent out. I myself became interested through reading a pamphlet written by Doctor S. C. Ells. As far back as 1913, Doctor Ells, who is a capable geologist, was in that part of Alberta, and I presume he went up and down, if not every year, at any rate every other year. He has been in that part of the country for the department and has written many articles which have inspired producers everywhere and encouraged engineers from the remotest parts of the world to visit that area. I am not going to thresh old straw to-day; I am not going to repeat what I have said on former occasions; I wish to put something new on the record. Engineers whose names I have mentioned in previous addresses, men eminent in their profession, agreed with the report sent out by the Department of Mines and Resources, or, as it was formerly known, the Department of the Interior, indicating that there is a very large deposit of oil in these sands.

The American Bureau of Resources at Washington, through their engineers, state that there is five times as much oil contained in the tar sands as that to be found in the whole world. Whether that is so I am not going to argue, but I do know that various reports were sent out on this subject, and looking up some of these reports to-day I came across an article not referred to on a former occasion, written by a gentleman named C. Bruder in the Nor'West Farmer in January, 1942. Mr. Bruder heads his article "Oil in the Bank", and he writes:

> There's ten thousand square miles of that up here.

That is, the oil sands.

> Those tar sands contain enough oil to lick Hitler, Japan, and Italy. Enough oil to put diesel power on every western farm and to asphalt all the highways from Halifax to Vancouver.

He says that there is more oil there than in all the proven oil fields of the world, according to United States engineers' estimates—250 billion barrels, five times the estimated reserves of all the oil fields of the world. It was strong statements such as this, sent out by the department itself, that resulted in the investment of millions in that part of the country. This investment is also in large part the result of investigations carried on ever since 1913. I congratulate all the departments on what they did in the way of investigation, but I am not a bit satisfied with what is being done now, and I shall give my reasons as I go on.

The minister said that $132,000 had been paid to the Consolidated Mining and Smelting company for their investigation. I do not know whether that was in 1942 or 1943—

Mr. CRERAR: Some was in 1942 and some in 1943.

Mr. MacNICOL: That is the total? The Minister of Munitions and Supply said that to the end of last year the amount spent by the Consolidated company was $112,000. Therefore the minister's figures carry over into 1944.

The minister referred to an investigation made in England back in 1922. I know nothing about that investigation, but I did hear that one was made, and I saw a report of an investigation said to have been made some time in the thirties. I have not been able to find out the exact year; whether it was 1934, 1935, or 1936 I do not know. Doctor Ells, testifying before the reconstruction committee on November 30, 1943, stated that it might have been about that time, and that he personally had dispatched two carloads of tar sands to Wales for testing. I spoke to an engineer and the impression I got was that those sands had been sent to Freeman at Cardiff; whether that is true or not I do not know. Freeman, who is a great scientist in this business, is said to have made a test and discovered that out of each ton of tar sands 36·7 gallons of crude oil were produced. Doctor Ells stated to the committee on November 30, 1943, that his memory was that the test, whether Freeman's or some other, cost about $500,000.

Mr. CRERAR: I might tell my hon. friend that it did not cost the government anything more than the cost of transporting the sands to Edmonton.

Mr. MacNICOL: I do not know that the two incidents are the same. Are they the same? Evidently Doctor Ells did not know or had forgotten on November 30 last that the test was made many years prior to 1930, because I stated before the committee that my information was that the sands were sent over in the middle thirties. I was given that information by an engineer, but I cannot recall his name at the moment. However, it is neither here nor there. Doctor Ells' statement was that it had cost $500,000.

Mr. CRERAR: I understand Doctor Ells stated somewhere that the cost to this company in Britain was $500,000.

Mr. MacNICOL: No. I have his statement here. He did not say who paid the money. I got the impressison that it cost the government $500,000. I may be wrong in that. If I am, I am subject to corection. When the Minister of Munitions and Supply was speaking earlier in the year, I believe on March 21, as recorded on page 1728 of Hansard, he said that the government, up to that time, had spent $900,000 on the work going on at Fort McMurray. That is probably correct, according to the minister's own figures to-day. Then we have this vote of $500,000, which I am going to support. Therefore in the aggregate many millions of dollars have been spent in connection with the Alberta oil or tar sands, or bitumen sands—they are called all three.

How did the government get into this business? That is the question I ask myself. Then I look back into the records, and what do I find? I find that the minister himself said to-day—and it was quite correct—that the shortage of gasoline and the necessities of the war had encouraged the government to go into the business of producing oil at Fort McMurray. I may say right here that I am wholly opposed to government plants of this nature, for the very good reason that no government plants can be operated as economically as a private plant. It cannot be done, because it just runs itself. There is no necessity for anybody to exert himself to do anything in a government-operated plant. When I hear people talk about industries being operated by the government I think back over my thirty years' experience or more in industry and I feel sorry when I hear such a statement. Here is an example of a government operation that has now cost away beyond anything that it should have for the reasons that are associated with government-operated plants.

How did the government get into the business? Mr. Haanel, testifying before the committee on November 30, 1943, stated that:

> Up to 1930 the rate of discovery of new oilfields was capable of keeping pace with the mounting demand. But since that year has greatly declined. In the United States, for example, the rate of discovery of new oil reserves has for several years been scarcely one-third of the rate of consumption.

If that is a fact it would be one very good reason why it was necessary to produce oil at Fort McMurray. He also stated that in Canada in 1941 we produced 10·1 million barrels of oil and imported 55·4 million barrels, and that Canada imported 87 per cent of her oil requirements. That is a very good reason why Canada should produce oil from every available source. Here was one source; the Alberta oil sands, a very good source from which to produce oil.

I come now to the agreement which was entered into on April 1, 1943. The minister referred to this agreement. The very first paragraph reads as follows:

Whereas the oil controller, Department of Munitions and Supply, has recommended to the government that for the purpose of more effectively prosecuting the war in which His Majesty is presently engaged all possible sources of new oil supplies in Canada should be investigated and put into production if such is found feasible.

There was every reason why the greatest effort should be made to produce oil anywhere, and particularly, because of this vote, at Fort McMurray, as I have always been led to believe it could be produced there. Therefore the government decided to do something. The government did not enter blindly into an agreement with Abasand. Right here I must correct the minister. Before the committee on November 30, one of the officials disputed my assertion, but I am going to state it again bluntly and strongly. The Abasand company with which the government is dealing is not the Abasand company which built the 1942 plant. The government took over the works from the Abasand company, but there is no official belonging to the original Abasand company working there to-day, that I know of. Max Ball, the former manager, is in the United States. The next official is living in Edmonton. A few of the employees may be there. The plant is operated by the government, not by the original Abasand company. So far as I know, the old Abasand have nothing to do with it, and are not responsible for the operation of this new plant.

I said a moment ago that the government did not go blindly into this thing. They appointed the Consolidated Mining and Smelting company to make an investigation. They made an investigation. I was up there in 1942. I met the engineers on the job. I saw them making investigations. The minister gave their recommendations and the results of their investigations. To make it emphatic I am going to cite a few remarks from the report. This is what the report says:

(1) As to the process—

We heard the minister say that some new plant has been erected. I want the facts and figures to prove that; because so far as my photographs go it is the same line of construction as that which preceded it. In any event what did they say about the process? This is what they say:

—we are of the opinion that the process of Abasand Oils Limited for separating the bitumen from the sands is a practical one, which could be used in a large scale plant and which would yield reasonable results.

Could anything be plainer than that? The next clause covers equipment:

The equipment in the Abasand separation plant is largely standard equipment and little difficulty is anticipated in adapting the process to a large scale operation.

We believe that a well designed and equipped plant based on the present process would give satisfactory operation.

To arrange with Abasand to expedite contemplated changes in separation plant and refinery—

That is, the government must arrange for them to do that. As far as I know the Abasand people had planned for everything.

Mr. CRERAR: No.

Mr. MacNICOL: I do not want to contradict the minister, because I like him too much, but I say that just as emphatically as I can. After many years of trial and error and trying to overcome difficulties, I think it is unfair to the Abasand company to refer to the inability of the refinery to take care of what passed through the separation plant. The Abasand company had made plans to increase the refinery capacity to 600 barrels a day, but they could not get the equipment. Frequently Max Ball had to go out and sell his services to other companies in order to obtain money to continue with the construction of the plant. I think the hon. member for Athabaska will agree with that. That is one reason why it took several years to complete the plant. The Abasand company did not have the government chest into which to dig to get funds to build the plant; they had to get the money where they could. I understand they got some through a stock broking firm in Montreal, and Mr. Max Ball himself put money into it. The next paragraph reads:

Organize an engineering staff and prepare preliminary plans of necessary plants.

We consider that the results in the Steep bank area are sufficiently promising for a large development to render unnecesary any consideration of a small plant at Horse creek.

In the face of that recommendation by the Consolidated Mining and Smelting company, what happened? The plant was pulled down. When we had the investigation in the reconstruction committee on November 30, Mr. Timm stated, I presume in reply to a question by myself:

> Mr. Chairman, the former plant of Abasand was so constructed that when we attempted about a year ago to make a run with that plant, they would run a couple of days and then closed down for changes and then run again for a while, so that we could not get any reliable data from the operation. We had our engineers go up there to try to get some cost data from the plant and it was found that this was the situation so that the government decided that there had to be so many changes made—and besides that the plant was out of balance, the recovery end, that is the separation end, was so much larger than the refinery end, and so forth. They met all kinds of difficulties so they decided to tear out the machinery in the plant and put it together again.

That is where the mistake was made. The Consolidated Mining and Smelting company did not recommend that; they recommended that the plant should be repaired or improved and enlarged. What happened is almost incredible, and I should like to know who is responsible. This was a brand new plant built in 1942. It was well constructed, by men who knew as much as anyone how to extract oil from tar sands.

Mr. ROWE: Who pulled it down?

Mr. MacNICOL: I presume it was done on orders from the department. I have a picture of the plant here. Why was it pulled down? It was pulled down because someone told the men on the job that the plant should be put down in the pit so that they would not have to bring the sand up to the mill. Then after they had started to place the plant down in the sand pit, which is about fifteen to twenty feet deep, someone told them that the Horse river would overflow and drown out the plant. They then proceeded to erect it again and I believe it is now constructed just where it was before. I am not censuring anyone, but someone must be responsible for this needless waste of public money.

This plant had been erected in 1942 and had operated intermittently, as the minister has said. The refinery had been built to take care of from two hundred to three hundred barrels per day, whereas the separation plant could produce four hundred. The refinery could not absorb the full production of the separation plant, and yet in seventy days, according to the statement of the Minister of Munitions and Supply, they produced 11,000 odd barrels of oil. That is a plant that was pulled down and is now being rebuilt.

I am for this vote. I am for anything that will help to rebuild the plant that was destroyed. When I go up there next summer I expect to find exactly the same separator that operated in 1942. I may be wrong and I shall not be able to tell until I get there, but go I will if I can to see what has been done. I am anxious that oil should be obtained from these tar sands to be used in the prosecution of the war. That is why the Consolidated Mining and Smelting company was sent up there to investigate. Since that time we have had two years of war, 1943 and 1944, and up to date not a barrel of oil has been produced.

The old company should have been left in charge, because they were the only ones who knew how to extract oil from these sands. They had discovered how to do this after many years of trial and error and they were doing a pretty good job. According to one report I have, they produced 30,000 barrels of oil in 1941, even with the difficulties they had to overcome, one of which was in connection with mining. I was there when the mining difficulty was overcome.

Mr. ROWE: How much have they produced since?

Mr. MacNICOL: There was nothing produced in 1943 and nothing in 1944. The latest report I have is that they will not be producing anything until next fall.

Mr. ROWE: They may pull it down by that time.

Mr. MacNICOL: That is a very good interjection. So far as I can find out the men on the job there to-day have had nothing whatever to do with the extracting of oil from tar sands. Unless they follow the Abasand procedure they will have to develop their process by trial and error. That is what I expect they will do. I do not want to pass any comments about anyone's ability, but the manager is an oil man from Petrolia, Ontario. We all know how much oil sands there are around Petrolia. There the oil is pumped out of wells. If working there gives a man sufficient experience to operate an oil sands plant, then I might just as well hang out my shingle as a doctor, and I know nothing about medicine.

Coming back to the agreement, which I think is important. The government entered into an agreement, which was not followed by those operating the plant. What was the agreement? It states:

> And whereas the government during the past thirty years has investigated the extent and quality of northern Alberta bituminous (or tar) sand deposits and the most conclusive results to date is that the Horse River reserve, near McMurray, is known to contain substantial deposits which, because of their grade, location and volume have the most immediate potential importance for petroleum production.

And whereas the contractor has carried on investigations since 1930—

Here again I wish to interject that that is not quite correct. The Abasand company did carry on from 1930, but not the present contractor. The agreement continues:

And whereas the contractor has carried on investigations since 1930 into machinery and processes for mining the Alberta tar sands, extracting the bitumen, and refining petroleum products therefrom.

And whereas the oil controller, Department of Munitions and Supply, and the director of mines and geology branch, Department of Mines and Resources, recognizing the necessity of exploring all possibilities of producing petroleum products greatly needed in this emergency and afterwards, have recommended that a test or pilot plant should be developed for the purpose of proving what can be produced from the Alberta bituminous or tar sands—

Well, Mr. Chairman, if they had only kept on with the plant that was there, they would have got somewhere. And, had a new refinery been put up, or had the present refinery been enlarged, in 1943 and 1944 they would have perhaps produced not less than 50,000 barrels of oil. In contrast to that, we have nothing so far as the production of oil is concerned.

What was the next step? It was to take over the plant. On April 14 the Minister of Munitions and Supply said. "We are simply taking it over." That is not the Abasand company; that is the government. He said:

We are simply taking it over to conduct certain experiments. We hope to recover from paving material produced for the Alaska highway the costs we expend, and the property will not be returned until the money is recovered.

Then, in another place:

We hope to have a small commercial operation as a by-product of the research this summer.

That was last summer, 1943. The minister was optimistic. If only he himself had been able to go there, I venture to say he would have produced oil. Then he said:

We hope to have a small commercial operation, as a by-product of the research this summer, producing bituminous material for the Alaska highway, so that there will be some revenue to offset the expenditure.

Well, there has not been any revenue from oil for the Alaska highway, as everybody knows. I will not say anything about it. Everybody knows what position it is in to-day.

What was this to cost? In his statement the minister said:

Developments within recent weeks, following upon the insistence of the oil controller for constructive plans, have included the proviisonal taking over of the management of Abasand Oils Limited by Mr. Earl Smith, refinery engineer of Canadian Oil Companies Limited, at Petrolia. Mr. Smith, in his first report, estimates that an expenditure of $268,000 will be necessary for repairs, replacements, and remodelling of the present Abasand plant—

I have no doubt that Mr. Smith is qualified, but his programme definitely was not carried out. Instead of that, the plant was torn down, for the reasons I have given, one of which was to erect it in the pit, and afterwards take it out again and put it up at the point from which it should never have been taken.

I now feel it incumbent upon me to say a word about Max Ball. I have not seen nor heard from Max Ball since 1942. I saw him at the plant when I was there making an investigation. I should like to express, as a Canadian, my sorrow at the fact that Max Ball, in some way or other, was forced out of the plant. He is not now there. Had Max Ball been left in charge of the plant, with his staff, there is no reason under the sun why he should not have done as well in 1943 as was done in 1942, and no reason why he should not have done much better in 1944 than was done in 1943. Instead of that we have produced nothing. Most of their difficulties might have been overcome if they had not sent men up who, so far as I can ascertain, had had no experience in connection with taking oil from oil sands. Those men may have had experience in ordinary oil production, but not oil from oil sands. Had they had that experience, this comedy of errors would not have taken place, and all this unnecessary expenditure of money would have been avoided.

And yet I say I am in favour of the vote, because we are into the mess now, and we have to get out of it the best way we can. There is oil there, and if the government has to have another half million or another million, I will support such a vote.

I believe I have recorded everything in connection with oil sands that can be usefully recorded on this occasion. Let me say that I must confess I am deeply disappointed when I think that in 1942 an appeal was made to the house to vote a sum of money for an investigation by the Consolidated Mining and Smelting company, and in 1943 there was an appeal for another sum of money to proceed with the development of oil at Fort McMurray; in 1944 again we have set out another sum of money—and still we are producing nothing. Somebody is responsible for that. I do not blame the minister one iota, but I would like to see a parliamentary committee set up with power to subpoena witnesses. Let us bring here before a parliamentary committee everyone we can bring who can give us any advice as to how to produce oil at Fort McMurray. I would like to see Max Ball subpoenaed before such a committee, I would like to hear the evidence of his different foremen, whoever they may be. I would like an investigation made into why the agreement was not carried out. What business did anyone have to alter an agreement which had been made by the Minister of Mines and Resources, and under which it was understood that oil would be produced, at an expense of $268,000? Who has been responsible for altering this whole business—this comedy of errors, tearing the plant down, starting to put it into a pit, taking it out of the pit, and putting it back where it was before?

The minister referred to the moving of the tanks. That may have been necessary. But so far as the building of a townsite was concerned—no, it was not necessary. The agreement in the first place was to make that plant a pilot plant. Max Ball had about 54 men working at the plant. In January last I am told there were more than 90 men working there. The latest report I have is that there are 159. If we had given Max Ball this amount, or if the country had said to Max Ball, "Here is a half million dollars" the country would have been a million dollars in, and would have had another 50,000 barrels of oil.

Mr. REID: May I ask the hon. member a question?

Mr. MacNICOL: Not until I finish, if the hon. member does not mind. I should like to know why competent men were displaced. I have letters from men who work in the plant. I shall not read their letters, but they say what has been going on. I should like to know why the separation plant was torn down. There must have been some gross incompetence there. Who was responsible for starting to put that plant down into the pit.

Mr. ROWE: The Minister of Munitions and Supply said he wanted to experiment.

Mr. MacNICOL: No, I do not think the Minister of Munitions and Supply did it, and I do not think the Minister of Mines and Resources deserves criticism on that point either. Somebody was responsible for tearing that plant down. I saw it working myself. As I said, in 1942 it turned out intermittently, 11,000 barrels in 70 days. Surely our duty was first to produce oil. It was to get a pilot plant in operation, and to ascertain whether the recommendations that were made were satisfactory. Who gave instructions to build the townsite? It was all right, after the townsite was built, to bring in water from the Athabaska river. But we should know what we are doing. The minister will recall that when the piping was put in the trench, the welding was not done properly, and after the water was run in the trench had to be opened up again and the pipes taken out. The equipment that dug the trench in the first place had in the meantime been sent back to Edmonton. What a comedy of errors and incompetence! Somebody is responsible for such a waste of public money.

I should like to know why, instead of monkeying—that is a good word—with the separation plant which the Consolidated Mining and Smelting company had pronounced very good, and the minister said had been working fairly steadily, a larger refinery was not built. They knew that the refinery was too small. Max Ball was going to put up a larger refinery. If they had put up a larger refinery there would have been some reason for that. Lastly, I should like to know, after the Department of Mines and Resources had set out in the first place to produce oil because of the necessities of war, who was responsible for the non-production of oil at Fort McMurray. The minister said to-day that some inquiry had been made from so-and-so, in order that we might carry on the production of oil there in the winter time. No one has produced oil from the sands there in winter time. Have the men who are directing the work that is going on in that plant produced oil from tar sands in winter? No, they have not. How are they to know that the plant can produce oil in winter? They do not know. They should have left that separation plant alone. It was working very satisfactorily. They were getting the oil out of the sands, and the refinery should have been enlarged. I believe they had a programme for taking out the sulphur that was in the oil. I have found that the oil produced at that plant was fine oil. I have talked to the engineers at Box on lake Athabaska, and to the engineers at Yellowknife, and they told me it was first-class oil. Abasand produced all the gasoline they needed for the operation of their trucks and for their boats that went up and down the river. The plant was not in such a mess as some would lead us to believe. I should like to see a committee of this house inquire into this question, where we could examine the men who know about oil sands, not men who do not know, how to extract oil from the sands; and then after that, let the minister, if he desires, bring in an estimate for five million dollars or ten million dollars to support a plant to produce 30,000 barrels of oil a day. That would be a commercial plant which would be able to supply a refinery at Edmonton with oil required to make gasoline for farmers on the prairies.

Mr. CRERAR: Perhaps I might be permitted to give some information on some of the points my hon. friend has raised in his speech.

He inquired as to the total amount of money that had been spent over the years in an effort to develop these sands commercially. I do not know what has been spent by private companies, but government expenditures up to 1932 amounted to a total of $105,000. That was spent largely in surveys and in putting in a few test pits and that sort of thing. The amount spent under the arrangement made between the Department of Munitions and Supply and Consolidated Mining and Smelting company for the purposes I indicated a short time ago was $132,000. The amount that has been advanced to the Abasand company since the agreement was made between them and the government was $850,000, and of that I understand the Abasand company has expended $766,000.

My hon. friend rather criticized the administration for going into this thing, and stated that he was opposed to government operation. I wholly agree; I do not think that government can operate a business of this kind—

Mr. ROWE: There has not been much oil come out since you went in.

Mr. CRERAR: That is very true. I do not believe that government can operate a business of this kind as efficiently as private enterprise. The reason why the government made the arrangement with the Consolidated Mining and Smelting company has been stated at various times. It was embodied in the various orders in council that have been tabled. The arrangement was made because oil was needed for war purposes. That was the sole reason. Oil was desperately needed wherever it could be found. There may be a difference of opinion on the government's part in these operations. It may be said, perhaps with some force, that there was insufficient knowledge of the possibilities of getting oil out of these sands, that the time that would elapse before oil could be secured was too long to warrant the government going into it. That is a matter of opinion, and there will be a final judgment of history upon that question.

Mr. GRAYDON: That is a long time to wait.

Mr. CRERAR: We are getting the judgment of the hon. member for Davenport to-day.

Mr. GRAYDON: He said it was monkey business.

Mr. CRERAR: Does my hon. friend agree with him?

Mr. GRAYDON: I do not know. I am trying to find out who is right, and up to the present I think he is.

Mr. CRERAR: Well, I hope to add to my hon. friend's knowledge of the matter.

Mr. GRAYDON: Thank you.

Mr. CRERAR: The utmost that the Abasand company produced in 1942 was not 30,000 barrels, as the hon. member for Davenport stated, but under 10,000 barrels, according to the actual data supplied to the Department of Mines and Resources.

My hon. friend also criticized the administration on the ground that we had dispensed with competent men who were in the employ of the Abasand company giving direction to the enterprise. I have to differ directly with my hon. friend on that point. I have met Mr. Max Ball. He was an oil geologist, with a considerable reputation. But he was not an engineer. He had never had experience in designing plants, and I think that if Mr. Ball and those associated with him had got some practical men in 1935, when they went into this thing, they would have met with a great deal more success.

At this point I wish to read—and to avoid misunderstanding let me state that this is only an extract—a portion of a letter which was written by J. M. McClave to Doctor Ells about the middle of February this year. I have not the complete letter here, but the extracts bear on this particular matter, and if I may read them without being asked a moment later to table the letter I should like to do so. Mr. McClave is an oil engineer of considerable experience and reputation. He worked out what was known as the McClave process in connection with these tar sands, and the method which was being used by the Abasand company was based. I am informed, both on the experimental work done by the university of Alberta and the work done by Mr. McClave. He was associated in some capacity with the Abasand company.

Mr. MacNICOL: They were using his equipment for separating the oil from the sand after it passed through the separation or emulsion tank.

Mr. CRERAR: I believe that is correct. In any event, Mr. McClave was at Waterways—

Mr. MacNICOL: I met him there.

Mr. CRERAR: —last year, I think. He writes:

In my last letter before leaving camp—

That is, Waterways.

—I gave you some news about the completion of the bunkhouse and the work on the new office building. Before leaving camp November 15, 1943, they had the foundation in for the new machine shop and garage, which is located between the warehouse and the laboratory. The location of the new separating plant is on the other side of the warehouse. I did not see Paul Schmidt before leaving camp, but knew of his caustic reactions about the new construction work.

I know about how much work had to be done this winter before the wheels began to turn, viz., the machine shop had to be finished, the separating plant completed and machinery installed. The boiler house building had not been started, engine and electric power units had to be installed. Then the many details of assembly of machinery and apparatus had to be in place before starting operations. With a mild open winter this work should be completed this spring.

As I indicated this afternoon, there were delays in getting the work pushed forward rapidly because of labour problems and priority problems regarding materials.

What I would like to get over to you is that this is an engineering job and has no relation or comparison to Fitzsimmons' makeshift plant.

That is the plant further down the river.

I know when this plant is completed, we can operate twenty-four hours per day, every day.

I would like the hon. member for Davenport to note that.

Mr. MacNICOL: Did he say, "in the year"?

Mr. CRERAR: No, he says "every day". I shall have a word to say about that in a moment. I want the hon. member for Davenport to note this, because I think that Mr. McClave is an engineer of standing.

Mr. MacNICOL: I know him very well.

Mr. CRERAR: Well, this is what he says:

When the General Construction Company—

He means, the General Engineering company.

—took over the first of last October all we had was a junk pile and the jig-saw puzzle of putting this junk back into a working condition is no easy job.

Mr. MacNICOL: It is certainly a reflection on whoever ordered it torn down.

Mr. CRERAR: That was Mr. McClave's opinion about it.

In regard to the new water line from the Athabaska river this was Mr. Nielsen's job and as he had been in the oil business and was familiar with oil pipelines, I thought he had the know how for installing a mile of six-inch water line and I did not pay any attention to the work. I believe the General Construction Company have outlined a practical plan for the development of a large pilot plant and this is no time to jump on them as they are not encumbered with a magic carpet or Aladdin's lamp to guide them in their work.

You ask, "What is the matter, anyway?" The construction and operation prior to the fire in November, 1941, and the redesigning after the fire was about the extreme limit of poor design for practical operation of a separating plant. In 1940 I prepared a complete working flow sheet of a separating plant. These drawings were never used. At first, Mr. Sage, construction engineer, said he had never received the drawings. Later, I found the flow sheet plans among his other drawings. Then he stated that my plan was impractical, and from that time on I was not responsible for what happened during the next two years.

But after all, I cannot blame Mr. Sage and Mr. Byrum, as they were oil men and never had any experience in ore dressing mills. Now the engineers in charge of reconstruction have had experience in designing and operating ore dressing plants, and this is what we should have had in the beginning of construction instead of refinery engineers who had never been in an ore dressing mill.

I mention this because I do not know anything personally about these matters; all I can do is to take the advice of men who should know, who are practical men.

Mr. GRAYDON: There is one over on this side.

Mr. CRERAR: I think it is not too much to say that the mistakes in designing both the plant subsequent to 1935 and the one that followed the fire lay in the fact that the designing was done largely by oil geologists and not by practical engineering people. That is why, when this arrangement was made and we were putting government money into the development of a testing plant, we wanted to get the very best technical assistance we could find, and I have no hesitation in saying that in my judmment the General Engineering company are unsurpassed in their knowledge and ability to do that kind of work.

My hon. friend made some criticism of the town site. I do not wish to add to what I said previously about that. You must provide the necessary staff—there is a considerable operating personnel in both the plant and the office work—at a place like McMurray with decent quarters in which to live. They may call it a town site or a city site or a village site. What was aimed at was the provision of accommodation which was designed and built to meet reasonable needs.

My hon. friend had a comment to make about wintertime production. I rather differ from him there; I think it is very important to ascertain whether or not operations can be conducted in winter weather at that plant.

Mr. MacNICOL: Of course I agree, but I say it had not been done.

Mr. CRERAR: It was not done in the past, but in the new set-up it is intended to carry on these duties throughout the year. The margin for profitable operation in any event will, I think, be very, very small, even if all the difficulties are overcome. It is quite possible that if you get large-scale operations, day and night, 365 days in the year, the overhead expense can be cut to the point where it can be made a commercial proposition.

Therefore the expenditure in this plant is designed to provide that test. Whether it will, I cannot say, but I can assure the members of the committee and the hon. member for Davenport, for whom I have the highest respect, because he is one member of the House of Commons who has endeavoured to inform himself on these matters, that what we aim at is to get the most complete test we can, since it is only on that basis of known facts that commercial operation for the future is possible.

Mr. MacNICOL: May I make one correction in regard to the amount of oil produced in 1941? I find that everyone has different figures. It is so hard to get figures that fit in with other estimates. Doctor Ells knows all about Abasand; he knows what is produced there and in the June, 1942, issue of the Canadian Geographical Journal he states:

> Nevertheless, production during the period May 19–September 30, 1941, amounted to approximately 17,000 barrels of crude.

I had said 30,000 barrels because my recollection was that was the figure sent to me by the Abasand company. Doctor Ells states it is 17,000 and now the minister quotes a figure a few thousand less. That is our trouble. We never get correct figures that agree. As regards the McClave system, I thoroughly understand it. It was in operation in 1941 and 1942 in both plants. I did not see any difference as between 1941 and 1942. It works very simply. It is a system such as you would see in a gold mining plant. It has a flotation tank. It takes the emulsion of hot water and oil that flows out of the large revolving tank in which the sand is placed first, and when it flows out of the separation tank it goes into the McClave stationary flotation tank in which the sand in time goes to the bottom and at the top the oil is fluffed off from one corner into the sedimentation tanks. Shortly after, it receives a dilutent and then it goes from the sedimentation tank to the refinery. The trouble at the Abasand plant was that the refinery was too small for the amount of oil produced. What amazes me is that the separation plant was pulled down. It was equipped with McClave's own apparatus. I may observe in passing that the last time I was there McClave slept, not in the same bed but in the same room with me. I found him a very capable man. What I want to know is whether the new plant will have the McClave process installed and the same revolving emulsion tank?

Mr. CRERAR: We do not differ on the process. The difficulty was not in the process of treatment. There is no criticism of the Abasand company's process in their operations in 1941 and 1942. It was rather in connection with the lay-out of their plant, the general design of it and the construction, which was not such as to give the most effective and economical operation. I may tell the hon. member that this data I have is taken from the reports of the Abasand company, and in 1941 the total virgin crude produced, namely, the bitumen as it comes from the sands, was 20,282 barrels.

Mr. MacNICOL: I thought the minister said a few moments ago 11,000.

Mr. CRERAR: No; I was speaking of 1942. This is 1941. In 1941 the total virgin crude produced was 20,282 barrels.

Mr. MacNICOL: In 1941?

Mr. CRERAR: Yes. In 1942, after they had the new plant going, it was 9,958 barrels.

Mr. MacNICOL: I total the figures in the report as about 11,000 barrels.

Mr. CRERAR: I do not know that it is of a great deal of importance. This is contained—

Mr. MacNICOL: In a report.

Mr. CRERAR: Yes. The information is contained in the report made by the Consolidated Mining and Smelting Company of Canada, which was tabled in the house.

Mr. ROWE: How much was produced in 1943?

Mr. CRERAR: They were not operating in 1943.

Mr. ROWE: It is getting less every year.

Mr. CRERAR: The revamping of the plant was taking place and that is going on now. The plant will come into operation again this year and we hope there will be continuous operation throughout the winter season.

Mr. DECHENE: I am sure the committee will agree with me when I say that I have not wasted the time of parliament during the present session. I have been impressed at all times, in taking that attitude, by the necessity of going ahead with the work of the house. I have been impressed with the terrific situation that exists overseas. I have been impressed by what has appeared to me to be the interminable delay occasioned by members in carrying on the work necessary for the war purposes of the country. Indeed, we are still trying to pass estimates relating to the war, and as I speak this afternoon I am quite conscious of the importance of getting on with the business of the house, and I would not speak but for the fact that these sands which we are at present discussing are right in the riding of Athabaska.

I will not say that it was an error, but I will say that through some unfortunate occurrence when the question was before the house a few weeks ago, I was not permitted to speak while those who knew less about the matter were allowed all the time they wanted. I am impressed with the fact that right now your boy, Mr. Chairman, and mine are up in the air over Germany possibly, risking their lives, that your boy and mine, perhaps, are in Italy gloriously carrying the arms of Canada in the first big victory in which our forces have been engaged in this war. I am struck with the fact that there are members of the house who are spending day after day, week after week, in criticism, some of it very unfair and unjust, to my mind, taking up time with repetitions, day after day, week after week, when we know how much these debates cost.

When we remember, Mr. Chairman, that these debates cost from $1,200 to $1,500 an hour—these are the figures put on the record by Mr. R. B. Bennett himself some years ago—and when we remember that all over the world millions of men and women are in want, some of them starving, walking skeletons, we have seen pictures from Greece, Serbia, France, et cetera, and realize that in Canada we have been spared anything of that kind—foods of all kind are more than plentiful. Everything is plentiful. We are living on the fat of the land, to use an expression that is commonly heard in the street. When we remember all these things and find some hon. members carrying on carping criticism of things that are most difficult to do as, for instance, the successful development of the tar sands at McMurray, it makes one wonder. Apparently the hon. member for Bow River has forgotten about the mines in his own constituency being idle.

Mr. JOHNSTON (Bow River): No, he did not; he brought the question up here.

Mr. DECHENE: He talks about something about which he knows nothing.

[Mr. Dechene.]

Mr. JOHNSTON (Bow River): The hon. member is doing that right now.

Mr. DECHENE: The hon. member is a champion in this house. He is a champion of some kind. He can talk more often, more fluently and longer of things about which he knows nothing than any other hon. member. I do not make a practice of doing that. The hon. member for Davenport knows something about the difficulties of the situation. They were explained by the Minister of Mines and Resources. I believe he is able to handle the situation without my help, but I wish to remind the hon. member for Davenport that at Fort McMurray we have a proposition that is entirely new in Canada. Geologists and other men who have knowledge of the oil game as it is practised on the north American continent, taking the crude oil out of the ground as it is done in Turner valley, for example, refining it by cracking and other methods and putting it into use, know the situation up there is different. That is the oil game as we have known it; but at Fort McMurray it is a mining proposition, and a most difficult one. The engineers who are hired and who know all about oil find that they do not know much about the other process. That has been a part of our difficulty. It is a most difficult thing to work.

I may tell the committee that I, for one, have been interested in these oil sands for many years. As I said in this house a couple of years ago, some of us invested and lost our money in that country to try to develop the sands many years ago. We are not criticizing anyone. We tried to get those vast resources into production.

At this time the war has come to the rescue of this oil field and we are getting the same field proved for the people of Canada. I deprecate the attitude of people in public life whose criticism is unfair and unjust and which may retard the successful operation of that field. Not so long ago we had the spectacle of a minister of the crown of Alberta moving, on the floor of the legislature of that province, a resolution couched in language that no public man to my knowledge has ever used before in addressing another house. I sat in the Alberta legislature for many years. I sat there during the depression. I know how severe conditions were and how often our tempers were tried. But never for a moment would we have moved a resolution in the language of the livery barn or the words of a bushwhacker to be sent to the parliament of Canada in order to suggest something—

Mr. CASTLEDEN: You ought to come to Saskatchewan.

Mr. DECHENE: This was done by a minister of the crown of Alberta. The other day in speaking to the question the hon. member for Davenport said that some friend in Edmonton had sent him a copy of the Edmonton Journal and he saw the resolution and the arguments put forward on this question by the minister of public works of Alberta. The hon. member for Davenport said, according to Hansard, that he thought this gentleman was responsible and conscientious. Well, his definition of a gentleman is not the same as mine apparently. I shall read what the minister of public works of Alberta said:

> Shortly after the dominion government took control of the property strange things began to happen. Out of the north came an endless procession of weird, incredulous stories of criminal incompetence and scandalous waste of public funds and charges of sabotage were heard on every hand.

Mark the language used by a minister of the crown of Alberta. Then he goes on to say:

> . . . some time after the survey party which was sent to McMurray to investigate the oil sands, a prominent Edmonton citizen came to his office and told him that the men in charge of the party were in his room in a city hotel the previous night. He said they proceeded to get very drunk and openly bragged that they had been sent here by the dominion government to bring in an unfavourable report in connection with the development of the oil sands.

This is the language used by a man whom the hon. member for Davenport says he believes is a conscientious gentleman. Can any reasonable man conceive anything of the kind? Could any reasonable man say that a minister of the crown of Alberta was justified in stating that he got his information from a lot of drunken men?

Mr. JOHNSTON (Bow River): He did not say that.

Mr. DECHENE: He said they gave him the information that they had been sent here by the dominion government to make an unfavourable report. If that were the case it was the duty of the minister of the crown of Alberta to report the matter immediately to the Minister of Mines and Resources and the Minister of Munitions and Supply. As a public man it was his bounden duty to do that, to report such an unusual procedure and a waste of money.

Mr. JOHNSTON (Bow River): He is asking for a royal commission to investigate the whole matter. That is exactly what he is doing.

Mr. DECHENE: If the hon. member would sometimes keep his mouth shut and open his ears he might learn something. If he had a head on his shoulders for some other purpose than for keeping his necktie from falling off he might learn something, and he might concern himself with—

Mr. JOHNSTON (Bow River): The hon. member was talking about a minister of the crown and ought to be more careful.

Mr. DECHENE: I am speaking about a particular matter concerning my own constituency.

Mr. JOHNSTON (Bow River): This is the first time you have done it.

Mr. DECHENE: I have never interrupted the hon. gentleman. I have sometimes wondered about the things he has said, but I have left him severely alone in the hope that some day he might tumble to himself, open his ears and learn something.

McMurray is not the only region. From Waterways and McMurray and along to Clearwater and down to Fort McKay is the region where these oil sands are found in large quantities, but it is the portal or entrance to the great north lands where such vast minerals are available. Day after day in the house and in committees we are talking about our men in the forces. I know our minds at this time are taken up, and rightly so, with what we can do for those boys on their return. I have always said that there is a place for a lot of them in the north. These young men have had an experience far greater than others. These young men have been thoroughly trained. After they come back we are prepared to train them further to take their part in the development of this country. Northern Alberta and the Northwest Territories, north of Edmonton, is the place that could take care of thousands of them. Everything is there. If hon. members have travelled, as has the hon. member for Davenport, to places like Pittsburgh in Pennsylvania, they will have seen the three elements which have made it possible for one of the greatest developments of the world to take place there. They have coal, oil and power.

Mr. MacNICOL: And limestone.

Mr. DECHENE: At McMurray we have oil. It is there, and it can be developed if we try to help, rather than hinder; if we do not sabotage the effort by unfair criticism. I believe that some day they will find a proper method of extracting the oil, gas, bitumen and other materials from the vast tar sands deposits in that area.

At Waterways there is a modern salt factory which produces some of the finest salt to be found in this country. They turn out table salt as well as salt for stock and other purposes. But they are held down in their efforts because of the high freight rates they must pay. There used to be only one train a week until they increased it to two or three last year when the Canol pipeline at Fort Norman was being constructed.

I think I would be in order to urge upon the federal government the construction of a highway from Edmonton to Fort McMurray. I do not think we shall get this from the provincial government. The paving materials are available right there and construction could be started at both ends. There is no doubt about the value of this paving material because it has been proved. Some pavement was laid in Edmonton twenty-five or thirty years ago, and it is still just as good as pavements made from other materials imported into the country. Such a highway would not only help to develop these oil resources, but open up many thousands of acres of new land. Fleets of trucks could be used to carry materials for the refinery and so on and bring back the finished products to Edmonton.

Such a highway would go west of Lac la Biche and, as I say, it would open up thousands of acres of the very best land. When the Alberta and Great Waterways railway, now part of the Northern Alberta railway system which is now operated jointly by the two great railway companies, was first built it went around the east end of Lac la Biche even though one of the original surveys was to the west. To the west of that lake and along the Athabaska river to Fort McMurray is to be found some of the very best land in the country. The country through which the railway now travels provides little traffic and the result is that the railroad must obtain its revenues from through traffic. The rates charged are adjusted to take care of from 150 to 200 miles of country from which little local revenue is obtained. These rates are too high to permit the successful operation of a plant on a large scale at Fort McMurray or Waterways.

The building of this highway would make this possible. The building of such a highway should form part of any effort by the federal government to develop these tar sands. We are being asked to vote $150,000 and $650,000, and I think I am justified in suggesting that some money should be devoted to the construction of this highway as part of our war effort and for post-war use. It would open up considerable new land and would help in developing the tar sands area at Fort McMurray and Waterways.

I think it was in 1906 or 1907 when I first visited this region. I went down the Athabaska river for about a hundred miles and reached the Pelican rapids. These rapids would provide considerable water power and there is also a tremendous supply of gas in this area. Then you continue down the Athabaska to Ells river—this is named after Doctor Ells—and Fort McKay. A few miles farther down you reach a point where the waters of the Athabaska river and the Peace river and all their tributaries pour through a great funnel. A vast amount of water power is available here. The flow is so great that even with the extreme temperatures of the far north these rapids never freeze.

I am not an engineer and I think one of the troubles faced by the hon. member for Davenport and myself is on account of our inability to understand their reports or why they do certain things. It is like a doctor's diagnosis. One doctor will diagnose a certain disease, another diagnoses another disease; they finally operate; the patient dies, and the operation is declared to be a success. That is according to what we read about it. That is just said in passing. I am not going to enter the field of criticism which has been entered upon by the hon. member for Davenport.

I do not believe that any engineer, whether he is working for a company or for a government, will not fulfil his duties properly according to his knowledge and his lights. I have been acquainted with many engineers, and I believe they are just as proud of their work, their honesty and their integrity as are members of any other profession. That is part of their training. The hon. member for Davenport has referred to the trouble that took place, but I am convinced that the plant operated by Max Ball was not good enough to enable the government—

Mr. MacNICOL: They are not changing the separation plant.

Mr. DECHENE: It was not good enough to warrant the government expending a large amount of money in an attempt to make thorough tests of the possibilities of the tar sands of the Fort McMurray area. In order not to spend money foolishly; in order that money would not be spent without results, the government decided to follow the engineers reports—these men were members of a well-known engineering firm—and construct a modern plant which would assure that a full and final trial of the possibilities of the tar sands would be made. We would then know whether we would be justified in going on.

I know the oil is there because I have seen some of the gasoline produced by Max Ball. It can be done; but whether it can be done commercially, whether it can compete in western Canada with gasoline produced in other fields, is another question. It is sometimes harmful for a man to attempt to debate a proposition of this kind without being fully informed. In the discussion which took place the other day the hon. member for Bow River stated that to his knowledge $500,000, which is a vast sum of money, had been spent to send two carloads of tar sands to England.

Mr. JOHNSTON (Bow River): Where is that? I have Hansard right here.

Mr. DECHENE: If the hon. member will wait to make his own speech perhaps we shall get along better.

Mr. JOHNSTON (Bow River): I am just trying to check in order to keep the hon. member to the truth.

Mr. DECHENE: I quote from page 1732 of Hansard of March 21:

In the course of my remarks I said that on one occasion the research department had spent $500,000.

Mr. JOHNSTON (Bow River): Who said that? Doctor Ells?

Mr. DECHENE: It continues:

I should like to read a little of the evidence to show what a disgraceful performance the whole thing has been. Mr. Ells appeared as a witness before the reconstruction and reestablishment committee. . . . He was asked this question . . . he does not know for sure—

Mr. JOHNSTON (Bow River): Yes, he does.

Mr. DECHENE: He said, "I have heard of it." I am quoting from Hansard, and it says:

That is a vague recollection. Mind you, two carloads of Athabaska tar sands were sent clear to England—

Mr. JOHNSTON (Bow River): Do you deny that?

Mr. DECHENE:

—at an expense of $500,000—

Mr. JOHNSTON (Bow River): Do you deny that?

Mr. DECHENE:

—and Mr. Ells, who was giving evidence said: "I have heard of it but I think the results have not been given out."

No such thing was ever done.

Mr. JOHNSTON (Bow River): You are entirely wrong.

Mr. DECHENE: Two carloads of tar sands were sent to England by a private individual, General Lindsay. I know him myself. All that the Department of Mines and Resources —at that time the Department of the Interior—had to do with it was that they took the tar sands from McMurray to Edmonton. General Lindsay paid all expenses from there to Europe. Not one dollar was spent by the government of Canada. No part of $500,000, or any other amount of money, was spent by the government of Canada to send sand across the sea.

Mr. JOHNSTON (Bow River): You are entirely wrong.

Mr. DECHENE: The hon. member should know it, but he does not even understand it yet. I despair of making him understand anything; only I know he put on the record and stated something that is absolutely untrue.

Mr. JOHNSTON (Bow River): On a point of order, the hon. member has said that I made a statement which was absolutely untrue. I demand that that be retracted; because the evidence from Doctor Ells, when he spoke before the committee on reconstruction, indicates the truth of what I said, and it is recorded at page 965 of the proceedings. I shall read it, if you wish.

Mr. DECHENE: I have the floor.

Mr. JOHNSTON (Bow River): I wish to put the statement correctly on Hansard.

Mr. DECHENE: I have the floor, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. JOHNSTON (Bow River): No, not now; sit down.

The ACTING CHAIRMAN (Mr. Golding): The hon. member for Bow River may make notes, and speak later.

Mr. JOHNSTON (Bow River): No; this is a very serious matter. The hon. member has said that I made a statement which was absolutely false. I ask him to withdraw it, because I have the record right here in my hand. The hon. member is saying something which is not correct.

The ACTING CHAIRMAN (Mr. Golding): The hon. member did not make that statement deliberately.

Mr. JOHNSTON (Bow River): I ask for a ruling on the point of order.

Mr. DECHENE: I gave my proof. I will give the hon. member proof of what he said, and he can ask for a ruling, because—

Mr. JOHNSTON (Bow River): The hon. member said something that is not true. I am speaking to a point of order, and I am asking him to withdraw.

Mr. DECHENE: I am not withdrawing that remark, because it is true. Here is the proof in Hansard.

The ACTING CHAIRMAN (Mr. Golding): When an hon. member makes a statement, and another hon. member makes the accusation that the statement is absolutely untrue, in the opinion of that hon. member that may be so.

Mr. JOHNSTON (Bow River): But that is not what he said.

The ACTING CHAIRMAN (Mr. Golding): When an hon. member says that another hon. member deliberately makes a misstatement, that is different.

Mr. JOHNSTON (Bow River): That is the accusation he made, that I had made a statement which was absolutely untrue. However, if he is not gentleman enough to retract, let it go.

Mr. DECHENE: Mr. Chairman, here is the report of what happened in the House of Commons, as it is reported at page 2590 of Hansard for May 4. On this page we find questions asked by the hon. member, himself. They are as follows:

Mr. Johnston (Bow River):

1. Was a quantity of Alberta tar sands sent to England?
2. If so, for what purpose?
3. In what year was it sent, and what quantity?
4. Who was the sender?
5. What was the total cost to the government of Canada?
6. What report, if any, was received by the government?

The answers on the same page are as follows:

Mr. Crerar: I have the answer to this question, but perhaps a word of explanation would be in order. At the time the shipment of tar sands was sent to England there were two departments of government dealing with it. They are now combined with the Department of Mines and Resources. There was considerable correspondence at the time, which has not been included in the answer to the questions, but certain reports that were made by officers of the department have been included. I may say there was no expense to the government in connection with the shipment of tar sands. I think the information that is relevant to the question is all here.

Department of Mines and Resources (from the standpoint of the Department of the Interior):

1. Yes.
2. Experimental purposes.
3. 1920 and 1922—21·2 tons in 1920; 20 tons in 1922.
4. General W. B. Lindsay.
5. All expenses in connection with shipments of this material from Edmonton to England were borne by General Lindsay.

Mr. JOHNSTON (Bow River): That is all right. Now look at page 2665. That was only part of the answer. That was the answer from the former Department of the Interior. Tell us the rest of it.

The ACTING CHAIRMAN (Mr. Golding): The hon. member for Bow River cannot interrupt unless the hon. member who has the floor consents.

Mr. JOHNSTON (Bow River): I want to keep him on the right road, though.

The ACTING CHAIRMAN (Mr. Golding): I have now before me a citation with respect to the point of order which has been raised. This is what I find at page 775 of Beauchesne's Third Edition:

> February 18, 1915.
> The Honourable Thomas Simpson Sproule, Speaker. It is not unparliamentary to say that a statement is untrue.
> Mr. Speaker explained to the house on the 18th February, 1915, that the ruling which he had given on the 16th instant in connection with a statement of the hon. the Minister of Justice, was not that "it was unparliamentary to say of a member's statement that it was untrue", but that "it was unparliamentary to say that it was untrue to the knowledge of the member making the remarks."
> Journals, House of Commons, 1915, vol. 51, page 57.

Mr. DECHENE: The other part of the question put on the order paper by the hon. member was replied to, as he said, by the Department of the Interior. The answer to the first question was yes. The answer to No. 2 notes where the tar sands were sent, and the answers to questions Nos. 3, 4 and 5 set out the cost. There is no record of any charge in connection with any shipment being delivered to the Department of Mines and Resources. That is clear enough.

Mr. JOHNSTON (Bow River): The minister will not say that, though.

Mr. DECHENE: Not one dollar.

Mr. JOHNSTON (Bow River): You will not find the minister saying that.

Mr. CRERAR: If I understand correctly, the hon. member for Bow River has challenged the hon. member for Athabaska with respect to the shipment of sand to Great Britain.

Mr. JOHNSTON (Bow River): I was not challenging him at all.

Mr. DECHENE: What were you doing, then?

Mr. CRERAR: I missed what was being said, but the facts are that the dominion government bore the expense of taking the sand to Edmonton, and from that time on there was no further expense.

Mr. JOHNSTON (Bow River): But that cost alone was over $850.

Mr. GRAYDON: Let the hon. member for Athabaska finish.

Mr. DECHENE: I regret that this has arisen. This matter had to be checked up. When a man says on the floor of the House of Commons that $500,000 was spent, as it appears at page 1733 of Hansard—"Two carloads of Athabaska tar sands were sent clear to England at an expense of $500,000"—

Mr. JOHNSTON (Bow River): That is correct.

Mr. DECHENE: And when he says that Mr. Ells, who was giving evidence, says he does now know anything about it, I want to check it up, because that is absolutely untrue.

At six o'clock the committee took recess.

After Recess

The committee resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. DECHENE: Mr. Chairman, I am sorry I was unable to complete my remarks before six o'clock. I have in mind the great possibilities of the development which we are now discussing. I have briefly touched on the great resources of that far north country, not only the tar sands we are now discussing but its water powers and its great salt mines, et cetera. Its waterways are the portals to this tremendously rich north country, which some day will be the richest part of Canada. I can envision the building of a great city at the junction of those rivers, the Athabaska and the Clearwater. The old timers, the Hudson Bay travellers, used to call it the Hudson Bay portage. That was a hundred years ago or more.

If I became a little heated this afternoon it was because I feel so keenly about that great north country. I have seen it as a little fellow; I have lived in it since I was a young boy, and I hate to see it discredited and criticized. I am getting to be an old man, but I hope to live long enough yet to see a big city rise at the junction of those two great rivers, the Athabaska and the Clearwater. If I criticized a member of another legislature this afternoon, a minister of the crown, which may have appeared to you, Mr. Chairman, perhaps a little uncalled for—but I have his own words which appeared in the press—it is because of this fact. He poses as a brave man who criticizes this government so bitterly. He was elected in his own riding in 1935 through a fluke, in the catastrophe of 1935. Then in 1940 he was not so good, but got elected, and now he knows he cannot be elected from that same riding again. This man who puts all these statements in the press, which now appear in our own Hansard because they have been transmitted here by some of the members from Alberta, is now running in a northern riding where he thinks he, as provincial minister of public works, may have some influence against the soldier candidate. This soldier candidate has served overseas since 1939 and is now in Sicily or elsewhere overseas, where unfortunately most of us are too old to go to serve. This great big man, this minister of public works of Alberta, this brave man who uses the press and information given him by a lot of drunken men in the hotel at Edmonton, now quits the riding where he knows he cannot be elected and is a candidate in Grouard against a soldier officer. The officer's name is Tremblay. He has a brother in the commons, also a returned soldier, who fought in the last great war as well. The minister of public works of Alberta, this brave man who finds all this fault, is pleased to run against a returned soldier in Grouard, a man who is now overseas and cannot defend himself against his opponent. I will not say any more about the matter.

Mr. KUHL: Because you are on dangerous ground.

Mr. DECHENE: No, I am not on dangerous ground. What I said about the $500,000 is in Hansard; it was not in a committee's report.

Mr. JOHNSTON (Bow River): You are changing your story now.

Mr. DECHENE: I quoted from Hansard and nobody can deny it.

I was saying, Mr. Chairman, that I believe a great city will rise at the junction of those two great rivers, the Athabaska and the Clearwater, because in that northern country we have everything—water powers, coal mines, gas and oil, salt, everything that goes to make a country prosperous. I have already stated that I think a highway should be built from Edmonton to McMurray because it would enable us to develop that country much more quickly. To-night I have a vision of northern Alberta. I wonder how many members have seen northern Alberta at the end of May or the beginning of June. I have known that country for fifty years and I know what a grand country it is. I do not think there is another place in the world as beautiful as northern Alberta, when the prairie is a mass of flowers and along the road are wild roses growing up almost to the height of this ceiling. We might call it the wild rose country. That is something you cannot see anywhere else. I was going to say that it talks to you, but most certainly it appeals to you. I think northern Alberta has more resources than any other part of Canada. I may be wrong but I believe it has. Do not let us ruin the future of that great country by unfair criticism, from motives of political expediency. I believe I know the feelings of the old-timers in the province of Alberta, those who came and settled there from the old provinces of Quebec and Ontario, and others from the United States, up through the Kootenay and down the Peace river to Edmonton before 1880, and those who came later. We all love that country and love Canada more than anything else. We never allowed political differences to interfere with what we believed would be for progress of that part of the country. I believe that the Department of Mines and Resources is not asking for enough money. We should vote enough money to ascertain the possibilities and the resources of that country. We know that gas and oil are there and also great water powers. Everything is there to make the country north of Edmonton a Mecca for thousands of our young men when they come back from overseas.

Mr. JOHNSTON (Bow River): Mr. Chairman, I had not intended to say very much about this. I thought I had made the record quite clear by my statement of March 21 when I spoke in this house. But the hon. member for Athabaska has gone to some length to misquote statements of mine, and I wish now to correct him.

He seems to be quite disturbed because there is some criticism in this house of government policy and government expenditure of money. But it seems to me that that is the very reason we are here, and I am sure that his constituents will agree with me when they read over the hon. member's speeches in Hansard—if they can find many of his. Constructive criticism is what we are here for. I have listened for quite a long time, expecting to hear the hon. member give the government some suggestions or offer some constructive criticism, but apparently he is quite satisfied with the way in which the development of the tar sands is going on. For my part I am not satisfied at all, and I may say that I have tried to go carefully into this matter.

Before I start to deal with the subject I wish to correct some statements which were put on Hansard just before the dinner recess by the hon. member for Athabaska . He quoted some statements which I made on March 21, 1944, as reported on page 1733 of Hansard. I will read some of these so that the committee will know exactly the words I used. On this particular occasion I was discussing the samples of sand which were sent over to England back in 1920 by the government of the day. As a matter of fact two carloads, or a little over forty tons, were sent. I will not stop to refer to the way in which it was sent over, although that in itself is amusing. When the question was asked of Doctor Ells, he said:

I have heard of it but I think the results have not been given out.

Then I go on to say:

He does not know for sure.

May I say I was criticizing Doctor Ells at that time for his apparent lack of memory with regard to this transaction. I was commenting upon the testimony he gave before the committee, and I believe I was entirely justified in doing so. I said:

He does not know for sure. He says: "I have heard of it." That is a vague recollection. Mind you, two carloads of Athabaska tar sands were sent clear to England at an expense of $500,000.

Mr. DECHENE: Who said that?

Mr. JOHNSTON (Bow River): I was speaking there.

Mr. Ells, who was giving evidence, said: "I have heard of it but I think the results have not been given out." He was then further questioned about this matter and on the next page he says: "No, I have not any definite recollection." That is, he has no definite recollection of its having been sent to England. I think I should go back to the next page and read the question of the hon. member for Davenport, which was as follows: "Have you any recollection of the sand having been sent to England?" The answer is, "No, I have not any definite recollection." If anybody sent two carloads of Athabaska tar sands over to England at an expense of—with the investigation which was carried out—$500,000, there is something wrong with his memory if he does not even remember it.

Mr. CRERAR: Did Doctor Ells make that statement?

Mr. JOHNSTON (Bow River): Yes, exactly so. But Doctor Ells recollected a little later on. He said that it was sent to England, at whose expense he does not mention, but he says that an expense of $500,000 was incurred. I am not criticizing that point of it; I am putting on Hansard what I said that day, which the hon. member for Athabaska entirely misconstrued and misrepresented. The answer of Doctor Ells goes on:

I do recall that some years before that there were two carloads went over to England, to Cardiff, Wales, and a rather large amount of money spent in testing a method—I think about $500,000.

Mr. MacNicol: It was sent over to Cardiff?

Doctor Ells: Yes, two carloads; I shipped them myself.

At that time Doctor Ells was an employee of this government, and he says most definitely that he sent two carloads of tar sands over to England. While I will not now read the exact words from the committee report, I will give the committee the pages at which they may be found; they are in the report of the reconstruction and reestablishment committee of November 30, 1943, page 965, and I hope the hon. member for Athabaska will take the trouble to read the report; he may learn a little and know what he is talking about the next time he speaks. It ill becomes anybody in this house to say what the hon. member said in speaking of Hon. W. A. Fallow, who is a member of his majesty's provincial government of Alberta and minister of public works. I wrote down what the hon. member said, and it is corroborated by two or three hon. members who sat close to me. I do not think it is proper to refer to a cabinet minister anywhere, or to a member of this house, as having "got his information from another drunken man." The clear inference is that Mr. Fallow was a drunken man.

Mr. DUPUIS: He did not mention his name.

Mr. JOHNSTON (Bow River): Let the hon. member keep still. The hon. member for Athabaska may speak for himself.

Mr. DECHENE: I never said that. The hon. member is absolutely wrong.

Mr. MacKINNON (Edmonton West): He did not say that.

Mr. JOHNSTON (Bow River): Well, I do not know whether the Minister of Trade and Commerce was here or not.

Mr. MacKINNON (Edmonton West): I was here.

Mr. JOHNSTON (Bow River): Those are the words the hon. member uttered. I took them down and had them corroborated by other hon. members.

Mr. DECHENE: Mr. Chairman, on a point of order, I never said anything of the kind. I repeated what he said in the hotel.

Mr. JOHNSTON (Bow River): I sincerely hope that the hon. member does contradict it, because those words should not be left on Hansard. As regards Mr. Fallow being elected again, I think he will be able to take care of himself when that time comes. I have talked to him at considerable length about this matter, and his only concern is that these tar sands shall be developed.

To me this question is of great importance. My concern was aroused when the Minister of Munitions and Supply stated a year or so ago that the government was going to investigate this problem because the war emergency was so great, the need of gasoline so pressing, that we should develop every possible source of supply and do so as speedily as possible. I thought that was the right attitude to take. But the thing which amazes me is that we have spent three or four years and have not got anywhere. The Minister of Mines and Resources, when referring to this matter this afternoon, said that the company which is up there now had to start out and break absolutely new ground. That is not quite right. Probably he meant, as far as that particular location was concerned, and even then he would not be exactly correct, because this investigation, as he himself indicated, began away back in 1920. One of the agreements entered into by the government was signed on July 16, 1920. Tar sands were shipped to England around 1920 to 1922 to a company whose name I forget, but which was being run by a Mr. Lindsay, I believe. It entered into an agreement with the federal government, whereby certain things were to be done by both parties, and some lands were leased to the company by the federal government. In shipping the tar sands to Mr. Lindsay the government undertook the responsibility of bringing them as far as Edmonton, at an expense to them of somewhat over $850. So that when the hon. member for Athabaska said that they did not pay anything, he was wrong again, although the amount was only a matter of a thousand dollars, which in relation to the total expense is neither here nor there. In the contract entered into at that time it was stipulated that the government should get fifty cents an acre for rentals. The English company had the land leased for two, three or four years, but the government, so far as we can find out, never received any rental payments, so that they lost that in addition. Then the contract was finally dropped.

But the thing that amazed me when I was reading the correspondence—of course the present minister had nothing to do with it then—was that one of the reasons why the operations were slowed down in connection with the Athabaska tar sands was the fact that an oil company in California was having a surplus of production. That was one of the factors that had a controlling influence on the development of those tar sands—overproduction in California. At that time such overproduction would have meant, in the development of the tar sands in Athabaska, so far away from a large city, that the work would have been uneconomical. That is what I am afraid is happening now, that these tar sands are not being developed as rapidly as they might be.

Let me quote an extract from the report of a committee which was set up by this government. It gives a fair indication that things could have gone better. This was a committee set up by the present government, the Kirkpatrick committee, I believe. The minister will correct me if I am wrong. I understand that there was set up a committee known as the Kirkpatrick committee, appointed by the dominion government in the spring of 1942, and the following is a part of that committee's report:

> We believe in general that the production of the crude oil from these sands is a practical project as a war measure. We also believe in general that the project would have more than a reasonable chance as a post-war commercial enterprise.

That was as late as 1942, and it is fairly good evidence that there is a good chance of this being developed if handled properly. I am not standing up here this evening to defend Mr. Fallow, not by any means. He is a minister of the crown of Alberta and he belongs to the same political party as I do. I do say to the Minister of Mines and Resources however, that in the report which he gave us this afternoon he has not refuted one of the statements, one of the accusations made by the minister of public works of Alberta. I was somewhat interested in that letter which the minister read and I was going to ask him this afternoon, only he thought I should not interrupt him then, to table the complete letter, because Mr. Fallow, in a part of his statement in Edmonton, referred particularly to one part of the letter which I noticed, namely, about the laying of the pipeline, the water line. I am not going to attempt to give his exact words, but Mr. Fallow stated in general that the pipeline was laid and the ditch was backfilled without any test having been made of the pipes, when they tried to run the water through, the pipes leaked and the dirt had to be taken up again and the pipes fixed and the dirt put back in a frozen condition, and still it was not satisfactory.

The letter which the minister read this afternoon did not contradict that statement. In fact, it tended to give the impression that it was a true statement of the situation, because the man who wrote the letter, Mr. McClave —I am speaking purely from memory—took no responsibility whatever for it. I believe he said that he let the work to those whom he considered to be responsible men inasmuch as they had had some experience in laying oil pipelines and therefore he concluded that they would or should know how to run their business. But that does not refute the argument made by the Hon. Mr. Fallow. That is why I say that, in fairness to Mr. McClave and the committee, the whole letter should be tabled lest we get the wrong impression. At any rate, the impression I got from the letter was that the Minister of Mines and Resources had written to Mr. McClave trying to find out something about the statements made by Mr. Fallow.

Mr. CRERAR: My hon. friend is mistaken about that. He states that the letter from Mr. McClave is in reply to one sent to him by Doctor Ells. As a matter of fact, at that time I did not know that there was such a man as Mr. McClave in existence. I had no correspondence with him, but Doctor Ells, who was interested in the matter, had written to him and this reply was given.

Mr. JOHNSTON (Bow River): Was that after the statement of Mr. Fallow came out?

Mr. CRERAR: After the raising of the pipe?

Mr. JOHNSTON (Bow River): No; the letter that Doctor Ells had written to Mr. McClave asking for information. Was that after the statement that Mr. Fallow had made?

Mr. CRERAR: It was before that. It was prior to Mr. Fallow's statement in the legislature. I did not wish to interrupt my hon. friend but simply to correct that impression. However, I may have a word to say a little later about his remarks.

Mr. JOHNSTON (Bow River): I am glad the minister has made that reply, because I would not want to accuse Mr. McClave or Doctor Ells of anything of which they should not be accused. But that was the impression I got when the minister read the letter, and that is why I thought it should have been tabled, so that there would be no misunderstanding about it. That is what I intended to ask him at that time; but I will say frankly to the minister, and I think he will agree with me, that the statements Mr. Fallow made were very serious charges, and I think it is the duty of the government to set up a royal commission, as Mr. Fallow has suggested, to investigate the matter. I am sure that one of the first witnesses they would call would be Mr. Fallow himself to substantiate the remarks he made, because I do not think any responsible person in this country either in this government or outside should be permitted to make such statements and have them go unchallenged. Of course, when I say that, I know the hon. Mr. Fallow is agreeable to that, because I discussed this very matter with him and said to him what I am saying here and he agreed with me. He was quite prepared to give the evidence when the time came.

I take it that this question is too serious to have all these charges that are made go by lightly without any investigation whatever. A reference was made to that drunken survey party sent up there, and I will read what Mr. Fallow said in the provincial legislature in that regard. I do not think it should be allowed to go unchallenged:

> Some time after the survey party which was sent to McMurray to investigate the oil sands, a prominent citizen of Edmonton came to my office and told me that the men in charge of this party were in his room in the Macdonald hotel the previous night. He said they proceeded to get very drunk and openly bragged that they had been sent here by the dominion government to bring in an unfavourable report in connection with the development of the oil sands.

He goes on, but that is sufficient. Mr. Fallow is definitely accusing this government of sending up a survey party to bring in a wrong report. The proper and only place where that can be investigated is before a royal commission. Then he states—this is another accusation that Mr. Fallow makes about the government in connection with the tar sands:

> Instead, the dominion government appropriated another $500,000 to investigate the possibilities of producing oil from the sands. The next move was to take possession of the property being operated by the Abasand Oil Company. Mr. Max Ball, an engineer who had been the promoter of this operation from the beginning, and who knew more about the physical operation of this process than anyone else, was immediately pushed out of the picture by the dominion government and the plant put in charge of men who knew nothing about the process.

Mr. CRERAR: I do not wish to interrupt my hon. friend, but I will deal later with what he says.

Mr. JOHNSTON (Bow River): I assume that the minister will deny that.

Mr. CRERAR: I will say this. When Mr. Fallow refers to Mr. Max Ball as an oil engineer he is wholly mistaken. Mr. Ball was never an engineer at any time; he was an oil geologist.

Mr. JOHNSTON (Bow River): I do not think it is of material importance whether he was an engineer or a geologist. The fact is that he was in charge of that plant; he was the man who was getting results; and after he was removed from that job, as far as practical results were concerned there were none; they just stopped. So that the only logical conclusion one could reach is that he was of some use. But the proper way in which that charge could be investigated is by a royal commission which would go into the whole question. Here is another statement made during the course of this speech:

> Shortly after the dominion government took control of the property strange things began to happen. Out of the north came an endless procession of weird, incredulous stories of criminal incompetence and scandalous waste of public funds and charges of sabotage were heard on every hand.

Then listen to this:

> So persistent were these ugly rumours we decided to investigate and we found there was ample justification for the rumours.

In other words, this cabinet minister in Edmonton made certain charges, which he said were so serious that an investigation was held, and it was found that there was ample ground for such rumours. You cannot take that lightly and just dismiss it as nothing. The government have some responsibility in this regard; they are being accused by a man who should know what he is talking about. If he does not know what he is talking about he should be brought to account, but if these things are true those who are responsible should be brought to account. I do not agree at all with the hon. member for Davenport when he says that this government is not to blame, and that no blame should be attached to the minister.

Mr. MacNICOL: I did not say that the government was not to blame, but I did not criticize the minister.

Mr. JOHNSTON (Bow River): I am going farther than that, then; I am going to criticize the minister. I do not criticize him as an individual; it is not a personal matter in any way, but the minister must accept responsibility for the things done in his department. These charges are a reflection upon the government of this country, and they cannot be lightly dismissed. As I said, after hearing of these charges there was an investigation, and it was proved to Mr. Fallow's satisfaction that there was ample justification for these rumours. Here is another charge which I do not think can be overlooked; further in his remarks Mr. Fallow had this to say:

> To add to the antics of this crazy circus, someone poured sand in the oil boxes and pans of the machinery working on the job, putting all out of commission at one time.

That is a deliberate act of sabotage, and in time of war we should not permit such things to be carried on in this country, especially when they affect the production of oil. I do not know whether that statement is true, but I do know it was made by a cabinet minister of Alberta. Once more I say that the only proper way to investigate these matters is to appoint a royal commission. Just a short time ago the Minister of Mines and Resources said that he was not competent to judge on the mistakes made. Having made that statement he, as a responsible minister, cannot merely rise in his place and deny these allegations, expecting his denial to carry a great deal of weight, since already he has said that he is not competent to judge as to these mistakes. In what other way can a proper investigation be made than the way suggested by a responsible minister of Alberta, the Hon. Mr. Fallow? Surely a responsible man would not make such statements unless they had some foundation, and in the same breath ask this government to set up a royal commission to investigate the charges, for he would know very well that he would be one of the first witnesses to be called. Then he went on to say:

At the time that the dominion government took control of this property, about the first thing they did was to cancel the agreement which existed between the research council of Alberta and the Abasand Oil Company in which both parties agreed to cooperate in research and investigation in order to improve the separation process.

I think that is true; I do not believe there can be any disagreement on that.

We were advised that all future research work would be carried on by the dominion government.

That is an amazing thing in time of war, with labour so scarce and skilled technicians so hard to find. You would think the dominion government would have been anxious to make use of the scientific research of the university of Alberta or anyone else to assist in the development of this natural resource. but apparently that was not the case.

As a result of the circumstances which we found, I made a public statement at Vermilion on November 9 last, charging sabotage and a deliberate attempt to discredit the whole undertaking.

That is a very strong statement.

On November 11 last, under an Ottawa dateline, my remarks were criticized as "sheer nonsense" in which it was also claimed that there was a shortage of equipment and man-power.

The Minister of Mines and Resources spoke about the shortage of man-power and the priority difficulties. Here is what Mr. Fallow had to say in that connection as a result of his inspection:

I want to assure you, Mr. Speaker, that on the two occasions when I visited this plant there was certainly no evidence of a shortage of man-power or machinery. There was enough machinery and man-power to handle half a dozen plants of this size, most of which was idle.

I am not going to quote any more of the charges made by Mr. Fallow, but certainly there is enough evidence to compel this government, for the sake of its own self-respect, to hold an investigation and see if these statements are true. When I spoke on this question on March 21 of this year I went into the matter in detail to the best of my ability. I had only one reason for doing so; I want to see these tar sands developed, because in my opinion we are short of oil and this war might be easily lost through lack of sufficient fuel for our machines and aircraft.

Mr. ROSS (Calgary East): Did Mr. Fallow cause the saboteurs to be prosecuted?

Mr. JOHNSTON (Bow River): This is a dominion affair.

Mr. ROSS (Calgary East): Oh, no; the province could prosecute them.

Mr. JOHNSTON (Bow River): No; the hon. member cannot get away from the responsibility in that way. This is definitely a dominion affair. It does not even matter so much whether or not Mr. Fallow informed the Minister of Mines and Resources. The point is that now the Minister of Mines and Resources has this information and he is aware of the charges which were made.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): May I ask the hon. member who made the charges?

Mr. JOHNSTON (Bow River): The Hon. Mr. Fallow.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): Is he a responsible minister of the crown of Alberta?

Mr. JOHNSTON (Bow River): He is the minister of public works.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): Why did he not follow up his charges by appointing a royal commission of the province of Alberta to investigate them?

Mr. JOHNSTON (Bow River): The Minister of Pensions and National Health knows very well why that would not be done. If the provincial government set up a royal commission it could not demand that these civil servants who work for the dominion government should appear before it.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): Nonsense.

Mr. JOHNSTON (Bow River): That is the responsibility of this government.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): That is nonsense.

Mr. JOHNSTON (Bow River): It is no use trying to push off the responsibility on another government.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): That is the worst nonsense I have ever heard in this house.

Mr. JOHNSTON (Bow River): The responsibility lies right here. We have spent over a million dollars on the development, and the Minister of Mines and Resources has not shown us one pennyworth of value that has come from it, other than a little bit of construction.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): Mr. Chairman, I rise to a point of order. The hon. member for Bow River is quoting a lot of allegations which were made in a provincial assembly by a responsible minister of the crown. My hon. friend should do one of two things. He should either not waste the time of this committee by repeating statements made by a minister of the crown in a provincial assembly, who is not here to support what he has said, or make the charges himself on his responsibility as a member of this house.

Mr. JOHNSTON (Bow River): That is not my responsibility at all. If the minister had told me that about nine years ago I might have fallen for it, but not now. He knows, from the statements I have made, it is up to the federal government to do the investigating, not me. I am not the one in charge. I can only bring these things to their attention and, if they want to disregard them, that is their affair. My conscience is clear and whether theirs is is a matter of indifference to me. The charges have been made and they know them as well as I do. They know who made them.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): He had the right as a minister of the crown to follow them up, and he did not do so.

Mr. JOHNSTON (Bow River): The government and the Minister of Pensions and National Health have the information; why do they not follow it up?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): Is my hon. friend making any charges on his own responsibility?

Mr. JOHNSTON (Bow River): I am just stating exactly what was said.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): The hon. member is taking this indirect route of quoting a provincial minister who did not have the moral courage to prosecute the charges he made in the legislative assembly.

Mr. JOHNSTON (Bow River): That is just the trouble with this government; they have not the moral courage to go ahead and hold this royal commission and call the minister of public works of Alberta as a witness. If they did that they would find out whether he is guilty—I am not trying to defend him—they could find out whether he is right or wrong. Mr. Fallow was quite agreeable to this. He would not be so anxious to appear before a royal commission; he would not have suggested that a commission be appointed unless he had good grounds for the statements he made. I think it is quite evident that up to date we have not had any actual practical results from the development carried on in Athabaska. It seems to me, and it seems to a great many other people that there is something wrong with the organization which was sent up there to do this work. The minister says that he is not competent to judge of these mistakes, and I doubt if he knows whether there have been many mistakes made. But he should investigate to see if such is the case. He should certainly get after those who are responsible and see that they are required to pay whatever penalty they should pay. He should appoint a royal commission and put the minister of public works of Alberta on trial along with the rest.

An hon. MEMBER: Call his bluff.

Mr. JOHNSTON (Bow River): Call his bluff, yes.

Mr. CRERAR: In the opening part of my hon. friend's remarks he referred to a shipment of sand sent to Great Britain, and he said something about some committee that had been set up, or some arrangement that had been made between the federal government of that day and a Mr. Lindsay. As a matter of fact it was General Lindsay who was interested in the project at that time. This happened many years ago, long before my period in office. The information I had is that the federal government of the day who controlled the resources were prepared to give General Lindsay and his associates leases on oil-bearing sands sufficient to enable them to carry on an operation if they could prove up a useful commercial method of extracting oil from these sands.

Mr. JOHNSTON (Bow River): Something like 1,795 acres.

Mr. CRERAR: So far as the evidence given by Doctor Ells before the reconstruction committee is concerned he said, according to the quotation which my hon. friend read, that he was not very familiar with the matter. I do not know whether the total experiments cost $500,000 or $5,000,000. The government of the day were not interested. All they did was to transport a certain quantity of sand to Edmonton. Any work that was done in Britain was carried out by General Lindsay and his associates. They carried on their investigations to a certain point. There is a letter here which is on the record and which could be tabled addressed to the Hon. Charles Stewart, who was then Minister of the Interior, from General Lindsay under date of April 16, 1924. This was almost two years after the sands had been shipped to Britain. I shall not read all the letter, although there is no reason why I should not, since it is a public document, but one paragraph reads:

> Until oil can be produced from tar sands and sold in competition with oil derived from wells it does not appear to be feasible to develop these deposits economically. The present tremendous excess production of oil in California has necessarily retarded this. It will be recognized that it is hardly practicable to induce capital to enter this field until assured of a successful process,—

I should like that phrase to be noted.

> —leases which can be developed profitably and a reasonable market for their products. All of this will take time.

I would gather from that that whatever investigations General Lindsay and his associates carried on in Great Britain, they had not yet found a successful process at that time because he stated it would not be feasible to enter into it until a successful process had been found.

Mr. JOHNSTON (Bow River): What is the date of that letter?

Mr. CRERAR: April 16, 1924. I must confess that I am somewhat astonished at the position taken by the hon. member for Bow River. He seeks to leave the impression that something very harmful to the public interest has taken place and should be investigated by a royal commission. There are two things that may be said with respect to this. The hon. member quotes Mr. Fallow. I have read Mr. Fallow's speech, and I am bound to say that I do not think there was ever an address delivered in the Alberta legislature so filled with inaccuracies and misstatements. For one thing he said that the dominion government has spent $1,700,000. Where did he get that figure? The dominion government did not spend half of that.

Mr. JOHNSTON (Bow River): Oh, yes; it did.

Mr. CRERAR: No, it did not.

Mr. JOHNSTON (Bow River): Oh, yes; according to a return you brought down.

[Mr. Crerar.]

Mr. CRERAR: He stated that the government had spent $1,700,000 in the eighteen months prior to his making his speech. He was just 100 per cent wrong on that, or even a little more, and that is just about what he was out on his other statements. I invite the attention of the committee to the grounds upon which the hon. member for Bow River asks for a royal commission. He says that Mr. Fallow demanded it and that his demands should be granted. What were Mr. Fallow's grounds? One of them was that some fellow was drunk in the Macdonald hotel and he told someone else who told Mr. Fallow that some officers had been sent out from Ottawa to sabotage the whole enterprise. Will anyone in his reasonable senses here or anywhere else; will the hon. member himself when he goes home to-night and, in the calm of his room, think this over, agree that that is a basis for putting this country to the expense of a royal commission to investigate this matter? Here is someone who is intoxicated in the Macdonald hotel. Someone comes up to see him; they have a talk, and this drunken man says that he has heard something to the effect that people have come from Ottawa to sabotage this thing. He tells this friend; this friend goes to Mr. Fallow, and Mr. Fallow, on his responsibility as a member of the government of Alberta, rises in his place in the legislature, and gives that as a reason for a royal commission.

Mr. JOHNSTON (Bow River): That is only one of the many reasons.

Mr. CRERAR: It is the main one the hon. member has given. It was the first one to which he referred. The thing is too ridiculous for words.

There was another remedy open to Mr. Fallow. If he believed a fraction of what he said, then there was another remedy open to him. All this property is within the province of Alberta.

Mr. JOHNSTON (Bow River): This is dominion property.

Mr. CRERAR: And Mr. Fallow's government could have appointed a royal commission, and investigated it; certainly they could.

Mr. JOHNSTON (Bow River): No; the dominion government had a lease on the property, with the Abasand company.

Mr. CRERAR: They could have subpœnaed everyone who had anything to do with it.

Mr. JOHNSTON (Bow River): No, they could not.

Mr. CRERAR: Yes, they could.

Mr. JOHNSTON (Bow River): My information, from a legal authority, is that they could not.

Mr. CRERAR: I did not interrupt my hon. friend, and I would ask him not to interrupt me. The Alberta government could have appointed a royal commission; they could have subpœnaed Mr. Max Ball, and they could have subpœnaed every person on the work. They could have investigated everything. Why did they not do so?

Mr. JOHNSTON (Bow River): I just told you why.

Mr. CRERAR: And I will tell you why: Because Mr. Fallow knew that he could not substantiate the charges he was making in the Alberta legislature. That is why they did not do so.

Then, to make matters worse, the hon. member comes here and retails all this gossip which Mr. Fallow retailed in the legislature. And on the basis of that he demands that this government appoint a royal commission. I will tell the hon. member right now that if he will rise in his place and make these charges against the government, and stake his responsibility as a member upon it, he will get his investigation.

Mr. JOHNSTON (Bow River): Not my responsibility, at all.

Mr. CRERAR: When my colleague the Minister of Pensions and National Health suggested that to the hon. member a moment ago, what did he say? "Oh, no; oh, no. Nine years ago I might have done it, but not now."

Mr. JOHNSTON (Bow River): That is right, too.

Mr. CRERAR: In other words, "I have learned something since then."

Mr. JOHNSTON (Bow River): You are telling me!

Mr. CRERAR: Might I say he has learned since then that he is not going to risk his precious political skin on any proposition of that kind.

Mr. JOHNSTON (Bow River): The government has taken the same stand.

Mr. CRERAR: I ask the members in this committee: Is there any reasonable basis for the demand that a royal commission be appointed?

Mr. JOHNSTON (Bow River): The hon. member for Davenport agreed with me.

Mr. CRERAR: I will say more than that: The government is making an honest effort to see that the possibilities in these sands are worked out. What my hon. friend has said this afternoon and evening, to get some headlines in the papers, and possibly to get on the radio at ten o'clock to-night—

Mr. JOHNSTON (Bow River): I do not care whether it is or not.

Mr. CRERAR: You do not?

Mr. JOHNSTON (Bow River): It is not my concern.

Mr. CRERAR: But I think members of this house should have some sense of responsibility for statements they make.

Mr. JOHNSTON (Bow River): I am not speaking for political advertising. I am not seeking to advertise.

Mr. CRERAR: When my hon. friend makes an allegation of that kind, I really—because, quite frankly, I like him, and I do not think for a moment that he was serious in the statements he made—must conclude that it is unfortunate that such statements are made.

Mr. JOHNSTON (Bow River): Well, the hon. member for Davenport almost said the same thing as I did—and he was there.

Mr. CRERAR: Another reason given us is that sand was thrown in some of the bearings of the machinery. He said that there was sabotage. Well, that is quite true; someone did put sand in the oil,—

Mr. JOHNSTON (Bow River): Mr. Fallow has not been altogether wrong, then, has he?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): At least ninety per cent.

Mr. CRERAR: Would the hon. member for Bow River please let me finish?

Mr. JOHNSTON (Bow River): I am sorry.

Mr. CRERAR: It is true that some sand was thrown into some of the bearings of the machinery. That was reported to the police, and so far they have not been able to find the individual who carried on the sabotage. But my hon. friend gives this as an additional reason why a royal commission should be appointed.

Is my hon. friend serious in that? Does he think, because someone, in a moment of pique, or perhaps to damage the war effort, or for any other reason should, surreptitiously, throw sand in the bearings of the machinery, we must open a royal commission to investigate the government's responsibility? For a good many years I have been a member of parliament, but in all kindness to my hon. friend I must say that I have never heard in all that time a more ridiculous or more absurd suggestion than that we should put this country to the expense of a royal commission to investigate the government's responsibility for someone throwing sand into the bearings of the machinery.

Mr. JOHNSTON (Bow River): I never said that, and the minister knows that very well.

Mr. CRERAR: My hon. friend urged it as a reason why a royal commission should be appointed.

Mr. JOHNSTON (Bow River): The minister knows very well I did not say that at all. He is just trying to get out of a difficult position.

Mr. CRERAR: And this was said on his own responsibility. He said that the government have spent over a million dollars and had nothing to show for it.

Mr. JOHNSTON (Bow River): I said about a million—and it is not far from it.

Mr. CRERAR: "About a million?"

Mr. JOHNSTON (Bow River): Yes.

Mr. CRERAR: We are right on that, then. He has said that the government has spent about a million dollars, and has nothing to show for it.

Mr. JOHNSTON (Bow River): Well, not much.

Mr. CRERAR: Is my hon. friend serious in that?

Mr. JOHNSTON (Bow River): Yes, absolutely.

Mr. CRERAR: Well, for the life of me I cannot understand how my hon. friend reaches some of the extraordinary conclusions he ultimately arrives at.

Mr. JOHNSTON (Bow River): Results are what count.

Mr. CRERAR: A million dollars spent, and nothing to show for it? Let me tell my hon. friend a few of the things there are to show for it. For instance, there has been a very considerable amount of drilling done on the sand-bearing land, to determine the quality of the sand, the depth of overburden, and how expensive it might be to get it out.

Mr. JOHNSTON (Bow River): Only $33,000 spent on that.

Mr. CRERAR: And that is something. In addition, very considerable tests and examinations have been made by the Universal Oil Products Company of Chicago to determine what extraction should be made from the bitumen. I gave that information to the committee this afternoon. In the third place, the plant has been redesigned and rebuilt.

Mr. JOHNSTON (Bow River): And torn down and rebuilt again.

Mr. CRERAR: The separation part of the plant is completed; and the refinery end of it will be ready for operation by September. In addition, all the other things necessary to carry out a thorough and continuous test of the possibilities of the sands are almost completed. Yet my hon. friend rises in his place in this house and says, "You have spent a million dollars, and have not anything to show for it."

Again he is simply retailing some of the gossip indulged in by Mr. Fallow. Or perhaps there was some other hotel in Alberta where someone was intoxicated, and told someone else something, and that someone else told someone else, and that someone else came and told Mr. Fallow that they had wasted a million dollars; and Mr. Fallow gets up in the legislature and wields that as a weapon of attack on the federal government.

There is just one other observation I have to make. Mr. Fallow states that the federal government is trying to sabotage this whole development. He seeks to leave the impression, and my hon. friend gives support to the allegation, that we are more interested in preventing successful development of tar sands than in anything else. Mr. Fallow says that this wretched government at Ottawa have no interest in developing the tar sands; that they are trying to sabotage the project. My hon. friend will not dispute that that was the tenor of Mr. Fallow's remarks.

But Mr. Fallow has a perfectly good remedy right in his own hands. Of the whole vast area of oil-bearing sands the federal government controls about 2,000 acres. Where does the control of the rest lie, of ninety-nine per cent of these oil-bearing sands? It lies absolutely with the province of Alberta.

Mr. Fallow accuses us of giving away some of the federal government's small area, 100 out of 2,000 acres. That is one indictment he levelled against us in his speech in the Alberta legislature. But he did not tell the legislature and the country, and my hon. friend has not told this committee, that the government of which Mr. Fallow is a member gave large concessions to the Abasand company out of its own resources.

Mr. JOHNSTON (Bow River): That has nothing to do with the matter.

Mr. CRERAR: It has something to do with it.

Mr. JOHNSTON (Bow River): The minister is indulging in political propaganda.

Mr. CRERAR: It has this much to do with it; it is an indication of the irresponsibility of Mr. Fallow. Then on the strength of all these wild statements of Mr. Fallow the hon. member rises in his place and demands a royal commission of inquiry. But when he was asked if he would take the responsibility as a member of this house of making charges that would warrant a royal commission he said: "Oh no, I might have done that nine years ago, but not now."

I think the committee can form its own estimate of this whole thing. The Alberta government could have gone ahead fourteen years ago and aided in the development of these sands. It could have put in its own plant. It could have used public money and bonused the industry, encouraging the industry to go on and develop the sands. But it did not do so; and now, when this government is making an honest effort to find out the commercial possibilities of these sands, all we get by way of thanks in return is the sort of speech that Mr. Fallow made in the legislature and the kind of speech my hon. friend made here this evening.

Item agreed to.

Investigations of petroliferous deposits and of potential petroliferous areas in Canada, $145,000.

Mr. GREEN: Will the minister explain to the committee in which part of this country this money is to be spent?

Mr. CRERAR: It is difficult at the moment to say just where it will be spent. The money voted last year was spent in investigations for oil in the Wainwright park area and to pay the expenses of drilling on the tar sands we were discussing a few moments ago. There were also surveys for oil exploration in New Brunswick. The vote this year is not allocated to any particular project. It is to meet requests that may come from the oil controller during the year. This vote does not touch the ordinary civil administration. We shall have our ordinary civil estimates to vote for this kind of work.

Mr. GREEN: For exploration?

Mr. CRERAR: For exploration, but that will be on fairly definite projects. We have plans mapped out already in connection with our civil estimates. As I say, this vote is to meet requests that may come from the oil controller during the year. If no requests come from him the money will not be spent.

Mr. GREEN: I would ask the minister to tell us whether the government has any policy with regard to the development of the Northwest Territories, the Yukon and northern British Columbia. The completion of the air line to the Yukon known as the Northwest staging route and of the Alaska highway and the Canol project, air developments in the Mackenzie River basin as well as mining developments in that district have focused the attention of many people in Canada on our northern country. There would seem to be great possibilities for development there. I am wondering whether the government has any special policy with regard to northern Canada. That is also brought to one's mind by the developments that have been made in Siberia, across the north pole and on the Asiatic side of the world.

I have here a booklet entitled, "Expanding Mineral Frontiers in the Northwest Territories," by A. W. Jolliffe, which was distributed by the Alberta Publicity and Travel Bureau. In this booklet there is a statement about the developments in Siberia. It says at page 12, comparing northern Canada with Russia:

> Northern Asiatic Russia is geographically a close relative of Northwest Territories. The two regions show similarity in climate, in plant and animal life, in their great northward-flowing waterways, and even in their geology, although the Canadian shield has a greater area than the pre-Cambrian of Siberia. Latitude for latitude, Siberia has a much tougher climate than Northwest Territories. No place in Arctic Canada can match the temperature extremes recorded at Verkhoyansk which is slightly north of the latitude of Eldorado mine on Great Bear lake. Winter temperatures have been known to reach ninety-four degrees below zero, and more than ninety above has been recorded in the summer. This cold pole of the world lies in the territory of Yakutsk, which in 1933—

I want to point out this fact to the minister:

> —had a population exceeding 300,000, equivalent to one person every four square miles, as compared with one person per hundred square miles throughout Northwest Territories. New industrial regions have sprung up in Asiatic Russia which extends north to the sixtieth parallel, equivalent climatically to much further north in Canada. On a map of Siberia published in 1935 are shown fifty-four permanent scientific research stations north of latitude 64°, and about 10,000 geological survey parties were active throughout Russia in 1937. The fruits of this programme are evident in the steady northward progress of mining, industry, and settlement; and in the success of maritime transportation along Russia's long Arctic coastline (fourteen ships travelled the entire length of the "North-east Passage" in 1936). Surely the experiences of our northern neighbour and ally will be of great assistance in the opening up of our own Arctic territories.

Canada, of course, has had no such development, and one sometimes wonders whether we are not missing an opportunity in the north country. Apparently none of this vote, or very little of it, is earmarked for the northern country. Would the minister tell us just what the government has in mind in the way of promoting the development of northern Canada?

Mr. CRERAR: My hon. friend is now discussing a matter which should be discussed when the ordinary civil estimates of the department are before the committee.

Mr. GREEN: I think the minister is not quite right about that, because several of these items deal with expenditures for research and for finding new mines and oil wells and so on. Surely under items of this type we are entitled to ask the policy of the government with regard to developing northern Canada.

Mr. CRERAR: Under these war appropriation estimates we could make excursions into every branch of departmental activity. In the ordinary civil estimates of the mines branch we have an item of $314,000 for geological surveys, and it is under that vote that the work as to which my hon. friend is pressing for information—and it is very important work—would be carried out, and the details can then be given. As I stated a moment ago, this item of $145,000 may not be spent this year at all. It is in the war appropriation for war purposes, to meet requests from the oil controller should such requests be made; also perhaps a small part of it is to complete undertakings of last year where the vote lapsed at the end of the year. In addition, provision will be made from this vote for whatever drilling operations are carried on in this area of oil sands in northern Alberta.

Mr. GREEN: Well, could the minister give us some idea now of the policy of the government with regard to developing northern Canada? It really is a war item. For example, we have what is known as the joint Canadian-United States economic committee, and a branch of that committee was given the job of surveying all the resources in the Yukon, Alaska and northern British Columbia and of making recommendations as to what developments should take place in those areas. Could the minister not give us some idea of the general government policy on the development of the north country? It is probably one of the most important matters which faces Canada to-day. Its importance is evidenced by developments which Russia has made.

Mr. CRERAR: I do not for a moment decry its importance, but the information which would fully satisfy the questions of my hon. friend is not here to-night, because I expected to deal with the subject when the ordinary estimates of the department were up. The government has not been unmindful of the possibilities of the north country. I just asked the director of the mines branch, who tells me that last year we had two geological survey parties in the Yukon territory.

Mr. GREEN: Two?

Mr. CRERAR: Two. I do not know how many there were in the Northwest Territories, but almost every week, perhaps every day, in the summer months mining claims are being recorded in our mining recording office at Fort Smith by prospectors. As my hon. friend knows, there has been a substantial mining development in the Yellowknife district north of Slave lake, and we have had geological parties there for several years. In addition, we are sending out this year oil geological parties; that is, parties to search for oil deposits.

Mr. GREEN: In the Northwest Territories?

Mr. CRERAR: Some in the Northwest Territories, some in Alberta, some in Saskatchewan and some in the northeastern part of British Columbia. But I could have more complete information on all that when I have the data before me to deal with the civil estimates.

Mr. GREEN: Perhaps to-morrow the minister could make a statement on the northern policy of the government.

Mr. CRERAR: Well, that can be done, perhaps, when we come to our ordinary civil estimates.

Mr. GREEN: That may not be until the last five minutes of the last day of the session, and would not leave any time for discussion. I think the minister should make the statement at once.

Mr. CRERAR: All I can say in a general way, Mr. Chairman—

The ACTING CHAIRMAN (Mr. Golding): The minister has pointed out that this item has nothing to do with the question which the hon. member for Vancouver South has in mind, and he has promised that he will deal with it at the proper time. I appeal to hon. members to realize that if we hope to make any progress at all in these estimates we must try to deal with the items as they are. I hope I shall not have to say any more in that regard to hon. members.

Mr. GRAYDON: Are you speaking to the minister too?

Mr. GREEN: With regard to that, this particular item is for investigation of petroliferous deposits and of potential petroliferous areas in Canada, and the most important oil field in Canada is in the Northwest Territories. I have been asking the minister if he will make a statement on government policy with regard to developing the resources, including oil, in the Northwest Territories. The very next item has to do with mineral deposits. Surely we cannot be ruled out of order in asking questions of this type.

The ACTING CHAIRMAN (Mr. Golding): I again appeal to my hon. friend. When this item was up on Tuesday evening the minister gave the committee information as to what the item was for, and he has done the same thing to-night. It does not deal with the question which my hon. friend raised.

Mr. GREEN: It does, or it does not?

The ACTING CHAIRMAN (Mr. Golding): It does not.

Mr. GREEN: That is exactly where you are wrong, Mr. Chairman, because the minister himself has stated that some of this investigation for oil-bearing areas is to be in the Northwest Territories.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: I brought up this matter on Tuesday night. I was dealing with the subject of exploring those areas and I was ruled out of order on the same ground. The minister did, however, intimate that there was another item to come up later—it is on page 397 of Hansard—dealing with the expenses of liaison officers in connection with the Alaska highway and Canol projects. If he is willing that we should deal with the Canol project at that point I am quite willing to discuss it then instead of on this item. But I maintain that order in council P.C. 2904, tabled by the minister on May 5, has very much to do with this particular item—boring for oil in that area—and opportunity should be given to hon. members to discuss that war-time action on the item dealing with the exploration of those oil fields.

Mr. CRERAR: It is a mere matter of proceeding in an orderly fashion—

Mr. CASTLEDEN: I am agreeable.

Mr. CRERAR: —in the consideration of this. The hon. member for Yorkton who spoke a few moments ago raised this question on Tuesday night. This vote has nothing whatever to do with the Canol project. You might as well discuss reindeer on the arctic coast.

Mr. GRAYDON: They come under your department.

Mr. CRERAR: There is another item in the estimates on which the Canol project can be discussed. Let us discuss it when we come to that item. I say again to the hon. member for Vancouver South that this vote is not earmarked specifically for any particular project except perhaps one, namely, the expense of carrying on drilling to determine the extent and quality of sands in this northern Alberta area, which expense will be taken out of this vote. The remainder of it is there to meet requests from the oil controller. We have had these requests in each of the last two years, and this is provided, I understand, at his suggestion. He may have something that he would like the department to investigate, and if we should receive such a request we provide for expenditure in connection with it under this vote. When we come again to the general permanent work of the department which is covered in the votes which parliament will be asked in due course to pass, relating to geological surveys and the like, such matters can be raised. I sympathize with the request of the hon. member for Vancouver South. I appreciate his claim that it is important to have wise policies for the development of the north country. I do not think there is anyone in this committee who has a better appreciation of the possibilities of northern Canada than I have, if I may modestly say so. I have travelled over a good deal of it; I have seen and watched with interest, and have had some little part, through the agency of the Department of Mines and Resources, in the endeavour to restore the furbearing animals for the benefit of the Indians, and I know there is great need for a wider dissemination of knowledge of the north country. I have used my influence, modest as it is, in connection with the work of the national film board to see to it that, through the medium of the film, they should carry information to the Canadian people as to the possibilities of the north country and endeavour to clear up a great many of the misconceptions that exist about it. One day toward the latter part of August I was in Aklavik, 150 miles beyond the arctic circle, a disagreeably warm day, something like this—

The ACTING CHAIRMAN (Mr. Golding): Order. I wonder if we cannot deal with this item now.

Mr. CRERAR: I appreciate your calling me to order, Mr. Chairman,—

Mr. GRAYDON: I think the minister should deal with it in the civil estimates.

Mr. CRERAR: —but I want to impress upon the hon. member that the government has not been remiss—

Mr. GREEN: You need not impress that upon me.

Mr. CRERAR: —in its consideration of the possibilities of the north country.

Mr. GREEN: Is there any reason why there should not be a development in northern Canada similar to the development in Siberia?

Mr. CRERAR: I do not think so. I think we have the resources.

Mr. FAIR: Is any further exploration work being carried on at Wainwright this year? If so, to what extent?

Mr. CRERAR: There are no further investigations in the Wainwright area; that is, in the park area at Wainwright. These investigations were carried on last year and the right to secure leases will be auctioned off. We are putting up the area inside the park.

Mr. ADAMSON: Will the minister undertake to bring down his civil estimates at an early date so that a full debate can be held on these matters? Many of us wish to discuss this item and I discussed the matter personally with the minister before the house met. These items are not really the place to deal with the broad policy of his department. That department is so important that I should like him to try to bring his estimates down so that a full-dress debate can be held on these matters in the near future.

Mr. CRERAR: I shall endeavour to bring them down as soon as possible, but if my hon. friend asks me when they will come on, I cannot tell him. There is a good deal to be disposed of before then. I agree with him, however, that the question of developing the vast resources of Canada is one that could well engage the earnest attention of the house. I do not think there is anything more important, and I do not say that because I happen to be the minister in charge.

Item agreed to.

Special exploration and development work in connection with the supply of strategic materials, $60,000.

Mr. WHITE: Will the minister give a break-down of the persons or corporations to whom the $500,000 was paid during the last year and to whom it is expected that the $60,000 he is asking for will be paid during the coming year?

Mr. CRERAR: The break-down was given when the vote was asked for last year, but—

Mr. WHITE: I am interested in the moneys advanced for the development of fluorspar in the county of Hastings.

Mr. CRERAR: The vote for strategic minerals last year was $500,000. Does my hon. friend want it all, or some particular items?

Mr. WHITE: Just the items that deal with fluorspar in Hastings.

Mr. CRERAR: There was the Reliance fluorspar estimate of $10,000, of which $9,234 was advanced. Then there was the R. T. Gilman loan of $106; nothing was advanced against that. Next is H. C. Miller, $8,731, of which $8,036 was spent. Then there was the Trent fluorspar loan of $6,235, of which $6,085 was advanced. I am giving round figures. There was also the fluorspar drilling at Madoc. For drilling at Madoc $20,000 was provided and $18,692 spent.

Mr. WHITE: What is the total amount advanced by the government to date for fluorspar operations in the county of Hastings and, second, the amount it has cost his department, in connection with this money advanced, for salaries of their engineers, surveyors, auditors, travelling and other expenses in connection with the operation of these fluorspar mines?

Mr. CRERAR: I can give the total expenditures authorized and the net advances. I am afraid I cannot give it in the detail requested by my hon. friend, but I find that Reliance Flourspar at Madoc had an authorized expenditure of $48,000. Did my hon. friend want the net advances in each case?

Mr. WHITE: Yes, the net amount.

Mr. CRERAR: Reliance Fluorspar, Madoc, $46,881.92; Gilman Fluorspar, Madoc, $22,-778.14; H. C. Miller Fluorspar, Madoc, $34,196.89, and Trent Fluorspar, Madoc, $9,848.41.

Mr. WHITE: That is up to what date?

Mr. CRERAR: That is at May 19, 1944.

Mr. WHITE: Then could the minister answer the other question, as to what has been the total cost to his department, or whatever department this comes under, for salaries, wages, cost of engineers, auditors and other expenses in connection with the operation of these mines?

Mr. CRERAR: I do not have it broken down.

Mr. WHITE: I shall be satisfied with a lump sum if the minister has it.

Mr. CRERAR: I have the total for salaries for all the strategic minerals, but that covers not only fluorspar developments; it includes chromite, tungsten, molybdenite, and metals like that. The total salaries for all of that were $19,221.11, but if my hon. friend wants them for fluorspar alone it will be necessary to have that figure broken down. If my hon. friend is interested I can have my officers prepare that information and send it to him.

Mr. WHITE: That will be satisfactory. Then the minister stated that the amount advanced to one H. C. Miller was $34,196, out of an appropriation of $35,000. In connection with the advances to this man, could the minister give the committee any information as to what led up to the granting of this appropriation, just what has been done on the property, the amount of money he has actually expended, the production of fluorspar that has been developed, the amount that has been repaid to the department on this loan, and the manner in which it has been repaid.

Mr. CRERAR: Mr. Miller received $34,196.89. I think that information was given in answer to a question asked by my hon. friend. His total repayments to January 31, 1944, were $7,229.95.

Mr. WHITE: I have that information already in a return brought down by the minister on February 22. I should like the minister to give the committee some information as to how Miller came to get this appropriation, what led up to the granting of this amount of $35,000.

Mr. CRERAR: The Department of Mines and Resources does not initiate these contracts, if I may so describe them, with these individuals. In the first place they are initiated by the metals controller. He hears, perhaps from various people, or from one source or another, as to possible deposits of these strategic minerals. In this case it is fluorspar, which I understand is used as a fluxing material in the production of high grade steel. The metals controller, in some manner of which I am not aware, learned of Miller's deposit and gave the particulars to the Department of Mines and Resources. The technical officers of my department examined the deposits, gathered all the data they could, and were in a position to say whether or not this was a property that might offer possibilities of supplying fluorspar. The next step was when the metals controller, supported by the director of the mines branch, made a recommendation to me as minister, and on the strength of their recommendation the order in council was passed providing financial assistance.

Mr. WHITE: Does the minister know that Mr. H. C. Miller, the man who obtained this money, is a civil servant? In an answer which was brought down on February 11 to a question which I had asked it is stated that Mr. Henry C. Miller has been in the employ of the government since June 8, 1942, and that he receives a salary of $3,720 a year and devotes his full time to his position. Under the contract drawn up and signed by the minister with Mr. Miller it is stated that Mr. Miller was unable to finance the development of this mine. In proof of that there is attached to the contract a list of the debts owing by Mr. Miller at the time he obtained this grant. I should like to know if Mr. Miller put up or supplied any of his own money in the development and operation of this mine.

Mr. CRERAR: I do not know Mr. Miller; if he were to walk down the aisle right now it would be the first time I would have seen him. I understand he is employed in some capacity in the oils and fats administration of the wartime prices and trade board, but I do not know what his duties were, what they are, or what they may be in the future. All I know is that the metals controller had reason to think that Mr. Miller controlled a deposit of fluorspar that would be of use in the war effort, that the deposit had been examined by the technical officers of the Department of Mines and Resources, and on the recommendation of the metals controller and the director of the mines branch of the department I sent a recommendation to council that gave authority to make these advances.

When the advances were made provision was made for the return of them in all cases at so much per ton of the product mined. The government also retained a lien on all tangible assets that were secured for development purposes. In some cases I anticipate that these advances will be fully repaid and there may be other cases where they may not be repaid. In any event the procedure was as I have outlined.

Mr. GREEN: Does the minister's department not make any check?

Mr. CRERAR: Oh, yes. When these deposits, whether it was tungsten or anything else, came to the attention of the metals controller he asked the mines branch to have its technical officers report on the possibility of getting useful results from a working of the deposits. That investigation was made; if the report was satisfactory the metals controller and the director made a recommendation to me as minister of the department, and from that followed the order in council that appropriated the money.

Mr. WHITE: I do not think the minister has answered the question I asked, whether or not Mr. Miller had advanced any of his own money in order to equip this mine and get it ready for the production of fluorspar, or was all the money supplied by the department?

Mr. CRERAR: My advice is that the department supplied the money to get the mine into operation, and then the working capital necessary in the initial stages was provided by the owner, in this case by Miller.

Mr. WHITE: The minister probably knows that his department had a competent and capable engineer in charge of these operations and that no money could be expended without the approval of that engineer. He must know that audits were held and a careful and proper check kept on all expenditures. How much did it cost Mr. Miller to bring this mine into production?

Mr. CRERAR: I shall be glad to give the information if we have it.

Mr. WHITE: I am sure the minister must have it because I know exactly the way it was done. There was a careful check made and no money could be advanced—this is all covered by the contract—without the consent of the departmental engineer.

Mr. CRERAR: I have not that information here, but if it can be found in the records of the department it will be brought forward. I can either give it to the committee to-morrow if we do not finish to-night or give it to my hon. friend privately, whichever he wishes.

Mr. WHITE: Has the minister any knowledge of any part of this $35,000 being used by Mr. Miller after the mine was brought into operation?

Mr. CRERAR: I am advised that we have no knowledge of that.

Mr. WHITE: I do not think that is satisfactory, because no one could have kept a more accurate check than the engineer supplied by the minister's own department. Complete records were kept of everything and audits have been made. The minister should have this information.

Mr. CRERAR: I should have said that I have no record here to-night. It may be in some of the reports that the department has in connection with this operation. That would be a public document and I would have no objection to giving it to my hon. friend, but I have not it with me to-night.

Mr. WHITE: The minister has just stated that the money advanced under these contracts was to be paid back on a royalty basis of $3 a ton. The question I asked was answered by sessional paper 169. Question No. 9 was:

> Is the operator permitted to make a profit before repayment has been made in full of all moneys advanced by the government?

The answer was:

> Under the terms of the agreement, the operators are permitted to use balances of revenues after payments to government for the purpose of carrying on mining operations. It is doubtful that these balances of revenues are more than sufficient to continue necessary mining operations.

The return shows that Miller produced some 2,377 tons and paid back $7,229.95. Has the minister any knowledge as to what profit Miller made out of those 2,377 tons of fluorspar he produced and sold?

Mr. CRERAR: We have no information on that point. As I explained, when these contracts were made they were made on a more or less arbitrary basis of a certain repayment per ton of product mined. In the case of Miller those repayments have been made. Whether Miller had some money left after paying his other expenses, I cannot say. It may be that my hon. friend is on fair ground in criticizing the government for making that sort of arrangement, but the repayment of these advances was estimated on a basis which the officers of the department thought was fair and reasonable. I have no apology whatever to make for accepting their advice. Miller may have run into a little richer deposit, or may have had some other advantage in operation that I know nothing about. Whether he made a profit or not, I cannot say. All I know is that we gave him a certain advance; that he was to pay it at so much per ton of the product mined. Up to the present time he has paid about $7,000; and the government holds a lien on all the tangible assets provided out of this grant, until the full loan is repaid.

Mr. WHITE: The minister admits that he does not know whether Miller made a profit. But I would point out again that when the fluorspar ore was sold to the various steel companies those sales were all made with the approval of the engineer from the Department of Mines and Resources. They had copies of all the way bills, and everything else. They knew when the cheque came back, and they would know exactly how much profit, if any, Mr. Miller made.

I understand that during the very short time that this property was operated by Mr. Miller, who was a full-time civil servant at Ottawa, and who was unable to finance the mine in any way with his own money, but who was granted over $34,000 of public funds, he made a profit of anywhere from $10,000 to $25,000. The minister has told me that he has no knowledge as to whether or not Miller made a profit. But I would say to the minister that his officers, his engineers, or somebody in his department would have some knowledge as to the profit that Miller made. Would the minister be good enough to get me that information?

Mr. CRERAR: There is not the slightest objection. I do not know, really, what my hon. friend is driving at. There is no objection to giving any information that our records can disclose.

Mr. GRAYDON: What he is driving at seems clear enough.

Mr. WHITE: I will explain what I am driving at, if the minister would like to know. Here is a man, a civil servant, who makes a contract with the crown. It is stated in the contract that he is unable to provide the money to finance this mine. Attached to the contract is proof of that, because there is a statement of his debts. The government advanced him $35,000; and during a very short period of operation, extending perhaps from eight to fourteen months, a man who is already drawing from the crown a salary of over $3,700, is allowed, without risking one cent of his own money, to make a very large and substantial profit. At the same time he is only asked to repay to the crown the very small sum of $3 a ton on all the fluorspar ore produced. Why should that contract not have been drawn so that all the profits on the sale of the fluorspar, over and above the operation of the mine, should be paid back to the government until such time as the full amount of the money advanced had been paid in full? Would that not be the logical way to do it? I should like to have the minister comment upon that.

Mr. CRERAR: My comment would be this: In this case Miller—and in other cases, others—had property that probably was of considerable value. It cost them money, in the first instance. I do not know how much—

Mr. WHITE: If the minister does not know, then please do not say it cost him money. The minister does not know.

Mr. CRERAR: Well, that is rather remarkable. I do not see how a person would get property of value unless it cost something. He may have inherited it, or it may have dropped in his lap from the gods, or something of that kind. At any rate, he owned the property, irrespective of what it cost him, and it may have had some value.

We were not doing anything in a confiscatory manner. In this instance it was found Mr. Miller had a deposit of fluorspar, something which was very badly needed. He was approached by the metals controller, and the metals controller asked the officers of the department to investigate. They, in turn, reported that the deposit was worth developing. Money was advanced; the property was developed, and the fluorspar so badly needed was secured.

My hon. friend says that we were improvident in not providing that more than $3 or $3.50 a ton, I believe it was, was repaid on the loan out of each ton of material produced. I quite admit that my hon. friend is justified in offering that criticism, if he thinks that is a pertinent criticism.

Mr. WHITE: Does the minister not think it is pertinent?

Mr. CRERAR: No, I do not think it is a pertinent criticism.

Mr. WHITE: You do not? All right; go ahead.

Mr. CRERAR: After all, we could have expropriated this property.

Mr. WHITE: That is the next question I am going to ask. Why did you not do that?

Mr. CRERAR: Were we going to expropriate all the fluorspar sites, all the tungsten property and everything else? I did not have the responsibility for making these arrangements. They were with the Minister of Munitions and Supply, and the metals controller.

Mr. WHITE: You signed the contract.

Mr. CRERAR: The Department of Mines and Resources entered into the arrangements on the recommendation of the metals controller. I still submit that the arrangements were reasonable, and that the repayment was fair. They were reasonable arrangements.

Mr. WHITE: They were very reasonable; that is my complaint. They were too reasonable—far too reasonable.

Mr. CRERAR: My hon. friend can make a play on words, if he wishes.

Mr. WHITE: Oh, no.

Mr. CRERAR: I do not know about this mysterious man, Mr. Miller, who happens to be employed, I believe, in the oils and fats division of the wartime prices and trade board. In that sense he is not an ordinary civil servant. I presume that he is someone who was secured by the wartime prices and trade board because of competence in doing a job they wanted him to do, or that he volunteered his services. At any rate, be that as it may, by whatever road he reached his job, he is employed by the wartime prices and trade board, according to the information I have. Quite probably he is doing a satisfactory job.

Does my hon. friend argue that because he was employed by the wartime prices and trade board and getting a salary of $3,700 a year, when we had a chance of getting fluorspar from his property we should have turned it down because of his government employment? I do not think my hon. friend would argue that seriously, for a moment.

The main point is that fluorspar was badly needed. This man had property on which there was fluorspar, and we entered into arrangements for its development. It was done on a basis that we thought was reasonable, and offered a reasonable chance of the government's receiving back the money it had advanced. I still maintain that position. Whether Mr. Miller made a profit out of it, or whether he had debts, or whether he was employed by the wartime prices and trade board, or employed anywhere else, are not factors in the matter, so far as the department is concerned. The main point is that we helped to finance this property, and we are getting repaid for it. Then, too, we are getting fluorspar, which is badly needed—and after all, that is the main consideration.

Mr. WHITE: It is all very well for the minister lightly to brush aside spending the mere bagatelle of $35,000. Where I live, and where this money was spent, it is considered a large sum of money. But of course the way in which this government deals in millions and billions, it is a trifling amount. I think the minister overlooked the point, entirely, or perhaps he can tell me if it is the usual thing to find persons coming to his department, or to some other department of government, and putting up a proposition under which they will not be called upon to risk one cent of their own money, and will receive out of the public treasury of Canada sufficient funds to operate a property by remote control, under foremen, and thereby make a substantial profit. That is what I am objecting to. I think it is entirely wrong for any citizen of Canada—

Mr. CRERAR: Does my hon. friend contend that Mr. Miller should not have been allowed to make any profit?

Mr. WHITE: After he had paid you, he could make all the profit he wanted to, certainly.

Mr. HOWE: Since my department is responsible, perhaps I might ask my hon. friend a few questions. Has he any evidence whatever that Mr. Miller made a profit?

[Mr. Crerar.]

Mr. WHITE: The Minister of Mines and Resources says that he does not know anything about it but that he is going to get the information.

Mr. HOWE: Does my hon. friend know?

Mr. WHITE: I am not answering your questions.

Mr. HOWE: The hon. member is basing his statements on an assumption he cannot prove.

Mr. WHITE: Do not get off on any line like that. All these fluorspar properties were financed entirely by the government—Miller, Reliance, Trent and Gilman. Not one of them was able to finance alone. Since these fluorspar properties are all located within an area of one or two miles, and are probably the same vein, would it not have been more reasonable for the government to take over these properties and operate them themselves instead of advancing all these moneys to these four different companies, having four sets of everything, equipment and all the other things needed for these various properties.

Mr. CRERAR: In reply I would refer the hon. member for Hastings-Peterborough to the hon. member for Davenport who, speaking this afternoon of another development, stated that he was opposed to the government operating properties, and I confessed that I agree with him. Now the hon. member for Hastings-Peterborough comes along and accuses the government for not having taken over these properties and operated them as government enterprises. I would suggest to my hon. friend who leads the opposition, who is a philosophical gentleman, that he try to reconcile these differences among his supporters.

Mr. GRAYDON: You have a job of that sort to do on your own side.

Mr. CRERAR: I do not know whether the hon. member for Hastings-Peterborough contends that the owners of these fluorspar properties should not get anything for them. Perhaps my hon. friend could tell the committee how much money the people who own these fluorspar properties have made out of them in the last fifteen or twenty years. I am advised that the properties were so unprofitable that they were not being operated, and that operation came about only because in the stress of war this material fluorspar, of which I confess I know nothing, was found very useful for fluxing purposes in the making of high-grade steel, which was urgently needed. The metals controller learned of these properties and wanted to get them developed. It may be; in fact it is contended by the hon. member for Hastings-Peterborough that the government should have taken these properties over. Supposing we had done that; what would we have had to pay for them? We could not take them over for nothing. At any rate I can assure my hon. friend that this government, with all the sins that may rest upon its head—

Mr. FRASER (Peterborough West): And they are plenty.

Mr. CRERAR: I dispute that. I do not think the hon. member for Hastings-Peterborough would contend that the government should take these properties away without compensating the owners. If we could not agree on a price we would have to resort to the exchequer court and have it assess the value of the property. The next step would be to buy the property, and then we would have it on our hands and would have to operate it as a government enterprise. That is the contention of the hon. member for Hastings-Peterborough. But if we had done that, one of our first critics, and I would have sympathy with him, would have been the hon. member for Davenport.

Mr. MacNICOL: I am wholly opposed to government operation of industry.

Mr. CRERAR: Let us get down to essentials. The fluorspar was urgently, almost desperately needed. We entered into arrangements with people who had the properties. They did not know what they would get out of it. If the war lasted only a year or two they would lose money if they went ahead on their own. But they did not have the capital. Even if they had had the capital, they would not want to risk it under those circumstances. Therefore, on the advice of the technical officers of the department we made the arrangement that we should be paid so much per ton on the fluorspar mined. I do not think it would be reasonable to say that the people who own these properties should not get something. The deposit might be depleted before the loan was returned. They entered into this arrangement at the request of the government. They cooperated in that respect, not only these people who own the fluorspar properties but many other firms throughout the country engaged in other lines of business, to which the Minister of Munitions and Supply can testify.

Mr. KNOWLES: He has taken a lot of them over.

Mr. CRERAR: If the war goes on for another year or two and the fluorspar deposit lasts we shall be repaid. In the meantime we have security on all the tangible assets, and that is a proposition that I am not afraid to defend in this house or anywhere else.

Mr. WHITE: It will be interesting to learn, when the minister's war estimates are before the committee next year, how much was lost through this deal, which the minister thinks is very fine.

Mr. CRERAR: We may lose some money; I do not deny that.

Mr. WHITE: I have one or two questions to ask in regard to the various contracts made with these companies. Are the terms the same in each contract as to the amount of repayment on the basis of $3 a ton, or is there one contract which provides that all proceeds from the sale of fluorspar are to be applied on account of the loan after the payment of operating expenses?

Mr. CRERAR: I am advised that the contracts were all identical, except the one with the Reliance company. They got an advance in the first instance and the basis of repayment was the same as in the other contracts. Later on they came back for an additional advance, and a higher rate of repayment was agreed upon.

Mr. WHITE: Can the minister tell me the amount of what he calls the higher repayment, and further, does the Reliance company have to pay back, in addition to a stated amount per ton, the profits on the sale of fluorspar over and above the amount of operating expenses, or does the department just get a certain amount per ton?

Mr. CRERAR: I am advised that, after the second advance, repayment was to be at the rate of $5 per ton of the fluorspar mined.

Mr. WHITE: Is that all that the Reliance has to pay as far as the second advance is concerned?

Mr. CRERAR: I am advised that it is.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: There are some questions pertaining to the country as a whole which I should like to ask in connection with this item. According to the report of the department for the year ended March 31, 1943, $325,000 was expended in the preceding year in the form of loans to mine operators, contracts for exploratory work under dominion or provincial government supervision, purchase of mining equipment, and so on. How much was expended under this vote during the past year?

Mr. CRERAR: Under the vote of $500,000?

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: Yes.

Mr. CRERAR: I am advised that the total amount expended was $117,787.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: That is considerably less than the year before. What degree of success was attained by the expenditure of money under this particular item? Is the minister satisfied with the returns which were secured and the discoveries or exploratory work done?

Mr. CRERAR: It will take a little time to get the details, but I can indicate the results roughly. We got fluorspar, tungsten, molybdenum, chrome for hardening steel—those four at any rate, in the class of strategic minerals.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: I assume that the minister will give the figures pertaining to what actually was discovered as a result of this vote.

I wish to refer to something which was dealt with last year, namely, the expenditure which is being made or was made under this item in the three provinces of Manitoba, Saskatchewan and Alberta. How much was spent under this item for exploratory or development work in connection with research for strategic metals; first, during the year 1942-43; second, in the year 1943-44?

Mr. CRERAR: I would doubt whether under this vote there was any expenditure in Saskatchewan or Alberta in respect of strategic minerals; that is, for chrome or tungsten or the others I mentioned a moment ago. I believe there was some expenditure in eastern Manitoba. I have not that from my officials, but that is my recollection. There were some explorations for tin. The Minister of Munitions and Supply advises me that money was spent on exploration or investigation relating to a chrome deposit in Manitoba.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: That was a comparatively small amount, was it not?

Mr. CRERAR: I could not say how much.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: The figures will be made available, I presume?

Mr. CRERAR: They can be dug out of the records if it is of any particular importance.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: Well, not dug out, just given. I am asking for the figures. Surely the officials must have the figures showing what expenditures were made in those various provinces.

We in the western provinces find ourselves in this position as regards our great potential mineral resources, that we are not receiving any consideration from the government in connection with exploratory and development work. As I recall it, a report was made some years ago by the Saskatchewan department of mines and resources that chromium, molybdenum and tungsten were to be found in northern Saskatchewan. Yet, at a time when money is available for exploration work in this connection, none or very little of it is expended in the western provinces. Last year I brought this matter to the attention of the minister and asked him why consideration was not given by the metals controller to mineral development in the prairie provinces. Over a large part of their area is the pre-Cambrian shield. We have vast potential resources of what have been designated strategic metals; yet, at a time when money is expended everywhere else in the dominion, it seems impossible, even with a minister representing a Manitoba constituency, to get any assistance for the development of our mineral wealth.

Mr. GRAYDON: Charity might begin at home.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: Last year I pointed out that the metals controller or his branch seemed unwilling to cooperate with the western governments in connection with metals to be found in these provinces. I mentioned Saskatchewan, and asked him whether the government of that province had brought to the attention of the federal government its potential resources in strategic metals. As I remember what the minister said at the time, it was that no doubt the provincial government had, and that he personally would give consideration to mineral development and exploratory work taking place in the western provinces during the past year. We in western Canada find ourselves in this position, that industry is concentrated in eastern Canada and, to a lesser extent, at the coast. Certain industries could have been established in the western provinces, but for some reason Saskatchewan, Manitoba and, to a lesser degree, Alberta have not received consideration in that respect. I think it passing strange that no portion of the money comprised in this vote is available to the western provinces with the exception of Manitoba, and there only to a small extent.

We have no resources to equal our mineral resources. They are valuable to-day, in war time. We are now laying post-war plans for the employment of men when they come back from overseas. It is all very well to say that governments should control the mineral resources of a nation. Governments may cooperate with private enterprise. When you see the record of the development of mines over a period of years, and if what the Northern Miner suggested the other day is correct, namely, that in Ontario, out of 4,426 organizations, 98·2 per cent made no return whatsoever to their shareholders and only one per cent of starters finished at the post of economic success, it becomes obvious that the government, if it were engaged in mineral development for itself, would not continue long. But here we have a vote to make possible the finding of strategic minerals, and none of that money has been made available to the western provinces with the exception of a small amount in Manitoba. I do not want to transgress your ruling, Mr. Chairman, but I think that, as the hon. member for Vancouver South said, it is a very important matter to ascertain from the government its plan in regard to mineral development. In my opinion, all the provinces having potential mineral resources have a right of equal access to moneys being expended by the dominion government at this time—at least reasonably equal access—and that has been denied.

Mr. BERTRAND (Laurier): What about wheat?

Mr. GRAYDON: What about fish?

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: That indicates that the Minister of Fisheries feels that wheat is a mineral resource or a strategic ore, and that does not show that he understands the problem as well as he should. I am dealing with mineral and strategic ores.

Mr. BERTRAND (Laurier): But we are spending the money.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: Is the Minister of Fisheries objecting to the moneys that are expended in connection with wheat and on agriculture in western Canada?

Mr. BERTRAND (Laurier): Not at all. But when somebody from the west compares what is being spent in the east with what is being spent in the west, he should take into consideration certain moneys that are not spent in the east on things like wheat.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: No one is criticizing what is expended in the east. I am pleading for a diversification of industry in all parts of Canada and not the concentration in any one part. In connection with this vote I would ask the minister how he would react to the suggestion that under the vote an opportunity be given to some of the men coming back from overseas to-day to engage as prospectors for the purpose of exploring for minerals. Many soldiers coming back to-day, used to the outdoors, willing to go prospecting, require training in that direction; and I suggest that under this vote, instead of reducing it from half a million to $60,000, the grant should be continued and an opportunity given, by the establishment of prospecting schools and the like, to train some of our men who are returning from overseas so as to enable them to engage in this very important work after the war. If you do this you will be doing war work, prospecting for strategic metals, and you will be training men for a vocation after the war. I believe that one of the committees in connection with post-war rehabilitation has made that suggestion and I should like to hear the minister's view in that connection. I suggest that there should be at this time, under this vote, a declaration by the minister, indicating something of the long-term policy of the government with regard to a general survey of the dominion for metals, the intensification of activity in the development and discovery of our metal resources, to the end that when the war is over, this very important source of our wealth will be available in greater measure for post-war purposes. The vote this year is considerably reduced. I know that the government of Saskatchewan has asked consideration of the department in this connection; and I cannot understand why it is that, when we have the potential resources, when, according to the surveys made by the western provinces, we have the strategic metals which the minister mentions, such as chromium, manganese, molybdenum, tin, and possibly tungsten—

Mr. HOWE: Where is the manganese located?

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: After all, if the minister knows where it is located, and there is none located in the west—

Mr. HOWE: None in Canada that I know of.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: I am referring to returns of provincial governments. At any rate, I suggest that we have a right to ask for a share of this vote. I say, too, that there should be an extension of the grant asked for this year. The sum of $500,000 was small enough. We should have an extension to the end that we might encourage exploratory work now and train men coming back from overseas to fit them for this very important phase of endeavour, to secure in an ever-increasing measure this potential of great wealth. The minister said that he could not very well declare the policy of the government except on his civil estimates. These estimates give him an opportunity to do so. These estimates will indicate whether or not, in the midst of war, and as a part of the war vote, the government is looking forward to the future, after the war, to secure the employment of many men who will be returning from overseas and who will require jobs. If we are to answer those who say that jobs cannot be procured under the present system, we must now be in a position of having a post-war plan established so that jobs shall be made available. This is one potential source of jobs, mineral development in Canada. We have potential resources in western Canada and an unequal economy there as at present constituted; and on behalf of western Canada I ask the minister this question: Will he not this year give the three western provinces an opportunity to share in the discovery, and in exploratory work incident to the finding, of these minerals, so that our economy may be developed on a wider and more comprehensive basis than in the past? In that connection I suggest that the department give to the Department of Finance suggestions in regard to relief from taxation to a greater extent than prevails to-day for the benefit of those who are prepared to gamble their wealth and financial future on exploratory work in the finding and development of mineral resources. Taxation as it now stands prevents the development of our mineral resources as we would wish them to be developed. It denies to the adventurer the willingness to gamble on uncertain profits. It denies the development we have at our door if we but took advantage of the opportunities that are ours. Through this vote, with the minister's cooperation, much good would result if he would be willing to give all the provinces—not only one or two of them but all of them—an opportunity to join in the development of our mineral resources through the extension, expansion and discovery of those resources. Only in that way may we be sure, particularly in this one phase, of greater employment after the war than there was before the war.

Mr. CRERAR: The first comment I have to make is that the hon. member for Lake Centre has not displayed the clarity he usually brings to bear in his contributions to the debate in this chamber.

Mr. SLAGHT: A little louder, please.

Mr. CRERAR: For the benefit of those hon. members who did not hear me I shall repeat what I have said. I am afraid the hon. member for Lake Centre has not brought to the discussion of this item the clarity he usually displays when he discusses matters in this house, and I think also he has confused this estimate with the ordinary civil estimates of the department. I am just as anxious as my hon. friend is to see mining development in the western provinces, but Alberta does not have within its borders any of the pre-Cambrian shield. The northern part of Saskatchewan has a substantial area of what is known as the great shield, and of course Manitoba has a much larger area.

My hon. friend seemed to be under the impression that under this vote we send out parties to search for strategic minerals. That impression is wholly wrong. This amount is put in here to be available to meet requests from the metals controller for the exploration or development of properties that may come to his notice. I sympathize wholly with my hon. friend's appeal that a substantial part of this money should be devoted to northern Saskatchewan, for instance, but we do not know whether there are any strategic minerals in northern Saskatchewan, and the purpose of this vote is not to discover strategic minerals. Its purpose is to provide for the exploration and investigation of proposals or suggestions that may come to the metals controller in regard to properties that already exist. Thousands of properties are registered; thousands of claims have been staked by prospectors and others who have no capital with which to develop them. A prospector may have a claim registered in Ontario, or northern Saskatchewan, or somewhere else. He will say, "I have tungsten on my claim". His reports are examined; his story is listened to, and if the metals controller is convinced that there is a reasonable possibility of getting tungsten from that claim the matter is investigated. The cost of that investigation is chargeable to this vote, and that is the sort of thing this vote is for.

Mr. GREEN: Is none of the money spent for prospecting?

Mr. CRERAR: No. Under this vote we do not prospect for properties, nor do we carry on geological surveys. Such surveys are carried on under the ordinary estimates of the Department of Mines and Resources.

Mr. GRAYDON: Why do you have an item in here for exploration when you do not explore?

Mr. CRERAR: My hon. friend is quite mistaken in his understanding. Let me illustrate. A prospector in northern Ontario comes to the metals controller and says, "I understand you are in very great need of tungsten?" The metals controller replies in the affirmative. Then the prospector says, "Well, I have several claims staked in such a township, and I have strong evidence of tungsten on that property." The metals controller listens to him, and perhaps has him tell his story to the technical men of the Department of Mines and Resources. If the metals controller is convinced that the property is worth exploring —and that is what I mean by "exploring"—the work can be undertaken and is chargeable to this vote.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: That is my complaint, that you cannot convince the metals controller that Saskatchewan and Manitoba have these resources.

Mr. CRERAR: I would not say that.

Mr. HOWE: Saskatchewan and Manitoba are the biggest producers of base metals of any of the provinces, in proportion to area.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: Yes, developed by themselves, by private industry.

Mr. CRERAR: A moment ago my hon. friend asked me about Manitoba. There are chrome deposits in Manitoba, though so far not a great deal is known about them. There are evidences of tin in places in Manitoba, and I am told that evidence of tungsten has been found there as well.

Mr. MacNICOL: Up on lake Athabaska.

Mr. CRERAR: That is not in Manitoba, and I am speaking of that province. Several of these possibilities have been investigated under this vote. If a prospector came along with information in regard to claims that he had registered in northern Saskatchewan, and convinced the metals controller that he had a property worth investigating or exploring, to use the language of the vote, it would be investigated. That is the purpose of this vote. The ordinary business of development, of geological surveys, of mapping surveys, the work done in the mines bureau—all that comes under the civil estimates of the department. These are special votes provided to meet possible demands that may arise during the coming year for further investigation of these strategic minerals, and should not be confused with the ordinary estimates.

My hon. friend raised the question of the taxation of mines. Perhaps that question could be better discussed when the budget is brought down. If I were to express my own personal view, I think taxation in nearly all respects is too high to-day; and I have said publicly within the last two years that in a peculiar way it is onerous and heavy on mining development. If we are to secure the mining development that is possible in this country I think that matter must have attention, and I do not for a moment disguise my opinion.

As far as returned men are concerned, certainly they should be given every opportunity. I did not quite understand the point my hon. friend was making in that connection; I do not know whether he was suggesting that the government should engage these men and send them out as prospectors, with the idea of getting into governmental development of mining. I believe the part of the government is to provide all possible facilities; that is, the geological surveys and information, the mapping surveys, and all the necessary technical knowledge which may be made available to the prospector, so that he can study it and go out on his search for metals. I feel sure that a great many of the men coming back from overseas will want to return to mining, because I doubt if enlistments in any other branch of our economy were heavier than in the mining districts.

Mr. SLAGHT: Hear, hear.

Mr. CRERAR: When those men come back they will probably go to those districts and we want to have as complete information as possible ready for them so that they will be able to expend their efforts on prospecting in a way that will help.

Mr. MacNICOL: I have a recollection of receiving from a man living west of lake Winnipeg in Manitoba a letter giving information about manganese. The hon. member for Lake Centre mentioned manganese and the Minister of Munitions and Supply stated there was none in Canada. As I recall it, I sent this letter to the Department of Mines and Resources asking them to write to this man and tell him where he could make a sample shipment of manganese. Having been in the iron and steel business I was interested in this matter, because I know how important manganese is to the industry. I am sorry I did not follow the matter up and I have no recollection of having heard from him again. Perhaps the minister could tell us if there is any manganese in northern Manitoba.

Mr. CRERAR: There is some evidence of what is known as bog manganese, but I am quite frank in saying that I do not know anything about it. It is found, not in rock formation, but in other forms. Several of these deposits have been examined, but they were found to be low grade and would not be practicable for the production of manganese.

Mr. GREEN: This vote is one method under which development work for the supply of strategic minerals could be carried on. I understand that this work is also carried on by means of advances made by the Metals Reserve Corporation of the United States. The minister can correct me if I am wrong in that. Could he tell us whether there are any other means by which mining development is encouraged, and could he give us some idea as to the amount of money spent under the different methods? We are going to spend only $60,000 under this vote, and I should like to know what has been advanced by the Metals Reserve Corporation and from other sources.

Mr. HOWE: Companies like Flin Flon, Consolidated Smelting and International Nickel carry on private operations and they sell their products at world prices. At one time there was an urgent demand for zinc and copper, and the result was that certain low grade zinc and copper deposits were opened up. These required a much higher price than was paid for the output of our commercial mines. Canada had a surplus of those metals and there was no need of our paying a higher price, but the Metals Reserve Corporation of the United States did have a higher price for zinc and copper. That is, they had a commercial price and they had another price almost twice as high for marginal properties. They placed a few contracts in Canada for high-priced zinc and copper.

Mr. GREEN: Were they placed through the metals controller?

Mr. HOWE: Yes; they asked us to act as their agents. Those high-priced contracts were cancelled.

Mr. GREEN: Was tungsten in the same category?

Mr. HOWE: We developed tungsten on our own, not for the Metals Reserve. Zinc came into easy supply and the high cost contracts were cancelled recently. Certain high-priced copper contracts are being continued. There are other ways of developing. We have a corporation known as Wartime Metals Limited. It has advanced a certain amount to a tungsten mine in British Columbia, to a chrome mine in the eastern townships in Quebec and to certain other mines. These properties have been financed as mining operations. All these strategic metals have come into excess supply since we have had amazingly favourable results in our search for rare metals. They were found in ample supply, and some of the properties opened up by Wartime Metals have been closed because the product is no longer required. One small property got into production through the vote we are now discussing. Another was developed by Wartime Metals Limited, and then there were the high-cost operations, a few of which were financed by the Metals Reserve Corporation.

Item agreed to.

[Mr. Green.]

Assistance to provincial governments in construction of transportation facilities into strategic mineral, including oil, properties, $75,000.

Mr. GREEN: Will the minister explain how much of this vote was spent last year and why it has been reduced from $200,000?

Mr. CRERAR: The vote last year was $200,000, of which $128,300 was expended. According to the notes I have here, $73,818 was expended in connection with the development of the Kam-Kotia copper mine west of Timmins.

Mr. GREEN: About half the vote.

Mr. CRERAR: A little more than half.

Mr. GREEN: Was that spent on a road?

Mr. CRERAR: Yes. This was a copper property being developed in that area. It was a three-way split. The Hollinger mine, which was developing the Kam-Kotia property, put up one-third; the provincial government put up one-third and the federal government one-third. Then assistance was granted in Quebec for the construction of a road into a zinc property on Calumet island, and for a road into the Sterret property near Richmond. An amount of $1,503.57 was spent in connection with a mica mine in Mattewan township, Ontario; in Quebec, for road from Pressiac village to Indian molybdenite mine, $2,427; for the Calumet zinc mine road, $11,759; for the Sterret chromium mine road, $1,301, and for the Cadillac-St. Maurice road, $30,974.

Mr. GREEN: Those are in Quebec?

Mr. CRERAR: Yes; those are in Quebec. Then, in British Columbia there is the Twin J mine road, at $2,991; and the Bralorne mercury mine road, $3,523. That is for a mercury mine that the Bralorne people control.

Mr. GREEN: On what basis are those amounts spent?

Mr. CRERAR: In practically all cases I am advised the mine made a contribution of one-third, the province a third and the federal government a third. There may be a few instances where the expense was shared between the provincial and federal governments.

Mr. GREEN: On whose recommendations are expenditures made? Is it the recommendation of the metals controller?

Mr. CRERAR: They are made on the recommendation of the metals controller.

Mr. GREEN: How is the money to be spent this year?

Mr. CRERAR: We are appropriating $75,000 this year to meet requests that might come along from the metals controller. I would impress upon the committee that there is one difference between these estimates and ordinary civil estimates. Civil estimates are prepared for particular projects. On the other hand, in respect of war estimates one simply draws out of the war appropriation a certain amount so that it may be made available to meet a need should it arise during the year.

Mr. GREEN: The minister does not expect as heavy a demand this year as there was last year?

Mr. CRERAR: No; we think $75,000 will cover it.

Mr. NEILL: May I ask if that expenditure at the Bralorne mine produced any mercury?

Mr. CRERAR: Yes, it has produced mercury. I have asked my officer if he could tell me the amount, but he has not that information with him.

Mr. NEILL: I might add that for at least forty years I have been familiar with a mercury mine in my district, which is only a stone's throw from deep water. We would not have needed to spend $72,000 to get mercury out of it. It is easily accessible in Barkley sound. I know of my own knowledge that there is mercury, because it was worked in a very primitive way. They had trouble with the Chinamen who did the work. The mercury affected their teeth. The teeth got loose, and dropped out. But why the government needed to spend $72,000 to get mercury in Bralorne, when it was available right there, at the water's edge, I do not know.

Mr. CRERAR: Where is that located?

Mr. NEILL: In Barkley sound, on the west coast of Vancouver island. It is a place called Sechart.

Mr. CRERAR: I shall inquire about that. The director has no recollection of its having been brought to the attention of the department. I do not know whether it has been called to the attention of the metals controller. However, inquiries will be made.

Mr. NEILL: The mercury is there, all right.

Mr. ESLING: Since the United States markets are closed to Canadian zinc, as a result of which contracts for production are cancelled on the four properties, as recently announced by the department, what market is there for the disposition of Canadian zinc by the Slocan producers of lead and zinc ores?

Mr. CRERAR: I understand that my hon. friend is inquiring what market may now be available for ores from certain mines which hitherto have been shipped to the Metals Reserve Corporation in the United States. I am unable to say. The metals controller of the Department of Munitions and Supply might be able to give information on that.

Mr. ESLING: As the minister knows, the only outlet for Canadian zinc other than that which goes to the British government, has been in the United States market. Now, apparently the United States market is fully supplied, by reason of which fact these contracts were cancelled with the Quebec properties, and the Kootenay-Florence in British Columbia. There are a number of small producers of lead and zinc ores. Where is their market? I am just wondering if some arrangement cannot be made for marketing those ores somewhere?

Mr. CRERAR: I regret I cannot give my hon. friend much information on that. I know that through the agency of the Department of Munitions and Supply certain mines were reopened for the production of concentrates for shipment to the Metals Reserve Corporation of the United States, when zinc was very badly needed. I understand that in some instances that corporation has terminated its arrangements.

Mr. ESLING: In practically all instances. That is the reason why I asked.

Mr. CRERAR: They have terminated these contracts. Why they have done so, I cannot say. I can only assume they have done so because their zinc situation is easier in supply. What may be done to keep these mines in operation, I am not in a position to say. I do not think at the moment there is any other market, so far as I am aware, for these concentrates, other than that in the United States. Perhaps my hon. frieind might discuss the matter with the Minister of Munitions and Supply, and get some information from him.

Mr. ESLING: One naturally looks to the Minister of Mines and Resources to tell the public what market there may be, or if there is not to be a market, or if all lead and zinc mines are to be closed definitely and permanently.

Item stands.

The house met at three o'clock.

WORLD MONETARY CONFERENCE

REPORT AS TO MEETING CALLED BY PRESIDENT ROOSEVELT FOR JULY 1

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. H. BLACKMORE (Lethbridge): Mr. Speaker, it is reported to me that over the radio to-day it was anounced that President Roosevelt has called an international monetary conference for July 1, 1944. Will the Minister of Finance tell the house not later than Monday: first, whether or not Canada has been invited to this conference; second, whether or not, if invited, Canada has accepted the invitation; third, whether or not the Canadian delegates, if Canada should send such, will be told that they shall have no power to commit Canada to any international monetary agreement until after such agreement shall have been subjected to the maturest consideration by the parliament of Canada?

Hon. J. L. ILSLEY (Minister of Finance): I will answer on Monday.

SELECTIVE SERVICE

PRESS REPORT AS TO ASSURANCE OF PERMANENT EMPLOYMENT TO LABOUR TRANSFERRED TO PACIFIC COAST

On the orders of the day:

Mr. THOMAS REID (New Westminster): I desire to ask the Minister of Labour a question based on a press dispatch to the effect that national selective service is endeavouring to procure help from other provinces for work in industry on the Pacific coast, with the assurance given them of permanent employment following the end of the war. My question to the minister is: Are such steps being taken, and if so, is the same guarantee being given to all those who have left British Columbia?

Hon. HUMPHREY MITCHELL (Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, I am not responsible for any statement in the press. There is of course a considerable movement up and down the country under the direction of national selective service; that is inevitable under war conditions and with the civilian labour situation as it is at the moment. I have no knowledge of any guarantee being given as indicated by the hon. member with respect to permanent employment when the war is over.

[Mr. Esling.]

STATEMENT OF MR. MACNAMARA—MAN-POWER SHORTAGE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. G. DIEFENBAKER (Lake Centre): I wish to direct some questions to the Minister of Labour concerning the lengthy statement given yesterday, as reported in the Canadian press, by Mr. MacNamara, the director of national selective service. No doubt the interview or statement is known to the minister. In the statement it is said that having regard to Canada's position to-day the number in the armed forces or gainfully employed "is just about as high as we can expect to go." Then it goes on to state that certain things are to be done by the department shortly. The questions I would ask the minister are these: In view of the declaration of Mr. MacNamara, do the surveys of the department indicate that there is any hoarding of labour on a large scale? Mr. MacNamara says that measures are to be taken in order to comb out those who have been hoarding labour. What industries are to be affected by further compulsory orders about to be issued, as stated by Mr. MacNamara? Does the statement I quoted a moment ago indicate that it is the intention of the government—

Mr. SPEAKER: Order. The hon. gentleman has laid the foundation for his questions, and I think he should now put them.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: Does that statement indicate that Canada has come to a point about as high as we can expect to go in manpower and that there is to be no change in the matter of call-ups under the National Resources Mobilization Act?

Hon. HUMPHREY MITCHELL (Minister of Labour): Answering the last question first, no change is contemplated at the moment in the call-ups under the National Resources Mobilization Act. As I indicated when my estimates were before the house, we have a staff who are continually combing the industrial and commercial structure of the country for additional recruits for the army, and we have in motion also a policy of direction, transferring men from less essential to more essential industries. That is going on continuously. It is a day to day administrative policy. As regards the question of additional compulsory transfers, that has not been finalized at the moment, and I do not think I can go further than that at present.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: May I ask one supplementary question? Was Mr. MacNamara stating what is a fact when he said that to-day Canada faces its most acute man-power shortage?

Mr. MITCHELL: I think that is generally understood. Most grown-up men know that.

FRESH FRUIT

PRICE CEILING ON BRITISH COLUMBIA STRAWBERRIES AND RASPBERRIES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. G. A. CRUICKSHANK (Fraser Valley): I desire to ask a question of the Minister of Finance on a matter which affects fruit growers not only in my riding but in the entire province of British Columbia. I directed a question to the minister some three weeks ago, and again on the 24th of this month, in connection with the picking and disposal of strawberries and raspberries—particularly, at that time, strawberries. Under the present price set-up as established by the board it is impossible for the berry growers to arrange for the picking and salvaging of the crop. I would ask the minister, in view of the seriousness of the situation, and the fact that, with a seasonal crop like this, an immediate or a very early decision is necessary, and the price set by the board makes it uneconomic to pick the crop: First, what provision is being made to have the crop picked and so avoid waste, and, second, will the government give immediate consideration to modifying the administrator's order No. A-1224? The matter is of urgent importance to us in British Columbia?

Mr. D. C. ABBOTT (Parliamentary Assistant to the Minister of Finance): Perhaps I might answer that question. Ceiling prices for strawberries were fixed, as my hon. friend has indicated, by administrative order No. A-1224, which was published, I think, on Monday of this week. I understand from my hon. friend that in zone 3, which includes British Columbia, the price is alleged to be not sufficient to cover the cost of production. My hon. friend has asked what the government proposes to do about that: is that correct?

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: Correct.

Mr. ABBOTT: I received notice of his question a few minutes before coming into the house. I got in touch with the administrator of fruits and was informed that last year, when no ceiling prevailed, the price was higher than the price which has been fixed this year. The price fixed this year is ninety per cent higher than the average for the years 1938, 1939, 1940 and 1941, and it is felt that it is sufficient to provide an adequate return. That is the only answer I can give to my hon. friend's question, but I shall be glad to bring his further representations to the attention of those concerned.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: I would point out that it is of vital importance that we should know when this decision will be given.

Mr. ABBOTT: My information is that one of the leading grower organizations of British Columbia was written to to-day in reply to certain representations which had been made setting forth in substance what I have said here, that the ceiling price set is felt to be adequate, and there is no indication at the moment that the price will be changed.

EXCISE ACT

PROSECUTIONS IN PRINCE EDWARD ISLAND—ANSWERS TO QUESTIONS ON MAY 25

On the orders of the day:

Hon. R. B. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Mr. Speaker, yesterday, on a question of privilege, I adverted to the fact that, with respect to questions 9, 10 and 11, which I had on the order paper on May 16, the Minister of National Revenue (Mr. Gibson), answered only four questions in a series of twelve, leaving eight unanswered, with the notation that it is not considered to be in the public interest to answer these questions at the present time for the reason that the case is still before the courts. That, by some stretch of the imagination, might be applicable to questions 8 and 9, but I do submit that I am entitled to answers to questions 5, 6, 7, 10, 11 and 12. I want to know what counsel fees have been paid to date in relation to these cases; what witness fees have been paid to date; what other costs have been paid. Then I do want to know whether the attorney general was requested to prosecute these cases and whether he acted, and has there been more than one trial of these cases and, if so, how many. Then finally and vitally, why were the proceedings taken by way of indictment instead of by summary conviction under the appropriate part of the criminal code. I am entitled to answers to these questions.

Hon. C. W. G. GIBSON (Minister of National Revenue): When the hon. member was speaking on this matter yesterday I did not notice that he said:

> I am entitled to have that information notwithstanding that the case may be under appeal.

I would point out that these cases are not under appeal. The cases came on for trial before a jury some time ago; I understand that the jury disagreed, and the cases are coming on for trial again next month. It is considered not to be in the public interest that the answers asked for should be made public at this time just before a jury trial. While there is no objection to the hon. member himself having that information, I do not think it should be made public property at this time.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I respectfully dissent from the whole attitude of the minister. What possible effect could the cost of these trials to the public have on an approaching jury trial?

ANSWERS TO QUESTIONS

FURNISHING OF INFORMATION TO MEMBERS PRIVATELY INSTEAD OF PUBLICLY

On the orders of the day:

Mr. G. K. FRASER (Peterborough West): I should like to ask the Minister of Finance a question based on a statement made by the Minister of National Revenue. On April 24, at page 2280 of Hansard I asked a question about subsidies. The Minister of Finance said that he did not think it was in the public interest to give the information and I then asked this question:

And after that, would there be any harm in showing me privately to whom these are paid?

The minister said:

I do not like the latter part of the suggestion.

I replied: "It has been done before." The minister said:

I really do not like it, because I do not think it is fair to other hon. members.

To-day the Minister of National Revenue suggested to the hon. member for York-Sunbury (Mr. Hanson) that he would show him the information privately. What is the difference between the two questions? Why should one hon. member receive the information privately and not another?

Hon. J. L. ILSLEY (Minister of Finance): Each minister administers his own department and must take the responsibility for the practices he favours and adopts; and it is possible that my colleague and I have different views as to what should be done in the same situation. It is possible also that these are different situations.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): What are the rights of the members of parliament; that is what I should like to know?

Mr. FRASER (Peterborough West): Then the Minister of Finance suggests what the Minister of National Revenue says is unfair.

[Mr. Gibson.]

LABOUR CONDITIONS

MACDONALD BROTHERS AIRCRAFT PLANT, WINNIPEG

On the orders of the day:

Mr. S. H. KNOWLES (Winnipeg North Centre): I should like to direct to the Minister of Munitions and Supply a question, notice of which I sent him earlier to-day. Has the minister received from the Winnipeg city council a copy of a resolution adopted at its meeting of last Monday evening, expressing concern over the large-scale lay-offs that have taken place recently at the MacDonald Brothers Aircraft plant, and asking the minister to investigate the possibilities of allotting to this plant contracts for other types of planes to replace the previous order allotted to this firm? If so, can the minister indicate what action may be expected in connection with this request from the Winnipeg city council?

Hon. C. D. HOWE (Minister of Munitions and Supply): I have not received the resolution of the city council but I have a letter from MacDonald Brothers Aircraft Limited referring to the matter, which I should read. It arrived on my desk to-day:

The Honourable C. D. Howe, Minister,
Department of Munitions and Supply,
Ottawa, Ontario.

Dear Sir:

Enclosed herewith please find a clipping taken from the Winnipeg Free Press of May 23, 1944.

To-day we made a statement to our employees concerning this matter. A copy of this statement, and a letter to the Managing Editor of the paper is enclosed.

A similar report was published in the Winnipeg Tribune and we have sent a copy of our statement with a covering letter to the editor.

The following is the letter to the Managing Editor of the Winnipeg Free Press and the Winnipeg Tribune:

We wish to direct your attention to a press report of the last city council meeting. Statements were made that the airport division of this company would close down in June next due to lack of aircraft work. This statement is entirely wrong and we wish to bring to your attention the attached statement of fact which was given to our employees to-day.

We know that this statement will clear up any doubts in the minds of men and women who work for the company, and we are relying on the press to inform the public. We know that you appreciate the serious consequences which can ensue from the publication of misleading reports affecting the employment of large groups of men and women, particularly in war time, and would ask you to give the same prominence to this statement as to the original press report.

The following is the statement to the employees:

Many of you have seen a press report of the last meeting of the Winnipeg city council which appeared in last night's papers. This press report indicates that this plant will be closed down on June 15 next due to lack of work.

It is very regrettable that this misleading information has been published in the press because it can do a great deal of harm when all the facts are not known.

I wish to be most emphatic in stating that the information concerning the closing of the plant, as reported in the press, is erroneous.

It is quite true that a considerable number of employees were laid off at the airport division and as our employees know, this lay-off was entirely from the overhaul department due to a curtailment in the use of the Anson Mark I aircraft. You also know that we have manufactured a large number of Anson II's and are at present working on the Anson V programme. Both of these later type machines will substitute for the original Anson I. The Robinson street and float departments are engaging men and in the near future will require an additional three hundred employees in order to cope with the amount of work now outstanding. For the float division, Robinson street division and airport division we have orders on the books which will carry us through at least until the fall of 1945.

Due to factors beyond our control, it was necessary to reduce the overhaul staff at the airport division in proportion to the amount of work which we now contemplate doing for the overhaul division of the Department of Munitions and Supply. We have orders from the Department of Munitions and Supply for ten overhauls per month and this will probably be increased around September or October.

I wish again to emphasize the fact that there is no foundation in fact for the report that this plant will close down on June next and also to emphasize that we have contracts with the Department of Munitions and Supply which cannot be completed before the fall of 1945.

With that as a text I should like to say that we are suffering very greatly from statements of public men, whether in city council, provincial legislatures or particularly in this parliament, referring to the closing down of plants, when there is no foundation in fact for such statements. I sincerely wish that hon. members would not casually read an article in the press and then rise in the House of Commons and announce that a plant is to be closed. It causes a great deal of unrest in the plant. We have had the same thing happen during the last eighteen months with regard to various plants. I sincerely hope that my hon. friend will not ask a question of that kind again before finding out privately if there is something in the statement.

Mr. KNOWLES: I should like to say that I appreciate the statements the minister has made, which set aside any rumours regarding the closing down of the plant; but in connection with the rebuke he endeavoured to give me I should like to point out—

Some hon. MEMBERS. Order.

Mr. KNOWLES: On a question of privilege, Mr. Speaker, I ask for the right to point out that my question did not refer to any rumours as to the closing down of the plant—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. KNOWLES: —I asked only about lay-offs taking place.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

OTTAWA PAINT WORKS—CONDITIONS UNDER WHICH MEN ARE REPLACED BY BOYS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. JEAN-FRANÇOIS POULIOT (Témiscouata): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Labour regarding sweat labour in Ottawa. I am informed that men at the Ottawa Paint Works who earn an average of fifty cents an hour were replaced by boys of about eighteen who were paid $15 a week; that their job is to load and unload barrels of white lead weighing three or four hundred pounds, and that those boys are frozen on the job. If that is the case, it is just sweat labour and I ask the minister to investigate it at once. Would the minister be kind enough to tell me if he will investigate the case?

Hon. HUMPHREY MITCHELL (Minister of Labour): Yes.

PRIME MINISTER CHURCHILL

SUGGESTED PUBLICATION IN "VOTES AND PROCEEDINGS" OF SPEECH OF MAY 24

On the orders of the day:

Mr. JEAN-FRANÇOIS POULIOT (Témiscouata): Yesterday I asked a question about the publication of Mr. Churchill's speech of the day before in Votes and Proceedings. Can the Minister of Mines and Resources give me any information in that regard?

Hon. T. A. CRERAR (Minister of Mines and Resources): When my hon. friend brought this matter up yesterday I asked that it stand until to-day. I have been a bit remiss in my duty. I was engaged in the house yesterday and omitted to mention the matter to the Prime Minister. I do not think the matter has come to his attention. I think before the rather novel procedure as suggested by my hon. friend is adopted perhaps the Prime Minister should give some consideration to it. I promise to make a reply on Monday.

CIVIL AVIATION

INQUIRY AS TO ENLARGEMENT OF STEVENSON FIELD

On the orders of the day:

Mr. S. H. KNOWLES (Winnipeg North Centre): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Munitions and Supply which differs from the question I asked a few moments ago. Has the minister received from the St. James-Winnipeg airport commission a further proposal for the enlarging of Stevenson field to meet both war-time and post-war needs? In view of the importance of this airport to the whole of Canada, will the minister indicate—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. KNOWLES: —whether consideration is being given—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. KNOWLES: —to the granting of approval to the commission's plans?

Mr. SPEAKER: The hon. member must place that question on the order paper.

SUPPLY

Hon. J. L. ILSLEY (Minister of Finance) moved that the house go into committee of supply.

Motion agreed to and the house went into committee of supply, Mr. Bradette in the chair.

Mr. ILSLEY moved:

Resolved, that a sum not exceeding $46,331,283.90, being one-sixth of the amount of each of the several items to be voted, as set forth in the estimates for the fiscal year ending 31st March, 1945, laid before the House of Commons at the present session of parliament, be granted to His Majesty, on account, for the fiscal year ending 31st March, 1945.

He said: With the consent of the leaders of the different groups we are to vote interim supply, one-sixth.

Mr. GORDON GRAYDON (Leader of the Opposition): Before the resolution carries may I ask the minister for the customary undertaking which the minister and the government always give when interim supply is asked for and granted, namely, that it is given without prejudice to the rights of the hon. members of this house to discuss and deal with any item covered or partly covered by this vote, as the item comes up in the general estimates; in other words, that we shall be as free after this vote passes as we were prior to its passing to discuss the general estimates.

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes, I give that undertaking.

Resolution reported, read the second time, and concurred in.

WAYS AND MEANS

INTERIM SUPPLY

Hon. J. L. ILSLEY (Minister of Finance) moved that the house go into committee of ways and means.

[Mr. Knowles.]

Motion agreed to and the house went into committee, Mr. Bradette in the chair.

Mr. ILSLEY moved:

Resolved, that towards making good the supply granted to His Majesty on account of certain expenses of the public service for the fiscal year ending March 31, 1945, the sum of $46,331,283.90 be granted out of the consolidated revenue fund of Canada.

Resolution reported, read the second time and concurred in. Mr. Ilsley thereupon moved for leave to introduce bill No. 111, for granting to His Majesty certain sums of money for the public service of the financial year ending the 31st March, 1945.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

Mr. ILSLEY moved the second reading of the bill.

Mr. GRAYDON: In view of the fact that copies of the bill have just been delivered to us, will the minister give an undertaking that the bill now in our hands is in the same form as the previous interim supply bill? I do not desire to hold up the bill, but for our protection I should like to have that undertaking.

Mr. ILSLEY: Strangely enough I hesitate to give that undertaking without seeing what was done at the time it was passed, for I was away then. This cannot be in anything but the same form, as far as I can see. Certainly I believe it to be in the same form. It is very simple; I think I would be safe in giving that undertaking, but I should like to compare it with the other bill before doing so absolutely.

Mr. COLDWELL: The amount is $46,331,283.90?

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and the house went into committee thereon, Mr. Bradette in the chair.

Bill reported.

Mr. ILSLEY moved the third reading of the bill.

Mr. GRAYDON: Once more I rise to the point I mentioned a moment ago; that is, in connection with the form of this bill. Has the minister the number of the previous bill, so that a comparison may be made before third reading is given? I would not care to consent to the third reading of this bill until we have had an opportunity of at least seeing that the form is in order.

Mr. ILSLEY: The Clerk of the House informs me that it is in exactly the same form as the other bill. I have not compared it myself, but on his undertaking I will give the assurance that the form is the same. It cannot be anything else.

Mr. GRAYDON: I have not been able to find the other bill on my file; however, on the undertaking of the minister that this bill is in the same form as the previous bill I am prepared to agree to third reading. The responsibility now becomes his rather than mine, and that is exactly where I want the onus to rest.

Mr. CHURCH: This is the sixty-sixth day of this session. Now parliament is being asked to grant more interim supply for two more months, which will bring us beyond the end of June. In other words half our annual expenditures will have been made, and the detailed statement will not be presented to the house until the 15th day of next session. This is a most unusual procedure; half the annual expenditure will be made without this house having any control over one cent of it. The budget should have been brought down before bringing in a bill like this. We are just holding as a house a post-mortem on these expenditures after the money is passed.

Motion agreed to and bill read the third time.

Mr. ILSLEY moved that the bill be now passed and that the title be as upon the order paper.

Mr. GRAYDON: A copy of bill No. 65, purporting to be the bill passed by this house on March 30, 1944, has been put in my hands. I have one objection to make; the bill now before us has no schedule, while the other bill has. In my opinion a bill without a schedule is not a proper bill to bring into the house at this time. I think perhaps in giving his undertaking the minister did so sight unseen, and I should like to have these things regularized if possible. I do not want to be put in the position of quibbling about details of this kind, but we are letting this bill go through without debate in order to facilitate the business and I think we are at least entitled to have the bill in regular and proper form.

Mr. KNOWLES: I think the bill to which the leader of the opposition is referring must be the bill dealing with the supplementary estimates for last year rather than the bill granting interim supply for two months of this year, which is what we are dealing with now.

Mr. GRAYDON: I think the hon. member is right, but this is the bill that was given to me, and it is not the same as the bill we are now being asked to pass. Now I have been given a copy of bill No. 53, which appears to be the same, and I am quite satisfied.

Motion agreed to and bill passed.

WAR APPROPRIATION BILL

PROVISION FOR GRANTING TO HIS MAJESTY AID FOR NATIONAL DEFENCE AND SECURITY

The house resumed from Thursday, May 25, consideration in committee of a resolution to grant to His Majesty certain sums of money for the carrying out of measures consequent upon the existence of a state of war—Mr. Ilsley—Mr. Bradette in the chair.

MINES AND RESOURCES

Mines and geology branch—Assistance to provincial governments in construction of transportation facilities into strategic mineral, including oil, properties, $75,000.

Mr. NEILL: Mr. Chairman, I would like the minister to give us some information on this vote and tell us why it has been so greatly reduced. This is a very valuable form of assistance that can be given to mineral development. I recall that, in the district I represent, some years ago a prospector found ore in the Zeballos valley so rich he could make wages packing it out on his back over the mountains and along the beds of rivers. Then this government aided by the provincial government gave a considerable sum to make a road up that valley, which not only affected this man's holdings but meant that a number of others were developed. Inside of a year or more four stamp mills were running in that district. The stamp mills crush the rock. The ore was very rich and the development was very successful. I remember that one mine was turning out $160,000 of gold a month, and as I say four stamp mills were running there in that small area—a situation that hardly could have been found in Canada before. The money that was granted by the dominion government, aided by the provincial government, helped that enormous development to take place. I would like to see that form of assistance continued, but I see that the vote is cut down from $200,000 last year to $75,000 this year. That will not go far in making roads through mountains. Mineral is almost always found in rock, not in a potato field, and rock is generally associated with mountains. To make a road with bridges through the mountains is very expensive. The sum of $75,000 would not make much more than eight or ten miles of mountain road.

That would be of very little assistance in promoting any substantial development. Would the minister say why this vote has been cut down so much?

Hon. T. A. CRERAR (Minister of Mines and Resources): I think the point raised by the hon. member for Comox-Alberni is a pertinent one. The amount provided last year was $200,000, and the actual expenditure was $143,000 odd. This vote is to meet requests that may possibly come in from the metals controller for assistance in getting roads built into places where strategic minerals are found. It is not to assist in the ordinary mining development of the country at all. This is a war vote. It may be that this amount will not be required this year; on the other hand, over $75,000 may be required, in which event we would have to find ways and means of getting it somewhere out of the war appropriation. I wish to impress on the committee that while these are estimates they are really very little more than shrewd guesses as to what may be required.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): They are something more than tokens, are they not? You are going to spend some money, are you not? And where?

Mr. CRERAR: We may not spend any of the money. I explained to the committee yesterday on another vote that these items are included in the estimates to meet possible requests from the metals controller for assistance in developing certain strategic metal mines.

Mr. NEILL: What is a strategic metal?

Mr. CRERAR: They are the ones we discussed yesterday, such as tungsten, chromite, molybdenite, manganese if it were found, fluorspar, mercury, and others. It may be that in the course of this year some prospector who has staked a claim in one of the provinces or some company that has a claim staked may come to the metals controller and say, "We have a property that may be valuable in producing tungsten,"—or it may be some other metal required in the war effort—"but we need assistance. We think it is worthy of your examination." The metals controller makes an investigation, and if he thinks the property warrants further exploration; we have made provisions for that.

Mr. NEILL: In that case gold would not be a strategic metal?

Mr. CRERAR: No.

Mr. NEILL: Will there be a similar vote in the ordinary estimates?

[M. Neill.]

Mr. CRERAR: I think not this year.

Mr. NEILL: Why not?

Mr. CRERAR: I will come to that in a moment. I was giving an illustration. Suppose the metals controller finds that the property is worth developing but that transportation facilities are required; the amount could be provided out of this vote.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Have there been any requests for assistance this year under this vote?

Mr. CRERAR: Not up to the present time.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Then of course this is just an enabling vote which may or may not be used?

Mr. CRERAR: Quite so.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Has the government through its own motion or through the metals controller investigated the supplies of strategic metals? I have in mind tungsten. There is in the county which I have the honour to represent, to use the language the hon. member for Queens-Lunenburg used recently, a very large deposit of tungsten at Burnt Hill mountain. In the last war some development of that deposit took place; has it been called to the attention of the authorities in this war, and if so have they done anything about it? I believe that the ore is of very high quality and there is an ample supply of it if it is capable of reduction. As a matter of fact, the development is one that I think the country ought to undertake. I have always been surprised that the provincial government did not do something about it. I must confess that my knowledge of the property is most superficial, but I am drawing the attention of the minister to the fact that there is a large deposit of tungsten in the parish of Stanley in the county of York which might be explored and, if it is of good quality, be made accessible—it is not at the moment. It might be an important contributing factor in the present war.

Mr. CRERAR: The deposit to which my hon. friend refers did come to the attention of the metals controller and was examined by him and by the officers of the mines branch of my department. It was one of a great many properties. The decision was not to go ahead with that particular one. I am not in a position at the moment to give the reasons why, but I presume other sources of supply were more readily accessible. The requirements for tungsten at the moment, according to the Department of Munitions and Supply, are not nearly so pressing as they were eighteen months or a year ago. In other words, quite substantial quantities of tungsten have been developed and secured.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): In what part of the country?

Mr. CRERAR: In various parts. As a matter of fact some of the gold mines, such as Hollinger, find tungsten in with their ores. I am unable to state the quantity, but I know that fairly large quantities come from that source. Some comes from Nova Scotia and British Columbia.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Would the minister be good enough to have his officers send me what they have in the nature of a report on the Burnt Hill tungsten deposit?

Mr. CRERAR: I shall have that sent to my hon. friend, if that will be satisfactory. The hon. member for Comox-Alberni raised the question of assisting in the development of gold producing properties. Commencing in 1936 and for several years thereafter a vote was provided in the estimates of the Department of Mines and Resources for assistance in developing transportation into mining areas. Substantial amounts were spent in conjunction with the provinces in carrying out that work. That vote was dropped at the commencement of the war or shortly after. There has not been the pressing need for gold in the last few years that there has been for many other metals, and so for the moment that has been put more or less aside.

My own opinion is that when the war is over and we come to times of peace the matter of the development of mineral areas, both in base and precious metals, should receive the serious consideration of whatever government is in power. During the depressed thirties there was no single industry that made such a contribution to maintaining the standard of economic wealth we had during those years as the mining industry. It was the one industry that expanded during those years and it continued to expand until the outbreak of war. In connection with base metals there has been a great expansion since the outbreak of war. When the time comes that the story may be told in full, the contribution made by the metal mines of Canada to the winning of the war will be recognized as a fine contribution indeed. I would hope that in the policies that may be developed when this wretched war is over the type of assistance referred to by the hon. member for Comox-Alberni will be taken up again. There is no question of its economic value to the country.

Mr. SLAGHT: I think the minister is right in reducing this item substantially, because, as the committee will note, it is to provide transportation facilities for strategic metals development. Last year two large companies, Hollinger in Ontario and Bralorne in British Columbia, were the recipients of the one-third which the government provided in connection with this work and which made up the $142,000 spent at that time.

Apropos of the question asked by the hon. member for Comox-Alberni about gold, the minister hoped that when the war is over any government in power would take up the stimulating of activities in the production of gold. I want to submit to the committee and for the consideration of the minister that we should not wait until the war is over to encourage prospecting for gold and the development of gold mines. I think the hon. member for Comox-Alberni will probably be with me in that view.

In the first two years of the war under the then minister of finance, the present Minister of National Defence, the gold mining companies of Canada were asked to step up their production to the highest possible degree. They put in new machinery and did everything to respond to that request. Additional production was needed because the Department of Finance was put to it to find gold in order to finance our war needs. Later on, under the liberal treatment that this country received from our neighbours to the south in assisting us in our great munitions production programme and furnishing us under a type of so-called lend-lease with the basic materials we were putting into the munitions we were sending to the mother country and other allies, the need for gold as a means of payment to Washington eased off very materially.

Drafts were made upon the men employed in the gold mines, and I think quite properly. An entirely different programme was adopted by the Department of Finance, and I think quite properly. They said, "We do not need gold with which to pay; we have better relations with our neighbours, and we are financing without the use of gold." It was said that the gold mining industry must bow to the manpower needs of base and strategic metals and other important war industries. Under that state of affairs one company with which I am acquainted has been operating with only twenty-seven per cent of their normal manpower.

Gold production in our country has fallen off, but to my mind that is not so alarming as the fact that the search for new gold mines and new base metals mines, the prospecting which is the very genesis of ultimate production, has also fallen off. That is to be expected, because the prospector is an adventurous and courageous man. I spent ten years of my life among these men in northern Ontario. They have enlisted in overwhelming numbers and after the war they will be back. If the committee agree with me when I say that while we cannot predict the date, we know we shall not lose the war, then my humble submission to the minister is that we should not wait until peace is declared to encourage prospecting again.

Instead of a large item of $142,000 going mainly to two wealthy mining companies to assist in building roads into strategic metals properties I should like to see the minister stimulate the Minister of Finance when he brings down the budget and have provision made this year to provide for the bonusing and encouragement of prospecting. Everyone will tell you that there is a long period from the time a property is first discovered and staked until actual production occurs. Take the Hollinger mine, for instance, which has produced $150,000,000 of gold since it was first discovered. After the discovery of the Hollinger it took four years before a brick of gold was produced. That is the history of gold mining. Therefore we should be alert, in my judgment, because I am not so sure that when peace comes our neighbours to the south will be so ready to lend-lease and send their material "on the cuff"; they may resume quite properly, the position of saying, "For the coal, the gasoline, the cotton and other raw products which you need from us in your economy you have got to pay us with something", and gold will be a very sure economic assistance to this country in enabling us to pay for raw materials which we need after peace is declared.

Mr. MacNICOL: Not if we have only a paper money and nothing behind it.

Mr. SLAGHT: I do not know what my hon. friend means by that. I hope he is not trying on this item to provoke me into an argument on economic principles. If he thinks we ought to go back to the gold standard, I suggest that he read history. My view is that never again should we return to the gold standard; it would cramp the development of the natural resources of this great country. Perhaps my hon. friend did not mean that. If he did, I should like personally to convert him, if he has a couple of hours or a couple of days to spare.

Mr. McCANN: Or a couple of months.

Mr. SLAGHT: I should like to show him what is involved.

Mr. ROWE: It will take until after the next election.

[Mr. Slaght.]

Mr. SLAGHT: There is nothing political in what I am talking about, and I am sure my hon. friend did not mean to suggest that. The gold industry has been of great value to this country over the past thirty years. Look at the ramifications of the industry, the money which has been spent on wages, machinery, transport, everything which has gone into our economic life. The gold industry of Canada has had a magnificent stabilizing effect upon the economic life of this country. That being so, my only purpose is to urge the minister to say to his colleague or colleagues who bring down our budget: Do not overlook in this present session provisions which will encourage and stimulate the prospector, the man who must come first, before you build your transport or your roads, before you bring your hoists to raise the ore to the surface, before you construct your mills, and remember that four or five years must elapse between the discovery of a property and bringing it into production; so that you must make provision to encourage that branch of the industry.

Mr. ROWE: You are already two years late.

Mr. SLAGHT: There is some force in what my hon. friend says. I do not know whether he participated last year in the discussion of this item for the encouragement of prospecting. To my mind the amount was too niggardly a provision, and this country can well afford to increase it. It does not represent very much in the sum total of $5½ thousand millions which we spend in twelve months.

It has been indicated to me that Canada is not on lend-lease. That of course is true; and I may have created a wrong impression I did not mean to say that we were on lend-lease; I intended to say, on a basis of commercial trading with our neighbours to the south whereby they eased tremendously their demands in the earlier years of the war, before they were allies with us, in requiring us in the earlier years to pay either in kind or in gold. When they entered the war, as they did after Pearl Harbor, their whole economic attitude toward Canada altered very materially; in the past two years they have treated us with a great deal of consideration and a helpfulness which has reduced the need for gold. That is the reason for the change in the attitude of our administration towards gold mining. First it was, "Produce all you can," then, "Ease down and give your men to other industries." Let me therefore correct any suggestion I may have conveyed that we are on a lend-lease basis with the United States. We make a great contribution to them, let it not be forgotten, in nickel and other strategic minerals. Canada's place in the production of strategic metals and the stepping up of that production during these war years is a magnificent war effort of which we may well be proud. Any hon. members who desire to pursue that study will find in our booklet, "Canada at War," a chapter devoted to what we have done in the world picture in the producing of strategic metals.

I have spoken longer than I intended. I merely desire again to impress upon the minister that we should at this very session stimulate prospecting for and the early stages of the production not only of strategic minerals but of gold as well.

Item agreed to.

Special exploration and development work in connection with the supply of strategic minerals, $60,000.

Mr. CRERAR: Yesterday the hon. member for Lake Centre asked for some detailed information in regard to the expenditures under this vote. He desired a break-down of expenses under the strategic minerals vote for 1943. I find that they were as follows: Nova Scotia, $13,502; Quebec, $127—the expenditure in this province was small, but the year before it was much larger—Ontario, $45,630; Manitoba, $20,000; British Columbia, $10,564; Yukon Territory, $4,600. These amounts, with administration expenses of $23,363, give a total of $117,787.

The hon. member for Hastings-Peterborough asked some questions about the Miller deposit of fluorspar at Madoc. As we obtained the questions from Hansard they were these. First, how much did Mr. Miller spend to bring the mine into production? The answer is that Mr. Miller's expenditures prior to the mine being established in production are not known, but he must have had a considerable investment in connection with his acquiring of rights to mine fluorspar ore. The next question was: What part of the government's advances of $34,196 odd were used by Mr. Miller after the mine was brought into production? The answer is, none. Third, what profit did Mr. Miller make on fluorspar? The answer is, as indicated yesterday, that we have no information as to what Mr. Miller's profit was. Fourth, what were the expenses of supervision, including engineers, surveys, auditors and travelling? The supervision expenses for 1943-44 in connection with the Madoc fluorspar agreements amounted to slightly more than five thousand dollars, as a matter of fact $5,168.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: One supplementary question: has the minister any information as to how much this property cost Mr. Miller?

Mr. CRERAR: None. As I indicated to the committee yesterday, Mr. Miller had control of a property which could produce fluorspar if it were worked. It was brought to the notice of the metals controller, it was examined, and the expenditure of some public money to get it into production was considered justified, so the arrangement was made. How much Mr. Miller paid for it, how long he owned it, or any other particulars of that kind we do not know; nor, to be quite frank, were we interested. All we were interested in was getting fluorspar, and getting it on terms which would reasonably protect the public interest; and I think these aims were accomplished in the way it was carried out.

Item agreed to.

Bureau of Mines—Metallic minerals division —Services to war departments, $330,000.

Mr. MacNICOL: How much has been spent and how much is it proposed to spend on the new laboratory? Personally, I think this is one branch of the department that has been more or less starved for money to build adequate equipment. I would like to see in Ottawa a metals laboratory that would be a credit to the city and the country with all the necessary equipment to handle everything pertaining to minerals that come here. A month or two ago I received a bag of metal quartz or samples from a gentleman who is well known to the minister, Mr. W. J. Young of the Pas, Manitoba, who apparently is a mining man of note in that country. These samples are still in my room. He suggested that I send them to someone in Ottawa to have them tested, but I do not know where to send them. If there is a metals laboratory to which I can send them I shall be glad to send them there or I could send them to the minister, because the gentleman I referred to is in the minister's own riding. I support this vote because I think an adequate metallic laboratory is something that we have long lacked. I have been out to the small one in Ottawa, in the southwest corner of the city, near the city limits, but the buildings I saw did not strike me as anything that the government of Canada should have for laboratories of any kind. If there is now being erected a laboratory for the testing of minerals I hope it will be a real one. If so, it will be worthy of support.

Mr. CRERAR: The point is, of course, an important one. Prior to the war we had considerable research facilities in the mines branch located on Booth street in Ottawa.

Mr. MacNICOL: That is the street.

Mr. CRERAR: Since the outbreak of the war that has been considerably extended. A new physical metallurgy building was put up at a cost of $230,000 and laboratory equipment put in amounting to $100,000 or more, and that added substantially to the facilities which existed at the outbreak of the war. The work done under this vote is carried on in the new laboratory building as well as in the old buildings, and I think I am safe in saying that by far the greater part of the work of the staff engaged there is devoted to war purposes. That consists of testing of various kinds. I do not wish to go into the matter in too much detail, because we have been asked by some of the allied governments with whom we are cooperating to give out as little information as possible as to the nature of the work that is being done. I can say, however, that it has practically all to do with war work and largely in the testing and improving of new devices. I am glad that my hon. friend has emphasized the importance of research work. There is no question whatever of its vast significance. We have under consideration now plans for a considerable extension of research work particularly in the utilization of coals and oils.

Mr. MacNICOL: Hydrogenation.

Mr. CRERAR: Precisely. Experimental work looking to the application of the hydrogenation process for getting more out of the oils that we have and possibly getting oil from coal. Hon. members know that methods had been developed in Germany before the war and since the outbreak of the war, and Germany has unquestionably secured a great deal of her fuel oil for motors and the like by synthetic processes from coal.

Mr. MacNICOL: Three hundred million barrels a year.

Mr. CRERAR: Probably. We have vast quantities of coal in Canada and I think an expenditure of the kind is highly justified. If the bitumen from the tar sands is ever to be successfully developed— this is my own idea; I may be wrong, and perhaps I am putting myself in the realm of prophecy where I should not be—if, I say, this bitumen from the sands is to be commercially exploited with success in the future it will probably be through the application of the hydrogenation process.

Mr. MacNICOL: I suggested that two years ago. Now, in reference to this small bag of stuff sent me from the Pas—

Mr. CRERAR: I am sorry I overlooked that. If Mr. Young will take it to the mines branch on Booth street and inquire personally for Mr. Timm, when we get him off the grid here, we will give Mr. Young every possible facility. That work is being constantly done by the mines branch in the testing of ores and sampling them and giving advice on them.

Mr. GAUTHIER: Will the minister answer the motion I put on the order paper on May 16 addressed to Minister of Munitions and Supply? I think he can answer it. I should like to have the correspondence with reference to the closing of the Montauban zinc and lead mines in the Portneuf county—the correspondence between the Wartime Metals Corporation, the Department of Munitions and Supply, and Siscoe Metal Limited. I believe that two or three hundred workers are being laid off. I should like to know if this is on account of the situation existing at the present time, which situation was explained by the Minister of Munitions and Supply last night when he suggested that the market for zinc was full and that high price contracts had been negotiated by, and cancelled with the Wartime Metals Corporation. I should like to get the facts about the situation with respect to zinc.

Mr. CRERAR: I am advised that the mine to which my hon. friend has referred has been closed as a result of the Metals Reserve Corporation of the United States terminating its contract for concentrates from that mine. It is not a matter that comes within the control of this vote or, as a matter of fact, within the control of the Department of Mines and Resources. These contracts or arrangements with the Metals Control Reserve Corporation in the United States were negotiated by the Department of Munitions and Supply. The Minister of Munitions and Supply acted in reality as the agent of the Metals Reserve Corporation in making arrangements with the various mines. The Metals Reserve Corporation has terminated its agreement with several mines, and the one to which my hon. friend refers is one of those.

Lands, parks and forests branch—

Bureau of Northwest Territories and Yukon affairs—Expenses of liaison officers in connection with the Alaska highway and Canol projects, $10,000.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: I was dealing with this matter the other evening on another item, and the minister said that an opportunity would be given to discuss the allocation of oil and the Canol project generally under this item. I referred the other evening to the order in council tabled in the house on May 5 last, and at that time I asked permission of the committee to have it printed in Hansard along with orders in council 742, 1138 and 2447, which had to do with the handing over of the oil resources of the Yukon territory and a large portion of the Northwest Territories. To save the committee the time of my reading them I would ask permission to have them printed in Hansard.

The CHAIRMAN: It requires the unanimous consent of the committee.

Mr. CRERAR: These orders in council have all been laid on the table. They are available to hon. members. What is the use of going to the expense of having them reprinted in Hansard?

Mr. CASTLEDEN: Merely to save time. I will read them if you wish. I believe the people of Canada ought to be thoroughly informed as to what has been done with the oil resources and the rights for exploring for and developing oil and selling it. Complete control is handed over under this order in council. If the minister prefers that I read them I am quite willing to do so.

The CHAIRMAN: They are already available for distribution to every hon. member of this House of Commons and the Senate. Why should the country be put to the expense of having them reprinted in Hansard?

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: What are the numbers?

Mr. CASTLEDEN: Numbers 2904, 742, 1138 and 2447.

The important one is 2904. The first part of this order in council reads as follows:

Whereas following the exchanges of notes between Canada and the United States in reference to extending the fuel supply for the United States army in Canada and Alaska, special regulations were established by order in council P.C. 742 of January 28, 1943, and P.C. 2447 of March 26, 1943, for the disposal under permit of petroleum and natural gas rights, the property of the crown, in the Northwest Territories and Yukon Territory;

And whereas Imperial Oil Limited, who through a subsidiary held oil leases on certain lands in the vicinity of Fort Norman in the Northwest Territories acquired under the regulations established by P.C. 154 of the 19th January, 1914, and P.C. 331 of the 11th February, 1921, and had already found and was producing oil therefrom, was selected by the United States government to search for and develop the additional supply of oil;

And whereas in pursuance of an agreement between the United States government and Imperial Oil Limited, the company acquired under the regulations established by the said order in council P.C. 742 of January 28, 1943, permits comprising in all 139,176 acres, and carried out an exploratory and drilling programme thereon and, as a result, a proven field of oil has been delimited, comprising approximately 4,264 acres, estimated to contain from thirty to sixty million barrels of recoverable oil;

And whereas approximately one-third of such field is included in the leases previously acquired by the company and the other two-thirds in the permits acquired under the regulations established by the said order in council P.C. 742 of January 28, 1943;

And whereas under the last-mentioned regulations, it was provided that at the termination of the war the company would have the right of taking up under leases when oil was discovered one-half of the area in each permit and that the other one-half would continue to vest in the crown;

And whereas the Minister of Mines and Resources reports that no oil has yet been found on any of the lands covered by the permits issued to the company except that found on those portions thereof within the proven field, although the company under its agreement with the United States government did carry out considerable exploratory work thereon;

That the United States government is desirous of renegotiating its contracts with the company and of withdrawing from participation in the exploratory and drilling programme; and in consideration of the expenditures it has made the United States government desires to acquire from the company an option to purchase for its own use and not for resale up to one-half of the oil (but not exceeding 30 million barrels) in the proven field and ten per cent of the oil in new fields that may be found, until a total of 60 million barrels had been obtained;

That before the company renegotiates the said contracts it is necessary for the Canadian government to decide upon;

(a) The respective interests in the proven field and the manner in which the said field is to be developed;

(b) The terms upon which the company can explore and develop the remainder of the area held under permit; and

(c) The regulations to be established for the search for and development of oil in the rest of the Northwest Territories and Yukon territory;

That it is expedient to terminate as soon as possible the exploratory programme being carried out under the direction of the company for the United States government and to make available the whole of the Northwest Territories and Yukon territory for prospecting and development under new regulations that will facilitate, encourage and expedite the discovery and development of other large reserves of oil;

That it is to the general advantage of Canada that new sources of oil be discovered; that there are approximately 100,000,000 acres of lands in the Northwest Territories and Yukon territory warranting exploration for oil but owing to their remoteness and distance from markets large expenditures would be involved in exploring for and developing additional reserves sufficient to warrant the construction of a new pipeline; that it is estimated such expenditures would amount to $100,000,000, including the cost of the pipeline; and it is therefore necessary to establish regulations which will encourage exploration and development on a sound economic basis; and

That the war committee of the cabinet have studied the questions involved and are in general agreement with the recommendations hereinafter set forth;

Therefore, His Excellency the Governor General in Council, on the recommendation of the Minister of Mines and Resources, and under and by virtue of the War Measures Act, chapter 206, Revised Statutes of Canada, 1927, is pleased to authorize and doth hereby authorize the Minister of Mines and Resources to enter into an agreement with the Imperial Oil Limited to include, among other terms and conditions, the following:

1. In respect of the proven field—

(a) The area to be developed as a unit operation by the company, the oil produced therefrom to be disposed of by the company in the ordinary course of its business, the government's share therein to be sold at prices satisfactory to the government;

(b) The government's share of the oil to be one-third and the company to be paid the actual direct costs of producing it, plus a fee of 10 per cent;—

I should like the committee to note the portion that Canada gets out of it, although there is nothing, as I said before, to show how the direct cost of producing is to be arrived at.

(c) Subject to the prior and preferred supplying of all local requirements for crude petroleum and petroleum products, the company to have the right of giving an option to the United States government to purchase for its own use, but not for resale, an amount up to one-half of the oil recovered from the proven area, not exceeding thirty million barrels, the price therefor to be the cost of production, plus 20 cents per barrel. From its share the Canadian government will supply one-third. The United States government after May 1, 1954, shall take its oil currently as the field is produced,—

That is after 1954, so that you see this is not just a war-time contract; it has to do with the more or less permanent leasing of these properties and the oil rights and resources in that area.

—at the rate of at least 20 per cent of the total amount currently produced from the proven area for export. If the United States government does not desire to take its share currently, then the company shall be entitled to sell it on its own account and the said government would be entitled to any difference between the cost of production plus 20 cents per barrel, and the average sale price received by the company for oil sold by it during the period in question;

(d) The company shall pay a fixed permanent royalty of 5 per cent on its two-thirds share of the oil produced and on that portion of the Canadian government's oil that may be included in the option to the United States;

(e) Up to the time the agreement comes into effect the company may deliver to the United States government all oil produced, less that required for local needs, and no royalty shall be paid thereon;—

I do not think anyone would find fault with that in war time.

(f) No rentals or other fees other than royalty shall be paid on that portion of the area in the proven field covered by permits issued under P.C. 742 but the company shall pay the rentals and fees payable under the leases it now holds;

[Mr. Castleden.]

(g) The agreement shall come into effect six months after the termination of hostilities or when the contract between the United States government and the company is terminated, whichever date is the sooner.

2. In respect to the balance of the permit area—

(a) Upon the completion of the renegotiation of its contracts with the United States government, the company shall have the right of surrendering the areas under permit not included in the proven field and of taking in the place thereof prospecting permits of the kind to be provided for in the new regulations and thereafter such areas shall be subject to the conditions, rights and privileges applying to such permits, provided however that instead of the rate of royalty to be provided for thereunder and in lieu of any interest that may have accrued to the crown by virtue of the regulations under which the said permits were issued, the company will pay a royalty on all oil produced from the said area of 7½ per cent for the first five years after commercial exploitation has commenced,—

Mr. CRERAR: Does my hon. friend propose to read the whole order in council?

Mr. CASTLEDEN: Yes, and I am just at page 4 now.

Mr. CRERAR: Then perhaps the committee will excuse me while I go out and have a smoke.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: You have my permission. You would not give me permission to have the order in council tabled.

The CHAIRMAN: Order; it was not a question of permitting the hon. member to place the orders on Hansard. The hon. gentleman must realize, as I stated previously, that these orders in council have been published and are ready for distribution to all hon. members of the House of Commons and Senate. That is why his request was refused. They are public documents.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: As I said on Tuesday evening when I was stopped, I think the people of Canada have a right to know what is happening to their resources, as a result of orders in council like these passed under the War Measures Act. There was no bill brought before this house in connection with handing over these resources; this is the only information we have, and I think the people of Canada are entitled to know exactly what are the regulations.

The CHAIRMAN: The hon. member realizes that these are public documents which are available for distribution to all hon. members, and also available to the whole of Canada.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: This is one method of giving them further circulation, so that the people of Canada may have an opportunity of learning just what is happening to their resources. The order in council continues:

—10 per cent for the second five years and 12½ per cent thereafter, plus 10 per cent of the net profit derived by the company from such operations, to be computed as part of the royalty before income taxes;

(b) That in respect of any oil found outside the proven field the company may grant an option to the United States government to purchase 10 per cent thereof until the balance required to make up the total of 60 million barrels is reached after including that obtained from the proven field, and in respect to such balance the said government will take the same at the rate of 20 per cent of the total amount currently produced as in the case of the share coming from the proven field;

His excellency in council is further pleased, hereby, to authorize the Minister of Mines and Resources to prepare and submit for approval new petroleum and natural gas regulations for the Northwest Territories and Yukon Territory to provide for, among other things, the following:

(a) The granting of exploration permits for periods of three years renewable for a further period of three years;

(b) No permit shall exceed 256,000 acres and not more than eight permits shall be held by any one individual or company at one time. At the end of the first three year period anyone holding more than 1,000,000 acres under permit shall reduce the said excess by 20 per cent during the fourth year, by 30 per cent during the fifth year, and by 50 per cent during the sixth year, so that the total area shall not exceed 1,000,000 acres, and thereafter any permittee may obtain additional permits as long as the area held under permit at no time exceeds that amount, exclusive of the amount that may have been taken up under leases;

(c) During the first three years of the permit the holder shall expend in exploration works not less than the sum of 20 cents per acre, during the fourth year not less than 30 cents per acre, during the fifth year not less than 40 cents per acre and in the final year not less than 50 cents per acre;

(d) At the end of the sixth year, unless such time is extended in the discretion of the governor in council, the holder of permits may acquire leases up to 35 per cent of the area held under a permit or group of permits, provided however that the total area held under leases by any one person shall at no time exceed 350,000 acres;

(e) The leases to be issued shall be for a term of 21 years, renewable for further periods of 21 years;

(f) The rental shall be 50 cents an acre for the first year and thereafter $1 an acre. Credit for work done may be allowed against the rentals due for the first two years of the lease and when commercial exploitation commences royalties then payable may be credited on all rentals due over 50 cents an acre;

(g) Royalty payable to be 7½ per cent for the first five years after commercial exploitation has commenced, 10 per cent for the second five years and 12½ per cent thereafter, subject to the provision that where it is satisfactorily proven that the cost of producing oil or natural gas from the area covered by any lease or group of leases, including the amount paid in royalties, is such that the commercial exploitation thereof does not permit a reasonable profit on the capital invested therein, the governor in council may reduce the rate of royalty and likewise may increase it again up to the original level when the reasons for making the reduction no longer exist;—

That is a perfect guarantee of profit on the capital invested.

(h) The governor in council may determine the allowable production of any well or wells or of any field and regulate the taking of petroleum or natural gas so as to prevent waste and to ensure conservation in accordance with the best practice;

(i) The prices to be charged for petroleum products obtained from any lease, sold for use in the Northwest Territories and Yukon territory, shall be subject to the approval of the governor in council;

(j) Where no adequate existing facilities are available a lessee shall have the right to build and operate a pipeline to the nearest market and connecting feeder lines and for the purposes thereof shall be entitled to free right of way over crown lands and the use of public roads. The pipeline shall be operated as a common carrier under such regulations as the governor in council may impose.

(k) The government shall have the right of taking possession temporarily or permanently of all or any part of the areas held under permit or lease, together with all or any part of the improvements, buildings and equipment thereon and pipelines and feeder lines that any permittee or lessee has constructed, in which event the permittee or lessee shall be compensated therefor. Failing an agreement as to amount of compensation, it shall be fixed by the exchequer court.

Mr. HOWE: I hope the interjection by my hon. friend will not be taken as part of the order in council. He said something about a perfect guarantee of profit.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: I would not want that read as part of the order in council.

The question I should like to ask the minister is this. I do not think anyone in this house will question the part Canada should play or the contribution she should make to assist the war effort of the united nations. I do not think there will be any objection to Canada's resources being made available in the general pooling under lend-lease for the prosecution of the war, that we may make our contribution along with that of other countries.

If you will look over the exchange of notes between Canada and the United States which led up to the order in council, you will see that the United States was asking, so far as the Yukon is concerned, just for that portion which lies north of the 66th parallel. But the order in council hands over to them the rights of exploration and development in the whole Yukon territory and practically everything in the Northwest Territories west of a line parallel to the Mackenzie river and seventy-five miles east of it. What does the minister value these oil resources at? What are the Canadian people receiving out of these resources? The Canadian government can get one-third of the oil, for which it must pay exactly what it cost, plus a fee of 10 per cent. I maintain that the great natural resources of Canada are the birthright of the Canadian people, the birthright of the boys who are fighting on the war-fronts of the world to-day, and when they come back to Canada they expect to take part in the development of the natural resources of this country in the interests of all the people. But Canada and the United States have entered into this agreement with Imperial Oil of Canada, which is controlled by Standard Oil of New Jersey, and all the development rights are being handed over to that company. Why does the Canadian government not enter into an agreement with that company to use these resources for herself? She could provide the United States with all the oil she requires for war purposes in that area. I think the Canadian people are entitled to a statement from the minister as to the value of the resources handed over, the value of the resources remaining, and a statement as to why the resources were handed over. In my estimation this is stealing. I should like a statement from the minister as to Canada's contribution so far as the oil is concerned and what the Canadian people are to get out of it by handing over to that company one of our greatest birthrights.

Mr. CRERAR: I have endeavoured to follow the remarks of my hon. friend since he concluded reading the order in council and I am somewhat at a loss to know just what he has in mind. He inquires what the Canadian people will get out of these transactions. I think that is clearly set out in the order in council and in the regulations forecast in the order in council. How much the Canadian people may get out of it in the end, or how much anyone may get out of it in the end, depends upon factors of which at the moment we know nothing. If no additional oil were discovered in the Mackenzie river country, I would say that no one is going to get anything out of the development.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: Imperial Oil would not be drilling there and proving the field in that case. They have done some drilling and proving there.

[Mr. Castleden.]

Mr. CRERAR: My hon. friend has not got the matter right at all. The statement which I gave to the house on May 5 at the time the order in council was tabled outlined clearly all the circumstances that led up to the drilling and exploration which were carried on in the district around Fort Norman. If Japan and the United States had not gone to war, these resources would have been lying there just as they have been lying there for a hundred thousand years and would not have been developed beyond the limited development which Imperial Oil has carried on at Fort Norman. Away back in 1914 Imperial Oil secured the right to make certain explorations and got leases covering some 2,900 acres. They drilled some wells and found some oil, but that oil was 1,550 miles from Edmonton by the ordinary means of transport and over 1,100 miles by air. Consequently it was not an economic proposition to develop. They had put in a small refinery turning out a few hundred barrels of oil a day, which was processed and used for ordinary commercial purposes in the Mackenzie river district which it could serve. Later on, when the radium mines were developed at Bear lake, they expanded their plant to take care of the demand from the mining company for fuel oil, because all its power had to be produced by diesel engines and it was much more economical for the mining company to take oil up the Bear river and across Bear lake to Fort Norman than to transport oil from Edmonton, the nearest source of supply they had. That is what led to this limited development up to the outbreak of war.

But the outbreak of war changed the whole picture. Members of the committee are aware that when Japan attacked the United States fleet at Pearl Harbor a considerable part of the United States fleet was destroyed or damaged and there is no question that after Pearl Harbor Japan for a time had naval superiority in the Pacific ocean. Not only that, but Japan successfully attacked some of the Aleutian islands and for a time held them. It was the desire of the United States war chiefs, the combined chiefs of staff, that led to the development of supplies of oil for the defence of Alaska and northwestern Canada. They feared that coastal traffic might be interrupted through Japanese naval action. It was that which led to the building of the Alaska highway, to the creation of the air route from Edmonton north to Fairbanks, and those were the very same circumstances that led to the development of the oil resources at Fort Norman. The whole project was developed as a defensive measure. Of course, once they got oil at Fort Norman, it was necessary to transport it to the place where it was required. That necessitated the building of a pipeline from Norman Wells to Whitehorse in the Yukon, where it would connect with a line to Alaska. As part of a scheme to provide those supplies the United States authorities built the refinery at Whitehorse. This whole project was developed with the greatest possible speed. Hon. members are aware that for many months, until comparatively recent times, no public reference was made in newspapers or anywhere else to the developments which were taking place and which are now known as the Canol project. That secrecy was maintained for security reasons.

Information can be given here now because it has been publicly revealed in the United States. On the whole enterprise, the drilling, the transportation, the building of the pipeline and the building of the refinery at Whitehorse, the United States has spent something over $130,000,000.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: Does that include the highway?

Mr. CRERAR: No; that is just the Canol project alone. In laying a pipeline across rugged, mountainous country such as existed between Norman Wells and Whitehorse, transportation facilities had to be provided.

Mr. GRAYDON: How far is that?

Mr. MacNICOL: Four hundred miles.

Mr. CRERAR: It is more than that; it is about six hundred miles from Norman Wells to Whitehorse, right over the ridge of mountains. The difficulties were almost insuperable. I ask the committee to bear in mind that this country is in the very far north and it is expensive to provide transportation facilities. All the equipment for drilling, all the pipe, all the supplies needed to maintain the people who were doing the work had to be transported to Waterways by rail. It was then put on boats and taken down the Athabaska river, across the western part of lake Athabaska and down the Slave river to Fitzgerald. At that point every pound of freight had to be taken over a portage of sixteen miles from Fitzgerald to Fort Smith. At Fort Smith the supplies were loaded on barges and boats and taken down to Slave lake and across that body of water, which is rather difficult to navigate under some conditions, to the Mackenzie river. The supplies continued down the Mackenzie to the point where they were taken off the boats to be moved inland over the muskeg to the place where the drilling was done.

I know something of these difficulties because I visited that part of the country in August, 1942, when the work was being carried on with the greatest possible speed. The difficulties to be overcome were tremendous. When they got the pipe and other supplies as far as Norman, which is 1,550 miles from Edmonton by rail and water and portage, they had to be transported out along the pipeline toward Whitehorse. That involved building the type of road that would provide the necessary transportation facilities. As I say, the United States authorities spent an immense amount of money which in the aggregate, as reported to the Truman committee in Washington, amounted to $134,000,000.

The pipeline was a four-inch line. This size was adopted because it was easier to transport than it would have been to transport ten or twelve-inch pipe. This pipe was more readily obtainable because it did not require so much iron and steel which were very pressing needs at that particular time not only in the United States but in Canada. The four-inch pipeline was designed to handle about 3,000 barrels a day.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: In winter as well as in summer time?

Mr. CRERAR: Not so much in winter. I have not in mind at the moment what the winter capacity would be, but there is no doubt that the cold weather would interfere with the movement of oil and it would be substantially less. It was estimated that in the event of oil supplies to Alaska being shut off on the Pacific coast this pipeline would provide some of the necessary fuel for the defence of Alaska and northwestern Canada. Canada was vitally interested in seeing this work carried on because, if the Japanese had succeeded in overrunning Alaska and had got into northwestern Canada, we would have had a serious problem on our hands.

Consequently, when the United States made these proposals the Canadian government accepted them. This is all set out in the exchange of notes which were tabled in this house from time to time as soon as they could be. I want to impress upon the committee that this work was purely a defensive measure in our war effort. The picture has changed since. The Japanese are out of the Aleutian islands and the allied nations have increased their strength on the Pacific tremendously. The United States alone has naval forces in the Pacific which are more than a match for Japan. Consequently the danger of an interruption in gasoline supplies by the Aleutians and Alaska being overrun has pretty well disappeared.

The need which led to this project being undertaken no longer existed and it then became a matter of making adjustments and getting a new arrangement with the United States. Once the defensive need had disappeared the United States were not anxious to continue exploring for oil up in our northwestern country. They desired to get out and I think the general Canadian point of view was that the United States interest in the development of these resources should be concluded. That is what was being done by the arrangements to which my hon. friend takes such serious exception.

Mr. GREEN: Are they not still operating the pipeline?

Mr. CRERAR: They will operate the pipeline as long as the war lasts?

Mr. GREEN: And the refinery?

Mr. CRERAR: Quite. I am speaking of the exploration work and drilling for oil. With the drilling of some more wells in the proven field there is enough oil available to meet the requirements of the present pipeline. If hon. members are interested and will refer to the exchange of notes they will find there set out the basis for the final liquidation of the arrangement when the war is over.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: I do not find any such thing. I do not know the terms for the liquidation of this after the war is over. I have here the notes for December 28 and those in February and March. They do not deal with the matter.

Mr. CRERAR: If my hon. friend will refer to the notes which were tabled—I cannot give him the date but they are in the records of the house—he will find a provision set out for the termination of the arrangement once the war is over.

Mr. GREEN: In effect they give the Canadian government first option.

Mr. CRERAR: Yes; the Canadian government is given first option on the pipeline, as I recall. If they do not wish to buy it, then it can be put up to auction. I have here the United States note.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: What is the date of that?

Mr. CRERAR: June 27, 1942. In the exchange of notes I find this from the United States Secretary of State:

My government further proposes that the pipeline and the refinery shall remain its property, and shall be operated under contracts with it or by its agents or representatives during the war. It further proposes that at the termination of hostilities the pipeline and refinery shall be valued by two valuers, of whom one shall be named by the United States and one by Canada, with power, if they disagree, to appoint an umpire. The valuation shall be based upon the then commercial value of the pipeline and the refinery, and the Canadian government shall be given the first option to purchase at the amount of the valuation. If the option is not exercised within three months, they may be offered for sale by public tender, with the amount of the valuation as the reserve price. In the event that neither the Canadian government nor any private company desires to purchase the pipeline and refinery at the agreed price, the disposition of both facilities shall be referred to the permanent joint board on defence for consideration and recommendation.

Additionally, it is proposed that both governments agree that they will not themselves order or allow the dismantling of either the pipeline or the refinery, nor will they allow any company which purchases them so to do, unless and until approval for dismantlement is recommended by the permanent joint board on defence.

It is understood that if the pipeline and refinery are at any time used for commercial purposes they will be subject to such regulations and conditions as the Canadian government may consider it necessary to impose in order to safeguard the public interest.

That is the clause in the exchange of notes which provides for the final termination of the arrangement under which the United States authorities came in to secure these very necessary and pressing supplies of oil as regarded at that time.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: That has to do only, I believe, with the disposal of the pipeline. It does not deal with the permit for the production and development of oil over that whole area. That is what I was talking about.

Mr. CRERAR: I might read a portion of the note which has to do with the question just asked by my hon. friend:

My government,—

This is the United States minister, for his Secretary of State, speaking.

—faced with the necessity of obtaining an increased fuel supply without delay, desires to propose the following project:

That it (a) make surveys and construct a pipeline either by United States army engineers or by contract, of a size sufficient to deliver three thousand barrels of oil daily from Norman Wells, Northwest Territories, Canada to Whitehorse, Yukon Territory, Canada; (b) sign a contract with a Canadian company to drill additional wells, upon its leases obtained under the petroleum and natural gas regulations applicable to dominion lands or upon permits obtained by it under the oil and gas regulations covering land in the vicinity of Norman Wells. Under this contract the United States War Department would provide the necessary equipment and would purchase the total flow of the additional wells during the war at an agreed price. The wells would remain part of the leasehold or permit property of the Canadian company and would be regarded as having been drilled under the provisions of the dominion regulations noted in this clause.

In the next paragraph it speaks of the refinery. The Imperial Oil company, as was stated earlier, had already drilled wells in the district of Fort Norman—as a matter of fact they are about forty miles down the river from Fort Norman—and had secured limited quantities of oil. The geologists thought more oil could be secured, and it was on the basis of that possibility that the United States entered into this arrangement. The result was that they provided the equipment and, I understand, provided the company with the means of carrying on drilling operations. In view of this arrangement, special war-time regulations were issued covering it. If the United States government proposed to advance moneys to the Imperial Oil company, and wells were drilled and oil was found at practically no expense to the Imperial Oil company, the Canadian government—I made the recommendation to the government myself—thought the new regulations should apply. Consequently war-time regulations were promulgated, and under the war-time regulations the government were entitled to share equally in whatever assets developed. The war-time regulations were published in the Canada Gazette, I am told, in January, 1943; at any rate they were tabled.

Mr. GREEN: Is that P.C. 742?

Mr. CRERAR: P.C. 742.

We come now to the stage where new arrangements have to be made. I can quite understand the position taken by my hon. friend, and I do not quarrel with him. In the speech he delivered he has not suggested what policy the government should have followed. He criticizes it for giving away vast resources, but I submit that his criticism is not tenable. We have not given the resources away. We have provided for the development of these oil resources on terms which we think are fair and equitable and which protect the public interest. I assume, and perhaps I am wrong, that my hon. friend's contention would be that the government should have gone into this development as a government enterprise. I should like him to say now whether or not that is his contention.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: I am a believer in government enterprise in a thing of this kind. The oil as a natural resource belongs to the Canadian people; but since under the war set-up you have decided to go ahead with the development of it, seeing that Imperial Oil is already in the field, and since you are doing something that is essential for the prosecution of the war, we have no quarrel with that. But we do quarrel with the fact that under the order in council the permit to go on with the development of these resources after the war is continued and the rights for the development, exploration and the taking of oil and selling it, are now in the hands of the Imperial Oil company, which is owned by the Standard Oil Company of New Jersey. What Canada gets out of these resources is too little for the resources that are being handed over. We can estimate Canada's share in the United States government's expenditure, and let Canada take her fair proportion. We have no quarrel with that. But under this arrangement, all the oil development rights, the permits, will continue with the Imperial Oil, and what Canada gets out of one of her great natural resources is not sufficient. I maintain that you have made a bad bargain.

Mr. CRERAR: I want to continue the discussion along the line I was taking. I think I understand my hon. friend's position. There are two approaches to this question. He can say that we are not providing for sufficient royalties, or that we are not providing for sufficient revenue to the crown from the development of these resources; or he can take the other line and say that we should not have had an arrangement at all with a private company. That, I gather, is the position he takes, that the government should have developed this as a government enterprise. That is quite in accord with the policy of the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation party. They have never disguised the fact, and I do not find fault with it. They have a perfect right to advocate that. But what I am trying to get at is what is really in issue here so far as my hon. friend is concerned. It is not the kind of arrangement that we made with the Imperial Oil company but the fact that we made any arrangement at all with them, and that the whole oil development that may ensue in the future in northwestern Canada should be a government-owned, controlled and operated development. I do not think I am presuming too much in saying that.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: I did not say you should not have entered into an agreement with them. I say you made a bad bargain with them.

Mr. CRERAR: Is my hon. friend going back on the socialist principles of the party which he adorns?

Mr. CASTLEDEN: Not at all. As a war measure, you had the Imperial Oil in the field already there, developing, and probably under the circumstances you could not change overnight. But I am saying that once you have asked them to go into the exploring field—and the United States government is assisting them, and apparently it will not cost them very much—then Canada should pay her proportionate share of the cost, because the defence of Alaska is part of the defence of Canada, since we are under a lease-lend agreement in this matter. But after the war is over you have handed over the rights for developing that oil in the Yukon and in the oil-bearing territories in the northwest.

Mr. CRERAR: Handed them to whom?

Mr. CASTLEDEN: Imperial Oil, under this agreement.

Mr. CRERAR: No.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: The rights and the permit continue.

Mr. CRERAR: My hon. friend should really study the orders in council, and the statements that have been tabled, a little more thoroughly We do not hand over to the Imperial Oil company all the areas to which my hon. friend refers.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: For exploration.

Mr. CRERAR: No, not for exploration.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: Read the order in council.

Mr. CRERAR: That is not contemplated at all. Nothing in the order in council that was tabled, nothing in the statement that I made to the house on May 5, can by any stretch of the imagination be construed into such a position. I suggest to my hon. friend that he should study this whole matter objectively and not approach it—am I unfair in saying so?—from a certain angle of prejudice. I want to come back to the other point. I do not know whether my hon. friend is finding fault at the moment with the agreement or the arrangement we have made with the Imperial Oil company.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: Yes; that is right. I am.

Mr. CRERAR: Then, so far as this oil development is concerned, my hon. friend is not at the moment advocating that the government should have gone into it as a government enterprise, putting in public money and developing it as a public undertaking.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: It would be a splendid post-war project.

Mr. CRERAR: My hon. friend is hedging a little bit on that.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: No, I am not.

Mr. KNOWLES: May I ask the minister whether any discussion was had with Wartime Oils Limited with reference to the matter?

Mr. CRERAR: With whom?

Mr. KNOWLES: With Wartime Oils Limited, a crown company.

Mr. CRERAR: The Minister of Munitions and Supply can give more information on that than I can, but Wartime Oils was a government company formed to do certain drilling, to provide the finances in order to drill for oil in certain areas, where oil was likely to be found. But that has nothing to do with the point we are discussing.

Mr. KNOWLES: I am asking whether consideration was given to Wartime Oils going into the matter.

Mr. CRERAR: Perhaps the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre will enlighten the committee as to the kind of development the government should have undertaken. Does he object to our making an arrangement with the Imperial Oil company for development in that particular area? Does he criticize the government on the ground that it should have developed this resource as a public enterprise with government money? I ask my hon. friend frankly, does he take that position?

Mr. KNOWLES: I do not mind answering the question straightforwardly. I feel that the proposal which the minister has suggested would have been the better one, but knowing that this government would not consider that, that the government preferred to deal with a private company, we are nevertheless exercising our right to criticize the deal made with that company.

Mr. CRERAR: Quite right.

Mr. KNOWLES: Knowing that the government will not go forward to the position that we would like them to take, it does not rule out of court our criticizing the agreement made.

Mr. CRERAR: My hon. friend is quite right. I do not deny that for a moment. He is quite right in criticizing the government for making, from his point of view, an improvident arrangement so far as the public interest is concerned. That is his privilege.

Mr. KNOWLES: You have put it in the correct language.

Mr. CRERAR: Well, we can argue it out on that basis. But before I pass to that I must offer the reflection that my hon. friends of the C.C.F. are apparently moving from the socialization of all public enterprises, because I saw not very long ago that the hon. member for Yorkton, if I remember correctly, was advocating that all the mines and timber industries in Canada should be nationalized, and that everything indeed in Canada excepting perhaps some small businesses and farm lands should be brought under some great master plan, organized and developed for the benefit of the Canadian people. I take it to-day that in so far as their criticism of the government's proposal in this respect is concerned they are not occupying that ground.

Mr. KNOWLES: If the minister thinks he is forcing us into an awkward position let me assure him he is totally mistaken.

Mr. FRASER (Peterborough West): The hon. member is already in it.

Mr. KNOWLES: We have every right to state what we believe to be our position. After we have done that, knowing there is not a great deal of chance of getting this government to take that position, we then try to get this government to do certain things which we feel are not inconsistent with the position of moving in the direction of proper protection of the public interest. That is the position we take with respect to this matter. We do not waste the time of the committee arguing the position that we feel should be taken in this matter, because we know the government would not pay very close attention to it, but we consider that we are justified in criticizing and that it is our duty to criticize the government at least on the basis of the government's own philosophy in these matters, and I believe that is what my colleague from Yorkton was doing.

Mr. CRERAR: We shall now proceed to discuss the arrangement.

Mr. FRASER (Peterborough West): Is there not every chance in the world of the Imperial Oil company losing out on this project? There are many chances that Imperial Oil may lose out on this project.

Mr. CRERAR: I would think there is a very considerable chance of their losing out.

Mr. FRASER (Peterborough West): That is what I wanted the minister to say. Is it not also true that practically every workman of the Imperial Oil company owns stock of that company?

Mr. CRERAR: I could not say that; I have no information on that point. If I may say so, I do not know that that is germane to the discussion we are having at the moment.

The statement that was read to the house on May 5 and the order in council which the hon. member for Yorkton placed upon Hansard—really I do not wish to be critical, but I do not know why my hon. friend did that, because the order in council was tabled and has been available to every member of the committee—

Mr. CASTLEDEN: But not to the Canadian people.

Mr. CRERAR: Of course, if my friend wishes to send Hansard out to a number of his friends perhaps it is justified on that account. They can read the order in council; but what arrangement was made? First, take the province of Alberta. Alberta operates on oil royalties. Any oil development that I have known anywhere in the world—I will except Russia because at the moment I do not know just what the practice was there—was on the basis of royalties in some cases, plus a ground rental per acre of the areas covered by leases. That royalty in Alberta runs from five to fifteen per cent. The ground rental for the leases, once they are taken up is, I understand, fifty cents an acre and upwards. In the United States the average oil royalties are 12½ per cent. Our information is that in south American countries the royalties are the same. In Alaska the United States fixed a royalty rate of 6¼ per cent on any oil to be found there. These are regulations that were promulgated some considerable time ago.

I mention that background simply to indicate to the committee that the practice generally in all oil-producing companies, not only in Canada, but in other countries, has been to get revenue from the development through the imposition of royalties and ground rentals. That is precisely the principle that we have applied in the Mackenzie river area.

Mr. GREEN: What about the special provision for reducing the royalty in the event of a company not making a profit?

Mr. CRERAR: Oh, well, regulations will provide that royalties may be reduced. After you impose a flat royalty of fifteen per cent and you come to a point in taking the oil from the well that it does not pay to take it out because of the excess of royalty, if you reduce the royalty, say to five per cent, you enable the well to have a longer life, and that, I am advised, is the advantage of a fluctuating rate of royalty. That can be determined by the authorities of whatever government is dealing with the matter, whether provincial or federal.

As regards the set-up in the Mackenzie river country I would ask the committee to keep in mind that it was all set out in the statements which were tabled in the order in council. There are two areas to which I wish to draw particular attention. One is described as the proven area. The proven area consists of approximately five thousand acres; but in that proven area is included the original wells of the Imperial Oil company drilled under licences which they secured over twenty years ago.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: Estimated to contain about sixty million barrels of oil.

Mr. CRERAR: Not on the proven areas. Opinions of geologists differ. The geologists have some formula from the study of drilling cores—

Mr. CASTLEDEN: I read that in the order in council.

Mr. CRERAR: It states from thirty to sixty million barrels. Oil geologists differ in the estimate of the amount of oil in this proven area of five thousand acres. Part of the oil that will be produced comes from the original licences held by the Imperial Oil company. The remainder of it, which the geologists estimate roughly at two-thirds, will come from the remaining area which Imperial Oil secured under its arrangement with the United States or drilled under its arrangement with the United States.

Outside of this particular area Imperial Oil have taken up under permit under the war-time regulations the remainder of the 140,000 acres. Some drilling has been done on that, but so far no oil has been struck. We proposed that in so far as the proven area is concerned, where we know there is an estimate of from thirty to sixty million barrels, we shall retain one-third of the oil. That is provided in the arrangement.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: It would be more correct to say that we reserve the right to purchase it at cost plus ten per cent.

Mr. CRERAR: Yes; but how is that different from the statement I made?

Mr. CASTLEDEN: I thought you said we retained one-third of the oil.

Mr. CRERAR: Yes; one-third of it is ours to do with as we like.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: If we pay for it.

Mr. CRERAR: We pay the cost of producing it, plus the management fee of ten per cent, so that we have that. On the oil produced by Imperial Oil which it sells on its own account, it pays a royalty; and it also pays a royalty on the amount coming from the proven area which may go to the United States.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: That is a royalty of five per cent?

Mr. CRERAR: Yes.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: Is that on the selling price?

[Mr. Crerar.]

Mr. CRERAR: The royalty is calculated on the value of the oil as it comes from the well.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: That is, the company's cost price; what it costs the company?

Mr. CRERAR: It is what it is worth when it comes from the well, not what it is worth if you transport it a thousand miles and sell it.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: It is the selling price at the well.

Mr. CRERAR: Probably that would be a correct description. Then, because the Imperial Oil company derived certain advantages under the arrangement it made with the United States, we provided for a scale of royalties which, once licences are secured, go up every five years. For the first five years I think it is 7⅓ per cent, for the second five years 10 per cent, and thereafter 12½ per cent. In addition, once they secure their leases, ground rental on these properties commences.

There is one other point with which I wish to deal; that is, the extravagant statement by the hon. member for Yorkton that we were alienating all these resources to the Imperial Oil company. It is expressly stated in the order in council and in the regulations that there shall be a limit to the number and extent of the acreage that can be held by any one company.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: Limited to a million acres.

Mr. CRERAR: No; it is less than that. In the first place they get a permit to explore; that is the initial step, and that permit may cover two million acres. After a few years that is reduced, and finally it is brought down to the point where they have to say whether or not they are going to take out leases. Once they take out leases the maximum amount they can get is 350,000 acres. So that when my hon. friend states that we have given these vast areas to Imperial Oil, I must assume that he has not closely read—

Mr. CASTLEDEN: Yes, I have read it all.

Mr. CRERAR:—the proposals that we submitted. When the leases are taken out there is provision for ground rental. That is simply to encourage development.

Then I wish to go one step further and deal with another matter, namely, the arrangement which the government agreed could be made between Imperial Oil and the United States. There is a variation here from the original exchange of notes but, as I stated earlier in my remarks, the United States has spent about $134,000,000 on this project. As a result of that expenditure undoubtedly Canada has secured the development, possibly in a very large, commercial way, of the oil resources of that part of the country, should oil resources be discovered there. So that we provided that the United States should be compensated for the expenditure they have incurred, by saying that under certain conditions they may be entitled to obtain up to sixty million barrels of oil. That oil is for the use of the United States government, for army, navy or air force purposes; they cannot resell that oil, and it has to be taken currently, when production starts. Under the arrangement they have to pay Imperial Oil the cost of bringing the oil to the surface and I think a fee of 20 cents a barrel, which is roughly one-half cent a gallon. There is nothing mysterious about that. Does anyone here think the government should not have taken this step? Will anyone in this committee claim that after the United States had gone in to develop these resources—true, for their own defence but for the defence of Canada as well—we should say, "No; now your expenditure must go for naught." No one would support that view for a moment. I say that this government, and I think the Canadian people generally, want to maintain good relations with the United States. In our international dealings with that country we want to be fair and we want them to be fair, and within the last few years I think a great deal of progress has been made in that direction.

My hon. friend criticized our arrangement with Imperial Oil on the ground that it is too generous. Let us look at a few of the factors in this situation. Once more I would remind the committee that this oil development is 1,550 miles by rail and water from Edmonton, or almost 1,200 miles in an air line, and that the oil has to be transported from Norman Wells, not very far from the arctic circle, to a market where it can be consumed. What expense is involved in that? The present four-inch pipeline is not a commercial proposition at all. It is estimated that if sufficient quantities of oil were found, at least a ten-inch and probably a twelve-inch pipeline would have to be laid in order to make the proposition commercially practicable. Therefore, what must be done? First, there must be drilling to determine whether there is sufficient oil to warrant the building of a twelve-inch pipeline to seaboard, the cost of which is estimated at $60,000,000. It is further estimated that it will be necessary to discover reserves of 300,000,000 barrels of oil before it would be feasible to build a pipeline that large. So that we had these alternatives. Either the government could go in and risk that amount of money, taking a chance on marketing the product afterwards, or we could make an arrangement with a private company along the lines indicated in the statement I read to the house, and in the order in council my hon. friend read this afternoon. I do not think there can be any serious criticism of the arrangement the government proposes to make. We want to get the oil resources developed. There has been a good deal of talk in recent months about the depletion of the oil resources of the world. To-day we draw eighty-five per cent of our oil requirements from the United States. What would the United States authorities think of us if Canada were to take the position that we are not going to do anything so far as developing oil is concerned but were going to depend upon the United States to supply us with oil.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: We can supply our own needs if we develop the sands in that north country.

Mr. CRERAR: The California fields are growing less. Ultimately this development may lead to the supplying of Alaska, British Columbia and the Pacific states with their requirements. We have also a better assurance with this development of securing the needs of eastern Canada for oil. My hon. friend asks: Why do you not take this oil down to the prairies?

Mr. CASTLEDEN: I say that we have oil in Canada. Why not develop it?

Mr. CRERAR: Let my hon. friend reflect for a moment what would be involved in his proposal. There would be involved the building of a pipeline to Edmonton, a distance of at least 1,200 miles, and probably 1,400 miles by the route that would have to be followed.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: You can take it out to the coast.

Mr. CRERAR: Certainly; that is what we propose to do under this arrangement. But Standard Oil controls it.

The ACTING CHAIRMAN (Mr. Golding): I must ask the hon. member for Yorkton to address the Chair if he wishes to speak.

Mr. CRERAR: There is just one other point I would mention. Under these proposals the regulations will apply generally. There are no reservations for Imperial Oil, other than the areas they now hold and referred to in the order in council. Any person who has the capital and wishes to go in there and take the risk can go in there and prospect and develop, but he cannot secure in excess of the amount that I mentioned a moment ago.

Mr. GREEN: Can a pipeline be used by any other company?

Mr. CRERAR: I was just going to mention that. We contemplate that when a pipeline is built either by Imperial Oil, or by any other company or association of companies, that pipeline must be a common carrier and its charges subject to public regulation.

Mr. GREEN: Does that apply to the present pipeline?

Mr. CRERAR: No, because that is not a commercial proposition. It exists merely to get the oil through for military purposes. But a commercial pipeline must be a common carrier and be subject to control by public regulation.

There is one clause of the order in council which I should point out to the hon. member for Yorkton. He must surely have overlooked it. It is a clause that should bring cheers from our hon. friends in the C.C.F. It is the concluding clause of P.C. 2904, which reads:

> The government shall have the right of taking possession temporarily or permanently of all or any part of the areas held under permit or lease, together with all or any part of the improvements, buildings and equipment thereon and pipelines and feeder lines that any permittee or lessee has constructed, in which event the permittee or lessee shall be compensated therefor. Failing an agreement as to amount of compensation it shall be fixed by the exchequer court.

It might happen down the vista of years that our C.C.F. friends might one day have the responsibility of office.

Mr. GRAYDON: Perish the thought.

Mr. CRERAR: If ever they should have, this provision is in the regulations for them to take advantage of if they so desire. I apologize Mr. Chairman, for having taken up so much time, but it is a complicated matter.

Mr. GRAYDON: The minister is more optimistic about the C.C.F chances than most people.

Mr. BLACK (Yukon): It may interest the committee to know that on the first of this month I took part in the ceremony of the official opening of the oil refinery at Whitehorse to which the oil which has been discussed this afternoon is being piped for refining. I remember well when the discovery of oil in the vicinity of Fort Norman was made thirty years ago. At that time I happened to be Commissioner of the Yukon, and I know that gold miners from the Yukon valley made their way across the divide into the Mackenzie valley and staked out oil leases on that discovery. For the most part they snowshoed out of the valley of the Yukon over the watershed and down into the Mackenzie, where they staked out their leases.

When I returned to Canada after the war and came here as a member of parliament, the holders of these oil rights, not having capital to develop them themselves and not being able to interest capital in their development, put it up to me to deal with the government of that day to extend the terms of their leases so that they could continue to hold them without having to do the development work and make the substantial expenditure called for by the terms of the leases. The government extended the time. But finally the time came when they would no longer allow that to go on. They were reasonable enough. It had to come to an end some time.

The Imperial Oil company, which had acquired some of the oil reserves, because of their isolation and distance from the market, had to cap the three wells they had, and the wells lay there dormant until mine development began at Great Bear lake and at Yellowknife, and then a little oil was used.

Then came Pearl Harbor and the Americans had to have oil. They thought the Japanese might take possession of the coast of Alaska and the coast of British Columbia. Oil could not be got to Alaska by tankers because the submarines were attending to that. So that the United States came in, and they have spent $134,000,000 in exploring those oil resources for Canada. Fortunately the exigencies of war never made that oil necessary for war purposes. But the Americans put in a four-inch pipeline from Norman Wells to Whitehorse and extended it from Whitehorse to Fairbanks, and from Whitehorse to the coast, to Skagway, Alaska. As the minister said, that four-inch pipeline is too small for a commercial undertaking.

I only hope that the development of the wells at Norman will be sufficiently extensive to make it a successful commercial undertaking. I for one would not approve the Canadian government going in there and spending anything like $134,000,000 in exploring that oil deposit as the United States have done. We had the experience not long ago of the government of British Columbia spending a huge amount of public money on drilling in the Peace River block. They lost it all; they have no oil. I do not think public money should be gambled in that way.

When I first read the agreement and heard the minister give his explanation of it a month or so ago I felt that the terms granted to Imperial Oil were somewhat too generous. When you take into account the risks that that company has taken, similar to what the United States has taken, and the returns that are bound to accrue to Canada if the gamble is a success, then I think we should compliment the government on the agreement they made.

Mr. SISSONS: Mr. Chairman, I should like to support the remarks of the hon. member for Yukon and express my appreciation of the excellent manner in which he delivered them. I wish also to dissent and join issue with the remarks of the hon. member for Yorkton. I do not think Imperial Oil has been given any undue advantage under this order in council. I am not particularly interested in theories or in the relative merits of public or private ownership, but I am interested in the results that are obtained. I want to see action in the north country; I want to see developments. I want to see this government give every encouragement to Imperial Oil and to any other oil company that wishes to go into that country. I want to see this government give every encouragement to every mining company, every prospector, every fisherman, every farmer and every other corporation or person who want to help to develop that Mackenzie river valley.

I am not worried about Imperial Oil making any undue profit or of retaining that profit after they have paid income tax. Any profit they may be able to make will be small compared with the benefits that will accrue to Canada as a whole from this development. There are not only oil resources to be developed; there are minerals in the Great Slave and Great Bear lakes areas; there is fishing; there is agriculture, and there are many other types of development that can be carried on. A balanced and orderly development of these resources will mean the production of new wealth and an increase in the national income of Canada.

There will be provided opportunities for thousands of Canadians, particularly for our returned men. These are the things in which I am interested. I want to see a real development in that north country. I particularly want to see that development because it will mean the development of the northern part of the constituency of Peace River. It means also that there will be created in the great north land a market for the produce of the Peace river country.

My hon. friends of the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation party are claiming that Imperial Oil is a monopoly. I do not like monopolies. I do not like private monopolies, nor do I like public monopolies. I know I would not like the kind of monopoly we would have if my hon. friends were in power. While I dislike monopolies, it is not an obsession with me. Monopolies seem to be an absolute obsession with my hon. friends, and yet at the same time they admire monopolies. They contend that monopolies make huge profits, but I cannot see that they do. I do not think monopolies are very efficient. Like most giants they grow slow and sluggish, whether they are private or public monopolies. I certainly do not fear monopolies because as long as we have a free parliament we can deal with them. But what we would not be able to deal with is the type of monopoly my hon. friends of the C.C.F. would create if they were in power.

Some weeks ago we dealt with what might be termed a monopoly in the form of Canadian Pacific Air Lines. We passed legislation which practically wiped that company out of existence and there was not one voice in this house raised in protest. We can deal with monopolies. I think there is some indication that monopolies are rather defenseless when they come up against public opinion.

My criticism is not that the department is doing too much for Imperial Oil; it is that the department is not doing enough for the development of the north country. The department is too much inclined to pay attention to such carping criticism as we have heard this afternoon from the hon. member for Yorkton. The greatest blow that the north country ever received in the past, the greatest handicap it had to overcome was such carping criticism. Probably it will be the greatest handicap the north country will have to face in the future.

Somebody has mentioned the possibility of a pipeline from Fort Norman to the south. In 1921 a private bill was submitted to the Alberta legislature to incorporate the Imperial Pipeline company. In 1920 Imperial Oil brought in a producing well at Fort Norman and they submitted this bill to permit the building of a pipeline south through Alberta. What happened? A tremendous filibuster was opened up and arguments much along the lines of those used by my hon. friends were advanced. It was said that Imperial Oil was a monopoly and the filibuster was kept up from some time in February until late in April. Not only that, but attacks against the bill were carried on throughout the province and in the press.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: By whom?

Mr. SISSONS: By people with exactly the same attitude of mind as my hon. friend, men who would rather adopt a policy of cutting off their noses to spite their faces than to see a development carried on by what they termed a monopoly. On the last day of the session the premier of Alberta read a telegram which he had received from Mr. Herbert Greenfield, president of the United Farmers of Alberta, protesting emphatically against the passing of the bill and demanding that it be withdrawn. The bill was withdrawn under this pressure and the house rose the next day.

A few weeks later the government went to the country and were defeated. A U.F.A. government came into power, headed by the same Herbert Greenfield. For a period of fourteen years, from 1921 to 1935, the U.F.A. government was in power in Alberta. Toward the end of its career that government was affiliated with the C.C.F. movement, and in 1935 went to the country calling itself a C.C.F. government. That was the opposition which was offered to the attempt to construct a pipeline from Fort Norman to the central part of Alberta.

At six o'clock the committee took recess.

After Recess

The committee resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. SISSONS: Mr. Chairman, in my remarks before six o'clock I think I made it clear that I am not especially interested in any academic debate on the relative merits of public and private enterprise. I stated that I was very much interested in the development of all the great and varied resources of the north land, and would favour even more generous treatment, not only of the Imperial Oil company but of every corporation and every individual prepared to play a part in the development of any of those resources; and that I deplored the reactionary ideas and the defeatist philosophy of the hon. member for Yorkton and his friends. I pointed out that the attitude of the hon. member and those who think like him is the greatest handicap that the north country has had and has to overcome, and I went on to show how a similar attitude had held up the development of the oil resources of that great land in times gone by. I pointed out that in 1921, when the bill to incorporate the Imperial Pipelines company was before the Alberta legislature as a private measure, it was defeated by a filibuster directed largely by men who thought as the hon. member for Yorkton thinks, and by pressure from outside the house of those who held similar ideas.

I wish to make only a very few further remarks regarding that debate in the Alberta legislature some twenty years ago. During the course of that debate the late Hon. J. R. Boyle pointed out what the obstructionist tactics would result in, and Mr. Boyle wanted to know if the Imperial Oil company were to be told that they were free to spend vast sums of money in exploration work but that if oil was found they were not to pipe it out. That is exactly the attitude which was taken in Alberta; the Imperial Oil company were in effect called upon to spend their millions on exploration work, but if they did find oil they were not to be allowed to pipe it out. Probably a more significant statement was made during the course of that debate by Mr. R. B. Eaton, one of the members. Mr. Eaton stated that "the question of oil development should be carefully taken into account, because the oil resources of the north might easily be diverted to British Columbia if Alberta placed impossible barriers in the way of companies planning development." Back in 1921 Alberta did place impossible barriers in the way of a pipeline from the Fort Norman field to Alberta, and you see the results to-day. That oil is not being diverted, as Mr. Eaton thought it might be, to British Columbia, but it is being diverted to the Yukon, and to Skagway in the United States territory. That is a penalty the provincial government of Alberta paid for giving attention to the carping criticism of men who in Alberta at that time thought and uttered the thoughts which the hon. member for Yorkton has uttered this afternoon.

As mentioned, in 1921 the government then in office was defeated and a U.F.A. government came into power. That government was in power from 1921 to 1935, and during its whole term of office very little encouragement was given to the development of the north land, particularly that part of the north land which lies in the Peace River constituency north of the Peace river. The development of that area, particularly the fertile territory north of the river in the district of Fort Vermilion, was retarded, and retarded deliberately. I do not make that statement concerning the late U.F.A. government because it was a United Farmers of Alberta government or because its philosophy was largely that of my friends of the C.C.F. To a less degree the same thing must be said of the present Social Credit government of Alberta, and I would ask my hon. friends of the Social Credit party not to take offence, because I would say the same thing largely of the government I support. I do not believe that either the old U.F.A. government of Alberta, the present Social Credit government of Alberta, or any federal government of Canada has ever given the encouragement which should have been given to the development of that north land. I admit that the present government has done some things, but it has done far too little. It has been content more or less to make gestures. I am not unmindful that the Department of Mines and Resources has done a good work in regard to geological surveys. I am not unmindful that an important forward step was taken when the air fields in the Mackenzie river valley were taken over by the government. I am not unmindful of the good which will result from the civil aviation policy announced some weeks ago by this government respecting the opening up of that north land. I am not unmindful of the assistance which was given by the dominion and provincial governments toward the construction of the winter road from Grimshaw to the north in order to open up that territory. But I still say that no government, provincial or federal, has done more than a small part of what should have been done to open up that empire of the north.

I do not ask that governments should do a great deal, but I ask that they should do things which only governments can do, and these they have not done. If the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre lived in the Peace river country he would not be so complimentary to public ownership, its performances and its possibilities. All governments have failed in their duty to encourage this development.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): The Canadian Pacific Railway company has done a good job.

Mr. SISSONS: The Canadian Pacific Railway company did no job toward the development of the north country, nor did the Canadian National Railways. I shall have something to say about that a little later.

I believe that a great part of the development of the north country in the future as in the past will be brought about by men and not by governments. Men with the blood of the pioneers have brought about the present development of the agricultural lands of the Fort Vermilion district, where there are now 3,000 settlers, still 250 miles beyond the railway. I am not unmindful of those mining pioneers who have pioneered in the lake Athabaska, the Great Slave lake and the Great Bear lake districts. I am not unmindful of the pioneer work done by the Imperial Oil company. I am not unmindful of those young pioneering pilots who blazed air trails through all the north land. These are the men who have brought about our present development. It will be men of that type who will bring about the great development of that country in the future. But there are some things which governments and only governments can do, and it is these things which I want the government to do. Years ago the Alberta government should have built a highway from Grimshaw up through that fertile Fort Vermilion country. That has not been done. Our own federal government should do certain things. They should give greater assistance to those who wish to play a part in the development of the north land, much greater assistance than they are giving to the Imperial Oil company. They should provide markets for the produce which that vast country can provide. Especially, they should provide railway transportation for that north country.

The hon. member for St. Paul's mentioned a moment ago the Canadian Pacific Railway company, but I wish to deal for a moment with the Canadian National Railways. That whole northland was the territory of the Canadian National Railways. The Canadian National had that territory for years and never developed it, and it allowed the Canadian Pacific to come in and take over, under lease, the Northern Alberta railway. The Canadian Pacific did nothing toward developing that territory. Later the Canadian Pacific Railway company and the Canadian National Railways jointly purchased the Northern Alberta railway and came to this parliament and had passed the Northern Alberta Railway Act which provided among other powers that a branch line should be constructed from Grimshaw to the northern boundary of the province. That is a line which would have opened up the Mackenzie river valley. That was in 1929 and not one foot of the line has been built since.

Now we find both the Canadian Pacific Railway company and the Canadian National Railways, joint owners of the road, coming forward with this proposition, that they should not be asked to build one mile of railway into any part of that north country until there has been developed sufficient traffic that it can pay a profit from the commencement. That is the attitude of the Canadian Pacific and the Canadian National. Now I am going to ask the government to do several things, but one thing in particular I do ask is that they go to the Canadian National Railways and the Canadian Pacific Railway company and put the situation up to them in this way: "Either you people do your duty and develop that north country, giving it the transportation which it was understood you would give it when this parliament passed the Northern Alberta Railway Act in 1929, or we shall ask parliament to repeal that act and hand the assets of the Northern Alberta railway over to someone who has a wider vision and who is prepared to play the necessary part in the development of that north country."

All I ask is that this government and the provincial government have vision when it comes to the development of that north land, and particularly that this government pay no attention to such carping criticism as has been uttered this afternoon by the hon. member for Yorkton. Let the government pay no attention to such things but branch out on a programme of development for that whole north land which will repay itself many times over. Branch out on a programme of development which will produce new wealth, add to the national income of Canada and bring a greater measure of prosperity to Canadians in that area and in all parts of Canada.

That is what I ask. I also ask for even a larger measure of support than is contemplated in the vote. Let us help all those who would have a part in that northern development.

Mr. MacNICOL: We have had two really interesting addresses to-day, one of them delivered by the hon. member for Peace River (Mr. Sissons). While most of what he has said in the last half of his remarks has nothing whatever to do with the vote, I endorse every word he said about the north country and I agree with him in that regard. The other address was given by the hon. member for the Yukon (Mr. Black), and it was refreshing to hear first hand information from that hon. gentleman, who told the story of the commencement of this oil business. I wish someone had mentioned the beginner, the real pioneer, the man who more perhaps than any one else had to do with what is now called the Canol project or, as it should be rightly called, the oil development fifty miles down the Mackenzie river from Fort Norman. That gentleman is Colonel James K. Cornwall of Edmonton, one of the real pioneers of the great northwest, from whom I have personally learned great deal and with whom I have had much correspondence with reference to the north on the occasion of various preparations for trips to that country.

I believe it was about 1912, or in fact some years prior to the great war, and particularly when the Turner valley was being opened, that, according to information given me by Colonel Cornwall himself, he had a conversation with a promoter who spoke to him with reference to investing in Turner valley oil. He said, if I remember, to the promoter, "I am not going to invest any money in Turner valley oil because there is more oil in Mackenzie river area than anywhere else I have had to do with."

Apparently, following that, the prospectors to whom the hon. member for the Yukon referred were the first into that country; and as that hon. member said, they took up claims. These claims were later purchased by the Northwest company, a very fitting name, a subsidiary of Imperial Oil, which itself is a subsidiary of Standard Oil of New Jersey. In reference to the vote itself, I wish to support the minister in one stand he is taking, as referred to in the agreement, with which I presume he has had something to do if he is not largely responsible for it, namely, that the oil shall be developed if possible by private enterprise. I personally am wholly opposed to the government going into any business on that scale.

I agree with the department's proposal to assist in the development of the oil by financial assistance to private concerns. In that way we shall get a much better development; it will cost the country much less, and moreover there will be far more returns if it is developed privately, with the support of the government. But if the government itself proposes to develop the oil we shall get the same exhibition that we have had in most businesses operated by governments. I am not blaming this government alone; that goes for any government. No government can operate business with anything like the same economy as a private firm can.

What does the agreement call for? All I want to be certain of is that Canadian interests are protected. I have read the agreement, and at the moment I do not see that I can suggest any improvement. Someone would have to show me where it could be improved from the point of view of the country. If the agreement recommended that the government itself should develop the oil resources up there I would be opposed to that; but the agreement does not say that. Furthermore, I like the attitude of the minister toward Imperial Oil. I cannot understand the attitude of people, who know little about business, who nevertheless denounce business. We hear it denounced here and it is easy for those who have not had experience in big business to engage in these denunciations. But big business has done a great deal for the whole country.

As regards Imperial Oil, what happened? They puchased the right from the Northwest company to the claims and then commenced to invest money there. They drilled or made attempts to drill many holes in that area to find oil, but they did not find it at every place they drilled. The Minister of Munitions and Supply probably knows more about this than anybody else, but I believe that at the outbreak of war there were three wells in existence, and they were not working at that time. They had been in operation during the time of the development of the radium mine on the east end of Great Bear lake and during the developments at Yellowknife and the other gold centres north and east of Yellowknife. There were seven mines in that area altogether, but that development was not sufficient to take up the oil that could be produced from the three wells, so that I believe they were shut down. If my memory serves me rightly they produced about 24,000 barrels of oil in the last year they operated.

Following the United States entering the war and the necessity of producing oil, which was explained by the minister, and I do not intend to repeat it now, increased production took place at Fort Norman. An additional number of wells were drilled. I believe that before the war five were drilled that could produce oil and since that time the number has increased to twenty-three. Some twenty-six wells have been drilled and I believe that the capacity of the twenty-three is about 8,500 barrels a day. That is a considerable surplus over the possible capacity of the pipeline which was built from Fort Norman to Yellowknife, a distance of some 620 miles. When the pipeline was first laid out it was not to be as long as that, but they found that they had to go down the river a piece, and the total length from Fort Norman to Yellowknife is 620 miles.

Mr. CRERAR: If my hon. friend will permit me a moment, the present production of the existing wells at normal flow is about 3,900 barrels a day and not 8,000 barrels as my hon. friend says.

Mr. MacNICOL: I said that the capacity was 8,500 barrels a day. I do not think I said that they were producing 8,500 barrels a day, but the information I have from the engineers is that the capacity is about that. I do not know whether that is right or not, but in any event the production of 3,900 barrels a day is more than the capacity of the pipeline, which is 3,000 barrels a day.

Personally I want to be assured that after the war, when this agreement has been carried into effect, those who have to do with taking over the equipment will be qualified to understand the length of life of pipe, if the pipe is steel, or iron. If the four-inch pipe is not an iron pipe the length of its life is limited, relatively speaking, to a brief space of years. It will rust and go out if it is steel pipe. If it is a wrought iron pipe, of course it will last much longer. Therefore, in taking over the plant after the war the great consideration with me as to what should be paid for it is, what is the pipe made out of? This pipe crosses damp country; much of it was laid in muskeg; a lot of it was laid during the winter time on ice, which has since become covered with water. It was perhaps laid on props or supports of some kind, that is a consideration. Therefore the length of the life of the pipeline would be the determining factor with me if I had anything to do with passing comment on what should be paid for the plant after the war; but that will have to wait until then.

There is nothing more I wish to say in reference to this matter. There is nothing we can do about it. We should all be unanimous on the necessity of producing oil in the country, if it can be produced. I was talking to a man recently who told me that the distance from Norman to Aklavik would be some 500 to 600 miles. That would not be a long pipeline. This gentleman told me that after the war—and plans are being made for it now—it was intended to run a line of tankers through the Bering strait and around Alaska to Aklavik with the expectation that at that time the Norman wells will have developed to such an extent that it would be worth while running a pipeline of 500 or 600 miles from Norman wells, to tankers there. If that is what is going to happen then the oil could go down to Vancouver and be refined there, which would help to make the great city of Vancouver much larger than it is to-day.

Along with the hon. member for Peace River I see vast developments in that north country and the whole northwest country. At the moment I am thinking of going away to the far north again this coming summer with a view to seeing with my own eyes what can be done. I agree with what the minister and others have said, namely, that a large part of the future of this country depends on the opening up of the whole northwest country, the Northwest Territories and the northern half of the three prairie provinces, if we can awaken out of our lethargy. I am not blaming anyone for it. I like to keep these things out of the narrow sphere of politics which has done more to retard progress in Canada than anything else. If we can get beyond that, up on the higher plane of patriotic development and fervour and all work together irrespective of party lines for the development of this country after the war there would not be any need for any unemployed men or women.

I hope that when the war is over and the possibilities of this territory are realized we shall do something. In that connection I think of Vilhjalmur Stefansson, who explored this northwest country and said that in his opinion there is more oil around Fort Norman than in any other flowing wells in Canada. If that is the case Canada should develop it, along with the Athabaska tar sands which I am not going to go back on. In my opinion they could be worked jointly, and Canada could be placed on a self-sustaining basis, so far as oil is concerned.

As the minister said to-day, and as I said last night, we import eighty-seven per cent of our oil requirements. Let us try to get out of that. Do not let us quibble over the advocacy of the hon. member for Yorkton. I think about as much of his plan as the hon. member for Peace River does.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: Why not develop our own oil?

Mr. MacNICOL: The difference between my hon. friend and myself is this: I have been a producer for many years. I have been in big business. I have operated big business and have had to do with giving employment to many thousands of people in the aggregate. I doubt if my hon. friend ever gave a job to a man in his life other than to cut the grass on his front lawn or such like.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: The people of Canada felt the results of big business, too, from 1930 to 1939.

Mr. MacNICOL: I get absolutely tired of listening to men who know little or nothing about production and less about giving employment. I like to talk to men who have done things, and I like to listen to them. I do not care to waste my time listening to men who have never done anything that I know of or ever read of or ever heard of toward production in this country. If we can get the real men of this country together, the men who know and the men who do things like the Minister of Munitions and Supply we shall be doing something. The minister is on the opposite side of the house, but I cannot get down on such a small plane as not to recognize a man's ability because he happens to be on the other side of the house. My hon. friend the Minister of Munitions and Supply can do a big job. I said last night in the minister's absence that if he had only been at Fort McMurray last year and the year before he would have produced oil. I have that much confidence in him. I do not want him to say I am wrong.

Let us get on a higher plane as we think of this great country, with more resources than any other nation in the world. We have more than ninety per cent of the world's asbestos in Quebec, more than ninety per cent of the world's nickel in Ontario, and more than ninety per cent of the world's oil in Alberta and the northern country. If we do not awake from our sleep, Mr. Chairman, and recognize what God has given us to develop, some other country may come in and take it away from us. I say all power to anyone who can advance a plan to develop this country, for the good of the country and to create employment. In conclusion, I repeat that I hope the minister will stick to the private production of oil, not only in the northwest but at Fort McMurray, after the war.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: I am not going to waste the time of the committee by replying to the barrage of words that were thrown at us this afternoon. If we look at the condition of want that has prevailed in this country for seventy-five years; if we remember that the only time we have enjoyed decent wages for labour and parity prices for farmers has been in time of war; if we recognize the record of the gentlemen who have been in power in this country since it has been a country, the wealthiest land in the world, with only eleven million people living in it, I think all that is sufficient answer to those who have been advocating the continuance of things as they were in the past. We have opened up western Canada and British Columbia; what has it meant to the welfare of the Canadian people? What did it mean in 1930 to 1939?

An hon. MEMBER: Who opened it up? Not you.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: Big business opened it up, and what did the workers get out of it?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): The pioneers opened it.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: And where are the pioneers to-day?

Mr. REID: We have lived better than any other people in the world.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: With a billion dollars spent on relief and forty per cent of our young men unable to earn a living.

The CHAIRMAN: Order. We are discussing a special item in connection with the Canol project. I do not want to curtail discussion, but I do not believe hon. members will tolerate repetition ad nauseam, and I am going to try to confine the discussion from now on to the item under consideration.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: I thank you very much, Mr. Chairman, and I shall abide by your ruling. Later on I hope you will see that I am given an opportunity to reply to those statements, if I may not do so now.

Mr. FRASER (Peterborough West): That is the C.C.F. again.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: I suppose I am not allowed to reply to these interjections thrown at me. You maintain order on one side, but I am not allowed to reply.

The CHAIRMAN: I must appeal to the committee in reference to the statement made by the hon. member. I wish he would withdraw his remark. I try to be fair and I believe I have been fair to the hon. member for Yorkton and all other hon. members of the committee. I have always tried to be impartial, but I repeat that in the general discussion which took place this afternoon and the early part of this evening all parties expressed their viewpoints, and I am going to keep hon. members within the confines of the item now under consideration.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: I am very sorry if I have cast any reflection upon the Chair, and I withdraw my remark. This afternoon the minister stated that the arrangements made under this agreement would not prevent any other company or companies from taking part in that development. I should like to draw his attention to one of the notes exchanged between the governments of Canada and the United States. This note is dated January 18, 1943, and was written by Mr. Keenleyside in reply to a note from the United States government dated December 28, 1942. The last paragraph reads:

> It would facilitate the drafting of regulations if the United States authorities would indicate more definitely the particular districts, within the very large area described in your note No. 818, paragraph 2, which seem to be the most promising. These districts could then be reserved for exploration by nominees of the United States government.

Apparently there was a reservation for the government of the United States. The minister stated that no measures would be taken to prevent other companies from developing this region, but from this note it would appear otherwise.

Mr. CRERAR: The effect of the two notes to which my hon. friend has referred is that at the request of the United States government a certain area was reserved for exploration. The right to go out and search for oil structures; the right to examine territory to see if there are favourable conditions for oil, would not confer any right upon them to exploit the property. That was not put under their control at all. The only thing the United States government were interested in was getting a sufficient supply of oil. They thought they might require up to 20,000 barrels a day. No private companies were going in at that time and searching for oil structures. My officers will correct me if I am wrong, but the United States simply said, "Will you reserve a certain area, where we can send our geologists to see if we can find favourable structures," and that is all that was done. It did not give the United States government any right to preempt any territory, and that is where my hon. friend has misunderstood the meaning of the exchange of notes. No monopoly was conferred upon the United States government or anyone else under these regulations. I stated this afternoon that under the terms of the proposed regulations Imperial Oil may get the right to explore an area of perhaps 2,000,000 acres, but over a period of years that must be reduced to 350,000 acres.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: I think it is 1,000,000 acres under the agreement.

Mr. CRERAR: Yes, but eventually it comes down to 350,000 acres. When oil may be found anywhere over 100,000,000 acres I do not think you are setting up a monopoly if you lay down regulations under which eventually a company, after it has examined a certain area, may operate in 350,000 acres; really my imagination is not quite keen enough to bring me to the conclusion that this is conferring a monopoly on the company. I am sure my hon. friend is quite sincere and in earnest in the criticism he is offering, but I suggest that he has not appreciated the full meaning of the regulations and the exchange of notes.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: I do not think there is any doubt about that.

Mr. GREEN: I should like the minister to explain two or three features in connection with this northern development. The first explanation is the general policy of the government with regard to the development of our north country. Last evening I mentioned the developments that have taken place in Siberia, and this evening the hon. member for Peace River stressed the need for great developments in northern Canada. I wish the minister would give us some idea of what the government have in mind as a general policy for developing northern Canada. I am convinced, as I think perhaps most hon. members are, that there are great prospects for development in that part of the country.

The other matter about which I should like a further explanation has to do with the ways in which another company or other companies or private individuals or syndicates will be able to go in and develop oil wells in this territory. The minister dealt with that in part, earlier in the debate. There seems to be no doubt that this Mackenzie river oil field is the finest in Canada. The Minister of Munitions and Supply said last year that it was a very fine field, and I have here the March 13 issue of the publication known as The Oil Weekly, published in Houston, Texas, in which there is a long article by Doctor G. S. Hume, geologist for the oil controller for Canada. The article is headed: "Mackenize River Basin Best Opportunity for Oil in Canada." The minister will correct me if I am wrong, or if this statement is wrong. Doctor Hume, in his article, states this at page 26:

> The Mackenzie river valley, comprising 150,000 square miles and extending westward into the Wind river basin of the Yukon, the most promising oil territory in Canada, recently has been brought to the attention of the public by the Canol project, which includes the development of a field that was discovered more than twenty years ago by Imperial Oil company.

Then, further down on the same page we find this:

> Doctor O. B. Hopkins of Imperial Oil has stated that a major oil field comparable with a major oil field in the United States has been found and that the area has been proven much larger and more productive than originally anticipated.

So that we apparently have something worth while—very much worth while—in this Mackenzie river oil field.

It just so happens that in the same magazine appears an editorial pointing out the great opportunities for United States oil interests to undertake development in Canada. It says, after describing the possibilities in Canada:

> All these factors will result in relatively large representation in this "foreign" development by smaller American oil companies, independent operators, and geophysical, drilling, and other service companies.

I think we should be sure that these other operators will have a reasonable chance to succeed in the Mackenzie river field. Frankly, I am not convinced that that is the case at present, under the law as it now stands in Canada. I realize that the Canol project was undertaken as a war emergency measure. But the order in council of January 28, 1943, under which Canada gave approval to that development, P.C. 742, contains this paragraph:

> 1. A permit for a location on lands lying within a radius of 50 miles from Discovery Well of Northwest Company Limited—

Which, I understand, was a subsidiary of the Imperial Oil company.

> —situated about 45 miles north of Fort Norman on the Mackenzie river, conveying the exclusive right to prospect and drill for, to produce and dispose of oil and gas thereon may be granted by the minister to any corporation or to any person eighteen years of age or over for the duration of the present war, provided however that no person shall enter the area to which these regulations apply for the purpose of prospecting for oil and staking a location without first obtaining from the minister a preliminary authority so to do.

I believe under that power the Imperial Oil company was given an exclusive right, not only to explore, and not only to prospect but also to drill for, produce and dispose of oil.

Then, later on, namely on March 26, 1943, order in council P.C. 2447 was passed. This order in council extended the territory from a territory within the radius of fifty miles of the old well, to include the whole of the Yukon territory and, the minister will correct me if I am wrong, also all of the district of Mackenzie west of a line drawn roughly seventy-five miles east of the Mackenzie river. I presume the Imperial Oil company got the same exclusive rights with regard to that territory, or as much of it as they wanted. Presumably no other company or individual was given any permit.

Then, this year order in council P.C. 2904 of April 27, 1944, which was read into Hansard this afternoon was passed. It certainly gives the Imperial Oil company every advantage. For example, as I read it, in any part of the field that has been proven; in other words, any part where producing wells have been bored, the Imperial Oil company again has exclusive rights. That is, it will have the whole of the proven field. I may be wrong in that, but the minister will correct me if I am.

Mr. HOWE: Who proved it? Was it not the Imperial Oil company that proved the field?

Mr. GREEN: For example, section 1 (a) of this order in council states:

> In respect of the proven field (a) the area to be developed as a unit operation by the company . . .

I take it that means that the Imperial Oil company have exclusive rights to the oil in the whole of the proven field. They also have rights to the balance of about 140,000 acres, over which they have permits. And they have the right to substitute for any part of that 140,000 acres a similar territory, or a like amount of ground in the other part of the whole area.

Mr. CRERAR: That is not correct.

Mr. GREEN: I would ask the minister to correct me, because I am simply asking for information.

Mr. CRERAR: Well, that is not correct.

Mr. GREEN: It looks to me as though any other company or any other operator is almost doomed to failure in that field, under present conditions, unless some way can be found of giving help to them. I would ask the minister to give us some further explanation respecting that feature of the development, because I do not think it is right to give the Imperial Oil company a monopoly in this Mackenzie river oil district. That may not be the situation, but certainly it is not right that they should have a monopoly. If we can develop that country as Russia has developed part of Siberia there may be 100,000 or 200,000 people there eventually. And it is far more likely to receive proper development if we do not permit any one company to have a monopoly in the area.

The third feature about which I should like to have an explanation is the government's policy with regard to the United States. Just a few weeks ago either the Prime Minister or the Minister of Munitions and Supply, I am not sure which, explained to the house that the government proposed to buy out certain American interests in the north. That is, we were to repay the money that had been spent in developing air fields, and in buying land and erecting buildings. The Canadian government is buying the United States government out in respect of those operations, so that such developments will be purely Canadian-owned.

As I understand it, that is not being done with either the Alaska highway or the Canol project. I would ask the minister to say just what the plan is with regard to the relationship between Canada and the United States in respect of the Alaska highway and the Canol project. He admitted to-day that the United States army is to operate the pipeline from Norman to Whitehorse, and presumably is also to operate the refinery at Whitehorse, and the pipeline from Skagway to Whitehorse. But we should know just what arrangements there are between the two governments in respect of these two projects, and whether there are any other developments in northern Canada in which the United States has, or after the war will have a financial interest, once Canada has paid for the particular developments to which the Minister of Munitions and Supply referred.

Mr. CRERAR: I shall reply first to my hon. friend's last question. The exchange of notes which have been tabled sets out the full basis of the arrangements made between the government regarding the development of the Canol project. Those were read into the record this afternoon and they show the means by which final disposition will be made.

Mr. GREEN: There was a change made in the government's policy regarding airports.

Mr. CRERAR: If my hon. friend will please let me proceed, I am referring to the Canol project which is the item under discussion.

The CHAIRMAN: It is the only item before the committee.

Mr. GREEN: The Alaska highway is also before the committee.

The CHAIRMAN: This is the item before the committee:

Expenses of liaison officers in connection with the Alaska highway and Canol projects.

Mr. GRAYDON: The hon. member for Vancouver South is correct.

Mr. CRERAR: May I be permitted to continue? My understanding is that the United States authorities who constructed the pipeline and refinery at Whitehorse can either operate them directly or arrange to have them operated by agents. When the war is over, the basis of settlement, the liquidation of the matter if you like, will be as is clearly set out in the exchange of notes. The Canol project is not in the same category as the airfields. The hon. member for Vancouver South referred to a statement made some little time ago by the Minister of Munitions and Supply. It is true that so far as the airfields are concerned the Canadian government is paying the United States government for the work done, because it represents assets which will be of permanent value to Canada. I think that answers the first part of my hon. friend's question.

Mr. GREEN: What about the Alaska highway?

Mr. CRERAR: The exchange of notes provided for the Alaska highway. So far as I am aware there has never been any suggestion that Canada should pay the United States for the expenditures on the Alaska highway. There were certain extensions to airfields which were found necessary and for which we will repay them.

With regard to the second to the last point raised by my hon. friend, he seemed to fear that we were giving Imperial Oil some sort of monopoly in the Northwest Territories and he inquired whether companies would have the right to go in there.

Mr. GREEN: And individuals and syndicates.

Mr. CRERAR: I made a statement on government policy on May 5 when the order in council setting forth the arrangements and giving the details of the proposed regulations was tabled. I should like to quote from that statement as reported on page 2651 of Hansard, as follows:

In respect to the new regulations to be established, the order in council sets out briefly some of the more important conditions that will be imposed. It is to the general advantage of Canada that an active programme of exploration and search for oil should be carried out in order that new sources may be found and developed. The regulations will make available to all companies and individuals the opportunity of exploring and developing these resources.

The policy of the government with respect to the matter is set out in those words. There is no attempt to restrict this to any one company. As I have pointed out once or twice already in the discussion, the regulations provide that while the company can retain a permit of one area up to 2,000,000 acres, it must within a period of years reduce that and settle upon what particular acreage it is going to take. The limit of the acreage that it can have when it reaches that point is 350,000 acres.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): What happens to the remainder?

Mr. CRERAR: It is open to anyone else. My hon. friend can go in and explore it.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): Could I have all the rest?

Mr. STIRLING: If you stake it.

Mr. CRERAR: My hon. friend could go in; anyone else could go in. We were particularly careful in framing these regulations to provide against the very danger that the hon. member for Vancouver South has in mind. I have stated already that ultimately a pipeline must be built if the area is to be commercially exploited, and that must be open to everyone upon terms approved by the government. I do not know how anything more could have been done to make certain that any company or individual that was interested should have an opportunity of going in and staking.

This is not a field of operations for an individual or company with small capital. You must transport your drilling equipment and supplies and everything else nearly 1,500 miles over very costly water and land transportation routes. You will have only three or four months in the summer for drilling operations and you must face heavy winter conditions. It is not a field for the small individual, such as Turner valley. This is not because of any limitation imposed by the government; it is because of limitations imposed by nature.

Mr. GREEN: Is it a fact that the proven field has been reserved for Imperial Oil?

Mr. CRERAR: One-third or a little more of the proven field was covered by the old leases which Imperial Oil obtained twenty years ago, the other two-thirds being secured under the war-time regulations. There is no doubt that the area is now under the control of Imperial Oil, but within a radius of fifty miles of Norman Wells there are over 5,000,000 acres.

Mr. GREEN: How much more does Imperial Oil control?

Mr. CRERAR: I am just coming to that. As I say, within a radius of fifty miles of the proven field there are over 5,000,000 acres, and of that Imperial Oil have a right to secure a permit covering 140,000 acres.

Mr. GREEN: In addition they could get permits for over another million acres?

Mr. CRERAR: I suppose they could.

There is one other point I wish to mention. There is no doubt that at the moment Imperial Oil are in a position that may be regarded as advantageous compared with that of any other company coming in, but that is on account of the fact that they went in there twenty years ago and found oil. They were the people to whom the United States authorities went because they were on the spot and knew something about the country. It may be argued that they have a preferred position, but that preferred position may not be of any permanent value to them. I may add that other large oil companies are showing an interest in that country and, if they want to go in, they are free to go in. The same with my hon. friend; if he wants to get a company together he will have a chance to go in and see what he can do.

Mr. GREEN: May I ask one further question? Did the United States government provide the money for developing these wells?

Mr. CRERAR: I am not fully informed of the financial arrangements between the United States authorities and Imperial Oil. My understanding is that the war department or some authority associated with the United States war effort financed Imperial Oil.

Mr. MacNICOL: Did the United States government itself not drill the additional wells since Imperial Oil left off?

Mr. CRERAR: Quite right. I was going to ask, would it be reasonable to say to Imperial Oil, "Are you prepared to go ahead and spend five or six or ten million dollars bringing in heavy drilling machinery and drilling wells to see if we can find some oil?"

Mr. GREEN: Is it fair to say then that the Imperial Oil company had three wells in this area when the emergency arose; that they were on the spot; that the United States government stepped in and financed them to drill other wells; that the Canadian government gave them these exclusive rights; and that they are now keeping all the rights as provided for in the new order in council? It is true that they had developed three or four wells up to the time the emergency arose, but apparently they did not finance the further developments.

Mr. CRERAR: I have tried to explain that Imperial Oil had—roughly—2,900 acres under their original leases secured over twenty years ago. In the proven area there is an additional 3,000 acres, and in that area they have an estimated thirty to sixty million barrels of oil. Some of the holes were dry holes; most of them produced oil. In addition to that, because they wanted to be certain of their supply for the pipeline, they selected within a radius of fifty miles other areas upon which drilling operations were started but had not and have not yet reached a final conclusion, but probably will be carried on. As I said a moment ago, perhaps Imperial Oil had a preferred position because they were already established there. They had a small refinery from which they were producing gasoline for aeroplane services in the north country and diesel fuel oil for Bear lake.

It will take only a moment to deal with the first question asked by my hon. friend. I agree with him that increasing attention and importance must be attached to the development of the north country, and the government and the Department of Mines and Resources have not been idle in that regard. This was the field work carried on in 1943. One party studied a proposed national park in the southwest Yukon and the recreational attractions along the Alaska highway. Two parties studied wild life along the Alaska highway.

Mr. GREEN: What sort of wild life was it they were examining?

Mr. CRERAR: I think my hon. friend knows what is meant by the term. One party surveyed forest resources along the Alaska highway. Fourteen geological parties carried out surveys in northwestern Alberta between British Columbia and the Yukon. Seven topographical parties made surveys in northwestern Alberta. Four parties determined astronomical positions leading to the acquisition of the necessary data to establish proper base lines for mapping and surveying purposes. A party surveyed sites in northern British Columbia and the Yukon for water-power purposes. Two parties carried on hydrographic surveys on the coast of British Columbia—very important work. In addition, the Department of Agriculture sent out a reconnaissance soil survey party along the Alaska highway, and one party in central British Columbia to make a soil survey along the Canadian National railway belt. For the current year we have made provision for almost forty parties in the territory about which I have been speaking. It is difficult to-day to get the personnel for these parties. We are endeavouring to gather all the information we can. A great deal has been obtained and it is available for further development work. I hope this will give my hon. friend the information he requires.

Mr. GREEN: Would it not be possible to send a party to Siberia to find out the developments which the Russians have made in their north country? They seem to have done wonderful things there. The Canadian government might get some very useful ideas.

Mr. CRERAR: I think that would be very difficult during the war. We have, as my hon. friend knows, an ambassador in Moscow. All the data which has been gathered by the Russian government is available to our officers or can be secured for study. Later on, after the war is over, if it is thought desirable—and there may be a good deal to commend it—that we send a special mission to Russia to ascertain on the spot what the Russians are doing in the development of their north country, that could be done, but I do not think it would be wise to approach the Russian government with that proposal at the present moment.

Mr. GREEN: It might be worth trying.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): The minister has just told us about the work of these survey parties. I have been wondering if they all went out under the vote of $10,000.

Mr. CRERAR: No.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): We all remember that years ago some wells were drilled as a result of speculative activity, and others, perhaps more, to meet the needs as they arose in the north country, on behalf of the mining industry, and one thing and another. The main factor in recent development, as I see it, is the stress of war; that is, the United States needed oil for their ships on the west coast; something had to be done, and the problem of financing became in reality a United States job. I would ask the Minister of Munitions and Supply if that is not so, that the United States wanted a supply of oil for their ships on the west coast, in view of a possible Japanese invasion. I do not know what arrangement was made as between Canada and the United States to provide capital. But in connection with this project there is one important consideration which I wonder whether the government has in mind. Does it visualize Canada as a country of fifty million people instead of eleven and a half millions? These concessions given to Imperial Oil or any other company are being given not as concessions for to-day but as concessions for the future which at some time will become very valuable.

As far as the development of our natural resources in Canada is concerned, I am all in favour of having Canadians given an opportunity of developing them. I am not in favour of having to go outside Canada to get capital to any great extent to develop those resources. We have a great industrial organization in Canada, in the east, and we can take care of all supplies necessary to develop our own country. One of the difficulties in the twenties, so far as Canada is concerned, was that between 1920 and 1930 there were 120,000 Canadians leaving every year and going to the United States because we were not developing our own country. We let someone else do that for us. I am in favour of having this country developed by Canadians, by the boys who will be coming back from overseas. I would not give away the country to anyone else to carry out that development. The only question in my mind, in connection with these concessions which are given at the present time, is this: Are the government keeping that point of view in the forefront? The hon. member for Peace River suggested that the Canadian Pacific Railway Company had done a good job for the development of the north country. So they have, by airways. I want to put that on the record.

Canada has proved herself as far as her productive capacity is concerned. I repeat, we have proved ourselves, and therefore I want to see our natural resources developed by Canadians with Canadian capital, with our own machinery, which we have in this country. The only thing that disturbs me when I hear about concessions being given to someone else is that we may not be looking forward to the future and keeping the concessions we have, in connection with the development of our natural resources, for the people of Canada.

Mr. HOWE: We are getting a little afield from the actual project. Much has been said about concessions to Imperial Oil, but I would remind the committee that the discovery of oil in that area was made by that company. They were not financed by anybody but went in as a Canadian corporation seeking oil in Canada.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): I was not criticizing that.

Mr. HOWE: They discovered oil in the Norman area. It was developed to a moderate extent, and that development was limited entirely by markets in the territory. A small refinery was built; a few wells were drilled, and Imperial Oil since 1920 has been furnishing the requirements of that area for gasoline and oil products. When war broke out, entirely new problems arose. The sea route from Alaska was threatened by enemy action. A huge market for gasoline arose in the area owing to the development of the Northwest staging route. The United States army looked over possible sources of supply, and they were informed by Imperial Oil that the development was in existence in Fort Norman and that the probabilities were that the source of production could be enlarged. The United States government approached Canada and asked permission to carry on in that area certain development work as a war project. They chose as agent the Imperial Oil company. Why? Because that company knew the geology of the area and were operating in that area. For the United States, the Imperial Oil company drilled several wells which proved up a certain area. The results were favourable and in the course of a year or two all oil had been proven of development that was likely to be required in the country. The Americans built a small refinery, or rather moved one from Texas and established it at Whitehorse to convert Fort Norman oil into the products required in that area. That is the extent of the development that is warranted by markets. Beyond that, another possibility exists, namely, that that development can be brought to a point where the oil can be transmitted by water where markets will be available sufficient to use the products of a larger field.

When you talk about concessions to Imperial Oil, what is the position of Imperial Oil to-day? They have a small proven field, between 30,000.000 and 60,000,000 barrels of proven oil. In order to transport that to the coast an economical pipeline must be built costing $60,000,000, and to justify the pipeline, further oil must be found to bring the potential up to 300,000,000 barrels. Imperial Oil to-day have the right to go to that area and attempt to prove up additional oil to the total amount of 300,000,000 barrels; then they have the privilege of finding $60,000,000 and to build a pipeline; and after all that has been done they will market their first barrel of oil outside the immediate area.

Mr. GREEN: Is that over and above what the United States gets?

Mr. HOWE: The United States of course found certain oil and they are entitled to that oil at cost.

Mr. GREEN: They get 60,000,000 barrels; they are entitled to 60,000,000 barrels.

Mr. HOWE: If additional oil is found they have the right to 60,000,000 barrels at cost, plus twenty cents a barrel.

Mr. GREEN: Does that give them a total of 120,000,000 barrels?

Mr. HOWE: No. They have the right to-day to 30,000,000 barrels. If additional oil is found they are entitled to ten per cent of the proven field up to the total of another 30,000,000 barrels.

Mr. MacNICOL: To reimburse them for what they spent.

Mr. HOWE: To reimburse them for their expenditure in drilling the wells.

Mr. MacNICOL: Yes, and that is only fair.

Mr. HOWE: The enviable position of Imperial Oil is this. They are located in the area. They have a certain field, but before it can be available and before they can get any substantial amount of money they must spend another $30,000,000 for development work and $60,000,000 for a pipeline before they will begin to get any return whatever from the field.

Mr. MacNICOL: And they spent $10,000,000 in the beginning.

Mr. HOWE: Yes. They spent $10,000,000 before the Americans came in. I wish the hon. member would not interrupt me. He has upset my train of thought. This development work will probably take from eight to ten years. I admire a private company that can take a gamble of that kind. I may say that all these wells have not been successful. A number of dry wells have been encountered, and there is nothing sure about the fact that that field will be large enough to warrant a pipeline to the coast. If it turns out not to be large enough to warrant a pipeline the expenditure that is made from now on will be lost for many years. It is a huge speculation. It is a speculation that large oil companies can take. I have never known one as large as this; nevertheless, I am proud of the fact that a Canadian company—Imperial Oil is a Canadian company—is strong enough to undertake a development that requires such a tremendous risk of capital and so much courage to carry to completion.

Mr. GREEN: They are really a subsidiary of Standard Oil of New Jersey.

Mr. HOWE: Assuming they are; nevertheless they are a Canadian company operating under Canadian laws with a substantial Canadian ownership. I hardly think that it has been the policy of this country through the years to discriminate against a Canadian company because some of its stock is owned in other countries. That is the position. I may say that every other company has the same right as the Imperial Oil company to go into that area and develop it. When the pipeline is built it will be a common carrier. If it is built by the Imperial Oil company, the smallest oil company that cares to go into that country and develop it will have the same right to use that pipeline and can use it at the same transport rate as the Imperial Oil company. The pipeline will be operated by a company whose rates will be regulated by the board of transport commissioners for Canada, and its use will be available to everyone operating through the area. The government sincerely hopes that other companies will go into that area and develop it. Every development will provide a portion of the 300,000,000 barrels required to justify the pipeline; and if other companies will provide a part in the proven oil resources it will mean that much less for Imperial Oil to do, and that much shorter time before this area can be brought into production.

What is the Canadian interest in this development? Canada is a beggar for oil. We are knocking at every door on the American hemisphere to get petroleum to-day. In normal times we produce about seventeen per cent of the petroleum products that we consume. At the present time we produce considerably less than seventeen per cent of the petroleum that Canada is using. We formerly got our petroleum largely from United States sources, partly from the Caribbean area. We find that certain sources previously open to Canada are being depleted or overloaded to an extent that they are no longer available. We must go farther and farther afield. Formerly British Columbia was supplied entirely from California—

Mr. GREEN: And Peru also.

Mr. HOWE: To some extent, perhaps. To-day we are going almost entirely into South America for our supplies of petroleum for British Columbia. On the Atlantic coast we are going farther and farther south all the time to get crude petroleum and we are obtaining a lower grade of crude as the months go by.

If the world felt that Canada had large deposits of petroleum within its own boundaries which it was not attempting to develop I am sure that our reception would not be as cordial as it is to-day when we ask the United States and other countries to share their petroleum supplies. It is of great national importance that Canada should have an important source of petroleum within its own boundaries. The distribution of petroleum is limited by economic factors. The only possible way of getting petroleum out from the area in question is to the Pacific coast and then by tanker; but if we had a good supply there we could trade that oil for United States oil in position to serve eastern markets and would be in a vastly stronger position with respect to petroleum than we are to-day.

I ask hon. gentlemen in looking at this transaction not to look at the minute details. I believe that the minute details are perfectly in order. We are developing oil in the Northwest Territories just as we developed oil in every other part of Canada and just as every other country in the world has developed its oil. As a matter of fact, every province except one has given oil leases on practically the same terms as those have been given in the Northwest Territories. Although this deposit is in an area of extreme temperatures in which development work can be carried on only for a portion of the year, and in spite of the fact that there is this great transportation problem of moving the petroleum to the coast, the royalties charged and the terms of exploration are just as onerous as they are in other parts of Canada. Speaking personally, I can say that I fear the Department of Mines and Resources have driven too hard a bargain. My only fear in the transaction is not that the bargain is not hard enough, not that the government has not squeezed out the last share that can be squeezed out, but that the terms may be so onerous that the development may be stopped. I am indeed glad to note that the government of the day can, if that position proves to be the fact, relax the terms to a certain extent. I think that is a very fortunate saving clause in the contract. It may be that the development will go smoothly. Perhaps the schedule can be maintained, and the estimates in the hands of the oil companies completed. It may be that the company can carry out this development and pay the ground rentals and royalties called for in the lease; but to me the main thing is to get a major Canadian oil development which will make Canada independent in her oil position in the world.

[Mr Howe.]

Mr. GREEN: Is it not important to get other operators in there?

Mr. HOWE: Yes; we hope that other operators will come in. I may say they are in exactly the same position as Imperial Oil if they do come in.

Mr. GREEN: Hardly that.

Mr. HOWE: It has been suggested that Imperial Oil have a monopoly on a great part of the area. That is not true at all. All the property on which the Imperial Oil has rights is a small speck on the map of the Northwest Territories and a not much larger speck on the territory which has in a sense been proven to be oil-bearing from surface observation. There is ample property left. Perhaps the total claim of Imperial Oil is about two per cent of the acreage that is believed to be oil-bearing. I may say that some of the acreage is nearer markets than the acreage Imperial Oil has at Fort Norman.

I hope that hon. members will take my viewpoint, that the main thing is to obtain oil from that territory and to develop that territory into a source of supply for Canada. That is the important thing, and the exact terms on which that oil is obtained, to my mind pale into insignificance in relation to the main problem.

Mr. GRAHAM: What is the type of crude there?

Mr. HOWE: It is a very good crude.

Mr. NICHOLSON: It would appear to me that it should be government policy to plan for the production of the greatest quantity of oil with the least amount of labour in the post-war period. I think it is taken for granted that oil will be a very important commodity in the life of Canada; and since the government has spent very large sums of money in geological survey work and in developing the north country, I think plans should be made now for the government to go into this newest development in order that the Canadian people may obtain some return from these large expenditures. Last summer, while returning from the north country, I travelled for two days with some seventy Americans who had been employed on airport construction work in the far north. The lowest paid man in that party had received $450 a month, with board; carpenters were paid $500 a month and electricians $550 to $600. The government of this country is planning to take over these bases, as I understand it, paying all the cost of their construction; and many of these places will be of use in the development of the resources of the far north.

Having in mind what has been done by the government in a critical period of war—I have in mind a visit I made this week to one of the prize babies of the Minister of Munitions and Supply at Sarnia—and remembering how the minister can boast of what has been done with public funds in connection with publicly owned corporations, I see no particular reason why the government could not take the risks involved in the drilling of wells, even if they should be dry wells. Imperial Oil or any other company must get from the Canadian people the funds they intend to use in this development. I believe that if we knew the very large amounts of money that bakers, tinsmiths and farmers in Ontario and Quebec have lost during the last twenty-five years in wildcat oil developments we would find that the experimental work has been very costly. Having made such very large expenditures in the past, however, I should think it would be government policy now to determine that the government should take the cream as well as the skim-milk. I believe it would be a great calamity if in the post-war period we should have half a dozen companies planning to build plants such as the one at Sarnia, when one plant of that size undoubtedly will be able to produce all the rubber we are likely to use, with something over for export. Similarly I believe the development of our oil resources should be carried on as part of a national policy to produce all the oil available in Canada to keep the wheels of industry turning and to export the surplus to other, less fortunate countries, if that is possible. I think at this stage the minister might make some statement indicating that the people of Canada will have a chance to recoup the large expenditures that have been made in the past in connection with the development of the northern country.

Mr. GRAYDON: I have said nothing in this debate so far, and I rise at this time only to say a word in support of some of those who have taken part in this discussion. I think anyone who has studied the possibilities of that northern territory must range himself in support of a larger, more comprehensive scheme for its development. In the years to come I am sure this area of such potential wealth will come to be regarded as one of the most important parts of this country, and I wish to support much that has been said by those who preceded me, particularly the hon. member for Vancouver South, who suggested that we should take advantage of the expeirments and the experience of our neighbours across Bering strait, the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics. In replying to the suggestion that we should take advantage of the valuable experience of Russia I thought the minister's answer was not perhaps as comprehensive as it might have been. I think we might very well take advantage of the experiences of other countries in developing areas whose climate and other characteristics are similar to those of the northwest part of our dominion. So that in these very few words I should like to identify myself with the suggestion that has been offered in that regard, and I hope the minister will accept in a kindly way the advice that has come from this side of the house during this debate, which I think has been constructive and to the benefit of the Canadian people. I should like to see the government adopt a forthright, vigorous and well considered policy for the development of the Northwest Territories, so that in the years to come this will become one of our richest and best developed districts.

Mr. CRERAR: Some useful, constructive suggestions have been advanced during the course of the discussion. I believe my department is fully aware of the importance of taking advantage of everything that can be learned of what is being done in Russia. In my opinion the Department of Mines and Resources and indeed the dominion are very fortunate in having as deputy minister Doctor Camsell, whose knowledge of the whole north country is probably greater than that of any other Canadian. I would mention to the leader of the opposition that the Siberian or arctic region of Russia differs substantially from the arctic region of Canada. Our great northern area is largely found within what is known as the pre-Cambrian belt of rocks, which extends from Labrador, swinging around south of Hudson bay down as far as Port Arthur, and then in a northwesterly direction up to Great Bear lake, where the radium mines are, and on beyond the arctic. Therefore the development we may expect in a great part of our north country will be mineral development. I understand that conditions in Russia are somewhat different. Climatic conditions, I understand, are not quite as severe as they are in Canada, and they have timber and other resources.

Mr. GREEN: The article I read last evening said that their climate was worse than ours.

Mr. CRERAR: I know, for instance, that navigation is open every summer from Archangel, in the northwestern corner of Russia, around through to Bering strait. In Canada that is not possible. Ships have made the journey from Hudson bay to Bering strait, but it has taken two years to do it. As a matter of fact a ship is on that journey now. Whether or not those conditions will improve, I do not know. Probably some improvements can be made. However, ice conditions appear to be worse in northern Canada than they are in Russia.

I can assure the leader of the opposition, however, that the department is fully alive to the importance of gathering all possible information. I remember reading within the last six or seven years a book entitled, "Forty Thousand Against the Arctic," describing northern developments in Russia. All the data which can be gathered is being gathered. I should like to express a measure of satisfaction that there is among the membership of the House of Commons a substantial growing interest in the possibilities of our north country.

Mr. GRAYDON: The minister should mention the hon. member for Davenport, particularly.

Mr. CRERAR: I have done so, several times.

Mr. MacNICOL: The hon. member for Vancouver South asked a question the answer to which I did not hear. I believe I can answer it. At page 1 of the report of the special committee at Washington investigating the national defence programme, I find something which I believe answers the hon. member's question. After stating that the programme in connection with Canol would cost $134,000,000, the report states:

> The second part of the Canol project will cost approximately $99,000,000. It includes prospecting for oil and developing new wells in the vicinity of Norman Wells in Canada at a cost of about $17,000,000.

So that I take it from that that the United States government has undertaken to pay the Imperial Oil company the cost of the drilling, namely $17,000,000.

Mr. NOSEWORTHY: If I understand correctly, the Imperial Oil company have an option in respect of drilling on 2,000,000 acres. They have a number of years or a given period of time after which they must decide how many acres they want to lease. I did not get the length of time they were permitted to carry out their exploration work before they must name the number of acres they want to lease. Will the minister give us that information?

Mr. CRERAR: They can get the eight permits of 256,000 acres each.

Mr. NOSEWORTHY: Two million acres.

Mr. CRERAR: That is for exploration and drilling. Within three years that must be reduced to 1,000,000 acres. And finally it gets down where they can select 350,000 acres.

Mr. NOSEWORTHY: I take it, that this 2,000,000 acres on which they may take an option includes the territory that has been proven, with the aid of the United States government finances, under our war programme.

Mr. CRERAR: The 5,000 acres, which is what we have been describing as the proven field, is not included in that. They have outside of that, within the radius of fifty miles, 140,000 acres. I understand that the 5,000 is included in the 140,000.

Mr. NOSEWORTHY: This 2,000,000 acres will unquestionably be the 2,000,000 that at this date offer the greatest promise for oil?

Mr. CRERAR: No, not necessarily. It is true that oil has been found in this area; but fifty miles away there may be a better field than was found at Norman Wells. No one can say, until the geological structures are studied. That is nothing new; it has happened in every oil field in the world.

Mr. NOSEWORTHY: The minister did not make clear just how many years the company will have before it must decide finally how many acres it will lease. He has said that after threee years the 2,000,000 acres will be reduced to 1,000,000 acres. Then, after a given period, it will be reduced still further. What is the time limit before they must make their final decision?

Mr. CRERAR: Within six years from the time the operation begins they must get down to 350,000 acres or less.

Mr. ROWE: They have been in there for more than twenty-five years.

Mr. GREEN: Have any recommendations been made in connection with development of northern Canada by the joint economic committees of the United States and Canada. On June 20, 1941, these committees were appointed, and on January 25 of last year it was announced that they were going to undertake a study of the north Pacific area, including Alaska, the Yukon and northern British Columbia.

On February 22 of last year the Prime Minister said:

> The object is to study the possibilities for the economic development of the region for the benefit of the two countries and for the welfare of the inhabitants of the area.

At that time no recommendations had been received from the committee. Have any been received since that time?

The ACTING CHAIRMAN (Mr. Golding): That has nothing to do with the item. We want to deal with the items as they are.

Mr. GREEN: With all due deference, Mr. Chairman, the item deals with the Alaska highway and the Canol project.

The ACTING CHAIRMAN (Mr. Golding): Yes.

Mr. GREEN: One goes through the Yukon and the other through northern British Columbia and the Yukon. Certainly they are economic developments. The committee to which I referred was a joint committee of the two nations appointed for the purpose of recommending what economic developments would be undertaken. Since that committee was appointed, both these projects have been undertaken. I have asked the minister whether or not there have been any recommendations with regard to the projects, and I submit I am in order.

Mr. CRERAR: I can answer, briefly. This was a joint committee. I believe that in the initial stages it was expected a joint report would be prepared. I understand now that it is exchanging information, and that each section of the committee is going to report to its own government. As yet the Canadian section has not reported to the Canadian government.

Mr. GREEN: There has been no report from it at all?

Mr. CRERAR: Not yet.

Mr. GREEN: Although it has been appointed for more than three years.

Mr. CRERAR: It is not three years, is it?

Mr. GREEN: June 20, 1941.

Mr. CRERAR: Well, no report has come in yet.

Mr. NOSEWORTHY: I wish to join with those who have already spoken, to express the desire of this group to see this territory developed. I believe we have made it quite clear that our chief concern is to see that this rich area is developed. To-day it is practically the only area containing vast sources of natural wealth which has not been handed over, in one form or another, to large monopolistic interests. I am not going to continue this discussion any further. I should like to say something about the statement made by the hon. member for Davenport, but his riding adjoins my own and I have no doubt that we shall have ample opportunity to exchange views on this subject.

I wish to endorse what has been said by the leader of the opposition and the hon. member for Vancouver South regarding the profit that may accrue to the Canadian people from what has been done in the northern areas of Russia. I was delighted to hear the minister say that his department has already given consideration to those developments and studies which have been carried on by our allies. I should like to ask him if from the study his department has made he has found that that country has given any corporation comparable with Imperial Oil the exclusive right to explore 2,000,000 acres of their oil fields?

Mr. CRERAR: No. I confess that my studies have not proceeded to that point, but I would think it most unlikely that Russia had done so. Up to the present time Russia has carried on under a different political philosophy from that obtaining in Canada, one that is probably more in accord with the views of my hon. friend. I do not know upon what basis Russia has developed her north country.

Item agreed to.

Dominion forest service—internment and prisoners of war operations, $52,800.

Mr. GREEN: Will the minister explain this item and tell us the approximate number of prisoners of war and internees being used in these forest operations, and the type of work they are doing? Will he tell us also whether any attempt is being made to segregate the nazis from the anti-nazis?

Mr. CRERAR: I do not know that I am in position to give my hon. friend the number of prisoners of war working in any particular camp.

Mr. GREEN: I did not ask for those in any particular camp; I wanted the number at work.

Mr. CRERAR: I think I can go as far as saying that last year there were 44,062 man-days. I cannot tell my hon. friend where that work was performed or the number of men who were working at any particular time.

Mr. GREEN: Has any attempt been made to segregate the nazis from the anti-nazis?

Mr. CRERAR: That matter would be under the Department of National Defence; it would have nothing to do with this vote. These people are in the custody of the Department of National Defence, but the cost of supervision is covered by this vote. Trucks are required, and tools and other equipment to enable them to do the work, and that is all charged against this vote. The information in regard to the number should be secured from the Department of National Defence.

Mr. NOSEWORTHY: What is the nature of the operations?

Mr. CRERAR: Some of them are cutting cordwood; others are cutting pit props; others are cutting fence posts and some are doing other lumbering operations.

Mr. NOSEWORTHY: It is useful work?

Mr. CRERAR: Useful and necessary work.

Mr. SHAW: What is the government policy with respect to the sale of posts, pit props, mine ties and so forth? We have a peculiar situation here. The government is not paying wages comparable with those being paid by companies engaged in this work. Are you selling the product at a price comparable with that being charged by those regularly engaged in this type of work?

Mr. CRERAR: The prices at which props or wood or anything else is sold are fixed by the timber controller or the fuel controller, as the case may be. I think that gives the information asked by my hon. friend.

Mr. SHAW: Back in 1942 there developed an acute shortage of pit props, ties and so forth in the minefields of western Canada. I think that shortage was owing to the fact that the price which the producers were able to charge did not enable them to secure labour; in other words, they could not afford to pay the wages asked. At that time the government adopted the policy of paying a subsidy of $3.50 per thousand lineal feet and at the same time they put conscientious objectors and prisoners of war at work producing these commodities. Then in January, 1944, after more than a sufficient quantity of these products had been produced to meet the demand, without notice the subsidy was terminated. The producers of these products had responded to the request of the government and had produced thousands of lineal feet of mine ties and pit props, but before they could deliver them the government notified them on January 20 that the subsidy had been discontinued as of the previous day.

Mr. CRERAR: I do not wish to interrupt my hon. friend, but I think he is talking about something that is not concerned with this vote. There are no subsidies paid under this vote. For one reason or another a number of people were interned, or a number of prisoners of war were available, and they were put to work cutting cordwood, pit props, lumber, fence posts and so on. The Department of Mines and Resources has control of the forest experimental plots or areas and supervises this work. The material produced is disposed under terms set by either the timber controller or the fuel controller. No question of subsidy enters into the matter.

Mr. SHAW: I quite recognize that fact.

Mr. CRERAR: My hon. friend has certainly been good throughout the debate, but I doubt if he is in order in discussing this matter on this item.

Mr. SHAW: Then I will put myself in order by taking the minister's own words that these commodities are disposed of by the department over which he presides and I shall develop my argument on that basis. While I shall not say all I had intended to say, I object to the government utilizing prisoners of war or conscientious objectors to produce a commodity which I believe they have put on the market at a lower price than regular producers can afford to offer it at. I have no objection to these people being put to work; in fact I believe it should be done, but it is not right to compete with established businesses upon an unfair basis. Perhaps I may just mention that while it is true that the pit-prop producers, when the $3.50 subsidy was withdrawn, were allowed to raise their own price by $3.50, when they tried to deliver their materials to the mines they were told by the mine owners, "We do not want your product, because we can buy it from the government at a lower figure." That in itself justifies the criticism which came from the Alberta Mine Timbers Retail association. They protested most vigorously against the use of this type of labour to produce a commodity which, by reason of the circumstances under which it is produced, can be sold at a lower price than regular producers can afford to charge.

While I recognize that the wartime prices and trade board and the Commodity Prices Stabilization corporation are tied in with this, it is sometimes extremely difficult, especially with the set-up as it is to-day, always to be in order when one discusses it, because there are three organizations involved—the two I have mentioned, and a government department. I object to any policy whereby the government puts prisoners of war and conscientious objectors at work to produce a commodity and thus undersell persons who are regularly engaged in that type of work. The minister suggested that that was not being done. I hope not, but we have reason to believe that it is.

Mr. MITCHELL: Prisoners of war and conscientious objectors come under the jurisdiction of the Department of Labour, and I wish my hon. friend clearly to understand that at no time have they been used in competition with what may be termed free labour in an effort to undersell ordinary producers. That is an elementary and fundamental principle. My hon. friend can make any case he likes, but I assure him that under no circumstances is the product of prisoners of war and conscientious objectors underselling the products of free labour.

Mr. ROWE: With reference to the employment of prisoners of war, what the Minister of Labour has said is quite true. The wages which are paid prisoners of war to-day by companies do not cheapen the production of what they create, and certainly in none of the companies by whom they are employed has civilian labour in any way been prejudiced. These people are used only where civilian labour is not sufficiently plentiful. I feel, however, that the scanty proportions of this vote reflect the government's policy toward forest services generally. The minister shakes his head, but we find that from year to year during the war the expenditure in his own department on this work has been less as the years go by. From 1939 to 1942 there has been a very substantial reduction.

The ACTING CHAIRMAN (Mr. Golding): I do not think that upon this item we should get into a general discussion in connection with forests.

Mr. ROWE: This subject pertains to forest services generally, and the amount to be voted under this item has to do only with forest services. I submit that considerable latitude has been taken even by the minister himself; we have been in Russia and Japan and all over the Pacific. We also took in a lot of latitude in the items which preceded this.

The ACTING CHAIRMAN (Mr. Golding): I think too much latitude has been taken under all these items. This particular one states definitely, "Internment and prisoners of war operations"; it does not have to do with general policy in connection with forests.

Mr. ROWE: Very well, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. CRERAR: I wish to make one or two remarks in reply to the hon. member who has just spoken. He is under a misapprehension or perhaps in some confusion. This vote is not intended for forest development work; it is to provide for the supervisory expense of looking after certain internees or prisoners of war.

Mr. ROWE: It is the first item under "forest service".

Mr. CRERAR: Quite true. As I have explained, that is what this vote is for, but my hon. friend is under a misapprehension if he measures by this vote what we are doing in forestry work. In our civil estimates, which in due course will be before the house, is an item of over $300,000 for forestry work. But this has nothing to do with that; it is merely a vote for which we are asking to supervise the work of internees and prisoners of war who happen to be employed at dominion forest experimental stations.

Mr. NOSEWORTHY: The vote last year under this item was $42,445. Will the minister tell us what the actual expenditures were, and also what income accrued to the department through the sale of what these men produced?

Mr. CRERAR: I have already explained to the committee that the work of these internees and prisoners under supervision was directed to the production of cordwood, pit props, a small amount of lumber, fence posts, and pulpwood.

Mr. NOSEWORTHY: Those were sold?

Mr. CRERAR: I can give my hon. friend the figures. There were produced over 16,000 cords of wood, including 5,000 cords to heat the internment camps; 2,750,000 odd lineal feet of mine props; over 12,000 lineal feet of fence posts, including fence posts for the internment camp; over 1,100 cords of pulpwood; and over 55,000 feet board measure of sawn logs. My hon. friend asked what the receipts were. I am sorry we have not that here, but the material was sold at prices fixed by the timber fuel controller.

Item agreed to.

Forest products laboratories, $56,400.

Mr. ROWE: Will the minister explain this item?

Mr. CRERAR: This is war work carried out by the laboratories. The purpose is to ascertain the best means of preservation and fire retardment treatment of wood for various purposes, serviceability of wooden aircraft under different climatic conditions, recovery of ethyl alcohol from wood waste for use in the manufacture of synthetic rubber, the use of paper plastics for aircraft and for other purposes, charcoal for producer gas and metallurgical purposes, the moulding of aircraft parts to double curvature, the seasoning of lumber for special war purposes, and work of that kind. That is all directly related to the war.

Mr. PERLEY: How many different laboratories are there?

Mr. CRERAR: There is one in Montreal, one in Ottawa and one in Vancouver. That is the character of the work done, and the increase is due simply to the increasing demand made on laboratories by war services.

Mr. GREEN: Some time ago there was a discussion about the possibility of setting up a forest products institute in Vancouver in connection with the university of British Columbia. I understand that a tentative agreement was reached between the dominion government, the provincial government and the board of governors at the university and the timber industry at the coast. What progress has been made with that project?

Mr. CRERAR: Some discussions in that regard have gone on with the government of British Columbia, with the university of British Columbia, and with the timber industry in that province, and I understand that substantial progress has been made. The likelihood is that before very long an agreement will be worked out.

Mr. GREEN: When will that project be undertaken? Is it a post-war project?

Mr. CRERAR: It was agreed that it would be post-war, that it would be carried on after the war. It involves the erection of a building, and the provision of facilities and equipment necessary for the work. It would be difficult at the moment to get the labour and materials for the construction and equipment necessary.

Mr. GREEN: But it is the intention to go ahead with it?

Mr. CRERAR: Yes. The agreement is practically worked out and I have no doubt we shall carry it through. At least I hope so.

Mr. ROWE: Is the general laboratory work carried on for post-war as well as for war purposes?

Mr. CRERAR: In Vancouver?

Mr. ROWE: No, in the estimates?

Mr. CRERAR: Yes. It is directed mainly to war work now, but these are the functions carried on by the department in normal times. They have been carrying on research work and investigations but since the war most of the work has been directed to matters relating to the war.

Mr. ROWE: I wish to emphasize again the scanty attention that has been paid by the dominion department to the forest products industry. When one considers what has been done during war years in Germany and in other European countries, one sees that our amounts as well as our efforts are infinitesimal in comparison with the enormous resources we have to deal with. I know the minister does not want me to hold up the estimates, but this afternoon we discussed possible treaties with Russia and the question of how we are going to fight Japan, and what we shall do in the post-war period. Many hon. members on the other side of the house have emphasized the importance of the gold mining industry to give employment in the post-war days, and we can all agree with that.

The ACTING CHAIRMAN (Mr. Golding): Which was all out of order.

Mr. ROWE: No, Mr. Chairman. I submit that the hon. member for Parry Sound was not out of order when he was dealing with gold mining under the minerals item. The minister himself now states that this is for post-war considerations as well. However, I realize that these are war appropriations and I will not hold them up long, though I submit again that this side of the house has not been doing all the holding up. Let me emphasize that our whole approach as a dominion parliament and as a dominion government to our post-war possibilities in the forest products industry, and to post-war employment that will be given by that industry, has been very much neglected. Indeed, it has been a miniature compared with the part that the forest products industry plays in the war and the part that it will play after the war. Just consider the different uses of the forest products of this country, from hospital waddings to the parcelling of goods for the boys overseas, buildings, wall board, as well as ammunition, and all sorts of paper requirements, the things that are used every day in the war. Consider the tremendous shortage that exists and the difficulty we are experiencing in maintaining the supply of pulps for explosives and waddings, pulps to make parcels, and so on. There is, I repeat, a vast shortage and this is a small vote for the laboratory work during war time. The time has come when as a dominion we must assume more of the responsibility for the promotion and encouragement of the second greatest industry in Canada, the one that offers the greatest possibilities in the post-war period, the industry that is second only to food production in the requirements of the war. The minister has mentioned $300,000 that may be brought down later. He says, I believe, that that is more than was spent in 1941 and 1942, when the expenditure was $60,000, less than in 1939. Well, $300,000 is not much for an industry that brings in, in revenue alone, almost $80,000,000 a year, an industry that pays out in wages $200,000,000, an industry that employs between 300,000 and 400,000, an industry that plays a more important part than any other except agriculture. It may be said that this comes under the provinces, in connection with civil and property rights. Well, one might just as well say the same about agriculture. We must realize that if we are to win the war and to win the peace that will follow we must have some practical and creative policies in our approach to a sound development of our great natural resources. Some would say, "Very well, we will handle all that through the state", but if we are to give employment to our people we must realize that we have a part in protecting, maintaining and preserving the great forest wealth of Canada that lies behind such employment.

I am not going to deal with many of the items on which the government might well spend money. The spruce bud-worm situation has been mentioned here. If the government were doing its duty toward our great natural resource it would have a larger vote directed toward the crucial years of the spruce bud-worm infestation, much larger than the amount mentioned here for all other laboratory purposes. I wish to mention only the general principle and the utter neglect which the government has shown toward this great industry not only in recent years but for many years. I am delighted to find that the leader of this party, Mr. John Bracken, who has studied the problems of this industry, as he has carefully studied the problems of other industries, made a speech not long ago in which he demonstrated his appreciation of the part our forest resources may play in post-war development. I urge the minister seriously not only to consider increasing this vote, but when he brings down his other estimates, not to talk about $300,000, but to assume the responsibility that he should toward an industry that has been so long forgotten.

I realize that this item is not a large one. I am not criticizing it for its size; I am criticizing it because it is scanty and is an indication of the government's appreciation of the problem. In this dominion we have done practically nothing for the forest industry. The minister's department has spent more on the national parks of Canada alone than on the promotion of all the forest products of the country. When one stops to realize it, Mr. Chairman, one must think that if we have not awakened in peace times we should have awakened in war time, and for war purposes we should at least be abreast of other nations who have been spending not in one year but for twenty years amounts that make us look like a backward nation. We are a nation that holds the key to the greatest forest resources development of any nation in the world. I urge the minister to reconsider, especially when he is bringing down his other estimates, increasing the vote in order to do the many things that are waiting to be done. I urge that he increase his other vote and give forestry its proper place in this country.

I may say here that after the next election—and it may not be long in coming; it is well indicated now—we shall have a keener appreciation of the forestry industry and we are likely to have a forestry department. In the meantime the minister who has had a long experience in the mines department, may at least take a leaf out of the constructive book of Mr. Bracken and show some progressive productivity.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Where is he?

Mr. ROWE: He is out studying the problems that hon. members who have just made that remark do not understand, and I am glad that we see the results of some of that study in a clear comprehension of the problems that confront this country.

Mr. CRERAR: The boundless optimism of my hon. friend as to what may happen in the next election certainly challenges one's admiration. He chides us for the smallness of this vote. He criticizes the government because of its parsimony in dealing with the problems of the forest wealth of this country, and he evinces a remarkably keen interest—

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): Newly discovered.

Mr. CRERAR: —a newly discovered interest in pushing forward the value of our timber assets. I do not know how recent the conversion of my hon. friend to that point of view has been, but if he will take the trouble to go back eight years, to the time when his party was in power, and compare the amounts that the Conservative party, as it then was, appropriated for work of this kind with the amounts that have been appropriated and expended since this government came into power, even under the stress of war years, he will find, I think, some food for thought.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): He knows that.

Mr. CRERAR: In the observations that he has made—

Mr. ROWE: I said that.

Mr. CRERAR: —the hon. gentleman is evidently putting a great deal of faith in Mr. Bracken. Well, I do not quarrel with that. I know Mr. Bracken.

Mr. SENN: You should know him.

Mr. CRERAR: I may say to my hon. friend that I supported Mr. Bracken in several provincial elections in Manitoba. I supported him when the Conservative party were calling him everything under the sun—and trying their best to destroy him.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): They are now.

Mr. CRERAR: If my hon. friend wants the proof let him look up the newspaper files of those days. I am glad he thinks Mr. Bracken is interested in a forest policy. I believe he is. Probably Mr. Bracken is a little more interested in a forest policy than he is in the official opposition in this house at the present time, if I may judge by everything I can learn about Mr. Bracken's work.

Mr. PERLEY: What did the minister think of his present leader when he first came to this house?

Mr. CRERAR: Well, now—

Mr. ROWE: Look up the records on that.

Mr. CRERAR: The hon. member for Qu'Appelle does not need to barge into this discussion in this way because he was one of the gentlemen, if I mistake not, who came into Manitoba and campaigned against Mr. Bracken.

Mr. PERLEY: I ask the minister to withdraw that. Never in the world did I make a speech in Manitoba against Mr. Bracken. I went into Manitoba and spoke against the minister's government but never against Mr. Bracken.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: And they elected us.

Mr. CRERAR: If my hon. friend did not, and I think my memory is right—perhaps my hon. friend is right, but there is no question that the hon. member for Qu'Appelle lent all the moral support he could to the Conservative party in Manitoba when it was seeking night and day every day in the week to destroy Mr. Bracken.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): "Bracken must go" was the slogan.

Mr. CRERAR: "Bracken must go" was the slogan, a man unfit to be premier of Manitoba. The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre could support my statements to that effect if he would care to do so. Therefore it is rather amusing; it is, indeed, decidedly interesting, to hear the hon. member for Dufferin rise in his place as he did to-night and in the best preachment style of which he is capable—and he is some performer in that direction—admonish this government and criticize it because it has failed to show proper regard to the development of the forest industry in this country.

Mr. ROWE: I said, "All governments in the country"; I did not confine it only to this government.

Mr. CRERAR: My hon. friend did not say that.

Mr. ROWE: Yes, I did; I said "all governments".

Mr. CRERAR: My hon. friend directed his shafts at this government.

Mr. ROWE: I said "all governments".

Mr. CRERAR: If you go back to the days prior to the Conservative regime of 1930, that started in those unfortunate early years of 1930, what do you find the government of the day, the Liberal government, did? Look at the records and see what it was spending on work of this kind and contrast it with, I was almost going to say the parsimony of my hon. friend's party when it was in power from 1930 to 1935. Contrast that again with what has been done from 1935 up to the present time, even during the last five years of war. Why, my hon. friend has not a single peg on which to hang his hat.

Mr. ROWE: That is why we need a new interest now; we have a new day coming.

Mr. CRERAR: The new interest that would be provided by my hon. friend would be a retrograde interest. I would be desperately afraid if the thing were entrusted to my hon. friend. However, this vote does not cover what the department is doing for the development of forest resources; it is merely for the supervision of the work of these prisoners of war in internment camps.

Item agreed to.

Alternative service work camps, $127,000.

Mr. PERLEY: Would the minister explain this and tell us where these camps are established?

Mr. CRERAR: The alternative service camps are in three national parks; Banff, Kootenay and Riding Mountain, and in Kananaskis forest station in Alberta and the Petawawa forest station in Ontario.

Mr. PERLEY: What is the nature of the work?

Mr. CRERAR: It is the same as I explained under the previous vote; that is, pit props, cordwood, pulpwood, fence posts and other products of that kind.

Mr. PERLEY: You are keeping away from Saskatchewan on this vote?

Mr. CRERAR: Yes. The only part of that province in which we could get this work done would be away up in the northern section.

Mr. STIRLING: Would the minister say how he finds the Doukhobors work in his camps?

Mr. CRERAR: Fortunately or unfortunately, personally I think fortunately, we have no Doukhobors in any of these camps.

Mr. STIRLING: In none of the alternative service camps?

Mr. CRERAR: No.

Mr. NEILL: Where is the British Columbia camp?

Mr. CRERAR: In Kootenay national park, which is between Banff and Golden.

Item agreed to.

National parks bureau—
Alternative service work camps, $250,000.

Mr. KNOWLES: Would the minister explain why this description appears in two separate items? First we have alternative service work camps, $127,000, and now alternative service work camps, $250,000. Is the work different? Why should there be two items dealing with this matter?

Mr. CRERAR: One covers the work in the dominion experimental forest stations I mentioned a moment ago, Kananaskis in Alberta and Petawawa in Ontario. The other is for the work in the national parks, which I also mentioned; Kootenay, Banff and Riding Mountain. It is merely a distinction. Probably they could have been linked together, but putting it in this form gives more complete information.

Mr. KNOWLES: Then the camps you mentioned cover both these items?

Mr. CRERAR: Yes.

Item agreed to.

Surveys and engineering branch—
Prince Rupert–Terrace–Cedarvale highway, $3,000,000.

Mr. REID: Would the minister give a break-down of this item? Would he also explain why the federal government, after starting a highway which when completed was to extend from Vancouver to Prince Rupert, should leave a small portion of eighteen miles for the provincial government to complete? The people of British Columbia, and particularly those of the Prince Rupert district, are rather incensed at the federal government for leaving that small portion to be completed by the province. Would the minister explain this item and why that work is being left to the province?

Mr. CRERAR: It will be necessary to deal very briefly with the genesis of this road. Ordinarily, as the hon. member for New Westminster knows, the dominion government does not go into a province and build a road. Years ago, under the government of the present Prime Minister, we did build what is known as the Big Bend highway in British Columbia. The road under discussion never would have been undertaken by the federal government if it had not been for the needs of war. The suggestion for the road came first, I believe, from the United States chiefs of staff; it was concurred in by the Canadian chiefs of staff, and was recommended by the permanent joint board on defence. Its origin is similar to that of the Alaska highway, the development of the Canol project which we were discussing this afternoon, and other matters. In considering the defence of North America the military authorities had to keep constantly in mind the possibility that coastal traffic would be interrupted. At a certain period of the war that was a danger. There was a road of sorts, capable of supporting truck traffic, from Vancouver to Hazelton, on the old Grand Trunk Pacific.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: A road of sorts.

Mr. CRERAR: Parts of it were all right; parts perhaps were not so good. At any rate it was a passable road. There was also a road of sorts from Hazelton toward Terrace, which under certain weather conditions was capable of being used by vehicles. Between Cedarvale and Prince Rupert, for a distance of ninety-seven miles, there was no road whatever. That country was a wilderness; the only outlet was the old Grand Trunk Pacific railway. It is not my place or my function to pass judgment upon the opinions held by military people, but certainly the chiefs of staff at Washington, supported by the chiefs of staff in Canada and the permanent joint defence board, recommended the construction of this road from Terrace to Prince Rupert in order to provide an alternative route in case the railroad should be destroyed. This was predicated, perhaps, on a very long chance that coastal communications might be interrupted.

Mr. GREEN: The chance was not so long at one time.

Mr. CRERAR: Perhaps not; I agree with the hon. member for Vancouver South that there was a definite possibility. That is why the road was undertaken. Nothing was known about the country, so that reconnaissance surveys had to be run. The work was entrusted to the Department of Mines and Resources, and under the surveys and engineering branch, in charge of Mr. Wardle, these surveys were made as speedily as possible. Undoubtedly greater difficulties intervened than had been expected. Surveys had to be made. There was a good deal of rock work, and much heavy timber to be moved. There was difficulty in getting labour and in getting materials. There were unfavourable climatic conditions, all of which increased the cost of the road, and delayed its construction very considerably beyond the period at which it was hoped it would be completed.

The fortunes of war have changed. If conditions at the beginning of 1942 had been as they are to-day, the probability is that the road would not have been recommended. It was built as insurance, and was thoroughly justified on that ground.

Mr. REID: Why not complete it?

Mr. CRERAR: I shall deal with that. The road was not constructed as an ordinary provincial road. The building of roads within provinces is the function and responsibility of the provinces.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: Not all roads.

Mr. CRERAR: Yes, all roads, with the exception of the transcontinental highway, where the federal government has assumed certain responsibilities. But this road was constructed for military purposes. That military need has disappeared.

Mr. GREEN: Not necessarily.

Mr. CRERAR: Well, the military need, in the opinion of the chiefs of staff, has, I think pretty well disappeared.

Mr. REID: Sometimes they have been wrong.

Mr. CRERAR: The road, in addition to the original section from Terrace to Prince Rupert, has an additional mileage from Terrace to Kitwanga. That was also included in the construction. It is expected that the total cost will be between $10,000,000 and $11,000,000.

[Mr. Crerar.]

Mr. HANSON (Skeena): The minister has said that the chiefs of staff have decided that the completion of the road is not necessary. I am of opinion, and I am sure that the chiefs of staff recommended that this road should be completed—

Mr. CRERAR: Well, now—

Mr. HANSON (Skeena): —because it was necessary.

Mr. CRERAR: The chiefs of staff recommended the road, in the first instance. Now they do not think conditions warrant the government extending the road. I think that is right.

Mr. SINCLAIR: Finish, not extend.

Mr. CRERAR: No; the demand is that the road should be built further by the federal government. The whole matter was carefully considered by the government. In this appropriation we have $3,000,000 to complete some sections of the road which were not completed, and for maintenance purposes during the year.

Now, what the province gets out of it is 110 miles of a good and completed road, with bridges.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: What does the dominion get out of it?

Mr. CRERAR: The dominion gets—

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: Security.

Mr. CRERAR: Well, yes, it gets security, which was indicated in the first instance. But I say now—

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: Is the war over?

Mr. CRERAR: I say now to the committee that I do not think the road would have been undertaken, in the light of conditions as they exist to-day.

Mr. REID: The same applies to the Alaska highway.

Mr. CRERAR: Of course.

Mr. GREEN: Will this vote finish the road?

Mr. CRERAR: This vote will complete the road to Kitwanga, and there is in the vote the amount necessary to maintain it during this season. There is the possibility that in the spring some bridges or culverts may go out. The road is new; we have to gain by experience. But the vote was intended to cover the completion of the road from Kitwanga to Prince Rupert, and to maintain it this season.

Mr. GREEN: Apparently there are some sections which will not be finished. Which sections are they?

Mr. CRERAR: The extension between Kitwanga and Hazelton.

Mr. GREEN: How far is that?

Mr. CRERAR: About twenty-three miles, I am informed. It is not up to the standard of the road from Kitwanga to Prince Rupert. There was a road there. The provincial government had spent money on a road at that point. Under certain weather conditions it is passable, so I am informed.

Mr. REID: And now they are left holding the bag.

Mr. GREEN: Surely that does not make sense—for the government to take this attitude. Surely this plan does not make sense. I understand that the vote will complete the road, with the exception of a bit in the middle of it.

Mr. CRERAR: No.

Mr. GREEN: Fourteen miles will not be completed?

Mr. CRERAR: No, no.

Mr. GREEN: And several millions have been spent on it. Why not complete the road as quickly as possible? The minister has referred to supplies being moved to Prince Rupert. It was not only a question of supplies, and still is not. It is also a question of bringing troops up from reserve. While we are very glad that the menace is not nearly as great as it was before, yet Prince Rupert is the most exposed centre on Canada's Pacific coast, and nobody can tell what may yet happen. The Japanese fleet has not yet been destroyed.

Mr. REID: And the road may be required at any time.

Mr. GREEN: And until the Japanese fleet is destroyed, we are not justified in taking chances. I would suggest that the minister ask for sufficient money to complete the road. It does seem foolish to leave a fourteen-mile gap which cannot be used in certain seasons of the year. Where on earth is the business sense in that?

Mr. CRERAR: My hon. friend is under a misapprehension. The road from Kitwanga to Hazelton is a passable road even to-day.

Mr. GREEN: In certain seasons, the minister says.

Mr. CRERAR: Probably if there were heavy rains, and muddy conditions, there might be some difficulty with traffic. But it is a passable road. It was not included in the first recommendation by the chiefs of staff. That covered only from Terrace to Prince Rupert. Later on, the additional stretches between Terrace, Cedarvale and Kitwanga were included. Now the demand is that another stretch from Kitwanga to Hazelton be included. Do that, and someone else comes along and says, "Well, there is another stretch of a hundred miles down this way, which is not in good shape, and which should be included." The government wishes to be perfectly fair in the matter, but we have not an inexhaustible supply of money, as hon. members know. The provision of money is for the Department of Finance.

Mr. KUHL: I thought it was a question of men and material.

Mr. CRERAR: The hon. member for New Westminster stated that British Columbia was left holding the bag.

Mr. REID: I did, and I repeat it.

Mr. CRERAR: Is British Columbia left holding the bag when we have spent $11,000,000 in building 112 miles of road, which is going to British Columbia, free?

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: If you do not finish it, we are.

Mr. CRERAR: I would be willing to be left holding the bag under those circumstances.

Mr. GREEN: With a gap in the middle?

Mr. REID: You did not finish it.

Mr. CRERAR: Yes, we did.

Mr. REID: No, you did not.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: You did not finish it.

Mr. HANSON (Skeena): Since this road is in my riding I think I can give the committee some information about it. From Vancouver, British Columbia, this road is approximately 1,200 miles. The provincial government have built the road from Vancouver to a point fifteen miles west of Hazelton, or a distance of about 900 miles. The federal government undertook to build the road to link up that road to Prince Rupert. According to the minister, the government has spent something like $11,000,000. There is fourteen miles of this road which is passable at certain times of the year, and I understand that it will take about $100,000 to link these sections up. If a business man or a corporation spent a thousand dollars on a project and then needed to spend only $10 to finish it, I think they would complete the job. The minister says that there is some responsibility on the provincial government, but when the provincial government has built something like 900 miles and the federal government undertakes to build 200 miles, I do not think they should stop at mile 178. As I say, this section of the road can be gone over with a model T Ford which has a sufficiently high clearance. If this road were linked up it would provide transportation from Prince Rupert to Vancouver. If it were necessary to evacuate troops from Prince Rupert they would not be able to take them over these fourteen miles of road except in a model T truck.

Mr. GRAYDON: It looks as though they are playing both ends against the middle.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: There is not any middle.

Mr. HANSON (Skeena): They are playing the middle against both ends. Boards of trade and other interested bodies have appealed to the government to complete this road. I also know that the officers commanding have recommended that the gap be closed up. The provincial and dominion governments should get together and complete this gap. It is absolutely impossible to convince any layman that it should not be completed. I should like to ask the minister the total amount spent on the road up to the present time and what would be necessary to complete it to Kitwanga.

Mr. CRERAR: The amount spent to March 31, 1944, was $8,619,000 in round figures; of this vote $1,500,000 is to complete construction, which will make the total cost of construction roughly $10,119,000. The amount of road to be completed is not fourteen miles as the hon. member for Skeena states, but twenty-three miles.

Mr. HANSON (Skeena): Ten miles of the road from Hazelton is passable road.

Mr. CRERAR: It would cost several hundred thousand dollars to complete the road. There are difficulties in connection with materials and labour.

Mr. O'NEILL: It must be almost a solid tunnel if it is going to cost that much.

Mr. HANSON (Skeena): The estimate of the provincial public works engineer is less than a hundred thousand dollars.

Mr. CRERAR: That is simply to repair the existing road. To build a road of the same standard would cost over half a million dollars.

Mr. REID: I do not think the minister gave the complete picture. The information we have is that when the United States military men looked over the north country there was some kind of agreement arrived at whereby they would build the Alaska highway through Canada, which would become the property of the government of Canada, and Canada would build a road into Prince Rupert. As anyone from British Columbia knows, Prince Rupert is largely a United States city because there are so many United States troops there. That was a definite understanding, and I am rather surprised to hear the minister say that the project is not being completed because of a lack of $100,000. An undertaking was given that a road would be built from Hazelton to Prince Rupert, and not carrying out that project meant not carrying out the bargain that was entered into when the road was started.

Mr. CRERAR: Who gave that undertaking that a road would be built from Hazelton to Prince Rupert?

Mr. HANSON (Skeena): It was to connect up with the provincial highway at Cedarvale. There was no highway from Terrace to Cedarvale and the section of road to Kitwanga was impassable.

Mr. REID: If the United States government had not carried out its agreement to build the Alaska highway—

An hon. MEMBER: Or Canol.

Mr. REID: —we would have claimed a breach of the agreement. I urge the minister to consider this matter and see to it that this road is completed.

PENSIONS

OLD AGE AND THE BLIND—CHANGES IN ADMINISTRATION

Hon. J. L. ILSLEY (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I wish to make a statement in regard to pensions for the aged and the blind.

As a result of negotiations with the provinces extending over several months, agreement has been reached on a number of changes in the administration of this scheme. I now wish to table two orders in council which have been passed implementing these changes. Before the new proposals become operative, a supplementary agreement must be entered into with each of the provinces. However, it is expected that in view of the provincial agreement to the substance of these changes, there will be no delay in the execution of these agreements. The effective date of their coming into force will be April 1, 1944, or such later date in the case of any province as may be desired by that province.

The most important change increases the amount of allowable outside income which a pensioner may have. When the maximum amount of pension was increased in 1943 from $240 to $300 a year, the maximum total income which a pensioner could have from all sources was allowed to remain at $365 a year. The allowable income from sources other than old age pension was therefore reduced from $125 to $65 a year. With the consent of the provinces, we are now providing for an increase in the maximum income which a pensioner may receive from $365 to $425 a year. In other words, the pensioner will be allowed other income of $125 a year instead of $65 a year, without a reduction in the amount of his pension. The maximum income allowed blind pensioners will also be increased by the amount of $60 a year.

While the amendment will not increase the maximum pension of $300 a year, it will benefit pensioners with small incomes who could not previously qualify for the increase in pension granted in 1943. Those who are now receiving an old age pension at the maximum rate of $25 a month would not be entitled to receive an increase in the amount of their pension, unless by way of supplemental allowances which are now being paid in certain provinces.

Other amendments are intended to meet as far as may be practicable under the present law the difficulties arising out of the residence qualifications. Certain of the existing regulations were causing disappointment and difficulty for pension applicants who for various reasons had been outside of Canada for extended periods or had found it necessary to transfer their residence from one part of Canada to another. One proposed change will enable an applicant who failed to qualify with the sixteen years' residence requirement between the ages of fifty and seventy, in the case of an applicant for an old age pension, and between the ages of twenty and forty in the case of an applicant for a blind pension, to make up the deficiency by a further period of residence in Canada equal to the deficiency. Under the old regulations in some extreme cases he might have had to wait sixteen full years following his return to Canada before he qualified for a pension. Another proposed change will eliminate the necessity of an applicant who has recently moved to a new province returning to the province of previous residence for the sole purpose of applying for a pension.

Other cases of difficulty with regard to the residence requirement were found in instances of temporary absence from Canada as a result of service on ships or in fishing. The new regulation will permit such periods of temporary absence to count as residence in Canada provided the applicant maintained a self-contained domestic establishment in Canada during such periods.

Some weeks ago the house was advised that although there had been in the past certain legal doubt as to whether the clause relating to recoveries from estates of deceased pensioners was mandatory or permissive in its effect, the dominion in accordance with later legal advice had indicated to the provincial pension authorities that whether or not recovery should be made from estates where the net value does not exceed $2,000 would be left entirely to their discretion.

These changes represent the result of a very careful examination of the steps which the dominion would recommend to make the present legislation meet the immediate practical problems without radical revision of the whole scheme.

As the house will recall, the speech from the throne stated that the working out of a comprehensive national scheme of social security, in which federal and provincial activities will be integrated, will require further consultation and close cooperation with the provinces and indicated that the government would be prepared "when suitable agreements are reached with the provinces," to recommend a measure for a national scheme of contributory old age pensions on a more generous basis than that at present in operation.

The adoption of a national scheme of contributory old age pensions would involve a fundamental revision of our old age pension legislation. This must, of necessity, await the holding of the dominion-provincial conference.

In adopting a contributory system it will, in my opinion, be found advisable not only to increase the scale of pensions but to reduce the eligible age and to have the pensions paid as a matter of right rather than on the basis of a means test, which is an essential feature of the present scheme and the cause of most of its administrative difficulties.

Certain of the provinces would be agreeable to lowering the eligible age from seventy to sixty-five years immediately for the non-contributory pensions being paid under the present scheme. It is, however, very doubtful whether it would be possible to obtain the agreement of all the provinces to such a reduction of the eligible age under the present scheme, as this would be a very far-reaching change involving a substantial increase in the financial and administrative burdens upon the provinces. If nevertheless, all or substantially all the provinces should make representations to the dominion government in favour of lowering the eligible age from seventy to sixty-five years under the present scheme, I can assure the house that the government will be prepared to give consideration to the acceptance of such representations as an interim measure in anticipation of and pending discussions with the provinces regarding a contributory scheme.

Mr. GORDON GRAYDON (Leader of the Opposition): May I ask whether the government has given consideration also to the position in which some older people appear to find themselves with respect to assigned pay and dependent's allowances? In some instances considerable hardship has been suffered by older people by reason of deductions in their old age pensions because dependent's allowances and assigned pay have been granted them through some member of their families being in the armed forces. Will the minister look into that? I have in mind one particular case of extreme hardship, and that is what prompted me to ask the question.

Mr. ILSLEY: If the hon. gentleman will let me have the case I shall look into it. The matter has been fully considered and explained on many occasions in the house.

Mr. GRAYDON: I shall be glad to do that.

Mr. ILSLEY: A change was made in the regulations some time ago.

[Later:]

On the orders of the day:

Mr. E. E. PERLEY (Qu'Appelle): A very important announcement was made by the Minister of Finance with respect to pensions at the opening of to-day's sitting. I believe that some forecast of this announcement was made in Saskatchewan over the week-end. Before the announcement was made in this house it was said in Saskatchewan that further consideration was being given to the matter. With what is going on in that province we might expect things like that to happen.

Mr. GRAYDON: Would the Minister of Finance make some comment on the question asked by the hon. member for Qu'Appelle with respect to the premature notice given to the people of Saskatchewan in regard to the changes in the old age pension regulations?

Mr. ILSLEY: I certainly gave none. I gave no notice of any kind ahead of the notice in this house. In fact part of what I announced was not decided on until noon to-day; therefore it could not have been communicated to the electors of Saskatchewan.

Mr. GRAYDON: The other part might have been.

Mr. PERLEY: Certain candidates have been peddling it for quite a few days.

Mr. ILSLEY: What did they say? What have they been peddling?

Mr. PERLEY: They have been visiting those who receive the old age pensions telling them what was likely to happen.

Mr. ILSLEY: What did they tell them?

GRAIN

STATEMENT RESPECTING GOVERNMENT MARKETING AND PRICE POLICY

Hon. J. A. MacKINNON (Minister of Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, on April 27 I reported to the house that the basis of wheat marketings for the 1944-45 crop year would have to be determined at a later date, when account could be taken of the development of the 1944-45 crop, the probable export and domestic demand, and the elevator space and transportation available for handling the 1944-45 grain crops. The government will be in a much better position in July to appraise these factors bearing on the need for delivery quotas and an over-all limitation on wheat deliveries from the 1944 crop. For the balance of the 1943-44 crop year, however, I wish to announce that the eighteen-bushel limitation per authorized acre will be removed forthwith.

In the spring of 1941 owing to lack of available storage and restricted export demand, the policy of limiting deliveries to estimated export and domestic demand for the ensuing crop year was instituted. This policy meant, in effect, that the dominion government would permit marketings of that quantity of wheat which could be disposed of within the crop year. In 1941-42 the limitation was set at 230,000,000 bushels for all of Canada; in 1942-43 the limitation was 280,000,000 bushels for the west, and for the present crop year 1943-44 deliveries in the west were first limited to fourteen bushels per authorized acre; later this figure was increased to eighteen bushels per authorized acre.

As members of the house know, during the past year the demand for Canadian wheat, both at home and abroad, has increased substantially. To date in the present crop year, commercial disappearance of Canadian wheat has amounted to about 350,000,000 bushels, as compared with 213,000,000 bushels for the same period last year. We conservatively estimate that commercial disappearance of Canadian wheat for the crop year 1943-44 will amount to 425,000,000 bushels, as compared with 270,000,000 bushels during 1942-43. From August 1, 1943, to May 19, 1944, producers in the prairie provinces marketed 230,000,000 bushels of wheat, or 120,000,000 bushels less than commercial demand for Canadian wheat during the crop year to date.

The Canadian wheat board carefully surveyed remaining farm stocks in the prairie provinces and estimate that producers will market about 265,000,000 bushels of wheat under the eighteen-bushel limitation, and about 305,000,000 bushels if the restriction on deliveries is removed for the balance of the crop year. In other words, with the restriction on deliveries removed for the balance of the crop year, marketings during the present crop year will still remain about 120,000,000 bushels less than commercial disappearance for the crop year.

Available storage space in country elevators has been increasing rapidly in recent months, and at the present time there is over 100,000,000 bushels of space available for the immediate delivery of grain in the three prairie provinces, and grain is being shipped out of country elevators at a rapid rate.

The government's decision removing the restriction on the marketing of wheat for the balance of the crop year is therefore based upon a careful appraisal of domestic and export demand and the storage situation which now exists in western Canada.

Mr. FAIR: May I ask the minister whether the announcement he has just made removes the need for using our quota books at this time?

Mr. MacKINNON (Edmonton West): The announcement is to the effect that the over-all restriction of eighteen bushels per authorized acre is removed.

Mr. FAIR: We will not use our quota books any more this season?

Mr. MacKINNON (Edmonton West): The circumstances under which the quota books will still be needed this year will be if there is congestion at certain specified country elevators. In that case they will be needed until space is available.

[Later:]

On the orders of the day:

Mr. E. E. PERLEY (Qu'Appelle): The Minister of Trade and Commerce made a very important announcement when he said that restrictions would be removed for the 1943 crop. I am sure that will facilitate the farmers getting rid of a lot of the 1942 crop. I know that a lot of them still have it.

About ten days ago the minister made a statement with respect to participation certificate payments. He said that ten thousand went out in one mail. Could he tell the house now how many of the 1940 payments have been made and to what provinces they have gone?

Hon. J. A. MacKINNON (Minister of Trade and Commerce): I am not just sure that I caught the hon. gentleman's questions correctly; there was considerable talking going on in this neighbourhood. I believe the question had to do with the participation payments that have gone out on the 1942 crop.

Mr. PERLEY: No; the 1940 crop. The minister made a statement the other day to the effect that some ten thousand cheques had gone out in one mail. I should like to know how many have gone out since and to what province.

Mr. MacKINNON (Edmonton West): I misunderstood or incorrectly heard the hon. member for Qu'Appelle. I thought he was asking about the 1942 crop. I was quite sure that he knew the payments on the 1942 crop would be a matter of the future. I did not make a statement that ten thousand cheques had gone out in one mail. I said that some ten thousand cheques were issued on the first day and a half. I can very easily inquire and find out actually how many cheques have been issued since. All I know at the moment is that the cheques are continuing to go out in volume. If the hon. member would like to know the exact number that have gone out I can quite easily get that for him.

Mr. PERLEY: I should like to have that.

STRAWBERRIES

PRICES IN BRITISH COLUMBIA—MOTION FOR ADJOURNMENT UNDER STANDING ORDER 31

Mr. G. A. CRUICKSHANK (Fraser Valley): Mr. Speaker, I desire to ask leave of the house to move, seconded by the hon. member for Vancouver North (Mr. Sinclair) the adjournment of the house to discuss a definite matter of urgent public importance namely, that the price set for strawberries in British Columbia by administration order A-1224, effective to-day, is so low that the farmers are unable to pick their berries and the crop is therefore going to waste.

Mr. SPEAKER: The hon. member has given me a statement of the reasons why he asks leave to move the adjournment of the house. I find that there is a degree of urgency. The hon. member for Fraser Valley moves, seconded by the hon. member for Vancouver North (Mr. Sinclair) for leave to adjourn the house on the grounds stated by him. Is it the pleasure of the house that the hon. member shall have leave to move the adjournment of the house?

And leave having been granted:

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: First of all I should like to point out that this does not concern just my riding; it concerns the whole province of British Columbia. It just happens that most of the berries and small fruits generally are in my riding.

I should like to point out to you, Mr. Speaker, and to the minister that the berry growers in my riding are not by any manner of means complaining of the action of the war-time prices and trade board in trying to control the cost of production and inflation; but we are emphatic in our opinion that deflation is far more important than inflation. While we approve the idea of controlling inflation, we certainly ask the minister to protect us as berry growers from the deflation which we think will result from the board's order.

For the benefit of hon. members who are not familiar with small fruit growing I might explain that in the first place the land has to be of high quality, that it has to be very intensely cultivated and well and properly fertilized to get anything like a decent crop. In the province of British Columbia we are faced with a higher original cost for our land, with higher taxes on that class of land than in any other part of the country, and with higher wages in connection with all branches of berry growing or other small fruit production. I presume hon. members are familiar with the figures set out in the order which goes into effect to-day.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): What are they?

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: I will answer that question in a moment. I am moving the adjournment of the house to-day because I think it is quite obvious to every hon. member of the house that in connection with a perishable fruit of any kind, if remedial action is to be taken that must be done at once.

With respect to the order, the dominion is divided into three zones for the purposes of the price ceiling. Ontario and Quebec are in zone 1, the maritimes are in zone 2, and British Columbia is in zone 3. Incidentally the figures for the maritimes are the same as those for British Columbia, so that I need only give the figures for Ontario and Quebec and British Columbia. Effective as of to-day the maximum price in zone 3 is 27 cents a quart, or 14½ cents a pint—and I would point out to the house that in my province we deal in pints rather than quarts. That is the maximum price to the producer. For the same period the price to the consumer is set at 39 cents a quart or 22 cents a pint. After June 17 the farmer in British Columbia will be allowed only 12 cents a pint. We cannot possibly produce berries in my province at that rate. I do not want to weary the house any more than is necessary, but this is a matter of vital importance not only to the farmers but to the whole economic structure of British Columbia.

Incidentally I should like to say a word about deflation. This government has been very proud of what it has done under the Veterans' Land Act, about which I shall have something to say later; they are proud of what is to be done for the veterans when they come home. We have taken over some 750 Japanese farms in the province of British Columbia, which are being held for our veterans. All these farms were devoted to the production of berries prior to the evacuation of the Japanese, and no soldier can carry on at deflated prices. No member from British Columbia has been consulted, nor to the best of my knowledge has any organization of producers in that province been consulted by the board in arriving at these figures. In fairness to the board I must say that I think they want to do the right thing, as I know the minister wants to do the right thing for the farmers of British Columbia and every other part of Canada, but I do not think a sufficiently thorough study of the problem was made before setting the figures at which we are expected to produce.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): What prices are you suggesting?

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: I shall come to that in a moment, and will carry New Brunswick with me, if my hon. friend will give me time. In 1943 the cost of production in British Columbia was 12·57 cents a pound, but effective as of to-day we are allowed only 14½ cents a pound and after June 17 will be allowed only 12 cents. In the eastern part of British Columbia berries will not come to production until after June 17. In the Fraser valley and the lower mainland they will commence to come into production about June 10. The dominion and provincial governments are not even opening their pickers hostel at Haney, in the heart of the Fraser valley fruit district, until June 10; yet this order is put into effect as of May 29. In passing I want to say that the selling figures I am giving are not my estimates; I am quoting the figures given by the gentleman whom I understand is in charge of this matter, Mr. E. J. Chambers, the administrator of fresh fruits and vegetables for the wartime prices and trade board. The production figures were prepared by a large berry cooperative.

An hon. MEMBER: Mr. Chambers is from British Columbia.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: Yes, and he is a very fine man, as are all men who come from British Columbia. In arriving at his figures he refers to the years 1938, 1939, 1940, and 1941. The approximate average for those four years, at the shipping point, was slightly over $1.60 per crate. I want the farmer members of this house, particularly, to think of that. This gentleman is basing the prices he is setting in the year 1944, with present cost of production, on the prices received by the Japanese farmers in the province of British Columbia. How can anyone expect a white farmer to operate under similar conditions? I do not say that the Japanese received enough; I know they did not, according to the figures given by the board. Again these are not my figures; they are quoted by the wartime prices and trade board. In 1941 the average price of berries per quart in the province of British Columbia was 8·9 cents. Can you imagine that?—8·9 cents for a quart of berries. In 1942 the price was 12 cents; in 1943 it was 33 cents, yet this year we are asked to produce for a maximum of 27 cents, though when we can get it we are paying hoeing labour 50 to 65 cents an hour. Last Saturday right in this city berries were selling at 59 cents a quart or 30 cents a pint.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): They are imported.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: I do not care where they come from. I am getting a good deal of assistance from the hon. member for York-Sunbury, for which I am grateful. While berries are being imported and sold at this rate, we are not shipping. I wonder if any member of the wartime prices and trade board or any member of this house ever saw them picking strawberries for the first shipments. Why, in a field of strawberries the size of this room you would be extremely lucky to get two crates of berries. That is no exaggeration; in order to get our berries to that early market they have to be picked here, there and everywhere throughout the field, because only a few are ripe and in condition.

Another thing to be kept in mind is that unfortunately in British Columbia we are not heavily industrialized and do not have the large early market. We ship our berries largely to the prairie provinces, and in order to ship them over the mountains you must pick the berries at a certain stage and under certain weather conditions or they will not stand the trip. Apparently some people have the idea that we just turn the pickers loose with pails, but that is not the way they are picked in British Columbia. The berries must be sorted, graded and packed, and that all costs money. I presume it is the same in other parts of Canada, but I am speaking from my knowledge of British Columbia.

How they arrived at these prices, I do not know, but from their own statement they have used as a basis the average for the four years I mentioned. They also based it, as I understand it—and again there was no statement—on the assumption that they expected twenty per cent of our berries would be shipped by crate. I know, and every farmer member knows—probably there are some others who are not so familiar with the country—that we make our profits on crated berries, shipped to the higher priced market. This year, according to their own figures, the board states we will get an average of $3 a crate. They are working on the assumption, again according to their own statement, that we begin shipping on May 29—to-day. In eastern British Columbia they do not start until after the seventeenth, and in other parts until the twentieth. I do not blame the board for that, because no man alive can predict when we will ship, or how many we will ship, because the Lord Almighty attends to that. It is a perishable product, as we all know. But they base their price upon $2.88 as a maximum, and a rate of 12 cents a pint is allowed. There is a maximum amount of 14½ cents a pint. They base their average of $3, according to their statement, on the assumption that the farmer will ship on May 29. Well, we are not by any means starting to ship at that time. They also base their average of $3 on the assumption that we are going to ship twenty per cent by crate. The actual facts are that last year the largest strawberry shippers in British Columbia shipped out of one of their freight centres exactly ten per cent in crates and ninety per cent in jam. Yet these geniuses down here in Ottawa can tell us that we are going to ship twenty per cent by crate, starting to-day, when the berries are not even ripe. That is the position they take, when actually last year we shipped only ten per cent. As hon. members know, when the berries are made into jam you get a very low price.

Last year the average cost of pickers in British Columbia was four cents a pint. That is the way we pay our pickers out there. We pay a basic rate of four cents, and a bonus for staying the whole season. I assume that that is done in other areas of Canada as well. Last year the average cost of production in British Columbia was 12·57 cents per pound. These figures are taken from the records of over 800 berry producers, and they have been averaged over that number. Therefore the figure I have given is last year's average cost. And mark this: I presume everyone knows that the average life of the strawberry plant is five years. In the first year they are planted there is no return to the farmer at all. Then, if you take in the cost of planting, cultivating, fertilizing, thinning, and all the other costs for the first year; hold off any allowance for rental of land, taxes, and add to that the cost of cultivating in the second year, it will be found that the average cost is 9·20 cents per pint. The maximum we are allowed at the rate set to-day is 12 cents.

I could give all sorts of statistics with respect to jam. However, I am prepared to prove my point before the board or anywhere else. I would like to point out that I, as a member for Fraser Valley, along with other members from British Columbia have been pressing this point since early in February. We have been insisting, in the first instance, that if a ceiling was to be placed on the berries we would oppose the ceiling, and I surely think it would be clear why we cannot have a ceiling on perishable goods such as strawberries which must be shipped across the mountains. If we had thought we were getting nowhere in preventing a ceiling being placed on berries, and that we would have had to wait until May 23 to have a ceiling announced, I wish to assure the minister he would not have had a solitary berry planted in the Fraser valley this year. Those berries would not have been planted if we had known that we had to sell them at 12 cents a pint or in other words, pay the consumer for consuming them.

I know it may be said that the board sets all these orders. I can understand perfectly well that if any branch of the government, or any person connected with it, makes a mistake, the minister must assume responsibility for that mistake. In the long run the Prime Minister has to assume the responsibility for the mistakes of his ministers, and, to carry it even further, parliament has to look after the mistakes made by the Prime Minister and his government. I can see no earthly reason why any argument should be advanced against the minister's overruling the wartime prices and trade board. They are doing a very difficult job and, I believe in most cases, the board are doing very well. I give them credit for it. But I do say that when an injustice is being done it is the minister's duty to overrule.

I could give a typical example, in connection with banking. This matter came up before a committee which sits in another room in this building. They were—

Mr. SPEAKER: Order; the hon. member should not make reference to that committee.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: I withdraw that remark, Mr. Speaker. Then, I would ask the minister—and I believe I have ample support—to give further consideration to this matter. In conclusion I would point out that it is proper to criticize the minister or his department, if one has any suggestion to offer. We who represent the berry growers of the lower mainland—and I believe there are three members who are in that position—met the minister last Friday and made a suggestion to him. We thought we had made a reasonable suggestion, namely, that the dates of the various rates be retarded, a procedure which would have avoided upsetting the whole price structure that has been developed. In other words the rates would be held in abeyance. I am speaking from memory, but I think we suggested that the order be held in abeyance until June 15. It will go into effect to-day, but should be held in abeyance until that date at least. From June 15 to June 27 the rate would be 14½ cents, I believe it was, and from there on it would be 12½ cents. In other words we offered a compromise. We do not wish to make fortunes out of the berry crop, but on the other hand we do not want our farmers to be forced out of existence.

Mr. JAMES SINCLAIR (Vancouver North): Mr. Speaker, on this occasion I speak more as a British Columbia member than as a member representing berry farmers. I have one small district in my constituency in which strawberries are grown. However this is a matter which affects a very large number of the berry farmers in British Columbia. I share an office with the hon. member for Fraser Valley (Mr. Cruickshank) and since last February I have been hearing about berries. Hon. members in the house have heard the hon. member for Fraser Valley repeatedly ask whether a ceiling price would be set on berries.

My first criticism as a British Columbia member is that if a ceiling was to be placed on the price of berries, there is no reason why it should not have been done two months ago. In this instance there is a no D-day, and no element of surprise is necessary. The farmers were entitled to know two months ago what their prices would be. They should have known two months before the ceiling was put on. As my hon. friend has said, they would not have planted strawberries if they had known they were going to be given 12 cents a pint, in view of the fact that last year their basic cost was 12·52 cents. It would appear that when the ceiling price was set, it was not set on last year's price, but rather on prices from 1938 to 1942. It must be remembered that in that period of time the great bulk of berry farmers in British Columbia were Japanese. Japanese produced berries at prices at which no white man could ever attempt to produce them. They worked from dawn to dusk for ten and eleven cents an hour as their basic rate of pay. To-day the berry farmers of British Columbia—when they can get labour—must pay 65 cents an hour.

I do not think the people of British Columbia are objecting to price control, but they are objecting to our farmers being legislated into bankruptcy by the action of the wartime prices and trade board. There was no consultation with any of the berry-growing group in British Columbia. Certainly no British Columbia member was tipped off or asked in advance what he thought of these prices. These men of the prices board sit in their ivory tower down here, suddenly set a price and say, "You can like it or lump it." Well, we are not going to like it or lump it. The only way we can object to the action taken by this board is to move the adjournment of the house to discuss a matter of immediate national importance. This matter is of immediate national importance. We members sitting in this house are able thus to bring before the house particulars of an act committed by this board which is legislating into bankruptcy the strawberry growers of British Columbia.

Mr. THOMAS REID (New Westminster): Mr. Speaker, coming as I do from a district where there are a considerable number of strawberry growers I rise to join in the protests that have been made against the action taken by the wartime prices and trade board. I concur in what has been said by the two hon. members who have spoken. While to many hon. members this matter may not seem to be one of national importance, I will point out that it affects the lives of many farmers. It would not have been brought before the house this afternoon had the representations made to the minister been given heed to, but there is no other way to bring this grievance before the house than to stop its proceedings and point out forcibly to the government and the country what has been described by hon. members as an iniquity.

I do not intend to go into the matter too deeply at the moment, but I think it is well known that the attitude of the wartime prices and trade board has not been one of helping the farmer or keeping him in business. Donald Gordon, the chairman, has stated emphatically right from the time he first took office that he did not care what it cost the producer, that all that he and his officials were interested in was the price set. In this instance information about the price has been deliberately withheld from the public until almost the eve of the crop coming on the market. The prices board now comes along and notifies the people of British Columbia and elsewhere what the prices will be.

Let me give one or two reasons why we are protesting. The other hon. members who have spoken have pointed out why strawberries have continued to be grown in British Columbia. Previously the strawberry patches were mostly in the hands of the Japanese, and that meant that the father, the wife and all the family down to the smallest tots were working long hours. They were thus able to keep up their strawberry production at prices which would have permitted very few men or women to exist at all. Many of these farms were taken over after the evacuation of the Japanese. Although prices were low, they kept going up a little as the war progressed, and until this year no price ceiling on strawberries was put in effect by the prices board. The prices obtained for strawberries last year were almost twice what will be received this year. Even with the prices being asked last year, I did not hear one complaint. Why? Early strawberries are generally looked upon as luxuries and the people bought them without any great complaint.

To my mind it would be far better if people were able to eat more fresh strawberries than to have them put up into jam with the use of pectin. I have my own views as to the kind of jam that is going on the market to-day. However, I do not intend to discuss the jam situation at this time; I shall deal only with strawberries. If this order is carried into effect it will mean that many strawberry growers will say that they cannot carry on, and they will not do any transplanting this year. They will decide to go out of business, because they cannot continue at that price and make ends meet. Last year they were getting twice what they are going to get this year, and naturally they were encouraged to go on. I do not know of any strawberry grower who made a fortune. There is no crop that I know of that requires more labour, not only in the spring and summer but throughout twelve months of the year. I can speak from experience because I have hoed strawberry plants many times and I know something of the difficulties faced by these growers. We are appealing now to the minister to take some action and have this price changed in order that our farmers may have a chance. The suggestion made to the minister the other day was a very reasonable one. It may have been his nice smile, but I was carried away by the reception we got and I thought we were going to have good results. However, it shows that you cannot always tell when you go for an interview just what you are going to get. Apparently it was just a sliding out that we got. However, we realize he is placed in a difficult position. He is not a farmer; he does not know and he must depend upon what his officials tell him. When members representing these different districts come to him and lay the facts before him, their views should be listened to. I join my voice in protest against this order and ask that it be changed even at this late date.

Mr. R. W. MAYHEW (Victoria, B.C.): Mr. Speaker, what we are witnessing to-day is due entirely to the fact that those who are setting our prices do not take into consideration the views of hon. members representing the different districts. This matter is not the sole responsibility of the hon. member for Fraser Valley (Mr. Cruickshank) and I think the farmers of British Columbia will be indebted to him for bringing the matter up at this time. I am wholly in accord with what he and the other hon. members have said. The price being allowed for strawberries will not pay the cost of production.

While there are no strawberries grown in my district, they are grown, and have been grown successfully for a number of years, in Nanaimo, which adjoins my riding. It is on behalf of the strawberry growers of that district that I am speaking. I am sure that while the consumers would like to get berries as cheaply as possible, they would not want to get them below the actual cost of production. If the members from British Columbia who represent strawberry growing districts had been called in before this order was issued, I am sure it would not have been put out in its present form. I hope this will be remembered in the future by the people who make out these orders. I was speaking to one man early in February and I told him that if a ceiling price was to be put on berries it should be announced in good time so that the people could make the necessary preparation. He said that that would be done, and yet we find this order announced just when the berries are about to be picked. At the present time there are a few berries being picked near Gordon Head and in Keating district, but they will soon be in full production all over. The price of 27 cents a quart which has been set is away below the cost of production.

Mr. GORDON GRAYDON (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, it seems to me that there are one or two matters which might properly come within the purview of this discussion. Many of us in this house have urged year in and year out that agriculture should be properly represented on the boards and commissions which this government has set up. I think most hon. members who represent farming and agricultural districts will be in agreement with that statement.

Mr. ILSLEY: There certainly was in this case.

Mr. GRAYDON: I was just going to ask the question which the minister now purports to answer. What representation was there of the producers of this commodity on the board which set the prices in this order?

Mr. ILSLEY: E. J. Chambers is administrator of fruits.

Mr. GRAYDON: The minister talks about E. J. Chambers being the representative of agriculture in the setting of these prices. May I ask him whether Mr. Chambers is a producer of strawberries?

Mr. ILSLEY: I do not think so.

Mr. GRAYDON: I am quite sure that he is not, and when the minister suggests that civil servants are to be the representatives of the farmers in deciding costs of production and as to the general situation in connection with agriculture, I take issue with him.

I am not going into the merits of this particular case at the moment, except to say that I have listened with much interest and not a little sympathy to those who have spoken on the question brought up by the member for Fraser Valley (Mr. Cruickshank). But I do want the minister to consider this one point, which I emphasize even at the risk of repeating myself, that some of the difficulty which he is now experiencing could be rectified if the voice of agriculture were heard when these matters were being decided, and by the voice of agriculture I mean the voice of practical agriculturists, the producers themselves.

I have listened with interest to what has been said on the costs of production. I know that no member of this house has any desire to attack the general principle of the price ceiling or the anti-inflationary programme of the government, and I am quite sure that the government will not construe what has been said here to-day as an attack on those general principles. Nevertheless, under the price ceiling, or the price roof, if you like, many instances of injustice occur from time to time which the government rectifies. The government has accepted the principle of the rectification of injustices done under the price ceiling; and therefore I would ask no more than this, that the minister reconsider this whole question with his board, with a practical producer sitting in to consider the suggestions that have been made here to-day, and if they are found to be sound, then I think it is the duty of the government and of the board to eradicate such injustices as may be found.

I close by repeating what I have said many times before, that even at this late date I think the producers should have a proper representation on all the various governmental boards.

Mr. ROBERT FAIR (Battle River): Mr. Speaker, I am perhaps trespassing a little on the ground of the British Columbia members. I do not think they will object on this occasion, because while I am not engaged directly in growing berries I do like to eat strawberries, and as the hon. member for Victoria (Mr. Mayhew) said, I do not want to buy them at a price below that at which the growers can afford to produce them. I am speaking as an agriculturist in another branch of that industry, and judging by experiences in my own particular line of agriculture I feel that the hon. member for Fraser Valley (Mr. Cruickshank) and his colleagues have just reason for complaint. Personally I have no complaint against the principle of price fixing, but I am not satisfied with the administration of the principle because in some cases no account whatsoever is taken of the costs of production of agricultural products.

I have here prices that were given me by one of the merchants in Lloydminster, a town on the border between Alberta and Saskatchewan. I was told only last winter before coming here in January that in 1941 strawberries were laid down f.o.b. Lloydminster at $2.60 a crate, while in 1943 strawberries ran anywhere from $8 to $14 a crate. If the wartime prices and trade board would concentrate first of all on the costs to the producer they would be doing a good service by basing their prices on the actual average costs of production. They should also consider the price to the consumer, because I believe that injustices are being done both in the prices set to the producer and in the prices which the consumer has to pay. I want to support the member for Fraser Valley and his colleagues in the request they have made to-day.

Mr. T. J. O'NEILL (Kamloops): Mr. Speaker, I want to congratulate the hon. member for Fraser Valley (Mr. Cruickshank) on bringing this question up and on the able manner in which he has presented it to the house. It is not my intention to detain the house very long, because I can only repeat what has already been said. I am completely in agreement with the hon. member for Vancouver North (Mr. Sinclair) when he says that the price of berries has been regulated this year on the cost of producing berries in the years when they were produced practically by slave labour in the Fraser valley. That is something to which consideration should be given. I think, too, with the hon. member for Victoria (Mr. Mayhew) that the prices have been set without any consultation either with the producers or with their representatives in the districts where the berries are produced. If such consultation had taken place I feel quite sure that prices would not have been set at their present levels. I am given to understand that there is a difference of three cents in the price of imported berries in Ontario and imported berries in British Columbia. But that is only hearsay; I do not know the facts. I think that the minister should give consideration to abolishing the whole order of the wartime prices and trade board with respect to these prices and start all over again.

Mr. G. E. L. MacKINNON (Kootenay East): Mr. Speaker, it is not often that I rise to say anything in this house, but I would like to endorse what has already been said regarding the plight of the fruit growers in British Columbia. It is thirty-five years since I first went into the district of Kootenay, and in that time I have watched the Creston fruit area develop from a small handful of people to a population of five or six thousand. In those years I have listened to many harrowing tales of people who sold fruit as fine as any that ever grew out of doors and got nothing for it in return, and then had to dig down to pay for their boxes and crates. In the last few years conditions have possibly been a little better. But the war has changed conditions again. Labour shortages and increased costs have put the producers in a position at least approaching the plight in which they were a few years ago.

With regard to the date line of June 17 I wish to make this point. You can get on the train at Vancouver in what might be classed as summer weather and in twenty-four hours you are in the interior in the fag end of winter; therefore I do not believe it is possible to set a date line that can be fairly applied to all districts in British Columbia. If June 17 is fair for the coast, it is certainly not fair for the interior. On Friday I had a telegram from the Creston district stating that no berries would be ready for shipment on June 17.

In regard to the price, it was objected that $2.88 for a 24-pint crate is too small. They stated that it was questionable whether at that rate this crop would be picked, and certainly there would not be a crop next year.

I suggest that conditions of season and climate in British Columbia be taken into consideration. If June 17 is a fair date for the lower mainland and Vancouver island it is perfectly all right with me, but a later date should be set for the up-country fruit growers. Whatever date is agreed on for the lower mainland, I suggest that a date at least two weeks later be set for the interior.

Hon. R. B. HANSON (York-Sunbury): No representations have been made to me by the strawberry growers of the Saint John valley, but I know that a very substantial amount of small fruit is grown in the counties of York, Sunbury and Queen's. Our climatic conditions are somewhat different from those in British Columbia. It will be learned with surprise by some members that our season is two or perhaps three weeks later than Ontario, and that our crop comes on at what might be termed the tail end of the season, at a time when the Ontario berries are nearly over and when the appetite of the public for strawberries is more or less satiated. So that our growers have always been under a very definite handicap. Their principal export market is in Montreal, where our early fruit has to meet the competition of the local product.

My suggestion is that, so far as that zone is concerned, there is no need at all of any price ceiling, and I should be glad of an opportunity to meet with Mr. Chambers, whom I do not know personally, and discuss the matter with him. I think the member for Fraser Valley (Mr. Cruickshank) made a substantial point when he suggested that, before these prices are fixed by an arbitrary board under powers delegated to them by the cabinet under the War Measures Act, somebody should come and see the local member and ascertain what his reaction is. He wishes to act fairly with both the producer and the consumer because his constituents are in both categories. I suggest that before an arbitrary rate is fixed something of this kind be done. I do not know anything about the situation in British Columbia, whether the price is fair or not, but courtesy itself seems to me to dictate that the local members in the areas affected might at least be asked their opinion. I am satisfied that with that judicial capacity which the member for Fraser Valley has so often exhibited in this house, he would do justice both to the producers and to the consumers in his constituency, and that is the attitude that I would desire to take myself.

Without having been instructed, but having a substantial knowledge of the conditions obtaining in New Brunswick, which I have endeavoured to outline, I am of the opinion that no price ceiling order is necessary at all for the maritime provinces. I am going to suggest to the minister that if he will be good enough to ask the officials in charge to have a chat with me, we could talk the matter over and I could get their point of view while I would endeavour if possible to give them my viewpoint.

They have definitely in New Brunswick promoted the production and sale of small fruits. We have an overnight market to the city of Montreal. With gasoline restrictions such as they are, the truck distribution is not as good as it used to be. A great deal of this fruit was handled by trucks in days gone by. That is not so important, of course, for export, but it is very important for distribution in other parts of the provinces. There are counties in New Brunswick that do not grow strawberries at all, just as there are counties in that province that do not grow apples. Most of the apple crop in New Brunswick is grown in the three counties to which I have referred, York, Sunbury and Queens, and their best market is the market of the adjacent counties where they do not grow apples. The same is true of strawberries.

I have an open mind on the subject of prices if there is to be fixing of prices, but my immediate reaction is that there is no necessity at all for a price ceiling on strawberries in New Brunswick. I should like to see it abolished and I should be glad if the minister would see that the gentleman in charge of this problem—and of course I suppose it is a problem, more acute in British Columbia than elsewhere—would speak to me about it. We might arrive at certain conclusions, or at least agree to disagree.

Mr. W. K. ESLING (Kootenay West): Hon. members from the coast have been energetic in presenting to the government the inequalities of these marketing orders in regard to berries, and certainly the member for Kootenay East (Mr. MacKinnon) has made a perfect presentation of the local conditions. The wartime prices and trade board have simply brought in a blanket order covering the four western provinces with absolutely no consideration and no proper knowledge of local conditions.

The conditions at the coast are very different from those in Ontario. The conditions in Kootenay East are considerably different from those in Kootenay West. We do not have the competition of Japanese labour as it previously existed, but we have had such competition and such disregard for labour and wages from the Doukhobors as to have discouraged considerably the growing of strawberries in the interior. Many times, as the member for Kootenay East says, the growers do not get back the return for crates alone, and it is discouraging not only for local marketing but for shipping.

I am sure that after the presentations that have been made by British Columbia members the government will see that some consideration is given to the interior growers so that they may get at least a return which will pay them for their labour and for the material involved in crating.

Mr. DANIEL McIVOR (Fort William): I have a relative who went into the berry business at Chilliwack three years ago and he was glad to get clear of it at a considerable loss for the reason that the cost of labour was high, the price of the berries was low, and there was unequal competition with the Japanese. We were told yesterday some place that if one part of the body suffers, the whole body suffers with it; and if one province suffers the whole of Canada suffers with it.

Mr. B. M. HILL (Charlotte): I do not believe that a price ceiling is necessary in New Brunswick. It is my impression that the market will take care of the price of strawberries. I do not agree with the hon. member for York-Sunbury (Mr. Hanson). I believe the minister knows all about the marketing of strawberries in the maritime provinces.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I do not think he knows anything about it.

Mr. HILL: If the minister will cast his mind back he will remember that when the first strawberries came on the market they were carefully picked. They consisted of a few berries that ripened ahead of the others, and it was quite an expensive operation to pick the berries. They were marketed at a fairly high price, as a luxury. The next week, the berries having become more prolific, the price automatically dropped sometimes eight and ten cents a box. A fortnight later, when the great mass of the berries ripened, the crop automatically took care of the price and the price dropped seven and eight cents a box. That invariably takes place each year in New Brunswick.

This price ceiling does not take care of the marketing of the early berries, the few scattered berries that ripen at the start. If the farmer were to receive twenty-two cents a box right through for his average crop he would certainly be getting a high price; but what will happen is this. The first berries that were marketed at around thirty-five cents a box will have to be sold at twenty-two cents, and then the next week, when previously they dropped to twenty-five cents a box, they will still have to be sold at twenty-two cents. When the large crop comes on the price will automatically drop eight cents and the farmer will get an average of only twelve to fifteen cents a box.

Hon. GROTE STIRLING (Yale): It has not been very often in nearly twenty years when a fruit discussion has taken place in this house that I have not played my part in it. On this occasion I have but little to say, because in the Okanagan valley, which I represent in this house, the fruits grown are more largely the tree fruits than the small fruits; consequently we are not shippers on a commercial scale of large quantities of berries.

The difficulty with which we are faced to-day is that great one of ascertaining what the price should be. It has been the difficulty over the years. It is accentuated at this time when there is more necessity than ever to take care of the consumer. What has been wanted, what has been desired by the producer who is producing over a series of years, is that the right price should be received; that the consumer should not suffer but that the producer should get an adequate return for his work.

As I have not had representations from those whom I represent here with regard to prices, labour, and so on, I am not going to take any more part in the debate except to say that in listening to the hon. member for Fraser Valley (Mr. Cruickshank) last week and to-day I must say that I am impressed with the suggestion that in so far as this year is concerned it does not look as if the dates chosen were the right dates for the purpose. I would suggest that consideration be given to the possibility of setting those dates in accordance with the price later on, and allow things to come nearer to picking time before the final decision is made.

Mr. P. C. BLACK (Cumberland): I come from a part of Canada that is in a special position, perhaps a favoured position, with respect to the growing of strawberries, inasmuch as we at the head of the bay of Fundy, with the advantage of fog and perhaps the disadvantage of a slightly later spring, have a crop of strawberries that comes on the market the last of any producing area in Canada, after the Saint John valley and the Annapolis valley, represented by the Minister of Finance (Mr. Ilsley), crop has been almost completely marketed. Our position at the head of the bay of Fundy is somewhat analogous to that pointed out to the house by the hon. member for Kootenay East (Mr. MacKinnon) when he stated that the strawberries marketed in his constituency are two weeks or more later than the strawberries marketed from the coast and Fraser valley.

I am in general agreement with the representations made by the hon. member for Fraser Valley and the other hon. members from British Columbia. I am in complete agreement with the representations made by the hon. member for York-Sunbury (Mr. Hanson), namely, that no ceiling price should be placed on strawberries. I believe this is a case where the price of the commodity should be controlled by supply and demand.

May I point out the ridiculousness of this fixed ceiling price as applied to the area at the head of the bay of Fundy. They fix a ceiling price of twenty-seven cents a quart up to June 24. Well, you do not even raise a box of strawberries down there in the greenhouse at that date. Then, after June 24 the price is twenty-two cents. In our area we rarely market a box of strawberries until after July 1. Yet they fix a maximum price of twenty-two cents as of June 24, the lower price. I would presume that the board which is responsible for setting these prices would at least consult—they do not consult the members—some dealer or producer of berries in those localities before they set a price and a time which on the face of it is ridiculous.

I am in general agreement with the representations made by the hon. members from British Columbia. I am in complete agreement with the request made by the hon. member for York-Sunbury. There should be no ceiling price on a commodity such as strawberries at a time such as this when they are being produced at high costs, and when you consider the difficulties of securing fertilizer and help to raise them. When everything is taken into consideration very little, if any, profit even under the most favourable conditions is derived. The farmers will certainly be discouraged by the ceiling prices that are set for this year.

Mr. G. G. McGEER (Vancouver-Burrard): Before the Minister of Finance (Mr. Ilsley) replies, there are one or two observations I should like to make on this particular order. I understand that there were no ceilings on strawberries last year. Strawberries are hardly a commodity that enter at this time of the year into the category of necessities of life, yet they probably do add something to the joy of life. Certainly I have had a great deal of difficulty in finding out in the last year's proceedings where the wartime prices and trade board have ever added anything to the joy of Canadian life since they were brought into being; and this is a splendid instance of that board, apart from the purpose of its necessary and essential duty, becoming a board of interference, a board that has destroyed its real value by its indifference to moving into the realm of nuisance value. It is high time that some supervising authority stepped in to prevent that board from destroying its own usefulness by its own folly and its own nonsense.

Everybody will agree that in war time prices should be controlled. Everybody will agree that production should be regulated and that the distribution of things essential to a war time economy should be done with equity and fairness. I go farther than a great many of my hon. friends on this side of the house in believing firmly that in the economy of a power age the control and regulation of reasonable prices, of reasonable services, of reasonable production and distribution, is an essential part of our whole system of planned and organized life which we cannot escape. Here you find a typical example of the sort of thing that emanates only from unbridled bureaucracy. This is one of the dangers with which our whole peace-time programme is confronted, and one of the things that has hindered rather than helped our war effort.

Now let me just give a few examples of the sort of thing involved in this order. The zones are described; No. 1 takes in Ontario and Quebec, that section of the Dominion of Canada which has been favoured so long by this canoe-minded atmosphere in Ottawa.

Mr. McCANN: Who says so?

Mr. McGEER: I have never known any of you to suffer; and in any deal between central Canada and either the west or the east I notice that central Canada always comes out on top. Let us look at this particular example, even in connection with a small thing like strawberries. In zone No. 1, Ontario and Quebec, the strawberry grower receives 30 cents. In zone No. 2, the maritime provinces, the price drops to 27 cents, and in zone No. 3, British Columbia, the price is also down to 27 cents. Tell me why a strawberry grower in Ontario, with the huge market in this area, should get more at this season of the year than a grower in the maritime provinces or in British Columbia. The growers in central Canada have cheaper land; they have a better market, and they have cheaper labour. That is one situation. But let us see what happens when the table is turned, when they are packing their surplus in this area to compete with those who pack berries in the maritimes and British Columbia. Strangely enough the central packer again gets the benefit. After June 24 the price in Ontario and Quebec drops to 19 cents, while in the maritimes and British Columbia it is held at 22 cents. Let me ask this question. When conditions are in favour of the grower; when prices are high, with the new production coming on the market, why does the eastern producer benefit to the extent of three cents a quart; then, when it comes to producing for packing house competition with British Columbia and the maritime provinces, why should we find the central packer paying a price of 19 cents as against 22 cents which must be paid by the packer in British Columbia and the maritimes?

I know the Minister of Finance resents any criticism of the wartime prices and trade board, and I know that this board does not welcome suggestions from members of parliament. Under our modern bureaucracy we have been relegated to the background to the extent that it is an insult to our wartime prices and trade board, and to our bureaucrats, to dare offer a suggestion as the representatives of the people. I do not want anyone to accuse me of speaking for votes on this matter, because I do not happen to have any strawberry growers in my riding, and I suppose running true to human nature most of my constituents would like to get strawberries even in the early season just as cheaply as possible. Apart from that, however, from long experience in British Columbia I know that all the people of that province will resent the idea of an unfair discrimination against the growers of British Columbia and the maritimes, and an unfair preference to the growers of central Canada. When a government undertakes to move into the discreet level above which profits may be made, or to dictate the discreet line along which any business must operate, that government will find that in doing so it is doing more harm than good. If ceilings are to be fixed and floors established, they can be levelled out; it can be arranged upon a basis under which a reasonable amount of competition can exist between the floor and the ceiling. What we want to prevent in war time as in peace time is the unreasonable exploitation of the consumer in the consumers' market. We never want to undertake to restrict competition or to destroy the incentive of a reasonable and fair reward.

This, Mr. Speaker, is a splendid example of the need for reform in the wartime prices and trade board. It is typical of the harsh and arbitrary measures that are too often adopted by this board without the necessary experience to qualify them to dictate the policy and programme of the many businesses and of the farmers and producers upon whom they have fastened like a straitjacket an army of regulations and controls that now need revision, and many of which should be done away with. I congratulate the hon. member for Fraser Valley on bringing this matter to the attention of parliament, and I hope the minister responsible for this order will see that the kind of inequality, the kind of discrimination, the kind of preference and the kind of sectional differences that appear here are eliminated.

Mr. J. H. BLACKMORE (Lethbridge): Mr. Speaker, I should like to support the hon. member for Fraser Valley (Mr. Cruickshank). Only recently I was contending, on behalf of the beef producers in my constituency, that they were suffering from similar foolhardiness in the management of prices. I think the hon. member for Vancouver-Burrard (Mr. McGeer) was fully justified in saying what he did, and I support his remarks. In the first place let me say that I favour the principle of a ceiling and a floor.

Mr. ILSLEY: So does everybody, but no one is ever satisfied with any price that is set. It is the other fellow's price.

Mr. BLACKMORE: I can understand why the minister makes that statement, and I must say that I have great sympathy for him in the difficult position in which he finds himself. But may I say that just as long as the minister and his government persist in trying to manage the affairs of this country under an outworn, outmoded and ineffective financial system, he will continue to find himself in this situation. That may sound strange, but right things have sounded strange before this. The floor and ceiling must be fair to both producer and consumer. I am sure the minister will agree with that.

Mr. ILSLEY: That is the last mention there will be of the consumer.

Mr. BLACKMORE: I believe the principles involved in this discussion are sound. I refer first to the principle of home production. It is my belief that to the greatest possible degree the Dominion of Canada should produce its own needs and should consume its own production. That applies to strawberries as well as to other commodities. The berry growers deserve, and in the interests of Canadian consumers must receive, prices covering costs of production and plus a fair remuneration. At the same time consumers must be protected; otherwise they will cease to use Canadian berries and will seek substitutes of one kind or another, again to the disadvantage of Canadian producers.

I should like to know upon what basis the wartime prices and trade board were working when they fixed the price of strawberries. I do not happen to be familiar with production of strawberries, and therefore I am not in a position to speak with any degree of authority in the matter. But it would be interesting to find out just how they computed the price. How did they determine what it ought to be? I am inclined to say, with respect to the wartime prices and trade board, that they have endeavoured to be fair to consumers. I believe their difficulty has arisen out of that desire, and I do not find too much fault with them, because I believe I understand their difficulty. Now they have endeavoured to fix a price which the consumer can, will and ought to pay. I believe that is right, and I believe the board are entitled to have a member say that. But at the same time the price upon which they have fixed is, it appears, one unquestionably lower than the grower can accept, or at which he can grow berries. What is going to be done about it? No one has thus far in the debate offered any suggestion as to what should be done. May I offer one? The solution of the difficulty will be found in a well-placed subsidy. There will be those who will say immediately that the principle of subsidies, being too expensive, is unsound. There will be no serious objection to the subsidy once it is realized that it can be paid out of the national credit, in so far as the goods and services producing and consuming capacity of Canada will justify the use of that credit. Just as soon as that principle is recognized it will be possible to pay a price which is fair to the producer and at the same time fair to the consumer. If a subsidy is necessary to bridge the gap between the two, then let a subsidy be paid.

Already we are using the principle of paying subsidies, in respect of many commodities. It will do no harm to extend it. I believe it was last year, when the Minister of Finance was discussing the amount of money to be spent for the board which has to do with the adjustment of prices, that I pointed out I had only one fault to find with the appropriatoin, and that was that it was too small. I advocated something like $500,000,000 whereas the minister was asking for about $200,000,000—and I am speaking entirely from memory. Many hon. members thought I was extravagant, but I was not extravagant. If the economy of this country is to be established on a basis equitable and advantageous to all the people, both producers and consumers, a far more extensive use of subsidies must be made, so as to bring down prices to the consumers and bring them up for the producers.

Hon. J. L. ILSLEY (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, the discussion this afternoon must have brought home to all members of the house, and to all members of the public who are taking an interest in the matter, the difficulty of price control. The hon. member for Fraser Valley (Mr. Cruickshank) made a rather moderate request. He with some other British Columbia members made the request last Friday afternoon. I took it up with the wartime prices and trade board, where it was fully discussed, and eventually determined to be impracticable—or, if not impracticable, undesirable.

But before I come to that, let us consider this matter in its other aspects. A year ago, in the spring and summer of 1943, fruits and vegetables went to very high prices in this country, and we had from all parts of the country complaints that our much vaunted price ceiling, as it was called, was no price ceiling at all. It was said that while we held down the price of bread, the price of butter, the price of meat, and the price of some other necessities of life, we were not bringing about a realistic cost of living for Canada at all, because we were allowing fruits and vegetables, and a great variety of foods which most Canadians are able to buy to go uncontrolled. And so we felt we had to bring a great range of commodities under control this year which were not under control last year. In that list was fruit. That is the reason for a price ceiling on strawberries, along with a great many other fruits which were not controlled last year. We have not heard much from the consumer in this house at all. We do not hear that until we do something against the interests of consumers. For instance, let me take as an example the hon. member for Battle River (Mr. Fair). He stands up in his place this afternoon and expresses sympathy with the hon. member for Fraser Valley when that hon.

member asks the government to let the price of strawberries go up. But last year, owing to the fact that we had let the price of a good many foods go up, during the first two months of the operation of the price ceiling it was found necessary to allow the price of meals in restaurants to be increased somewhat, and to permit an increased charge for tea and coffee. And the first member in this house to get up and launch an attack upon the government for its failure to control prices of foods, was the hon. member for Battle River. Members cannot have it both ways.

The hon. member for Vancouver-Burrard (Mr. McGeer) also spoke this afternoon about prices. He talks half the time for the farmer and half the time for the packer. First he says how unfair it is to the farmers of eastern Canada and western Canada to allow a higher price ceiling for farmers in Ontario and Quebec during the early part of the season. "Why," he says, "they are held to 27 cents in the maritime provinces and also to 27 cents in British Columbia during the early part of the season. But look at Ontario and Quebec, the part of Canada which always gets the best of everything, and gets the best of the other provinces. They are not held down to 27 cents; they are allowed 30 cents." Then he said, "After they get into midseason see what they cutely do, to help Ontario and Quebec. What they cutely do then is to get the ceiling down to 19 cents in Ontario and Quebec, and allow the farmers to go up to 22 cents in the west and the maritime provinces." Now, he cannot have it both ways either.

Mr. McGEER: The eastern farmer gets it both ways.

Mr. ILSLEY: The eastern farmer does not get it both ways because the price—

Mr. McGEER: You are not—

An hon. MEMBER: Sit down.

Mr. McGEER: You are not speaking for the minister and I am sure he will not object to my asking this question. Is it not true that in the early part of the season, particularly in the east, when they are getting 30 cents, the farmers make an enormous profit on their early berries?

Mr. ILSLEY: I do not know.

Mr. McGEER: On those berries they make an enormous profit.

Mr. ILSLEY: After a certain date, after mid-season, the price to the producer in the central market is held down to 19 cents. The producer in the western and eastern provinces gets 22 cents.

Mr. McGEER: How can our packers—

Mr. ILSLEY: My hon. friend switches from farmer to packer in mid-season. He argues for the British Columbia farmers for the first of the season and for the British Columbia packers for the last of the season. He should follow the farmer through from beginning of the season or follow the packer through from the beginning of the season; he should not contradict himself. The effective date of this order was set at May 29, in order to bring imported berries under control. It was thought unwise to let a lot of imports go completely uncontrolled before the domestic crop appeared on the market and then impose a ceiling on the domestic crop. In the United States berries are selling at about 50 or 60 cents, and one hon. member said that they were selling for 59 cents in Ottawa. I do not know what the price is, but I am told it is something like 50 cents.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: Fifty-nine cents.

Mr. ILSLEY: A year ago people were complaining because there was no control over the price of fruits. Hon. members say that there were no complaints, but the fact is that there were tremendous complaints because there were no ceiling prices. Those complaints were received from wage-earners notably. Do you think we could allow quantities of berries to come in from the United States at high prices and then just as soon as our own berries came on the market clamp on a price ceiling? Why should the price ceiling not begin early and apply to imported berries, as well as to our own? It has been said that there are no berries until the early part of June in British Columbia and until considerably later in the eastern parts of Canada.

I can remember the hon. member for New Westminster complaining bitterly in this house because we imposed a price ceiling upon Canadian honey and allowed Mexican or some foreign honey to come in here. If we were to allow the foreign product to go uncontrolled and controlled the domestic product, we would hear all kinds of inflammatory talk about bureaucracies—we have heard a lot of it this afternoon—and all this foolishness about bureaucrats and that sort of thing. These things have to be considered when you are dealing with a price structure.

In Ontario and Quebec the ceiling is 30 cents a quart until June 24, and 19 cents a quart after June 24. In the maritime provinces it is 27 cents a quart up to June 24, and 22 cents a quart after June 24. In the western provinces it is 27 cents a quart up to June 17 and 22 cents a quart after June 17.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): We have no berries before June 22 in the maritimes. Why should we have a ceiling there?

Mr. ILSLEY: I want to deal with these contentions one at a time. Some members say, no ceiling; others say, no control.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I said in the maritimes.

Mr. ILSLEY: Just in the maritimes, and a ceiling everywhere else.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I do not care whether you have a ceiling or not. The minister is not going to misrepresent my position. I stated expressly that I did not understand the situation in western Canada and I do not pretend to understand it in Ontario, but I have some knowledge of the situation in the maritime provinces. I suggest also that my contention has been supported by hon. members from the maritimes on both sides of the house. My contention is that no ceiling is necessary, and until I am shown otherwise I shall continue to hold that view. It may be that there is a reason and, if so, I should like to be shown. But I should like to be consulted once in a while by these so-called bureaucrats whom the minister is defending so magnificently this afternoon. He is telling us that we must not say a word against them. Surely members of parliament are entitled to be consulted.

Mr. ILSLEY: I do not mind a question, but I hate some types of speeches in the middle of my speech. Ontario and Quebec are higher for the early berries and lower for the mid-season berries, because this conforms to usual market conditions. Prices in the central provinces always show a much wider swing between early and mid-season prices than do prices in the other provinces. This just follows the pattern of other years; it conforms to the experience of other years. It is not a device to favour one part of the country at the expense of another. I should imagine that the great majority of the berries would be marketed after June 24 in Ontario and Quebec where the ceiling is 19 cents a quart as against 22 cents a quart in the maritime provinces and British Columbia. I may be wrong, but I think that would be the case.

British Columbia is the principal producing area in the western provinces, and the season there is almost invariably ten days to two weeks ahead of the rest of Canada. Hence the date for dropping to the mid-season price is made one week earlier in British Columbia. It may be that that is too early for the eastern part of British Columbia and it may be that a good deal can be said for the representation made this afternoon by the hon. member for Kootenay East that the season in the interior is much later than on the coast. That is a matter to which consideration has been given and is being given at the present time.

But that kind of representation is different from the coastal representation, which is that there should not be any ceiling at all during the early part of the berry season. You would have this condition. Those persons who could get their berries off early would be able to get uncontrolled prices, while other unfortunate individuals would have to sell at the controlled price. You would then have accusations of discrimination far worse than anything that has been made this afternoon.

What about these prices? I want to put on the record the prices for the different provinces for different years. To hear some of the speeches made this afternoon one would think that we took the prices of Japanese produced berries in 1938, 1939, 1940 and 1941 as a basis for what we would allow the producers of berries in 1944. That is not the case at all. The prices of berries years ago were only about a third of what are being allowed under this price controlled order. Here are the average prices:

	1939 cents	1940 cents	1941 cents	1942 cents
Nova Scotia.....	10	11	13	14
New Brunswick....	8	7	9	10
Quebec	6	7	9	10
Ontario	7	6	9	12
British Columbia..	8	8	9	12

Mr. STIRLING: Are those pints?

Mr. ILSLEY: No; those are prices for quarts. The Japanese began to be removed from British Columbia in February, 1942, and I would call attention to the fact that the 1942 prices were higher in all provinces.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: I know the minister does not want to give a wrong impression, but I think he has been misinformed when he says that the Japanese berry growers were leaving British Columbia on that date.

Mr. ILSLEY: I made inquiries just a few minutes ago as to when the Japanese began to be removed from British Columbia and I was told it was in February, 1942.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: I come from a district where there were 700 Japanese farms, and I know that the minister must be misinformed. Perhaps one Jap and a small dog left then and they said the Japanese were beginning to be removed.

Mr. ILSLEY: It was not an official who informed me. I think my information was authentic.

In 1943 what was the situation in British Columbia? British Columbia's crop was only one-quarter of normal and prices rose to inflationary levels, being more than four times the prices which prevailed in 1940 and 1941, and more than two and a half times the prices of 1942. Let me give the production to show that what I am saying about shortages in the crop is true. In British Columbia the number of quarts produced in 1939 was 10,877,000; in 1940, 9,078,000; in 1941, 10,431,000; in 1942, 5,649,000; in 1943, 2,523,000. That shows the tremendous drop in production, and there was a tremendous rise in price. The price in British Columbia in 1943 did rise on the average to 33 cents a quart, and as I said before, that was four times the prices which prevailed in 1940 and 1941, and more than two and a half times the prices of 1942. In fixing a ceiling for 1944 I do not think it would be reasonable to take the conditions of last year, which were entirely extraordinary. The 1944 average ceiling is 9 or 10 cents a quart below the 1943 price but it is nearly double the 1942 price—not nearly double the old prices of 1938, 1939 and 1940, but nearly double the 1942 price. The 1944 ceilings do not constitute a roll-back on 1943 prices in other provinces and in each case are about double the 1942 prices.

A great many statements have been made in the course of this discussion of which I have made notes. I have the remarks of the hon. member for Fraser Valley about the costs of production. I do not know what the source of his figures is.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: I will give it.

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes, but I have not got it. The figures would have to be pretty carefully checked. But when you fix a ceiling price that is about twice the 1942 price, which was a very considerable increase over the preceding two years, it would seem to me that adequate consideration must have been given to all relevant factors, including the cost of production. I do not know that Mr. Donald Gordon ever said what the hon member for New Westminster (Mr. Reid) says he said—

Mr. REID: He said it in Vancouver when arguing with the potato growers.

Mr. ILSLEY: —that he did not care what it cost to produce.

Mr. REID: I can give you the date and the meeting.

Mr. ILSLEY: I would be doubtful if there was any record of his saying anything of the kind. I certainly do not know of his saying anything of the kind. It is very, very easy to attack officials, men who are doing an enormously difficult job. This discussion to-day is like discussions that have gone on over the last two or three years. Members get up and say: "We want controls; we want ceilings"—except the hon. member for York-Sunbury (Mr. Hanson), who does not want a ceiling in the maritime provinces.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): On strawberries.

Mr. ILSLEY: Members get up and say, "We want ceilings, but we do not like what was done here." That is what they say to nearly everything. I have yet to meet anybody who is affected by controls to such an extent that he will lose money that he would have had but for that limitation, and who accepts the control without an argument. While it is a painful thing to operate all these controls, it involves prices in hundreds of thousands of individual cases and individual commodities, and I think that the officials have acted carefully and fairly in this particular case. Mr. Chambers, the administrator of fruits, has had forty years' experience in British Columbia. Some members of this house know him better than I do, but I know that he has had forty years' experience in British Columbia, and I am thankful this afternoon that he did come from British Columbia. I am thankful that he did not come from Ontario or the maritime provinces.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Was he a grower?

Mr. ILSLEY: He has been growing apples and has been in the Okanagan valley and has been associated with growers and cooperative organizations for years.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: How many strawberries are grown in the Okanagan valley?

Mr. ILSLEY: I do not say they grow strawberries there.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: I know.

Mr. ILSLEY: Mr. Chambers has been in touch with this problem for months. He has made trips to British Columbia about it and has done a very considerable amount of consultation with people who ought to know about it.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): He never consulted with one member of parliament about it. We are not idiots altogether.

Mr. ILSLEY: I say that this order was worked out carefully and I can see nothing unfair about it. It may be that the order is not absolutely perfect; I do not know. I will say this, that time after time these situations arise, representations are made, and we do the best we can with the situations, but it is pretty hard to convince me that a price which is about double the price of 1942, which was about four times higher than the prices of 1941, 1940 and 1939, is an unreasonable price.

With regard to the dates when there is a drop in the ceiling price, that is a matter, as I said before, to which consideration can be given.

Mr. HAZEN: Will the minister give the average figures for 1943 for the other provinces? He gave the figures for British Columbia only.

Mr. ILSLEY: In 1943 the average figure for Nova Scotia was 22 cents; New Brunswick, 19 cents; Quebec, 17 cents; Ontario, 18 cents; British Columbia, 33 cents. That shows it was altogether an abnormal price.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: Will the minister state whether in his opinion these prices are adequate figures to be used as a base in fixing the price for 1944, namely, eight cents in 1938, eight cents in 1939, nine cents in 1941? I will repeat those figures and I want to make sure that every member hears them: 8 cents, 8 cents, 9 cents and 12 cents. Does the minister think those are fair figures to use in fixing the price for 1944?

Mr. ILSLEY: I am defending the figure of 27 cents.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: The minister stated that there was an abnormal rise in those years.

Mr. SPEAKER: Order.

Mr. ILSLEY: The abnormality is shown by comparison with the other provinces.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: Mr. Speaker, I want to do this according to Hoyle. May I ask permission to withdraw the motion?

Motion withdrawn.

PENSIONS—OLD AGE AND BLIND

8. Yes. The brewers complained that bottles were leaving the province and that there were not enough left for their requirements.

9. From the files of the W.P.T.B. it appears that a situation relating to the provision of beer bottles for breweries in the martime provinces was brought to the attention of the board in the spring of 1942, by one of the brewers in the maritimes. In previous years, maritime breweries had relied on the collection of used beer bottles for their needs, because bottles are not manufactured in the maritime provinces. As demands for beer increased and a bottle shortage appeared possible, shipments of empty bottles back to Ontario and Quebec breweries began to increase. The situation was discussed between officials of the board and officials of the N.S. and N.B. liquor commissions together with the maritime brewers and the provisions of order No. A-505 were thereby developed. The purpose of this order was to keep used beer bottles needed for the use of the maritime breweries in the maritimes, and thus avoid shipment of empties back to Ontario and Quebec, and shipment of additional quantities of new bottles to the maritime breweries.

10. The chief commissioner of the Nova Scotia liquor commission is authorized to act on behalf of the W.P.T.B., in the administration of order No. A-505.

11. See question 10.

WAR PRODUCTION—PROVING GROUNDS

Mr. KNOWLES:

1. What is the total personnel assigned to or employed by the proving grounds establishment of the Department of National Defence?

2. What percentage of Canadian war production, during the past year, has been tested by this establishment?

Mr. MACDONALD (Halifax):

1. 54 all ranks. In addition, 121 are temporarily attached for special tests now in hand.

2. Vehicles of various types with their ancillary equipment constitute the bulk of all war materials tested by the proving ground of the Department of National Defence. About ·45 per cent of the total production of vehicles in dollar value was tested during the last fiscal year. This represented, however, the testing of 100 per cent of new model vehicles as at least one of each new type was tested.

The percentage of the total Canadian-produced vehicles tested has no relation to the activities of the proving ground. While only a very few of each type of vehicle are tested by the proving ground, a large number of special tests are carried out from time to time. Many of these tests take a large number of man-hours to complete, such as the tests carried out in order to develop satisfactory synthetic recapped tires, which involved 15 trucks, 28,000 man-hours and 260,000 miles of testing.

1. Yes.

2. (a) 41,138;

(b) Since August 25, 1939, orders in council passed under the authority of the War Measures Act have been tabled periodically in both Senate and House of Commons.

Prior to October 1, 1942, orders in council of general or widespread interest or concern were published in eight volumes under the general title "Proclamations and Orders in Council relating to the War". Other orders in council relating, for example, to foreign exchange control, defence of Canada regulations, et cetera, were published from time to time in separate volumes.

The statutory orders and regulations order 1942 (P.C. 7992, September 4, 1942) provided for the publication by the privy council office in "Canadian War Orders and Regulations" of all orders in council relating to the war, of a legislative character or imposing a penalty. Since October 12 of that year "Canadian War Orders and Regulations" has appeared weekly.

Orders in council required by statute to be published in the Canada Gazette are printed from time to time in that publication.

Orders in council which have not been published or made public, since the beginning of the war, fall into two categories, namely:

(1) Orders of a purely administrative character and of no general interest.

Such orders include those originating in the Department of Munitions and Supply, for the authorization of contracts between the Minister and manufacturers and suppliers of weapons and war supplies of all kinds. For this purpose the authority of the governor in council is required under the Department of Munitions and Supply Act. These account for approximately 70 per cent of all orders in council passed since the beginning of the war.

Also included in this category are those authorizing contracts by the Department of Public Works, appointments to various administrative positions and miscellaneous routine orders passed under the authority of various statutes.

(2) Orders in council, the publication of which is withheld for security reasons.

In this category are included orders in council, the publication of which is omitted or deferred under the authority of the secret documents (non-publication) order 1941 (P.C. 5135 of July 15, 1941); the publication of such orders would otherwise be necessary. Also included within this category is a small number of orders in council in respect of which military authorities issue a certificate to the effect that their publication would convey information likely to be of value to the enemy. Such orders, for example, authorize military establishments and the like.

Mr. ABBOTT: Return tabled.

Mr. GRAYDON: I suggest to Your Honour that since we have disposed of these notices of motions with such celerity to-day, a good deal of time that is taken up in reading the motions could be saved if the house were agreeable to dispensing with that procedure. Unless there were some special reason why every motion should be read, perhaps we might adopt this speedier method of dealing with them.

Mr. SPEAKER: Personally I should be glad indeed to follow the hon. gentleman's suggestion, but an hon. member in whose name a motion stood might desire to have it read.

Mr. GRAYDON: In that case it could be read.

Mr. SPEAKER: Only with the consent of the hon. member concerned could the reading be dispensed with.

CITY OF OTTAWA

JOINT COMMITTEE OF SENATE AND COMMONS TO REPORT ON FEDERAL-MUNICIPAL RELATIONS

Hon. J. L. RALSTON (for the Prime Minister) moved:

That a joint committee of the Senate and House of Commons be appointed to review the special problems arising out of the location of the seat of government in the city of Ottawa and to report on the relations between the federal government and municipal authorities of the said city and their relative responsibilities in respect of such problems with power to inquire into the matter and things therein referred to:

That the said committee consist of the following: Messrs. Boucher, Cote, Dechene, Gregory, Hill, Knowles, Marshall, Matthews, McIlraith, McLean (Simcoe East), O'Brien, Pinard, Purdy, Reid, White.

That standing order 65 of the House of Commons be suspended in relation thereto;

That the committee shall have leave to sit while the house is in session;

That the said committee shall have power to send for persons, papers and records and to report from time to time;

That a message be sent to the Senate to acquaint their honours that the House of Commons has appointed this committee and to request their honours to appoint members of the Senate to act thereon with the members of the House of Commons as a joint committee of both houses.

Motion agreed to:

WORLD MONETARY CONFERENCE

INQUIRY AS TO INVITATION TO AND PARTICIPATION BY CANADA

On the orders of the day:

Mr. GORDON GRAYDON (Leader of the Opposition): On May 22 I directed an inquiry to the Minister of Finance asking him for information as to whether or not the government had been consulted with respect to the reported calling of a world monetary conference. I also inquired at that time if the government was in a position to indicate under the auspices of what nation the conference would be called and the date and place of such a meeting, also as to whether or not Canada would be represented at the proposed gathering. The Minister of Finance stated in answer to my inquiries that the government had not been consulted with respect to the reported conference and was unaware that such a conference was to be convened.

It now appears that representatives of forty-two countries, as well as the French Committee of National Liberation, have been invited by President Roosevelt to a conference to deal with monetary and financial stabilization on July 1, next. I would now ask the Minister of Finance if Canada has received an invitation to this conference and, if so, how many delegates will attend from Canada? I should also like to know who these delegates will be and who will head such a delegation.

Hon. J. L. ILSLEY (Minister of Finance): Canada has received an invitation to this conference, but the delegates have not been selected, and the number of delegates has not been decided upon.

Mr. GRAYDON: May I ask the minister whether that will be decided upon by those who call the conference, or by Canada?

Mr. ILSLEY: I have the invitation before me, and I do not think it mentions the number of delegates. That would be decided by this government.

Mr. GRAYDON: Can the minister say whether he will be attending the conference?

Mr. ILSLEY: I do not even know that. Probably I shall be there for a short time.

Mr. BLACKMORE: The minister will remember that on Friday I asked a similar question, the third part of which was whether or not the Canadian delegates would be informed that they had no authority to commit Canada to any international monetary scheme until after such scheme should have been maturely considered by the parliament of Canada.

Mr. ILSLEY: In the communication extending the invitation appears the following sentence:

> It would be understood, of course, that the delegates would not be required to hold plenipotentiary powers and that the proposals formulated at the conference would be referred to the respective governments and authorities for their acceptance or rejection.

This government in considering any proposals formulated at the conference would of course act with a due sense of their responsibility to parliament; and I do not think any further commitment than that should be asked for at this time. I would assume that if anything is proposed to alter the monetary policy of the Dominion of Canada in an important or far-reaching way, that would be brought before the house for its consideration and approval. I think that is all I should say at the moment. The government, in considering any such proposal, would act with a due sense of its responsibilities to parliament.

Mr. BLACKMORE: I believe that before Canada became committed to any international monetary scheme whatsoever there should be introduced into this house a measure which could be referred to the banking and commerce committee for the most thorough study.

SUPPLY

Hon. J. L. ILSLEY (Minister of Finance) moved that the house go into committee of supply.

Motion agreed to, and the house went into committee of supply, Mr. Bradette in the chair.

LEGISLATION

The Senate—

112. General administration, $219,980.

Mr. POULIOT: This is an important item. It concerns one of the two legislative bodies of this parliament. We hear complaints that the senate is not being given the importance that it has in our constitution. It is easy to make a comparison between our senate and the senate of the United States. Across the border the senate has much more importance than congress and it is because the American senators assumed the initiative on many important matters of public administration. There is an external affairs committee of the United States senate which decides the foreign policy of that country. They play a role of major importance, and I do not see why a discussion of matters which are so vital to our national life are left to the parliamentary assistant to the chairman of the privy council, the Prime Minister, who delivers broadcasts twice a week about matters that should be studied by a committee of the senate. I very seldom listen to the radio, but I should like to read the reports of such committees of the senate.

There are also other things that should be studied by the senate. Many conservative senators have died; let them rest in peace, but those who are still alive, though their party is dead, should meet together to discuss the vital questions of bureaucracy. They should study the civil service. On two occasions special committees of this house have recommended unanimously that a standing committee on the civil service should be set up. The government did nothing about it, but on the other hand there is in the senate a standing committee on the civil service, which never sits. It is in the same class as the honorary committee on debates, the same as the committee on public accounts which was sleeping until it was awakened by the present leader of the opposition. Yet those people complain that they are not sent any work by the House of Commons. They have completely lost any sense of shame in the senate, and with the exception of two or three senators for whom I have the deepest admiration I concur in what was said by the leader of the C.C.F. party as to the abolition of that body. Here they are, sitting perhaps fifteen days or three weeks during the session. We can see what they do by looking at their Hansard; it is as thin as a sheet of tissue paper. They meet, shake hands and go away. They have nothing to do. If they were willing to work; if they had enough initiative, they could help us; they could play the part that was allotted to them under our constitution.

I am not surprised that the vacant seats are not filled by the government. I believe there are thirteen of them, which is quite a number. It is true that this government has a majority in the senate, but I remember the time when Mr. Bennett was in power and Mr. Sauve was Postmaster General. He was my political football at the time and I wanted to keep him in the house; I did not want the Prime Minister to appoint him to the senate. I told the right hon. gentleman what economy he was practising by not making appointments to the senate. He was saving $4,000 a year for each vacant seat, plus travelling expenses, and he found the idea so good that he kept the Postmaster General in the house, to my great enjoyment. But now it would be easy for the government to appoint good men to the senate, some of the members who vote with the government on all matters but do not say a word in the house, those for whom the Christmas tree is in full swing the year round. Someone was complaining that outsiders were appointed to the senate and that as a result members of parliament were suffering an injustice. I say it is a good thing that they received the treatment they deserved. They did nothing here, and the Prime Minister could not expect them to awaken in the senate after they had been sleeping in this house since the beginning of the war. The senate is a nonentity in our parliament at the present time, just on account of the unwillingness of the senators to do something while they are sitting there. It is a great honour to be in the senate; it is like a decoration for merit.

The CHAIRMAN: Order. If I may be allowed I would refer the hon. member to standing order 41, which reads:

> No member shall speak disrespectfully of His Majesty, nor of any of the royal family; nor of the governor or person administering the government of Canada; nor use offensive words against either house, or against any member thereof. . . .

Mr. POULIOT: Yes, Mr. Chairman, and I will not infringe the rule, but this is the only time during the session when we can say what we think, not of the senators themselves but of the would-be senators and of the usefulness of the senate. I would not infringe the rule by saying that the senate is useless.

Mr. GRAYDON: Is my hon. friend preaching for a call?

Mr. POULIOT: Well, my hon. friend knows very well that the only call to the senate I accepted was when the Minister of Munitions and Supply invited us to attend the sanctioning of certain bills, and that invitation was extended to my hon. friend just as much as it was to me, since the hon. gentleman wanted to adjourn the house while I was on my feet dealing with a problem much less interesting than this one. As I have said, I have two or three old friends in the senate who are still active and full of pep, but they are like an anachronism. Why should one have pep? It is the realm of rolling chairs and railroading bills. I am not against the senate; I am for it. I think the senate could do much more than it is doing now. I will not take the trouble to search for my copy of the debates of the senate, but it is painful to think that we should be voting $618,989 to keep the senate going now. I would not be for the abolition of the senate if the senators were really up to the standard of days gone by, but now it is the reward for a long political career. It is all right to reward old friends; I am all for it, and that is why I am surprised when some opponents of the government are appointed to various important positions and especially to honorary positions. Take the last four appointments to the senate for the province of Quebec. One is a gentleman who has a fat salary as head of a power organization. Another is a gentleman who had fat contracts from the Department of Munitions and Supply for being the agent of Mr. Macmillan in the province of Quebec. The third had no political background whatever.

Mr. RALSTON: My hon. friend knows the rules better than most of us. I want to point out to you, Mr. Chairman, the language the hon. member has used with respect to the senate, and I do submit that it is an infringement of standing order 41. Not only should my hon. friend discontinue using this sort of language against the other house; I suggest to him that it would be quite in order, and the thing to do, if he would withdraw it. He said that the members there might do us some good if they were willing to work; that if they had enough initiative they might do us some good; that the senate was a nonentity; that the senate was an anachronism. A moment ago he stated that one of the members was enjoying a fat contract with somebody, and intimated that this was the reason he was appointed. I ask my hon. friend to desist from this sort of thing, and I take objection to his talking in that way regarding the other house.

Mr. POULIOT: In answer to what the minister has said—

The CHAIRMAN: The hon. member may speak to the point of order.

Mr. POULIOT: Yes. I will explain to him that there is positively nothing disrespectful in what I have said.

Mr. RALSTON: If that is so—

Mr. POULIOT: And I will ask the minister to sit down, please, and not interrupt me while I am speaking to a point of order.

Mr. RALSTON: I am speaking to a point of order.

Mr. POULIOT: Exactly. And I have to say that what I have said is in order, and I will not speak of anything else. My contention is that it is my duty, my solemn duty, to establish to the satisfaction of the Chair that I have not infringed the rules of the house while I was speaking on this subject. And I do not want my words to be distorted by anybody. I never said that it was because a man had fat contracts that he had been appointed to the senate. My hon. friend said that. But I said that a man who had fat contracts had been appointed to the senate and had received a reward besides his contract. And this I can say, and it is not disrespectful to say it. It is not attacking the honourableness of the man, in the first place.

In the second place, if I say that the senate is an anachronism, there is absolutely nothing insulting about it. And I will take the dictionary to prove to you that the definition of "anachronism" has not anything at all disrespectful, or that is against the rules of the house. Moreover, I have the Concise Oxford dictionary from the table. This is the dictionary that is to give us the true significance of each word.

Anachronic: Involving anachronism; out of date.

Anachronism: Error in computing time; thing out of harmony with the present. So anachronistic.

In French, anachronisme. Is there anything against the rules of the house in using the word "anachronism"? Then, I used the word "nonentity." Well, when the senate does not sit, can we call the senate an entity? It is an entity, theoretically, but not in fact. At the present time the senate is not sitting. I can say it is a nonentity; they do not exist. Is there something that is disrespectful in mentioning those facts?

[Mr. Ralston.]

What did I say besides that? I said a gentleman had an important job with a big salary, while he was appointed to the senate—or before he was appointed to the senate. This is not disrespectful. I did not attack their character. He has no right to sue me for libel or slander if I say it in this house. Moreover, I can say it in the drawingroom of the princess; it is the king's language. And what did I say? I said that the other fellow had no political background. Is there something disrespectful about that? I take it, statement after statement, and there is positively nothing disrespectful in what I have said. On the other hand, if this committee of the whole has become a star chamber, I will not insist any more. But on the other hand, I ask the Minister of National Defence not to be so touchy.

The CHAIRMAN: Order.

Mr. POULIOT: And to let members enjoy the rights that they have under the constitution.

The CHAIRMAN: On the point of order raised, the hon. member has stated his case, and I wish to give a ruling. I have already read to the committee standing order 41. I have no doubt in my mind that there were some disrespectful words uttered against the senate, and some newly appointed members of the senate, and I ask the hon. member to withdraw them.

Mr. POULIOT: I will consider withdrawing when you mention what I have said that was out of order, or that was not in accordance with the rules of the house.

The CHAIRMAN: I shall read again standing order 41:

No member shall speak disrespectfully of His Majesty, nor of any of the royal family; nor of the governor or person administering the government of Canada; nor use offensive words against either house, or against any member thereof.

I maintain that the insinuation against two newly appointed members of the senate, of fat contracts and receiving rewards, should be withdrawn.

Mr. POULIOT: I never made that insinuation.

The CHAIRMAN: These are the words which the hon. member actually used—"fat contract, and received rewards". The word "anachronism" might be parliamentary; but surely the word "nonentity" cannot be applied to the senate, and members of it. The statement that the hon. member made, that because senators are not sitting, it is a nonentity, cannot be applied to the senate when they are not sitting.

Mr. POULIOT: I have no objection to withdrawing the word "nonentity" if you feel like that. But with regard to the other things I said, that a man had fat contracts, but got another reward—that is what I said.

Mr. RALSTON: I do not wish to take the time of the committee; I think sufficient time has been taken. At the same time, this is a matter of serious principle.

Mr. POULIOT: Surely it is.

Mr. RALSTON: I wish to know just what the hon. member has withdrawn, and what he has not.

Mr. POULIOT: I have withdrawn the word "nonentity" at the request of the chair.

Mr. RALSTON: I am addressing the chair.

Mr. POULIOT: I was, too.

Mr. RALSTON: I propose to address the chair when I have the floor. I have asked what has been withdrawn.

The CHAIRMAN: The word "nonentity" uttered against the senate has been withdrawn. I rule that the word "anachronism" would be in order. And I also ask the hon. member for Témiscouata to withdraw the statement he made against a newly-appointed member of the senate, that he made an alleged fat contract, and received an award.

Mr. POULIOT: I cannot withdraw a thing which I have not said.

The CHAIRMAN: You will have to make an appeal to the house, then.

Mr. POULIOT: I wish to say what I have said, that a man had fat contracts from Macmillan, or something like that, after which he got a reward. This is what I said.

The CHAIRMAN: I must say that if the hon. member refuses to withdraw the statement against the newly-appointed member, I must report him to the Speaker.

Mr. POULIOT: You may report it to the Speaker; all right.

Mr. RALSTON: The item stands, then.

Item stands.

DEPARTMENT OF MUNITIONS AND SUPPLY

174. Dominion fuel board, administration and investigations, $32,120.

Mr. KNOWLES: Just to have the record straight, before we went into supply the Minister of National Defence sent me a note to the effect that the government intended to call two departments. I had absolutely no objection. I would point out, however, that on Friday night, he said that we would move into supply, and call an item in the Department of Munitions and Supply. The indication then was that there would be just one department.

Mr. RALSTON: I sent my hon. friend a note with regard to it. It really is not another department. I thought legislation would be the most innocuous item that could be suggested; but I was mistaken in that.

Mr. KNOWLES: I just wanted to have the record clear.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): Item 174 stands.

Item stands.

The CHAIRMAN: Before reporting to the house I shall have to see Hansard, so that I can see the statement made by the hon. member for Temiscouata.

Mr. RALSTON: There are other matters that will have to be dealt with also when Hansard is sent for. In the meantime, I move that the committee rise, report progress and ask leave to sit again this day.

Progress reported.

WAR APPROPRIATION BILL

PROVISION FOR GRANTING TO HIS MAJESTY AID FOR NATIONAL DEFENCE AND SECURITY

The house resumed from Friday, May 26, consideration in committee of a resolution to grant to His Majesty certain sums of money for the carrying out of measures consequent upon the existence of a state of war—Mr. Ilsley—Mr. Bradette in the chair.

DEPARTMENT OF TRADE AND COMMERCE

Export permit branch — administration, $153,805.

Mr. PERLEY: Could the minister make a general statement on these five or six items? This would facilitate our obtaining information when we come to deal with the particular items.

Hon. J. A. MacKINNON (Minister of Trade and Commerce): Mr. Chairman, I think the suggestion of the hon. member is a good one. As a matter of fact I shall be glad to tell the committee something of the work going on in the department in connection with these various items under this war appropriation. I shall deal first with the export permit branch. This branch was established in the Department of Trade and Commerce in April, 1941. The purpose of export control is, first, to conserve materials for Canada's own requirements or those of her allies; second, to prevent exports going to dangerous destinations or undesirable consignees; third, to fulfil our commitments to the United Kingdom; fourth, to conserve supplies for Canadian civilian use and, fifth, to aid in the administration of United States export control and domestic policy and to prevent Canada from being used as a back door by persons wishing to evade United States export regulations.

This branch considers applications for permits to export and issues or refuses them after consultation with the various administrators and controllers. An interdepartmental committee on export control upon which are representatives of trade and commerce, munitions and supply, wartime prices and trade board and all other departments concerned, deals with special questions in regard to the issuance of export permits which present particular problems from the point of view of shortage of supply, allocation of exports to different markets, et cetera.

Subsidies are paid by the dominion government in order to maintain Canadian domestic price ceilings. These subsidies are not payable on goods for export. The export permit branch recovers any subsidy paid before issuing a permit. The amount of subsidies recovered from September 1, 1942, to April 30, 1944, was $407,998.81. This money was remitted, partly to the prices stabilization board and to the Department of Agriculture for dairy supplies. Export quotas have been set up for a number of commodities and this division supervises the allocation of them. A fee of $2 is charged for each permit to export, the value of which exceeds $100, and the revenue for the present fiscal year amounts to $174,394.91.

Mr. PERLEY: The minister has made a statement with regard to export permits and I notice that practically the same statement appears in his annual report. Could he give us the number of permits issued this year, not only for the exporting of general commodities but for the products of western Canada other than grain? I understand that his department controls the general export of everything, grain included. Perhaps the minister can give us the number of permits issued for the export of grain, to the United States in particular, and also the policy of the government with respect to the use of United States transportation facilities. As I understand it, a number of United States cars are sent direct to the western provinces and do not come under the same regulations that govern shipments by lake boats. Perhaps he can give us a little information about this.

Later on I shall have something to say about the different items. I notice that the auditor's report contains an item with respect to drawbacks received by the mills. The minister has said that subsidies are not paid on goods for export, but how about flour? I understand that a subsidy or a drawback is paid to the mills on wheat which is to be manufactured into flour, for both domestic and export use. How do they keep these apart? From the minister's statement I would gather that flour for export would not carry any subsidy or drawback, and I should like some information as to how the millers keep their accounts of these subsidies; how they keep track of the wheat used to produce domestic flour.

I think we should have an auditor's report as to the subsidies paid to the mills or whoever received it, also a statement as to the price paid for the grain delivered to the mills and the basis upon which the flour is sold. The other day a return was brought down by the minister's department giving the price of flour at Saint John, and on the basis of that return we find that the price of wheat figures out at more than a basis of $1.25 Fort William. This return was tabled on May 15 in reply to my request for prices of flour at Saint John and Vancouver. It shows that for mutual aid the price was $9.46 per 280 pounds. If you figure out how much wheat it takes to produce 280 pounds of flour you will find that they ought to have at least $1.50 for the wheat, taking it on the basis of forty-five pounds of flour from a bushel of wheat. Then there would be the middlings and bran and so on, which, according to the bureau of statistics, would figure at about twenty-seven cents. If we take these figures it comes to $1.77 for the wheat. How about the drawback which the miller gets? Is it the miller that gets it? If so, that amount would have to be added on top of the $1.77. What is the per bushel drawback, which would have to be added to the $1.77, including flour, middlings, bran and shorts on the minister's own basis of 280 pounds, Saint John, $9.40?

Mr. MacKINNON (Edmonton West): I am very anxious to give the hon. member for Qu'Appelle and any other hon. member all possible information on any of the items coming before the committee this afternoon. The item before us deals with export permits, and the hon. member is asking for information which is entirely foreign to the subject under discussion. Some of the information he has asked for could be given on my civil estimates. He has also asked for information as to millers' drawbacks. That does not come under this department but under the Department of Finance.

The hon. member asked as to the number of export permits issued this year. The total number issued was 99,153. I am sorry I have not a break-down of these items, showing the commodities covered.

The hon. member also asked as to the use of United States cars for the movement of wheat. That does not in any way come under this item.

Mr. PERLEY: Does it not come under export?

Mr. MacKINNON (Edmonton West): It would not come under export permits, because export permits are not used in connection with that movement at all. The hon. member will have an opportunity to get that information on my civil estimates, when I shall be prepared to give it to him. I am not hesitating at all to give all the information available now, but I think it would facilitate the discussion if we confined ourselves to the item before us.

Mr. PERLEY: I know that a man has to have a permit to ship grain to the United States and that it would go there in some United States cars. I think my questions are quite pertinent therefore, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN: There is this difficulty when there are both civil and war appropriation estimates. I think, however, it would shorten the discussion if the minister's suggestion were to be followed. He has stated that he has not the information before him that the hon. member desires.

Mr. PERLEY: I submit, Mr. Chairman, that my questions are pertinent, because according to the auditor general's report, page Y-6, after "Canadian shipping board administration" the next item that appears is "drawback claims for millers" and the next item is "export permit branch administration", and these items are all listed under the Department of Trade and Commerce. Further details are given on pages Y-25, Y-26, Y-27 and Y-28. I should like the figures of expenditures to compare them with the expenditures given in the auditor general's report for the fiscal year ending March 31, 1943, for "export permit branch administration".

Mr. MacKINNON (Edmonton West): The amount voted for 1943-44 was $144,160 for the export permit branch. This year we are asking for $153,805. The total expenditure for the fiscal year 1942-43 was $99,842.11, and for 1943-44, $136,851.78. The revenue for the fiscal year 1942-43 was $139,727.53, and the revenue for 1943-44 was $174,394.81, showing that this branch operated at a profit of some $40,000 for the year.

Mr. PERLEY: The minister stated that the number of permits issued was 99,153. Quite a number of permits were refused last year according to the last annual statement. Would the minister state how many permits have been refused this year and to where the goods were consigned?

Mr. MacKINNON (Edmonton West): I have not that information before me at the moment.

Mr. PERLEY: Perhaps we could get it after eight o'clock.

At six o'clock the committee took recess.

After Recess

The committee resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. RALSTON: I move that the committee rise, report progress and ask leave to sit again this day.

Progress reported.

PRIVATE BILLS

FUNDY AIR LINES

The house in committee on bill No. 89, to incorporate Fundy Air Lines—Mr. Pottier—Mr. Bradette in the chair.

On section 1—Incorporation.

Mr. KNOWLES: I understand that the committee proposed an amendment to this bill. Should we not know where the amendment fits in?

The CHAIRMAN: There are some amendments.

Section agreed to.

Sections 2 to 6 inclusive agreed to.

On section 7—Powers of the company.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): If hon. members will read the powers of the company they will at once be impressed with the far-reaching powers that are sought. I only desire to call attention to this phase of it. The real object of the company, I assume, is to incorporate an air transportation line or lines. But this company can carry on the business of bus proprietors, and builders and manufacturers. It can also carry on the business of insurance. I should like to have some assurance that the superintendent of insurance is cognizant of the provisions of this bill. Would the promoter be good enough to tell the committee if this bill has the imprimatur of the superintendent of insurance? I wish to point out to this committee that the powers here are almost unheard of. I am not going to vote against the principle of the bill. I want to see the proprietors, the incorporators, get a charter to incorporate an aeroplane company, but I do not want them to go into the business of insurance; I do not think they ought to go into the business of a bus company, and above everything else I do not think they ought to go into the business of stock jobbing, because that is in this bill too. I am surprised to find that they are asking for so many powers. I wonder whether the committee gave consideration to all the powers sought and what reasons were assigned by the promoters for asking for the multiplicity of powers. I suggest that this is a kind of blanket affair. They want a great deal more than they ought to receive from this House of Commons. I merely point that out to the committee and to the Minister of Transport who is in his place at this time. I wonder whether he has taken cognizance of the tremendous powers asked for by this company. They have almost enough power to hang a man. I wonder whether his department has given consideration to that aspect of the bill and whether those considerations were in any degree considered by the committee on railways, canals and telegraph lines. In a nutshell, I think the powers asked for are too wide.

I am anxious to see this company have a bill passed that will enable them to operate aeroplane transportation, because this is private enterprise which I like to see encouraged in this country, and in which many of us still believe. I am sure the minister believes in it, too, if he would only allow himself to give self-expression.

I should like the promoter to explain the omnibus powers that are asked for in this bill.

Mr. POTTIER: The hon. member for York-Sunbury has asked for an explanation on the three objects of this bill. His first question has to do with paragraph (f) with regard to insurance.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): No; the first objection I had, if it can be called an objection, was to the power to carry on the business of omnibus proprietors and builders—paragraph (d) of section 7.

Mr. POTTIER: I take it, that that paragraph means they are asking for power to carry on that business in connection with air lines.

[Mr. R. B. Hanson.]

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): No, that is not it.

Mr. GRAYDON: I am afraid the courts would not so interpret it.

Mr. POTTIER: That is the intention here. They wish power to carry on any business that would be connected with the carrying on of a successful air line. That is what they are asking here. That is what I take that paragraph to mean.

In so far as paragraph (f) is concerned, the insurance mentioned there is insurance of a kind connected with the operation which they are entitled to carry on; that is, to—

> . . . act as agents for accident, indemnity and all other kinds of insurance in connection with the operations which the company is entitled to carry on or in connection with similar operations carried on by other companies, firms or persons.

I take that to be insurance connected with the business of air lines?

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): That is a fair interpretation.

Mr. POTTIER: I think the next objection of the hon. member for York-Sunbury was to stock jobbing. I do not think there is any power under paragraph (f) to do any stock jobbing. I take that to be paragraph (j).

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): There is no limit in the section to what they can do.

Mr. POTTIER: I do not think the company has the power implied by the hon. member for York-Sunbury.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I submit that paragraph (d) of section 7 is an alternative power to paragraphs (a), (b) and (c), and under any proper statutory interpretation is in no way connected with the business of aeroplane passage. That is not so true with respect to paragraph (f) of section 7. That paragraph expressly provides that in connection with the business of the company, the company may act as agent. Of course I think that is an appurtenance of the business of carrying on an aeroplane company and I would not have so much objection to that.

Mr. HAZEN: That is the omnibus business too.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): But in connection with paragraphs (h), (i) and (j), I suggest these are pretty large powers. I never saw them given to a joint stock company in just this language, and I doubt if they can get it under the Companies Act of Canada or of any of the other provinces. It seems to me that the draftsman who prepared this bill must have had something in his mind when he asked for all these rather extraordinary powers to deal with the distribution and capitalization among the shareholders of undivided profits and the reserves by assigning shares to the shareholders holding shares pro rata and so forth. That part could obviously be under the Joint Stock Companies Act, but certainly I do not think this company needs to have a bus franchise and to be a bus company because the same people now have a bus company that almost covers the province of New Brunswick. S.M.T. Limited is controlled by the same interests.

These are the main objections I would have and perhaps the only ones. The borrowing powers in section 8 and the ancillary and incidental powers in section 9, I have no objection to at all. If the committee desires to pass this bill as it is I am satisfied, but I think I should point these things out to the committee.

Mr. GRAYDON: I do not think the hon. member who is sponsoring this bill has made out a very good case in respect of section 7. I should like to ask the hon. member if in the committee stage of the bill the powers to be conferred on this company by this legislation as contained in paragraph (d) namely, to carry on the business of omnibus proprietors and builders, were discussed, and, if so, what decision was arrived at and what were the reasons given by the committee for arriving at that decision. As pointed out by the hon. member for York-Sunbury, and very properly so, the powers asked for in paragraphs (a), (b), (c) and (d) are powers that are in no way limited to the ordinary aeroplane business. I take it that is the case in so far as paragraph (e) is concerned. It says: "for the better carrying on of the business of the company". Then there are several paragraphs which are limited and perhaps confined and restricted because they come within the business of the company, but so far as paragraph (d) is concerned that is in an entirely different category. If paragraph (d) passes and it means anything, it means that we are conferring upon this company the right to carry on the business of omnibus transportation, and I think the point should be further explained.

Mr. POTTIER: It would be incidental to their business, I should say, to operate a bus from the airport to some central point, and it seems a fair power to ask that they be able to operate a bus to carry passengers from an aerodrome to some central point in a town or city. As far as I know there is no intention of going beyond that.

Mr. GRAYDON: If that were done under paragraph (e) I do not think there would be any real objection, because then it would be within the confines of the comapny's own business.

Mr. POTTIER: If that is the only objection of the leader of the opposition I would not mind if he moved an amendment making this a subparagraph under (e).

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Would the hon. member tell us if those powers were discussed in the railway committee?

Mr. POTTIER: Yes.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Was there any discussion with respect to (d), and what was the explanation of the promoter or his agents?

Mr. POTTIER: There was no particular discussion of paragraph (d) before the standing committee on railways, canals and telegraph lines. There was a general discussion of the powers asked for in the bill, and the agents of the incorporators, who were there, offered to answer any question; but there was no particular discussion of (d).

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Was the bill read to the committee, or was it just called section by section? This paragraph (d) is not limited to bus transportation within the business of the company. This is a federal charter and it gives them the right to operate omnibus service anywhere in Canada. You can get that right under provincial companies acts, and you cannot run on the highways without a licence from the provincial government, but this gives the company the right to operate interprovincial bus traffic. Did it ever occur to the committee to investigate that point and ask why this power should be requested?

Mr. POTTIER: This is merely incidental, I may tell my hon. friend.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): If my hon. friend will pardon me, I suggest that on a proper construction of this section 7, paragraphs (a), (b), (c) and (d) are distinctly operating powers. They may be nothing but omnibus proprietors and builders which, under provincial jurisdiction, carries with it the right to use the highways. However, I am not going to say anything more about it; if the house is willing to put through legislation of this kind I am satisfied.

Mr. HOWE: Just to shorten the discussion, may I say that this bill does not give the company the right to operate anything. It is an application to incorporate a company. Ordinarily applications for the incorporation of companies are granted freely by the government, provided that they comply with the dominion Companies Act. I believe I am responsible for recommending to the government that in connection with companies seeking incorporation to operate air lines the approval of this House of Commons should be obtained. I did so for one reason. A year or eighteen months ago, at a time when it was impossible to operate any air line company owing to the fact that no equipment could be obtained and no gasoline could be allowed, the Secretary of State was being flooded with applications for the incorporation of companies to operate air lines, with titles that were most comprehensive. One that I recall was the Canada-West Indies Air Line company; another was the Canada-North Atlantic Air Line company, and I could name several more. At that time the government had not announced its policy dealing with the operation of air services. It was quite obvious, or at least it seemed to me quite possible, that those desiring the incorporation of companies with names such as I have mentioned intended to trade on the name of the company as an asset, which seemed to me quite improper. Therefore I asked council to require that the approval of this house be obtained in connection with the incorporation of any air line company. My thought was that those desiring incorporation should come before the committee on railways, canals and telegraph lines and explain why they wanted to incorporate a company, and give hon. members any explanations that might be required. I would point out that, had the government not taken that step, this company could have gone to the Secretary of State and been incorporated with any powers the incorporators wished to include in the bill.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Only those coming within the statute.

Mr. HOWE: Yes, within the statute. I may add, however, that under the declared policy of the government it will be quite impossible for this company to operate an air line and also a bus line. That is expressly prohibited by legislation which has been placed on the order paper; and unless the incorporators can satisfy the government that they intend to operate within declared government policy, they will not be assigned a route over which they may operate. I should like to make it clear that this bill gives the company no permission to operate anything.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I take issue with that statement. It is quite true that the bill in itself will not entitle this company to operate aeroplane transportation.

Mr. HOWE: Nor bus lines.

[Mr. R. B. Hanson.]

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Well, would the minister produce any order in council that prevents the incorporation of a company to operate interprovincial bus lines? I assure him it is a fact that under provincial legislation a bus company may be incorporated to operate bus lines within a province. It is true in my province, and I assume it is true in all the other provinces. That may not and probably does not mean that they can operate interprovincial traffic, because when they go beyond the confines of one province according to my view of the law they come within the jurisdiction of the federal parliament; that is to say, with respect to transportation between the provinces. I am asking the minister now if there is an order in council passed under the provisions of the War Measures Act, which prevents a company from getting a federal charter under the Companies Act, without coming to parliament. Has an order in council been passed of the same nature as that relating to aeroplane companies? I am just asking that for information. The minister shakes his head; I take it for granted that such an order in council has not been passed.

Mr. HOWE: If a company wished to get a federal charter to operate bus lines, I suppose it could do so without coming to parliament, but if the company wanted to operate in more than one province it would have to satisfy each province, and also obtain operating rights from each province, in which case it would hardly need dominion incorporation to operate across provincial boundaries.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Well, they would be under the jurisdiction of the board of transport commissioners with regard to rates and that sort of thing. It is quite true that you cannot operate on the highways of a province without a licence from the government of that province, even if you have a dominion charter. So that when the minister made the sweeping statement he did make, that this company could not operate anything, I think on reflection he will agree that that was just a little too large an order. I agree with him, entirely, that as the law now stands this company could not operate air lines transportation, without much more. However, I am not going into that.

Nor do I wish to be misunderstood. I am anxious that this company should have a charter to operate aeroplanes. They can then fight their way through to a satisfactory conclusion. But I think the powers they have asked for are too wide. They can do almost anything, and I am rather astonished that hon.

members in this house, who have legal minds, have not been aroused. Just read over the powers as to how they can switch these shares, or reserves, or undivided profits. I thought those days were pretty well over in Canada; I imagine they would meet with a good deal of trouble from the income tax division.

However, I am not going to hold up the bill, nor did I ever intend to. But I really am astonished at the magnitude of the powers asked for to operate an aeroplane transportation company, and I think my duty is done in pointing out these facts to parliament.

Mr. MACDONALD (Kingston City): I think the hon. member will find, upon reading section 10, that the powers of the company are cut down considerably by that section.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): That probably is true.

Mr. MACDONALD (Kingston City): They can do only such things as the Aeronautics Act and the Transportation Act allow them to do. So that that cuts down considerably what they can do.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Yes; that is an overriding restriction; but it is not all-inclusive.

Mr. KNOWLES: The Minister of Munitions and Supply (Mr. Howe) said a moment ago that, if passed, this bill would give the company no power to operate anything. I take it that in a sense what he has said is correct. Yet, if that is so I do not understand why the hon. member for Shelburne-Yarmouth-Clare bothers to introduce the bill.

Mr. HOWE: He wishes to incorporate a company; that is all.

Mr. KNOWLES: It seems to me that if the incorporation of the company is granted by the bill, and the company starts in to sell shares and get itself organized, it will be in a position to do things contrary to the policies laid down by the minister when he spoke on March 17. I refer in particular to what he said on that date. He said that one reason for halting expansion was that the young men who should have a prominent part in any such expansion are overseas on combat duty.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): What about these men; they were all overseas?

Mr. KNOWLES: On the other hand the minister pointed out it was not too early to plan for orderly and rapid expansion of our domestic aviation. I wholly agree with the two statements the minister made on that occasion. I am wondering whether the incorporation of this company does not give them certain powers, and give them the right to get started, to sell their shares, and actually vitiate the two principles the minister laid down. I particularly emphasize the minister's suggestion that the expansion of our air services should be on an orderly basis.

I do not agree with the hon. member for York-Sunbury, that the way to achieve orderly expansion is to go on giving wide-open privileges to private enterprise. It seems to me that, to be consistent with the position he took on March 17, the Minister of Munitions and Supply should oppose the passing of this bill.

Mr. NOSEWORTHY: I was going to remark that in view of the fact that the house has not yet had an opportunity of considering legislation of a similar class to be brought down by the minister, namely, that of setting up a transport board for aviation, and other legislation pertinent to the working out of the government's policy, it is premature to ask hon. members to support this measure. I would favour withholding support of the bill until such time as government legislation in the field of aviation has come before the house, and until we have had an opportunity of understanding it.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): In justice to the promoters of the bill, I would say that the five names mentioned in section 1 meet 100 per cent the suggestion made that returned men are to be given opportunities to operate aeroplane companies—men returned from the last war. I know all these men, with one exception. Mr. Rogers has to his credit in the last war the destruction of eleven German aircraft. Mr. Ritchie was a gallant soldier in the last war, and up to a recent date rendered yeoman service in this war in organizing the army in military district No. 7. Mr. Bell is a personal friend of mine; and he, too, had a most creditable war record. Mr. Kenneth C. Irving, who will be head of the company, also had a fine record in the last war. I do not know Mr. Hodgins personally, but I am informed that he, too, is a veteran of the last war. So that these men qualify 100 per cent for the minister's definition—although I do not suppose the minister thinks that anyone who is a non-soldier should not be allowed to be engaged in the aeroplane business.

I say this in justice to these men. I am anxious to see the bill go through, but I submit that the powers they have asked for are really beyond reason, for an aeroplane transportation company.

Sections 8 and 9 agreed to.

On section 10—Limitations.

Mr. KNOWLES: Was this section not amended? Would the Chairman read the section as amended?

The CHAIRMAN: It states:

10. The operation of the company shall be carried on throughout the Dominion of Canada and elsewhere and shall be subject to the provisions of the Aeronautics Act, chapter 3 of the revised Statutes of Canada, 1927, and of the Transport Act, 1938, chapter 53 of the statutes of 1938, and amendments thereto.

Mr. KNOWLES: What is the amendment?

Mr. MACDONALD (Kingston City): It consists in the addition of the words "and amendments thereto."

The CHAIRMAN: Yes; those three words constitute the amendment.

Bill reported, read the third time and passed.

THEODORE ZALOPANY

Mr. R. W. GRAY (Lambton West) moved the second reading of bill No. 10, for the relief of Theodore Zalopany.

Mr. JEAN FRANÇOIS POULIOT (Témiscouata): Mr. Speaker, I desire to protest once more against this legislation. It is being disposed of quickly, but there is no reason why the Senate and the House of Commons should pay any attention to legislation of this kind. It represents some work to examine these cases in committee and investigate them, but most of the records are disgraceful and it is unfortunate that such evidence is published by the king's printer. I hope that the time will come when these bills do not appear on the order paper of this house. If the other house enjoys listening to cases like this, that is their business, but I think we should dispense with this type of legislation. There should be another type of legislation which would not require to be passed by the House of Commons, only by the Senate, and which would not appear on our order paper.

Motion agreed to and bill read the second time.

TRADE AND COMMERCE

Export permit branch, administration, $153,805.

Mr. PERLEY: When the committee took recess at six o'clock the minister was about to give some information with respect to the number of export permits that had been refused and why they were refused. While he is giving us that information, perhaps he could also tell us who comprise this shipping board.

Mr. MacKINNON (Edmonton West): We are dealing with the export permit branch, not the shipping board.

Mr. PERLEY: The minister was going to give us information with respect to the permits that had been refused.

Mr. MacKINNON (Edmonton West): We have not in Ottawa the number of export permits that have been refused. I can get that information and give it later to the hon. member or submit it in any other way.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Where does the branch operate?

Mr. MacKINNON (Edmonton West): In Ottawa. I made a mistake in using the words "in Ottawa".

Mr. PERLEY: How many export permits have been issued for grain from the western provinces to the United States direct, not through lake shippers?

Mr. MacKINNON (Edmonton West): No permits are required for the export of No. 1, 2 or 3 northern wheat, and those are the grades that are being exported.

Mr. PERLEY: What about feed wheat?

Mr. MacKINNON (Edmonton West): The export of feed wheat requires a permit.

Mr. PERLEY: How many were issued?

Mr. MacKINNON (Edmonton West): I have not that information here, but possibly I can get it.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): How many commodities require export permits, and what are they?

Mr. MacKINNON (Edmonton West): Practically everything.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): That is what I thought. Has anything been overlooked? A man cannot even export his wife.

Mr. NOSEWORTHY: In connection with what countries are export permits required?

Mr. MacKINNON (Edmonton West): All countries with which we do business.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): That is a most illuminating answer.

Mr. MacKINNON (Edmonton West): It is comprehensive.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): It is intended to conceal. Name the countries.

Mr. MacKINNON (Edmonton West): If I understand the hon. member correctly, he is asking about shipments to other countries, and he wants me to name the countries with which we do business and in connection with which export permits are required. I said, all countries with which we do business. That is a comprehensive answer. I cannot give any other answer unless I itemize them. I could start in with the countries on this hemisphere, then take the United Kingdom, Australia and various other countries of the world.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): That is the answer; the American countries and certain others. That is a reasonable request.

Mr. PERLEY: I asked for the number that had been refused and this afternoon the minister referred to this matter himself. In his departmental report it states that export permits were refused because of unsatisfactory consignees or destinations. Surely he can give us the number which have been refused this year, and to what countries. He gave the number for last year.

Mr. MacKINNON (Edmonton West): The figure referred to by the hon. member covers export permits that were refused during the year ending March, 1943.

Mr. PERLEY: That is the last report we have.

Mr. MacKINNON (Edmonton West): Those are the figures to which the hon. member is now referring. I have not the figures as to the number of export permits refused for the year ending March 31, 1944.

Mr. PERLEY: The minister stated this afternoon that 99,153 applications for export permits had been granted, and I was wondering why he could not give us the number that had been refused.

Mr. MacKINNON (Edmonton West): I have not that information here. My hon. friend wanted to know the personnel of the export control committee. They are as follows: Mr. Mallory, of the Department of Trade and Commerce, is chairman of the committee, and the other members are Mr. Adams, of the foreign exchange control board, Mr. English of the Department of Trade and Commerce, Mr. Angus, of the Department of External Affairs, Mr. Geddes of the wartime prices and trade board, Mr. Taylor and Mr. Sproule of the wartime industries control board.

Mr. PERLEY: The committee must have been enlarged considerably since 1943, because the last report shows the salaries and that there were not nearly as many employed in 1943.

Mr. MacKINNON (Edmonton West): There are no salaries paid to the members of the committee.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): They are all civil servants?

Mr. MacKINNON (Edmonton West): Yes.

Mr. PERLEY: What salaries will be paid out of this vote?

Mr. MacKINNON (Edmonton West): We are asking for $105,420 for 1944-45 salaries.

Mr. PERLEY: That is a considerable increase over last year.

Mr. MacKINNON (Edmonton West): An increase of $6,270.

Mr. PERLEY: The last report of the auditor general shows $65,907 for salaries.

Mr. MacKINNON (Edmonton West): I believe that is two years old.

Mr. PERLEY: That is just another evidence of how difficult it is to get information with respect to the minister's department. I have here, for instance, a report on the grain business in Canada, dealing with the 1942 crop. That is two years old. We are approaching the 1943-44 crop, but we have no report more recent than this one which is two years old. The minister now says that the auditor general's report is two years old in giving the salaries. How can we make comparisons if we do not know what was paid for salaries last year?

Mr. MacKINNON (Edmonton West): The salaries paid last year amounted to $99,150, and we are asking for an increase this year of $6,270.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): What is the basis or what are the bases upon which export permits are granted or refused? What is the policy and who decides the policy? Does this export permit board decide it, or is it a matter of government policy in a given case or with respect to a given commodity?

Mr. MacKINNON (Edmonton West): I gave that information this afternoon. It considers applications for export permits and refuses or grants after consultation with the various administrators and controllers. Members of the committee will understand that we are the machinery through which these export permits are handled. Representations are made to us by other departments of government and by controllers and administrators, and the applications are then refused or approved.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Then it is not purely an administrative body but a body with judicial functions. But it is not an entirely independent body. Its deliberations and its decisions are based upon the representations that may be made to it not only by applicants for export permits but by the controllers and what not set up by the government. I have in mind the export of seed potatoes within a few weeks. Some of these boards are given pretty wide powers. Do they ever consult the minister in a given case?

Mr. MacKINNON (Edmonton West): Oh, yes.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): In all cases?

Mr. MacKINNON (Edmonton West): Not in all cases.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): In how many?

Mr. MacKINNON (Edmonton West): It would be a fairly limited number.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): So that the control of the export trade of this country through the issue of export permits is in the hands of a group of civil servants and the government has ceased to function as such.

Mr. MacKINNON (Edmonton West): Oh, no.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): That is what it comes to. They have fairly wide powers. I know of one particular case where seed potatoes were required very badly by our neighbours to the south. We were anxious to get in there in peace time. We would have given anything to establish a trade with the southern states in our seed potatoes from New Brunswick. But there was always considerable difficulty in getting a permit. I must say that in the case I had in point for one of my colleagues the board were very decent indeed when the facts were placed before them, and the permit was issued. But that is not always the case. Very wide powers are being given to these boards, and I am just wondering whether it is wise for the country to vest such wide powers in a group of civil servants, who, after all, are not business men. Not one of them could be called a business man.

Mr. MacKINNON (Edmonton West): The export permit board does not take it upon itself to decide these matters without being guided largely by the administrators and controllers and, in the case of food products, by the advice of the Department of Agriculture. As I said before, the board is largely the administrative machinery.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): The board then can of its own powers grant or refuse a permit, notwithstanding the representations that may be made against such a course by some of these controllers or administrators?

Mr. MacKINNON (Edmonton West): That would be possible.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I imagine the regulations are wide enough and extensive enough for that.

Mr. MacKINNON (Edmonton West): I would say so.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Here is a board that is exercising judicial functions, and there is discretion in the board. As I understand the minister, the board is not entirely bound by the representations that may be made either by the applicant or by others concerned. So that it must be exercising a judicial discretion and can of its own motion overrule the representations made to it. Is that a fact?

Mr. MacKINNON (Edmonton West): It can, but almost invariably it follows the advice given to it by the administrators.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): Has there been any increase in the number of permits granted over last year and over the year before that? What are the figures for last year and the year before? How long does it take to have an export permit issued after it has been applied for?

Mr. MacKINNON (Edmonton West): It depends entirely on the commodity. Some can be granted in a matter of hours. Some may take a day or two or a little longer.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): How many applications were refused in the last fiscal year and what were the commodities? I think the minister ought to have that information here.

Mr. MacKINNON (Edmonton West): I shall be glad to get that information.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): The minister did not answer my question. How many permits were issued last year and the year before and was there an increase over the year previous? Is it the policy at the present time to increase as much as possible the number of export permits granted, in order to increase our external trade?

Mr. MacKINNON (Edmonton West): I have not the exact figures, but there has been a substantial increase in the number of permits granted this year over last year. We are guided to a very large extent by the administrator. One reason why the board operates under the Department of Trade and Commerce is that the department is necessarily anxious to promote trade and business in every way and our approach to the matter of granting export permits is a sympathetic one.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): Does the minister feel that everything possible is being done to grant these permits?

Mr. MacKINNON (Edmonton West): Yes.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): Is it the policy of the department to increase trade, and does the minister review from time to time the refusals to grant permits so as to see how matters line up? What responsibility does he take for refusal of permits?

Mr. MacKINNON (Edmonton West): Any refusal is referred to the board for review. That does not come to me except in the odd case. A question was asked about the actual number of permits issued in 1942-43 and 1943-44. They are respectively: 87,400 and 99,153.

Mr. POULIOT: I desire to praise the minister for having said not long ago that we shall need a large number of ships for our trade after the war. Canada is an exporting nation and we shall have to find ships to convey our goods to all countries of the world. We shall need aeroplanes also and all other means of transport, and I hope there will be true collaboration and cooperation between the Minister of Trade and Commerce, the Minister of Agriculture and the Minister of Transport in order that our trade may be the largest after the war and, if possible, before the end of the war. The minister has men who are well trained in several commercial observation posts in all the countries that are not occupied by the enemy. But may I tell him this—and I want him to listen closely to what I tell him now, and not be disturbed by anyone while I am addressing the Chair on a matter like this. I say that we should have commercial independence in Canada. I am not for the political independence of Canada now.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury: Not yet.

Mr. POULIOT: I will ask the hon. member for York-Sunbury not to try to be a mind-reader, because we shall put a fez on his head if he does—and something else. We have to be commercially independent, and if we go to South America as little brothers of big Uncle Sam we shall not be as well received as if we went there as Canadians, as citizens of a great and proud country. If we are under the tutelage of British ambassadors, ministers and consuls; if our commercial agents are not independent of them, in order to compete with them in trade, then our export trade will be a fiasco. I should like every serious-minded business man in the country to hear what is said now. If they want progress in trade; if they want to be successful in implanting their trade in other countries, next to British trade agents or Chinese trade agents or African trade agents, or any others, they must be entirely free. I thought it was a great mistake when the Prime Minister announced the appointment of a Canadian consul general in New York and when he said that this official would work in cooperation with the British embassy. That was all wrong. Why? Because the duty of the Minister of Trade and Commerce is to see to it that all Canadian traders compete with the traders of any other nation of the world. I want the minister to remember this because I speak to him as friend to friend and I know that he means well—

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Beware of the Greeks.

Mr. POULIOT: —and I know he is an able minister, a much abler minister than the last one in the Bennett cabinet. I say that with full knowledge and I appreciate the applause of the committee as I say that. It is true. I do not say the other one meant badly, but I say that the minister we have now is much more competent than the one that was in charge at that time, and this I say because his predecessor, who may be illustrious in other ways, had no broad vision of trade such as the present one has. That is why I think it is so important that, instead of restrictions being applied by the export permit board or any other board, every facility should be given to red-blooded Canadians to export to other countries all the goods that are not required in this country for consumption. They must rely on the constant assistance of the Department of Trade and Commerce, and then it will not be for us to go after any other country for trade protection. We have ships. We have a fine merchant marine. We have been told that our navy has expanded considerably for the protection of our trade routes, and we shall have powerful rivals. I would ask hon. gentlemen to keep the peace for a moment. If they want to chatter, they should not sing a hymn too loudly.

I will say another thing to the minister. Not so long ago I read in the press that at the conclusion of the war or perhaps at the end of this year the merchant marine of the United States will comprise fifty thousand vessels and will be as large as all the combined merchant marines of the world. It is possible for Canadian shippers to ship their produce and goods on foreign vessels or on vessels of other countries, but it is also important that Canadian vessels be registered in Canada instead of in some other country. It is colonial to register Canadian ships in London, New York or anywhere else. It means that the owners of those ships are not sure enough of themselves to take advantage of our legislation to give credit to Canada for the vessels that are owned in Canada. I hope that the minister will not forget those observations too quickly; that he will remember them, and that since he has not the same turn of mind he will not give false interpretations to what I said as his illustrious predecessors did in other ways.

I should like to say a few words with regard to one other matter. This matter is not of the same importance as general trade trends and conditions. It is very difficult to get information about export permits for charcoal. There is a way of shipping charcoal in the United States and I am told that charcoal absorbs water. It is known by the exporters that some water is poured on charcoal to make it heavier and they receive a better weight. That is just as ingenious as the plans of the great Archimedes. It is apparent they must have studied physics, but they are not honest with the consignee. I will not give names below, but I shall give them later to the minister, and I shall ask him to make an investigation in due course so that the patrons of those shippers will not be deceived as to the weight of the shipment. I thank the committee for listening so generously to the few remarks which I have made, and which I made in order to promote Canadian trade and to try to relieve us of all inferiority complexes in matters that are so vital to the future of this country.

Mr. MARSHALL: I wish to make one brief remark with respect to the export permit branch which was set up in 1941. Paragraph 2 on page 5 of the deputy minister's report is rather difficult to follow. We are told in that paragraph that 95,000 applications were received. Of those 95,000, 3,150 were refused. That would bring the total down to 91,850; yet we are told that only 87,400 permits were issued. I should like to know what happened to the 4,450. We are told that of that 87,450, 75,488 carry a $2 licence fee. Seventy-five thousand permits at $2 is $150,000; yet we are told a net revenue of $140,000 was produced. I think the minister should give an explanation of that particular paragraph, because it is not clear and may leave a wrong impression in the mind of the layman. It leaves a difficult impression in my own mind at the present time as to what it actually does mean.

Mr. MacKINNON (Edmonton West): In answer to the hon. member for Camrose I would point out that out of 95,000 applications for export permits, 3,150 were refused on the advice of the administrators or controllers because of the supply situation in Canada; but in addition to that a substantial number were refused by the export board itself, for purposes of economic warfare.

Mr. MARSHALL: Who refused the 3,150?

Mr. MacKINNON (Edmonton West): They were refused on the advice of the administrators or controllers.

Mr. MARSHALL: Therefore in reality, instead of only 3,150 applications being refused, 7,600 were refused.

Mr. MacKINNON (Edmonton West): Yes; the remainder were refused for other reasons: For example, people on the black list or supplies for countries like Spain and Portugal where there might be a danger of the goods reaching undesirable destinations

Mr. MARSHALL: What permits could be refused by the administrator or controller? Who had the power to cancel such permits? Is that entirely in the hands of the minister himself?

Mr. MacKINNON (Edmonton West): The refusal of those permits on the grounds of economic warfare is in the hands of the export board itself.

The hon. member pointed to the seeming discrepancy in the fees. The amount shown simply by multiplying the number of permits granted by the $2 fee does not take into account the rebates that were made later.

Mr. MARSHALL: Would the minister enlarge on that?

Mr. MacKINNON (Edmonton West): Then permits under $100 do not require a $2 fee.

Mr. MARSHALL: How many were there for goods under $100 that would not carry the $2 fee?

Mr. MacKINNON (Edmonton West): There would be a large number. We have not the figures at the moment, but they would be substantial.

Mr. MARSHALL: Might I have those figures?

Mr. MacKINNON (Edmonton West): Yes; I shall be glad to get them for the hon. member.

Mr. MARSHALL: When may we have an opportunity to discuss the board recently set up under the direction of the Minister of Trade and Commerce by order in council P.C. 70 of January 31 last, known as the Canadian export board? Evidently there is no vote here covering the operations of this board; yet according to the Commercial Intelligence Journal for February 12, for the purposes of this board it will be provided with a revolving credit, adjustable as experience demands, to provide adequate working capital. Shall we have an opportunity of discussing the establishment of this board, its operation and the amount of capital that has been set aside for it for the next twelve months, and when may we have that opportunity?

Mr. MacKINNON (Edmonton West): It might be well for me to make a short statement in that connection at this time. There is no vote under discussion covering this particular item. This board was not set up until January 31, 1944, and it was therefore too late to be included in the printed estimates. While there is no item under discussion, I am pleased to be able to tell hon. members of the committee some of the purposes of the board.

A number of overseas governments, for a variety of reasons, have insisted that imports into their countries must be effected by government agencies, and that import permits will not be issued for certain classes of goods. Procurement agencies have been set up in Ottawa by several governments, while others have their procurement agencies in the United States. The procurement of war supplies has been and continues to be done by the Department of Munitions and Supply. In the case of goods which are not strictly for use by the armed forces, however, it was felt that some other agency should be responsible for procurement. Even under this condition it was only after careful investigation had shown that orders were being placed elsewhere than in Canada that the Canadian export board was established by order in council P.C. 70, of January 31, 1944.

This board is acting as procurement agency for civilian goods for those countries which will not permit normal channels of trade to be used. Without the board, orders would be placed in other countries and Canada would lose valuable trade connections which would be difficult to regain for the post-war period. The export board also acts as one of the procurement agencies for the mutual aid board, handling goods which, although war supplies, are not actually munitions of war. There is, of course, close coordination between the export board and the Department of Munitions and Supply.

The export board operates on a non-profit basis and really functions as agent for overseas governments. Goods are furnished to other countries at the purchase price plus any additional charges which are necessarily incurred in completing the export transactions. The board is not competing with private enterprise and, in fact, is trying to divert business back to trade channels as and when conditions permit. When a request is received by the board from an overseas government, or from the mutual aid board administration, quotations are invited from all Canadian firms in a position to supply, or in accordance with any allocation which may have been established by the appropriate controller or administrator; thus normal trade channels and methods are utilized so far as possible.

Mr. MARSHALLL: One of the powers given to this board is to buy, sell, negotiate the purchase or sale of and engage in export trade in such commodities to such extent as the board may consider advisable. Does that mean the board can go into any part of Canada and buy these commodities, and then act as a sort of agent for the various companies in the sale of the commodities? For example, what work does it do in connection with agricultural products, let us say?

Mr. MacKINNON (Edmonton West): This board will not buy until it is actually in possession of a buying order from some other government. Then it goes out and purchases the goods for delivery to the other government. Practically it acts as an agent for the other government.

Mr. PERLEY: Then would the minister inform the committee how he deals with shipments for export under the mutual aid arrangement and, for instance, shipments of grain to Greece. Do the exporters require permits under the mutual aid arrangement, or does the government itself handle such shipments through some agency?

Mr. MacKINNON (Edmonton West): Under mutual aid they do not require export permits. In connection with shipments of wheat to Greece export permits are required.

Mr. PERLEY: Would the exporters secure that wheat from the wheat board and then get a permit to ship it; and would there be any commissions or brokerage fees charged on the grain?

Mr. MacKINNON (Edmonton West): I can answer that question now, or it can be dealt with later in connection with the export of wheat to Greece.

Mr. PERLEY: We might as well have it now; it will save us the necessity of asking the question again.

Mr. MacKINNON (Edmonton West): The wheat for export is furnished by the wheat board.

Mr. PERLEY: The exporters will have to get a permit from this board?

Mr. MacKINNON (Edmonton West): Yes, for that purpose.

Item agreed to.

Mr. RALSTON: I move that the committee rise, report progress and ask leave to sit again this day.

Progress reported.

SUPPLY

The house in committee of supply, Mr. Bradette in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN: The official report of debates shows that during the previous sitting of the committee to-day the hon. member for Témiscouata used the following words in speaking about the senate:

> They have completely lost any sense of shame in the senate, and with the exception of two or three senators for whom I have the deepest admiration, I concur in what was said by the leader of the C.C.F. party as to the abolition of that body. . . .
> If they were willing to work, if they had enough initiative, they could help us, they could play the part that was allotted to them under our constitution. . . .
>
> The senate is a nonentity in parliament at the present time just on account of the unwillingness of the senators to do something while they are sitting there. . . .
> But they are like an anachronism . . . it is the realm of rolling chairs and railroading bills. . . .
> I would not be for the abolition of the senate if the senators were really up to the standard of days gone by. . . .
> Another is a gentleman who had fat contracts from the Department of Munitions and Supply for being the agent of Mr. MacMillan in the province of Quebec.

The hon. gentleman was asked to withdraw these offensive statements which are prohibited under standing order 41. He refused to give a full and unqualified explanation which can be considered as satisfactory or in keeping with the dignity of the house and the mutual respect that should exist between the Senate and the House of Commons. I must insist on an unqualified withdrawal.

Mr. POULIOT: Mr. Chairman, will you kindly let me see the quotations? In the first place, I may tell you that I have gone to the Hansard room and I have asked them not to change an iota of their notes, an iota in the transcription of their notes, which means that I did not want to interfere with the report of Hansard, but which is not an acceptation of the transcription of the notes of Hansard in full.

For instance, in the first quotation I am reported as having said, "They have completely lost any sense of shame in the senate." I never said that. I said, "They have completely lost any usefulness in the senate." And I said—

> And with the exception of two or three senators for whom I have the deepest admiration I concur in what was said by the leader of the C.C.F. party as to the abolition of that body.

That was said—the second part.

But, at page 3329, I am quoted as having said:

I would not infringe the rule by saying that the senate is useless.

This I said. And it is naturally connected to the first part of the sentence; and I hoped that it would have been in the mind of the touchy little Emily Post—and when I use that expression I do not mean the Chair at all. Then it goes on:

If they were willing to work; if they had enough initiative, they could help us; they could play the part that was allotted to them under our constitution.

In order to show my willingness to cooperate, I am ready to withdraw, "If they were willing to work"—that phrase—and the sentence would read:

If they had enough initiative they could help us; they could play the part that was allotted to them under our constitution.

I do not think that sentence, as corrected, is against the standing order that you quoted.

There is another sentence:

The senate is a nonentity in our parliament at the present time, just on account of the unwillingness of the senators to do something while they are sitting there.

This I have withdrawn, and I do not see why any member should be obliged to withdraw the same thing twice. I remember that on a previous occasion, when Mr. Bennett was Prime Minister, he forced me—he tried to force me to withdraw a second time a thing I already had withdrawn, for the sake of peace, and to show my spirit of cooperation, and what the Prime Minister calls good will. But I do not see why the torture should be imposed upon a member of parliament who says a thing like that, and who has to kneel down twice. I am sure, and I believe in your fairness you will agree that a statement withdrawn once must be settled forever, until it is repeated again. But when I had to do so it was in explaining a case. And it is not because I have read the record that I shall be forced a second time to withdraw.

Then:

But they are like an anachronism.

This was declared in order—or not out of order. Therefore I have nothing to withdraw here. Then:

It is the realm of rolling chairs and railroading bills.

I made a mistake here, and I confess it. After having seen the performance on divorce bills, it is not the Senate that is the realm of rolling chairs and railroading bills; it is the House of Commons. We passed I do not know how many bills in eight or ten minutes, but I was the only member to make any protest against them, although in many other instances other members have protested against them. But if we did not railroad bills to-night, then bills were never railroaded in parliament. Five pages of bills in five minutes—a page a minute; think of that! And in the senate they pass our bills over there, just the same as we pass their bills here. They are doing it just as fast. It is not railroading; it is the airways; it is the T.C.A., at 200 miles an hour.

"Of rolling chairs"—I withdraw it.

Then:

I would not be for the abolition of the senate if the senators were really up to the standard of days gone by.

I will substitute for it:

I would not be for the abolition of the senate if all the senators were really up to the standard of days gone by.

Then:

Another is a gentleman who had fat contracts from the Department of Munitions and Supply for being the agent of Mr. Macmillan in the province of Quebec.

Perhaps I did not express myself clearly enough. I did not have in mind any offensive remark against that gentleman personally. What I meant was that he was agent of Mr. Macmillan, and while he was agent of Mr. Macmillan he had huge contracts from the Department of Munitions and Supply. Afterwards I spoke of reward. By "reward" I meant a senatorship; and I would have said it if I had not been interrupted by the Minister of National Defence. I could not finish.

Further, I had something very fine to say about the fourth last appointee from the province of Quebec, Senator Lesage, who deserved an appointment to the senate, because he had been political organizer for the Liberal party for twenty-five years. And a man who had done that job for a quarter of a century deserves recognition. But I did not have an opportunity to say it. My remarks were cut right in the middle by someone who was exceedingly touchy. And it cannot be an insult to a man to say to him that he had big contracts from the department. And, mark you, there is something that is more important: I used the present tense in that case. I said:

One is a gentleman who has a fat salary.

This is present; it is not past.

Another is a gentleman who had—

And this is the record of Hansard—

—fat contracts from the Department of Munitions and Supply for being the agent of Mr. Macmillan in the province of Quebec. The third had no political background whatever.

I wish to relieve from your mind the idea that I thought of imputing any bad motive to Macmillan's agent, when I spoke of that. What I had in mind was that he had enough in having a big contract, and that there was no reason to appoint him to the senate to give him that reward, or anything. I did not use "award"; I used "reward". And I would have said, "For reward, a senatorship", if I had not been interrupted like that by the Minister of National Defence. I appreciate the compliment when he said that I knew the rules quite well. I do not pretend to be that good; that is an exaggeration.

To conclude I want to tell you, Mr. Chairman, that I abide by the rules; I abide by your decision, but at the same time I want to defend the rights of members of parliament. This is not a pink tearoom; this is the place where we have the right to discuss the business of the nation. I contend that if there is an item in the estimates which permits a discussion of everything that pertains to the senate, it is item 112 of the main estimates. I tell you that we live in a false atmosphere. I wonder if it is like that around the table at Barclay's bank. I have never been there and I shall never be there. We must talk like men, men who have a tremendous responsibility. This responsibility rests not only on the minister; the members of parliament have a responsibility as great if not greater, because they are the immediate representatives of the people. During the campaign through the west in 1941 the Prime Minister regretted that he had no direct contact with the people. We have.

When I speak here as a member of parliament there are things that I have the right to say, and I deny to any minister the right to interrupt me on a point of order and saying that I should not rise in my place. I have not the time to write my speeches because I have a voluminous correspondence to attend to. I speak extemporaneously; I do not speak for the students and I do not expect that my speeches will be translated two thousand years hence. I speak for to-day; I speak on the problems of to-day and I do that with tremendous emphasis.

I am not going to be bullied by any one of my colleagues with calls to the Chair when I have the right to speak, when I have the right to express the views of my electors as well as my own. I protest solemnly and strongly and energetically and with the greatest vehemence against the tactics of the Minister of National Defence who would like to see members of parliament act as mummies in the House of Commons. The ideal member for him would be the member who would keep his arms folded and his big back on the chair and never rise in the house, who would always nod yes. He wants a yes-man. I am not a yes-man; I am a no-man to him; I am a no-man to any suggestion that he will make because if he makes a good one it will be wrongly presented and wrongly done. That is why I affirm my independence as a member of parliament. I cannot tolerate any more interruptions from any minister, and especially from the Minister of National Defence.

Mr. RALSTON: Mr. Chairman, as you might anticipate, I do not propose following the hon. member in the byways and highways which he has pursued in connection with this particular matter. I am only rising here as I did this afternoon because of my duty, happening to be at the moment leader of the house. I feel it to be my responsibility to endeavour to preserve not only the dignity of this house but the dignity of parliament which consists of the House of Commons and the Senate. The suggestion by any hon. member that he has the right to speak, that he will not be hobbled or that he will not be stopped by me or by anybody else leaves me quite cold because there is no suggestion of that kind at all. All that an hon. member needs to do in order to preserve his right to speak is to keep within the rules of the house.

Mr. POULIOT: I always do.

Mr. RALSTON: It was for the purpose of calling attention to that that I regretfully had to rise this afternoon at a time when we should have been engaged in something other than discussing matters of the kind the hon. member discussed this afternoon. He had a right to make his speech on the particular item, but at the same time I felt that the dignity of the other branch of this parliament should be preserved as we would expect the dignity of this house to be preserved if the tables were reversed and if any such remarks were made regarding the House of Commons as were made regarding the other chamber by the hon. member this afternoon.

The hon. member has gone pretty far in connection with this matter. He could not resist the opportunity to take a fling at the individual who happens at the moment to be leading the house. I shall leave that for some other time, but there are some things which the hon. member has not done and which I submit he should do. Notwithstanding the fact that he does not take suggestions from me, I venture to suggest to you, Mr. Chairman, that the well known grace of his race ought to prompt him to make a full and unreserved withdrawal of any imputations which he may have passed upon the other chamber or its members.

The first statement which was mentioned and which is recorded on the blue sheets of Hansard the hon. member says that he did not say; that Hansard wrongly reported him. All I can say is that it is in Hansard at page 3328. This is the statement:

> They have completely lost any sense of shame in the Senate, and with the exception of two or three senators for whom I have the deepest admiration, I concur in what was said by the leader of the C.C.F. party as to the abolition of that body.

If the hon. member had withdrawn it; if he had simply left it and stated that he had not said it, that would have been one thing. But the hon. member did not do that. What he said was that he proposed to substitute for the words "sense of shame" the word "usefulness." He thought that that would cure the difficulty, that that would make words which were exceedingly offensive, if not wholly inoffensive, at least less offensive. The definition "offensive" as given by the Oxford dictionary is this:

> Offensive—1. Pertaining or tending to attack; aggressive; adapted or used for purposes of attack; characterized by attacking. Opposite to defensive. Hurtful, injurious. Giving, or of a nature to give offence; displeasing; annoying; insulting. Causing unpleasant sensations; now, nauseous, repulsive. Of the nature of a transgression. The offensive: the position or attitude of attack; aggressive action.

I suggest that you take the revision which the hon. member has made of his speech, the substitution of "usefulness" for "sense of shame," and add to that the other statements which he has made with regard to the senate and which appear in the extracts which you have just read—such as this statement:

> If they were willing to work; if they had enough initiative, they could help us; they could play the part that was allotted to them under our constitution.

Add that to the statement that they have completely lost their usefulness, and then add this statement:

> The senate is a nonentity in our parliament at the present time, just on account of the unwillingness of the senators to do something while they are sitting there.

I ask you if the change from the words "sense of shame" to the word "usefulness" helps a great deal in making the language used less offensive to the other chamber. I ask hon. members to put themselves in the position, and I ask the hon. member to put himself in the position of a member of the House of Commons reading a statement of that kind being made by a member of the other chamber with regard to this House of Commons, the tatement that this house had completely lost its usefulness, that they were not willing to work, that because of their unwillingness to do something they are a nonentity in parliament, that if they had enough initiative they could help. I ask him; I ask you, Mr. Chairman, and I ask the members of this committee if they would not consider that that was offensive. Those are the words which the hon. member has still left on the record, and added to them is the statement which he made about one member of the other chamber, with regard to which he makes a rather curious explanation. He says:

> Another is a gentleman who had fat contracts from the Department of Munitions and Supply for being the agent of Mr. Macmillan in the province of Quebec.

Perhaps my mind is too suspicious; perhaps I am too touchy, but if I were reading that statement I would have thought that the gentleman there was being accused of having used his position as an agent of Mr. Macmillan, who was under the Department of Munitions and Supply first as timber controller and afterwards as director of Wartime merchant shipping for the purpose of obtaining fat contracts from the Department of Munitions and Supply.

Mr. POULIOT: I rise to a question of privilege, Mr. Chairman. I do not want my statement to be distorted by anyone.

Mr. RALSTON: I am stating, Mr. Chairman, that that is the construction any reasonable man would put upon that particular passage, and that is the thing which, it seems to me, is about as offensive as anything which could possibly be said by a member of this house with regard to a member of the other house. There is a sort of special pleading in connection with the matter, because the hon. member does make some suggestion that he thought the member of the other house having gotten contracts, would not need any more contracts in view of the fact that he had attained a position in the senate. That explanation may satisfy the hon. member for Temiscouata, but I do not think it will satisfy the public who see that particular statement on the record with regard to a member of the senate.

Mr. POULIOT: Once again, Mr. Chairman, the minister has not understood what I have said.

Mr. RALSTON: I am speaking of the exact words as they are recorded, and which the hon. member admits were recorded, with regard to that hon. gentleman.

Mr. POULIOT: The minister pays no attention to my explanation.

Mr. RALSTON: I submit that having done, as I think he has, a very grave injustice to the members of the other house and to a particular member of that house in that passage, I would have thought he would have unreservedly withdrawn any imputations of the kind.

Mr. POULIOT: Which I have done.

Mr. RALSTON: If the hon. member says he has done it—

Mr. POULIOT: Surely.

Mr. RALSTON: Then so far as I am concerned the incident is closed, but I understood my hon. friend to do almost everything but that.

Mr. POULIOT: That is most unfair and I protest, Mr. Chairman, on a question of privilege.

Mr. RALSTON: Do I take it, Mr. Chairman, that the hon. member does withdraw unqualifiedly any imputations against the senate or any members thereof?

Mr. POULIOT: I do not want my statements to be distorted by anyone.

Mr. RALSTON: I rise to a point of order.

Mr. POULIOT: I am on my feet, Mr. Chairman. How is it that I have to sit down when he rises?

Mr. RALSTON: I am rising to a point of order. I submit, Mr. Chairman, that this is a matter which is not debatable. The matter is before the Chair, and all I am saying is that if the hon. gentleman does withdraw unqualifiedly any imputations which he has made against the senate and its members, then so far as I am concerned the incident is closed. The remarks he has made about me do not disturb me in the least. But I submit that it is not a matter that we should debate.

Mr. POULIOT: I ask you, Mr. Chairman, if I have to withdraw twice?

The CHAIRMAN: No doubt the committee realizes that it is a delicate question to settle. Several arguments have been brought up by the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Ralston). An hon. member of this house has a right before the orders of the day are called or in committee to see that he is properly reported in Hansard. That is the privilege accorded to every member of parliament. The hon. member for Témiscouata has stated this evening that he did not use the word "shame" but that he used the word "useless." I feel that the committee must accept the statement of the hon. member for Témiscouata on that point.

This afternoon I gave a ruling on the use of the word "nonentity" as applied to the senate, and the hon. member for Témiscouata withdrew that statement unequivocally as will be found in the record of Hansard for this afternoon.

The only question that is left as to which I am not absolutely satisfied in my own mind, although I listened very attentively to the hon. member for Témiscouata, is the allusion that he made this afternoon to a gentleman who was appointed to the senate, stating that he had received fat contracts. I listened very attentively to the hon. member's explanation this evening but that matter is still left on the border-line to some extent. Although I want to believe that he intended no reflection whatever on the character of the senate and of the senator that he had in mind—

Mr. POULIOT: Not at all.

The CHAIRMAN: —from the repeated statements made by the hon. member for Témiscouata that he has just made at this sitting, I believe I am voicing the sentiments of the majority of the committee when I say that his explanation should be accepted.

Some hon. MEMBERS: No.

The CHAIRMAN: Shall I report progress?

Some hon. MEMBERS: No.

Mr. RALSTON: I am only submitting this, that the statements to which I have referred are the hon. member's statements with regard to the senate having lost any usefulness and also its unwillingness to work, which simply means that members of the senate are there not only neglecting but unwilling to do their duty.

The CHAIRMAN: On that point the hon. member for Temiscouata has said this evening that he did not want to use the expression that the senate is useless.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Withdraw the whole statement.

The CHAIRMAN: I agree that the hon. member should withdraw it now.

Mr. POULIOT: I will bow to your decision, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): Do I understand there is an unqualified withdrawal of all the aspersions of any kind whatsoever that have been made against the other house by the hon. member for Temiscouata?

The CHAIRMAN: I listened very attentively to what the hon. member for Temiscouata said a few moments ago, and took notes of his statements, and I believe that that is the case.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): May we have the assurance that that is the case?

Mr. POULIOT: How many times do I have to repeat it to deaf ministers?

Mr. HOWE: Ask him the question, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN: I will ask the question. I will ask the hon. member for Temiscouata, who, I know, wants to be fair to himself and to the committee, if he makes an unqualified withdrawal?

Mr. POULIOT: I cannot do more than I have done, Mr. Chairman. I have done it gradually, one by one. I am not going to bend before any minister. I respect you, Mr. Chairman, and I will abide by the Chair's decision, whatever you decide. I cannot say more than that. I do not abide by anything that is said by the Minister of National Defence.

The CHAIRMAN: I know the hon. member realizes that the committee wants an unqualified withdrawal.

Mr. POULIOT: If the majority of the committee wants it, I will give it.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): That is not unqualified.

Mr. POULIOT: If I am told to withdraw statements distorted by the Minister of National Defence, I cannot do it. I do not want to do an injustice to anyone. I observe the golden rule, and if I have offended against the rules of the house in anything I have said I have already given a satisfactory explanation which has been accepted by the Chair. After it has been accepted by the Chair, I hear roars from powerful breasts telling me to do something else.

The CHAIRMAN: I listened attentively to the hon. member for Temiscouata and thought it was an unqualified withdrawal, and I have rendered my decisions accordingly, but apparently the members of the committee do not feel that it was such. I will therefore ask the hon. member for Temiscouata if he makes an unqualified withdrawal.

Mr. POULIOT: I always abide by your rulings, Mr. Chairman, and I do so now even for those who do not have ears to hear.

[Mr. Ian A. Mackenzie.]

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): That is not an unqualified withdrawal.

The CHAIRMAN: Does the hon. member withdraw unqualifiedly?

Mr. POULIOT: I abide by your decision.

An hon. MEMBER: No!

An hon. MEMBER: That is not a withdrawal.

Mr. POULIOT: Well, what is this? Is it a torture room? It is most ridiculous when ministers want to humiliate a member of parliament. I will not kneel down. I bend before the Chair, but I kneel down before no one else.

The CHAIRMAN: I must ask the hon. member for an unqualified answer, yes or no. Does he withdraw?

Mr. POULIOT: I abide by your decision.

The CHAIRMAN: I must ask for an unqualified withdrawal, yes or no; otherwise I shall have to report to the Speaker. I shall have to name the hon. member, and that is one of the duties which I am loath to discharge, and which I want to use only as a last resort. I must ask the hon. member for an unqualified withdrawal.

Mr. POULIOT: Well, all right, sir.

The CHAIRMAN: These words cannot qualify. I must have an unqualified withdrawal.

Mr. POULIOT: All right, sir.

The CHAIRMAN: Shall I report progress?

Some hon. MEMBERS: No.

The CHAIRMAN: Does the hon. member withdraw unqualifiedly? Yes or no.

Mr. POULIOT: Yes, Yes, Yes.

Progress reported.

WAR APPROPRIATION BILL

PROVISION FOR GRANTING TO HIS MAJESTY AID FOR NATIONAL DEFENCE AND SECURITY

The house resumed consideration in committe of a resolution to grant to His Majesty certain sums of money for the carrying out of measures consequent upon the existence of a state of war—Mr. Ilsley—Mr. Bradette in the chair.

TRADE AND COMMERCE

The CHAIRMAN: Shall item 1 carry?

Item agreed to.

Canadian shipping board — administration, $98,300.

Revolving chartering fund, $500,000.

Mr. MARSHALL: Will the minister explain the reason for the increase in the vote?

Mr. MacKINNON (Edmonton West): The amount asked for, for 1944-45, is $598,300. There is a revolving fund of $500,000. The details are: salaries, $30,000; cost of living bonus and other pay-list items, $2,700; travelling $36,000; telegrams and telephones, $15,000; printing and stationery, $2,000; miscellaneous, $2,000; allowance Washington representative, $7,000; office accommodation, Vancouver, $3,600. This increase is on account of the fact that during the forthcoming year it will be necessary for the shipping board to appoint a representative in India and a senior shipping clerk for the Great Lakes, St. Lawrence division. The revolving fund revenue far exceeds the total expenditure for the operation of this entire board.

Mr. MARSHALL: I thought something like that had taken place in connection with the revolving fund because in 1942-43 the allotment was $350,000, of which only $15,000 was expended. Could the minister give the figures as to the actual amount—

Mr. MacKINNON (Edmonton West): I cannot hear the hon. member.

Mr. MARSHALL: Well, I am talking as loud as I can. I wonder if the minister would give the amount actually earned during this last year 1943-44, and the expenditures. Certainly, if there is a profit, I do not see why you need $500,000 of a revolving fund. It is said that the earnings far exceed the expenditures. If that is so, what is the object of having a revolving fund of $500,000?

Mr. MacKINNON (Edmonton West): The total expenditure for 1943-44 was $128,529.77, and the total revenue for the same period was $351,666.69, or, in the year's operation, a net surplus of $223,136.92. The revolving fund of $500,000 is an amount that is used for the chartering of vessels, and any earnings go to the consolidated revenue fund. Possibly we could get along with a smaller amount, but it is not considered advisable to ask for less.

Mr. MARSHALL: Does the surplus go into the consolidated revenue fund, or is it kept in the revolving fund?

Mr. MacKINNON (Edmonton West): It goes back to the consolidated revenue fund.

Mr. FAIR: Who are the members of the shipping board and what are their duties.

Mr. MacKINNON (Edmonton West): The members of the board are: Mr. A. L. W. MacCallum, chairman and director of shipping; Mr. F. E. Bawden, vice-chairman, who deals with the director of trade routes and steamship subsidies, and who is an official of the Department of Trade and Commerce; Captain J. W. Kerr, supervisor of nautical services, from the transport department; Captain Eric S. Brand, director of the trade division, naval service, Department of National Defence; Mr. T. C. Lockwood, transport controller, Department of Transport; and Mr. J. S. Macdonald, Counsel of the Department of External Affairs. This position of Mr. Macdonald's is temporarily vacant following his appointment as high commissioner to Newfoundland. Mr. A. W. Merriam represents the Department of National Revenue, and the secretary is Mr. B. A. Macdonald, Canadian government trade commissioner on loan to the forces at the present time.

Mr. FAIR: What are their duties?

Mr. MacKINNON (Edmonton West): These men speak for each of their departments.

Mr. MARSHALL: I am not quite clear on the question of where this surplus goes, because in the previous year we are told that the earnings were carried forward to a special account. Would the minister explain what is meant there? If the money is all shown in the consolidated revenue fund, why does it state in the auditor general's report that those earnings are transferred into a special account?

Mr. MacKINNON (Edmonton West): The earnings from the ship voyages carry on from month to month, and the moneys are carried into this special fund and turned back possibly at the end of the year.

Mr. PERLEY: Does the harbour board play any part in the working of the board?

Mr. MacKINNON (Edmonton West): No.

Mr. PERLEY: Are any of the members of the Montreal harbour board members of this board?

Mr. MacKINNON (Edmonton West): No

Mr. PERLEY: Does the harbour board play any part in the export shipments permits, and so on?

Mr. MacKINNON (Edmonton West): No; simply a matter of close cooperation.

Mr. PERLEY: With the harbour board?

Mr. MacKINNON (Edmonton West): Yes.

Item agreed to.

Shipping priorities committee — administration, $47,380.

Mr. MARSHALL: Why the decrease?

Mr. PERLEY: Why the increase?

Mr. MacKINNON (Edmonton West): It is a decrease.

Mr. PERLEY: The auditor general's report is confusing.

Mr. MacKINNON (Edmonton West): The general decrease in estimated expenditure is rendered possible by the fact that this branch is now believed to have achieved its maximum expansion with expenses being consequently more fixed and more accurately predictable.

Item agreed to.

Gift of wheat to Greece, $8,500,000.

Mr. PERLEY: There is an increase of $2,500,000 in this amount, and a very great increase over the previous year as shown in the auditor general's report. Would the minister explain that, and also is there any flour going to Greece other than wheat under the mutual aid, or does it all go in the form of wheat?

Mr. MacKINNON (Edmonton West): This all goes in the form of wheat. The additional amount required is on account of the increase in the price of wheat, together with the fact that improved shipping conditions have made it possible for the relief commission to obtain more consistent sailings and in that way send larger amounts.

Mr. PERLEY: How do you arrive at the price of this wheat? What does it cost the wheat board?

Mr. MacKINNON (Edmonton West): The wheat is delivered from that which the government has taken over and the price is $1.25 a bushel.

Mr. PERLEY: Is there any difference in the price of this wheat so far as the wheat board is concerned and the price of the wheat shipped to other countries under mutual aid?

Mr. MacKINNON (Edmonton West): Not under mutual aid, no.

Mr. PERLEY: The same price prevails?

Mr. MacKINNON (Edmonton West): Yes.

Mr. PERLEY: Based on Fort William?

Mr. MacKINNON (Edmonton West): Yes.

Mr. KNOWLES: I should like to take just a moment to speak in wholehearted support of this item and the policy that makes it possible. I wish to take a moment to read an extract or two from the April, 1944, issue of "International Affairs", a copy of which came to my desk a few days ago. Included in this publication is a report of an address given at Chatham House on November 16, 1943, by George Exintaris, who was at one time governor general of Macedonia. He escaped from Greece to Great Britain in July, 1943. In his address Mr. Exintaris dealt with the steady deterioration of the situation in Greece following the German occupation in April, 1941. There are two or three sentences that I should like to quote, and they are as follows:

> Between October 1941 and April 1942 the spectacle of Athens and Piraeus was truly tragic. One used to see in the streets people suddenly dropping dead from exhaustion. At night the lamentations of the old and the cries of starving women and children, cries of unappeased hunger, haunted the passer-by and transformed, as it were, most of the streets of Athens into one whole wailing wall of Jerusalem. Mortality assumed terrifying proportions. In Athens and Piraeus alone in the five months from October 1941 to February 1942 the number of deaths above the normal was thirty-five thousand.

Mr. Exintaris goes on to point out how the situation kept getting worse. Then we come to this sentence which gave me a real sense of pride when I came across it:

> Between the end of 1942 and June 1943 the situation improved slightly. This was due to:
> (a) the regular monthly dispatch from Canada of eighteen thousand tons (fifteen thousand tons of wheat, three thousand tons of beans and small quantities of powdered milk).

The speaker went on to give two other reasons for the slight improvement at that time, but I call attention to the fact that the first reason for the improvement to which he was referring was this regular monthly dispatch from Canada consisting mainly of our gift of wheat to these people. However, Mr. Exintaris went on to point out that the situation has even since then deteriorated and that the need is exceedingly great. He ends this part of his address by saying:

> If those in whose hands these decisions are entrusted could visit Greece for one day only and see for themselves the extent of the tragedy, they would, I feel sure, take steps to alleviate the sufferings of a people whose only fault, if fault it be, is the execution of their duty and the defence of their homes.

I think all of us in this committee should be justly proud that Canada is able to alleviate even to this slight extent the terrible suffering of the people of Greece. Let us hope that we may learn out of this experience the value of trying to help meet the needs of humanity the world over. These are days when we are seeing many things that are terrifying, the suffering that is going on due to this conflict in which we are engaged. I take just this moment because it seems to me that it is encouraging to realize that at the same time we are learning some other things as the desirability of endeavouring to help our brother men when they are in dire need.

I rise to support wholeheartedly the policy of the Canadian people—the government will not mind it if I put it in that way in this instance—in making this gift to the needy and heroic people of Greece.

Mr. MacKINNON (Edmonton West): Following the hon. member's remarks I might just mention that as of May 9 of this year Canada has sent a total of 11,172,308 bushels. I am occasionally asked as to the certainty of this wheat, and all of this wheat, getting to the people for whom it is intended. Just recently I have had an opportunity of discussing this matter with people who are positively in touch with this, and I shall take just a moment or two to give the committee some information given to me by those people. As a direct result of wheat shipped by Canada to Greece three million Greeks are being provided with a basic bread ration of approximately two hundred grams or, roughly, half a pound a day. Greek officials have estimated that many hundreds of thousands of Greek lives have been saved by Canada's contribution. The wheat shipments have given the Greek nation the certainty of being able to secure bread freely and fairly. Though not large, the bread ration has been a vital factor in sustaining Greece during her long period of suffering.

Before the war Greece used to import one-third of her foodstuffs. She was broken and impoverished by her heroic seven months' struggle against Italy and Germany. Then came the terrible famine of 1941, to which my hon. friend has just referred, when people died in the streets of starvation, and at one stage the death rate in Athens was at least ten times normal. It was against this background of suffering that Canada's wheat shipments began in the spring of 1942, under the terms of an international agreement. We are positively assured by the best authority that all our wheat has reached the Greeek people for whom it is intended. The Swedish Red Cross and the Internation Red Cross, with the Swedish government acting in a supervisory capacity, are in charge of the Greek distribution in Greece.

Mr. MacNICOL: I can endorse what the minister has just said. Quite a number of Greeks live in the riding of Davenport, and they are extremely fine citizens. In several cases members of a family are now holding high positions in the allied service in Europe and North Africa. Some of the young men whom I know quite well not only are participating in the fighting but rendering wonderful service as interpreters. I heartily endorse the idea of sending wheat to Greece; in fact I should like to see it sent in larger quantities. Think of it for a moment; just a few million Greeks stood up like lions against Italy, who sent many hundreds of thousands of soldiers in an attempt to conquer that little nation, but until the Germans sent division after division to support the Italians the Greeks more than held their own. The least this great country of Canada can do is to alleviate the suffering of these people as much as possible. This is one way in which we can help our own people by buying wheat from them and relieving the surplus in Canada, and at the same time help feed these starving people. I say all honour to every effort, no matter by whom made, to relieve the sufferings of the gallant Greeks.

Mr. QUELCH: I am heartily in favour of this gift to Greece, and I am also heartily in favour of the provisions of UNRRA, whose provisions I hope will be sufficiently wide in scope to take care of any situation that may arise in future. But why should this wheat not be sent to Greece under the provisions of UNRRA? Was the arrangement made before UNRRA was set up, and in that case will this wheat be made available to Greece in future under UNRRA?

Mr. MacKINNON (Edmonton West): The hon. member is correct in thinking that this item is dealt with separately because it started before UNRRA was organized.

Mr. QUELCH: And in future?

Mr. MacKINNON (Edmonton West): We propose to carry it on in this way. It is just as good for the Greek people as in any other way.

Mr. QUELCH: It seems a little odd to have an organization such as UNRRA to take care of the stricken areas, and then find gifts made outside of UNRRA. Where does UNRRA begin and where does it end?

Mr. MacKINNON (Edmonton West): It has been pointed out to me that UNRRA does not enter into the picture in supplying goods to a country that has been overrun, until that country is liberated.

Mr. MacNICOL: The wheat was sent before UNRRA was thought of.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): I hope the minister is assured that the wheat we send gets to the Greek people and not to the nazis, though I suppose that is a chance we must take. I heartily endorse the idea of sending this wheat to Greece. After all, the Greeks and the people of the British empire have always stood for freedom. We can never forget the great part played by Greece in fighting a delaying action at a most important time in the history of the war, when they held the fort against great odds. They knew what would happen to them; they knew the difficulties they were up against; they went into it with their eyes open, because they believed in freedom. The least we can do is to give them all the wheat we possibly can. I have known many Greeks, and they are fine people. They did not expect much help when they went into this war, and I think we should do as much for them as we possibly can.

Mr. ROSS (Souris): I was not altogether clear on the answer given by the minister to the hon. member for Qu'Appelle. Am I right in assuming that any wheat shipped prior to September 28 would be charged at the initial price to the wheat board, which is ninety cents, and that since that time the price has been $1.25? It is the initial price at all times; it does not vary as the price of wheat shipped to other countries varies according to market conditions at the time of shipment?

Mr. MacKINNON (Edmonton West): The price now is $1.25 a bushel f.o.b. Fort William. Before that price was established; before the government took over that wheat, the price at which it was accounted for to the producers of Canada was the sale price of other wheat at the time. I cannot give that price, because it has not been disclosed.

Mr. ROSS (Souris): That is, prior to September 28 it was sold at the prevailing market price?

Mr. MacKINNON (Edmonton West): Yes.

Mr. ROSS (Souris): And since that time all shipments have been on the initial basis of $1.25?

Mr. MacKINNON (Edmonton West): That is correct.

Mr. PERLEY: Do I understand, then, that the wheat shipped before the price was increased to $1.25 would go on the basis of the price of wheat shipped to the United States, for instance?

Mr. MacKINNON (Edmonton West): The wheat shipped to the United Kingdom.

Mr. PERLEY: Shipped from the United States or from Canada?

Mr. MacKINNON (Edmonton West): From Canada.

Mr. HAZEN: Does this amount of $8,500,000 include the cost of transportation as well as the cost of the wheat?

Mr. MacKINNON (Edmonton West): This amount represents our contribution only. The transportation is arranged by the International Red Cross, I believe.

Mr. PERLEY: I have the minister's report dated January 28, 1944, and the day the price of wheat was increased wheat at Saint John for shipment overseas was $1.40, so that the minister must be wrong; it could not be based on ninety cents at Fort William.

Mr. MacKINNON (Edmonton West): I do not think I made the statement that it was based on ninety cents at Fort William. I said that it was based on $1.25 at Fort William at the present time, and that previously the price was based on what we realized for our wheat shipped to the United Kingdom.

Mr. PERLEY: Then it was based on the price in this report, which is $1.40, at the time you increased the price at Fort William?

Mr. MacKINNON (Edmonton West): What is the date of that report?

Mr. PERLEY: January 28, 1944.

Mr. MacKINNON (Edmonton West): I am told that the difference between $1.25 and $1.40, the price my hon. friend mentioned, is represented by the cost of forwarding to the Atlantic port.

Item agreed to.

National research council, special war activities, $3,945,507.

Mr. GRAYDON: Is any part of this vote for agriculture, or does that come under the civil estimates? The minister will recall there is an amount this year for agricultural research, and I was wondering whether it is in this vote, or in the civil estimates.

Mr. MacKINNON (Edmonton West): None of this is for agriculture. That comes under civil estimates.

A year ago when we were discussing these war appropriation items, and particularly that having to do with the national research council, I asked permission of the committee to place on Hansard a report prepared by the national research council respecting the activities in research during the past year, and to set out the work for the future. Many members, and many people throughout Canada have written to us thanking us for submitting this information to them. With the permission of the committee I should like again to place on Hansard a report of the work of the national research council.

Mr. MacNICOL: Covering this vote?

Mr. MacKINNON (Edmonton West): Yes, covering this vote. It stands to reason that it would have to be explained to laymen. I have it in proper form, one which I believe would be of great interest not only to hon. members but to the country generally. With the permission of the committee I should like to place it on Hansard.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): This is a pretty big and important vote, and the minister should give a statement. In my opinion it would be better to make a statement, so that hon. members would have an opportunity of listening to it as he goes along, and of discussing it after we have heard it. I should imagine it would not take long to read it.

Mr. MacKINNON (Edmonton West): I am not trying to run away from reading it, or from submitting it. But I would suggest that if I have permission to put it on Hansard now, there would be an opportunity of asking questions when the estimates for the national research council are before the committee again, when we are discussing civil estimates.

Mr. MacNICOL: Does it refer to the same body?

Mr. MacKINNON (Edmonton West): Yes.

The ACTING CHAIRMAN (Mr. Golding): Does the committee give unanimous consent?

Mr. PERLEY: There is a considerable increase from last year, as it appears in the auditor general's report. The number of employees in 1943, as shown at page Y-29, was 732. Is there any increase in the present year?

Mr. MacKINNON (Edmonton West): There is a substantial increase in the number of employees. I just wish to point out that I do not intend in any way to attempt to shut off questions respecting the national research council, or to curtail any comment any members may wish to make this evening.

The ACTING CHAIRMAN (Mr. Golding): Order; does the committee agree to having this statement placed upon Hansard?

Mr. GRAYDON: I do not think the minister should be interrupted, when he is just part way through a statement. He was going to say something, and I should like to hear what he has to say.

Mr. MacKINNON (Edmonton West): I was just suggesting that if I had permission to place this on Hansard, I had no thought in shutting off discussion at this time.

Mr. ROSS (Souris): I think the minister should be permitted to place the statement upon Hansard. But this year the vote is almost double what it was last year. If he would make a short statement, pointing out what the changes are, it would be sufficient. I do not think we should ask him to read the entire statement, but he could make a general statement.

Mr. MacKINNON (Edmonton West): On the understanding that we shall take it up under the civil estimates.

Mr. PERLEY: The minister has said there is an increase in the number of employees. What is the number?

Mr. MacKINNON (Edmonton West): At the present time there are 1,240 employees connected with the national research council.

Mr. PERLEY: That is an increase of 500.

Mr. MacKINNON (Edmonton West): I might mention, in answer to the suggestion of the hon. member for Souris, that there is a considerable increase in the amount allotted for war appropriation over the amount for 1943-44. This is due, mainly, to a number of new projects, some of which are these: Experimental explosives establishment, $450,000; refrigeration unit for low-temperature work, $250,000; cooling system for single cylinder room in engine laboratory, $100,500, and explosives research, $90,000.

Mr. NOSEWORTHY: What is the nature of the low-temperature work?

Mr. MacKINNON (Edmonton West): I confess, frankly, that I cannot say. That is one of the reasons I wish to place the report upon Hansard.

Mr. FAIR: Are most of these votes for war purposes?

Mr. MacKINNON (Edmonton West): This is all for war purposes.

Mr. MARSHALL: Is Habbakuk still on the secret list? I note at page Y-31 of the auditor general's report it says this:

> Allotment: national research council, special secret problem, "Habbakuk", $53,370.80.

Is it still on the secret list?

Mr. MacKINNON (Edmonton West): I am told that the work is completed, but it is still on the secret list.

Mr. KNOWLES: Has any consideration been given to Lieutenant-General McNaughton's return to work in connection with the national research council?

Mr. MacKINNON (Edmonton West): Mr. Chairman, I have nothing to say on that point. I have no idea what is in General McNaughton's mind in that connection.

Mr. GRAYDON: We are not asking what is in General McNaughton's mind; the hon. member is asking what is in your mind?

Mr. MARSHALL: The government's mind.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): I would like to ask the minister—

Mr. MacKINNON (Edmonton West): I am not in a position to make any statement.

Mr. GRAYDON: There is something in your mind, but you are not going to divulge it.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): Is this increase altogether taken up by the three projects mentioned by the minister? Then, how far-reaching is the connection between private enterprise of one kind and another, and the national research council, due to the war? There are civil estimates for the council; I suppose it is doing a certain amount of war work.

Mr. MacKINNON (Edmonton West): It is all war work. I am told that practically the total work being done by the national research council at the present time is war work.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): All war work?

Mr. MacKINNON (Edmonton West): Yes.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): Well then, why are there civil estimates? Why is it not all included in these estimates?

Mr. MacKINNON (Edmonton West): These now before the committee are in addition to the regular peace-time organization. At the present time the peace-time organization is fully engaged in war work.

If I have permission to place this upon Hansard—

Mr. GRAYDON: Well, Mr. Chairman, is that the report the minister has mentioned?

Mr. MacKINNON (Edmonton West): Yes.

Mr. GRAYDON: Then may I point out a matter which I think the minister has overlooked. I have no desire to have him read a lengthy report at this stage of proceedings, particularly in view of the fact that he has undertaken that all that is contained in the report may be discussed fully when the civil estimates are before the committee. I hope that that undertaking and understanding will be properly implemented because it is important that it should be done. There is one more point involved so far as procedure is concerned. I do not think we as a committee should drop into the careless habit of putting on Hansard reports such as this. I am afraid other ministers will decide to put reports on Hansard which might not adorn Hansard as much as this one would. I think it should be either circulated in the form of mimeographed copies or printed in Votes and Proceedings. I think we must present an obstacle to filling up Hansard with things other than the spoken words of members of parliament. I realize that there are times when a mass of figures can be placed on Hansard much easier than reading them, but I think this instance would be creating a precedent which I am not prepared to permit without protest at this time. I know the minister has not this in mind and I ask him either to have this report mimeographed or printed in Votes and Proceedings.

Mr. MacKINNON (Edmonton West): Do I understand that the hon. member would prefer not to have it placed on Hansard?

Mr. GRAYDON: Yes, I would.

Mr. MacKINNON (Edmonton West): I think that would be quite agreeable, but if it is printed in Votes and Proceedings, it does not get the same circulation.

Mr. GRAYDON: I know the minister is anxious for circulation, but we should be careful about what precedents are established. I know that at times the government has special reasons for wanting circulation, and I often suspect that when certain questions are passed as orders for returns the same circulation is not desired as when questions are answered quite readily. If a similar report were placed on Hansard last year it escaped my notice because I am sure I would have protested against it.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): Members of parliament have enough to read already. We have plenty to read. What is the use of sitting in the chamber if we are to have to read this as well?

Mr. PERLEY: I think many hon. members can read faster than the minister.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): I am serious about this. The point is that we have plenty to read. It is much easier to get it if we hear it read and I imagine it would save a certain amount of discussion. I am quite willing to have it go in Votes and Proceedings.

The ACTING CHAIRMAN (Mr. Golding): I am just wondering whether we should place it in Votes and Proceedings without the Speaker being in the chair.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): With unanimous consent we can do anything.

Mr. KNOWLES: I agree in general with the position taken by the leader of the opposition about placing material like this on Hansard. Frequently, when this is done the things a member is reported as saying subsequently to the material being placed on Hansard look rather out of line. He speaks without having heard the material read which appears in Hansard just ahead of his own remarks. As I say, I agree in general with the leader of the opposition, but I do feel that this material is of such importance that it should get the widest circulation possible. I think we all agree that the staff of the research council have done a particularly worth-while job during the course of this war. In my view they have done that job without getting sufficient pay and under the most difficult of circumstances. If this statement recites some of the achievements of the staff of the research council, I for one would like to see it get the widest circulation possible. Just one instance of recent note comes to my mind in connection with the sad occasion of the sinking of the Athabasca. A news dispatch in connection with this sinking referred to a life-jacket and what it had meant to many men, and then it went on to state that the initial research on this jacket had been done by our national research council. There are undoubtedly many cases of this kind. I ask the leader of the opposition, without abrogating his general position, to agree to having this statement placed on Hansard.

The ACTING CHAIRMAN (Mr. Golding): Is it the unanimous wish of the committee that we place it on Hansard?

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): Before we give unanimous consent may I ask the minister how long it would have taken him to read it?

Mr. MacKINNON (Edmonton West): Half an hour.

Mr. GRAYDON: I never want to be a hold-out in the committee and I do not think many members have found me taking that position. If it is the wish of the committee that this should go on Hansard, all I can do is to protest. I am not going to hold it up, but I should like it to be distinctly understood that this is not a precedent. If there is to be unanimous consent except by the leader of the opposition, then I should not want to withhold that consent.

Mr. ADAMSON: There is one question I should like to ask the minister. Prior to the war we were spending approximately one-tenth per capita as much as the United States on research. At the biginning of the war we found ourselves in an inferior position when compared with that country. I wish to compliment the minister upon what has been done during the war. Our scientists deserve a tribute. But we are probably still a long way behind with regard to research, and when the minister brings down his estimates I should like him to give some idea of the per capita expenditures in Canada on research as compared with the expenditures, if they are obtainable, in the other united nations.

Mr. MacKINNON (Edmonton West): I shall be very glad to do that. The people of Canada are not educated to or fully aware of the value of research. They are not ready to spend the money that other countries have spent to great advantage. The hon. member has referred to the United States where expenditures on research run into the millions, but even they are behind continental countries.

Mr. ADAMSON: I understand the policy is that the national research council cannot undertake an investigation or a piece of pure research unless they are asked specifically to do so by an industry or someone in the country. I suggest that that is a false policy and that the national research council should be encouraged to undertake pure and applied research. I think that is very important.

Mr. MacKINNON (Edmonton West): I am told that the council does that now to a limited extent.

Mr. KNOWLES: That is the trouble; it is too limited.

Mr. MacKINNON (Edmonton West): We fully appreciate that. In 1938-39 the peacetime vote was $987,569.59, and last year the total vote was $5,442,681.59.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): In connection with having this put on Hansard, I said I would give my consent. Just to make it all right there are one or two things I should like to say. The minister has just stated that the peacetime vote was $987,000, but he did not mention the fact that there were large recoveries and that the national research council was practically self-supporting at that time. Another interesting thing is that we do not do nearly enough research work in the council.

Speaking the other day before the Engineering Institute of Canada, Dean Mackenzie gave some interesting figures. He said that research expenditures in the mid-thirties, by countries were estimated per capita as follows: Russia, $1.80 to $3; United States, $2.40; Britain, 70 cents; Canada, 22 to 29 cents. I do not think that the people of this country have appreciated as they should have done the work that was done by General McNaughton when he was in charge of the national research council. He made a real research council out of the place and had pilot plants there all ready to go to work when the war came on, and he would have had a much bigger research establishment there if it had not been for the opposition to pilot plants by the government. I think General McNaughton deserves a great deal of credit for what he did. Then there is Doctor Boyle. There is not a more outstanding scientist in Canada than Doctor Boyle, at the national research council. Very few people hear about him, but he is known to the whole scientific world, and when the history of our scientific achievements is written the names of Doctor Boyle and General McNaughton will be known all over the world.

Mr. MARTIN: And Doctor Tory.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): That is right, and Doctor Tory and many others. But I mentioned those two because I know very well what they have done. Dean Mackenzie is also doing a marvellous job right at the present time, as well as many other able men at the research council. Another thing I would point out is that they are not paid enough. It is a shame that they are not paid more. They are working there for the love of science and love of their country. If they left they could get far more money outside.

Another question I would ask the minister is what we are doing in connection with chemurgy? The United States before the war was spending on the chemical industry in the United States between two and three per cent of its sales value and spending one-seventh of one per cent on chemurgy while we spent practically nothing. We would like information on all these things. Just how far-reaching is the work of the national research council? Is their work confined to what is done at the national research council here, or does their work extend to other places outside? We know what has been done in the medical field by Doctor Collip. We ought to know more about what is going on at the national research council.

Mr. NOSEWORTHY: The minister made the statement a moment ago that the people of Canada were unwilling to spend money on research as other countries did.

Mr. MacKINNON (Edmonton West): I did not say unwilling, but that they had not been educated sufficiently along that line to realize the value of research.

Mr. NOSEWORTHY: I wonder if the minister is correct and if he did not think the government of Canada is unwilling rather than the people.

Mr. MacKINNON (Edmonton West): Oh, no.

Mr. NOSEWORTHY: Just on what premises does the minister base his assumption that the people of Canada are not willing to see more money spent on research?

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): I would like to follow that up? The minister thinks it is the people of Canada who do not appreciate research. I have always thought it was the government that did not do enough. We would have been far better off to-day if in years gone by the government had given more leadership in research and shown what could be accomplished by it. The government should have taken a leaf out of the books of other countries which have accomplished wonders in research. There was a great lack of research for the benefit of Canadian industry which was due to the lack of initiative by the government. I do not blame the council at all for that because they did the very best they could. They had to fight all the time to get what money they wanted to carry on with their work, and with what they did get they did a marvellous job. But the government did not give them the leadership that they should have given.

Mr. MacKINNON (Edmonton West): I should now like to put on Hansard the statement to which I referred. It is as follows:

Work of the National Research Council

Prior to the outbreak of war the national research council was conducting scientific research and investigation in its own laboratories. It was also fostering research throughout Canada by means of its associate committees, by grants in aid of research, and by providing scholarships to aid in the training of young scientists. Each associate committee superintended a limited field of investigation and its membership consisted of technical and administrative men from universities, departments of government and industry, whose experience and skill were pooled in directing the research. Through these committees the council was in touch with laboratory personnel and facilities throughout Canada, and it acquired fairly detailed knowledge of their potentialities.

The value of this knowledge and of the council's widespread contacts became apparent as soon as war broke out. Problems which required the work of scientists were brought to the attention of the council and were either undertaken in the council's laboratories or placed with the individual or laboratory best equipped for the work. Some of the associate committees were already working in fields which merely had to be broadened in order to meet the new needs. For example, the committee on medical research, which had originally been organized to coordinate medical research for civilian needs in Canada, became the nucleus for the study of medical problems presented by the new and changed conditions of warfare on land and sea, and in the air. Similarly the Canadian committee on food preservation turned its attention from strictly peace-time food technology to studies of the means of maintaining the quality of the foodstuffs delivered to our armed forces and to the people of Great Britain. Both committees have produced sound work which will continue to be of value after hostilities cease.

Supervisors of research under certain committees whose work was of a peace-time importance only were directed to use their grants in the pursuit of specific war problems which their special training enables them to undertake. In addition, individual scientists who had been receiving grants in aid of research directly from the council also undertook war research problems. All this resulted in the utilization of facilities from one end of Canada to the other in a systematic attempt to cover the tasks at hand with economy of staff and equipment.

The council's own original staff also provided a nucleus around which an increased organization could grow and function. The demands for research increased steadily until this staff increased fourfold, and the council was operating nine stations, in addition to its large central laboratory, either independently or in cooperation with the services.

The foregoing indicates briefly the means by which the peace-time organization of associate committees and grants in aid of research were modified in order to meet the conditions of hurry and stress, and how the council staff provided a nucleus for the rapid development necessary. That the scholarships of the council have also proved their worth during this period is indicated by the fact that a large proportion of the young research men engaged in these problems, either in civilian laboratories or in the services, have at one time held national research council scholarships, for post graduate training in science.

So far we have been dealing with internal coordination and cooperation. But facilities for the exchange of scientific information between Great Britain and the United States on the one hand, and Canada on the other, became very necessary. A new liaison organization was therefore developed to function as a channel for the exchange of confidential and secret information. The council maintains a chief scientific liaison officer in London, who supervises and expedites the exchanges between Great Britain and Canada; and exchanges between the United States and Canada are carried on through the Ottawa office. The liaison offices obtain and transmit scientific information not only for staff of the council but for other departments and for the armed forces.

Turning to the research work proper it might be well at the outset to indicate that while the importance of physical sciences in warfare is obvious, the country which would depend on these alone would be severely handicapped. The importance of such apparently insignificant items as insects and fungi may be overlooked by the uninitiated, but those responsible for maintaining the health of the troops and for the supply and storage of equipment in the field are acutely aware of their importance. For this reason work in many fields of applied biology has had to be speeded up.

The war-time history of the associated committee on medical research, which has already been mentioned, illustrates this fact. This committee has had to organize three specialist groups, one on aviation medical research under Dr. Duncan Graham, one on naval medical research under Surgeon Captain C. H. Best, and one on medical research for the army under Lt. Col. W. Hurst Brown.

The committee on aviation medical research has been responsible for an outstanding programme of work especially in the fields of high altitude flying, protective clothing for flyers, oxygen equipment, and personnel selection. Most of the flying clothing and auxiliary equipment developed by this committee is now in use in active combat. The committee has also been able to assist in the solution of medical and physiological problems that arose from new conditions encountered in service flying.

The committee on naval medical research works in close conjunction with the medical unit of the Royal Canadian Navy. Dietary surveys made by these groups resulted in recommendations for the correction of various dietary deficiencies. Attention has also been given to the quality of the rations and water carried on lifeboats. This committee has also concerned itself with the question of night vision, and tests which it developed for the evaluation of night vision, colour vision and visual acuity have been adopted by the navy. Special lighting techniques have been designed for use on bridge controls, bridge instruments and chart tables in order to minimize interference with night vision. In connection with the operation of anti-submarine detection devices, experimental work on the fatigue of personnel has yielded information which has been applied in determining the optimum length of watch periods. Tests designed to indicate personnel suitable for this branch of the service have been adopted by the Royal Canadian Navy, the Royal Navy and the United States navy. Investigations on such problems as "immersion foot", underwater blast injury, and eye protection for bridge and look-out personnel have produced satisfactory practical results.

At present further problems under investigation are: obtaining fresh water from sea water in life boats, protecting naval personnel from noise, combating fatigue in radio detector and wireless telegraph operators, following tracer bullets fired "into the sun", improving ventilation and lighting aboard ships, and healing and treatment of burns and shock.

The operation of large numbers of small vessels makes sea sickness a problem of special importance. In this connection groups working in Montreal and Toronto have devised techniques for sorting out those who are susceptible to motion sickness, and therapeutic measures have been devised to prevent or alleviate the condition in a large proportion of the cases tested.

Army medical research investigations are in progress on night vision, effort syndrome, evacuation of wounded from battlefields, the prevention of respiratory and other infections in barracks, the use of drugs in relation to motion sickness and gastric physiology, air ambulance transportation, fumigants, and water purification. In connection with nutrition, surveys have been made and a study of sprouted grains and legumes as sources of vitamins for troops is also under way.

In the council's division of applied biology, investigations on food problems not related to the war effort were dropped at the beginning of the war, and a pre-war staff of nine had to be increased to twenty-nine in order to cope with food problems referred to the council by various government departments.

The general programme of this division in connection with food has had to do largely with such products as pork, bacon and eggs and in addition a large refrigeration project has been carried on. At the beginning of the war there was a shortage of refrigerated space and it became necessary to devise, if possible, a method of using the uninsulated holds of cargo vessels for the transportation of perishable products. Excellent progress has been made in the development of comparatively inexpensive emergency refrigeration equipment for this purpose which is easily and quickly installed, and which has proven satisfactory in actual use. Already several vessels sailing from Canadian and United States ports have been so equipped.

Investigations on bacon have resulted in the adoption of a standard cure by Canadian packers, with the result that Canadian bacon is now held in high favour on the British market. It appears that the British prejudice against Canadian bacon, which was founded on the definitely bad curing practices used during the last war, has been overcome. This should help in holding the British market for Canadian bacon after the war. Standard canning procedures for pork and ham have also been adopted by the manufacturers as a result of investigations conducted with the object of developing a processing procedure which would improve both the keeping quality and the nutritive value of the product. Procedures for the dehydration of pork and other meats have been studied and experiments are under way to determine the storage life of the product. Testing panels have agreed that the product is as edible as fresh material. Modifications of the design of drier and of the drying procedure are being tested.

Dried egg powder has now become a prominent feature of British diet, and specifications for the control of quality in this commodity have been prepared for the Department of Agriculture which controls production in Canada. The division had already carried on a great deal of work in determining the best methods of processing and storage of dried eggs on an industrial basis. Studies designed to determine means of extending the storage life of shell eggs indicate that oil dipped eggs shipped in sealed lined bags keep reasonably well.

Japan's entry into the war cut off the source of agaragar which had been used as a jelling substance in the canning industry. The search for a promising substitute resulted in the choice of Irish moss, a form of seaweed. A laboratory method has been developed for processing this substance, and the properties of the product are being studied. Work is being continued to develop a commercial method of making a good jelling substance from this seaweed.

It was anticipated early that shortages of edible oils might develop, and investigations were put in train to find possible substitutes. As a natural outgrowth of the work on bacon, attempts have been made to improve the stability and other properties of lard as a suitable alternative for vegetable oil shortenings. Linseed oil is the only vegetable oil that Canada produces in quantity. The national research council is giving financial support to the Ontario research foundation in an experiment on the hydrogenation of linseed oil to produce an edible product. In addition, oils from various crops which might be grown in Canada and also oils from certain weed seeds are being studied with a view to their conversion to edible oil shortenings. The development of these crops is undertaken by the Department of Agriculture. The responsibility of investigating the processing of the oils is being undertaken by the national research council in its oil seeds laboratory at the university of Saskatchewan and in its laboratories at Ottawa.

Surveys have been made on the vitamin intake of Canadian troops at various depots, and the components of emergency rations used by the Canadian army have been examined to assess their caloric value and keeping quality. These projects were initiated at the request of the Department of National Defence. Advice has been given to the Department of Munitions and Supply on the actual value of foods offered for public sale.

[Mr. J. A. MacKinnon.]

As a result of metal shortages, a great deal of work has had to be done on the development of moisture resistant packages for dehydrated foods for export or for use by the armed forces. Packaging tests have also been made with compressed dried egg powder and dried milk.

The production of butylene glycol from wheat by fermentation is under active study. This chemical is an important raw material in the manufacture of butadiene, a precursor of synthetic rubber. Attention has been given to the possible use of butylene glycol as a substitute for war materials in short supply, as well as with a view to developing new industrial uses. A pilot plant has been constructed for the determination of data necessary for the design of a full-scale industrial plant. Members of the staff of the associate committee on grain research have assisted greatly in this work.

Promising native and exotic species of plants have been analyzed for rubber content and investigations carried on to determine the methods of extraction of natural rubber from these plants. Simple methods have been developed for removing rubber from Russian dandelion roots and from the leaves and seed pods of milkweed. The rubber obtained is passed to the division of chemistry which does the testing and compounding. This work is carried on with the active cooperation of the university of Toronto and the Dominion Department of Agriculture.

The division of chemistry has been engaged in a large amount of testing and development work. In the field of metals, work has been done on low alloy high-strength steels and aluminum alloys. The sea-water resistance of various coatings has been investigated and a study of means of preventing corrosion of different materials by chemicals has been made. Rubber products used by almost every branch of the armed forces have been investigated for production purposes or with the object of making improvements. These include surgeons' gloves, ground sheets, respirator components, crash and steel helmets and parts for artillery and tanks. In addition, rubber conservation problems and synthetic rubber processes have been under examination.

The wide use of textiles in the armed forces has led to a large amount of work in this field. Special problems investigated included methods of reducing the weathering of canvas duck, the thermal transmission of blankets, the colour analysis of certain textile products, and the characteristics of respirator pads. The development of fabrics impermeable to gas has been undertaken and suitable standards of quality for materials of this nature drawn up. The water-proofing, mildew-proofing, and flame-proofing of cotton textiles have also been studied. Tests have been made on many materials including felt, silk gauze, silk thread, braid, vulcanizing cloth, box cloth and various types of uniform materials. Work on the development of a suitable man-carrying parachute with nylon canopy, shroud lines, tapes and sewing thread, has been successful and this type of parachute has been adopted. Viscose rayon is now being successfully used as a substitute for silk in the manufacture of flare parachutes.

Advice has been given as to the suitability of a variety of leathers for different military purposes, and numerous dressing and waterproofing compounds for leathers have been examined for quality. Used military boots have been examined in order to determine means of overcoming certain weaknesses that developed with wear. Tensile strength tests and wear resistance tests have been made on composition sole materials. Soles composed of cotton fabric and suitable plastics have been made up and are undergoing field trials. The success of such soles would help to alleviate any short supply of sole leather. In addition, these soles have an advantage over leather in that rights and lefts are the same since both outer surfaces are identical.

Transparent sheet resins for military purposes have been tested for quality, and vulcanized fibre identification discs and other similar objects have been examined, general consideration being given to the substitution of plastics for metals in war materials.

A large variety of finishes is required for use on military vehicles and other equipment. Many of these materials are comparatively new to Canadian industry, and the research council has cooperated with government departments and manufacturers in facilitating the supply of these highly specialized coatings. Gas-detector paints, luminous paints, heat reflecting paints for armoured vehicles, finishes for rifle barrels, camouflage paints, fluorescent paints and fire retardent paints have been developed.

The commercial production of fuse powder charcoal was developed and carried on for some time by the council but the manufacture has now been turned over to a commercial concern. However, research on the fundamental problems involved in the operation is being continued. Indicators for war gases and chemicals for other war purposes have been synthesized and studied.

From a small cooperative effort between the national research council and the Canadian army, activities in chemical warfare have grown rapidly to the point where a highly coordinated project has been developed as an establishment of the Department of National Defence. The director general of this organization is a civilian scientist on the staff of the council. About one-half of the active personnel are civilian scientists, the remainder being members of the armed forces. This establishment is an outstanding example of active coordination of military and civilian agencies.

Several sections of the division of physics and electrical engineering are concerned almost exclusively with research and development for the Royal Canadian Navy. A shock and vibration machine based on British admiralty design, but modified to permit the use of Canadian materials, has been installed to test the resistance to shock of instruments and equipment for merchant and navy ships. The results of tests on this machine are used in devising instrument specifications. Other work of this general nature includes the construction and use of a rocking machine to simulate the movements of a ship in order to test instruments. Studies of gear for magnetic-mine sweeping have also been made. The acoustics section has been engaged in the design of special secret navy gear for offensive and defensive operations.

Apparatus for work in ballistics has been developed on an increasing scale, and measurement equipment for ammunition and gun proof has been developed and is now in use. Problems connected with directing gunfire and the armouring properties of various materials have been investigated. Work is also under way on the improvement of anti-aircraft projectiles. In this work the existence of a committee on ballistics and fire control has been of great help.

In the optics section, research and development in optical instruments and in photography and spectrochemical analysis has been accompanied by the construction of many and varied optical components for military instruments. A joint committee on photographic research sponsored by the R.C.A.F. and the council handles all photographic problems for the former organization. A great deal of research in this field has been completed.

Electrical measurements work has been largely testing for certain council laboratories and other government departments. There has been a marked increase in the testing of new insulation materials as a result of the rubber shortage and the manufacture of new materials in Canada. The mechanical testing of war materials in increasing volume has taken considerable time in the strength of materials section. In addition to routine tests numerous investigations on testing with radium and X-rays were carried out. A great deal of radiographic testing of steel, bronze and aluminum is also done outside by council-trained radiographers. The amount of X-ray diffraction work is gradually increasing.

In metrology, tests of such instruments as binoculars, sextants and thermometers run into the hundreds. The output of specially designed work on fire-control apparatus and teacher-training equipment for the army and navy has increased, and pilot models constructed in the council's shops have been sent for service trials.

In the gauge-measurement laboratory the number of gauges measured per month has been approximately 4,200, which appears to be the point at which production has finally settled. Improvements have been made on measuring technique and new equipment added, some of which was proposed, designed and constructed in the council's laboratories and shops.

The development of secret radio equipment continues apace. The sections on research and radio engineering design work hand-in-hand with the army, air force and naval sections. Equipment for radio location has been completed and successfully used against the enemy.

In the division of mechanical engineering many service projects are carried on. These include matters relating to marine engines and their lubrication and the design and test of ships of various types. Model testing basin results are useful to the naval architect and shipbuilder, and also to the designers of aircraft hulls and floats.

There is very close cooperation between the R.C.A.F. and these laboratories. Much of the work in progress in the new laboratories on the Montreal road has been suggested by air force authorities in Canada, the United Kingdom and the United States. The council has horizontal and vertical wind tunnels for the testing of the characteristics of aircraft. The results obtained are important in the development of superior fighting machines and in working out all possible safeguards for their crews.

The gasoline and oil laboratory has complete equipment for chemical and physical testing of fuels and lubricants, and this has been in constant use on war problems. An interesting experiment in this laboratory established the fact that thermally cracked gasoline could be safely used in training aircraft, thus increasing the aviation gasoline supply. Flight tests were made, specifications for such fuel were drawn up, and refiners were provided with information as to the limits within which cracking could be done. Aircraft engines are tested in an engine laboratory where studies on cold starting of engines and of the cooling of armoured fighting vehicles are also in progress.

The council possesses the only building in Canada equipped for testing aircraft structures such as wings and tail surfaces. This equipment must be used in the development of new aircraft and in the study of modifications to existing structures. Considerable work in design and construction of moulded plywood aircraft has been undertaken in order to reduce the drain on duralumin and steel and to draw upon Canada's wood working facilities. For these purposes the structures laboratory serves as a pilot plant where interested firms may follow the development of new designs.

The mechanical engineering division works in close cooperation with the test and development establishment of the R.C.A.F., which operates what is really a full-scale experimental flying station. Through this cooperation laboratory results and flying operations are well coordinated.

On the physical and engineering side of its work, the council is closely associated with the Canadian engineering standards association, which is the national approvals body for engineering practice. The main committee of the C.E.S.A. is the associate committee on engineering standards of the council. The C.E.S.A. has close liaison with similar bodies in the United Kingdom and the United States, and this makes for close coordination of standardization work.

The foregoing outline contains merely a few highlights of the work, more details of which will be found in the annual report of the national research council. Since the national research council is the official research establishment of the navy, army and air force, many of the projects undertaken by the council are secret and cannot be made public at present. It is hoped that the general picture of the place of the council in the war effort can be visualized from the facts given.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES

BANKING AND COMMERCE

Third report of standing committee on banking and commerce.—Mr. Macdonald (Brantford City—for Mr. Moore).

MISCELLANEOUS PRIVATE BILLS—CONCURRENCE IN FIRST REPORT

Mr. L. P. PICARD (Bellechasse) presented the first and second reports of standing committee on miscellaneous private bills, and moved that the first report be concurred in.

Hon. R. B. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I should like to know the necessity for this motion. If it is concurred in, the quorum of this committee will consist of a very small fraction of the membership. It seems to me that this committee has important functions to perform, and that therefore the quorum should be substantial.

Mr. PICARD: The committee is composed of fifty members. There are many select committees sitting every day, and many of the members of this committee are members of other committees as well. It was considered advisable to reduce the quorum in order that we might carry on the business of the committee in a proper way.

Motion agreed to.

PRIME MINISTER CURTIN

ANNOUNCEMENT OF ARRIVAL IN CANADA

Hon. J. L. RALSTON (Minister of National Defence): On behalf of the Prime Minister I should like to inform the house of the arrival in Canada of Prime Minister Curtin of Australia. Mr. Curtin reached this country this afternoon, and will arrive in Ottawa this evening from Montreal at 10.10 p.m. As hon. members may know, and will be glad to know, Mrs. Curtin, who accompanied Prime Minister Curtin from Australia to Washington, arrived in Ottawa earlier to-day.

Arrangements have been made for Mr. Curtin to address members of this house and of the senate on Thursday afternoon. It is my understanding that Mr. Curtin's address on that occasion will be broadcast so that all the citizens of Canada may have the privilege of hearing him.

It is proposed that when the house adjourns this evening the formal session will stand adjourned until four o'clock on Thursday, but it is anticipated that the members will assemble at the usual hour of three o'clock without going into formal session so that they may have the privilege of hearing, along with the members of the senate, the address of Mr. Curtin.

I am sure that I am speaking for all members of the house, and for the country generally, when I say that to us Mr. and Mrs. Curtin represent a sister dominion whose progress in peace and whose prowess in war have been a matter of pride and admiration on the part of the whole of the British commonwealth of nations. Therefore we feel particularly happy to welcome these two distinguished people on this occasion.

Mr. GORDON GRAYDON (Leader of the Opposition): May I just say in connection with the words which have been uttered by the acting leader of the government that the high standing of the Right Hon. Mr. Curtin and the nation which he represents will ensure for him and Mrs. Curtin a royal welcome while he is in Canada. We hope that our hospitality will know no bounds while they are here.

Mr. S. H. KNOWLES (Winnipeg North Centre): It is hardly necessary to add anything to what has been said already, but on behalf of this group may I express our extreme pleasure at the forthcoming visit of the Prime Minister of Australia.

NAVAL SERVICE ACT

AMENDMENTS AND CONSOLIDATION—ADAPTATION OF UNITED KINGDOM NAVAL DISCIPLINE ACT, 1866

Hon. ANGUS L. MACDONALD (Minister of National Defence for Naval Services) moved for leave to introduce bill No. 112, respecting the naval service of Canada.

Mr. GRAYDON: I think the minister ought to explain.

Mr. MACDONALD (Kingston City): Briefly I may say that this bill has two main parts. The first part is the present Naval Service Act with some few amendments, none of them substantial in character, which experience has shown to be desirable in that act. The second part is an adaptation of the British naval discipline act of 1866. That act applies now to Canadian naval forces simply by reference. It is proposed to take that act and make such changes as are necessary to adapt it to Canadian use, and have it as part II of the new Naval Service Act.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

CANADIAN ARMED FORCES

PRESS REPORT OF STATEMENT OF DOCTOR PENFIELD AS TO SPECIAL CENTRES FOR NEUROLOGICAL TREATMENT

On the orders of the day:

Hon. H. A. BRUCE (Parkdale): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Pensions and National Health, of which I have given notice, in view of the statement made yesterday by Doctor Wilder G. Penfield, leading neurological surgeon on the North American continent and head of the Montreal Neurological Institute, who is reported in the Gazette of to-day to the effect that the offer to the government of the institute as a treatment centre had been turned down because of fear of the establishment of an embarrassing precedent. Doctor Penfield further said:

> It is not for us to question this decision, but four and a half years of this war have now passed, and the Canadian government has done practically nothing to establish special centres for the care of war injuries of the nervous system; nothing at all in Quebec and the maritimes.

I would ask the minister to inform the house why this offer was not accepted.

Hon. IAN A. MACKENZIE (Minister of Pensions and National Health): I received notice of my hon. friend's question just before I came into the house, and hurriedly perused the article in the Montreal Gazette. Of course, as Your Honour is aware, it is entirely improper to quote from press reports on the orders of the day, though I am not making any point of that. Two statements are made in the article in question, the first having to do with the lack of accommodation for the armed services. This statement is entirely inaccurate. At the present time we are operating 23,000 hospital beds in Canada, 15,000 by the armed services. In 1939 the Department of Pensions and National Health was operating 2,700 beds; at the present time it is operating 8,450 and will be operating 10,000 within a year.

In regard to neurological cases, I have the most profound admiration for Doctor Penfield, as one of the outstanding men of the world in his field; but in conjunction with the armed services we recently established four centres for the special care of neurological cases, in Edmonton, Winnipeg, Vancouver and Toronto. In Montreal neurological cases receive preliminary investigation at Ste. Anne's and are then moved to the Montreal Neurological Institute for major surgery.

With reference to the alleged turning down of the institute, I take it that my hon. friend's question refers to a suggestion that was made for an additional wing to that institute for the special care of such cases. This is exactly the sort of suggestion that was received in five, six or seven hundred similar cases all over Canada, from other hospitals, which in the very nature of things cannot be accepted. I can assure my hon. friend that every possible consideration has been given, is being given and will be given to the treatment and care of neurological cases in the armed forces of the crown before and after discharge.

Mr. BRUCE: Does the minister not think a man with the outstanding ability of Doctor Penfield should be given an opportunity of doing this work in Montreal?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): I do not believe that question is in order, either. I said I had the most profound admiration for a man of the outstanding ability of Doctor Penfield, but he displayed a remarkable lack of knowledge of the preparations made both by the armed services and by the Department of Pensions and National Health in regard to the care of neurological cases in Canada. We are using his services now.

[Mr. Bruce.]

FUEL

REPORT AS TO PERMISSION TO RECONVERT FROM COAL TO OIL FOR HEATING PURPOSES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. KARL K. HOMUTH (Waterloo South): In view of the report in the morning paper that householders in the city of Ottawa who changed from oil to coal could change back to oil, under permit, has the Minister of Munitions and Supply anything to tell us concerning the situation throughout Ontario and Canada with regard to fuel oil, coal and gas?

Hon. C. D. HOWE (Minister of Munitions and Supply): I did not see the item in question, but definitely those who converted from light fuel oil, the type ordinarily used for domestic heating, to coal, may not convert back. That regulation is very definite. There has been an easing in the supply of heavy fuel oil such as is used for bunkering ships and in larger heating plants. There has been a surplus supply of heavy fuel oil in consequence of using a lower grade of crude in our refineries, and therefore conversion from coal to heavy fuel oil is permitted. But I wish to make it clear that this means nothing at all to the householder, or to the owner of the ordinary apartment block, all of whom must necessarily use light fuel oil, which is in position of very acute shortage. Therefore no conversion of the type suggested can be permitted.

Mr. HOMUTH: One of these days could the minister give a full statement of the situation with regard to fuels of various kinds?

Mr. HOWE: I shall be glad to do that.

INTERNMENTS

CAMILLIEN HOUDE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. LACOMBE (Translation): With reference to the reply which the hon. the Minister of Justice (Mr. St. Laurent) made on Thursday last, May 25, 1944, to one of my questions concerning the review of Mr. Camillien Houde's case, will the minister kindly tell the house whether Mr. Houde has been released from an internment camp, as a result of the hearing he had before the members of the advisory committee in Fredericton on Friday last, May 26, or, at any rate, if the report of the committee is favourable to the release of Mr. Houde, when he will be discharged?

Hon. LOUIS S. ST. LAURENT (Minister of Justice) (Translation): In reply to the honourable member's question, I may say that:

1. Mr. Houde has not been released.

2. I have not been informed that he had a hearing in Fredericton on Friday last.

3. A report has not yet been made to me.

4. When the report of the committee reaches me, I shall consider it, along with all the other documents on file, in the usual manner, keeping in mind the responsibility which devolves upon me under the Defence of Canada Regulations.

MOBILIZATION ACT

NUMBER OF MEN AVAILABLE FOR CALL-UP IN VARIOUS DISTRICTS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. G. S. WHITE (Hastings-Peterborough): I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Labour. When the minister's estimates were before the house on May 1, as reported at page 2509 of Hansard, I asked him if he would give certain information under ten different items in regard to man-power. He promised to give this information at an early day. May I expect that information this week?

Hon. HUMPHREY MITCHELL (Minister of Labour): I shall be glad to look into the matter and see what I can do to expedite the information which the hon. member has asked for.

SUPPLY

DEPARTMENT OF NATIONAL REVENUE

The house in committee of supply, Mr. Bradette in the chair.

Customs and excise divisions—
185. General administration, $975,845.

Mr. GRAYDON: May I interject a remark with reference to procedure? I am not sure how many items are still to be called on the civil estimates, and we are anxious to know whether there are some departments left. The government will at once recognize this as one of the things which as a matter of protection, we as an opposition would ordinarily be entitled to know.

Mr. RALSTON: There are two left. The item will stand.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): They are all in but two.

Item stands.

DEPARTMENT OF NATIONAL WAR SERVICES

193. Canadian travel bureau service, $77,950.

Item stands.

Progress reported.

WAR APPROPRIATION BILL

PROVISION FOR GRANTING TO HIS MAJESTY AID FOR NATIONAL DEFENCE AND SECURITY

The house resumed from Monday, May 29, consideration in committee of a resolution to grant to His Majesty certain sums of money for the carrying out of measures consequent upon the existence of a state of war—Mr. Ilsley—Mr. Bradette in the chair.

DEPARTMENT OF FINANCE

Wartime prices and trade board—administration, $15,600,000.

Mr. TUSTIN: Will the parliamentary assistant be good enough to give a breakdown of this amount?

Mr. D. C. ABBOTT (Parliamentary Assistant to the Minister of Finance): The breakdown is:

Salaries	$ 9,500,000
Travelling expenses	950,000
Printing	1,150,000
Stationery	250,000
Telephones	300,000
Telegrams	75,000
Legal and audit	150,000
Advertising	1,000,000
Postage	425,000
Freight and express	50,000
Local ration board	700,000
Ration coupon banking	840,000
Sundries	210,000
Total	$15,600,000

Mr. TUSTIN: How many employees are working under the wartime prices and trade board? How many offices are there across Canada; how many employees are there on the inspection staff, and how many are on loan to this branch of the service?

Mr. ABBOTT: As at March 31, 1944, there were 5,112 employees. These are paid employees. There are fourteen regional offices and about 114 or 115 local offices.

Mr. TUSTIN: How many are employed as inspectors?

Mr. ABBOTT: I have not that information at the moment but I will make a note of the question and get it later. In order that I may be clear as to what is meant, does my hon. friend mean enforcement inspectors or some other type of inspector?

Mr. TUSTIN: I think it is the enforcement inspectors. There are a great many of them travelling all across the country.

Mr. ABBOTT: I am advised there are between three and four hundred.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): How many young lawyers are employed?

Mr. ABBOTT: I am afraid I have not that information.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): All the young lawyers in the country are working for them.

Mr. ABBOTT: We will get that information.

Mr. TUSTIN: Mr. Chairman, each year in the town in which I reside a poultry fair is held. A large amount of dressed poultry is brought in; as a matter of fact in two days last December the producers brought in ninety tons of fresh poultry. There was practically an army of wartime prices and trade board inspectors there at the same time. To my knowledge there were nine of them, and how many more I do not know. The point I am raising this afternoon has not so much to do with the inspectors as it has with the controls placed upon the poultry producers of that community. On those particular days wartime prices and trade board inspectors placed blackboards in the market square advising the buyers what the ceiling prices were at which they could buy poultry. In my estimation they were working exactly backward. A farmer would come in with a load of poultry that might grade A or B, and he was told definitely by the inspectors that he could not accept more than 30¼ cents for chickens and 35¼ cents for turkeys, the idea being that the poultry must be sold ungraded. Another farmer might drive in alongside the first man with a load of poultry that would not grade more than C or D. If the buyers saw fit they could pay him the same price because his poultry was also ungraded. From talking to the buyers I know that they were anxious to pay the producer considerably more than they were allowed to pay. A lot of the dressed poultry taken out of that town in those two or three days was shipped to Montreal or Toronto by truck and sold in the stores in those cities at a price of 43 cents for grade A and 42 cents for grade B. My contention is that the farmers were robbed of from 7 to 8 cents per pound due to the way in which the wartime prices and trade board handled the situation. I am protesting against that kind of thing. The men who purchased these fowl were willing to pay more than they were allowed to pay, and the result was that they were able to make an exorbitant profit of from 10 to 13 cents per pound, a profit entirely out of line with what the producer received.

I have no axe to grind about the price ceiling to the consumer. I think that is perfectly all right, but I protest against a price ceiling to the producer which is 13 cents below what the consumer has to pay. That is out of all proportion. My contention is that the ceiling to the consumer should be enforced, but instead of the wartime prices and trade board saying to the producers of these fowl, "You cannot receive more than 30¼ cents for your chickens or more than 35¼ cents for your turkeys," they should say to the buyers, "You cannot pay less than those prices." If the large concerns that are buying this poultry are satisfied to take a smaller profit than 10 to 15 cents a pound, then I say they should be allowed to do so.

In my estimation this practice is doing much to discourage agriculture in this country. On the one side we have the government urging the farmer to produce more and, on the other, we have the wartime prices and trade board doing much to discourage that which is being requested by other branches of government. I felt it my duty to bring this matter to the attention of the department and to urge that this thing be not repeated. The order should be amended so that the farmer who is doing the work, who is producing at the request of certain branches of government, will receive a fair price. There should not be the spread between what is paid to the farmer and what the consumer pays as exists in this case.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): What authority did these inspectors have to take the stand they did?

Mr. BLAIR: I think what the hon. member has just said should be considered. Fowl should be properly graded. At the present time we are carrying on an extensive business in bootlegging and it ought to be controlled.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Who are "we"?

Mr. BLAIR: Poultry should be classified and graded so that the buyer knows exactly what he is buying. That would regulate prices. I think perhaps the farmer is being legislated against in this regard.

Mr. ABBOTT: I should like to deal with the points raised by the hon. member for Prince Edward-Lennox. There are three ceilings on poultry, as I have no doubt my hon. friend knows. There is a ceiling on the wholesale price, there is a ceiling on the producer and there is a ceiling to the retail trade. The producer of poultry is entitled to sell at the ceiling price according to who is his customer. If he sells to a wholesaler, he gets the producer price; if he sells to a retailer, he gets the wholesale price, and if he sells to you or to me as consumers, he gets the retail consumer price. That is the price ceiling policy with respect to dressed poultry.

As to what these inspectors were doing in my hon. friend's town, I must confess that I have no personal information. I am not an expert in the grading of poultry. The wartime prices and trade board has nothing to do with establishing the grades of dressed poultry; that is done either by the provincial agricultural authorities or by those of the federal government. In any case the grades are fixed and the prices board establishes ceilings for the different grades.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): What authority had these men to step in?

Mr. ABBOTT: Would my hon. friend tell me about what time of the year it was?

Mr. TUSTIN: It was December 3 or 4.

Mr. ABBOTT: I asked one of my officials and he said just before Christmas there was a considerable—.

Mr. TUSTIN: Possibly I did not make myself clear. I am not finding any fault with the grading of the poultry, but the poultry which was brought into the market square on these particular days, unless it comes through the pool, is not graded. Last year the pool did not function and none of the poultry brought into the market was graded. The farmer is not allowed to grade the poultry himself, and there were no inspectors from the Department of Agriculture there to grade it. The result was that every farmer was forced to sell the poultry at the ungraded price, no matter how good or how poor it was. That is what I am complaining of.

Mr. ABBOTT: I have no knowledge of the particular facts my hon. friend is bringing forward. I take it that this poultry, turkeys, fowl or whatever it was, for some reason or other had to be sold as ungraded poultry and was therefore subject to the ceiling for ungraded poultry.

The hon. member for York-Sunbury asked as to the authority for the inspectors doing what they were doing. I am not clear as to what orders they were enforcing, but I am advised that just prior to Christmas of last year there was a considerable tendency on the part of certain buyers in cities and elsewhere to push up the prices without too much regard for the ceiling, and that the enforcement division were instructed to keep their eyes open for that sort of thing.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): But that does not take care of the situation. What determined the price when the fowl was ungraded?

Mr. ABBOTT: I have not the order before me, but I am advised that under the order there is a price ceiling for ungraded poultry.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): No matter what may be the quality of the poultry?

Mr. ABBOTT: Quite so.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): That just illustrates once more the fact that when you set up regulations to interfere with the laws of supply and demand, as is being done by the wartime prices and trade board, great irregularities and injustices are bound to occur. Here is a man with grade A poultry, and he is told by the so-called gestapo that he cannot get the price for grade A poultry, that he must take the ungraded poultry price. I am satisfied that the regulations were made with good intent; I want to make that clear; but it is the operation of these regulations that brings about injustices and great discontent in this country. Make no mistake about it—the hand of every man who produces is against these regulations.

Mr. ABBOTT: Not the hand of every consumer.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I am talking about the producers.

Mr. ABBOTT: I know you are.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): The producer has to have somebody stand up for him once in a while. The consumers of this country are not to be so greatly pitied. With a national income of ten billion dollars they have money enough to pay and are willing to pay, but I do agree that we should endeavour to keep prices within reasonable ranges. How do these regulations work? Here is another perfect illustration of the inflexibility of the rules and regulations laid down here in Ottawa by a group of white-collared boys who never were in the poultry business, who know nothing about it, but who sit around a table and draft a lot of regulations without knowing how the thing is going to work out, without knowing how it is going to affect both the producer and the consumer. That is what I object to, and that is what the people of this country are objecting to. The regulations are so inflexible, and then those who are administering them hold the fear of fine and imprisonment over the people. That is the kind of thing the people are rebelling against to-day, and this government will find it out when they go to the polls. I do not know anything that is going to drive this government out of power quicker than the way in which these regulations are administered. I am sure I am right. I can run my whole campaign in the next election if I want to on this very question, and I will be elected.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: I too.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): The regulations are drafted with good intent. I am not questioning the idea behind the scheme, although I have often said that at the beginning prices were frozen on a very uneven scale. I illustrate that by the freezing of the price of hay in my province at the October, 1941, price. Anybody who knows anything about hay, and we produce a good deal of hay in our part of the country, knows that October is the month when hay is at its lowest price level. That is just after the new crop has been pressed. The price of hay rises steadily from October to April, and the thrifty farmer, if he can, holds his hay until he can get the top price in April. But the price of hay was fixed by the prices board at the lowest price for hay, the October price. That is the price the farmer had to accept for his hay in the month of April, when the price ordinarily rises to its peak. The farmer will never forget it. That is the indictment that I make against these regulations. They are so inflexible. They are like the laws of the Medes and Persians. These bureaucrats are like the Bourbons; they never learn anything. They did not know anything to start with, and they never learn anything as they go along. They are never in touch with local conditions—

Mr. HATFIELD: And they never ask any member of parliament for advice.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): No, they never ask any member of parliament. I could have told them about hay. That is one thing I happen to know because in days gone by, on lands owned by me, I produced a great deal of baled hay. I was fortunate enough to get out of that market with the coming of the automobile, and I am glad I did. But hay is coming back into its own now, with all the restrictions on gasoline. Hay is a real commodity now in the Saint John valley.

Does the prices board ever ask anybody about the local conditions? Take the case mentioned by the hon. member for Prince Edward-Lennox. There is a case where the farmer was robbed of seven cents a pound on his grade A poultry, and it was done because of government regulations which do not have regard to actualities. How does the parliamentary assistant defend that sort of thing? I know he is not personally responsible; it is the administrative officers who are responsible for that sort of thing.

I want to ask a question about salaries. You have nine and a half million dollars here for salaries, and the board has about five thousand employees scattered all over the country. That is an average of about $1,900 each. What is the ranges of salaries paid? How much does the chairman get? What does the secretary get? What is the number of employees in the high income group? The country would like to know what this organization is costing them and what it is costing the producers, because they are being kept down although they are still taxpayers. I also want to know how many lawyers the board has. It has engaged lawyers to conduct prosecutions from time to time. I am not objecting to prosecutions for infractions of the regulations, but my observation is that the employment of these prosecuting attorneys in my part of the country is a form of political patronage. I know it is so in my county, and I am told it is so everywhere. I had someone look up for me the names of the lawyers in New Brunswick who were prosecuting infractions of these regulations. Would you believe it, there is only one lone Tory engaged to prosecute in the province; he is in the county of Charlotte, and the only reason he was appointed was that there is not a Liberal lawyer left in the county because they had all been given jobs. There are not many of them there in any event. The fact remains that only one Conservative lawyer in New Brunswick was employed by this board. I want to know how these lawyers are appointed and what their fees are. Are they appointed through the Department of Justice?

Mr. ABBOTT: Yes.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): That is what I thought. They are on the patronage list of the Department of Justice? Correct?

Mr. ABBOTT: I would not know about that.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Well, you could easily find out. I think the minister, perhaps, does know something about this. I make the statement that I believe there is a patronage list established in the expending of this money, which is voted under the guise of war, to pay Liberal lawyers, some of whom ought to be in the army. I am not going to name them. I understand that they are patriots to the extent of $25, $35, $50 a day, prosecuting infractions of this act. I should like to have a break-down of the employees in categories, and I want full information about the employment of the lawyers—what they are paid, how they are paid and who fixes their remuneration.

Mr. ABBOTT: First of all I would like to deal with my hon. friend's remarks as to the price ceiling policy. He said in connection with these agricultural prices that ceilings were fixed by a bunch of white-collar boys here in Ottawa. I just want to point out to him that the person mainly responsible for fixing these agricultural prices is the administrator of meat and poultry, Mr. F. S. Grisdale, who, as my hon. friend knows, is a former minister of agriculture of Alberta and the head of an agricultural college, and who can hardly be described as a white-collar boy who knows very little about prices.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): He is not a dirt farmer.

Mr. ABBOTT: In addition he avails himself, and so do the officers of the board, of the assistance of officials of the Department of Agriculture.

As to the criticism of the fixing of the price ceiling on hay, I am advised that hay has been exempt from the price ceiling since the early days of the controls.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): It was exempted after a roar went up from one end of the Saint John valley to the other.

Mr. ABBOTT: The price ceiling was imposed in November, 1941.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): October.

Mr. ABBOTT: And hay was exempted from the price ceiling, I am advised, in December, 1941.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): That is after they made the mistake.

Mr. ABBOTT: A ceiling was placed on hay in the western provinces in November of 1943; I think in British Columbia, at the request of the provincial agricultural authorities, because the price was running up too fast.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): That just shows a system of trial and error.

Mr. ABBOTT: As to the question of salaries, I can get my hon. friend the break-down which he asks. He will remember, not I think this session but in the last session, questions were asked—one, I know, by the hon. member for Lake Centre—as to the number of officials of the board in certain salary categories. That answer was given; it involved a considerable amount of work; and I wonder if my hon. friend would be satisfied if I have the officials of the board check to see if there is any substantial variation from that return, which was tabled, I think, towards the latter part of last session. I doubt if there has been; but if he insists on the information, of course we can obtain it.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): It is a very large item—nine millions. I have not seen the return.

Mr. ABBOTT: Perhaps my hon. friend could let that stand.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Yes, I will do that.

Mr. ABBOTT: I will send him a copy, and if he thinks it should be amplified perhaps we might do that.

Now as to the retention of lawyers, a certain number of lawyers are retained on a full-time basis by the board here in Ottawa and in the regional offices. There are regional enforcement counsel. I will get for my hon. friend the number of these lawyers.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): And the names.

Mr. ABBOTT: And the names, and the salaries which they are paid. As to the local prosecutions, these are handled, as I understand government prosecutions have been handled for a great many years, by counsel retained by the Department of Justice, and I have no doubt that that practice was followed.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Why should not the regional counsel handle it?

Mr. ABBOTT: I am informed that the number of prosecutions has now risen to some five thousand a year, some of them it is true, of a minor character.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Most of them.

Mr. ABBOTT: And that the number of local regional counsel we have, with the other duties they are required to perform, is simply inadequate to begin to handle these cases, which are scattered through different parts of the country.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): That is not the whole picture. Most of these cases take about ten minutes each.

Mr. ABBOTT: I have not had any personal experience.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Neither have I, but I have noticed that most of the defendants plead guilty, and fines are imposed; in default of paying they go to prison. They come up in batches regularly in the police court at Fredericton. I wonder, if a man had ten cases in the one docket, how much he would be paid for the couple of hours that he spends on that. So much a case?

Mr. ABBOTT: I cannot say that. I am advised that the costs are fixed by the Department of Justice.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): So much each case?

Mr. ABBOTT: I really have no information. But they are settled by the Department of Justice, not by the wartime prices and trade board.

Mr. WARREN: In reference to grading of poultry, as to which the hon. member for York-Sunbury seems to be so terribly concerned, I wonder whether in the cases he has in mind the producers themselves have not been somewhat at fault. Certainly the officials of the wartime prices and trade board would have nothing to do in the matter of grading, and if control is to be exercised as far as the consumer and the producer are concerned we must have some basis. If we are to have ceiling prices we would naturally have those prices established, or ought to, according to grade.

An hon. MEMBER: How can you?

Mr. WARREN: If they are graded, why not? What is to hinder establishing ceiling prices according to grade?

Mr. BOUCHER: What if there is no possibility of having grading?

Mr. WARREN: Well then, whose fault is it? I do not know. In the village of Eganville, near which I live, a number of years ago we marketed our poultry and eggs in the usual haphazard manner. The federal Department of Agriculture, I believe, initiated this scheme. A young fellow was established in a very small office, some of the farmers got together and put up their notes as collateral, and this young man started in grading eggs, having first been trained by an official of the Department of Agriculture. For the first year or two that young man was operating the plant the business was very small, but over a period of just a few years it has developed to a matter of $100,000 or more a year. One advantage of this young man having been trained was that when he graded a crate of eggs that grade was accepted on any market. That was not true if a merchant graded the eggs; his eggs would be regraded at Montreal and they might be placed in a different grade from that fixed by the local merchant. In that neighbourhood there has been a gradual but continuous increase in production of poultry and a very marked improvement in quality. In the old days probably not twenty per cent of our poultry were grade A. Now eighty per cent are grade A. The same is true of eggs. Nobody is suffering because of it. The grader instead of working in a place by himself now has a grading machine and a half dozen or more helpers around him. In the fall of the year the farmers bring in their poultry which are left there, weighed and graded, and there is never much grumbling or dispute that I am aware of, respecting the grading of poultry. In some communities by a little cooperative effort on the part of the producers what is thought to be a grievance can be very easily corrected.

The same thing is true of the village of Cobden. Within the last few years the grading and handling of poultry and eggs have become big business in that village, and the revenue in those districts must have increased tremendously. Instead of a woman raising say fifty poultry she handles them by the hundreds. The women make a job of it and they know how to dress their poultry. They go around in groups. The neighbours help each other. They find out the proper methods to use in dressing poultry to have them grade properly. The result is there is not much dissatisfaction. I do not know why we should jump on the wartime prices and trade board officials with respect to grades. If we do not pay for our products according to grade we shall be doing the producers harm instead of good. A man ought to be paid for his products on the basis of quality.

Mr. TUSTIN: I have listened with a great deal of interest to the hon. member for Renfrew North. I am surprised to see him standing in his place and agreeing that the farmer should be cheated out of thirteen cents a pound on those chickens just because he was unable to have them graded. I made it clear a few moments ago that we agreed with grading. So far as producing poultry is concerned, more poultry are produced in my constituency than in any other constituency in Canada. I am not in the least disturbed about any successful contradiction of that statement.

We have had this fair at Napanee for many years and we have followed through the grading of poultry and eggs ever since the commencement of it. But the point I strongly emphasized to the committee was that last December it was impossible for the farmers to get their poultry graded because the Department of Agriculture could not send graders there or did not send them there. It made no difference how good the poultry were, all that the farmer was allowed to accept for them was 30¼ cents a pound. Those chickens were taken a hundred and fifty miles to Toronto and sold to the consumer at 43 cents a pound for grade A and 42 cents a pound for grade B. I say that should not happen. It is not protecting the farmer. The point I have tried to emphasize is that the inspectors of the wartime prices and trade board were on the market square and when the farmer drove up with his load of poultry it made no difference whether they were grade A, B, C, or D, the inspector walked up to farmer's rig and when the buyer came along the inspector said,

"You can pay only 30¼ cents a pound for those chickens." I say that is dictatorship. Instead of the board saying to the buyer, "You cannot pay more than 30¼ cents for those chickens," it should protect the consumers who are paying 42 or 43 cents a pound.

In many instances the buyers wanted to pay more for this poultry last fall, but the wartime prices and trade board said it could not be done because the poultry were not graded. Instead of the board saying, "You cannot pay more than 30¼ cents a pound", they should say, "You cannot pay the farmer less than 30¼ cents".

Mr. WARREN: Have them graded.

Mr. TUSTIN: We are ready to accept grading at all times. That is the way we should like to sell our products. We have done more in our district to improve the quality of poultry and eggs than any other district in Canada. I was amused to hear the hon. member for Renfrew North saying that the farmers in his constituency dealt in hundreds of chickens. In my part of the country they deal in thousands. I have one hatchery alone that has been producing since the first of February and it will be producing until the end of September. It is producing at the rate of 16,000 per week. I have three hatcheries in my constituency, but this one hatchery is producing 16,000 a week and will continue at that rate until the end of September.

I do not want to repeat these things, but I do wish to urge upon the parliamentary assistant to the minister the necessity of his seeing to it that the wartime prices and trade board are made acquainted with the difficulties that the farmers had last year, and that the same difficulty does not arise again this fall.

Mr. ROSS (Souris): I should like to support the remarks of the hon. member for Prince Edward-Lennox with respect to the marketing of poultry. I have been convinced from the inception of price control in this country, as has been pointed out by other hon. members to-day, that the primary producer was taken at an unfair advantage and a very uneven price structure. We of the opposition have battled continuously for some form of parity for the primary producer. This applies not only to poultry but to all primary products of the country. Beef is a glaring example. Hon. members have taken advantage of every occasion to refer to the difficult situation of beef production in Canada. Beef and hogs and other commodities may come under some other department, but back of all the difficulties is Donald Gordon and his price control administration.

The beef feeder, the man who has been accustomed to finishing beef in Canada, has been almost entirely put out of business by price complications and controls. The price of grain to-day and the price of beef do not permit the feeder to buy cattle and finish the animal properly as he used to do.

The excuse that is always given to us is that we cannot now take advantage of our natural market to the south because it would be unfair to the consumer of this country. That market is on the average thirty-five per cent higher than it is in this country. The argument has always been advanced in this house by several ministers that in the case of hogs we must supply the finest type to Britain in order to obtain that market. Surely that same argument ought to apply to beef, but we have not been doing that. We have been shipping cow beef to Britain. True, that has been taken off the market recently, but surely we will not retain that market by supplying that type of cattle to Britain. The set-up is not consistent.

We had a new system of hog grading put in force in recent months in Canada with bonuses for the select hog. I think that is all to the good. But on the other hand we have controls by the packers, and penalties which they impose. Under the old schedule up to March on a heavy hog dressing 220 pounds there was a penalty of some two cents a pound. This hog is a choice hog in the United States. Under the new set-up which prevails in grading the settlements, in April the packer penalized the producer 4¼ cents a pound on the heavy hog. There is over twice the penalty that previously applied on that 220-pound hog. Previously there was a penalty of $4.40. Under the present set-up of settlements on the first of the month the producer is penalized $9.35, through no fault of his own. Besides, man-power enters into it because there was a glut in all of the abattoirs throughout western Canada.

A man with a select hog ready to go on the market was not allowed to market it; the hog became a heavy, and he was further penalized by the packer who took his product; there was no control at all. In addition, a great deal of that heavier pork is sold for domestic consumption in Canada, in many cases at a higher price than is paid for the select bacon by the bacon board. The government does not profess to do anything about that. I say that in many of these matters the price controls are very unfair to the primary producers of this country, who have always received secondary consideration. I have made it plain that I am in favour of price control for the benefit of the consumers, but in connection with many items the consumers have benefited to a far greater extent than the primary producers.

While I am on my feet I should like to ask the hon. gentleman another question. I was not sure of the figure he gave in the breakdown in connection with ration coupon banking. I believe he gave some figure of about $800,000.

Mr. ABBOTT: Yes, $840,000.

Mr. ROSS (Souris): I believe this is a new venture; previously these coupons were handled on a different basis. I know that gasoline coupons were handled by the oil companies themselves, at no cost whatever to the country. I should like an explanation from the hon. gentleman as to why this change was made and what it cost the government last year to have these coupons handled in this way. I should like to know just what the banks receive for this service, which I understand was performed gratis by other people until this change was made, but which now costs the taxpayers of this country $840,000.

Mr. ABBOTT: In the earlier days of coupon rationing this service was provided largely by the retailers. It involved a great deal of work and a great deal of additional expense, and it was felt that this was perhaps an unfair burden to impose upon one particular class of the community.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Unless they were paid for it.

Mr. ABBOTT: That is perfectly true, but that would involve a very difficult administrative job which probably would result in greater expenditure and less efficiency than is the case under the coupon banking system which has now been introduced, and which I think I am right in saying was adapted from other countries, particularly Great Britain.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Was the voluntary system efficient?

Mr. ABBOTT: I am advised that under the voluntary system there was a considerable clutter-up of coupons and considerable difficulty both on the part of the retailers and on the part of the government in maintaining accurate records.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Was there not also the possibility of fraud?

Mr. ABBOTT: And of course there was the obvious danger that the coupons might be handled improperly. This coupon banking system was based upon systems in vogue in other countries, including Great Britain, and the work was placed with the banks. It may be said that the banks should have done it for nothing, but it was an additional service which the banks were asked to provide. In the case of the retail grocer or merchant, he was getting the benefit of the rationing system in the sense that there was a reasonable flow of supplies, and he was maintained in business, but it was purely an extra service as far as the banks were concerned and they are being paid for it on a cost basis.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I do not think the retailer looked upon the rationing system with much favour, because his supplies were kept down.

Mr. ABBOTT: I dare say that is true; but I venture to suggest that the retailer would have looked with much less favour on the absence of rationing in connection with these very short commodities. He accepted the rationing system; he may have considered it an evil, but I believe he recognized that it was necessary, not only to assure equitable distribution to the people but for the protection of his own business. Very briefly that is the reason for this charge in connection with ration coupon banking.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): What do you pay the banks?

Mr. ABBOTT: The sum of $460,618.51 has been paid by the government to the chartered banks of Canada for their services in connection with ration coupon banking for the period from March 1, 1943, to November 30, 1943.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Just how is it handled, and what are they paid?

Mr. ABBOTT: The monthly charges have been running between $55,000 and $65,000. The board's estimate of $840,000 was made prior to the discontinuance of meat rationing and therefore may be in excess of need. However, it is felt that there should be some leeway in the event that other commodities may have to be rationed. The rates the banks are using at present were based on a time study of the actual operations involved, and represent only the banks' direct salary cost and out of pocket expenses in connection with stationery, supplies and so on.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Then they are doing it at cost?

Mr. ABBOTT: Yes, at cost.

Mr. MARSHALL: What is the actual rate?

Mr. ABBOTT: It has been running at $55,000 to $65,000 a month.

Mr. MARSHALL: I know that, but what is the basis of the charge?

Mr. ABBOTT: The rates are subject to review from time to time both by the board and by the bankers, through the Canadian Bankers' association. They are based on a study of the time of the bank's employees involved in providing these services.

Mr. MARSHALL: How do you arrive at that figure of $55,000 or $65,000.

Mr. ABBOTT: I am advised that the figure is arrived at on the banks submitting evidence of the actual time spent by their employees in handling these coupons. It is cleared through the Canadian Bankers' association to the board, and figures are submitted as to the time occupied by the employees of the banks and the amount of stationery, and so on, involved.

Mr. MARSHALL: So that really you have to take the word of the banks for the whole thing?

Mr. ABBOTT: Subject to check by the officers of the board to ascertain whether the statements of the banks as to the time consumed are correct.

Mr. MARSHALL: Surely the officers of the board know the basis.

Mr. ABBOTT: That is right.

Mr. JOHNSTON (Bow River): Do they not get 25 cents in addition for each account?

Mr. ABBOTT: It is not on the basis of so much for each coupon, or anything like that. The basis of remuneration to the banks is their actual out-of-pocket expense. That may not be determined to the last cent, but as closely as it can be arrived at the work is done by the banks on a cost basis.

Mr. JOHNSTON (Bow River): Just to keep the record straight, not long ago I obtained some information from the department in regard to this very matter, and according to that information the banks were paid 25 cents for every account established in regard to these coupons. I have the letter up in my office.

Mr. ABBOTT: I will get more detailed information as to the way in which this is operated, but the general statement I have made is correct; payment to the banks is on the basis of the banks' cost. How that cost is arrived at, other than by the time taken, and so on, I am not in a position to say at the moment, but I will get the information.

Mr. JOHNSTON (Bow River): The minister's information may be correct as far as the figure of $55,000 a month is concerned.

Mr. ABBOTT: Between $55,000 and $65,000. Let me say at once that this is not business for which the banks asked. They did not invite it at all; the government asked them to undertake it.

Mr. JOHNSTON (Bow River): That is so. At the same time, if I understand the situation correctly according to the information given to me by the department some time ago, in addition to the actual cost of this operation as far as the time of their employees is concerned—and that is in accordance with information I received—the banks are paid 25 cents for each account they have established.

Mr. ABBOTT: I shall verify that. I think there is some misunderstanding there and I shall have to check on that and give an answer later.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: I wish to direct a couple of questions to the parliamentary assistant on a subject about which we have heard something in the past couple of days, namely, strawberries. If I had known that this item was coming up to-day I would have reserved until this occasion a part of the remarks I made yesterday. May I say that it has never been suggested by anyone in British Columbia at any time that the ceiling should be lifted from strawberries, because we know that that is impossible at this date. We did ask that the price be based on cost of production. I may say, Mr. Chairman, that it will be much more convenient to answer my questions to-day because it will not entail messages being sent up and down each moment in order to get a direction.

I wish to quote as an authority on this subject the minister himself. He stated that the reason for the ceiling was to prevent inflation. Now, we never suggested at any time in British Columbia that there should be an inflationary price. What we did urge was that the ceiling should be based on cost of production and a reasonable profit for 1944. Last year for the first time in British Columbia the price was based on white labour and white production, and the price, according to the minister, was 33 cents. Let me repeat, the minister said that they were definitely setting the ceiling in order to prevent inflation. May I remark in passing that yesterday I said nothing that could be regarded as antagonistic to the officials of the board, though I must say that in my opinion they do not know the first thing about berries. They are human beings who are trying to do a good job in connection with something they know nothing about.

The CHAIRMAN: Order. I know that the hon. member for Fraser Valley does not want to repeat what has been said before in discussions in the committee. Yesterday we had a discussion lasting nearly two hours in connection with strawberries and raspberries and this afternoon the question has come up again. I would ask hon. members to try as far as possible to avoid repetition.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: I do not want to repeat anything, Mr. Chairman, but I am quoting the highest authority in the house, the minister himself, who declared that the prices were set with a view to preventing inflation. Let me read what he said as reported at page 3322 of Hansard of May 29:

> In 1943 the average figure for Nova Scotia was 22 cents; New Brunswick, 19 cents; Quebec, 17 cents; Ontario, 18 cents; British Columbia, 33 cents.

Before I go on with my argument, may I say that on no account do I want prices reduced in other provinces. I do not know what their cost of production is. But the minister's statement is based on the figures he quoted, and if there has been an increase in all the other provinces and there has been no inflation, where is the inflation in British Columbia? Let us take the beautiful province of Nova Scotia, a province which is fortunately situated. In 1939 the price was 10 cents; in 1940, 11 cents; in 1941, 13 cents; and in 1942, 14 cents—the highest of any province of the dominion. Yet in 1944 Nova Scotia—and I do not say that the figure is too high—the price is set at 22 cents. My point is this: Why is it that British Columbia is the only province that is told it must come down? In every other province the price is higher than ever before, and that has not resulted in inflation; yet we are told that there is danger of inflation in British Columbia, where, as I say, we have the price based for the first time on the white man's production costs.

I am going to ask the officials of the wartime prices and trade board to take into consideration some of the facts which I am about to state. In British Columbia the minimum wages effective from a date before 1938, so far as the canneries are concerned were: at least 85 per cent of male employees, per hour, 38 cents; at least 90 per cent of women, 30 cents; not more than 15 per cent of male employees, 28 cents, and not more than 10 per cent of women employees, 25 cents.

I will not give New Brunswick, but let us take Ontario prices. In cities and towns with a population of from 5,000 to 30,000, the wages were 22 cents for women and 15 cents for girls under 18. Anyone who knows anything about the jam canneries knows that the average girl employee is under 18. As regards the rest of the province, in towns and villages with population from 2,000 to 5,000—and that is where the average farm cannery is situated—the wages for women was 20 cents and girls under eighteen, 15 cents. Compare that with a minimum of 30 cents in British Columbia. Can anyone contend that we have inflation in British Columbia?

The situation in Quebec is even worse. I did not think it was possible to have anything worse than I have already shown, but here are the figures for the province of Quebec, taking temporary employees—and the average employee in a cannery is a temporary employee. For men—mark this, men, regular employees—the figure is 25 cents; for women, 17 cents; and in the city of Montreal and outside Montreal the figures are, men, 20 cents and women, 15 cents. I thought that was bad enough; I did not think it was possible to have slave labour of this kind. However, we find that the average employee in Quebec canneries, between June 15 and October 15, received, men, 14 cents an hour, and women, 14 cents an hour.

I would ask the officials of the board to explain to me where the inflation comes in in British Columbia when every other province has had an increase this year as compared with last year and when we in British Columbia have to compete against such wages as I have quoted. I should like to know whether the cost of production is taken into consideration. When it requires 30 cents a quart to produce in Ontario, and when we find such disgraceful wages as 14 cents an hour being paid to men working in a cannery, how can we produce at 27 cents? I do not say that 30 cents is too high for Ontario and Quebec. I do not think the farmers are getting too much, but it is unreasonable to expect the farmers in British Columbia to swallow hook, line and sinker the nonsense that is put out by men who, as the member for York-Sunbury says, know nothing about berries and who evidently do not take these facts into consideration.

I defy the deputy or any official of the board to say that any farm organization or member of parliament was consulted in arriving at the figures. I admit that I am a little bit bitter about this, but I assure you, Mr. Chairman, that there is nothing personal in my remarks, so far as the members of the board are concerned. Indeed, two gentlemen who have to do with jam come from British Columbia. I say, however, that the farmers of British Columbia, judging by the wires that I have received, are anxious to know, and they are entitled to know, how the figure was arrived at. I particularly wish the parliamentary assistant to tell me whether the cost of production was taken into consideration, when we are compelled to ship our berries, our processed fruit, where we are directed.

No doubt in war time that is necessary. How is it that the price in Ontario of 30 cents for fresh fruit is dropped to 19 cents?

Mr. ABBOTT: Thirty cents.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: The price of 30 cents in Ontario is dropped to 19 cents after June 24. The hon. member for Vancouver-Burrard was challenged yesterday by the Minister of Finance, but he was correct; he knew what he was talking about. They want the cream at all times. Why the increase to 30 cents and then the drop to 19 cents? I should like the parliamentary assistant to explain why that is. I will prove my point by their own figures.

When the time comes for canning, Ontario must import processed berries from British Columbia. The manufacturer in British Columbia can pay up to 12 cents per pound after that date, but of course he is not going to pay that for jam berries. For argument's sake say that he pays 10 cents a pound, but 12 cents is the maximum he is allowed to pay. He will offer 10 cents a pound and say, "Take it or leave it; I have to compete with the cheap labour and cheap manufacture in the east." We are compelled to ship our processed berries to eastern Canada. I am not quarrelling with that because at the present time we do not have the manufacturing facilities in British Columbia. It is a peculiar fact that when you follow that through you find that 30 cents is being paid in Ontario with its cheap labour, and then 19 cents when they want to manufacture. It should be noted that at December 31, 1943, there were 8,200,000 pounds of fruit pulp in British Columbia as against 3,800,000 pounds in 1942. I doubt if any of the great producers' organizations in British Columbia were consulted. I doubt if any hon. member from British Columbia was consulted in connection with this price ceiling for berries. I doubt very much if the jam manufacturers of British Columbia were not consulted before this figure was arrived at. I want the parliamentary assistant to explain to me how they arrived at this. Was the cost of production taken into consideration? Were the jam manufacturers consulted before the ceiling was set?

Mr. ABBOTT: I thought we had our strawberry festival yesterday. I am afraid I am not very well prepared to deal with the questions my hon. friend has asked. As I recall, he asked how the price was arrived at. It was arrived at by the fruits and vegetable administration, of which his fellow British Columbian, Mr. Chambers, is the administrator. I am informed that it was arrived at after consultation with the officials of the department of agriculture of British Columbia and after Mr. Chambers had visited that province. That was so far as the price in that part of Canada is concerned.

Mr. SENN: Was the horticultural council called in?

Mr. ABBOTT: I cannot say.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: May I ask a question?

Mr. ABBOTT: Perhaps I could cover the points raised by my hon. friend.

The CHAIRMAN: The parliamentary assistant should be allowed to give his answer.

Mr. ABBOTT: I was just trying to cover the other question which was asked. The hon. member asked how the price was arrived at, and I pointed out that consultations had taken place before that price was fixed. As the minister said yesterday, the 1943 crop in British Columbia was about one-quarter of normal. Speaking from memory, it was some 2,500,000 quarts as against about 5,500,000 quarts for the year before and some 10,000,000 quarts for the preceding year. There was no price ceiling on berries last year, and to use a slang phrase, the berry growers in British Columbia went to town with their prices. I do not blame them, but the fact is that they got a very good price for their berries last year. There was no ceiling in effect and average price received in 1943 by the berry growers of British Columbia was 33 cents per quart as against 12 cents per quart the preceding year.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: Do I understand you to say that the average price received for all berries was 33 cents?

Mr. ABBOTT: I am informed that the Dominion of Canada Department of Agriculture reports show that the average price received in 1943 by the growers in British Columbia was 33 cents a quart as against an average price of 12 cents a quart in 1942. In other words, it was better than two and a half times the price received in the preceding year, and, as the minister indicated yesterday, about four times the average price for the preceding four years.

I think the cost of production of agricultural products is probably one of the hardest things to determine, but it is a pretty fair indication as to whether a return is reasonable when the price set is double the prices received over an average period. It is true that the ceiling price fixed this year for British Columbia strawberries is about nine or ten cents below the 1943 prices, but, as I have indicated, those prices were more than double the 1942 prices. In the judgment of the board, and particularly of Mr. Chambers, who is the fruits and vegetable administrator, that was a fair price, both to the producer and to the consumer. I am afraid I cannot give any more information as to how the price was arrived at. If I had to make the decision I certainly would not have fixed a higher price.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: I should like to follow that question through. As I understand the parliamentary assistant he said that the average price received in British Columbia last year was 33 cents a quart.

Mr. ABBOTT: That is right.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: And he intimated that that is how they arrived at the figure.

Mr. ABBOTT: That was one factor that was taken into consideration in fixing what was thought to be a proper price this year. As I think the minister indicated yesterday British Columbia was the only province in which there was a roll-back of prices, to use the jargon of price control. It was thought that the prices last year in British Columbia had got so much out of line with prices in other parts of Canada that some roll-back was necessary.

Mr. CRUICKHANK: I am afraid that that is just what I expected the board would use in arriving at their prices. I appreciate the fact that the parliamentary assistant is not a berry man, although I think he knows a great deal more—

Mr. ABBOTT: It is not a question of berries; the same principle would apply to any other commodity.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: I think he has a great deal more experience with berries than any of the people on the board at that time.

Mr. ABBOTT: I have picked a lot in my time.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: The parliamentary assistant tells me that 33 cents was the average price. That is not correct. Last year only approximately ten per cent of the berries were sold at 33 cents. That is according to the board's own figures.

Mr. ABBOTT: I am taking the figures of the Department of Agriculture; I have no personal knowledge of this matter.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: I am speaking from personal knowledge and I defy the board to correct me in Hansard or anywhere else. Only approximately ten per cent of the berries were sold at that price. It is unfortunate that these officials over there do not know anything about growing or selling berries.

[Mr. Abbott.]

The CHAIRMAN: I am sure that every hon. member of the committee heard the same questions asked and the same answers given yesterday. After almost four months of discussion in committee I do not think there should be so much repetition. I know that is the sense of the members.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: When I am out of order I will appreciate being told.

The CHAIRMAN: It is not a question of being out of order. Surely the committee has reached a stage in the proceedings where there should not be so many repetitions.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: Mr. Chairman, I do not think I am repeating myself and I will have Hansard checked. The impression has been given to the committee that the berry farmers of British Columbia received an average of 33 cents a quart last year for their berries. That is absolutely incorrect, and I want to correct it. Only ten per cent were sold at that price. I shall quote some figures. In 1941 one factory at Haney shipped out 49,058 pounds of fruit in crates; last year, 1943, they shipped 7,017 pounds. Then they tell me that that is the average figure arrived at. Surely that cannot be the average figure arrived at. This is of vital importance, Mr. Chairman, to 3,000 berry farmers in the province of British Columbia. Now it is a question whether they keep their farms or not. This question could have been settled here in five minutes if the private members had been consulted before this order was brought down.

There is another thing about which I feel very keenly. It is not inflation to increase the price in Ontario and Quebec. Apparently Ontario and Quebec run Canada. Then in Nova Scotia, one particularly situated province where the price has been higher than in any other province in Canada, the price is increased—and that is not inflation! You can use your imagination.

Mr. RICKARD: When we began this discussion this afternoon, Mr. Chairman, we were on poultry, and we have since wandered to beef cattle, strawberries and the like. I was very much interested in what the hon. member for Prince Edward-Lennox had to say. I live not too far from him, and I know that in his county they have a real poultry show every year. I hardly understand how it was that these producers had to sell their poultry at the ungraded price. In our county for some years we have held a little poultry show; we have had a government grader come to the show to grade the poultry, and the poultry was all sold on that basis. If the producers mentioned had to sell their poultry ungraded, that was unfair. We have been educated for years to grow high-grade products, not only poultry but apples and all kinds of farm products, and surely we should be able to sell our products on a graded basis. While it does not come under the wartime prices and trade board, steps should be taken to see that the poultry is graded because the producers should not be compelled to sell poultry ungraded.

I hold no brief for the wartime prices and trade board. I do not think any hon. member does. This board brings possibly as much grief as any board we ever had.

Mr. REID: You can be assured of that.

Mr. RICKARD: But I believe in giving credit where credit is due. The board has done some things well; it has done a real job. When I have brought individual cases to their attention they have always been courteous and willing to consider the situation, and when they see the situation as we see it we get pretty good results. On the other hand, a great many of these men on the wartime prices and trade board know very little about the thing they are trying to control. I do not suppose you could find on the board a man who had any experience in the production end of agriculture.

Mr. ABBOTT: Mr. Grisdale.

Mr. RICKARD: While I appreciate the fact that the officials of the board will go to the federation of agriculture or some other organization for information and advice, at the same time from some of the decisions they give one must conclude that they know very little about what they are trying to control. But as I said before, they should be given credit where credit is due, and they have done some real good work.

There is too much spread between the producer and the consumer so far as poultry is concerned. There is no reason why the farmer should sell at 33 cents and the retailer sell at from 45 to 47 cents. That is too much of a spread. If the board is going to control prices it should step in and set the price at what the consumer has to pay.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Were you ever consulted by the board about anything?

Mr. RICKARD: No, but I have always been received courteously by the board, and any case that I have brought before them has received consideration.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: And no action.

Mr. RICKARD: Yes, action.

Mr. HATFIELD: Why is the price of fertilizer, especially orchard fertilizer, set at from one to two dollars higher in the maritime provinces than in the province of Quebec? In Nova Scotia, New Brunswick and Prince Edward Island the price was set at $34 a ton, and in Quebec $32.50 a ton. In Ontario the price was set at $34.50 a ton. The laid-down cost of the raw material is the same in every province and at all stations because the government pays the freight on the raw material.

Mr. ABBOTT: I will try to get that information.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Why is it that in the maritime provinces the wholesalers are said to be allowed a larger profit than in the other provinces? That was given to me as one of the reasons why the consumer paid a higher price in the maritime provinces than in any other province. I would like to know why these wholesalers were allowed a special profit.

Mr. ABBOTT: Is the hon. member referring to fertilizer?

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Yes.

Mr. ABBOTT: I have a memorandum here which I would like to look over before I give my hon. friend an answer.

The CHAIRMAN: The committee realizes that this subject has been lengthily discussed on the estimates of the Department of Agriculture and I believe that the answer which the parliamentary assistant may now be going to read is to be found in Hansard of a few weeks ago.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): We had better hear his answer.

Mr. ABBOTT: With reference to the question asked by the hon. member for Victoria-Carleton and the supplementary question asked by the hon. member for York-Sunbury, the point which the hon. member for York-Sunbury made probably has something to do with it. I am advised that the principal reason for the difference in prices in the maritime provinces and Quebec and Ontario is the difference in manufacturers' discounts to wholesalers, jobbers and retailers, which discounts were in effect during the basic period. All these prices are fixed on the basic period price.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): You see the inequity that arises from that.

Mr. HATFIELD: During the basic period the price of fertilizer in Nova Scotia, New Brunswick and Prince Edward Island was four dollars a ton less than in the province of Quebec because of the water rate.

Mr. ABBOTT: I am not familiar with the price of fertilizer during the basic period or to-day. I will try to get a little more information on the subject. I have a memorandum here which indicates, as was suggested by the hon. member for York-Sunbury, that the differential was based on the difference in discounts in the basic period.

Mr. HATFIELD: So far as discounts go, the volume is much heavier in the maritime provinces than in Quebec.

Mr. ABBOTT: I will get the information and give my hon. friend an explanation later.

Mr. KNOWLES: I should like to make a few general remarks in connection with the wartime prices and trade board. What I say will be critical but I trust that the parliamentary assistant and his officials will accept my suggestions as intended to be constructive.

I think we all must agree, despite the many criticisms we may make about the work and the administration of this board, that its job has been a very necessary and very important one in this time of war. As previous speakers have pointed out, difficulties have arisen largely because of the way in which the policies of the board have been administered. I feel that in particular the fault has been the failure of the board to win the confidence of the Canadian people, and I offer that criticism in the hope that the board might consider taking steps even at this late date to try to overcome that deficiency by winning the confidence of our people.

One thing that strikes me and a great many other people is the fact that apparently the government and its boards are always right. It does not matter what question is asked or what complaint is made; the government, or a board as in this case, always has an answer which is supposed to set aside the complaint. It seems to me that one means of gaining the confidence of the Canadian people in the activities of this board would be for the board to admit that this is a terrific problem which they have undertaken, that the board is faced with difficulties, and that it needs the help and the understanding of the people.

Let me quote one or two examples. Until last fall, one of a number of restrictions which the wartime prices and trade board had imposed was that very silly one against two pairs of trousers with a man's suit and also prohibiting cuffs on a man's trousers; and as hon. members on the Liberal side of the house will recall, suddenly, following a meeting of the National Liberal Federation in Ottawa last fall, that order was changed.

Mr. ABBOTT: Pure coincidence.

Mr. KNOWLES: "Pure coincidence", of course. Similarly with the other relaxations which were effected at that time.

[Mr. Abbott.]

Mr. ABBOTT: What were those?

Mr. KNOWLES: Such as rubber. I know that Liberal members of the house rather set aside what the parliamentary assistant has said, by claiming credit for what was done—

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Surely, they have, all over the country.

Mr. KNOWLES: —because of the fuss they raised on that occasion. I suggest that that kind of thing does not build up confidence on the part of the people in the board's decisions.

Another matter is that of deterioration in the quality of goods. During the course of this war, as the cost of living has gone up—though admittedly kept in control by the board as compared with what happened during the last war—one of the things which people in general and housewives in particular have tried to point out is that there was a deterioration in quality. We have raised the matter on the floor of this chamber, and last year and the year before the Minister of Finance, of course, always had an answer—there had not been any deterioration in quality which the wartime prices and trade board had not taken into consideration. Well, the parliamentary assistant can make the statement again to-day, but the housewives of the country find it difficult to believe; and I am simply suggesting that if, in the propaganda the board puts out, in the radio talks, in its general appeals to the public, it would go so far as to admit that some of these unfortunate things have occurred, perhaps it would win some of the confidence which is so necessary for it in its difficult job.

The same is true in connection with the increase in the cost of living, another point which has been raised here a number of times. Material is always produced to prove that it has not risen any higher than the indices show, despite what the housewife and the average citizen may know. It does not seem to me that it is ever to the disadvantage of a government to tell the whole truth and nothing but the truth. Not only is that true with respect to the matters which I have mentioned but also with respect to the supply of goods available. From time to time hon. members representing different sections of the community have mentioned the shortage of clothing for people in the farming communities, or the shortage of baby clothing, and so on, and the minister or his parliamentary assistant always had an answer; the government is always quite efficient and always doing a perfect job.

Mr. ABBOTT: Oh, no; we never laid claims to perfection—never.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): You never admitted an error.

Mr. ABBOTT: Yes; I have admitted errors on occasions too.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Never.

Mr. ABBOTT: We certainly never laid claims to perfection.

Mr. KNOWLES: Any errors are always fully explained and fully accounted for. I suggest that this kind of thing, along with the example I quoted of the board's orders being changed when a little Liberal political pressure was put on, does not warrant the confidence which the board needs in its job.

Here is another example of what makes the people of this country wonder what is going on. I hold in my hand an advertisement which was clipped from the Winnipeg Free Press of April 17 of this year. It displays four ladies' handbags on sale in a large department store in the city of Winnipeg. The prices are quite modest; here is one for $47, another one for $75, another for $85, and one for $100. Supposedly luxury goods are not being produced, not being made available; people are being asked not to squander any surplus funds they have on unnecessary things, yet such articles are on the counters; and this is typical of many kinds of luxury goods which are still available.

Mr. ABBOTT: Are these imported or domestically produced?

Mr. KNOWLES: They are imported, but are made available in this country, and people are allowed to go ahead and purchase such luxury goods.

Mr. ABBOTT: There is a big tax on them.

Mr. KNOWLES: People generally have the notion that the job of the wartime prices and trade board and the aim of government policy in general are to avoid the spending of money on luxury goods, so as to get down to the real business on hand. It seems to me that this sort of thing should be avoided if at all possible, and that when it is not, it works against the success of the job which the wartime prices and trade board is trying to do. This advertisement appeared, I might say, at a time when the victory loan drive was being launched. I saw it myself in Winnipeg papers which I receive every day, and it also came to me from several correspondents in Winnipeg who were quite incensed when they saw this advertisement in the papers.

I offer this suggestion in a critical vein; at the same time I do it in what I hope is a constructive manner, because I feel there is yet a long pull ahead as regards the price control policy of the government, and if the board is to do its work effectively, in the light of the criticisms which the parliamentary assistant is getting from all over the chamber to-day—most heatedly from his own side—it must take every step to win the confidence of the people, and I trust that the parliamentary assistant will take seriously and pass on to his officials the suggestions which I have made.

Mr. JOHNSTON (Bow River): I should like to make a small correction of the statement I made a few moments ago to the parliamentary assistant as regards bank charges for accounts established in respect of coupons. I stated that I had received a letter from the department. That is not so; I got letters from some of my constituents in this regard, and I was intending to write to the minister's department, but I recalled that the question had been asked at a previous time. I therefore telephoned the returns officer, and together we found in Hansard where this question was asked. I should like to read the answer; for all practical purposes it was the same as I indicated to the minister a while ago. The report is to be found on page 1990, March 30, 1944. It is in answer to the hon. member for Eglinton, who asked, with reference to gasoline coupon rationing, what service the banks render and what remuneration would be received. It is stated:

> The basis of payment is as follows: 25 cents per account opened; 6 cents per debit or credit entry; 12 cents per 1,000 coupons handled. The basis of these charges is subject to review following an analysis to be made within a few months after gasoline rationing coupon banking becomes effective.

I would suggest, while we are on this subject, that this is a very substantial return for the banking service rendered. I was amazed when I looked up the answer to this question and found how exceedingly generous was the remuneration for this service. I think the committee will be really interested to know, when the parliamentary assistant brings down his final statement, the amount of money that is to be paid to the banks for this service. It seems to me it will be tremendous.

Mr. ABBOTT: As I said a moment ago I am going to get the information and give the hon. member a detailed answer on the coupon bank.

Mr. CARDIFF: I think the parliamentary assistant to the minister will admit that the object of the wartime prices and trade board was to control prices?

Mr. ABBOTT: And to assure adequate civilian supplies. It has a double function, remember.

Mr. CARDIFF: If it failed to control prices then it did not accomplish the object for which it was set up. Let us take the years 1928-29 and compare them with the present day. I think that would be a fair comparison. We had no wartime prices and trade board in 1928-29, and yet we find in those years that the price of cattle was higher and the price of beef lower than it is at the present time. I cannot give the figures but I could get them from the statistics. But the price of cattle this year is lower and the price of beef higher than it was in 1928-29.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Because there is a ceiling.

Mr. BRYCE: I do not wish to cover any of the ground that has been already covered, but I wish to add to what the hon. member for Prince Edward-Lennox said in regard to the price of poultry. Does the department take into consideration the grade? If that is not taken into consideration the grade can be stepped up at any time with a resulting loss to the farmer. I want to be clear on that point.

Mr. ABBOTT: Does the hon. member want an answer to that now?

Mr. BRYCE: Yes.

Mr. ABBOTT: There is a most elaborate scale of prices for poultry, depending upon the grades, starting with special, grade A, grade B, and so forth. It varies with the different parts of the country. It is all contained as a schedule to administrative order A-893. The schedule of ceiling prices covers a full page and fixes special ceiling prices for different grades of poultry such as special grade, milk-fed; grade A, milk-fed; grade B, milk-fed; special grade A; grade B; grade C, and so on, with different ceilings for each recognized grade as defined by the Department of Agriculture.

Mr. BRYCE: Does the inspector see that the grade goes to the consumer?

Mr. ABBOTT: That poultry is inspected and graded, of course, by an inspector of the Department of Agriculture. The wartime prices and trade board has nothing to do with that. On the point raised by the hon. member for Prince Edward-Lennox that it was not possible to get the poultry graded in the town of Napanee early in December because there were no inspectors there, I take it he would agree with me that if the poultry raisers had wished to do so they could have shipped the poultry to the packing plants and had them graded there and received the price for the grading. That is my advice.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): They could not bring them back to the show, though.

[Mr. Abbott.]

Mr. ABBOTT: I do not know whether they could show them or not, but they could ship them and get the graded price.

Mr. BRYCE: According to the statement of the parliamentary assistant to the minister, his department has nothing to do with seeing that the established grade is enforced; that is, if turkeys are sold, the men who get them cannot sell them as grade A if they were graded as B's?

Mr. ABBOTT: The grading of poultry is clearly the function of the Department of Agriculture, and their inspectors establish the grade. If the poultry has been classified as grade A and the dealer attempts to sell them as special grade A, if our enforcement officers can catch him they would prosecute him. The wartime prices and trade board is charged with the responsibility of enforcing the ceiling. The ceilings are based on the grade of the particular bird that is being sold. If a dealer has purchased grade B and fraudulently attempts to sell it as grade A, the wartime prices and trade board would endeavour through its inspectors to catch him, and if he is caught they will prosecute him.

Mr. BRYCE: There is no law or order set up to make sure that the farmer's grade goes through to the consumer?

Mr. ABBOTT: He is entitled to get the price which is fixed for the grade of poultry that he is selling. If he sells to a wholesaler and his poultry is graded grade A, he is entitled to get grade A wholesale prices.

Mr. BRYCE: I understand that, but there is no protection from the farmer to the consumer to ensure that the middleman cannot raise a B to an A. Your department does not do anything about it, to see that a man does not get away with that.

Mr. ABBOTT: That is a very serious offence. It applies to any commodity that is subject to grading. I do not know what my hon. friend means by "protection". The law is there. If it is broken and the offender is caught, he is prosecuted. That is the only answer I can give. It is a serious offence to alter the grades of poultry or any other agricultural product which is graded in accordance with the requirements of the Department of Agriculture.

Mr. BRYCE: My point is that it is as essential to see that the grades are maintained as that the price is maintained. When you alter the grades you alter the price. As far as ungraded poultry is concerned, progressive farmers think that field is the happy hunting-ground for private enterprise.

I do not wish to cover the ground gone over by the hon. member for Souris, but I should like to add a little to what he said. Under the regulations to-day the farmer is deducted $3.50 for one pound overweight of pork. Those regulations have been set up by the wartime prices and trade board.

Mr. ABBOTT: I should like to say that the wartime prices and trade board covers a very wide field, but it has nothing to do with the grading of pork products. I would suggest that my hon. friend direct his inquiries and criticisms to the Minister of Agriculture when he is here, because certainly I, personally, am not competent to deal with questions involving the grading of pork. The wartime prices and trade board has no control whatsoever over them.

Mr. BRYCE: Perhaps I am all mixed up here. The wartime prices and trade board appointed the meat board.

Mr. ABBOTT: No; the Department of Agriculture set up the meat board.

Mr. BRYCE: No; it comes under the wartime prices and trade board.

Mr. ABBOTT: No; it has nothing to do with the board. We have enough headaches of our own.

Mr. BRYCE: Donald Gordon was the man who dominated things in the meat board in Manitoba, and if he is in the wartime prices and trade board he is not in the Department of Agriculture.

Mr. ABBOTT: I am advised that the meat board—

Mr. BRYCE: If the parliamentary assistant says that his department has nothing to do with it I have to take it.

Mr. ABBOTT: I am advised, and I know it to be a fact, that the Canadian meat board was created and set up last June under the Department of Agriculture by order in council. There is nothing in this appropriation which has anything to do with the Canadian meat board.

Mr. GAUTHIER: I put a question on the order paper about a man by the name of J. K. Smith, truck controller in the province of Quebec. I received an answer from the parliamentary assistant to the minister on May 22, 1944. My questions were as follows:

1. Is Mr. J. K. Smith, truck controller for the province of Quebec, an employee of the dominion government or a dollar a year man?

The answer is:

An employee of the dominion government, wartime prices and trade board.

2. In either case, since when?

The answer is:

May 1, 1942.

3. What was his previous occupation?

The answer is:

From 1900 to 1920, Mr. Smith was engaged in various phases of freight traffic handling, becoming in 1918 assistant to the general traffic manager of the freight tariff bureau of the Canadian National Railways. In 1920 he joined the Acadia Sugar Refining Company, Montreal, as traffic manager, and in 1922 was appointed manager of the transportation bureau, Montreal board of trade, from which organization he is presently on loan to this board.

4. Will a bilingual employee be appointed in his stead?

The answer is:

No appointment is necessary as the position is now filled.

The majority of the people of the city of Montreal speak the French language. This parliament passed a law—I do not remember the year, but the measure was sponsored by the hon. member for Quebec-Montmorency—under which the government is obliged, in making appointments to governmental organizations, to appoint men who speak the language of the majority of those living in the locality. Mr. Smith does not speak one word of French. If he can speak it he does not want to do so. When he is mad at something; when he differs with a visitor over a matter of policy, be it fascism or anything else, he asks for the police and wants the visitor thrown out. The hon. gentleman must be aware of that.

Mr. ABBOTT: No, I am not, but I will look into it.

Mr. GAUTHIER: That is what he did with Mr. Fillion, secretary of the Catholic union of farmers in Quebec. The question went on:

5. If not, why not?

The answer is:

Mr. Smith's services are quite satisfactory and he has several French-speaking assistants.

Well, his services are not satisfactory. The government is obliged to appoint a man speaking the language of the majority of the people in the locality, and Mr. Smith does not speak French. Why do we have to fight all the time for details? We are not tired of fighting, but we do not like it. The government should take care of that situation; it should pay heed when representations are made by serious people in regard to employees who are not able to speak both languages, especially in the province of Quebec. Imagine a government employee in Toronto or Winnipeg speaking French and not a word of English, able to give satisfactory service because he had English-speaking assistants!

He would not last very long. Why should we be expected to put up with this sort of thing in Quebec? I know the hon. gentleman speaks French, so that I should like to read an article which appeared in Le Droit of Tuesday, May 23.

Mr. ABBOTT: Le Devori?

Mr. GAUTHIER: No; Le Droit. It would not be too bad if it had been Le Devoir, because that newspaper represents a good portion of the opinion of Quebec.

(Translation): Such a thing would not happen in Ontario.

Some time ago, a French-language agricultural weekly, Le Terre de chez nous, upbraided Mr. J. K. Smith, director trucking in the province of Quebec under the dominion government. It charged that official, among other things, with inefficiency in the performance of his duties, because of his ignorance of the language spoken by four-fifths of the people in the province of Quebec.

The matter had an echo in the house—

That relates to my question.

Here is the reply made by the government on Monday. Mr. J. K. Smith has been employed by the Canadian government on the staff of the wartime prices and trade board since May 1, 1942.

The reply I have quoted a few moments ago is then given. The article goes on:

Of course, such a thing would not happen in Ontario. It would never occur even to the dominion government to appoint a director of trucking who could only speak French, and if, against all possibility, that was done and should the government, in reply to a question asked by a member in that connection, state that the said director had assistants who spoke English, the representatives of the Ontario people in Ottawa would surely not accept such an explanation. An uproar would be raised against the action of the government and the latter would hasten to rectify their blunder.

(Text):

So that I ask the parliamentary assistant if this situation will be cleared up, if Mr. Smith will be replaced. It is only fair to the people of Quebec, to the farmers of that province, that we have in Montreal a chief speaking both languages, or at least the language of the majority. French is official, as well as English, and we hope the government will listen to our representations. I trust the parliamentary assistant will look into the matter seriously, because we will come back.

Mr. ABBOTT: Well, Mr. Chairman, I know Mr. Smith slightly, but I do not know whether his knowledge of French is good or bad. I was under the impression that he spoke both languages.

Mr. GAUTHIER: Well, then, he does not want to speak French.

Mr. ABBOTT: As to that I cannot say. Mr. Smith has had a long experience in the transportation business, as was indicated in the answer to the question asked by my hon. friend.

Mr. GAUTHIER: I do not deny that.

Mr. ABBOTT: Mr. Smith knows the work thoroughly, and I am advised that he has several French-speaking assistants. My hon. friend will realize that these special war jobs are not permanent positions in the civil service, to which men are appointed for a period of years. Many of these positions are filled by men who are on loan because of their special technical qualifications, and I believe that is the case with Mr. Smith. Because of his special knowledge of transportation problems he was appointed transport controller, or whatever it is, in the province of Quebec. I have no knowledge of the instances mentioned by my hon. friend of alleged discourtesy on the part of Mr. Smith toward people who came to see him, but most certainly I will make inquiries and see what there is in that particular charge. I have here a letter which was written by L'Association du Transport Interurbain Inc. of Montreal, signed by the secretary, Mr. Archambault, and addressed to the chairman of the board, with reference to Mr. Smith, and I should like to read it to the committee to indicate how his services are viewed by one association in Montreal, at any rate. The letter is as follows:

Mr. Donald Gordon,
Chairman,
Wartime Prices and Trade Board,
490 Sussex street,
Ottawa, Ont.

Dear Sir:

Our association has learned with the greatest surprise that certain representations have been made regarding the present controller of transport at Montreal, Mr. J. K. Smith.

Our association feels that Mr. J. K. Smith has been doing his utmost to uphold the interest of the public in general and to carry out the regulations that have been imposed by the prices and trade board in order to control the business of transportation by truck and assist in the conservation of gasoline and tires.

It is obvious, in our opinion, that certain individuals feel that the present restrictions impose a hardship upon them and that the controller of transport should be the person to blame.

It has been resolved by the directors of our association to forward you an expression of their opinion to the effect that Mr. J. K. Smith has been serving the best interests of the public and that they do not recommend any change in this appointment.

Yours most truly,
Association du Transport Interurbain Inc. per C. Archambault,
Secretary.

The letter is dated May 20, 1944. As my hon. friend knows, I am just as anxious as anyone in this house or this country to have both languages spoken, and my hon. friend knows that my own facility in his native tongue is reasonably good.

I really deprecate that, in the case of a man who is doing a war job such as Mr. Smith is doing, and doing it well, according to my information, putting it on the basis that because he is operating in the province of Quebec, where admittedly the majority of the people speak French, that being their mother tongue, he must also speak French. I am not satisfied that he has not some knowledge of French, although I daresay, like a good many English-speaking Canadians in the province of Quebec, his knowledge of that language is not as good as it should be. Nevertheless, I venture to say that he understands French and probably understands it pretty well. He may not be able to converse in the language as fluently as he would like, but I have no doubt that he does understand it. That is about all I have to say. As regards the direct question which my hon. friend has put, as to whether Mr. Smith will be replaced or not, my answer at the moment is no.

Mr. GAUTHIER: I do not deny the ability of Mr. Smith, and I hope the parliamentary assistant does not deny that an official of any department should be obliged to speak the language of the majority of the people in the locality.

Mr. ABBOTT: Perhaps I should point out that, according to my understanding, this is not a civil service appointment. Mr. Smith was appointed, as many were appointed to these war jobs, by order in council and not on the recommendation of the civil service commission.

Mr. GAUTHIER: Then the parliamentary assistant says that Mr. Smith, not being a civil employee, is not compelled to speak French?

Mr. ABBOTT: I shall have to verify this. I understand that this is not a civil service appointment.

Mr. GAUTHIER: If Mr. Smith understands French he should not get mad when anyone speaks French to him. He does not have to throw people out, and that is what he did. He called for the police. I do not deny his ability, but I deny his courtesy toward people who have dealings with the farmers. All the farmers in Quebec do not speak English, though a great many of them do. I repeat, no member of this house from the English-speaking provinces would stand for such a situation, and they would be right. Why should we have to stand for it?

Mr. ABBOTT: I promised my hon. friend that I would look into the statements he has made as to Mr. Smith's attitude toward people who came to see him. I have no knowledge of that myself.

Mr. GAUTHIER: I hope my hon. friend will look into it.

Mr. ABBOTT: I take it that my hon. friend is giving this on hearsay; he was not present at the interview.

Mr. GAUTHIER: I was not present but I have letters that prove it is true. Mr. Fillion of "Terre de Chez Nous" wrote himself that he had to go out of Mr. Smith's office, and we can believe Mr. Fillion as well as anyone else.

Mr. ABBOTT: I am not questioning Mr. Fillion's word. I am saying that I shall have the matter looked into.

Mr. GAUTHIER: It is not hearsay on my part.

Mr. MacKENZIE (Lambton-Kent): The matter I am about to discuss should perhaps be brought up under a subsequent item, but seeing that we have wandered all over the place, perhaps it will not be objected to if I attempt to discuss it at this moment. I do not suppose there has been a session in the last forty years when at some time or another the question of sugar has not been considered in its many ramifications. One of the things that strikes me as peculiar, looking back over the records, is that the speeches as reported in Hansard ten and fifteen years ago on this question resemble the speeches of the last few years. This subject was debated at some length during the last session and it has been brought up once or twice again this year. During the years from 1930 to 1935 the question of sugar, in its relation to the sugar-beet industry particularly, was debated at considerable length and a special subcommittee was appointed in that period, from the standing committee on agriculture and colonization, to make a study into the sugar-beet industry and to report to the government of the day. An exhaustive study of the subject was made at that time. The records show that it was conducted here over many weeks and many witnesses were brought here, growers as well as refiners. After a thorough study of the subject they submitted to the house a report from which I will read a portion of the final analysis that was presented:

> Your committee therefore recommends that in view of the existing tariff on sugar and in consideration of the substantial payments being made to agriculture and labour by the beet sugar factories at present in operation, the cane sugar refineries should undertake to provide for a gradual increase in factory facilities for the refining of beet sugar in Canada, and that, with the additional advantages in freight rates to points in the middle west, heretofore described, factory facilities should now be steadily increased in western areas where beets are grown, and thereby make it possible to produce from beets a more substantial percentage of the sugar consumption of Canada.

On March 20, when the subject was discussed in the house, the hon. member for Qu'Appelle (Mr. Perley) read that statement into the record. The hon. member is no doubt a loyal party follower and it rather amused me to read this statement he made in connection with it:

I read from that report to show that the government of that day and the agriculture committee of that day were ready to encourage the production of beet sugar in Canada. Since that time there has been a considerable increase in the production of beet sugar in Manitoba. There is a splendid refinery located there and I suggest to all hon. members that they visit it. It is one of the best in Canada and it has great possibilities. I say these few words to show that the party of that day was interested in increasing the beet sugar industry of Canada.

There is no doubt that the majority of the members of the committee were taken from the government in power. That was the normal thing to do. But actions speak louder than words and there was no evidence that the party in power was favourable to the production of beet sugar, because nothing was ever done by the federal government to encourage that industry. At that time a delegation came from Lambton to interview the Prime Minister of the day because they could visualize another refinery or two in that part of the country. They had an interview with the Prime Minister of that day and he was quite conversant with the sugar-beet industry. They said that he talked intelligently on the subject, but he gave them the old stock in trade, which is given by a great many people: "You may rest assured that we shall go over this matter very carefully and give it every consideration."

At that time the beet-sugar industry was at a very low ebb. The price of sugar was very low, and naturally the contract price of beets would be based on the wholesale price of sugar. There were many reasons for that. During the war of 1914-18 sugar production in the cane districts increased tremendously to take care of the sugar demands of the world. The beet industry in Europe at that time was very much disrupted and was out of production. After the war the sugar-beet industry came back into production and the cane industry kept up production with the result that there soon developed a world surplus of sugar. This became quite acute and in 1922-23 sugar became so cheap that it could be purchased in some of the cane sugar countries at as low as fifty-five cents a hundred pounds. That was a very low price and it was almost impossible to compete against it. In 1936 the retail price of sugar in our western districts was $4.80 a hundred or $3.80 a hundred without the excise tax. A conference was called to consider the world supply of sugar and, as was mentioned the other night in the house, this was held in London from April 5 to July 6. Twenty-two countries were summoned to the conference, and I have the report before me. I should like to read an item or two from the report as follows:

The summoning of the international sugar conference was the direct outcome of efforts which originated in the world of the world monetary and economic conference which met in London in June-July, 1933. The economic commission of that conference devoted special and detailed attention to the problem of securing better coordination in the production and marketing of staple foodstuffs and raw materials and the application of the principle to individual commodities—one of which was sugar—was considered by special subcommittees appointed for the purpose.

Most of the countries represented were either producers or large consumers of sugar. Canada was not particularly interested in the production of sugar or in the curtailment of production to keep in line with world demand, so that the Canadian representative did not sign the agreement that was arrived at. I quote from the report:

Mr. Massey stated that after a necessarily hasty examination of the convention, the Canadian government regretted that it had not found it possible to authorize signature at present. Canada was, of course, sympathetic with the conference's desire to avert uneconomic production but her position at the conference as an importer and consumer of sugar was so different from that of almost all other countries, that the Canadian government desired a further period of time to study the effect of the specific proposals of the convention on that position, and in the light of that study to decide whether it would be possible to accede later.

The votes allocated to Canada were given to the United Kingdom and the United States. The amount of sugar produced by Canada at that time was a mere bagatelle when compared with the world's needs. Prior to that time Canada had with Great Britain a treaty known as the British West Indies treaty which took care of the sugar supply of Canada. That treaty was revamped and reshaped in 1925 or 1926. Under the terms of the treaty sugar from the British West Indies was given $1 per 100 pounds preference over all other sugar imported into Canada, with the result that practically all the sugar we imported came from the British West Indies. This treaty was a perennial treaty in that it could be terminated only by either country giving twelve months notice of termination. It was suggested by the Canadian officials that the treaty was out of date, that Canada was not getting equal value by the terms of the treaty, and the result was that in 1938 Canada gave notice that she wished to terminate the treaty and that a new arrangement should be arrived at.

At that time the then Minister of Finance referred the question to the tariff board for inquiry and report. Hearings were held in Ottawa during the summer of 1938. During those hearings reference was made to the possibilities of the sugar beet industry. The board was headed by the late Mr. Justice Sedgewick, and hearings were held in the justice building. Before the report could be submitted war was declared and nothing further was done.

After the declaration of war in 1939 Great Britain took over all British empire supplies of sugar and appointed a sugar controller by the name of Sir William Rook. Shortly after that time Canada appointed Mr. S. R. Noble as sugar controller. I do not know how he came to be appointed, but I do know that he had considerable experience in Cuba in connection with the sugar industry. The point I want to make is that up to that time there had been no encouragement given to the sugar beet industry by any federal government in peace time.

Nevertheless the sugar beet industry did develop. One of the first refineries in Canada was established at Wallaceburg in 1903 with the help of a provincial subsidy. About three years ago a refinery was established in Winnipeg also with the help of provincial support or subsidy. In 1944 a refinery will go into production in Quebec which also has the support of the provincial government. In spite of all handicaps the number of sugar-beet refineries in Canada has grown and to-day there are six modern refineries.

There are two refineries in Ontario which have a processing capacity of 45,000 acres and a total aggregate sugar producing capacity at normal yield of around 110,000,000 pounds. The two refineries in Alberta have a capacity of 35,000 acres, and would have a normal yield of around 110,000,000 pounds. The tonnage is a little higher in Alberta and the sugar content is a little higher. The refinery in Manitoba has a processing capacity of 20,000 acres with a sugar capacity of around 32,000,000 pounds. The refinery in Quebec, which will come into production this year, has a processing capacity of around 20,000 acres with a total production of 35,000,000 pounds.

If we had our total possible maximum production of sugar this year, from 120,000 acres, it would total around 287,000,000 or 290,000,000 pounds. The normal requirements of Canada are around 1,100,000,000 pounds, so that we would still require about 813,000,000 pounds to be imported to meet our needs. In a normal year that would be about one-quarter of our total requirements, but under our rationing system it would be approximately one-third of our requirements.

Since the United States entered the war Canada and that country have cooperated in connection with the supply of sugar. At the moment our principal supply is from Cuban sources. During the last war our main sources of supply were Sumatra, Java, Malaya, the Dutch Indies, and the Philippines, all of which are now under Japanese control. According to the authority of Sir William Rook, the world reserve of sugar is gradually fading away. In 1942 this reserve was 3,000,000 tons; in 1943 it was 2,000,000 tons; in 1944 it was 1,000,000 tons, and it is expected that in 1945 our reserve of sugar will be practically used up. In other words, we shall be starting from scratch.

I have a press release which was issued on April 20 by the wartime prices and trade board, which reads:

> Warning that world supplies of sugar are so short that larger rations may not be expected for the first year or two after the war was given recently by Sir William Rook, British sugar controller, during discussions with wartime prices and trade board officers.
> Not only is there no surplus of sugar in the world to-day but the present supply is insufficient to meet even essential needs without strictly rationing, Sir William said. He termed "incomplete and inaccurate" the view that all that is lacking is enough shipping space to transport sugar from producing to consuming countries.

In Ontario to-day we have a pretty fair contract for the sugar-beet growers, especially when compared with other days. During the depression days the price was around $4.50 to $5 per ton, and a fair price would be a minimum of $9 per ton. On a sixteen per cent beet it would be $11 a ton, and on eighteen per cent beet $12.20 a ton. Labour costs are very high in Ontario and in all beet producing districts. The cost of hand labour for thinning, hoeing and harvesting would be $30 per acre; seed $2.25 per acre; fertilizer $3 per acre; delivery $12.25 per acre, making a total of $47.50.

Mr. MacNICOL: Has the hon. member the additional cost in Alberta for the delivery of irrigation water?

Mr. MacKENZIE (Lambton-Kent): I shall have that a little later. If we have an average crop of ten tons of beets to the acre in Ontario, and that has been a fair average over the years, at $9 a ton the gross return would be $90 per acre, from which deduct total costs of $47.50 and you have a net profit of $43.50 per acre, which should be the profit in a normal year. That does not include the farmer's own work, the cost of the land or anything he may do in connection with cultivating the land, so that the profit would not be very high.

Mr. MacNICOL: How is the Ontario farmer able to compete with the Alberta farmer whose beets have an eighteen per cent sugar content?

Mr. MacKENZIE (Lambton-Kent): The sugar content in Ontario last year was eighteen per cent. There is not a great deal of difference in that respect.

Mr. MacNICOL: I understood the hon. member to say twelve per cent sugar content in Ontario.

Mr. MacKENZIE (Lambton-Kent): Ten tons to the acre of eighteen per cent beets at $12.20 per ton would give a good gross yield. That includes subsidies. The Ontario government this year provided a subsidy of $1.55 a ton to the beet growers, and the beet growers appreciate that. The Ontario minister of agriculture, when presenting his bill to the house last winter, announced, according to press reports, that the government felt obliged to assist the beet industry in Ontario because the federal government would do nothing. That statement is hardly correct. It would have been correct for him to say that the federal government refused to give any more assistance to the beet industry at this time because they have already given two subsidies in the last two years. The first subsidy of half a cent a pound was given in 1942 on the price of refined sugar, and most of that subsidy went to the producer, though not all. There is a straight half a cent a pound subsidy because there was a stabilization fund built up after the outbreak of the war which the stabilization corporation has in what they call their inner reserve. Like the banks' inner reserves, we do not know what that reserve is, but they have this inner reserve. The second subsidy of half a cent a pound was given on February 1, 1944. This all went to the producer. A ton of beets that would have a test of eighteen per cent sugar content would run close to 300 pounds of sugar to the ton. That would mean close to $3 a ton subsidy from the federal government. The federal subsidies apply to all beets produced in Canada. Alberta probably gets a little better price for her sugar, but they have added freight rates and higher sugar prices; and after all the contract price of beets is based on the selling price of sugar. Sugar is selling in the retail stores to-day at eight cents a pound, which with one cent off for excise tax would make it seven cents.

The outlook for the Ontario crop is not too good, for many reasons. Labour is quite a problem. The crop must compete for labour with other crops in the district, such as corn, tobacco, beans, tomatoes. Mechanized equipment can be used for many of these other crops, whereas a lot of the work of growing beets must be done by hand. Ontario has a total capacity of 45,000 acres for growing beets. But I do not think we shall have more than 15,000 to 18,000 acres in beets in Ontario this year.

We have two refineries in Ontario, one in Wallaceburg and one in Chatham, both of which should operate at full capacity.

It is a mistaken idea that if we produce 290,000,000 pounds of sugar in Canada we shall have all the sugar we need, because all this sugar must go into the pool and be allocated by rationing. It is estimated that the Cuban yield will be 5 million long tons. If we produce our maximum amount of sugar and the United States produce their maximum amount of sugar, we probably could have our sugar ration increased.

Mr. MacNICOL: What is the United States maximum?

Mr. MacKENZIE (Lambton-Kent): Last year the United States had thirty-two beet refineries which never operated at all. This year they are trying to get them all into production. I am not sure how they are getting along. One of the things we tried to do to increase our sugar-beet production this year was to suggest to the wartime prices and trade board—I am going to find fault with the board in this matter because it seems the proper thing to do—

Mr. ABBOTT: It is fashionable at any rate.

Mr. MacKENZIE (Lambton-Kent): I feel that I should find fault with the board because the United States in order to increase its beet sugar production offered ration-free sugar to producers of beets. Anyone who produced one acre or more of sugar beets would get a free ration of sugar of twenty-five pounds per person. We made the suggestion to the wartime prices and trade board that a similar scheme should be adopted in Canada. The sugar controller was of the opinion that it would help.

Mr. MacNICOL: What does the hon. member mean by twenty-five pounds per person? Does he mean twenty-five pounds per person on the farm?

Mr. MacKENZIE (Lambton-Kent): On the farm. Each extra acre of beets would produce around forty hundredweight of sugar, and if there were four people in the family, that would mean four twenty-five pound lots of free-ration sugar for them. They would put forty extra hundredweight into the pool and take one hundredweight out. That would mean that there would be thirty-nine extra hundredweight in the sugar pool.

The chairman of the board said that that would be discriminatory. He asked, why should people in fruit districts in Niagara, for instance, not get as much sugar as the people who produced sugar beets in Kent, Lambton or Essex? It would be discriminatory in the narrow sense, but if you produced a good many more acres of sugar beets you would be producing a lot more sugar, and in the long run it would not be discriminatory. In the long run we would have a greater supply of sugar. We could have adopted that policy which they are following in the United States. It is too late to do it this year. It would not probably have affected large operators, but it would have induced a great many small farmers who are not in the sugar beet business to produce one or two acres in order to get the free-ration sugar. Each extra acre would put forty hundredweight into the pool and probably take one hundredweight out. I am anxious to see how it works out in the United States.

There is one other thing I would mention in closing. If we want to get the industry back on a sound basis and want the beet growers to have confidence in the refiners, the Department of Agriculture should provide inspectors to go through the plants when the processing season is on for three or four months in the fall of the year and test the beets so as to assure the growers that they are getting a proper test of sugar content. The question is raised, of course, that that may be true of cream and what-not, but the fact remains that cream producers have a choice of where they are going to send their product; the beet grower has none. I am quite sure that the refiners themselves would agree to that. It is the old story; people feel rightly or wrongly that the testing is all done by the refiners; there is no other way of shipping their beets; they must take it, whereas if the government had an inspector there to test those beets as they were processed and assure the growers that they were getting full value, it would do much to restore confidence on the part of the growers.

I believe that we can grow sugar to-day in Canada successfully and economically. The refinery in Wallaceburg has operated successfully since 1903. The only year that it did not operate was 1942, owing to the lack of sufficient beets. Costs of production can be greatly reduced, with the new system of planting, with new split seed, by which they avoid the clusters. They are doing away with all the back-breaking labour; in Idaho they have a mechanized outfit which will pull beets, top them and load them in one operation. If that is developed in this country, I believe the government would be well advised to hang on to the beet industry, because it will play an important part in the post-war world and will absorb some of the labour which is bound to be a problem in the years of reconstruction. I call on the government to give the industry every assistance. Here are the figures covering the two refineries in Ontario for the 1940 crop only:

To beet growers—cash paid for crop	$2,590,986
Supplies—coal, lime, bags, etc.	659,261
Freight to railways	380,332
Labour—Factory and office payroll	655,746
Total	$4,286,325

The industry, I feel, is one which the government would be well advised to keep in operation and give all the support it possibly can.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Before the committee takes recess I wish to ask one question with respect to the sugar stabilization fund. Perhaps the parliamentary assistant has not the information, but this is what I want to know. It will be recalled that in the earlier stages of the war the sugar controller bought all the stocks in hand from the refineries and sold them back at an advance of half a cent a pound. The result was that several million dollars were collected; I had the figure once, but I am not sure what it is; perhaps the parliamentary assistant will let us know. I wish to be informed as to the purpose of establishing that fund at that time; has the same practice been consistently followed out to the present time; how much, if anything, has been disbursed in the interim; and how much remains? I should like to have a break-down of the disbursements; because, after all, the price of sugar was raised to the consumer to take care of that special fund; it did not come from the government or out of taxation; it was taken from the consuming public, who paid it in every purchase that it made.

Mr. ABBOTT: If my hon. friend will let that question stand I will get the information.

At six o'clock the committee took recess.

After Recess

The committee resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. BLACK (Cumberland): I wish to bring before this committee a matter which comes under the heading of "administration", for which there is an appropriation of $15,600,000. Under this heading the board makes expenditures of $156,600,000. Then there are additional subsidies of over $70,000,000 for food products in the Department of Agriculture. The board deals with the cost of living down to empty beer bottles and I am expected to discuss beer bottles although I am not an authority on this article.

The liquor business is the biggest business in which the government of Nova Scotia deals. Last year total sales amounted to $15,324,147.68. In this sum is the enormous outlay of $7,699,497.85 for beer. It is estimated that the containers for this beer are estimated to be worth at least $1,000,000. The profits in handling the empties would be from $50,000 to $100,000 a year for the entire province. The wartime prices and trade board issued an order, No. A 236, in June, 1942, regulating the handling of liquor, wine and distillers' bottles, with no special reference to ale or beer bottles. This was a general order, I understand, applicable to the whole of Canada. It was cancelled soon after, since the supply of such bottles was sufficient to meet the needs of those requiring them.

On December 7, 1942, the wartime prices and trade board issued a further order, No. A-505, applicable only to the provinces of New Brunswick and Nova Scotia. It controlled the purchase, shipment and sale of the empty beer bottles in the two provinces. Prior to that they were sold without any control from the wartime prices and trade board and could be shipped out of the province. I am not objecting to that order if it were administered in the way it was intended so as to give producers of beer in those two provinces their requirements. New Brunswick administered this order in the spirit in which it was issued. They recognize nine dealers in the province, namely, Thomas Buraglia, Bathurst; A. Freedman and Son, Saint John; J. Omer Guidry, Campbellton; Hachey Bros., Chatham; Fred Levesque, Edmundston; W. G. McIntyre, Saint John; J. A. Robichaud, Rexton; G. Rubenstein, Chatham, and Harry Ruch, Moncton. In Nova Scotia no such condition prevailed. The orders of the wartime prices and trade board have been grossly abused, creating a monopoly under the control and for the profit and patronage of a notoriously partisan political friend of the government of Nova Scotia, namely, W. B. Moriarty, for the whole mainland of Nova Scotia. Complaint was made to me. About three weeks ago, after several efforts, I got in touch with the chairman of the board, Mr. Donald Gordon, over the telephone. I told him that I was getting complaints and as a member of parliament I would like to get some information and justification for the order. He said that he had had complaints ad nauseam, that he was leaving the matter to the authorities in Nova Scotia to justify and that he did not wish to discuss it with me.

I have been before the public for twenty years as a member of the provincial legislature and of this house. I was a minister of a department for over eight years. In all that period I was never treated with such discourtesy by an official. I am not going to blame Mr. Gordon altogether, because I feel that he was put into a position that he could not justify, and that, therefore, he did not wish to discuss it. That is the only explanation I can give of his treatment of me. I told him that I was a member of parliament and that I wanted information in order to understand the complaint. After that I put certain questions on the order paper and asked for the return of all correspondence, which I have received and been able to look over to-day. It was brought down by the parliamentary assistant to the minister yesterday. He very kindly spoke to me about it and asked me if the information in the answers to the questions and in the return were what I wanted. They are what I wanted but I have not had time to study them fully. I did notice, however, that in some of the correspondence reference is made to other correspondence on certain dates, and that correspondence is not on the file. At a later time I shall be able to go over it and see what additional information I require. I assume that the parliamentary assistant to the minister will see that I get it.

There is in this return of correspondence over eighty copies of correspondence and I have not had an opportunity to examine it thoroughly. I am now going to make a summary. First, there is the Minister of Finance. He is in charge. I understand he has general oversight of the wartime prices and trade board. I do not hold him responsible but I believe that he is being duped. Next, is the wartime prices and trade board under the chairmanship of Mr. Donald Gordon. Third in line of responsibility of handling these beer bottles in Nova Scotia is the chief commissioner of the liquor commission in the person of Mr. A. S. Mahon, of Halifax, who was a political appointee. As such I have no quarrel with him if he were administering the affairs of the province in peace time. But in administering a war order in war time under these circumstances, to prostitute the wartime prices and trade board as he has done, acting for Mr. Moriarty, I say it is discreditable to this war parliament, and I ask that he be dismissed from that position and that someone in whom the province of Nova Scotia and the country has confidence be appointed to administer that responsibility. I would suggest that Mr. Lee be appointed. He represents the board in Nova Scotia. I would favour his appointment or that of any capable man who has some sense of responsibility, free from political bias. W. Stanley Lee is the prices and supply representative of the wartime prices and trade board, Cunard building, Halifax, Nova Scotia. He would be satisfactory, or any man irrespective of politics who would administer these duties in time of war with some sense of responsibility. The fourth man in the line appointed by Mr. Mahon is Mr. W. B. Moriarty, president of the Provincial Bottle Exchange, Limited, who played outright politics and favouritism and does not represent that he does anything else. He does it for profit and he is doing it under the wartime prices and trade board. I hold the Minister of Finance responsible and I hold Mr. Gordon responsible. I hold all those who are over him responsible. This man Moriarty undertook to give instructions of a dictator as soon as the order was passed to those who were handling bottles in Nova Scotia. In New Brunswick they did not do that. They worked with those who had been in the business, but not so Nova Scotia. He made use of this order to put a legitimate dealer, with whom Mr. Moriarty was not in sympathy, out of business, a man who had the previous year shipped up to 200,000 dozen empty beer bottles out of the province and who the year prior to that had sold 170,000 dozen altogether, of which 110,000 were marketed in Nova Scotia and 60,000 exported. I have the exact figures of what was shipped during seven months of the year 1942, and it bears out the statement that I have made.

Now, when this order was put into effect Moriarty telephoned or got in contact with this firm, John Ross and Sons, that had been in the business which I have just described in Truro and told them that they were not permitted to ship any more. They had at that time 50,000 or 60,000 dozen bottles on hand. They had a carload loaded on the rails, but they could not get a permit to ship that one carload. They had to unload it, and they were forced to do so in the name of the wartime prices and trade board order.

Mr. ABBOTT: Moriarty is not an official of the wartime prices and trade board.

Mr. BLACK (Cumberland): He is, when they recognize him. The Minister of Finance recognizes Mr. Donald Gordon; Mr. Donald Gordon recognizes Mr. Mahon; Mr. Mahon appoints Mr. Moriarty as his representative on the mainland of Nova Scotia, and therefore I hold the Minister of Finance and his parliamentary assistant responsible.

Mr. ABBOTT: I shall reply in due course, when my hon. friend has finished, but I am just pointing out that Mr. Moriarty is not an official of the wartime prices and trade board.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): He is the only man allowed to buy bottles on the mainland. He has a monopoly.

Mr. BLACK (Cumberland): Mr. Ross wanted to come to an understanding with the wartime prices and trade board; he wanted to abide by the rules, and he endeavoured to obtain recognition. He continued to buy from his clients and accumulated a supply of almost one hundred thousand dozen bottles. He had $40,000 invested in these bottles and could not dispose of them. The question arose of what he was to do with them; he either had to go into bankruptcy or knuckle down; accordingly he knuckled down and came to terms with this man Moriarty in order to ship his stock on hand. This was shipped out of the province to Moriarty's orders at a profit to Moriarty of from $50 to $100 a car. His stock on hand ran to twenty-five cars or more at that time, with a very much larger quantity purchased afterwards. This man Moriarty never had to raise his finger, except to telephone and give shipping orders; yet he got a rake-off of $50 to $100 a car.

This order was passed under the plea that the bottles were required for the brewers in Nova Scotia and New Brunswick. That may be partly so. Mr. Ross was prepared to ship to the firm in Halifax, through Mr. Moriarty, but he wanted to ship out of the province to his own customers. Prior to this order A-505 he had been shipping a large quantity out of the province direct to brewers. When the order was put into effect he was completely cut off from that business and he either had to hold his goods or sell them to the firm of Moriarty. I have some correspondence here, giving further particulars with respect to this business. Prior to the original order of 1942 Mr. Ross was selling to firms in central Canada, and was sending a considerable quantity to Halifax by truck, handing them over to Mr. Moriarty. He was satisfied to do that, at a reduced price; he was getting a return load coming back, and the business was reasonably satisfactory. But while he was buying in his own territory he was being undermined and interfered with by Mr. Moriarty's other buyers. That was not sufficient to put him out of business, so that Mr. Moriarty or Mr. Mahon or those in authority were able to have this war-time order put into effect. I am now going to read from a letter dated June 26, 1942, to show the dictatorial manner in which this man Moriarty usurped the right to control the beer bottle business in Nova Scotia. The letter is addressed to Mr. Harry Ross, of John Ross and Sons, and I need not read it all:

> I want it definitely understood from this date that you are not to ship any bottles out of Nova Scotia and I want you to let me know how many bottles you have on hand at the present time. I don't wish to have any unpleasantness with you, and I ask your cooperation trusting it will work out to our mutual advantage.
> J. B. Moriarty,
> President.

On the letterhead is the "Provincial Bottle Exchange". Here is another letter dated June 17, 1942, I presume from the manager of Canadian Breweries of Quebec, telling the Ross firm that they require more empty beer bottles and indicating that they are prepared to continue to carry on business with them. I need not read the letter; it is available if needed.

Mr. ABBOTT: Are these letters being tabled?

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): The hon. member will hand them to you.

Mr. BLACK (Cumberland): Yes. I have a copy of a letter from Mr. Mahon to Mr. Rosenberg, deputy administrator of used goods, dated June 30, 1942, one paragraph of which reads:

> From the information I have Mr. Ross has only recently been active in the bottle business, and I really do not think we are doing him any injustice in appointing him a B dealer—

That is a dealer who has to sell his bottles at forty cents a dozen as against the ceiling price of forty-five cents a dozen.

—as I do not agree with his statement that the bottle business is his mainstay.

[Mr. P. C. Black.]

I do not think it is for Mr. Mahon or even for Mr. Donald Gordon or the minister to say that because a man has or has not been in business for a long time therefore he is not entitled to sell, during war time, an article that is being salvaged and that is required to carry on our war-time activities. The fact is that Mr. Ross claims he had been in this bottle business for ten years; that he was shipping bottles by the hundreds of thousands of dozens when this order was issued; yet he was refused a permit to ship his goods out of the province, so that unless he came to terms he was put out of business completely.

Here is a letter from Oland and Son, Limited, brewers and bottlers, dated May 5, 1942, addressed to Mr. S. Godfrey, used goods administrator. Oland and Son Limited control two breweries in Nova Scotia, and their main or only outlet is the Nova Scotia liquor commission. They have to be good; they have to do what they are told. They are told from whom they must buy their reclaimed bottles. There is an old saying that there are more ways of killing a cat than by choking it with butter. It was not necessary to have a war-time order to tell the Oland company or anyone else in the province from whom they would have to buy empty bottles. In any event they designate the Moriarty firm as the persons to act for them, and no one else would have any authority to sell beer bottles to a brewery in Nova Scotia. Here is a letter from Mr. H. S. Rosenberg, deputy administrator of used goods, dated May 19, 1942, and directed to Mr. A. S. Mahon. I need not read it all; but this is part of it:

> I am quite prepared to appoint you as our representative in respect of bottles in your province and to give you authority on our behalf to determine what beer bottles may or may not be shipped out of the province, and by whom they should be shipped. Do the Halifax Beverages handle liquor bottles for you? If so, will they now have to turn them over to Mr. Moriarty?

The business is completely in the hands of Mr. Mahon and Mr. Moriarty.

> If J. Ross handles liquor bottles, will he have to do the same? As far as we are concerned, if we appoint Messrs. Moriarty and Cohen—

Cohen is the representative appointed exclusively for the island of Cape Breton.

> —and it is our present intention to do so, all others handling bottles will have to dispose of them through and at the direction of the two authorized dealers. Mr. Cohen says that he is satisfied that Mr. Moriarty will treat the other bottle dealers fairly, and allow them good prices.

I need not read more of that letter. Here is another dated May 22, 1942, also addressed to Mr. A. S. Mahon, from the same gentleman, Mr. H. S. Rosenberg, reading in part as follows:

In my discussion with Mr. Ross I learned the following:

1. That for some years Mr. Ross has been in the business of reclaiming beer bottles.

2. That his place of business is about eight miles away from camp Debert.

3. That until recently he was paying the camp 30 cents per dozen for large bottles, and paying 5 cents per dozen to the man who arranged to get them, and that he was selling them to Mr. Moriarty for 40 cents per dozen.

4. That Mr. Moriarty has commenced to purchase direct from the camp himself, and that he has raised the camp price by 5 cents and Mr. Ross has had to meet this price. Both of them, incidentally, have broken the ceiling which was established in the basic period.

5. That Mr. Moriarty and Mr. Ross are apparently unable to arrive at a satisfactory arrangement between themselves.

6. That Mr. Ross, for his own protection, has had to arrange to sell bottles elsewhere.

7. That Mr. Moriarty is shipping bottles out of the province.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Moriarty?

Mr. BLACK (Cumberland): Yes, Moriarty. I go on:

. . . I was impressed with his sincerity and unselfishness and treated him as an unofficial representative of Mr. Moriarty and yourself. I must admit that when Mr. Ross left me I had the feeling that it was unfair for Mr. Moriarty to enter into Mr. Ross' territory and to outbid him for bottles, forcing him to pay 40 cents per dozen, and then naturally, refusing to pay Mr. Ross any more than that, thus leaving him in the position where he must either continue to pick up bottles and lose money for the privilege, or he must seek a market elsewhere. I felt, that having found the market elsewhere, it was unfair to prevent him from shipping the bottles out. I later learned that there was some feeling on both sides, and that the blame was by no means on one side alone.

The purpose, however, as I interpret it, was to drive Mr. Ross out of business. In the same letter the following appears:

The principle behind our desire to limit the number of authorized dealers is that we would like to find a small number of dealers with large facilities for sorting and handling bottles, and with facilities and equipment for washing bottles. We would then like those dealers to set up collection machinery in all the outlying districts and to pay the freight to bring the bottles in to their warehouses. We were hoping that that would be the case, not only with liquor bottles and wine bottles, but also with food bottles and pharmaceutical bottles as well. We are having pressure brought to bear on us by several members of parliament, asking us to appoint Halifax Beverages as an A. dealer. We are also having pressure brought on us on behalf of Mr. Whitzman. His name had originally been suggested by some of the distillers, and it had been placed on a few of our preliminary drafts.

I have one or two other quotations to read and I shall be through. There is a letter to A. S. Mahon dated July 24, 1942, addressed by Mr. Rosenberg:

I am sorry that you are being given so much trouble by Mr. Ross, but we are also being given trouble. Mr. Ross means nothing to this department. He is however, a citizen of the country, engaged in a certain business, and we have no more desire of hurting him and putting him out of business than of doing that to anyone else. We are anxious to continue existing channels. To put one man out and to put another man in is certainly not our function. I am very much interested in your statement that if I had followed your suggestions the bottle situation could have been cleared up some time ago.

I suppose that was to put Ross entirely out of business.

Naturally that is what I am very anxious to do. I have no knowledge of any suggestions of that type. If I have missed them, would you be good enough to write to me by airmail as to what your suggestions are that have not been followed.

I am proceeding immediately to draft an order in respect of beer bottles, and I shall submit it to you in draft form for your consideration and advice.

Mr. KINLEY: Who wrote that?

Mr. BLACK (Cumberland): H. S. Rosenberg, deputy administrator. Another letter I have here is dated October 31, 1942, addressed to Mr. Rosenberg and signed by A. S. Mahon, chief commissioner, Halifax:

We are in receipt of a letter from Messrs. John Labatt Limited in which they state that they have not received a fair distribution of empties from Nova Scotia. We placed before you as far back as May certain proposals which if they had been accepted I believe would have eliminated our troubles. Our organization that has been functioning in Nova Scotia for the past few years in connection with empties gave every satisfaction, and all that was necessary in my opinion was to make a few changes, which, as I previously stated, was placed before your department without any results.

Is it not about time that this matter was finalized, as the present arrangement is very unsatisfactory.

That is signed A. S. Mahon, giving dictatorial instructions to the administrator.

Here is another letter dated December 5, 1942, signed H. S. Rosenberg, deputy administrator, to John Ross and Sons, Truro, Nova Scotia:

Dear Sirs: We have your letter of December 1st.

That letter is not on file.

The only thing we can say to you is that if you can sell your bottles in Ontario and Quebec, and not in the maritimes, we have no objection to your doing so. Apparently there is no great shortage of bottles in the maritimes at this time, and a number of the brewers in Quebec and Ontario feel that they have not received a proper portion of the maritime bottles for some time.

That indicates the willingness of Mr. Rosenberg and some of those in the wartime prices and trade board to recognize that Mr. Ross, as a Canadian citizen engaged in this bottle business, and having a large stock on hand, had a right to ship them, and they were disposed to grant him that right.

There is one more letter from which I wish to read some quotations. It is dated February 22, 1943.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): From whom?

Mr. BLACK (Cumberland): It is from R. Geddes addressed to Mr. A. S. Mahon. I quote:

Dear Mr. Mahon:

Developments in the functioning of our order A-505, respecting empty beer bottles, have been such that the question of rescinding it and allowing the trade in these goods to return to the basis on which it was conducted prior to the adoption of our order arises.

The order was instituted, as you know, to ensure an equitable distribution of empty beer bottles collected in your province and in New Brunswick and, in particular to ensure that the supply for local breweries was not drawn away to central Canada markets where excessive demands for beer and potentially limited production of new bottles were then indicated. It was not intended that the order would become an instrument for immobilizing hundreds of thousands of bottles in the hands of a collector or collectors and place them in storage where they are neither at the disposal of your local brewers nor of the central Canada brewers.

That has, however, happened, not because of the order itself but of the administration of it—

I would emphasize that—"not because of the order itself but because of the administration of it."

—which has become entwined with informal arrangements for bottle collection and distribution which had been operative in your province but were neither recognized nor ratified by this order of ours. The order was designed, as mentioned above, to ensure equitable distribution of bottles and, since it is not doing so, but rather achieving the reverse, the question of rescinding it logically arises.

If the situation which now prevails in respect of these bottles is carried to its ultimate, huge stocks of bottles are going to be withdrawn from use and brewers' stocks will have to be replenished by the manufacture of new bottles, with attendant but unnecessary wastage of labour and materials in doing so. We do not wish to see this development carried further and to have one or more dealers become the unwilling hoarders of bottles.

We wished to notify you of our plans for rescinding the order before proceeding with them. The supply situation apparently no longer required the control which the order imposed; while these huge stocks have been accumulating, no evidence of shortages in your province have come to our attention. If it is demonstrated that some measure of control is still necessary, we shall, of course, reconsider the decision. We will await your advice in this connection until March 1st.

[Mr. P. C. Black.]

On the file there are letters from Mr. Mahon —there may be others, I do not know—pleading with Mr. Geddes not to rescind order A-505 which they were administering under such dictatorial powers for the political and financial benefit of some people in the province and certainly not in the spirit of a war-time order that should have the support of everybody in the country, not as a government measure to be administered by partisans, but as an order to be administered in such a manner as to meet the wishes and command the confidence of the people of Canada. The order should command the confidence of those who have contributed to enlistments in our armed forces; it should command the confidence of those who have invested in victory bonds and of those who supported the plebiscite vote. That is what it should do, rather than be for the benefit of those who have for years past administered anything over which they had control on the basis of the greatest possible political advantage. I am sorry to have taken up all this time dealing with beer bottles, upon which I am no authority.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): The gravamen of the charge made by the hon. member for Cumberland is not against the principle of the order of the wartime prices and trade board but against its operation. In the return made to the questions asked by the hon. member for Cumberland, which was brought down yesterday and from which he has quoted some portions, it is indicated that the purpose of administrator's order A-505 of December 7, 1942, signed by the administrator of used goods, Mr. Godfrey, and approved by Mr. Gordon, was to keep used beer bottles needed for the use of brewers in the maritimes in the maritime provinces and thus avoid the shipment of empties back to Ontario and Quebec and the shipment of additional quantities of new bottles to the maritime brewers. The order applied not only to Nova Scotia but to New Brunswick. For some reason unknown to me, and possibly with the best intentions, in each case the chairman of the provincial liquor commission was appointed the representative of the wartime prices and trade board. In the case of New Brunswick it was Mr. R. G. Fulton, and in the case of Nova Scotia, Mr. A. S. Mahon.

Mr. KINLEY: For this purpose only?

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): For this purpose only.

Mr. KINLEY: Very natural.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I do not think it was natural; I am surprised it was done. As far as Mr. Fulton was concerned, I think he operated the order, not only to the satisfaction of the suppliers but to the satisfaction of the brewers and the public generally. He recognized all the established dealers in New Brunswick who were collecting beer bottles. I assume that he saw to it that the two New Brunswick breweries, which by the way are operated by the Oland family, who also operate one if not the two breweries in Halifax—it is an old family custom—were properly looked after. Permits were issued to each of the nine dealers to sell the breweries beer bottles. There has been no complaint either as to prices or otherwise.

However, in Nova Scotia, a different policy was adopted by Mr. Mahon. In the first place, Mr. Mahon recognized only one A class dealer, his friend, Mr. Moriarty, who was given a monopoly. The gravamen of the charge made by the hon. member for Cumberland is that a monopoly was placed in the hands of the Provincial Bottling company, if that is its name, owned and controlled by Mr. Moriarty and his friends, and that the other dealers who collected bottles in Nova Scotia were refused licences to sell direct to the breweries.

Mr. BLACK (Cumberland): On the mainland of Nova Scotia.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I must limit my statement to the mainland of Nova Scotia. In Cape Breton my old friend Myer Cohen, who used to be a Conservative when he lived in Saint John and who became a Liberal after he went to Nova Scotia, was able to carry on. He was a very good worker in the ranks of the Conservative party when he lived in Saint John, but he is now a Liberal since he got this concession from the government.

Mr. KNOWLES: There is no difference between you anyway.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Maybe there is not, but you are a poor judge. You are not going to interrupt me by saying that. As I say, a monopoly was created in Nova Scotia, and no one could ship a single bottle out of that province although bottles were accumulating that were not actually required by the breweries. That is one point that I wanted to make. Mr. Mahon refused to allow other dealers to ship surplus bottles out of the province to the breweries in central Canada which actually required them. The correspondence shows that they were asking for them. These breweries felt that they had not had their fair share of the distribution. That is the first charge, that a monopoly was created.

The effect of creating that monopoly was this. The selling price of these bottles was forty-five cents a dozen—I can be corrected if I am wrong—and Moriarty, without any investment of capital, without doing anything except using the telephone and keeping his books, was able to buy bottles from these people for forty cents. He thus had a rake-off of five cents a dozen, which is substantial because it would amount to from $60 to $100 a car. Not content with his monopoly, not content with his unearned profit or increment, he went out into the territory and bid against the other dealers for surplus bottles which they could not buy at the price at which they had to sell to him. That is to say, he was offering forty cents a dozen which was all the other men could get. He was assured of a profit without any sense of loss because he had a sure customer. All he had to do was to turn over the bottles to the brewers at forty-five cents a dozen and pocket the profit.

I am not going to blame Mr. Donald Gordon for the inception of the theory on which he was proceeding. He wanted to conserve beer bottles for the maritime breweries. It is the instrument which he set up to deal with the matter about which complaint is made. This has had the result of driving honest dealers out of business, while his chosen instrument—a common phrase in this house at times—was given a monopoly which gave him anywhere from $50,000 to $100,000 a year. I hope he is paying income tax on that profit. If he is not, someone ought to direct the attention of the Department of National Revenue to the fact.

The time arrived shortly after when the situation which made necessary the order was no longer in effect. Because of the large number of newcomers to the province, especially to Halifax, and the two great military camps, there was always a surplus of bottles after a certain period of time after the order was passed. This correspondence indicates that there was no longer any necessity for the order, and responsible officials here in Ottawa sought to have it rescinded and indicated their intention of so doing.

But they were probably over-persuaded by Mr. Mahon not to do any such thing but to continue the arrangement he had made, under which his friend Mr. Moriarty obtained a profit of five cents a dozen on all the empty beer bottles which he chose to take and which he supplied to the brewers in Halifax, shipping the rest out of the province. He had a monopoly not only for the local market but for the surplus which he acquired from the sources I have indicated and which he shipped out of the province. The whole thing became a racket; there is no doubt about that, and it ought to be ended if it has not been ended before. I suggest to the parliamentary assistant that if he becomes seized of all the facts he will recommend to Mr. Gordon that the order be rescinded forthwith, taking care that a sufficient number of bottles are provided for the breweries of Nova Scotia. But let them buy the bottles by contract from the recognized dealers. They will get the beer bottles all right; there is no doubt about that, and the ceiling price will be adhered to. I have heard no complaint about the price. The complaint is that these men are no longer able to deal directly with the brewers who must deal through one funnel and pay a toll to the proprietor of that funnel. That is wrong if it be a fact, and I have no doubt it is a fact.

What should happen is this. The order should long ago have been rectified and permits should have been issued to these men to deal directly with the brewers and ship their surplus out of the province. That would be fair play and British justice.

I said in my opening statement that I have no fault to find with the underlying intent of the order at the time it was made, because no doubt it was passed on representations that were made by responsible people, we will say, to the wartime prices and trade board that there was a scarcity or threatened scarcity of beer bottles in Nova Scotia. That situation has been rectified. It no longer obtains. The necessity for the order therefore no longer exists. Certainly by the cancellation of that order a great injury to the local dealers on the mainland of Nova Scotia will have been rectified.

The plea I make to the minister is that he ask Mr. Donald Gordon to review the whole position and to put it on the same basis as the operation in New Brunswick, namely, that all the established dealers collecting empty beer and liquor bottles in Nova Scotia be recognized; that permits be issued to them; that they be allowed to sell at the ceiling price to the brewers direct, and not through one chosen instrument as is done in Nova Scotia, and that they be allowed to export the surplus to breweries in any part of Canada. That is a fair statement of the position as it ought to be and as it exists in New Brunswick, where there is not a single complaint so far as I am aware. That is the situation as it ought to be in Nova Scotia, where there is nothing but turmoil in this business owing to the fact that unwittingly—I go that far—Mr. Gordon allowed himself to be led into this position. No wonder he refers to this beer bottle question, with all the complaints he has received, as nauseating. I have no doubt that it would be nauseating to any man who had found that he had made a mistake and did not rectify it. I suggest to the parliamentary assistant that the position can be very easily rectified, if it has not been rectified already. You cannot undo what has been done, of course, but I rather suspect that steps have already been taken to rectify the situation. I do not know. The parliamentary assistant shakes his head. Then he is perpetuating, I suggest to him, a gross injustice to a dozen dealers in Nova Scotia who are just being crowded out of business for the benefit of one particular pet of the chairman of the Nova Scotia liquor commission. I do not know anything about Mr. Moriarty's politics, but I know that my hon. friend the member for Cumberland is well versed on things political in Nova Scotia.

An hon. MEMBER: Moriarty must be a good Irishman.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): That does not make a bit of difference. If he is an Irishman or of any other nationality it is all the same to me. I do not know whether Ross is a Scotsman or an Englishman or of any other nationality. It does not make a bit of difference. I am not going to be drawn into a discussion like that.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): Be careful about the Ross's.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): They are a great clan, are they not? There are a good many here in this house. It is a good name so far as I know; I am not saying a word against it. I suggest to the parliamentary assistant that unwittingly a monopoly has been created and that because of that a grave injustice has been done to some of the citizens of Nova Scotia, an injustice that ought to be rectified.

Mr. ISNOR: Mr. Chairman, I have not had an opportunity of looking over this return.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Neither have I.

Mr. ISNOR: Therefore I am not in a position to discuss it as intelligently perhaps as the hon. member for Cumberland. I rose not to defend order A-505 but rather to protest against the narrow partisan attack made by the hon. member for Cumberland on a very fine citizen of Halifax, Mr. A. S. Mahon, chairman of the Nova Scotia liquor commission. The people of Halifax and, I believe, throughout the province of Nova Scotia will resent the very narrow partisan manner in which the hon. member for Cumberland has brought this matter to the attention of the committee this evening. Let us deal with the hon. gentleman's own record in handling affairs of this kind. He told the committee that he had been in public life in Nova Scotia for many years, and so he has been. I remember that I sat on the opposite side to him in the legislature of Nova Scotia when he as minister of highways of the province carried on in the most partisan way perhaps of any minister we ever had.

Mr. GRAYDON: Mr. Chairman, I do not know how far you are going to allow matters to be discussed that have nothing to do with the item under discussion, which has to do with the administration of the wartime prices and trade board. The senior hon. member for Halifax is now dealing with something that happened in Nova Scotia many years ago, which has nothing whatever to do with the item before us.

Mr. POULIOT: "Partisan" is the highest compliment that could be paid to a politician.

The CHAIRMAN: On the point of order raised by the leader of the opposition, I believe it is the wish of the committee that we keep as closely as possible to the item before the Chair and I would ask hon. members therefore to limit themselves to the discussion of empty bottles for the time being and complete it.

Mr. ISNOR: I propose, Mr. Chairman, to keep within the limits of the debate as carried on by the hon. member for Cumberland. He brought into the discussion the matter of his public life and I am simply answering his statement. I was going on to say that I consider him as of a very fine type, if the hon. leader of the opposition had restrained himself for a moment—

Mr. GRAYDON: I knew what you were coming to.

Mr. ISNOR: You thought I was going to play politics.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): What you are doing is coming to the defence of your friend Mr. Moriarty.

Mr. ISNOR: I wanted to ask questions of both the hon. member for Cumberland and the hon. member for York-Sunbury, who stepped out of his province of New Brunswick into Nova Scotia to support the political speech made by his colleague the hon. member for Cumberland, but I did not interrupt. I hope that the leader of the opposition will pay me the same compliment.

I should like to deal with the public life of the hon. member for Cumberland. He was minister of highways of Nova Scotia.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. ROWE: The Chairman has ruled against that already.

Mr. ISNOR: The hon. member brought it on himself.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): That does not make any difference.

Mr. ISNOR: You started it.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I did not start anything of that kind.

Mr. ISNOR: The same procedure was carried on after the introduction of the Nova Scotia liquor commission act, which was brought into effect by the party to which the hon. member for Cumberland belongs.

Mr. BLACK (Cumberland): Mr. Chairman, that was not done under a war-time order. A minister in war time represents all the people, all the taxpayers of the country. That is so even if your statement were correct.

Mr. ISNOR: The hon. member admits my statement is correct; and he appointed one.

Mr. BLACK (Cumberland): I said, "if" it were correct.

Mr. ISNOR: He appointed one person only to handle all bottles throughout Nova Scotia. He knows as does everybody else that the brewing concerns of Oland and Son and O'Keefe's buy bottles. From the questions and answers we find that two persons were appointed in Nova Scotia, one for the mainland and one for Cape Breton—a very easy method of taking care of the bottle situation.

Mr. ROWE: Evidently.

Mr. ISNOR: We find that the hon. member has a friend in Colchester county, or a firm, of the name of John Ross and Sons.

An hon. MEMBER: Is that his name?

Mr. ISNOR: Well, I will not say; he goes under the name of "John Ross and Sons". Who was he in competition with? With whom has he been in competition in the short period he has been in the bottle business? He operates, as the hon. member for Cumberland says, just outside camp Debert. A returned man, a veteran of the last war, had been carrying on business at Debert; but John Ross and Sons were not satisfied with the business which they were getting elsewhere; they made a dead set at the business at Debert, thus doing the very thing which the hon. member complains of others doing. Ross tried to take the business from this ex-serviceman who had already had connections at Debert camp. Not only did Ross try to take it from an ex-serviceman in Colchester county, but he went to New Glasgow, where another ex-serviceman with a large family was struggling along at the bottle business. John Ross and Sons came in and tried to take the business away from this ex-serviceman by offering to pay more for the bottles.

The hon. member for Cumberland has characterized the action of which he complains as done for political gain. Such terms should be used with a greater sense of responsibility as regards these two fine citizens, men who are held in high esteem—the chairman of the Nova Scotia liquor commission, Mr. A. S. Mahon, and Mr. W. B. Moriarty, a man who has been a well known sportsman for years, a prominent oarsman, and is still closely associated with sport in general, as well as enjoying a high reputation in the business life of Halifax. As I said before, I believe that the citizens of not only Halifax but the whole province of Nova Scotia will resent the partisan attack made by the hon. member for Cumberland on these two gentlemen.

I was surprised to hear the hon. member for York-Sunbury say that there was no expense in connection with this transaction, that there was a five cent per dozen profit. Surely he must know that if bottles are to be collected in large quantities for shipment, they must be stored.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): They came in carload lots right to the brewery.

Mr. ISNOR: He has a very large warehouse; he has equipment for washing them; he must collect these bottles and crate them. This necessitates help, which costs money. All these things add to the overhead. I do not know whether his overhead amounts to four cents a dozen or four and one-half cents a dozen, but to say that he does this without cost is ridiculous, and it shows that the speeches of the two hon. members are nothing more or less than partisan attacks.

An hon. MEMBER: How much did he put in the campaign fund?

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Unless you put it in your campaign fund?—somebody asks.

Mr. ISNOR: Would the hon. member repeat that? He hesitates to do so. We always hear these "yap yaps" from the bushes.

Another rather ridiculous statement was that the profit amounted to $100,000.

[Mr. Isnor.]

Mr. ROWE: It depends upon how many bottles he had.

Mr. ISNOR: I do not know whether the parliamentary assistant to the minister is going to be in a position to state the profit. The total shipments in terms of numbers of dozens at such and such a gross profit, less the operating expense, would be easy to compute. But I am satisfied that neither the Provincial Bottle Exchange at Halifax nor the Consumers' Bottle Company, Sydney, nor the two combined, would make anything like $100,000 in any one year; nor do I believe that the firm in Halifax would make $50,000, or $25,000. The profit is a long way from $100,000.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): That is your opinion. Do you know how much they make?

Mr. ISNOR: My opinion is as good as yours in this case. I am talking common sense.

Mr. HANSON (York Sunbury): You are trying to minimize it; that is all.

Mr. ISNOR: I am just trying to be fair to those whom I know. Apparently the hon. member who has just spoken does not know either gentleman very well.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): No, I do not know them, and I do not want to, either.

Mr. ISNOR: I am in a position to speak for them, and I intend to defend their good name.

Mr. ROWE: You are only guessing how many bottles there are.

The ACTING CHAIRMAN (Mr. Golding): Order.

Mr. ISNOR: We always hear a little roar from the hon. member for Dufferin-Simcoe.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): Once a month.

Mr. ISNOR: But he does not know a thing about it.

Mr. ROWE; Neither do you. You do not know how many bottles there were.

Mr. ISNOR: I know quite a little about it.

Mr. ROWE: Maybe you had better tell the rest.

The ACTING CHAIRMAN (Mr. Golding): Order.

Mr. ISNOR: The hon. member speaks of a "rake-off". What does that mean? Just a political term, I suppose.

An hon. MEMBER: We all know what it means.

Mr. ISNOR: I do not think the hon. member means that. I do not think he would stoop to speaking in terms of insinuation. I should not like to charge the former chairman of the Nova Scotia commission, who was appointed by my hon. friend's party, with looking for a rake-off.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I do not think he suggests that Mr. Mahon had a rake-off.

Mr. BLACK (Cumberland): I rise to a point of order. I did not accuse Mr. Mahon of a rake-off. I said Moriarty got a rake-off from the Ross firm in Truro on bottles that he shipped, running to many, many carloads, which he never saw and never touched; all he did was to give telephone orders to bill them out, and he got a profit of fifty to a hundred dollars per car, and that is what I called a rake-off. Whether that is a proper description of the transaction I cannot say.

Mr. ROWE: And he did not even wash the bottles.

Mr. ISNOR: I think we will allow the record to speak for itself. I would deal with it in a business way and in a different manner. I would say that if Mr. Moriarty or this bottle exchange firm in Halifax is getting a commission of five cents a dozen, fine and dandy.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Good money, eh?

Mr. ISNOR: Good money—gross.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): That is what we say.

Mr. ISNOR: Until we know what the overhead is.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Do you know?

Mr. ISNOR: No, but I have enough common sense and business experience to know you cannot run a business without overhead.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): A telephone and office stool, I suppose.

Mr. ISNOR: The hon. member for Cumberland also used the term "any decent man," implying that neither Mr. Moriarty nor Mr. Mahon was a decent man. I did not rise, as I stated, to argue for or against order A-505. From what I have heard it appears to me that it must be an order that is bringing about the results desired, namely, collecting bottles in an orderly way and disposing of them, whether done through Mr. Moriarty, who is a good Liberal, and I admit it. He has good sense; I will say that for him. There is nothing wrong with that.

Mr. GRAYDON: Do not cast reflections on him now.

Mr. ISNOR: The hon. members cannot take it. The hon. member says, "We do not want a Liberal; we want some other person." He then names another gentleman.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): Another Tory.

Mr. ISNOR: No; we do not consider him as one.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): Recognize a Tory, that is all.

Mr. ISNOR: I have nothing further to say. I want to bring to the attention of the committee the fact that both these gentlemen referred to in such a slighting manner—

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I did not refer to them in a slighting manner at all. I do not know either one of them.

Mr. ISNOR: The hon. member for York-Sunbury was not the only speaker.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I thought I was referred to.

Mr. ISNOR: Those gentlemen referred to in such a slighting manner are respected citizens of Halifax, and it is not becoming that any hon. member, particularly an hon. member from Nova Scotia, should refer to them in the terms used by the hon. member for Cumberland this evening. It is all the more surprising that the hon. member for Cumberland should have used that language because, as I said before, I sat on the opposite side of the house on more than one occasion when he was a member of the government of Nova Scotia. I sat on the government side when he was in opposition, and this evening I am sitting on the government side and he is sitting in the opposition. He has done to-night just what he has done in Nova Scotia in the long period of his public life service, namely, played party politics in a narrow partisan manner.

Mr. BLACK (Cumberland): If we are going into the record of hon. members of this House of Commons I should like to have a little time and I would go into the hon. member's record, too. If he wants some exposure on the floor of this House of Commons, I will expose him.

Mr. ISNOR: I did not finish what I intended to say. In conclusion, may I say I was speaking in a political sense. I want it distinctly understood I was speaking of the hon. member in a political sense.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): This is part of the war effort—salvage.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): It was started on that side.

Mr. ISNOR: The hon. member is continually playing party politics.

Mr. ROWE: You should ration that part of it.

Mr. HAZEN: It is quite apparent from this discussion that this order is being administered in Nova Scotia to create a monopoly and give one firm an opportunity of making from $50,000 to $100,000 a year and put out of business all other legitimate dealers. Now, that is plain party politics. If to complain of a situation of that kind is playing party politics, I do not know what party politics is.

When the ceiling price on strawberries in British Columbia was discussed yesterday afternoon in this house the hon. member for Vancouver-Burrard used these words—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. HAZEN: We are in committee now. The debate yesterday took place in the house.

The CHAIRMAN: What the hon. member is reading took place in a previous debate and it is against the rule to read it.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Not in committee; you had better read the rules.

The CHAIRMAN: The same rules apply to the committee as in the House of Commons.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): No, they do not.

Mr. ROWE: That was only yesterday. The senior hon. member for Halifax was talking about what took place in the provincial house ten years ago.

Mr. HAZEN: We are in committee now, Mr. Chairman, and this is what the hon. member for Vancouver-Burrard said:

> Here you find a typical example of the sort of thing that emanates only from unbridled bureaucracy.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): I rise to a point of order. The hon. member is quoting from a previous debate of the present session which obviously cannot be referred to.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): That is only when the Speaker is in the Chair.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): If my hon. friend would give some little time to a study of the rules he would find the same rules apply to committee as when the Speaker is in the Chair.

[Mr. Isnor.]

The CHAIRMAN: I believe that the country, the press and hon. members of the committee are not going to stand very much longer for unlimited repetition. We had a debate yesterday, and I almost gave a ruling this afternoon against the hon. member for Fraser Valley for reopening a discussion that lasted almost two hours. I hope we shall not have any further reference to a previous debate but that we shall continue with the discussion of the item that is now before us.

Mr. HAZEN: I say this is a case in which we find an example of unbridled bureaucracy and this is a case in which we find a violation of what was intended by this particular order. Surely the Minister of Finance or his parliamentary assistant will not say that this order was intended to create any monopoly in any province or in the provinces to which it applies, namely, Nova Scotia and New Brunswick. Apparently in the way it was administered in New Brunswick it did not create a monopoly there. But in Nova Scotia it did create one. It enabled one man to make a profit of from $50,000 to $100,000 and put every other legitimate dealer out of business.

Mr. ABBOTT: Where are those figures of a profit of $50,000 to $100,000?

Mr. HAZEN: Here are the figures. They were given by the hon. member for Cumberland. He says that the figures show that the amount of beer sold in one year in Nova Scotia amounted to the enormous sum of $7,699,497.55. That was the price which was paid for the beer. He goes on to show that the containers of the beer were valued at about $1,000,000. Does it require any stretch of imagination to suppose that in the handling of those bottles there would be a profit made from $50,000 to $100,000?

Mr. ABBOTT: There is no restriction on the sale of bottles in Nova Scotia.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): They have to be sold through one dealer and only the brewers could take them.

Mr. HAZEN: Under that order only one man in Nova Scotia could get the regular price for the bottles. Any other dealer in the province who attempted to handle the bottles had to sell them to that man, and as the hon. member for Cumberland says, all that that man had to do was to telephone into one of those other dealers to put up a carload, and as a result of that telephone message he makes a profit of $60 to $120 on every carload of empty bottles that is shipped out of or in the province. That is not a satisfactory state of affairs. The hon. member for Cumberland also said that during the twenty years he had been in public life—I am going to refer to this because he was dealing with one particular matter when he said that—he had never received such discourtesy as he had from Mr. Donald Gordon when he approached him about this matter. He told us about the conversation. Perhaps Mr. Donald Gordon was not feeling in a very good frame of mind when he had this conversation with the hon. member for Cumberland. I recollect that a little over a year ago an official of the provincial government came up to consult with the wartime prices and trade board. He was an official that had to do with dairy products. After he came back to New Brunswick he made a public statement in which he said he was told by the officials of the wartime prices and trade board that they did not give a damn for the little man or the middleman. I think there has to be notice taken of the rights of the middleman. I say that free competition has to be preserved and that a monopoly created under an order of this kind should not be permitted.

Mr. ABBOTT: I am not an expert in second-hand beer bottles or Nova Scotia politics, but I should like to place before—

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Deal with Quebec politics.

Mr. ABBOTT: Nor Quebec politics. I am going to place before the committee the position of the wartime prices and trade board with respect to this order. As has been indicated by some of the previous speakers, in 1942 it was brought to the attention of the board that second-hand beer bottles were being shipped out of Nova Scotia to the central provinces.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Who brought that to their attention; was it the brewers or Mr. Mahon?

Mr. ABBOTT: That was by the brewers. The situation, as maritime members know, is that beer bottles or bottles of any kind are not manufactured in the maritime provinces, and for a good many years the practice has been, I understand, for maritime brewers to supply themselves with beer bottles which have been sent east from central Canada. In 1942 there was a shortage of beer bottles in central Canada, and the brewers represented to the board that used beer bottles in the maritime provinces were being shipped to the central provinces to such an extent that there was not an adequate supply for the brewers in the maritimes, which meant that new beer bottles would have to be shipped to the maritimes. Obviously this would mean double transportation and inefficiency, and for that reason the wartime prices and trade board was justified in taking the action—

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Can the hon. gentleman tell me whether Canadian Breweries of Quebec or Montreal are allowed to ship beer to Nova Scotia?

Mr. ABBOTT: I cannot say as to that.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): That is another monopoly.

Mr. ABBOTT: I know the situation was that second-hand beer bottles were being shipped from the maritime provinces to the central provinces to such an extent that the supply was short.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): You were told that?

Mr. ABBOTT: That is the information which was given to the board, and I have reason to believe that they verified it. Then order A-505 was passed which in effect did prohibit the export of used beer bottles from the maritime provinces. I want to read to the committee section 4, subsection 2, which deals with Nova Scotia and which is in identical terms with subsection 1 dealing with New Brunswick. This is what the section says:

> Except with the permission in writing, of the chief commissioner of the Nova Scotia liquor commission, no person shall
> (a) purchase any used beer bottles which are now or which are hereafter located in the province of Nova Scotia for shipment to any other province;—

In other words, that prohibits the purchase for export.

> (b) ship or cause to be shipped any such bottles to any other province;
> (c) knowingly purchase, accept delivery of or have in his possession any such bottles in any other province which have been shipped out of the province of Nova Scotia after the date of this order;
> (d) sell any such bottles to any person other than a brewer in the province of Nova Scotia.

Mr. BLACK (Cumberland): Then the hon. member might tell the committee that these brewers are not allowed to purchase except through certain channels.

Mr. ABBOTT: Certainly there is nothing in the order of the wartime prices and trade board to that effect.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): But there is under the order of the agent of the board.

Mr. ABBOTT: Let me finish my statement. As I say, the wartime prices and trade board was interested in adopting an order which would prevent the waste of shipping facilities by sending bottles to central Canada and shipping bottles back to Nova Scotia. That was the purpose of this order, and it did not create any monopoly in Nova Scotia or New Brunswick as far as the sale of used beer bottles in those provinces was concerned. If any such monopoly exists it was not created by any order of the wartime prices and trade board. The board is not charged with administering the Nova Scotia liquor commission; or the New Brunswick liquor commission; and identical provisions were established for New Brunswick. The commissioner of the New Brunswick liquor control board has the same powers as the commissioner of the Nova Scotia liquor control board; and the only effect of that order, as far as creating a monopoly is concerned, is that the chief commissioner of the government liquor control board is empowered to say who can export used beer bottles from Nova Scotia. The wartime prices and trade board is completely justified in taking the word of the responsible head of the government liquor commission, who, I assume, is charged with the distribution of beer in the province. It has done so in Nova Scotia and has done the same thing in New Brunswick. I would point out what has not been made clear in any of the previous speeches, that there is no restriction on any dealer in Nova Scotia collecting used beer bottles and selling them to either of the two breweries in Nova Scotia, but he cannot export them without a permit. That is the position as far as the wartime prices and trade board is concerned. The hon. member for Cumberland read a letter from Mr. Geddes, chief of the supply division, I think dated February 22, 1943, in which—

Mr. BLACK (Cumberland): Would the hon. member not agree with my statement that the entire stock of almost one hundred thousand dozen bottles which had been accumulated by Ross was shipped out of the province by order of Mr. Moriarty, and not used by the brewers of Nova Scotia?

Mr. ABBOTT: I do not know anything about the details of how they were shipped; I am dealing with the order passed by the wartime prices and trade board to control a situation which, as I indicated at the outset of my remarks, was resulting in the inefficient use of transportation facilities. I do not know what stock was held by Mr. Ross, my hon. friend's friend in Truro, and I do not know how he disposed of it. I am pointing out to the committee that the wartime prices and trade board was justified in adopting this order; that the order did nothing more than prohibit the export of beer bottles from Nova Scotia, and that it is still in effect.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Is there the same necessity for it now as there was then?

Mr. ABBOTT: That is just the point I am coming to now. The hon. member for Cumberland read the whole letter, I think, in which Mr. Geddes stated that information received by the board would appear to indicate that the restrictive order was no longer needed; but following that letter the board received communications from the chief commissioner of the Nova Scotia liquor commission and perhaps others, I do not know, and from the New Brunswick liquor commission, stating that the order was still required, that this surplus in Nova Scotia was purely temporary, and asking that the order be not rescinded. Copies of these letters and telegrams were included in the correspondence which I brought down yesterday; my hon. friend has copies of them. As late as March 21, 1944, we had a letter from the New Brunswick liquor control board, again urging that the order be not rescinded. The information given to the board subsequent to that letter of February 22, from which my hon. friend quoted, demonstrated to the satisfaction of the officers of the board that this restrictive order was still necessary.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Did they take steps to verify that?

Mr. ABBOTT: I am informed that they did.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): What steps?

Mr. ABBOTT: I cannot answer that, but I should think the assurance of the chairman of the provincial liquor commission would be perhaps as good evidence as one could ask for as to the necessity of continuing this order in force. After all he is the man who is responsible.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I am not so sure about that.

Mr. ABBOTT: I am not entering into any political discussion about this matter.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): You know they changed the commission in New Brunswick and got a political appointee there.

Mr. ABBOTT: I suggest that in a matter of this kind the chairman and officers of the wartime prices and trade board are entitled to accept the assurance of the chairman of a provincial liquor commission, whether the administration in power happens to be Liberal or Conservative. He is the man responsible for the sale and distribution of these beverages, and I suggest that he is a perfectly proper person to whom the wartime prices and trade board should go for information on these matters. As far as the board is concerned the order was passed solely for the purpose of conserving transportation facilities, and it does not affect in any way the sale or disposition of used beer bottles within the particular province concerned. That matter is entirely within the jurisdiction of the province, and as a matter of fact the order which I quoted imposed no restrictions.

Mr. GRAYDON: If the parliamentary assistant is through I should like to bring one or two points to the attention of the committee in connection with this matter. Perhaps the hon. gentleman is carrying his argument a little far when he suggests that this order is being continued in effect because of the problem which exists in regard to the transportation of empty bottles from Nova Scotia to the central provinces.

One instance which will at once disprove any such contention is the fact that while this order was apparently being kept in effect for that purpose, at the same time, the firm which is referred to as the Moriarty firm—I am using that only as a matter of distinction from the others—had shipped empty beer bottles from Nova Scotia to the central provinces and apparently with the consent and by the authority of the Nova Scotia liquor commission or its head, who had been given a special job under the wartime prices and trade board. I point that out to the parliamentary assistant because it fairly well shatters the argument that this order was put into effect for the purpose of conserving transportation between central Canada and Nova Scotia. The fact that there was considerable shipment of empty bottles from Nova Scotia to central Canada also, I think, adds substantial weight to the case put up by the hon. member for Cumberland.

At one time there may have been some justification for order A-505; but, as time went on, the effect of transportation of this product and these commodities from Nova Scotia to central Canada fairly well dispensed with the necessity of continuing the order. That having been the case, the committee must look for the reasons why the order was continued, and those reasons have been supplied by those who know much more about the matter than those of us who have not made a close study of it. As the hon. member for Cumberland and the hon. member for York-Sunbury pointed out, it would have the effect of giving the head of the Nova Scotia liquor commission the right to point his finger to one particular dealer and to say, "Only you may deal with other provinces by way of export of this commodity from Nova Scotia." That had the effect—and I say this in an endeavour to argue the case fairly with all concerned—of establishing a continued monopoly in so far as the man who was pointed to by the head of the liquor commission is concerned.

May I say to the parliamentary assistant, I can understand why the chairman of the wartime prices and trade board would feel very sick, as he said, of telephone calls and being bothered with the matter, because it seems to me, whatever may have been the underlying reason, and I am ascribing no untoward reasons or untoward influence with respect to this matter, that when the wartime prices and trade board saw fit to appoint the head of the liquor commission of Nova Scotia—

Mr. ABBOTT: And of New Brunswick.

Mr. GRAYDON: I am dealing with Nova Scotia, because apparently in New Brunswick they carry on their affairs a little differently and, perhaps, a little more satisfactorily, in regard to their empty beer bottles. In any event, I have no desire to join issue with my good friend from Halifax in what he has said to-night. In the appointment of the head of the liquor commission to a responsible position on the wartime prices and trade board, and the minister having some knowledge, as he must have had, that there was a situation such as this existing in Nova Scotia, what actually happened was that the fingers of the wartime prices and trade board and of this government as well were burned because of the situation that developed.

Mr. ABBOTT: Nonsense.

Mr. GRAYDON: I do not say that in any offensive way. I am simply trying to explain the situation that actually exists because the delivery into the hands of the Nova Scotia liquor control commission of the powers of the wartime prices and trade board with respect to this matter, whether the dominion government likes it or not, placed the whole situation, from the point of view of the government, right into Nova Scotia politics, and it is because of that that the weakness of the whole arrangement becomes so apparent. I rose to ask the parliamentary assistant to investigate the matter thoroughly, and I suggest that if he does so he will find that there is no longer any real necessity for order A-505 remaining in effect. Whatever may have been its advantages in the beginning, it now operates against the public interest. That I have gathered as I have listened to the convincing arguments advanced in this debate.

Mr. FAIR: If we are now through dealing with second-hand beer bottles, perhaps we can return to the cup that cheers but does not inebriate. A year ago I took up the question of the increase in the price of tea, coffee and milk sold in restaurants in this city and elsewhere across the country. That question is still pricking the conscience of the minister and some members of the wartime prices and trade board as well, because only yesterday, in another discussion, the minister brought up the question again and told us that because the price of meats and other foods had gone up in restaurants they allowed an increase in the price of tea and coffee. This, I believe, was thrown out as a sop to some of the organized restaurant keepers and it did not take into consideration the effect it had on certain victims. I bring this question up now because to-day we have an increased supply of tea and coffee. There is no shortage of either of these commodities. Nor is there any shortage of milk at the present time. Prior to the time the order was put into effect we could go into a restaurant and get one or two or three cups of tea or coffee or we could get additional milk and we did not have to pay any extra money for the coffee we drank.

At the present time we are told that because prices of meat and other foods have gone up, an increase of five cents on tea, coffee and milk has been allowed. Very little consideration, however, has been given to the effect which this has on certain people. The number of people who can afford to eat some of the more expensive foods, including strawberries—something that was discussed yesterday—are now getting away from the increased cost of meals, but those who have to use tea or coffee or milk, and perhaps a muffin or something else for breakfast, or lunch, or perhaps the evening meal, are paying the additional cost. I do not think this is fair, and I ask once more that some consideration be given the matter, because you are penalizing the wrong persons. You are penalizing the poor for the benefit of the rich. If the price of meat has gone up in restaurants, then let the people who have the benefit of the better foods pay the additional prices, and let those who have a cup of tea or coffee, or a glass of milk, and who, in some cases, at the end of the month, after paying their taxes, have little left to buy meat and some of the good foods, be allowed to get their tea and coffee without paying extra.

There is another matter I want to call to the attention of the wartime prices board.

[Mr. Graydon.]

Several complaints have been made to me that in the chart sent out by the board showing the different cuts of animals sold over the butcher's block, the price always quoted is that of the top quality beef or pork, and it does not make any difference whether it is the top grade that is being sold by the butcher or an old milk cow that has raised half a dozen children for some farmer, the price is the same. I think some consideration should be given to this and some attempt made to create a price range according to the grade of meat sold. If you go into a restaurant and order a ham or beef or some other kind of sandwich I think you will find out that what I am saying is correct. If you get your teeth into it you will be lucky to get them out again, and the price will be the same as though you were getting top-grade meat.

Mr. MacNICOL: I suppose you would leave false teeth in?

Mr. FAIR: False teeth are better than none at all. If you have poor teeth, false teeth would be preferable. I do not know whether it is necessary to go on any further, but I ask the wartime prices and trade board to give this matter some consideration. I do not make this plea on my own behalf; I make it on behalf of some of our lower paid workers who, I am informed by those who work in restaurants, have not enough to eat when pay day comes around or for two or three days before. They are unable to buy a decent meal; all they can get is a bowl of soup with muffins or something of that kind. We should take away the penalties from those who are not able to bear them and place them where they properly belong, namely, upon those who eat meat and other foods that have gone up in price.

Mr. MacNICOL: Mr. Chairman, there are two or three items among many I could bring up that I should like to discuss for a moment or two. The first is coal, with which I believe the wartime prices and trade board has something to do. In one of my own buildings, run by a janitor, I burned twelve tons of coal the year before last, a very severe winter. During the winter just passed I burned fifteen tons. The price was the same in both years; the difference in the number of tons was due to the lower grade of coal. The parliamentary assistant knows that last summer everyone was ordered to buy coal earlier. We had to take anything they sent out, but the price remained the same. I believe that in all the coal I used there was a difference of ten to fifteen tons additional. The wartime prices and trade board set the price, but they should have done more than that. They should have seen to it that the consumer got good coal or had to pay only in proportion to the grade obtained. I think this complaint would apply to many in Canada who burn coal.

My next complaint is about gasoline. When you drive up to a gasoline station to have the tank of your car filled with gasoline you hear complaints about poor gas. I hear them every time I drive to a station. I am getting only fifteen miles a gallon and my car is in A-1 condition and is well taken care of. When the gasoline was better a year ago I used to get up to nineteen miles to the gallon. Yet I am paying the same price. The wartime prices and trade board has set the price of gasoline but it does not say what the octane rating shall be.

Mr. McNEVIN: Get a smaller car.

Mr. MacNICOL: I like to ride in a comfortable car.

My last complaint is in reference to maple syrup. To my mind, producers of maple syrup have been greatly interfered with this year. I buy maple syrup in six-gallon lots. That required twenty-four sugar coupons, but after I got my coupons together I had to drive from one end of the city to the other in order to get some sort of certificate to mail to the farmer producer, so that he could express my maple syrup. That was just a nuisance; it is one of the many things that has interfered with maple syrup and other production and sale. I am quite sure that the same thing would apply to other commodities.

It has been said to-day that many of the officials in charge of the wartime prices and trade board regulations have had very little experience in dealing with the public or in dealing with the commodities under their control. This would not apply to all. I know many of them who are really big men, who have done a fine job, but on the other hand I would judge that many of them are more or less inexperienced. How they came to be taken on the staff I do not know.

Earlier in the day we were given the number of those employed by the wartime prices and trade board. I was just looking up the public accounts for 1943 and I notice it states that the number of employees drawing $2,400 a year and over was 4,769. It does not state how many were drawing less than $2,400. That is a tremendous staff. They may all be necessary, but I am under the impression that this is just another case of governmental interference in business that cannot be controlled and where two men are employed when one is all that is needed.

I have always been an advocate of good salaries. The more a man makes, the more he can buy. However, but I find that of that number of 4,769, between ninety-five and 100 were drawing from $4,000 to $5,000 a year; between twenty-five and thirty were drawing from $5,000 to $6,000; between twenty and twenty-five were drawing from $6,000 to $7,000; approximately five, if I have counted correctly in my hurry, were drawing between $7,000 and $8,000; another five were drawing between $8,000 and $9,000, and one was drawing over $10,000.

I have no doubt that the men in the high income brackets are A1 men. They must be or they would not be in those positions. Quite possibly their salaries are less than they should be, but in the aggregate it is a staggering payroll to anyone who has been connected with big business. I would like to compare this payroll with the payrolls of the New York Central, the General Electric or any one of those huge companies. I doubt if any of those companies has comparably such a colossal payroll, a payroll on which so many large salaries are paid. I am not going to find any fault with it because I like to hear of men getting good salaries. However, I ask this question: when the war is over, how is business to get its staffs back and have them comfortable and happy when they know that such salaries have been paid by the government during the war?

I have nothing further to say other than that I am not going to find any fault with any particular official. These men have had a strenuous time and they have done a very difficult job. I hope they have been doing the best they can, but I do know that the public everywhere are incensed because of regulations which do not seem to be sensible. There may be reasons for them, or for some of them, but the public are not conversant with them. I am thinking particularly of some of the things that were mentioned a short time ago such as buttons on coats, cuffs on trousers and so on. These are only small items in the aggregate. The amount saved in comparison with more or less reckless expenditures in scores of other directions does not commend itself to the public.

Mr. NOSEWORTHY: I sincerely hope that the wartime prices and trade board can survive the attack that was made upon them with empty beer bottles to-night, strawberries yesterday, coal and so forth.

I have moved about the eastern part of the country probably as much as most members. I have had occasion to visit a great many points in four provinces within the last six or eight months, and I am satisfied that in general the people of Canada are supporting the government's measures and the controls established by the wartime prices and trade board.

I have conversed with many scores of small business men who complain of difficulty in getting all the goods they want and of many of the controls, but a great many of them have admitted quite frankly that but for the controls of the wartime prices and trade board they would probably not be able to get enough to sell, that the fact that they can remain in business under the conditions that prevail in war time is due to the quotas established by the board which entitle them to get goods to sell. I have no doubt that the small business men of the country realize that in times such as these, without those controls, the larger business concerns, the monopoly interests of this country, would have gained a much greater control of our business life than they now have.

I am confident that by and large the consumers of the country are grateful for the rationing which has been adopted. I think the majority of our people, certainly those with limited means, realize that they are enabled through the rationing regulations to get a portion of the goods that are available for sale. I think the general population throughout the country realizes that these controls have effected a stabilization of prices which has had an effect upon the rising cost of living. We have only to compare the cost of living to-day with the cost of living in the last war to realize that there are a great many benefits to be derived from these controls. I certainly hope that the criticism which we hear of the wartime prices and trade board will not have the effect of releasing all these controls too quickly or of releasing too many of them too quickly. I think everyone who has given much consideration to the problems that will face us immediately after the war realize that, in the interests of the country generally, some of these controls will have to be maintained for some time after the war ends, regardless of which government is in power.

I have heard criticism of specific regulations of the wartime prices and trade board and criticism of the administration of specific regulations. I realize, as I think most members of the house do, that in the early days of the board a great many of the positions in its organization were filled possibly by party workers, were patronage jobs, but I have not heard in more recent months nearly as much complaint along that line as I heard at the beginning.

The board has unquestionably made mistakes. I well recall how infuriated the small retail dealers were at some of the regulations that were imposed upon them in the early days of the board, regulations regarding the delivery of goods and so forth, but these I think have been largely ironed out as time went on.

I remember being in the maritimes last fall when the new order relating to dressed and undressed poultry came into effect. It was the talk of the whole of at least two of those provinces. I doubt if any government ever received so much criticism from among the farming people as did this government because of that order. I was asked by a certain number of people to get in touch with the prices board, but by the time I could get around to doing it I discovered that the regulation had been modified.

There was still a great deal of criticism regarding the deterioration of goods. People all across this country are not satisfied that the wartime prices and trade board or some other government agency is doing all that could be done to prevent that deterioration. I have gone into many towns where retail merchants have showed me articles which, while the price remains the same, have deteriorated until in their opinion they were not worth more than half the price at which the article formerly sold. I have had instances of that in dry goods stores in connection with articles of clothing, and in many other stores.

The hon. member for Davenport has called the attention of the committee to the situation regarding coal. Only last week in an eastern Ontario town several citizens showed me their coal bills for this last winter as compared with their coal bills for previous winters, showing how they had been forced to buy several tons of coal more than they had been in the habit of buying. They were complaining that the coal they got last year, although the price was pegged, was much inferior in quality to what they had been receiving in previous years, and many of them were also complaining of light weight, that a ton of coal contained a great deal of water and much less coal than it formerly did.

One suggestion I would like to make to the parliamentary assistant is that if there is any possibility of simplifying the type of returns or of reducing the number of returns that have to be made by business men and firms to the wartime prices and trade board, any attempt in that direction will meet with the approval of vast numbers of people across this country.

I have seen restaurant keepers and hotel managers, particularly, sitting up to the wee hours of the morning trying to figure out how many cups of tea and coffee they sold, how many customers they served, how many pounds of this and that were disposed of

during the day—all of which apparently had to be recorded on a set form and forwarded to the officials. If the people of Canada are to accept the regulations which the wartime prices and trade board has to introduce, any orders which have very little value except a nuisance value should be eliminated. I have been told—I should like to know from the parliamentary assistant whether it is true—that the forms which have to be filled out are to some extent affected by the requirements of United States authorities in similar situations; that in order to obtain priorities, in order to work in line with the Americans, our wartime prices and trade board must be able to show to the entire satisfaction of United States authorities that we have effective control over goods and services, and that our board can satisfy these authorities only by showing them returns similar to their own. I hope that this is not true. I hope also that the wartime prices and trade board can take some measures to simplify and reduce these returns.

Last year a return was brought down showing the number of dollar a year men employed by the wartime prices and trade board. I wonder whether there would be very much work involved in bringing that list up to date. I think it would be interesting to the committee to know whether we have fewer or more dollar a year men, and who are thus employed by the board. It seems to me that by this time it should have trained men of its own who are capable of managing the affairs of the board, and that it should be possible to get along with fewer of these dollar a year men.

One further suggestion. Probably some of the criticisms or causes of criticism arise from the fact that there is not on the councils of the wartime prices and trade board adequate representation of the interests affected. That, I believe, was brought out in yesterday's debate. I believe it applies to a great many instances, that those responsible for the regulations pertaining to particular lines of business, particular commodities, are often familiar with large enterprises dealing in the commodity but not with the point of view of the small business man. I would like, if it would not involve too much work, to have that list of dollar a year men brought up to date.

Mr. ABBOTT: I have here the figures for both years. As a matter of fact this information was given in answer to a question of the hon. member for York East on May 18. The number of employees of the wartime prices and trade board serving full time without remuneration on March 31, 1943, was 293, and on March 31 of this year, 329; approximately the same, or rather, over thirty more.

As to the simplifying of forms, I can assure my hon. friend that a constant effort is being made to do that. On the other hand, the board is carrying on a complicated and difficult operation, and has to have a considerable amount of accurate information in order to carry out its responsibility properly, and for that reason it has to require that a good many forms be filed. A committee of the board is constantly working on the question, reviewing these forms and endeavouring to see that they are made as simple as they can be, I do not know with what degree of success; but in any event, a constant effort is being made to do that.

As to similarity of forms with those in force in the United States, I am advised that there is no real justification for that suggestion. There is this point that in connection with textile supplies, in particular, we are dependent upon United States supplies now for priorities and so forth; consequently we try to make our application forms and that sort of thing conform as closely as possible to those in use in the United States. Possibly that is what my hon. friend had in mind when he referred to that point.

The hon. member for Davenport raised one or two questions in connection with coal and gasoline. The question of supplies of coal, as he knows, is under the Department of Munitions and Supply. The price ceiling is fixed and enforced by the wartime prices and trade board. I have heard that there has been some deterioration in the quality of the coal which we have been getting lately. I have not noticed it in the case of my own coal, but that is perhaps no fair test. As to gasoline, again I do not know. The question of supply, as the hon. member is aware, is under the jurisdiction of the Department of Munitions and Supply, and so far as I know the price has not varied since September or October, 1941.

Mr. JOHNSTON (Bow River): The quality has, though.

Mr. ABBOTT: Perhaps I am particularly fortunate, but I have not personally noticed any variation. I drive a very light car, and I think I get at least twenty miles and sometimes twenty-five miles a gallon in the country at the lower speeds at which we drive. I am sure the hon. member for Davenport does not drive at any excessive speeds.

Mr. MacNICOL: I try to keep within the law.

Mr. ABBOTT: There may be some deterioration in the quality of gasoline, and it is perfectly true that the price is the same.

On the question raised by the hon. member about maple syrup, I can sympathize a good deal with his views, because I was born and brought up in the part of Quebec which produces more and better maple syrup than anywhere else—

Mr. MacNICOL: Not "better"; perhaps "more".

Mr. ABBOTT: —that is, the eastern townships. Being familiar with the processes of maple syrup making, and having bought and sold it for many years, I can sympathize with his views, and I heard a lot from my friends in the eastern townships regarding what they felt were the unnecessary restrictions upon the sale and distribution of maple syrup this year. Of course the reason, rightly or wrongly, for these restrictions was that maple syrup, maple butter and maple sugar were classed with what we call "sweet spreads", which include honey and jam; they are alternatives to these particular commodities, which, as my hon. friend knows, are rationed, and it was felt that it would be unfair to allow maple products to go unrationed.

It would mean that distribution would not approach anything like a fair one; that people who were near the sources of supply or knew where to go would get the lion's share of the product and it would not be available for the general public. I am advised, and that is confirmed by what I learned out in this beautiful part of Quebec to which I refer, the eastern townships, the maple sugar crop was good this year and apparently it has moved into consumption fairly smoothly. The selling price was higher than last year and I am told was sufficient to give a good return to the producer for his maple syrup. I am not going to assume the role of a prophet. I hope when the time arrives for the sugar crop next year it will not be necessary to ration this delicious commodity. I am sure that if it is necessary the sugar producers will put up with the relatively moderate inconvenience that they suffered this year and that those of us who, like the hon. member for Davenport, are very fond of this product, will also be willing to go to a little extra trouble to be sure that we procure it.

My hon. friend raised the question of salaries. I am not going into the details of the salaries now, but I wish to say to the committee that I do not consider the salaries paid by the wartime prices and trade board to be in any way out of line with the salaries paid for comparable service in private business or in any other section of the community.

On July 7 of last year the Minister of Finance in answer to a question gave a break-down in certain groups of persons in receipt of salaries in the employ of the board. While I have not a similar break-down here I am informed it has not changed substantially since that time. On July 7 of last year there was no one on the board receiving in excess of $8,500 a year.

Mr. MacNICOL: In what year?

Mr. ABBOTT: In July of last year. I think that statement still holds good to-day. There is no one in receipt of a salary of more than $8,500 a year. As the committee knows, the chairman of the board is the deputy governor of the Bank of Canada and is on loan to the board.

Mr. MacNICOL: The name I had in mind was D. G. MacKenzie. He is down for $10,400.

Mr. ABBOTT: Well, I am informed that the gentleman named by the hon. member for Davenport was engaged on a special fee basis in the past. He still works for the board but at a very much lower scale of remuneration.

Mr. MacNICOL: I have only the public accounts to go by.

Mr. ABBOTT: And that is the only case. As I say, there is no one receiving a salary in excess of $8,500 a year. In the bracket from $5,000 to $8,500, there were forty-three. I am giving the committee the general picture. In the bracket from $3,000 to $4,000 there were 174; in the bracket from $2,000 to $3,000 there were 683; the remainder, those receiving $2,000 and under number 3,723, making a total of 4,965. The total to-day is some 5,100, and I doubt whether any are receiving high salaries; there may be one or two, but the majority of the increased number are in the lower income brackets, additional inspectors, enforcement officers and so on.

Mr. MacNICOL: I do not find fault. I was asking for the number. Did the parliamentary assistant give the number receiving $8,000, $7,000 and $6,000?

Mr. ABBOTT: No. I said there were none receiving over $8,500 a year.

Mr. MacNICOL: No, but $8,000.

Mr. ABBOTT: From $5,000 to $8,500 there were forty-three. I have not any smaller break-down, but in the bracket from $5,000 to $8,500 there were forty-three. I think my hon.

friend and the committee are aware that some of those officers are performing exceedingly difficult and responsible duties. Not only that, but a great many of them have been lent to the board by their own private employers. They are not serving as dollar a year men. What is happening is that they are being paid the salary which they were receiving from their private employers. In most of those cases the employer continues to pay his own employee and is reimbursed by the board for the amount of the salary.

Mr. JOHNSTON (Bow River): They take it out of the excess profits tax when they pay their taxes. It is the same thing exactly as the government paying.

Mr. ABBOTT: Of course it is the same thing as the government paying. I am not questioning that for a moment. I am simply pointing out that these men are not taking on a government job as a life job, as permanent civil servants. They have come here to do this as a war job. They are doing it at the same salary they were receiving from their private employer. The private employer loses the benefit of their service and he is neither ahead of nor behind the game. He is simply reimbursed for the salary.

Mr. JOHNSTON (Bow River): It is hardly fair to say they are dollar a year men.

Mr. ABBOTT: I did not say they were. In fact I prefaced what I said by saying they are not dollar a year men. The figures I have given for men serving without remuneration do not include men in the category to which I was referring. I made a statement that a great many of the men on the prices board included in the category of receiving, let us say, $5,000 to $8,500 a year, are men who have been lent temporarily to the board by their employers and are being paid the same salary that they would have continued to receive had they stayed in their own private business.

Mr. MARSHALL: What types of positions do those men occupy?

Mr. ABBOTT: Administrators, chiefs of divisions. If the hon. member will look at the report of the wartime prices and trade board which I tabled early in January he will see there a list of the principal officers of the board. The hon. member no doubt has a copy of the report before him. If he will look at pages 52 and 53 he will see a list there of the senior administrative officers of the board. For instance, the distributive trades coordination is headed by Mr. R. F. Chisholm.

Mr. HATFIELD: Lent by whom?

Mr. ABBOTT: The foods coordination is headed by Mr. K. W. Taylor, who is sitting in front of me. Metal and wood products coordination is headed by Mr. D. P. Cruikshank, and so on.

The committee no doubt realizes that the wartime prices and trade board is carrying on in fact one of the biggest and most important businesses in this country. The decisions of the various administrators, as hon. members of the committee know, affect the lives and fortunes of every one of us. I know a good many of those men who have come here to serve in those capacities. I know they have done it not out of a desire to have any government job but out of an honest and sincere desire to help their country in war time. I am satisfied that they are not being overpaid, and I frankly feel that without some accurate knowledge hon. members should be hesitant—I am not suggesting that the hon. member for Davenport took that line—to throw out the suggestion that these officials of the board are getting salaries which are out of line with the service they render. I am convinced from intimate personal knowledge that they are not.

Mr. JOHNSTON (Bow River): They are getting the same salary that they were getting from their companies.

Mr. ABBOTT: In some cases, but not in other cases, and there is no reason why they should not.

Mr. HATFIELD: I should like to ask the parliamentary assistant to the minister how much refined sugar was damaged in Saint John while being held in storage by order of the wartime prices and trade board?

Mr. ABBOTT: I am afraid I have not the information at hand at the moment. I shall make a note of it and see if I can get the information.

Mr. SOPER: I should like to make a few remarks with regard to what the hon. member for Davenport said with respect to the coal business. If anything, the standard of coal we received in the past year was as good as or better than we have received in Canada for a long time. The hon. member referred to twelve tons being burned by certain people, three tons more than a year ago. That is contrary to the experience of most people. Householders throughout Ontario who last year used six to eight tons of coal used one or two tons less this winter. That was reflected in the amount of coal we were obliged to import; and if it had not been for that coal we never would have been able to get through the winter. The hon. member for York South praised the wartime prices and trade board, but then came along with a couple of little digs about short weight, and the coal dealers selling water. I do not know where these gentlemen from the good city of Toronto get their coal, but if I lived there I would move out of Toronto and go some place where I could find honest coal dealers.

Mr. MacNICOL: The hon. member may be quite right in saying that in the very mild winter through which we have just passed, one of the mildest in decades, some private houses in Smiths Falls may have used less coal, or may not have burned the coal, because in the first place it was hard to get and in the second place the price was high. However, I was speaking about people who owned apartment houses and duplexes, who had to supply the coal and whose tenants would not let the janitors cut down on the amount of coal used. I know what I said was correct. The next time I go to Smiths Falls I shall make a few inquiries and find out whether or not the coal sold by my hon. friend was so very fine.

Mr. HATFIELD: I should like to know if order No. 184 of the wartime prices and trade board, prohibiting the setting up of new cooperative associations and organizations is still in effect.

Mr. ABBOTT: I shall have to get that information.

Mr. GERSHAW: While the minister is looking that up I wish to draw to the attention of the committee some additional facts with regard to the beet-sugar industry. This afternoon the hon. member for Lambton gave a very fine review of the whole situation. He dealt with some of the assistance this government has given to the beet-sugar industry, but still I find that the quantity produced in 1943 was not as great as in 1942. For instance, the seeded area was 64,000 acres in 1942 and only 52,000 acres in 1943, and of course the yield was considerably less. This is an unfortunate situation, because some places in Canada are admirably suited to the production of sugar beets. There are the warmer areas of Ontario, the maritimes, the Okanagan valley and particularly places in Alberta where there is the maximum amount of sunshine, the richest soil, and good irrigation.

I want to make an earnest plea for an increase in the production of sugar from the home grown raw material, because we can produce these beets so well, particularly on irrigated land, and the benefits are so great. It will provide a great deal of employment in the immediate post-war period, which is surely an important coansideration. A great deal of coal, a great deal of lime rock, a great deal of coke; boxes, lumber, nails, bags, and various supplies of that kind are required. It produces freight for the railways and pays a good deal of money to farmers and factory workers. In giving evidence before a committee of this house the president of a large sugar company said that he knew of no industry which provided so much employment, not only for those actually handling the commodity but in connection with the materials used in the distribution of the product. Chemically there is no difference between cane sugar and beet sugar; they conform to exactly the same formula. At times it has been said that beet sugar has some disadvantages, but under modern refining methods there is absolutely no difference; I think that has been amply proven.

I particularly want to draw this to the attention of the parliamentary assistant because $35,000,000 has been spent in connection with irrigation in southern Alberta. Those irrigated districts are made much more profitable and the people on them are much more prosperous when there is a sugar-beet factory in the vicinity. There are such large areas as the eastern irrigation district around Brooks, and the western irrigation district farther west, where great quantities of beets could be produced, where the supply would be reliable, and where a sugar-beet factory would help greatly to assure the prosperity and stability of the people on the land. This industry means so much to the whole economic and social welfare of the people that I urge those in charge to give additional encouragement so that its benefits may be felt all through the Canadian economy, possibly in the way of freight rate reductions, tariff concessions, or further concessions in regard to the excise tax. I believe there are great possibilities for post-war employment and post-war reconstruction in making use of water, which is now flowing down to the sea for irrigation purposes, and then stabilizing those irrigation districts with beet sugar factories.

Mr. STIRLING: I should like to ask the parliamentary assistant to discuss the question of canned vegetables from the point of view of the orders which have restricted the amount reaching the public. On January 1 about nine and a quarter million dozen cans of vegetables were in the hands of canners and wholesalers, despite the fact that last year was less than an ample year of production. By April 1 that figure had been reduced to something under six and a quarter million dozen cans in the hands of canners and wholesalers, but that was a million dozen more than on the previous April 1, again despite the fact that last year's crop was not ample. It is true, I believe, that the restrictions were removed at the end of April, but the view I take is that the restrictions were maintained too long, because we have passed through those months of late winter when the consumer would have been glad to buy canned vegetables, and now that the restrictions are off and it is easier for the consumer to get the canned goods the fresh vegetables are coming onto the market.

I maintain that this is an unnecessary quantity of canned vegetables to have in the hands of canners and wholesalers; and, with the restrictions having been kept on for so long, that quantity will probably remain in their hands instead of the quantity being reduced on the eve of what looks like a year of very big production. I know that one reason why these quantities have been held is to make sure that the very large quantities required for our forces and those of the allies shall be available. But I think that, with the experience of the past to guide the board, the restrictions have been kept on longer than necessary and that now there is an opportunity for the retailer to have rather more for disposal to the public than he should have. The public is moving on to buy the fresh vegetables and the stores of the wholesalers are having too many cans of vegetablese held on hand when it may be expected that a very large amount of canning will be forthcoming in this season.

Mr. ABBOTT: I will bring my hon. friend's comments to the attention of the board. As he has pointed out, the restrictions were removed on the 1st of May. It may be that they could or should have been removed a bit earlier, but as he himself has said, we often learn a good deal by experience. The point is that they are now removed. I suppose it is safe to say that they will not be reimposed unless it is felt that they are really necessary for the purposes suggested. The hon. member for Victoria-Carleton asked about order 184, with regard to cooperatives going into business. Order 184 was subsequently amended by order 284 and finally amended on the 15th of this month by order 400. Order 184, originally imposed in November, 1942, imposed restrictions on the establishment, acquisition and extension of new business of all kinds, not only cooperatives but all new business, and when the original order was passed it was felt that there was need of a general curtailment of civilian activity to permit a more rapid expansion of war production. It was felt that the existing manufacturing and distributing facilities should be adequate, except in a few special cases, to handle available supplies of civilian goods and that new productive activities should be devoted to meet the rapidly increasing war demands. To-day the war requirements remain heavy and must continue to have first call on production, but the rate of expansion of war production is not as great as during the period when orders 184 and 284 were in existence. Shortages continue to exist in many lines of civilian goods and these are unlikely to disappear for some time. However, there may be some types of civilian production that can be undertaken without interfering with the full war effort, and for other types preparations and plans must be made many months in advance of actual production. It was considered that decisions concerning the nature of so many new enterprises can be taken better by those who desire to undertake these enterprises than by government agencies, and for these reasons the administration of order 284 is adapted in the light of conditions now applicable. As hon. members will no doubt have seen, the order was modified by order 400 to provide in effect that while new businesses must still get a licence to operate in order that a record may be kept of such new businesses, these licences will be granted, generally speaking, readily, almost as a matter of course, but on the understanding, as pointed out to the applicant when he gets his licence, that no assurance is given him in the granting of the licence that he will receive a quota of goods which may be in short supply. In other words, the licence to do business is more or less in the nature of a hunting licence, if I may so describe it. The applicant is free to go into business, but he must take a chance on being able to get an adequate supply of scarce goods and without reference to the board.

Mr. GREEN: Does that apply to men discharged from the forces?

Mr. ABBOTT: Yes.

Mr. GREEN: In other words, if they come back and try to set up in business, do they get no assurance of supplies?

Mr. ABBOTT: They have to get a licence the same as anyone else. I am advised in the case of returned men that an attempt is made to give them a quota where they are reestablishing a business in which they were engaged prior to joining the armed forces. In other words, they are put in a preferred position. They get their licence, but in addition to that an attempt is made to provide them with a quota if they were in a line of business which used scarce goods where a quota is required.

Mr. GREEN: That is only in cases where they were in business before enlistment?

Mr. ABBOTT: Yes.

Mr. GREEN: It would not apply to a young chap taking his discharge who had not been in business previously?

Mr. ABBOTT: In that case he should endeavour to go into a line of business which does not require articles in short supply. I am referring to things like sugar, tea, and coffee, which are rationed on a quota basis, and that applies to a good many other things such as hardware, where there is definitely a short supply. In the interests of the general stability of the civilian economy, you cannot have people coming in and establishing new businesses in those particular lines where there is a definite shortage of stock-in-trade. That situation may correct itself very quickly. Those articles in short supply to-day, in four or six months' time may be in adequate supply; but I do not think it can be said as a definite statement that the returned man going into new business which he has not been in before, can be assured of a quota of stock-in-trade which is of a type in short supply.

Mr. HATFIELD: Should he not have a preference to become established in a new business?

Mr. ABBOTT: Every consideration will be given if he has been in that line of business before, and an attempt will be made to give him a quota. But where a particular type of commodity is definitely in short supply it is subject to the equitable distribution policy of the board, and it would simply create a chaotic condition in the distribution system to allow an unlimited or even a large number of new entrants into that particular field.

Mr. HATFIELD: Suppose he wanted to go into canning farm produce?

Mr. ABBOTT: That is not in short supply. I am referring to such things as hardware, steel products. These are definitely subject to the equitable distribution policy, and the wholesalers are obliged to allocate available supplies to their customers in an equitable manner in accordance with purchases in the base period. It is a form of rationing, of course.

Mr. WEIR: I am obliged to the Parliamentary Assistant to the Minister of Finance for the assurance he gave a moment or two ago that there was no discrimination in the policy of the board with respect to the issuing of licences for new businesses as between cooperatives and other organizations. That is a desirable provision, and I hope it will be followed out. I have a little experience in that regard and I can confirm what he has said this evening in this matter. Listening to the discussion this afternoon and evening, I wonder what the general public's reaction will be. I am bound to say that when one goes about the country, the one feature of the government's domestic policy that is held up with greater acclaim than probably any other is the price control arrangements; and when we consider that along with the government's attempt to avoid inflation, I do not see how the two features of the government programme can be separated. But when we have a discussion in the House of Commons that seems to be a pretty general condemnation, certainly of many features of that programme, I wonder how the public will react to it. There have been cases where controls have not been exercised and we have experienced runaway prices. I refer particularly to used materials such as farm implements, tractors, used cars and things of that kind. In these cases it was found necessary to take action afterwards.

There are two classes in the community which are deserving of special mention in connection with the carrying out of the government's programme of price control and of rationing. Rationing is not a thing that everybody likes, but at least it is the idea of sharing so that everyone will have an opportunity of getting the goods that are available. The two classes which I think are particularly deserving of credit for what they have done are the retail country merchant and the automobile or gasoline dealer. From my observation these two classes of trades people have had more details to take care of and more trouble with respect to looking after coupons and that kind of thing than anybody else. I am bound to say that in the part of the country from which I come there have been few of them who have had any complaints. In nearly every case they have come forward and said that they hoped the government would extend its rationing or sharing policies to other articles that they were finding it difficult to handle. Those two classes certainly supported the government's efforts in the carrying out of these control measures.

I am surprised when I hear individual items picked out and condemned. If there are weaknesses in the policy they should be eliminated. I have met people from the United States who look upon our accomplishments with respect to price control as being splendid. They are particularly pleased with the enforcement of the control. You cannot have one without the other. I was talking to a business man in my town not so long ago and he put it in this way: having regard to the policy that was being carried on during this period of the war as compared with the last war, we are better off to-day. As he said after the last war when the inflationary period had got under way and the bubble had broken, business men simply went to their offices every morning to look at their inventories in order to see what their previous day's losses had been. That is the experience they had. The reaction of these business men is that every effort possible should be made to maintain the price ceiling so that business and the community generally will not get into a condition such as occurred at the close of the last war.

I think the country generally is behind the government's price control measures. Where weaknesses have been shown up, where individual items have been dealt with in a manner that was not the soundest, they have been rectified. It was a new policy and mistakes were bound to creep in, but I think the whole thing has been handled in a creditable manner.

I wish to say one thing more with respect to the general condemnation that has been made of many of the officials of the board and its policies. I have had some dealings with these gentlemen and I am bound to say that I have found them to be courteous; I found them to be men who knew their job; I found them to be men who were able to give me a reasonable explanation for the policy they were pursuing. I do not want anyone to think for one moment that I was able to persuade them to my point of view with respect to any particular matter we might happen to be discussing, but they were able to present the job they were doing in an understandable and reasonable manner. I think that much should be said for them. They are carrying out the policy in a practical and reasonable way; they are reasonable in their approach to it.

Mr. JOHNSTON (Bow River): Would the parliamentary assistant give us the details of the recent amendment to the business order?

Mr. ABBOTT: I described it, perhaps rather sketchily, a few minutes ago. It is order 400, which amends order 284, which in turn amended order 184. Substantially the effect of the amending order is that while a licence is still required by a new entrant into business or for the expansion of existing business, it will be granted readily—I put it almost as a matter of course—but upon the understanding that the granting of a licence does not entitle an applicant to a quota of goods which are in short supply. In other words, the new entrant into business is given, as I put it, more or less of a hunting licence. He is allowed to go into business as he would under normal conditions, but we have to issue a licence in order to have a record of the number of people in business. He gets his licence almost as a matter of course. If he is going into a business where inventories are in short supply he will have no assurance that he will be given a quota.

Mr. JOHNSTON (Bow River): I am grateful to the parliamentary assistant for giving that explanation. There should be no difficulty in a man who wanted to open up a new coal mine getting a licence?

Mr. ABBOTT: None whatever.

Mr. JOHNSTON (Bow River): I am glad to hear that. There was an article in to-day's Journal—

Mr. ABBOTT: That is so far as wartime prices and trade board is concerned; I cannot answer for munitions and supply.

Mr. JOHNSTON (Bow River): I am dealing with the wartime prices and trade board. This article refers to the shortage of coal, and it goes on to state that the coming winter may be one of the worst we have ever had as far as obtaining coal is concerned. I had a case which I took up with the wartime prices and trade board and the thing has been going along for some time. This man was trying to get a licence to operate a mine. He went to the board in Calgary and he was told that a licence could not be issued. This was a strip mine and he wanted to get it ready for this fall. He had spent a considerable amount of money in getting the mine ready for operation.

Mr. ABBOTT: This amending order 400 only came into effect on May 15 and perhaps the case to which the hon. member is referring was put forward before it came into force.

Mr. JOHNSTON (Bow River): Probably that is true, because I have a letter from the wartime prices and trade board dated May 20 in which they state that a new amendment had just been made. That would correspond with what the parliamentary assistant has just said. As I say, this man had spent a considerable amount of money in stripping this mine, several thousand dollars, I understand. He went ahead with this mine on the advice of an official in the wartime prices and trade board. I am not going to give his name because I do not think that is necessary. He continued with his work until he reached the point where he decided there was no use in going ahead and spending more money. Yet we are told that there is to be a shortage of coal this winter. There should be no hesitancy in granting a licence to this particular individual. As far as I know he has not as yet been given a licence.

Mr. HATFIELD: They are paying bonuses to open up new mines.

Mr. ABBOTT: If the hon. member will give me the name I shall have the matter looked into right away.

Mr. JOHNSTON (Bow River): I will drop the parliamentary assistant a letter to-morrow giving him the details. I think this is a matter that can be cured with his assistance.

Mr. WEIR: The matter to which I wish to refer for a moment may not come strictly within the purview of the Department of Finance although, when one considers it from the point of view of rationing of food and the maintaining of food supplies, I believe it will be in order. I have had a number of complaints from ladies with respect to what has happened to their fruits in sealers. They claim that the rubber used last year in the jar rings was very poor. Many representations have been made with respect to this important matter judging from the number of complaints I have had, if no assurance can be given that the trouble will be remedied I fear it will mean that a good deal of canning and preserving will not be done this year. I should like to emphasize the importance of that to the parliamentary assistant, and if he can give any assurance I would certainly appreciate it.

Mr. ABBOTT: I will be very brief. This is a most important matter and has been receiving constant attention both by the board and by the Department of Munitions and Supply. As the committee knows, since Pearl Harbor one of the most critical materials has been rubber. Every effort has been made to conserve this very important commodity. The technical officers of the Department of Munitions and Supply, the Department of Agriculture, the wartime prices and trade board and the national reasearch council have all been looking into the question, and I am advised that several months ago they developed specifications which it is believed will provide satisfactory rings.

Mr. WEIR: Are you sure?

Mr. ABBOTT: We are not sure. You can never be sure about anything. I asked my wife about this situation and she told me that last year we put up a good many jars of preserves and vegetables. Perhaps owing to her skill as a preserver none of them turned bad. She used the ordinary rings which were available. All I can say to the committee is that the problem is receiving the earnest attention both of the Department of Munitions and Supply and of the board, and it is hoped that the rings which will be available this year will be satisfactory. Incidentally it has been decided that synthetic rubber is not suitable for these jar rings, and the very highest grade of reclaimed rubber is being used.

Mr. FAIR: May I ask what happens in the case of a partnership of two men who have been in business when one buys out the other. The one who retains the business is all right, but what happens to the other fellow, if he wants to enter into business again?

Mr. ABBOTT: He can get a permit to enter business, as I explained to the hon. member for Bow River.

Mr. FAIR: But he would not have a quota.

Mr. ABBOTT: If the business were one dealing with something in short supply he would have to take his chance on getting a quota. The partner who continued in business would retain the quota that went with that business.

Mr. KNOWLES: I should like to deal with an item related to wartime prices and trade board order No. 223, which is an order respecting the distribution and use of print paper within Canada. I may point out that earlier this evening charges were hurled back and forth across the floor that members were indulging in partisan political debate. Before anyone makes any charge of that kind may I say quite frankly that I am going to speak briefly about a matter that has special reference to a political party. There is, of course, only one party that I would speak about. The Manitoba section of the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation, like a number of other sections of our party, publishes a paper. It is called the Manitoba Commonwealth. I have copies of it in my hand.

One thing is clear. This is a political paper and has been from its start. Its whole aim is to educate the people of Canada as to the superiority of the policies of the C.C.F. On May 16 of this year the director of publishing, of the Publishing, Printing and Allied Industries Administration, Mr. F. F. Macnab, wrote to Mr. Lloyd Stinson, editor of the Manitoba Commonwealth at 411 Confederation Life building, Winnipeg, Manitoba, informing him that during 1943 this paper had over-used its quota and that until some proposal came forward from the editor as to how this overuse was to be made good, permit would be withheld for the Manitoba C.C.F. to continue the publication of its paper. Mr. Stinson, the editor, and Manitoba C.C.F. provincial secretary, wrote back to Mr. Macnab on May 19 and sent me copies of the correspondence, following which I wrote to Mr. Macnab under date of May 27. I have not had a reply as yet, but I am not complaining unduly of that because there has not been a great deal of time. I rise to bring the matter up to-night because, if I do not do so on this item and the matter is not dealt with satisfactorily, I shall not have another opportunity to do so.

May I point out to the parliamentary assistant that order 223 as a matter of fact may be a little over-generous. I am not complaining about the order at all. But its terms are such that there should be no restriction on paper for this publication because section 4 (b) reads as follows:

> 4. This order shall not apply to
> (b) any newspaper or other periodical which, in the opinion of the administrator, is published by any religious, charitable, philanthropic, educational, scientific, professional, political, labour or other non-profit organization.

I point out that the paper is published—and this is very clear from its masthead—by a political party, the Manitoba section of the C.C.F.

Mr. ABBOTT: What about the proviso? My hon. friend appreciates that, "provided always that the exemptions granted," and so forth.

Mr. KNOWLES: I will read the proviso:

> Provided always that the exemptions granted by this section shall not apply to any newspaper or other periodical that is published primarily for advertiseing purposes, or derives its principal earned revenue from advertising.

The proviso does not affect this paper because it is not published primarily for advertising purposes, nor does it derive its principal revenue from advertising, but from subscriptions and from donations of members of the party to sustain the publication of the paper.

Mr. ABBOTT: If those facts are as stated I am advised that the newspaper will receive a certificate of exemption under this section.

Mr. KNOWLES: I am very glad to hear that. We were aware of the fact that other political parties seemed to get increased quotas of paper. The paper known as Public Opinion, for instance—

Mr. GRAYDON: It is the quality of that paper that gives it a preference.

Mr. KNOWLES: I may say to the leader of the opposition that it is partly because of the tremendous amount of advertising which Public Opinion has given to the C.C.F. that there has been an increase in our subscriptions and we need more paper to meet that increase. The increase is due to the advertising which has been given to the C.C.F. not only by Public Opinion but also by the circulation of the Saskatchewan Liberal. These papers are giving the C.C.F. so much publicity that our circulation has increased, and that is the reason for the requirement of extra paper. I am very glad indeed to have the assurance of the parliamentary assistant that there will be no difficulty about getting it. I was sure that there must have been a mistake.

Item agreed to.

Commodity Prices Stabilization Corporation, $140,000,000.

Mr. NOSEWORTHY: When the estimates of the Minister of Agriculture were before the committee there was brought to his attention the subsidy that was supposed to have been paid on potatoes, and I think that matter should be brought up on this item. I have received a number of communications from the potato growing sections of New Brunswick which I visited last fall, and I have in my files a number of newspaper clippings pointing out that there was supposed to have been a subsidy paid by this corporation on early potatoes.

The information I have is that one dealer in this particular part of the province, and one private grower at least, received subsidies on the quantities of potatoes that they shipped out in July and August. I have information that one of the shippers distributed the subsidy to his growers and that this ran anywhere from $90 to $1,000. Apparently he is about the only shipper who took advantage of that, or took advantage in time to get a subsidy. Then something happened, and other growers and shippers have been unable to get that subsidy. The row which has developed over that is that, according to my information, the enterprising shipper who took advantage of the situation and secured the subsidy was a former Liberal candidate. That has raised considerable political turmoil. I think the parliamentary assistant should give us some information as to what the situation is.

Mr. MARSHALL: I think that, with a corporation such as this, spending so large an amount of money from the treasury, we should have a full and complete report from the minister. I should also be glad if he would bring the financial statement of this Commodity Prices Stabilization Corporation up to date as to the operations. Has he the figures with respect to the operations of this company, we will say to the end of the last financial year?

Mr. ABBOTT: On the point just raised by my hon. friend, I had not anticipated that we would be fortunate enough to reach the estimates of the Commodity Prices Stabilization Corporation this evening. However, we have done so. It is five minutes to eleven. I expected to have the officers of the corporation on the floor in front of me in order to assist me in explaining some of these figures. Perhaps in the circumstances the committee would be willing to call it eleven o'clock.

Progress reported.

On motion of Mr. Ralston the house adjourned at eleven o'clock until Thursday at four o'clock p.m.

Thursday, June 1, 1944

The house met at four-thirty o'clock.

VACANCY

RESIGNATION OF MEMBER FOR THE ELECTORAL DISTRICT OF WEYBURN

I have accordingly issued my warrant to the chief electoral officer to make out a new writ of election for the said electoral district.

PRIVILEGE

MR. POULIOT—REFERENCE TO INCIDENT IN DEBATE IN COMMITTEE OF SUPPLY ON MAY 29

Mr. JEAN-FRANÇOIS POULIOT (Temiscouata): Mr. Speaker, now that your Honour is in the chair I have to rise, in the full house, on a question of privilege which affects every member of parliament. The matter is very serious. We have just heard an honoured guest state that we shall not be slaves of despots and tyrants, and that democracy shall be observed throughout the world.

There are three committees of the whole house. One of them is the committee of the whole, so-called; another is the committee of supply, and the third is the committee of ways and means. The house ignores officially what happens before one of those three committees, and, as I was victimized while one of those committees was sitting, it is my duty, sir, to inform you officially of what occurred on Monday while the house was sitting in committee of supply, and when the item for general administration of the senate was before that committee. And I will do so with the feeling that the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Ralston) recalls the well-known grace of my race.

The question that is of the utmost importance to all members of parliament, jointly and severally, as well as individually, is to know how many times a member of parliament has to withdraw a statement made in the house; and also, sir, if a minister can distort with impunity a statement made by a minister, and then call on the Chair for the withdrawal of a statement which comes from the lips of the minister and not from the mouth of the member who is supposed to withdraw the statement.

There is a well-known rule of the house forbidding members of parliament to impute motives to their colleagues. It will be enough to remind Your Honour of standing order 43, paragraph (1):

> No member may speak twice to a question except in explanation of a material part of his speech which may have been misquoted or misunderstood, but then he is not to introduce any new matter, and no debate shall be allowed upon such explanation.

Which means, as you know so well, sir, that provided that parliamentary language is used in a statement made by a member, if that statement is not reported correctly a member has the right to mention to the house what he has said. And how many times do members of parliament rise in this house to correct statements which appear in Hansard, in order to remove any doubt about the way they have expressed themselves on any matter which has come before the house? At page 3345 of Hansard we find the chairman stating that I had used the following words in speaking about the senate:

> They have completely lost any sense of shame in the senate, and with the exception of two or three—

Mr. SPEAKER: The hon. gentleman is rising to a question of privilege in connection with a matter which was dealt with in committee of supply and upon which no report has been made to the house. Therefore the house is not in position to deal with the matter. If the hon. gentleman has any authority to show that he has the right to bring before the house something which was dealt with in committee of supply and there decided, I will listen to it. I know of no authority to permit the hon. gentleman to bring a question of this nature before the house and ask the house to deal with that which has already been decided in committee of supply.

Mr. POULIOT: It is a most unusual case—

Mr. SPEAKER: That is the reason why I interrupted the hon. gentleman. I know of no procedure to permit this. If the hon. gentleman can submit to me a rule of the house which would enable him on a question of privilege to deal with something already dealt with in committee of supply, I shall be glad to listen to him.

Mr. POULIOT: I thank Your Honour for your question, which I will answer as satisfactorily as possible. The case I refer to is unprecedented in the annals of parliamentary history. There is no case that can be quoted where a minister of the crown has distorted and falsified what has been said by an hon. member.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. SPEAKER: The hon. member knows that such language addressed to any hon. member of the house cannot be maintained.

Mr. POULIOT: I know that.

Mr. SPEAKER: The hon. member will have to withdraw.

Mr. POULIOT: I withdraw, but the word "distorted" was not complained of when I used it in committee and when—

Mr. SPEAKER: The hon. member is speaking in the house and I rule that the word "distorted" cannot be used with regard to any hon. member. I ask the hon. gentleman to withdraw.

Mr. POULIOT: I will withdraw anything that is unparliamentary, but I say that the minister put in my mouth things that I never said. I complain bitterly of this because I have been called to withdraw a statement that I have never made. They were imputed to me. According to the whole parliamentary practice a member of parliament has the right to make a statement and to say exactly what he has to say for the defence of his rights and privileges in the House of Commons.

Mr. SPEAKER: I will admit that the hon. member has the right to rise to any question of privilege, but the hon. member well knows that a question of privilege should be taken up at the time the breach of privilege complained of occurs. The hon. gentleman had the right in committee of supply to make his protest with regard to any statement that was made, but there is no question of privilege when he brings before the house a matter which has not been reported to the house and which, therefore, cannot be dealt with.

Mr. POULIOT: If you will permit me, no question of privilege can be taken up in the committee. A point of order can be raised and then reported to the Chair. It was impossible for me to do that at the time because the notes had not been transcribed. I did not have the notes and I could not appeal the ruling to Your Honour so that Your Honour could decide upon it. Your Honour will agree that a question of privilege is similar to a point of order, but a question of privilege cannot be decided by the chairman of any one of the three committees already mentioned. That is one reason. The second reason is that the reporter's notes were not transcribed at the time. The third reason is that a member of parliament has the right to bring up a question of privilege before the house at any time in connection with anything that has happened in any committee. I do not want to use any offensive language; I only want to protest against the manner in which I was victimized on Monday last.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. SPEAKER: The hon. member is now making a charge which can only be a reflection upon the Chair when the committee of supply was sitting. He has said that he was victimized. After all, the chairman of the committee of supply would be ruling with regard to order. The hon. gentleman cannot say that he has been victimized.

Mr. POULIOT: I did not say that I was victimized by the Chair; I say I was victimized by one of my colleagues, who happens to be the Minister of National Defence.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. SPEAKER: The hon. member is now travelling farther afield. I must rule that there is no question of privilege involved. I have already stated that I have no authority to deal with a matter which was dealt with in committee of supply and not reported to the house, nor has the hon. member been able to quote any authority which would justify a question of privilege at the moment. I am therefore ruling that there is no question of privilege.

Mr. POULIOT: May I ask Your Honour if I may take it up when the house goes into committee of supply or committee of ways and means?

Mr. SPEAKER: I would not wish to give judgment at the moment on a matter which is so unusual. I shall be glad to consider the matter.

Mr. McNEVIN: The hon. member for Témiscouata said that he has been victimized by the Minister of National Defence. He should withdraw that statement.

Mr. POULIOT: I will ask the—

Mr. SPEAKER: Order. The matter is closed.

MR. KNOWLES—ADDRESS OF PRIME MINISTER JOHN CURTIN OF AUSTRALIA

Mr. S. H. KNOWLES (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I rise to a question of privilege. We in this group are grateful to the leader of the official opposition for the gracious manner in which he included all opposition groups when he spoke in connection with welcoming—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. KNOWLES: —the Right Honourable John Curtin.

Mr. SPEAKER: I could not hear the hon. gentleman who has risen to a question of privilege. I have not heard what the question of privilege is.

Mr. KNOWLES: I wish to refer briefly to three things, if I may. First, I want to express appreciation to the leader of the opposition. Second, I want to express appreciation to Your Honour for the courteous way in which you thanked the distinguished speaker on behalf of all of us. In the third place, I want to express the feeling of all of us in this group that at this moment it might be proper for us to place some words of our own upon the record in connection with the address which has just been delivered. I ask Your Honour whether that would be in order as a matter of privilege.

Mr. SPEAKER: I think the suggestion made by the hon. member would properly come from the minister who is leading the house.

Mr. REID: The house was not in session.

Mr. CRERAR: I think the matter might well be left until we reach the order for motions.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES

Third report of the standing committee on miscellaneous private bills.—Mr. Picard.

Third and fourth reports of the standing committee on railways, canals and telegraph lines.—Mr. Dupuis.

First report of the joint committee of the Senate and the House of Commons on relations between the federal government and the city of Ottawa.—Mr. Matthews.

[Mr. Speaker.]

RAILWAYS, CANALS AND TELEGRAPH LINES

Mr. VINCENT DUPUIS (Chambly-Rouville) moved:

That the fourth report of the standing committee on railways, canals and telegraph lines, presented to the house this day respecting reduction in quorum be concurred in.

Mr. GRAYDON: May I ask if this report contains anything more than simply a request to reduce the quorum?

Mr. DUPUIS: Nothing else, and that was agreed to unanimously in the committee.

Motion agreed to.

PRIME MINISTER OF AUSTRALIA

ADDRESS TO MEMBERS OF THE SENATE AND OF THE HOUSE OF COMMONS TO BE PRINTED IN THE OFFICIAL REPORT OF DEBATES

Hon. T. A. CRERAR (Minister of Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, in the absence of the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) I beg to move, seconded by the hon. Minister of Justice (Mr. St. Laurent):

That the address of the Right Hon. John Curtin, Prime Minister of Australia, delivered before the members of the Senate and of the House of Commons of Canada in the chamber of the House of Commons on Thursday, June 1, 1944, be included in the House of Commons Debates and form part of the permanent records of this parliament.

Mr. S. H. KNOWLES (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, if I may speak to this motion, I should like to say that I am very glad to support it, and we are happy that included among the speeches to be recorded will be the very gracious words of the leader of the opposition (Mr. Graydon) in which he spoke on behalf of all opposition groups in welcoming the Right Hon. John Curtin to the floor of this chamber. I feel, too, that I should like to take this opportunity of saying to you, Mr. Speaker, that no one could have done better than Your Honour in expressing the appreciation of all members of this house to Mr. Curtin for his memorable address.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. KNOWLES: Mr. Speaker, whether it is in order or not, I intend to say that you bring honour to this house on all such occasions. However, on an occasion such as this we of this group feel that some words of our own might properly be spoken, so that I should like to say on behalf of the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation that we join with particular pleasure in the wholehearted welcome which has been extended to the Prime Minister of Australia. He comes to us as the representative of a great people, for whom the citizens of Canada have the highest regard. We join in asking Mr. Curtin, as has already been suggested to him, that he take back to his fellow-citizens of Australia the good wishes of the Canadian people.

Mr. Curtin comes to us as the Prime Minister of the Commonwealth of Australia—

Mr. MACDONALD (Kingston City): Mr. Speaker, I rise to a point of order. The greetings to the Prime Minister of Australia were expressed by the Prime Minister of this country and by the leader of the official opposition, and I do not think it is in order for the member for Winnipeg North Centre to endeavour to get in on this welcome in the way that he is attempting to do at this moment.

Mr. KNOWLES: I am afraid I shall have to raise a point of order. The hon. minister is imputing motives.

Mr. MACDONALD (Kingston City): I am not imputing motives, but if this is to be allowed, the result will be that any member of the house can get up and have a part in welcoming the Prime Minister of Australia or any other distinguished visitor. The welcome to Mr. Curtin did not take place in the house; Mr. Speaker was not in the chair, nor was the chairman of committees in the chair. It is a matter entirely outside the house. A welcome was expressed to Mr. Curtin by the leader of the official opposition (Mr. Graydon) on behalf, I understood, of all opposition groups, and if my hon. friend is to be allowed the privilege of having his welcome go on Hansard I see no reason why every other hon. member of the house cannot get up and do the same thing.

Mr. SPEAKER: I do not wish to deprive the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre of the opportunity of making his statement, but it is most unusual in my experience and in the experience, I think, of this parliament to have such statements made by private members. Nor do I think the motion is debatable.

Mr. HOMUTH: And it is a most unusual party.

Mr. SPEAKER: Therefore I must ask the hon. member to desist from any further remarks along the line he is making. The motion is now before the house and it is not debatable. I do not find that it comes within any standing order which would enable it to be debated, and I must therefore put the motion to the house.

Mr. DUPUIS: Might I be allowed one word, Mr. Speaker? I do not wish to move an amendment but I would ask this house that the remarks of Your Honour as Speaker of the House of Commons be included in the record.

Mr. SPEAKER: The practice has hitherto been when we have had a meeting such as we have had to-day to include all the speeches within the motion.

Mr. KNOWLES: May I express the same hope, Mr. Speaker?

Motion agreed to.

(For text of address of Prime Minister Curtin, with speeches of welcome and thanks, see page 3453.)

FISHERIES

ANNOUNCEMENT OF EXTENSION OF SUBSIDY AND DEPRECIATION ALLOWANCE IN RESPECT OF CERTAIN VESSELS

Hon. ERNEST BERTRAND (Minister of Fisheries): Mr. Speaker, for the information of the house I would like to say that, with a view to assisting further to increase the productive capacity of the Atlantic fishing industry, the government has decided to extend its plan for subsidizing the construction of fishing vessels so as to make subsidy available to draggers and long-line vessels from fifty-five feet upwards in length when built for groups of four or more Atlantic fishermen. Up to the present the subsidy has been payable only on draggers of seventy-two feet or more.

The subsidy on construction of the smaller vessels will be at the same rate as in the case of the larger craft—$165 per gross ton.

The order in council which has been passed extending the application of the plan also provides that, in computing taxation on income or excess profits, the owners of the vessels may take a special accelerated depreciation allowance up to the whole cost of the depreciable assets in any one year or any group of years within a five-year period from the date of the vessels' registration. This accelerated depreciation will be in lieu of the annual rates of depreciation ordinarily granted under the relevant statutes.

Under another order in council which has been passed the same accelerated depreciation as I have just mentioned will likewise be permitted in the case of all fishing vessels of the schooner class on the Atlantic coast, no matter what their particular type or types, built subsequent to January 1, 1943, and used entirely for fishing purposes for not less than five years after registration.

During the five-year period the owner of each schooner wishing to claim accelerated depreciation allowance under this latter order will be required to submit to the Minister of Fisheries, not later than the last day of February in each year, a statement showing, to the satisfaction of the minister, that the conditions of the order have been fulfilled. The minister, in turn, will submit the statement to the taxation division of the Department of National Revenue. Failure to submit such a statement, or to comply with other conditions of the order in council, will render a vessel ineligible for special depreciation allowance.

Mr. REID: May I be permitted to ask the minister a question? With regard to the first part of his statement, will the deep-sea owners of these boats be granted not only the subsidy but the accelerated depreciation as well?

Mr. BERTRAND (Laurier): Yes

Mr. REID: Both a subsidy and accelerated depreciation?

Mr. BERTRAND (Laurier): There is a subsidy for the draggers and for the long-liners, and accelerated depreciation. There is accelerated depreciation only for schooners.

Mr. KINLEY: I could not hear the minister plainly. Is the effect of the two orders in council that there is no discrimination as between dory fishermen and dragger fishermen in the matter of depreciation and subsidy?

Mr. HOMUTH: Or between Liberals and Conservatives.

Mr. BERTRAND (Laurier): That is a question of policy. We thought that in the case of the schooners we could grant depreciation, and in the case of draggers which have not yet been built of fifty-five feet and over we thought we could grant a subsidy and depreciation.

CANADIAN LEAF PIPE TOBACCO

NATIONAL REGISTRATION

Mr. ROSS (Calgary East):

What procedure is followed to keep the records of the national registration of 1940 up to date in respect to each of the following: (a) changes in address of registrants; (b) marriages of registrants; (c) deaths of registrants; (d) registrations of persons who have attained the age of sixteen or have entered Canada since the general registration of August, 1940, and what were the respective totals of said address changes, marriages, deaths and new registrations received at the central registry in the year 1943?

Mr. MITCHELL: National registration records are kept up to date as far as possible in respect to subjects (a), (b), (c) and (d) through the following arrangements:

(a) Changes of address in most instances are reported to the chief registrar for Canada on printed "Change of Address" one-cent post cards obtainable at any post office in Canada, as provided in the national registration regulations. A considerable number of changes, however, are reported in letters from registrants. As changes are received they are recorded on the master registration cards of the registrants concerned. In the year 1943 the total number of address changes reported was 803,243.

(b) In accordance with the national registration regulations declaration of marriage forms are available at any post office in Canada. On completion of these forms the postmaster (all postmasters are designated as deputy registrars in the national registration regulations) supplies the wife with a new registration certificate in her married name and forwards the completed form to the chief registrar for Canada. On receipt of the forms at the central registry the name is changed on the master card and the date of her marriage is recorded. The change of conjugal condition and the date thereof is recorded on the husband's master card. The form provides for the reporting of the old and new address of both the husband and wife, and the master cards are revised accordingly. In the year 1943 the total number of marriages reported was 100,523.

(c) Through the cooperation of provincial vital statistics officials the central registry is advised of the deaths of registrants. Arrangements have been made whereby the national registration certificates of deceased persons are collected and forwarded to the central registry by funeral directors. In the year 1943 the total number of deaths reported was 64,585.

(d) Postmasters in their capacity of deputy registrars, register young persons as they attain the age of sixteen, issuing to them national registration certificates. The completed master cards are forwarded by the postmasters to the central registry, where they are incorporated into the records. The registration of persons who have entered Canada since the general registration of August, 1940, and of persons discharged or retired from the armed forces, who were not previously registered, is also performed by the postmasters. In the year 1943 the total number of new registrations received at the central registry was 234,863.

Did the United Brotherhood of Carpenters and Joiners of America, Winnipeg local union No. 343, appeal against the action of the national selective service office, in Winnipeg, in directing one or more members of said union to accept employment with Canada Packers, Limited, at St. Boniface, Manitoba?

2. If so, was the appeal allowed or dismissed?

3. What was the wage rate paid to any member or members of said union while employed with Canada Packers Limited?

4. Was this wage rate less than the rate normally received by members of this union in their regular employment?

5. Did the court of referees recommend to the Minister of Labour that a supplementary allowance be paid to such uuion members, under the provisions of section 212 (4) of the national selective service civilian regulations? If so, has this recommendation been implemented by the minister?

6. If the above-noted recommendation has not been implemented, is consideration being given thereto?

PRIME MINISTER CHURCHILL

SUGGESTED PUBLICATION IN VOTES AND PROCEEDINGS OF SPEECH OF MAY 24

On the orders of the day:

Mr. JEAN-FRANÇOIS POULIOT (Temiscouata): Mr. Speaker, following the motion which has been put by the Minister of Mines and Resources for the publication of Mr. Curtin's speech in our record, would he be good enough to tell the house what has been decided regarding the publication of the last speech made by Mr. Churchill at Westminster, that speech being the sequel of the work of the dominion prime ministers' conference?

Hon. T. A. CRERAR (Minister of Mines and Resources): I am unable to give my hon. friend a definite answer to that question. Hon. members are aware that I was not in the house on Monday or Tuesday. I shall again bring the matter to the attention of the Prime Minister—apparently it has not been brought to his attention—and perhaps my hon. friend can get an answer to-morrow.

Mr. POULIOT: And I will ask my hon. friend not to forget me this time.

CITY OF OTTAWA

JOINT COMMITTEE OF SENATE AND COMMONS TO REPORT ON FEDERAL-MUNICIPAL RELATIONS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. T. L. CHURCH (Broadview): I would like to ask the government a question growing out of the motion reported on page 3327 of Hansard, for a joint committee of the Senate and the House of Commons to report on federal-municipal relations. When the debate was on a month ago it was stated that a committee was to be appointed to deal with the whole general question of all municipal relations with the federal government in a national as well as in a local way. In view of the statement of the Prime Minister and others in that debate when it was announced that a committee was to be appointed, I would ask the government to look into the text of the resolution to see if it could not be broadened along the lines of the debate a month ago to include a national inquiry into municipal and federal relations, because the principles are just the same.

Hon. T. A. CRERAR (Minister of Mines and Resources): I shall bring the matter which my hon. friend has raised to the attention of the Prime Minister. The subject is one with which he has been dealing.

Mr. CHURCH: An inquiry was held in the United States and Australia, and it was national, not local.

WAR APPROPRIATION BILL

PROVISION FOR GRANTING TO HIS MAJESTY AID FOR NATIONAL DEFENCE AND SECURITY

The house resumed from Tuesday, May 30, consideration in committee of a resolution to grant to His Majesty certain sums of money for the carrying out of measures consequent upon the existence of a state of war—Mr. Ilsley—Mr. Bradette in the chair.

DEPARTMENT OF FINANCE

Commodity Prices Stabilization Corporation, $140,000,000.

Mr. POULIOT: I do not intend to speak at great length about this matter, but this is something about which members of parliament have no information at all. The Commodity Prices Stabilization corporation is not mentioned in the dominion government telephone directory. If it is, I would like the parliamentary assistant to tell us—

Mr. ABBOTT: It is under the wartime prices and trade board.

Mr. POULIOT: They go together? I thank my hon. friend for his information. However, it is all the same thing; it is a branch of the wartime prices and trade board. In the commodity prices stabilization corporation, Mr. H. B. McKinnon is the president and Mr. Noble the vice-president, but I do not see the name of anyone who is bilingual, out of twenty persons. Yesterday in the Ottawa Journal there was a news item that referred to the answer given to the hon. member for York South that 293 dollar-a-year men were serving with the prices board. I have made a check in the telephone book of the names of those who appear here and I find only sixteen French names of persons who presumably are bilingual.

The question of the number of French-speaking or bilingual persons who are employed now in major positions in the war departments has been raised in the legislature of Quebec, and I have waited for a long time to take it up here. I will ask the parliamentary assistant to see to it that members of parliament are given some information about the exact number of high officials, bilingual, in these branches as well as in the Bank of Canada and on the foreign exchange control board, and also a description of the positions they hold. There may be a certain number of stenographers, grades 1 and 2, and perhaps 3, who are bilingual, but they occupy minor positions. When it comes to higher positions it is all a closed territory: Bilingual shall not apply.

[Mr. Church.]

I have waited a long time to say this. I had occasion to discuss the matter with some of my colleagues and several English-speaking people outside the House of Commons, and they all agree that the treatment accorded to the bilingual people in this country is something unbelievable, something that has to be remedied. That was said to me in Toronto as well as in Montreal and in London by broad-minded people who understand that the bilingual element in the country cannot be put in a reserve and cannot be treated in the way it has been by all the war departments. If the bilingual people in this country, and especially French Canadians in the province of Quebec, do not have fair treatment, it is not due to the majority of the English-speaking people; it is due to the stubbornness of some English-speaking ministers who do not act with fairness when the question comes up of employing somebody. The one who gets in has to be a close friend of the one who is in already. They are chums, they are pets, and they practice the same favouritism that was twice bitterly condemned unanimously by a civil service parliamentary committee.

My friend, I would say my young friend, the parliamentary assistant (Mr. Abbott), lives in the province of Quebec. He has friends in that province, he is admired in that province, and I am sure he reciprocates those feelings; but I cannot see why some people in the department are showing such stubbornness—I am glad the minister has come in because I would say this to him—in refusing to employ bilingual people in major positions. It is the same in the department of munitions; it is the same in many branches of the Department of National Defence. This is a war appropriation, and I may say that those who speak French are at times ill-treated by some of these fellows.

I have no charge to make against anyone individually; I wish to defend the rights of those who are bilingual, and who should not be ostracized on that account. It is enough to read the list of the high officials—and by that I mean those who have the right to put their name opposite a telephone number under the wartime prices and trade board. Out of approximately 293 there are only sixteen who are bilingual. Is that reasonable?

The province of Quebec is doing very well when it comes to subscriptions to war loans. It is at the top. The first place to reach its quota was a place in my county. Montreal is doing exceedingly well, and even the small centres do very well, much better than other parts of the country. But when it comes to practical matters, when it comes to being given a chance, the bilingual men, especially from the province of Quebec, find the door closed. I protest most energetically against it and appeal to the good sense of the Minister of Finance. I will tell him that if no correction is made the people will remain of the opinion that it is due to the ministers themselves if the good people of my province have no better chance in the public service.

Mr. CHURCH: When this corporation was first appointed I brought to the attention of the house certain principles and facts about this policy which started its infancy in 1941. At that time early in the war things needed more control than they do now, and some stabilization. This vote has gone from $2,000,000 to $120,000,000 last year, and now it is proposed to make it $140,000,000, although we are near the end of the fifth year of the war. I contended, at that time, and I called it to the attention of the Prime Minister, that the two houses of parliament could broaden out their work and give a branch in another place some real war work such as this which they could consider and report on as is done by the senate at Washington.

The control system has done a good deal of good. There is no doubt about that, particularly at a certain stage of the war. But this stabilization corporation cannot do all the controlling and it is going to defeat the very objects and principles for which it was appointed. I remember Mr. Donald Gordon made a speech in Montreal at the start of this proposal. He said that during the fiscal year they would spend about $2,500,000. I think the Minister of Finance said he did not know exactly what it would be. No doubt he was correct at the time. He did not know what it would be because it was a problematical proposal. Mr. Gordon then made another speech a month later, in Winnipeg, at Easter I think. This second speech was made at Winnipeg. He said it would spend about $2,500,000. It has gone a long way beyond that. Can any business man tell me that he approves the expenditure of $140,000,000 at a time like this on a proposal such as this?

In the first place they applied the proposal to marmalades, jams, and all that kind of product. They waited so long that there was none of it on the shelves of the large and small stores to control. They waited so long that it became just a gamble in subsidies and their distribution, a gamble with unforeseen events. They are gambling with production and distribution. There are many other instances that I could mention. In the mother country they are getting away from that kind of thing and coming back to the old way of doing business and giving the retail man a chance. I know that some good has come out of this corporation. I admit that, but it has not been applied at the right time and it has not been applied to the commodities to which it should have been applied. You can go along the streets of the cities and see certain small retailers closing up. They have gone into the meat and butter business and a great many other articles of food and vegetables and many other things like this. I fail to see where we have been given value for our money.

We now have a consumers' league. From what I have seen and what I have learned about it and from what I know about the articles covered by the consumers' league—some of the gentlemen who compose it are teachers from universities, teachers trying to apply business principles and all that kind of thing to many articles with subsidy hand-outs—all they know about it is what they consume themselves.

I believe that protection is necessary at a certain time in the war, but the situation has all changed; and this is out of all proportion. We propose to spend $140,000,000 when we are told we have no money to build houses or practically no money to supply housing or for the care of soldiers, and when the small retailer and the working classes are asking for fuel and housing and all that kind of thing. While all this is going on we are going to take a big gamble in the manner indicated. I admit that there are some good men in this corporation, but some of them have never had any business training. They have never had any training in competitive business. I raised this question when the minister's estimates were up last year and the year before. A return was brought down on Monday and I notice that the control boards have 156 press agents and liaison officers boosting this proposal. Some of them write editorials and some of them prepare just ordinary write-ups in the newspapers. There is a staff of 156 in the department. I have seen pictures in some of the society papers of the gentlemen who compose some of these controls and the value of their work. While

I have supported the principle I believe it is catering to the big business man who buys in bulk and to some of the trusts along certain lines. It is not carrying out the functions for which it was set up, to prevent spreads and ensure stabilization, and to try to get the necessities of life to the consumer at reasonable prices. It is administered by a few gentlemen. Some of them doubtless have a great deal of capacity and ability. I believe some of the women's branch of the consumers' league do nothing but travel around the country making speeches at community clubs about the fine men and women in the department.

With regard to the consumers' league I fail to see where we are getting value for the money. I believe the time has come when this matter of this corporation should be dealt with by some committee. At Washington a committee of the Senate considers these things. There they have a duplicate house with ours. They have appointed a committee to inquire into these things. There was a complaint here on Monday about this very thing. I voiced that complaint many times about another branch in another place and the Prime Minister told me in 1941 and 1942 and 1943 that we were going to have a meeting with the other place and try to draft out some way by which those controls could be reviewed by a joint committee and other matters like that.

Mr. FRASER (Peterborough West): Would the parliamentary assistant—

Mr. CHURCH: I should like to have some explanation from the parliamentary assistant as to the increase of $20,000,000.

Mr. ABBOTT: I might give the break-down. Perhaps it will serve my hon. friend's purpose if I give him a break-down of the $140,000,000. The break-down is as follows:

Subsidies—Domestic
Fruits and vegetables—canned dried, etc.	$ 4,500,000
Footwear—discount on leather	1,000,000
Furniture	500,000
Groceries	2,000,000
Glove and garment leather	750,000
Jams and jellies	1,000,000
Lumber	3,000,000
Meat products	1,000,000
Milk—consumers	25,000,000
Oils and fats	5,000,000
Transportation of foodstuffs	500,000
Wood fuel	3,000,000
Woodenware and wooden containers	3,000,000
Miscellaneous	3,250,000
	$53,500,000
Subsidies—Imports	62,000,000
Total subsidies	$115,500,000

The committee will understand, if they have read the report of the wartime prices and trade board, that the Commodity Prices Stabilization Corporation Limited imports certain commodities in bulk, and in some cases takes trading losses on those in order that they may be sold to the consumer at ceiling prices. The estimated trading losses total, whether realized or not, amounts to $20,000,000. The details are as follows:

Trading losses
Alcohol—industrial	$ 2,500,000
Citrus juices	700,000
Cocoa beans	500,000
Coffee	1,000,000
Cotton yarns and fabrics	3,000,000
Dried fruits	5,000,000
Oils and fats	4,000,000
Miscellaneous	3,300,000
	$20,000,000

Then, too, we have an estimate of $1,500,000 for administrative expenses, and $3,000,000 for the Wartime Food Corporation Limited, making up the grand total of $140,000,000 as covered by the estimate.

Mr. NOSEWORTHY: On Tuesday I asked the parliamentary assistant for a statement with respect to potatoes. Could we have it to-day?

Mr. ABBOTT: Perhaps I might first give a brief background in connection with the potato subsidy. As the committee will recall, about this time last year the supply situation respecting potatoes in Canada was rather difficult. I recall very vividly that almost every day I was being questioned in the house as to what was being done in connection with the supply of potatoes. As a result of that short supply condition it was decided first to pay a subsidy on imported potatoes. Then, since Canadian new potatoes were beginning to come on the market it was felt it would be unfair to Canadian producers to subsidize imported potatoes, without offering a similar subsidy to the producers of Canadian potatoes. In normal times new potatoes are a luxury product, and when they first come on the market they sell at prices higher than those of old potatoes.

The situation last year was such that it was felt that as new potatoes came on the market they would have to be used, in order to fill current requirements. Consequently the ceiling price of new potatoes established in May, 1943 was fixed at the same rate as for old potatoes. At that time it was announced that a subsidy would be paid on domestically grown potatoes. I shall not go into details with respect to that subsidy. Generally speaking however it was to be at the rate of $3.75 per 100 pounds. Perhaps it would be well to give a little more detail than I had intended.

Subsidy was authorized to be paid to persons who purchased new potatoes direct from a primary producer or his agent for resale, provided that no subsidy would be paid on new potatoes purchased at prices f.o.b. original shipping point in excess of the following:

(a) $3.75 per 100 pounds when shipped on or before July 31, 1943;
(b) $3.50 per 100 pounds when shipped between August 1 and 15, 1943, both inclusive.
(c) $3.00 per 100 pounds when shipped between August 16 and 31, 1943, both inclusive.

There was in addition provision for the payment of necessary transportation charges and the allowance for shrinkage equal to five per cent of the maximum wholesale cost as fixed by order 236, which related to the selling price of potatoes. Transportation prices were not recognized in the case of potatoes grown within a radius of fifteen miles of consuming centres. The minimum quantity of new potatoes on which subsidy would be paid is seventy-five pounds.

To ensure that producers would have full opportunity to avail themselves of subsidy arrangements, wide publicity was given through the press, regional offices, wholesale and retail trade and the horticultural council, as respecting the growers and shippers.

The subsidy, as was the case with all these consumer subsidies, was administered by the Commodity Prices Stabilization Corporation. It was an exceedingly difficult subsidy to administer. With hindsight, which is always easier than foresight—

Mr. GRAYDON: And much more prevalent.

Mr. ABBOTT: Yes, and much more prevalent—it is possible that another method would have been decided upon to take care of this situation. The chief difficulty, I believe, arose because in August, a period which hon. members will recall, when the subsidy was at the $3.50 rate and the $3 rate—and I know the hon. member for Victoria-Carleton knows a great deal more about this than I do—the price of potatoes dropped very materially. It is evident now that no subsidy would have been necessary in order to get potatoes. But I think the committee should remember this, that at the time the subsidy was decided upon, and at the time the public, the producers and the dealers were told that such subsidy would be paid, the condition which developed was, of course, not known.

Mr. HATFIELD: The subsidy was payable only under certain conditions.

Mr. ABBOTT: The conditions were fairly well known, and they were the same for everyone. Briefly they were these, that in order to qualify for a subsidy a purchaser must have paid a price not in excess of the figures I have mentioned, namely, $3.75 during one period, $3.50 during another and $3 during a third. The subsidy would cover only the difference between the price he paid, and the wholesale ceiling in the market in which he was selling the potatoes.

In other words, to illustrate, if the wholesale ceiling in the Montreal market was $2.73—and I think that is what it was in August—and the dealer paid $3 per 100 pounds for his potatoes, the subsidy he would be entitled to receive, leaving aside any question of transportation costs, would be 27 cents. If the market price of potatoes on the Montreal market at about that time should fall to $2.40 he obviously would take a loss on his purchase, because he was entitled only to receive a subsidy down to the ceiling price for that market.

That, briefly, outlines the conditions under which the subsidy was payable. The hon. member referred to some claims which he said were made, and which he understood were improper. Complaints have been received by the corporation with respect to claims made by a certain dealer. Those complaints have been investigated, and the corporation has come to the conclusion that those claims concerning which the complaint has been made were imroperly filed, and subsidies improperly paid. A claim has been made for refunding of the subsidy. I do not know that it is necessary to indicate the name of the claimant.

Mr. GRAYDON: Is there only one involved?

Mr. ABBOTT: More than one, I think. I believe there are some producers involved, too. I am not suggesting that there were any improper claims, in the sense that they were fraudulent. The suggestion is that the claim made was not proper within the regulations governing this subsidy, and that consequently the subsidy was not properly paid.

Mr. HATFIELD: Would the investigators' report be available to the committee?

Mr. ABBOTT: I do not think I should make the investigators' report avaliable to the committee. I believe the stand has always been taken, in connection with these government boards, that the report of investigators to their superior officers are privileged documents. I believe that is sound ground.

Mr. HATFIELD: Is it not correct that claims made by other shippers from New Brunswick in August were refused?

Mr. ABBOTT: I am advised that no claims made in proper form and coming within the conditions set out were refused.

Mr. HATFIELD: The board claimed they were not made in proper form. There were other claims made, though.

Mr. ABBOTT: A certain number of claims were made which the corporation came to the conclusion were not within the regulations laid down and they were rejected for that reason. The claims which the corporation decided had not been properly filed and were not payable were not for large amounts. They had not been made within the time limits or under the regulations laid down for the payment of this subsidy.

Mr. HATFIELD: What is the board going to do with regard to refund?

Mr. ABBOTT: I indicated a moment ago that they have notified the person to whom the subsidy was paid that it must be refunded.

Mr. HATFIELD: If it was improperly made, I agree with the parliamentary assistant in that regard. For the information of the committee I may say that there were about twenty shippers in my constituency. There were some in the county of York and some in other counties. Only one shipper out of the twenty put in a claim for the subsidy. He stated that he had paid the producers $3.50 a hundred during the first part of August and $3 a hundred during the latter part. That claim was paid, but the claims put in by other shippers who had shipped the same grade at the same time during August, who had paid the same price, were refused. It seemed that one shipper in the province had a monopoly on the subsidy. We heard about a monopoly on bottles in Nova Scotia, but this seems to be a monopoly on the subsidy. Then the report goes out in the newspapers implying that the other eighteen or nineteen shippers had made a claim for subsidy and had held back the money. They did not do this, and in order to clear the names of the other shippers in the minds of the producers, in order to show that they had not received subsidies by presenting improper invoices, the whole thing should be clarified. I should like the parliamentary assistant to explain how it is going to be clarified.

Mr. ABBOTT: I have indicated that as a result of these complaints and investigations which were made the corporation concluded that the subsidy which had been claimed in the case of one or possibly two shippers had been claimed improperly and that consequently the subsidy had been improperly paid and the return of the amounts paid would be demanded from the particular shipper or shippers. I think two were involved. Presumably if refunds are not made voluntarily the proper legal proceedings will be taken to enforce the claim.

Mr. HATFIELD: There were two shippers involved. One shipper shipped only his own production, and I do not know how you will get a refund. He got in through a loophole in the regulations and I do not know how you will get that back. He could pay himself what he liked for the potatoes. The other shipper bought potatoes and falsified the invoices, which is another matter.

Mr. GRAYDON: After it became known that a subsidy had been paid to one large firm in New Brunswick I understand that the special investigator in the province, Mr. Daniels, who was working under the jurisdiction of the wartime prices and trade board, was sent in to investigate the charges that had been made with respect to the illegal collection of subsidies on the sale of potatoes. This report has caused a good deal of concern in New Brunswick and not a little bit of interest. The local press in New Brunswick have been intensely keen in their requests for a clarification of the situation.

If my memory is not faulty, one local newspaper indicated that one of these firms had been so solicitous for the producers with whom they were dealing that they were able to get a rather substantial subsidy, while other bona fide dealers were placed in the ridiculous light of either not having known that a subsidy was being paid or not knowing how to operate the machinery so that the subsidy could be collected. It seems to me that the parliamentary assistant must do something more with respect to the airing which this matter has been given in the press of New Brunswick than simply say that the report of the special investigator, Mr. Daniels, must not come to light.

I raise this as a matter of principle with respect to the wartime prices and trade board. It is not holy ground that the wartime prices and trade board are treading so far as the public of Canada are concerned. We are not going to allow in parliament an extension of the bureaucratic principle in connection with irregularities—I am not making any charge with respect to that because I have not seen the investigator's report. Parliament is the last line of defence for the taxpayers of Canada, and we have not only the privilege, it is our duty to inquire into what happened to this money and why it was paid illegally. It is not enough for the parliamentary assistant to attempt to hide behind—I do not say that offensively—

Mr. ABBOTT: We are not hiding behind anything.

Mr. GRAYDON: I am not going to take back the words. If the parliamentary assistant wants to object, he may do so. I was trying to be inoffensive, but perhaps I had better use the term, because I think it is more proper than I thought in the first instance. Here is the position in which the parliamentary assistant finds himself. He has the report in his hand—

Mr. ABBOTT: I have not the report in my hand.

Mr. GRAYDON: Perhaps I had better ask a question. If the parliamentary assistant has not the report of Mr. Daniels, I would like him to say so.

Mr. ABBOTT: I have not received the report from Mr. Daniels, if that is his name. I believe he is the chief investigator of the Commodity Prices Stabilization Corporation and has made a report to Mr. Hector McKinnon, president of the corporation.

Mr. GRAYDON: Does that mean that the only way we are going to get information—

Mr. ABBOTT: I have no doubt I can see it if I ask for it as a representative of the minister.

Mr. GRAYDON: We have got into a worse position than I thought we were in in the first instance. The governmental representative, let alone parliamentary representative, has not seen the report. I would not have raised this question quite so prominently at this time if it were not for the fact that I was greatly impressed by the local press having raised this question. The people of New Brunswick are intensely wrought up about the whole situation. In order to protect his own department and the Commodity Prices Stabilization Corporation I think the parliamentary assistant must give to this committee the details of the report made by the special investigator. I hope the parliamentary assistant is not going to take the position that these things are going to be done behind closed doors. We have had plenty of that; I do not think we want an extension of it. I speak this way only because I believe there is a definite principle involved so far as the taxpayers of Canada are concerned.

Mr. NOSEWORTHY: Will the parliamentary assistant tell us in what respect the returns of all the shippers were not correctly filled out? In the second place, when was it discovered that the report made by the shipper who received the subsidy was not properly filed? I would add that press reports indicate that one shipper, a former defeated Liberal candidate, received the subsidy, which has been paid out to the producers in sums ranging from ninety to one thousand dollars each, and further that the books and records of the shipper had been examined by a government inspector before the returns were filed. I think we should know in just what details the returns were incorrect, and when was it discovered?

Mr. ABBOTT: I do not remember the exact date, but complaints were received some months ago, perhaps partly as a result of representations made by the hon. member for Victoria-Carleton, that this particular claimant for subsidy was not entitled to receive it.

Mr. HATFIELD: I never made any such complaint. I wanted to know why, if one shipper received the subsidy other shippers did not?

Mr. ABBOTT: In any event an investigator was sent, either from the Saint John office or from Ottawa, some months ago.

Mr. HATFIELD: Mr. Herson was sent from here.

Mr. ABBOTT: That would be about a couple of months ago. The investigator's report made at that time was that the claimant's books and records showed that his claim was in order. That report was sent to Mr. McKinnon, chairman of the Commodity Prices Stabilization Corporation. The matter was afterwards pressed further by some others, and Mr. McKinnon decided that further investigation should be made. He sent Mr. Daniels, chief inspector of the Commodity Prices Stabilization Corporation, to New Brunswick, and Mr. Daniels made a further investigation. This investigator went farther than the original investigator had done. He went around and saw a lot of farmers from whom these potatoes had been purchased. As a result of the investigation which he made he reported that the claims for subsidy which had been made were not in accordance with the regulations, that some of the statements in the claim were inaccurate, and that in his opinion the subsidy had been improperly paid. That report was received I think within the last week, and it is as a result of that second report by the chief inspector that the claim for refund has been made.

With reference to the request of the leader of the opposition that the report of the chief investigator should be tabled, I am the last man to keep anything back that should be produced. But I suggest that it is not proper to produce to parliament the report of an investigator which is presented to a government department or to the Commodity Prices Stabilization Corporation, which is substantially the same as a government department.

I am no expert in deciding on privileged documents, but while any member is entitled to ask any specific question about any specific detail, I suggest that this is not the type of document which should be producible. I suggest that to produce it would create a dangerous precedent.

The hon. member for York South said to-day, and also the other day, that this particular claimant is a defeated Liberal candidate. He may or may not be; I do not know. My hon. friend has not been here very long and may not know Mr. Hector McKinnon, who is head of the Commodity Prices Stabilization Corporation, as well as many other members know him, but I think every member who does know him knows that Mr. McKinnon who is responsible for passing on the validity of the claims for subsidies, is not influenced by any political considerations. He is not concerned at all with whether a man is a Liberal or a Conservative. I know the payment of these subsidies has nothing whatever to do with a man's political opinions. I do not think the hon. member for Victoria-Carleton would make this suggestion otherwise, but the hon. member for York South has twice by innuendo suggested that the payment may have been influenced by political considerations.

Mr. CHURCH: We are spending money like water on subsidies. This house is divesting itself of all control of the Commodity Prices Stabilization Corporation. When the corporation was created I asked the minister what control parliament had over it, and the reply that was brought down in a return was that the minister leaves the payment of subsidies to the officials of the board. I have seen them making speeches to boards of trade and retail merchants' associations. Then they come along and announce a subsidy.

Item stands.

Progress reported.

After Recess

The committee resumed at eight o'clock.

DEPARTMENT OF FINANCE

Mr. CHURCH: I wish to call the attention of the minister to some features of these stabilization bonuses, subventions and so on, which now amount to $140,000,000. The minister gave a break-down of the figures and it includes for fruits and vegetables, $4,500,000; for discount on footwear, $1,000,000; for furniture, $500,000; groceries, $2,000,000; gloves-leather, $750,000; lumber, $3,000,000, and so on. The trouble with this policy, as I see it, is that it is sectional.

I have confidence in Mr. Hector McKinnon, whom I have known all my life, and I believe that he is a faithful public servant. But politics in this country being what it is, I suggest that the whole principle of bonuses and subventions is bound to be mixed up in politics. I have seen some of the effects produced by premature announcements made by some ladies and gentlemen of the control and consumer league who go around the district from which I come, predicting subsidies. They discuss many of the articles that are covered in the very break-down that the minister gave. Some of these people appear at some dinner, or some other meeting, perhaps, and they make an announcement which I would regard as being tantamount to a tip-off on what is going to be done. Take jams and jellies, in connection with which an amount of $1,000,000 is mentioned. That bonus, and the distribution of it, had been proposed for some weeks, and afterwards it was found that there were no supplies on the shelves of the retail stores or big stores. It may not be so intended, but in my opinion the whole policy operates indirectly against the small businessman, the retail man, while the larger industries, the departmental stores, are well able to take care of themselves. No doubt they do much good work, but the policy may be of advantage to them.

I cannot understand why, when the proposal was first made, when the policy was first started, it did not take into account one of the most important items so far as the householder is concerned. I refer to coal and wood fuel: I cannot see why this item was not included from the first day of the policy. People have to have a fire in their homes for seven or eight months of the year, and there should be a ceiling and subsidy to aid it. They can do without some articles of food for a while but they must always have fuel.

There is another matter I would urge upon the minister. I suggest that some part of the fund should have been utilized for building small houses and for materials in connection therewith, for the benefit of the working classes. The government did go into this policy in 1928, and again in 1936, 1937 and 1938, and some $85,000,000 was spent in bonuses through the banks. The government guaranteed repayment of the money to the banks.

These are two of the main items that should be covered by a stabilization policy of this kind. The growers and shippers also may have a tip-off, I do not know; at any rate I suggest that there is much room for improvement in this matter. This policy should cover necessaries of life for the benefit of the poor people of the country.

Another question I would ask the parliamentary assistant is this. Who audits the business of this corporation? Where is this famous war expenditures committee? Have they control over this $140,000,000? This is a war measure. Has that committee no control over it at all? In a letter he wrote to me some time ago, and which I read in the house, the auditor general said that he had no control over funds which are in the four corners of the war appropriation bill.

I do not wish to throw cold water on this stabilization scheme, because it has done much good for the consumer, but they are spending money like water, and I would point out that on seasonal products the consumer does not get the benefit. I read the market returns for the St. Lawrence market and the markets in the Toronto district and I know there is an increase. Never mind what the index shows; the index is not always correct, at any rate from the point of view of the small people. Take fuel, fuel wood and such things. I believe the proposal was last season that in the larger cities this fund could be used to give seventy-five cents in connection with the hauling of coal, to provide for expenses to the small retail man who has to go to the waterfront and get coal, put it on a cart and take it through the town when the thermometer is low and the roads are bad. This is one matter to which attention might very well be given. A deputation came from the municipalities last winter and made representations in connection with this matter, but the seventy-five cents was not allowed. In my opinion, if ever a case was made out it was made out on that occasion by these people who come from the larger centres of population.

There is a good deal of room for improvement in the administration of the fund and its distribution, because in my opinion it does sometimes savour of politics. It seems to be sectional. I do not know how people can buy strawberries with the prices charged for them. Take the $3,000,000 in connection with lumber. There is scarcity of material, and boards of education are finding it difficult to get lumber and light steel for the construction of buildings.

I suggest that the corporation should hearken to the handwriting on the wall and do something to help the coal industry, especially the small coal dealers, who should be given a small subsidy for delivery. Something should also be done to help the housing situation by the subsidy principle.

Mr. HATFIELD: I am sorry that a mix-up occurred in my constituency, and in all fairness to the board I will say that I do not think a certain shipper, because he was a Liberal candidate in the last provincial election, was given a subsidy on that account. I do not think the board knew what side of politics he was on. I do not know that the shipper and the growers who received the subsidy were all to blame. I understand that this particular shipper came to Ottawa in the month of August and was misled by a Mr.

McEwen of the stabilization board. He went to Mr. McEwen for instructions in the making out of a claim and that gentleman gave him absolutely a wrong idea. He went home and from that wrong idea induced the growers to give him an invoice that was much higher than the price they received for their potatoes. I do not believe that the shipper was all to blame, but I submit that, in order to clarify the situation, the money should be returned; otherwise the other shippers are being left in an invidious position.

I do not think there is any politics in it here, but when it got to New Brunswick politics came into it. They tried to make out that I did not know anything about these regulations, and they also tried to make out that the other shippers received the subsidy, put it in their pockets and did not pay it to the grower, so that it put the other shippers in a very bad light among the growers. I would like to have the whole situation clarified, because I do not think it will put the board in a very good light if the money is not returned. We want some guarantee that the money will be refunded.

I do not believe that the board can justify prosecutions against these people, but, I repeat, the money should be returned. In the first place the subsidy was wrong. When the price of potatoes went down the grower received no subsidy, and when it was up he received the subsidy. That was wrong. With new potatoes that are produced and harvested in July and August the growers get only half a crop and they should have received a bonus or subsidy.

I think the domestic bonus or subsidy should be a floor. I think it is a good idea to encourage the digging of potatoes before they get mature and particularly last year when we had a short supply in June and the first part of July when there were $812,000 paid out in subsidies on imported potatoes from the United States. In my opinion this subsidy was only wasted. There was no justification for any subsidy on imported potatoes from the United States last spring except the first part of June. There were about $100,000 paid out the first part of June. There may have been justification for that up to June 10 last year, but after that you could have bought all the potatoes that came from the United States away below our ceiling price. This subsidy developed into a racket. There were imported into Canada No. 2 potatoes upon which a subsidy was paid. Those potatoes were put into cold storage in Montreal and afterwards exported to the West Indies. At least fifty per cent of the $812,000 was paid out without any justification whatsoever. I think the claims were fraudulent. I want the parliamentary assistant to have the board look into it. If that is done I think he will find, if he goes to the cities of Montreal and Toronto with a proper investigator, that he will dig out more fraudulent claims than come from New Brunswick.

[Mr. Hatfield.]

Mr. GRAYDON: May I continue with another matter in connection with—

Mr. ABBOTT: Would the leader of the opposition mind if I answered one question?

Mr. BLACK (Cumberland): Before that is done I should like to ask a question or two. I have had complaints from Nova Scotia—

Mr. ABBOTT: I wanted to deal with one point. I understand the hon. member for Victoria-Carleton raised a question about some of the potatoes on which a subsidy was paid and which were subsequently exported. I am advised that the subsidy was recovered on any potatoes that were exported.

Mr. HATFIELD: It may have been recovered on some but on others it was never recovered.

Mr. BLACK (Cumberland): I do not wish to interfere with the discussion between the hon. member for Victoria-Carleton and the parliamentary assistant having to do with clearing up certain phases of the potato subsidies. There is no one in this house, no one in all Canada, who understands the potato trade as does the hon. member for Victoria-Carleton.

There has been considerable discussion with respect to this subsidy on potatoes. I do not fully understand it yet. I do not know why the subsidy was paid at the time it was paid and in such large sums, totalling, as the hon. member has just said, $812,000. This creates confusion all over the country and dissatisfaction in Nova Scotia and Prince Edward Island. I have had a large number of requests for information from Nova Scotia and Prince Edward Island with respect to this question. I have not been able to answer all the inquiries made of me. I do not know why a subsidy should be paid on new potatoes when there are hundreds of thousands of bushels of old potatoes still in the country ready to go on the market. I am advised that was the situation in June and July, and even in August when these large bonuses were being paid.

In response to inquiries made of me I put questions on the order paper on May 26. I asked the following questions:

1. What sums were paid as subsidy for the production or marketing of new potaties in the fiscal year 1943-44 in (a) Canada; (b) Nova Scotia; (c) New Brunswick; (d) Prince Edward Island?

The answer is:

1. Subsidies amounting to $722,411.96 were paid.

The reply says that the records are not broken down by provinces. I cannot give my people information if I am not able to get it through the house from the officials.

Question No. 2 was:

What sums were paid in the last fiscal year by the government for freight on potatoes within or into each province?

The answer is:

The following amounts were paid by the Commodity Prices Stabilization Corporation Limited during the fiscal year 1943-44 to cover extra transportation costs on potatoes diverted from their normal markets to areas of shortage:

Old potatoes (1942 crop).....	$15,012 38
New potatoes (1943 crop).....	5,368 85

I am not able to give the people making inquiries of me justification or the basis upon which these moneys were paid out. The reply again goes on to say:

The corporation's records are not broken down by provinces.

Nova Scotia and Prince Edward Island received practically nil.

Question No. 3 was:

What was the basis upon which payment was made of (a) subsidies; (b) freight; (c) purchases?

The answer to that question does not give the information.

My fourth question was:

What quantity of potatoes was imported into Canada from the United States of America in the last fiscal year, stating on what permit or authority?

That appears to be a reasonable question. Producers of potatoes are entitled to that information. The answer I received to the question is:

No information.

I think hon. members of this committee should have that information in connection with these very large expenditures.

My fifth question was:

What subsidies, freight allowances or reduction of import charges and exchange were allowed?

The answer is:

The sum of $817,623.79 was paid by the Commodity Prices Stabilization Corporation during the fiscal year 1943-44 by way of subsidy on potatoes imported into Canada from the United States of America.

I think the producers in the provinces of Nova Scotia, New Brunswick and Prince Edward Island are entitled to more detailed information as a justification for that and how it has been expended than I have been able to procure.

The answer to my question continues:

Effective May 1, 1943, the war exchange tax on imports of potatoes was removed by P.C. 3757, dated May 6, 1943. The removal of the war exchange tax was extended indefinitely, and the special excise tax was removed, effective June 22, 1943, by P.C. 4894, June 15, 1943, as amended by P.C. 7078, September 9, 1943.

The members of this committee, the dealers and the producers of potatoes, are not able to follow these many orders in council, and I am not able to get the information in justification of these expenditures. There should be clear information as to the moneys expended on these subsidies on potatoes and many other commodities.

When the Minister of Agriculture had his estimates on the war appropriation before the committee he reported that there had been subsidy appropriations of more than $70,000,000. Farmers and potato growers who are producing necessary food are surely entitled to full information with respect to expenditures for subsidies to which they are entitled or that are paid out to others in other parts of Canada. I am not satisfied with the return placed in my hand. I am not able to forward to those who communicated with me the information which I feel they are entitled to have.

Mr. NOSEWORTHY: There is one matter I have been unable to understand, from the statement of the parliamentary assistant. I understand that if a shipper of potatoes had paid a producer, let us say $3, for the potatoes, he could then have collected a subsidy from the government.

Mr. ABBOTT: Down to the ceiling price.

Mr. NOSEWORTHY: Which, if he chose—and some did choose—he could pass back to the producers.

Mr. ABBOTT: If he had paid it to the producer he would have paid it before he claimed and received subsidy, of course, and he would not have been able to sell it for more than the ceiling price.

Mr. NOSEWORTHY: In the event of his having paid $3 to the producer, he could claim a subsidy. But in the instance where the producer received only $1.80, he was entitled to no subsidy at all?

Mr. ABBOTT: That is right. He was not entitled to a subsidy, if $1.80 was less than the ceiling price. That is correct.

Mr. NOSEWORTHY: In other words, the subsidy was to bonus the producer when he got a good price for his article.

Mr. ABBOTT: No; the subsidy was to enable the consumer to purchase potatoes at the ceiling price. It happened that in May of last year, when this subsidy was decided upon, Canada was practically out of potatoes. The hon. member for Victoria-Carleton nods his head. He knows the potato situation, as someone has said, probably better than anyone else in the house. The fact is, however, that we were practically out of potatoes in Canada. The price of potatoes in the United States, the only place at that time where we could get them, was high. It was decided that we would have to pay an import subsidy, and it was also necessary, as I said this afternoon, to require the use of new potatoes as soon as they could be secured. I pointed out, too, that under ordinary circumstances new potatoes are a luxury product, and in the early season command a higher price than do the old ones. Under normal circumstances the public always have available the choice between purchasing new and old potatoes. They may purchase old potatoes at the old potato price, or if they wish to have the pleasure of eating new potatoes, they may buy the new ones at a higher price. But because of the short supply conditions last year it was necessary to use all the old potatoes available—and there were practically none—and to accept new potatoes. So that the ceiling price on all potatoes was fixed at the same figure. In order to induce growers to dig their potatoes as early as possible it is my understanding that the subsidy was provided, so that if a dealer purchased at $3.75 in the early part of the season he was obliged to sell those potatoes at the ceiling. And the difference between the ceiling price and what was paid was the amount of the subsidy.

Mr. HATFIELD: In other words, the consumer was the only concern of the wartime prices and trade board. They were not concerned about the producer at all. It was a consumer subsidy, not a producer subsidy. While these potatoes were being imported from the United States, and a subsidy paid on them, the United States market at that time was away below the ceiling in Canada. Growers adjoining the city of Montreal, and others in Ontario, were advised to hold their potatoes in the ground, while potatoes were being imported from the United States. Then, when the growers near Montreal were ready to dig their potatoes, after holding them two or three weeks in the ground, they found that the city was filled with United States potatoes, and the market had gone down below the ceiling price. So that the growers around the markets of Montreal and Toronto lost money.

Mr. GRAYDON: Following the point I raised this afternoon in connection with the New Brunswick potato situation, there are one or two matters which do not seem clear to me, and which I think the parliamentary assistant might be able to clear up quickly. He admitted there had been an investigation of the situation in New Brunswick in connection with one shipper.

Mr. ABBOTT: Two investigations.

Mr. GRAYDON: Well, I am not much interested in the first one, because the parliamentary assistant said it was not much good, anyway. He implied that the second one is the important one, and that the investigation made by Daniels, who was sent from—

Mr. MICHAUD: Mr. Chairman—

Mr. GRAYDON: The Minister of Transport seems to be interested in this, too. I do not know just how he is connected with it. In any event, the parliamentary assistant took a firm and, I thought, a most arbitrary stand this afternoon with respect to the production and tabling of the report from Daniels. I believe the principle involved is one which should not be permitted to pass without strong protest and argument. I say that we have to be very careful in adopting a principle of that kind—and I say it without the slightest desire of doing more than establishing a proper principle. I should like the parliamentary assistant to understand that. I do not raise the point only for the sake of criticism of his department. It may seem at times to the parliamentary assistant, from his position inside the workings of the department, that the suggestions, urgings and pleas made by hon. members in this group to have the workings of the government brought into the open, go farther than the interests of the public might demand. I say to him, however, that if an error has been made during this parliament, then it is that we have not often enough forced the government to disclose what is going on behind the doors of the various bureaucratic organizations and institutions in Canada. In that regard we, as members of parliament, have a duty to the electorate. Debates in the house of recent date would indicate that many things are being done without even members of parliament having an opportunity of being consulted.

Therefore I ask the parliamentary assistant to give the details in this instance, and to table the report of this Mr. Daniels, who made the investigation; because, if even a small part of the charges or allegations made by the hon. member for Victoria-Carleton is true, then it seems to me the parliamentary assistant is placing a very mild interpretation upon the disclosures made in the report, and in respect of the whole problem concerning this one shipper.

Mr. ABBOTT: That is not what the hon. member for Victoria-Carleton suggested.

Mr. GRAYDON: Perhaps the parliamentary assistant may be putting a wrong interpretation upon what was said. I was not in the chamber when the hon. member began his speech to-night, but it is my understanding—one which I believe will be borne out—that there were more than just ordinary irregularities.

Mr. ABBOTT: The hon. member for Victoria-Carleton placed the blame upon an official of the Commodity Prices Stabilization Corporation.

Mr. HATFIELD: Not all of the blame.

Mr. ABBOTT: Hansard will show. The hon. member gave the name—a Mr. McEwen—and said that he had given misleading information. I am paraphrasing what was said by the hon. member. He pointed out that the shipper in question had come to Ottawa and received misleading information from a Mr. McEwen in the Commodity Prices Stabilization Corporation which had induced him to put in claims in this way. That I think is a fair statement of what occurred.

Mr. GRAYDON: So far as the situation as now described by the parliamentary assistant is concerned, taking it even in that position, I think the whole matter now becomes less clarified than ever. The parliamentary assistant has not gone very far in giving us the exact particulars of what actually did occur. I take it that he is still continuing to refuse to table the report. He nods his head, so that I take that to mean that we are not intended to have it at the moment. I am going to ask the parliamentary assistant for some information to which I think we are entitled. If the report is not to be tabled I would ask him to give us the main features of that report.

I want to know and I think the committee is entitled to know, first, what the fiindings of Mr. Daniels were with respect to the shipper. Second, I want to know what findings Mr. Daniels made with respect to his interviews with the producers. Third, I want to know what recommendations Mr. Daniels made as to what should be done with the shipper involved, whether he should be prosecuted or whether there should be an ordinary claim made and how long a time should elapse before the money is paid back to the government. I am anxious to know what recommendations were contained in the report with respect to avoiding a repetition and assuring that there will be no repetition of the situation which now exists and which has been uncovered.

Those are matters which I think are very important. It has been rumoured that the attorney general, who is also the Premier of New Brunswick, came to Ottawa either last week or this week on this particular mission, to deal with this one particular problem among others. I should like the parliamentary assistant to indicate to the committee whether during the interviews which took place between the attorney general of New Brunswick and his department any question of the prosecution of the parties involved was considered and what decision was arrived at with respect thereto. These questions are important in view of the fact that the report is not being laid on the table. Against that principle I am urging very keenly to-night. I think it is a wrong principle. There should not be such a line of demarcation drawn by the government, and sometimes by boards such as this which in many cases seem to be supra-government authorities. I do not very often become vehement in my protests against what I think are injustices.

Mr. ABBOTT: Fairly often.

Mr. GRAYDON: My hon. friend says, "fairly often," but the parliamentary assistant must expect some severe criticism because, after all, we on the outside looking in have not the opportunities of those on the inside looking out. The result is that we can only inquire, we can only ask and we can only demand. But we have certain rights as members of this house to ask a disclosure by the government of particulars when public funds are involved. If we have not the right to inquire into a matter such as this then we may as well extend this principle right across the whole government expending board.

I am going to ask the parliamentary assistant to reconsider the question of letting us know what happened in this instance. Let us know what the government investigator found. These investigators are paid by the people who send us here as members of parliament, and there should be every opportunity of having an account of this stewardship. That principle should prevail in a democratic country. So that I ask the parliamentary assistant for answers to the questions I have asked. In addition I want to protest vehemently against what I consider to be an abuse of our democratic and parliamentary institutions. I do not like to see this parliament placed in the position where "not in the public interest" is flaunted like a brilliant flag in order to threaten and scare those who would inquire or those who would criticize from time to time. We want the truth. We want a disclosure made in the public interest, and I am asking the parliamentary assistant with as much emphasis as I can summon to my command to see that this principle of democracy shall not be entirely overlooked.

Mr. ABBOTT: First on this question of principle, I have not had the experience of my hon. friend in parliamentary matters, but I have always understood, and I believe I am correct, that confidential inter-departmental communications, which of course is what this report is, have always been considered as privileged. I am quite sure that that was exactly the stand taken by my hon. friend and the leaders of his party when they were sitting on the right of Mr. Speaker.

Mr. GRAYDON: I have not sat on the right of Mr. Speaker.

Mr. ABBOTT: As I say, my own experience is quite limited, but I am convinced, and it has always been my understanding, that that was a well accepted principle of parliamentary practice, governmental practice, or whatever you want to call it. I would suggest that to produce this confidential inter-departmental report would be creating a very dangerous precedent.

Mr. GRAYDON: Why would it be creating a dangerous precedent? It will be creating a dangerous precedent not to produce it.

Mr. ABBOTT: If these investigators feel that they cannot make a report in confidence to their superiors, that they cannot make a report which is not liable to be tabled, then the public interest will suffer. My understanding is that that principle has been recognized in government practice for years. I do not think it is even open to argument, and I say that with all diffidence because I am a neophyte in parliamentary procedure. But that is my understanding and it is for that reason that I am not prepared to produce this report. Not that there is anything in it to conceal.

In replying to my hon. friend's requests I shall try to summarize the report along broad lines. Mr. Daniels, who made this investigation, came to the conclusion that the prices which it was understood were paid or contracted to be paid to the growers were not the prices which were actually received and that, consequently, on an analysis of the transactions it was clear that under the regulations the subsidy was not payable. He recommended that under those circumstances, as he was bound to recommend, as any investigator would recommend, that the subsidy had been improperly claimed and paid and should be recovered. A demand has been made on the recipient of the subsidy to pay it back. I indicated this afternoon that if that demand is not complied with I assume the corporation will take the appropriate legal proceedings against the recipient of the subsidy to see that it is paid back. My understanding is that the recipient of the subsidy is perfectly solvent and able to pay. That is the story as far as the particular subsidy question is concerned.

My hon. friend referred to the attorney general and premier of New Brunswick being here and looking into this matter. So far as I know he had no interviews with the Department of Finance. I believe he did go to see Mr. McKinnon of the Commodity Prices Stabilization Corporation, but I have no personal knowledge as to that. That is about all I can say on this particular subsidy claim.

Mr. HATFIELD: What I said was that some fault might be attached to Mr. McEwen of the Commodity Prices Stabilization Corporation for giving the shipper a wrong steer. But I do not think for one minute that the officials of the board would advise a man to go out and get false statements from the growers in order to get a subsidy.

Mr. PICARD: I think this might be the appropriate item, Mr. Chairman, on which to speak of subsidies in general, and I should like to say a word or two about the Canadian raw leaf tobacco industry. According to the regulations of the Department of National Revenue—

> (a) "Canadian raw leaf tobacco" means tobacco grown in Canada, in its natural state, not further processed than cured and put up in hands, but does not include Common Canada Twist or scraps, waste, clippings, broken portions of leaf which cannot be tied in hands, stems, or deposits resulting from any process of handling tobacco.
> (b) "Raw leaf dealer" means every person who packages Canadian raw leaf tobacco by putting it up in hands and stamping same, or who only stamps such hands, for the purpose of sale for consumption.

This trade affects more particularly, not my own district, but the district of Joliette. The traders and dealers are scattered all over the province of Quebec and in certain sections of New Brunswick and Ontario.

The situation is this. The prices board or the stabilization corporation has allowed the growers to charge ten cents a pound more for their tobacco. I do not argue against that because I think every farmer should get as much as he can in order that he may make a decent living. But when it comes to passing on that price increase from the farmer to the consumer, the raw leaf tobacco dealers were prevented from doing that by the rule that no price ceiling can be broken. The dealers have appealed to the tobacco controller and have established from their books to his satisfaction, admitted in letters from the administrator, that their average profit per pound in years past was not more than two and a half to three cents. Yet this year they will be forced to pay ten cents a pound more to the grower, which will mean that they are bound to stand a loss of seven and a half cents a pound if they carry on in business. As soon as this became evident, the association of tobacco dealers got in touch with the department and interviews were had, at which I was present, where the situation was recognized as being one of hardship for the dealers, but the general principle was invoked and it was stated that nothing could be done. At that time I inquired of the assistant to the chairman of the prices board if I could, with two or three members of the association, secure an interview with Mr. Donald Gordon, and here is the wire that was sent by Mr. Gordon.

Reference your wire regarding tobacco packers regret it is impossible for me to meet personally all groups who are clamouring for interviews. Our tobacco administrator is David Sim, deputy minister customs and excise. He is fully qualified to deal with problems of tobacco industry and will be glad to arrange for interview upon request.

We arranged for an interview with Mr. Sim. I thought that as a member of parliament I might have received a different answer, but I suppose it is quite in order that members of parliament should be answered in this way by the administrators.

Mr. REID: Being a member of parliament does not count.

Mr. PICARD: No, even though we are defending democracy. We got the interview and we established the prices at which the merchandise had been sold in the past. When I say "we", I mean all the people connected with the industry on whose behalf I was appearing as well as on behalf of many of my constituents. Another member of parliament, the hon. member for Joliette, appeared with me. We established to the satisfaction of the officers that our profit on the average was not more than two and a half to three cents a pound and that if we had to pay ten cents more a pound to the growers we would have to stand a loss of seven and a half cents or go out of business. This is the letter sent by the tobacco administrator under date of November 12. The letter is not marked personal or confidential, so that I feel I am at liberty to use it:

This refers to your letter of November 8 and the interview had on November 5 by yourself and delegation on behalf of the independent Canadian raw leaf tobacco dealers. Demand was made for an increase of ten cents per pound in the retail price.

The basis for this demand as set forth in your letter and as enlarged upon on the occasion of your interview has been carefully reviewed by the writer with the officers mentioned and we have concluded that the considerations involved—

The fact that we lose seven and a half cents a pound or go out of business entirely.

—are not such as to warrant a departure from the established policy of this administration, which in effect requires that basic period prices plus new or increased taxes must be maintained.

It is realized that, for the reasons you have outlined, it may be difficult for some of these dealers to continue operating, but this, for the time being, should be regarded as a war emergency measure which must be observed in the interests of the public at large.

As a matter of fact it is difficult for every one of the dealers to continue operating, because none of them can make a profit. It simply means, Mr. Chairman, that they must close down their business and deprive their customers who have been used to taking this merchandise of the opportunity of getting it, or else they must enter the black market. I was convinced, knowing the diplomacy and great intelligence of Mr. Sim, that he had signed this letter, as so many of us do, without being sure of what was in it. A man of his diplomacy would never have written that last sentence. The letter must have been drafted for him to sign. It simply means, as I said before, that the dealers must operate at a loss, close their doors or enter the black market. There was a market for hundreds of thousands of pounds of this raw leaf tobacco in the section of the country that I mentioned a moment ago. I got in touch further with the administrator, trying to convince him that a number of the dealers would have to close their doors or enter the black market. The department has some prosecutions pending now of people who have done just that. Dealers found clients willing to pay ten cents a pound more, which they could not pay legally, so that people have been doing it illegally. They have infringed the law, and a number of prosecutions are pending. Those dealers who want to stay within the law did not purchase their stock of tobacco this year because they would have had to pay more for it than their selling price, and many others are in the black market and are ready to plead guilty. Later on I spoke to the administrator over the telephone and we had a long discussion. He wrote me in a letter, which is also not marked private or confidential, as follows:

As I understand the problem, these people find themselves squeezed between the higher price being demanded by the farmer for his tobacco, and the price ceiling which does not permit them to increase their selling price to the public.

The proposition put to us was either subsidy or an increase in the consumer selling price. Subsidies have been paid in the case of certain necessary food products such as milk, butter, canned vegetables, also wood fuel, etc., but I am not aware of subsidies being paid to Canadian producers of commodities which were not regarded as absolutely essential.

When I in effect told you this on the telephone you immediately suggested that in that event if they were to be regarded as luxuries a price increase should be permitted. This immediately raises the question as to whether or not the price ceiling is to be over all in character or selective.

He goes on to say that a further interview will be arranged. Some time in December I wrote the administrator again, stating:

I wish to impress further upon you the importance of the question we discussed over the telephone and I doubt very much that sending one officer of the prices section of the wartime prices and trade board and basing the conclusions of the board merely on that investigation would give justice to the seriousness of this situation. I think that, before putting these people out of business entirely, it would be only just and fair to allow them to put a formal brief before the board and allow them to be heard before responsible parties sitting on the board.

I thought that before you closed down or clamped down on people and forced them out of business, the least you could do would be to have them heard directly by the people responsible for the decision, the board itself. Finally, in February, I received a letter from the administrator:

I have not forgotten your representations in connection with the tobacco packers of Canadian raw leaf, who are squeezed—

Those are not only my words, but the words of the administrator.

—between the increased price paid to the primary producer and the price ceiling.

He admits the difference in price and the fact that they would have to close their doors. The letter continues:

This week I had some conversations with senior executive officers of the wartime prices and trade board . . . with a view to arranging some solution.

That was in February. We are now in May. No decision has yet been handed down, and all these prosecutions are awaiting the final decision. Many of these people are guilty; others have closed their doors, and there is a "black market", if we can consider as a black market a violation of ceiling price. I think it might be well for the wartime prices and trade board to ponder the advisability of closing a trade entirely just for the sake of maintaining a ceiling, or of recognizing the fact that by doing so they are depriving an element of the population of goods which they are entitled to buy as much as any other people. They do not like cigarettes; they do not like cigars. I do not myself smoke their tobacco, but we are living in a democracy, and they want that kind of tobacco, so why cannot we supply it to them when there is plenty of it and it is only a question of adjustment of price? I am not complaining about farmers increasing their prices. Having waited so long before getting proper remuneration, if they can get more now, good and well. The price should be raised in view of the fact that the public would be willing to pay it, and there is the demand. Therefore I think this is quite an opportune moment to ask the parliamentary assistant if he would not consider that question. If he knows about it, would he be ready to tell us to-night if a decision is about to be rendered? If so, I should like to impress upon him the advisability of giving that rise in the ceiling price; otherwise he is closing the doors of one of the important industries in the province of Quebec and he is depriving a number of people of goods to which they are entitled.

Mr. LACOMBE (Translation): Mr. Chairman, in many cases the wartime prices and trade board is far from giving a fair deal to the people in this country. For instance, unaccountable delays occur in the announcement of certain decisions taken in connection with articles that are essential to agriculture. Permits for the purchase of farm machinery, such as tractors, are only issued after weeks and months have elapsed. Once the farmer has obtained his permit, he has to wait even longer for the delivery of farm implements. The restrictions placed by the government on the manufacture of farm machinery should be lifted at once. They should never have been imposed. Agriculture is essential from the standpoint of food supplies for the army and the civilian population. All those restrictions interfere with production. At a time when more than 400,000 men and women have left farms to take up work in war plants or join the army, is it fair that agriculture should thus be deprived of indispensable implements? Let us be more sensible and practical. I know farmers who, on account of ill health and through the lack of help, will have to leave their farms untilled, because all kinds of restrictions have been placed on agricultural implements and their replacement parts. I urge the government to remedy once for all such a dire situation. Let them take action at once, with a view to amending the legislation whereby the wartime prices and trade board was established.

I shall make one more remark before concluding. The companies which manufacture farm implements should not take the place of farmers in the matter of filing applications with the Board. The government should prevent delays in the delivery of farm machinery, such delays often being caused by the companies themselves. In fact, it often happens that the companies file the farmers' applications with the board only after several weeks. Some may ask what their purpose is. I do not know. But I am sure of one thing and it is that discrimination has something to do with that hide-and-seek game. Let the farmers be empowered to deal directly with the Wartime Prices and Trade Board, without having to go to the companies or their agents. If such an infringement of the law and regulations is to be perpetuated, the government had better abolish all those boards and that irresponsible bureaucracy. Finally, it was certainly not worth while to establish those bodies, which become a public nuisance as soon as they interfere with agricultural production in these troublous times.

As far as I am concerned, I can well afford to make these few remarks. Some may voice complaints about that baneful bureaucracy in the creation of which they have had a part. I, for one, have condemned it from the beginning and I voted against its establishment. I believe that was the best course to follow.

(Text):

Mr. ABBOTT: I should like to reply at once to my hon. friend, who will forgive me if I speak in English, but I can do a little better in that language than in his. He has complained about the conditions of the issue of permits for tractors and farm implements and has urged that the restrictions on the manufacture of this particular type of machinery should be completely removed.

In that connection I can give the committee a short summary of what the position is with respect to farm machinery. By agreement with the United States authorities and ourselves, the supply of farm machinery and equipment available in each country is on an equal basis and similar rationing plans are in effect in both countries. Because of a shortage of steel and other components, the supplies available during the 1942-43 production year, which ended the 30th June, 1943, were very much restricted; only thirty-five per cent of the corresponding 1940 period taking into account finished machines only, or fifty-six per cent including repairs. That position improved in the 1943-44 period, and it has been possible to increase production substantially, to something over eighty per cent of the 1940 period in terms of finished machines plus 156 per cent of the 1940-41 average of repair parts. The 1944-45 programme, which will end on June 30, 1945, calls for a still further increase, to approximately 100 per cent of the 1940-41 average of completed machines and attachments, with no limit on the production and importation of repair parts. Incidentally, a special production allocation has been programmed for veterans' rehabilitation. The supply situation has eased so far as some materials are concerned, but shortage of manpower has led to difficulty in obtaining adequate supplies of steel sheets, malleable castings, ball and roller bearings and motors. Despite increased production, rationing still continues to be necessary since supplies of many types of farm machinery and equipment are not adequate to meet the demand. Rationing does not apply to attachments and repair parts or to certain lines of farm machinery such as pulpers, hay forks, watering equipment, et cetera. Under the rationing programme each area is assigned quotas of the various types of farm machinery and equipment on the basis of sales in past periods.

Mr. KNOWLES: A few moments ago members were discussing alleged wrong payments by the Commodity Prices Stabilization Corporation in connection with potatoes. In that regard I should like to ask the parliamentary assistant some questions relating to another phase of the corporation's work. The subject is the manufacture of bedding, mattresses and general products that are turned out by upholsterers and bedding manufacturers. I understand that one of the functions of the Commodity Prices Stabilization Corporation is to provide subsidies to some of these manufacturers, where necessary, to enable them to purchase first-class material to make the necessary supplies along this line. I would ask the parliamentary assistant to give us any figures he can as to the number of companies which have been receiving these subsidies and to inform us whether any of these companies have returned either voluntarily or involuntarily any portion of the subsidies. In other words, has there been any recovery by the corporation of subsidies paid to bedding manufacturers on the ground that they were wrongly paid? Perhaps the parliamentary assistant would care to answer this question now? I have some others to ask.

Mr. ABBOTT: It might be easier to answer them one by one. First of all, we would not have information as to the number of firms to which subsidies for this particular purpose had been paid. We would have information as to the amount of subsidies paid on particular raw material going into bedding. The record would be on a financial basis and would relate to tariff items, and I should think probably it would be raw cotton or some textile fabric which would be the type of raw material going into the articles to which my hon. friend has referred. I could give the gross amount paid in subsidy on that particular type of raw material, but that would include similar material for other purposes. I do not think we could segregate it into material going into bedding, for example.

Mr. KNOWLES: Can the parliamentary assistant tell me whether any firms have been called upon to pay back to the corporation funds received by way of subsidy to enable them to purchase material for bedding? If so, I should like to know what the reason was that the money was recovered?

Mr. ABBOTT: In the first place, claims are carefully scrutinized before the subsidy is paid; but claims for subsidies, and subsidies, are constantly under review. They are investigated, and a claim for refund made if it is found, for instance, that a subsidy is unnecessary and that the recipient can absorb the cost and does not need the subsidy. But I am not in a position to say, and the officials tell me that they cannot say now, whether, for instance, a bedding manufacturer who had received a subsidy on raw cotton or something of that sort used in bedding had to pay back a subsidy paid because he did not need it. The records would not give a break-down in that detail.

Mr. KNOWLES: If the parliamentary assistant has not the specific information with the figures before him, can he tell me whether in general any of this recovery of money paid in subsidies was owing to discoveries by inspectors that firms had not used the material specified in their contracts or in the claims or in the agreements between the company and the corporation? Is there anything here similar to the situation in connection with potatoes?

Mr. ABBOTT: It is pointed out that if we discover that the recipient of a subsidy has violated ceiling prices demand for refund is made. The subsidies are paid not to guarantee profits but to enable ceiling prices to be maintained, and if it is found, as has been found in some cases, that recipients have violated ceiling prices with respect to goods on which subsidies are paid and the material has been used, a demand is made for a return of subsidies and the cases are reported to the enforcement division of the board.

Mr. KNOWLES: Have demands been made for recovery on the ground that the bedding manufacturer has not used the specified proportion of new material? In other words, have there been discoveries that manufacturers have been using second-hand or used material in the making of mattresses, contrary to the specifications on which they were supposed to be working? Is there any prosecution of such a nature pending at the present time?

Mr. ABBOTT: I shall have to get that information. If my hon. friend will allow the question to stand I will get the information later.

Mr. KNOWLES: Later this evening?

Mr. ABBOTT: Yes.

Mr. KNOWLES: So long as the item does not pass before the parliamentary assistant deals further with the matter.

Mr. REID: No one has been more critical than I of certain aspects of the wartime prices and trade board, but I rise now to express my praise of the great number of citizens who are operating under the board and who have not been mentioned in this entire debate. I speak of the great work done by the hundreds of men and women who have taken in charge the distribution of the ration cards. Throughout the country, municipal councils have provided for this work, and I know that in the city from which I come—and other cities have a similar system—the people there and in the district surrounding are looked after in the matter of ration cards at a cost of only $60 a month. On this occasion I wish to give this word of praise to those men and women who have volunteered to do this work. They have gone to these offices day and night without hope of reward, merely from a sense of service to the country, and have given their services free in turning over these books to the general public. While criticism may be coming to members higher up in the board, this is one group of individuals working under the board, who, as I think every hon. member will gladly agree, deserve every praise that can be given them.

Mr. ROY: This credit of $140,000,000 to the Commodity Prices Stabilization Corporation, which is closely connected with the wartime prices and trade board, is to provide, if my understanding is correct, a subsidy to those who, where the ceiling is too low, suffer losses. It is to take care of losses to producers.

Before the opening of the lobster fishing season in 1942 a ceiling price was placed upon lobsters which was quite low. The fishermen and cooperatives were obliged to sell all their lobster production to the wholesale dealers in Halifax at the price ceiling. After the fishing season was over, the ceiling was removed, and those wholesale dealers who had bought the lobsters from the fishermen at a very low price were allowed to sell them at the highest price they could get for them. Last year we had no ceiling price on lobsters. This spring before the season commenced the ceiling price was again placed on lobsters, which means that the fishermen will suffer a loss of practically $8 a case on their fish. There will be that much difference in the price they will get this year as compared with what they got last year. I should like to know from the parliamentary assistant what can be done to correct that injustice to the lobster fishermen. I believe that the ceiling price should be removed immediately so that the fishermen will not suffer and that the wholesalers will not benefit as they did in 1942. If that is not done the Commodity Prices Stabilization Corporation should pay a subsidy to the lobster fishermen to compensate them for their losses.

Mr. ABBOTT: Before I reply to the hon. member for Gaspe I should like to deal with the inquiry of the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre, but before I do that I wish to join with the hon. member for New Westminster in the tribute he paid to those people who volunteered their services in the distribution of ration books. I concur—and I know the minister does—in the views which my hon. friend expressed as to the splendid work that has been done by those volunteer workers. It was a difficult task and they did it splendidly. I join with him in an endorsation of that work.

As to the inquiry of the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre, I am advised that there is no record of any case in which a subsidy has been reclaimed because of the use of second-hand material. Subsidies have been reclaimed where ceilings were broken and where there has been a degradation of goods by using second-hand material and in some cases where goods had been manufactured for munitions and supply which, of course, are not subject to subsidy payments. In one case in which a subsidy was reclaimed on one of these grounds—I am not sure which—the investigation by the corporation also disclosed certain other irregularities which had nothing to do with the subsidy payments. I am advised that those irregularities were reported to the Royal Canadian Mounted Police for appropriate action, but they had nothing to do with the question of subsidy payments made to that particular firm.

Mr. KNOWLES: I take it that the parliamentary assistant was not familiar with the situation before he consulted his officials. In the statement he made he first of all stated categorically that no recoveries of subsidies were claimed on the grounds I mentioned. In his subsequent remarks he did admit that there was a degradation of quality.

Mr. ABBOTT: Not in the case of a particular firm. I was speaking generally when I said that subsidies were recovered in two or three instances, first, where there had been a breach of the ceiling price; second, where there had been a degradation of quality below the quality the goods were supposed to be for which the subsidy was given, due, among other things, to the use of second-hand goods; third, where a subsidy had been claimed with respect to merchandise supplied to a government department, war materials to munitions and supply.

Mr. KNOWLES: Just that much of an admission confirms my suspicion and prompts me to question the parliamentary assistant further. He realizes that this is a pretty serious situation, not only with respect to the money involved but with respect to the injurious results to the health of people that could come from the manufacture of bedding which is supposedly brand new and which turns out to be made from used mattress material. There is a double offence involved in anything of this kind. I feel that the matter should be looked into more thoroughly. I happen to be a member of the war expenditures committee and a member of the subcommittee over which the hon. member for Bellechasse is chairman. One of the things that we have authority to go into is boards such as this one. It does seem to me in the light of the allegations that have been made to-night and the questions that have been asked that this whole matter should be gone into more thoroughly. I am a layman as far as legal matters are concerned. But I find it difficult to understand how these errors and wrongs can be made which seem to be awfully close to being fraudulent, and when the mistake is discovered all that results is that the recipient is told that he must pay back the subsidy.

Mr. ABBOTT: I said a moment ago that some cases were referred to the enforcement section and that prosecutions have been taken. My hon. friend has not cited any case. If he will give me the name of any particular concern which he has in mind I shall have something to go on; I can get specific information, but when we are talking in general terms—he is talking in general terms and therefore I can only reply in general terms.

Mr. KNOWLES: I am forced to talk in general terms by the very nature of the case. I think the parliamentary assistant should realize this. He and his minister sit there with officials in front of them and through those officials he has access to all the records. We have nothing. We are just the opposition with our bare hands, and yet it is our job to try and scrutinize every item of expenditure that is proposed in a bill such as the war appropriation bill, and try to find out if any of the public money has been wasted. I understand that a prosecution has been launched against one of the firms receiving subsidies from this corporation. I understand that that firm was manufacturing bedding. I understand that the prosecution was launched not by the corporation but by the Department of Munitions and Supply because that department found that this company was not making its bedding up to the specifications required by the department. The fact is that supposedly brand new bedding was being made out of stuff that may have been slept on for forty or fifty years. Although this may lead to a discussion that perhaps is not in order here to-night, I urge the desirability of legislation to prevent the manufacture of bedding on that basis. If the corporation is aware that a prosecution has been launched against that company because of that situation, then it seems to me that the matter has to be gone into a great deal more thoroughly, not just by inspectors of the corporation but by the Department of Finance which is responsible to parliament for these payments.

There is another aspect of the matter about which I should like to question the parliamentary assistant. I understand that the bedding administrator is an official, if not a very high one, of one of the bedding companies which receives subsidies from this corporation. What I had in mind in making that reference was this. On several occasions the Minister of Finance who I see is now in his seat, has said to the hon. member for Peterborough West, if not to others, that he did not feel it desirable to make public figures as to amounts of subsidies paid to individual corporations. He was not opposed to making public the total amount paid, but he did not wish to give the firms knowledge of the business of their competitors.

I may be wrong in this, but it does seem to me that if we have an official of one of these firms acting as the administrator, and having something to do with deciding the subsidies paid to the others, in such event we do have an unfair situation, on the basis stated by the Minister of Finance himself, namely, that of having one manufacturer knowing the conditions of his competitors, but without their knowing his. The parliamentary assistant will correct me if I am wrong in drawing such an assumption from this set-up.

I should like also to know whether there have been any recoveries of subsidies from the firm from which the bedding administrator came. It does not necessarily attach anything to him personally, but I am asking if from the firm of which he was head in peace time there have been recovered any subsidies because of its being found, after investigation, that they had been wrongly paid.

Mr. ABBOTT: With respect to the payment of subsidies, and the secrecy the minister has indicated he feels should be preserved with respect to amounts paid to individual recipients, I would point out to the hon. member that the subsidies are paid by the Commodity Prices Stabilization Corporation, and that the administrator of the industry to which he has referred is not a member of that organization, and presumably has no information as to the amount of subsidy paid to individual manufacturers.

Mr. KNOWLES: Is the parliamentary assistant sure of that? I notice he used the word "presumably".

Mr. ABBOTT: I am informed that that is correct, that the administrator would have no list of subsidies paid to individual recipients. If an individual were manufacturing a certain type of material he would know the subsidy payable with respect to that particular commodity; but he would not know how much that individual manufacturer received by way of subsidy. In other words, he would not know his volume of business.

Mr. KNOWLES: As bedding administrator, would he not be in a position to have fairly complete information about all firms producing bedding, under his direction?

Mr. HOMUTH: The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre, if he has not done it in a definite way, has by innuendo said that the bedding administrator who comes from a bedding firm has had to pay back from his firm—

Mr. KNOWLES: No. The firm, not the administrator.

Mr. HOMUTH: —money that he collected on unfair subsidies.

Mr. KNOWLES: On a point of order—

Mr. HOMUTH: The hon. member has said that by innuendo. I am sick and tired of sitting here and having talk like that in the house.

Mr. KNOWLES: On a point of order—

Mr. HOMUTH: No; you are out of order coming into this house and trying to impute that everybody who does business in this country is dishonest.

Mr. KNOWLES: On a point of order—

Mr. HOMUTH: And that is the story we have here. The hon. member has made that statement, by innuendo, and I say that the parliamentary assistant should tell us now: was any subsidy paid back to the government from the firm from which the bedding administrator came?

Mr. ABBOTT: The answer is no.

Mr. HOMUTH: That ought to keep him quiet.

Mr. KNOWLES: The hon. member for Waterloo South, in the very last few words of his statement, referred correctly to what I said. And if he had used those words in the opening part of his remarks I would not have had to rise on a point of order. He made it clear at the finish—as he did not at the beginning—that I was referring to the company, and not the individual.

Mr. ABBOTT: I am advised that the bedding administrator refused to accept a subsidy, and consequently he could not pay it back.

Mr. HATFIELD: Coming back to the potato subsidy, we all know what was claimed to have been paid the producer. Since the investigation we know what was actually paid. Would the parliamentary assistant tell us what was actually paid the producers? The investigation showed the amount that was paid.

Mr. ABBOTT: The subsidy was paid to the dealer.

Mr. HATFIELD: But he had to pay a certain price to the producer. It is claimed that he paid $3.50 for the first part of August and $3 for the latter part. What did he actually pay?

Mr. ABBOTT: I am afraid I have not that information here.

Mr. HATFIELD: The investigation brought out what was actually paid. And your Mr. Van Buskirk should know.

Mr. ABBOTT: Mr. Van Buskirk says he has not the information here. I repeat what I said before, that whatever the amount is, claim has been made on the recipient for the return of the subsidy paid.

Mr. GRAYDON: Just before you leave that—

Mr. ABBOTT: I thought I had finished this potato question, but I see I was mistaken.

Mr. GRAYDON: Just to go back, may I say to the parliamentary assistant—

Mr. ABBOTT: Perhaps the war will be won in the meantime.

Mr. GRAYDON: What was that statement?

Mr. ABBOTT: It was just an aside; I said that perhaps the war would be won in the meantime.

Mr. GRAYDON: Well, as long as my hon. friend is joking, I shall not take him seriously. I realize he would not say that, if he were serious about it. I must say to him, however, that he has not answered the hon. member for Victoria-Carleton with respect to what was paid the producers. That is an important point, and we should not allow it to slip by. The question has been asked, and the hon. member is entitled to an answer. The Daniels report would, of course, contain that information. If that was the kind of investigation Daniels made, then I do not wonder that the parliamentary assistant does not want to table the report, or to have anything to do with it; because if he was not able to produce that information, then I think a shadow is thrown upon the whole report. It seems to me that would be one of the salient features with which an investigator would deal.

Some time before the debate ends I would ask the parliamentary assistant to give the information to the hon. member for Victoria-Carleton, because if it is not readily available now it should be available before the debate ends. This is a vital part of the whole situation, as I see it.

Mr. ABBOTT: I shall see what information I can get. I have not had an opportunity to answer the hon. member for Gaspe in connection with the ceiling on lobsters. I understand that a ceiling on canned lobster was announced recently, but that exports, which run to seventy-five or eighty per cent of the total production, are free from the ceiling. In other words, they can be sold for any price the producer can get. Of course the ceiling varies. Perhaps my hon. friend is familiar with what the ceiling prices are and I do not need to quote them. I think I have answered his question by saying that seventy-five per cent to eighty per cent of the pack is not subject to ceiling prices.

Mr. FRASER (Peterborough West): Is there any subsidy on canned blueberries and canned cranberries, and also salmon?

Mr. ABBOTT: I am advised that there is nothing on canned blueberries and canned cranberries.

Mr. FRASER (Peterborough West): Recently blueberries were released for sale without any coupons, and my belief is that they were released because the tins were ready to rust through. I have had complaints, not only from my own city of Peterborough, but from Toronto, Hamilton and other places that they would keep only a relatively short time, for perhaps a week or two weeks and then rust through. Would the minister check on that?

A year and a half ago we used to get a pound tin of salmon for forty-eight cents, but now we have to pay thirty cents for a half-pound tin. Is there any subsidy paid on salmon and is there any ceiling on the prices? I am speaking of the red sockeye, or what is supposed to be red because it is sometimes pink. Many of the men and women working in our industrial plants have to have salmon sandwiches for their lunches and the price is out of all proportion.

Mr. ABBOTT: I am informed that blueberries do not keep particularly well in cans and therefore it was decided to release stocks on hand without any ration requirements. There is no subsidy.

Mr. FRASER (Peterborough West): They were released about four or five months too late.

Mr. ABBOTT: That may be another case of what the hon. member for Yale referred to as decisions being taken a little too late. We are learning by experience and perhaps next time we shall not make a mistake, if a mistake has been made. There is no subsidy paid on canned salmon. As the hon. gentleman knows, for about two years there was no canned salmon available in this country; it was all going to fill the British contract. Two hundred thousand cases were released recently, and the price at which the salmon is sold is based on the price received under the United Kingdom contract. That is, it is being sold in Canada at the same price.

Mr. FRASER (Peterborough West): Is there any subsidy on brooms?

Mr. ABBOTT: I understand there is a subsidy on broom corn, the material used to make brooms.

Mr. FRASER (Peterborough West): I was wondering if something could not be done to release more brooms. At the present time it is almost impossible to get one in a grocery store.

An hon. MEMBER: How about a hardware store?

Mr. FRASER (Peterborough West): They do not have them, and those they have do not have the five or six binders.

Mr. ABBOTT: There is such a shortage of broom corn, which comes largely from the United States, that we are on quota. The quantity of brooms available is determined by the amount of broom corn we can get to make into brooms. They are all being released.

Mr. FRASER (Peterborough West): Is the government doing anything to get them into the country?

Mr. ABBOTT: It is doing everything possible to get them into the country. We were able to purchase some broom corn from the Argentine last year because we could not get our full quota from the United States.

Mr. FRASER (Peterborough West): A subsidy of $5,000,000 was paid on oils and fats. Was that paid on oils and fats for soap manufacturers or for domestic needs?

Mr. ABBOTT: Soap and shortening largely.

Mr. FRASER (Peterborough West): I understand that there was an agreement with the different cities and towns that got fuelwood for the use of their residents whereby they could apply to the government to have that wood purchased if they did not need it. Has any been bought by the government?

Mr. ABBOTT: I understand that the answer is no. The fuelwood subsidy is administered by munitions and supply, although the Commodity Prices Stabilization Corporation pays the actual subsidy.

Mr. HATFIELD: Is there any subsidy on corn syrup?

Mr. ABBOTT: Yes. I am advised that the subsidy on corn syrup and corn oil is covered by order 116.

Mr. HATFIELD: Any subsidy on glucose?

Mr. ABBOTT: No.

Mr. HATFIELD: Or on corn starch?

Mr. ABBOTT: Yes.

Mr. HATFIELD: What is the subsidy on corn starch?

Mr. ABBOTT: It comes under order 116 and it is the roll-back from September 15 to October 11 to June, 1941, prices.

Mr. ROSS (Souris): I think the statement the parliamentary assistant gave a few minutes ago regarding the output of farm implements is too optimistic. He is not to blame, but the fact is that these quotas are not working out as he has given them to us. There is a bottleneck somewhere. I think it is in connection with the permits. The regional controllers did not take any action on the allotments for this year until November 1 of last year. The implement distributors made their allocations on the basis of the figures they were given last November for spring operation this year. Many of the people who were entitled to and obtained permits have not been able to procure the tractors which they needed for spring seeding. Just last week I saw letters which had been received from the manufacturers stating that certain cultivators and other implements of that kind would not be manufactured until this fall.

There is a definite bottleneck somewhere and I wonder if some improvement could not be made in the method of issuing permits so that an applicant may not be misled into thinking that he will get something when in fact he cannot get it. People are complaining that when they counted on getting a tractor or some other labour saving implement for spring operations they now find that they cannot obtain it. I know many agents who had orders for drills and had obtained permits but who found that they could not obtain them until this summer, when the seeding season would be past. This has created a good deal of unnecessary confusion among the producers. I am wondering if it would not be better not to issue the permits until the machines were actually available, although the people will want to know as soon as they can if they are to be able to obtain them. If they cannot obtain them when the season comes round, it is most difficult for them. We have discussed this matter with the Minister of Munitions and Supply and he says that the steel is available. I understand that man-power is a big difficulty with respect to certain portions of the machines. I wonder if the controllers could not do something to improve the situation particularly toward supplying labour saving implements?

Mr. ABBOTT: I will bring my hon. friend's suggestions to the attention of the minister.

Mr. WOOD: Referring to the subsidy on bedding, I must say that I was shocked at the attitude of the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre who suspected that fraudulent charges might be laid against certain manufacturers.

Mr. KNOWLES: Some have already been laid by the enforcement officers.

Mr. WOOD: We will take your word on that.

Mr. KNOWLES: That is the word of the parliamentary assistant.

Mr. WOOD: It comes with poor grace from the hon. member who happens to be one who has deserted the pulpit to come here and supply the material needs of humanity instead of the spiritual needs. I was taught that a man with a certain weakness generally suspects other people of having the same weakness.

Mr. KNOWLES: May I ask the hon. member a question?

Mr. WOOD: You talked for quite a while.

Mr. KNOWLES: Does he not regard this calling as an honourable one?

Mr. WOOD: Yes, but I did not have to desert a more honourable one to come here. I was also shocked to think that this government sees fit to subsidize bedding, especially in war time. I have spent more time sleeping on straw ticks and mattresses than I ever spent on Beauty Rest mattresses. I commend to the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre the beautiful aroma of well threshed oat straw in a good tick. That would put him to sleep and then he would not have so many crackpot ideas to bring before the house; possibly in these times of war it would be a good thing for most of us, instead of subsidizing the manufacture of some of these things that are wasteful of labour and materials.

I am inclined to take the view in spite of all handicaps the wartime prices and trade board have done a fairly good job. Had they not come into the field and guided man's labours, we would not have accomplished as much as we have done to-day. It is a new organization and we did not have men trained in the work of distributing goods and services. They had to take in men of no great experience. But in the main the board has done a good job. I feel that we spend too much time in pointing out little irregularities here and there to this thing and that, when we could be utilizing our energies to much better advantage.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Agreed.

Mr. WOOD: Take the group represented by my hon. friend, and you will see that they have filled up more columns of Hansard this session than any other group in the house. I do not say that to be unkind, but I was just wondering why they feel it necessary to spend so much time in giving us the benefit of the work of their analytical minds. They seem to know how to go about it. I must say that I have not as suspicious a mind as the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre has. I believe that the great majority of the people of the country want to play the game and want to play it fair. There is the odd man who is unpatriotic and who will bootleg a little gasoline or something like that, but society frowns down upon that sort of thing and the wrongdoer knows it. I am just trying to state things as I see them in my own quiet way, as I sit here wondering why we spend so much time in discussing some very small things, thereby delaying the business of the house.

Mr. MacNICOL: There is one side to this vote that, so far as I know, has not been mentioned by any one. The purpose of the vote has been to control prices and perhaps to increase production in certain lines in the interests of the prosecution of the war and the welfare of the people at large. There are about two hundred items in these war appropriation estimates, and this vote of $140,000,000 is about the sixth or seventh largest of the votes. Has any tabulation been made showing how much money has been saved to the country by a vote of this kind? That is what interests me more than anything else. The vote was originated for the very real purpose of controlling prices, preventing inflation, and perhaps increasing business in some lines. But nothing has been said as yet by the parliamentary assistant to show just what the country has been saving through the operation of the wartime prices and trade board. We might be able to find fault with scores of individual things that are done, but what interests me is the large results that have been obtained by the operations of the board. I would like the parliamentary assistant to rise in his place and say that this vote of $140,000,000, the vote of $120,000,000 last year and similar votes in other years have saved this country, let us say, one billion dollars through preventing inflation, and let him give a break-down showing just how the money has been saved.

Mr. ABBOTT: It is a little difficult to give any concrete estimate of what has been saved. As the hon. member for Davenport has pointed out, the purpose of consumer subsidies is to enable essential goods to be sold at ceiling prices instead of allowing prices to rise, because obviously if prices of some essential goods rise, prices of others will go up and you will have a more or less general price rise. It is considered that by the use of selective subsidies on essential consumer goods, which in effect means that the increased cost of these things is spread over the people as a whole by taxation, you avoid a general rise in the cost of living. It is estimated—these figures have been given either by the minister or by Mr. Donald Gordon—that a one point rise in the cost of living means an additional expenditure by the Canadian people of some $35,000,000 a year. Therefore the expenditure of $140,000,000, which is the estimate for this year—it was less than that last year—in consumer subsidies is the equivalent of approximately a four point general rise in the cost of living. Those competent to judge consider that without the payment of these subsidies the rise in the cost of living would have been greatly in excess of four points. We are always comparing this war with the last war, when we did not have a system of price control and did not use subsidies, as has been the case here. At the period of the last war which corresponds with the end of 1943 the cost of living had risen fifty-six points, as against a rise at the end of 1943 of 18·2 or 18·3.

Mr. MacNICOL: And each point, you said, amounts to about $35 millions?

Mr. ABBOTT: Each point rise in the cost of living, it is estimated, means an increased cost to the people of Canada of $35 million a year.

Mr. MacNICOL: On that basis there has been a very great saving?

Mr. ABBOTT: Yes. I am not suggesting that the subsidies account for that entire saving, but they are part of the over-all programme of price, wage and salary control, together with the fiscal programme of heavy taxation and periodical victory loans; they are all part of the picture, and it is felt that they play an essential part in maintaining a stable level of prices. It is pointed out to me that the government is spending nearly $5,000 million a year, and that if prices went up, let us say ten per cent, the government costs would go up perhaps $250 million, which would have to be raised by taxation, or borrowing, or both.

Mr. MacNICOL: I believe I can give the parliamentary assistant one commodity on which definite figures could be obtained. I remember clearly a period in the last war when the price of anthracite coal advanced from about $14.50 to $21, a difference of $6.50. During this war the price has risen to some extent, but nowhere near the height it reached during the last war. I imagine that if the department is able to obtain the approximate number of tons of anthracite coal burned in Canada throughout the year, and multiplies it by the difference of $6.50 a ton, it would have some figure to show what has been saved. The Canadian people want to believe that, through the expenditure of $140 million on this vote to control prices, bonuses and so forth, the country saves infinitely more. The parliamentary assistant has given some figures in proof of that.

Mr. ABBOTT: I think that can be safely asserted.

Mr. MacNICOL: Perhaps before he finishes he may have other definite figures, which would dispose the public to accept this expenditure. Here are we, the opposition, letting through—not that we could stop it if we wanted, to, but without too much opposition, or indeed without any opposition, and not much inquiry—a vote of $140 million. The public look to us to bring out the reasons for so large a vote. If it can be shown, as the parliamentary assistant has done in part, that an expenditure of $140 million will save $1,500 million or $2,000 million, there would be no opposition to it in the country, and of course His Majesty's loyal opposition would not be blamed too much for having let the vote go through so easily.

Mr. MARSHALL: When the house rose on Tuesday night I asked the parliamentary assistant if he would give us a more detailed statement with respect to the operations of the Commodity Prices Stabilization Corporation. Since that time I have had an opportunity of reading through the report of the wartime prices and trade board, and I wish to compliment that body on being, I believe, the only one which has given us information of an authentic character right up to December 31, 1943. Most of the questions which I intended to ask the parliamentary assistant have been quite satisfactorily answered in this report. The parliamentary assistant has broken down to some extent the $140 million item. He told us that domestic and other subsidies would amount to about $115,500,000. I should like to have had the specific amounts paid for imports, particularly general imports. He gave us a break-down of the domestic subsidies. I thought the expression which he used, namely, "losses," was unfortunate, because it conveys a peculiar idea to the general public. In reality it is not a loss; it is a subsidy paid by that particular branch of the corporation on that particular item.

For a moment I turn to page 25 of the report, which deals with potatoes. It is stated, "To encourage the movement of potatoes from Saskatchewan and Manitoba to northern Ontario and the northwestern part of Quebec a subsidy was paid covering the extra transportation costs involved." I wonder why mention there is made of only two of the western provinces, namely Saskatchewan and Manitoba. Although there was a tremendous crop of potatoes in Alberta, there is no reference to the fact that any potatoes have been shipped east from Alberta or any subsidy paid. The amount of transportation subsidy was a little more than $15,000 on the old crop of potatoes and a little more on the 1943 crop.

I had a number of other questions, but I shall not delay the committee. The only other question I desire to ask has to do with a subsidy paid on horsehair. I received a letter from one of my constituents, and when I read it I must confess that I laughed because I thought it was rather a ridiculous request to ask me to explain something on the subject which appeared in one of the western newspapers. The report in the west was to the effect that the prices board were anxious to get a large quantity of horsehair, and that if the domestic supply did not come forward in sufficient volume to take care of the needs of the armed forces and the war plants it would be necessary to import horsehair from South America. Upon looking up the auditor general's report, in which the figures given are no later than March 31, 1943—perhaps the parliamentary assistant could bring them up to the end of March, 1944—I find that the amount of horsehair purchased for use in Canada cost $653,370. That astonished me. It was sold to the trade, I assume, for $677,315, or a profit on the deal of $23,945. The part of the article that I do not understand is this. The price of good quality horsehair ranges from thirty cents to fifty cents a pound, and any wool and hide dealer will buy it. There must be a reasonable answer for that statement as to why in the domestic market the producer should receive only from thirty to fifty cents a pound, whereas the material imported from South America was able to command a price of $2 a pound. These are the two items.

I might also ask the parliamentary assistant to give me some idea as to the deal which was made between the corporation and the banks with respect to the charges made by them connected with milk subsidies. I understand that a substantial sum of money was paid to the banking institutions for work in connection with subsidies covering milk, and I should like to have an explanation of that particular item. I would ask the parliamentary assistant also to bring up to date the statement which is to be found at the bottom of page 64, appendix 1, where it gives the actual expenditures from April 1, 1943, to December 31, 1943. Will he bring that up to the end of March, 1944, and give a breakdown of the two items, including local ration board? Will he separate the amount paid the local ration board from the amount paid ration coupon banking costs? These are my questions.

Mr. ABBOTT: First I wish to thank my hon. friend for his complimentary reference to the report of the wartime prices and trade board. I agree that it is a good report. It was made for the nine-month period in order that we might table it reasonably early in the session. Hon. members will recall that it was tabled early in February. Last year the report was for the full period up to March 31, but unfortunately we could not get it in until the latter part of May or early in June. We felt this year that it would be useful if it were tabled earlier. Now the figures are available for the first twelve-month period, and I shall be glad, as my hon. friend has suggested, to bring the figures up to date. I do not know if the statements here should be printed in Hansard. We do not want to make a fresh report. The figures with respect to subsidy payments cover the nine-month period up to December 31. We have now the figures for the subsequent three months, so that it will be possible for us to place on Hansard a statement showing the payments for the full twelve-month period, and similarly a statement can be given of the actual expenditures of the wartime prices and trade board for the full period, although, as my hon. friend will appreciate, that does not relate to the item we are now considering. It is the item of $15,600,000, passed on Tuesday. Perhaps it would serve the purpose of the committee if I were to table a statement of the actual expenditures of the prices board for the twelve-month period. It would be available to any member who wanted it.

Mr. MARSHALL: Can the parliamentary assistant give the reason—

Mr. ABBOTT: The hon. member asked about the subsidy on potatoes. I am informed that at the time of the great scarcity last May, the only place in Canada where there were surplus potatoes was in Saskatchewan. There may have been a car or two in Manitoba, but not many. What was done in effect was to pay a transportation subsidy on these potatoes, which were the only surplus potatoes available, to bring them to eastern Canada.

On the question of horsehair, I understand that is an essential material. Formerly the bristles used in brushes came to us from China, but that source has been cut off, and consequently we have had to rely on domestic horsehair and such hair as could be obtained from abroad. We are not now importing any. We are able to get it from domestic supplies, but it is bulk-purchased by the corporation and made available to brush manufacturers. Brushes are required for paint work in connection with various war industries.

Mr. MARSHALL: When was the importation of horsehair discontinued?

Mr. ABBOTT: I am not sure that we have that information. It is subject to import permit and is ineligible for subsidy. No subsidy has ever been paid on imported horsehair.

Mr. MARSHALL: I understand that the Commodity Prices Stabilization Corporation was set up as a company under the Companies Act. The corporation was empowered to carry on the duties and responsibilities through incorporation and organization of subsidiary companies, and one at least has been set up under the terms of that order in council, one known as the Wartime Food Corporation Limited. Is that the only one, or are there others?

Mr. ABBOTT: That is the only subsidiary of Commodity Prices Stabilization Corporation.

Mr. MARSHALL: Can the parliamentary assistant give a short resume of the operations of that corporation?

Mr. ABBOTT: Wartime Food Corporation is a subsidiary of Commodity Prices Stabilization Corporation and it operated in the live cattle market for a time during 1942. It was inactive during 1943 and began renewed operations on a reorganized basis, including representation on its board of directors for both primary producers and organized labour in January of this year, 1944. It was reorganized for the purpose of ensuring that supplies of fresh fruits and vegetables were available in Canada and equitably distributed —empowered to bulk purchase or otherwise deal in fresh fruits and vegetables, both domestic and imported if necessary.

One of the first responsibilities of the Wartime Food Corporation was to assume control of distribution of potatoes in eastern Canada—I hope we do not start the potato argument again—in order to ensure supplies for deficiency areas and to meet the requirements of the armed forces and other preferred users. In addition to controlling distribution, Wartime Food Corporation bulk purchased potatoes both from British Columbia and later from Maine.

Under authorization from wartime prices and trade board Wartime Food Corporation has also paid a root vegetable freight subsidy covering potatoes, cabbages, carrots and parsnips. Wartime Foods now pays subsidies on potato freight eastern and on oranges imported from the United States of America, both formerly paid by Commodity Prices Stabilization Corporation; but that is purely for reasons of internal economy.

Mr. MARSHALL: Who is at the head of Wartime Foods Corporation, the same individuals?

Mr. ABBOTT: The directors are set out in the report which my hon. friend has in front of him. The president is R. T. Mohan; vice-president K. W. Taylor who is sitting in front of me; general manager, J. B. Lander; secretary-treasurer, H. N. H. James. The directors are: A. R. Johnstone, S. R. Noble, E. W. Smart, Raoul Godbout and Carl Sanders.

The break-down of the estimates for 1944-45 is as follows: There is provision for potential subsidy on potatoes of $750,000, a similar payment with respect to oranges of $2,000,000; cost of administration, $75,000, and miscellaneous, $175,000, making up the total estimate of $3,000,000.

Mr. ILSLEY: The Wartime Food Corporation has been mentioned. I wish to refer to the Wartime Food Corporation in the earlier phase of its activity, when it was not dealing with fruits and vegetables at all but was responsible for the market support of cattle prices. I wish to deal with one phase and one phase only. In a debate which took place under another item on May 23, 1944, Mr. Donald Gordon's name was mentionel several times by the hon. member for Lethbridge. The references to Mr. Donald Gordon were such as these. On page 3175 of Hansard at the bottom of column 1, Mr. Gordon's name is used and a press release which was issued on October 7, 1942, was quoted. In the first column on page 3176 reference is made to an undertaking contained in a press release by Donald Gordon to purchase any surpluses of beef to meet shifts in the price. In the first column of page 3177 reference is made to a promise in Donald Gordon's press release.

In a sense I am speaking on behalf of Mr. Gordon now. He is extremely jealous of his reputation for honour in carrying out his commitments, and I want to make clear that so long as the wartime prices and trade board was responsible for the operations referred to in the press release of October 7, 1942, those commitments were scrupulously carried out. During the period from June 28 to August 17, 1942, 49,727 head of cattle were purchased and 1,524 were exported to the United States. In this operation a loss of $832,281.69 was incurred. The board stood ready throughout to continue the support if surplus supply had threatened to depress cattle prices unduly. On May 21, 1943, however, an announcement was made and widely publicized in the form of a joint statement issued by the Department of Agriculture and the wartime prices and trade board, with the approval of the government, in which it was made clear that the support of the market from then on would not be the responsibility of the wartime prices and trade board. My colleague, the Minister of Agriculture, made it clear in the house that the responsibility as from that date, namely, the spring of 1943, was assumed by the meat board. That reference is found near the bottom of the second column of page 3177 of Hansard. It may be that a complete reading of the debate found in the columns to which I have referred makes it perfectly clear that there was no violation of commitments on the part of Mr. Gordon or the wartime prices and trade board or the Wartime Food Corporation. It may be that is perfectly clear already, but since there were several references to a promise made by Donald Gordon personally and a violation of that promise I thought I owed it to Mr. Gordon—and I know he would like me to make this clear to the committee—to say that there was no violation or breach of any commitment whatever on their part, and I have no reason to think there was any on the part of the meat board either, I may say.

Mr. McNEVIN: There is an item or two on which I should like to make some representations to the senior officials of the Department of Finance and the officials of the wartime prices and trade board respecting subsidies. But before doing so I wish to add a word of appreciation to those already spoken by the hon. member for New Westminster and the parliamentary assistant to the Minister of Finance respecting the work which has been so well done by those who have volunteered to distribute ration books. This group of unselfish and untiring citizens is deserving of the highest commendation by the government and the people of Canada.

Something has been said in this discussion this evening with regard to the value to the Canadian people of the work which has been done by the wartime prices and trade board. It would be a long story to cover all the items in which I think the people of Canada generally have been well served by this board, but I wish to point out two items. I refer to sugar and automobile tires. Those are items in which the supply is not sufficient to meet the demand, and if it were not for the control and the rationing of those commodities I am quite satisfied that the extra cost of those two items would run into many millions of dollars which would have to be paid by the general public. Therefore I think we should give credit where credit is due and highly commend the minister and those associated with him in this most essential and worth-while part of the war effort of the Canadian people.

If I had any criticism of the administration of these matters by the wartime prices and trade board it would be this. I am not sure that the officials throughout the Dominion of Canada who are in charge of these regional offices are always as considerate and as courteous to the public as they should be. I do not think it would be at all amiss if these officials were brought in at least once a year to some central point, so that the higher officials in the department could give them some instructions. They might be told that while we have to enforce restrictions, they should be enforced in a manner which would not be offensive to the general public.

I now come to one or two items concerning which I wish to make some representations. The first has to do with clover seed. I believe there are some lines of clover seed for which the grower is not receiving sufficient remuneration, so as to encourage production. To my mind this production is essential not only during the war, but in the post-war period. We have enjoyed for many years a substantial share of the import markets in Europe for clover seed. I believe that, particularly with respect to alsike seed, the present price is not sufficient to give that impetus which is so necessary to the maintenance of production on a large scale.

I believe members of the committee generally will agree with me when I say that very large quantities of seed will be required in Europe when the war is over. Therefore, if we are to be in a position to supply and to retain that substantial market, I think some consideration should be given to the possibility of paying a subsidy on at least some of these lines. The prices, as I recall them, are these: For alsike seed, twenty-nine cents a pound; for red clover, thirty-four cents a pound and for alfalfa seed, thirty-seven cents a pound. That is the price at which the dealer is permitted to sell to the retail trade in Canada. Perhaps those are reasonable prices for the consumer in Canada to pay.

Of course, so far as exports are concerned, the seed business of Canada is controlled by the export seed office, which is located in the town of Lindsay, in my riding. The official in charge of the export seed office, under the direction of the seed branch, is Mr. F. G. Perrin, general manager of the Hogg and Lytle Seed Company, a man who has had a wide trading experience in both domestic and export seed markets. I state that only to illustrate that the area I represent is a large clover seed producing district, particularly so far as alsike and red clover seeds are concerned.

I think the official returns will show this year that the alfalfa seed growers have received a fair price. I am not sure, however, that that is the case with respect to alsike. Of course the seed is turned over to the export office by the seed dealers at a price which is substantially lower than the retail domestic price to which I have referred. Then the grower is entitled, through participation certificates, to receive whatever additional sum may represent the profit on the export trade. I believe that is a sound set-up, because under other circumstances the dealers would profit to a greater extent.

We now come back to the price of alsike seed. A good deal of the seed was brought in at $10 a bushel. Some seed dealers at a later time paid an additional $2.50 a bushel. But even at that the returns to the grower are not sufficient to give that encouragement which is so necessary if we are to produce substantial quantities of seed. If we had enjoyed a heavy export for the 1943 crop of alsike the situation would have been more satisfactory from the point of view of the grower, because there would have been returned to him by the export seed office a substantial payment by way of participation certificates. That, however, was not the case. Our exports of alsike seed from the 1943 crop were practically negligible, so that there cannot be any substantial sum returned to the growers.

It is true that if the price at which the dealers must turn the seed over to the export office were increased, it would mean that the seed trade could go out and buy the seed from the growers at a higher price. The final result might not be very much different from what it is under the present set-up, but the grower would receive a larger down payment, and to that extent would be that much better satisfied. It is a long time to look ahead to what may come from a participation certificate. That applies particularly to the class of producers who have not been accustomed to receiving returns from those certificates.

It is my considered opinion with respect to alsike that a subsidy of 7 or 7½ cents a pound would give that encouragement so essential to maintain production on a scale which will provide ample seed, so that we may retain our share of that important European market during the war, and in the post-war period. I would ask the responsible officials to give most serious consideration to the possibility of putting into effect a subsidy of about those proportions in respect of alsike seed.

Then, some little additional encouragement would not be out of line in respect of red clover seed. Where red clover seed is produced we always find a good crop of hay. At least I can say it is usual to find that where you have a good crop of seed you have at least a fair crop of hay. In that way the grower has the advantage of two crops in one year. That does not pertain to alsike seed. After the threshing the feed is of very little value, and alsike clover seed is produced entirely from the first crop.

Alfalfa seed is not produced in large quantities in my community. However, substantial quantities of that seed are produced from a second crop. So that in that instance, too, the grower in many instances has a crop of hay, and then he can produce his seed from his second crop. It is also true that large quantities of alfalfa seed are produced in western Canada, and in some portions of Ontario, from the first cutting.

There is one further item to which I should like to make a brief reference, namely, Ontario fall wheat. There is a ceiling price on Ontario fall wheat of approximately $1.26 a bushel at Montreal, which nets the Ontario grower anywhere from $1.10 to $1.12 a bushel. My understanding is, although I may be mistaken, that there is no ceiling on western wheat. At the present time the price of Ontario wheat is below that of western wheat. That may not pertain right back to the grower, but in ordinary times Ontario fall wheat is sold at from ten to twenty cents above No. 1 northern. The result has been and will continue to be that a large portion of the Ontario fall wheat crop will go into the feed bin. Over a long period of years we have built up and developed a profitable and substantial business in pastry flour which is produced from Ontario fall wheat.

Mr. ABBOTT: Will my hon. friend allow me to interrupt? I do not want to stop him, but this question of Ontario wheat really comes under a later item in these estimates. I do not know whether he would prefer to discuss it now or later on.

Mr. McNEVIN: I was going to suggest that if the price ceiling cannot be altered consideration be given to the payment of a subsidy.

Mr. CARDIFF: The first question I should like to ask the Minister of Finance is whether I should call his assistant the parliamentary assistant or secretary?

Mr. ABBOTT: I believe the official title is parliamentary assistant.

Mr. CARDIFF: I should like to revert to the broom corn industry and ask the parliamentary assistant if the government had anything to do with financing or promoting certain companies which bargained with quite a number of farmers in some sections of the country to grow broom corn? In many cases the broom corn was never harvested because the contracts were misleading and it was found that the remuneration to be received was not sufficient to pay the labour involved in the harvesting.

Mr. ABBOTT: I am advised that the government had nothing to do with organizing or promoting the companies to which my hon. friend has referred. Perhaps I had better restrict my statement to the wartime prices and trade board or the Commodity Prices Stabilization Corporation, whose estimates we are now discussing. They had nothing to do with the promotion of any such companies. I have no information about other departments of the government, but I am inclined to doubt that they had anything to do with it.

Mr. BLACKMORE: I appreciate the great care the Minister of Finance took in framing his statement in defence of Mr. Gordon. I was involved in the attack on the government which involved Mr. Gordon, but I think a careful perusal of the remarks I made will show that I did not directly attach blame to Mr. Gordon. I think I made it quite clear that I did not know who was to blame, that the object of my remarks was to find out where the blame should be placed. Since it has been made clear by the statement of the minister that Mr. Gordon had control until the spring of 1943—what month was it?

Mr. ILSLEY: May 21.

Mr. BLACKMORE: That statement certainly exonerates Mr. Gordon and will raise him to a high regard of esteem in my constituency because there were no complaints before that date. What I said was based on what happened in 1944, and I think the minister recognizes that.

Mr. ILSLEY: I am not saying that there may be any blame.

Mr. BLACKMORE: I am not saying that there should be any blame attached to Mr. Gordon, but certainly there is plenty attached to whoever took over from that time. However, we are not discussing this matter at the present time, so that I shall not go into it in any detail. I just wanted to make it clear that I did not wish to make an unjustified attack on Mr. Gordon. As a matter of fact, I was just trying to find out who was to blame so that I would know whom to shoot at. I am glad one of them is eliminated. All through the months of February and March the impression was abroad in my constituency that somehow or another the wartime prices and trade board was responsible, or at least partly responsible. It will be remembered from what I said that one of our great difficulties has been that we do not know upon whom to place the blame. It would now appear that the blame is entirely on the Minister of Agriculture. I am afraid I gave the minister the benefit of the doubt, but in my next speech I will not.

Mr. ILSLEY: I am very sorry if my remarks were taken as an attempt to shift the blame, because really I did not say any more than the Minister of Agriculture said himself. He is reported on page 3177 of Hansard as follows:

> Mr. Gardiner: My hon. friend has read the statement and I now say to him that that particular arrangement was changed.
>
> Mr. Blackmore: When was it changed?
>
> Mr. Gardiner: It was changed in the spring of 1943.
>
> Mr. Blackmore: From that time thereafter—
> Mr. Gardiner: From the time the meat board was set up it became responsible for purchasing meat.

Mr. BLACKMORE: That was a good thing for the Minister of Agriculture to say. The trouble was that whoever tried to probe into the matter to determine wherein the responsibility lay always found that the wartime prices and trade board turned up. That has been where the difficulty lay. I believe that my attack was justified, but I am happy to know that Mr. Gordon is out of it.

Mr. ABBOTT: A matter was raised earlier this evening by the hon. member for Bellechasse who is not in his seat at the moment. I did not have the information at the time he inquired about tobacco prices. I am advised that the matter has been under consideration for some little time and that a decision will probably be given within the course of the next few days.

Mr. SHAW: Last week I referred to the subsidy which was paid by the Commodity Prices Stabilization Corporation to the producers of pit props and mine ties in western Canada. It was pointed out to me at the time that this matter did not properly come under the estimates of the Minister of Mines and Resources. It will be recalled that in 1943 a serious shortage of these items developed, and it was decided by the wartime prices and trade board that the mine operators could not stand an increase in price. It was also understood that a drop in the production of pit props and mine ties resulted because the producers were unable to procure help or to pay the wages demanded. Therefore the Commodity Prices Stabilization Corporation was authorized to pay a subsidy of $3.50 per thousand lineal feet on pit props and something like one-half cent per foot for mine ties. This continued until February, 1944, and I am not complaining because it was paid.

What I complain about is this, that without notice the subsidy was terminated. Our producers had in their yards thousands of lineal feet of pit props and mine ties. They had paid wages on the understanding that the subsidy would be continued. When it was suddenly discontinued they found themselves in a most unfortunate predicament. It was true they were told that they might increase the price of their product by $3.50 a thousand, and in the case of mine ties by the amount of the subsidy. But for two reasons they discovered that there was no market for their pit props and mine ties, one reason being that we now have a surplus. The second reason I am not going to press because some of the ministers take exception to this. The operator said, "He can buy the government produced commodity more cheaply than we can buy yours." But I am not going to press that.

I should like to know why the subsidy was discontinued. Was it because the mine operators were not in a position to pay the additional price? Could it be that the subsidy was discontinued because of there now being a surplus? I should like to get to the bottom of this. I am much opposed to this idea of getting operators to cooperate through a subsidy and then penalizing them for their cooperation, and that is exactly what this amounted to. They met your shortage; they had a surplus; you discontinued the subsidy; they were caught.

The situation is this. The labour shortage is undoubtedly going to get worse. Another winter might be very severe. Then it is reasonable to expect that another shortage of these very necessary commodities will develop. Can you expect the operators to cooperate as they did before? I think an important principle is involved. I would ask the parliamentary assistant to give me the reason for the discontinuation of the payment of that subsidy, at least on the materials which were in the yards and had been purchased with the idea that the subsidy would be paid.

Mr. ABBOTT: The reason is that the subsidy was superseded by price increases which were equal to the amounts to be allowed to producers of pit props and mine ties, effective from January 19, 1944.

Mr. SHAW: I referred to that. But the point is this, that a surplus had been created. Then, of course, we know that prisoners of war and conscientious objectors had also been engaged in the production of these commodities. When the operators increased their prices by $3.50 there was no market for them. The assumption was, and it is based on the statement of the operators: "We can buy them from the government more cheaply." But I am not going to press that. The Minister of Labour denied that although I could have produced enough evidence to convince him that I had a case, but my object was not to try to make a case. There is an important principle involved, and we may desire the cooperation of these people later on.

Mr. WARREN: Has consideration been given to avoiding in some way or another the difficulties that some producers get themselves into as a result of the fixing of a ceiling price which gradually rises to a higher point? We have a situation in our community with respect to potatoes. We produce potatoes quite extensively, but our potatoes are not graded. We can grow good potatoes, but there has never been set up in the community the machinery necessary for the grading of potatoes. That makes it difficult to market our potatoes outside the local neighbourhood or the local towns.

What happened this year was that numbers of farmers who have potatoes, some hundreds of bags, stored them, believing that they would get the spring ceiling price. They probably could have sold them last fall or found a market for them during the winter months, but they wanted to hold for the spring ceiling price. Then a shortage of potatoes developed, and potatoes were brought in from British Columbia and some from the United States to supply the market. The result is that numbers of farmers in my community have hundreds of bags of potatoes on their hands for which they cannot find a market. It looks to me as though something ought to be done to prevent the encouragement of that sort of thing. It is quite easy to say that the farmer has himself to blame, that he should have sold when he could have got a reasonable price. But most people like to get the top price. It is difficult to market potatoes in our climate in the winter months, and it is not easy to ship potatoes out of our community in carload lots for the reason that they are not graded. It is not easy to sell a carload of potatoes in the city of Ottawa, unless they are graded. The markets we used to have for potatoes was with the truckers who would run up from Ottawa, perhaps with a load, and take back a load of potatoes. But now these trucks cannot go beyond the thirty-five mile limit, and our neighbourhood trucks are not allowed to truck potatoes into the city of Ottawa, 100 miles away. The way it looks now, these potatoes are going to be a total loss. A repetition of that sort of situation should be guarded against. I would ask the parliamentary assistant if the officials could somehow get their heads together and find a market for the potatoes of these grievously disappointed farmers in my community.

Mr. ABBOTT: I have listened with interest to the hon. member for Renfrew North and I am getting quite a liberal education in potatoes. I will bring his remarks to the attention of the officials and ask them whether anything can be done.

Mr. HATFIELD: I called the board's attention to the question mentioned by the previous speaker in February and March before they started to import potatoes. The War Foods Corporation said: We will import potatoes from the United States. They failed to take my advice. They imported some two hundred and fifty carloads. I will say that the War Foods Corporation did a much better job than the Commodity Prices Stabilization Corporation, because they bought the potatoes from the war food distributing board in the United States, and they bought them away below our ceiling and saved the payment of any subsidy.

I see by this report that $1,300,000 was paid in subsidies on corn. Was that domestic or imported corn? Was the corn used for feeding purposes or for processing into corn starch, glucose and corn syrup?

Mr. ABBOTT: It was all imported corn, and I understand that it was largely used for corn starch and corn meal.

Mr. HAZEN: In spite of the efforts which have been made to control prices, I am informed that manufacturers of lumber are receiving more for their lumber than they did in the last war. I notice that a subsidy in the form of a ten per cent discount is paid the final consumer in certain cases. Final consumers who are eligible for the discount are "farmers, fishermen, growers of fruit and vegetables, trappers and other civilian users who purchase lumber from time to time for use in the pursuit of their personal trade or occupation, for maintenance and repair purposes, or for use in assisting the primary production of essential foods." We hear a great deal about the necessity for new dwellings; and the people who own and occupy houses have to make necessary repairs to them from time to time. In view of the increased cost of lumber these repairs add to their cost of living; and I ask the parliamentary assistant if any consideration has ever been given to the question of including owners of houses to provide that they obtain this discount.

Mr. ABBOTT: Repairs are eligible, not new construction.

Mr. HAZEN: Repairs to houses are eligible?

Mr. ABBOTT: So I am advised, yes.

Mr. HAZEN: As I read page 34 of the report of the wartime prices and trade board, it does not say that.

Mr. ABBOTT: That may have been an oversight.

Mr. HAZEN: In fact it says, "The subsidy is not paid on sales to industrial users and contractors and on lumber for the building or improvement of dwellings."

Mr. ABBOTT: That is right—on new building and improvements, but that does not cover repairs. Repairs and maintenance are included, not new building or improvements to existing buildings; and not, of course, for industrial uses.

Mr. TUSTIN: In regard to lumber, the parliamentary assistant told us there was a certain amount in this item for subsidy. Could he tell us how much the price ceiling on lumber has been lifted since the basic period of 1940?

Mr. ABBOTT: I may not have that information. Some price advances have been authorized, and they have varied in different regions of the country. I am afraid I have not the information here, nor have I any average figure here.

[Mr. Hatfield.]

Mr. TUSTIN: Possibly the parliamentary assistant could get that. I believe that the ceiling on lumber has been raised several times in some sections of the country, and I should like to know, if it is possible to get the information, by what percentage it has been raised since the basic period.

Mr. ABBOTT: I will try to get that information.

Mr. CARDIFF: Does that subsidy on lumber include all grades, or is there any specified grade?

Mr. ABBOTT: It is payable on all classes of lumber, but not on sashes, doors, millwork and so on; and only on soft wood lumber, not on hardwoods.

Mr. HATFIELD: Is there a subsidy on raw and refined sugar?

Mr. ABBOTT: No.

Item agreed to.

Wartime Salvage Limited, administration and losses, $500,000.

Mr. STIRLING: In the next few days there is going to be a determined attempt all across Canada to collect waste paper for war purposes. Can the parliamentary assistant assure us that the tons of paper which go out of this building will reach that beneficial end?

Mr. ABBOTT: I would hesitate to give that assurance.

Mr. STIRLING: What does happen to it?

Mr. ABBOTT: All these items, of course, were prepared some months ago, and I think were in Hansard in February. Wartime Salvage Limited is now in process of liquidation, and it is anticipated that it will cease all operations within the next month or so. Of the total amount of $500,000 provided by the estimates to cover the company's administrative expenses and losses for the fiscal year 1944-45 it is now anticipated that $30,000 at the very most will be required. The remainder of the amount required will revert to the war appropriation; and the activities which were formerly carried on by Wartime Salvage Limited under the wartime prices and trade board will, I understand, be carried on by the Department of National War Services, and the costs probably paid by the Commodity Prices Stabilization Corporation.

Mr. STIRLING: Can the parliamentary assistant tell us what does happen to the wastepaper from this building?

Mr. ILSLEY: The hon. member for Ottawa West tells me there is keen contest as between contractors or bidders for the paper which leaves this building, and it all goes into use in that way.

Mr. STIRLING: Into war uses?

Mr. ILSLEY: War and peace uses. I do not think you can trace through a particular lot of wastepaper into war use; but there is a great need for wastepaper now. What the hon. gentleman is interested in is whether this is being used. It is being tendered for and bought and used.

Mr. STIRLING: And the money goes into consolidated revenue?

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes.

Mr. CARDIFF: Who is Wartime Salvage Limited?

Mr. ABBOTT: The officers are set out in the report which was tabled two or three months ago: President, Mr. W. A. Bark; vice-president, Mr. R. Geddes; treasurer, Mr. C. F. Butler; Mr. C. W. Younger; and the director is Mr. Charles LaFerle.

Mr. HATFIELD: Do they handle reclaimed rubber?

Mr. ABBOTT: No.

Item stands.

Progress reported.

At eleven o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

ADDRESS

OF

Prime Minister of Australia

TO

MEMBERS OF THE SENATE AND OF THE HOUSE OF COMMONS

IN THE

HOUSE OF COMMONS CHAMBER, OTTAWA

ON

THURSDAY, JUNE 1, 1944

(Mr. Curtin was welcomed by Right Hon. W. L. Mackenzie King, Prime Minister of Canada, and Mr. Gordon Graydon, Leader of the Opposition, and thanked by Hon. Thomas Vien, Speaker of the Senate, and Hon. James Allison Glen, Speaker of the House of Commons)

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister of Canada): Members of the Senate and of the House of Commons: We are greatly privileged to have as a guest of our two houses to-day the Right Honourable John Curtin, the Prime Minister of Australia. Mr. Curtin has kindly consented to address us this afternoon. Before he does so I should like, on behalf of the parliament and people of Canada, to say just a word or two to him, and, through him, to the parliament and people of Australia.

It is difficult to believe that more than three years have elapsed since members here assembled had the honour of being addressed by Mr. Curtin's distinguished predecessor, the Right Honourable R. G. Menzies. At that time the war was far into its second year. Nazi Germany had subjugated most of Europe. There was desperate fighting in Egypt, in Libya, in Greece and in Crete, and on the waters of the Mediterranean. In all these theatres of war, and over Europe from Britain, Australian soldiers, sailors and airmen had been heroically withstanding the onslaughts of the enemy, often at great sacrifice.

But not in Africa and Europe only were the armed forces of Australia on active service.

They were serving at that time in Australia itself, in Asia, at Singapore and in Malaya, some, we are proud to say, were training as brothers in arms with our own airmen here in Canada. On no less than five continents and on many seas, Australia had distributed her fighting forces to help preserve the world's liberties. All this was even before Russia had come into the war. I mention these things, that you, Mr. Curtin, may know that the recollection of the service rendered the world by Australia in those early and perilous years is as vivid in our minds to-day as it was at the time. These memories will never be effaced.

Appalling as the prospect appeared to your countrymen, as, indeed, it did to all the other peoples of the British commonwealth in those first two years of war, that prospect, to you and to the people of Australia, must have seemed almost unreal by comparison with the situation which confronted Australia within two months of the time you became leader of the government.

For years the Japanese had been waiting for the day they might proclaim themselves masters of the Pacific. While you were denuding your own continent of its bravest men, and even of its own defences to help save freedom in Europe, Japan was extending her conquest of China. She was stealthily encroaching on other territories which brought her, in full strength, ever closer to your own shores. After Pearl Harbor, after the fall of Singapore, before aid could come to you from any quarter of the globe, you and the people of Australia must have experienced terrible anxiety. What Britain had to endure, when she stood alone facing the might of Germany, Australia for many months must have felt in facing the might of Japan. As Britain kept open the gates of freedom in the north Atlantic, so Australia and New Zealand kept open the gates of freedom in the south Pacific.

The free world will probably never realize what it owes to Australia, what it owes, Mr. Curtin, to your own sagacious and resolute leadership. We are anxious, however, at this moment to express what acknowledgment we can of so great a debt. With this acknowledgment we wish to give you the assurance that just as your forces and ours have been exerting their strength wherever the call was most imperative in this global war; just as to-day we await with confidence the outcome of the colossal conflict which will crush forever the menace of nazi tyranny; so on the morrow our forces will be found closer than ever at the side of yours, sharing with our allies in the total destruction of the tyranny of Japan.

[Mr. Mackenzie King.]

Before calling upon the Prime Minister of Australia to address us, I shall ask Mr. Graydon, as leader of the opposition, to join with me in extending to Mr. Curtin a unanimous welcome, and our best of wishes for the safe return of Mrs. Curtin and himself, and the members of their party, to their homeland. We ask them to take with them to the people of Australia the profound admiration and heartfelt good wishes of all the people of Canada.

Mr. GORDON GRAYDON (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I desire to associate His Majesty's Loyal Opposition and, if I may be permitted, other opposition groups in the house as well, with the eloquent and gracious words of welcome which the Prime Minister has extended to-day to our honoured and distinguished visitor. We warmly welcome the Right Honourable John Curtin as a statesman with a long, honourable and successful parliamentary career, and as a prominent member of Australia's "fourth estate". His keen concern for the welfare of the common people and his deep attachment to the cause of labour, which has made such a notable effort in this wartime period, gives to his visit a special significance to this parliament and the Canadian people.

May I express at this point, too, with what great pleasure the Canadian people extend their hospitality to Mrs. Curtin, who has through the years been such a tower of strength to her husband.

Australia's Prime Minister is just returning from an important meeting of the commonwealth Prime Ministers. This conference has given new encouragement and added determination to the British commonwealth and empire statesmen, and to the people they represent, to see this war through to a speedy and successful conclusion. Our fervent hope is that this conference marks only the beginning of even greater things ahead for a strengthened and more closely collaborating commonwealth and empire in the closing days of war and in that better world of permanent peace and plenty which must follow.

We greatly admire and honour the record of achievement in two wars of the powerful and heroic Australian forces on the sea, on the land and in the air. Their gigantic contribution to the fight for freedom, which came at one critical stage to Australia's very shores, constitutes an illustrious page in the history of this war, as in the last.

On the civilian front Australia has a magnificent record to her credit as well, and we ask Australia's Prime Minister to-day to carry back to his nation's armed forces and to his people in general the admiration and praise of Canadians for all that Australia has meant to this dominion, the British commonwealth and the united nations in these stern days of test and trial.

So I say to you, Mr. Curtin, that it gives me great pleasure and no small satisfaction to make the words of the Prime Minister, who so eloquently welcomed you to-day, unanimous in the Dominion of Canada.

Right Hon. JOHN CURTIN (Prime Minister of Australia): Mr. Prime Minister, Leader of the Opposition, Mr. Speaker of the Senate, Mr. Speaker of the House of Commons, members of the Parliament of Canada:

I do not propose in any way to fill out in detail the broad picture of what has been done by the people of Australia in the war. Indeed, sir, if I were to speak at very great length, with far greater power and energy than are mine, I could not pay a tribute to the Australian people more handsomely than have the Prime Minister and the Leader of the Opposition in the addresses which they have delivered here to-day. It will be my great pleasure, as indeed it is my duty, to attempt in some way to convey to the parliament and people of the Commonwealth of Australia an indication of the spirit that has marked the speeches which have been delivered, and to express to them how highly they are regarded in this great sister dominion of Canada. I know it will give them great pleasure, but it will not lessen in any way their energies. They will not feel, "Well, now that other countries know what we have done, there is not much more for us to do." On the contrary they will derive inspiration and encouragement, from the assurance we all must experience to-day, to see to it that what has now been done so magnificently by the people of the united nations will be carried through to completion, so that those forces of evil which commenced this struggle against liberty and freedom in the world will be so decisively defeated that in the future it will be impossible either for them or for those like unto them to regenerate conditions or to nourish ambitions which would lead to a fateful calamity such as that which has now overtaken the world as a whole.

You, here, come to this place, the law-making authority of a free people, as the result of the decisions of your citizens. They have their rights and they express them. They register their decision as to who, among those who offer themselves, shall become their representatives, along with other representatives of the people of Canada, in this great hall of legislation and as their trustees decide for them the kind of laws that they will be expected to observe. Nowhere in the world outside the Dominion of Canada can anything be said or done which can in any way lessen the complete authority of this parliament, as the law-making authority of the people of Canada, to decide for the people of Canada what it is that the people of Canada shall be expected to do.

This principle of the sovereignty of a free people is integral to the cause for which all of us went to war. For it will be remembered that among the very first things the nazis did was to burn the Reichstag, to destroy the representative assembly, to prohibit the association together of the citizens of Germany for those purposes for which association generally is considered desirable. Before they could attempt to destroy the freedom of the world they had to restrict it at home. And the writing was on the wall for the world at large when despotism in so great a country, with so large a population, began to plant its heel, internally, on the civic rights of the people, on the dignity of the individual man or woman of Germany. From that day onward totalitarianism not only marked the internal policy which Germany was pursuing, but was being constantly extended across the frontiers, infecting the states adjoining Germany. And where that could not be done easily, then the armed forces of Germany were projected beyond the territorial boundaries of Germany itself.

The decisions that had been reached at the peace conference were decisions no longer respected, and, as a consequence, force became the instrument with which Germany at home and abroad proceeded to translate its expectations into what it hoped would be fruition.

I need not do more than summarize what occurred. The rest of the world hoped that war had for ever been abandoned as a means of determining international disputes. It was believed that reason could be used in discussion—could be used, indeed, to decide differences of opinion between states as to their rights and their duties. Within the lives almost of the present generation the civilized world had had a bitter experience of the cost of war and of all that war means, apart from its material cost. Therefore they believed that by associating together it would be practicable to devise machinery to prevent a repetition of occurrences which in previous ages and, indeed, in quite recent times, had permitted the peace of the world to be disturbed, threatened and destroyed. They believed there could be this alternative whereby, without resort to force, the rights and claims of those who had rights and claims could be fairly and impartially considered and justly decided upon.

As I have said, force rules the world and has ruled it. That being so, notwithstanding the great exertions of those who had hoped for a different state of affairs, the fact became clear when Germany marched into Poland. That march came almost as soon as arrangements could be made, notwithstanding the fact that almost within a recent day or days, so quickly does time move now, an agreement had been made at Munich. The most recent agreement was merely the instrument whereby Germany had provided an anæsthetic for the rest of the world, lulling it into a sense of false security and using the time factor in order to have greater striking power when it felt the moment had come to make the initial onslaught.

No post mortem is necessary to adjudicate upon war guilt. The facts are themselves there for all to see. It is true that not only Australia but Canada and the whole British commonwealth were at war when Germany marched into Poland, because Great Britain had given a solemn undertaking to protect Poland against the intruder and aggressor. The pledged word of governments is the moral conscience of the world. There cannot be agreements between nations, there cannot be covenants between states; there cannot be any hope for the future of the world, unless high contracting parties keep their undertakings. It is not an easy matter to arrive at such agreements, covenants and treaties. A wide diversity of interests has to be commingled in some general unity before that can be reached. When it is reached, it means so much to the world, because after all is said and done, the social state of dignity and of decency, and the relationships of the common man within his own order or beyond it, rest finally upon the sanctity of contracts. Thus had Great Britain given this undertaking—given it in order to ensure that there should not be resort to force.

The very fact that Poland was wantonly invaded was not only a violation of the word that Germany had given through its government; it also violated the purposes and the whole spirit which had marked Great Britain's acceptance of the treaty of Munich. Peace was destroyed by that act. Who is there anywhere in the world now who sees the aggressor on the move, who is able to put a terminus to his movement? Is there immunity for you, but not for me? Ah, no; it is not within the wit of man to circumscribe brutality and to limit violence so long as brutality and violence are permitted without restraint to extend their boundaries.

Therefore the invasion of Poland, while involving immediately the people and the territories of that country, was in fact an indication to the whole world that there was no place which the nazis could reach and desired to reach that they would not seek to reach unless their strength could be taken from them. And war came, as we all know.

But the list of belligerents had not been made clear. Opportunism is one of the arts of war—to take advantage of the chance that comes to you, to be ready to seize whatever be the effects of general military dispositions and the ebb and flow of battle. As it turned out, Germany, having prepared for so long against the powers that had made little or no preparation, not only had the initial advantage, but because of the sheer momentum of the offensive that had been exerted was able to move to the east, then to the west and then to the south. In a little while, as it were, practically the whole of Europe, territorially and from the point of view of the economic structure of Europe that was most vital, was under either direct or indirect German domination.

You saw amid the wreck and misery of nations the flag of Hitler superseding the flags of countries that for many years had been proudly practising not only the principles of liberty, but, in so far as their capacity would admit, the arts of progress. Norway, France, Greece—why add to the list? This gave to Germany so tremendous a command of resources that the battle flowed even into the Atlantic. It would be absurd for me to occupy time in describing the strategy of it, but you can see at once that having taken control of practically the whole of Europe, all that was necessary then to secure control and complete the conquest for Germany was to isolate Great Britain. So the battle flowed with the U-boats and air power to cut off from Great Britain the supplies which would enable her to withstand onslaught. By day and by night the air power of Germany rained blows devastatingly upon the capital city of the motherland of the British commonwealth. By day and by night from the depths of the ocean seeped up the ravagers that sought the destruction of ships so that food and equipment which Britain needed would not arrive, and that which was a partial deficiency because of lack of preparation would become a complete deficiency because of inability to provide reinforcements and fresh supplies.

You have paid a tribute, sir, to Australia. May we not here, reviewing the world aspect of this terrible struggle, jointly pay a tribute to the people and to the government of Great Britain, which, standing alone against the fury and strength of Germany, withstood the shock? Not only did they withstand it, but more; they proved that there was in the people of Great Britain the resource and virility and determination and devotion and gallantry which, at that stage at any rate would not permit the forces which swept through France, which reduced Norway, which completely decimated the Low Countries; the forces which drove, as it were, Greece from its seat of ancient authority and apparently had so largely succeeded that the second belligerent said, "I am in with you,"—it would not permit these forces to go any farther. And Italy having come in, Great Britain still stood.

It is true that Britain had friends. There was the whole British commonwealth. You have spoken, sir, of what the Australian fighting man did. But here in this place may I now pay a tribute to what the Canadian fighting man did, to what the Canadian airman did, to your having, although unprepared, developed great naval strength; to the experiences you have had in the war, and to your determination to do all that you humanly can to see it through.

Britain was the bastion, but to that bastion as opportunity allowed there came the airmen and the military strength—yes, and the naval forces of the whole British commonwealth; for if the heart should be mortally attacked, how could the nether limbs survive? Australia sent her men—Australian men went over long distances; the truth is that they went because they knew that in fighting for the freedom of the world and for the defence of Britain they were in fact fighting for the defence of their own country. Not that they would not have gone had they believed that Australia was not menaced; for being kith and kin, of a common ancestry and all that goes to make up that vast heritage of freedom which has come down to us through the ages from our forebears who struggled for it where they lived in past ages—all that would have counted with us as it would have counted with you. But Britain stood firm; the forces of Hitler were dispersed as the waves of the sea are broken upon a rock. Hitler, however, felt there were still things he could do to complete his purpose of world domination, which was the central core of the totalitarian concept that Germany entertained. He turned east for a breathing space, so that, not knowing what might happen when he got too far involved in the west, there would not come upon him from behind the strength of Russia. For although there may be ideological differences between political systems, just as there are economic distinctions between dominions of the British commonwealth—those in the north, those in the south, those in the east, and so on—yet despite these political and economic distinctions there are fundamental principles which are common to all and which most certainly have to be defended if the realization of the freedom of the state in the future, and of its hopes for the future, is ever to be made possible.

Hitler feared Russia. Fear was an unwise monitor; none the less he drove to the east and brought Russia into the war. We can here pay tribute to Russia for all that she has done; but we can do more. We can express admiration for the colossal way in which that mighty country has rallied herself and energized herself and organized herself and fought in order that the legions of Hitler could not push so far into her territory as to destroy her.

Why go on as a kind of incompetent historian? Yet one is tempted to do so. In time Germany and Italy, because they had brought themselves to face the walls of Britain and the walls of Russia, decided it was desirable that something more should be done. Like a bolt from the blue, the third partner in the axis struck—struck like an assassin in the night. The President of the United States was having discussions with a special envoy of the Japanese government. He sent a direct appeal to the Emperor of Japan, and the Emperor replied with bombing raids on Pearl Harbor and with attacks on Singapore; replied with the instruments of his armed power to hit simultaneously at two bastions of freedom in the Pacific, believing that if he could neutralize those bastions there would then devolve upon the United States, as upon Great Britain, so very long a period for the rehabilitation of those bases and those resources that, in the meantime, he could consolidate his co-prosperity sphere and, without very much opposition, possibly be able to go as far as his ambitions led him. If you will look at it shortly you will perceive how nearly successful that campaign was. Malaya, then down through the Netherlands East Indies, then across into New Guinea, into the Solomons, Pearl Harbor and Hawaii, and the whole Pacific open to Japan's naval power with the bases they had established—improperly according to any standards of decency between nations, because in spite of their mandate they fortified these bases contrary to treaty stipulations. Thus they had given to them a capacity with which to cut the supply line between the United States and Australia, just as Hitler believed that he could cut the supply line between this continent and Great Britain, and isolate in the south the one land available as a base from which to mount great strength in order ultimately to defeat the Japanese.

It was a very close call that Great Britain had. It was a very close call that Australia had. Just a little more here, a little less there, and the result might have been different. The margin was not sufficiently large for comfort for either the government of Great Britain or the government of Australia. But the margin was on the right side. The strength came. The massing of resources in Great Britain has gone on steadily. The battle of the Atlantic has now turned from the U-boat hunting to the U-boat being hunted. And so in the Pacific, where Japanese air and naval power was continuously expanding, Japanese air and naval power is now on the defensive. The orientation of the war is different now from what it was. There are varying periods in the lives of men, and all of us have episodes; and so it is in war. War is not a static thing. If at the commencement of this colossal struggle the united nations were on the defensive and the initiative and the power to exert the offensive rested with the axis, imposing upon the united nations a holding strategy, that holding strategy has been completed. Behind it the requisite strength has been marshalled, and the time came, not simultaneously everywhere, when it could be employed in limited offensives to weaken the offensive of the enemy.

So the skill and genius of commanders in all theatres was directed to that purpose, to the point where the enemy was driven out of North Africa—but not without cost, not without a great deal of time being taken in the campaign, and not without a stupendous burden upon the productive resources of this and every other continent that is on the side of the allied nations in the effort to provide the material with which the fighting men in North Africa could at last carry through the task of making some return for all that had happened previously in North Africa, in Crete, in Greece and thereabouts.

Then you saw the entry into Italy; and now you see the battle in Italy raging, and you know that the battle which has been started is one which we confidently believe will represent the terminal point of German-Italian collaboration in any part of Italy. However, let me do no more than generalize; for hours, days or weeks are not for me to measure. The cardinal fact is that where the enemy held all the strategical locations from which to exert attacks upon the forces of the allied nations, to-day he is going backwards, towards Berlin in Europe, towards Tokyo in the Pacific. This could not have been done without imposing upon the civil populations of all the united nations the burdens of war. You cannot escape the inevitable price which will have to be paid for what has to be done. Soldiers have to be fed; supplies for them have to be transported vast distances; they have to have equipment for war vastly different from the equipment man uses in peace time. Therefore, in factories which were producing goods useful to us as citizens to nourish our bodies, to warm ourselves, to house us, only a portion of the materials and the skill and the labour which had been devoted to that end can now be devoted to it, and this would be inadequate to provide more than the minimum scale which would ensure to the civil population the measure of health and strength necessary to the production of instruments of war. Here that is broadly true; in Australia it is broadly true. The people have agreed that the greater claim upon industry shall be to produce the essentitals for the waging of war, that to a minimum the civil population shall have satisfaction of its needs; that there must be a drastic curtailment of its wants.

Taxation has been mounting. I am sure that the Chancellor of the Exchequer and the treasurers of Canada and Australia are quite delighted in discovering how infinite are the resources of their various populations. This burden has had to fall upon the people at home. They have had to work long hours. They have had all kinds of exhausting tasks to carry out. It has been done cheerfully. Yet no burden that is borne by those who work in the factories, the fields, or the industries of the country is comparable to that which has been imposed upon the fighting men, wherever they are—in the deserts of North Africa or in the frightful places of the east; in disease-infected jungles, with no roads, with fearful humidity, with conditions under which white men have not been accustomed to live in any great numbers, let alone to fight.

So that as the obligation which comes first to all the governments is that of satisfying and maintaining the strength requisite to keep the fighting men fit wherever they may be—and the civil populations must provide that substance, because there is no other physical way in which it can be done—when the war is over, the obligations to the fighting men will not have ceased. The burdens which governments will carry will be dual burdens—to rebuild the resources of the country so that the arts of peace may flourish, and at the same time to satisfy that solemn debt of honour which all governments owe to the fighting men, and to their dependents, for having stood between the enemy and those at home and enabled those at home to sleep comfortably at nights and to be assured that their institutions and their way of life would not be molested by an invader.

As I look at this stage of the war I cannot do other than express heart-felt gratitude to the fighting men of the united nations as a whole and to their commanders, who have done the most to keep the world from becoming the slaves of despots and of tyrants. Then I would pay tribute to that quality for concert which nations of different political systems have developed, and which I hope and pray—and will strive to see accomplished—will be maintained when the war has ended.

You have said, sir, that I have been in parliament for some years. We know our parliamentary system. Leaders of the opposition, prime ministers, ministers of state, leading representatives of the opposition, are all engaged in what may appear to an outsider as vain disputation and constant controversy. The government can never do anything right, say the opposition; and, the opposition has no resource or capacity to be entrusted with the government, say the ministers. Well, that goes on time and time again. But in all the great matters of national duty, the maintenance of the social order and the promotion of the true welfare of the people, the best counsellor the prime minister has is invariably the leader of His Majesty's opposition. That has been my experience with these political parties. They bring out the truth as to what is the right way to solve a problem. We do not in our parliamentary system ignore discussion. We do not trample down minorities. We are not overawed by numbers. As a matter of fact the opposition is always able to speak eloquently and effectively—it does not know quite so much about the problem as the government! That has always been so. Yet you see in times of crisis the unity of the people in Australia, in Canada, in Great Britain, with all our diversities of political parties and practices and the like; none the less out of that discussion and that distinctiveness and that variation in the point of view a unity emerges.

It is the more permanent and effective because that is the way it comes, rather than as a result of the ukase of a dictator and the fears of those who must yield to his demands. It is a unity born of the supremacy of persuasion. It is a unity that emerges to give triumph to conviction rather than to cowardice or weakness. It is the strength born of the triumph of reason.

This being true of each of our dominions in respect of the national unity of our own people, then you have the representatives of those dominions going to a conference. They are composed in their own countries of leaders of parties, but they are also the heads of governments. They meet in London. No longer do they meet as leaders of parties; they meet as heads of governments, responsible in all they do for the presentation of what is the considered view and consensus of their dominions as dominions. They feel certain that the view they put has to stand not only the test of immediate criticism but the test of time; for by their agreements they may commit their country to a point of view—not to any surrender of the sovereignty of the parliament and the government, but to the promotion of a generic idea which will lead to concerted action and cooperative endeavour.

Need I do more than just illustrate to you how significant to students of history is the fact that you could get at one table Mr. Roosevelt, the President of the United States and leader of the Democratic party in that country; Mr. Churchill, the leader of the Conservative party in the United Kingdom, and the leader of the United Kingdom, and Mr. Stalin, the Premier of the socialist republics of Russia. There they met. They did not meet to discuss whether conservatism is good or bad, or whether this particular type of political idea is better than another. They met to concert measures to serve the world. The British commonwealth prime ministers met, certainly with lesser problems and with lesser status, but none the less as a microcosm, as it were, a smaller association to promote accord, to help each other to devise formulas and to make arrangements, so that in a world where none of us is strong enough to stand alone we shall discover how and by what means we can best stand with and for each other.

This brings me then to my final thought; for there you have the problem of statesmanship in the years to come for all governments that are anxious, as all should be, and I believe are, to have regard for the welfare of mankind. What is the worst evil that can come to us? It is to be taken away from the promotion of the social and economic progress of our country in order that so many thousands, indeed millions, of useful persons in the fields, workshops, mines and the like shall no longer be available to produce the things that will minister to man's comfort, but be set apart in a vast army to engage solely in resistance to another vast army, imposing upon all those who have been left behind the double burden of feeding them and feeding with inadequate resources the whole population of the globe.

We see man's history interrupted repeatedly by wars, by bitter strife, by this ghastly loss to civilization. Upon the great nations, then, surely there falls the responsibility of making it clear that that association which war has meant for us—for Russia, for the United States, for the British commonwealth, these three great powers, together with China, that great land mass and teeming population in the far east—these four who have subscribed themselves to the Charter—means that their great resources involve also high responsibilities. What is their major responsibility? Just as they could agree and find ways and means to pool their strength to resist a brutal foe who threatened their homes, their liberties and the sovereignty of their peoples in their own affairs, so surely this strength, so prodigious in the present service of freedom, is a strength which can be maintained and made use of in order to prevent a recurrence of calamities such as Hitler and his axis collaborators have forced upon an unwilling, indeed a victimized world.

I make a plea here in this free parliament for the average citizen; for the shopkeeper; for the mother of forty years of age with sons and daughters who may be eighteen, sixteen or twelve; for the next generation; for those who are unborn; for my grandchildren, if there be any. Let us, since we have found fraternity and association and collaboration so indispensable to get the strength with which to meet the attack, preserve that association and use it, nourished by the genius of statesmanship, to ensure that the world shall not have a recurrence of this dreadful and indeed abysmal conduct whereby the sword has become the instrument of government, instead of the light of reason, which, despite all that may be said by the critics of democracy, can give to a free people not only as clear a vision of the future, but a capacity for decision, for right decision, which the totalitarians can never attain.

May I thank you very deeply for the great honour you have done me this afternoon in inviting me to speak to you. I come from a country small in point of numbers, a country of seven million people. We have an area of approximately three million square miles. We are in the south Pacific. Think for one moment about the map of the world and have a look at the lands that are south of the equator—South America, South Africa, Australia, New Zealand and the number of smaller islands scattered about, mainly in the Pacific. Consider the characteristics of the people that live in those parts, and you will understand when I say that the struggle to preserve Australia was a struggle to be of service to the world.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I would ask the Speaker of the Senate and the Speaker of the House of Commons to express our thanks to Mr. Curtin for the very eloquent address which he has just delivered to us.

Hon. Senator THOMAS VIEN, K.C., (Speaker of the Senate) (Translation): Mr. Prime Minister of Australia, the Canadian people are, as you know, largely of British and French extraction. I am very happy to be given the opportunity of expressing to you in my mother tongue, one of the two official languages of this country, the deep gratitude of the Senators, of the Members of the House of Commons, and, indeed, of the whole people of Canada, whom you have honoured by this visit at the conclusion of the historic London Conference and by the gracious and very moving words you have just spoken.

Your great reputation, Mr. Prime Minister, has preceded you in this country. You come to us in the radiance of the glory with which your fellow countrymen covered themselves on every battlefield during the first Great War—and of the even greater glory which they have achieved during the present conflict. Australia has earned the eternal gratitude of mankind for having heroically withstood the Japanese onrush which swept in like a tidal wave from the Far East. Thanks to the wise and courageous leadership that you have given her, your country has brought her war effort to the highest pitch, and made a tremendous contribution to the United Nations.

Canada has been in the West the link joining the Old World and the New. Your country has played an identical role in Southern Seas, where you have created friendly relations with the great American people, while remaining united by sacred and unbreakable ties to the heart of the Empire.

It gives me great satisfaction to express to you the unbounded affection and admiration of Canadians for you personally and for all our Australian brothers, and to convey to you our warmest thanks for the encouragement that we have received from your presence among us and from your very comforting words.

God bless Australia and the Australians and their distinguished Prime Minister! God bless our soldiers, sailors and airmen! God give us a glorious, speedy and decisive victory, and a lasting Peace to the World.

Hon. JAMES ALLISON GLEN (Speaker of the House of Commons): Mr. Prime Minister, it is with singular pleasure that we welcome and thank you for your presence with us.

We have had many notable and distinguished visitors during the last four years, and to-day we behold two of the Prime Ministers of the great dominions speaking from the floor of the House of Commons in Canada, our own Prime Minister, the Right Hon. W. L. Mackenzie King, and the Prime Minister of Australia, the Right Hon. John Curtin.

To add to the importance of this gathering, these very distinguished gentlemen have arrived in Canada fresh from a meeting of the Prime Ministers of the commonwealth of British nations in London, during which, it is no exaggeration to say, issues affecting the whole world and countless millions of people for countless years have been subjects of deliberation. This is not the occasion to refer to those issues, but I think it is permissible to say that at no time in our history were the bases of our democracy, and in particular free and untrammelled speech, better exemplified than in the recent meeting. It is eminently proper that the central purpose—to win the war—did not preclude that equally momentous purpose—the vision of a new world order based upon the policies of cooperation and good neighbourliness.

Sir, all will agree you made a notable contribution to that meeting and you are entitled to say that in the essentials, in the broad scheme of affairs, having regard to the geographical, political and social problems, there was agreement—a lesson for all the world to note.

We shall never forget those tragic days when your country was in serious and imminent danger of invasion in force by the Japanese. Those days were fraught with great peril, and it must be a matter of justifiable pride to you to reflect that under your leadership Australia rose superior to the threat, withstood and ultimately safeguarded her shores from a cruel and remorseless foe. Now your country and the other united nations are destroying that Japanese menace.

You, sir, are not a stranger to the floor of a House of Commons, and, while the report has it that the vocabulary of your assembly is vivid as its southern sun, I think this gathering to-day of both our houses demonstrates that the coldness of our northern words serves but to conceal the warmth of our welcome to you.

I am glad to say that four of our colleagues of this house will soon have an opportunity to convey to your assembly in sincere and adequate terms our friendliest regards and greetings to Australia, reciprocating those which some of your colleagues brought to us here last year.

Sir, Canada thanks you for your fine speech and your presence among us. We wish you a safe return to your native land, and we hope that the time is not far distant when we shall meet again in the happier days when this war shall cease. Towards that end your country has made an enormous contribution, and, when you speak to your own people, tell them that all Canada fervently declares: Well done, Australia!

The proceedings were concluded by the singing of God Save the King.

Friday, June 2, 1944

The house met at three o'clock.

Bill No. 115, for the relief of John William Frank Draper.—Mr. Emmerson.

Bill No. 116, for the relief of Sam Sokoloff.—Mr. McIlraith.

PRIME MINISTER CHURCHILL

SUGGESTED PUBLICATION IN VOTES AND PROCEEDINGS OF SPEECH OF MAY 24

On the orders of the day:

Hon. T. A. CRERAR (Minister of Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, a few days ago the hon. member for Temiscouata (Mr. Pouliot) directed an inquiry to the government as to whether it was the intention to print in Votes and Proceedings of the house the speech delivered by the Prime Minister of Great Britain before the British parliament following the recent conference of prime ministers.

I have made some inquiries since the hon. member again brought up the matter yesterday, and I may say it is not the intention of the government to have that speech recorded in the proceedings of the house. After all, the records of this house are for the discussions and debates which take place here. The speech of the Prime Minister of Great Britain is recorded in British Hansard, and has also been published in full in many of the newspapers of Canada.

CITY OF OTTAWA

JOINT COMMITTEE OF BOTH HOUSES TO REPORT ON FEDERAL-MUNICIPAL RELATIONS

On the orders of the day:

Hon. T. A. CRERAR (Minister of Mines and Resources): Yesterday the hon. member for Broadview (Mr. Church) asked if it was the intention to widen the scope of the committee at present inquiring into certain matters as between the city of Ottawa and the government. I may say to my hon. friend that it is not the intention of the government to broaden the present inquiry.

ROYAL CANADIAN AIR FORCE

REPATRIATION OF AIRCREW PERSONNEL AFTER THREE YEARS' SERVICE OVERSEAS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. GORDON GRAYDON (Leader of the Opposition): I should like to ask the parliamentary assistant to the Minister of National Defence for Air whether negotiations are under way between air ministry officials in Great Britain and Canada with a view to arranging that Royal Canadian Air Force men shall become eligible for repatriation to Canada after three years' service overseas. I would be glad if he would give the house the latest available information on this point.

Hon. CYRUS MACMILLAN (Parliamentary Assistant to the Minister of National Defence for Air): Mr. Speaker in reply to the leader of the opposition, who courteously gave me notice of this question, I may say that negotiations were completed some time ago between air ministry officials of Great Britain and Canada and an agreement was entered into under which aircrew personnel of the Royal Canadian Air Force who have served three years overseas will be eligible for repatriation to Canada. Such repatriation is always subject to the operational needs of the service.

[Mr. Crerar.]

THE BUDGET

INQUIRY AS TO PROBABLE DATE OF PRESENTATION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. GORDON GRAYDON (Leader of the Opposition): May I ask the Minister of Finance whether he is in a position to indicate when the budget will be presented?

Hon. J. L. ILSLEY (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I realize that I have indicated on two or three occasions that the budget would be presented at an early date. I am doing the best I can with the situation, but I must say that it will be two weeks from now at the earliest before I shall be able to present the budget. There has been a very considerable increase in the number of matters that make demands upon my time, and while a large amount of work is being done on it I do not think we can get it to the stage of completion until the time I have indicated. While I am on the subject I might refer to the fact that there are many rumours in the press and elsewhere as to what the budget will contain. I want to say that all those rumours without exception are entirely unfounded.

Mr. GRAYDON: Does the minister read them all?

Mr. ILSLEY: I have not read them all. In the nature of the case they must of necessity be unfounded. I do not know what the budget will contain; the government does not know what the budget will contain. I will not know until almost the last moment before the budget is presented.

Mr. GRAYDON: The press is in just about as good a position as you are to prophesy.

Mr. ILSLEY: I am not prophesying. I think it does far more harm than good to make statements, some of which are rather plausible on their face, as to what the budget will contain. I want to make it very emphatic that nobody knows what will be in the budget or has any ground whatever for making predictions as to what the contents of the budget will be.

Mr. GRAYDON: Perhaps it is the way the press have of making suggestions to the government, and the minister mistakes them for predictions.

Mr. ILSLEY: Perhaps so.

FOREIGN EXCHANGE CONTROL

PREMIUM OR DISCOUNT RATES ON UNITED STATES FUNDS

On the orders of the day:

Hon. J. L. ILSLEY (Minister of Finance): On May 18 the hon. member for Renfrew South (Mr. McCann) asked:

Are there to be any changes in the premium or discount rates?

To which I replied:

That is a matter of government policy to be announced in due course. None is being announced to-day.

I try to be very careful in these answers because I realize how important the interpretation placed upon them may be. I am told that that answer has been interpreted in some quarters as meaning that the government is giving consideration to changing the discount rate. That is not the case. I did not mean by that answer, nor did I intend to give the impression by that answer, that any announcement would in fact be made regarding that matter or that any consideration was or is being given to it.

INTERNMENTS

CAMILLIEN HOUDE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. LIGUORI LACOMBE (Laval-Two Mountains): Mr. Speaker, I gave notice to the Minister of Justice of the following question to which I should like to direct his attention.

(Translation): In the first place, has the hon. the Minister of Justice (Mr. St. Laurent) or his department received the report of the members of the advisory committee who have examined, at Fredericton, about a week ago, the application for release from an internment camp filed by Mr. Camillien Houde? Second, should the contrary be the case will the Minister of Justice request the members of the advisory committee to send him their report concerning the examination undergone by Mr. Camillien Houde. Third, has the Minister of Justice received, this very week, from certain public bodies such as the labour unions of Canada, petitions asking for the immediate release of Mr. Camillien Houde from an internment camp?

Mr. SPEAKER: Would the minister indicate just what is the question asked by the hon. member?

Hon. L. S. ST. LAURENT (Minister of Justice): The question relates to the release from internment camp of Mr. Camillien Houde.

Mr. SPEAKER: I do not know how many times the hon. member has asked a question of the same kind. It cannot have that degree of urgency which should exist for a question asked on the orders of the day, and I therefore must ask the hon. member to place his question on the order paper in the usual way.

WHEAT

PRICES FOR 1944 CROP

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. A. ROSS (Souris): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Trade and Commerce. In this morning's Montreal Gazette appears a lengthy article about the wheat convention that was drafted at Washington in 1942. It intimates that there is to be a change in the price of wheat and it happens that Canadian wheat board officials have recently been in Washington. May I ask the minister if any change in the price of wheat for the 1944 crop is contemplated by the Canadian wheat board, as is indicated in this article?

Hon. J. A. MacKINNON (Minister of Trade and Commerce): I saw the article to which the hon. member refers. Conversations have taken place in Washington from time to time in the international wheat committee, but there has been no decision on the point suggested.

Mr. GRAYDON: Is it being considered?

LABOUR CONDITIONS

EMPLOYMENT OF ARMED FORCES PERSONNEL IN CIVILIAN CAPACITY—FLORENCE COLLIERIES, SYDNEY, N.S.

On the orders of the day:

Mr. CLARENCE GILLIS (Cape Breton South): I should like to direct two short questions to the Minister of Labour based on telegrams which I received yesterday. One was from the steel workers' lodge 1064 at Sydney protesting against the employment of seventy-six members of the Joliette regiment as labourers in the steel plant while local labour was available. The second concerns the failure of the operators to accept the decision of the adjustment board in Nova Scotia and reinstate three employees at the Florence collieries. Is the minister in position to say whether his department can intervene in these disputes?—because they might mean a serious interruption of production.

Hon. HUMPHREY MITCHELL (Minister of Labour): I got my hon. friend's question just before I came into the house. The Department of Labour had no knowledge of this situation at Sydney until a telegram was received from the steel workers, I think on June 1. We checked the situation. It is true that seventy-six members of the Joliette regiment stationed at Sydney volunteered their services while on leave during the week-end and were employed at local wage rates, subject, I am informed, to the usual deductions for income tax. As to the question of employing members of the armed forces in a civilian capacity while civilians are seeking employment, my information is that there are no civilians in the Sydney area who are seeking employment of the kind undertaken by the men from this regiment.

The second question dealt with the dismissal of three employees at the old Sydney collieries in Nova Scotia. Word was received yesterday by my department that the adjustment board set up under the agreement between the United Mine Workers of America and the Dominion Steel and Iron Corporation had adjudicated on the dismissal of three employees, and while the arbitration board finds that both the company and the men were at fault, it recommended that the men should be reinstated. My department immediately got in touch with our resident officer at Fredericton, who in turn informed the company that their refusal to reinstate these men was a breach of section 17 of P.C. 1003. That is how the matter stands at the moment. The general manager of the company was absent at the time and the message was conveyed to the general superintendent, who I am informed got in touch with the general manager with reference to the opinion on the matter held by the Department of Labour. I hope to be able to give to my hon. friend some word over the week-end as to the conclusion of the dispute.

PRISONERS OF WAR

REPRESENTATIONS BY GREAT BRITAIN TO RUSSIA RESPECTING PRISONERS OF WAR IN JAPAN

On the orders of the day:

Mr. THOMAS REID (New Westminster): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the acting leader of the house, and if he is not prepared to answer it to-day, it might stand as a notice. According to a dispatch of the United Press, the Right Hon. Anthony Eden stated in the British House of Commons the other day that representations had been made by Great Britain to Russia on behalf of British prisoners of war in Japan. Has Canada made or is she making representations along similar lines to those made by Great Britain?

Mr. CRERAR: The question will have to stand as a notice until Monday.

HOUSING

SUGGESTED CEILING PRICE ON LOTS AVAILABLE FOR NEW DWELLINGS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. S. H. KNOWLES (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Finance. In view of the increasing demand for building lots, as a result of the government's housing proposals, will the Minister of Finance give consideration to the placing of a ceiling price on lots available for new houses, in order that there may be no loss of the advantages of the government's proposals?

Mr. SPEAKER: Order. That question must be placed on the order paper.

WAR APPROPRIATION BILL

PROVISION FOR GRANTING TO HIS MAJESTY AID FOR NATIONAL DEFENCE AND SECURITY

The house resumed from Thursday, June 1, consideration in committee of a resolution to grant to His Majesty certain sums of money for the carrying out of measures consequent upon the existence of a state of war—Mr. Ilsley—Mr. Bradette in the chair.

DEPARTMENT OF FINANCE

Wartime Salvage Limited, administration and losses, $500,000.

The CHAIRMAN: I must state to the committee with respect to this item that I was in the chair last night when the committee rose, reported progress and asked leave to sit again, and this item of $500,000 was passed, but in Hansard it is not recorded as having been passed. The item is carried.

Item agreed to.

Canadian wool board, administration, $500,000.

Mr. BRYCE: Has any change been made from last year? Manitoba and British Columbia did not participate in the bonus because under the agreement that was made the provincial governments had to put up fifty per cent. I think it is very unfair. I do not need to speak for British Columbia because—

Mr. ABBOTT: If my hon. friend will allow me, the payment of the subsidy, which is a producer's subsidy, is under the Department of Agriculture and has nothing to do with the operations of the Canadian wool board. I think my hon. friend's inquiry should be directed to the Minister of Agriculture.

Mr. HATFIELD: The price of wool in Canada was set by the wartime prices and trade board at 25 cents to the producer, while in the United States the O.P.A. set the price at 45 cents. The wool is all handled and controlled by the united nations wool pool. Why, then, is not the price in Canada as high as it is in the United States?

Mr. ABBOTT: In the first place, so far as I am aware, there is no united nations wool pool. The United States price has been higher than our price, which is the case with a good many other commodities. Incidentally the price in Canada is somewhat higher than 25 cents a pound as mentioned by my hon. friend. I have the 1944 prices here. The lowest price is 28 cents, and from that the prices range, depending on grade and quality to 33 cents and higher per pound.

Mr. FRASER (Peterborough West): Were subsidies not paid in the past on wool coming in from South America?

Mr. ABBOTT: Certainly not during the past year, and I am advised that at no other time has a subsidy been paid.

Mr. FRASER (Peterborough West): A subsidy was granted in the early days of the war on wool coming in from South America, and I wondered if any had come in. I know that their wool is of a very poor quality, dirty and tangled.

Mr. ABBOTT: We permitted the import, but there was no subsidy paid because I am advised that none came in.

Mr. FRASER (Peterborough West): It did not come in evidently because of its quality.

Mr. REID: While it is true, as the parliamentary assistant has said, that the subsidy on wool is paid under the Department of Agriculture, is it not a fact that the price of wool in this country is based on the price in the London market of Australian wool plus the freight from Great Britain to Canada? That was one of the reasons for the subsidy, to help make up the difference. At least that is the information we have from the wool growers association.

Mr. ABBOTT: I am advised that the price of wool is fixed at the laid-down cost of New Zealand and Australian wool in this country.

Mr. REID: From London?

Mr. ABBOTT: No, from New Zealand and Australia, whichever country it happens to come from.

Mr. CHURCH: How long is this subsidy policy to continue? Is it to continue after the war?

Mr. ABBOTT: I am afraid I am not in a position to say how long it will continue. If I venture into the field of prophecy, I think it is likely that we shall have to avail ourselves of subsidies until at least the end of the war, as part of the price control policy.

Mr. BRYCE: Would the minister put on the record the amount of wool which has been imported in the last three years?

Mr. ABBOTT: I have not that information here, but I can get it and give it to my hon. friend, if that would be satisfactory.

Mr. HATFIELD: Is there a subsidy on shoddy?

Mr. ABBOTT: The corporation sustained a loss of $5.95 last year on shoddy.

Mr. HATFIELD: They do trade in it?

Mr. ABBOTT: Yes.

Mr. GLADSTONE: Wool is being stored in large quantities in buildings throughout the country. Does the matter of storage come within the scope of this department, or is it handled elsewhere; and if so, could the minister give particulars of the contracts for storage?

Mr. ABBOTT: The company has its inventory stored in about forty warehouses. It pays the usual storage charges for warehousing its product, as any other merchant would do. I have a list here of the warehouses which are used; to be exact, there are thirty-nine. I do not know whether my hon. friend wants me to give him the list. It is a long one.

Mr. GLADSTONE: I would like the hon. member to place the list on the record; also to indicate if all contracts for storage are on a uniform basis, if persons are employed by the government to secure storage buildings, and how the entire system of storage is handled for the department.

Mr. ABBOTT: I find that the list I have here is last year's list. There is one more name to add to it, and I have not that name here. I suppose one should be prepared for all these questions, but I had not thought that we would require to table the list. However, I can get it. I do not know whether it need be printed in Hansard; that is as the committee wishes. If my hon. friend or any other hon. member is particularly interested I can see that a copy of the complete list is furnished. Perhaps that course would be preferable to printing the list in Hansard. Would that be satisfactory to the hon. member for Wellington South?

Mr. GLADSTONE: Yes.

Mr. ABBOTT: As to the basis on which these warehousing charges are paid, I am advised by the comptroller of the board, who is in front of me, that the contracts are on the usual basis. We would have to get particulars of each individual deal. There is no objection to doing that; I should be quite ready to furnish that information; but again I am afraid I have not got it here. There would be a certain amount of work in getting it, but if either the committee or any individual hon. member wants it of course I shall be glad to get it.

Mr. GLADSTONE: Is the storage based on so much per pound or per hundred, or does it vary with different buildings?

Mr. ABBOTT: I am advised that some of it is on a poundage basis, and some of it is on an annual rental basis, where it is expected that the whole of the space which can be rented can be used. It varies from warehouse to warehouse, depending on the circumstances.

Mr. GLADSTONE: Where the contract is made on an annual basis, is the contract with the government, or the owner of the building, or in some other way?

Mr. ABBOTT: The contract is between Canadian Wool Board Limited, the corporation whose estimates we are now discussing, and the warehouse company, or the owner of the warehouse, as the case may be.

Mr. MARSHALL: This board has been set up for a matter of two years. It was created under order in council P.C. 1853 of March 10, 1942. Unfortunately we have not the latest financial statement to inform us as to the operations of the company during the last year. In the previous year the company had a net loss of approximately $34,000. I would like a little enlightenment on the matter of the commissions on sales, totalling $11,345.82.

Mr. ABBOTT: Is that in last year's figures or this year's figures?

Mr. MARSHALL: Those are last year's figures.

[Mr. Abbott.]

Mr. ABBOTT: I have just received the statement of this year.

Mr. MARSHALL: What were the operating profits or losses for the year ended March 31, 1944?

Mr. ABBOTT: The net operating loss for the year ended March 31, 1944 was $221,296.11. I think my hon. friend has the comparative figure for last year.

Mr. MARSHALL: Yes. I have these figures: $36,246 last year, as against $221,296 this year.

Mr. ABBOTT: That is correct.

Mr. MARSHALL: Could the minister break that down into, let us say, commissions on sales, warehouse expenses, administrative expenses, office furniture and equipment

Mr. ABBOTT: Yes. Commissions on sales, $58,857.40, and a small item of $665.90 for discount on sale; total $59,523.30. Under warehousing expenses are included storage and handling, insurance, inter-warehouse freight, miscellaneous repairs, bales and bags, sampling and testing. The large item under that heading is $198,838.58, covering storage and handling; $16,733.45 for insurance; $15,384.04, inter-warehouse freight; the miscellaneous and similar items that I referred to, totalling $236,681.77; administrative expenses, the usual salaries, travelling, rent, stationery, et cetera, total $59,547.42; total expenses, $355,752.49. Net operating loss, $205,646.60, from which are deducted items representing discount on purchases, miscellaneous revenue, and inventory adjustment, totalling $26,689.46, leaving a balance of $178,957.14; and to that loss is added an item covering storage and handling of stock pile of $42,338.97, giving a net loss of $221,296.11. The auditor general is auditing this statement now. I should make it clear that this is the statement prepared by the Canadian wool board.

Mr. MARSHALL: Will the parliamentary assistant enlarge on that item of $59,523? To whom were the commissions paid?

Mr. ABBOTT: I have here a three or four page document setting out the regulations issued by the Canadian wool board respecting rates of commission to registered wool warehouses on Canadian fleece wool in 1944. It is lengthy. It gives the information which I take it my hon. friend wishes to have, but since I am not an expert on wool, I should be glad if he would indicate more definitely exactly what he wants.

Mr. MARSHALL: I am not especially interested in any one particular item. This is an amount which is paid to the regular firms operating in wool. Is that the object of the commission? This corporation carries on business through regular wool dealers?

Mr. ABBOTT: Regular wool brokers, wool dealers; that is correct.

Mr. MARSHALL: What is the rate of commission paid?

Mr. ABBOTT: The sole purchaser of Canadian-produced wool is the corporation, and it buys only graded wool through the registered warehouses. Agents, collectors or the wool growers' association may be licensed by the board to operate on behalf of the registered warehouses, but payments are made directly to the grower by the registered warehouse on the basis of grades and prices set by the board, and the warehouse is allowed the uniform commission. The wool sold by the board for civilian requirements is sold at prices in conformity with the domestic ceiling, and on all importations of wool yarns, fibres et cetera, the board assumes the position of any private importer as regards import subsidies and applies to the stabilization corporation for subsidies required to avoid a loss on its own account.

Mr. MARSHALL: What is the rate of commission paid these wool firms?

Mr. ABBOTT: The table I have referred to will give an idea of the rates:

For services rendered, a registered warehouse shall be entitled to commissions on the following basis:

Section 1—2½ cents per pound on all range wool and western domestic wool in the fine and ½ blood grades.

Section 2—3¼ cents per pound on all other grades of range wool and on all other grades of western domestic wool.

Section 3—3½ cents per pound on all grades of eastern wool—Ontario, Quebec and the maritimes.

These rates per pound on the net weight of the respective classifications are the full rates which will be paid by the board for all services rendered; payments to licensed agents; handling, grading, normal weight loss, insurance and all carrying charges until the wool is taken over by the board; loading graded wool on railway car or truck, and any other expenses incidental to the proper operation of a registered warehouse.

There is a good deal more information with regard to commissions of other types.

Mr. BRYCE: Can the parliamentary assistant tell us whether we are getting sufficient wool now? Two years ago we were 8,000,000 pounds shy, and that meant that the farmers would have to clip another million sheep to make up the shortage. At that time, two years ago, when the people were making blankets, they used seventy per cent shoddy and a year ago fifty per cent. Can the parliamentary assistant make a statement on the progress that has been made in the provision of wool?

Mr. ABBOTT: The situation is fairly satisfactory. As of March 31, 1944, the holdings of wool by the board, including stocks owned jointly with the United Kingdom, were 27,500,000 pounds, clean basis. With the war picture now changed and no longer demanding the holding of such large stocks as were necessary until recently for civilian and military purposes, the policy is to liquidate a substantial part of the present inventory.

Mr. GRAYDON: I have no wish to delay the passing of this item and I am sure the parliamentary assistant is anxious to avoid any possible delay, but I do want to call his attention to a part of the debate that took place last night after the hon. member for Victoria-Carleton (Mr. Hatfield) had asked some questions with reference to the potato subsidy which had been claimed and had been paid to the producer. On page 3441 of Hansard the hon. member for Victoria-Carleton said:

Coming back to the potato subsidy, we all know what was claimed to have been paid the producer. Since the investigation we know what was actually paid. Would the parliamentary assistant tell us what was actually paid the producers? The investigation showed the amount that was paid.

Then he went on to say:

But he had to pay a certain price to the producer. It is claimed that he paid $3.50 for the first part of August and $3 for the latter part. What did he actually pay?

The parliamentary assistant then said he was afraid he did not have the information here. Then the member for Victoria-Carleton said that perhaps Mr. Van Buskirk might know. The parliamentary assistant, however, said that Mr. Van Buskirk was in the same position as himself; he did not have the information with him. Then I entered the discussion and at the end of my remarks on the same subject I said:

Some time before the debate ends—

And that is why I am rising now.

—I would ask the parliamentary assistant to give the information to the hon. member for Victoria-Carleton, because if it is not readily available now it should be available before the debate ends. This is a vital part of the whole situation, as I see it.

The parliamentary assistant was good enough to say:

I shall see what information I can get.

I rise now not to open the matter again but to ask for the information that was promised.

Mr. ABBOTT: I had in mind dealing with all these points together when we had completed the various estimates, but I might as well deal now with the point raised by the member for Victoria-Carleton and the leader of the opposition. I made inquiries this morning as to the prices paid the producers in the case referred to, and I am advised that the board's investigator did disclose what prices were paid. They were found to be prices below the ceiling; otherwise a subsidy would have been properly payable. I am sure, however, it would be improper to disclose the private business of a private firm, in this house or elsewhere, as to prices paid for a particular commodity, and particularly so since the hon. member for Victoria-Carleton is a competitor, I believe, of the shipper in question. Therefore I do not think I should place on record the price paid to the producers. I make the general statement that the information was ascertained by the investigator of the Commodity Prices Stabilization Corporation and that the price found to have been actually paid to the producers was under the then prevailing ceiling, but farther than that I do not feel I should go.

Mr. HATFIELD: I may say that the price paid on the market in New Brunswick is public information. There are all kinds of rumours going around as to what price was actually paid in this case. I think I know what the price was—$1.80 a hundred.

Mr. ABBOTT: There was one point I should have added. The purchases were made at different times. I am advised that the price was not uniform in each case; it varied in different cases.

Mr. HATFIELD: I think I know the reason. Some of those potatoes were bought graded and some ungraded. There was an extra price paid for the graded. I understand the price was $1.80 a hundred the first part of August and $1.75 a hundred the latter part of August.

Mr. ABBOTT: My hon. friend knows the potato business very well; I would not question that.

Mr. GRAYDON: There may be some merit in the contention of the parliamentary assistant with respect to ordinary cases, but I am not admitting that there is, because I think the government does carry much too far in the house the matter of revealing of business of competitors. In this particular instance, where a serious situation has developed, so much so that investigations have been made—

Mr. ABBOTT: There has been no suggestion of fraud, remember.

Mr. GRAYDON: I have not made any suggestion of anything more than irregularities. The suggestion of fraud is a serious one to make, and I fancy no one would venture into that field unless he were confident that his statements could be easily supported. However the fact that the parliamentary assistant has declined to give this information is an indication that in a matter of this kind we should have had the report of Mr. Daniels to the wartime prices and trade board. I think the parliamentary assistant has gone much too far—

Mr. ABBOTT: We have argued that twice already.

Mr. GRAYDON: I am just giving the parliamentary assistant this parting shot, that I do not think—

Mr. ABBOTT: You want the last word, do you?

Mr. GRAYDON: Yes, one last word. I realize that it is in vain because of the position the government has taken, but I want to be in a position to support this contention on other matters. As I said yesterday, the principle is totally wrong. It cannot be supported in any appropriate way by the government. The parliamentary assistant should have given the information asked for by the hon. member for Victoria-Carleton, namely, the price that was paid to the producers.

Mr. CHURCH: I wish to refer to one or two matters in connection with the control system and the ceilings. I first want to point out to the parliamentary assistant that this corporation—

The CHAIRMAN: Order. I would ask the hon. member to keep within the item before us, namely, "Canadian wool board, administration."

Mr. CHURCH: I wish to refer to the commodity prices and some of the ceilings that have been placed on consumer goods. As I see it, while the report in the blue book put out by the board shows that a great deal of work has been done, there are a great many articles that should be under ceilings which are not under ceilings at all. Let us find out what control parliament has over this matter. I missed the item, Mr. Chairman, when you moved on to the other one. I want to bring it up on another item.

The CHAIRMAN: It is too bad that the hon. member was not here when the discussion took place, but he will realize it is absolutely impossible for the Chair to reopen an item on which many hours of discussion took place.

Mr. ABBOTT: In order to preserve my reputation for keeping my promises I should like to deal with three or four matters that were raised in the course of the debate, and on which I said I would give an answer later. The first was a request by the hon. member for York-Sunbury for information regarding the sugar stabilization fund.

This fund was set up under order in council P.C. 3223 on October 21, 1929, and P.C. 6239 dated July 21, 1942. The pertinent clause as amended in the last order in council is as follows:

Surplus funds realized from the sale of sugar and deposited to the credit of the sugar administrator may be utilized, under the direction of the wartime prices and trade board, as a fund for the stabilization of sugar prices in Canada in such manner and at such times as the board shall direct and, without derogating from the generality of the foregoing, such fund may be used before or after termination of the control contemplated by these regulations, for the purchase from time to time of any raw sugar in the possession or control of any refiner in Canada at the price at which such sugar was sold to such refiner by the sugar administrator (with no allowance for any carrying charges) and any refined sugar in the possession or control of such refiner at the cost of the relative quantity of raw sugar sold to such refiner by the sugar administrator plus the refining margin (being the difference between the prices of refined sugar and of raw sugar previously fixed); provided that, notwithstanding termination of the control contemplated by these regulations, the powers of the sugar administrator and of the said board shall continue for such time as is necessary to effectuate any said purchase; and provided further that, on the termination of the control contemplated by these regulations and after effectuating all said purchases, all surplus funds to the credit of the sugar administrator, including the surplus proceeds of sale of any sugar purchased under the authority of this section and sold after the termination of said control, shall be paid over by him to the credit of the receiver general of Canada and shall form part of the consolidated revenue fund of Canada.

The control of sugar supplies was taken over by the sugar administrator in October, 1939, without changing the price for refined sugar in effect on that date. The price of raw cane sugar was fixed at a figure which on a general average resulted in profits to the sugar administrator of approximately thirty-five cents per one hundred pounds. There was, of course, considerable variation due to fluctuation in freight rates, et cetera. In the spring of 1941 the Santo Domingo crop was purchased at 75 cents per 100 pounds, f.o.b. Dominican republic. Something more than one-quarter of this crop was allocated to Canada, and on this transaction an extra profit of approximately $3,000,000 was realized.

In the spring of 1941 the budget had been postponed, the first serious shipping shortage had developed, over-all sugar supplies were low awaiting the opening of navigation in the St. Lawrence, and a rumour was started that the government was likely to increase the excise tax on sugar as a measure to obtain additional revenue. This developed a run, and in order to stop it, an arrangement was made between the board and the Minister of Finance whereby the price of sugar was increased by one cent a pound, pending the submission of the budget, when it was intended that the excise tax should be increased from one cent to two cents. This increase, in the meantime, was paid over to the sugar administrator under appropriate arrangements. On this transaction approximately $1,000,000 was collected between the date of this arrangement and the submission of the budget. Twice since that time the excise tax has been reduced by half a cent without any change in the selling price for sugar. Since the reduction of the excise tax without a change in the price of sugar increased the value of the inventory by half a cent per pound, this amount was collected from the refiners on their total holdings. On each occasion the transaction added approximately $1,000,000 to the funds of the sugar administrator.

The stabilization fund is, of course, simply the realized profit of the sugar administration in operations to date. The balances in this account at the end of the sugar administrator's fiscal year, August 31, have been as follows:

1941	$12,647,804
1942	15,147,047
1943	11,532,425

At April 30, 1944, the surplus amounted to $14,710,314. The reduction of approximately $3,600,000 in the fund in the fiscal year 1943 was due to selling raw sugar below cost. This was the result of excessive war risk premiums during that period.

The hon. member for Victoria-Carleton asked for a statement regarding the quantity of refined sugar damaged at Saint John, New Brunswick. There have been no losses or damage on any sugar in Saint John owned by the board or held in storage by order of the board. The board is not aware of any losses or damage to any other sugar in Saint John. It is not, of course, familiar with the internal operations of private firms.

I promised to give the hon. member for Bow River a statement respecting the ration coupon banking situation. At the outset of ration coupon banking, arrangements were made with the chartered banks to provide this service at cost on the basis of actual salaries paid to bank employees for the time they were engaged on ration coupon banking and direct costs for stationery and other supplies. To ascertain these actual costs a time survey covering approximately some 100 branch banks was made for a period of about six weeks and records were kept of the time consumed and the actual salary costs of the bank officials so engaged. The results of this time survey were checked by the comptroller's division of wartime prices and trade board, and it was felt that the unit charges proposed in this survey were fair and reasonable. The survey covered only salary and direct costs such as stationery, et cetera, and did not cover any charges for overhead, space, light, heat, et cetera.

As a result of the survey, unit costs for four different operations were calculated. For example, there was a charge of 12 cents per thousand coupons physically handled; a charge of 25 cents payable for the opening of every new ration bank account; a charge of 25 cents for each ration transfer voucher (a document similar to a draft for transferring ration bank credits) and, finally, a charge of 6 cents per entry in a customer's account.

At the present time, in accordance with the original arrangement made with the banks, the board is reviewing the arrangement and making a spot audit of the monthly invoices received from the banks.

Mr. LACOMBE (Translation): Mr. Chairman, I wish to point out to the committee that the government should take every means in their power to prevent a rise in the price of fabrics and clothes. Is it a fact that the scarcity of wool—

Mr. ABBOTT: Mr. Chairman—

The CHAIRMAN (Translation): Order. The hon. member for Laval-Two Mountains knows quite well that he must keep within the purview of the item which is now before the committee. The matter with which he is now dealing has already been submitted to this committee, on the second item of these estimates, and it was discussed at great length.

Item agreed to.

Auditor General's office, audit of war expenditure, $290,600.

Item agreed to.

Finance, comptroller of the treasury, $9,105,355.

Mr. CHURCH: Mr. Chairman, I think the time has come when the house should regain what it used to have, namely, some control over war expenditures, as they appear in these estimates. We have just seen voted the sum of $140,000,000, and we have been divested of any control whatsoever in connection with that expenditure.

We now come to the office of the auditor general, one which at one time in Canada was most honoured. I have criticized this report at length since the war began. Shortly after confederation a great auditor general arose—the late Mr. McDougall—and he operated under the treasury of Mr. Mackenzie, who used to sleep on the strong-box. Well, there is no one in Ottawa now to sleep on the strong-box. Alexander Mackenize was a Liberal and an economist. Where is he today? The statue of him is away in the back yard—and that is a fitting place for him at the present time, the way money is being spent. In those days the auditor general's office was an important one. A civil war was fought in England to enable parliament to get control over all expenditures. Since this war began we have lost all control over war or civil expenditures, and all economy or retrenchment is forgotten.

What control has this parliament over any expenditures? Here we have an expenditure of around four billions of dollars. Last year I read to hon. members a letter received from the auditor general's office—I refer of course to the present auditor general, Mr. Sellar, a very good official, so far as I know. At the time I received the letter he was secretary to a minister of finance. In his letter he stated that he had no control over anything contained in war appropriation bills. The procedure has been amended somewhat so that now there is a comptroller of the treasury who has certain duplicate duties under the Minister of Finance. I sympathize with the minister, because I realize he carries a very heavy burden. He is the pivot of the whole public service, and bears a heavy share of work. However, I fail to see the usefulness of this particular division.

As hon. members know, there is now sitting a war expenditures committee. Where they are, I do not know. They have been lost, strayed or stolen. We have not had one report from them, and we have now reached the seventieth day of the session. I have yet to see one report from the war expenditures committee.

What are the functions of the auditor general and comptroller? Those functions are set out. They do not state that he is an official of the Minister of Finance. Rather he is an official of parliament and is responsible to parliament for every dollar spent. But we might as well go home, and stay home, for all the control this parliament has over war expenditure. All the boards have been appointed, and about 46,000 orders in council have been passed. Do hon. members think that orders in council do not involve the expenditure of money?

The auditor general makes his report a few days after the opening of parliament, and in it we find the public accounts. It is a very good report. If he sees anything wrong it is his duty to report it to the house, but up to last session very little reporting had been done. I do not see the hon. member for Témiscouata in his seat, but I know he would give the other house more work. I suggest the report of the auditor general might very well be referred to another branch of parliament in another place, where some of these expenditures could be considered.

I notice the Minister of Public Works is smiling. It was said that they could not get paint, but I notice they have enough money for yellow paint—"Site No. 1", "Site No. 2", "Site No. 3"—disfiguring not only the pavement but also the landscape on which we want to spend millions of dollars to beautify the city. Let us get rid of some of the extravagance right around parliament hill.

The auditor general has lost control over war expenditures and civil expenditures. He has not the functions he used to have. These are all with the comptroller now. A report may be presented to the comptroller of the treasury for payment and as long as it is within the four corners of the appropriation bill it is paid. Some of those reports cover almost a quire of paper. The information is given on the back of the paper, but there is very little check on the expenditure. No great banking system could maintain itself if it had not a better auditing system, nor could a department store or a railway company. The war expenditures committee never report to parliament till near the end of the session. They conduct their business as a star chamber. I doubt if the auditor general could get into that committee. I say the time has come for us to put on the brakes in respect of some of these war expenditures. I have the report of the auditor general before me and I think it is a good report for the money that has been spent. The vote is only $290,000. I am criticizing the system, not the officials.

I believe the time has come when parliament should try to regain some of the control over war and civil expenditures which has been lost. The auditor general reports to the house on anything that he considers to be wrong, and the report is a rather heavy volume. Our war expenditures amount to over four billion dollars and, as I say, the House of Commons should try to regain some of the lost control over expenditures.

Mr. MacNICOL: Just a word or two—

The CHAIRMAN: I called the first item and it was carried and we are now dealing with item No. 2. Apparently the hon. member who has just spoken did not understand that the first item was carried. Is it the wish of the committee to revert back to item No. 1?

Mr. ILSLEY: We had better revert back.

The committee having reverted to the item—

Auditor General's office, audit of war expenditure, $290,600.

Mr. MacNICOL: During the last few sessions I have criticized the auditor general's report rather vigorously, so that I feel it my duty now to express a word of commendation of the report this year. During the last few years there has been very little given to us in the report, but this year the auditor general has included everything down to $2,500 and has turned out a really fine report. I have studied it carefully and I should like to refer briefly to one or two items. There are many items in the auditor general's report which it would be well worth the time of hon. members to read. There is one which I have marked, "The Limit" to be found at page 14 at the back of the book. It reads:

> 42. Excise duty drawbacks—(a) The attention of the department was directed to the fact that drawback claims, in respect of the excise duty collected on malt contained in malt beer exported, were paid without the beer being tested as required by section 179 (2) of the Excise Act. In explanation, the department stated that "the instruction to dispense with testing of samples of beer exported was given because of the physical inability of our laboratory to keep up with the greatly increased volume, plus an appreciation that the test itself had proven to be of little or no value."

The fact that they were not able to keep up with their work is no excuse. I think the auditor general was quite right in pointing that out. There would appear to be laxity on the part of someone. There are many of these that I have marked, but another one that struck me particularly is paragraph 60 on page 19, which reads:

> 60. Receipts of $3,519,731.24 might have been, by reason of the provisions of the War Appropriation Act, recredited to war appropriation account. The sum represents moneys arising from special discounts granted by suppliers, voluntary refunds and refunds of profits on account of cost audits, which were treated as revenues rather than reduction of expenditures, since the contracts to which they are applicable could be ascertained only by effort beyond the practical needs of the moment. In addition to this sum, special receipts of $1,604,787.43, arising chiefly from refunds of profits disclosed by cost audits, were held in suspense as at March 31, 1943, pending investigation to ascertain the government or allotment entitled to receive the benefit.

As I say, having been critical before I now want to give the auditor general credit for putting out a most exhaustive report, and for pointing out many cases even more pertinent than the ones I have quoted. I had intended to let this matter pass, but when it was introduced by the hon. member for Broadview I felt it my duty to compliment the auditor general upon getting out such an effective report, a much more helpful report than the ones we had in the previous two or three years.

Mr. MARSHALL: When the item was called I refrained from making any comment because the auditor general's report is now the subject of investigation by the public accounts committee, of which I am a member. I want to add a word of commendation to those expressed by the hon. member for Davenport about the work being accomplished by the auditor general. The public accounts committee has held a number of sittings and we have gone into a number of the items mentioned in the report, particularly that part to be found at the end of the volume. I am satisfied that given more time we shall be able to clear up satisfactorily many of the misunderstandings which appear in the report. I notice that the civil estimates covering the work of the auditor general are somewhere in the neighbourhood of $348,000, whereas this vote is for only $290,000. The question arises as to why there should be this difference when there is more work to-day in connection with these audits than there was prior to the war. The whole matter should be gone into carefully and explained.

Mr. ILSLEY: The regular staff is working on war work, and I suppose they can be said to be paid to a large extent out of the civil appropriation. I should like to say a word which may not be strictly relevant. Last night some hon. members were good enough to speak appreciatively of the report of the wartime prices and trade board and today some hon. members have spoken appreciatively of this report. I want to point out that nearly all of the report is prepared by the Department of Finance, the auditor general's part being the small portion at the back.

Mr. KNOWLES: That is where the criticisms come.

Mr. ILSLEY: The auditor general goes through the public accounts and if there are any matters which are of doubtful regularity it is his duty to point them out; but I think that members will agree that for the volume of transactions that take place in this war the number of irregularities is very small indeed. The committee will remember that last year we had some debate over the adoption of this new form of public accounts and the auditor general's report, and I am glad that it seems to commend itself to the committee. I do not get an opportunity very often of saying anything in praise of the officials of my department, or of hearing much praise of them, and when I do I am pleased indeed. It is a matter of satisfaction to me that some tribute is being paid to the incessant work, the back-breaking work, that my officials do, not only in the discharge of their daily duties but in the preparation of this very able and excellent report.

Mr. KNOWLES: I would appreciate it if the minister would make some further comment—I think perhaps he intended to—on the question raised by the hon. member for Camrose, but before he does so I would like to enlarge upon it briefly. There is a disparity between the amounts of money required by the auditor general for auditing civil expenditures as compared with wartime expenditures. The amount of this year's civil budget is roughly $700,000,000 and the amount required for the auditor general's office—with respect to auditing, I take it, the $700,000,000—is $363,000. That includes $15,000 which the minister did not include in the figures he gave a moment ago. But when it comes to auditing the war expenditures, we have a total war appropriation bill of $3,650,000,000 and the amount required for auditing that sum would appear to be only $290,600. It occurs to me that there may be an explanation for that, of the kind suggested previously by the Minister of Finance. On the other hand there may be false economy here. Certainly no one can complain at all of an item of $290,600 to audit $3,650,000,000. I am a member of the war expenditures committee, which has just been run into the ground by the hon. member for Broadview. I shall not argue with him on some of the points he has raised in connection with the committee, but I have had enough experience on the committee to realize that the checking of the expenditures under the war appropriation is a huge job, and it does seem to me that we should have the assurance that the auditing is thorough, right down to the very last item. I should be glad if the minister would give us that assurance and explain why the vote is so small in this particular instance.

Mr. ILSLEY: The salaries of all the permanent officers are charged to the civil vote for the office. This allotment is mainly for the salaries of temporary employees engaged on war audits. The only other important item of expenditure is for travelling expenses by the men who make periodical examinations of the R.C.A.F. schools and stations and overseas establishments. I do not think it is possible to divide the total expenditures connected with the work of the auditor general with any precision whatever as between work on non-war activities and work on war activities. The permanent officers are engaged in what is more or less war work. The temporaries provided for by this estimate are engaged altogether on war work. I do not think there is any significance to be attached to the fact that the vote is a little larger for the civil estimates than for the war estimates, because it is so difficult to allocate precisely the expenditures to one or the other activity. The great cost of checking expenditures and seeing that they are regular is not connected with the auditor general but with the comptroller of the treasury. There we have an enormous staff, something like seven thousand, and there, there is a division between war expenditures and peace expenditures.

Mr. KNOWLES: Is there a much greater increase there?

Mr. ILSLEY: I think it is much greater for war there.

Mr. KNOWLES: That would partly explain it. While that is being looked up, I am quite prepared to accept the minister's explanation as to the difficulty of dividing peace and war expenditures so far as auditing is concerned. But having regard to the total amount of money being spent, $363,000 to audit an expenditure of $700,000,000 apart from the war, and a total of $653,600 for auditing a total expenditure of $4,300,000,000, including both civil and war, without regard to any line of demarcation between them, my concern was whether or not we were spending enough on auditing for our own protection.

Mr. ILSLEY: The figures relating to the comptroller of the treasury are $2,819,520 for non-war work and $9,105,355 for war work, so that there we are voting a great deal more for war than for non-war activities. I realize it can be argued that the comptroller of the treasury is not the auditor general, that the auditor general is an officer of this parliament and that the comptroller of the treasury is an officer of the Department of Finance. But the comptroller of the treasury is certainly most active in checking the regularity of and authority for all expenditures.

Mr. KNOWLES: Which one of these officers checks the expenditures of the various crown corporations?

Mr. ILSLEY: The auditor general.

Mr. MacNICOL: I think the explanation is very simple. The difference in the gross amounts might be made up through the tremendous expenditure on certain of the items.

Mr. ILSLEY: The size of the items, yes.

Mr. MacNICOL: It is not hard to understand that.

Mr. KNOWLES: From my experience on the war expenditures committee there are many projects that are brand new—the rubber plant at Sarnia, for instance; there is nothing to compare it with. It has to be pioneered right from the start, and there is a pioneering job of auditing to be done in connection with a project of that kind.

Item agreed to.

Controller of the treasury, $9,105,355.

Item agreed to.

Old age pensions and pensions to the blind, $6,942,250.

Mr. GREEN: This vote of $6,942,250 is a war vote described as being for old age pensions and pensions for the blind; in the course of my remarks I propose to deal with the old age pension, although most of these remarks will also apply in the case of the blind pension. The war vote is for approximately $7,000,000, and in addition there is a vote in the ordinary estimates for $31,569,780, of which $43,280 is for departmental administration, and the remainder, $31,526,500, is for old age pension and the blind pension. I take it that the reason why we have a war vote this year for the first time under this head is order in council P.C. 6367, passed on August 10, 1943, entitled "order in council authorizing making of agreements with provinces governing old age pensions." That order in council, as the minister explained on July 24 of last year, provides for the possibility of an increase of $5 a month in the case of a single pension, namely, an increase from $20 to $25, of which of course the dominion would pay three-quarters and the province would pay the remaining quarter. The first paragraph of the order in council reads as follows, and, I think, is very significant:

> Whereas the Minister of Finance reports—
> 1. That under wartime conditions—

And I emphasize those words.

> —It has become desirable and necessary to provide additional assistance to old age pensioners and blind pensioners.

As recently as May 29 the minister announced further changes. He described them in the house on that day, and his explanation will be found at page 3304 of Hansard. There are several changes; for example, in the case of a single pensioner the allowable income from sources other than the old age pension is now restored to $125 a year, it having been cut to $65 by the order in council passed last August.

Mr. ILSLEY: It was cut only by leaving the statutory rule where it was.

Mr. GREEN: But the effect was that the single old age pensioner could earn or receive only $65 over and above his old age pension. There are certain other changes which are beneficial, but they do not go very far. One of them has to do with restrictions on residence in the case of an applicant for old age pension who has spent part of his life out of the dominion. As I understand it, the change is that now, if, for example, an applicant has been out of Canada for five years of the last twenty, he can get a pension by waiting a year, the original provision of course being that an applicant must have been in Canada for 5,844 days out of the twenty years preceding his application for pension. So that there is some easing there, although it does not cover the need. I have a case where a woman now eighty-seven years of age was born in Canada and has lived here seventy-eight years of her life, but it so happens that she was out of Canada eight years in the last twenty. Under the law as it stood before these changes were made, she would have had to wait sixteen years from the day she returned to Canada. Now she will have to wait four years. In other words, she will be ninety-one before she can qualify for pension. I think that when the change was made it would have been better to provide that if a person had lived in Canada for twenty years of his life, or since he became forty or even thirty-five years of age, he would be qualified. That, I think, would have been much fairer.

There are several other changes—one with regard to an applicant moving from one province to another; another with regard to applicants who have been out of the country on ships or fishing; also a provision with regard to collecting from the estate upon the death of a pensioner. I think those changes are beneficial. But the minister in explaining them went a little further than just saying what they were. He also made a statement on policy, which will be found on page 3305 of Hansard, in these words:

> These changes represent the result of a very careful examination of the steps which the dominion would recommend to make the present legislation meet the immediate practical problems without radical revision of the whole scheme.

He went on to discuss contributory old age pensions, which I submit constitute an entirely different problem from the problem of non-contributory pensions which we have at the present time. He said that a scheme of contributory pensions could be introduced only after there had been discussions between the dominion and the provinces. I think he was right in that statement. But it is obvious that there will be no provision for contributory old age pensions during the present session. It is also obvious that there will be considerable delay before a scheme of contributory old age pensions can be instituted, and that even though it were, it would not help the present recipients of old age pensions or those Canadians of, say, over sixty years of age at the present time. Probably they would have no time left in which to contribute to the scheme, and no funds with which to contribute; they, I think, must be covered by a non-contributory scheme; I do not see that they are going to be helped very much by a contributory scheme. So that I suggest to the minister and to the committee that there are two separate problems, contributory pensions and non-contributory pensions, and that our particular job at the present time is to deal with the latter.

I think there are two serious defects in the government policy with regard to non-contributory old age pensions. The first is that the government, as announced by the minister the other day, is against any radical revision of the present scheme. The government is making wartime changes only. I read from the order in council of last August in which the minister set out that it was to meet the wartime conditions, and that is true of the changes which have been made this week, again by order in council rather than by amendment to the old age pension legislation; they are all based on a wartime need, the wartime position.

Then what changes are made are made only after there has been much pressure from members and even from a committee of the house; last year we had a report from the special committee on social security; it appears in Votes and Proceedings of July 23, 1943. Hon. members will find in paragraph 5 of the report of that committee the following recommendation:

> That the government review the existing regulations governing old age pensions, pensions for the blind, and war veterans' allowance, and consider the advisability of adjusting the eligibility age to a lower level and of increasing the amount of pension.

Pressure has also been brought to bear by the press and the people in many parts of Canada, as well as by most of the provincial governments. So that the second defect in the present government policy is that the government is declining to take the lead in settling this old age pension problem.

I am convinced that the government is wrong in each case, and very seriously wrong. After all that our Canadian people have gone through in the war, and with the Atlantic charter as drawn up by those two great leaders,

Mr. Churchill and President Roosevelt, emphasizing freedom from fear and freedom from want for all the peoples of the world, I think we have developed in Canada a new standard of values. We are placing far greater value on men and women and far less value on money and material things than we did before the war. We are emphasizing the human angle in our whole course of life. There is a new spirit abroad in this country as there is in all the other countries of the united nations, and I suggest that this parliament should recognize that fact and act accordingly. And right here, in the old age pension scheme, is a good place to make a start. It is a good place for us to put into action this new and better spirit that is abroad in the land. I am convinced that there is a very widespread and firmly held opinion in Canada that these older Canadians, these senior citizens, are not being cared for adequately, that they are being treated harshly. Quite a few of them come into my office when I am at home in Vancouver, during the short time the house is not sitting, and when they find that they are not eligible, because of some particular regulation or restriction in the act, they feel that they are being treated cruelly, and I must say that in many cases I get the same impression myself. The restrictions are much too severe.

I believe that the policy is not right. I propose to mention several features of the old age pension situation in Canada to-day which I think should be remedied. First of all the amount of the payment. As I said in the opening of my remarks, that amount is $20 under the act, and an additional $5 provided by order in council of last fall, making a total of $25 in the case of a single person. Then some of the provinces are paying an additional amount by way of cost-of-living bonus; at least that is so in British Columbia; they describe it as a cost-of-living bonus. I believe Alberta and British Columbia are each paying an additional $5, making a total of $30 for single persons. Other provinces pay smaller amounts, but there are great difficulties in this arrangement. For example, in British Columbia it is paid only to those who get a pension there or where there is an agreement with another province; an Albertan moving into British Columbia can get a cost-of-living bonus because of the agreement between the two provinces; and it is payable only so long as the pensioner continues to reside in British Columbia. I suggest that the payment of this additional $5 should be on a national basis; it should be dominion-wide. The single old age pensioner should get at least $1 a day, which means a little over $30 a month. That should be the very minimum in all parts of Canada.

Then the allowable income over and above the old age pension is now a maximum of $125 a year. Provision should be made that a pensioner could with his earnings bring the total income up to at least $50 a month. Anything he earned over and above the pension would be earned by his own efforts, and he should be encouraged to make as much as possible in the way of earnings.

Again, pensioners should be allowed their home without any value in the way of income being placed upon it. There is a very arbitrary way of setting income value on real property. I have here the regulations under the act, and as the minister knows, regulation 17 (a) (2) reads:

> For the purpose of determining the income of any applicant the pension authority shall take into account all sources of income including—

And then comes (2):

> —real property at the rate of not less than 5 per centum of the assessed value or market value thereof (whichever be considered the more equitable standard) exclusive of encumbrances—

And mind you, there may be absolutely no income from this real property.

> —or, in the discretion of the pension authority, the net income from real property if the net income exceeds five per centum of the assessed value or market value thereof (whichever be considered the more equitable standard) exclusive of encumbrances.

I suggest that actual income alone should be counted in deciding whether or not the pensioner is getting the allowable income.

Then the age for qualification should be reduced. The minister said in his statement on May 29 that several of the provinces had asked that it be reduced, and he went on to say that if all or substantially all asked he would give consideration to making provision for the reduction. I suggest that the dominion should take the lead and not wait for the provinces. There was a report tabled last year known as the Marsh report on social security for Canada. Members are, or they ought to be, familiar with that report. Doctor Marsh deals with old age pensions, and I quote from page 73 with reference to the age of eligibility:

> Review of the forty or more systems of old age assistance, contributory and non-contributory, effective in the world to-day clearly shows that the generally accepted view as to the proper age when consideration should be given to retirement from work and provision of security is 65 for men and 60 for women.

That is the finding of the government's own appointee.

Further the act and the regulations should be humanized. I have already given some instances of where that could be done. These are the days of social security. The Canadian people want real social security. May I give an example of that. This year the British Columbia legislature passed unanimously a resolution dealing with old age pensions, which reads as follows:

Whereas this house notes with satisfaction that the government of the Dominion of Canada has seen fit to increase allowances made under the Old Age Pensions Act:

And whereas these increases have been made under the War Measures Act, thereby limiting these increases to the period of the duration of the war;

And whereas the allowances are still less than this house considers adequate:

And whereas the government of the Dominion of Canada did not increase the amount of income the pension applicant may have before becoming ineligible for pension:

And whereas the government of the Dominion of Canada did not decrease the age at which persons shall become eligible for pension:

Therefore be it resolved, that this house petition the government of the Dominion of Canada urging that the Old Age Pensions Act be amended to provide that the maximum pension be raised to $365 per annum and that the maximum income be raised to $500 per annum and that the age at which persons become eligible for pension be reduced to sixty-five years for men and sixty years for women.

And be it further resolved, that this house petition the government of the Dominion of Canada, urging that the Old Age Pensions Act and its regulations be so amended that property used by pensioner as his home and contributions reasonably expected from children, donations, and benevolences be not treated as income.

I think that resolution of the British Columbia legislature is typical of the feeling of the people in most parts of Canada. They are not the only ones who think the regulations should be humanized. I would again refer hon. members to Doctor Marsh's report at page 70. He points out that in Great Britain a far larger percentage of the people over seventy years of age are able to qualify for government assistance than in Canada. Four-fifths of all the people over seventy in Great Britain are able to qualify, whereas in Canada he says it is unlikely that more than fifty to sixty-five per cent of the people over seventy are able to qualify for assistance of any kind, including old age pensions or relief or any other kind of assistance. He goes on to say:

While it would be tempting to assume that this is an indication of the greater comfort of the aged in Canada, and their greater ability to provide for themselves with savings or through their families, independent of the state, such an assumption is hardly sufficient to reconcile the entire difference. When one turns to examination—

[Mr. Green.]

These are very significant words in a young country like Canada which prides herself on being up-and-coming and wealthy.

—of the old age pensions administration in Canadian provinces, one finds a major portion of the answer to this discrepancy between British figures and our own; an answer which is a good deal more realistic and less to the credit of the Canadian people as a whole. Examination, for example, would reveal written into the act itself, and especially into the regulations—but most of all practised in the administration—a rigid system of eligibility requirements set on a very low level, which makes it difficult for many aged persons, genuinely in need of some form of assistance on a permanent continuing basis, to qualify for allowances. These provisions include:

1. Citizenship;

2. Residence restrictions, both dominion and provincial;

3. Means testing in terms of the applicant's personal income, personal property qualifications, and even the assumption of income from property where in fact such income does not exist.

I referred to that in dealing with real property. The report continues:

4. The principle, zealously adhered to in certain provinces, of the responsibility of the children, to the point of assuming that income is actually forthcoming from children for the support of the applicant, even in cases where it is not;

5. Scaling-down of allowances below the amount permitted by the statute, on the grounds that the pensioner does not require even that amount of pension which is found to be the arithmetical maximum payable after the exhaustion of all statutory, regulatory and administrative means-test procedures.

Therefore I say that the act and the regulations should be humanized. I then come to the question of citizenship. We listened in the house a few weeks ago to statements of several hon. members to the effect that certain old people who came here from other lands had never been naturalized, so that they now find themselves unable to qualify for pension. They also find themselves unable to become naturalized because they cannot speak either English or French. That is a situation which should be remedied. I do not believe that the remedy should be by changing the naturalization provisions, but I suggest to the minister that consideration be given to using the test of domicile as defined in our Immigration Act for deciding whether or not a person is entitled to old age pension. I believe that should be decided on their Canadian citizenship under the same provisions or similar provisions to those found in the Immigration Act. The definition is found in section 2, paragraph (e) of the Immigration Act, and is as follows:

(e) "domicile" means the place in which a person has his home, or in which he resides, or to which he returns as his place of permanent abode, and does not mean the place where he resides for a mere special or temporary purpose;

(i) Canadian domicile can only be acquired, for the purposes of this act, by a person having his domicile for at least five years in Canada after having been landed therein within the meaning of this act.

If a person has become domiciled in Canada under provisions such as those contained in the Immigration Act then the twenty years could run from that time or they could be used as a basis rather than the present basis which, I believe, is British citizenship. The individual must be a British subject.

There are other respects in which the act and the regulations could be improved; I have pointed out just a few. But I repeat that a radical revision of the whole scheme is needed now, not after the war. At that time the suggestion will be made that we postpone it until we settle post-war problems. This is something that should be done now without delay. The dominion must take the lead in bringing about a revision of the scheme and changes should be on a statutory basis and not by order in council under the War Measures Act.

I suggest that old age pensions should be administered not by the Department of Finance—with all due respect to the minister and his own department; I think it is not their job to deal with old age pensions—but by the new department of social welfare. About all the responsibility the dominion government takes at the present time—and this is taken, of course, through the Department of Finance—is to pay three-quarters of the cost and to check the accounts. Doctor Marsh deals with that situation in his report. He objected strenuously to the act and the regulations being administered in the provinces by the workmen's compensation boards, and by the way, I understand that at the present time only one or two of the provinces are so administering old age pensions; most provinces have set up a separate old age pension authority.

In his report Doctor Marsh used these words at page 71:

> The tendency in workmen's compensation administration is to assess eligibility on relatively hard and fast lines and then to apply the eligibility schedule strictly. Scaled to different earnings levels and to a variety of accident cases, this is less apt to produce harsh results. Scaled to what is supposed to be a minimum and to a need which is relatively equal for all cases, it can only produce inequities. Unfortunately, federal supervision reinforces these tendencies, through the fact that the old age pensions authority on the federal level is located in the Department of Finance. The supervision of provincial administrations consists almost exclusively of audit and financial control, the result being a restrictive influence on provincial administrations which is easily reflected in a repressive attitude towards the applicant.

The speech from the throne pointed out that we were to have a department of social welfare, the work of which was described as follows:

> A department of social welfare to organize and to assist in administering activities of the federal government in the fields of health and social insurance.

Then, in the resolution on the order paper at the present time with regard to the setting up of this department of social welfare we find that one of its duties is set out in this way:

> . . . to assume the management and control of and to consolidate in such department matters relating to the social security and welfare of the people of Canada.

So that I suggest to the committee that old age pensions should come under this new department of social welfare. In that department should be experts trained in social welfare problems, the idea being that in that way we shall be able to get something like uniformity right across the country and also that the act and the regulations will be administered in a far more humane and up to date way than they are at the present time.

While I blame the minister, because I believe his policy is a wrong one, yet I realize the difficulties he faces in respect of old age pensions; but I would point out to him, with all the sincerity I can muster, that the Canadian people are very much in earnest over this question of old age pensions, and that now is the time to act.

Mr. MacNICOL: So much has been said about old age pensions in the many years I have been here that I believe very little can be added to what has been said so well by others. May I add only a few words to what was said by the hon. member for Vancouver South, when he urged so strongly that it is the government's duty to do something now, and to prepare something of a uniform nature. That suggestion I strongly endorse. I do not know where we are going to go in respect of old age pensions payments, and the regulation of ages, unless something is done at once. To do that I would recommend that the federal government in agreement with the provinces take over the whole business. Let this government take it over entirely. I see no reason why it cannot be done in that way—with provincial agreement of the financial consideration, of course. If that is not done, however, there will be chaos from one end of the country to the other.

I remember that during the last election campaign in Ontario one candidate said that if returned to power he would see that the old age pensions regulations were amended so that they would grant $50 a month at fifty years of age. Another man could have said, just as easily, "If I am elected I will see that the old age pensioner gets $60 a month at forty years of age." Under present circumstances there can be no uniformity, and it will become a question of who is the biggest demagogue.

Mr. ILSLEY: The age will go down and the pension will go up.

Mr. MacNICOL: Yes, unless the federal government takes over the whole business and arranges something uniform which would apply in every province in exactly the same way. There is no telling where the present method will end.

I thought that on March 13 the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre delivered a very able speech, and one which had required a good deal of thought and care. What he said was well considered, and I must compliment him upon his ability to line up figures one after another. He pointed out—and I am not questioning it—that in no two of the ten authorities in Canada, the nine provinces and the Northwest Territories, are the old age pensions the same. Those figures appear in his speech as reported at page 1407 of Hansard. That being so, there is no uniformity. Therefore I agree with the hon. member for Vancouver South when he says that now is the time to do something, and I strongly recommend and suggest that the federal government take over the whole thing. It could easily arrange with the provinces as to where the money is to come from. At the present time it puts up seventy-five per cent. Then, in one province after another we find an addition of five per cent, or this or that, and the result is that to-day we have no uniformity.

Therefore, to avoid demagogic bidding in general elections, or in provincial elections, to avoid competition between this and that party, to avoid bidding for votes by promising the impossible—because some of these promises are impossible—the federal government should take over the whole thing and make regulations which would be uniformly applicable to all provinces.

Mr. ILSLEY: Does the hon. member think that would eliminate the bidding?

Mr. MacNICOL: It would reduce the bidding from nine bidders, nine provinces, to one bid among the parties in the federal field.

Mr. ILSLEY: Instead of nine small auctions there would be one big auction, you think?

[Mr. MacNicol.]

An hon. MEMBER: And the stakes might be even greater.

Mr. MacNICOL: They are having the same trouble in the United States. It is much more difficult over there to adopt a uniform procedure. They are having difficulty in each and every state, because the various parties in those states are bidding so as to get the pensionable vote. They are offering lower age limits and increased pension payments. Pensions in the United States range from $20 to $50 a month. California pays $50 and Alaska pays $45 a month. In many of the states the age at which the pensioner begins to participate is lower than it is in other states.

I like to see uniformity in these things. For the life of me I cannot see how we are going to get along, either here or in the United States, by following the procedure we have to-day. I find that eight American states pay $40 a month; one pays $36, and the remainder pay somewhere between $20 and $30.

The platforms of the various parties in respect of old age pensions are not far apart, as they have been enunciated in the past few years. I remember that when I first came here in 1930 certain resolutions were presented, chiefly by hon. members who were then associated with labour, I believe. The then hon. member for Winnipeg North, the then hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre, and later the hon. member for Vancouver East moved resolutions along those lines. Those resolutions were not far apart. At that time I strongly supported the principle of reducing the age limit for old age pensions.

I have had a long association with the working men in the industries with which I have been connected, and I know that with sicknesses and lay-offs and the large families with which God always blesses them—and God uses good judgment in doing so—most of them find it impossible from their earnings to lay up anything for their old age. That is why I have supported the principle of old age pensions, even before I came to this house. A resolution moved by the hon. member for Vancouver East reads:

> Therefore be it resolved, that in the opinion of this house, the government should consider the advisability of reducing from seventy years to sixty-five years the age at which the Old Age Pensions Act becomes operative and of increasing the monthly pension at least fifty per cent.

As I recollect, I supported that resolution, although I do not remember whether it came to a vote. That showed that in 1937 the hon. member for Vancouver East advocated that the age limit should be sixty-five years and that the pension should be $30 a month. I have advocated that on many occasions. In 1939 the then hon. member for Winnipeg North, Mr. Heaps, moved a resolution, which read:

Whereas it is becoming more and more difficult for older persons to be absorbed into the useful productive life of the dominion, therefore being unable to maintain themselves in decency and comfort;

And whereas Canada is a country richly endowed with natural resources capable of maintaining our whole population in a reasonably high standard of living;

Therefore be it resolved, that this house would welcome a government declaration of policy that would bring about an immediate lowering of the present pensionable age limit of seventy years, the effect of such being that the older generation would retire from industrial activity, thereby creating opportunities for the younger generation to be usefully and gainfully employed.

I presume that resolution meant to lower the age limit to perhaps sixty-five years. While it does not mention that the pension should be increased, I have no doubt that at that time the former hon. member advocated it. He was always most sincere in his efforts for the good of the working man. In making this reference to the former member for Winnipeg North, I am not saying anything against the present member for Winnipeg North.

Mr. KNOWLES: Perhaps you are mixing up Winnipeg North and Winnipeg North Centre.

Mr. MacNICOL: I am referring to Mr. Heaps, whatever riding he represented. He was always an ardent advocate of benefits for the working man. What is the situation as far as the Progressive Conservatives are concerned? I take them first because I am a member of that party. At their convention in Winnipeg in 1942 they advocated the payment of an increased old age pension at a reduced age. The present pension is $20 a month, and while I do not know what the framers of that resolution had in mind, I know I have advocated for many years that $1 a day should be given to old age pensioners, which would be approximately $30 a month, and that the age limit should be reduced to sixty-five years. While I cannot interpret just what the party meant at Winnipeg, I am interpreting it to suit myself.

Mr. WEIR: That would be an auction as well.

Mr. MacNICOL: I stand where I have always stood, namely, that the age limit should not be more than sixty-five years and the amount paid should be not less than $1 a day, or approximately $30 a month. I have found that in Great Britain, Australia, New Zealand and many states of the United States the pension is paid to women at the age of sixty years. I am in accord with that. Women have a double burden to bear and perhaps they are entitled to an old age pension at an earlier year than the men.

What about the Liberal programme? At the 1942 convention they passed a resolution that the age limit should be reduced. The present limit is seventy years and I presume that they meant to reduce it to sixty-five years although they do not say so. If we assume that they meant sixty-five years, that would bring them on the same platform as I am on. They say in the resolution that the amount of pension should be raised. It is now $20 a month, so that I would interpret the resolution as meaning that they intended to increase the pension to $30 a month or $1 a day. That would place the national Liberal federation or association or perhaps the party on approximately the same footing as myself on that subject.

The Liberal convention of 1942 advocated the dropping of liens. Perhaps there should be some limitation here. It has been advocated that houses valued at $2,000 or $2,500 should be exempt from liens. I believe any humble home should be exempt from a lien, but some of the expensive homes should not be exempt. I would presume that the exemption of a $2,000 or a $2,500 home would have the approval of the Liberal association, although they do not state any amount.

Mr. WEIR: What would happen to the house worth $2,500 upon the death of the pensioner?

Mr. MacNICOL: If he had a family, it would go to the family. I presume that is what the Liberal federation had in mind in 1942 when they passed the resolution that there should be no lien. My hon. friend was there.

Mr. GRAYDON: He has not a family.

An hon. MEMBER: Give him time.

Mr. MacNICOL: In 1944 the Social Credit party sent out a letter which stated that they advocated the reduction of the age limit to sixty years and an increase in the pension to $50. That was a pretty strong bid for votes, raising the pension to $50.

Mr BLACKMORE: That was not a bid for votes; that was simply a statement of the bare minimum to which an old age pensioner in Canada is entitled. Anything less than that is an insult.

Mr. MacNICOL: I notice that the same feeling is quite strong throughout Alberta because I have seen several resolutions from that province, advocating a reduction of the age limit to sixty years and an increase in the pension to $50. The Social Credit programme does not say anything about liens on homes.

In 1942 the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation advocated that the age limit be reduced to sixty years and that the amount of pension be raised to $40 a month. They also advocated that liens against houses should be dropped. I do not remember whether their programme placed a limit of $2,000 or $2,500 on the homes that should be exempt. There was something else that amused me greatly. In the letter of the C.C.F. which sets out their programme in connection with old age pensions and which is signed by the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell), it is stated that in 1927 former members of the labour party, which I presume would refer to the former member for Winnipeg North and perhaps the former member for Winnipeg North Centre, held the balance of power in this house. That is a far-fetched statement.

Mr. ROSS (Souris): What did they do about old age pensions while they had the power?

Mr. MacNICOL: In the parliament elected in 1926 there were 116 Liberals, ninety-one Conservatives, thirteen Progressives, nine Liberal Progressives, three Labour, two of them from Manitoba, and one Independent; so that if the two Labour members who later became Cooperative Commonwealth supporters held the balance of power—well, I cannot figure that out on these statistics.

Mr. McGEER: To complete the record, would it not be well to recall that the act passed in 1926 was vetoed by the senate, and that the act which went into force was passed in 1927 when the Liberals had a clear majority in the house?

Mr. MacNICOL: Thank you for the interjection, but I have no comment to make on it at the moment.

Just a word or two further. As I understand it—I may be wrong but this is my understanding—a Canadian who moves to Great Britain and resides there for twelve years becomes eligible for the old age pension there when he reaches the age of sixty-five. But in Canada to become eligible for the old age pension a man or woman must reside here continuously for twenty years. In my riding we have a number of people who have come there from Newfoundland. They are a fine type of citizen, thrifty, hard-working; there are no better citizens anywhere. A few years ago, when there was a great demand here for labour and when conditions in the fishing industry in Newfoundland were bad because of certain European conditions, quite a number of Newfoundlanders moved to Canada. They came here in good faith. Now they find themselves handicapped by this residence qualification, requiring twenty years residence in Canada before they can become eligible for the pension. It means that they may have to reach the age of eighty, eighty-five or ninety years before they will become eligible for the pension here. That is not fair to our brothers from Newfoundland. I can see that unless we make a reciprocal arrangement with Great Britain with respect to the citizens of Great Britain who leave the homeland prior to being eligible for a pension there and come to Canada, we shall not have that immigration from the old country which we certainly desire very ardently—I do in any event—because if they have to live here for twenty years before they become eligible for the pension they will not leave the fine social conditions they have in the old country. So that I suggest to the government that they consider making a reciprocal arrangement with Great Britain whereby a British citizen from the old land will not lose his entitlement to the old age pension at pensionable age by coming to Canada. I think we should also make a similar reciprocal arrangement with Newfoundland, so that we shall treat Newfoundlanders coming to Canada just as if they were Canadians. We want them to be Canadians. But with the present twenty years' residence requirement before they can obtain the old age pension we are penalizing them for coming here to live with us.

Mr. KNOWLES: Mr. Chairman, it would seem from what has been said back and forth across the floor of this chamber thus far that this debate may break into two general phases. I am going to devote my remarks to those two phases. On the one hand, possible changes were discussed, amendments to the existing old age pension legislation. On the other hand, there was the larger question of a much wider application of the old age pension and a much more generous old age pension set-up.

When references are made to lowering the age limit and to a higher amount of pension we get these various comments, that it is only so much bidding for votes and that kind of thing, which suggests to my mind that some hon. members do not yet realize that the basic philosophy underlying the payment of old age pensions has taken root in the minds of the Canadian people. They no longer think of old age pensions as something that should be given on the basis of a means test or as a form of charity. They no longer think of it as something that political parties propose to hand out as a means of trying to get into power. They think rather of this basic fact, that when people through their working years have contributed to the wealth of the country, it is a matter of right that in their later years they should enjoy, not just a pittance to keep them alive, but a proper share of the total wealth which the country is then able to produce, largely because of what they have done to help build up that greater productive capacity.

I make this earnest appeal, that hon. members refrain from sneering—I offer this word hopefully—at the suggestions that are made along these lines. The hon. member for Vancouver South has referred to the way in which the principles of the Atlantic charter and of the four freedoms and broader ideas with respect to social security have become a part of our thinking, so that the approach of the Canadian people to this whole subject is greatly different from what it was twenty or twenty-five years ago. I hope that we can have a reflection of that change of attitude toward the subject of old age pensions in the debate in this house to-day and in our whole approach to this subject in the months and years that lie ahead.

I am going to speak for only a few minutes with respect to this whole question of a larger pension at a lower age, and then I intend to turn to the other side of the subject. One reason why I do not need to say a great deal on this phase is that I have already spoken on this matter a number of times, and in particular I put on the record not only my own views but the position of our party in definite form when I spoke on the matter in this house on March 13 of this year, on the occasion to which the hon. member for Davenport has already referred most generously.

At that time I pointed out that we in this group feel that steps should be taken immediately to lower the pensionable age to sixty and to increase the amount of the pension to $40 a month. I must correct myself and say that when I made that suggestion on behalf of the party, I said "at least" $40 a month. There were certain other suggestions contained in my speech of March 13, and I do not need to repeat them. We are glad to note that other parties in general are agreeing with us, that we must approach this whole subject in the light of what we feel to be the basic philosophy about old age pensions, so that we can look forward to an early day when Canadians in their older years—not their declining years but years that should be still full of much enjoyment and pleasure—shall have around them the security of knowing that they are going to share in the wealth which the country is able to produce at that time because of what they have done through their working years to help build up that productive capacity.

I may take one more moment to say this, that the reason why I put that in—"at least" $40 a month—is not to protect myself against some higher bidder, as the hon. member for Macdonald might say, but because we do not know, I might say from year to year, but certainly from decade to decade, what the productive capacity of this dominion can be. The Minister of Finance has expressed a number of times his amazement at the achievement of this country in terms of production of wealth during the course of this present war, and we are all amazed at what we have been able to do. We feel that the rate of old age pensions should be related to the total productive capacity of the country and that as that productive capacity goes up the rate of pensions should go up. That is the reason why we put that phrase "at least" in there, and I think there is nothing unusual about it; I think every speaker and every party would take the same position, whatever amount they have set for the moment.

May I turn from that bit of generalization regarding the whole question of old age pensions, to the matters immediately before us which relate to this $5 that the vote we are discussing is supposed to cover, and the recent announcements made by the Minister of Finance and the orders in council tabled the other day. We were all grateful for the announcement which came at long last on May 29 that the ceiling on other income had been restored to $125 a year by putting the ceiling on the total income of an old age pensioner up to the figure of $425 a year. I hope that it will not seem like going back on one's expression of gratitude to take a moment or two to condemn the government for having taken so long to do this, but I think the government should be reprimanded for not putting the ceiling up there on August 10 last year when that $5 increase was made. When the minister on July 24 last year announced the $5 increase he indicated that the ceiling on a pensioner's total income would stay where it was; and that night I for one, possibly others, discussed the matter with him across the floor of the chamber and appealed to him to reconsider that point before the order in council was brought down. I know that when he came to Manitoba last July and August during the course of the election campaign we were conducting out there I made a public appeal to him on that one point and that one point alone, and we were quite disappointed, since there was time, that the government did not make that slight adjustment. Since then, provincial governments and old age pensioners' societies and bodies of citizens and members of parliament and newspapers all over the country have been, if I may use the phrase, putting the pressure on, and at long last the announcement has come through.

Mr. ILSLEY: We did not have the agreement of the provinces last July. The pressure did not come from anything like all the provinces. We took up with the provinces the question of whether they would agree. Raising the ceiling means bringing in a substantial number of new pensioners, and is a matter of vital concern to the provinces under our present system, and it cannot properly be done without agreement with the provinces.

Mr. KNOWLES: Yes, but when the announcement of the proposed $5 increase was first made, on the 24th of July, and when the order in council P.C. 6367 was made on the 10th of August last year, no agreements had been drawn.

Mr. ILSLEY: No, but we had agreement from the provinces covering what we did at that time, and we did not move until we had that agreement with the provinces—all the provinces. But we did not have the agreement on the other point.

Mr. KNOWLES: Is the minister telling me that the provinces up to that point had not agreed to raising the ceiling?

Mr. ILSLEY: They had not agreed.

Mr. KNOWLES: Well, at least we are getting the blame spread around a bit, if that is the case. My understanding from such provincial people as I have talked with was that they right along—

Mr. MITCHELL: What provincial people did my hon. friend have contact with?

Mr. KNOWLES: Members of legislative assemblies of various provinces.

Mr. ILSLEY: The province of Manitoba wanted it from the beginning. I will say that about Manitoba.

Mr. KNOWLES: May I ask the minister again then, was this matter given discussion prior to the 10th of August? Was it given thorough consideration? Was the government blocked from doing it by the unwillingness of the provincial governments to deal with it?

Mr. ILSLEY: No, it was not discussed. It was not taken up with them. We were taking up a different point entirely, namely, the question of the $5, without any reference to the other matter. The $365 ceiling was in the act, and it would be assumed, I think, would stay there, when provinces simply requested an increase in the amount of pension from $20 up to $25, which they did between 1941 and the summer of 1943, and we went as far as we had any general basis of provincial consent, in July or August of 1943. I am not saying that the other point was discussed. That was discussed afterwards, and the agreement of the last province was obtained on the 31st of March, 1944. I will say that perhaps this government should have proceeded a little more rapidly after March 31, 1944, but we have had a great deal to do and the order in council takes effect from April 1, 1944.

Mr. KNOWLES: I do not want to spend a great deal of time over a matter which has been taken care of, but when the proposal was made last summer it was a proposal for a $5 increase.

Mr. ILSLEY: That is right.

Mr. KNOWLES: It seems to me that involved in making that proposal was the whole question of the conditions which would permit that $5 increase or in some cases prevent its being paid, and the government already had the experience of a number of provinces—four or five, at any rate—which had added their own supplementary amounts to the former $20.

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes.

Mr. KNOWLES: There were Alberta, British Columbia, Saskatchewan, Manitoba, Ontario, and possibly Nova Scotia—I will not be too sure about that. At any rate there was a number, and in all cases where these provinces added their own supplementary amount they asked that it should be possible to pay it outside of the then existing ceiling. The government by order in council from time to time amended the regulations, adding in each one of the provinces to permit it to pay this former supplementary amount outside of the ceiling. So that when, for example, British Columbia added $5 to the $20 that the federal government then provided, everyone in British Columbia got that additional $5. My point is that, on that basis of doing things, means for providing for an extra amount to be received in full by every pensioner was a matter that had already been discussed. There had been a great deal of correspondence between the provincial governments and the minister. I had a return tabled about that kind of thing. All I am trying to say about this argument is that this subject was very much to the fore. I am amazed when the minister tells me now that prior to July 24 last he took up with the provinces the proposal to add $5 to the pension but did not discuss whether or not every old age pensioner in the province would get it.

Mr. ILSLEY: It is not quite right to say that I took up that proposal with the provinces. The request came from the provinces to make the then existing pensioners eligible for as much as $5 additional; but when it comes to raising the roof in the act, it would not only do that, but bring in a lot more pensioners who are not getting anything at all now, and that is clearly a new matter with which we did not have authority, on the basis of general provincial consent, to deal, and which we had to take up with the provinces later.

Mr. KNOWLES: The minister and I both think we are right, so that I will not argue that part of the matter farther.

Mr. MITCHELL: The minister is right. That is the difference.

Mr. KNOWLES: Oh, no. I am considerate enough not to take up further time in discussing that point, but I will say, in connection with the remark the minister has just made about raising the roof—perhaps we had better stick to "raising the ceiling"; we are not raising the roof yet—that to raise the ceiling brings in a larger number of people and that involves additional expenditure.

Mr. ILSLEY: And additional administrative difficulties, which are a matter of vital concern to the provinces. So long as this is on the present basis of primary provincial responsibility, the provinces must in decency be consulted about these things before we do them.

Mr. KNOWLES: I am not admitting what the minister says as to the place where the responsibility lies. I want to avoid getting into that argument at present. I will say, however, with regard to the additional $5 that if the minister could not have provided for everyone to get it by raising the roof, as he says, and thereby bringing in a great many other people—and I do not agree that they should not have been brought in—at least he could have provided for $5 additional to be received by every pensioner in the same way that he had provided for the individual provinces to give their $5 supplementary amounts to every pensioner. He provided by successive amendments to the regulations, bringing in one province at a time, while they were paying supplementary amounts, that these amounts could be paid outside the ceiling. You do not bring new people into the pension fund because the basic regulations still stand; but so far as people already under the pension scheme are concerned, they were permitted to get an extra $5 from British Columbia or Alberta, or $1.25 from Manitoba, outside the ceiling.

Mr. ILSLEY: My hon. friend will find that there is something inequitable about that, in just adding to the pensions of the existing pensioners. If he works it out he will find that there is.

Mr. KNOWLES: It was done in that day and it is being done to-day.

Mr. ILSLEY: By the provinces.

Mr. KNOWLES: With the new maximum payable under the act as amended, British Columbia is still paying, according to Hansard at page 2071, in answer to certain questions I asked, an additional $5 a month to each pensioner, and Alberta is paying $5 a month to each pensioner plus an amount up to $5 a year where income is less than $365 a year. In other words, British Columbia pays $60 a year and Alberta $65. Saskatchewan and Manitoba are paying an amount up to $1.25 a month to certain pensioners under certain circumstances. I will not try to explain the circumstances under which they get $1.25 in Manitoba. The matter is quite complicated and we will let it go at that. Ontario pays an amount of fifteen per cent of the amount of pension payable under the Old Age Pension Act prior to the passing of order in council P.C. 6367. Nova Scotia pays certain amounts as well.

This simply emphasizes what the hon. member for Davenport has said in regard to this discrepancy in the amounts paid in the various provinces, which has been the case for a good many years, ever since the provincial governments in some parts of the country began to agitate for an increased amount. In other words, it emphasizes the need for an overall federal plan of old age pensions which will establish some kind of uniformity throughout the country. So much for the question of ceiling. We are glad that at long last it has been raised and that it will provide for many pensioners who previously did not get the $5 increase and who will now get it. Some got only part of it and will now get the full amount, and it will bring in some people who were not getting any pension at all. It will give them some small amount and it will increase the pension rolls throughout the country. Every little step like that is all to the good.

The other day when the minister announced these changes and tabled the orders in council he gave me a little more hope, listening to him in the house, than perhaps I was justified in taking, because when I look over the orders in council, while it is good to have these changes, I feel with the hon. member for Vancouver South that something more might have been done even at this stage of the game. Order in council P.C. 3377 just makes the necessary changes to raise the ceiling to the amount the minister indicated. The differences as between the conditions as they apply to old age and blind are taken into account. The other one, P.C. 3376, is the one that makes some reference to the 16-year residence qualification. That was the one that was the greatest disappointment to me. From what the minister said I had hoped, though to read his language he seems to be correct—

Mr. MacNICOL: What was the 16-year qualification?

Mr. KNOWLES: If I understand it correctly, the change is to make the original intention of the act quite clear. The intention was that the pensioner should be deemed to have lived in Canada for the past twenty years if he had lived here sixteen years of the last twenty. The change by this order in council adds to that, "or since attaining the age of fifty years". That means now that a person who does not apply for his pension until he is seventy-five must have lived here sixteen years since he was fifty. Is that correct? I think that is the effect of it. The total amount of sixteen years he must get in before applying for his pension is now not just during the last 20-year period, but since the age of 50.

Mr. MacNICOL: When did that become effective?

Mr. KNOWLES: That is what the minister tabled this week. It was effective April 1. I think the suggestions made by the hon. member for Vancouver South should be given attention in connection with the whole question of residence in the country. A number of the amendments in the order in council are simply amendments consequent upon other changes that have been made. The one with regard to two years' residence in the province in which the pensioner applies is good in the sense that an old age pensioner is no longer forced to go back to the province from which he came. But these changes are quite incidental to the more basic question of residence, bearing in mind many cases of people who went home to England for a few short years between the ages of fifty and seventy and who have been denied their pensions, also people who spent a while in the United States.

Mr. MacNICOL: And during this war.

Mr. KNOWLES: There are a number of difficulties that are very discriminatory which the authorities should try to work out. From what the minister said the other day I was hoping that these orders in council would deal with them. Apparently there is still left something further to do.

On Monday of this week the minister referred to the slight change that had been made with regard to the filing of liens against homes of pensioners or the recovering of money from those liens. He advised the house that the provinces were being told that this would now be up to them. That is quite correct. Unless it was done on some other occasion, that advice was given in answer to a question which I put on the order paper. My question was on the order paper from February 10 to March 23; it was answered on the latter day and the reply indicated that up until that time there had been confusion, but that the government had now decided to straighten out the matter by advising the provinces that it was entirely up to them. My only complaint about it is that it is still left uncertain. It is definite so far as the federal government is concerned. They do not require it. But it is still left to the provinces to do it or not as they see fit. It seems to me that this is a place where the federal government might have changed the basic regulations so as to do away with it altogether.

Just on that point I should like to say this to the hon. member for Macdonald, who interrupted the hon. member for Davenport earlier when he asked what would happen to an old age pensioner's home after he died. I think the hon. member for Davenport answered the question all right, but I would point out to the hon. member for Macdonald, as I am sure he knows, that a great many people who are really eligible for pension and who should get it are deterred from applying for it by the knowledge that a lien will be applied to their homes. I know that I have said to many persons in Manitoba, where the government we have was headed formerly by a certain gentleman who established a reputation of not cashing in very often on those liens, that they did not need to worry about it because the government in Manitoba did not very often collect on the liens. However, there is always the possibility in the mind of the old person that his home may be taken after he is gone and that deters that old person from applying for the old age pension and getting it as his right. It seems to me that the solution is to do away altogether with the filing of liens up to some specific amount, say $2,000 or $2,500. While we are talking about liens against homes I should like to ask the minister a question.

Mr. MacNICOL: The hon. member means that there should be no lien against property in which there is an investment up to $2,500?

Mr. KNOWLES: There should be no lien filed against a home under that value or against the first $2,500 of the home, no matter how valuable it may be.

I do not know whether the minister has a copy of the Old Age Pension Act in front of him but possibly he can secure one. My question is with respect to section 9, paragraph 2 on page 5. I want to compare that with section 17 (a), paragraph (ii) of the regulations on page 13. The section on page 5 reads as follows:

> Where a pensioner is the owner of an interest in a dwelling house in which he resides and the pension authority accepts a transfer to it of such interest, the pension payable to the pensioner shall not be subject to any reduction in respect of the annual value of such interest, but the pension authority shall, on the death of the pensioner . . . .

The remainder of the section deals with the collecting of the money. It seems to me that that language is clear. If the pensioner is the owner of an interest in a dwelling house in which he resides there is to be no reduction of his pension in lieu of the value of the home.

Mr. ILSLEY: If the pension authority accepts transfer to it.

Mr. KNOWLES: Yes. As I read that, where the pensioner owns his house and lives in it and accepts a lien on it for the purpose of getting a pension there is to be no reduction in the amount of his pension. The point I am trying to make is that according to this section the only thing that is supposed to happen to a pensioner who owns the home in which he lives is that there is a lien filed against it, but there should be no reduction in the amount of the pension that he receives. But according to regulation 17 (a), (ii), which was included in the regulations made pursuant to the act. it has been decreed that for the purpose of determining the income of any applicant for pension the pension authority shall take into account all sources of income, including:

> . . . real property at the rate of not less than five per centum of the assessed value or market value thereof.

There is no reference in this clause at which I am now looking to except the home in which the pensioner lives. It seems to me from the reference I read on page 5 that when a pensioner owns his home and lives in it, only one thing should happen to it even under the full effect of the act, namely, that there should be a lien against it. But under the regulations as they appear on page 13, what happens to such pensioner is two things: he has a lien filed against his property and the amount of his pension is—and I know this happens because of my knowledge of many cases in Manitoba at any rate—reduced if five per cent of the value of the home in which he lives is an amount which brings him under the effect of the ceiling. It strikes me that either there is an inconsistency between the two references—

The ACTING CHAIRMAN (Mr. Golding): Order. It being six o'clock I now leave the Chair.

At six o'clock the committee took recess.

After Recess

The committee resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. KNOWLES: Mr. Chairman, I shall conclude as quickly as I can. There is a good deal more I certainly should like to say, but I realize that the time at my disposal is almost exhausted.

When the committee rose at six o'clock I was discussing section 9(2) of the act, and was asking the minister to compare it with section 17(a) (ii) of the regulations. I pointed out that the section in the act is quite explicit. Where a pensioner owns a dwelling, resides in it, and gives a transfer of his interest therein to the pension authority, there is supposed to be no reduction in the amount of his pension. I pointed out, on the other hand, that the regulation referred to, passed by order in council, in my view sets aside the spirit of section 9(2). No doubt the minister will deal with that point later. But since my time is just about exhausted I would turn for a few moments to something else.

I hold in my hand a letter which I should like to place on the record. I do not do this in any argumentative fashion at all, but do it merely because the matter was referred to this afternoon. It is only fair that the record should be complete. If there are other members who have anything they wish to say in the matter, they are of course free to do so, but I am sure this letter will set out clearly the activities of Mr. Woodsworth and Mr. Heaps, so far as old age pensions in 1926 are concerned. Hon. members will note that this letter is framed. Because this matter was felt to be of such significance, our organization had the letter framed and, normally, it hangs in our C.C.F. national office on Sparks street. I procured it at supper time for the purpose of reading it to-night. It is as follows:

Prime Minister's Office
Canada
Ottawa, January 28, 1926.

J. S. Woodsworth, Esq., M.P.,
House of Commons,
Ottawa.

Dear Mr. Woodsworth:

Replying to the letter received from Mr. Heaps and yourself, dated January 7, in which you ask whether it is the intention of the government to introduce at this session legislation with regard to (a) provision for the unemployed, and (b) old age pensions, I would refer you, respecting provision for the unemployed, to the answer given in the House of Commons to-day by the Honourable Ernest Lapointe on behalf of the government in reply to a question by yourself, and which indicated the government's intention of carrying out with respect to emergency relief the practice adopted in cooperation with provinces and municipalities in the years immediately following the war. In answer to a question from Mr. Neill, Mr. Lapointe further intimated that it was the intention of the government to introduce at this session legislation with respect to old age pensions.

You will observe that the statement made by Mr. Lapointe was in accordance with the intimation which I gave to Mr. Heaps and yourself at the time of our interview, following the receipt of the communication herein referred to.

With respect to amendments to (a) the Immigration Act, (b) the Naturalization Act, and (c) the criminal code, which were referred to at the time of our interview, I would say that having since taken up the proposed amendments with the ministers concerned, I feel I am in a position to assure you that legislation on these matters will also be introduced in the course of the present session.

Yours sincerely,

In the Prime Minister's handwriting is the signature "W. L. Mackenzie King"'. I point out for the record the fact that the letter establishes that immediately after January 7, which was the opening day of the parliamentary session for that year, there was an interview between Mr. Woodsworth, Mr. Heaps and the Prime Minister, that they discussed the subjects mentioned in this letter, and that the Prime Minister intimated to them that old age pension legislation would be introduced at that session.

Mr. GRAYDON: What date was that?

Mr. KNOWLES: January 28, 1926, is the date of the Prime Minister's letter. It was in reply to a letter Mr. Woodsworth and Mr. Heaps had sent on January 7 of that year. Reference is made to an interview between those two dates.

Mr. GOLDING: Are you going to table that?

[Mr. Knowles.]

Mr. KNOWLES: It goes back to the C.C.F. national office.

Mr. JOHNSTON (Bow River): It seems to me that every year this question of old age pensions is brought up and discussed by a number of members. On only one or two occasions have I heard, either in this chamber or in committees, anyone objecting to increasing old age pensions. I cannot say it is unanimous, but I can say that almost all agree that old age pensions should be increased, because there are only very, very few—not more than one or two, I should imagine—who are opposed to such increase.

I say that because I am sure that if to-day the minister were to bring in legislation to increase pensions for the aged, and to lower the age at which pensions might be received, or to widen, within reasonable limits, the scope of those eligible to receive them, he would receive the support of almost every member of the house. There would be no difficulty whatsoever. Therefore I am amazed that the minister neglects to do so, because this is a most serious question, especially for those who are concerned.

It should not be considered that we give old age pensions as charity; rather they should be given as of right. And when we think of pensions in that way we must also realize that these old people are deserving. Back through the ages, since Canada's inception, it was they who built up the country. Surely anyone who came here in the old days, who established a homestead, cultivated the soil, and cut down the trees to build up a great section of an empire, should not be denied a decent standard of living.

If it is a question of finance, of course that is a different matter, and one which we should be discussing. I venture to say, however, that the Minister of Finance would not offer that as a reason. Surely we have reached the time, after having spent so many billions of dollars for war, when there can be no further question about raising money to increase old age pensions, especially to that level where it is possible for the pensioners to keep body and soul together.

Some may say that the pensioners are getting along all right now. I heard one or two hon. members say that, but it is not so. On the amount of pension the old age pensioners are getting to-day—$20 a month, until the other $5 was added, making a present total of $25—what standard of living can they have? I venture to say the minister himself could not get along very far on $25 a month. If he had to maintain a home, or a room, buy his clothes and feed himself on $25 a month he would become very thin; I am sure of that. When we talk of applying the means test—

Mr. MITCHELL: That is cheap.

Mr. JOHNSTON (Bow River): There is nothing cheap about it at all. Do you mean to say it is cheaper for the Minister of Finance to live on $25 a month than it would be for an old age pensioner?

Mr. MITCHELL: That was not the expression.

Mr. JOHNSTON (Bow River): It might be a good thing for you and me to try it.

Mr. MITCHELL: That is not what you said.

Mr. JOHNSTON (Bow River): It is exactly what I said.

The CHAIRMAN: Hon. members who are discussing old age pensions should keep to the subject under discussion.

Mr. JOHNSTON (Bow River): Absolutely. That is exactly what I am doing.

An hon. MEMBER: And no more personal remarks.

Mr. JOHNSTON (Bow River): I do not think anyone on the other side is entitled to tell me what I should say and what I should not say.

An hon. MEMBER: Keep your advice to yourself.

Mr. JOHNSTON (Bow River): Keep your advice to yourself and you will be doing all right. I did not intend any remarks I made as being personal, and I do not think the minister took them as such—I hope not. What I wished to impress upon members of the committee, and particularly upon the minister, is that the $25 which pensioners are now receiving is not sufficient. There should be no question nowadays, when we are raising such tremendous sums for war purposes—and that is necessary—of raising a little more to make the lives of these old people a little more pleasant. It must be remembered that not only have they made this country a great part of the empire, but they have also protected it. In a great many cases these old people have sons who served in the last war or in this war. When one considers that they have assumed their share of the responsibilities of protecting this country, that should be sufficient grounds for increasing the amount of the old age pension.

I remember last year when I was on the social security committee this question came up. The session was just about to conclude, and we had to rush through the last few days in order to get our recommendations with regard to old age pensions to the house before it closed. We had to hold extra sittings to do that. There were two main recommendations brought in by the social security committee. One was that there should be an increase in the amount of the old age pension. The government took action and the amount was increased from $240 to $300. I have not checked up the figures exactly, but I think that increase came after the recommendation of the committee. However, I am not sure about that. The reason why the committee did not set the amount is obvious. Most of us thought the government would be more generous than they were and would allow more than a mere increase of $5 a month. Personally I do not think a $5 increase was sufficient; I do not consider a pension of $25 sufficient.

The hon. member for Davenport referred to the resolution which was passed in the Alberta legislature recommending a pension of $50 a month to be paid at the age of sixty years. There was a suggestion that that was done for political purposes, but I would remind him that Alberta is one of the provinces which have taken the lead in increasing old age pensions and trying to make living conditions of the older people a little better. That has been its attitude since 1935 when it was first elected. It did not wait to have this matter brought up as political propaganda. I would not even suggest that the minister brought down the orders in council referring to old age pensions for political purposes, although the Saskatchewan election may not be very far off. I know that was not the purpose at all in regard to Alberta. That would be too small a thing to do, to trifle with the incomes of these older people for such purposes as that.

Another aspect of this matter which was referred to in the statement made by the minister is the contributory scheme of old age pension. I want to say at once that I am against a contributory form of old age pension; I think it should be non-contributory. It should be given to these people as a right, not as a charity. As is suggested, they have given their lives to this country and when you have done that you cannot do more. I think it is wrong to talk about contributory old age pensions. There are many angles that could be discussed in regard to contributory or non-contributory old age pensions, but no doubt that subject will come up in the social security committee when we finish dealing with the health insurance bill. In view of the legislative programme before us and the rate of progress we have made lately, it is not likely that we shall get through with these matters this session. I have no great hope that the question of old age pensions will be settled this summer, and that is why I am somewhat concerned. When the minister brought down these orders in council he should have brought them down in a form which would have provided better conditions for these older people.

There are some things in the orders that are worth while, but it must be remembered that the pension is not increased. All that has been done is to increase the amount of income which a pensioner may have from outside sources over and above his allowable pension, and this has been increased to the extent of $60 a year or $5 a month. That does not represent a very substantial increase. It works out to about eighteen per cent, the increase in the cost of living index. I think everyone in the committee will agree that the cost of living has increased more than eighteen per cent. The index is based only on the necessities of life; the general standard of living has increased much more than that. This small increase of $60 a year or $5 a month provided by the order in council will not pay the increased cost of living which these older people have been compelled to pay since the war started. I think the change in the resident qualifications is worth while; that is the sixteen years requirement between the ages of fifty and seventy years. I think it was suggested this afternoon by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre that there should be some change in the period from fifty to seventy years.

The clause in the order in council providing for movement from one province to another is a good one, as is the clause which provides for service on ships or in the fishing industry. I am not going to discuss this matter at great length to-night since I have spoken on it before and I assume it will come up in the social security committee. However, I am very much disappointed that the order in council did not provide for a greater increase. I suppose the minister had in mind that later on there would be other legislation brought down, probably after the report of the social security committee was presented, which would in effect raise the actual amount given to old age pensioners. I am sure we would all agree with that.

Mr. McGEER: Mr. Chairman, I do not wish to review the details of the old age pension system in Canada because they are fairly well known to all members of the committee, but I should like to bring to the attention of the committee a phase of the old age pension system which I think is a peculiar and unique development of the present war. Without referring to it in detail, may I say that one of the warnings given to parliament and to the government by the governor of the Bank of Canada deals with a phase of our post-war adjustment that must be known to every member of this House of Commons who is conversant with the revolutionary development that has taken place in the last four years in Canada's power to produce.

One of the great problems that we are going to face—and it is not peculiar to the factory but applies just as well to the farm—will be to find the means to absorb and consume the enormous quantity of consumer goods that we can produce with comparative ease, and with the employment of a smaller proportion of wagearners than would have been required to produce the same volume of goods before the war. I believe that we should recognize our old age pension system as a potent factor—not by any means the whole solution—by which we can increase consumption and at the same time relieve the pressure of competition among the wagearners producing consumer goods. To some people that may seem a mug's game, as we heard in the banking and commerce committee the other day.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): What does that mean?

Mr. McGEER: If you ever gave any money away and awakened one day to the fact that you were not going to get it back, you would be playing what some people would call a mug's game.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I never heard the expression before.

Mr. McGEER: It is a very old English expression. It is the adoption of that kind of economy where you cast your bread upon the waters without any hope of its ever returning.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I have often done that.

Mr. McGEER: But I am not speaking about any mug's game. I am speaking about a sound, practical innovation in the economic life of the Dominion of Canada. Of course I thoroughly disagree with the continuance of the old age pension administration in the Department of Finance. The Minister of Finance cannot serve two masters. In the very nature of things he wants to keep his expenditures as low as possible; he wants to keep his burden of taxation as light as possible; and when he is called upon to face those responsibilities, who is apt to suffer if he is at one and the same time the representative of the taxpayer and the representative of the old age pensioner? We want a man representing the old age pensioners in Canada who will fight with the Minister of Finance for more for the old age pensioners—and I cannot see the Minister of Finance fighting with himself for the old age pensioner.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): This is a rebellion, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. McGEER: That is one of the privileges we have in the Liberal party.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): You will find out if you go far enough. They do not tolerate rebellion over there.

Mr. McGEER: They have stood me for a long time and I have not changed much in the seven years I have been here.

Mr. ROSS (Souris): But the times are getting rough.

Mr. McGEER: What I am advocating is a change in attitude, and I believe that in the change in attitude that should come with regard to old age pensions will be found something of the fundamental principle that we must employ if we are actually going to win the peace and establish expanding progress and expanding security with growing prosperity. Will anybody in this house or in the Department of Finance or elsewhere say that we in Canada cannot provide our old age pensioners with all the food they need? Is there anybody who can say that we are unable to provide them with all the clothing they need? Is there anybody who will say that we cannot provide them with a house fittingly comfortable for an aged Canadian? We have all these things in abundance. Is there anybody who will say that a man who has come to the age of retirement is not entitled to a radio and some of the comforts of this earth as well as the bare necessities of life?

Mr. BLACKMORE: A picture show, for instance, once in a while?

Mr. McGEER: Yes, and he should not have to borrow money at 9¾ per cent for medical services either. If it is true, then, that we have an abundance of the things that are necessary to sustain life, upon what principle will the men of this parliament support a Department of Finance that demands for our old age pensioners in Canada life on the basis of pauperism? That day must come to an end.

Mr. BLACKMORE: And now is a good time.

Mr. McGEER: The day when we place human values and human considerations above money will be the day when we shall have the peace that our men are fighting and dying for to-night. The whole attitude of finance to the old age pensioners discloses the wholly false attitude of the financial institutions in our whole economy. I know it was very popular a few years ago for men to declare that the granting of any form of old age pension would destroy the character of the individual, would destroy thrift, would break down the morale of our people. Let me refer the committee to one man's attitude with regard to that. I should like to place on the record a few remarks made by the present Prime Minister of Great Britain, in a speech made by Winston Churchill when he was the flaming crusader of Liberalism in Dundee in 1908. He said:

> We are told that our non-contributory scheme of old age pensions, for instance, will be fatal to thrift, and we are warned that the great mass of the working classes will be discouraged thereby from making any effective provision for their old age. But what effective provision have they made against old age in the past? If terror be an incentive to thrift, surely the penalties of the system which we have abandoned ought to have stimulated thrift as much as anything could have been stimulated in this world. The mass of the labouring poor have known that unless they made provision for their old age betimes, they would perish miserably in the workhouse. Yet they have made no provision; and when I am told that the institution of old age pensions will prevent the working classes from making provision for their old age, I say that cannot be, for they have never been able to make such provision. And I believe our scheme, so far from preventing thrift, will encourage it to an extent never before known. It is a great mistake to suppose that thrift is caused only by fear. It springs from hope as well as from fear, and where there is no hope be sure there will be no thrift.

Those men who in their own strength can go and take care of themselves, who believe in the ruthless philosophy of "root hog or die" and never had a bit of compassion in their souls, could have taken a lesson long ago in the Canadian parliament from the words of Winston Churchill, uttered in 1908. And when he became chancellor of the British exchequer in 1925 he rationalized and improved the old age pension system to a great degree.

The man who believes that the old age pensioner is a liability to the state and the taxpayer is unsound in his economic philosophy. If you give to the old age pensioners of Canada means of living upon a decent standard whom do they employ? They employ the farmer who produces the food, who has had surpluses in the past and, when the war markets go, will have surpluses again. Yes, our fruit will be rotting on the field and all the things which the farmer produces will be begging for consumers within a very short period of time after this war is over. Are we then going to stand forth and say that in the midst of this abundance there shall be starvation and misery again? Let us change our hearts and look upon this principle, not through the eyes of the money-changer and the money-lender, but through the eyes of common sense, guided by the plainest and simplest of humanitarian motives, and we shall be ashamed to stand up and admit to the condition of the old age pensioner imposed by a federal law.

Now, Churchill recognized that, and in 1909 he made another speech, when he had this to say:

> But there is another issue which must not be overlooked. I mean the social issue. We have taken a great step already. I must say that he is a rather sour kind of man who can find nothing to notice in the old age pensions act except its little flaws and petty defects. I think you will feel on the other hand, that the establishment of the pensions system is a marvellous and impressive example of the power which British governments possess. Without a hitch, perfectly smoothly, punctual to the minute, regular as clockwork, nearly six hundred thousand aged persons are being paid their pensions every week. That is a wonderful and beneficent achievement, a good job well worth some risk and sweat to finish. Nearly eight millions of money are being sent circulating through unusual channels, long frozen by poverty, circulating in the homes of the poor, flowing through the little shops which cater to their needs, cementing again family unions which harsh fate was tearing asunder, uniting the wife to the husband, and the parent to the children. No; in spite of socialistic sneer and Tory jeer and glorious beer, and all the rest of it, I say it is a noble and inspiring event, for which this parliament will be justly honoured by generations unborn.

Look at the England of to-day; look at what she has stood to, and ask yourself if the inauguration of the old age pension system and its steady improvement have ever undermined the character, the thrift or the courage of the English-speaking race. It has been a help and a power in building a stronger and a better nation.

I appeal to the minister to play true to the principles of Liberalism that were declared in 1926 and again in 1927. It is true that the first Old Age Pensions Act was passed in 1926. It is true that there were a great many people all across the Dominion of Canada advocating the establishment of the old age pension system. It is true that some correspondence passed between certain members in the independent ranks and the Prime Minister. And this fact remains: the bill which was passed in 1926 was vetoed in the senate.

Mr. KNOWLES: The C.C.F. was not there.

Mr. McGEER: An election was held; a Liberal government with a clear majority was returned to parliament, and one of its first acts was—

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): The Liberals did not have a majority in 1926. They had 116 seats; and there was a bargain made between the Prime Minister and Mr. Woodsworth—

Some hon. MEMBERS: No.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): —and the record is on Hansard.

Mr. SLAGHT: Why did you oppose it?

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I did not oppose it. We supported old age pensions. The hon. member for Parry Sound may laugh. He was not here and does not know the history of the deal. We did not oppose it. Hon. members over here supported it.

Mr. McGEER: The hon. member for York-Sunbury is entirely wrong.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I am not wrong.

Mr. McGEER: I said that in 1926 when the first bill was passed, there were letters passed between independent members and the Prime Minister. I then said that an election was held.

Mr. NEILL: In 1926.

Mr. McGEER: In 1926. The present Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King), in the assembly of 1926, was defeated on the floor of the house, went to the country as leader of the opposition, and was returned with a clear majority in the house.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): No.

Mr. MacNICOL: The hon. member is entirely wrong. He came back with 116 seats.

Mr. KNOWLES: It is stated right here in the Parliamentary Guide as 116 seats.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): The hon. member for Vancouver-Burrard was not here.

Mr. ROSS (Souris): His party had to start dealing.

Mr. KNOWLES: Look at page 353 of this year's Parliamentary Guide.

Mr. McGEER: In any event it was not in that election and it was not in 1927 that the letters passed; the letters passed in 1926 before the election.

Mr. KNOWLES: That is when they got it started. The Prime Minister did not dare go back on it after that.

Mr. McGEER: In 1927 the government, with a clear majority which it held until 1930, passed the act as a Liberal measure, without support from anybody.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): They had the majority as the result of a bargain. They had 116 Liberal seats; the Parliamentary Guide shows it. The memory of the hon. member is bad and his history is worse.

Mr. McGEER: All right; the record is there. I have not got it but I will get it.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Well, get it.

The CHAIRMAN: Order. If I ask hon. members to keep order it is not for the sake of the chairman; it is for the sake of the reporter, and for a certain amount of decorum. I would ask hon. members to primarily address the Chair.

Mr. McGEER: What I want to bring particularly to the attention of the minister is the Liberal policy on old age pensions as declared by the Prime Minister in 1931. He laid down these principles for the guidance of Liberalism, and I have never known our leader to change his attitude in that regard:

> The Liberal administration fought for many years for an old age pensions act, and care I think was taken to make it clear that an amendment to the British North America Act would be required before this federal government would have power to administer an old age pension scheme. It was recognized that an amendment to the British North America Act would take some time, and for that reason the government of the day adopted the method of agreeing to give those grants in aid to the provinces on condition that they would carry out a scheme framed by the federal government which would be similar in all the provinces.
> An hon. Member: A vicious principle.
> Mr. Mackenzie King: The principle, from a financial point of view, was unsound. I am quite prepared to concede that. But I will go a step further and say that, in my opinion, this parliament ought to remedy the unsoundness of the principle, not by discontinuing to vote money for old age pensions, but by assuming the entire obligation, one hundred per cent. This government should take over the whole scheme and itself pay out the money. That is the position that should be taken; that is the proper way to remedy what there is of unsoundness in the principle. . . .
> Obviously the principle is thoroughly sound. I have always taken that position and have fought strenuously for it; and to get that principle recognized by parliament, I was prepared to go so far as to support a grant in aid, which I am perfectly frank to admit was, from the point of view of financing, an unsound method. Now I say, let us recognize that the principle of old age pensions itself is perfectly sound and involves an obligation which the federal parliament should assume. Let us undertake to administer the Old Age Pensions Act from Ottawa and have all the moneys which are necessary for the payment of those pensions voted by this parliament.

Here we have a declaration of principle by the present Prime Minister; we have his government in power; and for some reason there are forces within this government that refuse to follow the declared principles of our leader and refuse to recognize the stand that we as Liberals have taken all down history, of giving to our old age pensioners something that every Canadian can be proud of.

I plead with the Minister of Finance—and this may be the last session of this parliament before the reconstruction period arrives: Let us leave upon the records a national old age pension system which will treat our old age people in Canada, in need, as economic units of consuming value. Let us treat them as people who are retiring from the competition of employment, and let us out of that great richness which we own in Canada put to the practical test the kind of thing we talk so much about and rarely put into practice.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): That is good.

Mr. McGEER: Yes; it is good.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): It is quite true, too.

Mr. McGEER: One of the sad things about our whole economy is that we who are secure, we who have been gifted with the intelligence and the strength and in some instances the good fortune to establish ourselves in sheltered positions of security, have too little thought for those less fortunate than ourselves. When in that other place the old age pension was vetoed I often thought it strange as coming from such an assembly, secure with a salary for life, comfortably ensconced, with transportation provided, that they should look upon the aged of the land as entitled to get but a mere $20 a month after reaching the age of seventy, when all good Christians are supposed to be dead, while in that place, in all its security, that proposal was vetoed, depriving the Canadian in need, over seventy years of age, of a mere pittance of $20 a month. And on what grounds? On the very grounds which our present Minister of Finance offered in the last session of this parliament. It would cost too much. It should be contributory. It would destroy the thrift and character of the Canadian people. And yet, mark you, the people of this country are not going to forget that we were rich enough to lend to Britain $700,000,000 and to produce and give to this war effort a billion dollars worth of goods, over our own goods and services, and that we stood in this house and defended our chartered banking system putting away in reserves, hidden and otherwise, tens and tens of millions of dollars. Yes, we found in that banking system men pensioned at the age of sixty-five; and if we Liberals think we can find endorsement from the electors of Canada, after giving evidence of being the richest people in the world, when we cannot do better for our old age pensioners than we are doing, then I think we shall find that not only the old age pensioners but a great army of men and women who are awakening to this injustice will let us know that they do not approve our attitude.

I say this as a warning. While I realize that the Liberal party has some defects, I can see no hope over there, and less in the far corner opposite.

Mr. GILLIS: That is where you are wrong. The only people who have the courage of their convictions are right over here.

Mr. McGEER: That is the trouble; they have too much courage. I have seen what happens to people right within your own party, because they do not agree with you—and I know the fate of Mr. Trotsky. I know that if I ever had to contend with that kind of thing and your group came into power I would be one of those fellows who would talk as freely then as I talk now, and I do not know what the end of me would be. I am worried about that. I am afraid I would hit a salt mine or a concentration camp.

Mr. GILLIS: We will do the things you are talking about.

Mr. McGEER: I have a great deal of sympathy for my hon. friends in that regard and I think the majority of men in the Liberal party would do it; and if we had you fellows over here on our side, and a lot of the Tories in the Liberal party out of this party, we would all be able to do it together.

Mr. KNOWLES: Do you not have the majority rule in the Liberal party?

Mr. ADAMSON: What about Tim Buck?

Mr. McGEER: There are some of us—and we do not mind saying so now—who have that feeling, and we expect the Liberal party to be true to Liberalism.

An hon. MEMBER: Whatever that is.

Mr. McGEER: If it is, it will not be trailing behind other countries in the matter of old age pensions and social services; it will be leading them.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Vain hope.

Mr. McGEER: One of the charges made against the countries of the British empire is that we possess too much of this world's wealth and use it too little, and there is no part of the British empire where that charge can be made with greater justification than right here in Canada. One of the reasons why we have failed to give our people the abundance that we are capable of producing is that we have been afraid to put buying power into their hands. Now we are to be told, I suppose, that if we gave the old age pensioners a decent standard of living, that would cause inflation.

Mr. BLACKMORE: I guess so.

Mr. McGEER: Well, that nonsense will not go with the people of Canada any longer. We were told that kind of nonsense back in the days of the depression, in the days of 1936, 1937, 1938, and 1939. The Canadian people will not accept from any government the declaration that we cannot find the money to give our old age pensioners a decent standard of living after the record we have established in finding the billions we have found to carry on a successful war effort, and not out of taxation, not out of borrowing, but out of the printing of Bank of Canada bills, and the creation of new money by allowing our bankers to use pen and ink to write up their own bank deposits. I had hoped after the last session of parliament that there would be some changes in this system, but I wish to say that it is with sincere and deep regret I find our Department of Finance just as much against the old age pensioner to-day as they were when after a long struggle and on the eve of the Ontario election we were able to wrest from the Department of Finance a meagre $5 a month increase with no increase in the total amount for the year.

Mr. FRASER (Peterborough West): They are putting it off now until the eve of the next election.

Mr. McGEER: Those orders in council that have been read and this statement that has been made passing the buck to the provincial governments will not be accepted by the Canadian people either. There is, in addition to that, the indifference to the old age pensioner. It is said that if we provide contributory old age pensions on a decent standard and pensions for those who have never had an opportunity to contribute as voluntary old age pensioners a lot of insurance companies believe that it will cut down the number of insurance policies that will be held by the Canadian people. One of the real obstacles—and the Canadian people have to come to know this—is the organized power of resistance to the establishment of the right kind of social services, the right kind of old age pensions. Why do not we amend our Unemployment Insurance Act and provide in that act that when a man has paid in to it for a certain length of time he will be allowed to retire and move out of competition in the production of consumer goods? All industrial activities that have pension schemes do that. Our banks do it. Why do not we or the government do it? Where is the resistance?

I hope that before this parliament prorogues some steps will be taken to place the old age pensioners of Canada on a much higher plane of living than they are now placed and that the age limit will be reduced from seventy to sixty-five for men and from seventy to sixty for women. I ask consideration for this not merely upon humanitarian grounds but also upon the sound basis that it is one place where we can safely put consumer buying into circulation without fear of inflation and as a means of creating employment for those who have to find employment producing consumer goods and services for others.

Mr. NEILL: I am sorry that I cannot rise to the heights of histrionic ability shown by the last speaker in discussing this matter; I also regret that I have been otherwise engaged and have not my notes on this subject as coherent as they should be; but I wish to touch on two or three points where at least I shall have the advantage of knowing thoroughly the subjects on which I wish to talk, having been actually present on the occasion. I shall also try to treat it in a practical and realistic way.

I have a suggestion to make to the Minister of Finance which I think, if it had been suggested earlier and acted upon, would have saved a great deal of the time of this house which I think we are all trying to do.

Why does he not—it is not too late yet because heaven knows how much longer this debate is going to take—send this subject to the committee appointed for many years past to deal specifically with such matters? This committee is called the industrial and international relations committee. I have been on it ever since I have been here. It has not sat for the last seven years. I am not sure whether it is seven or four years. There are two committees, one of which has not sat for seven years and the other for four. The industrial and international relations committee is set up specially to deal with such subjects. The matter of old age pensions was brought up in that committee long before I was here; in 1912 or 1914, I forget which. It reached the usual report of a partisan committee but it served to start the subject. If I remember rightly it was brought up again in 1919, also when I was not here. They made a little more progress; they showed a little more zeal, so to speak, and the matter was again stalled by bringing in a vague report with the government doing nothing on it. Then I came into the house in 1921 and I began in 1922, which was the first session, to agitate for this matter. We had a committee which discussed it for two years running. At the first year's committee we discussed the question at great length; I think we put in a report to the effect that we discovered or realized that according to the British North America Act it was a provincial responsibility, and that we could only proceed along the lines of helping out, but could not attempt to run things without a change in the act, and we suggested that the provinces should be invited to express their intention as to how far they would go and what assistance they would require. We obtained that information during the recess, and again in the next year, which I think was 1924, we brought in a definite recommendation that the government should bring in an old age pension act. It simmered along and nothing was done. An election was held in 1925. I might take a minute here to explain the difference between the last speaker, the hon. member for Vancouver-Burrard, and the hon. member for York-Sunbury. As often happens when two men are flatly contradicting each other, there is a certain amount of truth on both sides, but misunderstanding.

What happened was this: an election was held in the fall of 1925. The hon. member for York-Sunbury said that the Liberals came back with ninety-one members.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): A hundred and one.

Mr. NEILL: No man can deny me this, because I have the red book Parliamentary Guide before me. I am talking about the election of 1925, not 1926. Here it is in the Canadian Parliamentary Guide. In the election of 1925 the Liberals came back with a total of 101.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Quite right.

Mr. NEILL: The hon. member for York-Sunbury is right. That was not a majority, but the Liberals had a slight majority because there was always a certain number of people who did not want an election and so on. The government went along for a few months. Then, as the hon. member for York-Sunbury said, they made a deal, a quite proper deal, with two or three members to give them support for one term, I think it was, on condition that an old age pension measure be brought down. The Prime Minister of the day adhered to his agreement; we adhered to ours and the bill was brought down.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): They put the gun to his head.

Mr. NEILL: Not at all. We did not use those gross methods. The hon. member for York-Sunbury may be familiar with those methods but not the enlightened people of Comox-Alberni.

I might step aside for a moment and take up a point which I think is not properly understood. The hon. member for Davenport went far afield this afternoon into back history and everything else but he got his dates mixed and his party mixed up.

Mr. MacNICOL: You are away off yourself. My facts and figures were correct.

Mr. NEILL: The hon. gentleman is entitled to maintain that, of course. I am maintaining that he was away off. I did not hear every word that he said. Some of his figures were no doubt correct, but he was wrong in the general statement that he made. This is what took place. If the hon. member—I do not say this in any ill will to him; I am a great admirer of his—will look up Hansard of July 24, 1943, he will find that I put the whole thing on Hansard. He has only to read it to get the correct information. No one contradicted it. The very man I was contradicting was here and had nothing to say about it. I pointed out that the C.C.F party were going through the country and would continue to do so for years, taking the whole credit to their party for having passed the old age pension bill or, if they had not passed it, had been the means of having it passed.

They were not in existence until seven years after it was passed. They had nothing whatever to do with it, because the C.C.F. party did not come into being until 1932 or 1933, and did not run as such until 1935; and the Old Age Pensions Act was passed in 1926, nine years before. Would anyone like to contradict that?

Mr. MacNICOL: May I interrupt the hon. member? I did not say the C.C.F.; I said the representatives of the so-called labour party.

Mr. NEILL: Now the C.C.F., he said.

Mr. MacNICOL: Mr. Heaps was in the C.C.F. later.

Mr. NEILL: He was talking about the ancestors of the C.C.F., and was giving credit to the C.C.F., or—

Mr. MacNICOL: I told the truth about it.

Mr. NEILL: Quite, exactly; how pleased the C.C.F. will be to see that to-morrow. They will be glad to hear from the lips of an old Conservative that it was their party, or its predecessor in office, which put through this great reform.

Mr. MacNICOL: No, no.

Mr. NEILL: As a matter of fact it did not happen that way.

Mr. MacNICOL: May I correct the hon. member; I know he wishes to be right. What I said was that the former member for Winnipeg North and the former member for Winnipeg North Centre moved resolutions—along with the hon. member for Vancouver East—to reduce the age limit in connection with old age pensions, and to increase the amount of them.

Mr. NEILL: Ah, yes; and the hon. member, when he said that, did not say, as he should have said in all fairness, that those resolutions were perfectly well known to be utterly out of order, and were introduced only for the sake of cheap political notoriety, and in order that they could say, "We advocated it." And if the government of the day had offered them $40 they would have raised the ante to $50, and if the government had said $60 they would have said $100.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Mr. Chairman, the man is right. The man is absolutely right.

Mr. NEILL: Which man?

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): You. They were just shadow-boxing.

Mr. NEILL: I stand in the glory of a halo I have long hoped to wear, the approval of the hon. member for York-Sunbury.

Mr. MacNICOL: I do not wish to stand in the halo of that glory. What I said was correct, and I stand by it anywhere and everywhere.

Mr. NEILL: The trouble is that the hon. member's halo is pinching him; that is what hurts him. I hope, by the way, that I am getting time out for this.

Now, getting down to the election—

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): The hon. member—

Mr. NEILL: Am I to be allowed to speak, Mr. Chairman?

The CHAIRMAN: Order.

Mr. NEILL: Perhaps I had better begin again at the beginning.

Mr. MacNICOL: Well.—

Mr. NEILL: Now, give a man a chance. That was the election of 1925. The government made this deal and they introduced the Old Age Pensions Act in 1926. They put it through, and it was an excellent bill. The government by that time had found they could not get the provinces to do anything anyway. The provinces wanted the dominion to do it, and they shilly-shallied, and would not do one thing or another. The government, to its credit, said, "We will do it. There is only one way we can do it, and that is this way: we will pass what the lawyers call an enabling act. It will show that we are willing to give fifty per cent of a certain sum. Here is a draft bill. If you—Ontario, Manitoba and all the rest of the provinces, or any of them—want the pension, we will pay fifty per cent." But they did not bring it into effect immediately, because it had to pass the provinces. We had to get their consent. I am intensely sorry to have to disagree with my new-found sponsor the hon. member for York-Sunbury. and tell him he was mistaken when he said that his party had endorsed it, because I can remember the Right Hon. Arthur Meighen saying, "There will not be a dollar paid under this act; fraud is written in every line."

That was said about the first bill. That bill was sent to the senate, and the senate killed it. Then the government was defeated on another measure altogether. They went to the country, and the old age pensions proved to be remarkably and unusually popular. The government got into power, largely because of that, perhaps, and they put the same bill through, identically the same bill. Then the senate took the view that the country had pronounced upon it, and let it go through. On that occasion it is only right to say that the Conservative party certainly did not vote against the second passing of the bill. So that the hon. member for Vancouver-Burrard is right when he says that the Liberal party, with a sufficient majority behind them, did not have to make a bargain with anybody. On the other hand, the Conservative party did not oppose it the second time it was passed.

I have to answer the hon. member for York-Sunbury with respect to the election of 1926. He said the Liberals only got 116 members; that is true. But the Conservative party got only ninety-one. But the Liberal party could count upon a number of Progressives—thirteen, I believe, and nine Liberal Progressives, and occasionally they could pull in the U.F.A. from Alberta. The government had sufficient majority to go ahead. The bill went through, and they got the credit for it. The hon. member for Vancouver-Burrard is right when he says that the Liberal party passed it when they did not have to. And the Conservative party can say they did not oppose it the second time it was introduced.

I should like to say a word to the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre, who read a letter this afternoon, to which he appeared to attach great importance, so much importance that the blamed thing has been subject to some form of glorification, and has been framed. I do not know whether it is printed or embossed, but it is no doubt considered as the last word in political strategy. I have no doubt it will be playing an important part in the election in Saskatchewan within the next two weeks.

Mr. KNOWLES: I have it right here.

Mr. NEILL: Is it not framed?

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): It may be a frame-up, for all you know.

Mr. NEILL: I hope they frame all of the Prime Minister's speeches.

Mr. KNOWLES: Every time he says anything definite.

Mr. NEILL: I never heard any man's speech which was worth framing. However, the hon. member quoted a letter from the Prime Minister. It was written in language considered to be confidential, and never intended to be blatted forth. But if you read that letter, you will see that the bulk of it refers to a different matter altogether. It is only when you get to the foot of the letter that there is any reference to old age pensions, and that is a reference to a promise by Mr. Lapointe to Mr. Neill. Yet members of the C.C.F. party are going through the country to-day and saying that I had nothing to do with it, that it was given to the C.C.F., and to them alone. Nevertheless, if you look up that date in Hansard you will find that Mr. Lapointe in answer to a question by Mr. Neill promised old age pensions. That is the letter they are framing. They have framed it, and they are going to show it in Saskatchewan to prove that they and they alone are God's chosen people who passed this bill, or at least obtained the passing of it—and that was six years before their name was ever heard of. They should have waited for another six years, and got another more suitable name. I heard their leader, himself, say that their name was unhappily chosen.

Mr. KNOWLES: You should not worry about that.

Mr. NEILL: I heard him say that, myself. I heard Mr. Woodsworth say at a meeting in Courtenay, before a Rotary club, that he gave me great credit for my action in helping to get the old age pension measure passed. There is plenty of credit for both of us. I gave him due credit, and he gave me due credit. But hon. members to my left now hog it all.

Mr. KNOWLES: No one is taking it. I read the letter, and your name appeared in it.

Mr. MacNICOL: It is not such a credit.

Mr. NEILL: I am quite willing to give credit where credit is due. Does not Scripture say "Agree with thine adversary quickly lest he turn and rend thee."

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Or stab you in the back.

Mr. NEILL: With respect to the committee I was going to say that it recommended a resolution which afterwards became law at a very important and long session. Representatives of all parties were on the committee. Witnesses from far and wide were called. We always asked them two questions: What do you think the age should be? What do you think the minimum amount should be? I remember that a railway man, a very intelligent man, representing one of the railway unions, said, "That does not interest us because we will have to help pay for it; we have our own pension scheme, but I would say to you to go ahead and get it passed; do not quibble about the amount; it would be better to get it passed if you only get $20, because public sentiment will see that it is increased; but get it passed." I thought that was very sound advice. When it came to deciding upon that section of the report which prescribed the amount we were distinctly told, not only by the government of the day but by every representative of the different parties in the house, publicly and privately, that we had not a ghost's chance to get it through if we asked for more than $20. I will take my bible oath that that was the situation.

One gentleman who is now a leading light in the C.C.F. party, who is an organizer, I do not know whether of all Canada or of Alberta only, got up and said, "I propose that it be $40." I said to him, "Mr. So-and-so"—I will not say who it is for the sake of his unborn children—"what do you think is the best thing to do; do you think it is better to hold out for $40 and get turned down, as you know and cannot deny will be the fate of this measure, or to take some lesser amount, say $20, and regard it as a stepping-stone to something higher, as being of some advantage for these old people?" He said, "I would rather ask for $40 and get turned down, for I would get the credit in the country." Even in those days—there were no C.C.F. then; but he had the same desires—he was ready to sell out the interests of the old people for a place of profit, for a chance to advance to power by just one little bit. That is what is going on to-day. That is not carrying out the principles of government; it is just expediency.

Mr. KNOWLES: Is the hon. member referring to any member of this group?

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): He was here long before you were ever heard of.

Mr. NEILL: I was going to say that the government made the offer to the provinces. They said, "Take this and we will pay fifty per cent." Afterward when Lord Bennett was carrying on his campaign he offered to pay 100 per cent, but when he came into power he made it only seventy-five per cent.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): He went half-way. That is all the money we had.

Mr. NEILL: I have no doubt that he did the best he could.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): May I ask a question with respect to Mr. Meighen? The hon. member said that Mr. Meighen based his appeal on fraud. Mr. Meighen based his objection at that time on the known fact that under the constitution we had no right to do it, and he charged the Prime Minister with knowing that and still putting the bill through. It was on that basis that it was considered fraudulent.

Mr. CHURCH: That is right.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): That is the answer.

Mr. NEILL: That may have been his argument.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): That was his argument and that was true in law and in fact.

Mr. NEILL: Then you are on the horns of a dilemma. You have either to say that he wanted to reject a good measure, or that as a lawyer he said it was constitutionally rotten when it was not. It was afterwards passed and became law in the same exact language.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): It was only passed as—

Mr. NEILL: You have to take it one way or the other.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): It was only a grant in aid and it is yet.

Mr. NEILL: The bill was passed and it was a good bill. With one exception there has never been any need to change it. Where the mischief was done was in the regulations.

The government in their wisdom passed the power to make regulations over to the provinces and they passed such regulations which, if it were not unparliamentary, I would say were entirely damnable. If that word is improper, I will say they were utterly unworthy of a Christian country.

But that power was given to the wretched little boards in the provinces. I speak more particularly of the one in my own province. They simply made the law unto themselves. If you told them, "This is wrong; this is not the way the act reads," they simply pointed to the section which gave them the power to make regulations. Having that power to make regulations, they made a new act. If, as I pointed out, you said, "You cannot do that; that is contrary to the law," they said, "No; we have the power to make regulations; we can make any regulations we like." And they did. Some of the fool things they did were laughed out of court.

As I pointed out in this house a few years ago, there were a number of questions, I think about thirty-five, which were asked of applicants for pensions. One question asked was: "Since the old age pension law came into effect"—which was seventeen years before —"have you sold or given away any personal property?" There were some more legal words to the question. An old woman might have had a stove which was worn out and which she had given to her next-door neighbour who was worse off than she. Then the person to whom she sold it, if she sold it, or the person to whom she had given it, if she had given it away, had to be dug up whether he was in heaven or in California and asked to sign a statement as to the consideration that had passed on that occasion and what had been done with the money. It was not a question of bonds or land; it was simply a question of personal property. Finally something like shame struck the British Columbia board and that was changed to five years. They are still asked what they have done with an old saucepan or coal shovel, what they got for it, and they must produce evidence to show it was paid for or, if anything remains unpaid, how much it is. There were a whole lot of rules like that. Probably the government is not responsible for those rules except that it should have taken those people and knocked their heads together.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): This government agreed to those regulations.

Mr. NEILL: It sanctioned them.

Another regulation that I object to is that governing the estimated value of property. That is, they take the assessed value of the property, which in British Columbia is absurdly and ridiculously above the real value. I would cheerfully sell any of my property for the assessed value. I used to point that regulation out to the government and finally got it changed to either the assessed value or the market value, whichever seemed the more equitable. A man might have a hundred or two hundred acres of useless bushland and five per cent of the assessed value of that land would be considered as income.

What did this board do? They said, "We will continue to adhere to the assessed value." I said, "You cannot; the law has been changed; the regulations have been changed; you should take the market value of this property." I offered to take them from the nearest port in my car to show them the wretched land, but they said, "No; we will take the assessed value." I said: "You cannot; you are going against the law." They said, "We have the option to take whichever we like and we find that taking the assessed value is less trouble to us. We assume the assessors are honest and reliable men." They still take the assessed value because it is a little less trouble.

I have known of cases where a woman had 160 acres away back of beyond, away up on the northern edge of Vancouver island. I could not say what it was worth, because it was not worth anything. She might be paying $10 or $12 taxes. She was paying the taxes but getting nothing. But the board said that the property was assessed at, say $1,500 and that five per cent of that would be $75 and they considered that sum as part of the woman's income. They took five per cent of land that was not worth a curse, land upon which the woman had to pay taxes. I advised this particular owner to sell it, but it could not be sold. I said, "I will give you $10 for it, and then they can charge you only on the $10." That is the sort of thing we had to do to get an honest break for some of these people.

I wish to say just a word or two before I pass away from this. I have been slamming the provincial government. The board was rotten, lock, stock and barrel, but the system has been changed. They have now a new board. I think it was the hon. member for Vancouver South who said pensions ought to be run by a welfare department. It is run now by a welfare department in British Columbia; they have a competent man at the head, and it is to his credit that we are now able to get an old age pension out there much more readily. Very often it was a matter of months and months. I know of one man's case when it took exactly nine months, and then the pension was granted in the end. They were writing to a man who got mail only once a month and the final delay was over his position and earnings. They said: "You are a postmaster and no doubt get a princely recompense, so that we want a certificate signed by someone in authority telling us how much you got every year out of this valuable position." The man finally lost his patience—he had nothing else to lose, and so he wrote back, "Do you want a letter from the postmaster general or from the governor general or from the Prime Minister? There is a blue-book on your table, or ought to be, which will show you that I drew every year the sum of $100." That man had to go without the old age pension for months until they got a certificate that he drew only $100 a year. I know of another man whose pension was held up for months because they could not get a translation of his birth certificate. They could have got it in Vancouver for fifty cents. I have done it.

Another man who applied for an old age pension was dying of cancer. The authorities were holding his pension up until finally I told them, "Give this man his pension or he will be dead, and then you will be able to say that you saved the government $20 for a month." This man got his pension the day before he died. They wrote him a letter like this, "We know you are very ill. If you are dead when you get this cheque, it must be sent back at once."

I will give the provincial government credit that the system is much better now. It is run by a man who has some human sympathy, who believes in fair dealing, but still handicapped by fool rules.

There is one question I will take up with the minister. I asked him about it last year when this last $5 was added to the pension, and paid for out of the war appropriation. I asked the minister if the $5 would be stopped when the war ended and the minister replied, "Yes, unless legislative action is taken at that time or in the meantime." I hope the minister will take action now by an amendment to the Old Age Pensions Act so that there will be no doubt that the $5 will be continued after the war, so that these pensioners will not be shivering at the thought that, when the war is over, this last $5 that was added to their pension will be taken away again.

Many proposals have been made by hon. members looking to the future. No doubt a contributory system must be brought in at some time in the future and the age limit reduced, but we are living to-day and we have to deal with these people now. I think the hon. member for Vancouver South in his fine speech might have given the government a little more praise for the action it has taken. There is an old proverb that you should not look a gift horse in the mouth, which means that if a man gives you a present of a horse, do not open its mouth to examine its teeth which tell you the horse's age, because then you might find that he had given you a lemon instead of a horse. The present old age pension is a gift horse. It is an improvement, and I am willing to give the government credit for it. If somebody gives you something, grab it and use it as a stepping-stone to get some further advantage for the people you represent. Do not sneer at it because it is not all that you want and say that it was forced out of the giver. That is not the way to get things. It is the way to choke off at the source anything further of the kind.

I would suggest that the whole question of old age pensions go to a committee. These are local matters which could best be dealt with a committee. The government have a large majority in the house and they would have a majority on the committee. We have dealt with the matter four times already in committee and good came out of every one of those committees. This is not the place to dispute about these small matters. If the minister could see his way to sending the question to the industrial and international relations committee, the whole thing could be threshed out there and amendments suggested, and it would help to popularize the scheme with the people.

Here we are in the midst of a war and I know the large expenditures which the minister is called upon to make. I agree to some extent with the position he takes. I also admit that whenever he proposes to raise the pension, it is not his word alone that goes because he has to get the consent of nine provinces. If he would send the matter to a committee everyone would have an opportunity to be heard; the minister would get a sound basis for future action, post-war, and proposals would be made to deal with the matter equitably in the meantime. It is not just a question of a dollar or two more that irks the old age pensioner. It is the injustice, such as has been done in the cases to which I have referred, and I could go on reciting similar cases for an hour. It is that which kills the spirit of the poor. All question of charity, of course, will be removed in any contributory system, but that cannot be adopted in a moment. I do trust that the minister will accept the suggestion I have made.

Mr. CHURCH: In discussing this vote for old age pensions I shall leave politics out entirely. I was head of the Union of Canadian Municipalities for three years and head of the Ontario Municipal Association for three or four years. I was also a member of the committee on old age pensions, and during the time I sat on the committee I was ashamed of Canada, a so-called Christian country, in its treatment of our aged people or the blind. There is an old saying, "he that hath pity on the poor, lendeth unto the Lord." But for years we could get nothing for our aged people. I was the head of a very large municipality which pioneered in social reform services. The city of Toronto led the dominion in many forms of social legislation and had pension funds for its employees in most departments. We came here on many occasions to interview governments of all kinds and we got very cold and chilly receptions in all forms of aid. The first duty of the government is to look after the health, wealth, happiness and prosperity of its citizens.

This question is not a provincial one. We have the most complicated constitution in the world for the protection of human values in Canada. It is no wonder that juries of all kinds in their reports to the presiding judge have criticized the federal parliament and all governments for years for their utter lack of any Christian charity toward the aged and the poor of this country. It is disgraceful that this debate should have been precipitated in this chamber to-night, with a war on. There has been quarrelling about who did this and who did that, when as a matter of fact not a thing was done until recently for the aged, the blind and the suffering. It was left in the past very largely to the municipalities and private sources. Finally the federal government contributed seventy-five per cent and the provinces twenty-five per cent to the old age pensions. Then on July 24 of last year the maximum pension was raised by this government from $20 to $25 a month, but no cost of living bonus was granted. Where can you get a house for $20 or $25? That will not even buy your food, let alone a room.

We have heard from the British Columbia members to-night, and we are always glad to hear from them. When any question of importance to their province comes up they make, to borrow a phrase from hockey, a ganging attack upon the government. I wish the Ontario members would do the same for their problems.

The Liberals in their platform of 1919 had a scheme for unemployment insurance, sickness and health insurance, but it took them down to a couple of years ago to put such a measure on the statute book. The first day I was in the house in 1922, I had, with a former member for Winnipeg North Centre, a resolution in favour of sickness, unemployment and health insurance, and in addition, old age pensions for the blind and the aged. This whole problem has been left to the municipalities largely, until lately by the government, excepting for pin-money, for it is really nothing more, handed out in the form of grants of $5 and $10 to those who have borne the burden and heat of the day. It has been a disgraceful manner of dealing with a federal problem, which should be an entirely federal responsibility and not a tax on the municipalities and on real estate.

Just think of the way in which some of our citizens have been used. Long ago, at the time of the rebellion of 1885 in the Northwest Territories, troops from Quebec, Ontario and the maritimes, in response to the country's call, marched across lake Superior in the winter when it was thirty or forty degrees below zero. In those days and from then onwards these men of the militia have done much to build up our armed forces. Yet these 1885 veterans, the backbone of the militia, have never received any pension. We would have had no troops in South Africa and our efforts in the first great war and the present war would have fallen short of what they have been, but for the pioneers in the militia and cadet services of those days. Why have these aged men been used in this fashion? They have experienced the same sort of treatment as the schoolteachers who were allowed to starve in the country schoolhouses, receiving no more than three or four hundred dollars a year for their services as compared with the way Canada helped the builders of railways. The militia men got a grant of 200 acres, and that was all. To this day some of the 1885 veterans are in the poorhouse, and there they will continue to be, if we wait for Canada.

We tried to get their case discussed in this chamber, but were unable to persuade a so-called Liberal government of the justice of compensating these pioneers and veterans who served us in the northwest rebellion. My leader here and the hon. member for Kootenay West tried to get the matter discussed, but they never were able to have it dealt with.

As regards the blind, little or nothing has been done for them. They have been mainly dependent on the splendid Association for the Blind, upon the municipalities, private persons, the community clubs, and voluntary social agencies, much as are the poor unemployed people who found themselves out of work through some of the policies which have prevailed in this country.

What has been done about income tax? What encouragement has been given to those who tried to help in maintaining some of their poorer neighbours, or relatives or those who have contributed in large or small measure to charitable organizations? The charges required of them under the War Measures Act, in the form of income tax, are such as should not exist in any Christian country.

I ask that some consideration be given to these questions. Very little has been done for the pioneers. They are allowed $20 or $25 a month, plus a $5 raise by a province here and there. It is just charity, and charity in its worst form. Those who have worked honourably and well until they are sixty-five or seventy years of age should have a better outlook in life than they get now, namely an open door to a house of industry, or even to a gaol, or a poor-house. At times in the past the gaols have been filled with these poor people. I know, because I have been a municipal officer for many years, and have always taken great interest in social problems. Yet the parliament of Canada was able to vote millions of dollars for branch lines and other material purposes, while it could not treat with reasonable generosity builders of character in the schools and the poor old folks. But as for the builders of railways, they were presented with the title deeds of the country.

We have been a long way behind other countries in legislation for social purposes. Let me tell the last two speakers, although I have great respect for them because they usually contribute matters of interest to debates in which they take part, that on this question they cannot afford to adopt a holier-than-thou attitude. Here we can afford $140 million to support ceilings some of which may collapse overnight, and all the ceiling you have for the poor and the suffering and the sick and the halt and the maimed and the blind is about seven million dollars, while we quarrel about whether we shall pay them $5 out of $30, or four or five dollars out of $25. What a miserable sum for such a purpose! No wonder so much suffering exists in the homes of this country! I remember that the sister of Sir William Mulock, Mrs. Boultbee, who had taken a great deal of interest in homes for infants and other charitable institutions once came and told me, as the mayor of the city, "If you do not give us a larger grant for the infants' home we are going to put the babies on the front steps of the city hall." They did not need to do that, because the city of Toronto provided for them generously.

I greatly regret that these social problems have been made a political football ever since I have been in the house. Let us show some Christian charity among ourselves. Never mind who is entitled to the credit so long as the work is done. The poor are suffering, and I am almost ashamed as I travel over the country and visit the homes of the poor, for whom hardly a dollar is spent, while we provide $140 million to erect castles in the air and ceilings on anything or everything. Charity begins at home. Let us find first a few dollars for old age pensions and pensions for the blind. In letters I receive from the troops in Italy and other places the writers want to know if its true that their parents have been laid off work owing to the age limit, or that they are taxed heavily on what little they have, and they wonder what is going to happen to them in trying to exist on the dollar or dollar and a half a day which is about all they get.

Mr. NOSEWORTHY: I shall not digress into the history of the old age pension movement, nor shall I enter into argument with those who took part in that battle nearly twenty years ago; except to say this, that the people of Canada to-day—that goes not only for the old people but for the younger as well —are not half as much interested in who is to receive credit for what was done twenty years ago as in who is to provide them with pensions that will meet the needs of the present day. That, I think, is the vital question we should discuss here to-night.

Mr. MITCHELL: Why was the framed letter produced this evening?

Mr. KNOWLES: Because somebody referred to the matter this afternoon.

Mr. NOSEWORTHY: I am confident that every old person and every pensioner in this country and thousands of younger sons and daughters of these pensioners would be grateful to the minister for the crumbs which have fallen from the treasury bench's table to them These improvements help, and the people of Canada, the old people in particular, will be grateful for the change which has been made in the residential requirements. But there is still much to be done, and I think the most hopeful part of the minister's speech was the promise that he held out that there was to be something better in the near future. While a person now receives a pension at seventy if he has lived sixteen of the last twenty years in Canada, that still leaves many people with unsolved problems. There is a vast number of people in this country, aged and indigent, who reach seventy years of age and yet will not qualify for a pension even under these more generous terms, and I think we have to face the question of just what we are to do with indigent old people. We are not going to give them a pension and many of them will become a burden upon the municipality or the public, and while I am not going to say where that line should be drawn, nevertheless, sooner or later—I hope sooner rather than later—we shall have to accept the responsibility of publicly providing for the old and indigent. And I think we shall have to do it before they reach seventy years of age. As already pointed out, the time is not far distant when we shall be wise enough to know that it will pay us as a people to provide the aged at sixty-five with an adequate income, that it will be advantageous to us to do that, just as it is advantageous now for us to give gifts to the mother country in time of need. We shall find that the money will come back to us, that our entire economy will profit by the money we expend in providing these old people, not at seventy but at a lower age, with an adequate income.

There are two or three regrets I have to express. I wish the minister would correct me if I am wrong, but do I understand that where an old age pensioner receives, on behalf of a son in the armed forces, dependent's allowance, coupled with assigned pay, both the dependent's allowance and the assigned pay are counted as part of the income in arriving at the pension?

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes; they are both counted.

Mr. NOSEWORTHY: That is one of the things I regret. I wish that the minister, when he was amending the act, had taken that into consideration. That assigned pay is the soldier's money, and if he chooses to send it to his father or his aged mother, the government has no right whatever to save on its pensions by adding that to the pensioner's income. I do not think the minister himself; I do not think any cabinet minister; I do not think any member in this house would stand on a public platform anywhere in this country and defend that principle. I am confident that if that question were placed before this house at any time, not even cabinet ministers would support it. I would urge the minister to take that into consideration and, in arriving at the maximum pension, leave the question of assigned pay out of the picture entirely.

There is another matter I regret. The hon member for Winnipeg North Centre called attention to a clause in the act which seemed to provide that the home in which a pensioner lived should not be considered in arriving at the amount of his income. I have argued this with the officials many times, and I can find nothing in the act itself which justifies the board in taking as part of his income five per cent of the assessed value of the little home in which the pensioner lives. I can find it in the regulations and it appears to me to be a clear case of regulations, formulated by some board, overriding an act passed by parliament. I am confident that the people of this country, I do not care where you go, are opposed to that practice. They are opposed to having five per cent of the assessed value of the home in which the pensioner lives counted as part of his income against his pension.

On these two points I wish the minister would do something to get rid of this injustice. They are unfair and I do not think they can be justified on any grounds. There are other points in the act upon which I will not touch to-night, but in regard to these matters I appeal to the minister.

There is another point I would bring to the minister's attention. A great many instances have been brought to my notice where old people find it impossible to obtain proof of age. I have been told again and again by the officials that proof of age must be documentary evidence of some kind. I will say this for the officials. I have found them most cooperative and ready to accept almost every form of document which would establish, by way of documentary evidence, the date of birth. But a number of cases have been brought to my attention where the officials recognize that people are entitled to pensions but there is no possibility of getting any document sufficiently old to establish their date of birth. The hon. member for Davenport was good enough to refer to many of the old people born in Newfoundland. I have come across many such cases. No vital statistics were kept there until recently. If I had to establish the date of my birth, by a birth certificate, I could not do so. At the time I was born in Newfoundland no vital statistics were kept. There is no record there. I was fortunate enough to have secured an affidavit from my parents when I came to Canada and I have had to use that as documentary evidence when I required proof of age. There are many people from Newfoundland in Canada who just cannot get documentary proof of age. I have tried, in some instances, to get the old school registers, but they cannot be found. We have tried to get evidence from the churches in which persons' baptisms were recorded, but in many instances the churches are burned; the records have been destroyed. I have a number of deserving cases that just simply cannot get proof of age. I think there should be some latitude left to the board or to some officials whereby affidavits or adequate proof of age could be accepted without insisting on documentary evidence as required at the present time. I make these three suggestions to the minister for his consideration.

Mr. ROSS (Souris): I should like first of all to endorse the remarks and arguments which were so ably set forth this afternoon by my colleague the hon. member for Vancouver South. Without repeating any of the arguments that have been made to-day there are one or two points that bother me to some extent. One of them has just been referred to. It is the case of the old age pensioner with a son serving in the armed services. I think it is most unfair, where it can be proven that the son had been contributing to the assistance particularly of a widowed mother.

I think I have discussed this matter of old age pension in every session since I have been here. In 1940 I set forth the idea that those pensioners should receive at least $30 a month or a dollar a day. The cost of living has risen considerably since that time. I think the index is a hundred and nineteen point something now and food is much higher. The cost of food is up thirty per cent in the index. As has been pointed out, many of those old people have been pioneers in this country. At times they thought they had enough laid up for the eventide of their lives. In many instances, through no fault of their own they have lost it. I think we should do better for those old people who have developed this country. We should make better provision for them in their old age. We might consider raising the amount to at least $30 a month. The age limit might be reduced to sixty-five years in the case of males and to sixty years in the case of females.

To return to the matter of the widowed mother with a son serving in the armed services, I do not have to remind this committee that many of those sons are dying for parliament and our way of living to-day. I do not think we are keeping faith with the mothers of those sons who have sacrificed their lives for our way of life. Surely the first move with respect to social security in this country should be by way of a proper provision for those old people who in the eventide of their life are now in difficult circumstances. That should be our first thought in so far as social security in this land of ours is concerned. We all recognize that we have what could easily be, if it is not now, one of the most prosperous lands in the world. We have many untold and undeveloped natural resources and a sparsely settled country. Surely with all our available resources we can afford to do better for those old people and I think we should rightly do so.

I feel very much concerned about this matter, particularly with respect to those in the armed services. I sincerely trust that the minister will bring down legislation immediately whereby the assigned pay and the old age pension will not be taken into account where dependents' allowance is required.

Before taking my seat I wish to compliment the minister upon the statement he made in this house last month. I think the matter of increasing the income which the pensioner is allowed to earn from $65 to $125 is a step in the right direction, but I do not think it goes far enough. It should be still further increased. I trust that these suggestions, and especially the one about the widowed mother with sons in the armed services, will be dealt with more leniently. It is dealt with now in an altogether too carping a manner.

Mr. MITCHELL: I wish to say a couple of words on this matter. We have witnessed what I might call the Messiah versus the Messiah versus the Messiah this evening where so many different people have taken credit for the original establishment of old age pensions in this country. I think from a political sense the best exposition that I have heard to-day was from the hon. member for Comox-Alberni. I have a definite recollection of following him in the House of Commons in connection with this vitally important social problem. In saying that I do not want to take anything away from my good old friend the late James Woodsworth, with whom I sat in this House of Commons, and Abe Heaps. It might be truthfully said that the fact that the Liberal party in 1919 had this as part of its platform gives some indication of the movement in that direction over a good many years. But what has not been said here this evening and what should be said is the contribution made by the trade unions in this country in connection with the establishment of the old age pension.

Mr. KNOWLES: We are glad to join with you in that.

Mr. MITCHELL: It can be truthfully said that the trade unions as an economic organization—not as a political organization, you understand, because politicians from the very nature of things are very careful sometimes about what they champion—first sponsored in a big way the advocacy of old age pensions in the Dominion of Canada. Because of the observations that have been made here this afternoon and evening I believe it is only fair for me to make that statement. I endeavoured to get from the library here the records of the Trades and Labour Congress of Canada back to 1894 or somewhere around there, but I was not able to get them. I was able to get only back to 1914. I shall read a resolution advocating old age pensions in this dominion at a time before the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre even lived here. Let us go the correct way about this. Might I also say this, that I played some part in the establishment of old age pensions in this country, if I may be forgiven for saying it in a personal way, because I signed the agreement that brought it into existence in the province of Ontario. Strange to say, one of the signers of the agreement was the Hon. Peter Heenan, who was Minister of Labour of the Dominion of Canada at the time; the other signer was the Hon. Howard Ferguson, who was leader of the Conservative party in Ontario; and I went in and witnessed their signatures. Therefore it might be truthfully said that all the forward-looking citizens of this country who believe in social progress have played their part in the establishment of this very necessary social reform. Let us be fair and honest about it.

I have a vivid recollection of the campaign in which I took some part, the election of 1926, I think it was, referred to by the hon. member for Comox-Alberni. I think it was at that time that the Trades and Labour Congress of Canada set in motion another agitation, an educational agitation, for four fundamental things that were necessary. I remember two of them. One was the abolition of section 98 of the criminal code, and the other one was the establishment, after a veto by the senate, of old age pensions. If I remember rightly, I think the third one was the abolition or reform of the senate. Arising out of that educational campaign we got the establishment of old age pensions.

Might I say that if I had my life to live over again—I advocated non-contributory old age pensions—I think I would advocate contributory old age pensions. I believe that pensions should be paid—I speak now as an individual—to the people of this country by right. The only way you can get anything by right is by making some contribution to it. That principle is followed in Great Britain. It has been followed in Sweden and New Zealand, and in any country where they have what might be called a successful old age pension system, it does embody a contributory system.

We hear people talk about non-contributory unemployment insurance and non-contributory this and non-contributory something else. Whether you like it or not, anything and everything that is paid by the state is a charge on the living standards of the people of this dominion or any other nation. History has proven that pride is the backbone of a nation. Let us consider, for example, the nation from which the hon. member for New Westminster comes. There you have thrift and pride, a combination which has made the Scotch people what they are.

In the very nature of things we must take care of these old people, and I take second place to no man in the House of Commons in my understanding of the obligation owed to them by the state. But I hope I shall live to see the day when we shall establish a system of old age pensions which will provide pensions by right to every person—to the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre and to myself, for that matter, and if necessary to the president of the Canadian Pacific Railway company. I do not think there should be any discrimination whatsoever.

Some people are thrifty. It is something like walking down a country lane and seeing different kinds of land. We see the good farmer, the fair farmer, the indifferent or average farmer. Thrift should not stand as a barrier in setting out the obligation of the state toward the old people. It would be my hope that as the days go by we might establish in Canada a system of old age pensions, based upon a contributory principle, the same as unemployment insurance.

I have always felt that there have been three great fears in the lives of working men and women: the fear of destitution in old age, the fear of destitution through sickness, and the fear of destitution through unemployment. I have always felt it is only a question of organization in a big way—in a big way, you understand, rather than by telling people they can have something for nothing—that these fears can be met. There should be organization in a big way, and on a contributory basis, so that a nation could—not in a full measure, perhaps, but at least in a reasonable degree—eliminate those three fears from the lives of its working men and women, its farmers and others engaged in the commercial life of the country.

I have given what I have always considered to be my philosophy of life. It is as old as history itself. And remember this, that any state which started out to kid the people that it was giving something away for nothing, has ended up in the ashcan. It may be that we now have a new formula; I do not know. I sincerely hope, with all my being, that we have. But human nature being what it is, and in the light of history, there is reason for doubt. One could read the history of Carthage, Rome, Greece, the history of other civilizations and nations—

Mr. REID: And Russia.

Mr. MITCHELL: I could say that, too, but not at the present time. They flourished and decayed. That is written indelibly in the history of those nations. The strength and power of the British people is their pride and thrift. That has made them what they are. I hope that some day I shall live to see worked out an organization operating on a contributory basis which will attack these three great fears of our men, women and children.

Mr. ESLING: Mr. Chairman, various phases of the Old Age Pensions Act have been discussed this afternoon and this evening. However, I should like to touch upon just one phase of it, namely that relating to the blind. In doing so, I should first of all like to refer to that able and energetic blind administrator, Colonel Baker, director of the Canadian National Institute for the Blind. That is an institution which has done much more than is realized by the general public. It is to Colonel Baker that this country owes a debt for having made it possible for so many blind persons to maintain themselves.

Then, in the Department of Pensions and National Health is Doctor Burke, who has made a special study of the case for the blind. He has gone into the matter thoroughly, and looks forward to the day when there may be a further step which will improve the condition of the blind, and also relieve them by a system of treatments which should be put into effect in every province. Had such been done in late years, it is altogether probable that many who are now receiving pensions at the reduced age of forty, many who are to-day shut out from the world, would be relieved of that disability.

It is known that in 1942 there were 12,350 blind persons in Canada. Of that number some 6,350 are now pensioned, not only by reason of the age limit of seventy, but by reason of the reduced age of forty. There are also about 2,300 who are not blind, according to the interpretation of that status, as it is defined in the act, but who are suffering, and who would never have reached that state of disability had there been proper treatment. In many instances their condition is the result of disease, or malnutrition, or of accidents.

In this day and age when we look forward to travelling along a trail of sunshine and security the first essential is health. When we do not have the best of health and the best of treatment we may look forward to further cases of blindness, calling for pensions. It is strange to note how the cases are apportioned among the provinces. Although Ontario has a population which is 400,000 greater than that of Quebec, yet we find that Quebec has about 2,100 cases of blindness, and that about 900 are deserving and desirous of treatment. There are about 2,100 cases in the dominion who are awaiting the eligible age of forty years before they can be pensioned.

The point I would emphasize to-night is the necessity for treatment of the blind. Then, too, I hope the minister may see his way clear in the near future to bring in a measure which will put under one act legislation affecting the blind. I would suggest, too, that the age limit for the blind should be brought down to twenty-one years. Surely the life of a young man is just as valuable at the age of twenty-one years. He has more to look forward to at that age than the man who is blind at the age of forty years. The main purpose of all this social legislation is to create self-maintenance, self-support and independence. We are indebted to Colonel Baker for having made it possible for so many blind persons to be able to maintain themselves. I urge upon the government the providing of treatment in order to prevent so many people from being shut out from the world as the blind are. I ask the minister to give thought to this suggestion.

Mr. GRAYDON: Mr. Chairman, I have not been one who has been favourable to rising by way of repetition of other people's arguments, and I have no desire to do so to-night. I join with many of those who have spoken. There was an air of unanimity in the committee, to ask and demand that the older people of Canada shall have a square deal. I want to say to the government and to those in the committee that it seems to be easy for promises to be made and for bidding sometimes to take place with respect to the older people in our land. I may say that what the older people are interested in are not promises, what the older people are interested in is action which will bring them the conditions to which they are entitled under the present situation.

I want to say to the committee, and I state it very seriously, that I believe in the days to come the course outlined by the hon. member for Vancouver South must be followed by the Canadian people in a way in which it has never been followed before. That is, human values must definitely replace material values in a way that we in this nation have never known before. That is one of the things which the new era, the new world, the new order, will call for, will demand and must get if it is to be successful.

I would say this one thing with respect to old age pensions. This party does not take a back seat to any party in the House of Commons in its desire—perhaps this is more important—and in the years to come in its capacity to do something for those of our older people in Canada. As I listened to the hon. member for Kootenay West I could not help thinking of the excellent address that was made last night to the empire parliamentary association group in Ottawa by Mr. George Tomlinson, undersecretary to the minister of labour of Great Britain. He indicated the work that was being done there in rehabilitation in connection with those who have lost their sight. He pointed out that in certain industries in Britain those who are unable to see have mastered certain jobs which could not be mastered in the same way by those who have their sight. This was of vast interest to those who listened to him. I think we were all much cheered with the thought that there were jobs and trades being created for our people who are thus afflicted.

I rose to-night more particularly to say to the minister that there is one thing that perhaps ought to be stressed at this time. I have had cases, and I imagine hon. members have had cases, where old age pensions have been reduced, sometimes taken away entirely, because assigned pay or dependents' allowance had been received by a mother of a boy who is overseas. I want to make this very earnest plea to the minister and I think it is one that he will at once see should be given consideration. Where there is assigned pay or where there is a dependents' allowance I do not think this country can afford—I put it as seriously as that—to ignore the situation where those people are being so treated with respect to the reduction in old age pension, or in some instances are experiencing its loss altogether. It certainly is not fair and it certainly is not understood by those who are thus involved. From the cases I have come across I have reached the conclusion that we must do away with the regulation which calls for that.

Curiously enough, just a short time ago I received definite information and evidence of one particular case concerning two old people. The old gentleman was receiving an old age pension. His wife is living and his son is overseas. Assigned pay and dependents' allowance were paid into that home. First of all, his pension was taken away and then on May 12 last it was restored to the extent that instead of receiving $25 he now receives $12.83. I do not want to be unduly critical of the minister, and I do not rise in any sense of narrow criticism, but I think this country and this government will at once recognize that that is not the way to increase confidence in those fine old citizens of our country whose sons are overseas fighting for the security which we enjoy.

I for one do not think—and I believe I speak on behalf of the committee generally—that we can afford to allow that state of affairs to continue in this dominion. It may seem a small item to some people; it may seem a very insignificant thing, but when one realizes that this is the one and only source of revenue and income that some people have, it becomes a matter of major importance to them. I want to make the plea to the minister sincerely to-night that something be done with respect to the situation which I have just described. I realize that there has been some change made, but evidently the situation still needs attention of the character I have indicated.

Mr. GILLIS: Mr. Chairman, I appreciate that the minister wants to get his estimates through, but I have a few observations I should like to make. I have sat here for some time and had someone else expressed what I had in mind, I would not be on my feet at this moment. I wish to request the minister to pay serious attention to the remarks to-night of the hon. member for Vancouver-Burrard. Increasing the old age pension and the pension to the blind would not be a waste of money. There is a great consuming market in these people. There are 188,488 people receiving pensions, and there are a great number who do not receive them, particularly blind persons, because the blind pension is not paid until forty years of age. I think that is a crime. If you doubled the old age pension all the money would be spent within Canada. It would stimulate the markets across Canada and help in building up this country. I am not going to go into that in any detail because it is elementary social economics.

Mr. ILSLEY: But a post-war argument.

Mr. GILLIS: That is so, and it is post-war that I am thinking of. I realize that after the close of this session we may have an election, and we do not know who will be in power next. In listening to the debate in the house to-night, I have wondered who is the government of this country. Conservative members, whose party has been in power many times in the last seventy-six years, claim that on every occasion that their party has been in power the old age pension has been very close to their hearts The same is said by the Liberal members, who claim credit for establishing what? We have not established old age pensions in Canada yet. What makes me wonder who is running this country and who has been running it in the past is that the members of the House of Commons, we who are sent here to legislate for this country and are desirous of seeing old age pensions established, and the aged and the blind get everything that is coming to them, have not brought this thing to pass. What has stopped them from doing it? All that is required is to bring down the necessary legislation and it would go through the house unanimously.

I am sorry for the Minister of Finance, for whose honesty I have a great deal of respect. I am led to believe, after listening to the discussion here to-night, that whoever sits behind the scenes and runs the treasury board is running this country. Otherwise we would give effect to the things we talk about wanting. That is what strikes me as I sit here. If I belonged to a party in this house that had been in power in this country in the last twenty or thirty or forty years I certainly would not want to rise in this house and say that I still owed allegiance to that party and supported its principles if it had neglected the opportunity of passing the legislation when it was within its power to do so. That would be an admission that, while in office, it had not taken advantage of its privilege to enact the necessary legislation which it said it wanted.

I was glad to hear the Minister of Labour mention the struggle which had been made by the labour unions across Canada during the past forty years to get the old age pension enacted. Yes, they have struggled, and struggled hard. They have passed resolutions at their conventions, provincial, national and local, but they had no power to legislate. I can remember back to the year 1910, when I sat in a very small provincial organization in Nova Scotia which passed resolutions favouring old age pensions. They have been trying all along to get the government to do something about it.

What struck me to-night in the analysis given by the Minister of Labour of contributory and non-contributory old age pension schemes is this, that there is no such thing as a non-contributory old age pension scheme. You do not get anything without contributing toward it. I have said that for the last twenty years, when many people were discussing a non-contributory system. Our aged people have made their contribution. They have gone into industry or worked on the farms or in business; they have raised their families and given their children of three generations to war; they have helped to build this nation. Now they are at the end of the trail when they are no longer productive, and they are relegated to the scrap-heap. I have in mind the heavy industries of this country. I should like some members of the house to go into the coal mines of Nova Scotia at five o'clock in the morning and watch the old men, seventy years of age and older, with a can on their backs, hobbling along with a cane perhaps, crippled, but obliged to work because they have no other means of livelihood. They have given everything they had to that industry and there is nothing for them at the end of the trail. They have made their contribution already. That is why I say there is no such thing as a non-contributory system.

The minister stated that New Zealand and other countries had a contributory scheme. That is true. But he failed to point out the different methods used in those countries to finance their social security scheme. New Zealand has an over-all social security plan, covering old age pensions, medicine and all the rest of it—all these schemes that we are considering separately. Theirs is the only way to do it. New Zealand has a five per cent tax against all income in New Zealand, and the proceeds from that tax go into their over-all social security fund, which provides for old age pensions as well as other things. Everyone contributes to it. If your income is small, you make your contribution; if your income is larger, you make a greater contribution. It is a direct tax on the pay envelope of the individual. Everyone pays into that social security fund on the basis of his ability to pay. That is the difference in New Zealand.

Mr. ILSLEY: They have a flat tax as well?

Mr. GILLIS: A five per cent tax against all income.

Mr. ILSLEY: It is called a progressive tax, and in addition they have a flat tax of a pound a year.

Mr. GILLIS: No. Any deficit in their social security fund at the end of the year is made up out of consolidated revenue.

Mr. ILSLEY: My hon. friend is very positive, but often he is wrong. I am sorry to say that, but it is a fact. Is it not true that in New Zealand, in addition to the five per cent tax, which goes down to even the smallest incomes, there is a flat tax of a pound a year?

Mr. GILLIS: No.

Mr. ILSLEY: I do not believe my hon. friend knows. I have been told that there is.

Mr. GILLIS: Unless they have made changes quite recently, the tax is a five per cent tax for all social security purposes, and it is applied to all incomes.

Mrs. CASSELMAN: Is there not a registration tax on every man over sixteen years of age of one pound a year, and something less on every woman, in addition to the five per cent tax?

Mr. GILLIS: No.

Mrs. CASSELMAN: Yes, I think I am right in that.

Mr. GILLIS: I am not going to argue with the hon. member. The tax I mentioned is the tax that has been in effect in New Zealand up until six months ago. It may have been changed recently. That is the only way in which to deal with the matter. If you are going to finance separately all the social security plans that are being discussed in Canada now, $12 a year for medical services, so much for unemployment insurance, and so on, and load all those charges back against the pay envelope of the individual, or apply it as a tax by municipalities upon property, it will never work. No one can make it work. The only way in which to work it is the way they have in New Zealand.

I agree with the minister that we shall have to understand what is contributory and what is not. But I maintain that there is no such thing as a non-contributory scheme. We have to pay for it out of the wealth that is produced in this country. Personally I would not want to take any credit for the old age pension scheme that we have in effect to-day. We have established the principle; that is about all; and as someone pointed out here to-night, it really is a paupers' allowance, because the thing which any applicant for the old age pension to-day has to prove is that he is a pauper, that he does not own anything. Take, for example, the sad experience of certain families of veterans of the last war. The men carry an insurance policy of a thousand dollars. They pass away. They are no sooner dead than someone from the old age pension board and the other bodies which handed them out pittances comes in to inquire if there was any insurance. "Yes; there was a thousand dollars insurance." "All right, you cannot get anything from any source, be it a mother's allowance or anything else, until you have spent that thousand dollars insurance and have rendered an itemized account of it to the different boards from which you expect help, so as to make sure that it is all gone and that you have spent it solely for the necessities of life." These things are nothing to brag about. I would be ashamed if I had to admit that I had ever sat on a committee and put my name to that kind of legislation.

Mr. GERSHAW: As regards that thousand dollars, Mr. Chairman, is it not a fact that they figure out how much of an annuity could be purchased at the age of the pensioner, and then calculate, not the principal itself but the amount which would be produced if it were used to buy a government annuity?

Mr. GILLIS: No.

Mr. GERSHAW: I think it is.

Mr. GILLIS: That thousand dollars has to be used up. In the old age pension scheme they watch it a little closer. I am talking now about the application of the old age pension in Nova Scotia.

Mr. GERSHAW: We have a better scheme in Alberta.

Mr. HANSELL: Hear, hear.

Mr. GILLIS: I am not going to get into a political argument about Alberta. I know you have. I might go farther and say that it is not a Liberal or a Tory government in Alberta.

Mr. ROSS (Souris): Nor a C.C.F. government.

Mr. GILLIS: That is true. I know old people who dragged out their lives in the coal mines, retired at seventy, applied for the old age pension, and when a check-up was made, it was found that they had a few hundred dollars in the bank to pay the cost of burying them.

Mr. REID: I have always wondered why the province from which the hon. member for Cape Breton South comes has always paid the lowest old age pension of the provinces. As you know, it started at $20; some pay $30; but in Nova Scotia I believe the average is around $11; and I never could understand how a person could live on that, and why the province has not increased it.

Mr. GILLIS: You cannot live on it, and the only answer I can give is that up to 1925 we had about forty-six years of Liberal government in Nova Scotia. There was a break then, when the Tories went in, but the Liberals went back in again.

Mr. REID: That does not apply in British Columbia, because we have a Liberal government there, and the pensioners get $30.

Mr. ILSLEY: The average in Nova Scotia as of March 31 was $18.06, exclusive of the provincial supplement. There is a provincial supplement which is, I believe, $5.

Mr. GILLIS: In checking the thing since the rates were changed and the increase was granted, I have been told that there has been a much stricter administration, and that people actually lost money. That is all they succeeded in doing there with the increase.

There are two things of which I want specifically to complain in the administration of the act. A soldier of the last war who served in a theatre of war and is in receipt of war veteran's allowance is granted that pension because of being incapacitated through service in an actual theatre of war. The pension is granted by the federal government, and is the veteran's pension by right. Two cases have been brought to my attention where a wife, having reached the age of seventy, made application for old age pension, and $12 a month was granted and payment made for about two years. Then someone advised the authorities that the husband was in receipt of a "burnt-out" pension of $30 or $40 a month, whereupon the old age pension of the wife was immediately discontinued, and the war veteran's allowance to the husband was assessed so much a month to pay back what had been paid to the wife by way of old age pension. I think that is a practice which should be discontinued.

The same principle applies in the matter of compensation. A man injured in industry is in receipt of compensation, for which benefit he has paid. Some people are of the opinion that it is a benevolent set-up, that in the case of accident the industrialist pays you because of the injury. One of the first charges against the wage rates of workers in industry is compensation. It is one of the major elements in computing cost of production.

Mr. WARD: But the worker pays only a percentage.

Mr. GILLIS: He pays a big percentage.

Mr. WARD: No; small.

Mr. GILLIS: The fact of the matter is—if you want to argue the matter—that he pays it all. There is nobody who produces except the worker.

Mrs. CASSELMAN: Not in Alberta.

Mr. GILLIS: Just a minute. In a steel plant, in a coal mine, in a factory or a mill, the only person who produces wealth in the industry is the person who actually works. Nobody else produces it; and when you sit in and make an assessment for compensation purposes, if you pay only twenty-five or thirty per cent it is taken out of the actual cost of the operation, and he is the man who pays the shot 100 per cent. But in the event of an injury, and the man receives a small pension to compensate for the partial or permanent disability, there is an arrangement that, in the event of old age pension being paid, it is deductible from what the man receives in compensation pension. We are only kidding people when we tell them that we have establishesd an old age pension system for the aged and infirm when we ramify it through every other piece of legislation we have in operation. Either it is an old age pension or it is not. I believe that the first charge on the wealth of this and any country is for the care of the aged. I believe they should receive that pension when they are sixty years of age. There is no use in giving it to either a man or a woman who is older than that. What can they do with it? They cannot enjoy life; they cannot get around. They cannot do anything with it. When anyone has struggled from the time he or she is twenty years of age until the age of sixty and made a contribution in this country, the statesmen who are running the country should recognize it as an obligation to see that the few remaining years of his or her life are spent in at least a fair degree of comfort, with enough to eat, enough to wear, some little recreation and the opportunity to breathe the fresh air. That is not asking too much; it is a right which should be recognized; no strings should be attached to it, and there should be no quibbling about it.

I have heard no little talk about the building of morale of the men in the armed services. In listening this evening to the hon. member for Vancouver-Burrard and some other speakers, it struck me that if the programme of policy of the Liberal party as laid down in 1919 had been implemented even to the extent of fifty per cent, there would not be these groups in this chamber to-night. The groups represented here are the logical protest against promises made and never fulfilled. Fifty per cent of the programme mapped out in 1919, had it been put into effect, would, I am reasonably sure, have offset the third party movements in this country. But we have passed the time when we can keep on merely promising.

We have to start doing something, and on this point alone I think that at this session of the house something should be done about old age pensions. I think for the moment of the hundreds of boys in fox-holes in Italy and of the thousands who are waiting to-night in England to go on board a barge to cross the channel. They know what they are going into and they stop and look back at Canada and wonder what is happening here. You know that many of the homes these boys come from have as their only income an assignment of pay. In some cases they have an allowance by virtue of that assignment of pay. If something happens to that boy during the process of crossing the channel and going into the land of the enemy, that assignment of pay will stop; that allowance to the family will be discontinued. The result is that that family has a good chance of going back on relief. That is not a good state of mind for that boy to be in when he goes to invade the European continent.

In my opinion, one of the greatest morale builders that could be provided for the services at this time, and for our old people as well, would be a declaration on the part of the federal government that we in this country have enacted an old age pension law that will guarantee to the aged, at the age of sixty or sixty-five, an income of around $40 a month. It is the right of the old people; it is something they are entitled to; and if they have built a little home for themselves, if they have accumulated something in the course of their lifetime, there is no reason why they should be penalized in consequence and have to will that home to the provincial government in order to establish their right to pension. If something were done along the line I have suggested it would establish the morale of the men. I know it would be a relief to me if I were in England to-night, about to cross the channel, to know that we in Canada had taken at least one step in the direction of guaranteeing a measure of security to the people I had left behind.

And remember that the boys who are going to cross the channel come largely from such families. The one thing that I have feared, the one thing that ninety per cent of our people have feared all their lives, is old age. There is no security. You are living ninety per cent of your life preparing yourself to get sufficient to bury you after you leave this earth. That is all. The fear of insecurity is the spectre that has haunted the great majority of the people of this country. I do not know what the minister will do about it. But I am reasonably sure that if he has his way he will do something about it. I fear, however, that someone else is superior to him behind the scenes, and that is why something has not been done long ago.

Sitting here, listening to the discussion, I wonder where the supremacy of parliament is. This is not a war measure that must be passed by order in council. It is something that comes within the purview of the House of Commons, and we are all agreed upon it. Why, therefore, do we not do something about it? What are we waiting for? I could stand here and talk for hours on this subject, but I will not do so. The hon. member for Kootenay West spoke also about the blind pensioners, and they are in a worse position, if anything. There are hundreds of blind people in the country who are receiving no pension. Up to forty years of age you may be stone blind and yet not receive anything. After you pass forty years of age they will make some provision for you. There is a possibility that if there were proper pensions and grants and provisions made to augment the schools throughout the country, hundreds of young people who are in that condition could be made productive, and helped to lead useful lives.

I could tell the committee a story of the administration of blind pensions, but I will not do so now. It is too long. Certainly it leaves much to be desired. The people who are obliged to live either on a war pension or on a compensation pension and who are unfortunate enough to have a blind boy or girl in the house are penalized if they send that boy or girl to school. If the child is in the home the blind pension is paid, or the compensation pension is paid, on behalf of that child; but if that child is sent to Halifax, to a blind school, from any part of Nova Scotia, then immediately he leaves home and becomes an extra responsibility the pension is cut off, because he is no longer living at home. That is crazy, because the fact that the child has gone to a school adds to the obligations on the mother, in the case I have in mind, instead of relieving her. The compensation pension was cut off because he left his home and went into a school in Halifax.

It is little odds and ends such as this that irritate the people. In connection with this matter of compensation, war veterans' allowance, an agreement or understanding arrived at between the federal government and the provincial authorities is, I think, something which, if the Minister of Finance has any authority or power over, he should put his foot on. If a man is burnt out and unemployable in consequence of service in an actual theatre of war, what he receives is his by right, and if his wife is blind she should be entitled to blind pension, without any interference with what has already been granted the soldier by statute. The same applies to compensation. The compensation paid should not militate against the wife in the event of her reaching the age prescribed by the act in making her eligible for old age pension. This is something I feel strongly about, because it is one thing which for many years I have thought over. I have sat down and drafted bills, dozens of them. I have had pilgrimages to the provincial governments. We have tried to make it contributory; we have tried to make applicable to our own industry, we have tried in every way to get around it, but we have met with a rebuff every time. If we established it for one industry we were told we would have to make it contributory for some others; the rural people would make a fuss if it were not applicable to them, and we have not the same access to them by way of contributions, and so forth. For years and years we have been going around in a circle trying to do something about the matter. It is a federal responsibility. Everyone is agreed on that, but the surprising thing is that we do not do something about it.

Mr. ILSLEY: I asked the hon. gentleman if he was sure that the five per cent was the only contribution in New Zealand. I have had the high commissioner's office telephoned to find out about it, and I find that there is five per cent on the earnings at the source on everybody, one pound per annum registration fee on all males over twenty, and on women there is a registration fee of five shillings for women over sixteen and five shillings on youths of ages from sixteen to twenty. One hon. member has handed me the Vancouver Daily Province of Monday, May 29, 1944, in which is reported a speech by the Hon. David Wilson, High Commissioner of New Zealand to Canada. I quote:

> A shilling tax on every pound of income, and a registration fee of one pound per year per person pays for the majority of the benefits of social security in New Zealand, Hon. David Wilson, High Commissioner for New Zealand to Canada, said at the Sunday evening forum at St. John's United Church.

He goes on to make a speech on that. I simply wanted to make that correction because the hon. gentleman is wrong about it, as he is every once in a while. I do not object to that, because I am sometimes wrong myself; but he is so positive he is right when he is wrong.

Mr. GILLIS: You must remember that in New Zealand in financing this war they changed their financial arrangements half a dozen times.

Mrs. CASSELMAN: It was the social security Act of New Zealand of 1938, I feel sure— £1 a year for males over twenty, and somewhat less for males between sixteen and twenty, and for all women.

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes. The hon. gentleman is wrong again. He cannot say it was just since six months ago.

Mr. GILLIS: Have you got what it covers?

Mr. ILSLEY: Social security.

[Mr. Gillis.]

Mr. GILLIS: Complete?

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes.

Mr. GILLIS: Unemployment insurance, medical set-up, hospitalization and all the rest of it?

Mr. ILSLEY: I am quoting from the speech but that is not the point at all. The point is that there is the pound in addition to the five per cent for social security, and I am not going to carry it any farther with the hon. gentleman because once before I did. It was about the R.C.M.P. or something of that sort. I depended on what my hon. friend was saying. I asked him if he was sure about what he was saying because I could not deny it and I found out next day he was wrong about that. I am just asking him to be a little more accurate in these matters of figures in the house.

Mr. GILLIS: I do not remember anything about the R.C.M.P.

Mr. ILSLEY: I can remind my hon. friend of it.

Mr. GILLIS: The minister cannot bring the record in here.

Mr. ILSLEY: I certainly can.

Mr. GILLIS: No; because what I advocated about the R.C.M.P. at that time has been fixed up.

Mr. ILSLEY: My hon. friend was entirely wrong in his figures.

Mr. GILLIS: No; the only time I was wrong in my figures about the R.C.M.P. with the Minister of Justice I rose an hour later and drew it to his attention and told him I was wrong.

Mr. GRAYDON: I do not think the minister or the hon. gentleman are very sure about this thing. I think we had better go on with the business.

Mr. ILSLEY: So do I.

The ACTING CHAIRMAN (Mr. Golding): Shall the item carry?

Mr. KNOWLES: Quite a few questions were put to the minister and I am sure we should like to hear from him.

Mr. ILSLEY: If everybody is through—

Mr. HANSELL: Everybody is not through.

Mr. ILSLEY: I thought it was too good to be true.

The ACTING CHAIRMAN (Mr. Golding): The hon. member for Edmonton East has the floor.

Mrs. CASSELMAN: I have tried to get the floor before, Mr. Chairman. I just wish to say I do not want to repeat what has been said to-night; but I think all of us can speak on this question of old age pensions because we have all had them very much at heart and we should like to see an increase in the standard of living of our old people.

The Minister of Labour has expressed vigorously some of the things I should like to have said had there been time. We all recognize, of course, there are administrative difficulties because it comes under provincial and dominion administration. We have overcome some of the difficulties that could be overcome and we shall overcome others. We are all glad to have the minister's statement of a few days ago that all, or substantially all of the provinces that wish to have a decrease in the age will be given consideration. I also wish to join with the hon. member for Kootenay West in his references to pensions for the blind and the splendid work that the Canadian Institute for the blind is doing. That institute and the War Amputations' Association of Canada are helping a great deal at the present time those who are disabled in this war. They meet the cases at Halifax as they come back. They correspond with the relatives of the men who are disabled. They help to bring both to a better frame of mind in order that the adjustments which are necessary may be made when a man is disabled or injured in this war. I was also interested in the statement made by the hon. member for Peel, the leader of the opposition. Last night we both listened to Mr. Tomlinson's speech; I had the privilege of talking to the hon. member for St. Paul's later and he told me that in a Toronto hospital the same kind of treatment was given to the men disabled in somewhat the same way as Mr. Tomlinson spoke of. Those men were being treated similarly and are placed in industry in Toronto and made self-supporting. I think the training is an excellent thing because it teaches them to be self-supporting and independent. The early training is good.

My impression of the Canadian Institute for the Blind which gets a grant from the government and looks after the children sent to the blind schools is that when the children leave the home and are taken in by that institute it pays the bills. I am not exactly sure of that, but that is my impression. I shall look it up. I just wish to speak on these matters and, if there were time, there is a great deal more I should like to say.

Mr. HAZEN: When the minister makes his reply would he put on record the figures of the average old age pensions paid in each of the provinces at the last date he has available. I have the figures here but they are up only to April 12, 1943. Evidently we have later figures, because he referred to the average each year, the average payment in Nova Scotia. If he has the figures, perhaps he could give us the number of persons receiving pensions as well.

Mr. KNOWLES: That data will be found in Hansard of March 23 up to the end of last year.

Mr. ILSLEY: I have a lot of figures. Perhaps I had better look at Hansard to see what the hon. member has asked for and put it on Hansard later on rather than put on something that is not just what the hon. member is seeking.

Mr. KNOWLES: A partial answer to that will be found on Hansard of March 23 of this year at page 1744. There will be found the number of old age and blind pensioners in each province, the average old age and blind pensions in each province as at December 31, 1943. The minister may have later information, but that gives it to that date.

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes; all right.

Item stands.

ALCOHOLIC BEVERAGES

RATIONING OF BEER AND SPIRITS—ONTARIO AND QUEBEC—STATEMENT OF PREMIER DREW

Hon. C. W. G. GIBSON (Minister of National Revenue): Mr. Speaker, I wish to make a statement with reference to an announcement recently made by the premier of Ontario concerning the ration of spirits in that province. Colonel Drew referred to the difference in the amounts authorized by the provinces of Quebec and Ontario, and stated:

There may be some good explanation for this striking contrast in ration, but there can be no doubt of the effect of this situation upon the minds of those who come in contact with it.

Under P.C. 11374, the wartime alcoholic beverages order, the provinces are restricted to receiving each year for sale seventy per cent of the spirits which they received during the year ended October 31, 1942.

Each province receives the same percentage. All are treated alike, and there is therefore no foundation for any suggestion of discrimination.

Although this fact is well known, efforts are constantly being made to create an impression that Quebec is receiving preferential treatment over other provinces, particularly Ontario. The following table gives a comparison of spirit and beer consumption in these two provinces during the year ended October 31, 1943, the first complete year under the restriction order:

	Spirits
	Domestic (proof gallons)	Imported (proof gallons)	Total (proof gallons)
Ontario...	942,640·33	207,178·81	1,149,819·14
Quebec....	959,948·69	203,698·51	1,163,647·20

	Beer Delivered under 90 per cent quota (gallons)
Ontario	36,993,411
Quebec	27,947,571

It will be noted that although Quebec received 13,828 proof gallons of spirits more than Ontario, Ontario consumed over nine million gallons of beer more than Quebec. Expressing it in another way, Quebec received 1·2 per cent more spirits, while Ontario received 32·4 per cent more beer.

One obvious reason for the discrepancy in the ration between provinces lies in the variation in the number of permits issued. I observe from a recent advertisement of the liquor control board of Ontario that in January, 1943, when the permits issued by the province totalled 155,295 the monthly ration was 160 ounces. According to the same source, in March, 1944, the province had issued 1,282,938 permits, and the ration at that time was 26 ounces. I do not know how many permits are outstanding in Ontario at the present time. In one Ontario city a man has recently been prosecuted for having no less than 63 permits. The best answer to Premier Drew's allusions to the relative ration of Ontario and Quebec seems to be made by the chairman of the Ontario liquor commission, who says in the advertisement, "It is a problem in simple arithmetic," and goes on to state that:

The increase in the number of permits and the extent to which permit holders are purchasing spirits each month makes it necessary to reduce the amount which can be purchased by permit holders in Ontario.

Attempts are also being made to becloud the issue by drawing attention to the stocks of spirits which are held in warehouses. As far as the federal government is concerned, there has never been any suggestion that the restriction placed on the consumption of spirits was attributable to a shortage of supply. The Prime Minister made it clear in his speech of December 16, 1942, that the restrictions were being imposed to ensure a total war effort, and the reasons which he advanced at that time are not only valid to-day, but as the hour of our greatest trial approaches they possess added significance.

Mr. GRAYDON: Is the minister prepared to table the correspondence which appears to have passed between the premier of the province of Ontario and the federal government relating to this problem?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: The correspondence was between the premier and myself. I shall be happy to see that it is tabled.

QUESTIONS

(Questions answered orally are indicated by an asterisk.)

BICYCLES

Mr. BLACK (Cumberland):

1. Has the government or the wartime prices and trade board fixed the sale price and number of bicycles sold in Canada?

2. What are the delivered sale prices and number of such bicycles sold each year in each of the following provinces: Ontario, Quebec, New Brunswick, Prince Edward Island and Nova Scotia?

3. Does the manufacturer, dealer, government or purchaser pay the freight?

Mr. ABBOTT:

1. Yes. Under the provisions of wartime prices and trade board order A-694, the administrator of fabricated steel and nonferrous metal has jurisdiction over the production, manufacture, and design of bicycles sold in Canada. Prices have been fixed by the board on the basis of the consumer value of the wartime model.

2. The delivered sale prices and number of such bicycles sold in each of the years 1941 to 1943 inclusive are as follows:

Consumer prices	Men's	Ladies'
Ontario and Quebec	$42 50	$43 50
New Brunswick, Nova Scotia, P.E.I.	45 00	46 00

Number sold	1941	1942	1943
Ontario	38,880	28,205	20,608
Quebec	20,625	15,325	10,593
New Brunswick	3,534	2,413	1,638
Nova Scotia	3,611	2,728	2,005
Prince Edward Is.	640	466	297
Totals	68,290	49,137	35,141

3. The purchaser pays the freight charges in the fixed prices established by order A-463.

LABOUR CONDITIONS—VACATIONS WITH PAY, ETC.

Mr. FACTOR:

1. (a) How many vacations with pay plans were made effective during 1943 by the national war labour board, the regional boards and other bodies having such jurisdiction; (b) how many employers and employees were affected by the plans; (c) what is the estimated cost to industry?

2. What is the estimated amount, in money, that wage earners in Canada have received as a consequence of wage and cost of living bonus decisions by the national and regional war labour boards during 1943?

3. (a) How many investigations were made in 1943 by industrial disputes inquiry commissioners into cases of dismissal for union membership or activity under P.C. 4020; (b) how many dismissed workers were involved; (c) what disposal was made of the cases investigated?

4. How many workers in Canada were members of trade unions at the end of each year since 1939.

5. What was the percentage increase in membership at the end of 1943, as compared with the end of 1939?

6. How many votes to determine the collective bargaining agency have been held in industrial establishments as a result of proceedings under federal labour legislation since January 1, 1940?

7. How did such votes affect the settlement of disputes under the legislation?

Mr. MARTIN:

1. (a) 1,007. (b) 549,863 employees; 1,007 employers. (c) It is not possible to estimate the cost of vacation-with-pay plans. The standard plan allows employee one-half day vacation with pay in any year for every 25 days actually worked during previous year. Under the standard plan an employee may become entitled to not more than six days' vacation with pay.

2. $85,457,640.

3. (a) 32. (b) 179. (c) of 179 employees in 32 cases, 71 were reinstated voluntarily; 21 were reinstated by order of the Minister of Labour; 21 were found dismissed for cause; 36 were found dismissed for economic reasons; 21 left employment of their own accord, and 9 did not wish ot return.

4. Number of workers in Canada who were members of Trade Unions at the end of 1939, 358,967; 1940, 362,223; 1941, 461,681; 1942, 578,380; 1943(a), 660,000(a).

(a) Estimated, because returns for the end of 1943 are not yet complete.

5. The estimated percentage increase in membership at the end of 1943 as compared with the end of 1939 is 84 per cent.

6. 185.

7. Of 185 representation votes 64 were taken by the Department of Labour in connection with disputes involving procedure under the Industrial Disputes Investigation Act and 121 were consent votes taken by the department on request of the parties.

In the 64 cases where votes were held in connection with Industrial Disputes Investigation Act procedure, settlements were obtained in 40 instances; settlements were not obtained in 11 instances; and in 13 cases the persons petitioning for the vote were not supported by the employees concerned and the cases were considered closed.

In the 121 cases involving consent votes, settlements were obtained between the employees and employers based on the result of the vote. In cases of consent votes there is usually little difficulty in arriving at a settlement inasmuch as the parties usually give a prior commitment that they will abide by the result of the vote. In the overwhelming majority of cases settlements followed the vote.

MONTREAL, LIGHT, HEAT AND POWER—INCOME AND EXCESS PROFITS TAX

Mr. STOKES:

Has the taking over of the Montreal Light, Heat & Power Consolidated by the province of Quebec resulted in that company no longer being liable for dominion income and excess profits taxes?

Mr. GIBSON: The expropriation by the provincial government of the corporation's facilities for the generation and distribution of electricity and gas will not alter the status of the corporation as a taxpayer liable to dominion income and excess profits taxes on the income from its remaining assets.

ALTERNATIVE SERVICE WORKERS—RED CROSS CONTRIBUTIONS

Mr. WEIR:

1. What is the arrangement whereby alternative service workers contribute part of their earnings to the Canadian Red Cross society?

2. How much has been paid to the society to April 30, 1944, giving the breakdown by treasury offices?

3. What was the balance unpaid of such moneys on April 30, 1944?

Mr. MARTIN:

1. The arrangement whereby postponed conscientious objectors contribute a part of their earnings to the Canadian Red Cross society is in accordance with order in council P.C. 2821, section 5—

(5) The employment of any person under this section shall be subject to the terms set out in the order pursuant to which the employment was accepted and to the following provisions:

(a) If the employment is in agriculture, the employer shall supply board and lodging for the employee and in addition thereto shall pay in respect of the employment such wages as may be prescribed by the minister:

(b) if the employment is outside agriculture, the employer shall pay in respect thereof wages at the rate, if any, fixed by collective agreement for the place where the work is to be performed, or, if there is no such agreement, at the rate paid by good employers;

(c) If the employment is in agriculture, the employer shall pay to the employee, out of wages payable to him under this subsection, twenty-five dollars per month, unless the wages are less than twenty-five dollars per month, in which event he shall pay him the full amount thereof;

(d) if the employment is outside agriculture, the employer shall supply board and lodging to the employee or pay him an allowance fixed by the minister in lieu thereof and shall in addition pay him.

(i) The amount by which the wages payable in respect of the employee exceed the aggregate of the allowance for board and lodging as fixed by the minister and amounts which he is required by law to pay out of the wages to other persons, if such amount is not in excess of twenty-five dollars; or

(ii) twenty-five dollars per month if the amount, by which the wages payable in respect of the employee exceed the aggregate of the allowance for board and lodging as fixed by the minister and amounts which he is required by law to pay out of the wages to other persons, is in excess of twenty-five dollars; and

(e) the employer shall, each month, pay to the Canadian Red Cross society, or to some person designated by the minister to receive it on behalf of the Canadian Red Cross, the amount by which the wages payable in respect to the employee for that month exceed the aggregate of

(i) the amount payable to the employee under this subsection;

(ii) amounts, if any, which he is required by law to pay to other persons and

(iii) if the employment is outside agriculture, the allowance for board and lodging prescribed by the minister and

(iv) the amounts, if any, which he is authorized or directed by the alternative service officer to pay to any person as an allowance for the maintenance of dependents of the employee or for hospital, dental, or medical services rendered the employee.

A postponed conscientious objector who is directed to employment in agriculture or other essential industry may be required to sign an undertaking or become a party to an agreement between himself and his employer whereby a portion of his earnings is paid to one of the chartered banks of Canada to the credit of the Canadian Red Cross society. The employer pays the going wage rate; the conscientious objector receives twenty-five dollars per month together with board and lodging or the equivalent thereof; the Canadian Red Cross society receives the balance less statutory deductions. Where a postponed conscientious objector has dependents, dependents allowances may be granted and paid to the conscientious objector out of that portion of his earnings accruing to the Canadian Red Cross society.

MONTAUBAN, QUE., ZINC-LEAD MINE

Mr. GAUTHIER:

For a copy of all correspondence, letters and telegrams exchanged between the dominion government and the government of the province of Quebec, or any other person, association or municipal council, concerning the closing of the zinc-lead mine at Montauban, county of Portneuf.

JAPANESE NATIONALS—CREDITS FOR FISHING VESSELS, REHABILITATION, ETC.

Mr. REID:

For a statement showing the total of all sums collected, to the present time, by the security commission and standing to the credit of those of the Japanese race within Canada, showing, (a) sums of money owing or paid from all property, including farms under the Veterans' Land Act; (b) from fishing vessels, and (c) for rehabilitation purposes.

MOBILIZATION ACT—CANADIAN NATIONAL AND CANADIAN PACIFIC RAILWAYS

Mr. POULIOT:

For a copy of all correspondence exchanged between the Canadian National and Canadian Pacific Railways and the Department of Labour, from April 26, 1943, to June 14, 1943, concerning mobilization regulations of the national selective service.

Mr. MARTIN: Return tabled.

JAPANESE NATIONALS—BRITISH COLUMBIA

Mr. REID:

For a copy of the evidence taken by the commission appointed under order in council P.C. 9498 to inquire into the provisions made for the welfare and maintenance of persons of the Japanese race resident in settlements in the province of British Columbia?

Mr. MARTIN: Return tabled.

BARRIEFIELD MILITARY CAMP—BILINGUAL SECTION

Mr. POULIOT:

For a copy of all letters, memoranda and reports, (a) for the establishment, and (b) for the abolition of courses in French at A-21, C.O.C.T.C., Barriefield, since September, 1941.

Mr. MACDONALD (Halifax): On May 8 the member for Témiscouata asked that he might be given leave to amend his motion by substituting the words "a course in French" for the words "the bilingual section". There is no record of the establishment or discontinuance of a course in French at A-21, C.O.C.T.C., Barriefield, since September, 1941, nor can there be found any letters, memoranda or reports relating thereto.

[Mr. Lacombe.]

Motion dropped.

SELECTIVE SERVICE—RAILWAY BROTHERHOODS

Mr. POULIOT:

For a copy of all correspondence exchanged between the railway brotherhoods and the Department of Labour, concerning any amendment to the mobilization regulations of the national selective service.

Mr. MARTIN: Mr. Speaker, there is no correspondence between the railway brotherhoods and the Department of Labour concerning amendments to the mobilization regulations of the national selective service, as requested by the motion.

Motion dropped.

SELECTIVE SERVICE—LEAVE FOR AGRICULTURAL PURPOSES—PTE. FRANÇOIS LAPOINTE

Mr. BERTRAND (Terrebonne):

For a copy of all documents, petitions, letters, telegrams, medical certificates, concerning various applications for leave, for agricultural purposes, made by Private François Lapointe, D-616300.

Mr. MACDONALD (Halifax): Mr. Speaker, documents of the kind asked for by this motion are considered confidential and it is not regarded as being in the public interest that they should be produced.

Motion dropped.

EXCHANGE OF NOTES

CANADA-BRAZIL—CULTURAL AGREEMENT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. GORDON GRAYDON (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, may I ask if the Prime Minister is yet in a position to make public the provisions of the so-called "cultural" agreement relating to the exchange of professors, teachers and students between Canada and Brazil, which is said to have been signed some days ago? I presume the Prime Minister will table the agreement when it is in shape.

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I would say to my hon. friend that the cultural agreement to which he refers was in the form of an exchange of notes between the Canadian Ambassador and the Foreign Minister of Brazil on May 24 last. As soon as the Brazilian note is available I shall be glad to table the exchange. I might say in the meantime that by the exchange of notes the two governments welcome efforts to facilitate the exchange of official scientific and technical publications, books, magazine articles, et cetera, and the presentation of concerts, lectures, radio programmes, films and art exhibits designed to make each country better acquainted with the cultural life of the other. Within its constitutional powers the Canadian government undertakes to encourage intellectual and cultural exchanges of a reciprocal character with Brazil.

Mr. GRAYDON: Is this the beginning of a development whereby provision will be made for a better system of teaching Portuguese in Canada, having in mind the importance which now seems to attach to the learning of that language?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I could not say that it had that design, but I should be pleased if it might have that effect.

PRIME MINISTER FRASER

INQUIRY AS TO INVITATION TO ADDRESS MEMBERS OF BOTH HOUSES OF PARLIAMENT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. GORDON GRAYDON (Leader of the Opposition): I would ask the Prime Minister if the government has extended to the Prime Minister of New Zealand an invitation to address members of both houses of parliament when he honours Canada with a visit in the near future, and if so, whether the invitation has been accepted.

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, when I was in London I renewed the invitation to Mr. Fraser to visit Canada which had been extended to him before he left New Zealand to attend the conference of prime ministers. I also intimated to him that I was sure that both houses of parliament would be pleased if he would address their members when he was in Ottawa. He did not give me a definite assurance as to what he might find it possible to do while here, but I have every reason to believe that he will be happy to accept that invitation, and I hope he may be visiting us shortly; I cannot say how soon.

Mr. POULIOT: Does the hon. member for Peel (Mr. Graydon) expect him also to boost the cooperation between the Prime Minister and the Leader of the Opposition, as the Prime Minister of Australia has done?

WHEAT

PRICES FOR 1944 CROP

On the orders of the day:

Hon. J. A. MacKINNON (Minister of Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, on Friday afternoon last the hon. member for Souris (Mr. Ross) addressed a question to me regarding a press statement. I did not quite follow the question and it was only when I saw Hansard that I noticed that I had been asked if any change in the price of wheat for the 1944 crop is contemplated. I thought the hon. member was referring to an entirely different matter. In reply now to the question I wish to assure the hon. member that no change in the $1.25 initial advance for the 1944 crop has been under consideration here or in Washington or in any Washington discussions. This is wholly a matter between the Canadian government and Canadian producers and is not a matter for international consideration.

Meetings of the international wheat council have been and are still being held in Washington, but these are broad international discussions on the wheat situation affecting the various countries interested, particularly in the post-war period. There is nothing to announce at this time from these discussions, nor is any announcement in the near future likely.

LABOUR CONDITIONS

LAY-OFF AT AIRCRAFT REPAIR LIMITED, EDMONTON—QUESTION OF REEMPLOYMENT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. ROBERT FAIR (Battle River): May I ask the Minister of Labour whether employees of Aircraft Repair Limited, Edmonton, who were recently laid off, have yet been placed by selective service or any other agency, and if not when will such placement take place?

Hon. HUMPHREY MITCHELL (Minister of Labour): My hon. friend was good enough to give me notice of his question. I have not yet been able to secure the full information he desires. Employment selective service officers have special instructions to take care of workers involved in plant lay-offs, but details of the disposition of individual workers are not a matter of record at Ottawa. I have however asked for a complete report as to the disposition of workers involved in the lay-off of the aircraft plant of which he speaks. I expect to have this information in a couple of days, and I shall be glad to give it to him.

FARM PESTS

QUESTION AS TO RELEASE OF AMMUNITION FOR DESTRUCTION OF VERMIN

On the orders of the day:

Mr. G. K. FRASER (Peterborough West): I desire to address a question to the Minister of Munitions and Supply. In view of the fact that there have been serious complaints recently from the different agricultural districts of Ontario and other parts of Canada about the great increase of groundhogs, skunks, and other vermin that destroy farm products, will the government give consideration to releasing sufficient ammunition to farmers so that they may clear their farms of these destructive animals?

Mr. SPEAKER: I think that that question might well be placed on the order paper.

Mr. FRASER (Peterborough West): It is a serious condition right now, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): It is serious at any time.

[Later:]

Mr. GORDON GRAYDON (Leader of the Opposition): With regard to the question raised by the hon. member for Peterborough West, I realize that hon. members who do not come from farming districts may regard matters relating to agriculture as, perhaps, something which—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. GRAYDON: I am laying a foundation for a suggestion.

Mr. HOWE: This is just politics.

Mr. GRAYDON: My hon. friend the Minister of Munitions and Supply always has one answer for everything, and that is "politics". I was about to say that I encounter people from time to time who think that if some matter is raised with respect to the farmers, major importance should not be attached to it. Now I happen to know, as does the hon. member for Peterborough West, that the question the hon. member asked relates to a matter of great urgency, particularly in western Ontario and in the district from which he comes. There have been a great many complaints, and the matter is urgent from the point of view of production. It is, I believe, a question which an hon. member might properly ask the minister to answer, and to which we should have an answer.

Hon. C. D. HOWE (Minister of Munitions and Supply): The distribution of ammunition for farmers is a matter for the wartime prices and trade board. The ammunition industry of this country is operating at full capacity and has been doing so for a very long time, but the ammunition is being used for other purposes than the shooting of small animals in Canada. I am sure that if any ammunition can be released without jeopardizing the war effort it will be released. This is not a matter of immediate urgency; it has been before departments of government for the last eight months at least, and we are doing the best we can to meet the situation.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): There is plenty of ammunition in the hands of the wholesalers of New Brunswick, but they cannot let it out.

PRISONERS OF WAR

REPRESENTATIONS BY GREAT BRITAIN TO RUSSIA RESPECTING PRISONERS OF WAR IN JAPAN

On the orders of the day:

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Secretary of State for External Affairs): On Friday last the hon. member for New Westminster (Mr. Reid) stated that he had seen in a dispatch that the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs of Great Britain had communicated with the Russian government with regard to British prisoners of war in Japan, and he asked if any similar action was being taken by Canada. The question was allowed to stand as a notice.

I might say to him that I notice that Mr. Eden intends to make a further statement to-morrow on that matter. I should prefer to wait until that statement is made before answering the hon. member's question. I will later have a general statement on the position, and more particularly with respect to what Canada has been doing in the matter.

PRIME MINISTER CHURCHILL

SUGGESTED PUBLICATION IN "VOTES AND PROCEEDINGS" OF SPEECH OF MAY 24

On the orders of the day:

Mr. JEAN-FRANÇOIS POULIOT (Témiscouata): May I ask the government if the speech delivered by Mr. Churchill in the House of Commons at Westminster, where he summarized the work done by the conference of dominion prime ministers, will be published in the record?

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): I understand that the question my hon. friend has just asked was answered on Friday by my colleague, the Minister of Mines and Resources. However, I would say to him I am sure the house will agree that so far as Hansard is concerned it should be kept for the purposes of recording the proceedings of this house, not of the British house, and that speeches in the British house would probably find their place in the British Hansard and be looked for there.

SUGAR

REPORTED CESSATION OF RATIONING IN THE UNITED STATES—CANADIAN POLICY

On the orders of the day:

Mr. THOMAS REID (New Westminster): I desire to put a question to the Minister of Finance; perhaps it can stand as a notice. It is with regard to sugar. In view of the fact that the United States do not now ration sugar, will the minister make a statement as to the present position in Canada, and indicate whether the restrictions in this country will likewise be lifted?

Hon. J. L. ILSLEY (Minister of Finance): I will make inquiries—I was not aware that that was the condition in the United States—and make a statement.

Mr. REID: So that the minister will know where I got the information, I may say that I was just now in conference with a United States official from the state of Washington who is closely associated with the subject, and he told me that there is now no limit on the purchase of sugar in the United States.

WAR APPROPRIATION BILL

PROVISION FOR GRANTING TO HIS MAJESTY AID FOR NATIONAL DEFENCE AND SECURITY

The house resumed from Friday, June 2, consideration in committee of a resolution to grant to His Majesty certain sums of money for the carrying out of measures consequent upon the existence of a state of war—Mr. Ilsley—Mr. Bradette in the chair.

DEPARTMENT OF FINANCE

Old age pensions and pensions to the blind, $6,942,250.

Mr. HANSELL: A few days ago the Minister of Finance made a statement in respect of old age pensions having to be paid back from the estates of the old age pensioners, and pointed out that the policy was left pretty much with provincial departments of finance. It is my understanding that in the past that has been the regulation. Just what advantage the provinces have taken of it, I do not know, but I do know the effect on old age pensioners. When applying for a pension the applicant is asked to sign a document which hands over as collateral for his pension the little house or home in which he has had considerable pride. Is this a charge against the entire estate, or is it a charge against the property value of the estate up to the amount the minister mentioned? I ask this question because during the last victory loan campaign I was asked if war savings bonds would be considered part of the estate and subject to collection by the provinces in the event of the death of a pensioner. I could not answer the question, nor did I have time on that occasion to get in touch with the minister. Perhaps he will reply to the numerous speeches which have been made, and when he does I would ask him to include an answer to the question I have now asked.

I have always maintained that old age pensions should be paid to our aged mothers and fathers by right of their Canadian heritage. It is my belief that if the nation is to reach the status of a glorious Canadian people, one thing we have to do is to recognize as a right of Canadian citizenship the giving of adequate old age pensions to those who have pioneered in the country, to those who have spent their lives to make the kind of Canada we want.

I should like now to make some observations in respect of the speech delivered on Friday evening by the Minister of Labour. I have a good deal of respect for him, and therefore I am not going to criticize him personally. He is much bigger than I am, and I must be careful of what I say about him. However, as this is a land of free speech I suppose I have some rights when I criticize words spoken by him. This is what he said:

> I think I would advocate contributory old age pensions. I believe that pensions should be paid—I speak now as an individual—to the people of this country by right.

A statement of that kind is, to my mind, a misnomer. One does not have to talk about paying to people by right something that is owed to them. That goes without saying. I do not talk about this country paying me my indemnity by right. By law I am paid so much to indemnify me for what I may lose in my constituency by becoming a member of parliament. I do not have to say that that is paid to me by right; it goes without saying. That is one criticism I would make of the minister's speech.

Conversely to that, what the minister has in mind, of course, is that anything given to our old age pensioners, anything they receive by way of a gift, anything which does not come out of a fund to which they have contributed, is not their right.

Mr. MITCHELL: If I may correct my hon. friend, I do not think he wishes to misinterpret what I said. I still think it is theirs by right, but I think if one helps to pay for a thing, at least he has something to say about how it should be disposed of. That is not theory.

Mr. HANSELL: I do not think the minister has contradicted what I said. If we want to have a Canada such as we should have, then in my view anyone who puts his life into the building of Canada, anyone who has lived as a citizen of our country, should have by right of citizenship and by right of his Canadian heritage an adequate pension paid to him, without his paying for it for years before he reaches old age. If there is a contributory form of old age pensions then we are only paying back to the old age pensioner what he has contributed to the fund in his younger days.

I wish to draw this to the attention of the Minister of Labour, and I want to be as logical as I can. I think he is a logical man and I think he will follow this argument. The Minister of Labour is charged with the problem of finding employment. Very well. Any individual who contributes to old age pension, unemployment insurance, life insurance, or any other form of social services or means by which he can be helped later on, does so out of his wages or salary; therefore he has less to spend on that which is produced. If he has less to spend on that which is produced, then the production to that extent is not sold; and if you follow it to its logical conclusion it means that eventually men are laid off. If they are laid off, their purchasing power is still further reduced and there is more unemployment. I want the minister to think of that, because if it is followed to its logical conclusion there will be less employment in this country. Taking a long range view of this old age pension problem, we see that it will stretch forward into the years of our post-war life, the years when the production of civilian goods will be speeded up, and it will not be very long before we are in the same position as that in which we found ourselves a few years ago when there was what was commonly known as a period of overproduction.

A man and his wife, walking down a street, look into a shop window. Perhaps it is a furniture store. The wife notices a nice piece of furniture, a chesterfield or something of the kind. She would like that beautiful piece of furniture to grace her home. She says, "Well, Pa, what about it? Do you think we shall be able to buy it?" Pa figures it out and he says, "Well, now I don't know, Ma, if I can. I don't think we can buy it now. I have my unemployment insurance, which of course, is a tax. I have some taxes to pay on the property; and then I do not get much of a wage. There is the income tax, and that reminds me that I did not pay my radio licence fee, which is another tax. I shall be having that man after me if I do not pay it. Then of course there is the old age pension tax; this contributory scheme. Oh, no, Ma, I'm afraid I won't be able to buy that piece of furniture for you. I shall have to wait until we get old; then I may be able to squeeze out a little bit." That is the position. By the time this, that and the other thing are taken from a man's wages, how is he to buy back the production of industry? Industry becomes slowed up, and the first thing you know we have a period of unemployment on our hands.

Let me read what the minister said on Friday night as reported on page 3503 of Hansard:

> We hear people talk about non-contributory unemployment insurance and non-contributory this and non-contributory something else. Whether you like it or not, anything and everything that is paid by the state is a charge on the living standards of the people of this dominion or any other nation.

I say to the minister that I for one do not believe that statement. I suggest that he is thinking too far back. He is not thinking in terms of a modern technological age when we are able to produce more than we can consume. All I have to do is to bring to his attention the pre-war years, or, if you like, the post-war years when there will be over-production. People have been paid their wages, and for the purpose of my illustration there may even be a period when everybody is more or less employed. But through the advancement of technological skill we are able to produce an abundance. Goods pile up. If there is a surplus of production, does the minister say that if we organize our economic system through a financial accountancy to distribute that surplus to our aged mothers and fathers it will depreciate the standard of living in this country? I should like to have him answer that some time if he cares to.

Mr. JOHNSTON (Bow River): He would rather not.

Mr. HANSELL: It is true that in years gone by there was destruction of our surplus when people were in need. If ever I thought this world was a lunatic asylum it was at that time. I recall reading of a shipload of oranges going out from Liverpool and being dumped into the sea when little children in England needed them. Instead of feeding them to the children they fed them to the fish. Of course, economists from such schools as the London School of Economics, if you like, would say: But the children did not have any money to pay for them. Well, that is true; neither did the fish, but the fish got them and the children who needed them had to go without. We all remember the coffee from Brazil that was burned and dumped into the sea. We all recall blankets being destroyed and cotton ploughed under in the United States. Does the minister say that if instead of destroying those goods we arranged our economy in such a way as to distribute them to the aged and the needy it would reduce the standard of living in this country? That is something for him to think about.

The minister in his remarks on Friday night went on to say:

> Whether you like it or not,—

That is a nice preface to a statement.

> —anything and everything—

There is a positiveness about this. He is so sure about it.

> —everything that is paid by the state is a charge on the living standards of the people of this dominion or any other nation.

Then listen to this:

> History has proven that pride is the backbone of a nation.

Well, for a little while I am going to talk about pride. I am going to ask the minister if it is anything to be proud of when our economic arrangement is such that we have to destroy goods instead of distributing them.

Mr. MITCHELL: I am sure my hon. friend is not suggesting that I said we should destroy goods.

Mr. HANSELL: No; the minister said that people could not get something for nothing. We cannot give them the goods, so if they cannot be sold they must be destroyed; that is the logic of it.

Mr. MITCHELL: That is the weakness of your argument.

Mr. HANSELL: No, it is not my argument, and I do not know whether it is the minister's, but that is actually what has been done and it is exactly what will have to be done if the present economic arrangement is not changed. There is only one other way to deal with it; that is to give people enough purchasing power over and above wages to buy the surplus of goods, and you can start with the old age pensioner. As the hon. member for Jasper-Edson suggests, we are giving fifty per cent of our production to the enemy now and making no bones about it. I heard a story once about little Johnny. When he was a small boy he wanted a tricycle, but his father could not buy him one because he had no money. When Johnny got a little bigger he wanted a bicycle, but his father could not buy it for him because he had no money. A little later he thought he would like a car, since he was growing up, but his father could not buy one, and if Johnny wanted a car he would have to make it out of some old junk. Finally the time came when he did not want to live on his father any longer, so he began to tramp the roads of the country, to ride the rods, frying eggs by the side of the railroad track in the midst of abundance. Then war broke out; economic necessity laid hold of him and said, "Johnny, how would you like to have three meals a day and a suit or two suits of clothes?" Johnny replied, "What do you mean?" "Well, come with me and sign on the dotted line and you will get them." So he went and signed on the dotted line and got three meals a day and two suits of clothes. Then one day they came along and said, "Johnny, how would you like a nice education?" Johnny replied, "Are you going to give me a good education?" "Yes, we will give you an education that will cost $25,000." But Johnny said, "I could not possibly afford that." The reply was, "Oh, you don't need to pay for it; we will pay for it." So they took him and made him a pilot, at a cost of $25,000. After that they said, "How would you like a nice railroad trip?" He replied, "Well, I had many of those railroad trips before the war, and I got very tired of them; I used to ride the rods." "Well, you will not have to ride the rods now; we will even give you a berth to sleep in." "You are going to give it to me?" "Yes, we will give it to you." So he went all the way to Halifax. Then they asked, "Would you like a nice trip over the ocean?" and they took him over the ocean to a bomber field in England and said, "Look at that machine." He said, "Boy, isn't she a big one?" Then they said, "Here is a big bomber; how would you like to fly it?" "I couldn't afford to fly that; I could not buy the gasoline to fly even a mile." "Oh, that makes no difference; jump in." So Johnny jumped in and began to fly it all round. Eventually they said, "How would you like to fly over Germany?" "Well, I wouldn't mind; it has not cost me anything so far." But before leaving for Germany that afternoon they wheeled out the bombs and Johnny asked, "What are those?" "Oh, these are bombs." "How much did they cost?" "Oh, we couldn't tell you; thousands of dollars. Now we want you to take them over to Germany, and when you get over there we want you to give them to the Germans." "What, give them to the Germans? Are you not going to charge anything for them?" So he took them over Germany and gave the bombs to the Germans. As he was flying back he thought, "My, that is a great idea. I never knew they could give things away like that. Why could we not have a system after the war under which we could fly over Canada and, instead of dropping bombs, drop washing machines, furniture and things like that?"

That is the logical sequence. In time of war we are able to give a large part of our production to the enemy, but we are not able to give any of our surplus to our aged people in time of peace. When the minister talks of pride I tell him that I will have plenty of pride in a nation that provides for its aged people out of the abundance of its production and its surpluses. Suppose we came to a place in our economy when we provided all these things for our people; when, as they grew older, they retired on an adequate pension, not a pinch-penny $25 or even $30 a month, but $50 or more if necessary. Raise the ante, as long as there is a surplus of production. Imagine the minister and his friends who hold the same philosophy saying, "Well, I do not know whether or not I am proud of that. I think perhaps I had better go to some other country where they charge us in our youth for that which we may get if we live long enough to receive it." He ridicules the idea of something for nothing. I wonder if the minister has ever considered that some of the most precious things of life are given us for nothing. The very air we breathe we get for nothing, unless we want to listen over it; then we have to pay.

Mr. POULIOT: It is not a good thing to mention that to the minister.

Mr. HANSELL: I want him to see if there is anything wrong in the philosophy of something for nothing. The energy that comes from the sun; the rain—these are given to all, rich and poor alike.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): It has to be harnessed.

Mr. HANSELL: That is true; I am only saying that these things are given to us for nothing, and they are given to rich and poor alike. Let us take another example, if the hon. member for York-Sunbury objects to that one. Here is a young man who inherits a million dollars. If he holds the views of the minister he will say, "Oh, pride forbid; I could not take that, for it is something I am getting for nothing." All I say is that I have not a rich uncle or a rich father and mother, but I belong to a rich country. I belong to a country whose citizens have a heritage far greater than that of any other country in the world.

At page 3503 the minister goes on to say:

> I have given what I have always considered to be my philosophy of life. It is as old as history itself.

Of course; that is what is wrong with it.

> And remember this, that any state which started out to kid the people that it was giving something away for nothing has ended up in the ash can.

The hon. gentleman starts off as Minister of Labour; then he takes the part of a great economist, and now he has become a great historian.

> It may be that we now have a new formula; I do not know. I sincerely hope, with all my being, that we have. But human nature being what it is, and in the light of history, there is reason for doubt. One could read the history—

Then he refers to Carthage, Rome, Greece and "other civilizations and nations". Surely the Minister of Labour is not going to compare modern civilization with bygone dynasties. Some of us have read a little history. Those days were days of scarcity; and furthermore, there was a vast distinction between the rich, or the aristocracy, and the slaves who laboured by the sweat of their brow to provide for the rich. That day may not be completely gone economically, but I am certain that the minister cannot compare our modern age, our modern country and our modern civilization with bygone days and bygone nations. I think that is enough for the Minister of Labour.

A little later I was interested in listening to the speech of the hon. member for Cape Breton South. I usually enjoy his speeches because he is quite human and understanding, but I must confess I was a little amused when he tangled with the Minister of Finance over the matter of taxation or contributions given to this or that fund in New Zealand and here. I could not help thinking to myself, "Are they fighting over which system of taxation is the best?" I was tempted to say, "Why any taxation at all?" I say that with all sincerity. I do not believe there is any need for the extreme taxation that we have had in this country. I am not going to criticize what is happening at the moment, because we know that there is a vast depreciation in time of war in all civilian goods and that much of our money must be spent for munitions of war and goods of that nature. I am talking of normal times, when we get back to our quiet, peaceful life. In those days I see no reason for the taxation that has bled the people of this country white.

In this connection I want to read from a book written by Major Douglas, "Monopoly of Credit". I make no apology for quoting any first-rank social crediter.

Mr. WEIR: Mr. Chairman, I rise to a point of order. The hon. gentleman is proposing to discuss a matter dealt with by Major Douglas. We are dealing with old age pensions in Canada.

The CHAIRMAN: I have no doubt that a large part of the matter dealt with by the hon. member for Macleod has been out of order. We have been discussing old age pensions, and I hope that hon. members will keep within the orbit of the item.

Mr. HANSELL: I am sure I will keep within the rules. Most of my time has been taken up in criticizing the Minister of Labour.

Mr. MITCHELL: Stay with the Minister of Labour.

Mr. HANSELL: If I was out of order, then he must have been out of order. I intend to refer to contributory old age pension schemes, which are a form of taxation. I shall soon be finished, so that the hon. member who has raised the objection need not worry. Major Douglas says—

Mr. MITCHELL: Who is Major Douglas?

Mr. HANSELL: My hon. friend knows.

The CHAIRMAN: I do not believe the committee is discussing a contributory old age pension scheme; it is discussing the operation of old age pensions in Canada. I do not see how the discussion of that type of scheme would be relevant.

Mr. HANSELL: I am not going to argue the point, but I will say that on Friday night the Minister of Labour went out of his way to advocate a contributory old age pension scheme. I am only reading from what I regard as the greatest authority in the world on this matter.

Mr. JAQUES: And a Scotsman at that.

Mr. HANSELL: And a Scotsman, such as my hon. friend praised the other day. I want to quote what he says about contributory schemes. He states:

> In passing it may be noted how the power of taxation has grown into a form of oppression beside which the modest efforts of the robber barons of the middle ages must appear crude.

And again:

> Modern taxation is legalized robbery, and it is none the less robbery because it is effected through the medium of a political democracy which is made an accessory by giving it an insignificant share in the loot. But I do not think robbery is its primary object.

I will not read any more. I will conclude by saying that a contributory scheme of this kind, being compulsory, would mean confiscation. To my mind confiscation is to steal; to steal is to rob, and those who steal and rob are thieves and robbers. There is only one solution for the old age pension problem and that is the adoption of a philosophy which provides a national dividend as a right of citizenship. The Minister of Finance will make a name for himself in Canada—I suppose he has a name already; I think he is well respected in many quarters—he will move history and move this country if he adopts the principle that will make it possible to provide a national dividend, and he can get off to a good start with our aged mothers and fathers.

Mr. FRASER (Peterborough West): When a blind person marries another blind person his pension is reduced to $120. That seems hardly fair. In many cases a blind person needs someone else to look after him. I contend that the blind pension should be doubled in order to provide for this extra care which many blind persons need to help them out. Many accidents have occurred to blind persons because they tried to look after themselves. The government would be well advised to increase the blind pension. I was very much interested in what the hon. member for Kootenay West (Mr. Esling) said the other night, and I agree that the age limit should be reduced and the pension increased. The age limit should be reduced below twenty-one years, because there are many who have been blind from infancy.

Mr. MITCHELL: I thought my hon. friend was advocating reducing the age limit for old age pensions to twenty-one years.

Mr. FRASER (Peterborough West): No; I am talking about blind pensions. Can the minister make a statement with regard to one blind person marrying another?

Mr. ILSLEY: The pension is reduced to discourage the marriage of two blind persons.

Mr. HLYNKA: To my way of thinking there is no old age pension scheme in Canada to-day. What we have is pauper's relief for those who are seventy years old and over, and are able to prove that they are absolutely destitute, and can produce a birth certificate and other documents to prove their age and their economic position. I repeat; a citizen must be over seventy years of age and be absolutely destitute before he can qualify for this pauper's relief. In my opinion anyone who administers this pauper's relief as it stands in Canada to-day should hesitate before he speaks about it, because the results are a condemnation of any government and not a credit to a civilized people. I suggest to you, Mr. Chairman, that a conscientious and self-respecting farmer treats his old horses better than we have treated our old worthy pioneers, the old age pensioners. What we need in Canada is a retirement allowance. No pauper's relief under the old patched-up legislation will do. The present act should be discarded and thrown in the waste-basket, and a more humane legislation should be passed.

I do not apologize for taking the time of the committee to speak on the problem of old age pensions. Several aspects of this problem have already been dealt with, but I wish to touch on some aspects which have been either inadequately dealt with or omitted altogether.

I suggest to the minister and the government that all citizens who no longer possess the power to earn a living should be automatically granted a retirement allowance adequate to provide them with a decent standard of living. If a Canadian citizen has lost his earning power he should be immediately granted a pension whether he is over sixty years of age or below sixty years of age. Those reaching the age of sixty who have not the power to earn for themselves a decent standard of living should be given a generous retirement allowance. The amount of the retirement allowance should be such that our worthy pioneers could live in comfort and dignity. It could easily be fifty dollars a month for each individual pensioner.

Besides this regular monthly allowance our aged people should be provided with medical and dental care. Very few who have spoken in this debate so far have mentioned the importance of medical and dental care which our old people require. I suggest that the physical condition of each old age applicant be checked on applying for pension, and if medical or dental care is required money should be provided for it.

Mr. MacNICOL: I am under the impression that Ontario grants medical care. I know that the old age pensioners have been getting it.

Mr. HLYNKA: To my knowledge no province in Canada—

Mr. MacNICOL: I am speaking from knowledge. I know that the old age pensioners in Ontario were getting medical care, and they are still getting it unless a change has been made recently.

Mr. LALONDE: It is the same in the province of Quebec, where the aged receive medical care from the health units.

Mr. HLYNKA: If hon. members who have just interjected are ready to state that the old age pensioners in Ontario and Quebec are receiving medical and dental care, and are provided with glasses when they require them and their teeth kept in proper condition, I will certainly be the first to express my appreciation of what has been done in that regard.

Mr. MacNICOL: I am speaking from knowledge when I say that in Ontario the old age pensioners have been been receiving medical care, and are still receiving it unless some change has been made recently. I cannot speak definitely as to dental care.

Mr. HLYNKA: I have received many letters from old age pensioners across the country who have stated that they need money with which to buy glasses because they can no longer read without them, and they need dental attention. That is why I have included this point in my notes, to bring it before the committee. There is no reason why this nation cannot provide our aged people with complete medical and dental care, provide them with glasses, dentures when they need them, and so forth.

Provision should also be made for funeral expenses of old age pensioners. As things stand to-day, the old age pensioner is forced to put away a few dollars from his meagre twenty dollars a month pension so that he may be buried decently. This country could easily provide for funeral expenses, and let our worthy old pioneers enjoy the few dollars of pension they now receive.

I wish to say a few words on proof of age. I have many letters in my office from applicants who tried to get the old age pension but were turned down on the ground that they were unable to produce their birth certificates. I submit, Mr. Chairman, that a great many of our citizens cannot produce their birth certificates. Many of them come from different European countries where the difficulty of getting birth certificates would be very great. But as the law now stands they must be seventy years of age and produce their birth certificates before they are granted a pension. Surely it is too much to expect that every citizen treasure his birth certificate, keep it in a safe for years so that he can produce it when asked.

Mr. MARTIN: They can make a statutory declaration.

Mr. HLYNKA: I know of many instances in which the old age pension authorities refused to accept a statutory declaration. The applicant is asked to go out and find someone who remembers the day when the applicant was born. That is pretty hard to do, and so I say provision should be made to relieve them of this requirement, particularly those who have come from European countries and whose birth certificates have been destroyed or lost. This is extremely important to many citizens in western Canada. Perhaps even some members of parliament could not find their birth certificates. Perhaps some of them would not want anyone to know when they were born, because the attitudue of some would indicate that their birth took place somewhere back in the seventeenth century; at lease one might assume that when one hears them speak on measures which are urgently needed to-day.

Another suggestion I would make is that national registration should be used for the preparation of the lists of those qualifying for retiring allowance. Every citizen of Canada has certain obligations to Canada; he should also have certain privileges. If a young man is required for military service, under our laws he is called up, and he must obey the law or he is punished. My suggestion is that every Canadian be accorded similar privileges commensurate with his duties. When he becomes of pensionable age a notice should be sent to him to appear before the board to give a statement of his position. If his income is less than is required to provide a decent standard of living he should be immediately granted his allowance. If a citizen fails to accept his share of Canada's wealth and the heritage to which he is entitled he should be soundly scolded and told that unless he accepts his share it will be distributed among those who are kind enough to accept their cheques. That is the sort of attitude we should take. Again, every pensioner should be allowed to keep property up to a value of $3,500. Why not? He is not going to take it with him when he dies. But no; our present attitude is to grind him down and hold him to the ground to his last day. Surely we should be more human.

In a copy of the "Old Age Pensioner", a publication issued in British Columbia in the interest of old age pensioners, I notice these words:

> Not only was it necessary to have an increase in the pension and reduction of the age limit, but something should surely be done to humanize the regulations and those who administer them. Too long had these worthy pioneers suffered by the indignities placed upon them and it was high time a halt was called.

These words were uttered by a gentleman interested in the subject of old age pensions, in asking the government to humanize the regulations and the handling of the whole problem.

Up until recently in my own constituency very few pensioners got as much as $20 a month. Always there was some sort of deduction. An old mother is usually told to go and live with her daughter or her neighbours or someone else; and if she argues that the daughter has her own children to support and cannot provide her with living quarters, she is then told that she can do anything she wants and that that is the decision of the board and she will have to abide by it.

Mr. ILSLEY: Mr. Chairman, let me correct my hon. friend. The average pension paid in Alberta is $22.82.

Mr. HLYNKA: I agree with the minister; with the assistance that the provincial government of Alberta has given to pensioners—

Mr. JAQUES: I thought it was $30.

Mr. HLYNKA: —some of the pensioners can now receive as much as $30.

Mr. ILSLEY: Let me correct my hon. friend. The average pension is $22.82 exclusive of the provincial supplement.

Mr. HLYNKA: So much the better. But I never ran across anyone in my constituency until these changes were made who received $20 a month. I know what I am talking about. I have never met anyone in my constituency who received that much. There was always a deduction.

Mr. REID: Did the hon. member say, hundreds of them?

Mr. HLYNKA: Hundreds of them.

Mr. REID: He must have a great old age pensioner constituency.

Mr. HLYNKA: Well, I have nearly fifty thousand people in my constituency. I know how anxious the minister and those who sit on the government side are to defend the present system, but let me tell them that these conditions have existed too long; it is about time that the regulations were humanized. I am glad to hear from the minister that the average pension, exclusive of provincial assistance, which is being paid in Alberta is $22.82. Any case which is referred to me in the future of old age pensioners who are not getting their share I intend to pass on to the minister, and I shall see how many of them are granted the amount to which they are entitled. It is all right to talk theoretically about these things, but in practice there is absolutely nothing to be proud of. I have had to go to the boards and try to rectify various cases, but I was told it is simply impossible to do anything because such were the regulations and they had to abide by them. Naturally those who administer the regulations are in the driver's seat, and the old age pensioner is forced to accept what he is given.

I wish next to plead the case of those who do not speak adequately either the English or the French language. A large number of our Canadian pioneers in the west, particularly in the northern part of the prairie provinces, settled together in blocks. For many years there were no schools in the districts and they had no opportunity of learning the English language. To-day, if they have reached the age of seventy, they cannot obtain a pension because, they are told, "You must be a citizen; you must have your citizenship certificate." If these old folks apply for their citizenship certificates they are told to go home, that certificates will not be granted because they do not know the English language. Surely that is an unfair attitude to take. These people are pioneers; they have contributed much to the development of this country. Is there not at least one minister who would get up and say that now is the time to show our appreciation of what these people have done for this country, in which many of them have lived for fifty years or more? Yet two or three years ago they were celebrating their fiftieth anniversary of their coming to Canada, this very government failed even to send a government representative to their convention. That is not the attitude that makes for true Canadianism. That is not the attitude which should be adhered to. It is about time someone studied the problems of these people with a view to treating them as they should be treated.

I should like now to touch upon the subject discussed by the hon. member for Macleod, when he referred to the oft-repeated phrase, "something for nothing." A large number of members in the house object to that phrase because they would not want the people to know that they can get something to which they are entitled without working for it. Why should the people not be taught just the opposite? Why should they not be told that there is a certain heritage to which each citizen is entitled? That is the point of view we should all take. Certainly we should not raise our voices in ridicule when we speak of heritage. When an hon. member ridicules that expression, or ridicules us by reference to $25 a month, it immediately indicates a process of thinking that I could not possibly describe properly.

Reference has been made to contributory pensions. I suggest the reason why this government, or governments which have preceded it, have not brought in an adequate and proper old age pension scheme or a proper scheme of retirement allowances, is that they did not want to stand in the way of insurance companies and, so that the companies could advertise in the press, and make use of pictures depicting misery, and say, "Unless you buy an endowment policy you will find yourself in a similar position."

That is the catch. I say the people of this nation should support the principle of insurance. They should be insured, but insurance should not stand in the way of the old age pensioner. And if we are going to have—

Mr. ILSLEY: I rise to a question of privilege. The hon. member is going pretty far. I do not think I can remember anyone having gone quite so far as that before to the length of saying that the reason the government is not making a more generous provision for old age pensioners is that it is desirous of helping the insurance companies. I deny that, completely, both for myself and on behalf of the government, and I ask the hon. member to withdraw it.

The CHAIRMAN: We are discussing old age pensions. Surely hon. members should keep within the limit of the item. I have some responsibility in the matter and I must insist that this be done. I have ruled to that effect, and I repeat that hon. members must keep within the item before the committee.

Mr. HLYNKA: I am not going to argue the point, but I must say that if we are to have a contributory pension scheme in Canada we shall undoubtedly have to compete with insurance companies. It will be a choice between one and the other. The point I wish to make is that if the government cannot give our citizens non-contributory old age pensions, the scheme will be of less value, because even as conditions are to-day our citizens can insure on their own behalf. They can insure with one of the insurance companies, and be cared for when they reach the age of sixty years or over. As has been said so often by the hon. member for Lethbridge and other hon. members of this group, every citizen in this nation is entitled to a certain heritage—as a right of citizenship. A right to an old age pension is part of that heritage.

The minister said that I have gone beyond what he expected. However, I have noticed in the last four and a half years that unless one puts a problem straight to the government, the minister under whose jurisdiction the problem comes ignores the representations made, and that is the end of it. I would like the minister to read the letters I receive from old age pensioners. I would like him to read the letters which come from people who are either refused or receive pensions inadequate to care for them in the circumstances in which they find themselves. Therefore I do not apologize to the committee or to anyone else for urging as strongly as I can upon the government that something more be done with respect to old age pensions.

Mr. JAQUES: Mr. Chairman, I am not going to apologize for making a few remarks on this subject. The only wonder to me is that such a debate as this is necessary in this day and age. I have wondered why there is any opposition or any hesitation on the part of members, or people outside the house. I wonder why there should be any longer any reluctance to pay a decent, civilized old age pension to citizens of Canada who are too old to work and who have failed to provide, as the saying goes, for a rainy day.

It seems to me the opposition springs from two points of view. There are those who still ask where the money is to come from—although I think they are not in as large numbers as they were. The other kind of opposition comes from those who regard thrift, which in their meaning is nothing but the saving of money, as the greatest of all virtues. From that they draw the conclusion that if an individual has not provided for his old age it proves that he has not led a good life, or even a useful one.

Mention has been made of the superiority of the Scot in the matter of thrift. I happened to be in Scotland last winter, and while there met a number of Scotsmen. During a discussion I was told that while the Scots were probably better thinkers than the English, the English had sounder instincts. That reminds me of a story of Doctor Johnson. While in the highlands he was told by some Scotch people, with great pride, that one could buy twenty eggs for a shilling. Doctor Johnson, with the sounder instinct of the English—if I may say so—replied at once, "The reason for that is not the plentiful supply of eggs, but the scarcity of pennies."

The statement has been made that a government can distribute to the people only what money has been previously contributed by them. I hold in my hand a book which was lately sent to me called "Monetary Experiment," by Richard A. Lester. Mr. Lester was born in New York state, educated at Yale and Princeton. He holds the Ph.D. degree from Princeton. He has devoted his time to teaching. He was an instructor in economics at Princeton, assistant professor of economics at Haverford college, and is now assistant professor of economics at the university of Washington. For a time he was an analyst with the United States treasury. This book deals with experiments in money in the American colonies.

The CHAIRMAN: Order. I have no objection to hearing read a book written at that time, but I must remind the hon. member that we are now dealing with old age pensions. Surely this is not the time to deal with social theories and new economic problems or panaceas. I repeat that I must make a ruling at some time, and I would ask the hon. member to keep within the orbit of the item now before the committee.

Mr. JAQUES: Mr. Chairman, I do not wish to argue the point with you, but I want to read the quotation for this reason: the excuse that is given everywhere for the failure to pay more adequate pensions is, where is the money to come from? The statement has already been made in this committee that it is impossible for a government to distribute to a people money which has not already been surrendered to the government. Here is a matter of history. I wish to quote only a few lines, as follows:

> When Maryland first issued paper money in 1733, most of it was given away—a certain sum to each inhabitant over fifteen years of age. This was done in order that the paper money might be "the more useful to the inhabitants" and its circulation made as "speedy and diffusive as possible." The legislature hoped by this means "to remove the difficulties under which the inhabitants had long laboured." In a sense this "bounty" was a sort of "social dividend," similar to that advocated by Major Douglas in his books on social credit.

At the end of the chapter he sums up this particular experiment in these words:

> From his detailed study of forty-five years of money in Maryland, Professor Gould concludes:
> "Considering the peculiar benefits to grain and tobacco culture, the conveniences offered to trade, the exceptionally high exchange that the bills maintained throughout most of their life, and the faithful redemption of every shilling at face value, it is hardly too much to say that this was the most successful paper money issued by any of the colonies."

The author of the book, as I said, is a qualified economist who has held the position of analyst with the United States treasury. I do not think it is necessary to enlarge on the point as to where the money is to come from, because everybody has heard it said that if we can finance a war of course we can finance the peace.

But let us turn to the other objection to paying adequate pensions on a non-contributory basis. The idea seems to be, as expressed here, that you cannot get something for nothing; that in order to provide for old age every man should save money. I am going to make this statement to the committee: whenever a man or a citizen ceases to work—I do not care whether he has a million dollars saved up or not, it does not make any difference—he immediately ceases to contribute to the work or to the effort of the nation and he is bound to live on the bounty of the rest of the country. The idea that a man can save money and then at the end his life live off what he has saved and not at the expense of the community is, I am convinced, pure fallacy. I was reminded of this by a book which I read quite a few years ago and which I procured from the library this afternoon. It is called "Essays in Persuasion," by Maynard Keynes. In his chapter on inflation and deflation Mr. Keynes makes some remarks on the saving of money. He says:

There are to-day many well-wishers of their country who believe that the most useful thing which they and their neighbours can do to mend the situation is to save more than usual.

Of course, Keynes was writing during the depression, after the last war, in 1925, I think. The quotation continues:

If they refrain from spending a larger proportion of their incomes than usual they believe that they will have helped employment. Now, in certain circumstances all this would be quite right, but in present circumstances, unluckily it is quite wrong. It is utterly harmful and misguided—the very opposite of the truth; for the object of saving is to release labour for employment on producing capital goods such as houses, factories, roads, machines and the like. But if there is a large unemployed surplus already available for such purposes, then the effect of saving is merely to add to this surplus and therefore to increase the number of the unemployed. Moreover, when a man is thrown out of work in this or any other way, his diminished spending power causes further unemployment amongst those who would have produced what he can no longer afford to buy, and so the position gets worse and worse in a vicious circle.

The best guess I can make is that whenever you save five shillings, you put a man out of work for a day. Your saving that five shillings adds to unemployment to the extent of one man for one day—and so on in proportion. On the other hand, whenever you buy goods you increase employment—though they must be British, home-produced goods if you are to increase employment in this country. After all, this is only the plainest common sense. For if you buy goods someone will have to make them. And if you do not buy goods the shops will not clear their stocks, they will not give repeat orders, and someone will be thrown out of work.

Those are the words of Maynard Keynes, who is reckoned one of the great economists; and they are in direct contradiction to the theories that are always advanced whenever the subject of old age pensions is brought up. The statement always is made that people are not entitled to pensions unless they have saved sufficient money to provide for their old age. And who is to value the contribution that any man may make during his life?

What about a mother who raises a large family of from six to a dozen children, whose husband earns barely enough to keep them, and certainly not enough to provide for any incidentals? Having raised her family; having done all the work for them and, as far as wages go, having received nothing for it; having put the welfare of her children before the accumulation of savings for her own old age, is she to be penalized because she has not saved sufficient money to provide for her needs? That is the position to-day. And I would ask this. In a country as empty as Canada, where we are bringing in Asiatics to fill up the waste spaces, what more valuable contribution could anyone make than by raising a family? Yet to-day the people are penalized for doing so. We all know what avarice does to a nation. We need only look at Roman history to learn that those people became so "thrifty" and so money-minded that they could not even reproduce their own numbers, and so there came about the decline and fall of the Roman empire. So it is in Canada; we have pretty well reached the stage, outside the province of Quebec, when the people cannot afford to raise enough children to populate their own country.

Mr. FRASER (Peterborough West): What does the hon. member mean when he says we are bringing in Asiatics? We are not bringing in any now, are we?

Mr. JAQUES: They are refugees. I do not know where they come from; I cannot find out.

Mr. FRASER (Peterborough West): They are not Asiatics, are they?

Mr. JAQUES: I do not know where they come from, but we have brought in quite a number.

With regard to the future, we are told by the government and by other leaders that we must have a new order, a new world. When you boil down this new world it comes to this, as far as I can make out, that everybody is to be put to work. I do not think there is anything new about that; it seems to me the oldest thing in the world. I presume that if the work does not come about naturally then it will be created for its own sake. Let me put it from the point of view of providing employment for the majority of the people after the war. If you are going to have full production then you must have full consumption. There is no question about that; and if all the younger people are going to have full-time employment then the surplus must be distributed to those too old to work. If there is to be any involuntary unemployment after the war—and I have not met anyone yet who does not fear it—surely that unemployment should fall upon those who are old and not upon those in the prime of life.

So I say that from every point of view you wish to look at it, whether from the moral or the practical, there is everything to be said for properly looking after our old people. I know that what is good in war is not necessarily good in peace. As someone has said, war is hell, and we do not want to carry the conditions of war into the time of peace. But if we are to prepare for the new age that we hear about in this chamber and elsewhere, a very good way to begin, and a proof of the earnestness of those who talk about it, would be a guarantee to those who are too old to work, those who have done their share of work in this country, that henceforth they shall be granted more than the bare necessities of life—at times they do not even get that—and that in future they may enjoy some of the comforts as well, whether or not they have accumulated savings deposits of money. Again I ask, who is to judge the value of any man's contribution? Who is to value the life work of any man or any woman? Certainly it cannot be done by the size of his or her bank balance.

Mr. McIVOR: I am sure there is not an hon. member in this chamber who could not speak on old age pensions and pensions to the blind for at least forty minutes. But when I remember that the minister is to bring down his budget next week, or at least very soon; when I remember that we have been discussing this matter for two days, I feel that if I spoke for forty minutes now, or for five minutes, I would be committing an unpardonable sin. I know we have much to say, but I think the patience of the committee has been exhausted. I believe we should call a halt to this discussion and say, "Carried."

Mr. ROSE: I would have felt the same way as the hon. member for Fort William, but if we can spend practically half a day on strawberries, an hour and a half on empty beer bottles, quite a while on dressed and undressed poultry, and so on, surely we can spare some time for the aged people. I do not want to quote from any books or deliver a full thesis on the question of the aged. I believe everyone here could approach the problem from the humanitarian point of view. Among the saddest scenes I have to witness is old men and women selling newspapers in the city of Montreal on cold winter nights. Often I say to myself there must be something radically wrong with this world of ours that such things should have to be. Each of us is confronted with such a scene now and then, and I am sure we all feel the same way. I do believe, however, that in dealing with the problems of the aged it is hardly proper for an hon. member of this house to slur our Asiatic allies or anyone else, or to go in for racialism, as the hon. member for Wetaskiwin did.

Mr. JAQUES: Not at all; I maintain that charity begins at home.

Mr. ROSE: Our Chinese allies have been fighting our battles for many years; they are a very fine people. The Siberian corps at Stalingrad were very fine people too.

Mr. JAQUES: That is all right, but charity still begins at home.

Mr. ROSE: So far as we are concerned I should say the word "Asiatics" was used by the hon. member in a racial sense and in a manner unbecoming to any hon. member of this house. What was the obstacle placed in the way of the payment of old age pensions in Canada? At one time it was the province of Quebec. I can remember not so many years ago when the leaders of the government in Quebec used to say, "We do not want any old age pensions in this province because it will destroy charity." Others used to say that it would take away the responsibility of children to look after their parents. I would say that those people were hypocrites. They did not mean anything of the kind; they were just thinking of the money that would have to be paid out of the provincial treasury.

I am glad that to-day the province of Quebec has taken the lead in asking that the age limit be reduced to sixty-five years, and the government of that province deserves congratulations. One of the obstacles of olden days is now out of the way. Why should it not be possible to speed up the dominion-provincial conference in order that this matter may be settled as soon as possible? These old people cannot wait. Many of them feel that they never know how many more years of life they have. I went through an election campaign not so long ago and many of them came to me and asked, "What will you do about it?" I told them I would do my best. They cannot wait; they feel that their years are numbered.

This matter should not be postponed too long. I understood that the dominion-provincial conference was to take place in the early summer, and this problem of old age pensions should be on the agenda. This government is considering the payment of family allowances and I think that problem and the problem of old age pensions can be considered together. In both cases the people concerned are helpless; they need someone to look after them, and considered from this point of view we should not let down our old people.

I remember back in the days of unemployment when the labour leaders used to say that the age limit should be reduced to sixty years in order to provide more jobs for younger people. Many thousands of young men will be coming back after the war and if these older people could step aside it would provide many jobs for them. This matter should be considered as a post-war problem. Whether the scheme is to be contributory or non-contributory, I believe the people of Canada will not quarrel about it once they feel assured that they will receive an old age pension when they reach the age of sixty or perhaps sixty-five years.

Many hon. members have given credit to the trade union movement for the improvement in old age pensions. I was especially gratified to hear the Minister of Labour give credit to the trade union movement and the work they have done for the aged. In a memorandum submitted to the Prime Minister and members of the dominion government by the Trades and Labour Congress of Canada on Friday, February 25, 1944, it is stated:

> While some adjustments have been made in regard to pensions paid to aged people and the blind, in our opinion the adjustments were not sufficient to meet the increase in cost of living and some further adjustments should be made immediately. Some of the provinces have taken action in this regard but we would suggest that your government take the lead in calling a conference of all the provinces in order to establish once for all an adequate pension on a uniform scale that aged and incapacitated persons may enjoy a full life.

That is a very moderate demand on the part of the trade union movement and it should receive the full support of this committee.

Before sitting down I should like to say a few words in support of those who are not citizens of this country. I have had people come to me and explain how they have put off becoming citizens, and now they find themselves too old. Quite often they do not speak the language very well and because of their experience with police in their homeland they are fearful of going down to the Royal Canadian Mounted Police. They have many other reasons for not becoming citizens. The result is that they cannot get pensions. Many of these people have lived and worked in this country for a number of years, and they should be able to enjoy the few years that remain to them without being punished for not having become citizens. Whether they have their papers or not, they are just as loyal as anybody else.

[Mr. Rose.]

Mr. REID: All hon. members, no matter where they sit, are in favour of increasing pensions for our aged people and decreasing the age limit. The records of the house over the past years show that I along with other members have championed the cause of old age pensions. I think, however, it ill behooved the hon. member who has just taken his seat to accuse other hon. members of taking up time, in speaking about strawberries. Although strawberries may have nothing to do with old age pensions, I, as one of those who did speak about strawberries, have no apology to make for having done so.

There was a principle at stake in that connection, as there is a principle at stake here to-day. In that case we had a board appointed by the government fixing prices and the only court of appeal to which we had access was this House of Commons. Having appealed to the board and having received no redress from the board, we then brought the matter, as was our right, to the House of Commons. That was the reason why many of us entered into that discussion and took up the time of the house on that occasion, and it ill behooves the hon. member for Cartier to chide any hon. member of the house for doing that.

I sat in my place and listened to him take up about forty minutes in discussing a man by the name of Kirkconnell. Those who live in glass-houses should not throw stones, and this place has more windows than any other place I know of which are easily broken if a man begins to throw stones. Reference has been made by the hon. member to Asiatics, but may I say that at any time if I referred to Asiatics I did so in a fair way. I have never attempted to raise racial hatred. Although I well remember when, in 1934, the Japanese were being discussed, hon. members belonging to his party used that old tirade, or old argument of their's by saying that I was doing it just to draw a red herring across the trail. I have always approached the question from the practical point of view and with no idea of causing racial hatred.

I rose, however, on this occasion to add my voice to those who have spoken on this question of old age pensions which is one that should not be allowed to die down. Time has moved on, and we have reached the stage when the old people in this country should get a better deal than parliament has granted them up to the present time.

Mr. ILSLEY: I suppose I should answer some of the questions that have been asked and deal with the matter as a whole for perhaps fifteen or twenty minutes. I did not make any general remarks when introducing this item to the committee. Perhaps I should have done so. Perhaps I would have done so had I known the debate would be so protracted.

At the present time we have an old age pension system in Canada which is far from satisfactory. It is far from satisfactory mainly because of the division of responsibility between the dominion parliament and the legislatures of the provinces. I have never disguised the fact that this system is an unsatisfactory one. Those of us who have any responsibility for its administration see evidence of that every day. For that reason I have been saying, for the last year or two at least, that I hope to see the time, and I hope it will be at an early date, when we shall have a satisfactory system of old age pensions in Canada under one jurisdiction, where the pension will be more generous and where it will be payable at an earlier age than at present.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): And be more uniform.

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes; if it is under one jurisdiction it will be uniform. But we cannot move from our present divided jurisdiction system into that better system without a transfer of certain jurisdiction from the provinces to the dominion. That certainly is true if we adopt the contributory system of old age pensions. I have not had experience, as members of the house have pointed out, in the administration of social service legislation; and if the dominion government undertakes the administration of a federal pension scheme, I am inclined to agree that its administration should not be in the Department of Finance. I do not say that because I admit a hard and unsympathetic heart. I say that because I think it could be more appropriately administered by a department of social welfare than by the Department of Finance. The reason why the administration of the old age pension scheme, in so far as it is administered by the dominion government, is in the Department of Finance is that we are merely contributors to nine provincial old age pension systems, and that is a fact which so many members lose sight of entirely. The payment of old age pensions from the beginning has been regarded as primarily the responsibility of the provinces, just like the payment of mothers' allowances, just like the administration of workmen's compensation. It is a scheme to which we contribute, and which is administered by the provinces. It is administered by regulations agreed upon by the provinces and the dominion. There is a dominion Old Age Pensions Act which authorizes us to contribute.

In the early days of the old age pensions legislation the federal contribution was fifty per cent of the pension. Shortly after 1930 that was increased to seventy-five per cent of the pension, and it became more unsatisfactory from our point of view. I do not mean because it cost us more than it would have had our contribution remained at fifty per cent, but it became a case where the administrative authority was less concerned about the matter because the paying authority was to the extent of seventy-five per cent of the pension another authority altogether.

Accordingly that system went on, a most unsatisfactory system; I do not deny that at all. I want to see it move into a more modern, more advanced and more generous system than the system we have at the present time. The only way we can do that sensibly is, I think, by adopting a contributory system which will be administered entirely by the dominion government. That would probably cost the dominion treasury more than the present system, even though it is a contributory system, because it is not true to say, as some members have said, that under a contributory system everything is paid for by the contributors. A large part is paid by the state. The only way in which we could get a transfer of jurisdiction would be by an amendment to the British North America Act. Whether we can get the provinces to agree to that I do not know, and whether the people will accept a system of contribution I do not know.

Mr. GRAYDON: Has the matter been discussed with the provinces?

Mr. ILSLEY: No; that is a matter which will have to be taken up and will be taken up at the approaching provincial conference. We have come out in the speech from the throne in favour of a contributory sysem. Whether it can be done or not I do not know. I have listened to members and most of them talk as if it were wrong to ask anybody to contribute. Perhaps I am not qualified by experience to argue the matter thoroughly, but students of these questions, experts on these problems, all seem to agree—there seems to be complete unanimity—that the sounder system is the contributory one. Sir William Beveridge says so; Marsh, who wrote the report to which the hon. member for Vancouver South referred, says so. They have a contributory system in the country which is always quoted by the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation as the most advanced country in the world, namely, New Zealand, where they contribute to their social security measures. I think it is a sounder system. I think people ought to contribute. Remember, in unemployment insurance we do not say that the workman should not contribute to the fund out of which he gets benefits when he is unemployed. We do not think there that an outright dole is better than the insurance principle.

Mr. GILLIS: It works out in that way.

Mr. ILSLEY: They contribute, and there are very sound reasons for a contributory system. However, that is in the future. In the meantime we have the present system to administer.

What is the situation? We started out in the beginning with a maximum pension of $20 a month. In the early part of 1941 a cost-of-living bonus was being paid to persons engaged in industry, and there was a great demand that we pay the cost-of-living bonus to old age pensioners or do something along that line. In November, 1941, I announced the government's policy to the house. I stuck to the principle that has always been preserved in this pension scheme, namely, that it was primarily a matter of provincial responsibility; I said that if any province wished to pay a supplemental allowance we would alter the regulations in such a way that they could do so without that supplemental allowance being regarded as income, and certain provinces did that.

Prior to the passing of the order in council of last year six provinces had made provision for a supplemental allowance: British Columbia, $5 to each pensioner from April 1, 1942; Alberta, $5 to each pensioner from April 1, 1942, plus up to an amount of $5 where income is less than $365 a year; Manitoba, $1.25 to each pensioner from January 1, 1943; Saskatchewan $1.25 to each pensioner from January 1, 1943; Ontario, 15 per cent of pension payable under the act from July 1, 1943; Nova Scotia, $10 a month payable at the discretion of the pension authority to pensioners with income of less than $365 a year, from June 1, 1943. That provision made in the various provinces is illuminating. It shows the different views which the different provincial authorities took with respect to adding to the pension by way of supplemental allowance.

As a result of that and the addition to the pension which we provided last summer, the maximum payments per month now allowed in the various provinces are: Alberta, $30, plus $5 per year; British Columbia, $30; Manitoba, $25; New Brunswick, $25; Nova Scotia, $30; Ontario, $28; Prince Edward Island, $25; Quebec, $25; Saskatchewan, $25. If hon. members are interested in the average paid in each province apart from the supplemental allowances, I can give the figures as of March 31 last: Alberta, $22.82; British Columbia, $23.55; Manitoba, $23.41; New Brunswick, $17.69; Nova Scotia, $18.06; Ontario, $23.09; Prince Edward Island, $18.53; Quebec, $22.54; Saskatchewan, $23; Northwest Territories, $24.55.

In November or December, 1941—whenever it was that I announced the government's policy—I also said that if all or substantially all the provinces wished us to agree to increase the maximum amount of pension payable we would give attention to doing that; and the provinces, somewhat slowly, began over the next year or year and a half to make requests that that be done. The last of these requests was received in July, 1943, and we passed an order in council increasing the maximum from $20 to $25 a month. There is some demand at the present time that the age be reduced from seventy to sixty-five years, and the decision of the government has been that they should pursue exactly the same course as they did with regard to the raising of the maximum payable, namely, that they should not attempt to force this on the provinces, it being primarily a provincial responsibility; that they should say to the provinces, as I said to the provinces the other day in the statement I made in this house, that if all or substantially all the provinces should make representations to the dominion government in favour of a reduction of the eligible age from seventy to sixty-five years the government would give consideration to those representations. That is just as I did before; and I do not think, if we are to keep our policy consistent, if we are to pursue a policy which will have regard to the position and rights of the provincial authorities and respect the provincial jurisdiction, we can do anything but that.

Mr. MARTIN: Has there been any reaction from any province yet?

Mr. ILSLEY: Not since I made the statement the other day; but three or four provinces had indicated previously that they would like to have the ages reduced—one of the provinces, I think to sixty years. But the position we felt we should take was very carefully thought out.

Mr. KNOWLES: On this same point may I ask the minister if any of the provinces at the same time are suggesting increasing the amount?

The ACTING CHAIRMAN (Mr. Golding): Order. The minister has listened patiently to a number of speakers, and I think he should not be interrupted.

Mr. ILSLEY: I believe certain provinces are requesting an increase in the amount. The provinces contribute only twenty-five per cent to all this, and requests come forward with considerable facility. In a good many cases they do not need very much encouragement. But that is the situation.

As I say, I think this is a reasonable course to pursue under the present system, the system of divided jurisdiction which we have had established here since 1926. Not only is it consistent but it is, I believe, the correct and proper course to pursue.

After we passed the order in council of last summer raising the maximum amount from $20 to $25, the question arose as to whether the permissible outside income should not be raised to $425. One or perhaps more than one of the provinces had asked that at the beginning, I remember particularly the province of Manitoba. They thought the matter through and coupled their request with a request for an increase in the maximum amount payable. But most of the provinces said nothing about that; the question was not discussed; and I did not feel free on a basis of general provincial consent to take that step, because it would be not only increasing the amount payable to existing pensioners but enlarging the class of pensioners, and would raise administrative burdens for the provinces as well as cast further expense on them. That was taken up later with the provinces by the dominion, and the other day, this order in council, which in a sense is consequential to the order in council of last summer, was passed having effect from April 1 or such later date as the province in any particular case might desire.

It has been suggested by one of the speakers that we should put these changes we have made into legislation, that we should amend the act.

Mr. NEILL: Hear, hear.

Mr. ILSLEY: Well, I do not like the act as it stands well enough to bring in amending legislation if we can help it. If we are to legislate on the subject of old age pensions, I should like to put something on the statute books more satisfactory than a patched-up 1926 Old Age Pensions Act; and I think, if there is patching-up to be done, it should be done by order in council.

Hon. gentlemen may be afraid that the authority for the orders in council will run out before there is a chance for legislation. Let me point out that the War Measures Act of the last war ran until some time in 1920—I have not the exact date—and there is no prospect of the present War Measures Act losing its effect for a very considerable length of time to come. It does not pass out at the end of the war or six months after; it passes out when the necessity for it, in the opinion of the government of the day, no longer exists.

Mr. MARTIN: Or when the courts say the necessity for it no longer exists?

Mr. ILSLEY: I do not think so. My hon. friend suggests that it is perhaps when the courts say the necessity for it no longer exists, but certainly there is a post-war period during which the War Measures Act will be in force, and I suggest that there is plenty of time for legislation such as this, and that we should not enact legislation for old age pensions until we have a more satisfactory system, jurisdictionally and otherwise, than we have at the present time.

Certain specific suggestions have been made during the course of the debate, and I will try to deal with a few of them. I cannot make any definite pronouncements on the suggestions which have been made, but in certain cases at least I am prepared to give them consideration.

One was that no rental should be charged up against the occupant of premises which he owns. Rental is charged up against them at the present time because of a regulation which was agreed upon by the provinces and the dominion, and I assume that that regulation was based upon the desirability of eliminating discrimination between pensioners who occupied their own property and those who roomed, or something of that kind.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Those who had to pay rent.

Mr. ILSLEY: One must be very careful in changing these regulations not to give rise to discrimination, because nothing creates a sense of injustice so much as discrimination.

Mr. GREEN: The home owner has to pay taxes.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Well, the roomer.

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes, but that is not equivalent. Taxes are merely a fraction of the occupancy value of the premises.

Another suggestion was with regard to dependents' allowance and assigned pay, and I should like to review that story. In the first place let us take the case of the person to whom the soldier assigns pay, there being no dependents' allowance. In that case it was considered, first, that it must be regarded as income. Then a great many cases came to the attention of the pension authorities in which these seemed to be the facts: it was found that in many cases pay was being assigned to persons who held the pay in trust for the assignors. That was particularly true in cases where there was no dependents' allowance. It was true in cases where there was no condition of dependency. So that it became impossible for the authorities to decide as to whether the assignee held the amount in trust for the assignor, or otherwise; and it was decided, therefore, in those cases to wipe it out as income altogether, and to consider it the property of the assignor, and not to consider it the income of the assignee.

The next case about which complaint is made in the house by a great many members is the one where there is no question of dependency, because dependents' allowance is being paid. It was considered that under the regulations, there being no question of dependency, the dependents' allowance board having decided that the assignee is a dependent of the assignor, in that case what the assignee received by way of dependents' allowance and assigned pay must be regarded as income. The result was that the old age pensions in some cases were cut out or reduced.

I am not just sure what the suggestions are that have been made in this debate, but I gathered from a remark made by one of the members that he thought possibly one should be considered as income, but not the other. Someone asked the question whether both were regarded as income. There is some argument for giving assigned pay the same treatment in a case where there is dependents' allowance as in a case where there is no dependents' allowance. There is some argument for that. But there is also some argument on the other side, too. All I can say about it is that I took to heart what some members said about this situation. It may be a little difficult to explain, and it may be thought there should not be strictness in adherence to the regulations. I would be prepared to give consideration to the suggestions which have been made, and see whether they can be squared with the regulations or, if not, whether the regulations should in some way be limited. But that would be a matter of agreement with all the provinces, as I have said before.

I wish to point out at once that if we build up too much the income of the mother of a member of the services, in proportion to the income of the mother of someone who is not a member of the services, but living next door, the latter-mentioned mother will say there is discrimination.

Mr. KNOWLES: Not in the case of assigned pay.

[Mr. Ilsley.]

Mr. ILSLEY: Perhaps not in the case of assigned pay. But if dependents' allowance were allowed to go you would have a lot of difference in the treatment of two old age pensioners who might be living side by side. That must always be considered when one considers amending regulations.

The hon. member for Macleod asked a specific question regarding to what property of the pensioner a lien attaches. That is a matter of provincial legislation. I presume the regulations in the various provinces are different. No lien is created by dominion legislation. The lien has to be created by provincial legislation, and they can make the lien attach to any property they wish. The most common provision is that it is a lien against the real or personal property of the pensioner.

Mr. REID: Could a province waive that right?

Mr. ILSLEY: Oh, yes, they can do that. I believe the dominion act says it is a debt, does it not?

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): All the provinces have liens, have they not?

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes, they all have liens, but they do not necessarily all have the same kind.

Mr. STIRLING: None of them exercise them, do they?

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Yes, they do.

Mr. STIRLING: British Columbia does not.

Mr. REID: The dominion gets the blame for the property clause.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I thought it was the other way around.

Mr. KNOWLES: Five of them do not.

Mr. ILSLEY: The relative provision of the dominion legislation creates a debt, but it does not create a lien. The lien is created by the province.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): It is a crown debt, and it is ahead of ordinary debts.

Mr. ILSLEY: Oh, no.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Oh, yes; a crown debt is ahead of my debt.

Mr. ILSLEY: The income tax people do not think so.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Well the courts have said so.

Mr. ILSLEY: That is a long story.

Mr. KNOWLES: I would remind the minister that his parliamentary assistant has already made that point clear. He referred to it on March 23, when the house was told in answer to a question of mine that it is now up to each province whether the crown files liens, at least up to a certain value.

Mr. ILSLEY: That is correct.

Mr. KNOWLES: And according to subsequent information given in answer to a question, it now appears that British Columbia, Alberta, Saskatchewan, New Brunswick and Nova Scotia do not file liens up to the specified amount, which seems to leave it that the other four provinces do still avail themselves of that privilege.

Mr. REID: Then it is not correct to say the property is taken away from the old age pensioners in those provinces?

Mr. POULIOT: Mr. Speaker—

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Has the minister finished?

Mr. ILSLEY: I am afraid I have stirred this up, all over again. We could go on all afternoon and evening. I shall have to answer new questions that are asked.

Mr. GREEN: I understand that the minister says he is in favour of having an amendment to the British North America Act to give the dominion exclusive jurisdiction over contributory old age pensions.

Mr. ILSLEY: That is correct.

Mr. GREEN: Does he mean that to include old age pensions to the people who would not be able to contribute to such a scheme? In other words, would the contributory scheme include all the persons who are now pensioners, or would it not? I do not know whether he thinks they, too, should come under the exclusive jurisdiction of the dominion.

Mr. ILSLEY: I certainly think they should. I think the dominion should have jurisdiction over the whole thing. The object would be eventually to work into a contributory scheme which would have very wide coverage. Of course it would not be contributory as far as present old age pensioners are concerned, because it is too late.

Mr. GREEN: If the dominion takes over contributory old age pensions it should also take over present old age pensioners.

Mr. ILSLEY: In some modified form, perhaps. But I would be in favour of the dominion dealing with old age pensions as a whole, because I do not think we can have a federal scheme and provincial schemes. We would just have confusion worse confounded.

Mr. GREEN: Take over everything.

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes.

Mr. GREEN: May I ask the minister—

The ACTING CHAIRMAN (Mr. Golding): Order.

Mr. GREEN: The minister said I could ask a question.

The ACTING CHAIRMAN (Mr. Golding): Order. Several times this afternoon the chair has requested that we do not get into a debate on contributory insurance, and it has been urged that we deal with this item.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): The minister said he was willing to answer questions.

The ACTING CHAIRMAN (Mr. Golding): It has been suggested several times this afternoon that we stick to a point under discussion, and I hope hon. members will do that.

Mr. GREEN: I have one other question.

Mr. KNOWLES: The minister did not stick to it.

Mr. GREEN: The minister has repeated this afternoon that old age pensions are in the same category as mothers' allowances and workmen's compensation. I wish he would go a little farther in his explanation of that statement, because actually the fact is that mothers' allowances and workmen's compensation are handled exclusively by the provinces. The dominion has nothing whatever to do with them and has never had. On the other hand, the dominion stepped in and passed the first Old Age Pensions Act and, as the minister said, is now paying three-quarters of the cost. Will he explain how he puts these three types of assistance on the same basis and then says that they are a provincial responsibility in each case?

Mr. ILSLEY: I have explained that repeatedly in other years. The dominion did what it did in 1926 in order to get the provinces going; that was why. The provinces got under way under their own steam in the matter of mothers' allowances and workmen's compensation, but they were not getting ahead with old age pensions. Therefore the dominion adopted the principle of paying part of the cost which we have all repeatedly said we do not like, just for the sake of getting the provinces going.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Would the minister in his scheme suggest that the provinces be relieved of all costs, administrative and otherwise, if they transferred their jurisdiction to the dominion?

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes, I would; but I wish to point out that that will be a big burden for the dominion to assume and it is tied up with financial adjustments and division of revenue fields and so forth with the provinces.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): You will have to ask them to give up something else.

Mr. ILSLEY: I do not know who will do the giving up. The two things are tied up to one another.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): No doubt about that.

Mr. ILSLEY: We have a fairly satisfactory arrangement with regard to taxation fields for the war period, but it expires at the end of the war, and we shall have to get our minds down eventually to the question as to what taxes may be imposed by what authority.

Mr. POULIOT: This act was, in the first place, dominion legislation. By that I mean that the first statute with regard to old age pensions was a dominion statute. I remember the day when the Hon. Peter Heenan, then Minister of Labour, went to Toronto to have the agreement signed with the Hon. G. Howard Ferguson, then premier of Ontario. Afterwards agreements were signed with the other provinces, and at the present time there is an old age pension scheme in every province.

The act was passed at a time when provincial rights were respected. It was not long after a judgment of the supreme court that was not appealed from by the government of the day, in which the respective powers of the dominion and the provinces were clearly stated. It is important to note that it was the then Minister of Labour who went to Toronto to sign the agreement with the premier of Ontario; it was not the Minister of Finance of the day. I do not know whether or not since that time pensions have been placed under the Minister of Finance. Perhaps they have been, but they were not at the time. The idea of putting the plan on a fifty-fifty basis with the provinces was precisely to respect provincial autonomy. The provinces were told that the dominion had passed legislation in virtue of which a subsidy of fifty per cent would be paid to the provinces if they agreed to it, and it was up to them to establish an old age pension scheme within their boundaries.

It took some time to have this scheme accepted by all the provinces, but finally it was. Then Mr. Bennett came into power. He also respected provincial autonomy, but increased the dominion contribution by twenty-five per cent, making it seventy-five per cent. What people do not understand is that the dominion is paying seventy-five per cent and the provinces only twenty-five per cent. They administer the whole thing. The dominion has no responsibility to the people with regard to the administration of the scheme, but on the other hand all the blame is put on the dominion by the provinces when a pension is refused. The provinces say the regulations that have been passed by Ottawa prevent us from granting a pension, and so on. That is the story. This is most unsatisfactory legislation.

I will tell you, Mr. Chairman, what I think of old age pensions. I think it is a good thing. I congratulate the minister for having raised the contribution from $20 to $25 a month. It was a good step, but the age should be lowered to at least sixty-five years for the old and in so far as the blind are concerned, as soon as a child is acknowledged by the doctor to be blind he should be entitled to a pension if his parents have not sufficient means to pay for his care. Distinction should be made between those who have some means and those who have none. We now come to a basis of contribution. I will not discuss the question of contribution at all. How is it possible for a man who has nothing, who is destitute, to pay a contribution toward old age pension? Those who have sufficient means may buy an annuity from the Department of Labour. It still exists. It does not come under the Department of Finance unless things have been changed. We are not fighting here the case of those who have a sufficient income on which to live or who have independent means. We are fighting the case of the poor who have not the means to pay a contribution, who are destitute and who must not be left on the street. They are old. They have rendered a certain service to the community and they deserve some help from the state. That is the purpose of the old age pension, as explained by the legislators and by the members of the government of the day when this act was passed. It is easy to see in the speeches made at that time by the present Prime Minister and the Hon. Peter Heenan who was then Minister of Labour that the purpose of the old age pension was to help those who had no means on which to live and who were destitute, who had no children who could help them.

There is another matter I should like to mention. To-day a twenty-dollar bill does not go any farther than a ten-dollar bill used to go. These people have expenses to meet. Even those who have not much to live on have to pay more for their food, clothes and so on. Therefore they need a certain increase. It is a matter that the minister has understood and I congratulate him upon having done so. It is essential for the government to understand that discrimination exists when men aged sixty-five do not get their pensions. How many suffer from rheumatism and are unable to work when they reach sixty, labourers, who did not save any money for their older days? I leave this to the minister's consideration. I hope he will realize the fact that the suggestion is unanimous; it has been made by all parties of the house.

There is perhaps this controversial question of dominion and provincial rights. The minister holds the view that this matter of old age pension should be under one jurisdiction. He is perfectly right. I agree with him; but we should not forget that taxation from which this old age pension is paid comes from the pocket of the Canadian taxpayer. The only question that arises as between a provincial payment and a dominion subsidy to the provinces is that of control. The taxpayer pays the same amount for the same purpose, but the question is whether the money is to be raised and controlled by the province or by the dominion. If the only purpose of the dominion government in establishing old age pensions was to see to it that the scheme was adopted by all the provinces, now that it has been so adopted; now that it is in force; now that it cannot be changed, surely that purpose has been realized.

How would it be possible to have the matter under one jurisdiction, which it is a desirable thing? It could be done by the Minister of Finance releasing a part of the taxation that formerly belonged to the provinces, to enable them to carry on the old age pension scheme. It is the easiest thing in the world. Take the succession duties, and things like that; if the minister would release the dominion succession tax and negotiate agreements under which the provinces would bind themselves to lower the age at which people could receive pensions, surely an agreement of that kind could be relied upon just as much as a treaty with a foreign nation. Why should provinces not be considered on the same footing as other countries? They are our own people; yet such a fuss is made when agreements are to be signed with the provinces. The time has come when our own people, the provinces of this country, should have priority over all other nations in their dealings with the dominion government. They are our own people; it is only natural that we should look after them; so why not do it in an orderly way? Some people in the Department of Finance like complicated matters; instead of simplifying the procedure and allowing the provinces to be masters of their own destiny they say, "Well, we will get the money and we will give it back to you." What is the reason for that transaction? Why keep accountants to write down the amount of money received on behalf of the provinces and the amount of money that is returned to the provinces?

In a nutshell what I have to suggest to the minister is this: reduce the age at which the blind may receive pensions, so that they may be paid even to infants and children whose blindness is certified by competent doctors; lower to sixty-five the age at which old people may receive pensions; give pensions only to those who need them, but give pensions to all who need them. Then start once more to respect provincial autonomy. Give the provinces an opportunity to collect the amounts of money they collected previously, so that this scheme may be operated by the provinces themselves to the great benefit of all concerned.

RATIONING OF BEER AND SPIRITS—CORRESPONDENCE BETWEEN PREMIER OF ONTARIO AND DOMINION GOVERNMENT TABLED

Mr. CRERAR: If I may revert for a moment to motions I should like to table the correspondence asked for this afternoon by the leader of the opposition (Mr. Graydon), which passed between the premier of Ontario and the government here on the matter of increasing the supplies of spirits.

At six o'clock the house took recess.

PRIVATE BILLS

GORE DISTRICT MUTUAL FIRE INSURANCE COMPANY

The house in committee on bill No. 40, respecting Gore District Mutual Fire Insurance Company.—Mr. Homuth—Mr. Bradette in the chair.

Sections 1 and 2 agreed to.

Preamble agreed to.

On the title.

Mr. MARSHALL: What is the capitalization of this company?

Mr. GRAYDON: I was hoping that my good fortune would be such that perhaps I would not be examined too closely upon the details of the bill which I have undertaken to sponsor on behalf of the hon. member for Waterloo South (Mr. Homuth). Perhaps my hon. friend would be content to take the undertaking that that information will be given to him in due course and the title might be permitted to carry in the meantime.

Title agreed to.

Bill reported, read the third time and passed.

PATENT APPLICATION OF CLAUDE H. PETERS

The house in committee on bill No. 94, respecting a certain patent application of Claude H. Peters.—Mr. McIlraith—Mr. Bradette in the Chair.

Section 1 agreed to.

On section 2.—Manufacture, use and sale commenced prior to February 15, 1944, by others may continue.

Mr. MARSHALL: What are the facts in connection with this patent?

Mr. McILRAITH: The bill merely permits the applicant for the patent to make application before the patent office in order that it may be dealt with there in the ordinary way. It does not confer any substantive rights at all. The patent has to do with air-conditioning equipment.

DEPARTMENT OF FINANCE

Old age pensions and pensions to the blind, $6,942,250.

Mr. NEILL: Mr. Chairman, I shall not long detain the committee. I listened with interest this afternoon to the explanations of the minister, more especially as regards the trouble he was encountering in dealing with this subject, which is under dual jurisdiction. He also stated that he personally was in favour, later on possibly, of a contributory scheme, that he would be in favour of it if the provinces would agree. I do not think there will be much trouble in the provinces agreeing. If you go to a man and ask him to pay his debts he may quibble; but if you offer to pay half his debts you are much more likely to get a favourable response. If you go to him and offer to pay the whole bill, I do not think there would be a great deal of trouble in getting his consent. The trouble in 1926 and 1927 was that while we fully recognized, as we do still, that it was the obligation of the provinces, we could not make the provinces recognize their obligations, or at all events they would not do anything about them. The only way we could get action was not by waiting, dallying along the primrose path, but by taking action ourselves, and so we drafted a bill and passed it and said: This we will do, and you can come in or stay out. British Columbia immediately came in, and the other provinces one by one followed suit.

The outstanding feature on which the minister has not been able to meet the representations made to him the other day was as to reducing the age limit. I think he might have given a lead to the provinces in this matter. Nothing is to be gained by waiting on the provinces, with the provinces waiting on somebody else, but just as when we passed an act and said to the provinces, "We will contribute fifty per cent" we got action because the people of the provinces stirred up their governments, so that I think in this case the Minister of Finance might give the provinces another lead by proposing to reduce the age limit. I think he said that three or four provinces were already agreeable to that.

When I was discussing old age pensions the other night I raised two points. One was the danger of losing the last five dollars that was added to the pension last year. I find that the Minister of Finance admitted last year, as he did again this afternoon. that the increase then put on would be liable to be taken off if legislative action was not taken at the end of the war or in the meantime. I foresaw the danger of putting this in as a sort of cost of living bonus item which would disappear with the disappearance of the War Measures Act. But now the minister says that the War Measures Act of 1914 lasted for some years after the end of the last war. Although I cannot find any record of that, I take his word for it. Then he said that there was no hurry, that no doubt the War Measures Act would extend beyond the end of this war and there was time to deal with any emergency at that time. I do not just see the point. This is not like an act. This has not been done by passing an act or by passing an order in council under the War Measures Act but merely by putting an item in the estimates which is contained in certain appropriations to be passed under the War Measures Act. Last year the minister simply rose in his place and did not consider it necessary even to put an item in the war appropriation. He simply said: We will take the necessary sum out of the war appropriation. There is no guarantee that he will do so this year. We have confidence in him, of course, but there is no obligation on him to do so. After the war other governments, with other minds, may come into power and may say: We will drop this; we have no authority to pass further items of this sort under the War Measures Act. They might even go further if challenged and say: It is obvious that the government that passed it did not intend it to be anything more than a temporary measure because they did not pass an act but simply put an item in the estimates, so that eventually it was nothing more than a temporary measure, a cost of living bonus, so to speak, which might be taken away. They would have a good argument in saying that.

The minister said that he did not like the act. But if we never voted for anything we did not like, sometimes governments would find their tenure of power somewhat slim. I think, with all deference to the minister, that was a weak argument. After all, it is only a small act and only a small amendment is required. If later on another act is necessary to bring in the contributory system the amendment would disappear with the disappearance of the act. Is there any harm in tying it up for the present in such a way that it will not disappear? Another, perhaps unsympathetic government might fall back on the contention that this was a temporary thing on account of war conditions and so on. I cannot see how my suggestion would do any harm; it would relieve these old people from the fear hanging over them that, for some minister's convenience in years to come, he might say, "Oh, times have changed; I am not going to put it in; what are you going to do about it?" We could do nothing about it; we could not point to a definite measure, unless passed the way I suggest. Therefore I urge that it would be a good thing to allow this simple matter to be inserted in the act itself.

If I were the leader of the party to my left I think I would be inclined to insist upon that, because I am sure it has the approval of the people as a whole. I would be inclined to say, "Well you have brought this in; you admit it is right; the people think it is right; you will put it in the act—or else". But of course that is for somebody else's judgment.

The second matter I brought up when I was speaking the other day—the minister did not allude to it—was that he should send this bill, and the regulations connected with it, which are the greatest source of trouble, to the committee appointed to deal with just such things; I mean the committee on industrial and international relations. It was dealt with on four different occasions, each time with some measure of profit, and out of the last discussion came the bill itself. There are a number of small matters which we have not time to thresh out here, nor is a committee of 245 members adapted to discuss them, but they could well be discussed in the committee to which I have referred.

I mention only one or two points, although I could cite half a dozen or more. Take the one which says that a poor old man may have 160 acres of wild bush land, not worth the paper that the title is written on, but it is assessed at, we will say, $1,000 and he has to pay $20 a year taxes on it. The pension board say, "You own that property, it is assessed for $1,000; therefore, we say you have an income from that useless land of $50 a year and we take that off the amount of pension you have been getting". On top of that his taxes are $20, so that he is "out" $70 a year on some land of which he long since got tired, and which never did have any value except in some optimistic hope twenty or thirty years ago. It may be said that he could sell it and get rid of it. But it is the sort of thing you cannot sell. I made written application to the government, signed by an old age pension applicant, who stated, "I hereby convey and grant all my right, title and interest in such a piece of land to the government." But the government were too smart They would not take it. They said, "Not for us; we know better than that, and we don't want it." The alternative was to let it go to tax sale, we were told, and he could thus get rid of it. But no; first, it would take two or three years to get rid of it in that way. There were hard times during the depression; perhaps an election was coming on, and the government did not hold tax sales, so that the wretched man could not let it go to a tax sale, since none was being held, and he was caught between the two dilemmas. He could not get out of it at all. He could not sell it; he could not give it to the government, and he could not let it go to the tax sale. Things like that are well worth consideration by the committee.

They are charged five per cent on land which is not producing anything. That charge should be abolished.

The other point to which I particularly wish to refer is the assessment of the land. We got the regulations changed so that it would not read, as at first, the assessed value, but would read, the assessed value or the market value, whichever was deemed to be the more equitable. I immediately jumped at that concession and said to myself, now we shall be able to get a pension for that man or woman, because the market value of the land is eighty cents and the assessed value is about $2,000. But the authorities would not do that, and said so. They told me, "We have the option." "No", I said, "the only option you have is to say which is the more equitable". They said, "It will save us trouble; we prefer to take the view that the assessors are men of ability and assess the land properly", and to this day they will not regard the equitable market value but insist on taking the assessor's value, although the regulations read that they must adopt whichever is deemed most equitable. Everybody knows that land in British Columbia is overassessed.

I could name several other things. I am sure the government does not want to give the impression that it is chiseling on these old people, and the people do not want the government to do that. However, you must go around and yell at them for a year or so, and perhaps in the end the government will give way.

When the act was first passed it read that the pension was to begin from the date of the man's first application. What did they do? They changed it by regulation to make the pension start from the day the board made its decision that the wretched man was entitled to it, and if they could prove that the poor man at some time was in Africa or some other remote place they kept writing to him for certificates on different things so that his grandchild would be more likely to get the pension than he would. And when they finally had decided, payment was made only from the date when it was decided to give it to him. I have known a man to wait for eight or nine months for his allowance, living meanwhile upon the charity of friends, and when he got his pension he was not able to pay the arrears for board and lodging because the pension was dated back only to the time when they decided that it was due.

Several other matters of this kind occur to me. By just going through the regulations the committee, I am sure, could make useful and reasonable recommendations. The government would have power to say yes or no; they could decide whether they approved the committee's suggestions; they could insist, the next time these local boards got together, on something like ordinary common sense being introduced. So that I say a great deal might be gained by the government allowing this matter to go to the committee. The government has a majority on the committee; I cannot see why they need fear our doing anything unreasonable about it, and it would certainly satisfy a great many people as regards the treatment they are getting, or not getting, under these regulations.

Mr. KNOWLES: There are a few remarks I should like to make following the interesting statement the minister made this afternoon. It was indeed a significant statement, particularly wherein he laid down the views which the government will probably present on this matter at the anticipated dominion-provincial conference. However, I should like to say in reply to his defence, in which he pointed out that this government has considerable trouble in getting the general consent of the provinces to some of the things it would like to do, that when we as members of parliament go back to our respective provinces and come up against the situation there, we find the provincial people telling us that the trouble is that Ottawa will not agree. The minister may say, and quite rightly, that this situation underlines the necessity for an over-all federal scheme, but in the meantime the poor old pensioner is being shuttled back and forth between Ottawa and the provinces.

I say that not just to be critical but as a basis for offering a suggestion in addition to some of the worth-while suggestions which the hon. member for Comox-Alberni has just made. The minister recently has followed a policy which I think might be pursued. He made it known that in the matter of filing liens against property henceforth the decision as to whether or not it would be done would be up to the provinces. Prior to that announcement the provincial government of Manitoba, the province from which I come, could always say, "Well, we have to file the lien because of section so-and-so of the act." Well, the other provinces, such as British Columbia, and some others, did not read the act in that way. Now this government has made it clear that, however the act may have been interpreted before, it is now understood that this matter is entirely up to the provinces.

Mr. ILSLEY: With the $2,000 limit.

Mr. KNOWLES: Yes. So far as the government of Manitoba is concerned, the responsibility has been located. No longer does it rest with this government on that point. It rests with the province of Manitoba to do the thing that British Columbia, Alberta, Saskatchewan and two or three other provinces have done.

Mr. NEILL: It never was compulsory.

Mr. KNOWLES: The statement that was made by the parliamentary assistant to the Minister of Finance on that point, on March 23 of this year, as reported at page 1742 of Hansard, was that whatever may have been the intention, there had been some confusion. Some provinces thought it was compulsory. But whatever may have been the case in the past, it has now been made clear by the action of this government that there is no compulsion on this point.

I suggest that the Minister of Finance do the same thing with respect to one of the regulations to which the hon. member for Comox-Alberni has just referred. I have in mind section 20 of the regulations which indicates when a pension shall commence. It states that the pension shall commence on the first day of the month following the month in which all necessary information and proof has been furnished, to the satisfaction of the pension authorities, or on the first day of the month following the month in which the applicant first becomes entitled, whichever is later.

As the hon. member for Comox-Alberni points out, this means that when the applicant for old age pension produces his evidence establishing his eligibility for a pension on the day he becomes seventy years of age, his pension is not made retroactive to the day he became seventy. It becomes effective only on the first day of the month after the month in which he finally got in all those documents to prove his eligibility at the age of seventy.

I know the provincial legislature of Manitoba has discussed this matter and feels that it is quite unfair. I know a resolution was sent down some time ago—probably it has been sent more than once—from the legislature of Manitoba asking this government to change the regulation. That is a regulation which is not in the act, mind you. But as yet nothing has been done. The province of Manitoba is still in a position to say, "We would do it, but for this federal regulation." I suggest again to the minister that he ask his officials who administer the Old Age Pensions Act to go through a number of these regulations to which his attention has been called in the debate. See if there are points like that, where announcements similar to the one about liens might be made, saying to the province, "Henceforth it is up to your administration. These are the limits within which you can go in interpreting these regulations."

I know the minister may point out that that makes it more patched up, perhaps, than it is already. It is pretty badly patched right now, and if these little adjustments would improve the situation, and take care of some of the grievances, then at least it means something to the old people in the meantime, many of whom will not live for that finer old age pension set-up, which we hope yet to see realized.

There are a number of minor points like that. For example, as I have pointed out before, if a person were born on the second day of the month, assuming he gets all the documents in on time, when he becomes seventy years of age and eligible for old age pension that pension could not commence—not according to the act, but according to these regulations—until the first day of the month after the month in which he became seventy. So that many a poor old person who may reach his seventieth year on the second or third day of the month is quite disturbed when he discovers that his pension does not become effective until the first day of the following month, and that the cheque will not be received until the 30th or 31st day of that following month. Those two months, to the old age pensioner, are two months for which he thought he was going to receive a pension. The amount of money involved is not very great. Once a pensioner is eligible for pension, and begins receiving his pension, that one month might in time be forgotten. But it is little grievances like that which create some of the difficulties, and I suggest that things of that kind should be straightened out.

When I discussed this matter on one occasion with the superintendent of old age pensions in Manitoba he produced correspondence between Manitoba and the administration in Ottawa of a good many years ago—I forget the date—showing that this decision as to the application of one's actual date of birth had been made as a matter of interpretation by the law officers of the administration. Therefore that bears out what is in my mind, namely, that many of these small grievances could be ironed out if the administration in Ottawa would comb them through and would advise the provincial old age pension authorities along the same line as the advice that was given a month or so ago with respect to the filing of liens.

Those adjustments, if they are all made, fall far short of the ideal picture of a better old age pension set-up, such as the minister described this afternoon. That is what we all want—a new and better plan. But he knows perhaps better than I do that the provincial problem comes in, and that it will take some time to work that out. That is why we hope that more of these so-called minor adjustments might be made right now. We shall have another opportunity to debate old age pensions this session, namely, when we reach the item in the civil estimates. I hope that before that time the minister may be able to make an announcement suggesting that some of the grievances have been adjusted.

Before I resume my seat I should like to add one comment. It is this: When the minister talks about throwing into the dominion-provincial conference, whenever it meets, the whole question of a better and more adequate old age pension scheme, and when in that connection he makes reference to the set-up in New Zealand, I would suggest to him that the mistake be not made again of setting up only a partial scheme. Reference has been made frequently to the opposition to a contributory scheme in this country, as compared with the well-known fact that in New Zealand the people gladly contribute. What is the difference? Is it because of a great difference between our people and the people over there? I think one of the real differences is that any schemes which have been talked about in this country have been partial—just old age pensions, or just unemployment insurance, or just health insurance. All one sees he can get as a taxpayer or as a worker, for his contributions, is protection against only one of the things which may happen to him.

Mr. REID: What about Great Britain?

Mr. KNOWLES: Great Britain has gone a good distance along that line, too. In New Zealand in particular the scheme is all-inclusive. It would take far more time than the Chairman would allow me to put on the record the list of things that are provided. It is all-inclusive protection; and I think, when the matter is discussed at the dominion-provincial conference, that way of doing things should be thrown into the discussion.

In the meantime, however, without arguing the detailed points, I welcome the general statement of the minister this afternoon, in which he took the position taken by many of us, that the time has come when measures such as our old age pensions legislation—and we say even more—should definitely be established on a dominion basis.

Mr. ILSLEY: There were two or three points raised in the last two speeches to which I think I should reply. I agree with the last speaker when he says that the officials in charge of the dominion administration of the old age pension scheme should take this debate, make a list of the suggestions, and prepare a report on them so that the government may decide which ones, if any, they would like to take up with the provinces. I think agreement on any substantial number of them would probably have to await the conference, but hon. members know that changes are made in the regulations from time to time as the result of correspondence. I think that would be a better course of procedure than to refer the matter to the committee on industrial and international relations. It is true that that committee could work out lines along which they would recommend that the government approach the provinces, but a more appropriate group to work out changes would be representatives of the provinces and the dominion. In the main the matters that the hon. member for Comox-Alberni speaks about are matters of provincial administration. It would appear to me more appropriate that the matter be taken up with the provinces than by a committee of this house.

There is one objection to putting more work on committees of this house. It means that the time of overworked officials is taken to attend and a large number of committees are now sitting. For my part I do not see what there is about a committee on industrial and international relations which makes it an appropriate body to consider old age pensions.

Mr. NEILL: Because it has dealt with it four times already.

Mr. ILSLEY: I am sure if I said that it would be argued that it was a very bad reason.

Mr. GRAYDON: It depends on who advances it.

Mr. ILSLEY: With regard to the other points raised by the hon. member for Comox-Alberni, the authority to continue the payment of $5 a month does not depend only upon items; it depends upon orders in council. Those orders in council have the force of law so long as the War Measures Act is in existence, and a vote would take place as a matter of course to carry out the provisions of the orders in council. Of course they do not have the permanency of legislation. Legislation would stay on the statute books until it was repealed, and the orders in council come to an end automatically with the end of the War Measures Act at some time in the future. But the point I was making this afternoon is this, that that time will not be very soon and I would hope that when this matter is dealt with by legislation it will be dealt with in a much more satisfactory and thoroughgoing way than by amendments of this type to the present act.

From my experience I do not think there will be any danger of any government dropping the $5. The whole trend is not that way, to say the least, and I think the picture that the hon. gentleman has drawn of some grasping, cheese-paring government coming in that will drop that $5 simply because it is paid by orders in council is one that will never become an actuality.

Mr. GRAYDON: The minister does not look for our hon. friends to the left to be elected.

Mr. ILSLEY: The other point made by the hon. member for Comox-Alberni is that we should take the position we took in 1926, namely, that we should say we will lower the age for any province that wants it. That would result in a patchwork of ages across the country. In some provinces they would start at sixty-five and in others they would start at seventy.

Mr. NEILL: Why not; it worked before?

Mr. ILSLEY: In 1926; but rightly or wrongly I gave that principle a great deal of consideration at the end of 1941 when the hon. member for Comox-Alberni urged us to do the same thing about the additional $5. I think what I said to him was that in time of war we did not want to swing that sort of club on provincial governments. I do not think we should have a different age for different provinces across the country. I think we should wait until the provinces are pretty well in agreement on this matter of ages, and therefore I put what I have said in regard to age in the same language exactly as I did in reference to the $5 increase. That is, when all or substantially all the provinces make representations in favour of a lower age limit we shall give those representations consideration. Otherwise acute provincial political issues are raised. I can remember all through the years provincial elections almost being run on whether they should come in under the old age pension scheme. I do not think we want to raise that kind of thing in time of war. I think we want to keep this thing as uniform as possible and to wait until there is some generality of demand by the provinces.

Mr. NEILL: The minister speaks of uniformity. Uniformity is not necessarily desirable. To-day we have anything but uniformity in the amounts paid by the different provinces, some as low as $11, others $19.80 or something like that. Conditions vary. Living conditions vary. It might not be desirable to have unanimity on the one fixed rate. In fact it would not be, because the cost of living in British Columbia far exceeds the cost of living in some of the other provinces.

Mr. ILSLEY: I think it is desirable to have a fixed rate in the dominion and a similar age. Then let the provinces go ahead and do as much more as they like. There is nothing to prevent the provinces themselves from bringing the age down to sixty-five or sixty now and paying the pension at that age. I do not say they should do that, although they have far more money than we have. All of them have large surpluses, and, as this committee knows, we have enormous deficits. Hon. members are pressing us all the time, nevertheless, to go into that field and do it all ourselves when the provinces should take the load.

Mr. GRAYDON: Could the minister give the committee any hint as to when this long looked-for dominion-provincial conference is to take place?

Mr. ILSLEY: As soon as we can get around to it. I am not in a position to make a statement on that. A statement could be made if the hon. gentleman wants it, not on the time, but on the present stage of the negotiations with the provinces.

Mr. GRAYDON: Perhaps I had better ask a question of the Prime Minister on that?

Mr. ILSLEY: Whatever the hon. gentleman would like to do.

Mr. JOHNSTON (Bow River): The minister said there is nothing to stop the provinces from lowering the ages to sixty-five or sixty under the present set-up if they want to do so. The dominion would not pay its share for those new applicants?

Mr. ILSLEY: No; it would not pay anything.

Mr. JOHNSTON (Bow River): Therefore if the provinces lowered the age they would have to assume full responsibility—

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes.

Mr. JOHNSTON (Bow River): —for those who came in under that lower age?

Mr. ILSLEY: Exactly. I do not think I have anything more to say to the hon. gentleman. He has made certain suggestions about the time of the beginning, and all that sort of thing?

Mr. KNOWLES: I have one question to ask the minister, although when I read Hansard I may find that the answer is there. Did the minister agree with me to the point of giving an undertaking that he would have the departmental officials comb through those regulations and see what could be done about straightening out some of the grievances with a view to communicating further clarifications to the provinces?

Mr. ILSLEY: We are communicating with the provinces all the time more or less about this. There is a vast amount of correspondence with the provinces going on all the time. What I said was this: I would ask the officials to take this debate and make a list of the suggestions made in it, make a report on those suggestions; that is, say what they thought of them. We do not take the position that we will do anything with regard to these regulations that the provinces want us to do. It is sometimes right when the provinces or particular provinces say they would like to do so-and-so, for the dominion not to do it. Sometimes that is correct. I do not say their suggestions are not always correct, but there are ten views to reconcile with regard to those regulations, the views of nine provinces and the dominion. Sometimes you get them in agreement and sometimes you cannot.

Mr. MARSHALL: I should like to ask the minister a couple of very simple questions. My views are well set in regard to old age pensions; I want the age lowered and the amount increased. The first question I wish to ask the minister is: how much was allotted for this purpose up to March 31, 1944, and of that allotment how much was actually spent? I shall have another question to ask when this is answered.

Mr. ILSLEY: The hon. gentleman is speaking about old age pensions alone, is he?

Mr. MARSHALL: The list which appears at page 395 of Hansard shows the amount of $6,942,250 for old age pensions and pensions for the blind for 1944-45. Nothing at all is shown for 1943-44, which would lead one to believe that no allotment was made last year and no money was spent up to March 31 of this year. The question I am asking now is, what allotment actually was made and what amount of money was expended.

Mr. ILSLEY: Under the order in council of last August, passed under the War Measures Act, $4,500,000 was allotted from the war appropriation and $2,943,494.16 was spent; that is, for old age pensions.

Mr. MARSHALL: And pensions for the blind?

Mr. ILSLEY: The allotment for pensions for the blind was included in the $4,500,000 that covered both. The amount expended on pensions for the blind up to March 31, 1944, was $118,660.21.

Mr. MARSHALL: According to the statement made by the minister the other day, liens are not filed against the estates of these old people by the dominion government on amounts of less than $2,000.

Mr. ILSLEY: To get the groundwork right, the dominion government does not file any liens against anybody.

Mr. MARSHALL: That is my understanding; if any liens are filed, that is done by the provincial government.

Mr. ILSLEY: Right.

Mr. MARSHALL: Has the dominion government collected anything from old age pensioners, through the provinces, on account of the money that has been expended by the dominion? If so, what amount has been collected, say up to March 31, 1944?

Mr. ILSLEY: Does the hon. member mean altogether, or for the one year?

Mr. MARSHALL: I should like to have it for last year, and if the minister has the total to date I should like that as well.

Mr. ILSLEY: I have not the figures here; I have seen them, but I would not like to give them from memory. It is true that some money has been collected from estates of deceased pensioners, of which seventy-five per cent has been paid to the dominion government.

Mr. MARSHALL: Would the minister bring down those figures? I should like to have them.

Mr. ILSLEY: I had better send them to the hon. gentleman; there will not be time to bring them down during this debate.

Mr. MARSHALL: All right; thank you.

Item agreed to.

Payments to millers and other manufacturers of wheat products, $15,000,000.

Mr. ILSLEY: I wish to make a statement on this. A statement never has been made to the house, and I feel that the country is indebted to the millers for the cooperation they have given in this matter.

These payments relate to the maintenance of the price ceiling, but are shown separately because they are administered by the Canadian wheat board on behalf of the Minister of Finance. As hon. members are aware, flour prices are not permitted to rise above those prevailing in the base period, September 15 to October 11, 1941. Wheat prices, however, have not been subject to the same degree of control; and when in August, 1942, the Canadian wheat board initial price was raised to ninety cents for No. 1 northern in store, Fort William, flour millers were subjected to a serious squeeze. After an investigation by the wartime prices and trade board into milling costs it was decided to make payments to flour millers and other manufacturers of products using western wheat in respect of their domestic sales at a rate equal to the difference between the average monthly price of No. 1 northern wheat and 77⅜ cents, which was the highest price recorded in the base period when flour ceilings came into effect. This basis of payment was in effect for the year beginning August 1, 1942.

An important change in the basis of payment was made on August 1, 1943. It had been recognized that millers could not be expected to produce flour for sale in the domestic market if they were unable to obtain western wheat at prices appropriate to the flour ceilings. Some mills, however, as a result of war conditions, were enjoying very large and increased export business, which enabled them to earn excess profits. Most of these increased exports are for Britain and are being financed, in part at least, by Canada. Under these circumstances it was difficult to justify payments to mills earning excess profits even though such profits may be attributable to the export business. After discussions with most of the mills principally affected it was decided to continue payments on the same basis as in the previous year but subject to the refund of any payments contributing to profits taxable at the rate of 100 per cent under the Excess Profits Tax Act. The net effect of this is that the mills will sacrifice the twenty per cent refundable portion of the 100 per cent excess profits tax on any government payments that would have contributed to profits in excess of 116⅔ per cent of standard profits.

I always intended to say on some occasion, and I want to say now, that I greatly appreciate the cooperation the millers have given the government in this matter.

Mr. ROSS (Souris): This item of $15,000,000 is for 1944-45, but there is no item in the 1943-44 column. I was not quite able to follow the minister's statement, in view of a return which was brought down on March 6.

Mr. ILSLEY: The allocation took place in August, for some reason or another. I do not know why there was not some allocation in the spring, at the time we presented our war appropriation for 1943. That is the point the hon. gentleman is making, is it not; that there was no allocation last year with which to compare it?

Mr. ROSS (Souris): Yes.

Mr. ILSLEY: It may be that we expected that subsidy to come out of the subsidies payable by the wartime prices and trade board. That is the explanation which occurs to me.

Mr. ROSS (Souris): It would be the Commodities Prices Stabilization Corporation?

Mr. ILSLEY: We expected that would be the source of the subsidy, but the wartime prices and trade board did not do it under the corporation, so that later in the year we got an allotment out of the war appropriation, which does not show in the figures presented to the house in the spring of 1943.

Mr. ROSS (Souris): Is it expected that this $15,000,000 will take care of all subsidies for the next calendar year?

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes.

Mr. ROSS (Souris): In a return brought down on March 6 of this year I asked this question:

How many bushels of wheat were used by the millers of Canada during each of the years 1942 and 1943?

The answer was:

1942—93,134,762 bushels;
1943—108,448,431 bushels.

The prices prevailing over the subsidy paid for 1942 and 1943 varied all the way from 11⅝ cents to 30⅝ cents. The subsidy paid last January on this same basis on No. 1 at Fort William was 47⅝ cents and on durum, 52⅝ cents. I suppose that will prevail right through and be based on the $1.25 price. I assume there is just as good a demand for flour now as there was in those years.

Mr. ILSLEY: The hon. gentleman has not taken into account the profit control factor of the arrangement. The subsidy is reckoned on the basis of the difference between 77⅞ cents and $1.25, but the arrangement made with the millers for the present grain year which ends July 31 is that that amount will be reduced by the extent to which their profits exceed 116⅔ per cent of their standard profits.

Mr. ROSS (Souris): Excess profits.

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes. That is the reason why I expressed my appreciation of what the millers are doing, because it really worked out to reduce their profits on their export business although this is a subsidy in respect of domestic business. I do not know whether that arrangement can be continued for another year, because there is considerable objection to it by some millers, but they have been very fair to date; I will say that.

Mr. ROSS (Souris): I was just asking for information. Have you figured out on a monthly basis the refunds made on the excess profits up to the end of the year?

Mr. ILSLEY: It would have to be at the end of the financial year.

Mr. WEIR: I am sorry I did not hear all of the minister's statement. Does this arrangement take into consideration the mills grinding only for domestic use as well as those in the export business? I am thinking particularly of the small mills in the west who would not be in export business. I wanted to know if this arrangement worked out on the same basis as it does for the exporting mills.

Mr. ILSLEY: They get the full subsidy except to the extent that the subsidy might push them up above 116⅔ per cent of their standard profits. It does not make any difference whether they are in the export business or not; it is simply that the export end of the business has been more profitable for most companies and that is how a reduction in subsidy was obtained.

Mr. SENN: Would the eastern mills grinding winter wheat for pastry flour enjoy this subsidy as well as the western mills that are grinding hard wheat?

Mr. ILSLEY: I think so, although I do not know. The idea of the subsidy is that they must sell their flour for what it sold for in the basic period, and therefore they have to buy wheat at the price they were buying it for in the basic period, or at something near that figure. I should think they would have to be subsidized if wheat has gone up in price. It may be that it has not, because I understand that wheat in Ontario was fairly high during the basic period.

Mr. ROSS (Souris): I understand that millers are subsidized on the same basis and that there is no distinction between the different mills as referred to by the hon. member for Macdonald.

Mr. ILSLEY: That is right.

Item agreed to.

Housing conversion programme, $3,755,000.

Mr. NOSEWORTHY: Would the minister give us the statement as to what has been achieved under this programme.

Mr. ILSLEY: I will give a statement of the houses converted into apartments and those under construction as of April 30, 1944:

Completed and occupied April 30, 1944	Houses	Apartments provided
Quebec	2	16
Montreal	8	66
Ottawa and Hull	17	94
Toronto	7	25
Hamilton	9	46
Brantford	3	15
Vancouver	9	80
Victoria	5	24
	60	366
Under construction
Quebec	9	120
Montreal	20	140
Ottawa and Hull	2	19
Toronto	2	16
Hamilton	3	19
Kingston	2	18
Galt	1	5
Fernie	2	44
Vancouver	21	298
Victoria	7	72
	69	751

If we add those that are completed and occupied to those under construction we get 129 houses to provide 1,117 apartments.

Mr. HAZEN: Have any steps been taken to bring this plan into operation in the maritime provinces? I remember some time ago I wrote to the officer in charge about some reconstruction in Saint John, and if my memory serves me correctly he told me that he was on his way to British Columbia but that when he returned he hoped to go to the maritimes to look into the situation there.

Mr. ILSLEY: The extension of the plan to Moncton, Saint John and Halifax is authorized, but no work has yet been done in any of those cities.

Mr. MacNICOL: What is the total number of apartments?

Mr. ILSLEY: The total number of apartments provided or being provided is 1,117 from 129 houses.

Mr. MacNICOL: That makes an average of from two to three thousand dollars apiece. The total amount is $3,755,000.

Mr. ILSLEY: I have not given any figures of cost.

Mr. MacNICOL: The figures are here—housing conversion scheme, $3,755,000.

Mr. ILSLEY: That is not what has been done. That is for the current year.

Mr. MARSHALL: How much was spent last year?

Mr. ILSLEY: The total expenditure to the end of March was $842,201.48.

Mr. MARSHALL: How does this scheme differ from the national housing scheme, the wartime housing plan and the home improvement plan? Is it a different scheme entirely?

Mr. ILSLEY: Oh, yes; it differs in an infinite number of ways.

Mr. MARSHALL: Cannot one tie in with the other?

Mr. ILSLEY: It is nothing like the others. Under this the government leases large houses for a number of years, converts them into apartments and then rents the apartments at an amount estimated to bring the government out even at the end of five, six, seven or eight years. The government agrees to turn the property back to the owner in its converted condition at the end of that time.

Mr. MARSHALL: Is it not possible to consolidate some of these housing schemes?

Mr. ILSLEY: No; this is not like any of the others, and none of the others are alike.

Mr. MacNICOL: What is the number of applications for this year?

Mr. ILSLEY: Does the hon. member mean tenants, or property owners, or cities?

Mr. MacNICOL: How many applications from Toronto, say, to convert these large houses into apartments, and how many apartments is it anticipated will result from conversion in the city of Toronto this year?

Mr. ILSLEY: There are no applications. The government has to take the initiative—I would not say that that is 100 per cent the case. In Toronto the number of units occupied on May 1 was thirty-four; the number of units under construction sixteen, and the number of additional units estimated to be under construction before December 31, 1944, 166.

Mr. POULIOT: Housing is an urgent matter to a large number of Canadian citizens, and there is no reason why members of parliament should be deprived from taking advantage of housing legislation. It seems to me that it would be in order to amend the Senate and House of Commons Act to allow members of parliament to enjoy the same rights as any other Canadian citizen to live in houses of their own under the government housing scheme. Members of parliament should not be permitted to take advantage of the legislation to build apartments or houses to rent out. I hope the minister will consider the matter and give his thought to it so that housing of which we hear so much may become an accomplished fact in the near future. To my knowledge people are living in sheds and barns. That may do in the summer but people should have better accommodation than that in the winter. The minister is open-minded and, I am sure, will realize that fact, and I trust that he will consider favourably the suggestion I have made regarding members of parliament and members of the senate as well.

Mr. ILSLEY: The difficulty is the Independence of Parliament Act, is it?

Mr. POULIOT: Exactly.

Mr. ILSLEY: That can be given consideration, but I do not know that we would be justified in bringing in an amendment to the act.

Mr. POULIOT: Let me explain to the minister. Suppose that a member of parliament is a tenant and wants a home of his own. He would be satisfied with a modest little home just the same as the labouring man or anybody else in this country. All other Canadians can take advantage of the housing schemes, and I do not see why the Independence of Parliament Act should not be amended to permit a member of parliament to have his own little home under a government housing scheme the same as any other Canadian citizen.

Mr. ILSLEY: Some members might say that they are entitled to have their own little contracts with the government just like any other Canadian citizen, but they cannot.

Mr. POULIOT: I have been told that some members of parliament are shareholders in companies which build a lot of these houses, and have contracts for building from twelve to twenty houses. If they can do that, why cannot a member of parliament have his own little house?

Mr. REID: In connection with the renovating of old homes on the Pacific coast complaint is made that they are allowed a rental which represents a ten per cent increase over the rental of modern apartments in the same vicinity. A great deal has been said regarding the plight of tenants and no doubt much may be said on their behalf. On the other hand, something may be said for landlords who own houses. I know of one landlord who rented a house for $25 a month. The man to whom he has rented it draws $80 a month from that same house. The landlord pays all the taxes and all the upkeep and takes all the responsibility for $25 a month, while the man who has the house lives in a two-room suite in the basement, rents the rest of the house, and draws $960 a year in rentals. That is a serious complaint.

Mr. ILSLEY: That has nothing to do with this plan.

Mr. REID: It comes under the renovation of homes. Why should old homes that are renovated be allowed a higher rental than modern suites right in the same vicinity?

Mr. ILSLEY: I know there was complaint in Vancouver. I did not hear it from anywhere else. We went into that very carefully and I thought I had it straightened out. I know the housing administration agreed with the wartime prices and trade board that they would not transgress the rental ceiling regulations, and I have every reason to believe that they carried out that agreement. They say they have anyway.

Mr. KNOWLES: As the minister has already indicated, this housing conversion programme is just one of the ways in which the government has tried to do something about the housing situation in time of war. The minister has already announced in this chamber that certain other steps will be taken in due course. As he knows, in practically all our cities our local municipal people are quite concerned about the housing situation. Many municipal councils and voluntary bodies are giving a great deal of study to the whole question. Bearing in mind the fact that the minister and his officials will be giving consideration to ways and means of supplementing this part of the programme with other housing legislation, I should like to draw to his attention two suggestions which have been placed in my hands, with the thought that consideration might be given to them now, in advance of the presenting of that legislation.

The first suggestion is contained in a resolution sent me by the Winnipeg council on rehabilitation and post-war reconstruction, which is one of the voluntary bodies to which I referred a moment ago. I will quote the resolution:

> Whereas there are at all times considerable differences in the cost of identical structures in the various cities and provinces of Canada,
> And whereas unavoidable variations also arise from differences in climate, subsoil, drainage and other physical factors,
>
> Resolved that this council urge parliament, in its revision of the housing acts, to take these regional differentials into account in:
> a. Setting the upper limit of cost-per-unit for low-rental housing projects, and > b. Prescribing the lending values and the maximum amount of individual loans on single-family units.

The other suggestion I would make to the minister in advance of any legislation which may be brought down is, in my view, an urgent matter. I endeavoured to ask a question about it the other day, but it was intimated that I might ask it in another way, and I put it to the minister now. In view of the announcement made by the government, which announcement we welcome, to the effect that something is to be done about housing, there is an increasing demand for building lots upon which homes may be built in various cities, and that increasing demand results immediately in the prices of these building lots starting to go up.

Mr. ILSLEY: Are they actually going up?

Mr. KNOWLES: I have been advised by at least one real estate agent—of all people—in the city from which I come that that is taking place right now, and the fear was expressed to me that it would nullify to some extent the advantages of the government's housing proposals. My suggestion is that it might be proper and consistent with what the government is doing to arrange for the freezing of prices of lots available for the erection of new homes. The price at which lots would be frozen would have to be related to something—the assessed value, or the value of the home to be built, or as the minister might determine. It seems to me that the question should be considered along with other plans for helping to relieve the housing situation.

Mr. ILSLEY: I will ask the officials for a report on that proposal. We considered it in the past and thought it was entirely impracticable, and I think still it may be entirely impracticable, but I will not shut my eyes to the possibility of something along that line being done. I can see plenty of grief ahead if we try to place a price on real estate.

Mr. KNOWLES: I will tell the minister privately from whom the suggestion came.

Mr. GRAYDON: I am very much interested in the suggestion of the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre, and I ask him—only for information with respect to it—to what basic period would he hitch the price in a freezing arrangement for real estate? Good as the plan may be—and I understand what he has in mind—the difficulty will be to find some base upon which to set the price at which the land will be frozen. Has he any practical suggestion with respect to that?

Mr. KNOWLES: This problem is one which literally is as old as the hills, namely, the way in which land values rise when a demand is created in this way. It strikes me that some such period as the present time, or the period just prior to the recent announcement of the proposals by the government for the building of homes, might be a suitable time. The difficulty involved was my reason for suggesting, when I spoke earlier, that the problem would have to be worked out by the department, preferably with reference to one of the bases I suggested, but it seems to me that it should be tackled, lest some of the good involved in the government's plan be lost in these increased prices of building lots.

Mr. FRASER (Peterborough West): I do not think there is any increase in the cost of building lots. I know of a great number of lots in Toronto, Hamilton and Peterborough which would sell now for much less than they did away back in the boom days. Some lots which cost as much as $500 can now be bought for $50 or $100. People are glad to get rid of them; they cannot carry them because of the income tax.

Sundries, $178,720.

Mr. MacNICOL: Of what is this amount made up?

Mr. ILSLEY: Expenses of administration, employee's plan, $164,220; overseas cheque adjustment branch office, $3,500; payment of premiums on the purchase of Dominion of Canada registered stock, $1,000; payment of losses of remittances for war savings certificates and stamps, $8,000; miscellaneous small loses on war savings certificates, stamps, et cetera, $2,000; total, $178,720.

Mr. MacNICOL: How would the losses in connection with the stamps occur?

Mr. ILSLEY: The $8,000 is to provide for payment of losses of remittances for war savings certificates and losses by fire or theft of war savings stamps or proceeds of the same in accordance with order in council P.C. 117359 of August 9, 1942. It is estimated that the average monthly loss will be between $650 and $700.

DEPARTMENT OF MINES AND RESOURCES

Surveys and engineering branch—
Prince Rupert–Terrace–Cedarvale highway, $3,000,000.

Mr. MacNICOL: About how many miles of the road are completed? I understood it was to be finished a year ago. Is it still under construction?

Hon. T. A. CRERAR (Minister of Mines and Resources): The total mileage of road to which we are committed in the construction is 110 and one-third miles. That includes the road from Rupert to Kitwanga.

Mr. MacNICOL: Alongside the river.

Mr. CRERAR: No; it is alongside the railway, and in some places alongside the river. When this matter was under discussion the other evening it was urged, I believe by almost all members from British Columbia, that the government should be a little more generous in reference to this road in northern British Columbia. I explained to the committee at that time the genesis of the road, and I need not repeat it now. It is true that, if not wholly, at least largely the military needs have disappeared.

Mr. GREEN: We hope.

Mr. CRERAR: Yes, as we see it at the moment. I have gone into the matter since we discussed it before, and although it is difficult to make a definite statement now, possibly we may be able to save something on the amount appropriated for the maintenance of this 110 miles of road. That depends on weather conditions and on spring freshets which may carry out small bridges and culverts. There is the possibility, however, that the amount estimated may not all be required. If it is not, then I am quite willing to say to the government of British Columbia that if they will duplicate what we provide for the measure of rehabilitation of the road from Kitwanga to Hazelton, which was the contention advanced the other night, we shall be prepared to go ahead. I justify that solely on the possibility that the road may yet have to serve a military purpose.

I understand that on the Kitwanga-Hazelton section there is a road of sorts in existence, and that the work to be done is that of rehabilitation and bringing it up to a higher standard, with particular attention to a few short distances which under certain weather conditions are almost impassable. It was the intention of the government to bring the matter to the attention of the government of British Columbia. After all, for military purposes we have spent something like $11,000,000 —or will have spent it—on this stretch of road including maintenance. And when the war ends it is scarcely to be expected that the federal government would maintain it. It would then be the responsibility of the province, and the road will be handed over to the province without any expectation of repayment.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: Is that the complete road?

Mr. CRERAR: The road as it is—as it will be completed.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: What good will it be that way?

Mr. CRERAR: The completed road?

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: No; it is not completed.

Mr. CRERAR: I am speaking of the section we are completing. This road was built for military purposes. When the military need disappears the road is turned over to the province, without any expense. In effect, what happens is that, because of the military need for this road, British Columbia gets over 111 miles of completed road which cost over $10,000,000, and we are not asking the province to repay any of it.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: Well, why should they?

Mr. CRERAR: I am not suggesting that they should. I believe I have covered the information the hon. member wants.

Mr. GREEN: Will the dominion maintain the road until the conclusion of the war with Japan?

Mr. CRERAR: I will not attempt to make any prediction now as to what may be done next year. There is in this vote an amount that our engineers estimate will be sufficient to maintain it for the present fiscal year.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: I should like to ask a question. Probably the hon. member for Skeena would like to speak.

Mr. HANSON (Skeena): The explanation given by the minister seems to be satisfactory. He says they are going to complete the road, and he hopes they will have ways and means to fix up the gaps on the provincial highway. Probably we should not expect him to go farther than that.

Mr. POULIOT: I have no objection to that road. On the other hand I cannot see why nothing has been done in connection with an old military road between Rivière du Loup and Madawaska, through Edmundston, and so on. It is an old military road, part of route No. 2, and the government has not done anything in connection with it. For some time money was spent on the trans-Canada highway. The province of Ontario had millions upon millions of dollars, and the province of Quebec had very little. We are now at war. We have a military road in the east, offering the best outlet between the St. Lawrence and the state of Maine. We have as our ally the United States, and there is a good deal of traffic in that locality. When military trucks go to Halifax they pass that way, because it is the shortest route. It is protected, and I cannot see why something is not done for that route.

I now bring the matter to the attention of the minister. He is a broadminded man, and has already done some things at my request. They were not big, in themselves, but I appreciated them just the same as if they had been very big. I hope this time he will realize the importance of this connecting link between the St. Lawrence river, particularly the county of Témiscouata, and the county of Madawaska, from which the Minister of Transport comes.

When one of the minister's lamented colleagues was Minister of Labour, the Hon. Mr. Rogers, some intrigue was made to change the course of that highway. Mr. Rogers would not allow it. He understood the strategic importance of the road. His opinion was most valuable from a strategical point of view, because afterwards he was appointed as the one and only Minister of National Defence, at the start of the war. He had as much military experience in his own head as the three present war ministers have now. And for all those considerations I hope the minister will pay due attention to the matter, consider it and recommend it to his colleagues, for the best interests of this country.

Mr. CRERAR: The road to which the hon. member from Témiscouata refers is one that certainly should have consideration in the post-war development of this country. As my hon. friend has quite properly stated, it will be recalled that from 1936 on, the federal government made a contribution to the various provinces to assist in building what were known to be tourist roads, or roads which might serve tourist purposes. I certainly hope—and I am expressing my own personal views—that consideration will be given to that when the war is over.

But the road we are now considering, from Kitwanga to Prince Rupert, was not assisted because it would develop into a tourist route. The purpose of this expenditure was purely military. If that necessity had not arisen I can say to the committee that the government would not have spent a dollar on this road. I hope that explanation will satisfy my hon. friend to some extent.

Mr. POULIOT: I think the minister is halfway to conversion, but I would tell him that the hon. members from British Columbia have insisted all the time that there was a danger to their shores, and so on. I supported them, but when it comes to the east we are very much exposed. The hon. member for Gaspé and I were laughed at when we spoke of the danger. We do not know the future. We do not know what the enemy contemplates doing on the eastern coast. The war is not yet over. The Prime Minister told us not long ago that the war was far from won and that we would still have a long time to fight before it was won. Mr. Churchill said the same thing. I am not asking this from the tourist point of view. I ask it for the army men who travel there in their trucks and bring ammunition and other war materials. I had hoped that the minister would understand it. I know it is easier for him to understand those problems than any one of the three war ministers, and that is why I ask him to-night. I do not object to what has been done for Prince Rupert and British Columbia, but there is a possible danger in the east. I am not a scaremonger, but I can use the same language as western members have used.

Mr. HANSON (Skeena): You have no Japanese.

Mr. POULIOT: No; but the Germans came close to our shores and it is precisely because the hon. member for Gaspé and I insisted on better protection that the danger was not so serious last summer. I will tell the hon. member for Skeena that I do not object to what has been done for his constituency. The Japanese have their eyes not only on Prince Rupert. We do not know what is in the mind of the enemy. We must be ready to repel any attack, and as we boast of our friendship and amity with the United States the first thing we should expect is good roads to connect the two countries. I would think it foolish to ask something only for my constituency. I do not ask it only for my constituency; I ask it for eastern Canada because it is the best link between United States and Canada. I bring it to the attention of the minister in the hope that something will be done in that regard.

Mr. MARSHALL: I have one simple question to ask the minister. I understand that a substantial amount of money, something over a quarter of a million dollars, was advanced to contractors to purchase machinery on this road. How much of this money has been paid back and how much remains unpaid?

Mr. CRERAR: If I understood my hon. friend's question aright it was, did the government purchase machinery?

Mr. MARSHALL: The government advanced a sum of money in excess of a quarter of a million dollars to purchase machinery. Of this amount a certain quantity has been recovered. How much has been recovered and how much is outstanding?

Mr. CRERAR: There was an amount of $210,000 of machinery purchased or provided by the department. That was charged up against the contracts.

Mr. MARSHALL: It does not seem to be right, somewhere or another.

Mr. CRERAR: I cannot hear my hon. friend.

Mr. MARSHALL: On page J-63 of the auditor general's report for the year 1943, there appears this item:

> Recoverable expenditure in connection with purchase of machinery on behalf of contractors amounting to $258,598.44 of which $152,576.16 has been recovered, leaving a balance of $106,022.28 outstanding.

Of that debt, how much is still outstanding?

Mr. CRERAR: I am advised it is all paid back. There was some question of priorities. It was essential that the contractors get the machinery. They were unable to do so. The department was able to get the necessary priorities for the purchase of the machinery and it was turned over to the contractor. It has all been paid back. That is the advice my officers give me.

Mr. MARSHALL: I am not questioning the transaction. I asked if it had been cleared up.

Mr. CRERAR: I can say to my hon. friend that I am advised it has been all cleared up.

Item agreed to.

Employment of persons of the Japanese race and/or Japanese nationals, $1,000,000.

Mr. NEILL: Mr. Chairman, I will not detain the committee, and I do not propose to reopen the whole Japanese question because we discussed it the other day and we rested on the promise of the then acting leader of the government that we would have a definite statement of policy from the Prime Minister later on. I am rising to-night only to make a correction in a statement that has been very much circulated. I might pause here for a minute to say I wonder why it is that whenever this subject comes up the information furnished to the public is so very often misleading and invariably misleading in favour of our Japanese enemies. The hon. member for New Westminster in his speech the other day said, I think, that there was a group of officials in Ottawa—I do not exactly know how he put it —who were very, very sympathetic to the Japanese. I begin to think he is right.

As I say, why is it that information is always or often at any rate false and apparently so absolutely innocent. The other day the Minister of Labour made this statement. I am sorry he is not in his seat at the moment, but before I say what I am going to say, may I say that I am perfectly certain he did not intend to deceive the house when he made his statement. He is not built that way. Before he made the statement he expressed sympathy with our point of view. He said, as reported in Hansard, that seventy-five per cent of the Japanese in the dominion were born here. Well, that is absolutely and entirely false. That is all that is wrong with that. The correct figure is twenty-eight per cent—a vast difference. Once you start a lie going, goodness knows how far it will go. I repeat that the minister did not make that false statement wilfully. He just repeated what somebody else had handed him. Some day in the distant future perhaps we shall be able to get around to those officials alluded to by the hon. member for New Westminster and deal with them adequately. Look how it spreads. Here is an article in "Canada at War." It is supposed to be an accurate description, of course, of our efforts in action in the war. This is what appears on Page 55:

Seventy-five per cent of the Japanese in Canada are Japanese-Canadians.

That is, born in Canada, as stated by the Minister of Labour. As I say, the only trouble with that is that it is entirely false. There can be no doubt about that. I have in my hand a booklet called "Removal of Japanese from the Protected Area in British Columbia." It is a report issued by the British Columbia security commission. They knew all about it, if anyone did. Here is what they say on page 3:

In March of 1941 the many thousands of Japanese domiciled in Canada, practically all of whom were in British Columbia, had been required to register themselves with the Royal Canadian Mounted Police, and the resulting records reveal the following details: Canadian born 6,727, naturalized 7,011, nationals—

That means Japanese not naturalized.

—9,758; United States citizens 16; total 23,512.

If you analyse those figures you will find that instead of seventy-five per cent being Canadian born, it is only twenty-eight per cent. Why the difference? Oh, if you trace it down far enough somebody will say, "We made a mistake," but why are the mistakes always on the one side? This pamphlet is circulated far and wide; it goes across the country, to our men in the trenches and everywhere else. "Oh," they say, "do not make a fuss about it; seventy-five per cent of the Japanese are born in Canada." It is not seventy-five per cent but only twenty-eight per cent.

Here is something else which was just put in my hands, and remember that I do not go around hunting for trouble. Not long ago the hon. member for Peterborough West asked for a return showing the Japanese who have been allowed to remain in the protected area, out of which they were all supposed to be moved. The return brought down—and I did not ask for it—showed something like ninety-seven. I glanced over the list, and was attracted by the occupations of these people who have been allowed to remain in a protected and therefore dangerous area. Some of their occupations are: aircraft fitter; Empress hotel laundry; retired; no occupation; lawyer; warehouse foreman; cook-house employee; tap dancer—you will readily understand the necessity for having a tap dancer remain in this area—floor lady; factory worker; candy packer; dentist, and so on. I thought there was something funny about it, and took it upon myself to write the department concerned and ask why it was necessary to have so many Japanese in that area. They wrote back and said that they had looked into the thing and that there had been a mistake of forty, that some forty of these people should not have been on the list. Can they not bring down a return covering ninety-seven people without being wrong about forty of them? If I had not dug into that it would have gone out to the world, whatever object they sought to achieve by making this misleading statement in a return brought down at the request of the hon. member for Peterborough West.

I rose for the purpose of putting hon. members straight about that seventy-five per cent, but while I am on my feet perhaps I may be permitted to present something else to the committee which came to me not half an hour ago. I have in my hand a copy of a bill introduced in the house of representatives at Washington on May 9, 1944, not a month ago, by Mr. Mott. The bill is, "To provide for the deportation of Japanese aliens." I quote the first sentence of section 2:

> Within thirty days after the approval of this act the attorney general of the United States shall proceed to prepare warrants for the deportation of all undesirable aliens as defined in section 1 of this act.

I think it was the minister now before us who told us the other day that to a large extent we would have to be guided by the policy of the United States in regard to the Japanese. Well, this is a sample of that policy. Of course this bill has not been passed as yet; it was introduced only three weeks ago, but at least it is evidence of what some thinking and perhaps foresighted men in the United States congress are doing. I must correct myself. It was not the minister now before us; it was the then acting leader of the government who said that we would have to be guided to some extent by the policy adopted by the United States. At any rate I would present this bill as an illustration of what the people of the United States are thinking about this subject.

Mr. STIRLING: Would the minister break down this item? Obviously it covers the use of Japanese in the work under the surveys and engineering branch. Would he describe where they are working, and would he say what proportion of them are Canadian born and what proportion are Japanese nationals?

Mr. CRERAR: I do not know that I can answer the last question asked by the hon. member for Yale. I should like to make it clear to the committee that the surveys and engineering branch of the Department of Mines and Resources is simply supervising the work the government decided should be done by these Japanese. Other than that we as a department have no interest in it. There are several projects upon which the Japanese have been employed. There is the Hope-Princeton highway in British Columbia, the Revelstoke-Sicamous highway, the Yellowhead-Blue River highway, which I think is up on the North Thompson river or somewhere in that part of British Columbia, and in addition a small number were employed on the trans-Canada highway at Schreiber, Ontario.

Mr. STIRLING: Only those four projects in Canada?

Mr. CRERAR: Yes; those four highway projects. At April 1, 1943, we had employed on these various works some 876 Japanese. By January 31, 1944, that number had decreased to 498, and it has further declined to 417 as of May 20 of this year. The decline in the number engaged in this road work is explained by the fact that they have been put at other work. A number were taken away to work in the sugar beet fields of Manitoba, and I think a number were brought to Ontario for the same purpose. Some of them are working on farms as agricultural labourers. They are working at different jobs all the way from the eastern boundaries of British Columbia to Ontario. That explains the decline in the number employed on these road projects, and is also the explanation for the decrease in the vote asked for this year as compared with last year.

Mr. STIRLING: Could the minister divide the 417 as among the four projects?

Mr. CRERAR: Yes. As at May 20, on the Hope end of the Hope-Princeton highway there were ninety-six, and on the Princeton end, 150; on the Revelstoke-Sicamous road, fifty-nine; on the Yellowhead-Blue River road, ninety; on the Trans-Canada highway at Schrieber, twenty-two.

Mr. REID: Why should we require a million-dollar vote to take care of only 417 Japanese? That works out at about $2,400 each, which is more than is earned by a good many Canadian citizens. I am wondering why this amount should be required.

Mr. CRERAR: At the time these estimates were prepared there were about 520 Japanese employed in this work, and the number might increase again; some of those employed elsewhere might be brought back to these roads.

Mr. REID: How much are they paid per day or per hour?

Mr. NEILL: The more there are, the more expensive they become, apparently.

Mr. CRERAR: I am advised that they are paid twenty-five cents an hour, but in addition this vote covers the purchase of equipment. All this money does not go in wages, by any means; it includes equipment and supplies.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: What equipment is there on the Hope-Princeton highway? On one of my visits all I saw operating was one broken down bulldozer and one shovel. What equipment does the federal government supply?

Mr. CRERAR: I am told that there was some equipment rented or supplied by the British Columbia government, and then other equipment, such as trucks, tools and so on, had to be purchased. The total vote this year is $1,000,000 as against $2,200,000 last year.

Mr. NEILL: That makes $3,200,000 in two years. It would have been cheaper to keep them in drawing-rooms.

Mr. CRERAR: The estimated expenditure for last year was $1,014,000.

Mr. REID: How much road work did they do for that?

Mr. CRERAR: I think I can give my hon. friend that information. Here are the details of the Hope-Princeton project. Length of project when work began, 88·8 miles. On the Princeton end existing road and tote road have been improved, cleared out and made passable to Allison Summit, a distance of fifty miles from Princeton. In this section six miles of standard road, twenty to twenty-four feet in width, have been constructed.

On the Hope end the partly graded road between Hope and Tashme has been maintained, widened and improved over a distance of fourteen miles. This work included some new simple bridges. Work has been continued on the pioneer road towards Allison Summit, and this road has now been connected through, but is not yet suitable for general travel. Progress has been made on the 1·6 mile revision at mile 4 from Hope.

At the inception of the Yellowhead-Blue river project there were 115 miles of road impassable—that is rather an Irish way of putting it—or not opened up between Yellowhead and Blue river. The work of the Japanese has been concentrated on constructing a tote road passable to cars and trucks between these two points. Up to the present time there is a total of 99·5 miles of road passable to trucks, and with the addition of some unconnected sections that are ready, there is only a total of some six miles of tote road north of Blue river to be completed. The bridge over the North Thompson river near Gosnell has been completed.

Work on the Revelstoke-Sicamous project has consisted of improving alignment and reconstruction on various sections along some 44½ miles of the trans-Canada highway westerly from Revelstoke. Standard road is being built, and a substantial amount of work has been done. During most of the construction period five work camps were operated, but late in 1943 this number was reduced to three, in view of the taking of Japanese to other projects.

There would have to be a good deal of heavy equipment for that type of construction in a mountainous country. As I said a moment ago, some of that was supplied or lent by the British Columbia government, but a good deal had to be purchased. Camps supplies and so on had to be purchased.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: When the construction was going on, there were two small bulldozers which had been supplied by the provincial government and two compressors, neither one of which would blow up a bicycle tire. There was only one bulldozer which was supplied by the federal government and which came from Banff. Then there were one Ford truck, one Ford light delivery truck and a small shovel. I know this because I went there many times since this project is in my riding. I am not complaining of what the minister's department has done, but with the excessive rates being paid. I think the federal government would have been well advised in spending some money on decent equipment in order that we might accomplish something. I understood the minister to say that the Hope-Princeton highway was a passable road for forty miles. It might be called a passable road in Flin Flon but not in British Columbia.

Mr. REID: Passable for a mule team.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: Not a mule team; passable for a mule up ahead with a camel in between. It certainly is not passable. I should like to know from the minister just what equipment there is on the Hope-Princeton highway. After all, we are paying out all this money and, since the wartime prices and trade board partly handles the money of the country, I think it would be sound economy to have a little equipment which would enable these Japs to accomplish something. I should like to know what equipment there is on the Hope-Princeton highway at present and what there was last year, and how much was supplied by the provincial government.

Mr. CRERAR: I am sorry, but I have not an inventory of the equipment used on the road out there. Some of it was supplied by the federal government and some of it by the provincial department. At any rate, there was enough supplied to have the work carried on.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: No, no.

Mr. CRERAR: My hon. friend may say, "No, no". I have no doubt the work was handicapped by the type of equipment, but I would tell my hon. friend and the committee that it was very difficult to get priorities for equipment of that kind. I think the department did a creditable job with the equipment they had. At the Hope end there were two shovels, four bulldozers, five to six trucks and the necessary small tools. I have not the list of equipment at the other end. This information may be of interest to the committee. In 1943-44 there was spent on the Yellowhead-Blue river project, $159,000; on the Hope-Princeton project, both ends, $409,000; on the Revelstoke-Sicamous project, $276,000 and on the Schreiber-trans-Canada project, $42,000. The administration costs were over $7,800.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: Was the $409,000 on the Hope-Princeton project all labour?

Mr. CRERAR: That includes supervision, equipment, supplies for the men, the building of camps, wages and all that sort of thing. The committee will bear in mind that these camps must be up to certain standards, as must the treatment of the Japanese. We may not like it, but there are Canadians in Japan. I do not know just what percentage of these Japanese are Japanese nationals, but the camp conditions would be subject to inspection by the protecting power which Japan employs for supervision in Canada, just as would the situation of our Canadians in Japan be subject to inquiry and investigation by the protecting power that Canada uses in that country.

Mr. GRAYDON: Does Japan give us the same cooperation as we give her?

Mr. CRERAR: The standards are set by international law.

Mr. GRAYDON: Do both countries carry out that international law the same way?

Mr. CRERAR: I think so, as far as I know

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: No, no.

Mr. CRERAR: It is all very well to say, "No, no", but in answer to the question asked by the leader of the opposition I cannot say that I have any knowledge that it is any different. At any rate, those are the expenditures on the different projects. The work will be reduced this year because many of the Japanese employed on road projects have been taken to other work. A year ago—and also this year—a number were working in the sugar beet fields in Manitoba and, I think, in Ontario. Some are engaged in domestic service in some of the cities in the east, I have heard, although I have no actual knowledge of that.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: I want to keep the record straight. I am not quarrelling with the $409,000, but I say that that $409,000 should not all be charged against the Hope-Princeton highway. According to the minister himself we must provide a certain class of camp and so on, so that part of the charge of looking after the Japanese is not properly chargeable to the highway. It has nothing to do with the construction of the highway. Am I not correct in that?

Mr. CRERAR: It depends on how you look at it. Here is a project on which we put Japanese. Certainly as minister administering a department I want to know every dollar of expenditure that goes into that project. I do not think it would make any difference in the total amount spent. The situation was that we had to move these Japanese from the Pacific coast for security reasons. I do not need to go into that because it is an old story that has been discussed many times in the house. The Japs had to be got away from the Pacific coast, and got away as quickly as possible. They had to be put at some kind of work. In the beginning a large number of them were employed on road projects in British Columbia. I think the expenditure on the road has been reasonable. I do not say for one moment that we have got the same value in work per man out of the Japanese that a contractor would have got who could dismiss a man if he was not satisfactory. We could not dismiss the Japanese from the road. We had to make the best of them. I think on the whole the work was carried out with credit to those in charge of it.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: I think they did some excellent work on the Hope-Princeton highway. We are getting only two-bits-an-hour work out of them anyway. But what I want to make clear is this. The overhead of Tashme camp, the biggest Jap camp in Canada, should not be charged to the Hope-Princeton highway. I give the department full credit for doing excellent work in opening up that highway, but you would have got far greater value if you had procured some decent equipment for road building. That highway happens to be the kind where the greater part of the work must be done by heavy machinery, and you would save some of the taxpayers' money if you got decent equipment, instead of spending all this money on tap dancers or something like that.

Mr. CRERAR: I shall be glad to take my hon. friend's suggestions into consideration.

Mr. FAIR: Does the government set any particular rate of pay for Japanese working on farms, or do they receive the prevailing rate of wages in the district?

Mr. CRERAR: The Department of Mines and Resources has nothing to do with that. I have no information on that. My hon. friend will have to ask the Minister of Labour.

Mr. REID: I want to ask a question of the minister but, first I want to draw to the attention of the committee and the country an important statement that the minister made this evening, the significance of which may have been overlooked. There are opinions in this country, both political and otherwise, that the Japanese in this country are Canadian citizens. But the minister in answer to the hon. member for Fraser Valley said that one of the reasons why we have to treat the Japanese in this country fairly is that there is an agreement governing the treatment we shall accord to the nationals of Japan and that if we do not treat them accordingly Japan will object. But if the Japanese in Canada are Canadians, why should we worry? I trust that everyone gets the significance of the minister's answer.

We in British Columbia hold that the Japanese owe allegiance to Japan, that Japan counts every one of them as her nationals, and the minister has substantiated our point of view because he has said that they are all Japanese, and they being Japanese we must not offend Japan by our treatment of these Japanese, because we have some Canadian citizens in Japanese custody and if we offend the Japanese in Canada Japan will hold us to account. I hope those who are championing the Japanese in this country will take note of the minister's statement to-night, which to me is very significant. He has said what we have always held and hold to-day, that in spite of all the froth and stuff being said about the Japanese in Canada, every one of them still belongs to Japan and Japan is holding us and will hold us to account.

Mr. GRAYDON: Who are championing the Japanese in Canada?

Mr. REID: The leaders of the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation in British Columbia are championing them. Let me draw the attention of the leader of the opposition to what was said a short time ago. The leaders of the C.C.F. in British Columbia are saying that those of us who hold the view that the Japanese in Canada are still Japanese and should be sent back to Japan are just indulging in political propaganda. It is the leaders of the C.C.F. who have brought this question into the realm of politics and who are saying that we are acting under a party whip, that the old parties have a whip and that they crack it over our heads. If you took a secret vote of the people of British Columbia you would find that the rank and file of the C.C.F. are with us in this fight. But they dare not open their mouths because their leaders say that they would rather retire from the party than submit to that kind of thing. This is going to be one of the fights in British Columbia. The leaders of the C.C.F. in British Columbia have become the avowed champions of the Japanese in this country, and of that I shall speak later on in this house. The statement of the minister to-night places the Japanese in Canada where we have always placed them. They belong to Japan, the minister says, and we must abide by the international agreement and treat the Japanese in Canada fairly.

The question I wanted to ask the minister regarding this vote, which is not as large as last year's vote, when $2,000,000 was spent, was this. Statements have been made in this house and in British Columbia that some of the work done on this road by the Japanese was a scandal. Delegations from the board of trade of Vancouver have said the same, that the road work done by the Japanese, who receive only twenty-five cents an hour, is a scandal. The minister speaks of dollar for dollar value. Has he taken note of this charge that has been made? Can he tell the people of this country that we are getting value for the money spent on the roads?

Mr. CRERAR: No. Under the circumstances I think we are getting as reasonable value for the money expended as we could expect. We have to keep in mind what the position is. The Japanese have been evacuated from the Pacific coast and sent into the interior of British Columbia. We employ them at work. If a Japanese is not working satisfactorily you cannot say, "You are off the job," as a contractor would say to a workman who was not giving him satisfaction. That probably results in not as efficient work from the Japanese as a whole as a contractor would get from a similar number of labourers he had hired to work for him. But in the light of all the circumstances I think a reasonable return is being secured for the money expended.

Somebody asked me a moment ago if I knew how many of the people employed on these projects were Japanese nationals and how many were not. I am unable to give that information. The hon. member for New Westminster states that Japan considers as Japanese nationals all these people, whether born in Canada or not.

Mr. REID: That is important.

Mr. CRERAR: I have no knowledge personally of the views of the Japanese government on this point, although I have no reason whatever to question the statement of the hon. member for New Westminster. Our officers cannot inform me how many may be regarded as Japanese nationals and how many, under our laws, would not be so regarded.

Mr. FRASER (Peterborough West): The minister mentioned a little while ago that we had to be very careful because of Canada having nationals in Japan. In the return mentioned by the hon. member for Comox-Alberni and dated Thursday, March 2, 1944, it is stated that in these camps they have 204 radios. I wonder whether the Japanese are allowing the Canadians in Japan to have radios. Also I see that in Roseberry camp we are supplying eight school teachers; in New Denver camp, thirty teachers; in Slocan camp, ten teachers; in Kaslo, nine; in Sandon, eight; in Lemon Creek, twenty-four, and in Tashme, twenty-nine. Are these children taught English or are they taught Japanese in the camps?

Mr. CRERAR: I have no knowledge on the particular point, because I believe the camps to which my hon. friend refers are not under the direction of this department.

Mr. FRASER (Peterborough West): Oh, yes; New Denver and Tashme are under the department; at any rate Tashme is. The hon. member for New Westminster mentioned the C.C.F. party in connection with the Japanese. I know that the hon. member for Vancouver East, who unfortunately is not here to-day, gave a talk here to a group of ladies who have what is called a school for citizenship every Wednesday night, and in his address he said that Japanese should intermarry with Canadians.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: Who said that?

Mr. FRASER (Peterborough West): The hon. member for Vancouver East. He said practically the same thing in this chamber last year.

Mr. GILLIS: Nonsense.

Mr. REID: It won't be tried out in his family.

Mr. FRASER (Peterborough West): No; That is the trouble with the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation party; they like to try things out on somebody else, not on themselves. Could the minister find out if these teachers are teaching English or teaching Japanese. Every one of them is a Japanese. I think he should also find out if our nationals in Japan are privileged to have radios.

Mr. CRERAR: My hon. friend was referring to the camp at Tashme?

Mr. FRASER (Peterborough West): Yes.

Mr. CRERAR: That is not one of the camps where people are employed for this work.

Mr. FRASER (Peterborough West): Then will the minister name the camps?

Mr. CRERAR: Tashme camp is under the Department of Labour. I do not know whether the Japanese in these camps have radios. I cannot say, and I do not think anyone here can say, whether Canadians interned in Japan have them or not.

Mr. SINCLAIR: We can say that they have not. They have not even Red Cross parcels.

Mr. CRERAR: That may be.

Mr. SINCLAIR: That is so.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: Just read the papers.

Mr. CRERAR: However, the camp of which the hon. member for Peterborough West was speaking is, I understand, Tashme. That is not one of these.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: The men are taken from Tashme and come out on the road. Do not tell me they are not on the Hope-Princeton highway. I have ridden on a truck with them. The Japs get better treatment than I did.

Mr. STIRLING: I am very much interested in one statement the minister made this evening, namely, that part of this $109,000 was to purchase equipment for this road. I am fairly well acquainted with the Princeton end of the road, just as my hon. friend is acquainted with the Hope end of it, and I was not aware that the dominion government had any equipment of this kind on it. The road has been getting what equipment it could from the department of public works of British Columbia. If the government is purchasing equipment to get on with the work I commend the minister very highly for it, and I only wish he would buy some more, for this reason. The gap in this highway is one of the greatly desired things of the whole of the southern part of British Columbia and Alberta. It is sixty or eighty years since this road was started, and it has always been held up. The inhabitants in that neighbourhood have been looking on during the last one or two years at the work which the Japanese are doing on that road, in the great hope that it will be finished at last. Now the minister has the disappointing story to tell that the numbers employed are diminishing. A difficulty to which I think the minister did not refer is that only those Japanese go to the road camps who are ready to work at the road camps. My hon. friend has referred to the settlement at Tashme. The Hope-Princeton road passes close to Tashme, and there are I do not know how many, running into the thousands, of Japanese men, women and children there. But the difficulty is that if they do not choose to work on that road work they can look up at it on the mountain side there but they do not work. No way has yet been found to induce the men of that Tashme camp to go out and work on that road; only those go out to work on it who are ready to do so for the remuneration paid to them. As that number dwindles and as the work is finished which labourers can do with shovels, all the more necessity for road machinery, and it needs only about one season's work with adequate machinery to get that long-desired work finished. Anything that the minister can do to increase the equipment will be very much appreciated all through the southern part of British Columbia.

Item agreed to.

Post-war construction programme—planning, $420,000.

Mr. FRASER (Peterborough West): Is this post-war work of the minister's department only, or is it a general plan? The Minister of Public Works, I believe, had a post-war estimate down, and when we questioned him he discovered that it was just to refit some of the buildings.

Mr. CRERAR: This covers only the Department of Mines and Resources. Perhaps I might explain it briefly to the committee. Part of the vote is for national parks improvements expected to be undertaken when the war is over.

Mr. MacNICOL: The vote calls only for plans.

Mr. CRERAR: During the last four years practically no work has been done in the national parks. We have in our national parks across Canada approximately 1,000 miles of roads or highways. The department has had in mind for some considerable time hard-surfacing these roads. This vote is to get all the plans and specifications, and make the necessary examination of the roads from the point of view of drainage, and the like, so that when the war is over, this work can be undertaken for those desiring at that time to undertake it. Then there is similar survey work in the Indian branch. We have recognized for some considerable time that there must be improvement, by way of schools, hospitals and medical care in connection with the Indian services.

Mr. MacNICOL: How does it come under the war appropriation?

Mr. CRERAR: This is post-war planning and, rightly or wrongly, it is charged against the war appropriation. I believe there are other items in other departments to that effect.

This is all associated with work which will be undertaken after the war. Perhaps it could have been included in the civil estimates, but it was considered proper to have it included as a charge against the war appropriation.

Then there are certain services which have to be undertaken. There is the geodetic survey. The amount there is $171,500. This is important work, from the point of view of having accurate mapping of the country, and plans are in hand now for mapping on a large scale. This is to provide the necessary basic controls, so that the base survey points and lines are accurately determined. It is of the utmost importance that our mapping and surveying be accurate. This also provides for certain precise levelling in northern Ontario, Manitoba and British Columbia. But if anyone asks me what precise levelling is I am afraid I could not give a complete answer.

Then it is intended to take certain astronomical observations for the determination of latitude and longitude for mapping, particularly in the arctic islands, and across northern Canada from the eastern shore of Hudson bay to northern British Columbia and the Yukon territory. This work has not been done before, and it will be of great importance in the post-war years, and of particularly great importance from the point of view of the development of aviation, both nationally and internationally.

Mr. MacNICOL: At the moment, however, this vote is to pay for drawing plans, making specifications and compiling engineering details.

Mr. CRERAR: It is for more than that. It will send out field survey parties to make determinations of base points and lines. It requires special mathematical knowledge.

The next item covers hydrographic surveys, and amounts to $14,500. That is for hydrographic field surveys of the Mackenzie river and Slave lake areas in northwestern Canada.

Mr. MacNICOL: It has all been done many times.

Mr. CRERAR: No, this has not—not as far north as that. Then there is an item of $9,000 for legal surveys and map surveys. That is mainly for surveys in the Yukon territory, and perhaps certain surveys of Indian reservations.

Mr. MacNICOL: How does the minister connect this up with the war appropriation measure, unless it is a provision for plans and specifications to provide employment for returned Canadians who are now serving in the war?

Mr. CRERAR: I am afraid I have failed to make myself clear. That is precisely what it is. It is to gather data and have it available so that when the service men are discharged some of them, at any rate, can get jobs.

Mr. MacNICOL: A short time ago some departmental officials of the Department of Mines and Resources appeared before the committee on reconstruction and presented what to my mind was a very good argument for the expenditure of considerable sums of money in connection with post-war rehabilitation in various parts of the country, connected particularly with fur raising in northern Manitoba, northern Saskatchewan, Quebec and elsewhere. That programme called for plans and specifications. Has the department a large staff engaged in making specifications for all these matters?

Mr. CRERAR: The fur conservation programme has been an item in the ordinary estimates of the department for the last five or six years. That work is being continued.

Mr. MacNICOL: The officials who appeared before the committee on reconstruction presented suggestions with respect to votes of money which I expect will appear later on, and will provide for rehabilitation. I thought it was good work, and I am in favour of it. For instance, it is for completing work in connection with the fur programme along the Sipanok channel between the Saskatchewan and Carrot rivers. It looks worth while. Is that included in this vote?

Mr. CRERAR: No. That is carried out under the ordinary estimates of the Indian affairs branch.

Item agreed to.

Sundry services, $67,490.

Mr. MARSHALL: Would the minister break down this item?

Mr. CRERAR: There is in the engineering and construction service the shipment and storage of equipment in use in various camps. Some of these we have discussed to-night, and others are alternative service camps. There is $5,000 for that. Then there is an item for the salary and expenses of two engineers to inspect and observe reconstruction and maintenance operations on the Alaska military highway. That was undertaken after careful consideration, and decided upon several months ago. These two engineers will patrol that highway so far as its location in Canada is coancerned, and $15,000 is provided for that. Then there is certain triangulation work in the geodetic surveys to be completed through Newfoundland and in the vicinity of the strait of Belle isle and there is $3,000 for that. There is war zone risk bonus payable to ships' crews employed in certain specified dangerous waters by the hydrographic survey which is in the Department of Mines and Resources, and the appropriation for that is $6,500.

Then there is the legal surveys and map service; salaries, cost of living bonus and other pay list items for additional staff employed, especially for the compiling and drafting of air navigation charts and other maps for the Royal Canadian Air Force. There has been a very heavy demand for production of all sorts of those maps, and the item for that is $23,210. Then there is a legal survey of the Alaska military highway required in connection with the administration of lands, mineral claims and waterpower, which will arise through the construction of the highway. There is $14,780 for that. These are the different items that make up a total of $67,490.

Item agreed to.

Immigration branch—
For expenditures in connection with looking after Canadian interests abroad, $475,000.

Mr. ROSS (Souris): There is an increase of some $200,000 in this item. What does that large increase cover? Is any consideration being given to post-war immigration?

Mr. CRERAR: No; there is nothing whatever in this item for post-war immigration, or in any of those items. There are certain Canadian nationals and have been since the outbreak of the war who still are in enemy countries and enemy controlled countries. Our protecting power is Switzerland. Certain moneys are advanced to the Swiss government and their consuls or governmental representatives in those countries use those funds to assist Canadian nationals who may for the time being be in enemy occupied countries or enemy countries. The numbers have increased because some of the Canadians in those countries are asking for help, probably owing to their resources being pretty well exhausted. In addition to that, where items like food or clothing have to be provided the cost has tended to increase. That is the explanation of the increase from $275,000 a year ago to $475,000 this year.

Mr. FRASER (Peterborough West): This afternoon one hon. member mentioned that Asiatics were coming in now. He mentioned later on that they were coming in as refugees. Is there any truth in that?

Mr. CRERAR: That is incorrect. Occasionally an Asiatic who has been in this country has been allowed to remain here. The director of immigration tells me that one or two Chinese Canadian nationals have been repatriated.

Mr. DORION (Translation): Mr. Chairman, we are called upon to vote a sum of $475,000 for expenditures in connection with looking after Canadian interests abroad. I have just listened to the brief explanations given by the honourable the Minister of Mines and Resources. Reference to some sessional papers brought down since the beginning of this session shows that some amounts are paid for bringing refugees to Canada. Now, I submit that the discussion of this item brings to our minds two questions. The first is this: what are those interests which Canada may have to look after abroad in connection with immigration? And here is the second: how will this sum of $475,000 be used.

I wish to make it clear that in the few words I may say on this matter I shall show as much broadmindedness as possible and that I do not wish to echo any narrow or unworthy feeling in connection with immigation. Neither do I wish that some newspapers should continue to construe some of our opinions as was done, for instance, by the Toronto Globe and Mail in its edition of May 24 last. Allow me to quote the following excerpt:

> It has been taken for granted for a long time that the province of Quebec is not anxious for any considerable growth in the population of this country to which it does not make its own preponderating domestic contribution. A general flood of immigrants who would not be sympathetic with Quebec's own particular problems and ambitions would naturally not be welcome. It would weaken that province's position apropos the other provinces.

I believe, Mr. Chairman, that such are not at all the feelings of the province of Quebec concerning immigration. As everyone knows, there are two opposite schools of thought on this subject: some would like our country to be hermetically closed against all immigrants; others wish to open our doors wide to welcome them. I do not believe either of these policies, which I call extreme, should be adopted. In this realm, as in all others, a middle course should be followed and we should consider this matter in the light of our experience of past events and of future needs.

First, one must realize fully the possibility for Canada to absorb immigrants. In this regard, I submit that it would be wise to act as a reasonable man does who wishes to increase his stock or his staff. A thorough investigation should be conducted to ascertain whether we have room in our midst to accept a large number of newcomers. Then we would be in a position to decide whether such an immigration policy would really be wise. In the past, we have, at a certain time, opened our doors wide. Statistics show that thousands upon thousands of immigrants have availed themselves of the opportunity they were thus offered. The results may not have been adverse, for, at that time, Canada was a younger country, with plenty of available space, and opportunities for all kinds of industrial and business ventures, but to-day, we have reached a more advanced stage in our national life and it behooves us to ask ourselves what gaps remain to be filled, if any We should also stop to think whether—

Mr. CRERAR: Unfortunately I do not understand the language my hon. friend is speaking. That is a matter of very great regret, and always has been with me, but I believe the hon. gentleman is discussing immigration generally with some particular reference to refugees who have been brought to Canada, and is asking whether or not any part of this vote is to be expended for that purpose. This vote does not touch immigration generally at all; this is an amount we are being asked to provide to look after Canadian citizens who for the time being are in enemy occupied countries. It has nothing whatever to do with bringing people to Canada, and on that ground I would submit that my hon. friend is out of order.

Mr. DORION: Then I think the wording of the item is quite peculiar, because I see it is for expenditures in connection with looking after Canadian interests abroad, and it comes under the immigration branch. If we take the report of the Minister of Mines and Resources we see that there is a special section for immigration, in which is also the question of refugees. If the wording is not correct, I may be out of order, but if the wording is correct as it appears in Hansard of February 11, I think I am in order in discussing this question. We are dealing with immigration, and I have the right to establish my contention before the committee.

Mr. CRERAR: I would have no objection whatever to a discussion of the point raised by the hon. member. It could be discussed appropriately under the ordinary estimates of the department, but the item we are now considering has nothing to do with bringing people, refugees or others, to Canada. It is wholly concerned with the care of Canadian citizens who, unhappily, find themselves in enemy or enemy occupied countries. Their welfare is looked after through the agency of the Swiss government, which is the protecting power as far as Canada is concerned.

Mr. DORION: Then would the minister be kind enough to tell me under what item we can discuss the expenditures being made at present in connection with the agencies Canada has established in Europe to bring refugees to this country, through which we receive many hundreds of refugees every month?

Mr. CRERAR: That will come under the immigration vote in the ordinary estimates of the department. There will be ample opportunity to discuss that and any other questions about immigration when those estimates are under consideration. I submit, however, that if we are to make progress we must endeavour to keep the discussion within the bounds of the particular item under consideration. I repeat that not a penny of this money has anything to do with the movement of refugees to Canada or the movement of immigrants to this country. It is concerned wholly with the welfare and care of Canadian citizens who are so unfortunate as to find themselves in enemy or enemy occupied countries.

Mr. DORION: Then would the minister be kind enough to tell the committee in what countries there are Canadian nationals at the present time? Do we have Canadian nationals in central Europe?

Mr. CRERAR: I would say there are Canadian nationals in practically all the enemy occupied countries of Europe; some in Japan, and probably some in that part of China which has been occupied by Japan. The purpose of this vote is to look after them.

Mr. DORION: How many Canadians are there?

Mr. CRERAR: I am advised that the total number at the present time is approximately 800. That number may increase. In countries such as France, Belgium, Holland or Denmark, for example, Canadian nationals may have been able to get along on their own resources, but as those resources become exhausted they ask for assistance, and that assistance is given under this vote through the agency of our protecting power in Europe.

Mr. JOHNSTON (Bow River): What type of assistance is given? Of course it may be a money grant, but for what purpose?

Mr. CRERAR: In the main it is money that is transferred to them so that they can have it available to buy food and other necessities in the places where they live.

Mr. JOHNSTON (Bow River): And how many did the minister say there were?

Mr. CRERAR: About 800.

Mr. POULIOT: Does the Lisbon agency have anything to do with that?

Mr. CRERAR: No; it is done by Canada's protecting power, which is Switzerland.

Mr. SINCLAIR: I have a certain amount of sympathy for the hon. member for Charlevoix-Saguenay. If this item has nothing to do with immigration, why is it here under the immigration branch rather than under the Department of External Affairs?

Mr. CRERAR: Because external affairs requested the immigration branch of the Department of Mines and Resources to handle these funds.

Mr. SINCLAIR: Why?

Mr. CRERAR: I do not know why; perhaps my hon. friend should put that question when the external affairs estimates are under consideration. However, I am told that before the war, even in peace time, there was a small fund available in the Department of Immigration for the relief of distressed Canadians abroad. That has always been under the administration of the immigration branch, so that when we came to the larger question of relief for Canadian nationals abroad it also was handled through the immigration branch.

Mr. POULIOT: I submit that the item mentioned by the minister was in the estimates before the war; I remember that very well, because I had an argument about it one afternoon at three o'clock with Mr. Gordon, who was the minister under Mr. Bennett. It seems to me that this item should not come under either the Department of Mines and Resources or the Department of External Affairs. I believe it should come under the Department of National War Services, because the work is done by the Red Cross, and Switzerland is the country where the Red Cross has its headquarters. I do not see why we maintain a civilian vote to look after these people during war time. I have no objection to helping Canadians who are in occupied Europe, but it seems to me that the logical way to help them would be through the Department of National War Services, since the work is carried on through Switzerland.

Item stands.

Progress reported.

At eleven o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

THE WAR

INVASION OF WESTERN EUROPE

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, at half-past three o'clock this morning the government received by radio the following communique from General Eisenhower's headquarters:

Under the command of General Eisenhower, allied naval forces, supported by strong air forces, began landing of allied armies this morning on the northern coast of France.

Ten minutes later from General Eisenhower's headquarters the following bulletin was received:

It is announced that General Bernard Montgomery is in command of the army group carrying out the assault. This army group includes British, Canadian and American forces.

At eight o'clock this morning I made the following radio broadcast:

"At half-past three o'clock this morning the government received official word that the invasion of western Europe had begun. Word was also received that Canadian troops were among the allied forces who landed this morning on the northern coast of France. Canada will be proud to learn that our troops are being supported by units of the Royal Canadian Navy and the Royal Canadian Air Force. The great landing in western Europe is the opening up of what we hope and believe will be the decisive phase of the war against Germany. The fighting is certain to be heavy, bitter and costly. We must not expect early results. We should be prepared for local reverses as well as successes. No one can say how long this phase of the war may last, but we have every reason for confidence in the final outcome.

"I cannot better express to the people of Canada the government's feelings at this moment than by giving to you the words of General Crerar, the Canadian army commander, as conveyed to the Canadian assault forces on the eve of their embarkation:

"'I have,' said General Crerar, 'complete confidence in our ability to meet the tests which lie ahead. We are excellently trained and equipped. The quality of both the senior and junior leadership is of the highest. As Canadians, we inherit military characteristics which were feared by the enemy in the last great war. They will be still more feared before this war terminates.'

"I should like to add this word: Let the hearts of all in Canada to-day be filled with silent prayer for the success of our own and allied forces and for the early liberation of the peoples of Europe."

The house will be interested in the order of the day which was given to the troops by General Eisenhower. It is as follows:

"Soldiers, sailors and airmen of the allied expeditionary force: You are about to embark upon the great crusade toward which we have striven these many months. The eyes of the world are upon you. The hopes and prayers of liberty-loving peoples everywhere march with you.

"You will bring about the destruction of the German war machine, the elimination of nazi tyranny over the oppressed peoples of Europe and security for ourselves in a free world.

"Your task will not be an easy one. Your enemy is well trained, well equipped and battle hardened. He will fight savagely.

"But this is the year 1944. Much has happened since the Nazi triumphs of 1940-41.

"The united nations have inflicted upon the Germans great defeat in open battle man to man. Our air offensive has seriously reduced their strength in the air and their capacity to wage war on the ground.

"Our home fronts have given us an overwhelming superiority in weapons and munitions of war and placed at our disposal great reserves of trained fighting men.

"The tide has turned.

"The free men of the world are marching together to victory. I have full confidence in your courage, devotion to duty, and skill in battle.

"We will accept nothing less than full victory.

"Good luck, and let us all beseech the blessing of Almighty God upon this great and noble undertaking."

Hon. members will realize that at this stage it is very difficult indeed to give the house much information of an official and authentic character. It would be a mistake, I think, for me to attempt to give anything in the nature of details relating to the events that have happened within the past twenty-four hours. Fortunately, however, the Prime Minister of Great Britain addressed the House of Commons of the United Kingdom this morning and in the course of his remarks was able to give to the house information which will be of equal interest to all of us. I therefore propose now to give to the house a part of the statement which Mr. Churchill made this morning. I should say that the Prime Minister preceded his remarks by making a reference to the significance of the fall of Rome. He dwelt at some length upon what that great event signified in relation to the other events which are taking place at this moment. He then continued as follows:

"I have also to announce to the house that during the night and early hours of this morning, the first of a series of landings in force upon the European continent has taken place.

"In this case, the liberating assault fell upon the coast of France.

"An immense armada of upwards of 4,000 ships, together with several thousand smaller craft, crossed the channel. Mass airborne landings have been successfully effected behind the enemy's lines.

"Landings on the beaches are proceeding at various points at the present time. The fire of shore batteries has been largely quelled. Obstacles which were encountered in the sea have not proved as difficult as was apprehended.

"The Anglo-American allies are sustained by about eleven thousand first line aircraft, which can be drawn upon as may be needed for the purposes of battle.

"I cannot, of course, commit myself to any particular details, as reports are coming in in rapid succession. So far the commanders who are engaged report that everything is proceeding according to plan. And what a plan!

"This vast plan is undoubtedly the most complicated and difficult that has ever occurred. It involves the tides, wind, waves and visibility both from the air and sea standpoints, and the combined employment of land, air and sea forces in the highest degree of intimacy.

"There are already hopes that actual tactical surprise has been attained, and we hope to furnish the enemy with a succession of surprises during the course of the fighting.

"The battle which has now begun will grow constantly in scale and in intensity for many weeks to come, and I shall not attempt to speculate on its course, but this I may say—that complete unity prevails.

"Throughout the allied armies there is a brotherhood in arms between us and our friends in other states. There is complete confidence in the supreme commander, General Eisenhower, and in his lieutenants, and also in the commander of the expeditionary force, General Montgomery.

"The ardour and spirit of the troops, as I saw for myself when they were embarking in the last few days, were splendid to witness. Nothing in the way of equipment, science or forethought has been neglected."

As we await the news of battle there are certain things which I think it would be well for members of this house as well as for the people of Canada to keep in mind. The fact that an allied landing on the continent has taken place is of itself a great feat. It means that after many months of the most careful and detailed planning the enemy has been pushed back at one part of the rim of his fortress. Even so, the task of having landed is but a prelude to the more urgent task of maintaining this first foothold, and of maintaining it so strongly that the enemy cannot dislodge the allied forces. We must expect that initial counter attacks on a small scale will be followed by massed, all-out counter attacks by the mobile and reserve forces of the enemy. These counter attacks may extend over a long period, and it is important that we should not magnify successes which may be achieved.

On a previous occasion, referring to the invasion of Europe, I said:

"This greatest of all tasks must be approached with the utmost foresight,. . . .it will require the most complete preparation. It is the duty of all concerned to see that sound judgment is not impaired by impatience, that nothing that can possibly be foreseen is left to chance. Invasion when it comes must be fortified with as full knowledge, as it is possible to obtain in advance, of every factor that will count for life or death in the balances that to-day are deciding the fate of the world."

The allied offensive launched to-day, as Mr. Churchill has said, is the most complete coordination and integration of effort among all the allied forces.

We must also remember that the enemy has been established for more than four years in the territory which he must now defend. The defensive preparations he has made must be expected to be all that his experience and ingenuity can devise. The enemy strength, while not precisely known, is very formidable.

We must also keep constantly in mind that the supply problem is one of the greatest magnitude because of the fact that most of the implements of war, munitions, food and supplies have to be carried to the front line by sea.

For obvious reasons, it would not be advisable to give information about the strength and disposition of the allied forces or concerning particular formations and commanders taking part in the operations. These will be made known from time to time in official announcements.

Conjecture in these anxious days will not do any good, and it may, in fact, give help and comfort to the enemy. This is the more important because of the particular care which has been given to the timing and planning of different operations. It is not to be supposed that the offensive launched to-day will not be followed by other offensives in other parts of Europe both from the sea and over land.

The people of Canada will expect, and it will be the duty of the government to provide, so far as possible, a correct and sober representation of events as they occur. The future, however, must unfold itself.

I am happy to be able to inform the house that official word has already come to the effect that our men have successfully achieved their first objective and are making good progress.

Mr. GORDON GRAYDON (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I should like on this very compelling occasion to add a word or two to those which have been said by the Prime Minister.

There are no divisions of opinion and no cleavages in thought in this house as we rivet our attention upon the progress of the long-anticipated offensive in Europe. An indescribable sense of oneness pervades this parliament and this nation to-day. The vital and critical character of the present military operations in which our troops are engaged erases all else from the thoughts of the Canadian people. Our armed forces must know that we at home are prepared to reinforce their efforts to the furthest limit. This nation must see to it that whatever is needed to support our fighting forces in men, materials and money is given without stint, without hesitation and without restriction. Nothing less than the best will be good enough for those who give so much for us.

May God be very close to our fighting men and their loved ones at home as this mighty battle for freedom, liberty and democracy proceeds apace.

Mr. J. H. BLACKMORE (Lethbridge): Mr. Speaker, I assume that all members of the house feel much as I do at the present time, that this is a moment for prayer. All must feel deeply grateful for the protection which the all-Father has given our people; the protection which has enabled us to stand against the apparently invincible forces which confronted us in 1940, and to persevere even until to-day, when it is our privilege to return the attack.

We must feel gratitude also for the miraculous way in which allies have been brought to our side whose timely assistance rendered it possible for us to survive and whose help, still afforded us, will enable us to prevail against our enemies.

I feel that we all are deeply filled with supplication for the protection of our boys, as far as that may be, and for their success in the arduous task which they now are essaying; and we also, I know, are possessed with the desire to implore the Almighty that we at home may be able to perform our tasks in a way which will make us worthy of the noble boys who represent us overseas.

Mr. MAURICE LALONDE (Labelle) (Translation): It is fitting that a French voice should stress the epoch-making fact that the hour of liberation has now come for France. I am sure of voicing the feelings of all Canadians of French descent in saying that we have been deeply moved by such news. We have not forgotten France, Mr. Speaker, we have not forgotten her, for hundreds and thousands of young French Canadians are perhaps, at this very moment, driving the German invader from the historic shores of old France.

With the permission of this honourable assembly, may I say that the occasion calls for the singing of the national anthem of France.

(The members rose and sang "La Marseillaise" and "God Save the King")

Mr. S. H. KNOWLES (Winnipeg North Centre): We of this group desire to associate ourselves with the very appropriate words spoken this morning on the radio by the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) and by him and the others who have spoken in this chamber on this solemn occasion. We associate ourselves not only with what has been said but with the spirit that rightly pervades the house at this historic moment.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

DESIRABILITY OF EXPEDITING THE WORK OF THE SESSION

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): I should like to take advantage of the feelings which are uppermost in the minds of hon. members at the present moment to make a very earnest plea to the members of the house to join together to seek to expedite as much as we possibly can the further business of this session. I am perfectly sure that with the mind of the country concentrated upon events which will go far to determine the fate of nations for generations to come, individual members in this house, and the people of Canada generally, will be impatient of utterances made in the House of Commons at this time which are not very much to the point in the discussion of the business which we are here to transact.

I would be the last to wish to impose any restraint upon the utterances of anyone, but I am confident that the feeling throughout Canada is that to-day we have reached one of the most serious moments in the history of the world, and that it is a part of our obligation to human society to avoid irrelevancies as much as possible and to concentrate as completely as we can upon the business before us.

I must say that from looking over the proceedings of the house in the past six weeks it seems to me that we shall not be able, unless we move at a more rapid pace than has been followed thus far, to complete in the course of this year the business that is already indicated on the order paper. I know hon. members do not wish to have the proceedings unduly prolonged. The only way in which the house can control the situation is by each member feeling an individual obligation to do his utmost to further the common will.

Mr. GORDON GRAYDON (Leader of the Opposition): What the Prime Minister has said will, I believe, find a very responsive echo in the house generally at this time. I am quite sure it will also be appreciated outside the house as well.

I would like to suggest to the Prime Minister one thing—a suggestion that was made before. Perhaps I can make that suggestion now in a way that will be of considerable help to the government and to parliament and will tend to expedite the business of the house. As the Prime Minister knows, we have not been sitting on Wednesdays during this session. I quite appreciate the position in which the government find themselves, and I have no desire to make it more difficult for them. Indeed, as the weeks have passed, I have had a greater appreciation than ever before of the burdens on the government, but I am going to suggest to the Prime Minister that we sit on Wednesday afternoons and evenings. I suggest that we have none of the preliminary proceedings on Wednesdays which would necessitate the presence here of the ministry, the Prime Minister or the war committee of the cabinet. I suggest that on Tuesday night we adjourn to go on at three o'clock on Wednesday exactly where we left off the night before, without any of the intermediate proceedings, and that we continue until eleven o'clock, with the supper adjournment on Wednesday.

Perhaps that would meet a situation which the Prime Minister finds exceedingly difficult. Both he and the government want to have some time in which to handle the heavy burdens in the war cabinet, and I offer that suggestion in what I hope is a constructive way, in order that we may be able to utilize not only the cooperation which I am sure the house will give, but also every minute of the time, because everyone in this house wants to have the business disposed of as quickly as possible. If the Prime Minister, myself and others give the lead we shall probably find a responsive following all over the House of Commons.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I shall be glad to consider carefully what my hon. friend has said, but I would say that the events of the last twenty-four hours have placed an additional burden on the ministry, much greater than any we have borne heretofore. Whether members of the government are in the house or not, the ministry has to bear the responsibility for what takes place. I would wish to think over very carefully what my hon. friend has suggested. To-morrow it would not be possible for the house to meet, in the light of what has happened to-day. Whether it will be possible in subsequent weeks, I shall have to consider very carefully with my colleagues. I suggest to my hon. friend, however, that to-morrow and possibly other Wednesdays until we feel we can sit on Wednesdays as well as other days without incurring serious risks, the day might in part be occupied by the whips of the different parties meeting together to see whether they could not come to some arrangement among themselves as to the amount of time it will be necessary to give to different measures, and reach an understanding with regard to methods of expediting the work of the session. That, I understand, is one of the methods employed in the British house. A certain length of time is assigned to particular debates; it is left to the different parties to decide which of their members will speak, and the discussion is limited to the time agreed upon. Something of that sort, I think, will be necessary if we are to get through in any reasonable time.

RAILWAY COMMITTEE

CONCURRENCE IN RECOMMENDATION OF STANDING COMMITTEE RESPECTING FUNDY AIR LINES

Mr. VINCENT DUPUIS (Chambly-Rouville) moved:

That the recommendation contained in the second report of the standing committee on railways, canals and telegraph lines, presented on May 25, 1944, respecting capital stock charge on Bill No. 89 (letter R2 of the senate), an act to incorporate Fundy Air Lines, be concurred in.

Motion agreed to.

PRIVATE BILL

THE GENERAL MISSIONARY SOCIETY OF THE GERMAN BAPTIST CHURCHES OF NORTH AMERICA—CHANGE OF NAME

Mrs. CORA T. CASSELMAN (Edmonton East) moved the first reading of bill No. 118 (from the senate) to change the name of The General Missionary Society of the German Baptist Churches of North America to The North American Baptist General Missionary Society.

Mr. GRAYDON: May we have an explanation of the bill?

Mrs. CASSELMAN: This society was first incorporated under the statutes of the state of New York. The word "German" in its title became objectionable to its members and in 1942 they asked that it be dropped in the main body in the state of New York. That was done. They are now asking that the body incorporated in Canada in 1922 under that name also have the word "German" removed from its title.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

AID TO GREECE

MESSAGE OF THANKS FROM PRIME MINISTER PAPANDREOU FOR SHIPMENTS OF FOOD

On the orders of the day:

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): I received last night the following telegram from the new Prime Minister of Greece in reference to shipments of food which have gone from Canada to Greece. The house will be much interested in its contents. The telegram is as follows:

Cairo, June 5, 1944.

The Right Hon. W. L. Mackenzie King,
Prime Minister of Canada,
Ottawa.

In assuming the premiership of the Royal Hellenic government of national union I wish to express to you and to the government and people of Canada the profound gratitude of the Greek nation for the vital help which they are receiving from your generous country in their appalling plight. Having lived in Greece until a few weeks ago and having shared in the unprecedented burden of famine and oppression which has not succeeded in crushing the spirit of my countrymen I feel entitled to convey to you this recognition of Canada's assistance and also to appeal for the greater possible development of these shipments to Greece without which the Greek nation cruelly decimated as it is would be threatened with total extinction. Please let all Canadians know that the food grown in the rich and free lands of their fine country is helping to save the life of a nation on whose soil liberty was first born and was constantly defended throughout long centuries, a nation which is now tortured and mutilated more than ever because it has refused to deny its ancient creed in the freedom and dignity of man.

Papandreou,
Prime Minister of Greece.

To that communication I sent the following reply this morning:

Ottawa, June 6, 1944.

His Excellency George Papandreou,
Prime Minister of Greece,
Cairo, Egypt.

I am deeply grateful to you for your moving message expressing the gratitude of the Greek nation for the shipments of food from Canada. It has been a source of pride and thankfulness to the government and people of Canada that during the past two years they have been able to provide some relief in this manner to the people of Greece. It is fitting that the ancient seat of human freedom should be sustained during the time of its darkest tribulation by the young and free Canadian people. I trust that the aid already brought to Greece in its struggle for survival will increase in volume until liberation has been achieved. May the day of liberation be near.

W. L. Mackenzie King

PRISONERS OF WAR

INQUIRY AS TO SHOOTING OF BRITONS AND CANADIANS IN GERMANY

On the orders of the day:

Mr. GORDON GRAYDON (Leader of the Opposition): I have a question to direct to the Prime Minister which arises out of a statement made by the Acting Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. St. Laurent) in a statement on May 19, 1944. Has the Prime Minister any information to convey to the house with respect to the investigations being made by the protecting power into the shooting of forty-seven British and Canadian prisoners of war in Germany.

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): I have no information to give to the house at the moment. I am sure that the protecting power, Switzerland, is doing all possible to obtain the information for us, but my hon. friend will recognize it can only be secured with the cooperation of Germany. Up to the present we have not received any further word, but the Swiss government is fully aware of our anxiety and desire to get information at the earliest possible moment.

INDIAN AFFAIRS

MEETING OF INDIAN DELEGATES IN CONVENTION IN OTTAWA

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. W. NOSEWORTHY (York South): Has the Minister of Mines and Resources been requested to meet Indian delegates in convention here or to provide room for their accommodation; if so, what provision has been made?

Hon. T. A. CRERAR (Minister of Mines and Resources): The hon. member was good enough to send me an intimation before three o'clock that he proposed to ask this question; and since the matter to which it relates has been the subject of reports in the newspapers and I believe was also mentioned on the radio last evening, perhaps I should answer his question a little more fully than by a mere "yes" or "no".

On May 19 I received a letter from one who purported to be the leader of the Indians of Canada. His name is Jules Sioui, of Loretteville, Quebec. Perhaps I should read the letter. It is as follows:

Dear Sir,

It is my duty to acquaint you with the final decision of the Indian chiefs of each tribe throughout the country, namely, that without exception they will all be present at the great convention which will be held in Ottawa from the fifth to the tenth of June.

It is understood that you are the general superintendent of Indian affairs but it is known that you have a great number of assistants and agents who are guilty of serious irregularities since many years toward the Indians.

Here is the claim of the Indian people for the next convention which will be held from the fifth of June; according to them the promises which were made by Her Majesty and others, either by proclamation or treaty, have not been respected either by your department or by the government itself. Therefore, the Indian people want it to be known that it cannot live and is not willing to go on living as it does, in a state which is not tolerable. That is why they will have a meeting with the object of dictating the future of the nation for their offspring.

Being the leader of the Indian people I am requested to hereby notify you that the Indian chiefs ask that a convenient place be prepared for the holding of their meeting which will last five days at least; and in view of the scarcity of rooms in the hotels, we also ask you to take the necessary steps for the erection of large tents where they will be able to sleep. It is understood that they will pay the installation cost of those tents.

I think it is necessary to draw your attention to the fact that the Indian chiefs are determined to be peaceful and gentle, but they have decided that your department and the government will have to change the situation from A to Z, believe it or not.

Yours truly,

Jules Sioui,

Leader of the Indians of Canada
Post Office, Loretteville, Que.

My reply to that was as follows:

M. E. J. Bastien,
Indian Agent,
Village Des Hurons, Quebec.

Please advise Jules Sioui that his letter of May 15 has received my personal attention and that the department does not recognize his leadership of any group of Indians in Canada and also that it is my earnest desire that the proposed convention should not be proceeded with as there is no accommodation here. Extreme pressure of business makes it impossible for the authorities to meet a large gathering. Director of Indian Affairs will be ready to receive a small delegation of about six Indians if recommended by their agents.

T. A. Crerar.

In spite of this, Jules Sioui turned up yesterday with a number of Indians. There may be some chiefs in this group of Indians whose presence in Ottawa has received considerable publicity, but I doubt if there are many. Sioui has no standing whatever as leader of the Indians in Canada. Yesterday he sent a request that I meet him and the delegation. I refused to do so, for two reasons. In the first place he is not the leader of the Indians of Canada; in the second place Sioui has been convicted of offences twice in the last six or seven years and has served gaol sentences. Not only that, but at the present time he is before the courts on a charge which, if ultimately proven, will land him in gaol again. I am doing no injustice to the Indians of Canada when I refuse to see him. I have sent word to the Indians present here in Ottawa that if they wish to appoint a small delegation of five or six I shall be glad to see them in my office in the House of Commons at five-thirty this afternoon, but I would not receive Sioui if he came with them as a delegate. I think that answers the question of my hon. friend.

LABOUR CONDITIONS

REINSTATEMENT OF THREE EMPLOYEES AT FLORENCE COLLIERIES, SYDNEY, N.S.

On the orders of the day:

Hon. HUMPHREY MITCHELL (Minister of Labour): On Friday last the hon. member for Cape Breton South (Mr. Gillis) asked a question, at page 3463 of Hansard, with respect to the dismissal of three employees of the Florence collieries of Nova Scotia. At that time I indicated that the matter had been looked into by an arbitration board in conformity with the agreement between the mine workers' organization and the employers, and that they had recommended the reinstatement of the men. I am glad to say that through the agency of the officer of the Department of Labour in Fredericton the company has agreed to reinstate the men in question.

MOTOR LAUNCH "OLGA"

REQUEST FOR INQUIRY INTO ACCIDENT RESULTING IN LOSS OF LIFE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. T. L. CHURCH (Broadview): I should like to ask the Minister of Transport if an inquiry will be held by the wreck commissioner into the wreck of a motor excursion launch called the Olga on Sunday last, at Port Stanley on lake Erie, in which some fifteen passengers were drowned. The act requires an immediate investigation. I should like to know also what life-saving equipment is carried by boats of this kind, what aids to navigation are provided, and what precautions are taken.

Hon. J. E. MICHAUD (Minister of Transport): The hon. member for Broadview was kind enough to give me notice of the question he has just asked. In reply I may say that on Sunday, June 4, a motor cruiser named Olga capsized at Port Stanley, Ontario, with the result that the lives of several persons were lost. On Monday morning arrangements were made to hold a preliminary inquiry under section 548 of the Canada Shipping Act, 1934. Captain Fred S. Slocombe, supervising examiner of masters and mates, Toronto, was instructed by telephone to hold an immediate inquiry. He left Toronto yesterday morning, accompanied by the chairman of the board of steamship inspection. It is expected that a complete report of the preliminary inquiry will be available in two or three days.

Replying to the second part of the question, the Canada Shipping Act, 1934, provides for the making of regulations for the safety and protection of people using small craft as well as large boats. Regulations were made and published; the last issue of the publication was 1937, and it was entitled, "Regulations respecting life-saving appliances." One of the regulations provides that the owners of small boats of more than five tons capacity shall protect the lives of those using such boats by providing life buoys, and further that every ship to which the regulations apply shall carry an appropriate number of life jackets, not less than the number of persons which the ship is certified to carry. Further, motor boats in excess of five tons gross tonnage carrying passengers are required to be inspected by a steamship inspector, and to have a certificate of inspection given by him. From time to time notice of these regulations is given to the public; the last notice was published on June 1, 1943, and must have been posted at or near Port Stanley, as directions were given that such notices should be posted in all our ports, calling the attention of motor boat owners to the provisions of the regulations and the shipping act with regard to equipment for the protection of people using such boats.

Mr. CHURCH: Regulations and statutes are all right, but there is no one anywhere to enforce them. These drowning accidents are occurring all over the inland waterways. I would ask the department to try to bring in some further regulations. We have not even a life-saving station near there on lake Erie.

[Mr. Church.]

SUGAR

REPORTED CESSATION OF RATIONING IN THE UNITED STATES—CANADIAN POLICY

On the orders of the day:

Hon. J. L. ILSLEY (Minister of Finance): Yesterday at page 3519 of Hansard the hon. member for New Westminster (Mr. Reid) asked this question:

In view of the fact that the United States do not now ration sugar, will the minister make a statement as to the present position in Canada, and indicate whether the restrictions in this country will likewise be lifted?

I have made inquiries, and find that the United States is still rationing sugar on substantially the same basis as it is rationed in Canada. The sugar administrator informs me that he thinks there is no chance of the United States abandoning the rationing of sugar, and certainly no consideration is being given to the lifting of the restrictions here.

WAR APPROPRIATION BILL

PROVISION FOR GRANTING TO HIS MAJESTY AID FOR NATIONAL DEFENCE AND SECURITY

The house resumed from Monday, June 5, consideration in committee of a resolution to grant to His Majesty certain sums of money for the carrying out of measures consequent upon the existence of a state of war—Mr. Ilsley—Mr. Bradette in the chair.

DEPARTMENT OF MINES AND RESOURCES

Immigration branch—

For expenditures in connection with looking after Canadian interests abroad, $475,000.

Hon. T. A. CRERAR (Minister of Mines and Resources): Before resuming consideration of this item I should like to correct a statement I made when the Abasand matter was under discussion last week. I described Mr. Max Ball as an oil geologist of very considerable eminence, and went on to say that he was not an engineer. I was incorrect in this latter statement, but was so advised at the time. Mr. Ball is a graduate in engineering, but I think I am correct in saying that the main part of his practice throughout his life has been as an oil geologist. I wish to make this correction because I do not want to do Mr. Ball the slightest injustice or even the appearance of injustice.

I do not think there is anything I can add to what I said yesterday about the item under consideration. Hon. members may have some further questions.

Mr. CHURCH: I should like to ask some questions in connection with this item for expenditures for the purpose of looking after the interests of Canadian nationals abroad. Last night the minister said that this expenditure referred to Canadian nationals in enemy countries who could not get home, and that the money would be spent for clothing, food, and purposes of that kind.

I would remind the minister that we are altogether relying on the International Red Cross, with its headquarters at Geneva, Switzerland. Switzerland is a neutral country, and it is the allies' protecting power. It acts as a sort of caretaker, and as a protecting power for the allies. The International Red Cross is located in that country; it communicates with and inspects camps, and looks after parcels sent to enemy countries. I fail to see why we should depend only upon one protecting power for the carrying out of this work, because in my view it is the first duty of the government to look after these nationals and prisoners of war. The same observations would apply to prisoners of war—although I realize they are not included in this item. There should be some inspection as well as that of the protecting power; we ought not to have to rely solely on Switzerland. For instance, we have Russia as an ally. Some of our nationals are in Japan, and yet we depend upon the protecting power, Switzerland, for the protection of those nationals. One of our allies, Russia, might be able to help in respect of our nationals and prisoners in Japan. The same applies to Germany, and to all other enemy countries.

We should be more active, not only in connection with Canadian nationals in those enemy countries, but also in respect of prisoners of war. In my view the government itself should take some action in these matters, direct or indirect, and not depend entirely on the International Red Cross. Sometimes they cannot do all that should be done—although we realize they have done magnificent work. These nationals and prisoners of war should not have to depend entirely upon a protecting power which in turn depends upon the International Red Cross. Surely the government could be a little more active.

The minister gave a long list of neutral countries, but there was one he did not mention, namely, southern Ireland. She is a neutral country, and some of our Canadian pilots are there. They have landed there and cannot get out. I have been told that they are not looked after, through this vote. The first duty of the government is to follow this through as far as possible and not rely entirely upon one protecting power. Let us get better reports than we are getting from Switzerland. While we have a diplomatic arrangement with that country to look after prisoners of war and nationals in enemy countries, something more active than that is necessary so that we may know what is going on over there. For instance, the other day some of those nationals might have been shot, the way some of the prisoners of war were. In those circumstances we would not have known where we stood.

On this seventy-second day of the session we should have more information in the house with respect to Canadian nationals and prisoners of war than we have at the present time. I should like to have a reply from the minister, because complaints have been made.

Mr. CRERAR: Last night I explained the purpose of the vote. This is not drawn upon to look after prisoners of war. The Red Cross have that work exceptionally well organized, from all the information made available to the public. They made several appeals to Canada, with very generous response. This item is to be administered by the director of the immigration branch, through the agency of the protecting power, to assist Canadian nationals, some of whom may be interned and others of whom may not be interned, but who might be in want because of the circumstances in which, through no fault of their own, they find themselves.

The important question whether or not the government is doing enough to care for prisoners of war is one which does not come under this vote. That is a question which might be taken up on some other occasion. As I understand it, under international conventions the German authorities are expected to provide for allied prisoners of war who may be in Germany the same accommodation and food they supply to their own troops. I believe I am correct in that. On the other hand, that is the standard in Canada so far as German prisoners of war are concerned. The chief question raised by the hon. member, however, cannot be covered by this vote.

Mr. JOHNSTON (Bow River): I should like to refer to the vote for $475,000, but before doing so may I make a brief observation in connection with the statement made by the minister a moment ago with respect to Mr. Max Ball. I have in my office evidence which would prove conclusively that Max Ball is, as the minister has stated, a graduate of a university of engineering, and that he is a practical and capable engineer. I am glad the minister put his statement on the record, because it will clear up some misunderstanding. It has been stated on several occasions, especially by the Minister of Munitions and Supply, that Mr. Max Ball is not an engineer. That may have given a wrong impression throughout the country, although some of us have disputed the suggestion. It is well that the minister has placed his statement on record, because the fact is that Mr. Ball is a practical and capable engineer.

Coming back to this $475,000, the other day the minister said this money was to be used to pay refugees in Europe.

Mr. CRERAR: No.

Mr. JOHNSTON (Bow River): And that it was paid through the government of Switzerland. He also said there were between 700 and 800 refugees who would come under this vote.

Mr. CRERAR: No; my hon. friend is quite mistaken. It is not a matter of refugees at all. At the outbreak of war Canadian citizens could be found in practically every country of Europe. Some of them were representatives of business concerns in Canada; others perhaps were tourists who found themselves unable to get out. Those people are in Germany now, and in the occupied countries. This vote is simply to provide means for a substantial measure of support for those people. They are not in any sense refugees. They are Canadian nationals who happened to be living for the time being in those countries.

Mr. JOHNSTON (Bow River): I am glad the minister has replied, because I was in error when I referred to refugees. I meant Canadian citizens in occupied countries in Europe. The minister stated that there were between seven and eight hundred of them; that this vote was to be used for their maintenance there, and that the money was paid out through the Swiss government. It would amount to a little more than $600 apiece for these Canadian nationals. Does it take that much to maintain them, or does a good deal of this vote go in administrative costs? Is the fund administered through the Red Cross in the occupied countries?

Mr. CRERAR: I can set my hon. friend's mind at ease. None of the money goes into administrative costs.

Mr. JOHNSTON (Bow River): I do not mean in administrative costs in Canada.

Mr. CRERAR: The fund is administered by the director of immigration.

Mr. JOHNSTON (Bow River): In Canada?

Mr. CRERAR: Yes.

Mr. JOHNSTON (Bow River): I am speaking of administration over there.

[Mr. C. E. Johnston.]

Mr. CRERAR: We may on occasion pay the travelling expenses of agents of the Swiss government who keeps in touch with the needs of these Canadians wherever they may be. The Swiss government have or had diplomatic representatives in all these European countries. They certainly have in Germany, and I dare say they still have consuls in all the occupied countries. It is through this machinery that we keep in touch with the needs of these Canadian nationals. Consequently expenses that might be described as administrative costs are very low.

Mr. JOHNSTON (Bow River): Just what are those expenses? Probably the minister has that information before him.

Mr. CRERAR: I have not the figures here, but the director who administers the fund tells me that the costs are very low, practically nil.

Mr. JOHNSTON (Bow River): If the administrative costs are practically nil, I would think that $600 apiece is a very generous gift to the Canadian nationals. I am not saying that the amount should be reduced, but I am very doubtful whether these individuals get that amount. I think that there must be administrative costs somewhere. If so, they should be given to the committee.

Mr. CRERAR: I am informed that the payments to the Canadian nationals run about fifty dollars per month per person. When that is converted into the currency of the occupied or enemy country its effective purchasing power may be reduced. In addition, the cost of food has considerably increased in these countries. We have not very much information on that, but we asked for an increase this year because of increased living costs, and the costs may continue to increase. Some Canadians have been able to get along without asking for this assistance. The increase is due to those two factors.

Mr. JOHNSTON (Bow River): If the minister cannot tell us now what the administrative costs are, perhaps he could tell us later. They may be much more substantial than the minister imagines.

Mr. CRERAR: We will try to get that information, but the advice I get, and I accept it, is that administrative costs are practically nil.

Mr. MARSHALL: Is it not a fact that on previous occasions moneys have been advanced from this particular allotment to Canadian high commissioners in various parts of the world?

Mr. CRERAR: No.

Mr. MARSHALL: Advances were made according to the auditor general's report for the fiscal year ended March 31, 1943. At page J-64 there is this item:

Allotment: Immigration branch—Expenditures in connection with looking after Canadian interests abroad apart from enemy and enemy-controlled territories.

Is not that the allotment we are discussing now?

Mr. CRERAR: Yes.

Mr. MARSHALL: Under the item is this comment:

Of this allotment, $1,187.97 was expended in repatriating Canadians from Lisbon to Canada. Relief and repatriation charges to other Canadian nationals amounted to $6,980.93. The Canadian High Commissioner at Canberra was advanced $3,938 and the Canadian High Commissioner at Pretoria $1,338.

For what purposes were these sums advanced to the high commissioners?

Mr. CRERAR: Some of the fund, I am advised, might be used for the relief of distressed Canadians in Great Britain, for example. Let me illustrate. If a Canadian who was in an occupied country or in Germany shortly after the outbreak of the war succeeded in getting to Britain and then found himself stranded, he could get assistance from this fund through the high commissioner. I believe the same thing has happened in Australia. I think that is the explanation of the point raised by my hon. friend.

Mr. MARSHALL: In that case the fund is not administered through the Swiss Red Cross.

Mr. CRERAR: No. Never at any time have I stated that the fund was administered through the Red Cross. The Red Cross have had nothing to do with it.

Mr. MARSHALL: Did not the minister say it was administered through Switzerland?

Mr. CRERAR: Yes. I have stated several times that the fund is administered for Canadians in enemy and enemy-occupied countries through the agency of the Swiss government. That administration is carried on between the Swiss authorities and the Canadian authority in the person of the director of immigration. The Red Cross have nothing to do with it at all.

Mr. JOHNSTON (Bow River): I think if the minister will agree to give the committee a break-down showing how much was spent for administration and how much these Canadian nationals actually received, it will be satisfactory. The minister has not yet given a satisfactory explanation of the disposition of this $475,000. He is not sure himself; he does not know. I think he should show the committee where the money has gone.

Mr. CRERAR: My hon. friend is not going to get away with that for one second. It is quite easy for him to get up in his place and say: I want to know where every cent has gone.

Mr. JOHNSTON (Bow River): I did not say that.

Mr. CRERAR: Let me finish. I did not interrupt the hon. member. When we give him that information, he can come along and say that he wants the names of all those who got the money.

Mr. JOHNSTON (Bow River): That is exaggerating.

Mr. CRERAR: Then afterwards he might say: I want to know the colour of their hair.

Mr. JOHNSTON (Bow River): That is nonsense.

Mr. CRERAR: I did not interrupt my hon. friend. It is all a question of how much detail should be given. My hon. friend is asking for a break-down of this expenditure. We cannot give any break-down of this item of $475,000 because we do not know where it is going to be needed. We expect that it will be needed. We could probably give my hon. friend a break-down of the expenditure last year. But this item is to meet contingencies that may arise this year. I cannot tell my hon. friend now how much will be spent in Germany, how much in France, Holland, Belgium, and so on. That is impossible. The vote is here to meet requests which may reach us for assistance, and it is not possible now to give a break-down of this amount in the manner desired by my hon. friend. If he wishes information as to how the $275,000 which was voted last year was expended, while I have not the details here I can secure them. But I must ask my hon. friend to realize that it is impossible now to break down the $475,000 and say where it will be needed.

Mr. JOHNSTON (Bow River): I do not want to prolong this unduly, but surely the committee should know how these moneys are going to be expended. Up to now, in the information he has given the committee the minister has not revealed how any part of it will be spent; in fact he said he thought that for administration purposes the requirements were nil. The hon. member for Camrose showed from the auditor general's report how some of this money was expended last year, and pointed out that quite a substantial amount was allotted to the high commissioners. Since the minister has indicated that some money was paid to employees of the Swiss government for administrative purposes, we should know at least how the money which was disbursed last year was allocated, and what portion of it was received by Canadian citizens living in these countries. I do not mean, received by them as individuals, for certainly we are not concerned about the colour of their hair; no one would ask such a nonsensical thing, and I am astonished that the minister even mentioned it; it would almost seem as though he was trying to evade the question.

Mr. MARSHALL: Last year the minister on his own admission stated that we did not spend $275,000.

Mr. CRERAR: I did not make that admission last year; I made that admission a few moments ago, that we required a little less than $275,000.

Mr. MARSHALL: How did the departmental officials who estimated the amount calculate that we will require $475,000 this year, if last year the allotment of $275,000 was not spent?

Mr. CRERAR: All I can say in reply is that from the information coming into the department it is expected that a larger sum will be required. My hon. friend asks upon what basis we estimate for $475,000 this year. There is not any other basis than past experience. It may be that $50,000 will be required in Germany, or it may be that not $1,000 will be required. I cannot say. All I can do is give the committee the purpose for which we are asking for the money. There is no hon. member who will disagree with the object of the vote. I can assure hon. members that it will be spent as wisely as possible; and when the war is over we shall know how it has been apportioned as between the various countries.

Mr. MARSHALL: How much of the $275,000 voted last year was spent?

Mr. CRERAR: I have not that information here, but I will ascertain the amount which was spent and the places where it was spent last year.

Mr. JOHNSTON (Bow River): And the amount paid for administration.

Mr. CRERAR: I find I have the amount spent last year out of the $275,000; it was $267,527.44. I understand my hon. friend also wants to know how much was spent in each country. It will take a little time to compile that, but I will have it prepared and sent to my hon. friend.

[Mr. C. E. Johnston.]

Mr. MARSHALL: So far as I am concerned I am not interested. All I am interested in is the amount of the allotment which was actually spent last year.

Mr. CRERAR: Well, that is the amount.

Item agreed to.

To provide single minimum cost of transportation of wives and dependents of members of the Canadian forces overseas, $100,000.

Mr. MacNICOL: Is the minister able to state the number of soldiers' wives coming from England and the number of children accompanying them? Is it necessary to assist all of them, or do some of them pay their own way?

Mr. CRERAR: The government pays the passage of these dependents to Canada. From the beginning of the war to the present time approximately fifteen hundred have been brought to Canada. In the fiscal year 1942-43 257 were brought back at an expenditure of $22,651. The number of warrants for transportation issued to dependents for the period April 1, 1943, to January 4, 1944, was 580, and the expenditure for the last fiscal year up to February 29 was $23,299.51. But the number of these people coming back week by week and month by month is increasing, and consequently we are asking for this larger sum. I cannot tell the committee whether all of it will be required; I cannot tell them whether it will be sufficient. As regards many of these war appropriation estimates all we can make is an approximation, and we hope we are fairly near the mark in the amount we are asking for here.

Mr. MacNICOL: Some time ago I saw a newspaper item to the effect that 11,000 of our soldiers had married overseas. In due course their wives will have to be brought to Canada. In the meantime they will have some children, and the aggregate number requiring transportation will be quite large. I have been wondering whether the minister has asked for a large enough vote.

Mr. CRERAR: I believe the number of Canadians who have married overseas is substantially larger than the figure mentioned by my hon. friend, and it may be, if the war ends soon and a movement to Canada upon a considerable scale is begun, this amount will be insufficient; if it is, probably we can get a further amount out of the war appropriation vote. But it is not likely that there will be a very large movement of dependents during the present fiscal year. In the first place, where a soldier has married overseas and has one or two children, his family will remain there until he returns; indeed the likelihood is that he will return before his family. That is a problem which has to be worked out. Then there is the question of transportation facilities.

Mr. MacNICOL: Over here?

Mr. CRERAR: Across from the other side to Canada. When the war is over several million troops will have to be brought back to North America. The officers think that this amount is sufficient to meet the needs of the current year.

Mr. MacNICOL: Does the vote cover the return of soldiers' wives who went to Great Britain with their husbands?

Mr. CRERAR: There might have been a few in the air service who went over very early, immediately after the outbreak of the war, but later the movement of women and children was stopped. Therefore, soldiers' wives and families were not allowed to leave Canada and go to Britain. A very serious problem arose at the end of the last war. During the course of that war thousands of dependents of Canadian soldiers, wives and children, went to Britain and had to be brought back. There were over 50,000 at the end of the war. There are two or three reasons why we did not want a repetition of that after this war. There was a greater danger in this war than there was at the time of the last war in having the dependents over there, and furthermore Britain was hard pressed for food and it did not make sense to allow the dependents of Canadian soldiers to go to Britain and thus add to the difficulties there. The movement was therefore stopped. The movement which this vote will cover will be in all instances that of dependents of members of the armed forces who went overseas.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): Does the request for the return of the wife come from the soldier or from the wife?

Mr. CRERAR: From either or both.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): What is the general policy in connection with the return of these people? Some men may have been killed and some may be fighting in the army overseas. Does the request come from the soldier himself or from his wife?

Mr. CRERAR: Usually the soldier makes the request of the Canadian authorities in London, and sometimes the wife does. These have to do, mainly though not altogether, with cases where the soldier has been wounded and is invalided home. He may be discharged for one reason or another and comes back to Canada, and under those circumstances, if he has married since he went to Britain, he wishes to have his family back, and we want to bring them back. The vote is for that purpose.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): Is the consent of the soldier always obtained before the request is granted?

Mr. CRERAR: I would assume it is. There might be cases in which the soldier did not want his dependents to come back with him, but I do not know of any.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): I am thinking more particularly of soldiers still over there, soldiers still in action, and I was wondering whether the request came from the wife or the soldier. The consent of the soldier would have to be obtained, would it not?

Mr. CRERAR: There have been, I believe, some instances in which wives and families have returned to Canada while the soldier is still in the army. They come here to relatives. That is done by private arrangement, but in that case we pay the dependent's fare to Canada.

Mr. MARSHALL: Does the government regard it as a loan or as a gift?

Mr. CRERAR: It is not a loan, and there is no repayment.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): I do not see why the soldier should not be always consulted. He is the husband, and unless there is some good reason, he should be consulted as to whether his wife should come home or not. He is the man to be thought of. That is why I asked the question.

Mr. CRERAR: This is ground on which I would not wish to be too dogmatic in expressing an opinion, but I believe that in practically all cases the soldier is consulted. I do not think his wife would want to run away from him over there, nor do I think he would want to run away from his recently acquired wife. These things are worked out by mutual arrangement. I do not know of any cases of the kind suggested by my hon. friend.

Mr. REID: Is the government considering the question of designating as Canadians, in the sense of children born in Canada, the children of soldiers born in the old country? There is quite a distinction between those of us who come from the old country and are British citizens in the first instance and Canadian citizens by domicile, and persons who are Canadians by birth. Citizenship by domicile does not carry on if you leave the country, but a Canadian child, a child born here, cannot be denied entry and is a Canadian citizen as well as a British subject throughout his life. Many of these children would be born in Canada if shipping space could be provided to send the wives here. This matter is important from the point of view of the child; it is important that it be recognized as a Canadian child, as if born in Canada. Some consideration should be given the fact that these children are the children of Canadian soldiers. They are justly entitled to that consideration, because it will mean something to them in later life. Will the government consider this aspect of the matter?

Mr. CRERAR: My hon. friend has raised an interesting point. He asks whether consideration has been given it. I do not think it has. When a Canadian soldier marries overseas and has two or three children before he is discharged from the army we assume that he will bring his wife and children to Canada and the children will not be under any handicap in this country. The point is an interesting one and I would like to think it over. It strikes me offhand that if we were to clothe these British born future Canadians with some special right it would require to be done by legislation.

Mr. REID: It is worthy of thought.

Mr. CRERAR: It is an interesting point and will be given consideration.

Mr. WEIR: From whom and where is the application made for assistance to bring soldiers' dependents back to the country? That is the point which the hon. member for St. Paul's had in mind.

Mr. CRERAR: The request should be directed to the commissioner of immigration, Canada House, London, by those who are overseas. If a soldier overseas desires to bring his dependents to Canada he should make application to the commissioner of immigration.

Mr. JOHNSTON (Bow River): Is there any restriction on the amount of money? Does the applicant have to be in necessitous circumstances before he makes a request?

Mr. CRERAR: No.

Mr. JOHNSTON (Bow River): Can any soldier's wife get it?

Mr. CRERAR: The soldier can make application and get the transportation.

Mr. JOHNSTON (Bow River): Does the amount given cover just transportation or does it include other things as well?

Mr. CRERAR: The amount given is transportation expenses through to destination, whether it be Ottawa, Montreal, Winnipeg or Vancouver.

[Mr. Reid.]

Mr. JOHNSTON (Bow River): Any soldier who applies for it can get it?

Mr. CRERAR: Any soldier can get it for his dependents.

Mr. JOHNSTON (Bow River): But he must be a soldier. Officers' dependents could not get it. I want to make a distinction there. Can an officer's dependent get it?

Mr. CRERAR: All members of the Canadian armed forces are entitled to it and they can make application on behalf of their dependents who wish to come to Canada, or the dependents can make application and if the circumstances are all in order they get their transportation and are not asked to repay it.

Mr. JOHNSTON (Bow River): It does not depend on the financial standing of the person who is applying for it?

Mr. CRERAR: No.

Item agreed to.

Assistance to the national advisory committee for children from overseas, $75,000.

Mr. GILLIS: Would the minister give us a brief summary of this vote? What is the personnel of the committee, and what are its functions? In what way is this money spent? Are the members of the committee remunerated for their services?

Mr. CRERAR: The members of the committee serve without remuneration. Doctor Wallace of Queen's university is chairman of the committee, and the following are members: Doctor Johnston, of Ottawa, who used to be deputy minister of Marine and Fisheries; Mr. Kenneth Greene; Mr. Fred Bronson; Mayor Lewis and Senator Wilson. Then there are a number from outside points across Canada whose names I cannot recall at the moment. As a matter of fact the general committee have not had a meeting for two years or more, I think. There is a small executive here that handles the distribution of funds and passes accounts; that is, in relation to what was known as the "Corb" children, the children who were brought to Canada at government expense in the late summer of 1940. As I recall it, about 1,560 children were brought to Canada at that time. Some of them have returned. Some of the older ones have returned to enlist, and some have enlisted in the Canadian forces.

Mr. GILLIS: I am not interested in pressing the matter; I was merely questioning the words "assistance to the national advisory committee". As the minister pointed out, I thought that the work was pretty well completed and that $75,000 of an appropriation as assistance to that committee appeared to be high.

Mr. CRERAR: There are over 1,300 of the children still in Canada. It will be recalled by the committee that there was a very generous response from homes of all classes of people across Canada for the reception of those children. Conditions in those homes were carefully investigated by the welfare departments of each of the provinces, from whom we receive the finest cooperation. People in many of those homes were not able out of their own means to provide expenses, some of which necessarily arose with regard to clothing, school books and the like; and there might be illness requiring hospital treatment, and so forth. There was of course a generous response from the public at the time. The general public contributed altogether over $65,000, and $37,000 of that came from the Independent Order of Oddfellows of Canada. I was particularly proud of that, because I have been a member of that order in good standing for over forty years.

Mr. JOHNSTON (Bow River): That is one good quality.

Mr. CRERAR: Oh, yes. Private donations have now practically ceased, and this amount is asked for to carry the incidental expenses of which I gave an illustration a moment ago. I do not know whether the whole amount will be required, but I do not think there is anything which has really evoked more sincere admiration from the British people as a whole than what the Canadian people have done in their limited way in caring for these children. It might be recalled—it will take only a moment—that in 1940 it was expected that the movement would run into substantial numbers, and it was only the torpedoing of two ships in the late summer of 1940 on which children were coming to Canada, with considerable loss of life, that stopped the movement. I have no hesitation in asking the committee to approve this vote.

Mr. GILLIS: I am not objecting to it at all, but the wording of the vote is misleading. If the money is to be expended in the way the minister points out, I think it is small, but if it is to be used as the wording of the vote suggests, merely as assistance to the advisory committee, it would lead me to believe that it was an administrative vote.

Mr. CRERAR: I think I can clear that up to my hon. friend's satisfaction.

Mr. GILLIS: I am quite satisfied.

Mr. CRERAR: It was anticipated at the time this movement of children started that some private funds would be received; consequently the order in council that was passed, on which the whole action was based, provided for the setting up of an advisory committee and the expenditures were to be made on approval of the advisory committee but subject to government audit. That procedure has been followed, and that is why the vote is worded in this way.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): This vote refers only to children who came out under the government scheme at that time; is not that so?

Mr. CRERAR: The vote is practically for what is known as the "Corb" children. That is the abbreviation for the body set up in Great Britain to deal with the matter—the "Children's Overseas Reception Board." It is true that between five and six thousand women and children came to Canada voluntarily; that is, their people made arrangements for them to come here, and made arrangements for their maintenance here. There have been some instances, not a great many, in which funds provided by this vote have been used in necessitous cases. In the main the vote has reference to the children who came out under government auspices.

Mr. POULIOT: I want to congratulate the Minister of Mines and Resources upon the interest he has taken in the welfare of these children. This afternoon the Prime Minister read a cable from the Premier of Greece, sent from Cairo, to the effect that the help sent by Canada had been received by the Greeks. That help was badly needed, and the cable indicated, that what had been sent by Canada had reached its destination. If I understood correctly what was said by the minister this item of $75,000 is in connection with children already in Canada. I suggest to the minister that something should be done for the children of Europe. It could be done through the Red Cross, in the same way that parcels are sent to allied prisoners of war in concentration camps in Germany or the occupied countries. The distress of these children is incredible. I have here a book by Miss Therese Bonney, a lady who is very much interested in welfare work; this book is illustrated, and I will send it to the minister. The preface is in these words:

> This is the tale, not of one, but of too many European countries, the story of an eye witness . . . visual testimony . . . not words . . . not propaganda . . . reality. There are no staged pictures . . . no misleading captions.
> With my camera I have made this record in France, Spain, England, Sweden and Finland.

This is incidental. They might have been taken in a score of other countries to-day. I have written this story with my lens. This is the truth for which I vouch.

The captions under the pictures go on in this way:

It was not so long ago—the children of Europe trooped to class. They went to school—learned their three R's; led happy normal lives at home—at play. Then—war was declared. They too read the news. Suddenly—their little voices were silenced—communications were severed and then—we knew no more. Children played while men dug trenches. Then—they too prepared for war. When the day came there was only an hour—to leave. They took to the road. Tiny tots—packs on their backs. Heavy burdens for weary mothers. From time to time they rested; the old—the young; slept anywhere, everywhere; took refuge in barns. Like grown-ups they too were wounded. They tried so hard to save what they loved if only—a doll. Planes overhead. They understood so little—between air raids; a moment's respite. So exhausted. At times it seemed almost impossible to trudge on. To concentration camps they went, the children, all over Europe. Mothers cradled them while fathers died at their side of neglect and tuberculosis. There the Quakers gave them paper and pencil and they tried to learn. They took it all so seriously, opened their eyes so wide; faced it so courageously—so gallantly. Timidly—they climb to would-be homes in gutted houses. In wind and rain they beg—they search for food; and so often all they find is rotten oranges. Shoeless, hungry, they stay in bed. One shoeless—rags. They go from door to door; sleep—in mangers. Victims—of a civil war, a defeat, an invasion; they face a strange life. Larders empty; "no bread—useless to insist" chalked on bakery doors. "Plus de pain; inutile d'insister." No food at home; long lines in school; one meal a day. They fold their hands in prayer and thank God for that little. Trust the world so implicitly. So few have understood; the Quakers, Red Crosses—nuns. That bread becomes not only the staff of life but the staff of resistance and oppression. They—not the Germans—get the little sent and they try so hard to say thank you.

I want to show this to the minister. I wonder if he cannot do anything for these little children who are dying of hunger in occupied Europe. Those who are here are well fed and well looked after, but these are the young men of the future generation. I hope they will never be exposed to the horrors of war. This is a tragic matter. The situation is so bad in France that little children cannot go to school unless they have a certificate from the doctor to the effect that they do not suffer from tuberculosis. Children are dying in countless numbers in Europe at the present time, and now is the time to do something for them. A society was organized in Montreal for the purpose of helping these children. I have a friend in Westmount, an eminent artist, Mr. J. R. Spendlove, who has taken a special interest in this matter. He has done as much for these little children as Miss Therese Bonney has done in Europe. He wonders, for instance, why the work of the Save the Children Society of Montreal was halted. People were ready to do something. I received a letter from one of my confreres in Beauce county, who told me he wanted to do something, but all their hopes were in vain; nothing could be done. This afternoon, when we came back to the chamber after having listened to His Majesty the King, I went to see the Prime Minister and showed him some of these pathetic pictures. I do not know if that society in Montreal had the approval of the Minister of National War Services, but where is that minister to-day? He is supposed to look after all charitable organizations. This is a matter that should have come under the Minister of Mines and Resources, with his big heart, but now is the time to see that something is done, something more than words, something concrete. Our granaries are full of wheat, some of which we have sent to Greece. There is no reason why something should not be sent to the other countries of Europe. I ask the Minister of Mines and Resources and his colleagues who are listening to me now to urge this matter upon the Prime Minister, who is surely well disposed, so that something may be done at the earliest possible opportunity. Now that the invasion has commenced it will be possible to reach some of these people directly, but in the case of those who cannot be reached directly some help may be given through the Red Cross. I urge this upon the minister, and I hope that something may be done.

Mr. CRERAR: Following the very moving appeal by the hon. member for Temiscouata I want to say that I think he has done a distinct service in bringing this matter to the attention of the committee. This book of pictures which he has sent to my desk reveals a shocking condition of affairs in the districts in which these photographs were taken. Unquestionably we have no conception in Canada of the terrible plight of hundreds of thousands—yes, millions of men and women, and particularly children in Europe to-day. To bring a measure of relief to these unfortunate people is one of the purposes of the United Nations Relief and Rehabilitation Administration, commonly called UNRRA, which was set up several months ago, and upon which Canada is prominently represented. Under UNRRA the people of Canada are pledged to provide a certain quota of relief. By far the greater portion is to come from the United States, and Great Britain and other countries are also pledged to assist. I have no doubt whatsoever that effective steps are now being taken to organize relief for those poor people, and if the steps already taken prove insufficient, there would be no people or government in the world with any of the decent instincts of humanity that would refuse further assistance.

In the moving speech he delivered this afternoon the hon. member for Temiscouata has brought to the attention of the committee a matter to which we should give full consideration.

Mr. GRAYDON: It would seem that the war estimates of the Department of Mines and Resources are almost through. Therefore at this time may I pay a tribute to those of our war guests who came from Great Britain to Canada. Before doing so, however, may I add what I believe is a well-deserved tribute to the sympathetic and moving appeal made this afternoon by the hon. member for Temiscouata. It shows that in the House of Commons members have big hearts, and that they are prepared to take their stand for the rights of humanity in which this nation is so deeply interested.

Many of our war guests are now returning to their homes, some to serve in the armed forces and some for other causes, and for that reason I believe that as a parliament we might properly express our deep appreciation of having had them with us. They have been an inspiration to the whole country, particularly to the people in those communities in which they have been located. Among the guests who came to Canada were some seventy or eighty little girls from St. Hilda's college at Whitby, England. They were taken to one of the larger homes in Erindale, in my constituency, where arrangements had been made for them. I have been to that home on occasion, and the impression the little girls made upon those of us who from time to time went to see them, and to see the work being done for them by the sisters, is one which will remain with us for a long time.

I believe that the war guests have done something for the Canadian people, and I hope on the other hand that we have done something for them. I believe that their presence here has brought the people of the United Kingdom and those of Canada just a little bit closer because, in the final analysis, there is nothing like children to bring about that result.

Mr. REID: And we hope that they will come back.

Mr. GRAYDON: The observation of the hon. member for New Westminster prompts me to join in the hope that they will come back. I believe that we may expect something of that kind, because I have no doubt the hospitality and welcome extended to them has been deeply appreciated.

The hon. member's remark prompts me to add something further. In the last three or four months I have had particularly heavy overseas correspondence from men who lived in my constituency but who are now overseas. Now, more than ever before, they are writing home and saying that they have friends from one or other parts of the empire, or from Great Britain itself, who are anxious to learn if this would not be a good place to come when the war is over. They want to know what the possibilities are. They want to know what jobs there will be. If I have answered one, I am sure I have answered scores of letters in the last two or three months giving information along those lines. This is information sought by friends of our boys overseas. They have liked those boys, and because of that they think they would like our country.

I have thought it well at this time to take a moment or two of the committee's time to add this word of appreciation in respect of one of those little things brought about by the war, one of those things which, as time goes by, may develop into a very big thing

Soldier settlement, Alaska highway, legal and survey fees, et cetera, $15,000.

Mr. FAIR: What does this cover?

Mr. CRERAR: In connection with the building of this highway it was necessary to secure right of way, and depots for storage purposes of one kind and another. The Canadian government undertook to do those things. In the process certain legal expenses arose in connection with the searching of titles, the securing of titles to roadway and other properties. This vote is directly associated with those expenditures. There are survey costs of $7,500. Then there is an item of $5,000 for field representatives and travelling expenses. There is a further item of $2,500 for legal and miscellaneous costs in connection with the item.

Mr. KNOWLES: What relation has this to soldier settlement?

Mr. CRERAR: None at all, other than that a couple of experienced employees of the soldier settlement branch did the work.

Mr. KNOWLES: And that is the reason why it is listed under soldier settlement?

Mr. CRERAR: Yes.

DEPARTMENT OF EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

Departmental administration and passport office, $142,425.

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, hon. members may recall I mentioned a few days ago that, when taking up civil estimates, I would make a general statement on external affairs, and would be prepared to discuss individual items in the committee at whatever length hon. members might desire. My hope is that it will not be necessary to discuss on these war appropriation estimates, in any detail in any event, the matters that would be discussed on the civil estimates.

I might explain that when the war came on, the Department of External Affairs necessarily assumed a number of additional duties and began to perform services which had not been performed in peace time. It is apparent now that many of these services will for the most part have to be continued after the war is over. I might illustrate; for example, a number of new legations and embassies have been opened during the war. In making appropriation for these services where they have arisen in time of war we have voted some of the moneys required under the war appropriation. This year, in order to make matters a little clearer, we have included many of these services in the civil estimates account rather than in the war appropriation estimates. Hon. members will see we are asking for smaller amounts in the war appropriation estimates than we did a year ago. That does not mean that there will be less expenditure on these services. It means that we have transferred to the civil estimates expenditures we were formerly voting under the war appropriation. All the three items here set forth, departmental administration and passport office, representation abroad, and sundry services could be discussed under the civil estimates as they will come up then, and I would hope that they might be discussed then rather than now.

Mr. KNOWLES: In view of what the Prime Minister has just said about transferring the expenditures to civil estimates, may I ask why he does not transfer all of them? Are the amounts that are still here in the nature of war estimates?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: There are always certain exceptional things arising; for example, temporary staff, the renting of premises that had not been anticipated or that might only be temporarily required and the like. Provision for such may appear under the war appropriation estimates. If they continue after the war they will thereafter appear in the civil estimates.

Mr. GRAYDON: Now that the items have been carried—I was fearful of provoking further discussion if I spoke before—I wonder whether the Prime Minister at some time, not necessarily now, would clarify something which has not been clear to my mind. The other day the diplomatic representatives of Chile and Canada were raised to the rank of ambassadors from ministers, and I was wondering what the policy was that governs such changes. Perhaps the Prime Minister would make a statement on that when his civil estimates are up. I was curious why it was done in the case of some countries and not in that of others. I was also wondering who takes the initiative in such matters, whether it is done by agreement, and generally what is the policy covering such changes.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): And is there no distinction made between great countries and small countries? We should not have ambassadors to every country.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: On this continent we had reached the stage where our minister at Washington was the only senior representative with the rank of minister of all the countries represented there. All the South American countries had ambassadors, and we did not feel that our representative should take second place to any country in this western hemisphere.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): That is equality of status.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Both in status and in stature we felt that we could hold our own.

Wartime information board, $995,707.

Mr. FRASER (Peterborough West): I do not think this item should carry without some explanation from the Prime Minister as to the need for this amount of money. There is a lot of money spent by the wartime information board that should not be spent. They are getting out bulletins all the time. Here is one, "Airmail Bulletin." They have issued a number of bulletins. They are coming out nearly every day, and sometimes what they get out is not even accurate.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I should not like to admit the last statement. There must be some explanation. My parliamentary assistant, the hon. member for St. Lawrence-St. George, has been following very closely this phase of the work of the privy council and I shall allow him to make the explanations that are being called for.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Two instances were brought to my attention of bulletins sent out by the wartime information board covering national selective service. I took occasion to write, protesting against the duplication, to the gentleman whom I see in front of me. I must say that he answered very courteously but without very much conviction, to me at all events. There is duplication and some of the information given out is not even supplementary. I am sorry I have not my file with me. I could show the Prime Minister exactly what I mean if I had it here. The wartime information board were sending out information with respect to the operations of certain government departments which the departments themselves had already covered and covered very fully with respect to employers, employees and so forth. Two of the bulletins I refer to were just pure duplication. If the board have to be busy—and I suppose they have to or they could not justify themselves—care should be taken to see that there is no overlapping, because all this comes out of the taxpayers' money. There should be more coordination to prevent this duplication. I am sorry I have not under my hand the two bulletins to which I refer, but I am sure I was justified in making the protest which I did at that time. There is duplication—that is the assertion I make.

Mr. CLAXTON: Last year the appropriation and work of the wartime information board were very fully explained and discussed, and I do not feel that hon. members would wish me at this time to make any extended remarks.

The work of the board has been carried on and has been expanded considerably during the past year to fill strong and obvious needs for its services. Plans for this fiscal year are for the continuation of activities on about the present level. The amount of the board's estimates is small in relation to the need for the spreading of knowledge about wartime Canada both abroad and inside the country itself.

The events of to-day bring home the desire of all Canadians to have all possible information about their country and its place in the world and the glorious record our forces are making abroad. Information leads to understanding and understanding to common action. Information has played an important part and has still a great role to play in the winning of the war and the laying of a solid foundation for peace. It was in pursuance of these objects that the board was set up to meet a real need.

The remarks of the hon. member for York-Sunbury were directed toward a publication known as "Labour Facts," issued by the wartime information board to editors of labour journals to industrial establishments and trades unions. The bulletin was issued after a very careful survey had been made which indicated that there was a strong need for such a publication. I have a copy under my hand.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Why does the parliamentary assistant say that? I will tell him that the publication came to me from a big industrialist who said that he had already received the information many times from the Department of Labour and that there was nothing new in this publication.

As to the necessity for this board generally, my understanding of the setting-up of this board was that it was to diffuse proper information in the United States, where there was a misunderstanding as to Canada's war effort. I applauded that because I thought they were in need of information over there as to Canada's aims and objectives; as to what we did, how we did it and why we did it. But the work of this board is expanding at an alarming rate. More than that, it ignores the public press of this country. Most of the stuff this board sends out, the newspaper men tell me, finds its way into the wastepaper basket.

Mr. CLAXTON: This sheet, "Labour Facts", was sent out, as I say, to meet a need which was strongly expressed. That material was not made available in any other form. This is not of the nature of news; it is information bearing on labour questions; and I can read to the committee, if it wishes me to take the time, some part of this file of commendations received from representatives of trades unions and industrial establishments and industrial organizations, commending this publication and stating that it meets a long-felt need. May I read one, from Mr. A. R. Mosher, president of the Canadian Congress of Labour:

> For several months the wartime information board has been publishing a bulletin entitled "Labour Facts" for the use of labour publications in Canada. I believe that that bulletin should be read by labour editors on publication and that the material in it, both text and illustrations, should be utilized to the fullest extent. It is almost impossible to keep up with activities in the field of labour on a national and international scale, and much interesting material that would be overlooked ordinarily is brought together in "Labour Facts" in such a way that it can be reprinted directly or rewritten to meet the requirements of the editor. May I commend "Labour Facts" to all labour editors and urge that they cooperate with the wartime information board by giving wider circulation to the material it contains.

There is a very large file of similar correspondence. This publication does not take the place of regular news services; it does provide material which editors concerned in dealing with labour questions can use in such form as they wish, and they do use it.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Does the parliamentary assistant suggest that this is any more than a collection board of material which is already sent out by the labour department? That is my understanding of what it is, and whether or not Mr. Mosher has received this material in a convenient form suitable for his purposes, or whether labour editors have received it, I say as a fact that what is sent out and distributed in this pamphlet was already distributed by the Department of Labour, and is a duplication. That is what I am told.

Mr. CLAXTON: A reference to the publication itself will indicate that it is not a duplication. On the other hand, it does present in various forms material which has already been sent it by the labour department, but in addition it presents material bearing on the treatment of labour questions in other countries of the British commonwealth including the United Kingdom, and in the United States, and brings to the attention of those dealing with labour matters information of a general nature which is interesting and which has a definite usefulness in Canada. If you look at volume 1, No. 4, which I have in my hand, you see the headlines in one column, "Labour in Other Lands". "U.S. Trades Unions Increase Membership". Then there is another heading, "Aussies Say Unions 15·7 per cent of Population". "Ford Co. in Britain Signs Union Agreement". And so on. It presents in this particular column information which would not ordinarily be available in any other form. It also collects information which is available in some other form and puts it in the most presentable and most useful form for the purposes of these editors.

Mr. FRASER (Peterborough West): I mentioned before this "Airmail Bulletin" sent out by the wartime information board. This is dated February 21. One of the items is, "Labour-Progressive Platform: Tim Buck, National Leader . . . " Of course I understand now why they put that in, because Buck wants to affiliate with the Liberal party. But it is information which newspapers throughout the country already had, and I understand that these are sent to practically every newspaper in Canada.

Here is another dealing with shipbuilding, and it states that Hughes Cleaver, of Halton, chairman of the war expenditures committee, says the government is saving $40 millions on account of readjustments. That is nothing but bunk, and we know it.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): It is nothing but propaganda.

Mr. FRASER (Peterborough West): All these bulletins are the same. Here is something about the Saskatchewan election, in the wartime information bulletin of May 12; they even forecast what it is going to be.

An hon. MEMBER: What is the forecast?

Mr. FRASER (Peterborough West): They say that the main fight is expected to be between the Liberals and the C.C.F.—which also is absolute bunk, because the Progressive Conservatives are going to come out on top there. That sort of stuff should not appear in wartime information board publications.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I should like to ask the hon. member for St. Lawrence-St. George how he justifies that.

Mr. FRASER (Peterborough West): Here is another one, put out on May 29, reporting "Captain Denton's Warning", in a speech in the house, and they correct it on May 1. They say, "Correction, item 3, Saturday", that it should be "Group Captain Denton Massey", instead of "Captain Denton". That is the sort of stuff they put out. They ask us to save paper. Good Lord, this outfit is destroying paper as fast as they can do it.

Here is another one, "Canadian Churches". I understand this bulletin is sent out every month. There is an article, "Churches in Chains", dated November, 1943. Also we have "Consumer Facts". There is a "Consumer Radio Service". I know quite well that, as the hon. member for York-Sunbury says, most of this is thrown in the wastepaper basket. Here are more sheets, "News Features", a service sent out to Canadian newspapers weekly for them to clip. Yet another one, "Facts and Figures Weekly". There is a French edition as well as an English one.

Mr. MARSHALL: How does the hon. member get all these?

Mr. FRASER (Peterborough West): They come, all right. Here is another one, "Post-war Planning Information, Wartime Information Board, Ottawa".

Mr. MARSHALL: A lot of these I never heard of.

Mr. FRASER (Peterborough West): Yes, but they are being issued, thousands and thousands of them. Here is another, "Weekly Editor Looks at Ottawa", by Jim Greenblatt. It is prepared by the wartime information board and sent to the Canadian weeklies. I have here another one, "Wartime Clips", intended for weeklies and other newspapers. Certainly, as I said before, the government is helping to waste paper. Look at all this stuff. "Book Shelves", "Canadian Affairs", "Future for Fighters". If you go through this you will find that it is a set-up for the government in power.

Mr. SINCLAIR: It is first-class stuff.

Mr. FRASER (Peterborough West): According to your say-so.

Mr. SINCLAIR: According to any fighting man who wants to know what has been done for him.

Mr. FRASER (Peterborough West): That would be all right if it was—

Mr. SINCLAIR: Published by the Tory party.

Mr. FRASER (Peterborough West): No; they would not waste paper putting out all this stuff. They would issue it in a form that the soldier, sailor or airman could read.

Mr. SINCLAIR: Another fifty points by John Bracken—for the soldier this time.

Mr. FRASER (Peterborough West): When John Bracken is here, leading this house—

Mr. SINCLAIR: "When."

Mr. FRASER (Peterborough West): It will not be very long. These are samples of the pile of stuff which is being sent out all the time, and which is nothing but a waste of material. In the air force they even ask how the people are going to vote, and the wartime information board are doing practically the same thing.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I think we ought to have a little more justification of this, because it is waste.

Mr. CLAXTON: The hon. member says it is waste. That does not make it waste.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): No; but it is a good opinion.

Mr. CLAXTON: The hon. member for Peterborough West referred first to the "Air-mail Bulletin," and said that it competed in some way with newspapers.

Mr. FRASER (Peterborough West): No; I never said that. I said that it was sent to all places in the United States, to the newspapers there. That is where I understand it is sent.

Mr. CLAXTON: The hon. member's information is not correct. This is a concise statement of developments in public affairs and in the war effort throughout the dominion. It is sent by air mail to Canadian diplomatic missions, trade commissioners, British embassies and legations, in Central and South America, to the various departments of information, broadcasting and government, to the head offices of a limited number of Canadian exporting firms who have expressed the desire to have it. All these cannot receive the information quickly by any other service. The need was expressed and this publication meets it. It is a single sheet on airmail paper and goes out daily. It is the only way these diplomatic missions and others living abroad receive prompt information about events in Canada. My hon. friend referred to some of the items as if they were mistaken. I have not seen any cases of inaccuracy.

Mr. FRASER (Peterborough West): I was told by a member of the war information board that it was sent to newspapers.

Mr. CLAXTON: It may be sent to newspapers at their own request if they cannot get ordinary news or other services, but it is not sent to newspapers generally.

With regard to "Canadian Churches and the War," this publication is sent out to ministers of non-Roman Catholic churches. It was decided, after conferring with the committee of heads of churches presided over by the primate of the Anglican church, that this would be a useful service. It was to supply a need which the ministers themselves expressed that this service was undertaken. This publication matches a similar service given in the United Kingdom to the churches there. There is a corresponding service that goes to Catholic churches in Canada, and that was agreed to after discussions with the cardinal himself, who expressed his sympathy with the project. In these bulletins material is largely collected from publications in England, in the United States and in other countries as well as in Canada, bearing directly on the work of the churches in connection with the war and the organization of peace after the war.

Mr. FRASER (Peterborough West): I have one bulletin which says, "Roosevelt and Wilkie define functions," et cetera. That is January, 1944. Do these go to all the churches or just to the Roman Catholic, the United Church and the Church of England?

Mr. CLAXTON: The first publication I mentioned goes to all churches of Protestant denominations, and to all non-Roman Catholic churches. "Nouvelles Catholiques" goes to Roman Catholic churches.

My hon. friend mentioned "News Feature," published weekly. It has a circulation of 340 and goes to editors of farm and weekly papers and to representatives of cooperating government departments. It supplies a service of material that may be clipped by these editors. I can show my hon. friend clipping books indicating a very wide use of this material.

He next mentioned "Reference Papers." Reference papers are mimeographed papers which are prepared by the wartime information board on the basis of information already available. They endeavour to collect in a short, compressed form all the information on a single subject. It is issued to editors and others only on their request. It goes to government departments and a limited mailing list of that kind. Anyone who has seen a collection of papers to date will see how useful they are, because they collect in one place all the useful information on a particular topic.

Post-war planning information is exactly similar in character. Hon. members themselves must be aware of the quantity of information available now coming from parliamentary committees and in legislation of one kind or another as well as in other ways on post-war planning and organization of various kinds. A strong desire was expressed by members of this house and many others that a summary be prepared and kept up to date giving an account of what is happening in that field, and that paper is designed to meet that need.

The "Weekly Editor Looks at Ottawa" is issued weekly. It has a circulation of 444 and goes to weekly newspapers in Canada which express a desire to have it.

Mr. STIRLING: These are free?

Mr. CLAXTON: Yes. Mr. Greenblatt, who edits it, is himself a weekly editor, and this service is widely used.

Mr. HANSON: (York-Sunbury): Is it objective or is it propaganda?

Mr. CLAXTON: It is objective.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Entirely?

Mr. CLAXTON: My hon. friend and I could go through it and we might differ over certain points—

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): You are the authority.

Mr. CLAXTON: —but it is as objective as it can be made. I should add that the weekly newspapers themselves suggested that Mr. Greenblatt should be the editor of this particular work.

[Mr. Claxton.]

My hon. friend mentioned "Canadian Affairs." "Canadian Affairs" was started at the express request of General McNaughton and was referred to in the debate last year. It has been continued, and I have here in a folder expressions of the highest commendation of this publication from officers commanding units from one end of Canada to the other as well as from many units in the United Kingdom. The publication corresponds very closely to a similar one previously issued in Great Britain by the United Kingdom authorities for the service of their troops there.

My hon. friend did not mention "Canada at War", which has the largest circulation of any publication of the wartime information board. That is a publication that is recognized as unique. "Canada at War" is recognized everywhere as the most compact and informative information bulletin issued in any country to-day. Hon. members have all seen the illustrated number which was issued in March and I can assure them that it has received the widest possible praise both inside and outside Canada.

Mr. STIRLING: The Prime Minister said that he was not in a position to accept the allegation that inaccuracies appeared in these publications. I would remind him of one. Earlier this session he was putting through a small supplementary vote in connection with refugees, and I called attention to the fact that the February number of "Canada at War" gave a list of dates in the month of January and asserted that a consignment of refugees, I believe 250, had arrived in Canada from the Iberian peninsula that month. Investigation had shown me that it had not yet been decided that they should come, much less had come, and I think the Prime Minister himself had been misled by that information. He will remember that these refugees not only had not come but did not come for some weeks after that.

Another instance of inaccuracy in "Canada at War" was brought before the committee last evening by the hon. member for Comox-Alberni, a particularly displeasing one to the people of British Columbia, where it was asserted that seventy-five per cent of the Japanese in Canada were Canadian born. As the Prime Minister knows, that is a very difficult question in British Columbia, particularly at this time. It is unfortunate that such a misleading statement as that should have come out in "Canada at War". The real figures were placed on Hansard, this session, last session and the session before, and I cannot understand how those who produce "Canada at War" could have made those two mistakes, both of which have come particularly to my attention. I do not see how it could happen if they collect the facts, sift and examine them carefully before allowing them to go into print.

Mr. CLAXTON: The hon. member is quite right in his reference to the statement about the coming of refugees in "Canada at War"; that statement was based on information which had not been properly verified and it was not correct. We are very much indebted to him for pointing it out.

With regard to the percentage of Japanese born in Canada, I have not the figure and I am sure we are very glad indeed to get that correction too. I point out that those publications are issued fairly widespread. "Canada at War" has a large circulation. I think I am right in saying that the hon. member is one of the few people who have ever detected any error of fact in that publication.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I detected one which was admitted, but we did not discuss it publicly. It was a terrible thing to put in this publication.

Mr. CLAXTON: When one takes into account the amount of statistical information it contains and the difficulty of securing adequate secretarial and editorial staff in these days I think it will be seen that the record is a fairly good one, all things considered.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I notice they are spending about fifty per cent more this year than they did last year. How much has the staff increased and what is the salary increase? Who is now the head of the board? I understand that Doctor Mackenzie has resigned. Who is now the head of the board and what salary does he receive?

Mr. ADAMSON: What is the circulation?

Mr. CLAXTON: Doctor Mackenzie has not resigned. He is going to move to British Columbia to take up his new office as president of the university of British Columbia. I think it can be anticipated that when he does move he will resign and will have to be replaced.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): He told me he was going to resign; I thought he had.

Mr. CLAXTON: No; he has not resigned.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: That is an error.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I have his own word for it that he was going to resign. I immediately assumed that he had. He certainly cannot do the work as chairman of this board—

Mr. CLAXTON: That is quite different from saying that he has resigned. He receives, of course, no remuneration.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I realize that.

Mr. CLAXTON: None of the members of the board receives any remuneration. With regard to the staff, at the time the estimates were dealt with last year it amounted to 142. The figure to-day is 157.

Mr. ADAMSON: Has the parliamentary assistant any idea of the circulation of "Canada at War"?

Mr. CLAXTON: Yes; 180,000.

Mr. KNOWLES: It seems to be a popular indoor sport to criticize the wartime information board, and since I sit on the opposition side I suppose I might be expected to indulge in that sport; but I am going to vary it a bit and say one or two things on the other side. I agree in part with the criticism that there is a certain amount of material that is not all it should be, and that there is considerable waste, but in the main I think the job the wartime information board has set itself to, namely, the collecting and disseminating of information on all possible subjects relating to the war-time situation and also the task of getting informative material through to the members of the forces, is one that had to be tackled, and I would hope that from the floor of this house we might not try to discourage the board but that we might offer constructive criticism in order that the work of this board might be improved.

I should like to say a word about two publications. One has already been mentioned, namely, "Canadian Affairs". The other is "Canada Digest". Although I have some criticisms that I might offer about them in a moment, I think they are very good publications, and in this I agree with the hon. member for Vancouver North who made commendable references to them a moment ago. Having said that, may I offer one or two suggestions which I hope will be constructive? I think we have to face this fact, that politics is an important factor in the life of any democratic country; certainly it is in the life of this country. There is no use in trying to evade that issue; there is no use in trying to be supra-political in talking about our national affairs.

In this country we have several major political parties. They take definite stands. They are all very active, and a great many people feel that the future of this country depends upon which of those parties rise to the top out of the general situation in which we find ourselves. Bearing that in mind, I think the wartime information board, both in the reference papers that it is preparing for use generally at home and in publications that it prepares for the forces, should collect and give more information about other political groups, in addition to the party now in power. For example, a commendable series is reaching my desk right now. I do not receive all the material that the hon. member for Peterborough West receives, and on that score I feel a little bit slighted. One commendable series that is coming to me is one in which post-war planning information is being collected—

Mr. FRASER (Peterborough West): I mentioned that.

Mr. KNOWLES: The hon. member mentioned that, yes. I have read that material closely and I have not yet seen anything in it but the plans of the government now in power. It is a good idea to collect that material and make it available, but I think that not only would the wartime information board save itself from criticism but it would be doing a job that it ought to do if it also collected the plans of the Progressive Conservative party, assuming they have some plans.

Mr. FRASER (Peterborough West): We certainly have.

Mr. KNOWLES: Also plans of the C.C.F., which we print from time to time and publish in books that members of this house are only too glad to buy.

Mr. GRAYDON: After all they cannot transport libraries overseas.

Mr. KNOWLES: I am quite enjoying the cross-fire that is going on here, but at the same time I am serious and I think hon. members agree with me that if information is to be collected about plans being drafted by responsible bodies in Canada, that material should include not only the material of one party which happens to be the government in power but also the material of the other responsible parties of this country. I feel that the same principle should be given effect to in "Canadian Affairs" and in "Canada Digest". I would therefore suggest that there should be articles in "Canadian Affairs" on the activities of other political groups. The men overseas are interested in what is going on at home. Many of them have been away for quite a few years. They do not know what has developed in the meantime. It seems to me that the wartime information board would be doing its job just that much better if it gave information about other groups. I would suggest that the best place to get authentic information about the Progressive Conservative party is not from us or from the Liberals but from the Progressive Conservative party. When I say that, my hon. friends to the right do not interrupt me, I notice. The same thing applies to the C.C.F. The best place to get information about our party is not from our enemies—

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): The trouble with my hon. friend is that the members of his party do not all agree. One fellow in British Columbia says one thing, and another fellow here says another.

Mr. KNOWLES: —but from us. Similarly with the "Canada Digest". Articles by or about the political leaders of other groups might be reprinted.

As I said a few moments ago, I feel that we have to be realistic about this word "politics". So often it is suggested that there is something underhanded about it, that we should not get "political"; but the plain fact is that politics is an important factor in our Canadian life; it always has been and is definitely so at the present time. I would urge the wartime information board to try to be not just a board of the government but a board of the people of Canada; to aim at collecting and supplying information, both in the reference material provided here at home and the material provided to members of the forces, concerning all the groups and all the activities in Canada at the present time.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I want to register my protest against the underlying theory of the hon. member's proposal. What is it? That in wartime the money of the taxpayers of this country should be utilized in disseminating political propaganda. He objects, and perhaps properly, that the information disseminated by the wartime information board is political propaganda in favour of the government of the day. I think there is a good deal in that charge; I believe it is one of the charges one might justly bring against this board. But let us view the thing from its wider aspect. If the government in charge is entitled to do what it is doing, the hon. member says that we should be allowed —meaning his party—to have our views disseminated at public expense in wartime, and the Progressive Conservative party should have the same privilege. Why does he stop there? We have in this house representatives of the bloc populaire; why should they not have their views disseminated at public expense through these government publications? Then we have the Canadian party. It is not large, it is true, but at times it is vocal; and why should he not have his views disseminated in the same way? I need only go down the whole gamut to reduce this whole thing to an absurdity.

The fact of the matter is that not one dollar of this money should be utilized for political propaganda in behalf of any party, and I know that in principle the Prime Minister will agree with that statement. I believe the distinction he will make is this. He will say that the plans of the government for the future are not in the nature of political propaganda, that they are statements of government policy. Well, the dividing line there is too narrow for me. I do not think any of this money ought to be spent in disseminating the views of any particular party with respect to any economic proposals, for the future or otherwise. I do not think the taxpayers of this country will agree to expenditures of that kind; certainly I am not going to agree. No matter what may be the sins of the government in this regard, I am sure they would not agree either. What about Tim Buck? Why should he not get his oar in also?

Mr. KNOWLES: He has it in now.

Mr. JAQUES: He uses the CBC.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I did not know his propaganda was appearing in "Canada at War" and other government publications. I know he is trying with all his might to attach himself to some party. First he tried the socialist party, but they repudiated him. Now he is knocking gently at the door of the Prime Minister, and as far as I am concerned the right hon. gentleman is welcome to him. I notice that the only political parties he has not sought to associate with are the Social Crediters and the very respectable Progressive Conservative party, to which I belong, and I tell him now that if he knocks at our door he knocks in vain.

But let us be serious about this matter for a moment. I ask the Prime Minister to see to it and give instructions that any information disseminated by these boards shall be objective and shall not be open to the criticism that it is political propaganda. The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre has made the definite charge that material which has gone out is propaganda on behalf of the government. I believe a great many people will agree with that view. It may be arguable, but I do not think much issue can be taken with that statement if you consider as a whole what has been sent out. Certainly I would object to any of my taxes—and I pay a good deal—being used to disseminate my political views. I shall do that in some other way. I would register the strongest possible protest I could summon to my aid against sending out propaganda in favour of the socialistic policies of my hon. friends to the left. I am not going to help pay for that if I can help it.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: May I just reply to my hon. friend and say that I would very strongly resent government publications being used for purposes of political propaganda. I think all the boards understand that, and I am perfectly sure the members of this board seek in their publications to avoid what may be regarded as propaganda and to give only facts.

At six o'clock the committee took recess.

After Recess

The committee resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. FRASER (Peterborough West): I should like to ask the parliamentary assistant to the Prime Minister what Canada pays towards the united nations information office at 610 Fifth avenue, New York?

Mr. CLAXTON: In the period March 31, 1943 to February 29, 1944, the amount was $8,446.54.

Mr. FRASER (Peterborough West): Just for distribution, is it?

Mr. CLAXTON: It is a contribution to the work of the office. The united nations information office is one of the instruments of the united nations. Quite a number of those nations contribute to the work of the office. The costs are allocated among them, and Canada's contribution between those dates was the amount I have mentioned.

Mr. CHURCH: I should like to call the attention of the committee to some matters in connection with this wartime information board which I think are of most importance, particularly in view of the changed position in the war. As hon. members know, the appointment of this particular information board was, in my opinion, a reflection upon the press of this country. It showed not only a lack of appreciation, but a lack of confidence in the press of the country, which had done such splendid work during the last war, in the present war, and in the long years of depression between.

I am very much surprised, in view of the changed conditions in the war, that the government is now anxious to continue this policy of spending nearly a million dollars in the United States to educate the people over there.

I have looked into this situation very carefully. There was a debate on July 13 last year with respect to this same subject matter. It was pointed out at that time that some of the leading people wanted us to open offices in New York, Chicago, San Francisco, and many other places in the United States. What for? To try to educate the people of the United States about Canada, and all that kind of thing. As a result of this the parliamentary assistant, and others, invited many members of the press to come to Canada. Fifteen or twenty of them looked over the country. They came, they saw, but they did not conquer. They went back home and wrote a few articles in their newspapers—and in some cases Canada paid in gold of the realm for it, paid for ads in those little papers—pages of ads in papers. They went into the county papers, and all that kind of thing.

The government forgets to realize that we have to-day a regular expeditionary force. Where? In the United States. What are they doing? Why, you cannot walk down a street in Washington without meeting them. We have a small standing army in Washington, and we purchased big locations for them. They say, "When in Rome, do as the Romans do." I suppose it would be, "When in Washington, do as the Americans do." They have spent money like water on this publicity and information campaign. In my opinion the good it has done has not amounted to a snap of the fingers, so far as educating the people of the United States is concerned, or to win the war. Our soldiers and the glorious work in Italy, Sicily, Africa and other places have done more than any information bureaux, past, present and future.

I believe in putting on the brakes, so far as these expenditures are concerned. The expenditures of this particular department are going up by leaps and bounds. Away back on July 13, 1943, it was a different story. They had no office. I have no quarrel with the parliamentary assistant, because he is a most excellent gentleman, and one whom I have known for a long time. But there is a difference of opinion between him and me and between the Prime Minister and me in respect of public matters like this one. The Prime Minister has done a great deal in the United States to bring about good will. I admit that; I give him credit for it. He is well liked over there. But I have differed with him on many public questions, and I do in this instance. I do not take anything back in what I have said. I was opposed to this proposition of a wartime information office, right from the start.

[Mr. Church.]

This branch has been under the control of almost half a dozen ministers and acting ministers. One of the ministers was a gentleman who went to the bench—a very good citizen. He had charge of this board at one time. Then it came into the hands of a new minister.

What do we find here? We find a number of newspaper men coming forward, and offices were opened in the United States in October, 1942. The office had been open for only ten months when the last vote was before the house. At page 4711 of Hansard for 1943 we find a description of policy. It is said that the men in New York and Washington work hard. They go down and look at these glorious offices, fitted out in New York city. Well, you would think that the field of the cloth of gold could not be compared with some of that furniture. One would be reminded of another place in this building, where he sees that kind of furniture. Then those men go to work, and they want to open offices also in San Francisco, Chicago and other places to educate America. Last year the parliamentary assistant said, as reported at page 4711 of Hansard:

> Those suggested to me now are the representatives of the Associated Press, the Chicago Sun, the New York Daily News, the NFA service and a good many others.

After you have gone through all this, what do you find? Well, you find that there was a debate on this very question, namely, that of understanding Canada, which took place in the senate and house of representatives at Washington. What did they say? Some congressmen said that Canada to-day was paying tribute and cash taxes to Britain yet, the same as in the days of Lord North—a tribute of millions of pounds a year, in taxes taken out of this country by the imperial government. Then there was a debate in Washington on what was known as the Connolly bill—Senator Connolly who was in Ottawa last summer to attend a meeting of the empire parliamentary association. On that occasion he made a fine address. It was asked whether Great Britain should have five seats in a proposed new organization, or only one seat.

Mr. Denys Smith, writing in the May issue of the National Review, criticizes this policy. He states:

> The similarity of American and British history, however, is not only unrecognized in the United States, but American information about the British empire appears to have become crystallized about fifty years ago so far as the vast majority of the population is concerned. Some of the ideas entertained about modern Britain and the British empire would be a travesty of the truth were they applied to the days of George III. There are, unfortunately, few ways of measuring the depth of this ignorance although it is manifest in every congressional debate on foreign policy and in many editorial disquisitions even in reputable newspapers. A recent Gallup poll showed that three-quarters of the population believed Canada paid taxes to the British treasury, an obvious residual impression left by the usual school textbook presentation of the war of independence as an attempt by the parliament at Westminster, or as the textbook would more probably phrase it, the British king, to get taxes from the colonies for the benefit of the mother country. If there is that much ignorance about Canada, a country which is the United States closest neighbour and one which tens of thousands of Americans have visited at one time or another, there is small wonder at the ignorance displayed, say about India. British knowledge of America is far from perfect. But it is not as bad as American ignorance of Britain.

There is the same ignorance about Canada. I was glad to see the Prime Minister's efforts in collaborating with the great President of the United States and it is of the utmost importance that we continue to collaborate with our glorious ally to the south. But there is a right and a wrong way of approach. I have talked to a number of Americans. I was one of the officers of the municipality of Toronto for a great number of years; a large number of Americans visited that city in the summertime and I met many of them. They are very fine people, but they would respect Canada and the mother country more if they knew more about us, and if we would tell them the truth once in a while about our empire. There was a debate on foreign policy in both houses of congress three weeks ago last Monday, and the views expressed there were more significant than the general resolution passed in favour of post-war collaboration. There was a food convention at Atlantic City, a body known as the United Nations Relief and Rehabilitation Administration. It formulated its policy at a conference in Atlantic City, an American city which is typically American in the sense that its like would be hard to find elsewhere. The general Republican position toward world affairs combines two apparently irreconcilable concepts. First there is the suspicion of anything in the nature of a close association with a few powers in the post-war world, and a preference for an all-inclusive union of all countries large and small. Yet at the same time there is opposition to the principle of equal rights for all countries great and small. In other words, as to isolation they are back to the days of George Washington and Andrew Jackson—a policy of no commitments.

There was a chance, right in the cities of Washington, New York and Atlantic City, for our publicity men and this information bureau to act and do some good work, to educate the people of the United States. We have a small standing army of publicity men and our military forces and other agents there. If they were to march down Bank street four abreast they would reach from here to Lansdowne park, but apparently no effort is made to explain the position of Canada to the people of the United States. Look at the glorious record which our Canadian soldiers have won in Europe, by their work in Sicily and in Italy, by their march across the desert, and by the capture of Rome. In every theatre of war they have distinguished themselves. But all that is not publicized in the United States by our publicity men.

There has been a wide expansion of the information bureau since last July. We had a debate in this house on July 12 last on the wartime information board, which continued on July 13 and lasted into the 14th and what have been the results from the efforts of our publicity bureau? What have we got? They have not been telling the people of the United States about Canada and what it has done. No one can justify the way in which our public relations officers and publicity men and the information bureau have expanded in numbers in the United States.

I have a return here which was brought down in accordance with an order of the house last week showing that we have 396 publicity officers, 156 of them being press agents and liaison officers in one branch alone. All these officers are to educate the public, mostly in the United States. It is really usurping the power of the press of this country and shows a lack of confidence in the press to establish such a board. A true picture should be given to the electors of what is happening at home and abroad. These public relations officers have expanded to a small regiment. Their work is not merely to educate the public but apparently to put before the public all that there is in Webster's dictionary. They tell us all about food, all about clothing, all about departmental policies. They have a spokesman in each department who gives interviews to the newspapers along the lines I have mentioned. Then they have what is called an apology department, a chief apologist for policy, past, present and future. He is really a ghost writer behind the scenes, a spokesman for this, that and the other department. There are 156 of these publicity, press and liaison officers, and I do not know how many there are altogether. That was never intended when the board was created. Then they get up Gallup polls to show what the state of public opinion is on various matters that come before the country. I believe that the information board has left undone what it should have done. When the United States was losing ships through U-boat attack in the north Atlantic a great American general, Eisenhower, wrote to the head of Eire, de Valera, a strong letter telling what was happening to American ships and how the sinkings and the deaths of sailors were aiding the axis powers, and speaking of the policy with respect to southern Ireland. Why did we not do the same thing, and why did our information board not do the same thing? Why did our information bureau not give the people of Canada the facts? We should have done it ourselves. This United States general wrote that an explanation should be demanded from southern Ireland as to why United States ships were being sunk for lack of bases in southern Ireland.

The information bureau should have said something about the strikes that are going on in war time. They put advertisements in United States magazines, monthlies and newspapers. Here is a recent editorial from Life. It is a criticism along the lines of what we were told by the hon. member for Greenwood and by the Prime Minister of Australia the other day, and by others, that we are losing the battle in the war on the home front. This editorial in Life says:

> The home front, speaking generally, seems to have no comprehension of the historic role that it is being called upon to play. Hence, instead of pulling together it is breaking apart. Thus in the last several months every major effort to stream-line the home front for war has failed. The farm bloc has scrambled a subsidy programme for keeping down the cost of living. In three of the most vital industries—coal, railroads and steel—labour has defied the government and driven wages upward. Efforts to tax the swollen war incomes that the nation is enjoying have wholly failed.

I believe in having a proper information bureau which will tell the people the facts, whether they are good, bad or indifferent. No matter how bad they are, and how bad the news is, the public should be informed. The policy of the government in expanding this service all over the United States, sending out a small expeditionary force of publicists, and gathering in all these correspondents, is not worth a snap of the fingers as regards helping the war along or educating America. Our brave soldiers, sailors and airmen will do Canada more good with the achievements which stand to their credit than all this expenditure of money upon advertisements in United States newspapers, and things of that kind. If we want to promote this sort of education let us do it in the British empire, because charity begins at home, and dear knows you have something to speak about in the glorious record which this empire has made in the war. Britain held the gate of the continent until our troops came to the aid of the motherland.

I hope there will be some retrenchment in this expenditure. Personally I would not continue it any longer, in view of the invasion now in progress. From the time of Lord North, nearly two hundred years, Britain has tried this kind of appeasement policy of spending money to educate America and the world at large, and it cannot be done. The glorious record of our soldiers in this war, the great achievements of the United States army and navy, and the comradeship which this war has brought about between the forces of the United States, Canada and the mother country, will be of more lasting value than all the spending of money on newspaper advertising and other such material aids.

Mr. POULIOT: I desire to ask the parliamentary assistant to the President of the Privy Council to give details of the expenditure of moneys under this vote.

Mr. CLAXTON: The break-down of the vote can be given very readily if the committee desires it. Salaries, $329,457; cost-of-living bonus, $15,000; unemployment insurance, $1,250; travelling, $65,000; motion pictures, $10,000; radio, $50,000; photos and mats, $100,000; pamphlets, $185,000; posters nothing this year, that having been transferred to the film board; printing and stationery, $40,000; public speaking, $15,000; Canadian Council on Education for Citizenship, $10,000; overseas publicity, nothing this year; visitors, $20,000; displays, $25,000; united nations information service, $15,000; miscellaneous, $115,000; total, $995,707.

Mr. POULIOT: I thank the hon. gentleman. Now I will ask him to give us the cost of each publication.

Mr. CLAXTON: The wartime information board has not accounting officers of its own. Its books are kept by the treasury officials. They are kept under the categories which I have just mentioned, and it is not possible for me to give the hon. member for Témiscouata a break-down of the cost of each publication. There is a considerable number of publications. Almost everyone, as the hon. member will appreciate, working on the preparation of a publication is also engaged in working on something else. Only a part of his time is given to the editorial work in connection with the preparation of a publication. A great many publications are produced in the office itself in mimeographed form, so that it is difficult to allocate the proportion of the costs of stencils and mimeographing that is appropriate for each item. Those which are not produced in the office itself are produced largely in the office of the king's printer; we get costs from them ultimately and they can be allocated. If my hon. friend would indicate any particular items or publications in respect of which he would like to have the costs brought down I would be very glad indeed to get him the information.

Mr. POULIOT: Would the parliamentary assistant kindly give the list of all the publications that are not mimeographed and that are not published by the king's printer? I assume that some of them are published by other printers, and it is easy to ascertain the cost of each one. Would he also give a list of all those included in the $329,000 item; the names, the salaries and the travelling expenses of each one, and also their occupations? It may not be possible for him to give it to-night, and I would be satisfied if it were done at the earliest possible opportunity. It is a matter of great interest and should be published the same as some returns were published. I remember that some returns asked for by the hon. member for Broadview were printed and distributed to all members of parliament and to members of the press gallery, and it is important for us to know who is receiving money under this item, how much each one receives, and what is being done by each one. This is a formidable amount of money for publicity.

Mr. MacNICOL: You would not think there was a war on.

Mr. POULIOT: There are other ways to publicize the deeds of our heroes and have them publicized beyond Canada. One has only not be be fearful, to be above criticism, to be sure of his facts and to lose no opportunity to bring before the world the importance of the Canadian war effort. Sometimes the method which is used may be regarded as unorthodox, but if the results are good there will be nothing to complain about.

For instance, during a broadcast from London Mr. Churchill mentioned the achievements of other countries, but without mentioning Canada. The matter was brought before the house by the hon. member for Temiscouata who received some letters that were written in an unfriendly spirit by people who live in this country and who have not the right to call themselves Canadians, while on the other hand he received from Great Britain letters that would put those people to shame. To show you, Mr. Chairman, what could be done to publicize the war effort of Canada without any cost to this country, I will read two letters that I have received, one from Montreal and one from Birmingham, England. The one from Montreal is as follows:

6400 Prince Arthur St. West,
Montreal,
April 1, 1944.

Hon. Mr. J. F. Pouliot (L. Témiscouata),
House of Commons, Ottawa.

Dear Sir: I have read with surprise an article published in to-day's Gazette under the caption "Pouliot Claims Canada Slighted by Churchill" and having reference to Mr. Churchill's broadcast of last Sunday.

Now sir, for you to assume that Mr. Churchill slighted Canada you are taking a lot on yourself and I suggest that his words and snub to those who have nothing better to do at a time like the present, than to belittle the government or to embarrass them in their mighty task, might with equal meaning and truth apply to you. Mr. Churchill happened to be speaking about the Japanese area in particular and the deliverance of Australia by American, Australian and New Zealand troops in particular reference to the Pacific area.

Why is it that you and people like you are always wanting to be "patted on the back"? I am quite sure that Mr. Churchill never for one moment had the slightest intention of doing what you accuse him of—

I did not accuse Mr. Churchill at all.

—for he has repeatedly spoken of and expressed his admiration for the part Canada has and is playing in the war effort, by men, money and materials. Surely it is not necessary that he should repeat this on every broadcast he makes. Mr. Churchill is far too wise, too big and too generous a man to do anything in the way of slighting any of the allied nations, and I submit, sir, that you are "all wet" in thinking and speaking otherwise. I hope you will think twice before you again make such regrettable speeches about one who has been simply marvellous in carrying the supreme load in this war. He deserves the wholehearted support and thanks of every right-thinking person in the allied cause. Such remarks as those attributed to you, sir, are grossly unfair and uncalled for, and by such you certainly are not helping the cause of Canada in an "all-out war effort."

I submit that where the censor is really necessary at times is within the house, when speeches like that reported as coming from you are made.

Yours truly,
Hubert G. Harris.

This is a man who has not the Canadian spirit. Now I will read a letter received from Birmingham from a true Englishman, one who represents the feeling of the British nation and who is different from this Mr. Harris:

2/212 Heneage St.,
Ashted,
Birmingham,
England.

Mr. Pouliot.

Dear Sir: Please do not think me presumptuous. But do you know that I said to my wife when listening to Mr. Churchill's talk—

And mark you, sir, this comes from Birmingham, England.

REVISED EDITION

—that I should have thought so great a man would never have forgotten so splendid and courageous an ally as the good old Canadians. Personally I served with some of the gallant C.F.A. in the last war. So you can understand that I felt rather hurt they not being even mentioned. Still perhaps we must believe that in his case he just overlooked them. It does seem strange that I should see your remarks in one of our local newspapers, namely, the Birmingham Evening Dispatch of April 1, 1944, under the heading of "Little Dispatches." Now, dear sir, I do hope this little bit of news will find you quite well and if it is not asking of you too much, to ask you to give my every good wish to Canada. God bless the boys.

Yours very sincerely,
Sidney H. Clark,
late of the Royal Scots.

This is a letter I prize very much. It is a letter which is written not by a bloke but by a true Englishman. It did not cost the country anything. I do not pretend I see behind what was said of Canada at Westminster, but on the other hand every little bit helps, and it is the duty of members of parliament to lose no opportunity to show to the whole world what our country is doing for them. This is one item that has cost nothing. There is no bill for it.

But there is something else. The wartime information board is losing track of fundamentals and in preaching unity it creates disunity. I will explain that to you, sir, and you will understand me very well. In the first place, there is a mentality that has been created by the wartime information board to the effect that if we have no conscription it is to maintain national unity, because Quebec would resent it. On the other hand, no opportunity is lost to repeat over the radio and to publish in writing what the Minister of Labour has said in reply to me in the house, that the duty of every able-bodied Canadian of military age is to join the forces, leaving aside the idea and the suggestion of the essentiality of war industry in this country. I complain bitterly that the wartime information board has not taught the English-speaking provinces outside Quebec that what is accomplished by all men in essential industry is just as vital to the war effort as what is being done by the soldiers, and that without their assistance the soldier could not go anywhere. Was that ever published by the wartime information board? Never. It was the duty of that board to tell the Canadian people what they had to think in order to have a common thought regarding the war. Instead of that, inspiration has come from jingoes and junkers who showed no charity toward the province of Quebec but left the English-speaking people of Canada under the false impression that the people of Quebec were not doing their duty.

That was a great mistake on the part of the wartime information board and I cannot conceive that all the gentlemen who are working there, 393 besides stenographers, did not understand it. The question is obvious. It is that if we accept the views of those jingoes and junkers the ideal Canadian soldier will be one who will walk on the land without clothes, without shoes, without arms, without ammunition, walk to the shore, swim across the ocean, pick up some stones in Ireland and fight the Germans with them. That is the ideal soldier in the minds of the jingoes and junkers.

The wartime information board has been remiss in its duty in telling the Canadian people about the importance of the work of the farmer, the fisherman and the man who is engaged in railroad occupations, the importance of all those who manufacture arms and ammunition and those who build boats. All those men deserve well from their country. In the view of the jingoes and junkers the only man who serves his country well is the man who volunteers. I have no objection at all to praising the soldiers and giving them their due. They are good men. Canadians are such good soldiers that they are considered the best of all, and as Lord Mottistone said four years ago, they are now the spearhead of the army; not only was that so in Italy but it is so in France to-day. The Canadians, after having liberated His Holiness the Pope will deliver France from the enemy. But if they did not have behind them the man who is engaged in an essential occupation, and if those who have accomplished so much in essential occupations were not paid by the Canadian citizens who do not work actually in an essential industry but accomplish the important task of being taxpayers, where would the Canadian army be now? That has to be said. The Canadian people, especially the English-speaking Canadians have to be told that, and who could tell them that better than the wartime information board? In the first place those who are on the board must understand it and, after having understood it, they should inform the people about it.

I complain of something else besides that. This is not a censorship board. The duty of the wartime information board is precisely to inform the Canadian people. How is it that the liaison officers of that board have infested the press gallery to prevent—my hon. friend is jumping in his seat. I will refer him to one who has been named by the hon. member for St. Paul's already. They were there to tell the newspaper men that it was their duty not to publish reports of what had been said in parliament, what the people of Canada had a right to know; and that has been done. They have sinned not only by omission but by commission. That was done.

In my view, sir, the best thing to do with this item is to reduce it to one dollar and give it to the poor, and then give some freedom to the press. If the reports of the Canadian Press and the British United Press were published integrally by the Canadian newspapers they would be well informed. If the reports that are written by the journalists to their papers for the information of the readers were published integrally we would not need the wartime information board. I have nothing against those people. They mean well; and I will not say that the accomplishment of the board was to try to work out some kind of political propaganda. I will not go as far as that, but I will say that they have contributed more than any other body to destroy Canadian feeling in the hearts of Canadian people; they have contributed more than any other body to cause national disunity in Canada, to represent the province of Quebec in false colours; and they never had the courage to tell the Canadian people the truth about the nobility and the essentiality of the work of the farmers, railwaymen, fishermen, the man who makes ammunition, arms and so on. That has never been done. Is it too late? I do not know. It is never too late to do good. I may be told that I am not a good Canadian because I express my views sincerely in this chamber. But, sir, at election time the farmers will be praised on every husting. Why is it not done now from the broadcasting studios of the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation and the wartime information board? How is it that railwaymen are now considered as doing work that is not essential? They are told to join the army, even though they have had long railroad experience. They are told that by the wartime information board. That is to inform the Canadian people wrongly. That is what happens. We are coming to fundamentals. There are fundamentals that no one has the right to ignore, least of all the wartime information board. How long will it take to teach them fundamentals, to teach them the A.B.C.'s of national unity in Canada? After having led people in error, perhaps not always directly, but through insinuation, insinuation in which the province of Quebec was always the sufferer, why does the wartime information board not tell the Canadian people that the province of Quebec was high up in the victory loan—in the victory loans, I should say—that the objective was attained there, to use Major Triquet's expression, sooner than anywhere else; that the French-Canadians of Quebec as well as their English-speaking fellow citizens are doing very well for the war effort. I could say the same thing of all those who belong to other races and who live in the province of Quebec. They are doing very well. Is it necessary for us to repeat it? I should not have to say that. It should have been said a long time ago by the wartime information board. It should not only have been said in this chamber but have been broadcast from ocean to ocean, so that no Canadian citizen, no Canadian woman, no Canadian child should ignore what has been done in the war by every part of this country.

Now, sir, that being said, I do not despair. I have said some truths, and I regret that the wartime information board until now has not come up to the standard we expected. It may improve; I hope it will, because there is plenty of room for progress.

My concluding words would be these. There is only one way to follow; that is the straight way. The duty of each board, whatever it is, under whatever minister, should not be to try to please or to displease; it should be to do what is right. What is essential in this country is national unity, but we shall attain it only if the same things are said to all parts of Canada. I am opposed to special programmes for the English-speaking provinces and other special programmes for the province of Quebec or over the French network. All French and English-speaking people, all Jews and all others in Canada should be told the same thing. They should be told the truth about each other. When that is done we shall have national unity in Canada, and we shall realize that even though there may be a handful of intriguers, in this country the mass of the people, whether English or French, are the very best.

Mr. CLAXTON: I think I should say something in reply to the hon. member for Broadview and the hon. member for Temiscouata. The fact that they agree on a point does not mean necessarily that the point is either right or wrong, though I must say it is helpful in coming to a conclusion.

The hon. member for Temiscouata made a number of remarks with which I think I should deal factually. He asked, why the wartime information board did not say that Quebec had done well in the war loan. The wartime information board does not give news to the public at first hand; that is done by the press of Canada. It is not part of the work of the wartime information board to take over any of the work of the press, and the publicity for the national war loans is in the hands of the national war finance committee. While the wartime information board is glad to assist with secondary information, and to assist in seeing that information is given to the public, it does not issue the information about war loans in the first place. However, I think it will be found that the publications of the wartime information board in regard to the standing and contribution of Canadians to the war loans have done adequate justice to all parts of Canada including Quebec.

The hon. member spoke about the freedom of the press, and said how desirable it was that the press of Canada should be free. I think I can say in this house that the press of Canada is freer than the press of any other country in the world to-day. Never has the wartime information board either infested the press gallery, as suggested by my hon. friend, or done anything else in connection with the press except to help it in ways that the press desired. That is the function of the board.

Then the hon. member said that we had 396 employees, not to speak of the stenographers. I do not know where he got the figure, but the number of employees of the wartime nformation board is 157, including all the stenographers, office boys and everyone else.

The hon. member said that it was the duty of the board to assist in the education of the Canadian people and to tell them what to think. I deny, Mr. Chairman, that this is the duty of the board, or any other board, in a democratic country. Our people do not want to be told what to think. On the other hand it is the duty of the board to help the press and all other agencies that disseminate information throughout the country to give the people all the facts and all the information on which they can make up their own minds. That and nothing else is the function of the board. We have not done anything else; no one can say that we have done anything else; no one has brought forward a single fact or a single act that would support any such statement. The board is here to serve the people of Canada; it has no other duty. It serves them by giving them, principally through the agencies that deal directly with the public, all the facts and information on which people can make up their minds on the complicated questions as to which people have to make up their minds to-day. They are not easy questions, as we in this house know very well. It is our job in this house, as it is the job of the press, of the radio and, to some slight extent, of the wartime information board, to facilitate that process, but that is all the board can do. Let no one say that it is our job to tell the people what to think, because then we shall have lost this war.

[Mr. Claxton.]

Then the hon. member said that we had done nothing to make it clear that the jobs of the people back home, of the men working on the farms, of the men working in the factories, were just as vital as the job of the men fighting on the beacheads in France to-day. I deny that the job we are doing here in this parliament or in our factories or on our farms is just as vital as the job being done by those men who are offering their lives in France for our freedom to-day. I deny that. However, I do say that if you want a comprehensive picture of what the whole Canadian people are doing, either in the armed forces or on the farms or in the factories, look at "Canada at War" for March, or the French issue, "Le Canada en Guerre", and turn to pages 40 to 78. There you will find a picture of Canada at war at home. Pages 1 to 40 are devoted to Canada at war in the fighting services. If that is not a fair division of space in the sense desired by the hon. member for Témiscouata, I should like to know what is. If it errs on any side it does so in giving overemphasis to the fighting at home, but there are particular reasons for that. Statistically it requires more pages to picture the war at home and to break it down into significant figures.

Then the hon. member said that he wanted the names, occupations and salaries of the staff working for the wartime information board. Well, Mr. Chairman, I could take up the time of this committee by giving that information, if it were required; I have it here. There is no secret about it; it is available to any hon. member who wants to come and see it. However, all these details were given in a return brought down in the house on February 24. The information was complete up to that date, and I could go on from there and enlarge on it if the committee desired me to do so. I do not think hon. members would want me to take the time to do that, however; but if the hon. member for Témiscouata desires the facts and figures, he can get them either now or at any subsequent time.

The hon. gentleman also asked for particulars of any publications not placed through the king's printer. On inquiry I find that no publications are printed except through orders placed with the king's printer. In the case of a publication like this, "Canada at War", the king's printer obviously has to go outside the establishment on Sussex street because he has not a rotogravure press, but he lets that work in accordance with the ordinary practice, over which we have no control whatever. All the printed publications of the wartime information board are placed through the king's printer or printed by the king's printer.

I thought the hon. member for Broadview made some rather helpful remarks. He suggested that we had not been doing a good enough job in informing the people of the United States as to Canada's war effort. The hon. member pointed out that we were failing in certain respects

Almost all the comments ever made with respect to the operations of the board can be categorized under two headings, either that we are not doing enough, or that we are engaging in political propaganda If one were to try to pick out the number of illustrations where any member has said that anything has been done wrong, he could number them on the fingers of one hand. He would not find more than five. The comment falls into one of two categories, either that we have not been doing enough, or that we are doing too much by way of teaching political propaganda.

In respect of not doing anything, I think all parties in the house at one time or another have expressed themselves to the effect that Canada should do more to make her war effort known, not only to the people of Canada but to the people of the United States, Great Britain, and those of other allied nations. All parties have said that, and the board has tried to carry out that idea. Within its resources I say it has done so, admirably. The hon. member for Broadview suggested that to-night.

If I might refer back to what happened in a previous session, I would direct the attention of the committee to a question asked by the hon. member for Parkdale on November 4, 1941. That question, as reported at page 4059 of Hansard of that year was as follows:

> In view of the importance of having Canada's war effort more widely known in the United States than it is at present, will the Prime Minister tell the house whether it is the government's intention at an early date to establish a Canadian bureau of information in New York?

Then, in the debate last year the hon. member for Lake Centre said that "there is still room for greater endeavours in the furnishing of information to the United States."

We have endeavoured to carry out this injunction, and have had a great deal of support from the press and people of Canada, of the United States and of Great Britain. At this point may I pay tribute to the number of Americans who have voluntarily given their time and services, completely free, by way of radio programmes, moving pictures and personal appearances to help make the cause of Canada better known not only in the United States but in Canada.

Our wartime information board is attacked on another count, namely, that of being an instrument of government propaganda. That is the kind of charge made by every opposition in every democratic parliament—and I suppose it is quite natural that it should be made.

But in this instance no one has brought forward a single word, a single note or a single line of justification for the charge. They have been generalities—the kind of generalities which get headlines in the favourable press.

I should like to be perfectly frank with the committee. The facts and figures in connection with the operation of the wartime information board are open to any member. Any member who has gone to the general manager, Mr. A. D. Dunton, who has succeeded Mr. Grierson, has got any information he wanted. He can get anything he likes. The facts and figures are available to him, and to anyone else in a position of authority similar to that held by hon. members.

Men have come from the press to the office in Washington, the office in New York or the office in Ottawa. They have looked into the operations of the board and have ended up by saying, "How can we help? This is an important job." That is the kind of attitude I hope hon. members will take with regard to this activity. There has been no evidence or no statement to bear out the suggestion that there has been anything in the nature of political propaganda issued from the office of the wartime information board, from beginning to end. It issues hundreds of pages of material. It also makes arrangements with radio programmes, with editors and with writers. Hon members will have noticed a steady increase in the attention given to Canada in United States and British publications during the last two years. There has been a steady increase. I do not suggest that any one of those editors has been influenced in any sense by the wartime information board. That would be quite improper. On the other hand I do suggest that those editors would not have had the material upon which they have based their articles, unless the wartime information board had helped them in a perfectly proper way.

Then, with regard to this charge of issuing propaganda may I call attention to the fact that the wartime information board is, in fact, a board. It is under the chairmanship of Mr. N. A. M. MacKenzie, president of the university of New Brunswick, who has now accepted a post as president of the university of British Columbia. The board consists chiefly of senior civil servants representing agencies which might be interested. That board would no more be a party to political propaganda than hon. members, who know the members of the board, would expect them to be. What their political affiliations are, nobody knows, so far as I am aware.

If one goes into the membership of the staff of the wartime information board he finds among the 147 members a number of experienced newspaper people and people of experience in other affairs. They are going to leave their occupations, as soon as the board ceases its work at the end of the war, and they are not going to jeopardize their future reputations by serving any political party.

So that I submit there is not a word of evidence to support that contention. I believe everyone admits the work of the board has been useful. Most people say that its operations should be extended. If there are any errors or omissions, we shall be very glad to correct them. But, above everything else, we would like to have the helpful cooperation of all members of the house and the people of Canada at large in the carrying out of this useful work.

Mr. NOSEWORTHY: I had hoped that the parliamentary assistant would give a somewhat more complete account of what the board is doing to inform the people of Canada at home and in the armed forces, and the people of other countries, including those of the United States, regarding Canada's war effort. I believe that a statement of that kind, setting before the committee something in greater detail of what is being done by the board, would be a valuable piece of information, not only for the board itself but for members of the committee.

I have no reason to believe that there is any considerable body of criticism from any part of the press on the ground that the board is usurping the place of the press in Canada. I have never heard that criticism expressed to any extent. In many parts of the country, however, I have heard commendations from small-town editors when they have spoken of the assistance the board has given them in providing information which was not readily accessible in any other way, and which they could pass on to their readers.

If the facts are as set out by the hon. member for Broadview, so far as a lack of knowledge of Canada's war effort on the part of our neighbours to the south is concerned, then I would suggest that his statement offers the best possible argument hon. members could find in favour of an extension of the type of work the board is doing. The work of the board is of such a nature that, I think we must all agree, it is difficult to assess its value in dollars and cents. The work of the board is like all educational work in that its value cannot be measured in terms of money. No one will question the need of keeping the Canadian people well informed. I am sure that none of us feels that there is the slightest danger of our people becoming too well informed because of the work the board is doing.

I would suggest to the parliamentary assistant, who spoke a moment ago of the members and staff of the board going back to their former jobs when the war is over, that there is a very great need for work such as this board can do in Canada after the war is over. There is a dire need of some organization that will interpret one part of Canada to other parts of Canada, or each part to other parts. Canada is a vast country and we have many different points of view and many different interests. There is just as great a lack of knowledge on the part of Canadians in one section of the country regarding Canadians living in other sections, as there is on the part of United States citizens about Canada as a whole. I would suggest that the board consider the possibility of undertaking the task of interpreting Canadians in each part of Canada to Canadians in other parts.

I suggested a year ago that there is in this country the need of certain books that can be used in the schools of the country, books that will interpret to the students attending school in the English-speaking provinces the life of the people of Quebec, and books that can be used in the schools of Quebec to interpret to the school children there the ways of life of the people in other provinces. I am satisfied that it would do much to cement the unity of Canada, of which the hon. member for Témiscouata has been speaking so much, and I know of no better organization to do that work when the war ends than some such organization as the wartime information board. Any contribution which the board is making either to inform our own people here, or to inform Canadian boys and girls in the armed forces about Canada's effort in this war, about conditions in Canada at the present time, about what is happening in Canada, is all to the good. Anything that I have heard from those in the forces or from those overseas is that they get all too little information about Canada, that the more information this board can give Canadians in the armed forces about what is happening in Canada to-day, the better.

Certainly no one will doubt the necessity and the value of informing our neighbours to the south about Canada. Such work cannot be valued in monetary terms. It will be of immeasurable value not only during the war but when the war is over. It will help to create a much better understanding between this country, the United States and other countries. Even though we have to achieve that at the price of giving the Liberal government credit for some of the things which it is doing, nevertheless, I think it is well worth doing. I do not see how in time of war you can tell the Canadian people or inform other people of what Canada is doing without at the same time giving credit to the government which has the responsibility for carrying on the war effort. I do not see how that can be avoided. I do think the government is obviously getting a good deal of advertising through the wartime informaton board, but I can see no way in which that can be avoided unless you are going to keep our people uninformed, and I do not think we should undertake to keep our people uninformed just because by informing them we are at the same time giving credit to a government.

I believe that without going into the field of political propaganda, particularly in keeping the boys in the armed forces informed about what is happening in Canada, the board could very well give information regarding what is being done by other parties as well as what is being done by the Liberal party. I do not think it is necessary to go into the field of active political propaganda, but if you are going to inform particularly the boys in the armed forces, I am sure that they are just as anxious to know what the Progressive Conservatives, the C.C.F. and other political parties in which they are interested are doing as they are to know what the government is doing.

Certainly I have no hesitation in supporting this estimate, even though it is increased largely over last year. From any knowledge that I have of the wartime information board, I would say that they are doing valuable work in the field of education both in Canada and in other countries.

Mr. KNOWLES: The parliamentary assistant came very close, when he was speaking a few moments ago, to discussing the matter which I touched on just before six o'clock, and which the hon. member for York South has touched on just now, but he really did not deal with the question. The parliamentary assistant made the statement that while there had been criticism of the wartime information board on the ground that it was putting out propaganda for the government, no one had given any definite evidence in support of that statement. As the parliamentary assistant knows, I am not one who made such a statement as that. In fact, I clearly dissociated myself from the indoor sport of criticizing the board. However, I would remind him that I pointed out, as my colleague from York South has done just now, that boards such as this from the very nature of things find themselves putting out material, even though it is plain, ordinary factual material, which cannot help but redound to the credit of the party that happens to be in power.

Mr. CLAXTON: In so far as their record is good.

Mr. KNOWLES: If the hon. member will wait for a moment, I refer him to the series of mimeographed documents from the board which are coming to our desks right now dealing with post-war planning. As I said this afternoon, they are good. Every time one comes to my desk I send to the board for several additional copies because I know people who would like them. But I would remind the parliamentary assistant that with respect, for example, to post-war plans, all the plans the board has collected, though admittedly those of the government of the day, are the plans of one party, and I suggest that in giving out that information alone, the wartime information board is not fully informing the public as to what is going on in this country with respect to post-war planning. Not only the government but my hon. friends to the right, we in our group, and our hon. friends to the left are working out plans of a general nature with respect to the post-war period, and plans for the demobilization and rehabilitation of the members of the forces. It seems to me that, just from the point of view of giving informative material, the wartime information board should be collecting and making available this other information as well. I know that when I discussed the matter this afternoon it somehow got under the skin of the hon. member for York-Sunbury. To him it seemed like asking the wartime information board to use public money to put out political propaganda. Well, when one speaks of "political propaganda" in that tone of voice I agree with him, and the Prime Minister, and the parliamentary assistant, in saying that public money should not be used for that purpose; let there be no mistake about that. But there is all the difference in the world between political propaganda of the kind which is put out in an attempt to run down some other party and nothing more, and the straightforward presentation by responsible political parties of their platforms and of the things for which they stand.

Speaking again under the two headings, material for our people here at home, and material for the armed forces, I feel that the wartime information board is not doing its full job unless it collects for both groups the material of the various political parties who are trying to make their contribution to the advancement of Canadian life at this time. The parliamentary assistant, or the Prime Minister, who spoke on this matter for a moment or two about six o'clock, can point out that there is nothing political in what the board is putting out, that all the wartime information board is giving is a straight statement of facts as to what the government is doing. That is true, but from the very nature of the case it appears to redound to the credit of one party. I am not worried about that. So far as our group is concerned, as hon. members know, we spend a great deal of effort and energy and as much money as we can collect in putting out our own literature. I am not concerned about ourselves, but I am concerned about the wartime information board doing a proper job with public money and getting full and complete information to our people in this country and the members of the armed forces.

Despite what the parliamentary assistant has already said on this particular question tonight, I hope he will reconsider it. I hope he will believe me when I tell him that there is a difference between partisan political propaganda such as the hon. member for York-Sunbury denounced, and a straightforward presentation of political programmes such as I am asking for. I hope that when this debate is over, members of the board, the non-partisan gentlemen whom he has described, in their next meeting will give this matter consideration and see whether there is not room in these mimeographed documents, in "Canadian Affairs", and in "Canada Digest", on the basis of supplying straight factual material, to give something of what other political parties are doing at the present time in their efforts, along with the Liberal party, which happens to be the government of the day, to make a contribution to the advancement of Canadian life.

Mr. DORION: I hold in my hand a publication called "Labour Facts". What is the circulation of this publication, and to whom is it distributed?

Mr. CLAXTON: That was dealt with at some length before the dinner recess. The publication is largely intended for distribution to editors of labour journals, to trades union officials, and to industrial leaders. It was originated in consequence of repeated requests that information of this kind be collected together in this kind of sheet, and it goes to that limited circulation for their purposes. So far the response, as I indicated to the committee before the dinner recess, has been extraordinarily favourable. I read to the committee a letter from Mr. A. R. Mosher, President of the Canadian Congress of Labour. I could have also read letters from the trades and labour congress officials, from members of the Canadian Manufacturers' Association, the Catholic syndicates, and other organizations, all expressing the utmost approval of this publication. I have a large file here, and if the committee want it I can take time to read it to them.

Mr. DORION: Who is the editor of this publication?

Mr. CLAXTON: The editor is Mr. Petegorsky.

Item agreed to.

Advisory committee on reconstruction, $25,435.

Mr. MacNICOL: This vote is so insignificant in comparison with the item which has just been carried that I should like a lot of further information. I said nothing on the previous vote because I had not anything particular to say. I felt that the wartime information board had done under the circumstances a pretty fair job. Perhaps it could be better; perhaps it could be worse. But comparing the two votes, I cannot see why this one is so very small. We are going to win the war; I have not any doubt about that; but we have also to win the peace. This vote refers to a committee on reconstruction. It will not be able to do very much on $25,000. What is it doing? As far as I know there are four different committees concerned with this subject, or three in addition to the parliamentary committee. The parliamentary committee has had before it many capable delegations and witnesses, and the chairman has sent to the house a statement, in my judgment of very great value, of what can be done to win the peace through rehabilitation and reconstruction. But this vote does not apply to the parliamentary committee, for as far as I know that committee has incurred little expenses, unless perhaps in bringing the odd witness from out of town. What has this committee done? Has it made any plans, and, if so, how could it make them for $25,000? Plans for work call for the services of engineers and surveyors, men qualified to prepare them, and others who are competent to make specifications, blueprints and details. Has this body done anything like that? If not, what has it done? I have read, of course, newspaper speeches here and there, but they do not mean a thing unless the plans and specifications of the jobs and the programmes which are to be carried out are prepared. Has this committee arranged for any such plans, specifications or programmes? If so, as far as I know they have not been tabled in the house.

One of the ministers said that plans and specifications were ready for programmes, while another minister said that plans and specifications for programmes are perhaps not necessary. I forget the exact words. Well, what has this committee prepared for post-war rehabilitation? The vote is a small one and I am not opposing it, but I want to know what the committee has been doing and what is ready. Few in this house have travelled in Canada more than I have in the last two or three years and I have not heard anywhere of anything being ready. If there is anything ready, why would every one of the provinces be setting up rehabilitation machinery of their own and going to a lot of expense. Ontario has set up a department and it is travelling around this country and the United States. What has this committee being doing? What has it really prepared, and what is actually ready which will give one man a job after the war?

Mr. CLAXTON: As hon. members know, the hon. member for Davenport has taken a keen interest in the work of rehabilitation and seeing that we are ready for the post-war situation. This vote is reduced from $47,250 last year to $25,435.08 this year. The difference is on account of the fact that the James advisory committee on reconstruction has concluded its work, been thanked by the government and passed out of existence. All its reports, including the reports of subcommittees, have been printed except the report of the subcommittee on housing, which should be printed in the next two weeks. The economic advisory committee to which this vote refers has since 1939 been advising the government on questions of economic policy. Since 1940 it has been advising the government on policies relative to reconstruction and full employment. That committee is still in existence and actively at work. It has a limited number of full-time people engaged by the committee itself on this work, but very largely it consists of senior civil servants and people drawn from other departments and paid by those other departments. That explains the fact that the vote is so small. A large proportion of the people working for the committee are paid by their permanent departments. I can give this committee the membership of the committee, but it is on the records available. The committee is advising the government on economic policy, particularly with reference to reconstruction.

The hon. member for Davenport asks, has it a single work ready? The answer is that that committee has not; that is not its function. That committee is advising the government on the kind of economic policies necessary to see that all the people of Canada, whether employed in industry or in farming or in the professions or other occupations, shall have the best possible opportunity of full employment after the war, and it is engaged in planning at that level. In addition, that committee has appointed a subcommittee and one or two officers who are endeavouring to coordinate all the planning of public works that is being carried on—and it is being carried on—by the government departments themselves on post-war works and projects, which is quite a different thing, though it is the kind of thing the hon. member for Davenport has particularly mentioned. These plans and projects for public works are being prepared and coordinated and the information with regard to them is being collected through that committee, so that the committee ties in to that work of planning post-war works and projects to be conducted by the federal government as part of its public works, although the committee is not charged with responsibility for carrying out these works itself. The works would be carried out by the departments concerned, such as the Department of Public Works, the Department of Fisheries, or the Department of Mines and Resources, or by some agency set up by them or by the provinces or by the municipalities, depending upon the arrangements to be worked out. The committee is endeavouring to collect and coordinate information on planning done in that field. I should answer my hon. friend in all frankness that the primary purpose of the committee is not to plan actual blueprints for any work but to advise the government on general policies with regard to reconstruction so as to bring about a maximum employment, maximum income and maximum security for the Canadian people.

Mr. MacNICOL: I hope I did not say anything that in any way reflected on what the committee has done. I was under the impression when the committee was set up that it was to make preparations for after-war rehabilitation, to win the peace as well as the war, which is being won by the military. I have searched diligently and carefully, and I have inquired just as diligently, to find out if there is anything ready. I have said, and I do not hesitate to say again, that I remember distinctly what happened at the end of the last war. If there were any committees at that time preparing anything, I do not know, but if there were committees following the last war, the fact is that there was nothing but chaos in regard to employment. I should not blame the government of that day because they had no experience to guide them. But this government has. It has the experience of the disastrous situation that followed the last war, and I have hoped right along, since the government set up three or four different committees, that something definite will be done in advance. Among those committees is the parliamentary committee, which I know has done good work. It has no authority and I doubt very much whether attention has been paid to any recommendations made.

Mr. CLAXTON: Most of them have been carried out.

Mr. MacNICOL: The intention is to set up a department of reconstruction and I agree with that. I believe that much good will come of a competent body headed by someone who is thoroughly qualified. We should have an able head of the reconstruction department. If we have, I look forward to its doing a good job. I may infer that the information gathered by this advisory committee to which the parliamentary assistant has referred will be turned over to the department of reconstruction rather than to mines and resources, although mines and resources has an opportunity to do much good work also. I want to feel that every member is sincere and earnest in seeing to it that the men who come back from this war will not have to go through what the boys went through who came back from the last war—not in a country where there are millions of opportunities. All we need to do is to get men who are big enough, who are thoroughly qualified and who understand the problems involved and can make the necessary lay-out. The parliamentary assistant has said that this vote is small because the particular committee is being wound up. I suppose we can only hope that the information it has compiled will be put in the hands of someone who will see to it that a programme is prepared against the day when the war ends. I am one of those who believe that it will end sooner than a good many people think. I have that much confidence in those who are running the war on our side. It may collapse earlier than we anticipate. I hope it does because, the sooner it does, the sooner will our gallant men come back and have a chance to build up the country. I hope everything will be ready for them to set to work and earn a living for themselves.

The CHAIRMAN: Shall I report the resolution?

Mr. KNOWLES: Before you report the resolution and in order to keep the record clear, may I ask if there are not some items at the bottom of page 400 of Hansard that have not been called? There are items there totalling $30,539,460. I am subject to correction on this, but I do not recall those items having been called by the Chairman. They are in the nature of loans, but still they are included in the total of $3,650,000,000, which is the amount of the war appropriation resolution.

The CHAIRMAN: These items were taken up by the Department of Transport. My information is we have now gone through every item of the war appropriation resolution. Is it the pleasure of the committee that I should report the resolution?

Mr. POULIOT: Before the resolution is reported I want to put in a frame statements that were made just a minute ago by the parliamentary assistant to the President of the Privy Council. I took a note of it and I want to read it. This is what he said:

> I deny that the job that we are doing here in this parliament or in our factories or on our farms is just as vital as the job being done by those people who are offering their lives for our freedom to-day.

My contention is that the soldiers could not go anywhere if they had not the help of those who work in industry or on the farm. The hon. gentleman said that our people do not want to be told what to think, which is true. He said that the duty of the board is to give all the facts, which is also true; but I now know the source from which the board gets its inspiration. I put it on Hansard so that the Prime Minister may see it and realize the faux pas that his parliamentary assistant made to-night.

Resolutions reported, read the second time and concurred in. Mr. Ilsley thereupon moved for leave to introduce bill No. 132, for granting to His Majesty aid for national defence and security.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

Mr. ILSLEY: Would the house give unanimous consent to second reading now?

Mr. STIRLING: I think it would be better to have it stand until the next sitting. It would be well for the members to have an opportunity of seeing the bill.

Mr. ILSLEY: It is in the same form as last year, exactly.

AERONAUTICS ACT

CIVIL AVIATION AND COMMERCIAL AIR SERVICES—AIR TRANSPORT BOARD

Hon. C. D. HOWE (Minister of Munitions and Supply) moved that the house go into committee to consider the following resolution:

That it is expedient to introduce a measure to amend the Aeronautics Act to provide for the establishment of an air transport board to perform the functions of a licensing and regulatory body in respect of commercial air services and to advise the minister on matters connected therewith. Provision will be made by the said measure for the payment for services of the members of the board and the employment of necessary officers, clerks and employees.

Mr. STIRLING: Does the minister propose making a statement before going into committee or when we are in committee?

Mr. HOWE: I shall be glad to make a short statement on going into committee, but I think it would be more useful if I make my main statement when the hon. members have the bill before them.

Motion agreed to and the house went into committee, Mr. Bradette in the chair.

Mr. HOWE: The bill before the committee amends the Aeronautics Act of 1922 in order to give effect to the government's announced policy on domestic civil aviation. The discussion on that subject a few weeks ago covered the government's intention in that regard, and this amendment to the Aeronautics Act puts into force the policy announced at that time.

The effect of the amendments is to form a board of three, a chairman and two members, who will administer the Aeronautics Act, take over the duties now being performed by the board of transport commissioners in regulating civil aviation as well as the duty of assigning air worthiness certificates and of licensing aviation enterprises within Canada. In addition, the board will function to advise the government as to ways and means of advancing civil aviation. The board will take the initiative in laying out routes, within Canada and overseas, which promise possibilities of profitable operation and will guide the government in seeing that these routes are operated by Canadians who are capable of carrying out such undertakings.

The judicial functions of the board are not new, but the functions of the board as advisers to the government on aviation policy are new, and will, I think, be helpful in bringing about the rapid development of civil aviation, both internal and external.

In general, the act follows the provisions of the Aeronautics Act of the United States. The functions of this board will be similar to the functions of the civil aeronautics authority of the United States. I think detailed discussion should await second reading of the bill, when we shall have the amendments in detail before us, and when a more complete discussion of the purpose of the bill and the means of effecting that purpose can be arranged. In the meantime I shall be glad to answer any questions on the subject matter of the resolution that hon. members may wish to ask.

Mr. GREEN: The Aeronautics Act was passed in 1919 and amended in 1922?

Mr. HOWE: Yes.

Mr. GREEN: And has not been touched since. In that act the Minister of National Defence is named as the minister in charge. I believe that when the transport board was set up it was given quite wide powers over air transportation in Canada, despite the terms of the Aeronautics Act. Will the minister explain whether now one minister is to administer the Aeronautics Act, or whether there are to be two, one dealing with civil aviation and the other with military aviation, because, as it now reads, this act would seem to cover both military planes and passenger and freight planes.

Mr. HOWE: The Department of Transport Act, 1936, transferred the control of civil aviation from the Minister of National Defence to the Minister of Transport, and since 1936 the Minister of Transport has been the minister named in the act. Military aviation is an entirely separate branch; it has its own airworthiness standards and its own regulations governing military operations.

Mr. GREEN: But it comes under the Aeronautics Act, does it not?

Mr. HOWE: No; it comes now under the regulations of the Department of National Defence for Air. Only civil planes come under the civil Aeronautics Act.

Mr. STIRLING: But the Aeronautics Act has not been amended yet; it must have been put in abeyance.

Mr. HOWE: The act has been amended several times since 1919, but I will speak only of the practice. I have been administering the act since 1936, and I can say that the Minister of Transport has no jurisdiction over military planes, which come entirely under the jurisdiction of the Minister of National Defence. In the amendments proposed, the minister means the Minister of Transport except for military matters, in which event the minister means the Minister of National Defence. Section 5 of the Department of Transport Act, 1936, reads:

The control and supervision of the civil aviation branch of the Department of National Defence is hereby transferred from the Minister of National Defence to the Minister of Transport, and the said branch is hereby transferred from the Department of National Defence to the Department of Transport.

Mr. GREEN: Then is the Minister of Transport to be the minister in charge under the Aeronautics Act as it is to be amended?

Mr. HOWE: A situation exists there which I have explained in the house once or twice already. When I was transferred from the ministry of transport to the ministry of munitions and supply, by arrangement with the then Minister of Transport and by direction of the Prime Minister, and by the exercise of the Transfer of Duties Act, the air services branch of the Department of Transport was transferred for administration to the Minister of Munitions and Supply. That was done because one of the important duties of the ministry of munitions and supply at that time was the building of airports. The air services branch of the Department of Transport had developed a highly skilled engineering personnel for the building of airports, and it was my feeling that the Department of Munitions and Supply should not be required to duplicate that personnel. It was and is the duty of the Minister of Munitions and Supply to construct the airports required by the armed services, and the practical way of bringing about an organization to do such work seemed to be to transfer the air services branch of the Department of Transport to the new ministry. Therefore the air services branch is administered at the present time by the Minister of Munitions and Supply.

Mr. GREEN: Who will be administering the new act?

Mr. HOWE: The Minister of Munitions and Supply, until the Transfer of Duties Act is again called upon to move it back to the department from which it came.

Mr. GREEN: Why is it necessary to go back to the Aeronautics Act and give the minister, who apparently now will be the Minister of Munitions and Supply, the very wide powers contained in that act? They are very much wider than the powers given to the transport board, as the minister knows. Why was it necessary to give such very wide powers as are contained in the Aeronautics Act?

Mr. HOWE: The powers contained in the Aeronautics Act are those required for the control of civil aviation. The Department of Transport only exercised certain regulatory functions, but the Aeronautics Act covers a great many matters that are not at present within the purview of the board of transport commissioners. That board is a judicial body, which simply interprets legislation, and does not initiate projects. It acts as a judicial body in connection with air matters.

Mr. GREEN: Are the powers under the Aeronautics Act to be reduced?

Mr. HOWE: No.

Mr. GREEN: The minister himself will have all the powers that are at present contained in the Aeronautics Act?

Mr. HOWE: Yes.

Mr. GREEN: Some of those powers are set out in section 3, which states:

It shall be the duty of the minister

(a) to supervise all matters connected with aeronautics;

(b) to study the development of aeronautics in Canada and in other countries, and to undertake such technical research as may be requisite for the development of aeronautics, and to cooperate with other institutions in carrying out such research;

(c) to construct and maintain all government aerodromes and air stations, including all plant, machinery and buildings necessary for their efficient equipment and upkeep;

(d) to control and manage all aircraft and equipment necessary for the conduct of any of His Majesty's services;—

That would be wide enough, of course, to include the post office or any other service.

(e) to operate such services as the governor in council may approve;

(f) to prescribe aerial routes;

(g) to cooperate with other officers of His Majesty, and to assist in the carrying out of any services under their jurisdiction which may require aerial work of any nature, and to collaborate with the officers employed in existing air services of His Majesty in such extension of their present work as the development of aeronautics may require;

(h) to take such action as may be necessary to secure, by international regulation or otherwise, the rights of His Majesty in respect of his government of Canada in international air routes;—

Then we come down to paragraph (k), which reads:

(k) to investigate, examine and report on all proposals for the institution of commercial air services within or partly within Canada or the limits of the territorial waters of Canada.

I understand that all these powers are to be given the minister?

Mr. HOWE: That is correct.

Mr. GREEN: Is it the intention to have Trans-Canada Air Lines operated by the government under this act? As I see it, Trans-Canada Air Lines can be operated by the minister direct; that is what it amounts to.

Mr. HOWE: Trans-Canada Air Lines has its own act. It operates under the Trans-Canada Air Lines Act. Its operations are subject to the regulations of the Aeronautics Act, just as the operations of any other service are subject to the Aeronautics Act.

Mr. HOMUTH: Which takes precedence?

Mr. HOWE: That is provided for by the amendment. The Trans-Canada Air Lines Act provides for management for the Trans-Canada Air Lines. It also provides the manner in which it shall be assigned routes, and the limits governing its operation. I assume that the minister, under the Aeronautics Act, will confine his attention to such matters as are not covered by the Trans-Canada Air Lines Act.

Mr. GREEN: Then the situation will be that the Trans-Canada Air Lines will no longer be operated by Canadian National Railways, but will come under and be operated directly by the government.

Mr. HOWE: No, not at all. The only difference will be that the directors of Trans-Canada Air Lines will not be directors of the Canadian National Railways. It will be operated by a board of directors, just as the Canadian National Railways is operated by a board of directors. But the two will not be operated by the same board of directors.

Mr. GREEN: Will the board of Trans-Canada Air Lines be civil servants?

Mr. HOWE: No.

Mr. GREEN: Or outsiders?

Mr. HOWE: Yes, outsiders.

Mr. GREEN: But they will be very directly under the minister?

Mr. HOWE: No more so than the board of directors of the Canadian National Railways.

Mr. GREEN: But if it is administered under this act it will be very directly under the minister. In effect, it makes the minister a dictator in respect of all the airways in Canada, does it not?

Mr. HOWE: Perhaps so; but who would you suggest should be dictator?

Mr. GREEN: I do not think there should be a dictator, myself.

Mr. CHURCH: This resolution is presented to the committee in a very awkward fashion. In the first place, the minister is to create a board just for the purpose of licensing and regulating. The present Minister of Munitions and Supply was formerly Minister of Transport. I very well remember when a board such as he now proposes to appoint in respect of commercial aviation in Canada was appointed to regulate railways. In the first place the Board of Railway Commissioners for Canada was set up. The organization is now known as the board of transport commissioners. At that time it was limited to railway rates. We have seen what it did with this country. That board did not regulate anything. It was a political board, and there was afterwards added to it control over express, telephone companies and all that kind of thing. It was given wide jurisdiction.

I have looked into the original Aeronautics Act the minister now proposes to amend. This parliament will run into all kinds of damage suits if it proceeds with this measure, because I believe the amendment proposed to the statute law, as now suggested by the Minister of Munitions and Supply, is ultra vires of this parliament, and is confiscatory since bonds were sold of one aviation company. I should like to find out what the Minister of Justice and Attorney General of Canada has had to say about this. Was he consulted in respect of this amendment? Or was this matter looked into by the lawyers for Trans-Canada Air Lines—the minister's own lawyers? Were they the legal people who drafted this resolution, which proposes an amendment?

I protest against the measure. We are now in the seventy-second day of the session. It is hopeless for the minister to think he can have an act of parliament passed through like this, one which upsets the whole policy of the country in regard to civil aviation. The proposal for civil aviation would involve millions of dollars, and it will interfere with the rights, the functions, the statutory privileges and property rights of two other large railway corporations. It is practically confiscatory. That is my opinion with respect to the proposed bill to set up the board.

Why does a minister of the crown need a board to advise him as to the way to arrange licences and regulations? Is a minister of the crown not responsible to parliament? Under our parliamentary system of government, is he not responsible to the country? Is he not responsible to the people for the very large expenditures which are to be made? This is a leap in the dark. This whole programme and policy of civil aviation proposed by the minister, and this regulatory board, do not commend themselves to the wisdom and judgment of the people of Canada.

We had a long debate on this matter only a month ago. Now we have before us a resolution, to be followed by a bill. I do not believe parliament has power to pass such legislation in its present form. If we do, we shall get into all kinds of trouble, because we cannot have what we call freedom of the air under a regulatory body such as this. Here we have a minister of the crown asking parliament to pass a resolution on which a bill is to be founded setting up a regulatory board, which will also advise on licences, with powers which no minister of the crown can have, under our constitution.

Not only is this wrong, from the point of view of law, but it is bad public policy. This was never attempted before. A board is to be set up, and it is to have supervision over a minister of the crown in respect of the expenditure of money allocated to his department. It will have power over functions which he would have, under our constitution. We are taking a leap in the dark. It will lead to all kinds of trouble. Certainly it is not in the interests of civil aviation. I believe it will sound the death knell of civil aviation.

More than a year has passed since April 2, 1943, and in that time nothing has been done. To-day a report was withdrawn by the hon. member for St. Boniface, as chairman of the select committee on railways and shipping. They went into matters connected with Trans-Canada Air Lines and the policy herein of the minister. An inquiry was conducted, and questions were asked. I was surprised to note what was done this afternoon. We saw that the report of the committee was presented; as a matter of fact it was presented last Friday. There was reference made in that report to the policy contained in this resolution, namely, that of civil aviation. There was further reference to licensing, and all that kind of thing.

Then the chairman of the committee rose in his place this afternoon and, all of a sudden, withdrew his report. What was his reason for doing that? Because the report would have to be discussed before this resolution could come up. Under the rules of the house with respect to anticipation it could not be accepted, when this resolution was to be introduced, and when there was to be a discussion as to the setting up of a regulatory body with powers to issue licences, and all that kind of thing.

I must confess I cannot understand it, and I never saw that procedure before. The committee was to go over these expenditures of the Canadian National Railways, and affiliated bodies, including Trans-Canada Air Lines. It did that. Witnesses were examined, and there was a good deal of the hallelujah chorus in the committee about what a wonderful system they had. Yet when one of our own ministers wanted to go across to the continent we had to go to Washington and get a Liberator.

[Mr. Church.]

Civil aviation is only in its infancy in Canada. I have been before the board of railway commissioners many times in the past and also before the board of transport commissioners. I have appeared in connection with telephone rates, freight rates, passenger rates and express rates. They never regulate anything. The applicant always gets what he asks for, with interest. And this particular board will be nothing but a board of moonshine. It will appoint a lot of officers and servants and agents and other people—to do what?—to help strangle the movement. I hope the committee will stop, look and listen before the minister is permitted to make this step. I can say this: I really believe he is wrong. He is wrong in policy; he is wrong in principle; he is wrong in the law. It is going to mean confiscatory legislation with respect to a very fine transportation company which has borne the burden and heat of the day. As I said a month ago when this matter was up, I think it should be sent to a committee of the house where the minister's policy could be thoroughly considered and everybody concerned given a hearing.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): The minister said a while ago that this was a similar situation to that prevailing in the United States. They are not the same at all. They are entirely different. In Canada we have a government-owned and operated air service, owned and controlled by the people of Canada. At the same time we have in Canada certain private aviation companies in operation. Now we propose to set up a board, which the minister says is to be a judicial board. Then he says it is to be advisory. Actually what is the board's position to be? It is to be that of player and referee at one and the same time, and we shall have the same difficulties that we had with radio. We all know how Canada has suffered from this dual position of a board being both player and referee in the operation of radio. This will bring about exactly the same situation. The fact of the matter is that this board cannot be judicial; it cannot be impartial.

Another thing, if the board of transport had too much to do, and this were simply a judicial board, it would perhaps be a good idea to have another board to look after aviation. But I do not know if they have too much to do. This is to be a different kind of board altogether. The minister says that it is to be just a judicial board. I think it will be found that it will get us into the same difficulties as we had with radio. However, we shall have to wait until we see what the bill proposes.

Mr. HOWE: If I might answer that point, we are doing in connection with aviation exactly what the private radio stations have been asking the government to do in connection wtih control of the air waves. The private stations object to the C.B.C. operating a chain of radio stations and at the same time controlling the private industry. I might point out that the board we are discussing to-night is not an operating board. Trans-Canada Air Lines has an operating board, but it has no regulative authority, and is itself subject to the regulations of the aeronautics board. This is exactly the situation which the private radio stations have been seeking in connection with the air waves.

I am getting attacked from various angles to-night. The hon. member for Vancouver South claims that the minister has too much authority, and the hon. member for Broadview suggests that the minister is divesting himself of his authority in favour of the board. I think this amendment involves no great change in governmental responsibility for the administration of aviation in Canada.

Mr. GRAYDON: I am afraid that there is.

Mr. HOWE: No change whatever.

Mr. KNOWLES: I agree with the statement which the minister made when this resolution first reached the committee stage, to the effect that we could discuss the subject much better when the bill is before us. I rose to ask him just one question, but now that I am on my feet it might not be out of place for me to come to his defence a little because he is being attacked by our hon. friends to my right and he does not seem to have many supporters to help him out.

Mr. HOMUTH: You both need a lot of them.

Mr. KNOWLES: The minister and I frequently disagree in matters of policy, and even with respect to this bill there are some criticisms which I expect to be making. But in the main I feel that the minister and the government are moving in the right direction when they seek to establish public control over so important a phase of our national life to-day as civil aviation.

Mr. REID: Now I am beginning to suspect the legislation.

Mr. KNOWLES: I hope that my support of the measure will not be responsible for its being defeated by the minister's own supporters. At any rate, I repeat that every step that is taken by any government to establish public control over a matter so important as aviation will have our unqualified support. A few minutes ago when this feature of the bill was being revealed, one hon. member to my right suggested that it would mean a government monopoly, and I think he even used the word "dictatorship." I resent that language being used as descriptive of public control. In this day and age there are many instances of concentration of power.

Mr. HOMUTH: And many concentration camps.

Mr. KNOWLES: The minister realizes, in introducing this bill, that in certain instances where there is a concentration of power there is only one thing to do, namely, to place that power in the hands of the people, and in the sense in which this bill proposes to do that with respect to civil aviation it has our support.

Mr. REID: If you lived in British Columbia you would not be so keen on public control.

Mr. KNOWLES: Does the hon. member not support this measure?

Mr. REID: I do not know yet; I am not sure. I have an open mind.

Mr. KNOWLES: There have not been many Liberal supporters of this measure, and that is why we come to the assistance of the minister.

Mr. HOMUTH: Actually I do not think he appreciates it.

Mr. KNOWLES: We shall be able to discuss the various points when the bill is before us, but I have one question. The minister stated earlier this evening that the board to be set up would in some respects be similar to the United States civil aeronautics board. He referred to the act under which that board functions when he spoke on this subject on March 17 of this year, and referred to the fact that the United States civil aeronautics act—I am looking at page 1573 of Hansard—provides that no common carrier (that is, surface carrier) shall own, manage, or operate any air carrier. He made that reference immediately after pointing out that it was the intention of the government to provide that the railways should divest themselves of ownership of airlines. May I ask him whether he can indicate at this time that this bill will give effect to that principle particularly with respect to the proposed divorce between the Canadian Pacific Railway Company and Canadian Pacific Air Lines?

Mr. HOWE: The bill provides that there shall be no common ownership of surface carriers and air carriers.

Mr. GREEN: In what way is the new board, the air transport board, subject to the minister? What is the tie between the minister and the air transport board?

Mr. HOWE: The minister is responsible for the administration of civil aviation in Canada. The board has certain judicial functions in its own right, and can decide certain judicial matters.

Mr. HOMUTH: Would their judicial functions be within the control of the minister, or separate from the minister?

Mr. HOWE: The judicial functions are directly under the control of the board, except that in certain cases there is an appeal to the minister. But the government is not attempting to divest itself of its responsibility for administering civil aviation. The government's experience, and my own, are wholly against an attempt of that sort. We had a perfect example of that in 1932, when the Conservative government of that day undertook to divest itself of responsibility for the administration of the Canadian National Railways. It set up a trusteeship of three men to administer the property, and by 1936, when the trusteeship was dissolved, it needed about one or two more years to make it a trusteeship in bankruptcy. The road was rapidly heading that way. The government at that time again assumed its responsibilities for the railway, and the—

Mr. HOMUTH: Was that not a condition of the times rather than a condition of the set-up?

Mr. HOWE: Perhaps each contributed.

Mr. HOMUTH: It is not a comparison.

Mr. HOWE: I could mention, if I were not getting fairly close to home, other examples where a government has tried to divest itself of responsibility, without success to the government or prosperity to the object.

Mr. HOMUTH: We might go near home on that, eh?

Mr. HOWE: Yes. So that we shall not discuss that. Nevertheless this government believes in government responsibility for government operations, and the amendments proposed to the act are not inconsistent with that belief.

Mr. GREEN: In other words, the air transport board is to be directly under the minister?

Mr. HOWE: Correct.

Mr. GREEN: The minister said that that, as I understand it, was not the position of the board of transport commissioners.

Mr. HOWE: That is correct, yes. The board of transport commissioners is a judicial body equivalent to a court, and its duty is to administer an act. That board has no function beyond the administration of the act —a wholly judicial function. This is a board which is both judicial and advisory.

Mr. GREEN: In other words, the board of transport commissioners had to decide whether an applicant for a licence should get the licence, on certain well-defined principles, which might be summed up as public convenience and necessity, and it had also to follow certain judicial principles in deciding what tolls would be charged.

Mr. HOWE: That is right.

Mr. GREEN: As I understand it, this new transport board will no longer be subject to those stipulations; it will no longer have to decide on the basis of public convenience and necessity whether or not a licence should be granted?

Mr. HOWE: The jurisdiction is set out in the bill. I think if my hon. friend will delay this discussion until he sees the bill he will find that his fears in that regard are unnecessary.

Mr. GREEN: But in effect now the minister is over and above that air transport board?

Mr. HOWE: Not in judicial matters.

Mr. GREEN: While he was not over and above the board of transport commissioners? Is that not so?

Mr. HOWE: I might point out that the board has two sets of functions. One is purely judicial; that is, when deciding matters of fact the board will be governed by the act; in that case the minister has no right to overrule them, except in the event of an appeal.

Mr. HOMUTH: If I may interrupt, that is what I wanted to ask the minister. After the board has ruled on a judicial matter, is there a right of appeal to the minister or to some other body?

Mr. HOWE: There is the right of appeal to the minister on certain matters, not all matters, but certain matters where there is an element of judgment as well as an element of judicial decision in interpreting the law. In certain limited matters there is provision for an appeal to the minister. Ordinarily, in judicial matters the board is bound by the act and its decision is final. However, the board will also initiate air projects. The board of transport commissioners is not an initiating board. This board can initiate plans, and present them to the government for execution, and that, I anticipate, will be a very important part of the work of the board. That is the purpose in having a board whose interest is entirely that of aviation, and whose important task will be to develop for Canada a well thought out, well conceived system of aviation.

Mr. GREEN: Would it not be wise to maintain some board that did act in a judicial manner—

Mr. HOWE: This board does. I have explained that point several times.

Mr. GREEN: —and let perhaps some department of government do the advising and initiating, rather than try to make the board sit on both sides of the fence at once? It does not seem to me as though those two functions can be carried out by the one body. The minister may be able to solve that in some way or another. How does he propose to get around that difficulty?

Mr. STIRLING: Has not the board of transport now got those two functions?

Mr. GREEN: No. The board of transport commissioners has far more independence in deciding on applications than this air transport board will have.

Mr. HOWE: I will agree that the board of transport commissioners is an entirely independent body, but I point out that its duty is wholly negative. It initiates nothing. If an application comes before the board, it determines whether the application complies with the Transport Act, or whether it does not. If such application does comply with the act it is approved; if it does not it is rejected. I point out that this new board has judicial functions in a similar way.

Mr. GREEN: On the same principles as are set out in the Transport Act?

Mr. HOWE: The hon. member had better wait for the bill to determine that. The principles are set out in the bill. They are varied in some particulars. The new board also has the function of attempting to build as well as to regulate. Civil aviation in the United States, which is more highly developed than in any other country, has been developed by a board of this type, and, I believe, developed admirably. I think that by and large the air transport system of the United States is a very successful development, and that its civil aeronautics authority has contributed much toward that fortunate situation. I believe it is a model which Canada can very well follow.

Mr. GREEN: Of course, there the government does not operate the air lines, does it?

Mr. HOWE: Trans-Canada Air Lines is just another air line as far as the air transport board is concerned. There is no connection between the two, except that the air transport board has regulatory functions over Trans-Canada Air Lines.

Mr. MacNICOL: Over the C.P.R.?

Mr. HOWE: Over every air line and every plane that carries passengers.

Mr. GREEN: The Trans-Canada Air Lines will now be more directly under the board than before.

Mr. HOWE: Not at all.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): It is not in the same position as the United States, and it is in the same position as radio in Canada to-day. The board has not at all the same functions as the board of transport commissioners. The board of transport commissioners have decisions to make as between the government-owned railways and the privately-owned railways and all the way through, as to whether the privately-owned railways should put a line in a certain place or whether it should be done by the government-owned railways. This board will not have any judicial function at all; and wherever privately-owned air lines are concerned, where they start to interfere with Trans-Canada Air Lines, the board will decide against the privately-owned air lines and in favour of the government-owned lines. That is, it will be in the position of player and referee at the same time.

Mr. REID: When this act is in operation, would a company, say in British Columbia, whose intention it would be to fly entirely within the province and not outside it, be compelled, before doing so, to come before this board for a licence?

Mr. HOWE: Yes.

Mr. REID: Then I think the committee should be very careful about this bill, because the experience we have had in British Columbia, in coming to Ottawa before the railway board, or before any board here, has not been at all happy. As far as I am concerned, I shall view the bill with some concern if every local operator has to come to Ottawa, before going into business in the province, to seek permission from a board here.

Mr. STIRLING: I cannot understand how the minister will operate under the act after it has been amended. The purpose of the amendment is to graft on to the Aeronautics Act an air transport board which I understand the Minister of Munitions and Supply will operate, or at least it will operate in conjunction with the Department of Munitions and Supply. He says that the Aeronautics Act will not be amended in any other particular.

Mr. HOWE: When did I say that? I do not think I did say it.

Mr. STIRLING: The question was asked and that, I understood, was the answer. Are there to be other amendments to the Aeronautics Act?

Mr. HOWE: Yes.

Mr. STIRLING: I clearly understood the minister to say that this was the only one.

Mr. HOWE: No. I said that the act would be amended to make effective the government's policy with regard to civil aviation as announced in the house some time ago. It is being amended in a number of particulars.

Mr. STIRLING: Then the description of the minister is one that will be altered?

Mr. HOWE: Yes.

Mr. STIRLING: You cannot leave the Minister of National Defence at the head of this act if it is the Minister of Munitions and Supply who will operate the board.

Mr. HOWE: The Minister of Transport is the minister named in the act; but, as I explained, the present is a temporary situation which may or may not last for long; only so long as the air services branch of the Department of Transport is administered by the Minister of Munitions and Supply.

Mr. GREEN: Will the air transport board have authority over air service abroad?

Mr. HOWE: Yes, to an extent. I should not like to answer that question with too great finality. It will certainly have jurisdiction over services in Canada. I presume it may not have jurisdiction over Canadian services everywhere.

Mr. GREEN: A route from Canada to Great Britain, for instance?

Mr. HOWE: Yes.

Mr. GREEN: What supervision would it have over that?

Mr. HOWE: It probably would have the whole supervision. It is difficult to anticipate what the rules of international air transport will be, but to-day, as between Canada and the United States, this board will have jurisdiction over all lines that are Canadian operations between the two countries. For instance, the line from Toronto to La Guardia field would be under the air transport board.

Mr. GREEN: Would it have supervision over a United States line coming to Canada?

Mr. HOWE: No. The whole matter is subject to international agreement.

Mr. GREEN: On the question of international agreement, now that the British have announced that they cannot follow the Canadian plan, is the government proceeding on the basis of making bilateral agreements with other nations?

Mr. HOWE: No.

Mr. GREEN: With Russia, for example? What is the position? Is our air policy indefinite temporarily?

Mr. HOWE: Everyone's policy is indefinite in that there is no comprehensive international agreement at the moment. Every country in the world is attempting to convince other countries that its own view of the international situation is the correct view. In consequence of a number of conversations, each view is more or less solidifying toward a common basis that all countries can accept. But until a basis can be found that all countries can accept there will be no international agreement.

Mr. GREEN: In what direction is it solidifying?

Mr. HOWE: I cannot say exactly. I am not a prophet.

Mr. ADAMSON: The minister has paid a high compliment to the United States civil aviation board. I understand there is a radical difference between the policy in the United States and the policy proposed by the minister, in that the United States policy is that there shall be competition over the same routes, whereas in Canada the policy announced by the minister in this house last month was that there should be no competition, or that Trans-Canada Air Lines should have the exclusive right to east and west air lines in Canada and that as regards the feeder lines, such as they were, the individual company should have the exclusive right. I understand that the United States policy is that direct competition is allowed in the major air lines.

Mr. HOWE: The air system of the United States was developed on just the opposite line, the line that competition between air lines should be held to a minimum. The country has been divided into certain areas. For example, American Air Lines has the southern part of the United States, United Air Lines the central zone, and other air lines the northern zone. Competition has been kept to a minimum. Recently the civil aeronautics authority has announced that it will permit competition on heavily travelled lines. There has been some discussion of allowing competition on the line between New York and Boston, which is a very heavily travelled line. This policy may be carried farther, but this is a new development of the last year or so. Before that, the policy of the board, as I understand it, was to avoid competition over the same route for different carriers. Important centres must necessarily be competitive. Of the four transcontinental systems, all must start from New York and several may touch Chicago. But, generally speaking, there is the least possible duplication of routes between different operations. I might point out that the population of the United States is twelve times as great as that of Canada, and that the area to be covered in the United States and in Canada is about the same. There may come a time when there is sufficient concentration of traffic over Canadian lines to warrant competition, and when that day comes I am sure the government of the day will recognize the fact. At the moment, the chances of survival of a modern and efficient Canadian air line depend, in my opinion, on not having competition of services over the same route.

Mr. MacNICOL: But the rates will be regulated?

Mr. HOWE: Certainly.

Mr. ADAMSON: I understand one can travel from New York to Chicago by four different lines.

Mr. HOWE: Yes, but that is only competition between two great travel centres. Those four lines from New York to Chicago travel different routes, and there are no other cities in between that are served by more than one line.

Resolution reported, read the second time and concurred in. Mr. Howe thereupon moved for leave to introduce bill No. 133, to amend the Aeronautics Act.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

FARM CREDIT

LIMITED GUARANTEE OF BANK LOANS FOR IMPROVEMENT AND DEVELOPMENT OF FARMS

Hon. J. L. ILSLEY (Minister of Finance) moved that the house go into committee to consider the following resolution:

That it is expedient to introduce a bill to encourage the provision of intermediate term and short term credit to farmers for the improvement and development of farms through bank loans, guaranteed with limitations, by the crown; moneys payable under the act including expenses of administration to be paid out of the consolidated revenue fund.

Mr. ILSLEY: I think I had better make a statement on this resolution, so that the house will have it before it when it considers the bill. If it is convenient I would suggest that discussion be deferred until the bill is before it, because discussion can be carried on much more intelligently if hon. members have the bill before them. But I should make a statement now because it will assist in understanding the bill.

During my statement on second reading of the Bank Act bill I gave a general outline of the purpose and structure of the proposed Farm Improvement Loan Act. As I then said, this measure is in effect collateral to the Bank Act. The amendments to section 88 of the Bank Act will enable the banks to make loans to farmers for the equipping and improvement of their farms and farm homes and to take appropriate security. The Farm Improvement Loans Act is intended to ensure that these newly created credit facilities will be made available to farmers to the fullest possible extent, at reasonable rates of interest and for sufficiently long terms.

This will be accomplished by guaranteeing each bank against loss up to ten per cent of the aggregate amount of loans made by it in accordance with the prescribed conditions. As I have already pointed out, this technique has already been applied with conspicuous success. Under the Home Improvement Loans Act, the banks loaned $50,000,000 mainly to urban home owners, within the period from November, 1936, to October, 1940. In the main these were loans that would not otherwise have been made, and it is generally acknowledged that the act made a notable contribution in terms of employment and community welfare. Under that act the banks were guaranteed against loss up to fifteen per cent of the aggregate value of the loans. Actually the losses to date are only three-quarters of one per cent. Conditions may have been especially favourable to repayment as the business cycle was on the upswing throughout the period of operations under the home improvement plan, but I think we are justified in concluding that a guarantee of fifteen per cent is unnecessarily high, even for loans to farmers which may be somewhat more risky than loans to urban home owners. Guarantees were also extended to the banks in connection with loans made for the summer stocking of fuel by consumers, and again the lending experience was excellent. All 1943 loans are now paid and only one bad debt had to be written off from 1942.

It is considered that a guarantee of ten per cent of the aggregate amount of loans made by one bank will be sufficient to offset the special risks attaching to farm improvement loans, yet will not be so large as to result in reckless lending without regard to the prospect of repayment. The amount of the guarantee is not, of course, the only factor that will influence the volume of loans. The attitude of the banks is important, and I have reason to believe that they will welcome the opportunity to extend their field of usefulness to farmers. The experience under the home improvement plan and the coal guarantee scheme must have brought home to many bank managers the opportunities that lie close at hand for serving the needs of individual borrowers.

It is necessary, of course, to fix some limit on the amount of loans to which the ten per cent guarantee applies. Further, we think it is desirable that there should be an opportunity after the scheme has been working for a reasonable period for parliament to review its operations and make whatever changes then seem desirable. For these reasons, it is proposed that the guarantee should be effective in respect of a maximum of $250 million of loans made within a period of three years. Apart from this over-all limitation on the government's liability, there will be provision for termination of the guarantee after due notice on loans in any particular category or made by any particular bank. This will ensure effective control over lending operations.

While the banks will be free to make whatever loans they see fit, at their own risk, under the extended provisions of section 88 of the Bank Act, only loans which comply with certain prescribed conditions as to purpose, eligibility of the borrower, amount of the loan, rate of interest, terms of repayment and security will be eligible for guarantee. In the bill itself the more general conditions will be set forth. Of necessity the details must be left to regulation, just as was done under the home improvement plan.

[Mr. Ilsley.]

First, as to purpose: the object of the scheme is to provide the credit needed by farmers to increase the efficiency of their farming operations and to enable them to make their farm homes more comfortable and attractive. With this in view, it is proposed that the guarantee should apply to loans made for the purchase of farm implements and farm equipment, for rural electrification, for the purchase of live stock, for fencing and drainage, for the repair, alteration and construction of farm buildings and for other farm improvement purposes that may later be specified in the regulations. The categories are very broad and include nearly every kind of permanent improvement to a farm or farm home.

The question of eligibility for loans raises some difficult points on which there may be differences of opinion. It will be proposed that the benefits of the guarantee should extended to occupiers of farms whose principal occupation consists of farming, and should not be available to landlords or to what might be called gentleman farmers, living on farms but working in the city. I think this is the right principle, but I would be glad to consider the views of the banking and commerce committee if they reach a different conclusion when they come to consider the bill founded on this resolution.

As to the amount of the loan, the scheme is meant to benefit the ordinary farmer and not the big scale operator who can presumably arrange a line of credit without government guarantee. Hence, it is proposed that the guarantee should not be effective in respect of loans to an individual farmer exceeding $3,000. The rate of interest is to be limited to a maximum of five per cent simple interest per annum, which is considerably less than rates generally obtaining for this kind of accommodation to farmers from merchants, dealers or other present sources and is, I believe, somewhat less than the average rate charged to farmers by banks on short-term loans. It is reasonable that the rate should be lower since an important part of the risk is being borne by the government. Nevertheless, earnings must be sufficient to cover the banks' costs of operation and to give them an incentive to go out after business.

Ideally, the terms and methods of repayment should be adapted to the circumstances of the individual farmer, taking into account the purpose and size of the loan. Thus a loan for a permanent improvement, such as a new barn, should in general be amortized over a longer period than a loan for a farm implement, and a loan for a cream separator might well be paid out of the monthly cream cheque, whereas payments on a binder would usually be most convenient at harvest time. Quite obviously, the necessary flexibility cannot be achieved by legislation or even by regulation. In the final analysis each loan is an individual personal problem. An attempt will be made, however, to issue certain general instructions for the guidance of bank managers and, as experience is gained, to make these gradually more explicit. In the bill itself the only limitation as to terms of repayment will be that a guaranteed loan must be repayable in full in not more than ten years. In practice most loans will be of much shorter duration, the outside limit being approached only in the case of large loans for the construction of a permanent improvement such as the principal farm dwelling.

With respect to the taking of security for farm improvement loans, it is proposed to require the banks to take the kind of security available to them under the Bank Act, except in the case of larger loans for permanent improvements for which special provision will be made in the bill founded on this resolution. Thus a loan for the purchase of a binder will be secured by a charge on the binder itself, and a loan for the installation of a farm electric system by a charge on both the movable and affixed parts of that system.

I would also remind the house that the banks have powers to take additional security of any kind after the loan has been made; for instance, if the borrower appears likely to default or has already defaulted.

For ordinary loans for permanent improvements, it is not the intention to require the banks in the first instance to take security on the farm itself even though the value of the property has been enhanced by reason of the improvements made. This decision was reached after very careful consideration, and I am sure it will result in a much freer use of the facilities than if the banks had been required to take a mortgage on the farm for every single loan in this category. Where the loan is for a relatively large amount, repayable over an extended period, however, it is reasonable and prudent to take security on the property which benefits by the expenditure of the loan. The bill will therefore contain a provision giving the banks power to take a mortgage or hypothec upon the farm or an assignment of the rights and interest of a purchaser under an agreement for sale as security for a farm improvement loan exceeding $2,000 and repayable in more than five years.

When the scheme is in operation the great majority of farmers will be able to arrange a loan at the bank and pay cash to the manufacturer or dealer for his machinery and equipment. The lower rate of interest payable on farm improvement loans will constitute a direct saving to the farmer, and I am also hopeful that this method of financing will make a real contribution to a reduction in prices of farm implements and equipment. Nevertheless, there is danger that some dealers and manufacturers, now that the risk of loss and the cost of collection are being transferred to the banks and the government, may tend to oversell. This is a thorny problem, and the government intends to initiate discussions with the leading companies at once so that suitable agreements can be worked out in advance of the commencement of the act.

These are the principal provisions of the measure founded on this resolution. I do not think it is necessary for me to deal at length with the reasons which led the government to adopt this particular method of providing intermediate agricultural credit. I stated them in my explanation of the banking legislation on May 2, and I amplified them in closing the debate on second reading of the Bank Act on May 11. Briefly, the reasons are these: this method avoids delay; it avoids the hazards and costs and problems of personnel involved in building up a new organization which would be necessary if we were to establish a new agricultural bank; it avoids duplicating the network of branch banks already in existence; it affords a desirable combination of government assistance with business judgment.

It is interesting to observe that the subcommittee on agricultural policy of the advisory committee on reconstruction, headed by Donald G. McKenzie of Winnipeg, in its final report recommended:

> That the dominion government make a careful survey of the schemes for providing short-term and intermediate credit now in force in other countries, with a view to making provision for adequate credit at low rates of interest to deserving farmers, using as far as possible existing facilities, including the chartered banks of Canada.

Mr. STIRLING: Is it the intention of the government to send this bill to the banking and commerce committee and, if so, at what stage?

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes; after it receives second reading in the house, just as we did with the Bank Act.

Mr. STIRLING: Another bill was sent to the banking and commerce committee before the principle was decided on second reading, and I wondered whether the government would think well of dealing with this bill in the same way.

Mr. ILSLEY: Oh, no; that was a different sort of bill. That bill was for the incorporation of a provincial bank in Alberta, with the principle of which the government was not prepared to agree, and the subject matter therefore was referred to the banking and commerce committee. The government sponsors this bill and the principle thereof, and is asking the house to approve the principle of the bill and send it to the banking and commerce committee for consideration as to details.

Mr. STIRLING: We are not in committee, but if I may be permitted to say a word I can see the difference perfectly well. However, this measure will open a very wide field of business to the chartered banks, which they have not been able to enter in the past; and although the minister says he understands the chartered banks are favourable to this proposal, I think it would be most valuable to hear the evidence of the chartered banks in that regard, possibly before the principle is decided upon by this house.

Motion agreed to and the house went into committee, Mr. Golding in the chair.

Mr. STIRLING: Does this measure extend these facilities just to the ten chartered banks, or to any other financial houses as well?

Mr. ILSLEY: I think it is just to the ten chartered banks. The reason I say "I think" is that there may be other than chartered banks in the province of Quebec, but I do not think so.

Mr. STIRLING: But not to loan companies of any description?

Mr. ILSLEY: No.

Mr. BLACKMORE: Are the facilities created by this act to be extended to all kinds of farmers; fruit farmers, dairy farmers and farmers of all types throughout the country?

Mr. ILSLEY: "A farmer" is defined in the bill. I do not like to pick up this draft bill and start quoting from it now; there will be plenty of opportunity for that in the banking and commerce committee.

Mr. BLACKMORE: But not before that.

Mr. ILSLEY: No. It is intended that a farmer shall mean a person who is in possession of a farm, and whose principal occupation consists of farming such farm. Then "a farm" is defined to mean land used for the purpose of farming, which term includes live stock raising, dairying, fruit growing and all tillage of the soil.

[Mr. Stirling.]

Mr. ROSS (Souris): I have quite a few questions to ask, and it is eleven o'clock now.

Mr. RALSTON: Let us finish it to-night.

Mr. ROSS (Souris): This is a very important bill, and I should like to discuss it.

The ACTING CHAIRMAN (Mr. Golding): This is just the resolution.

Mr. ROSS (Souris): Then may I ask the minister questions on second reading, before it goes to committee?

Mr. ILSLEY: No.

Mr. STIRLING: Surely if questions are to be asked on a bill which is to be sent to the banking and commerce committee, this is the time to ask them.

Mr. ILSLEY: That is quite right.

Mr. ROSS (Souris): Then I should like an opportunity to ask a number of questions.

Progress reported.

At eleven o'clock the house adjourned until Thursday at three o'clock p.m., pursuant to special order made Monday, February 21, 1944.

Thursday, June 8, 1944

The house met at three o'clock.

VACANCY

Mr. SPEAKER: I have the honour to inform the house that I have received a communication from two members, notifying me that the following vacancy has occurred in the representation, viz:

Of Hugh Bathgate McKinnon, Esquire, member for the electoral district of Kenora-Rainy River, by decease.

I have accordingly issued my warrant to the chief electoral officer to make out a new writ of election for the said electoral district.

THE KING'S BIRTHDAY

RESOLUTION EXTENDING GREETINGS AND GOOD WISHES TO HIS MAJESTY

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, hon. members are aware that to-day, June 8, has been set apart for the celebration in Canada of His Majesty's birthday anniversary. The house no doubt would wish to extend to His Majesty greetings and good wishes on this occasion; and my hon. friend, the Leader of the Opposition, (Mr. Graydon) has kindly said that he would join with me in a motion which would express the wishes of all parties in the house. I would therefore move, seconded by the Leader of His Majesty's Loyal Opposition;

That an humble address be sent to His Majesty, King George VI, in the following words:

To the King's Most Excellent Majesty:
Most Gracious Sovereign:

We, the members of the House of Commons of Canada in parliament assembled, desire to extend to Your Majesty, on this day set apart for the celebration in Canada of the King's Birthday, our loyal greetings and heartfelt good wishes.

Throughout these anxious days of the supreme effort of the united nations, it is our prayer that Providence may protect Your Majesty; that you may be spared to see an early triumph of the forces of freedom now launched upon tremendous battles on land, on the sea and in the air; and that the efforts of all who fight for freedom may be crowned with security and peace.

Mr. GORDON GRAYDON (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, perhaps the most appropriate manner in which I may be allowed to second the motion of the Prime Minister is to ask the members of this house to rise and sing "God Save the King."

(The members rose and sang God Save the King.)

Motion agreed to.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

WEDNESDAY SITTINGS

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): On Tuesday afternoon the leader of the opposition suggested that it might help to expedite the business of the house considerably were we to resume the sittings on Wednesdays. As hon. members are aware, the normal procedure has been to sit on Mondays and Tuesdays, Thursdays, and Fridays in the afternoon and evening, but on Wednesday for the half day only. I have been conferring with my colleagues as to the advisability of resuming the Wednesday afternoon sittings. If the house is prepared to accept the suggestion which was made constructively and helpfully by my hon. friend, that we might on Wednesday afternoons proceed immediately with government business, the business which was taken up on the previous night, or such orders as might be called, thereby avoiding delays on questions or motions preceding the taking up of business previously indicated, I would be prepared to move, with the consent of the house, that the house resume its sittings on Wednesday afternoons.

I have to make it clear that it will be necessary for the war committee of the cabinet to reserve Wednesdays, as we have up to the present this session, for the consideration of the very important matters which come before its members, and that the members of the government who are on the war committee will necessarily be obliged to absent themselves from the house that afternoon. I assume that hon. members will agree in the circumstances that there will be no divisions on Wednesday afternoons; that, as I have already said, ministers will not be expected to reply to questions, but that the procedure will be as it would normally be after the government has entered upon the orders of the day for the discussion of the different measures. If this is agreeable, and I gather from the response made to what I have already said that it is, I would move:

That on and after June 14, 1944, until the end of the session, the house shall meet at three o'clock in the afternoon on Wednesdays and that the order of business shall then be the continuation of the business interrupted by the adjournment of the house on the preceding day, provided always that government business may be called on Wednesdays in such sequence as the government may think fit.

That last clause refers of course to government business. It means that the government would announce on Tuesday evening that on Wednesday we would take up such and such items on the order paper, but not necessarily continuance of the particular measure that was being discussed after time of adjournment on the Tuesday night. That might be a measure in which the Minister of Finance or some other member of the war committee would be interested. The house will observe that at present we shall continue to follow the custom of not sitting on Wednesday evening. If we make substantial progress under the proposed arrangement and we find that it is really likely to help in expediting the business of the house, we may a little later take Wednesday evenings and after that, I hope, before long begin morning sittings.

Mr. GORDON GRAYDON (Leader of the Opposition): There are just two things I wish to say with respect to this motion. I think it will expedite the business of the house considerably, and I wish to thank the Prime Minister for having acceded to what I felt would be a constructive request, because we are all very anxious, particularly in these times, to see the house conduct itself with as much celerity and dispatch as may be humanly possible in the circumstances, reserving of course the right to deal properly with legislation that comes before the house.

The second thing I wish to say is that, in connection with Wednesday evening sittings, I had made that a part of my proposal, and I was glad to hear the Prime Minister suggest that the door was being left open so that Wednesday evening might be taken advantage of a little later on.

The other matter mentioned, in connection with the question of divisions on Wednesdays, calls for a comment, and perhaps the opposition ought in its own interests to protect itself, as the government has done, and to make sure that no legislation will be brought in by the government which would, by reason of the acceptance of the Prime Minister's suggestion about no divisions, in any way embarrass the opposition in connection with details of that kind. Perhaps that is a matter upon which we can all cooperate so that the interests and the rights of all shall be protected as time goes on.

Mr. E. G. HANSELL (Macleod): In rising to support the motion, may I make one or two suggestions to the Prime Minister. We usually find that civil estimates are rushed towards the end of the session. I think we could very largely comply with the suggestion made by the Leader of the Opposition and with the request of the Prime Minister and avoid divisions if it were possible to have civil estimates discussed on Wednesday afternoons. There is to my mind quite a difference in discussion as between civil estimates and legislation. When legislation is brought down it usually determines government policy. In order for us to familiarize ourselves with the various subjects involved in legislation a good deal of time is required, and an hour or two on Wednesday might facilitate the study of certain legislation. While civil estimates are being discussed there are not involved particularly questions of government policy. Civil estimates come down every year and usually about the same discussion takes place. I am going to suggest that if it is possible we reserve Wednesday afternoon for civil estimates and we may find as the session draws near its close that it is not necessary for us to hasten over these estimates as we usually do.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: The government will be glad to consider the suggestion, but I do think that general legislation is more important than estimates, though estimates of course are one form of legislation. My hon. friend will realize that already this session a great deal of discussion of items that appear in the civil estimates has taken place on the war appropriation, also in addition there has been under discussion some of the civil estimates, so that there is not now the possibility that the estimates will be left for consideration until the end of the session. On some Wednesdays we might take up civil government estimates; we might take them up on Monday or Tuesday, on Thursday or Friday. I would not wish to say that Wednesday would be reserved for that purpose. I think that precedence ought to be given to the bills we have, some of which are very important, and some of which will require a good deal of discussion.

Motion agreed to.

TREATIES AND CONVENTIONS

CANADA-UNITED STATES—AVOIDANCE OF DOUBLE TAXATION AND PREVENTION OF FISCAL EVASION

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): I wish to announce to the house that a convention for the avoidance of double taxation and the prevention of fiscal evasion in the case of estate taxes and succession duties was signed this afternoon, June 8, at 2.45 p.m. Mr. Atherton, the United States Ambassador, signed on behalf of the United States of America; and Mr. Mackenzie King, the Secretary of State for External Affairs, and Mr. Gibson, the Minister of National Revenue, signed for Canada.

The text of the convention will be tabled in parliament, and an explanatory statement will be furnished as soon as arrangements have been completed in Washington for communicating the convention to the senate.

THE WAR

INVASION OF WESTERN EUROPE—CANADIAN PARTICIPATION—PRESENT SITUATION

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): Hon. members will have observed that the Prime Minister of Great Britain has intimated to the British house that he does not think it will be possible for him to make statements from day to day in reference to the progress of the war, that he will have to choose occasions on which particular statements may be made. However, the Prime Minister in Britain is also Minister of Defence and may wish to speak in either or both capacities. I am sure hon. members will be interested in hearing this afternoon from the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Ralston) something about the events of the last few days, giving to the house as much in the way of information as it is possible for him to give, particularly in relation to the progress which has been made by our own forces. As there is no particular place indicated on the order paper for such a statement, if it suits the convenience of the house I suggest that the Minister of National Defence might make a statement immediately.

Hon. J. L. RALSTON (Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, I do not know that there is very much one can add to the press reports, but in view of the welter of official and unofficial news in the press and by radio, I do want to say a word about the various sources of information which we have and also a word as to the present situation.

Many of the reports that we get are from enemy sources and consequently they have to be taken with a good deal of reserve. Their object is not always to inform but frequently with the hope that the allies will give them information by statements correcting these reports. In addition to the enemy sources of information we get official communiques from the supreme allied headquarters which all members see in the newspapers. These are necessarily general in character, and as they are issued only periodically some of the information they contain will already have been released. Then we have press dispatches through the news agencies, the Canadian Press, the Associated Press, the British United Press, and also stories by responsible war correspondents of various agencies and newspapers who are on the ground. While these reports are not official, it can be assumed that they have been passed by the security authorities.

I must say that we have been extremely well served by the dispatches which have appeared in the last few days from all the different sources. At national defence headquarters we get a series of situation reports which show the identity of the troops engaged and the progress made and the positions established. From these we are able to spot the general line which is being occupied. The press and radio provide such speedy facilities that very seldom do we at headquarters have news by way of situation reports or reports from commanders which are earlier in point of time than what is gained from the press or radio. On the other hand there are details which we get in situation reports and reports from commanders which cannot be given for security reasons and are not carried by the press or radio.

The purpose of this explanation is to intimate that there would be very little point in my making announcements in the house unless there were some details affecting particularly Canadian interests which were not carried by the press or radio but which we felt might be announced without prejudice to security.

Since I am speaking I can say this that a careful putting together of the situation reports which have come in in the last twenty-four hours, enables me to tell the house that I am at least not making any over-statement when I say that Canadians are as far forward as any other land troops. We have late news of heavy fighting in one sector in which it is stated that the casualties may be considerable. In two recent messages from the commanders, one pays the highest praise to the magnificence of our troops in the assault and indicates that good progress is being made and that the casualties are moderate. Another speaks particularly of the outstanding bravery and resourcefulness of our men. Speaking generally this news is good. What we here can do is to keep right on with training and dispatching men, shipping equipment and paying the shot. But we can also encourage and support our sailors, soldiers, and airmen by letters, messages and by unfailing interest in their loved ones in Canada, and by our fervent prayers.

We cannot help feeling, speaking of the operation generally, that the most precarious phase for troops in an amphibious operation is passed. The outstanding fact is that they have gained solid ground and are pushing forward. That fills us with a sense of humble thankfulness. I am sure, however, that we are not being lulled into any sense of false security or complacency because this first vital phase has succeeded more quickly and with less cost than we dared expect. These men are facing a strong and desperate enemy. We cannot expect that operations will keep steadily on with the good fortune which has so far attended this one. We must always be prepared for bad news, and perhaps shocking news. In the meantime, these men of ours have our grateful appreciation and our fullest confidence. May they have stout hearts and strong hands for all the perils and difficulties of the great undertaking in which they are engaged. On the other hand may we on our part try to match their heroism, their resolution, and their determination with our unbounded support and our unflagging help and interest.

AVAILABILITY TO MEMBERS OF MAP OF WESTERN INVASION FRONT—CASUALTY LISTS

Mr. E. G. HANSELL (Macleod): Apropos of the statement of the minister may I rise to a question of privilege which I think affects every member of the house? It is not often that hon. members of the opposition hand bouquets to the government, but I wish to tell the Minister of National Defence how much I appreciate something that may not seem tremendously great, but which I think we all appreciate, namely, the announcement we received in the mail yesterday with respect to his decision to have maps placed in room 16 and an intelligence officer from his department in attendance to explain to us the progress that has been made in the invasion. I think these little acts of kindness all go to help make a member's work more pleasant.

While I am on my feet may I also express my appreciation of the decision made by the Minister of National Defence for Air (Mr. Power) some time ago to have his department send to members of parliament casualty lists with respect to the R.C.A.F. May I ask the Minister of National Defence if he would give consideration to sending to members of parliament casualty lists as they affect the army and the Minister of National Defence for Naval Services casualty lists as they affect the navy? They are of tremendous help to hon. members.

Hon. J. L. RALSTON (Minister of National Defence): I thank my hon. friend for his reference to what is being done to inform hon. members; it is the least we can do. I only wish we could do more in that respect. With regard to the matter of casualty lists, that is now under discussion with the records officer and I hope to be able to advise very shortly whether it can be done or not. It is simply a matter of physical arrangement.

QUESTIONS

(Questions answered orally are indicated by an asterisk.)

HOUSING—TORONTO

Mr. CHURCH:

1. Has the government made any proposals to the city of Toronto for the erection of small houses there on the new plan made in relation to housing in Montreal?
2. If so, for how many houses, at what cost, and what is the plan proposed?
3. What reply has been received by the government from the city authorities in relation thereto?
4. When will the houses be built?

Mr. ILSLEY: Under the plan announced by the Minister of Finance on May 11, 1944, for the financing of low-rental housing projects sponsored by limited dividend housing corporations, the government does not make proposals to a municipality. On the other hand, as the announcement indicates, it is willing to assist by making a first mortgage loan at an interest rate of 3 per cent to finance an approved low-rental housing project developed by a group of local public-spirited citizens organized as a limited dividend housing corporation. Such projects are planned by the local group and are taken up with the dominion authorities in order to secure approval of the project and to negotiate the loan.

[Mr. Hansell.]

City of Toronto officials requested information, and the general principles underlying the plan were explained to them. No reply has been received and no proposal for any specific housing project to be developed under this plan has been made to the dominion by the city of Toronto.

R.C.A.F.—BOMBING AND GUNNERY PRACTICE—LAKE ERIE FISHING GROUNDS

2. How much compensation are they paid per year?

4. What area of fishing grounds did each lose for the above purposes?

Mr. MACMILLAN:

1. Compensation is paid to lake Erie fishermen on the basis of the number of nets operated by each.

2. Two hundred dollars per net per year plus one payment of $200 per net towards expenses of reestablishment. The latter payment will be made at the time the fishermen are able to renew their activities.

3. For each of the years 1941, 1942 and 1943, $14,200 was paid to pound net fishermen. A further amount of $1,717.14 was paid in full and final settlement in respect of compensation to gill net fishermen.

4. Information not available as compensation was based on sworn statements lodged by the fishermen with Ontario government showing the annual catch of each pound, variety of fish, selling price as well as the estimated value of equipment used.

2 and 3. Answered by No. 1.

CANADIAN FORCES PERSONNEL—RAILWAY RATES

Mr. CHURCH:

1. Is the government giving consideration to continue negotiations announced to the house last session regarding the reduction of soldier fares by railways and a ceiling for the same for those on weekend leaves from camps while in training in Canada?
2. What has been done in this matter since it was last before the house the past three sessions and what negotiations, if any, have been conducted between the government and the railways since then?
3. Will time be set for the consideration of a bill, No. 6 on the order paper, regarding free soldier fares and railways?

Mr. MACDONALD (Halifax):

1. No consideration is being given at present to negotiating with the railway companies for any further reduction to be met by them over what they are now providing as a concession, i.e.,

(a) Provision of a return ticket for the cost of a single fare any time service personnel are travelling on ordinary leaves, including week-end leaves.

(b) Provision of a return ticket for the cost of a two-thirds of a single fare to service personnel when travelling on annual or embarkation leave; one-third of a single fare is payable by the person travelling up to an amount of $15 and one-third of a single fare is paid by the government, plus the excess of any amount of one-third of a single fare over $15.

2. Arrangements have been made to provide in the case of personnel proceeding on annual or embarkation leave under the arrangements of one-third of a single fare payable by the man, for a ceiling of $15 to be the maximum cost paid by such personnel; the government absorbing in addition to one-third of a single fare any amount in excess of $15 for the one-third of a single fare which was previously paid by the persons travelling on this concession.

The matter of free transportation at government expense for personnel to their homes and return to district depots when granted disembarkation leave on return from overseas is now receiving active consideration.

3. See resolution passed by the house on February 11, 1944, providing for precedence to be given to government notices of motion and government orders until the end of the present session. (Votes and Proceedings No. 12).

The action taken by the house has precluded consideration up to the present of bill No. 6 on the order paper and the question as to when time will be set for its consideration depends on the further action taken by the house.

SELECTIVE SERVICE—TRANSFER OF FARM WORKERS TO INDUSTRY

Mr. MAYHEW:

What steps were taken by the Department of Labour to facilitate the movement of farmers and farm workers into other industries during the winter months of 1943-44?

Mr. MARTIN:

1. An extensive educational and publicity campaign was undertaken early in the fall of 1943 to encourage farmers who could be spared from agriculture to accept work in other essential industries during the winter months. This campaign made clear to farm workers the procedure they were to follow in obtaining employment. In the case of those who were on postponement of military service assurance was given that their postponement would not be affected by accepting such employment provided that they had fulfilled the necessary national selective service mobilization requirements. This educational and publicity campaign included newspaper articles and advertisements, radio broadcasts, posters and a special letter from the director of national selective service to all farmers throughout Canada.

2. In addition to the above publicity conducted by the Department of Labour, the cooperation of interested provincial departments and industries was secured in publicity specially adapted to meet the specialized needs for labour across Canada during the winter months.

3. Under the dominion-provincial farm labour agreements all of the provinces made available members of their provincial field staffs to assist in recruiting farm workers who could be spared from agriculture during the winter months. With the assistance of these officials and of members of local agricultural production committees, not only were the essential needs of agriculture protected, but those who could be spared during the winter months were recruited for other high priority employment.

4. In some of the less commercialized districts where farm labour needs were less acute, certain high priority industries were permitted to employ canvassers under the direction of national selective service to recruit workers.

5. Through an arrangement with the national film board representatives of national selective service attended showings of films on the rural circuits in several of the provinces. On these occasions the needs of other essential industries were made known and farm workers, who could be spared, were recruited to help meet them.

OFFICERS SURVEY AND CLASSIFICATION BOARDS

Mr. POULIOT:

1. When was the overseas service control board formed?
2. How many officers have been recommended for overseas service by that board?

Mr. MACDONALD (Halifax):

No such board exists. On the assumption that the officers survey and classification boards are meant the information is as follows:

1. October 1, 1943.

2. It is not the function of such boards to recommend officers for overseas service.

There are six such boards assigned to definite areas covering Canada and Newfoundland, and each board is responsible for the survey and classification of all officers within its respective area. Eventually every officer will appear before one of these boards in order that he may be appraised and that a recommendation may be submitted as to his suitability to retain present employment—for reallocation if his services can be utilized to better advantage elsewhere—or for his return to civilian status.

VETERAN'S LAND ACT

Mr. CRUICKSHANK:

1. Is the Veterans' Land Act in force?
2. Are discharged veterans of the present war allowed to purchase land under this act?
3. If not, why not?
4. If the act is not in force at present, when will it become operative?

Mr. CRERAR:

1. Yes.

2. Yes. Discharged veterans certified as qualified under the act and regulations are assisted to purchase land. Farm machinery is in very short supply and a similar situation prevails with respect to building materials. Present administrative policy restricts establishments at this stage of the war to disabled veterans and to others in exceptional circumstances.

3 and 4. Answered by 1 and 2.
