Mr. COLDWELL: That kind of thing has to stop, and what I fear in this bill is that we have another paper organization which will not do anything about it. On behalf of those associated with me, Mr. Speaker, I want to say that there is no possibility of full employment; there is no possibility of doing what I believe the Prime Minister wishes to do, and at the some time maintain the profit and free enterprise system. To-night we have heard a great deal about New Zealand from my hon. friends to my left. The hon. member for Essex East knows what that country has done. He knows that the gentleman who was made president of the I.L.O., Mr. Nash, was elected largely as an appreciation not only of what he had done but also of the leadership his little country has given in the realm of social and economic reform.

Mr. MARTIN: But it is not a socialist government; it is not a government of socialism.

Mr. COLDWELL: Is it not? It is a socialist government, and you cannot tell Mr. Nash that it is not. Of course it is a democratic socialist government, just as we ourselves believe in democratic socialism. Do not tell the New Zealanders that they are not socialists; they simply will not believe you. Therefore, Mr. Speaker, I say that this falls far short of what is expected of the government at this time. I should like to see a plan produced under which we could use this $800,000,000 worth of machines and equipment for which this nation has paid during the war. I should like to see a thorough attempt made to develop the resources of this country, and to prepare plans for their development in the public interest.

Why, when we look across this country to-day and see what is waiting to be done, and no plans to do it—

Mr. MARTIN: That is not true.

Mr. COLDWELL: Yes, it is true.

Mr. MARTIN: It is not.

Mr. COLDWELL: Yes, it is true. Can you tell me of one plan for highways, or to irrigate, or to electrify the country, or for farm homes?

Mr. MARTIN: Hundreds of plans.

Mr. COLDWELL: Just one plan; have you one plan?

Mr. MARTIN: Yes.

Mr. COLDWELL: You have not one plan to do it—not one plan.

Mr. MARTIN: Surely the hon. member—

Mr. COLDWELL: You made your speech; I am making mine. I say the government has not one plan to develop any of these resources.

Mr. MARTIN: And I say that is not true.

Mr. COLDWELL: The only two things up to the present time that are offered to the country are a land settlement scheme—

Mr. MARTIN: No.

Mr. COLDWELL: A land settlement scheme for returned veterans, with an amount of money entirely insufficient to establish young men on the farms, and the other thing is an educational plan. It is an educational plan which I welcome, and I endorse it at the present time. It is not enough to educate our young men; it is not enough to give them technical training. What are they to do when they have had their technical training? Are they to be dependent upon some employer who will say whether they will employ them at a profit, or not? Are they to be dependent upon corporations, as to whether those corporations will employ them or not—and only if they can make a profit out of their labour?

Mr. DUPUIS: They surely do not wish to be regimented.

Mr. COLDWELL: The hon. member for Essex East said a moment ago that the controls which had been put on by the government would be maintained. Is that the kind of regimentation he is talking about?

Mr. MARTIN: I did not say that.

Mr. COLDWELL: Not the kind of controls that we have to-day.

Mr. MARTIN: I did not say that.

Mr. COLDWELL: The hon. member said "controls".

Mr. MARTIN: Does the hon. member wish me to say what I did say?

Mr. COLDWELL: To maintain the controls that we have, as long as necessary.

Mr. MARTIN: Does the hon. member wish me to say what I did say? When I was speaking he was going in and out, back and forth.

Mr. COLDWELL: No, I was not going in and out, and back and forth. I came in from behind the curtains, and sat in my seat.

Mr. MARTIN: I misunderstood my hon. friend, then.

Mr. COLDWELL: Yes, you misunderstood.

Mr. MARTIN: I was suffering from an illusion.

Mr. COLDWELL: That is quite frequent.

Mr. MARTIN: What I did say was that we were not tied to any labels, and that we recognized the need in this day of making great changes in our society.

Mr. COLDWELL: What did the hon. member say about controls?

[Mr. Martin.]

Mr. MARTIN: That in order to effect those changes it would be necessary to have a system of public investment in private enterprise, with private initiative, and I wished the government to maintain a measure of control by which that could be sustained.

Mr. COLDWELL: My hon. friend, like many others, referred to control as regimentation.

Mr. MARTIN: I did not even mention the word "regimentation".

Mr. COLDWELL: No, I know the hon. member did not. But that is the interpretation placed upon the controls. People across this country are criticizing these controls. If we are to have controls—and undoubtedly we shall have to have some controls—let them be democratic controls, not the controls of the kind we have to-day, with dollar a year men at the top assuming the responsibility in connection with these controls, men appointed by order in council. Let us have controls through the democratic organization of the people's representatives. That is something we do not have have to-day.

Mr. DUPUIS: That is our policy.

Mr. COLDWELL: But, sir, what I really rose to say was this, that in spite of all the fine words we have heard—and we have heard them before; we heard them in war time before, and we heard them for a second time to-night—we want to see some action. We want action, rather than words. If there is no action, then we face a period of great difficulty. We face a period of chaos.

I do not wish to see chaos. Rather, I wish to see orderly progress. But that kind of policy which the government has pursued in the past, and is pursuing to-day, does not give me much hope that we shall emerge into an era of peace within our country, or an era of prosperity for the common man. Therefore, Mr. Speaker, I hope that the government in setting up this department will go far beyond what they are prepared to go to-night, and will see to it that the great enterprises which we have built up during this war for the people of Canada are preserved and are used by the nation to give opportunities of life and of work to the great masses of people in this country.

Mr. ADAMSON: I did not wish to interrupt the hon. member when he was speaking. However, he did make reference to a plan. I would point out that there has been a major plan in connection with complete town planning for Toronto. I know the town planning organization has worked on it for three years, and it has been accepted, and is on view in Toronto.

Mr. COLDWELL: I was thinking of a plan for the whole country. A plan for all Canada would be more fitting than that. However, I do appreciate, of course, what Toronto has done.

Mr. B. M. HILL (Charlotte): Mr. Speaker, my point of view with respect to this bill is different from that expressed by most hon. members to whom I have listened to-night. I took a great deal of interest in many of the proposals presented to the parliamentary committee on reconstruction, and while I found many of them were provincial in character, a large number were national in scope.

Those briefs presented by provincial governments, which had been prepared by departments of public works, departments of agriculture and departments of lands, mines and forests in the provinces, were national in outlook. Also the briefs prepared and presented by the associations of engineers and architects were national in their outlook.

To-day we have heard hon. members discuss labour problems in connection with this bill. However, I believe that discussion might better be had under the Department of Labour than under the Department of Reconstruction. We have heard the statement that the prosperity of the country depends upon the prosperity of the primary industries. That is true. However, that has been taken care of by a guarantee of a price floor on products of the farms and fisheries.

One hon. member mentioned that the success of our country after the war depends upon our exports. Here again, in my view this depends upon the Department of Trade and Commerce. As I view the bill, it would be my opinion that it should have been called, "An Act to Establish a Department of Re-establishment and National Development." I have hopes that this new department will develop into a department of national development.

It appears to me that the development of Canada, so far as national development by the federal government is concerned, stopped about thirty years ago with the completion of the railways and canals construction in the country. I feel that the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) should appoint an able man at the head of this new department, one who has a wide national outlook. He should have as his assistant an able man to plan what should be done by the departments. In my view, plans should be prepared for a wide national development. In the first place, I feel that we need several more transcontinental highways, running from coast to coast, and I believe that it is the duty of the national government to provide them. This should be completed in the interests of the devolpment of this country. Lateral highways paralleling the Alaska highway should be extended to the north for the development of all that section in the west, because it certainly cannot be regarded as a provincial obligation. Then there are the flood controls of our great rivers. We have just had a report of a disastrous flood in the northwest territories. This danger will increase as the country becomes more settled, until the yearly damage will run into millions of dollars. In the United States, where more development has taken place, flood damage every year amounts to billions of dollars. The problem is a national one and should be dealt with by this department from the viewpoint of national development.

There is also the matter of protecting our forests. Our federal government derives large amounts of revenue from forests in the various provinces, and it is in duty bound to assist, by building roads and patrolling, to provide fire protection in all the forest areas. The development of our airways must also be undertaken.

As I visualize this department, it will be a permanent organization and over the years will spend billions of dollars on national development. I look upon it as providing the means in conjunction with the Bank of Canada to control and stabilize national income and national employment. If a scheme is prepared envisaging expenditures upon development to the extent of several billions of dollars over the next few years, then, as private enterprise is unable to provide employment, the wheels of progress can be put into action by this development to give employment and raise the national income. So long as private enterprise is able through the demand for its products to stabilize the national income, the department's work can be tapered off; when the demand for the products of private enterprise diminishes, this department can take up the slack by proceeding with a great programme of national development. The one thing necessary is that the minister as the head of the department shall not lose sight of the object for which it is created and must not go on with his development programme when full employment is otherwise available and provided.

Immediately after the war, I assume, the piled-up demand for civilian goods will allow private enterprise to supply all the employment which is called for in the early years.

When that demand is satisfied the department must come in and take up the slack and build up the national income, and do it on a uniform basis. If, as I have said, the department is properly administered it can, along with the Bank of Canada, iron out the high spots in our national economy and smooth out the low spots, so as to maintain a good average national income with steady employment. If whoever is in charge of this department takes that point of view he will have an opportunity of taking care of any depression which we may run into immediately after the war, and, indeed, for many years afterwards, and can foster, over the years, a steady progress which will protect us against periods of depression and avoid periods of excessive employment.

I would urge upon the Prime Minister that this department be established as soon as possible. We know to-day that with the impact of mechanized equipment, powerful armies fade away in a very short time. This war may come to an end very quickly through the collapse of the German army, and we shall then need this department to take care of the difficulties in the immediate post-war period. Unless whoever takes charge has at least six or eight months in which to prepare his plans and to gather around him an able body of administrative assistants, we shall again be facing what we were confronted with in the first year of the war, when we were not at all prepared, and floundered around without getting any results.

Mr. G. E. WOOD (Brant): It was not my intention to speak on this matter to-night, but I have been prompted to do so because of what has been said by some hon. members with regard to the setting up of this new department. I should first like to draw the attention of the house to the comment made by the leader of the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation (Mr. Coldwell) in trying to chastise the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) for having been somewhat slow and cautious in bringing down these reforms. I think I have heard speakers of the C.C.F. admit, in exposing their particular philosophy, that it will be some time before they will be able to implement their "pie in the sky" for the people of Canada. After all, even twenty years is not long in the lifetime of a nation, and far more progress has been made in this country under the leadership of our present Prime Minister in the matter of advanced social legislation than has been made in any previous time; also it will compare favourably with that of any other country.

In passing, I would suggest that we try to get a proper perspective in relation to some of the arguments of the C.C.F., because if we take them in their literal sense they are somewhat misleading. The leader of their party to-night was emphasizing the advanced position of New Zealand in social legislation. It depends upon what measuring stick we apply to advancement. I do not believe Canada needs to take second place to New Zealand as regards high standards of living. I have acquaintances in New Zealand and have asked them about this, and I know that their standard of living is not comparable with that of Canadians.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: From the health point of view?

Mr. WOOD: I am not in a position to tell you how many automobiles there are in New Zealand. I have the record in my desk.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: Have you the health record?

Mr. WOOD: I know, speaking of Canada, that in Ontario, every fifth person drives either a truck or an automobile. You could load on these vehicles every person in the province, and you would need to put only five in each vehicle and they could all get out in one procession.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: It might be a good idea.

Mr. WOOD: I believe that to get the same result in New Zealand you would have to put twenty-one persons in each car. Of course it does not follow that the automobile is the only measuring rod of standards of living, but undoubtedly it indicates the purchasing power of a nation, because it is a product which is highly desirable and much in demand.

I should like to commend to the hon. member for Cape Breton South (Mr. Gillis), who wants to bring about fundamental changes, the good old book. Perhaps the best politician in the Bible is King Solomon, whose wisdom is shown in the Proverbs. The Proverbs show that the people of those days experienced some of the same difficulties that we do. I do not look with such misgivings upon this new world so long as we have human beings in it because, in spite of all our difficulties, we have registered a great deal of progress already.

I am one of those who may be considered to have been born in the horse-and-buggy days, but I should like to say that there are some things in regard to reconstruction which it would be well for us to keep in mind. An old philosopher once said that it may be a good thing to have what money can buy, but that it is a tragedy to lack what money cannot buy. There are many things in this life to contribute to the happiness of people which money cannot buy, if we will only get the right philosophy and the right spirit.

The Prime Minister in his introductory remarks this afternoon said that the government had been successful in enlisting the cooperation of many organizations and of many governments and getting their advice in regard to our reconstruction programme. But I still believe that he overlooked one thing, namely, the spiritual life of our country. Much as I commend the chairman of the reconstruction committee I sometimes wondered if it would not have been better to have before that committee some of the leaders in the spiritual life of our country, to see if they were not in a position to make some contribution to the happiness of society. That is one of the things that should not be overlooked.

I have said that I was born in the horse-and-buggy days when the kerosene lamp was the light of the home and the rag carpet adorned the living room floor, when we had three square meals a day and gave thanks to the Almighty for them. The day's work was preceded by reading a chapter of the Scriptures, followed by a supplication to the Almighty for guidance and direction during the day. I would say to my hon. friends of the C.C.F. that when that supplication was made to the Almighty we always gave thanks for the things we had and were not continually asking for more. I commend that to my hon. friends of the C.C.F., who are feeling more enthusiastic to-day than they did a few short days ago. I would commend that philosophy not only to them but even to the other members of this house. Those were the days in which the mother contributed to the family life and when the whole family would gather around the hearthstone at night. Those were really happy days. I was not brought up to be idle. Idleness was not forced on me. At sixteen years of age I had to do my chores and contribute to the family larder in my own small way. I am not so sure that the hon. member for Jasper-Edson (Mr. Kuhl) made any impression on me by his argument that a living can be made by working only four hours a day and only four days a week. I wonder what would happen to my poor old cows under that system. What kind of cow can he invent that will go three days without milking? These things run through my mind when I hear that particular philosophy expounded by the C.C.F. across the way.

I read an article in the Globe and Mail recently about a man by the name of Krugg who said that if a dollar had been invested at the birth of Christ it would be worth so many billions of dollars to-day by virtue of compound interest and to expend the proceeds we would all have to buy 1,500 Ford cars a year. That is the sort of thing that happens when a man goes all out for mathematics and theory without using common sense. My hon. friends over there have the advantage of a great deal of education, but if I did not have an education myself I would far rather have common sense. You can make any kind of argument on theory. But we have to face facts. I rather enjoyed the attitude which the Prime Minister took when he said that in all this reconstruction expenditure the money must not be expended just for the sake of making work but that we want some results from it. I think the money ought to be expended cautiously so that it will finally bring returns.

When the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell) was condemning the capitalistic system I wondered if he thought of the extremely high standard of living which we enjoy under the capitalistic system. Perhaps we have not gone as far as some would like us to go, but we have gone far from the days of the kerosene lamp until to-day when by pushing a button my whole home is filled with light from Niagara falls. To-day we have radios in our homes. Can the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar tell us how many radios there are in New Zealand? He will find that there are only about half the number there that there are in Canada in proportion to population. We can hear the greatest celebrities on the radio in our homes to-day, and it is always a pleasure to hear our Prime Minister while we are sitting around our own hearthstone. This has been brought about under the capitalistic system and I would commend that to the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar. It is all right for him to argue his philosophy, but it has never been tried out, and if he ever happens to try it out, I should like to have an opportunity of sitting in opposition ten years afterwards and reminding him of some of the great and glorious promises he is making to the people of Canada to-day and of showing the horrible disappointments that had come during his regime.

We may not have all the social security measures that New Zealand has, but we do have wages. Our labouring men are enjoying the highest wages that were ever paid in the history of Canada, and by virtue of that we are having to-day an outbreak of what I call Toryism among the working classes. You make a man wealthy and immediately he becomes a Tory. The labour men to-day are organizing in this country as they never did before and are exerting their influence in politics. It is only another form of Toryism. The Liberal party has always taken the middle of the road course by trying to give to the middle classes the satisfactions of life, and they have been successful. They went down to defeat on reciprocity in 1911, in trying to give to the farmers a market for their products, and went down to defeat again in 1930 when they were fighting against high tariffs and a restricted trade policy. We told the country what would happen if those policies were put into effect and exactly what we prophesied came to pass. I assure hon. gentlemen that the middle of the road course is the course that the people of Canada want to take. If they experiment again as they have done in the past they will experiment only to their sorrow and they will come back to the middle of the road course. The Canadian people are not socialists but individualists. They come in the main from pioneers who never asked governments for help, but who were prepared to stand on their own feet. This country has been developed on the principle of free enterprise. It has been developed under what the hon. member sees fit to brand as the capitalistic system, but I challenge him to show any other system that would have registered in the last twenty-five years any achievements parallel to the progress registered under that system.

I should like to have spoken longer, Mr. Speaker, but I have purposely refrained from making some comments on this bill which I thought of putting before the house. However, when the bill is in committee there are one or two things which I shall take occasion then to say.

On motion of Mr. Claxton the debate was adjourned.

It being five minutes after eleven o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

Wednesday, June 21, 1944

The house met at three o'clock.

AERONAUTICS ACT

CIVIL AVIATION AND COMMERCIAL AIR SERVICES—AIR TRANSPORT BOARD

The house resumed from Monday, June 19, consideration in committee of bill No. 133, to amend the Aeronautics Act—Mr. Michaud—Mr. Bradette in the chair.

On section 1—New heading inserted.

Mr. GREEN: This bill is described as an act to amend the Aeronautics Act. In fact the bill contains the domestic policy of the government with respect to civil aviation, not only for the remaining years of the war but also, and primarily, for the years that follow; therefore it puts into effect a permanent air policy for Canada. Once that policy is instituted it will be difficult and costly to change. I believe that the policy will have to be changed, and to-day I propose to point out in what respects it is ill-advised. I suggest to the members of the committee, to the press of Canada and also to the people of Canada, that they scrutinize this bill very carefully before it is put on the statute book.

In the first place the policy is ill-advised in that it makes a minister a dictator of civil aviation in Canada. I say that for several reasons. The bill amends the Aeronautics Act. Under that act wide and drastic powers are given to the minister named therein. The Aeronautics Act is chapter 3 of the revised statutes of 1927. It was passed just after the last war, at a time when we were just beginning to find out things about civil aviation. I do not propose to read any portions to the committee to-day, but as it originally stood the minister referred to was the Minister of National Defence; the act was to be administered by the defence department and it refers to various things having to do with military aviation. But I think that the powers as they stood in the original act are much too drastic for present conditions. Yet all these powers are now to go to the minister who becomes the dictator of civil aviation of Canada. He is to have all these powers except one; he is not to do the actual licensing of flying lines; that power is given to the new air transport board.

Another reason why I suggest a minister is being made a dictator is that under this measure he is being given even further powers. For example, sections 9 and 10 of the bill give the minister power to order the making of very broad investigations with regard to airways; of course the new air transport board is authorized to make those investigations for him.

A third reason why I think the bill gives powers that are too dictatorial is that at the present time the board of transport commissioners licenses all commercial flying services. I hold in my hand the report of the board for the calendar year 1943. Hon. members will find at page 10 this statement with regard to air transportation licences:

> Eight applications for new licences were granted and nine licences were surrendered for cancellation. At December 31, 1943, a total of sixty-five licences were in force, composed of nine international between Canada and the United States, six interurban in Canada and fifty bush services in northern Canada.

All these licences have been issued by the board of transport commissioners. Under the new bill, however, licences are to be issued by the air transport board. That is provided in section 12 (1) but—and this is a very important point—the issuing of any licence is expressly made subject to the approval of the minister. In other words the new board cannot issue a licence without the approval of the minister in person.

Finally subsections 8 and 10 of the same section provide that in certain cases there may be an appeal from the new board to the minister. At present there is an appeal from the board of transport commissioners to the Supreme Court of Canada on questions of law, a proper judicial appeal, and then of course to the privy council. In addition the cabinet, described as the governor in council, have power to review any decision of the board of transport commissioners. That is all changed now; that is all done away with in the case of aviation. The appeal now is to the minister in person.

So I say that in effect this bill makes a minister of the crown the dictator of civil aviation in Canada; and while the bill mentions the Minister of Transport as the new dictator, in section 2 it goes on to say:

> . . . or such other minister as the governor in council may from time to time designate. . . .

Well, the other night the Minister of Munitions and Supply explained to us that this new dictator is not to be the Minister of Transport but is to be the Minister of Munitions and Supply himself. He gave some reasons for that, but in effect the Minister of Transport is being by-passed and these dictatorial powers are being given to the Minister of Munitions and Supply. On June 6 I asked the minister a question in that connection; it will be found at page 3601 of Hansard, as follows:

> In effect it makes the minister a dictator in respect of all the airways in Canada, does it not?

The minister gave a very significant reply:

> Perhaps so; but who would you suggest should be dictator?

Then I said:

> I do not think there should be a dictator, myself.

So that I say this bill is ill-advised, in the first place because it makes the Minister of Munitions and Supply or some other minister the dictator of civil aviation in Canada.

Then it is ill-advised in that with its twin, bill No. 101, which is described as an act to amend the Transport Act, it takes away all the jurisdiction of the Board of Transport Commissioners of Canada over civil aviation. In other words it removes the protection the Canadian people now have in respect of one of the principal methods of transportation, by virtue of the powers of this independent board of transport commissioners, functioning on a judicial basis. That protection now is being taken away from the Canadian people in respect of aviation.

The board of transport commissioners is not perfect. As hon. members know, formerly it was called the board of railway commissioners, and on the whole it has done a pretty good job for the Canadian people. It has held sittings in all parts of Canada. I know we in British Columbia found it a very good thing to have this dominion board come out and actually hear witnesses and get our side of the story, instead of sitting here in Ottawa ruling on something only half understood, three thousand miles away from the Pacific coast. In many cases the board of railway commissioners has been a protection to the people of British Columbia and, I suggest, to the people of the maritimes as well, those of us who are farthest away from the centre of things here in Ottawa. The board has built up a good name for itself; it has a good standing with the Canadian people. The way it works is well understood, and by and large I think it has given satisfaction. In 1938 it was renamed the board of transport commissioners. Hon. members will find the change made in the Transport Act, which is chapter 53 of the statutes of 1938. That act sets out the principles on which the board is to function. For example, section 5 reads:

> Before any application for a licence is granted for the transport of goods and/or passengers under the provisions of this act, the board shall determine whether public convenience and necessity require such transport, and in so determining the board may take into consideration, inter alia—

Then it goes on to point out all the things the commissioners have to consider:

> (a) any objection to the application which may be made by any person or persons who are already providing transport facilities, whether by rail, water or air, on the routes or between the places which the applicant intends to serve on the ground that suitable facilities are or, if the licence were issued, would be in excess of requirements, or on the ground that any of the conditions of any other transport licence held by the applicant have not been complied with;

There is no such provision in the new bill. This new air transport board is not subject to any direction such as I have read from the present Transport Act. Then paragraph (b) reads:

(b) whether or not the issue of such licence would tend to develop the complementary rather than the competitive functions of the different forms of transport, if any, involved in such objections;

In other words the board had to try to make transport services complementary. There is no such direction contained in the present bill. This new air transport board is virtually given carte blanche to do what it pleases. Then paragraphs (c) and (d) read:

(c) the general effect on other transport services and any public interest which may be affected by the issue of such licence;

(d) the quality and permanence of the service to be offered by the applicant and his financial responsibility, including adequate provision for the protection of passengers, shippers and the general public by means of insurance.

What we have now under the Transport Act is an independent board, which cannot be shoved around by any government or any minister. Perhaps that is one of the reasons that the control of civil aviation is being taken away from that board. Just about a year ago a decision was rendered in connection with air transport between Victoria and Vancouver. Canadian Pacific Air Lines had a passenger service already operating, and the board refused to allow Trans-Canada to put in another duplicating service. That decision may or may not have been right, but in any event it was reached by the board of transport commissioners after a fair hearing of all parties concerned, and I suggest that is the sort of procedure we should have in Canada. I have here the proceedings of the standing committee on railways and shipping for Monday, March 27, 1944, in which this very hearing was mentioned by Mr. Symington, president of Trans-Canada Air Lines, who said at page 21:

The situation under the present law is that the board of transport commissioners decide on public necessity and convenience, and they said that in their judgment the passenger service was sufficiently served by the Canadian Pacific Air Lines and that therefore they would only grant us the mail privilege in so far as that local traffic was concerned. That was the finding of the board.

Mr. Symington said elsewhere in these proceedings that in his opinion that decision had been reached after a fair hearing.

But this bill sets up a new air transport board. Once it becomes law we shall have two boards, the board of transport commissioners, dealing with other forms of transportation services, and the air transport board, dealing with air transportation. The minister himself admitted that the functions of the two boards were different. I asked him a question in that connection on June 6. Those questions and answers are reported as follows at page 3604 of Hansard:

Mr. Green: In other words, the air transport board is to be directly under the minister?

Mr. Howe: Correct.

Mr. Green: The minister said that that, as I understand it, was not the position of the board of transport commissioners.

Mr. Howe: That is correct, yes. The board of transport commissioners is a judicial body equivalent to a court, and its duty is to administer an act. That board has no function beyond the administration of the act—a wholly judicial function. This is a board which is both judicial and advisory.

Which, I submit, is trying to place this new board on both sides of the fence at once. No provision is contained in bill 133 for the exercising of judicial discretion by the new board. No provision is contained against discrimination. There is no provision for having hearings at which other interested parties may appear. I submit, Mr. Chairman, that this new air transport board cannot be a judicial body. I repeat, therefore, that my second objection to the bill is that it removes from the Canadian people the protection they now have in the form of an independent board with jurisdiction over a vital method of transportation in Canada.

The bill is ill advised also in that the powers given to the new board are too drastic. For example, section 13 of the bill gives the board this power:

The board shall review all licences respecting commercial air services issued under part III of the Transport Act, 1938, or under part VII of the Air Regulations, 1938, prior to and in force at the time of the coming into force of this part, and may cancel or suspend any such licence as it sees fit.

That is directly opposed to the procedure followed in 1938 when the Transport Act was passed. Section 5 of that act protected a licencee who had obtained a licence, before the new act was passed.

Then, in subsection 7 of section 12 we find that this new board may issue licences differing from the licences applied for. That is another very wide power. In section 11 it is given very wide powers to make regulations. In section 14 further dictatorial powers are given. True, they are in the shape of directions to the board. The section reads as follows:

Every licence issued under part III of the Transport Act, 1938, or under part VII of the Air Regulations, 1938, prior to and in force at the time of the coming into force of this part shall be deemed to be a licence issued under section 12 of this act, but every such licence, if not cancelled or suspended by the board under section 13 of this act—

Which I have just read.

—shall cease to be valid on or after the termination, as fixed by order in council, of the war in Europe which commenced on the 10th day of September, 1939.

Mr. HOWE: There is a rather important misprint in the bill, which I believe I should call to the attention of the committee. The expression "on or after" should be "one year after".

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): That does not alter the sense of it.

Mr. GREEN: It just postpones the hanging for one year. I say the principle of automatically cancelling all those licences is dead wrong.

This brings me to my fourth objection to the bill. I say it is ill-advised in that it provides that no licence to operate a commercial air service can be issued to any person or any company engaged in transport by means other than aircraft. That provision is contained in section 12(2), which reads:

No such licence shall be issued in respect of a commercial air service, owned, leased, controlled or operated by any person who is engaged in the transport of goods or passengers for hire or reward by means other than aircraft unless—

And here is a peculiar proviso which gives the government wide powers by virtue of which it can play favourites in this business—

—unless the governor in council is of opinion that it is in the public interest that such licence be issued.

That means that no license can be issued, either to a railway company or to a shipping, bus or trucking company. It cannot be issued to any person or corporation engaged in any other type of transportation. That, again, is a complete about face since 1938, when the minister—the same minister—introduced the Transport Act. Section 3(2) of the Transport Act expressly states that the board of transport commissioners are to try to make all means of transportation in Canada complementary. The section reads as follows:

It shall be the duty of the board to perform the functions vested in the board by this act and by the Railway Act with the object of coordinating and harmonizing the operations of all carriers engaged in transport by railways, ships and aircraft and the board shall give to this act and to the Railway Act such fair interpretation as will best attain the object aforesaid.

Air transport is now to be divorced completely from all other forms of transportation. In that connection one might well ask the question: How are these two boards going to get along together? One board is dealing with railways and shipping and the other deals with air transportation. How are they going to coordinate? Here is the minister's formula for that difficulty, as it is found at page 2192 of Hansard. He was asked that question, and replied:

I presume if there is any serious interference between rail and air traffic, the two boards can compare notes and work out their problems jointly. There will be no super-board coordinating all traffic.

That is the extent of coordination and harmonizing that there will be, once this bill becomes law.

In a statement on civil aviation, made some weeks ago, the minister said very frankly that his policy was to put all transport companies out of the air business. That means that Canadian National Railways is going to be right out of Trans-Canada Air Lines. The railway company has done a splendid job of operating Trans-Canada Air Lines; in my opinion the coast-to-coast service is excellent. Yet we are told that now the Canadian National Railways and Trans-Canada Air Lines are to be separated. Then, too, Canadian Pacific Air Lines is to be taken away from the Canadian Pacific Railway; by the act the railway company will have to divest itself of its air lines—air lines which were developed following an announcement of government policy. Here we have a sudden right-about-face in government policy. Both these lines have been built up over a period of years, and I think in both the Trans-Canada and the Canadian Pacific Air Lines we have had efficient operation. There are many communities which depend upon these air services. For example, there is the service from Vancouver to the Yukon, which is flown by Canadian Pacific Air Lines. Then there is the service up into the Mackenzie river, also flown by Canadian Pacific Air Lines. There is the service from Montreal to Quebec, down to the Saguenay and along the north shore of the St. Lawrence, also flown by Canadian Pacific Air Lines. They give good and efficient service, and the people in those communities are entitled to the certainty of continued good service.

Take the service from Vancouver to the Yukon. We do not propose to sit back and see that line wiped out and replaced with perhaps inefficient service because the government or the Minister of Munitions and Supply decides upon a new policy. That is not fair to the people served by that air line. Either the Trans-Canada will have to take it over and render efficient service, or some other provision will have to be made. The minister referred to the Mackenzie river service the other day. He was asked whether it was the intention to have Trans-Canada fly that service, and at page 2191 of Hansard he gave this answer:

> . . . at the moment there is no route down the Mackenzie river, and it is not the intention of Trans-Canada to operate a service in that area.

These operations from Vancouver to the Yukon, along the Mackenzie river and down the St. Lawrence river are not the type of service referred to by the minister as being small operations; nor are they taxi services, as the leader of the C.C.F. called small operations the other day. They do not come under that category. Yet the minister has said that only small operations will be tolerated in Canada.

Mr. HOWE: I never said that.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): That is the effect of it.

Mr. GREEN: The minister is reported on page 1573 of Hansard as follows:

> The government believes that feeder line operations, and pioneer lines into our northland, can best be developed as small operations.

Mr. HOWE: Developed.

Mr. GREEN: We will take it as "developed."

Mr. HOWE: The Mackenzie river service was developed privately as a small enterprise.

Mr. GREEN: It has grown beyond that stage. The air service from Vancouver to the Yukon has grown far beyond that, and much better service is being given now than was given under that scheme.

Mr. HOWE: I said they would be developed as small enterprises. If they grow into large enterprises, so much the better.

Mr. GREEN: The effect of government policy is to discourage all expansion, because a small operator would have no certainty of his position in the future. If he grows too large, or if the minister does not like the way he is doing business, or thinks that he is getting too big or giving competition, then he will just be snuffed out or taken over. That certainly is no way to build up air lines in Canada. In effect under this government policy there is a sword hanging over the head of every small operator of an air route.

Mr. HOWE: Name the small operators.

Mr. GREEN: There will be many small operators as soon as the war is over, as soon as gold mining opens up.

Mr. HOWE: A sword is not hanging over their heads; they are not in existence.

Mr. GREEN: If they develop at all a sword will be hanging over their heads. The leader of the C.C.F. expressed his point of view on this bill very clearly the other day when it was up for discussion. At page 3963 of Hansard he is reported as having used these words:

> I have no doubt that even if people do succeed in setting up privately owned airways in this country and elsewhere it will be only a short time before governments will be compelled to take them over and operate them as great public transportation systems. So that in order to avoid the difficulties which otherwise are bound to arise in the future let us establish now our own publicly owned and publicly operated airways system.

If the C.C.F. get into power all airways will be acquired by the government. They are entitled to that opinion, but we think they are wrong. By bringing in this air policy the ministry are simply playing into the hands of the C.C.F. They are travelling along exactly the same lines, and I suggest to hon. members who are supporters of the government that they read bill No. 133 carefully before they support it in this house.

Finally the bill provides that the government may subsidize air operations. Section 16 reads:

> The governor in council may authorize the minister to enter into a contract with any air carrier for the grant of such assistance, financial or otherwise, as may be specified by the governor in council payable out of moneys to be appropriated by parliament for that purpose.

In other words, power is being given to the minister, subject of course to the governor in council—

Mr. HOWE: And to parliament.

Mr. GREEN: It does not say that; it says "governor in council".

Mr. HOWE: It says "appropriated by parliament for that purpose".

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): All money has to be appropriated.

Mr. GREEN: That is the old alibi, but actually it can be done without parliament being here at all. The governor in council merely has to approve the actions of the minister. That means that any favourite of the government may obtain a subsidy. When the Industrial Development bank bill was under debate it was suggested that it be used to help in the financing of these airways. Why cannot it be done in that way? Why cannot these air operators get their financial assistance, the same as anyone else, from the Industrial Development bank instead of the cabinet taking power to grant subsidies to these companies?

I submit that this bill is ill advised in these five respects. I think some other steps should be taken. I have no objections to there being drastic control; it may be that there should be proper controls to prevent lines from being brought together unduly, from being built up, from being amalgamated, but certainly this bill goes much too far. It is a tragedy. Canada should encourage the building up and the expanding of air traffic. We need a bold air policy, and the policy under this bill is not a bold policy; it is a step backward.

Young Canadians are gaining a name for themselves as airmen in this war, just as they did in the last war. The commonwealth air training plan has been conducted with such success in Canada. Before the war we had a remarkable development of flying into the north country. This country should lead in the development of air routes. We should develop every single agency, Trans-Canada, Canadian Pacific and any other operation, instead of trying to throttle civil aviation in Canada with such a bill as this.

Mr. HOWE: This debate has taken an extraordinary turn in producing contradictory debate. First we had it from the hon. member for Lake Centre (Mr. Diefenbaker) as well as from the hon. member for Vancouver South (Mr. Green) that the government is being made a dictator of policy.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): The minister.

Mr. HOWE: All right, the minister; but the minister is a part of the government and therefore the government is involved.

May I point out that the alternative is to set up a bureaucracy, and the hon. member for Lake Centre spent ten minutes the other night denouncing bureaucracies. Someone must have the responsibility for issuing franchises for air lines, and ever since confederation the government has taken responsibility in the matter of issuing franchises for every type of transportation. It has granted railway franchises—

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): No. Parliament did, not the government.

Mr. HOWE: The government of the day makes the recommendation.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): The company proceeds to get a charter by way of a private bill, asking for the right to go on, and parliament decides. Can the minister not distinguish between the two?

Mr. HOWE: I do not know that there is a great deal of difference.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I agree, but there used to be a difference.

Mr. HOWE: The purpose of this bill is that the government of the day shall be responsible for the administration of Canada's air policy. I believe that that is a sound principle, and I am astonished that there is not general agreement on that point. The Aeronautics Act, which is being amended, went even farther in centralizing authority, because the minister had the sole authority under that act for the granting of licences.

Mr. GREEN: But that was taken away by the Transport Act.

Mr. HOWE: Yes, in certain particulars, in 1938, and I am coming to that. I will admit at once that the minister is the authority in policy matters, and through him the government of the day takes responsibility. I make no apology for that.

I point out that the board now being established has much wider powers than were given to any administrative board which has dealt with air matters in the past. The board of transport commissioners is bound by the Transport Act and is concerned chiefly with railway problems. The effect of the administration by the transport board was this. In 1938, when the act was passed, there were a great number of independent air operations in this country. Four years later there was only one independent air operation. Every other air operation in the dominion was owned and controlled by the railway companies.

My hon. friend speaks of decisions and mentioned one particular decision of the transport commissioners. That decision was perfectly correct under the Transport Act, but was it in the best interests of Canada? At a time when Canada is extremely short of aviation equipment and when the travelling public requires transport by air as never before, the board ruled that Trans-Canada Air Lines must operate from Vancouver to Victoria with empty seats, because there was another air operation connecting the two centres. The fact that the other operation was overcrowded and could not begin to handle the traffic, and could not obtain planes sufficient to carry the traffic, did not weigh with the board.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Was not an appeal provided for?

Mr. HOWE: The decision was not appealed. But was it in the public interest?

Mr. GREEN: Why was it not appealed?

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): It could have been.

Mr. HOWE: Who would consider it of importance?

Mr. GREEN: Trans-Canada.

Mr. HOWE: Trans-Canada Air Lines is a creature of the government; why should it appeal from the decision of a government board?

Mr. GREEN: Trans-Canada did not make the application. I understand it was made by a municipality.

Mr. HOWE: I think it was made by Trans-Canada Air Lines.

There is a departure in policy involved in this amendment, and that is that, in future, transport by air will not be bound by the rules of surface transportation. It will be allowed to develop separately from surface transportation. That I think is sound. It has been found to be sound in other countries. I know of no other country where control of aviation is in the hands of surface carriers. I know of countries where such control is expressly forbidden.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: What countries?

Mr. HOWE: The United States, for instance.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: Subject to qualification under their aeronautics act.

Mr. HOWE: Tell me one surface carrier that has control of aviation in the United States. I can tell you of several that were ordered to divest themselves of air operations.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: Which ones?

Mr. HOWE: The Boston and Maine railroad had an air service between Montreal and Boston, and the railway company was ordered to divest itself of control of that air operation.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): The railways are operating an air line to Moncton.

Mr. HOWE: I might also mention the Pennsylvania Central, which was also ordered to be divested. I can mention another company, a shipping line, which was operating an air service across the Atlantic. It has recently been ordered to divest. My hon. friend should not be too sure of his facts. If he can tell me of one company in the United States—

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: I am speaking about the statutes.

Mr. HOWE: Their statute is similar in form to this statute, of which my hon. friend is complaining.

[Mr. R. B. Hanson.]

Mr. ADAMSON: A shipping company is still operating the American Export Line.

Mr. HOWE: That operation has been purchased by American Air Lines, I am told.

This board has wider powers than ever were given to any previous aviation authority. The board is not bound by existing legislation. It is given the right to develop its own jurisprudence. It is given the authority of licensing, subject to an appeal to the minister in case the applicant for the licence desires to appeal, just as there is an appeal from the board of transport commissioners to council. It is intended that the board will not be simply a judicial board. It will interpret the law in matters brought before it, and also it will assist the government in actively developing aviation.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Acting in an advisory capacity?

Mr. HOWE: In an advisory capacity, and I would like to make that clear, because some hon. members have said that the board should make the policy. I think that would be going too far. I doubt if it would be a wise step to take. It certainly is not the policy of the Liberal government, whether or not hon. gentlemen opposite wish to make it their policy to set up administrative boards independent of parliament.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): No one has ever suggested that.

Mr. GREEN: I did not suggest that the board should make policy. I said that the board could not do two things, that it could not, on the one hand, advise the minister and, on the other hand, be a judicial body.

Mr. HOWE: I suggest that it can. It can advise the minister on certain matters, and can very well exercise a judicial function also, and will do so.

Mr. GREEN: Is it not supposed to rule, between two applicants, for instance?

Mr. HOWE: It can advise the minister.

Mr. GREEN: The board has no judicial function at all where there is a dispute between two applicants?

Mr. HOWE: The government makes the decision—

Mr. GREEN: Then the board has nothing to do with it at all.

Mr. HOWE: My hon. friend may be interested in knowing how the situation has developed in the past. He told of the number of applications which had been granted by the board of transport commissioners but he did not say to whom they had been granted.

Mr. GREEN: I simply read from the report. I was not trying to conceal anything.

Mr. HOWE: Of the 62 applications granted, I rather think that 61 were granted to one applicant. I doubt whether that is just the way in which this government wishes aviation to develop in this country.

Mr. COLDWELL: Who was the one applicant?

Mr. HOWE: I cannot say at the moment. My hon. friend speaks of subsidies. New air operations in this country have always been subsidized. Lines have been subsidized in the past by the post offices. High mail rates have been given to initiate a service, in the expectation that as the service prospered the postal rates could be reduced. That has usually happened.

Mr. GREEN: Is that not to be done in the future?

Mr. HOWE: No. The post office object to that and quite properly. The post office takes the view that there is no reason why the postal revenues of the country should be used to subsidize an air operation. The policy in the future will be that the postal rate will be fixed at a reasonable figure from the postal point of view and, if an additional subsidy is required, the funds will be voted by parliament. The board will investigate and make a recommendation, after due consideration of the facts and, if the government is satisfied that a subsidy is required to bring the line into operation, that subsidy will be voted by parliament.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Is it not true that the postal subventions were given in the first instance to Trans-Canada, and at a high rate, in order to ensure immediate operation?

Mr. HOWE: Yes.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): There is no doubt about that.

Mr. HOWE: Certainly. That is the point.

Mr. HANSON: (York-Sunbury): That may or may not be a good policy, but I want to have the fact established.

Mr. HOWE: I have said that every operation has been subsidized in its initial stages.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): By that method.

Mr. HOWE: Operations have been subsidized by the post office. What I am saying is that the purpose of this bill is to change the method, and I think a much more scientific as well as a fairer method, a method more in keeping with the supremacy of parliament, is being adopted.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): It leaves it to the whim of the minister to play favourites if he wants to.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: I have seen some reference in the United States press to the effect that the solution there seems to be the adoption of the rule that all first-class mail shall be delivered by air. Has consideration been given to that question?

Mr. HOWE: There is nothing in this bill to that effect. That question is outside the scope of the bill.

I do not know that I have anything more to say at this time, but while I am on my feet I might give the information requested by the hon. member for Lake Centre with regard to applications for franchise. I believe the question was as to how many applications there had been to the board of transport commissioners between April 1, 1943, and March 31, 1944, for licences for transport by air. There have been sixteen applications in that period. I might give the list: Canadian Pacific Air Lines, between points in New Brunswick and Nova Scotia; Canadian Pacific Air Lines in Ontario and Quebec; other points in Ontario and Quebec; other points in Ontario and Quebec, Canadian Pacific Air Lines; another for Canadian Pacific Air Lines, for points in Manitoba; another, Canadian Pacific Air Lines, for points in Ontario; Canadian Pacific Air Lines, for points in British Columbia; Canadian Pacific Air Lines, for points in Quebec, New Brunswick and Nova Scotia; another for Canadian Pacific Air Lines, for points in Ontario.

There is an application for Inter-City Air Lines Registered, Montreal, for points in Quebec and Ontario, and the second by the same applicant, for points in Ontario. There is another for Vancouver Island Air Lines Limited, for points in British Columbia, twenty-six routes; another by Greyhound Lines, between British Columbia and Alberta, nine routes; another, Grey Coach Lines Limited, Toronto, for routes in Ontario, eleven routes; another for Sky Lines Express Limited, Edmonton, for points in Quebec and Ontario; another by M. & C. Aviation Company Limited, Prince Albert, for points in Saskatchewan and Manitoba.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: What points in Saskatchewan?

Mr. HOWE: I have not the information.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): All refused?

Mr. HOWE: All held in abeyance.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): At the request of the minister?

Mr. HOWE: Quite.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Yes.

Mr. COLDWELL: Since our view has been brought into the picture this afternoon, I wish to say what we believe. We believe that the air lines should be entirely under government control. That does not exclude the possibility of the taxi lines being operated by private individuals or by private local companies.

Mr. MacNICOL: What does the hon. member mean by taxi lines?

Mr. COLDWELL: A great deal of stress is placed on the young airmen who will be coming back from the war, and the opportunities they will have. The list read by the minister indicates that this country is being entirely sewn up now, if the government permits, by the Canadian Pacific Air Lines, and the battle in parliament to-day is a battle between those of us who believe that the most efficient service can be run by the nation and those who want the Canadian Pacific to get in on the ground floor.

Mr. GREEN: I rise to a point of order, and a question of privilege. There is an inference—

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): An imputation.

Mr. REID: There certainly is.

Mr. GREEN: —that I was speaking for the Canadian Pacific, and I ask that it be withdrawn and withdrawn quickly, because it is absolutely untrue. My hon. friend and his party are very free in throwing around abuse of that kind.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): And they are pretty thin-skinned when anything is thrown at them.

Mr. COLDWELL: I have nothing to withdraw. What I suggested was—

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): On a point of order, Mr. Chairman—

The CHAIRMAN: The hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar is speaking.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): But I rise to a point of order.

Mr. COLDWELL: I am speaking to the point of order.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): You did not raise one.

Mr. COLDWELL: I am speaking to the point of order.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Have I the floor, Mr. Chairman? The hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar raised no point of order; he went on with his argument and stated that he withdrew nothing. On the point of order, the hon. member for Vancouver South (Mr. Green) has stated in effect that what the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar has said is an imputation against his motives and his honour. I agree with him and I think the membership of the committee will agree with him. The hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar must withdraw that imputation against the honour of a private member of this house. I ask the committee to sustain the honour of the member for Vancouver South.

Mr. COLDWELL: I did not make any reference to the hon. member for Vancouver South—

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): The inference is there.

Mr. COLDWELL: —either directly or by inference. I repeat what I have said, that the battle in this parliament at the present time appears to me to be a battle between those of us who believe in public ownership and those who believe that the Canadian Pacific Railway Company should be enabled to get in on the ground floor. That is an expression of opinion to which I am entitled.

Mr. GREEN: On a point of order—

The CHAIRMAN: The hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar has the floor; he is speaking to a point of order.

Mr. COLDWELL: That, I say, is an opinion to which I am entitled, an opinion which I may express. It reflects on no one. It is, as I see it, a statement of fact.

Mr. GREEN: It so happens that I opened the debate this afternoon and so far I am the only one who has spoken on the subject. Now the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar says that the debate to-day is a dispute between those who believe in the interests of the nation and those who are speaking for the Canadian Pacific Railway Company. That is an imputation which no member of this house should have to face. If a member representing a great constituency is to be faced with that sort of attack the minute he rises to discuss any bill, then there is no use at all of a parliament in Canada. It shows you what we are faced with if the C.C.F. ever get into power. I submit to you, Mr. Chairman, that the hon. member should withdraw.

Mr. REID: On a point of order—

Mr. COLDWELL: I referred to nothing that had been said this afternoon.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): You did refer to to-day.

Mr. COLDWELL: This debate has been on for several weeks and I am giving my opinion of this debate which I have gleaned over these weeks.

Mr. REID: On a point of order, my point is that the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar has thrown an aspersion, or put a false interpretation upon what I said. I said the other night that I would oppose this bill, and the hon. member in his speech has practically said that because we are opposing it I am in favour of the Canadian Pacific Railway Company. That is one of the subtle speeches that is made and put across the country as propaganda. I repeat I said that I would oppose this bill and I gave my reasons for so doing. The hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar has not dealt with the bill, nor has he warned the country of the danger that there would be in giving the government or any government the powers that are contained in this bill. All that he said was that if we vote against this bill we are in favour of the Canadian Pacific Railway Company. I wish to deny that because it is unfair.

The CHAIRMAN: On the point of order, I feel that it is a matter of interpretation. I do not think any point of order or question of privilege arises.

Mr. REID: There is a misstatement of fact.

Mr. COLDWELL: May I proceed?

Mr. GREEN: I appeal your ruling, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. HOWE: May I call the attention of the Chair and of hon. members to the undertaking that governs Wednesday sittings? If the leader of the opposition were in his seat he would agree with me in this. The undertaking was that there were to be no divisions on Wednesday afternoon.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): This is not that kind of division.

Mr. COLDWELL: Mr. Chairman, I do not want to delay the proceedings of the committee. If the hon. member for Vancouver South feels that I made any imputations against him personally, and if it would facilitate the business of the committee I shall withdraw that personal imputation.

Mr. GREEN: I do not want any withdrawal to facilitate the business of the committee. If there is to be a withdrawal it has to be an absolute one.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Unqualified.

The CHAIRMAN: Is the withdrawal accepted now?

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): If it is unqualified, yes.

Mr. COLDWELL: I made an unqualified withdrawal.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Nobody heard it.

Mr. COLDWELL: If the hon. member thinks there was any imputation—

Mr. GREEN: He does.

Mr. COLDWELL: If he does, then I withdraw.

Mr. CHURCH: It has to be by leave of the committee.

Mr. CHEVRIER: The Chairman has something to say about it.

Mr. COLDWELL: If I may proceed, I wish to say that as far as safeguarding these young men are concerned I think the list read by the minister this afternoon shows conclusively that an attempt is being made to gather up these franchises while the war is on. The franchises that have already passed into the hands of the Canadian Pacific Air Lines Limited have been pioneered by men who to-day no longer own those franchises or air lines. It is impossible for a young man, no matter how well trained he may be as a flyer, or for any combination of young men that I can conceive of, on returning from the war to be able to purchase the necessary equipment to operate an air line efficiently. The very fact that those air lines have already passed out of the hands of those who pioneered them is substantiation of what I say, namely, that the equipment for air lines is so costly that only a wealthy corporation or a group of individuals can possibly operate a great air service in this country. The alternative with which we are faced in Canada is, I repeat, whether a private corporation, powerful in itself, shall be permitted to obtain a monopoly of the new franchises that may be granted, or whether this great natural monopoly shall remain in the hands of the people where such monopoly properly belongs.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Will the hon. member tell us why it is a natural monopoly? It is not so in the United States?

Mr. COLDWELL: It is a natural monopoly in Canada.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Your ipse dixit does not prove it, you know.

Mr. COLDWELL: If the hon. member for York-Sunbury will just remain silent for a moment—

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I am asking a civil question. If you do not want to answer it, or cannot answer it, all right.

Mr. COLDWELL: I am answering it. It is a natural monopoly.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): That is an assertion; that is not an answer.

Mr. COLDWELL: No small concerns can enter it without a franchise. A franchise is required to operate an air line.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): That is not an answer.

Mr. COLDWELL: Any organization which uses the air for which a government franchise is given is receiving from the people a monopoly to use that particular air route or air line.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Not necessarily.

Mr. COLDWELL: In the past this country has given away its resources, has given away the right to operate great lines of transportation. I think this parliament ought to safeguard the Canadian people against the exploitation that may accrue from any monopolistic group in this country. We surely have had enough of the control of vital facilities by a few individuals and by powerful corporations to warn us to safeguard the rights of the people at this time, in regard to both aeroplane services, and if I may interject, the airwaves which comprise the radio and the television services of this country. I wish to support this particular bill very warmly.

Mr. CHURCH: I wish to offer some objections to this particular bill, having been one of those who has been interested in this subject in two wars and during the long depression. Those who are opposing the government on this particular measure serve no big interests. I believe I speak for my colleagues as well as myself in this committee when I say that we serve no big interests. So far as this bill is concerned our minds are free. I have always been a public ownership man. I cannot support the first clause of this bill. My remarks will be brief; I offer my opposition now and I shall not offer any objection to the other clauses.

The time has gone by when anyone can offer any criticism about what the opposition has been doing in connection with civil aviation. We serve no big interests. Some of us have suffered in the battle against big interests, and we are prepared to suffer again. I am not for the kind of public ownership that is envisaged by this particular bill, because I believe it would be a fatal policy for the people of this country at the present time. This bill is drawing a red herring across the trail in the darkest hour of the war, when the invasion has started on the continent and when it is known, as was announced by the great Prime Minister of Great Britain the other day, that they need every plane possible, that they need all the crews and personnel possible for war purposes. How then can the minister give effect to the first clause of the bill at this time? It is beclouding the war issue; it is causing a great deal of dissatisfaction in the country.

This particular industry, if properly applied, would be the greatest source of employment we could have after the war for our young war pilots; but the war is not over yet, far from it. I object to the red herring which has been drawn across the trail to divide our railroads and other forms of transportation, because it is interfering with the war effort. I believe that the policy proposed will be one of sounding the death knell to all progress in civil aviation in Canada.

I have opposed the principle of this particular bill, bill No. 133. I also oppose the allied bill, to amend the Transport Act, because I am opposed to transferring jurisdiction over commercial aviation from the board of transport commissioners to some other unknown body, especially when the war is at its darkest hour. In the second place, under the present statute every order made by the board of transport commissioners, whether with regard to railways, telephones, express companies or any other function, may be appealed to the governor general in council. That right is eliminated in this new proposal. True it is under the new bill an appeal may be made from the new air board to the minister.

Section 1 of this bill provides for the establishment of an air transport board, to do what? To advise the minister. On what? On matters in connection with the development of a system of civil aviation. Then it gives the new board another function, making it a licensing and regulatory body with respect to commercial air service. I do not find any judicial or semi-judicial powers conferred upon this body. It is purely a board of regulation; it will be a board of convenience for and subservient to the minister, and nobody will be able to get a licence under section 12, for the board can grant licences only with the approval of the minister. No matter how well qualified a company may be to obtain a licence, the final determination of its rights will be made, not by the board but by the minister himself. I believe that is a fatal mistake, and simply means that by this bill we are setting up a board for purely air local purposes, all dressed up and no place to go.

A further objection is that the board has no functions to perform. There will be nothing to regulate. We have, during the war and some time after it, no planes, no crews, no personnel. We have been almost begging the United States for planes, and have not received any. They grabbed the Pacific, and if we do not look out they will grab the Atlantic too. In connection with this question of public policy in relation to aviation, the minister forgets all about an empire air scheme. Surely, after spending a billion dollars in this country on the empire air training plan we should be able, after the war by unity in peace in the empire, to get something for the development of civil aviation within the empire, but under the new bill we are not doing anything to set up a commercial commonwealth air board in order to plan empire air routes for the future. Since the visit to England of the Minister of Munitions and Supply the United States under-secretary of state, Doctor Bearle, has also visited that country. He went there simply to discuss aviation matters with the United Kingdom, not with the dominions, but a discussion first between Great Britain and the dominions would have been better. Our young men who are flying all over the world will be very much disappointed with some of these policies. This board will be only clerical and advisory, with nothing to regulate. You cannot regulate a monopoly, and under this measure you are going to set up a monopoly in Canada for all time, at the same time ignoring any empire or international schemes. Of course Russia almost shudders at the mention of the word "international." They have their own plans and policies and, notwithstanding what the minister says, they have made at Moscow a bilateral agreement with Britain for after the war, regarding this very important matter. Britain entered into that agreement because she found us so helpless when it came to making any agreement along the lines suggested by Mr. Curtin and Mr. Fraser, when they threw out the life-line to Canada last January in the shape of an offer to have a concerted empire scheme, which has been long overdue. By means of empire coordination, cooperation and collaboration it was hoped that there might be an empire air policy by means of which these great dominion premiers could get to Canada in a day or so and discuss the problems which will have to be dealt with after the war. Washington almost shudders at the mention of any international policy. My hon. friends to the left, of the Co-operative Commonwealth Federation, all along have been praising an international policy, but our first duty is to those at home, to our own family. Let us map out first a policy that will appeal to the empire and the dominions —an empire air scheme first. Then, when you have an empire policy, you can move into the larger sphere of operations as an empire into the international field.

As it is constituted to-day, I do not believe the T.C.A. is a publicly owned body. I am absolutely opposed to the kind of public ownership we see in connection with that enterprise. It is my opinion that these two bills should be sent to a committee of the house, just as the Railway Act is revised by a committee of the house. That Act, like the Bank Act, until recently was amended every ten years. In 1917 a railway committee sat on it for four months hearing deputations. If it had not been for the war the Railway Act would have been revised in the same way long ago all along the line. The other day the Minister of Finance had important bills, the Bank Act and two other bills, first sent to a committee. After all, what are our committees for? Here we have a minister of the crown going over the heads of the dominions and of the mother country, right at the darkest hour of the war with the invasion in progress. What kind of policy is that? We shall make no progress in civil aviation, one of our greatest problems, in that way. As I said recently, I believe the T.C.A. should be reorganized right from the president down. If we want a national system under public ownership, let us have at the head of that system someone who has been a public ownership man. I have a great deal of respect personally for the president of T.C.A., but he is connected with twelve or fifteen companies which are absolutely opposed to the principle of public ownership.

The other day this matter was discussed at some length in both the British House of Commons and the House of Lords. The defects of our empire air system were pointed out. The announcement of this bill in Britain and the dominions has not only caused an air muddle in the dominion; it has caused an air muddle in the mother country, with the result that the Lord Privy Seal, Lord Beaverbrook, was at a loss to say just what Britain's policy is in regard to this matter. As was pointed out by those who spoke during that debate, at the present time we ought to confine ourselves to our military purposes until we know the decision of the great battles confronting us. Lord Beaverbrook, when asked where the planes, aircrew and personnel for civil aviation were to be obtained, did not know, and the critics in the House of Lords, urging an empire plan, said:

What is the use of all this shadow-boxing? Why don't we come to the real issue, that there are no aircraft, there is not any personnel, there are not any flying crews, there is no ground staff? . . . Two days this house has been sitting discussing a line to South America when we know that we have not got any available aircraft, that we have not got any crews and that we have not got any personnel.

I believe that in bringing up this question now we are interfering with the war effort, along the lines I have suggested. Commenting on the position the London Sketch in May last said:

Two important aspects of the future of civil aviation were raised in the House of Lords yesterday by the Duke of Sutherland: first, the desirability of private initiative and enterprise in the aeronautical field, and, second, the need for the government now to make up its mind to support flying clubs and to reserve a number of war-time aerodromes for private flying.

With the return of peace a new air age will come into being. An air generation, founded by war, already exists, and there are large numbers of potential recruits who will be eager and should be enabled to take to the air. This new age of air-minded Britons will best be fostered by an unfettered development of the aeronautical industry, for there will be a heavy demand for light aircraft suitable for private flying. America still leads the world in private flying, but there is no reason why Britain, too, should not begin to prepare for the expected new phase in aviation. It is by no means too early for the government to indicate to the industry and the public its intentions towards the inevitable post-war demand for popular flying.

Canada is now deciding upon a policy of isolation and a small nation policy of separation. I am sorry I cannot join in the hymn of praise which the minister uttered, and which was echoed by other members in the committee on railways and shipping, for the T.C.A. in the early days of this session. I am sorry I cannot join in that hymn of praise of Trans-Canada Air Lines as at present administered.

Speaking in the House of Lords the Duke of Sutherland, an aviator, said:

An empire policy for post-war private flying is an urgent military, social and commercial necessity.

I believe that what he has said is true. I have referred to this matter many times this session in opposing a monopoly in connection with civil aviation, and contending that the air should be free for all under drastic regulation. My submission is that there should be no more of a monopoly in civil aviation than in connection with design. No doubt, immediately after the war, improved aircraft for the transportation of passengers, emergency foods and many other articles will be absolutely necessary, because, when the war is over, the railways and other forms of transportation will be choked. So that it will be of the utmost importance that there be close cooperation and mutual understanding between Great Britain, the United States and the dominions.

I have opposed the creation of any monopoly in Canada. Canada should try to take the lead in the field of design. We should prepare an air policy for the next twenty-five years—but we shall not do it through this bill. Fundamental changes will occur in the future. Aviation in Canada is yet only in its infancy. Research, design and experimentation will be more important than ever. In Canada and in the empire we are on the threshold of a grand new age which will revolutionize aeroplane construction and the development of aeroplane engines. In this field high speed is essential to supremacy. Problems of all sorts arise; science and research will provide even lighter alloys and new types of wings, engines and parts which will withstand various climatic conditions the world over. I do not at the proper time, after the war, oppose a regulatory body. The time is not now.

This particular bill, as I see it, provides no functions for the said board to transact. There is no appeal to the governor in council as in the Railway Act. In my opinion this measure is too much Washington-minded. In our dealings with aviation we have been surrendering to Washington too much of commercial initiative, political and social security initiative, economic initiative and aviation initiative. That is what we are doing, instead of staying within the British empire, as part of a family, the mother country of which has supported us through thick and thin. For that reason I am opposed to the bill.

In conclusion, I would draw particular attention to section 17, which sets out powers subject to international agreements. There are no international agreements, although the mother country has been seeking to make them. Section 17 states:

The powers conferred by this part on the minister shall be exercised subject to any international agreement or convention relating to civil aviation to which Canada is a party.

What happened in England? Great Britain refused to adopt the proposal of Canada respecting an international body. The result is that there is no international body or association to-day. Both Washington and Moscow shuddered at the thought of it.

If the minister had postponed his decision until after the war the whole matter might have been considered by a select committee. The timing is bad. This is an important matter, and one which should not be considered until the war is over. No change should be made until that time, for the reasons I have given.

The minister is simply drawing a red herring across the trail. At the present time both railways are choked with traffic; they are doing magnificent work, and at this time should not be interfered with. I admit that Trans-Canada Air Lines has done good work, as have the rival feeder and other companies. These matters should be left alone until the war is over, and the matter can be settled within the empire first. Then we can move into the international field.

Toronto sends its own members to this House of Commons—a fact which is sometimes forgotten. It is the leading public ownership city on the North American continent. That city has invested very large sums of money in its street railways and radial railways and buses, and the city bought out the Niagara power companies with the province for $32,000,000 and got control of the power companies at Niagara falls. The federal government is reaping the benefit of Toronto's cheap power activities, and no department of government reaps a greater benefit from it in the province than does the one headed by the Minister of Munitions and Supply.

Application was made a short time ago by the Toronto transportation commission for a new form of local service, and helicopter services, but it was not considered favourably. Surely something should be free. At present a breath of air is about the only thing left that is free. Evidently we are still permitted to breathe air; there is no law to stop that. And yet, by this measure the government is abolishing all possible chance of freedom in the air for civil aviation and for rail and surface transport or for ocean navigation services to continue civil aviation.

The government is about to set up, under the bill No. 133, a new regulatory body—a board all dressed up, with nothing to regulate. They will have nothing to do except to draw their salaries, and all that kind of thing. This is the wrong time to proceed, and the bill should be withdrawn, or at least postponed for a year. If it and several other bills are not postponed we shall be here until Christmas. This bill ought not to be placed before the House of Commons—some of these new utopia bills in the sky, these new dreams of what is to happen—a new heaven and a new earth here after the war. When we get down out of the clouds with a few of them, probably we shall be able to prorogue in about six weeks, since the state has no money of its own for them except what the taxpayer gives it. If we do what I have suggested, I hope that when this bill reaches another place they will see that it is left over until next year. Let us leave it until the war looks better, and until we have an empire air scheme. Let us not enter into an international busy-body programme, or be Washington-minded when we deal with this measure.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: Mr. Chairman, I should like to refer to certain statements made by the minister, particularly those dealing with the powers of the air transport board. The minister made the statement that the board provided for in this bill has greater powers than the board set up under the Transport Act. I again refer to the powers held by the board under that act, as they are set out in section 13 (1) to (5). The power of that board was absolute. Within the ambit of the policy in the statute the board was all powerful. The minister has suggested that the air transport board should not have the power to determine policy. No one on this side of the house has ever suggested it. The policy is set out in the statute, and will have to be carried out by the board.

Under section 12 the minister is setting up a board responsible to him and under his direction. If parliament passes this bill it will be harnessing that board with powers which cannot be used because the board will be hobbled by the prejudices of the minister. In other words, a body having all the outward appearances of possessing powers is being set up, but it is able to exercise that power, as was said by the hon. member for Vancouver South, only with the approval of the minister. I entirely disagree with that principle.

It is my intention to move an amendment to section 12, when the opportunity arises, to delete the words "subject to the approval of the minister". The minister stated that this board has the power of the aeronautics board in the United States. Apparently a reading of that act was not a prerequisite to the drafting of the present bill. The aeronautics act of the United States gives power to the board it sets up to licence and control. It provides for the setting up of an air safety board to bring in the necessary regulations touching on safety, etcetera. It declares for a principle which we on this side of the chamber are not ashamed to declare for, that in the operation of the airways there should be an encouragement of competition to the extent necessary to ensure sound development of an air transportation system properly adapted to the needs of foreign and domestic commerce. That is the basis upon which the aeronautics act of the United States is premised.

I believe that the air transport board should have the power to regulate and control the airways to assure that competition will be maintained. Its purpose should be to control and protect the Canadian people against monopoly privilege, while at the same time promoting expansion or development, either by public or by private ownership, so far as feeder lines are concerned. When I look over this bill all I can conclude is that the Minister of Munitions and Supply wishes to place himself in such a position that, while pretending to be a servant of parliament, he will in fact under this legislation be master of the air development of this country. I have seen too much evidence of a cavalier disregard of the rights of parliament on the part of the minister to be willing to allow him to have the power which he asks for under this bill.

Gradually year by year we are permitting encroachments to take place on parliamentary procedure. We are losing our rights. Under the War Measures Act everybody legislates but parliament. Carry this bill into effect and you will carry into the days of peace the power now conferred on the executive under the War Measures Act. I cannot understand how there could be a better set-up for those who would centralize government than legislation such as this. The minister asks for almost unlimited powers under the war assets corporation bill. He will ask for like powers under the transport bill, and he asks for the extraordinary powers of this bill. I for one will not vote for the principle of a bill which will allow a minister of the crown, uncontrolled, to determine who shall have the right in this country to develop aviation.

It has been suggested that transportation companies are to be refused the right to operate air lines in this dominion because experience in other countries has shown that they are unable to do so satisfactorily. Under the United States act that right is granted with the consent of the board. Within recent months the entire trend in Great Britain has been to permit the interurban airways to develop in conjunction with the railway and transportation companies. Only recently a discussion took place in the House of Lords with regard to the international situation, and there was strong support for the view that steamship companies, having international relationships, should receive consideration in this development.

The reason given for all this is that the men coming back from the war should have an opportunity to bid in on these various air routes. There is no one who has better knowledge of the profits made by companies operating feeder or independent routes than the minister. He is reported as follows on page 1572 of Hansard of March 17:

[Mr. Diefenbaker.]

The first year of the war saw a sharp curtailment in gold mining operations, particularly those in remote areas, with the result that traffic for these independent air lines was sharply curtailed. I think I can say that the operation of these air lines, many of which were financed by public subscription, had never been profitable.

If they have never been profitable, what about the possibility or the probability of the men returning from overseas being able to enter the business, particularly when the establishment of an air line with only one aeroplane of the dimensions required means an outlay of from $200,000 to $250,000? We must make provision for our men when they come back from overseas. It is estimated that there are 225,000 men in the air force of this country, and the highest estimate, made by Doctor Weir, of the number of those men who can be employed in civil air services is 25,000. It has been estimated in the United States that in order to retain one-fifth of the men in their ground and aircrew it will be necessary that at least fifteen per cent of the ton miles now hauled on the railroads be hauled by the airways.

What we need is jobs for these men. Are they going to get jobs when they come back from overseas and apply for an air route which will require a quarter of a million dollars to set up? Are they going to enter into a business which according to the minister was never profitable before the war? I am one of those, who after the last war had an interest in a small air company. Year after year we put money into it but we never got any dividends. Finally there was an accident or two and that was the end of the company.

I submit that the men coming back from overseas will have a greater prospect of securing a degree of employment in aviation if we permit the development in this country of private air routes while preventing mergers and monopoly. The minister has never given any explanation for his change of viewpoint since 1938 when he believed that it was necessary for the railway corporations to operate the airways. After five or six years he has changed his mind. What has been the reason for that change? No one has ever been able to get an answer from the minister. Has it been antagonism against any one railway company?

Mr. HOWE: Mr. Chairman, I ask the hon. member to withdraw that insinuation, which has been made several times. Why insinuate that there is any antagonism?

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: I do not insinuate. I ask whether there has been.

Mr. HOWE: A neat way of insinuating.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: And the answer is still not a negative from the minister. He does not deny it. He said that I should withdraw something that I asked a question about, but he does not deny antagonism.

Mr. HOWE: I deny it now. Is my hon. friend satisfied?

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: The minister has now denied it, but I had to ask the question several times to get that denial. I am glad to have it now.

Mr. HOWE: Your insinuation is still on the record.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: Mr. Chairman, we must develop the airways of the north. Can we develop them unless they are going to be profitable? The minister said that these were never profitable.

Mr. HOWE: I made no such statement.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: The minister says that he made no such statement. I quoted from Hansard a moment ago his exact words.

Mr. HOWE: Where is the word "never" in there?

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: The minister sometimes forgets, just as last evening he forgot that a couple of months ago he stated in this house that he had told the board of transport commissioners not to issue a licence to a company between Saint John and Halifax. When faced with his own statement last night he used words to the effect that if he had been so reported in Hansard, that was his answer. I referred a moment ago to his use of the word "never." At page 1572 of Hansard the minister said:

> I think I can say that the operation of these air lines, many of which were financed by public subscription, had never been profitable.

There are his exact words—they had never been profitable. Now if in the conditions before the war, when there was a tremendous mineral development in the north, these air lines had never been profitable, is there any reason to believe that they will be any more profitable now than they were then?

The minister added that the reason for the emergency action of the Canadian Pacific Air Lines in taking over certain smaller companies was that:

> With the curtailment of traffic before mentioned, these small operators were faced with the necessity of either finding a buyer or closing down.

If these air lines could not be operated profitably by private industry which found it necessary to get out of the field or close down, can the government be expected after the war to continue to operate these lines in outlying portions of the country?

Another criticism of the essence of this bill is that it will deny to bus line companies and the like the right to operate helicopter services between neighbouring towns and points which are too close together to permit of the ordinary airways service. It will deny it because the government in the interests of its own political survival cannot enter into transactions or propositions such as this unless assured that there will be a reasonable return from them. The minister in reply to the hon. member for Peterborough West said that helicopters could not be utilized to-day, that they were still in the experimental stage. I have before me an authoritative work entitled "The Air Future," by Burnet Hershey, which sets out the position of helicopters and envisages the day not very far distant when the United States of America alone within ten years after the war will have a million helicopters in use. I quote:

> Helicopters able to travel between 120 and 140 miles an hour and carry from twelve to twenty passengers are not beyond reasonable expectations.

Then later on:

> Even before the end of the African campaign, American and Northeast Airlines had filed applications with the civil aeronautics board for authorization to operate helicopter air mail services from the rooftops of more than 400 post offices and railroad stations in the eastern states.

I submit that if we adopt the plan of the minister in this legislation, denying to transport companies and the like the right to operate air lines, we shall in fact retard the development of air traffic in this country, and at the same time we shall not be assuring employment to a large number of the men returning from overseas.

Again I refer to the terms of the bill itself. I ask the membership of this house this question. Do we realize what the implications of this proposed legislation are? It places the minister in the position of being the boss of aviation, where every individual and every returned soldier, everybody in this dominion, must comply with his wishes, and be subject to his whims and prejudices. Otherwise they will not receive a licence.

So far as government policy is concerned, it must be directed by the minister and the policy has been set forth in the bill, that no licence, if this is accepted by parliament, shall be issued for a commercial air service that is owned, leased, controlled or operated by any person engaged in the transport of goods, and secondly, that no person shall have an air franchise unless he is adequately equipped and able to conduct a safe operation. These are matters of policy. They rest with the government, but in my opinion, within the ambit of government policy, the granting of licences should rest with a body uncontrolled by the minister; or why set up a body? Is it simply to go through the motions, to take the responsibility and have no power to act as it will?

Now as to the subsections which provide for an appeal, subsections 8 to 10 of section 12. If the minister says that a certain individual or a certain corporation shall not receive a licence, then, regardless of his reasons, that person or corporation is denied the opportunity to have a licence. The minister has said in effect that a person whose rights to licence are denied can appeal to the minister, and under the bill, provision is made for an appeal from the hired man to the hired man's boss, after the hired man has refused a licence, having acted under the direction of the boss. I submit that the principle embodied in section 12 will curtail the development of airways in this country. It will mean that the development of our airways will not rest on the needs of aviation facilities, but will be strictly under the control of the minister.

The passing of this bill in its present form will be an abdication by parliament of its powers in that absolute power will be given to a minister, uncontrolled in any way, to dictate who shall be the recipients of the right to operate an airway licence in this country.

Let me place this viewpoint before you, Mr. Chairman. Suppose a person well qualified to operate an air route, the person best qualified to operate it, a person unconnected with a corporation, should apply for a licence, and there were other applicants less qualified. The minister will have the right to say to the board, "You will give that licence to the least qualified of these three." I submit that to allow a minister that power is to emasculate the board that is set up. In effect the bill confers powers on the board and then hobbles it by placing the minister in control of its actions. Never has there been any legislation in this parliament that would set up such a board and at the same time make the minister the absolute boss of it. As far as the minister is concerned, he intends to administer the power conferred on him fairly and squarely, without prejudice in any way, but it is not the individual that is in issue; it is the principle. Give that power that the minister has under this bill to a minister in another government in the future and that minister can throttle the right to develop aviation in this country. I ask the minister to reconsider section 12, subsection 1, by deletion of the words "subject to the approval of the minister," which occur in the paragraph that will enact that the board may issue to any person applying therefor a licence to operate a commercial air service, and second, by deletion of subsection 2 thereof, so that the matter will rest with the board to determine who shall have licences.

Too often the minister feels that when we analyse legislation such as this there is some personal feeling. Far from it. There is a principle at stake. Parliament is asked for the abdication of its power; it is asked to confer on an individual powerful rights, without any control of the fair and just carrying out of those rights. As the hon. member for Vancouver South so well pointed out, under the old act there was an appeal from the transport board, so far as rail transportation was concerned, to the courts of the country. There the aggrieved could secure a measure of justice.

Mr. HOWE: An appeal to the courts on points of law, and an appeal to the governor in council on points of policy.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: That is perfectly true, an appeal on points of law, but still an appeal. Under this bill there is no right of appeal to the courts. There is no right on the part of the individual aggrieved to have his rights determined without favour. Anarchy begins when there is denial of recourse to the courts. Injustice has its inception when any individual is endowed with absolute power without control and without regard to the rights of the individual. I appeal to the minister to reconsider this matter. These powers are too great to confer on an individual. We allow individuals the exercise of great powers in time of war. We accept centralization of authority in the executive. But with all the force at my command I intend to resist the extension of the centralization of authority in an individual or an executive. Where the individual is denied an appeal to the courts if aggrieved, I intend to insist, as far as I am concerned—even if I am the only member to do so—that democratic rights shall be upheld and that we remove the cloak of obscurity that hangs about these measures in order that the people may know, at all events, that there is a definite trend in the direction of and in extension of executive power in respect of which the individual is denied the right of appeal to the courts.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): The minister must not think for a moment that because we use strong language in denouncing the underlying principles of the bill there is anything personal in respect of himself. Let that be made clear at the very beginning. I would make this preliminary observation to the minister, having regard to the political situation in this country at the present time. This legislation is socialistic. I ask this question: Is this an attempt to outbid the rising power of socialism in Canada? Is this bill not the negation of everything that a Liberal party ought to stand for?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): By no means.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): All right. I think if I took the time I could demonstrate that.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): Define your own objectives.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Well, I will refer back to 1919 when the Canadian National Railway Act was set up, before I was here and before the hon. member for Vancouver Centre (Mr. Mackenzie) was here. I would ask the hon. gentleman to read the speeches of D. D. McKenzie and other leading Liberals, speaking on this side at that time, in relation to the setting up of the Canadian National Railways. I would ask him to read the speeches of Roch Lanctot of Laprairie and Napierville, who offered to give away the Canadian National Railways for a dollar. Let him read those speeches and see what the attitude of the Liberal party was at that time toward the amalgamation of the roads being taken over.

Liberalism, if I understand the subject matter correctly, means the liberty of the subject, the liberty of the citizen to engage in private enterprise; and some Liberals have belonged to the school of laissez-faire—at least Liberals in the old country have belonged to the school of laissez-faire, and we all know what that means. I admit that Liberalism in this country has often taken strange by-paths, but that is merely in passing. This bill is socialistic in its tendencies, and has regard to the political trend of the time. If you do not believe me, page the Minister of Agriculture.

Mr. GIBSON: Or Mr. Bracken.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): It is playing exactly into the hands of those who would nationalize in Canada all great major undertakings. I do not believe the people of Canada desire that.

Mr. HOWE: This bill nationalizes nothing.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): The tendency of this bill is toward nationalization and socialism. The minister's denial does not make it otherwise. The mere assertion of a negative does not prove anything. I would ask the minister to let me proceed with the thesis I am trying to develop. I warn the minister against legislative trends of this sort. We heard the hon. member for Broadview (Mr. Church) boasting a few moments ago that he was all for public ownership within certain ambits, and I am reminded that all the public ownership corporations that are set up in this country by the provinces, under the guise of commissions, escape the obligations that are imposed upon me as an individual taxpayer; and the trend is extending into the old Conservative province of Quebec. I ask myself the question: Who is to make up the nine or ten millions of income tax that will now be lost to the public treasury of the country by reason of the recent conversion in the province of Quebec of the Montreal Light, Heat and Power company? You and I.

Mr. MARTIN: There is a cut in consumer rates.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): They cut consumer rates by the amount of relief from taxation. Of course, they could cut consumer rates, and the corporation would long ago have cut consumer rates if it had been relieved of onerous taxation, which very properly it was not relieved of. But what happens? It is merely passed on to the general body of taxpayers in this country, and you and I who do not live in those communities have to pay an increased proportion. That is merely by way of passing.

I think the minister ought to be given perhaps a cursory sketch of the history of the control of transportation in Canada. He has not lived in Canada as long as some of us have, and he may not know that down to 1904 there was no public body in Canada charged with the control of transportation rates and conditions in this dominion. In the year 1904 this parliament, as a matter of government policy under the direction of the late Hon. Andrew G. Blair, set up a board of railway commissioners; and I believe it is the chief claim to fame of Mr. Blair that he fathered the idea of a government appointed judicial body having jurisdiction delegated to it by parliament—not as a bureaucracy, as the minister would suggest, by inference at all events, but as a body removed and free from political considerations, to look after the control of the railways in the interests of the state. Mr. Blair became the first chairman. What was the position previously? The railway companies were chartered, and may still be chartered, if they are intra-provincial, by the provinces as well as by the dominion; but if they are interprovincial they can be chartered only by this parliament. So far as the provincial railways are concerned the control of their rates has always been vested in the executive council of the different provinces—at least that is the position in my province, and I assume it is so in other provinces, although as a matter of fact it is merely an academic question and has no practical application at the moment because nearly all the railways of this country are now within the jurisdiction of the federal authority.

Previously to 1904 the control of rates with respect to railways under the jurisdiction of the federal authority was in the hands of the governor in council. I recall that one of the first subject matters I had to study when I came to parliament after the election of 1921 was the question of the suspension of a special statutory rates set up by the minister of railways in the year 1897 in consideration of certain concessions given by the government of the day to the Canadian Pacific Railway for the building of the Crowsnest Pass branch. At that time we had the spectacle of statutory rates being embalmed in the rate structure of the Canadian railways. Could anything be more injudicious than embalming static statutory rates in a freight rate structure? That was the position in 1904, and ever since that time this question of rates, except in so far as circumstances have had to be applied to alter certain conditions that arose during the war, the control of operations and other jurisdiction so far as railways are concerned was in a judicial body which had wide powers, and which I venture to suggest over forty years of experience has shown was never abused but on the contrary enured to the benefit of the body politic. My recollection is that from 1904 to 1917 the functions of the board of railway commissioners were employed more particularly in protecting the people of Canada against the railways, and from 1917, because of war-time conditions and the greatly increased cost of operating, wages and otherwise, the board was protecting the railways against the aggression of the electors. At least that was so, and that was the situation in 1921; but speaking generally the system functioned admirably. On questions of law there was an appeal to the Supreme Court of Canada, as the minister has correctly stated, and on questions of fact to the governor in council of Canada. I have not delved into the records at all but I think they will show that that appeal was not often taken. It was exercised sparingly, and most frequently on questions of fact the decision of the board of railway commissioners was affirmed by the governor in council.

So much for the setting up of the board of railway commissioners, which I deny was a bureaucracy in any sense of the word. It was a judicial body, and the public and the governments of the day had a good deal of satisfaction in watching their operations and decisions. So far as I recall those boards were headed by chairmen of the highest character, men of judicial ability who took a great pride in doing the work that they were called upon to do, and who built up a system of jurisprudence which I think has been a pattern for similar bodies in this country. We adopted that system because there had been established in the United States the interstate commerce commission, a more or less similar body which I believe has functioned to the complete satisfaction of the people of the neighbouring republic.

I now come to the question of domestic civil aviation. I desire to apply, if I may, some of the principles that have been established by forty years of use of the judicial policy incorporated in the act relating to the board of railway commissioners. Civil aviation is of comparatively recent origin. I recall that the late James A. Richardson and his associates established, if I remember correctly, the Canadian Airways. That was a body that had the blessing of the governments of this country. It was a private enterprise. A substantial amount of private capital was invested in it, and lost, chiefly, I think, because of the fact that the Canadian people were not then air-minded.

Mr. HOWE: Because your government closed it down in 1930.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): The minister can make a cheap gibe at me, but I am not going to reply in kind. Our government had to meet circumstances as they arose in a very trying time, and times that were not of our making. Whether we were right or wrong does not alter the situation. The fact of the matter is that Canadian Airways was an attempt on the part of private enterprise to enter a new field of transportation in this country, and it did not survive. I do not suggest for a moment that the minister believes that governmental action was the cause of its death. At all events when the minister entered this federal area in 1938 he himself encouraged the policy of private enterprise, but because of the amount of the capital required, because of the size of the country, because of the magnitude of the undertaking then under review, it was felt that only strong and important bodies could go into this business of transcontinental airways.

But private enterprise was encouraged; that was the policy of the government, and I think I can say without fear of successful contradiction that from that day down to a comparatively recent time the administration opposite encouraged private enterprise to go into the field of aviation. Had it not been for the nature of the huge undertaking, much more would have been done than was done by private enterprise. In any event I think it is incontrovertible that when the small lines reached the end of their tether because they could not make any money and could not pay their way, the government of the day, which was the present government, unquestionably encouraged the taking over of those lines by Canadian Pacific Air Lines. I do not think there is any doubt about that. They invested a large sum of money in those lines, which I believe is now in danger. However, I have had no communication with Canadian Pacific Air Lines, and I am not dealing with that aspect at all to-day.

In 1938, then, we had a policy set up of quasi-private enterprise, shall I say, of course aided by governmental subventions without which it never could have been started. There were substantial and generous subventions from the Post Office Department, and I am not sure that the minister is wrong when he suggests that in a given case these subventions should take another form. I am inclined to agree with that part of the bill which suggests that if public aid is required it should not be in the form of swollen post office subventions, because I believe the revenues of the Post Office Department are being unduly loaded with expenditures that are not justified from an operating, departmental view. However, I have no doubt there are two schools of thought in that regard. I have not investigated the matter mathematically, and I am not sure which school is right, but I am not condemning the minister's point of view in that regard.

Then suddenly, after the Canadian people and particularly the youth of Canada had become air-minded, we had a right-about-face on the part of the administration, and this bill is the result. I venture to say to this committee and to the country that we have never been given, at any time or at any place, a satisfactory reason for the change in policy. The government sold its policy on this matter to the house and the country in 1938; now it has changed its policy, and it must justify that change in policy at the bar of public opinion. If it was right then it is wrong now; if it is right now it was wrong six years ago. Not once, as far as I can recall, has the minister justified his right-about-face in regard to this question of public policy.

On the question of public policy I assert, as was asserted by my colleague a few minutes ago, that on questions of policy the government of the day must, of course, have the last word; but because the government asserts a policy does not by any means carry with it the conviction that such policy is right. No board of aeronautics; no governmental judicial body such as has been set up in relation to railways, has the right to determine public policy. That is the function of the executive, supported by parliament; but once that function has been discharged the duty of the executive should cease, and the operation of carrying out the policy should be vested in a judicial body which would be free from political control. That, I believe, has been the history of the railway commission and should be the pattern for dealing with aeronautics in this country. What have we here? We have an emasculated board of aeronautics which is to be set up under this bill, which has nothing whatever to do with policy but which is purely advisory, and that is the most you can say for it. It is true that in the bill the minister has gone through the form of giving this body certain authority. Section 8 provides that it may make rules for the regulation of its proceedings and the performance of its functions and duties under this measure. That means it can draw up a set of by-laws, and that is all it means; it may make rules for the orderly carrying out of the business within its jurisdiction. Then section 9 provides:

> Subject to the directions of the minister, the board shall from time to time make investigations and surveys relating to the operation and development of commercial air services in Canada. . . .

This board has no independent function delegated to it by parliament. It is a puppet of the minister, and I use that word in no derogatory sense; it is a term very commonly used to designate people in the category in which the membership of this board will find themselves, in that they cannot move without the nod and the authority, express or implied, of the minister. It does not take a board to make explorations, investigations and surveys. Competent departmental officials can perform these functions. The minister might as well have gone the whole way and reserved the whole power to the department in question. The board is given a power not with respect to policy but with respect to making recommendations in reference to any investigation or survey it may make, and to advise the minister in the exercise of his duties and powers under this measure in all matters relating to civil aviation. Under that provision I suppose they are to be, in a sense, a board of experts who tender their advice, which may or may not be accepted. Nothing could be much more innocuous than a board of this nature, set up to do the bidding and will of the minister if they will, but if they do not conform to his desires then their reports go into the waste-paper basket unless he chooses to adopt them. Of course that is no kind of judicial board at all. It is not an administrative board. That is merely an advisory committee that could be set up without any legislation. As far as sections 8 and 9 of the bill are concerned, I believe "innocuous" is the right term for them. There is a further question in section 10:

> The board shall from time to time make recommendations to the minister with reference to any investigation or survey made by it. . . .

And so on. That is in the same category as section 9. Then section 11 empowers the board, subject to the approval of the governor in council, to make certain regulations. In this case the governor in council is the minister, because this board will report to the minister, and if he does not see fit to recommend these regulations to the governor in council for enactment they die then and there. Any report the minister may make to the governor in council either pro or con, favourable or unfavourable, will, of course, be given either the approval or the disapproval of the governor in council. The minister still remains the head, the neck, the shoulders and everything else, so far as the board is concerned.

Someone has said that he will be a dictator. The minister's reply to that is that somebody has to be a dictator. I do not think anyone has to be a dictator in respect of a great utility, such as aviation in this country. Let us put it on a plane analogous to the manner in which our railways are controlled in Canada, and that will be suitable to the people. The people of Canada will never again allow the control and operation of ralways in their country to fall back into the hands of a minister of railways, or a minister of transport, whatever you wish to call him, as existed prior to 1904.

Here is a government inviting parliament, commanding its followers, to put aviation in exactly the position the people of Canada would reject in connection with railway transportation. I submit that in respect of the principle involved the two cases are analogous. If it is a proper principle that the railways shall be controlled in the manner I have indicated—perhaps inadequately—then it is just as true that the control of aeronautics and the operation of companies, or whoever may be fortunate enough to get licences, should be carried on in the same way as is done by the board of transport commissioners. I believe that when the people of Canada come to understand the tremendous powers vested in the minister designated—the Minister of Munitions and Supply—they will reject this bill, because they will know that it is capable of the greatest possible abuse.

The minister says that he will operate fairly, and I have no doubt that is his present intention. But let me put this case to him: In the face of an election one group of citizens comes to him with a proposal, and another group approaches him with another proposal in respect of the same subject matter. He must make the decision. What minister ought to allow himself to be placed in that position? I say that no minister ought to permit himself to be so placed.

Let me illustrate by referring to the granting of pensions by the Minister of Pensions and National Health. It is unthinkable that the Minister of Pensions and National Health should be authorized by parliament to grant pensions in individual cases. It is equally unthinkable that the Minister of Munitions and Supply, the minister designated by this bill, should be allowed to choose as between groups A, B, C and D as to which shall have a licence to operate an air route.

The Canadian people do not like this power of picking and choosing at the whim or, if you like, the prejudice of a minister. Or, yes, it may be the caprice of a minister. I point this out as a principle which ought to guide parliament in dealing with this matter. A minister ought not to allow himself to be put in a position where he will have to decide as between different applicants for licences. It is not fair to the minister, and by every test it is not fair to the people that the minister should have this power.

One board has issued licences to aviation corporations in this country. This new board is to have the power to override the decision of the present board, which is a branch of the board of transport commissioners. It can override a licence already given. The new board will have power to review all licences with respect to commercial air services issued under part III of the Transport Act, 1938, or under part VII of the air regulations of the same year, legislation set up under this very minister. What an incongruous position! Is parliament going to set up a new board to review the actions of a board which previously, by the will of parliament, was granted control over the issuing of certain licences? I think that is a terrible position. Here we have a right of appeal, an overriding veto on a creature of a judicial or corporate nature the minister has already set up. Or, to be more exact, there is to be an overriding veto in a given case, if it is so issued, from the decision of a judicial board in which the minister himself, through parliament, vested full authority in connection with these licences.

I would ask the minister, when he replies, to give me an answer to that. Why is there a violation of a principle whereby one board of equal standing is to have power to review the activities of another board of similar standing, and probably without the hearing of any evidence at all? If there were a higher judicial authority, my argument would not prevail. But I have only to mention the lack of principle underlying the power given to this new board, without any reason, to review licences which have been issued.

Then, of course, there is the question of the licences themselves, a subject which has been debated to some extent. The board is not to issue licences. I know the bill says that the board may issue to any person a licence, but that provision is subject to an overriding stipulation that the minister must give his approval first. That does not leave the board to act as a free agent. Every consideration of public policy, public convenience and public demand, in the interests of right, justice and equity, might prompt a board to come to the conclusion that a licence should be issued. Yet that licence would be refused if the minister said "No", and there is no appeal from his decision.

There is a form of appeal—I venture to say it is just a hollow mockery—from the decision of the board. The only other mockery in government legislation which would be comparable is found in the taxation laws of the dominion. I have run up against them lately—not on my own behalf, but for somebody else. I find that if a taxpayer in this country is dissatisfied with his assessment under the income tax or excess profits tax laws, he may file a notice of appeal. To whom does he appeal? He appeals to the very authority which imposed the tax in the first instance, namely the Minister of National Revenue. It is a travesty in the administration of justice that such should be the case, and I have urged upon certain persons in governmental authority that an amendment should be made at this parliament. Appeals from assessments under the income tax and excess profits tax laws should not be from Caesar to Caesar, from minister to minister, or from the minister who made the decision and the assessment to the minister who is acting in the capacity of an appellate court.

I am satisfied that the conviction will be brought into the mind of every one who is listening that the system is all wrong. There should be an appeal to a judicial body and it should be an appeal on the question both of law and of fact. In principle it will be an appeal on the question of the interpretation of the statute. I suppose that here again the bureaucratic mind which is so much in evidence today is again prevailing. There is to be an appeal from a body dominated by the minister to the minister who dominated the body in the first instance. I do not think I could use more cogent language to condemn that provision of the statute if I were to stand here all night. I condemn the underlying principle of this bill. If hon. members will do themselves, not me, and the country the justice that they ought to do by reading and studying these provisions, I do not think one of them will vote for this section. I condemn the provisions that maintain the incongruity of keeping in the hands of the minister absolute, unthrottled, uncontrolled control of the operations of this board.

It is a farce to set up a board of this nature. A board of aeronautic engineers, under salary, under the minister's direction, could do all the work that this board is intended to do. I suppose it is being set up under the guise that it is an independent board, but it is nothing of the sort. From A to Z this will be a creature of the minister and nothing else. I had not intended to speak so long, but if an amendment is moved to subsection 1 of section 12 to strike out the words "subject to the approval of the minister," I intend to vote in favour of it and endeavour to give this board some independence. Subsection 2 of that section provides:

> No such licence shall be issued in respect of a commercial air service, owned, leased, controlled or operated by any person who is engaged in the transport of goods—

I am not just sure of the implication of that, but I desire to call the attention of the committee to the overriding provision which follows:

> —unless the governor in council is of opinion that it is in the public interest that such licence be issued.

Let us consider the implication of that.

The CHAIRMAN: I desire to inform the hon. member that he has spoken for forty minutes.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I did not think I had, but if you say so I will sit down.

The CHAIRMAN: I kept the time and so did the assistant clerk.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I kept the time also and I do not think you are right.

The CHAIRMAN: I kept the time, and I always have it checked by the assistant clerk.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury) : I kept the time.

The CHAIRMAN: Surely the Chair has the right to say when a member has spoken for forty minutes. It is not a duty that I exactly relish, but I am expected to perform it.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I think a member has some rights.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): I want to protest most strongly and emphatically against the reflection made by the hon. member for York-Sunbury against the Chair.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I do not intend to take a lecture from you or anybody else.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): I am rising to a point of order.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I thought the chairman was wrong, but if he says I am wrong, I am going to sit down.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): I am rising to a point of order.

Mr. GRAYDON: I think it is better forgotten.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): Better not uttered.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): There was no reason for you to intervene.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): I am just as responsible as my hon. friend for the proper conduct of this debate.

Mr. GRAYDON: You take a pretty heavy responsibility at times.

The CHAIRMAN: I will ask hon. members to address the Chair; not for my sake, but a certain decorum must exist at all times in carrying on the debates of the committees of the house.

Mr. ROEBUCK: Before this bill is passed, I should like to say a word about it, largely because of the most eloquent remarks we have heard from the other side. Very strong objection was taken by some hon. members to the suggestion of the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell) that the question before this committee is whether the parliament of Canada shall control aviation or whether it shall become a monopoly of the Canadian Pacific Railway Company. It does seem to me that taking the attitude expressed by hon. members opposite by and large that is the issue before the committee.

Some years ago the parliament of Canada determined on the setting up of a publicly-owned air lines system in Canada, and that work has since been carried on and with no small success. I take it that the members of that house looked forward to the time when Trans-Canada Air Lines should be a great system of inter-provincial, inter-town and inter-county lines interlacing the various communities and provinces of the dominion with a most important public service. Not only is it great to-day; it is potentially greater still. One of the outstanding duties of this house, of the Department of Transport, of the executive and of the ministers is to protect the future of Trans-Canada Air Lines.

My hon. friends opposite have been talking about bureaucracy; yet they complain that the present bill, which is intended to protect this service, does not hand over the right to grant a franchise to lines competing with the government lines. They complain that that right is not left in the hands of some controllers. It is suggested that some board of appointees, of civil servants, shall have the right to grant franchises, uncontrolled and unsupervised by either the executive or the parliament of Canada, so that, as a result of the action of this board, there may be set up a system of air lines competing with the system owned by the people of Canada.

In his long and eloquent argument the hon. member for York-Sunbury (Mr. Hanson) dealt with the powers and splendid record of the board of transport commissioners. He endeavoured to draw a parallel between this suggested board and the board of transport commissioners, but he seemed to have forgotten the difference between the functions of the two boards. The function of this board will be to grant franchises or charters, grant the right to operate lines over certain territories and under certain conditions. No such power has ever been given to the board of transport commissioners.

The board of transport commissioners cannot grant a franchise to a railroad company to build even a branch line, much less to establish a railway system. When private capital desires to establish a railroad, it comes to the parliament of Canada. The matter is referred to the railway committee where it is studied. A report is made to the house, and it is passed on by the house, not by some appointed board which is not responsible to anybody and which, if my hon. friends had their way, would not be responsible either to the executive or to parliament.

Objection is taken that the franchise granted by the board must be subject to the approval of the minister. If I were to change that provision, Mr. Chairman, it would be to require approval by the parliament of Canada —not to abolish the approval of the minister. The granting of a franchise for operating a line of aeroplanes is a matter of public policy, and no matter of public policy should be put into the hands of civil servants. It should be reserved to the parliament of Canada, or at least—I say at least—to the responsible ministers of the crown, who are answerable to this house and to the electors of the dominion.

The hon. member for York-Sunbury has stated that no board should have the right to determine public policy, and with that statement I thoroughly agree. It should not have that right; the granting of a franchise to run an air line is a matter of public policy, and in the future, if not now, it may be a matter of most important public policy.

The hon. member also made some remarks about the minister picking and choosing, leaving one out and taking another in. Of course it would be nice if you could formulate rules so that everybody could have the right of operation on complying with the rules. But such is not possible in a monopoly. The hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar has described the operation of air lines as a natural monopoly. I do not think it is a natural monopoly, not as much as the ownership of land, the operation of a railway or something of that kind. It is not a natural monopoly, but with things geared up as they are now, it is a monopoly. It is a monopoly because we have decreed that no one can operate an air line without a licence. Having done that, we have made it a monopoly. I have not heard anybody suggest that we make it anything but a monopoly. I suppose we could allow anybody to operate an aeroplane; let him start from his own backyard and land in somebody else's backyard if he did not crash in between. You could do that, and then you would have the ideal which the hon. member for Lake Centre proposes—the greatest possible freedom in the operation of air lines. That would be the greatest possible freedom, and it is not impossible, but I fancy that no one here would advocate such a policy.

If we are to make it a monopoly by requiring that licences be granted, the question arises as to who shall grant the licences. Will you establish a board of civil servants and grant them an unrevised power to give away public property of great value and of great public importance? Surely, when that problem is faced squarely, no one in this house would agree that we give to civil servants the right to give away franchises, which are matters of great public concern, unrevised by this parliament or any of its representatives. The thing would be preposterous. We should take measures now before a railroad monopoly of the air has been created in this country.

My hon. friends opposite have criticized the minister for changing his mind. Well, somebody has said that consistency is the bane of small minds. The man who has not the power to change his mind is unable to learn by either reading or experience. If the minister has changed his mind in the course of the last five years—and I am not in a position to pass upon that; he may have—I give him credit for it. The last five years have given us some experience in the matter of air lines. It has been only within the last few years that the Canadian Pacific Railway Company has made an attempt to capture the air lanes of Canada and to compete with our own publicly owned air lines. So, that if the minister has changed his mind it is not too soon. It is time he changed his mind if there was in his mind in the past an intention of giving to the Canadian Pacific Railway Company a right to grab the air franchises of the Dominion of Canada.

The hon. member for York-Sunbury criticized very strongly the fact that the minister under this bill would have the power to review the proceedings of the board. Why should he not? Is there anyone in this chamber who would like to make appointees superior to parliament in matters of public concern? Why should he not have the right to revise the proceedings of the board? Then my hon. friend complains that this board shall have the right to revise the proceedings of the preceding board. Again, why not? Are the laws of the previous boards to become like those of the Medes and Persians which altereth not? When authority and responsibility are transferred to the new board, why should it be bound by the decisions of the old board, made static and permanent by act of parliament? Of course the new board have power to revise. When you realize that these licences are granted from year to year, certainly for short terms, why should not the new board have power equal to that of the old board in the granting and regranting of licences?

They talk about the bureaucratic provisions of this bill. It is true that we are drifting more and more into business management by the executive, but perhaps we are driven to it by the changing and developing order of our times. I have not liked the controllers. I hope that the time will come when arbitrary decisions by appointees may at least be lessened if not largely abolished and that we may get back to a parliament of the old days when the members of this deliberative assembly controlled more of the public business of the country. But were my friends opposite to have their way, they would establish in aviation a permanent board of appointed controllers who would determine the future of the air in Canada.

Mr. HAZEN: I do not like to see this bill pass without voicing my objections to some of its provisions. The hon. member for Trinity (Mr. Roebuck) referred to the fact that before a railway could be established the promoters had to come to this parliament to obtain an act. Under the present Transport Act, part III, I believe it is provided that before the existing transport board can grant licences to companies or persons to carry on aviation the governor in council shall state between what places in this country lines may be run or carried on. But once that is done, the transport board has absolute jurisdiction.

Mr. ROEBUCK: I think that is substantially what I said.

Mr. HAZEN: I understood that the hon. member was making a wide distinction between the powers of railway companies and those of aviation companies or persons carrying on aviation. When this committee was last sitting on Monday evening, the minister said, as reported at page 3969 of Hansard, that the bill proposed to set up a board that had all the judicial or quasi-judicial functions of the board of transport commissioners, under the Transport Act, and that those functions were not subject to review by the minister. He went on to say that provision was made in the bill for an appeal to the minister in certain cases, just as there is provision for an appeal from the board of transport commissioners to the privy council.

If you will examine the transport commission's powers, which are contained in section 13 of the Transport Act, you will find that the commission was empowered to license aircraft to transport passengers or goods. They were given absolute power. The power was not limited. They did not have to obtain the approval of the minister before granting those licences. It was, I say, an absolute power. But when you come to examine this bill, you find that the powers of the board are limited. Its powers are restricted by section 12, subsection 1, which provides that it may issue licences only with the approval of the minister. The board is limited further in its powers to grant licences by section 12, subsection 4, of the bill, which provides that it cannot issue a licence until the minister issues an operating certificate; to save time I will refrain from reading subsection 4, but in substance that is the provision it makes.

Many hon. members on this side have asked why the board's powers have been so limited, and I have not heard a satisfactory reply from the minister. As the hon. member for Lake Centre said the other evening, there are no safeguards in the bill against objectionable exercise or abuse of the minister's powers. I do not mean by that, and I do not think he did, that the present minister would indulge in or exercise any powers that might be called abuses. Nevertheless, in my opinion, and as the hon. member for Vancouver South said, the bill confers dictatorial powers on the minister and that, I think, is objectionable.

But the conferring of these powers on the minister is not all that is objectionable in the bill. The bill provides for an appeal by an applicant who feels that he has not received a fair deal. But to whom is he to appeal? Who is to hear and decide on his grievance? The Minister of Transport, the man who has the say as to whether or not he gets the licence, is the man who is to judge whether or not his appeal will be allowed.

There is no principle of justice in such a proceeding, no principle on which such a proceeding can be justified. Under our system of democratic government, the men and women the voters of the country elect to parliament make the laws, and independent judges interpret and enforce those laws. We have been inclined at times to be rather slack in our duty in the making of these laws. We have been inclined at times, instead of making laws, to allow laws to be made by means of regulations. If such regulations are merely of an administrative nature, there is no great objection; but when laws are made by regulations which impose penalties, then there is great objection.

The laws of the dominion should be made in this chamber, with the suggestions and criticisms of members of parliament. We should not allow legislative boards or civil servants to carry out the duties we were elected to discharge, and members of parliament are negligent in their duty to their constituents as well as in their duty to the country if they permit the laws of the dominion to be made by regulations, the terms of which they do not know and which they have not passed on or approved.

But, sir, that is not the only objection to this bill. It is not only the matter of regulations that I object to, but the powers that are conferred on the minister, who can act as a court of appeal and decide upon grievances when he is in the first place the one who has already come to a decision as to whether or not a licence shall be granted.

Progress reported.

At six o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

VACANCY

RESIGNATION OF MEMBER FOR THE ELECTORAL DISTRICT OF SHERBROOKE

I have accordingly issued my warrant to the chief electoral officer to make out a new writ of election for the said electoral district.

QUESTIONS

(Questions answered orally are indicated by an asterisk.)

R.C.A.F.—EQUIPMENT DEPOTS—STATIONERY AND PRINTING—SALVAGE

Mr. BENCE:

What was the cost value of the obsolete stationery and printing recovered as salvage from the equipment depots of the R.C.A.F., in each of the provinces of Manitoba, Saskatchewan, and Alberta, during the twelve-month period from May 1, 1943, to May 1, 1944?

Mr. MACMILLAN: No obsolete stationery was recovered as salvage. Certain recovery from forms and maintenance schedules was effected: (a) by reduction of such forms to scratch pads; (b) through equipment depots as salvage paper. The total original cost of material (forms, schedules, etc.) so used was: No. 7 equipment depot, Winnipeg, Man., $2,630.42; No. 11 equipment depot, Calgary, Alta., $1,689.60. Total, $4,320.02. There is no equipment depot in Saskatchewan.

WARTIME PRICES AND TRADE BOARD—ONTARIO TRUCK DIVISION, BILINGUAL EMPLOYEES

Mr. GAUTHIER:

1. What are the centres or districts of Ontario which have the services of bilingual employees in the wartime prices and trade board, truck division?

2. What are the names of such employees and the locations of their offices?

Mr. ABBOTT:

1 and 2. Centres in Ontario—Name of Employee.

Ottawa—Regional office, 69 Rideau St., Mrs. E. Beament, Mr. A. Renton, W. V. Kidd, L. G. Belanger, J. H. Lafreniere, E. D. Drouin, J. H. Pepin, F. Chevalier.

Windsor—Local office, Canada building, F. P. Bouteiller.

North Bay—Regional office, 169 Main St., L. Lamoureux, Miss R. Thomas.

Cochrane—Local office, King George Hotel, J. M. Gauthier, J. A. Brouillard, Mrs. E. Oulette.

Kirkland Lake—Local office, Roberge Bldg., L. E. Charette.

STRAIT OF CANSO FERRY

Mr. McGARRY:

1. What is the annual cost of the railway operations of the Strait of Canso ferry?

2. What is the cost of operating the ferry steamers, including maintenance, repairs of all kinds, and all operating costs?

3. What is the cost of switching engines on both sides, as well as the upkeep of the roundhouse, and all the equipment necessary for the operation carried on on both sides of the Strait of Canso?

4. What is the cost of freight haulage per ton mile from Sydney to Halifax, Sydney to Truro, and Sydney to Moncton, and the total tonnage hauled?

5. What would be the estimated cost of freight haulage with a bridge across the Strait of Canso, a new road alignment from Sydney to the strait, and from Sydney to Moncton, with grades reduced to possibly seven-tenths?

Mr. MICHAUD:

1. These costs are not segregated in the railway's accounts and are therefore not available.

2. $212,000 for the year 1943.

3. See answer to question No. 1.

4. With regard to the first part of this question, the information is not available in form requested. The total tons of freight handled over the line from Sydney to Point Tupper (both directions) for the year 1943, was about 2,500,000 tons, which quantity, however, is much above the average over a period of years.

5. It is not considered practicable to make a useful estimate as the cost of freight hauling depends on many more factors than the gradient of the lines.

With reference to questions 1, 3 and 4, the preparation of the information called for would entail a tremendous amount of clerical work in segregating the required items from the general operating and financial statistics of the railways. This work has not been undertaken on account of the lack of qualified staff due to war conditions.

VETERANS' LAND ACT

Mr. FAIR:

1. Up to the present time, how many parcels of land have been purchased in each province for account of Veterans' Land Act?

2. On how many parcels in each province has the board secured an option?

3. How many of these parcels are equipped with habitable buildings?

4. What is the price per acre paid or agreed on in each province for land, (a) with buildings; (b) without buildings?

5. Have any commissions been paid to individuals or other agencies for securing those lands?

6. If so, at what rate, to whom paid, and what amount was paid to each?

7. Will those commissions be included in the price charged to the settler in each case?

Mr. FAIR: I would ask that this question be dropped.

Question dropped.

CONSCIENTIOUS OBJECTORS—FARM WORK—DROUGHT BONUS

Mr. BRYCE:

1. Can the party operating a farm, owned by a conscientious objector now in camp, receive drought bonus?

2. If not, why?

[Mr. McGarry.]

Mr. GARDINER:

1. If otherwise eligible under the Prairie Farm Assistance Act and regulations, the fact that the farm of which he is the operator is owned by a conscientious objector does not render a farmer ineligible for the award.

2. Answered by No. 1.

FIBRE BOARD USED IN MANUFACTURE OF CHEESE BOXES

Mr. FRASER (Peterborough West):

1. Is a subsidy being paid on fibre board used in the manufacture of cheese boxes?

2. If so, how much is the subsidy per box?

3. What is the total amount of the subsidy to date?

4. Is there a subsidy being paid for elm veneer when used in the manufacture of cheese boxes?

5. If so, how much is the subsidy?

6. What is the total amount of subsidy paid to date?

7. In addition to the subsidy paid on materials used in the manufacture of cheese boxes, is there any subsidy paid on cheese boxes?

8. If so, what is the amount of the subsidy paid to date?

Mr. ABBOTT:

1. The Commodity Prices Stabilization Corporation Limited on the instructions of the wartime prices and trade board bulk purchases fibre board for use in the manufacture of cheese boxes. In order to supply this material to manufacturers at a price appropriate to the ceiling on finished cheese boxes, the corporation sells at a price considerably lower than cost.

2. The corporation's current trading loss amounts to 9 cents per cheese box body set plus handling and delivery costs.

3. The corporation's trading loss to March 31, 1944, on fibre board cheese box body sets amounts to $27,624.04.

4 and 7. The Commodity Prices Stabilization Corporation Limited is authorized by the wartime prices and trade board to pay a domestic subsidy to manufacturers on their sales of finished cheese boxes, but the rate of subsidy is based on the cost of veneer (including elm veneer) and heading used therein.

5. The rate of subsidy is the amount by which the combined cost of heading and veneer exceeds 27½ cents per set, but in no case may subsidy exceed 3 cents per finished cheese box. Subsidy is limited to 1½ cents on boxes in which fibre board purchased from Commodity Prices Stabilization Corporation is used. Where boxes are sold at less than ceiling prices, subsidy is reduced correspondingly. Subsidies are refunded to Commodity Prices Stabilization Corporation to the extent that they contribute to profits in excess to 116⅔ per cent of standard profits.

6 and 8. The total amount of subsidy paid to April 30, 1944, is $239.40.

PRODUCTION OF ALCOHOL FOR FUEL

Mr. BLACKMORE:

1. What additional factories were established in Canada for the production of alcohol for fuel in Canada during each of the years 1940, 1941, 1942 and 1943?

2. How much alcohol for fuel was produced in Canada during each of the years 1940, 1941, 1942 and 1943?

Mr. HOWE:

1. None.

2. None.

WARTIME PRICES AND TRADE BOARD—PRICES TO RETAILERS—TRANSPORTATION

Mr. ISNOR:

1. What is the distance in railway miles from Toronto to Winnipeg; from Toronto to Halifax, Nova Scotia; from Toronto to Sydney, Nova Scotia?

2. Because of transportation charges, what additional amount is allowed to retailers in the city of Winnipeg and west therefrom by the wartime prices and trade board under the provisions of orders No. 143 and No. 214?

3. Is the same allowance granted to Halifax and Sydney merchants?

4. If not, why not?

Mr. ABBOTT:

1. The distance by railway from Toronto to Winnipeg is 1,207 miles, C.N.R., and 1,231 miles C.P.R. from Toronto to Halifax, N.S.; —1,175 miles, C.N.R. and 1,099 miles C.P.R; from Toronto to Sydney, N.S.—1,337 miles C.N.R.

2. The majority of price fixations under the provisions of order No. 214 are established on an f.o.b. manufacturer's plant or shipping point basis, sales tax extra, to which wholesalers and retailers may add transportation charges and sales tax paid by them, if not included in the manufacturer's price. To this aggregate cost may be added a markup no greater than the markup customarily obtained by such wholesalers or retailers in pricing the same or their most nearly comparable line of merchandise during the basic period from September 15, 1941 to October 11, 1941. Provision is usually made in the price fixations for an over-riding maximum mark-up, which may not be exceeded.

Where it is a custom of the trade, principally in foodstuffs, prices to retailers may be fixed by zones. These are delivered prices, sales tax paid, and reflect transportation and other costs, to which the wholesaler or retailer may add his customary mark-up as outlined above.

The same general principles are followed in fixing prices under the powers contained in order No. 143.

3. Because of the difference in mileage it follows that the permitted addition for transportation charges to merchants in Halifax and Sydney would not necessarily be the same as in Winnipeg, but would be the actual transportation charges paid by the merchant.

4. Answered by No. 3.

What crown companies have been incorporated, (a) by statute; (b) by order in council?

FAMILY ALLOWANCES

PROVISION FOR PAYMENTS IN RESPECT OF CHILDREN UNDER SIXTEEN

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister) moved that the house go into committee at the next sitting to consider the following resolution:

That in order to ensure a greater measure of well-being to the children of the nation and to help gain for them a closer approach to equality of opportunity, it is expedient to introduce a measure to provide:

1. That family allowances, effective as from the first day of July, 1945, be paid in respect of each child in Canada under sixteen years of age, in accordance with the following scale:

in respect of a child less than six years old, five dollars per month; in respect of a child six or more years old but less than ten years old, six dollars per month;

in respect of a child ten or more years old but less than thirteen years old, seven dollars per month; in respect of a child thirteen or more years old but less than sixteen years old, eight dollars per month;

Provided that the above rates shall be reduced; by one dollar per month in respect of the fifth child; by two dollars per month in respect of the sixth child and seventh child; and by three dollars per month in respect of the eighth child and any additional child or children;

2. That the reduction in tax under the Income War Tax Act allowable to a taxpayer by reason of a child shall be reduced by an appropriate amount based upon the family allowances payable under the said measure;

3. That the amounts required under the said measure be paid out of unappropriated moneys in the consolidated revenue fund.

4. That the expenses necessary for the administration of the proposed act be paid out of the moneys appropriated by parliament for such purpose.

He said: His Excellency the Governor General, having been made acquainted with the subject matter of this resolution, recommends it to the consideration of the house.

Motion agreed to.

ROYAL CANADIAN AIR FORCE

DISTURBANCE AT VALLEYFIELD ON JUNE 19

On the orders of the day:

Mr. GORDON GRAYDON (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I desire to ask a question of the parliamentary assistant to the Minister of National Defence for Air. Will he give the house full information with respect to the recently reported incidents at Valleyfield?

Hon. CYRUS MACMILLAN (Parliamentary Assistant to the Minister of National Defence for Air): Mr. Speaker, I thank the hon. member for giving notice of his question. The A.O.C. of No. 3 training command reports that two men, one service and one civilian, were involved in a scuffle at 22:30 hours on the night of June 19 and were taken into protective custody by the local police. Subsequently a number of air force personnel appeared before the city gaol and requested the release of Sergeant Primeau, the airman involved, to which request the chief of police complied.

The full details of this are not entirely clear, but it appears that during the scuffle in the vicinity of the gaol a policeman received a blow, presumably from the fist of one of the service personnel present. His injuries, if any, were of a very minor nature and no hospitalization or medical treatment was necessary.

A court of inquiry was established ,and meanwhile all personnel, with the exception of a few who are living out, have been confined to barracks. The morning after the disturbance the usual route march was held, but these have been suspended by the A.O.C. in order not to excite any demonstrations. The A.O.C. stated that the newspaper reports were greatly exaggerated and that he has had conferences with the city manager and chief of police at Valleyfield, who are satisfied that everything possible is being done so that no further disturbances need be anticipated. He has assured the civic authorities that any service personnel involved would be made available upon their request.

The A.O.C. has detailed two of the command legal officers to conduct the inquiry, and when the proceedings are received full details will be available and will be forwarded to air headquarters as quickly as possible. Squadron Leader Chopin was acting as commanding officer during the absence of Wing Commander Cronyn on temporary duty. The latter has now returned to his station. There has apparently been a satisfactory end of the trouble, and there has been no further disturbance.

PRISONERS OF WAR

FAR EAST—REPRESENTATIONS AND ARRANGEMENT RESPECTING FOOD, CLOTHING AND MEDICAL SUPPLIES

On the orders of the day:

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I should like to make a statement respecting relief supplies to prisoners of war and internees in the far east.

On June 5 I promised the hon. member for New Westminster (Mr. Reid) that I would make a statement about efforts which are being made to improve the position of prisoners of war in the far east.

In January last I outlined the attempts which had been made by the Canadian government and the Canadian Red Cross Society in collaboration with other allied governments and Red Cross societies, to establish a regular service for the sending of food, clothing and medicines to our nationals in the far east. For over two years now, continuous efforts have been made by the governments and Red Cross societies of the British commonwealth and the United States to secure Japanese agreement to the regular transmission of relief supplies. In spite of repeated disappointments, and rejection by the Japanese government of one proposal after another, we have persevered in our efforts. So far, only supplies carried by the exchange vessel Gripsholm and by the British exchange vessels during the course of civilian repatriation movements have reached allied nationals in Japanese and Japanese controlled territory. All possible supplies were carried by these ships, but the amount was pitifully small in relation to the needs of the thousands of prisoners of war and civilians in the far east.

In December of last year representatives of the British, American and Canadian Red Cross societies meeting in Washington appealed to the Japanese Red Cross to use their influence with the Japanese government and to offer advice and suggestions, with a view to establishing a regular service for relief supplies. More recently, through the agency of the Swiss government, the governments of the British commonwealth countries proposed to the Japanese government a plan for the regular shipment of food and medicines in both directions on a neutral ship under the auspices of the International Committee of the Red Cross and manned by a neutral crew plying regularly between an agreed allied port and a port on the perimeter of Japanese-controlled territory. This proposal is similar to one originally made by the Canadian government in 1942 but dropped then because other proposals seemed more likely to be accepted.

The current plan provides that a second ship shall be placed at the disposal of the Japanese government to pick up the supplies at the entrepôt and carry them to points where they are needed. This second neutral ship might be manned by a Japanese crew.

As yet no reply has been received from the Japanese government to this proposal, which was submitted to them by the Swiss government on May 8.

Some time ago, limited stocks of food, clothing and medical supplies were shipped jointly by the Canadian and American Red Cross societies to Vladivostok for onward transmission to allied prisoners of war and internees in Japanese hands. The Soviet government agreed to hold these supplies until an agreement was reached with the Japanese authorities for their movement and there are now fifteen hundred tons of relief goods stored in Vladivostok. On May 10 the United States government received a communication from the Japanese government, offering to send a ship to a Soviet port at regular intervals to pick up the relief supplies already stored at Vladivostok, as well as additional shipments of relief and mail which would be sent subsequently to Soviet territory. The Soviet government was consulted and they have indicated their willingness to have the stocks loaded on a Japanese ship at a convenient port near Vladivostok, or alternatively to send the supplies over land to be delivered to the Japanese authorities at a convenient border railroad station. The Soviet government has also offered the facilities of an equally accessible port, to which future shipments of supplies and mail may be sent. The Soviet proposals have been communicated to the Japanese government, and it is hoped that a regular service for relief supplies and mail for distribution to allied nationals in Japanese custody may be established.

All relief supplies sent to the far east under any of these plans would be pooled, that is, would be made available to Canadian and other commonwealth prisoners of war and internees, as well as to those of the United States and the Netherlands.

I wish to make it clear that the Swiss government as protecting power for Canadian and other British commonwealth interests in Japan is the official channel through which all formal approaches to the Japanese government are made. I have already, more than once, spoken of the gratitude we owe the Swiss for their untiring efforts on behalf of our prisoners and civilians in enemy hands. The cooperation of the Soviet government has been requested in this instance in view of the desirability of establishing a depot on the pacific coast of the U.S.S.R. to which relief supplies can be forwarded and where they can be stored pending onward shipment to Japanese territory. The Canadian government, in common with the other interested governments, are deeply grateful to the Soviet government for their ready cooperation and willing assistance.

DEFENCE OF CANADA REGULATIONS

REPORT AS TO SECRET ORGANIZATION TO CREATE SEPARATE STATE IN QUEBEC AND PARTS OF ONTARIO

On the orders of the day:

Mr. FRED ROSE (Cartier): Mr. Speaker, in view of the statement made by an hon. member from the other place, reported in to-day's issue of the Montreal Gazette, with regard to the existence of a secret organization plotting to create a separate corporative state within the province of Quebec and parts of Ontario, will the Minister of Justice make a statement in the house, either to-day or in the near future, outlining steps his department will take to investigate the charges made?

Hon. L. S. ST. LAURENT (Minister of Justice): I might suggest to the hon. member that if he would put his question on the order paper without reference to any debate in the other place I could answer it without trespassing upon standing order 41 of this house.

Mr. SPEAKER: The hon. member should place his question on the order paper.

WHEAT BOARD

INQUIRY AS TO APPOINTMENT OF REPRESENTATIVE AT WASHINGTON

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. G. DIEFENBAKER (Lake Centre): I desire to ask a question of the Minister of Trade and Commerce, arising out of a press item to the effect that for the first time in its history the wheat board has appointed a representative in Washington. Is the minister prepared to give a statement with regard to this change? Will he indicate also whether the reports appearing in some of the United States papers, to the effect that arrangements have been made whereby after the war the United States will buy a larger amount of Canadian wheat than anticipated, are correct?

Hon. J. A. MacKINNON (Minister of Trade and Commerce): I am grateful to the hon. member for Lake Centre for giving me notice of his intention to ask these questions.

In answer to the first question, the Canadian wheat board has two principal considerations in appointing a representative in Washington. The first is that over the past eighteen months the United States has been purchasing very substantial quantities of feed grains from Canada, including wheat. For example, during the 1943-44 crop year to date the United States has imported 144,000,000 bushels of wheat, 62,000,000 bushels of oats, nearly 28,000,000 bushels of barley, nearly 9,000,000 bushels of rye and over 10,000,000 bushels of flaxseed. Altogether in the calendar year 1944 it is anticipated that the United States will import 170,000,000 bushels of Canadian wheat, in addition to what coarse grains are above our own requirements. Since the purchasing arrangements on wheat and the transportation on all grains have to be arranged between the Washington authorities and the Canadian wheat board, it will obviously be of advantage to the board to have a representative in Washington to serve as liaison between the board and the responsible Washington officials.

The second consideration is that Canada is an active participant in the operations of the combined food board, the cereals committee of which is bringing the grain supplies and requirements of the allied nations under international allocation. The cereals committee of the combined food board has been functioning since January of this year, with Mr. George McIvor, chief commissioner of the Canadian wheat board, serving as its chairman. Since it is impossible for Mr. McIvor to devote more than a small portion of his time to the work of this committee in Washington, the board's representative in Washington will be in a position to participate in the operations of the committee from day to day.

I might add that Mr. W. C. McNamara, who has been appointed to this position, has been associated with the Saskatchewan Pool Elevators Limited in Regina since 1924. More than two years ago he was lent to the Canadian wheat board and was in charge of the transportation department of the board. He has therefore been directly in touch with the transportation arrangements on the feed grain supplies which have already been moved to the United States.

I am sorry I am not in a position to-day to give the hon. member any information as to the supplies of wheat the United States may wish to buy in Canada next year. At the present time there does not appear to be any signs of a diminution in the demand from the United States.

GASOLINE

INQUIRY AS TO GOVERNMENT PURCHASE OF 80-OCTANE AND OTHER GRADES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. H. BLACKMORE (Lethbridge): In view of the statement made by the Minister of Munitions and Supply on gasoline supply on Tuesday, June 20, is the government in the market to purchase any quantity of 80-octane and other grades of aviation gasoline from others than the refineries?

Hon. C. D. HOWE (Minister of Munitions and Supply): It is the practice of the government to purchase its requirements of gasoline from refineries in Canada, which have either purchased the crude oil from Canadian sources, or have obtained petroleum from sources abroad which was brought into Canada through the agency of the oil controller. I know of no supplies in Canada that are not in the hands of refineries. If my hon. friend can show his wares and tell us where the gasoline is, we shall be very glad to buy it. I think I have some knowledge of the source referred to in his question, and if my hon. friend knew as much about it as I do, he would not be asking the question.

SUGAR

STATEMENT ON SUPPLIES FOR CANNING

On the orders of the day:

Hon. J. L. ILSLEY (Minister of Finance): I was asked a question by the hon. member for Haldimand (Mr. Senn) on Tuesday last about sugar for canning, and I promised to make a statement to-day. I dislike reading these long statements on the orders of the day, but I do not think there is any remedy for it.

Mr. GRAYDON: It is important.

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes. Under the direction of the combined food board, sugar is allocated to the United States and Canada on an equal per capita basis, but it is left to the authorities of each country to determine, on the basis of its own domestic circumstances, the most appropriate way for the given total of sugar so allocated to be distributed among its consumers. Thus there is no discrimination between consumers of the two countries as to the amount of sugar made available to them over-all, but each country has found it necessary to adopt plans suitable to the needs and habits of its own consumers for certain parts of the total distribution. The distribution of canning sugar has always presented a difficult problem with sugar rationing.

In 1943 the United States authorities, as an experiment, adopted the policy of making a maximum of twenty-five pounds of sugar per person available for canning purposes (only five pounds of which could be used for preserving jams, jellies and marmalade), ten pounds of this quantity being available through two coupons in each ration book and the remaining fifteen pounds being obtained by application to local ration boards, indicating the quantities of fruits and preserves to be canned. Under this scheme United States consumers took up an average of only thirteen pounds of canning sugar per capita, and only approximately forty-five per cent of consumers made application for canning sugar beyond the ten pounds obtainable by ration book coupons.

Our experience in Canada was markedly different. In 1943 consumers were required to apply to their local ration boards for their full supply of canning sugar. While the wartime prices and trade board had anticipated that perhaps thirty-five per cent of the population would make application, in actual fact eighty-four per cent of all consumers applied for an average of approximately twenty-three pounds of canning sugar per person. As this amount was just over double the amount of sugar which Canada had allocated for canning purposes or had previously used for this purpose, the solution which had to be adopted was to distribute through local ration boards an average amount of 11·3 pounds per applicant, the actual distribution of this amount in each district being left somewhat to the discretion of the local ration board to permit adjustment to local conditions. In addition, the introduction of the preserves ration in September made available, through the sugar alternative of the preserves ration, a maximum of an extra four pounds of sugar during the last four months of 1943, thus making it likely that consumers in Canada obtained on the average the thirteen pounds of sugar for canning which was the average in the United States.

Officials in the two countries are inclined to feel that the different results obtained in the two countries on the basis of somewhat similar policies are probably largely due to the fact that in many of the larger American cities an important section of the population does little or no home canning, with the result that on the average the supply of sugar for home canning has to be more widely distributed in Canada than in the United States. In any event, the experience of the United States authorities was such as to justify them in adopting for 1944 a policy very similar to that they had used in 1943. The only amendments made were those of detail; for example, only one coupon was included in ration books to cover the acquisition of five pounds of canning sugar, application being required for the remaining twenty pounds this year as opposed to fifteen pounds last year, while consumers were relieved from the necessity of indicating this year in their applications how much fruit and preserves they proposed to put up. In addition, the five-pound restriction on sugar for jams, jellies and marmalade, a limitation which was never in effect in Canada, was removed. It should be noted that, although consumers may receive a maximum of twenty pounds of canning sugar on application, it lies within the discretion of local ration boards to reduce the amounts requested, and should, for instance, our own experience of last year be duplicated in the United States this year, this would become inevitable on a wide scale.

In Canada, on the other hand, our experience obviously indicated that a plan of this sort would be impracticable. Accordingly, it was decided to combine a standard allotment of ten pounds of canning sugar per consumer, to be available through special coupons in ration books, with a provision for supplementary quantities of sugar obtainable through the sugar alternative of the preserves coupon. This plan has the important advantage of providing the flexibility which is so desirable as between individual households, and of establishing an extremely equitable basis of distribution in that those households whose practice it is to do more home canning, and to purchase less in the way of commercially packed preserves, are able to do so by converting preserves coupons into sugar.

It is fully expected, in light of past experience, that this plan of dealing with the extremely difficult problem of canning sugar will prove to be satisfactory. Accordingly, and in view of the fact that there is no discrimination between Canadian consumers on one hand and American consumers on the other in the total amount of sugar being made available to them, there is no intention of amending the canning sugar distribution plans already announced.

RECONSTRUCTION

ESTABLISHMENT OF DEPARTMENT TO FORMULATE AND CARRY OUT RECONSTRUCTION PLANS

The house resumed from Tuesday, June 20, consideration of the motion of Mr. Mackenzie King for the second reading of Bill No. 82, to establish a Department of Reconstruction.

Mr. BROOKE CLAXTON (St. Lawrence-St. George): Mr. Speaker, at this time our thoughts are overseas with the Canadian forces who are fighting in a way that is worthy of their country and their cause. We look forward to the day when they will return, and we recognize that the very best welcome we can give them when they do return is that every one of them shall have employment in a job that will use his capacities to the full. The purpose of the department which this bill is to set up is to assist in creating opportunities for such employment, as well as to assist in coordinating the whole work of reconstruction. I would have thought that such a bill introduced at this time might have received not only the support of all members but their support in speeches which did not raise political considerations. But on Tuesday night, when the debate began, there were one or two remarks made to which I think I should refer.

I refer particularly to remarks made by the leader of the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation in his speech in the house on Tuesday night. Towards the end of that speech he spoke as though he and his party wanted to see one single plan of reconstruction for the whole country. He spoke as though reconstruction was a tangible problem dealing with something concrete that could be dealt with in a single plan. He said at the end of his speech:

> I was thinking of a plan for the whole country. A plan for all Canada would be more fitting than that.

We undoubtedly need plans for reconstruction, but no single plan will meet the needs of the Canadian people, of the Canadian provinces, of the Canadian municipalities, of Canadian industry, of Canadian agriculture, and of the government of the country as a whole. What we need is a complex of plans which will meet those needs. And we need more than that. We need an attitude towards the whole problem of reconstruction. We are not going to solve the problem by setting down a hard-and-fast blueprint, because we do not know what the conditions will be that we shall have to meet. We do not know when the war will end. We do not know how long the war against Japan will last, and naturally until we know those things we cannot set down the hard-and-fast lines of a plan. The whole problem is so complex and complicated that what is needed is a very flexible and resilient arrangement of devices, ideas and plans which will be ready to deal with the whole problem or with any part of the problem as it presents itself.

On that account we must regard the problem as complicated and difficult, and we are not going to meet it by saying that it is easy. We can provide full employment for all the people of Canada and provide a maximum of income, but not by wishful thinking. It is not going to be met in that way. It can be met, but it is not going to be met by doing nothing about it, and it is the purpose of this department to coordinate the activities that must be carried on to do what is necessary when it is necessary to meet the problem.

Equally we cannot meet this problem by crying blue ruin and disaster, or by saying that after the war we are not going to have full employment, or that we are not going to be able to do this and that; and that, Mr. Speaker, is the attitude taken to a very considerable degree by the gentlemen opposite in the southwest corner.

Mr. BLACKMORE: Whom do you mean?

Mr. CLAXTON: Most of the members of the Social Credit party and the members of the C.C.F.

Mr. BLACKMORE: That is entirely false. The hon. member has no right to make a remark of that kind at all, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. CLAXTON: I can refer the hon. member to his own questions put in the course of debate at pages 3987, 3996 and 4015 of Hansard, which show just that attitude. As for the C.C.F., I had proposed to make a very brief reference to a speech made in the course of the Saskatchewan campaign by the leader of the C.C.F. party in that province, now the Premier of Saskatchewan.

Mr. BLACKMORE: I challenge the hon. member to support his statement with respect to the Social Credit party.

Mr. CLAXTON: I have given the references.

Mr. BLACKMORE: I ask the minister to read the questions to show that he has the right to draw the conclusions he has drawn. I challenge him to do it.

Mr. CLAXTON: The hon. member can read them as well as I.

Mr. BLACKMORE: The hon. member has made a statement, and I challenge him to support it by reading what I said.

Mr. CLAXTON: The passage I wish to read from the speech of Mr. Douglas in a radio talk given in Regina is the following:

> Liberal speakers are telling you how much better off you are. How many boys' lives has it cost to get $1.20 a bushel for wheat? My friends, it is not your economic position to-day that should determine your actions. Remember what you have come through before the war and what you will be called upon to go through after the war. I do not agree with those who claim that the farmer and worker are well off to-day—if I had time I could show you that the real beneficiaries of this war-time prosperity are the meat packers, heavy industry and financial institutions. The only difference the war has made is that the farmer can sell his produce and the worker can get a job. Every thinking person knows that under our system of free enterprise unemployment and low prices will follow the end of the war as night follows day.

Mr. COLDWELL: What is wrong with that? Was not that our previous experience?

Mr. REID: The prophecy might be wrong. That is what is wrong with it. Have you no hope?

Mr. COLDWELL: That is what happened after the last war when the Liberals were in power.

Mr. REID: That is the guff you have been giving the public.

Mr. SPEAKER: Order. I hope hon. members will realize that we are in the House of Commons.

Mr. REID: Some of them don't.

Mr. MARTIN: Some of them from Saskatchewan don't.

Mr. COLDWELL: If you want to re-fight the Saskatchewan election, all right.

Mr. GARDINER: We will re-fight it four years from now.

Mr. SPEAKER: I must ask hon. members to bear in mind that the hon. member who is addressing the house is entitled to speak without interruption.

Mr. CLAXTON: Mr. Speaker, I can answer the leader of the C.C.F. In putting forward the case for his party, in Saskatchewan and elsewhere, he and his supporters do not look at the situation of Canada as it is to-day, in 1944; that would not suit their book; that is too good. They look back to 1932—

Mr. COLDWELL: Why not?

Mr. CLAXTON: —and they do so because they were not in power in 1932; therefore, they argue, they should be in power in 1945 or some other time; whereas I suggest to my hon. friend that it would be just as logical to contend that because the Liberal party were not in power in 1932 they should be in power for ever and a day. The plain fact is that references to 1932 have about as much relation to the situation in 1944 and the future as references would have to a period before the last war.

Mr. COLDWELL: What about 1938 and 1939?

Mr. CLAXTON: There was a very great change between 1938 and 1939 and 1932, as my hon. friend knows.

Mr. COLDWELL: A million people were on relief.

Mr. CLAXTON: I would like to contrast this statement made by Mr. Douglas in the Regina election with the statement made a year before to the Trades and Labour Congress of Canada at Quebec city by the Minister of Finance (Mr. Ilsley) on the first of September, 1943. In that statement the Minister of Finance said this:

> We have learned very much and developed a long way in Canada during the past four years of war. We have completed to a large degree our transition to an industrial nation. Our manufacturing capacity has been increased by perhaps 50 per cent in these few years. Hundreds of thousands of Canadians have acquired new skills and learned to manage modern machinery. Our workers have demonstrated that they can produce—quickly and efficiently—many types of products which formerly we thought we had to get from Britain or the States. We have succeded in more than doubling our industrial production. We have discovered far greater reserves of productive capacity and ability than I believe any of us realized before the war.

Mr. COLDWELL: Did we not have enough capacity in 1933 and 1934?

Mr. CLAXTON: My hon. friend, as I said, is living in the past. He refers continuously to the depression of 1932, 1933 and 1934.

Mr. COLDWELL: And 1939.

Mr. CLAXTON: That is the attitude of the party to which I referred. The people and the government of Canada had about as much to do with the depression as the man in the moon. That depression was created by a world depression.

Mr. SENN: Hear, hear. That is a new story.

Mr. REID: No country did any better.

Mr. SPEAKER: Order.

Mr. CLAXTON: The Minister of Finance went on:

> During the war, our economic controls and our financial and productive efforts have had to be directed to the destruction of the enemy. We have had to restrict our general standard of living, while protecting that of those near the minimum, in order that we could attain the highest possible standard of fighting. When the war is over, however, we must and will I believe, turn our economic management, our newly found productive power, and our financial capacity to the improvement of the Canadian standard of living. It is then that we shall reap the fruits of the peace we have secured and of the experience we have gained.

Mr. BLACKMORE: How? Not a word about how it is to be done.

Mr. NOSEWORTHY: The same promises were made in 1939.

Mr. SPEAKER: Order.

Mr. McDONALD (Pontiac): The school teachers are showing a good example!

Mr. SPEAKER: I must again call attention to the fact that this is not a private debate between hon. members of various parties. The hon. member for St. Lawrence-St. George (Mr. Claxton) has the floor, and he is entitled to speak without interruption unless he is willing that questions should be put to him. I must ask hon. members on all sides of the house to observe that rule.

Mr. CLAXTON: I believe that I have never interrupted anyone in the house, but I have always been willing to answer questions. With regard to the question of the hon. member for Lethbridge, he has put that question three times in this debate; it has been answered three times; he has put it constantly to the house, and I do not think I should take up my time now in answering it any further. But I hope that my speech as it goes along will be an answer which he can accept, if he wishes.

The Minister of Finance in the speech which I have cited, referred to the objects at which we should aim and the paths we should take. I wish I had time to read extensively from this speech; it is magnificent. He ended with these words:

> What I wish to emphasize to you to-day however is not the detailed direction in which we must advance, but rather that we must advance with the same vigour and energy after the war that we are now using in the war itself. We must pursue better housing with the same effort and effectiveness that we are devoting now to price control. We must conceive and carry out social insurance with the same boldness and thoroughness with which we have raised the income tax for war purposes. We must have the same courage and faith in financing useful peace-time development as we have had to apply in financing the war. We must retain the confidence that we have gained in the war, and shake off for ever the frustration which fell upon us in the 1930's.

I ask hon. members to contrast those two statements—the statement of Mr. Douglas, in which he said how many boys' lives it cost to get $1.20 a bushel for wheat, and referred to the certainty of unemployment under the present system, and the statement of the Minister of Finance, in which he lays down aims and purposes and points the way that will be taken to achieve those aims. He, probably more than any man in Canada outside the Prime Minister himself, is by his service to the country demonstrating his capacity to carry out what he says he will do.

We are not going back after this war to 1939 or to 1932. We are not going back to any previous period. We are going forward on the basis of where we are at the end of the war, on the basis of 1944, 1945, 1946—whenever the war ends. I should like to call to the attention of hon. members that that starting point which we will have at the end of the war is a very different place and will find us in a very different situation from where we were even at the beginning of the war, and still less in 1932. The war has had an enormous effect on our productive capacity and on our skills. A country which can produce over 500 naval vessels and 200 ten thousand-ton boats, or 80,000 units of artillery and 10,000 planes, is a nation of considerable industrial capacity.

The London Economist, the leading British business paper, wrote:

> Canada will emerge from the war one of the great industrial nations. She will be able to produce fifty per cent more iron and steel, five times as much aluminum, quantities of magnesium, tungsten, mercury and chromium. Her hydro-electric power capacity will be twenty per cent higher. She will have great shipyards, aeroplane factories, explosive and chemical plants, a synthetic rubber plant, armament factories, machine tool industries, instrument laboratories which were not here before the war. About one billion dollars has been spent in four years in additions to plant and equipment. There is a new industrial army of skilled men and women workers. A new tradition and a rich experience have been acquired.

What does this mean to people who are going to want jobs after the war? It means that provided we use these new capacities and these new skills we can produce jobs for everyone, jobs at wages that have never been known before.

Our position has improved in many other directions. Take wages, already the average weekly pay cheque of people engaged in manufacturing has gone up by almost fifty per cent. The national income has been doubled; about ninety per cent of the people of Canada are better off than ever before; the external debt has been reduced; dividends have been reduced; salaries have been reduced, but wages income and security have gone up. The same thing is true of the position of the farmers. Despite a twenty-four per cent decrease in the number of people on the farms, the farmers of Canada are producing more than twice what they are doing before and they are getting twice as much as they got in 1939 for their produce. Agricultural production has doubled. The real purchasing power of the great majority of families in Canada is much higher than it has ever been, and to-day there are half a million more bank accounts than there were in 1939. Over seven million life insurance policies are in force, and three million Canadians bought war bonds in the last loan. The savings of individual men and women have increased by nearly four billions since the war.

An hon. MEMBER: That is war time.

Mr. CLAXTON: Yes. But we are not going to go back to the pre-war condition and stop everything just because my hon. friend says we are going to.

Now we can compare this situation with what it was in the last war. In the last war a few rich people became richer and poor people became poorer. That the exact contrary is true now is owing to the policies of the government and the support of the people of Canada during this war. In addition, there have been immense social gains in Canada owing to the way the war has been run. There has been a much better and fairer distribution of the national income, and there has been, in addition, unemployment insurance. To-day we heard read the notice to introduce a resolution to provide for family allowances on a scale not known in any other country in the world. That is part of the programme, and it is not a programme that will be put off until some far distant date. It is being carried out now while the war is on. My hon. friends can talk about the post-war period, but we are going to do in the way of social reform in Canada during the war the things that hon. gentlemen opposite talk about as part of their programme for the post-war period. We are going to begin the period of reconstruction very much better off not only than Canada has ever been before but probably better off than any other country in the world. We shall have greater natural resources. The record of achievement in the war, by our soldiers, workmen, industrialists, and farmers, is one that will make us proud to carry on after the war in the same splendid fashion as during hostilities.

The war has brought a change in the Canadian spirit, and that is something that we should recognize. No longer shall we be willing to face anything like the 1930's. We will not stand it, and there is no reason why we should. My friends opposite have not a prerogative of that kind of talk, because nobody is going to stand it, and nobody is going to have to stand it. It is not going to happen.

In this kind of discussion, very frequently, there creep in comparisons with the situation in other countries. As I said the other day in this house, it is unwise to make such comparisons unless for the purpose of emulation; but when these comparisons are made in a discussion of this kind invariably the person making the comparison picks out one single thing in respect of which some other country is better off and Canada has to match the best in the world. Well, usually Canada can match the best in all the world. But when we come to New Zealand particularly, a country for which I have the highest regard and where I have a great number of friends, I would suggest to my friends opposite that when they make comparisons they be fair and compare not only the scheme of social insurance, which is excellent in that country and which leads the world—there is no doubt about that—but also the standard of living, the standard of wages, national income, the burden of debt per capita and the rate of interest that is payable on the debt of New Zealand. They should also compare the climates, soils and geographical situations of the two countries. If we are going to make comparisons, let us make a fair comparison and see where we stand and where they stand.

We cannot match every country with regard to everything, but we can say that there are few countries in the world which have so much of what is best as Canada has; and I ask my hon. friends, when they discuss the post-war situation here in comparison with other countries, to ask themselves frankly and honestly what country can offer more, where in the world can a young man such as any of our boys who are returning from overseas find better prospects for the future than in Canada?

We are going forward on the basis of where we shall be at the end of the war and not on the basis of where we were in 1932, and to do that we shall require a set of arrangements similar to, though not the same as, those that are necessary to conduct the war. The same kind of foresight, the same kind of cooperation, the same kind of coordination as are necessary in the conduct of the war will be needed for the mobilization of the resources of Canada, human and material, in the post-war period.

The problem of reconstruction has been usually considered under three heads. First is the rehabilitation and demobilization of the armed forces. On that, Canada's record is said by impartial observers to be the best in the world. We are said to have the most complete and comprehensive programme of any in the world, a programme already working, not one to be carried out in the future, and that will improve steadily as discoveries and suggestions are made to that end.

But as I said in the opening of my remarks, the soldier's best welcome home is a job, and so the biggest part of our work in preparing for the post-war period must be to provide for industrial reconversion, and the provision of means of gainful employment for all our people who are willing and able to work.

This is going to be the greatest of all combined operations, and the new department will have the job of examining all plans and reports that have been made in order to provide maximum production, maximum employment, maximum income and maximum security. The department will look over all projects for public works and housing and fit them into a programme which can be put into action where it is necessary. It will involve close cooperation with industry, labour and the primary producers. It will involve the development of new industries, the extension of improvements gained during the war, the application of research, and the encouragement of initiative. The work already done in this field has been described by the Prime Minister. I have had an opportunity of examining it personally, and I can testify to the amount and the quality of the work of planning that has been done by the various interdepartmental committees that have been looking into this subject. That work will find its ultimate expression in government policy.

First comes the conversion of industry itself. Whether that industry be conducted by private enterprise or be publicly owned, the problems will be very much the same, and this question is receiving continuous consideration to-day under various heads, some of which I might mention.

Aids to production and cost reduction; tax and tariff reforms; expanded research; promotion of improved production and distribution methods; cheap credit, under which would come the Industrial Development bank, the National Housing Act, the agricultural credit bank, the central mortgage bank, amendments to the Bank Act, and the policies of the Bank of Canada; checks on inflation—because it is just as important in this post-war period that we do not let prices run away with us as it is to-day, and it may be more difficult then, so that we must consider what kind of controls will be needed to check inflation and distribute commodities in scarce supply. I should think the policy of this party, as opposed to that of some of the other parties, is to have the minimum amount of control necessary to do the job. Then there are improvements in labour efficiency; expanded employment service; increased vocational and technical training facilities; effective grievance, arbitration and conciliation machinery, and the development and extension into the peace-time period of labour-management committees.

Then we come to the second main class of subjects receiving continuous consideration at the present time: the promotion and stabilization of markets. Under this come expanded foreign trade promotion services, which include reorganized trade commission service, machinery for greater coordination of departments and outside interests concerned with foreign trade; export credits—an export credit bill has been announced in the speech from the throne—and other similar subjects. To increase domestic consumption, which is part of the problem, we have the guaranteed floor prices announced in the speech from the throne; monetary policy; subsidies of various kinds as, for example, the subsidies to provide for guaranteed floor prices.

As part of the programme to increase consuming power and expand markets for Canadian goods, we have the social security programme, including the measure of which notice was given to-day, the family allowance legislation. This is a great step forward in the equalization and fair distribution of income, and at the same time a great humanitarian measure to provide a basic minimum for the family with children. It is one of the greatest and most daring financial and economic measures ever put forward in a democracy to increase the consuming and purchasing power of the whole community.

There is another class of subjects, Mr. Speaker, which must be considered and which is receiving continuous consideration; that is, the avoidance of obstacles to business. This means the removal of discriminatory and discouraging taxation, of the fear of direct governmental competition in various fields and, of course, measures to eliminate the domination of markets by cartels and monopolies.

All these matters are receiving consideration in various levels of the government departments to-day. The policies have been announced in the speech from the throne, and they will be amplified in good time, and in sufficient time.

From the field of industry, whether conducted privately or by public corporations, we come to the field of public improvements. This field usually holds first place in the minds of the people, and various parliamentary committees have given the matter a great deal of consideration. On Tuesday of this week the hon. member for Davenport (Mr. MacNicol) made a very interesting and constructive speech on this subject. This field may, if everything works out for the best, prove to be the least important in the long run, because if the economic and financial policies of the government are effective, and if we have a reasonable amount of international trade after the war, we will find that the programme of public improvements will not need to be nearly as extensive as some people now feel or fear. However, public improvements will be needed, and plans are being prepared. I can assure hon. members that hundreds of plans are now ready or in process of preparation, and the provinces and municipalities are similarly at work. What is required is that the work be coordinated, and then that questions of priority be settled.

All this great complex of questions involved in restoring our economy from a war-time to a peace-time basis can be carried out only with the united cooperation and good will of the Canadian people. It can also be carried out only by the cooperation of the dominion and the provinces, and for that purpose the dominion government has called a conference with the provinces, to be held just as soon as the convenience of all can be met. The purpose of that conference, and the attitude of the dominion at the conference, will be just this: that the ten governments concerned will sit down around a table to see what the post-war needs of the Canadian people are, how those needs can be met, and who can best do each part of the job.

Mr. JAQUES: The blind leading the blind.

Mr. CLAXTON: Well, the work already achieved in this field, as indicated in the Prime Minister's speech, would hardly indicate any great degree of blindness. I should think the reputation Canada has won for herself in the other countries of the world in the fields of economic and financial policy during the war, and the record of the Canadian people, would indicate that our policies will stand comparison with those of any other country in the world, and that they have led most other countries.

This conference between the dominion and the provinces will be of the utmost importance to the future of the people of Canada. I think it must be evident from the attitude taken so far by the dominion and the members of the government that the conference will not be entered into with any thought of endeavouring merely to secure the transfer of constitutional and financial power by one side or the other. The conference aims to see what is best for the people of Canada, how their needs can be met and who can best meet them; and if, as I expect, the provinces meet the dominion in that spirit, we can look forward to a satisfactory arrangement to deal with all these questions.

We cannot anticipate everything that lies ahead, but we can do a great deal. I can assure hon. members and the country at large that from what I have seen of the work of the economic advisory committee, of the various inter-departmental committees, and of the committee in preparation for the dominion-provincial conference, these questions, which are of the utmost concern to all members, to all people in Canada and to our boys and girls in the armed forces, are receiving consideration every day of the week by about as able a group of servants any people or any government in the world can boast.

We can help them. Various parliamentary committees have been of enormous help, as have also the voluntary associations, committees and agencies of different kinds which have forwarded briefs. There are literally hundreds of plans for post-war reconstruction and development available. It will be the task of the new minister to coordinate all those activities and to draw them together in what I have described as the greatest combined operation—next to the war—in the history of the people of Canada. I am confident we can meet the challenge in a way which will justify the opportunities given to us by our being privileged to live in this great and glorious country.

Mr. A. J. BROOKS (Royal): Mr. Speaker, I followed with much interest the speech of the hon. member who has just taken his seat. I shall not discuss any of his arguments, but I was amused when at the outset of his speech he appeared to banter across the floor with members of the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation party. It has occurred to me that there might be considerable jealousy between the government and the C.C.F. We have always been told that the C.C.F. was the party of the left, and that they were travelling on the left side of the road. If we follow the legislation offered by the present government for some time past it seems to me the public might be justified in concluding that the government is jockeying with the C.C.F. for this particular position.

An hon. member who spoke a few days ago said that the Liberal party was following the middle of the road. As all hon. members know, that is a dangerous position. However, they may have been on the right side of the road at one time and crossed over to the middle. At the moment however they are now crowding the ditch on the left side of the road, and if we can believe indications I am satisfied they will soon be in the ditch.

It is not my intention to analyse the bill at length. Opportunity will be afforded in committee, when the bill is considered section by section; so that I shall content myself with making a few remarks in respect of its general application.

I am sure all hon. members approve the government's action in setting up a Department of Reconstruction. It is a necessity; and any government in power at the present time would have had to follow a similar procedure. Not only is it a necessity in Canada, but in this war-torn world I am satisfied every country will have to set up departments of reconstruction, or take other steps to build up their worn-out industries.

A few days ago the Prime Minister (Mr Mackenzie King) said that he had no idea how long the war in Europe would last. He also said that when the war was over it would be necessary for us to operate against Japan. I believe that all hon. members will agree heartily with those statements. He pointed out, however, that reconstruction, because of its tremendous implications, could not be left until the close of the war. We know as a matter of fact that many men have already been demobilized in Canada. Those men must be rehabilitated in civil life, and we must also make our plans so that we can look after the men who are coming home, look after those who are engaged in the manufacture of munitions, and in general look after the problems of the country in years to come.

Some speakers have pointed out that the responsibility rests with all governing bodies, and with that statement I agree. Our federal government, our municipal governments, even governments of towns and villages, including all the individuals of which they are composed, are interested in matters of reconstruction, and all must bear their share of the responsibility.

As the last speaker (Mr. Claxton) said, we are fortunate in Canada in having great natural resources. No party, of course, can claim credit for those resources; they are our great, God-given heritage. But it is up to our government and to us as individuals to see that those resources are used to the very best advantage. We have great agricultural lands, extending from one end of Canada to the other, and capable of yielding abundant crops of all kinds. We have great mineral deposits in the far north capable of producing untold wealth. Our waters teem with fish, and we have more than three-quarters of a million square miles of productive forest lands. In addition to these we have harnessed much of our water-power for the production of electrical energy, and there is great potential capacity still unharnessed. Nature has indeed been more than kind to us, and if, as other hon. members have said, any country can formulate policies for reconstruction and the employment of its people, certainly that country should be Canada.

But it is not enough to possess these great resources. We shall benefit from them only as we learn to develop them directing what is necessary of the finished products to our own use, and trading the surplus in other parts of the world.

When he spoke the other day the Prime Minister said:

> We shall do well, I believe, to bear in mind that prosperity is indivisible. It is not something which one nation can have and enjoy by itself; it is something that has to be shared. We shall have to come to see that we are members one of another and that no nation liveth unto itself.

That is a statement with which all can agree; there can be no prosperity in the world unless every nation is prosperous. I believe one hon. member has said that in point of air travel we are within sixty hours of any other spot on the face of the earth. No doubt that time will be still further contracted as the aeroplane becomes faster and faster, and as time goes on. As no nation can be prosperous unless all other nations are prosperous, so in Canada no part can be prosperous unless every other section prospers. We can go farther and say that no industry can be prosperous unless other industries prosper, and that no city or town can prosper unless the people throughout the country and in the farming districts also prosper.

I believe I may be pardoned if in my brief observations this afternoon I refer to some of the problems facing the people in the maritime provinces. I would ask hon. members to consider some of our primary industries, and how a process of reconstruction may be applied to them. Let us first consider the fishing industry. Some of us live by the sea, and many of our people are engaged in that great industry, one which is widely diversified. In the maritime provinces we have over 2,000 miles of coast line, and there are many thousands of square miles in which fishing operations are conducted. Over thirty thousand fishermen are employed in the industry. They, with their families, constitute about one-sixth of the population in the maritime provinces.

We have many varieties of edible fish. I think it can be truthfully said that the finest fish anywhere in the world are caught in the waters in and around the three maritime provinces. About seventy-nine per cent in value of the catch in those provinces is taken not by the offshore fishermen, as they are called, but by the inshore fishermen. That means they are caught by the individual fisherman, and it becomes the livelihood of the small man, or the man who goes out in his own boat and does his own fishing and does not depend upon trawlers or some other larger means of catching fish.

From 1923 to 1939 the fishing industry in those provinces was in a very poor condition. It was in a state of depression. The average earnings of a fisherman were estimated at that time to be $244 per year, not including operating expenses. The situation became so bad that, as hon. members will remember, one of the great daily papers of the maritime provinces, the Halifax Herald, decided to make an investigation. They sent one of the members of the press gallery here, Mrs. Tufts, to investigate the situation. I think that all hon. members are familiar with the excellent report that was made by Mrs. Tufts. In 1932 the price of fish to the fishermen was one cent per pound. I do not think any more need be said to call the attention of the house to the deplorable conditions affecting any group of men who would have to accept a price like that. In 1939 it had risen to one and three-quarter cents a pound.

The hon. member for Charlotte (Mr. Hill) said on Tuesday last that a floor had been put under the price of fish. That is true, but it was done by the price control board as a war measure. What I wish to emphasize to the house is that after the war in the reconstruction period a floor price must also be put under the price of fish if the fishing industry is to be maintained in those small provinces.

A number of other things were recommended by the fishermen of the maritime provinces in the brief which was submitted to the reconstruction committee. I wish to support in every way possible these recommendations. One of them was that freezing plants and cold storage plants be located at strategic points along the coasts of the different provinces. If that were done it would be of great benefit —and I might point out that it could well become a public utility. The fishermen have suffered in the past because of a lack of many facilities for catching, freezing and marketing of their fish. There is no reason why, in the days of reconstruction, this great body of our inhabitants should not receive the consideration which has been withheld from them so long.

There is also the matter of transportation. I am not going to deal with these points particularly, but I should like to bring them to the attention of the house. These fish are perishable, as everyone knows, and facilities for transporting them must be provided so that they may get to the different markets in good condition. I do not know whether it is feasible or not, but it seems to me that aeroplanes could be utilized for that purpose. We read of thousands of men being transported to France in great air liners. It is possible in the days to come that the fishing industry can be greatly helped by exporting fish from the maritime provinces by aeroplane to the different markets in Canada. It may also be possible to do it by glider plane, in order that the people of the central provinces and other parts of Canada may have the benefit of the fresh fish of the maritimes.

One of the other great resources of our country is our forests. More than ninety per cent of the forest areas are owned by the crown. By that I do not mean to say they are owned by the Dominion of Canada, but they are owned in the right of the provinces and the dominion. This great asset has been greatly neglected in the past. When I came back from overseas after the last war someone pointed out to me the terrible waste in the forests of our land. I also had the opportunity, as did most men who were overseas, of visiting the forests of England and France, and of making a comparison between the care given them in Europe and in Canada. The lack of care that we have given them in Canada is something that would, I am sure, appal hon. gentlemen. I have walked through the forests in England and in France. You would not find in those forests a small piece of wood the size of your finger. Everything is conserved and gathered up. Underbrush is cleared away. The forests are protected in every way. In this country we have been most neglectful. It is still true that for every hundred thousand feet of timber cut an additional forty thousand feet is lost through fire. Insects and disease destroy another large portion. There has been and still is waste everywhere in the forests of this country. In the past—this has been debated before in this house, but since it is so important I see no harm in again calling attention to it—the dominion parliament has not taken a vital interest in the matter. It has not realized the great asset we have in the forests of the country. I contend that in the reconstruction period no finer work could be done by the reconstruction department now being set up than the conservation, protection and care of the great forests of Canada.

In my own province we depend largely on the forests. Over eighty per cent of the twenty-eight thousand square miles of New Brunswick is still unsettled. It is made up of forest and woodlands to a great extent. For the year 1943 the estimated value of the forest products of New Brunswick totalled $56,000,000. This figure included the value of 300,000,000 board feet of sawn lumber; 823,000 cords of pulpwood used in the six pulp and paper mills in the province; 464,000 cords sold outside, and nearly a million cords of firewood—a product of great importance in the present national fuel emergency. Therefore everyone can see what a valuable asset the forests are not only to Canada, but to the small provinces, and to New Brunswick in particular.

I have read the report of the subcommittee on agricultural policy. I do not intend this afternoon to make any extended remarks with regard to it, but I agree in large measure with all the recommendations that have been made. I suggest that when the department is set up the recommendations of the committee on agricultural policy be implemented.

In New Brunswick we are interested not only in fishing and forestry as primary industries. Agriculture is a great industry. Any one who has visited New Brunswick and has gone down the Saint John river must have realized that it is one of the finest farming districts of Canada. He would also find the same splendid farms up the Kennebecasis river, over through the Annapolis valley, and in other parts of Nova Scotia and in practically all of Prince Edward Island. Close attention must be paid by the reconstruction committee to the position of the farmers in the three maritime provinces. To-day our farms can produce. During the war we have produced, with a limited number of men to work on the farms, far more agricultural products than we did in pre-war days. To give hon. gentlemen an idea of our production, in 1942 and 1943 we had the largest crops in the history of the province; and they were produced, I would point out, with many thousands of our young men overseas, with worn-out machinery, and with the people at home having to work very long hours. Our production of butter was 7,000,000 pounds in 1942, an increase of forty per cent; and I am very proud to say that in my home town of Sussex there is a butter factory which produced more butter in one month in 1943 than any other butter factory in the whole Dominion of Canada. But we have our handicaps and they constitute one of the problems which must be considered by the reconstruction committee.

One of the handicaps of the farmers of the maritime provinces has been high freight rates, and another the lack of markets. The question of freight rates has been discussed in this house on a good many occasions, and it would not be fair for me to take up time in dealing with it now. But it is a question that should engage the attention of the reconstruction committee, because high freight rates have a detrimental effect upon the provinces down by the sea. The cost of feed, for instance in New Brunswick is much higher than it is in Ontario, Quebec and the western provinces, with the result that the farmers of the maritimes who wish to raise hogs start under a severe handicap and it is impossible for them to compete in the bacon market in England with farmers from other parts. The same thing applies to fertilizer, which all farmers now use. We in the maritime provinces pay about one dollar per ton more for certain types of fertilizer than do the farmers in Quebec and other provinces. These are conditions, Mr. Speaker, which I contend must be corrected if we are to have the people in all parts of this dominion treated in the same manner, as I feel it is only just and right they should be treated.

Speaking of transportation, I do not think it is out of the way to bring to the attention of the house a transportation project which is not new so far as New Brunswick and Nova Scotia are concerned, and not new so far as the federal government is concerned. I refer to the Chignecto canal. The construction of a canal between New Brunswick and Nova Scotia was first thought of nearly three hundred years ago, when the French government was in control of Acadia, as it was then called; the French governor in 1686 recommended it to the French government as an undertaking which should be carried out at that time. He said that the Northumberland strait should be connected up with the bay of Fundy. Representations have been repeatedly made over a long period of years to the federal government that this canal should be constructed, because, it was pointed out, it would be of great benefit to the people in that part of the dominion. But in spite of the fact that, not millions, but hundreds of millions of dollars have been spent on the building of canals in other parts of this dominion, we have never been able to get what I believe to be this very necessary Chignecto canal, which would be a tremendous asset to us in that part of the country.

To show some of the advantages there would be in constructing this canal, I point out that the distance between Charlottetown and Saint John over the route that we have to travel at the present time is 488 miles; if the Chignecto canal were cut, the distance would be 144 miles. From Dalhousie to Saint John is now 720 miles; via the Chignecto canal it would 360 miles. From Pictou to Saint John is now 480 miles; via the Chignecto canal it would be 170 miles. From Montreal to Saint John is now 1,379 miles; via the Chignecto canal it would be 1,104 miles. From Montreal to Windsor, Nova Scotia, is now 1,250 miles; via the Chignecto canal it would be 820 miles. From Montreal to Hillsborough, New Brunswick, is now 1,235 miles; via the Chignecto canal it would be 760 miles. The saving in mileage and in the cost of transportation between the centres of upper Canada and the maritimes would be very great. The construction of this canal would be of benefit not only to our primary producers in the maritime provinces but also in reducing the cost of goods that we have to purchase from other parts of Canada. Besides, in these times when we are speaking of public works that must be carried on in order to provide employment when our men come back from overseas, I would point out that no public work could be carried on which would be of more benefit to the people of the maritime provinces and give better employment to the returned men than this construction. It would help all the industries of the maritime provinces. It would help our fishing industry; it would help our farmers and our manufacturers, and be of benefit to the people generally.

There is not much that I can say, Mr. Speaker, about the industries of the maritime provinces, because we have so very few of them. We have suffered much from a lack of industries in the past.

Mr. GRAYDON: You should have more industries.

Mr. BROOKS: We have heard that for a long time. It is true that we should have more, and I believe that we will have more. Some seventy-five years ago we did have good industries in the maritime provinces, industries in nearly every city and town, but then the tendency towards centralization began and our industries were moved to Montreal, Toronto, Hamilton and other large centres in the central provinces. When I spoke in the house in the month of March last I pointed out what a detrimental effect this moving away of our industries has had on the economic position of Nova Scotia, New Brunswick and Prince Edward Island. It meant the draining away of our people in the maritime provinces. There are more people to-day in the New England states who are descendants of people in the maritime provinces than there are in our own province. Why? Because we have not large industries in the maritime provinces to keep them there. And so, Mr. Speaker, when this new department is functioning I trust that it will consider well the decentralization of industry and take steps to provide more industries for the small provinces down by the sea.

We are told that one reason we have not more industries in the maritime provinces is that we have not electric power. That possibly has been true during this war. But no great effort has been made by the dominion government to provide electric power for the maritimes. The project is now being mooted—I am not an engineer and cannot speak as to its feasibility—of the development of the Petitcodiac river in Westmorland county in New Brunswick. From what I have heard I should think it is a practicable proposition. If the Petitcodiac river were developed it would mean the electrification of the farms of practically all Prince Edward Island. It would mean the electrification of farms and industry in the southern part of New Brunswick. It would mean electrification and the providing of power to industry in other sections of Nova Scotia. This, I contend, must commend itself very seriously to any government or department which is set up to deal with reconstruction.

Perhaps it has taken this great war to awaken Canadians to the responsibility which one section of the country has to another. We in the maritimes have entertained thousands of young men from all parts of Canada. Men from western Canada have been amazed at the beauty of our scenery, the fertility of our soil, and the great potentialities which our section of Canada possesses. I believe that with the information they have obtained, when the war is over our requirements will receive more sympathetic attention than they have had in the past. What is true of the men coming from the west is true also of the regiments who have gone from the east to western Canada; they are getting an idea of the problems which face western people. I believe that this increase and exchange of knowledge will have splendid results; it will lead to better understanding and a more united Canada.

I notice that section 6, which defines the powers of the minister, states:

> The minister, to enable him to perform the duties imposed upon him by this act, may:
> (c) consult with representatives of primary producers, industry, science and labour upon any question connected with reconstruction.

That is all to the good. He also has the power to—> (d) establish committees or boards and use existing organizations and agencies to assist him in carrying out the purposes of this act.

I trust that on these committees and boards all sections of this country, all political parties and various forms of industry will be represented. The problem is so big that every section, every view, every opinion should be well canvassed and considered, so that no part of the country shall be left unrepresented and all parts shall receive the attention to which they are entitled.

Mr. A. G. SLAGHT (Parry Sound): This is a bill which no hon. member can afford to oppose. It is an effort to set up now a department of reconstruction in order that when we pass from war to peace—which we all hope will be soon, and which, on the deliverance of the Prime Minister of Great Britain not long ago, we have good reason to hope may not be long deferred—the problems which may then arise will find us prepared.

Before I deal with two or three phases of the matter I wish to recall some of the statements made by the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) in introducing this bill, two days ago. He pointed out that the new department will be primarily concerned with economic reconstruction, and with that observation I fully agree. The reform of our economic policy, in my view, stands at the threshold of all our future efforts for reconstruction. He also indicated that almost every department of government will have some special work to do. That also is very true. But you can forget the efforts of the other departments of government if you do not provide them, through the finance department, with the necessary means to carry out a policy of reconstruction.

The Prime Minister intimated that the new minister's duties will be carried out in co-operation with his colleagues of other government departments, and I suggest to the house that the first and second and third steps to seek cooperation in his plans will be from the finance department.

We have been told that an advisory committee on economic policy, under Mr. W. C. Clark, have been studying this problem since January 23, 1941; and the Prime Minister told us also:

> There have been discussions on economic matters.

I quote him exactly, from Hansard, page 3986:

> I cannot say how successful they may be.

He further told the house, as reported on page 3988:

> I do not think my hon. friend need fear about the increase of the public debt or taxation to accomplish these things. . . . I believe the nation can go ahead with the great work of construction and reconstruction and at the same time reduce its taxation and reduce its debt.

That is bold and hopeful and optimistic language, and I desire to endorse that hopeful prediction of the future. I do not think I can give my viewpoint as to how it shall be done better than to quote his own language, as reported in Hansard in 1933, reiterated in 1934, when he said, with regard to the necessary economic policy of this country, as reported in Hansard of that year at page 4365:

> Once a nation parts with the control of its currency and credit it matters not who makes the nation's laws. Usury, once in control, will wreck any nation. Until the control of the issue of currency and credit is restored to government and recognized as its most conspicuous and sacred responsibility, all talk of the sovereignty of parliament and of democracy is idle and futile.

In 1933, the Prime Minister, as reported in Hansard of that year at page 2511, uttered this great policy, enunciated on behalf of the Liberal party who constitute the government of to-day:

> The Liberal party believes that credit is a public matter, not of interest to bankers only, but of direct concern to the average citizen. It stands for the immediate establishment of a properly constituted national central bank to perform the functions of rediscount, and the control of currency issue, considered in terms of public need. A central bank is necessary to determine the supply of currency in relation to the domestic, social and industrial requirements of the Canadian people and also to deal with the problems of international commerce and exchange.

I desire to direct special attention to these words:

> . . . a properly constituted national central bank to perform the functions of rediscount, and the control of currency issue, considered in terms of public need.
> Note "in terms of public need", not possible private gain.

I am compelled to believe that that splendid enunciation of policy has been carried out in part, but in part only. We have since then established a wholly owned national bank, the Bank of Canada. But I ask the members of this house whether we have taken steps to see that the control of currency, and the issue of currency, has been made on the credit of the nation in accordance with public need, or whether, on the contrary, it passed over into private hands, the hands of the chartered or private bankers of the country.

Let me make this suggestion, and I make my suggestions in a desire to be helpful to the Prime Minister and to the government and to lay before parliament what I believe to be the duty of this parliament at this session, here and now, and not to be left to the hands of a minister of reconstruction and his staff one or two years from now, no matter how eminent or industrious he may be. The minister under this bill has not a chance in the world to carry out the high purpose of the Prime Minister unless we in this parliament give him, at this session in this parliament and not at some time in the dim, distant future, the economic power to do so. I wish to make some suggestions which I regard as essential if this bill is truly to serve the Canadian people. The chart to be followed has been laid down in the language I have read to the house, but if we have put it into effect only in part, now is the time to round it out, to complete it at this session of parliament, in order that the relief we all desire the people to have may become an accomplished fact.

I have very strong views, Mr. Speaker, which I have not attempted to secrete, with regard to the subject of taxation and public borrowing, which the Prime Minister has placed before the house as one of the objectives to be accomplished by this new department. Let me say that our first consideration must never be lost sight of in this parliament. There must be no slackening in our war effort. There must be no legislation, no economic policy laid down which could in the slightest way prevent our country from seeing to it that our army and our allies have Canada at their back 100 per cent, to the fullest possible degree in the prosecution of this war, until unconditional surrender is forced upon our enemies. But having full regard to that, sir, we can and should look forward now, with quickening vision, because that is what this bill purports to do, to the reduction of taxation particularly as it affects the farmer, the lumberman, the settler, the fisherman, the industrial workers and those who through no fault of their own have the most difficulty in the struggle for existence. Let me give the house some details of the specific relief which I advocate putting into effect now, and which I have pressed upon the government, and desire in the most friendly way to continue to press upon the government and upon parliament, upon every member of this house.

It is time to sink some political differences and lend ourselves to this grave and difficult problem of reconstruction. That is what this bill lays the foundation, or purports to lay the foundation, to do. I suggest to you, Mr. Speaker, and to my fellow members that this parliament should reduce at once the taxation on unmarried men and women in the lowest brackets by raising the exemption from $660 a year to $1,200 a year, so that no man or woman who earns less than $100 a month should pay any income tax at all. They will continue to pay the sales tax; they will continue to pay the amusement tax; they will continue to pay a multiplicity of other indirect taxes on everything they eat and buy and wear and attempt to put into their houses. That will mean a los of revenue, through personal income tax, of $32 million and no more, but it will bring relief to 300,000 Canadian men and women. Second, I suggest that it is the duty of parliament to increase the exemptions for married people from the present $1,200 a year to $1,800 a year, so that no married person shall be called upon to pay income tax at all unless they receive at least $150 a month. That will mean a relief, on the basis of last year's collections, to 650,000 people, and it will create a loss of revenue to the treasury of only $55 million.

The result of these two changes will be to free altogether from income tax 950,000 Canadians who are least able to pay, whose struggle to make ends meet is the most difficult, and most of whose taxes are taken from them, before they ever reach their pockets, by their employers under the rigid method now in vogue known as deduction at the source. The total loss in revenue by giving a breathing spell to 950,000 of our people is therefore only $87 million out of a total revenue, taxed and borrowed, of five and a half billion dollars to be spent this year by a country of eleven and a half million people.

It is my belief that in times of heavy taxation those best able to pay should be called upon before we hit those least able to pay, and through no fault of their own. I further contend that we should reduce the present rate of personal income tax on everybody's taxes by a reduction of twenty-five per cent, or one quarter of the present personal income tax. By so doing we would incur a further loss in revenue of $220 million, being one quarter of the present total taxes collected from personal income last year. I go farther and insist, so far as my voice can insist, that the excess profits tax, which is paralyzing the small business man and which is going far to strangle all business in Canada, should be reduced at once by twenty-five percent, and that in the first year after the war a further reduction of another twenty-five per cent at least should be made. That means a further loss in revenue of $137,500,000. Those versed in arithmetic who may have followed me will find that I have indicated a policy which will mean a total loss of revenue, from the four items I have described, of $434,500,000, and you, Mr. Speaker, may very properly ask, "How shall we make that up if we do give our anything about money, but I do know that the municipalities in British Columbia cannot possibly take their proper share in the reconstruction programme unless they get assistance from the federal treasury.

Another thing in which I do not agree with the Prime Minister is that he has not much fear, as I understood him the other day, of the immediate six months following the peace. Personally I think that the first six months following the peace are going to present a very serious problem. Possibly I am looking at it from the soldier's point of view. I do not think you are going to be able to keep the men in the army after the war. The men will look after that themselves. The desire of every soldier will be to get home as quickly as he can and to get out of uniform, with the possible exception of the air force. These men are going to be thrown on to the labour market immediately after peace is declared. They will have a certain amount of deferred pay, which was an excellent idea on the part of the department, and a certain amount of savings. But I hope that every young soldier coming back from the war will not make the same mistake that I made and that the Prime Minister and the Minister of Pensions and National Health (Mr. Mackenzie) made. I waited twenty years after the war before I got married. I hope these young soldiers will get married immediately, but I do not know how far their savings will carry them if they get married unless we have concrete plans ready for their employment when they return. So far as I know, no concrete plans have been made by the government and no blue-prints prepared to put these men to work immediately after peace is declared. If peace were declared next week, the federal government, so far as I know, has no plans complete as yet to put these men and women immediately to work. We have had a wonderful reconstruction committee which has studied and submitted various plans.

I will tell you how we do it in British Columbia. The government of the day in British Columbia set up a committee, not of the government, but of the legislature, and that committee toured every little district in the province and got ideas from the Canadian Legion, from boards of trade, women's institutes, municipalities, and every other organization they could think of, as well as from individuals. I want to tell you that I am proud of the fact that I come from the province of British Columbia because within one week after peace is declared the British Columbia government can call for contracts for $10,000,000 worth of constructive work. That is a wonderful record. I want hon. gentlemen to mark that. I do not know how it is in the other provinces, and I am not criticizing them. So far as I know the federal government has no plans ready with which they can proceed to put men to work immediately after peace is declared. They have suggested various ideas—public buildings, waterways, railway expansion, and so on. But I repeat that British Columbia, through its Department of Public Works and other departments, has blueprints already prepared and estimates already made so that within one week after peace is declared they can call for tenders of $10,000,000 of constructive work. I think that that is the attitude which the federal government should adopt. I may be wrong; the federal government may have its plans ready, but if they are ready, this house has never been told about any concrete plans.

There is another matter. But first I had better continue with the Prime Minister, because there are some other things on which I do not agree with him, and if you are going to disagree I think it is a good idea to disagree from the top down, starting with your leader. I am not going to speak in a sobbing voice and then stab him in the back unless I decide to move across the floor on the same day.

One thing in which I am particularly interested so far as the soldiers are concerned is farming. I should like to quote what was said by the chairman of the reconstruction committee, the man who I think is most intimately connected with the reconstruction programme next to the Prime Minister himself. We are very glad that he comes from British Columbia. He and his committee have done an excellent job, and I am sorry that the chairman is not here to-day. He happens to be in hospital, and I know that I speak for every member when I wish him a speedy recovery. I quote in part what he said with respect to food at page 3994 of Hansard of June 20 of this year:

> In this respect we welcome the conclusion arising from the united nations food conference that never again—

I repeat that.

> —that never again will food be destroyed simply because people have not enough money to buy it.

That is from the chairman of the reconstruction committee. I point that out because I want to speak of it in connection with the Veterans' Land Act. Coming from the chairman of the committee it may be presumed that he was speaking for the government. What notice are we giving to the boys overseas with respect to this matter at the present time? Are we telling them that we in this parliament are not going to permit the destruction of food in this country? Hon. members will recall that the great president of the country to the south made probably the only mistake he has ever made in his leadership when he allowed brood sows to be destroyed. Brazil also destroyed coffee. Here we state through the chairman of the reconstruction committee that never again will food be destroyed simply for lack of money. Actually what do we find in Canada to-day? We in parliament are not supreme. What is going on in Manitoba? I quote this from the Winnipeg Tribune: "Growers plough under Manitoba Strawberries." I quote this because the soldiers of Manitoba will scarcely think us sincere in our plans for reconstruction, particularly as regards agriculture, when they see that we permit a few bureaucrats to allow this sort of thing to go on. There is a picture in this same paper of strawberries being ploughed under by a tractor, and under the picture is this:

Goodbye, Strawberries: Strawberry growers near Winnipeg are ploughing under their strawberries, as Aleida Daman, 18, daughter of Peter Daman, St. Vital grower, is doing in this picture. The prices board set too low a ceiling for berries, they say, and growers see no sense in paying labour $4.50 a day to keep the bushes in shape.

That must be an extensive piece of ground to have a tractor ploughing under this food. This paper is going to the soldiers of Manitoba who are over there in Italy and on the shores of France. Yet at the same time we are telling them we shall never let the lack of money cause the destruction of food. It will take more explanation from the government than I have heard yet to convince the boys over there that that policy is being carried out when they see food being destroyed in this way.

The reason I refer to this matter particularly is that in British Columbia we have some 750 Japanese farms which were all producing berry farms before we seized them—no, we did not seize them; we were too generous; we bought them out. We are holding these farms for soldiers when they come back. What will our soldiers in Italy or on the shores of France think of our Veterans' Land Act when in British Columbia out of 171 farms 121 have been allowed to go to wrack and ruin, and the people on the remainder are producing at a loss to-day simply because of the dictates of the almighty dollar, orthodox finance and the war prices board?

a million acres of land to the men who are coming back. But all we are going to allow a man who wants to go on the land is $4,800 to buy a farm and $1,200 for the purchase of stock to equip that farm. I took the trouble to inquire of every organization in the riding which I represent, and they agree without exception that the figure is, to say the least, conservative. It will cost at least $175 an acre to purchase land; the average tax amounts to $4 an acre; yet we expect a man to settle on a farm, raise a family, clothe and educate them, with no more capital than $4,800 for his land and $1,200 for his stock and equipment. I know that many hon. members are not farmers, but there is no need to be a farmer to know that you cannot possibly buy enough stock and equipment for $1,200 to run a farm, repay the capital, pay taxes, feed and clothe a family. It simply cannot be done; yet that is what we are holding out to these returning soldiers under the Veterans' Land Act. Go to any soldier organization that I know of, and the first thing you will find them discussing is this particular bill, which they regard as almost entirely unsatisfactory and inappropriate to the needs of the present day and age. Yet we send literature to the soldiers telling them how much we are going to do for them.

I disagree with an hon. member from one of the Montreal ridings who expressed the opinion yesterday that there is not much hope of placing many of our returning veterans on the land. Land has always been and always will be a safeguard in our economy. I believe there is a tremendous opportunity to put men back on the land. We cannot continue all these factories, no matter what they desire to manufacture; but we can produce in the vast expanses of Canada to an unlimited extent if agriculture is given parity prices. I admit that I might find it difficult to give a correct definition of that term, but I believe that parity prices must be provided for in legislation as applicable to farm products. Every bit of legislation the government has brought forward—and we are proud of what has been done—affects the farmer. He is absolutely dependent upon what the floor price is; and if the floor price is to be set, not by members of parliament representing all parts of Canada and all the political parties, but by some economist in the Bank of Canada or a small town lawyer on some of these boards, you are not going to get real parity prices, I can assure you of that.

The original definition of parity prices is to be found in the United States Agricultural Adjustment Act of 1933, the object of which was " to establish prices to farmers at a level that would give agricultural commodities purchasing power with respect to articles farmers buy equivalent to the purchasing power of agricultural commodities in the base period." That is not in effect in Canada to-day. Anyone familiar with agriculture knows that it is not in effect. Of course agriculture is on a sounder basis than it was in previous years. With the general prosperity enjoyed in Canada at the present time it is bound to be, but what the farmer fears more than anything else is that there will be a collapse of these prices. We have the assurance in the speech from the throne that floor prices will be set, but what I am particularly interested in is, who is going to set them? If it is we in parliament who are to set them, I shall not be worried so much, but if they are to be set by a board with no knowledge of conditions across Canada, and particularly of local conditions, it is a totally different matter. It has been demonstrated in the past as far as the agricultural policy of the government is concerned that agricultural conditions all over the country are taken into consideration, and rightly so. For years other parts of Canada carried Saskatchewan and other provinces during their misfortunes, and no one objected to that. But this illustrates the fact that conditions vary across Canada and that they must be taken into consideration in setting floor prices. In many cases in the past that has not been done. I again insist that I do not care what kind of veterans' land act is brought in or what amendments are made; it is absolutely impossible for the veterans to go on these farms unless they are guaranteed a reasonable and fair price for the commodities they produce.

In connection with the farm problem I wish briefly to revert to the subject of money. Speaking in the house on June 20, the Prime Minister is reported in Hansard, page 3986, as saying in part:

> Later, as forecast in the speech from the throne, there will be some tax modifications to encourage industrial conversion, and also there will be an expansion of research.

I have no particular quarrel with this proposal. If industries are not allowed to build up again, are not permitted to prepare to convert their plants to peace-time activities, we cannot put men back to work. But I do want to insist that agriculture must have exactly the same treatment. For years farmers had to do without new equipment, not only because it was not available, but because in any event they did not have the money with which to buy it. Even in the last prosperous two or three years what money they did have has been used to pay off debt, not to buy new equipment. Therefore the farmer is entitled to exactly the same consideration in any adjustments respecting income tax.

I hope that the budget is not quite completed. I happen to have my office on the fifth floor, and as the Minister of Finance (Mr. Ilsley) is located on the same floor, there is a continuous stream going and coming. I wish they would come in to me for advice in preparing the budget. I was quite flattered about something which happened yesterday. My office is in about the centre of the block. One of the most popular and esteemed members of the cabinet has his office on the fourth floor immediately below mine. Inadvertently yesterday he opened the door of my office and walked in, and he said, "Goodness, I must have opened the wrong door." I said, "No, it is all right." I will not tell you his name; it begins with a C. Coming events cast their shadows before; it may be that he came in to look over my office before I move down to his. Seriously, I hope the Prime Minister takes into consideration this important fact that agriculture is just as much entitled as any other industry to money for reconversion. The farmer is in the same position as the industrialist. He needs new binders, new tractors, other new equipment, and he should have the same consideration in so far as income tax is concerned.

There is one thing to which, I think, not enough attention has been paid. I want to congratulate the leader of the opposition (Mr. Graydon), who made, I thought, an excellent address yesterday. Particularly I would like to compliment the hon. member for York South (Mr. Noseworthy), who, I believe, is the only member who in the course of this discussion has touched on education, although it is a factor in reconstruction which affects the entire dominion and one in which, I think, we all should be interested. His speech last evening was very fair and very constructive. It is not often, possibly, that I can say that. I wish I could say the same for the leader of his party, who goes around and makes strange statements, probably for vote-catching purposes, about what he thinks the soldiers want. If anybody stops to think, he will know that what the expression "the Canada he left" means is that the soldier wants to get back to the Canada he left, to peace-loving Canada, and particularly, his mother's cooking. The speech of the hon. member for York South, however, was helpful, and I congratulate him, and also the hon. member for Cape Breton South (Mr. Gillis), who is always interesting.

I do not want to take any more time, except to impress upon the government that we in British Columbia will not be satisfied with a dollars and cents approach to this matter. After the announcement made by the Prime Minister to-day I do not know how any member of this house or anybody else in Canada can think in terms of dollars and cents about what is to be given as a matter of right to Canadian men and women coming back from the war. Money must never be allowed to stand in the way of what we are going to do for those men and women, and I urge upon the government that representation of the soldiers and of the women serving in the forces should be considered in the setting up of these boards under the reconstruction department—above all, the women. Little has been said about the way in which we are going to deal with the women coming back to civilian life from the army and from war industry. That will be one of the greatest problems we shall have to tackle. Money will not always provide the solution so far as the women are concerned. With money you can always find work for men, but you cannot always find suitable work for women, no matter how much money you may have. I suggest therefore that the government would be well advised in the setting up of these boards to consider the representation of the women in the armed services. The government might take representatives from the women's institutes and from those serving in the armed forces, as well as representatives who will look after the interests of the men in the army.

I am a party member, but I say that if the government sincerely wishes this department to be a success, politics in any form must be kept out of it. If anything is to be kept out of the department it is politics. Irrespective of party we should initiate a programme that has been planned for the good of all and not for the advantage of the few.

Mr. HUGHES CLEAVER (Halton): Before addressing a few remarks to the points I intended to cover in this debate, I hope my hon. friend who just preceded me (Mr. Cruickshank) will not take offence if I attempt to give him the other side of the story in regard to the Veterans' Land Act. I wish to suggest seriously to him that he should add up the over-all benefits which the new Veterans' Land Act proposes to give to the returned man who might wish to go farming. If he does so, perhaps he will revise his views in this connection. If he will add up all the benefits, he will find that the dominion government is making a cash grant substantially close to $3,000 to every Canadian veteran who wants to go farming under the Veterans' Land Act.

Before discussing that, I might add that any boy who will make a good farmer will in my opinion be entirely successful if he starts with $3,000 cash assistance and when the balance of his liability carries interest at a rate of only 3½ per cent. In adding up these benefits we find the veterans' initial responsibility is to pay $480 down in cash. The government, on the other hand, makes a cash contribution of $2,320 of the purchase price, $1,120 on account of the farm and $1,200 for implements, in addition to supplying the finances. That is made up in this way. As regards stock and implements, if the farmer is successful he pays nothing for the stock and implements; that is $1,200 of the amount I have referred to. The criticism is that $1,200 is not an adequate amount to equip a farm with stock and implements. Well, I suggest that it was never the intention that $1,200 should fully equip a farm with stock and implements. The intention, as I understood it, was that it would supply a suitable foundation stock; it would supply the initial bare needs for implements, and the farmer would go on from there. In addition to these amounts, it is well recognized that farm income does not come in monthly, and so provision has been made, for the first year, for monthly payments where necessary to the farmer to maintain him. The single man will receive something like $44 a month and the married man $68, while the married man with children will receive additional allowances for the children. Adding all these benefits together, we have a total of at least $3,000 for one man if he wants to go farming, and I repeat that many farmers in this country, reasonably prosperous, think they do very well by their sons in setting them up in farming if they make a contribution anything like that.

There may be some reason for criticism on the score that the benefits that accrue with respect to a farm costing not more than $4,800 are not adequate. Another clause in the act, which is quite elastic, provides that if a farmer wishes to buy a farm in excess of that amount he is permitted to do so but he must finance the balance himself.

I am coming to the one and only criticism I have—and I would not dream of criticizing such an act without offering what in my opinion is a helpful suggestion. I think that in some parts of the country farms are at such a price that $4,800 would not buy a good up-to-date productive farm. In that event I think the amount should be increased, but I would correspondingly increase the mortgage liability at 3½ per cent which the veteran assumes. With that one minor amendment, I think the act would work well, and that is the only complaint I have received from veterans' associations in my riding with respect to the act.

In rising to take part in this debate on the second reading of the bill to provide for the setting up of a department charged with the sole responsibility of post-war reconstruction, I do so simply to emphasize one problem which I think we shall be facing in the post-war period, and one which I think should be given a No. 1 priority. The general field has been ably covered and I do not intend to spend much time in that regard. While I agree that Canada's post-war prosperity is in part dependent upon the extent to which we are able to assist in achieving world-wide recovery, and while I agree that Canada must assume her full responsibility in that regard, and fully realize that in so far as we do have world-wide recovery Canada as a trading nation will participate in the benefits which flow therefrom, yet I feel just as strongly that living conditions in Canada also depend upon the way in which we treat our own local domestic problems. If our national income, whether large or small, is equitably distributed among the different classes of the population, then we shall achieve a proper distribution of goods. I do not think that happened during the depression, but I will not take time now to discuss the causes.

To be permanently prosperous I believe the country must maintain a standard of living on a par with its ability to produce goods. I think that is axiomatic, but there is just one "if," namely, if a country produces goods in excess of its own needs, in order to maintain this high standard of living I am talking about markets must be found for the excess.

As to the production surplus over and above our own consumption needs, which amounts in round figures to one-third of our total production, we should of course exchange that surplus for goods of other countries which we can use. If by foreign trade we are able to do this, we achieve our maximum prosperity. If we cannot do this by foreign trade, I suggest that under the best of management we would only reach two-thirds of our maximum prosperity. If we do not take the necessary steps to dispose of that unexportable surplus and to prevent the endless distress which follows, such as falling prices and the like, we can get into a lot of trouble. Therefore I suggest, Mr. Speaker, that until world recovery takes place to the point where we shall be able to dispose of the exportable surplus we have three options. We can either give that exportable surplus away to needy nations; we can stop producing it, or we can store it up at fixed prices hoping to be able to sell it in the future. I do not know of any better illustration of what I am talking about than our exportable surplus of wheat.

The problem I have just outlined is one that should be studied very carefully in this country. On the one hand I do not think that we should accept the defeatist attitude and say that we have to wait until general world recovery comes about; nor on the other hand do I think we should fail to assume our responsibilities in the matter of helping to assist general world recovery. As I said a moment ago, I am not going to discuss to-day the general problem but there is one concrete matter that I should like to bring to the attention of the government and of the hon. members of this house. It is a post-war problem which I think will merit a No. 1 priority. We have an acute shortage of houses in this country. Estimates differ, but reliable sources agree that when this war is over we shall have a shortage of over three hundred thousand houses. It is only right and proper that in time of war, with its consequent shortage of labour and materials, we should try to get along with the housing accommodation we have. We have struggled to do that, Mr. Speaker. By rental controls and the like we have done our best to get by the present emergency without any needless expenditure of either labour or materials on the building of houses. While we have been quite correct in postponing house building to meet the needs of war yet in the long run I suggest it is going to turn out to our advantage, because during the immediate post-war period this postponed consumer demand for houses will have to be met, and it will put thousands of men to work.

At the moment we can reasonably hope that the end of the war is not in the too far distant future, and I think we should immediately complete plans for post-war house building. I should like to urge that pilot or key organizations be set up now, which can be quickly expanded when the war is over, to support, and direct house building schemes. In adopting this plan of postponing the supplying of our housing needs until the war is over we have of necessity caused some real distress. To-day many people are living under almost unbearable housing conditions. To some extent this has been the cause of increasing crime, ill-health and the like. In addition to those who are in actual distress, thousands of families are daily living under the threat that their houses will be sold over their heads and they will have to move, not knowing where they will go. People cheerfully and willingly endure that sort of thing during war time. But I suggest to you, Mr. Speaker, that the minute this war is over the Canadian people will demand—they have a right to demand—that their proper housing needs be met.

In addition to the acute housing problem which exists at the present time, when thousands of our service men return they will marry and want homes of their own. In addition to giving the housing problem the rating which I believe it deserves, namely, No. 1 priority, I should like to urge that the government sponsor a campaign for every man to own his own home. I do not know of any better time to start than now, when we have such an acute shortage. I should like to urge that credit facilities be made available for this need on a sound business basis. The advantages of home ownership and the disadvantages of tenant occupancy are so apparent that I do not need to labour the point. In these days we hear many discussions of the relative merits of our capitalistic system and socialism. So far as I am concerned the major complaint that I have in regard to the capitalistic system is that we have too few capitalists. I would urge that every man in this country own his own home; every man should become a capitalist. This proposal is not a dream impossible of fulfilment. It is a scheme which if undertaken as a national programme could be quite easily attained in a very short time. To-day many men have to pay rent for their housing accommodation. Is there any man in this country who would not rather pay the same monthly payments on a house which he will eventually own?

Let me say something as to the down payment. We all know that practically everyone in this country is accumulating savings which I suggest in most instances will be sufficient to take care of the ten per cent down payment at the end of the war. To those who have not been able to acquire the compulsory saving as a down payment I suggest that the new amendment to the Bank Act will meet their difficulties. The banks are going to enter actively the field of small loans repayable on a monthly basis at a reasonable rate of interest. A man desiring to own his own home would be able to acquire his down payment from that source.

In the National Housing Act we have a well-tried instrument at hand. We do not need to create anything new to get on with this programme. Do hon. members know that since 1937, under the National Housing Act, we have built something over 25,000 houses? They are practically all owner-occupied; and while the government has participated to the extent of a twenty-five per cent contribution toward the cost of those houses, the act was so well thought out and has been so efficiently managed that our losses to date on the 25,000 houses are less than $5,000, or twenty cents per house. I suggest that the present act should be used for this purpose—with some amendments, or streamlined if you like—in order to bring those advantages within the reach of every working man in the country.

My first suggestion is in regard to interest rates. Interest rates should be reduced to 4½ per cent, and to 4 per cent if possible. As all hon. members know, money is now available in the Dominion of Canada—that is long-term borrowing—at 3 per cent, or less. Let us take the government's contribution of 25 per cent, and figure it on a 3 per cent basis. Let us allow the loan companies 5 per cent on their 75 per cent loan content, and we have a resulting interest rate of 4½ per cent.

I suggest if we are to adopt a large building programme the lending institutions of the country may not have sufficient money to finance it on that basis, and that perhaps the government should enter the field on a 50 per cent basis with 3 per cent money. In this event, allowing the loan companies 5 per cent on their 50 per cent content, the interest rate would automatically fall to 4 per cent. With the interest rate at 4½ per cent—and the Minister of Finance has announced in advance that that is what is going to happen—the monthly payments for these houses, under which a man actually acquires eventual ownership, are to-day less than the normal rental for houses of that type. With a possibility of a further one-half per cent reduction, one can see what the effect would be in connection with monthly payments.

Coming to the second recommendation, in connection with the repayment of loans, I know something about these houses built under the National Housing Act. They are well-built. I say without fear of successful contradiction that homes built under the National Housing Act standards have a useful owner-occupancy lifetime of at least forty years. I therefore suggest and urge that the amortization period should be increased from twenty to at least thirty years. That again will assist in bringing down the amounts of monthly payments. The Minister of Finance has already announced that that proposal is under discussion, and that some progress will be made. I would urge as strongly as I can that thirty years should be the minimum, where an owner requires that time to pay for his home.

My next suggested change is a new one. In the mind of each of these home owners is the constant dread, the constant worry hanging over his head that something may happen, possibly through illness or accident, as a result of which the breadwinner would lose his life and the widow would be left with an unbearable mortgage load. If this is to be a nation-wide scheme for every man to own his own home, then I say that in the event of his death the mortgage should be paid off and the widow should be presented with the house free from encumbrances; and that this should be paid out of an insurance fund. I am told that this type of term insurance could be acquired at moderate cost, not exceeding one dollar per home per month.

My next suggestion deals with restraint in respect of alienation. Very serious thought should be given to this matter. So far as I am concerned, the owner of a house should be placed in the position where he could not, through bad business judgment or in any other way, lose his house. I would have the house in such a position that it will not be subject to execution levies. In addition, I think it might be wise to prevent the owner himself from selling his house, or possibly it would be well in the event of sale to freeze the selling price, or set it apart to be used only for the purchase of another house. That is only my own thought on the subject, but I offer it for what it is worth.

These five suggestions will in my opinion make the act workable and bring it within the reach of every working man in Canada. However we could not possibly succeed in reaching a point where every man would own his own home unless we were to provide for the use of existing houses already built. I suggest that an additional part be added to the housing act to make these second-hand houses, if I may so describe them, available for exactly the same purposes and on quite the same terms. I concede at once that the amortization period should not be so long—that is, it should not exceed the life of the house. In addition, money should be made available by borrowing, repayable in monthly payments, just as under Part I of the act, to provide for necessary permanent repairs and permanent alterations to bring the existing houses up to modern condition.

If those things are done, and a nation-wide campaign is instituted, it would be almost impossible to estimate the amount of human happiness and human satisfaction which might flow therefrom.

I have commented on the urgency for the need for housing. I have commented, too, on the benefits, peace of mind and human happiness which would flow from such a plan. I have one other reason why in my opinion housing should receive priority in connection with post-war reconstruction, and it is this: The labour content of every medium sized house is at least eighty per cent. Some members may question that percentage, but when I refer to labour content I am not referring only to the labour expended in the building of the house. I include the indirect labour—the labour content that goes into the manufacture of frames, doors, lumber, flooring, plaster, hardware, plumbing, and everything else used in construction. If one computes all that in the labour content he will reach at least eighty per cent labour content in a medium sized home. I do not know of any type of construction in which the labour content is as great. For that reason therefore I say that is one of the post-war schemes we should first adopt.

There is another feature in connection with labour content, and it is this: I do not know of any construction work in which the labour content would be so diversified, and spread out over the entire country. One might say it would be spread throughout all branches of industry. Benefits would accrue to all parts of the country.

For all these reasons I urge as strongly as I can that the present is not one day too soon to make plans and to complete the organization for the financing and the supplying of materials for the new houses we so urgently need.

Mr. R. W. MAYHEW (Victoria, B.C.): Mr. Speaker, I do not apologize for taking part in this debate in connection with the establishment of a Department of Reconstruction. I agree entirely with the hon. member for Essex East (Mr. Martin), who has said that this matter is next in importance to that of winning the war or prosecuting the war. Had I not said anything I am afraid I would have been apologizing to myself for some considerable time. I suppose when I finish my speech I will still be apologizing to myself because of having fallen far short of what I would have liked to say in the short time at my disposal and with my limited ability.

I have been interested in this matter from almost the start of the war. So far as I know the first committee on rehabilitation set up in Canada was one set up in British Columbia by the British Columbia branch of the Canadian Manufacturers' association. I happened to be chairman of that branch at the time. I believe that committee is still functioning and considering plans for rehabilitation and reconstruction. I remember one statement that I made at the annual meeting. I impressed upon all the manufacturers of British Columbia the necessity of watching their plants very closely in order that they should not run down. I emphasized the fact that obsolescence was a detriment not only to the particular plant but to the province as a whole.

I took another step at that time in an effort to enlarge the knowledge of this subject, both in the province and throughout Canada, but this was a somewhat disappointing experience. I offered an award for the best essay on post-war rehabilitation to be written by any undergraduate in Canada. This offer was made directly to the James committee when it was first formed, and it was also passed along to the Minister of Pensions and National Health (Mr. Mackenzie) who received it very warmly. However, the universities did not seem to rise to the occasion and give this suggestion the leadership which I thought it should have received. Instead of announcing this award to their students at the close of the year, they announced it when the college term opened, and the result was that only a few participated because they had only some three or four weeks to prepare their essays.

I would be quite prepared to continue this offer for the duration of the war. I think if it had been done we would have had a young people who were more enlightened on this subject. There are many young people reaching the time of life when they might make an active study of these matters, but they have not had the opportunity. If they are prepared to make full use of my offer I am prepared to renew it at this time.

I regretted that the statement was made in the house that this department was being set up to fill a temporary need only. I think that is a mistake. It should be a department for the development of Canada not only in the transition period from war to peace but for the many years to come. The department should be available for as long as it is necessary, and I am sure that that will be for the lifetime of Canada. There is so much in this country that is yet untouched. There are tremendous possibilities for development, and I cannot see anything better than to have an all-time department. This should not be a department with just a minister, a deputy minister and a few assistants; it should be a department with a minister, a deputy minister and a staff sufficiently large that its members could be selected from all parts of Canada, thus bringing together the necessary knowledge for this particular sphere of development.

The other day we heard a splendid speech by the hon. member for Athabaska (Mr. Dechene). He told us a little—no one could tell us all—of that great northland of which we know so little. There are over a million square miles filled with every kind of natural resource, such as minerals, forests, fisheries and oil. I am sure it will take some time fully to develop this particular district.

Speaking a few days ago the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) mentioned another possible field of development. He referred to the creating of Ottawa as a federal district, and the possibilities of beautifying the nation's capital. He told us how it was hoped to make the other bank of the Ottawa river in Hull a thing of beauty. There should not only be a physical development of Canada; we should have cultural development as well. There are many cities besides Ottawa where similar projects could be carried out. I am one who believes that it is not a waste of money to develop cultural things. Would anyone say that money has been wasted in the construction of this grand building we are in at the present time? We could actually do with much less in the way of a building. We could talk just as much, although there might be a greater fire risk. But will anyone say that it has been a waste of money? Will anyone say that what was done on Elgin street a few years ago was a waste of money? I definitely say that it was not. We could take every city in Canada and try to make it a city beautiful as well as a city useful.

Any schoolboy will tell you that we must develop our industries to their maximum. These things are so obvious that they scarcely need mention. But the others are things which we have been overlooking. It is a change of mind that we want towards our development. Take, for instance, the city of Winnipeg, or Saskatoon, Regina, Edmonton, Vancouver; or take my own city, the city of Victoria. I do not think there is a more beautiful spot in Canada than Victoria, and regardless of what anyone else says, it is the playground and will remain the playground of Canada so far as climate is concerned. The nation could spend in the city of Victoria many millions of dollars which would be of tremendous advantage not only to the people of the city of Victoria but to the rest of Canada who would be glad to get away from the winters you have in the east. People are coming into the city of Victoria from all directions, both summer and winter. It is the only place where you can have really warm salt water bathing practically the year round. By the expenditure of a few hundred thousand dollars you could make it not only a national but an international playground to the great advantage of us all. I had no intention of bringing forward the claims of my own city for development. I use it just as an illustration of the possibilities that we have in Canada for just such projects.

Mr. KUHL: But we need to know where the money is coming from.

Mr. MAYHEW: Where the money is coming from? The Prime Minister told us the other day, and I think he is right, that the money will come for the things which the people are interested in and desire to have.

Mr. KUHL: They were interested before the war too.

Mr. MAYHEW: We listened to the hon. member speaking the other night, and if I remember rightly he implied that it was humiliating to work.

Mr. KUHL: I did not say any such thing.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: He has never tried it.

Mr. MAYHEW: If the hon. member did not say it, he implied it.

Mr. KUHL: I said that compulsory work was humiliating. I did not say voluntary, but compulsory.

Mr. MAYHEW: The Lord made it compulsory because He told us that we must earn our bread by the sweat of our brow. Personally I do not think you can build character in a people or in a nation unless they have work to do.

Mr. KUHL: Voluntary work.

Mr. MAYHEW: Work is the fibre of achievement that makes a nation great, and you cannot have the fibre of achievement unless you have something to do and are willing to do it. That is what my hon. friend lacks.

Mr. KUHL: No.

Mr. MAYHEW: I was saying, Mr. Speaker, that I am anxious to see these developments take place; I emphasize this because there is not time to deal with the others, and I want if possible to get this point across.

I believe that we have to have full employment. I do not believe you can have half of your people employed and the other half unemployed. Someone has said that no man is free unless all are free, and I do not think we can be busy to the best advantage unless we are all busy. I think we could all be busy in the future.

In the programme which should be undertaken the matter of tempo enters. Some say that the tempo should be increased just as soon as the boys come home from overseas. Personally I do not think so. I believe that there will be sufficient work, more than sufficient work, for the first two or three and possibly four years after the war is over. It will be in the subsequent period that we may have to move in and find work for people to do; but this nation I think will do these things I have mentioned because they are in the end self-supporting. I want to emphasize that. I do not think you should bring the boys home from overseas and put them to work and at the same time leave the boys that are at home without work to do, because when one man is idle, somebody else is not fully employed. Only when all are employed can all be fully employed.

I am going to make four suggestions, and then I shall conclude.

First I think the name "Reconstruction" is a misnomer. It has come out of its association with rehabilitation. It is national construction, national planning on a long and broad scale which in my opinion is required. Rehabilitation is an entirely different matter. I do not say that they are separable, because you cannot have rehabilitation without reconstruction. But title reconstruction would mean that this country has been partly destroyed or that we intend to destroy it and rebuild it. There is nothing of the kind. We are to build on what we have. It is a gradual development on the basis of our imagination, and, I hope, of our courage, because I know that our ability to do it is there. I suggest that the name of this department be changed.

I suggest, too, that it be made a permanent department. I suggest that it have a large personnel, not a small one; that that large personnel be selected from all parts of Canada, and that in their planning they look towards developing not only the ribbon that runs across Canada from the Atlantic to the Pacific, but Canada as a whole.

I suggest also that the minister, whoever he may be, be appointed now. I do not think it is too early. The formation of this branch of government is very timely, and the minister should be appointed now for this reason. He would be able to sit in on and give a lead to the banking and commerce committee, because finance is going to come into the programme of reconstruction, and his advice and assistance in planning for the reorganization, if that is to take place, should be of some assistance both to him and to us.

I suggest that this department be not just another department of government, but that it be "the" department of government, because upon it depends the full work of our people; on the full work of our people depends our national income, and on our national income depends whether or not we can carry on with our social legislation. This department is the heart and the backbone of Canada itself in action.

Mr. THOMAS REID (New Westminster): Mr. Speaker, most allied nations have been laying plans during the past three or four years for post-war planning and rehabilitation; but I say to you as emphatically as I can, in view of statements which are being made outside the House of Commons, that no country among the allied nations is so far ahead in plans for rehabilitation as is Canada under the present government. That statement cannot be successfully refuted. I am sorry that the leader of the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation is not in his seat this afternoon, because I intended at this time to deal with one or two statements he has made; however I will defer until later most of the things I have in mind. I think it is most unfair for an hon. member, especially one who is the leader of a party, to make statements throughout the country which, I say, are not true. For instance, he is quoted as having said a short time ago that two million jobs would have to be found for service men returning to civilian life in Canada after the war, and that not a single plan has been devised by the dominion government to meet that situation. In that utterance there are two gross misstatements of fact. The first one is that two million jobs will be needed for service men. There are not over eight hundred thousand men and women in the armed forces of Canada, and to assert publicly that two million jobs will be required for them is a kind of mathematics which is beyond me. I rather thought that people in the country from which I come knew something about mathematics and education.

Mr. GILLIS: Will the hon. member permit a question?

Mr. REID: Yes.

Mr. GILLIS: Where did he get this statement which he alleges the leader of the C.C.F. made?

Mr. REID: I am glad that the hon. member for Cape Breton South asked that question. For every utterance I have made in the House of Commons I have been careful to have proof. The statement I have referred to is reported in the Leader-Post of Wednesday, June 14; and may I say to the hon. member who interrupted—

Mr. MITCHELL: The Leader-Post of Regina?

[Mr. Mayhew.]

Mr. REID: Of Regina; yes.

Mr. GILLIS: It is ridiculous on the face of it.

Mr. REID: The hon. member may say it is ridiculous, but may I say that there is something in this connection which is very strange. I do not know much about how the C.C.F. act in other provinces, but in British Columbia, from which I come, I know something of their actions, and before this session is over I shall deal with a good deal of what has gone on there. Any time that any paper in British Columbia has reported some statement against the C.C.F. or any of their leaders they rush to contradict it, but I have never seen any contradiction of this report. Are they carrying on some other policy in Saskatchewan and not repudiating things they object to?

Mr. GILLIS: It is so obviously ridiculous.

Mr. REID: I do not see how the hon. member is in a position to deny it. I might say to him, just hold your horses a little while.

Mr. GILLIS: Well—

Mr. REID: Mr. Speaker, have I to take care of myself?

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: You can do it.

Mr. REID: Because if I have to, of course it is all right with me.

Mr. GILLIS: If you want to make such statements, it is up to yourself.

Mr. REID: Some statements have been made during this debate, either in the speeches or in cross-fire conversations across the floor of the house, particularly by members of the C.C.F., regarding the years of depression, 1930 to 1939. Speakers of the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation group have gibed at both the Conservative and the Liberal parties with reference to the great amount of unemployment during those years. I have been frank to admit wherever I have gone that there was a great deal of unemployment at that time, but I do not understand the reasoning of those who remind us of it, or why Canada in particular should be singled out and our form of democratic government denounced because we were not able to solve the problem during those years. No country in the world, I care not what form of government it had, solved the problem. Oh, yes; someone is going to say that all were working fully in Russia, that they were fully occupied in Germany and Italy and Japan. But if all those countries had their people at work, it was simply because they were getting ready for war. We are not a warlike country. The facts are that no country in the world solved the problem of unemployment during those years—neither Russia nor Germany, Italy nor Japan. Yet members of the C.C.F. go up and down the country saying that we must have a new form of democratic government, that the old parties have failed, because from 1930 to 1939 they did not solve unemployment.

The thought has just entered my mind, and it is something I have long wanted to say in this house, that I have been astonished at the attitude of a number of those who, have come to Canada from other lands and who, had they stayed in the lands they came from, would probably not have owned very much; yet with all the possible things that God could give them in this great land, they have gone around denouncing the government of Canada. I remind the house, and it seems to me a strange and significant fact, that during the years of depression, and when we were hearing so much of the progress of Russia, although 60,000 persons made application to the Canadian government to be taken back to Great Britain, no applications so far as I can learn were made by any who came from the countries of continental Europe to be returned to the country of their origin or birth.

I say, Mr. Speaker, let us have some pride in our land. When one looks over the membership of this house and recalls that some thirty-one hon. members were born outside this country and came to it from nine different countries, it seems reasonable to ask whether there is any other land which has provided the same opportunities as this great country has provided to those who have come here from abroad. One quality in the Russian people which we might well emulate is their great love of country.

While I am not suggesting that this government should adopt the policies of militarily-minded states, it is my opinion that following the conclusion of this war we shall not allow ourselves for many, many years to revert to the condition of unpreparedness in which we found ourselves prior to 1939.

One thing we all admire about Prime Minister Churchill is the great frankness of his statements. It is a splendid thing to be frank. When he was speaking in the British House of Commons on post-war rehabilitation someone reminded him that after the last war British shipowners had bought German merchant ships at a cost of little or nothing. He replied that that was perfectly true, but, he said, "We won't make that mistake again, though I expect," he said, "being human, we shall make other mistakes." I recall that because we too admit frankly, at least I do, that we did make a mistake in 1930 to 1939. But we are not going to repeat that mistake; and when anyone goes through this country endeavouring to persuade the people that a new heaven or a new earth will come about if only some new type of democratic government is given an opportunity, I warn the public to be very careful before they take such statements too literally.

It is only of late that members of the C.C.F. party have admitted that trade may be at all a significant factor. Like most parties, they are keeping their ear to the ground too and moving along as they think the people want them to, so that they do not differ from any of the older parties in that political regard. That, after all, is democracy. I do not know what the future will bring forth, but if past history has been any guide to us at all it shows us this. To me at least it has proved that the nations that have gone out to trade, and to trade freely, have been the nations which have given most of this world's goods to their people, while the nations who have lived unto or within themselves have been the nations which have given the least of this world's goods to their people. That has been the history of mankind from the days of Adam to the present time, and it is my opinion that the same thing will hold good for many years to come. We must therefore pay greater attention to international trade.

This country is adapted to produce great quantities of grain, lumber, fish and agricultural products which could never be consumed at home unless we trebled our population, even though we were provided with twice the amount of food we consume at the present time. I find that the Liberal party is in pretty good company, because at the international labour conference held in Philadelphia in May last the following statement was made with regard to trade, enunciating the fact that we must take note of what is taking place in other lands:

> The war against want requires to be carried on with unrelenting vigour within each nation, and by continuous and concerted international effort in which the representatives of workers and employers, enjoying equal status with those of governments, join with them in free discussions and democratic decision with a view to the promotion of the common welfare.

And this is what I ask you to note particularly. This is an outstanding resolution:

> Poverty anywhere constitutes a danger to prosperity everywhere.

That is the point of view held by those of the Liberal party who are looking to the furtherance of trade, believing that we cannot remain in our shell or live unto ourselves and hope to prosper. Isolation, sir, is as dead to-day as the great wall of China. When one realizes that it takes only about sixty hours to travel completely round the globe, one realizes how close countries are to one another and that we must pay greater attention to the prosperity and well-being of other countries as well as the prosperity and well-being of our own. When we think of the brotherhood of man, we must realize that this brotherhood was not intended to be confined within the borders of any one country.

In British Columbia for many years, emanating from those belonging to the C.C.F. and emanating as well from members of the C.C.F. party in this house, there have come public utterances upholding the Dominion of New Zealand. The other day an hon. member pointed out, in answer to an interruption, that the general picture of welfare in this country was ahead of that of New Zealand. I have gone into this matter a little, and these are some of the things I find. Take the debt charges in New Zealand, for instance—and I have the debt charge translated into dollars so as to make it comparable with that of our own country. The public debt charge of this country is on an average $680 per head, while in New Zealand it is $1,010. Take interest charges. We have heard a great deal about interest charges and debt-free money, but there again we are still ahead of New Zealand. Interest charges in Canada amount to 2·90 per cent—and I understand even that has been reduced—whereas in New Zealand the interest charges are 3·42 per cent. We have heard a great deal about the load of debt on the Canadian people. Well, the load of interest debt in Canada works out at something like $14.65 per head, whereas in New Zealand the load of debt is $28.75. I have given the interest charges they are paying on loans, and I have given the public debt. Now, coming to taxation, this may interest hon. members. I have not time to go into it fully, but I shall be pleased on another occasion to elaborate on these matters individually. The single man in New Zealand earning $700 pays something like $53. In Canada it works out at $26, with $13 refundable. The married man with two children earning $1,500 per annum pays in Canada $49.50, with $24 refundable. In New Zealand he pays $154. This information I have obtained from the New Zealand Year Book.

Mr. GILLIS: But you are only quoting half of it.

Mr. REID: I am giving the full details on interest and debt, and I shall be glad to discuss the entire New Zealand situation with any hon. member of the house, because the picture gets better as it goes on.

[Mr. Reid.]

Mr. GILLIS: It is not fair to put half of it on the record.

Mr. REID: That is the old way of putting something across, by rising and making such statements. You are putting that in my speech; it is very cutely done but you are all wrong. It is a habit you have had for a number of years, and I would ask you to keep your seat and possess your soul in patience. I can discuss it with you in committee.

Mr. GILLIS: You are insulting a sister dominion.

Mr. REID: I resent that. I am not insulting anyone. I am putting these facts before the house only for one purpose. It has been held up to the people of this country by the C.C.F. that if we adopted a government similar to that in New Zealand all the good things people hope for would be bestowed on the Canadian people. I am not bringing this forward for any other purpose than to answer my hon. friend. I do not wish to introduce division between sister dominions, but it is said so often by members of the C.C.F., both in British Columbia and here, that I am impelled to correct their statements and keep the record right and true. When it comes to taxation, it would appear that they soak the workers there. We in Canada place the burden of taxation where we believe it can best be borne. For in the matter of income tax they pay more in New Zealand until the sum of $10,000 per annum is reached, and thereafter it gets less, whereas in Canada it increases very greatly indeed. I could quote bond interest too, which is less in Canada. In regard to New Zealand's financial position I doubt, Mr. Speaker, had it not been for the help of Great Britain during the war, whether she would have been in as good a financial position to-day as her books would seem to indicate.

With regard to Canada and rehabilitation, may I say without fear of successful contradiction that the provision we have made for our service men is not bettered or equalled by any other country of the allied nations. There is only one thing that I believe New Zealand has done a little better than we, and that is with regard to the matter of clothing allowance. I hope that will be adjusted in Canada before very long. In the matter of treatment, pensions and hospitalization for service men, I know of no country which is doing more than we are. In saying that I do not want to leave the impression that we have finished or reached the ultimate in the treatment of our service men and women. I am merely stating the fact. If anyone has any statement to make to the contrary I shall be glad to hear it.

British Columbia is taking quite a part in the work of rehabilitation. The government of that province set up a committee composed of representatives of all parties in the assembly. The report of that committee emphasized the matter of finance. The hon. member for Fraser Valley (Mr. Cruickshank) in his speech this afternoon touched on the subject of municipal finances. While I realize that no definite projects can be outlined at the moment, the general plans are, however, outlined, and the government of the day should as soon as possible let the cities and municipalities know what their position will be in regard to loans. If the municipalities could obtain loans at cost, say, three-quarters of one per cent, I feel sure that every city and municipality would immediately set to work to outline post-war works. Remember, Mr. Speaker, that a great deal of the burden of rehabilitation will fall on these cities and municipalities, because when a man is seeking relief, and sometimes when he is seeking employment, the first place to which he goes is the municipal council. In every recommendation presented on behalf of the government of British Columbia that one point was brought out.

I am not going to weary the house because this document is too voluminous for me to place on Hansard, but I wish to read one of the recommendations that was put before the dominion government. It is as follows:

> No information seems to be available as to what procedure will be followed by the dominion government in allocating proportions of cost under any of the rehabilitation programmes where they operate to the benefit of municipalities. Naturally a programme involving one and a half million dollars is entirely beyond the capacity of most cities.

Then further:

> Your committee appeared before the provincial government rehabilitation committee early this year—

That was 1943.

> —presented their report, and entered into a discussion regarding some of the proposals, especially regarding the method of financing post-war schemes. We feel that until the question of finances has been settled, the whole work of all post-war committees has been futile. The provincial committee themselves have not a solution, as they in turn await the decision of the federal government on this point.

Therefore I urge upon the Prime Minister and the government the necessity of arriving at a decision as soon as practicable, and so that the municipalities, cities and provincial governments be informed as to what help they may expect from the dominion government and what rates of interest will be charged for loans.

I would make one other proposal to the Prime Minister and to the government. Before the programme of rehabilitation starts, steps should be taken with regard to the debts owing the dominion government by provincial governments. I was looking over this matter before I came down to the chamber this afternoon, and I was surprised to find that according to the last auditor general's report the provincial governments owed the dominion government something like $313,309,016—and by the way, Saskatchewan did very well in that respect because that province was lent a considerable sum of money, according to the record; they owe the government $79,828,017. As one looks over the staggering amounts one realizes that that is one of the things that should be taken up at either the forthcoming dominion-provincial conference or as soon as possible thereafter, to see if some means can be devised for clearing up those debts which hang like a cloud over the provincial governments. The provincial governments in turn have lent large sums of money to municipalities, and those debts also hang like a cloud over the municipalities.

In his speech of yesterday afternoon the hon. member for Royal (Mr. Brooks) made some reference to the fisheries. I am not going extensively into the matter of fisheries this afternoon, but in looking through the recommendations and statements made by the government I notice that fisheries have been mentioned as one form of rehabilitation. May I point out to you, Mr. Speaker, that in so far as British Columbia is concerned I doubt whether we can take many more men into the fishing industries. We may be able to take more men, women and youths into the canning factories, but I doubt whether we can place or take care of any more men as fishermen. I say that for this reason: the quantity of fish in our waters is, after all, limited, and the more men put into the industry the smaller the return will be for the individual fisherman. However, there is one branch of the fishing industry into which we could place more men. I refer to the halibut fisheries. Under the provisions of the international halibut treaty the yearly allotment of the United States and Canada is something like fifty million pounds. We have never been able to take more than one-third of our share. The United States fishermen have been able to take the larger part, up to three-quarters of the amount allotted. They can do that because they have larger and better fishing vessels which can go farther afield. They are better fitted to withstand the rough seas one or two hundred miles off our shore. Canada is bearing fifty per cent of the cost of the halibut fishery commission. Is there any reason why our fishermen should not be encouraged to take their fifty per cent of the allotment?

Since 1939 some ninety large fishing vessels have been taken from the fishing industry in British Columbia for military purposes. These boats, or better ones, should be put back for the specific purpose of fishing for halibut. Everything that it is possible to do should be done to enable our fishermen to compete with United States fishermen on the halibut banks. When the Japanese were taken out of British Columbia and the fishing licences were curtailed in 1941, it was stated that the fishing industry would suffer. It may interest the house to hear actual figures, and to know what the results have been since the Japanese left the fishing industry.

There were 1,337 Japanese fishing vessels taken over from the Japanese, and sold, the money being held to the credit of the individuals concerned. In 1941 there was a total of 13,602 fishing licences in all issued in British Columbia. Of that number the Japanese held 2,080, or 15·4 per cent. In 1942-43 the number of fishing licences increased until, at the last issue, they amounted to 15,379, an increase of 1,777. The actual picture is that 3,857 more fishermen have entered into the fishing industry since the Japanese left British Columbia. I would ask this very practical question of the C.C.F. In their rehabilitation programme will they allow the Japanese to return to the fishing industry of British Columbia? I would like to have that question answered. My stand is that they should not come back. The fishermen of British Columbia, however, should be told. They should be told whether if the C.C.F. were elected to power the Japanese would be allowed to come back into the fishing industry, because at the present time, with 15,379 licences issued, there is not a decent living for many more.

Mr. GILLIS: The hon. member said a moment ago that the British Columbia legislature had instituted a reconstruction committee report, of all parties?

Mr. REID: Yes.

Mr. GILLIS: Did they make a recommendation?

Mr. REID: In the book I have before me, they might have; but in the report I have not seen it. I want to be fair, and say that they might have. However, I have not seen any. In the report of the post-war rehabilitation council, the members of which are named, I could not find any recommendation regarding fishermen.

Mr. GILLIS: That is the body which should make a decision, because it is a British Columbia matter.

Mr. REID: The issuing of licences is not a British Columbia matter. It is not the provincial government which will make the decision; it is the people of British Columbia who will make it when the proper time comes. However, I want a statement in that connection, because I do not want the people to be misled. When they vote they should know what they are voting for.

I see my time is going on, and I shall proceed with my closing observations. In connection with rehabilitation I would say that first consideration must be given our fighting men; for without their sacrifice no rehabilitation or social security would be possible for us. While plans are being laid now to rehabilitate the men and women in our active forces after the war, and likewise to provide employment and other social measures for our citizens generally, much more thought will have to be given to world conditions than has been given to them by our people. Social security cannot be assured us unless we can be assured of a reasonable and lasting peace following the end of this war; and there can be no national security in a policy of isolation. One of the great problems facing the allies now, aside from the winning of the war, is how we can prevent another blood bath in the future; for the winning of the war may not bring peace.

For the past few years statements have been made throughout Canada about the danger of winning the war and losing the peace. While what is meant by losing the peace is open to many interpretations, to my mind one danger facing us is that owing to careless thinking on our part, or to not thinking at all, we may lose what freedom there is left. To many people, thinking is hard work. History can show many examples of peoples who have lost their liberty because they were too lazy to think out for themselves the problems that all free peoples must solve if they are to continue free. To my mind dangerous fires are being lighted in the minds of the people these days, fires which may flare up and consume us before we fully realize what it is all about.

Underneath a lot of the loose talk uttered to-day the real issue is not readily seen. That real issue is not so much economic as it is philosophic. The real issue is whether we should trust to the state supreme power over our lives. Never let us forget that our fathers found out long ago that complete power over our lives could not be trusted to anyone, no matter how wise or how virtuous a king or even a government might be. Men preferred to live their own lives; and so there was devised a society with power of its own to resist the government. If ever the state obtains complete mastery of our lives, freedom will be gone for ever. Once a single power, whether the state, the capitalist, the labour unions or any other group, undertakes to run our lives according to a certain plan and to guarantee by that plan to produce certain results, then it can brook no interference; for if the plan fails the rulers lose either their jobs or their lives.

It must not be inferred from what I say in this regard that I am advocating that we must not have new rules to prevent greed and the exploitation of the great masses of our people. New rules will have to be provided—yes, and enforced—so as to ensure a fuller and better life for all our citizens. In doing so, however, let us be very careful that we do not throw away for a mess of pottage the most cherished jewel of all, namely our individual freedom. The right to live one's own life, the right of free speech, the right to worship God in our own way—all these are a heritage which to me is priceless, and can never be compensated for by material things alone. It is as true to-day as when spoken by Christ, when he said, "Man shall not live by bread alone."

Mr. G. G. McGEER (Vancouver-Burrard): Mr. Speaker, I rise to say a few words to-day in the debate on this bill, because I believe it brings into focus the culmination of a long series of events since the turn of the century. This happens to be the first time any government in Canada has assumed the responsibility of setting up a department of economic direction.

The powers in the bill, which are to be vested in the minister and which are being delegated by parliament to the governor in council, vest in the new ministry a power over the economic well-being of individuals in Canada which, in itself, would have caused a revolution only a few years ago. Just what the exercise of those powers may be will be for history to disclose. But I think the acceptance of the provision for the wide powers extended to the ministry indicates that the government is well conversant not only with the seriousness of the problems which lie ahead, but also with the enormous difficulties which will attend their solution.

I for one hold the firm conviction that Canada is well provided to meet with success the post-war period, notwithstanding my belief that the difficulties will be just as great and just as costly as have been the problems of sustaining the economy of the nation through this period of war. There is no chart to guide us now as there was no chart to guide us when we embarked on the war in 1939.

I think some facts stand out, and here are what I consider the general broad conceptions of the main problem. Gainful employment will have to be provided for some five million Canadians, two million of whom are now engaged in the fighting services and in war industry. We have a public debt already of $14 billion, and upon any reasonable basis of estimation this will be rising for some time to a figure much larger than that. Already we have $11 billion of national federal debt, $2 billion of provincial debt and $1 billion of municipal debt.

Do not make any mistake about the condition of our provinces and municipalities. Representatives of both have appeared before the reconstruction committee. The Hon. Mr. Garson, Premier of Manitoba, pointed out in great detail that that province will have revenues wholly inadequate to provide for a greatly expanded programme of expenditure. I am confident that while every province has gleaned something from deferred maintenance during the war and from war revenues, there is not one which under its existing revenue powers has the financial resources to hope to make up in the post-war period the deferred maintenance that has accumulated during the war years.

Those who are interested in Mr. Garson's views will find them in the evidence of the reconstruction and reestablishment committee, No. 19, page 486, June 2, 1942. On November 27, 1943, representatives of the mayors' federation of Canada appeared before the committee and stated:

> The financial resources of the municipalities are wholly inadequate for any large scale post-war public works programme such as probably will be required.

That was not so after the last war. At the close of the last war the provincial and municipal governments embarked, not only upon a programme of making up deferred maintenance but upon a progressive programme of general expansion. On the other hand, the dominion government curtailed expenditures and moved toward a programme of balanced budgets with the objective of reducing the national debt.

Many people ask, and with some justification, "Are we going to move from this war into a period of illusionary prosperity and then collapse into a condition of hopeless inactivity?" There was never anything wrong with the wealth of Canada from 1930 to 1939, but there was something wrong with the machinery that maintained in circulation the economic power of the collective society of the people of Canada. We were told after the last war, "You have spent your money; the war has caused this debt; you have to tighten your belt and meet your obligations." No one can find much fault with that kind of honest theorizing.

Unfortunately, however, when the government stopped spending the country lost the power to expand, and all of a sudden the complete collapse of the economic structure took place. I should like to draw to the attention of the government and the minister some facts which are indicative that the financing of this war has followed closely the pattern of the financing of the last war. There are some details which vary greatly, but let me direct attention to the fact that in 1941 our total bank deposits were $1,052 million, while in 1918 they were $1,942 million. We increased our bank deposits by $842 million.

What have we done in this war? In 1938 our bank deposits were $2,498 million, and in April, 1943, they had risen to $5,297 million. Do not make any mistake about what that means. It means that the debt claim currency of this country, which was the cause of the trouble after the last war, has shown a proportionately larger increase during this war than it did in the last. That is not national currency circulating as a servant of the people; that is not currency issued in terms of public need; that is debt claim currency which is not spent into circulation as an operating medium of exchange but lent into circulation as a debt claim upon the nation to provide a monopoly. Make no mistake about what that means. If that is not changed, this system of frustrating every effort of progress, breaking down every power to move forward, all the plans, yes, all the sacrifices of this war will have been in vain.

Let me refer to another similarity. We have gone through this before and we are going through it again. Do not think for one moment that we on this continent will be given any special dispensation. What will permit us to escape the consequences which have befallen the people of Europe if we make the mistakes the people of Europe have made? In 1914 our public debt load was $335 million. By 1918 it had risen to $1,191 million, an increase of $866 million. But let me give the increase in the debt load since 1939. In 1939 we owed a debt of $4,693,000,000. On December 31, 1943, it had increased to $11,300,000,000. The increase in the federal debt in 1918 was $866,000,000, and to-day it is already $6,609,000,000. That debt must be serviced. Our interest charges have risen, although the rate has beeen cut, from $169,000,000 to $304,000,000. Our interest charges at the close of the last war were less than a hundred million dollars, and yet we heard those responsible for the government of Canadian cities, those responsible for the government of our provinces and those responsible for our federal government declaring throughout the whole of the period from 1920 to 1929 that the crippling power, the all-evading restricting force upon Canadian democracy in all its services to the people lay in the fact that there were fixed charges that could not be reduced; it lay in the fact that the debt load had increased to the point where nothing could be done without deficit budgeting, which is against sound, practical, financial economy.

What is the solution of that problem today, for it is not going to solve itself, and the men of to-morrow in our cities, in our provincial governments and in this parliament cannot escape finding a solution of this problem. I have listened to a great many ministers of finance. But I have never heard one minister of finance who approved deficit financing. I have never heard a responsible public man declare that a nation or a province or a city or an individual could go on and maintain its or his economic security by pyramiding an ever-increasing load of interest-bearing debt. There is plenty of evidence to prove that that debt load is a menace to-day.

You see, Mr. Speaker, it is all very well to say to the people: Your debts must be paid. The moment you start regimenting your people or imposing upon them a burden of taxation, you face one of two things. You face open revolt and repudiation of the government, and at the same time you face the line of diminishing returns. We are already at that point in Canada.

I support heartily what I thought was a splendid presentation of the situation by the hon. member for Parry Sound (Mr. Slaght) the other evening. But men say: How can you reduce taxation and increase public services? How can you call upon the government to cut down its levy of taxes on the people and to extend its expending power to provide services and improvements which the people are demanding? And we come to that easy phrase, You cannot get something for nothing. That on the face of it seems to be reasonable. But certainly under the existing system of issuing the medium of exchange, not in terms of public need, but in terms of private gain, through a toll-gate of interest imposed by private monopoly, you cannot escape the disaster of overwhelming and unpayable debt.

What is there in the way of solution? There was a time when men believed that the medium of exchange available to the people depended on the amount of money metal they could dig out of the ground. When the cycle of trade depression came around, unless you could discover a gold mine in California or Australia or perhaps the Cariboo, poverty would have to remain. As late as 1930 I heard the then Prime Minister of this country declare that gold is an asset necessary to our credit and that without our gold reserves our money would be valueless.

What has happened to that theory? It has gone, and gold has not lost its value. Gold plays a great part, as well as silver, in our international world to-day, and it probably will continue to play that part. But make no mistake about it, we have been released forever from the restricting powers of gold upon the volume of our internal currency, and to-day The Bank of Canada dollar, printed with a printing press upon a piece of paper, has behind it the integrity of the government, the resources of the entire nation and the intelligence of the Canadian people.

We have a means of creating a medium of exchange and putting it into circulation without accumulating an ever-increasing burden of debt. I just want to go back a little while, because what I am preaching is not new. I came to Ottawa many years ago and I laid before the banking and commerce committee of 1934 these proposals:

> The successful operation of the New Deal for humanity proposed by the Liberal party necessitates the establishment of the administrative foundations which I outlined to the banking and commerce committee on May 1, 1934, namely:
> (1) A national banking system controlling the issue of all currency and monetization and issue of credit transferable by cheque.
> (2) A department of taxation empowered to prevent excessive accumulation of currency and credit in issue;
> (3) A department of economy for the regulation and control of all internal trade, commerce and credit;
> (4) A department of foreign trade for the development, control and regulation of international trade, commerce, currency and credit.
> This plan does not involve the socialization of private finance or the wiping out of the legitimate business of the merchant banker. It can and should be confined to the national administration of currency and public credit devoted to the financing of all public enterprise and the maintenance of an adequate stream of consumers' buying power. Under this plan the national government, working in cooperation with the provincial and municipal authorities throughout the dominion can eliminate the disastrous costs which the private money system now imposes upon the financing of all public enterprise. We can eliminate unemployment, reestablish a rising standard of living, and advance our internal and external trade. Education may continue to iron out the social and economic inequalities which unfortunately persist. Steps to secure a greater measure of equity in the distribution of wealth may be undertaken with greater hope of success. Government will be able to function more effectively in maintaining a fairer balance between the city, agricultural and industrial communities. We do not assume that the Dominion of Canada can maintain economic independence, but we do say that under this plan the government of the dominion will be able to maintain, in cooperation with those nations who are willing and anxious to trade with us, a measure of economic security that has never been enjoyed in the past.

How much of that plan has been put in effect since 1934? All of it in some degree. The only thing lacking to give the government of Canada to-day power which every democratic government should have is the power to issue currency through its own national institution as the spending power of government.

I asserted at that time that we could not go on indifferent at the head of national government under our constitution to the financial needs and taxation powers and responsibilities of provincial and municipal governments. We found ourselves in those years in the junior branches of government hopelessly without the means of financing undertakings which would have eliminated much of the unemployment in our cities. School-teachers went unpaid. May I say that there is a great group of people throughout our national economy to-day who are underpaid, who are not receiving adequate compensation for the increase in the cost of living, or for the positions which they hold in our social and economic life, or for the services they render to the community at large.

If we are to have a peaceful period of secure progress after the war we have to meet some other problems. After the last war the number of airmen returning was comparatively small as compared with the numbers that will return in the uniform of the Royal Canadian Air Force after this war. The training they have secured and the record they have written in the skies entitle them, yes, entitle them all, to a place in the social order and economic life which will be worthy of the place they now hold. They will rightly demand a place in a nation enjoying a high state of progressive prosperity and they will not be satisfied with anything less. The men and women who will return in the uniform of Canada's navy are highly trained. They have held an important place. Do you think they are going to be willing to return to be mere hewers of wood and drawers of water? Are they to return to a life in which they may be told to-day that they can have a job and to-morrow that it is not available? So it is with the men and women of our army. They are trained to be leaders in the great forces of mechanized power. Do you think the problem of reestablishing the demobilized forces will be in any respect similar to what it was after the last war? Go through any of your modern factories; look at the people engaged there. The surroundings, the work they are doing, the wages they are receiving, are industrial conditions of the highest standards. Do you think for a moment that they will return to a standard of living such as obtained in Canada from 1930 to 1939? They will not do so. They will not be satisfied to accept it.

How then can this problem be faced? It certainly cannot be faced under the present debt claim system. It cannot be faced under a system of taxation which has already passed the line of diminishing returns and is destroying private enterprise—

Mr. BLACKMORE: And human life.

Mr. McGEER: —and private initiative. There is not any question about that.

Here is a new standard to be developed, an enormous debt to be reduced, and a condition of taxation which has already gone beyond the limits of reasonable acceptance.

That brings me to what I rose to speak on to-day, the problem of changing our banking and monetary system so that it will conform to a new order. Can we do that? Yes, Mr. Speaker, I believe we can, but I believe that it involves fundamental changes in our whole banking law. I believe that on the changes which are made in this regard depends more than anything else the success with which we shall be able to assume and fulfil the responsibilities which lie before us.

The Bank of Canada as at present formed has the power to finance our federal government by a straight issue of national currency, but it has no power to take deposits and no power to take advantage of deposits as a means of obtaining the benefit of a circulating currency or of controlling the circulation of currency. Those amendments are necessary.

A further amendment of the banking law is required to compel the Bank of Canada to be the financing authority for all public enterprise and to stop the chartered banks from issuing currency in the form of bank deposits as a substitute for Canadian money. They should be empowered to lend their own deposits and to lend their own capital; but to leave with them the power to issue a bank deposit debt claim as a substitute for currency, as a substitute for the Canadian medium of exchange, and to compel all Canadian governments and the Canadian people to be dependent upon that type of medium of exchange, is to leave us at the mercy of a private monopoly. It is because we have depended upon that kind of thing in the past that we have suffered both from inflation and from deflation, and so long as the present system continues we shall find that recurring condition inescapable. But, you say, how is that going to help our provincial and municipal governments? I would suggest that the time has come when we should have associated with the Bank of Canada a bank in each of the provinces of the dominion, a bank which will have close association with provincial and municipal governments, working in conjunction with each other and in conjunction with the federal bank, that is, the Bank of Canada, so as to be able to provide whatever finances are necessary to sustain the provincial and municipal economy.

Would such a system as that involve us in an inflationary condition? I do not think it would; but I am sure of one thing, that it would be possible under that system to avoid the disaster of inflation in the future. We have always suffered from deflation. We have never suffered from inflation. It was the deflation in 1921 that caused the disaster; it was the deflation in 1930 that caused the disaster. Where was there ever any inflationary condition from which the people of Canada have suffered? We have never had any means available to us to lift the people out of depression other than by piling up a new load of interest-bearing debt. We have never suffered from inflation and we never shall under the present system; but we shall invariably suffer from deflation, and that is what has happened in the past.

Should a government be provided with adequate means of financing a progressive rate in the standard of living? We are told in this house to-day that the problem of financing old age pensions is something which should be carried on by the provincial governments, and because we say that the cost will be too great a burden upon our national finances we leave the old age pensioners to struggle along on a miserable pittance. Take the burden of taxation as it moves across the under-strata in every class of society, taxed below a decent standard of living to-day. The power to avoid that kind of thing is the power that modern democratic government must take unto itself, and it must take it to itself through a sound and correct amendment of our currency laws.

We in Canada can look forward to an enormous expansion. We have a young country, the development of which is barely touched. Remarkable as it may seem, as yet we have not a single trans-Canada motor highway across the dominion. You can start at the eastern boundary line and go right through to the shores of Vancouver island, and in every part of the dominion there are millions of jobs crying to be done. Let me point out just one. Technical training is one of the great opportunities in Canada. We have built up during the war, around the national research council, a great organization that has made a splendid contribution to the war programme. Is there not an opportunity to take our national research council as it is to-day and consolidate it into a great technical training and scientific research training school to be applied to the development of our Canadian resources? There is one extension to our educational system that can be closely related to the whole development of our resources in line with the new age that is approaching. That is only one example. But none of these things will be available to us in all their full value if they are to be frustrated by a continuing and progressive load of unpayable debt with its burden of taxation and its ultimate burden of stagnation and repudiation.

RECONSTRUCTION

ESTABLISHMENT OF DEPARTMENT TO FORMULATE AND CARRY OUT RECONSTRUCTION PLANS

The house resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. Mackenzie King for the second reading of bill No. 82, to establish a Department of Reconstruction.

Mr. E. G. HANSELL (Macleod): Mr. Speaker, I have no desire to detain the house any longer than is necessary for me to make a few remarks on this bill to set up a Department of Reconstruction. At the outset may I say that I do not believe I have ever before experienced such a tense house as I experienced this afternoon, when the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) gave his official statement respecting some of our men who were among those who had been shot in Germany as they attempted to escape. Every heart here seemed to be hushed as we thought of it. I may say, too, that I think all hon. members agree with the Prime Minister when he says that such action should not be allowed to go by without punishment eventually being meted out to those who are responsible. I trust, too, that that punishment will be a penalty to fit the crime.

Some of us have boys in this war; some of us have lost sons in this war; some of us have sons who are prisoners of war, while others have sons who are facing the enemy on the seas, on the battle field and in the skies. Those brave lads who were shot gave up their lives for their country, and I trust that their sacrifice shall not have been in vain.

If the present administration are sincere in setting up this new Department of Reconstruction—and at the present time I have no reason to believe they are otherwise—and if they put their hands to the task and really attempt to bring about a new order in Canada which will give all men their security, and at the same time retain for all men their individual freedom, they will then have done something worthy of the sacrifices made by those young men.

The term "reconstruction" is something of a misnomer in Canada, because it appears to me that one cannot reconstruct something that is not broken down. So far as Canada is concerned—and the Prime Minister recognized this in his speech on the bill the other day—we have suffered no bombings. Our entire country is still intact. Our industries have already been built up. It will be a matter of transferring Canada from a war-time industrial nation to a peace-time nation. So far as reconstruction is concerned, I must say that I do not see what there is to reconstruct.

I believe, however, there is a great job we need to do. When I think of reconstruction I am wondering if the Prime Minister and his government are not a little bit behind the times. I can recall when as early as 1935 a certain well-honoured gentleman arose in this country and, recognizing that some reconstruction had to be done in those days of depression, brought into existence what was known as a reconstruction party. I believe that was the time when we had need to recognize that something was wrong in Canada. That was the time when this government, the one now in office, should have set its hand to the task of making Canada what it ought to have been.

I know a good deal of reference has been made in this debate to the past. Hon. members, particularly those on the government side, have said, "Oh, well, that is all in the past; we do not want to know about that. We want to know about the future." But I am at a loss to know, and particularly as I analysed the speech of the Prime Minister, what there is he hopes to get in the future that he could not have had in the past. There must be some reason for reconstruction.

The strange thing about it is—and I suppose it is quite explainable—that there have come from all quarters of the country, and I suppose from other countries which have found themselves in similar circumstances, the recognition of a need for reconstruction. We have boards of trade; we have chambers of commerce; we have industrialists; we have committees of the House of Commons and of the government. Why are there all these demands for reconstruction? I think I can say they have their background in the experience of the past.

While I am talking about the many plans offered for reconstruction, may I, in passing, call the government's attention to a little book I hold in my hand, a book of only seventy-three pages, entitled, "A Report on Post-War Reconstruction Policies," and issued by the post-war policy committee of the Vancouver board of trade. I do not know if the government's attention has been brought to this book, but I would say that I have read it diligently and I declare that of all the voluminous reports I have read with respect to reconstruction I have never discovered anything containing such valuable information as does this small book. It was not issued by the Social Credit government of Alberta. It was not issued by the Social Credit party of Canada. It was not issued by the Social Credit group in the House of Commons. Rather, it was issued by a committee appointed by the Vancouver board of trade, and it does something that many post-war reconstruction reports have not done, in that it analyses the reasons for our trouble. It shows the defects that exist in our present economic and political system. It diagnoses the trouble and then prescribes the remedy. Before the submission concludes, a series of resolutions is presented for consideration. I state this in passing, because I am certain that the committee who worked hard and long on this problem—for they must have done so—have submitted something that I believe will solve Canada's problems in the post-war period.

Many reconstruction submissions which I have read dealt with certain things that Canada might do, what could be built and so on. Submissions have been made, especially to the reconstruction committee of parliament, as to the roads that could be built, the number of bridges that could be constructed, the number of irrigation schemes and what-not that could be carried out. The report of the Vancouver board of trade says nothing about that, it simply asks a fundamental question, how are you going to do these things? This report deals with a question which I have failed to see answered in any other submissions I have read so far.

I remarked a little while ago that it is strange that there are so many reports being submitted. I think the reason is to be found in the history of the past number of years, perhaps the last ten or fifteen. We all recognize that there was something wrong with what is termed to-day to be the hungry thirties. We all saw ourselves pass from a period of depression into a period of apparent prosperity. I do not know that Canada has ever had such financial prosperity as she has to-day.

People are now saying the obvious thing—it has been asked hundreds of times—"You could not find the money for peace, but you can now find it for war." I do not believe that any government from this day on will be able to offer the excuse that they do not know from where they can get the money. If ever the question arises again, surely the people of Canada will be wise enough to know that that answer or that excuse will not hold.

There is one little observation I should like to make right here. There seems to be the unanswerable question of why we had such a period of poverty in the midst of plenty. I have never heard any politician answer that; I have never seen an answer by any professors of the old school of economics. The fact of the matter is that the bygone, orthodox financial expert has not yet answered that one question. The Prime Minister has not answered it. Upon analysing his speech I believe I can come to the conclusion that successful reconstruction depends upon whether or not we can sell our goods abroad. If my logic serves me as I think it should, my other conclusion is that the only reason why we had a depression then was that we could not sell our goods abroad. I am not making that statement; that is the conclusion I come to from what the Prime Minister seems to have said the other day. I do not believe that is the reason at all. I believe the only reason why we had those hungry thirties, the only reason why we lived in poverty when abundance abounded, was that the government refused to adjust its monetary policy in order that the goods that were available could be distributed adequately to the people of this country.

It always seems strange to me that apparently we have sufficient brains in Canada to tackle almost every problem except the one of finance. The other night Lieutenant Commander Todd gave members of the House of Commons a lecture on the invasion. I could not help feeling at the time that behind that huge fleet, that huge army and that huge air force were the brains that so strategically managed the whole campaign as to have it meet with the success it did. I thought of the genius that must have been behind it all. I think it is one of the greatest wonders of history. Yet we know that this genius is not confined to those who hold the rank of admiral, general or air marshal. Surely there is some intelligence in Canada. Are we to admit that we can solve every other problem but that of the distribution of our goods and services to bring our country to a place where it will have the highest standard of living possible in this world? Surely no one will deny that we have the genius for that. Surely it must be somewhere. Surely that problem is not beyond solution.

I should like to refer to Hansard of June 20 when the Prime Minister spoke on this debate, and analyse one or two of the remarks he made and attempt to point out some of the matters which I think need a little criticism and some others which need a little clarification. As reported at page 3980 of Hansard the Prime Minister recognizes that there is an aspect of reconstruction which might be termed economic reconstruction. In referring to this type of reconstruction he said:

> That has to do largely with the transforming of industry from making war supplies to making goods for human consumption and with restoring and increasing the capital equipment of the nation, together with the provision of employment for those who are being transferred from the one activity to the other. It is in connection with this economic reconstruction that the new Department of Reconstruction of the federal government will be primarily concerned.

The only reference of the Prime Minister to economic reconstruction is in connection with the transference over to a peace-time industry that will supply goods for human consumption. There is one thing sadly lacking in what I would term to be a description of economic reconstruction. Surely, if there is anything that needs to be reconstructed in order to get a vast amount of peace-time goods to our people, it is our financial arrangement which has never been able to do it. We have had the goods; we have the railways; we have the trucks and we have been able to get the goods right up to the retailer, but we have never been able to get them from the retailer to the larders and parlours and bedrooms of our homes. That is one thing that has been lacking in our economic system. If economic reconstruction is to mean anything, it must solve that one vital problem.

The Prime Minister is at the head of the present government, and surely what he says should be taken as having some authority as far as the Liberal administration is concerned. In all that speech there was not a single solitary stand taken or statement made as to what economic change must take place—actual economic change—actual change in monetary or fiscal policy—not a single suggestion.

I go along a little farther and here, at the top of page 3981 of Hansard the Prime Minister is dealing with markets, and repeating what he said a few days ago:

> Markets must be found and retained for our greatly increased food production unless we are not to face an agricultural depression.

Then farther on he says:

> First and foremost—

I want you, Mr. Speaker, to get those words.

> First and foremost there is the obligation to ensure the establishment of what may be most effective in the way of world organization for peace.

Then, after saying that this comes under the Department of External Affairs he says:

> Probably more than any other single question requiring attention in the post-war period will be the securing of wider markets and the extension of trade.

That may sound very well and good to the man who may not be thoroughly alert. But let me ask this question. Suppose this country is not able to gain the foreign markets that we require in order to sell our surplus goods—and no one is so foolish as to believe that every other country in the world will not be looking for the same thing, so that it will be the same old story over and over again and we shall find that foreign markets will not solve our problems for they never have before, not in this modern age, and I do not believe they ever will again—suppose we are unable to get the foreign markets we require, then what? There is absolutely no answer, Mr. Speaker. I repeat, then what? No answer.

Mr. BLACKMORE: From the Prime Minister.

Mr. HANSELL: My hon. friend the member for Lethbridge says that there is no answer from the Prime Minitser. Of course, we in this group have the answer; never worry about that.

Mr. BLACKMORE: They will find that out after a while.

An hon. MEMBER: When?

Mr. BLACKMORE: When you have bumped your heads a little more.

Mr. HANSELL: As some one has said, if people have to suffer in the post-war world, if they have not suffered enough already, it is their God-given right to suffer more. But we do not want them to. We believe that there is a solution of this problem and that that solution is not to be found in foreign markets. I am not saying that we do not want foreign trade, but I say that there is much ado made about this foreign trade business. It seems strange, does it not, that we have to feed the world before we ourselves can eat? But that seems to be the philosophy held by a lot of people who talk so much about foreign trade.

The Prime Minister in his speech also made considerable mention of cooperation by the provinces with the federal government. I shall read this one passage from his speech as reported at page 3981 of Hansard, where he said:

> In times of peace, on the other hand, we have to strive, in carrying out any policy, to get the good will and effective cooperation of every province, as well as carrying out our own work. I hope and believe, as a result of what has happened during the past five years, and of the cooperation which the federal government has had in large measure from the provincial governments, that following conferences still to be held between the provinces and ourselves we shall be able to work out some means whereby we can, in the period after the war, secure still greater cooperation for the benefit of all.

I do not know whether I am right in reading between the lines there, but I should like to make sure to-night that the Prime Minister is not putting the responsibility for this whole post-war picture on the shoulders of the provinces. I hope he has not in mind here that if one or two provinces refuse to accept his proposals at the forthcoming dominion-provincial conference he will turn around and say: We will see what the country has to say about this. That would be an extremely good excuse for bringing the representatives of the provinces here. I trust that the Prime Minister has no such motive.

I wish to say this in connection with provincial governments. The more that power is taken away from provincial governments and put into the hands of a powerful central government, the more is power taken away from the people. Let that be stated in unequivocal terms. The fact of the matter is that you get nearer to the people when you get out to their local governments. The more that provincial governments take responsibility away from the municipal governments, the more is power taken out of the hands of the people. I say this, too. When the hon. member for Essex East (Mr. Martin) the other night brought into the picture the Rowell-Sirois report which one or two provinces refused to accept, the tenor of his argument was that there was no cooperation. Well, why not? Simply because the Rowell-Sirois report to all intents and purposes would have placed more power in the hands of a centralized government and taken it away from the hands of the people, and one or two provinces would not bow down to that sort of thing. The strange thing about the Rowell-Sirois report, which in the end would have established more centralized power and more centralized control, is that it had every banker and every chamber of commerce behind it, and they sent out their literature and arguments to the various boards of trade which did not know what it was all about and which followed in father's footsteps. All the big chain newspapers were for the Rowell-Sirois report and all the big industrialists and, without mentioning any names, a good many politicians were also for it. I say that if this government at the forthcoming dominion-provincial conference attempts to take power away from the provinces, this group is going to stand by the provinces in their argument to retain their power for the reason that their power is more abundantly the people's power.

Let me ask this question. I do not suppose I shall get an answer but it does not make any difference. The central government, namely the government here at Ottawa, have complete control of our monetary system; at any rate they are supposed to have; no other government has it. Am I to be told that this government will not receive the cooperation of the provincial governments if it says to them, "We will see that you get all the money necessary to make financially possible what is physically possible and desirable in your province"? If the government said that, does anybody believe that the provinces would not cooperate? Certainly they would; there is no doubt about that. It is all a question of whether the dominion government is willing—I am not going to say "able"—to make financially possible that which is physically possible.

The other evening, while the Prime Minister was speaking, the hon. member for Lethbridge (Mr. Blackmore) interrupted him—

rightly so, I believe—by asking him where he was to get the money; was he to get it without increasing our debt? I am not going to enter at this time into all the Prime Minister's argument; but I ask him if, some time when he goes home and cannot sleep very well at night, he will turn to page 3987 of Hansard and analyse his answer. He went all the way round but he never touched the question. Finally he wound up his explanation by talking about a man having a family and, of course, he would need a home, and of course the home would have to be furnished, and so on. But is that a new condition which has suddenly come upon the scene of this world's economy? It seems to me that that has always been the case. Was it not so in the hungry thirties; was it not even so in the days of those two renowned people known as Adam and Eve? Is this part of a new idea? Is this part of the new order? I should like him to read what he said. I quote from Hansard, at page 3988:

> That is the way progress is made, through demands which arise from conditions of peace and prosperity;—

Let me ask him, how can a man make a demand if he has not the money? I know the Prime Minister has studied this subject, and I am positive he knows there is never enough money coming out of industry to buy back all the goods it produces. The Prime Minister continued:

> —and where you get demands of the kind which lead to the fuller employment of labour I do not think my hon. friend need fear about the increase of the public debt or taxation. . . .

Imagine that! The only answer is, "My hon. friend does not need to fear." Well, I say to-night that here is one who does fear that if we are not going to change our monetary policy, if we leave it to business, to industry—all well and good in its place—to sell its goods when people have not got the money to buy goods, we shall go back once again into the hungry thirties. But, oh no, the answer is. "Don't fear, my boy, don't fear; everything is all right; everything is going to be under control."

One other thing I should like to say here. I do not know whether the Prime Minister intended this as a promise or not, but he said, as reported at page 3988 of Hansard:

> . . . I believe the nation can go ahead with the great work of construction and reconstruction and at the same time reduce its taxation and reduce its debt.

He added:

> That at least is what I would hope to do if this government is in office when that period comes.

I do not know whether that is an election promise, but I am going to mark that page for reference when I come back here in the post-war period—and I shall come back.

Mr. MITCHELL: The hon. member is just bragging now.

Mr. HANSELL: I say that I shall be here if the Prime Minister is.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: You are working together, eh?

Mr. GRANT: Do you intend to turn Liberal?

Mr. JOHNSTON (Bow River): Who will? I have not found any in my part of the country; there are no such animals out there.

Mr. HANSELL: Since I wish to refer to one or two other things and I have only a minute or two to spare, I must hurry along.

As I have looked over these speeches I declare that the speech made by the hon. member for Jasper-Edson (Mr. Kuhl) has not yet been answered by his critics. Two or three hon. members have referred to it, but they have not given him an answer. What did the hon. member for Essex East say? I turn to page 4015 of Hansard:

> I am satisfied that no longer will our people go and receive a dole without at the same time receiving work for which they will be remunerated. Our people will not want to subscribe to the doctrine of the hon. member for Jasper-Edson.

The hon. member for Jasper-Edson never advocated any relief roll or what was commonly known in the relief days as a "dole." What he recommended was a reduction in the hours of labour and a national dividend to make up the purchasing power which was always lacking to buy back our production. When the hon. member for Essex East assumes to say what "our people will not want," is he speaking for our people? How does he know? He must be one of those three tailors of Tooley Street whose manifesto began, "We, the people of England." I want hon. members to get the logic of this:

> Our people believe in the dignity of work They do not want to be idle.

Who said they want to be idle?

Mr. GRANT: The hon. member for Jasper-Edson (Mr. Kuhl).

Mr. HANSELL: He never did. What we believe, and what the hon. member for Jasper-Edson said, is that work by compulsion from anyone at the top is something which takes away man's freedom, and that with the advent of technological skill the hours of labour could be reduced by scientific methods to four hours a day. The hon. member for Brant (Mr. Wood) asked, "How would I milk all my cows in four hours?" Can you imagine the logic of that?

Mr. CASTLEDEN: How does he do it now?

Mr. HANSELL: If he wants to work more than four hours that is his affair. We do not care if he pulls—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. HANSELL: I am sure hon. members do not mind if he milks cows all night if he wants to. We are not going to object to it.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: Five hundred pulls for one cent.

Mr. HANSELL: I see that my time is exhausted.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Go ahead.

Mr. HANSELL: I was only going to say this, that anything that is done to the people of Canada by compulsion from anyone else at all is the absolute antithesis of a Christian democracy. When man was created he was endowed with freedom of will to choose; and every satanic system which has been brought about since the old boy entered upon the stage has contained some device to take that freedom away from him.

Mr. JOHNSTON (Bow River): Even the Liberal party.

Mr. HANSELL: The only way to retain that freedom among men is for them to be able to choose to work at the work they want to do, and to be free to refuse work if conditions are undesirable. The man himself should be able to decide that, and if he wants to turn his talent to the writing of a concerto or the painting of a picture, then he should be free to do so. Compulsion brought to bear upon anyone by any other person is satanic. If it is natural compulsion it is different; but if it is compulsion exercised by any human individual over another it is satanic and I care not whether it is done by Liberals, Progressive Conservatives, the C.C.F. or Tim Buckism. If it is done it is satanic. A glorious Christian democracy is that which gives mankind the blessings the Creator has bestowed upon them and at the same time gives them absolute freedom. I thank you, Mr. Speaker, for your patience.

Mr. NORMAN JAQUES (Wetaskiwin): I should like to associate myself with the ideas expressed by the speaker who has just taken his seat (Mr. Hansell) and with the observations of the hon. member for Jasper-Edson (Mr. Kuhl). I have listened to this debate and to the other discussions on reconstruction and to what is called the new order, and all that it amounts to, so far as I can see, is that everybody is to be put to work. If there is anything new in work, I do not know what it is. Surely work is the oldest order in the world. But when the state undertakes to put everyone to work that is new; it is state socialism, and it does not matter whether it originates on that side of the house or in that corner of the house. It is state socialism just the same and you are all going the same road.

The hon. member for Essex East (Mr. Martin), referring to the hon. member for Jasper-Edson, made this statement:

> Our people will not want to subscribe to the doctrine of the hon. member for Jasper-Edson. . . . Our people believe in the dignity of work.

Exactly. Well, is there any dignity in slavery? Is there any dignity in work performed by a man who is compelled to work, unless from natural causes? If there is, then surely slavery was the noblest institution we have witnessed, and the slave was the noblest of mankind. We know, however, it is not so. Natural dictatorship and the struggle against it is an ennobling thing; nobody denies that. But the Almighty, or Providence, has permitted mankind through science and so forth, to make it possible to lift the burden of a struggle for mere existence from the backs of mankind. And when human beings step in and presume to take the place of the Almighty and to say to men, "You shall work or starve," that is dictatorship and it does not matter whether it is called Liberalism, Progressive-Conservatism, C.C.F.ism or Tim Buckism. It is all the same and it all originates from the same idea, or philosophy. What differentiates not only our group but our movement throughout the world, particularly in the British empire, the movement known as social credit? It is this. We believe in voluntary effort. We believe that the time has come when it is no longer necessary to impose a struggle upon everyone for the bare necessities of life. That has been solved. Struggle there must be, but the struggle should be lifted to a higher plane than the mere struggle for existence. We have always advocated dividends for all and that has been ridiculed. First of all, the question was raised, where would the money come from? Well, at the present time over fifty per cent of the production of this country and of our allies is being given—I say given because it is given in the form of munitions—to Germany and our other enemies. That is a national or if you prefer, an international dividend. We ask nothing in exchange. As a consequence of that, even though the cream of the nation is either in uniform or in munition factories, while essential retail goods and the necessities of life are being produced by the very young and the very old, in spite of that fact, and that we are giving away over fifty per cent of our production, right out of the country, the present standard of living in Canada is higher than ever before.

I know there are certain inconveniences and restrictions, but I think I am right in saying that, if you average Canada right through, the present standard of living is higher than it ever was before. Certainly it is a great deal higher than it was for the ten years preceding the war. The reason for that is surely obvious. The problem of marketing has been solved. There is no trouble about marketing and therefore there is no trouble about producing. And if you solve the problem of consumption you automatically solve the problem of production. I might say, in passing, that the paying of a dividend is not new. Not only is the idea of it not new, but as an actual fact it is not new. I have here a book entitled, "Monetary Experiments", by Richard A. Lester, and in a foreword by Professor Kemmerer the following appears:

> This study is one of a series being published under the auspices of the international finance section of the Department of Economics and Social Institutions in Princeton university.

This book is published under the auspices of the university of Princeton, and in the chapter headed, "Social Dividend in Maryland", I read:

> When Maryland first issued paper money in 1733 most of it was given away—a certain sum to each inhabitant over fifteen years of age. This was done in order that the paper money might be "the more useful to the inhabitants" and its circulation might be "as speedy and diffusive as possible." The legislature hoped by this means "to remove the difficulties under which the inhabitants had long laboured." In a sense this was a sort of "social dividend" similar to that advocated by Major C. H. Douglas in his books on social credit.

At the end of the chapter there are a few words which sum up the experiment, and they are as follows:

> From his detailed study of forty-five years of money in Maryland, Professor Gould concludes: "Considering the peculiar benefits to grain and tobacco culture, the conveniences offered to trade, and the faithful redemption of every shilling at face value, it is hardly too much to say that this was the most successful paper money issued by any of the colonies."

It can be seen that the national dividend is not even new; this was done before and it was a great success. To those who, like the hon. member for Essex East and others, have been so fond of saying that it would demoralize and pauperize the people, I would say that it was the recipients of that dividend who a few years afterwards fought and won the war of independence.

I shall now quote a few lines from Douglas himself. He has this to say on state socialism:

> State socialism is based on the premise that, firstly, the control of policy is resident in administration, and, secondly, that it is possible to "socially" control administration, and thirdly, that the state should be able to supply economic pressure to the individual; whereas I suggest to you that the control of policy is resident in credit, and its financial derivations, of which money is one, while administration is a technical and expert matter not susceptible of being socialized, and, lastly, that the only possible method by which the highest civilization can be reached is to make it impossible for either the state or any other body to apply economic pressure to any individual.

That is the reason for the dividend. It should be obvious to any thinking person that the world is coming to the parting of the ways. People speak of a new order. We believe in a new order. A new order should mean individual freedom. After centuries of struggle we have won political freedom but the world has not yet won individual economic freedom. The only offer that I have any knowledge of from any other movement but our own is this: People are being offered economic security at the price of individual freedom. That is what they are being offered. That is what they were offered and received in Germany, Russia and Italy. That is what they are being offered to-day not only in Canada but throughout the British empire. The so-called new order is state socialism. It is based, not on individual freedom as it should be, but on collective security at the price of individual freedom.

Quite recently the hon. member for Jasper-Edson was criticized for a statement he made about the leisure state. We well know that there is no room for a leisure state in war time. That is one of the reasons why war is hell. There is no leisure. But surely after the war is over and when the worst of the damage of the war and the waste of war have been repaired we should look to the ideal of a new order, and that should be toward a leisure state and not a work state; that is, work for the sake of working. Major Douglas has this to say on that subject:

> The more the maintenance of life can be shifted from the backs of men on to the backs of machines, the more important it is to find a creative outlet for the human energy released, and the more certain is it that a considerable portion of this energy will, without compulsion, be devoted to the improvement of the industrial machines. That is to say, that if a practical policy based on these considerations be pursued there will be a fall in the man-hours required for routine or operating work, and a consequent rise in the man-hours available for design and research work. The industrial machine is a lever continuously being lengthened by progress which enables the burden of Atlas to be lifted with ever-increasing ease. As the number of men required to work the lever decreases, so the number of men set free to lengthen it increases.

I shall read one more quotation from Major Douglas on the leisure state. It is as follows:

If we assume that the constant effort to reduce the amount of labour per unit of production are justified, and we recognize the unquestionable fact that the genuine consumption capacity of the individual is limited, we must recognize that the world, whether consciously or not, is working towards the leisure state. The production system under this conception would be required to produce those goods and services which the consumer desires of it with a minimum and probably decreasing amount of human labour. Production, and still more the activities which are commonly referred to as business, would of necessity cease to be the major interest of life and would, as has happened to so many biological activities, be relegated to a position of minor importance.

This movement of social credit is a great deal more than a mere method of finance. Monetary reform is not enough. Social credit is a philosophy of life, and the financial part of it is merely the means to gain the ends of the policy. The basic philosophy of social credit is freedom for the individual.

There are only two methods of production in the world—there can only be two—compulsion and persuasion. So far, the world has been more or less under persuasion. If there has been compulsion it has been imposed by Providence, by God or by Nature, whichever you prefer. But that has been overcome, and now we are threatened with production by compulsion—a compulsion imposed, not by nature, but by individuals who have assumed powers which, rightly, belong only to the Almighty. That is, in my opinion, the essence of all dictatorships.

We propose that everybody should be guaranteed—every man, woman and child—at least the necessities of life, whether they work or not. I do not mean to say that this would apply, of course, in war time and probably for some time after the war; but it is an ideal to guide us. All work would be voluntary, and that would be a noble thing. As I said before, I see nothing noble in being compelled by the state to work at a task which one must accept or starve. That condition is all right when it is imposed by nature. But that condition we have overcome; the problem is no longer one of production. As every speaker has said, consciously or otherwise, the problem is to market, to sell, if you like, or to distribute what we now can produce in such large quantities.

Therefore there is no longer any reason why all work should not be put on a voluntary basis. We could begin, of course, by lowering the age for pensions, and increasing the amounts. Perhaps we could raise the age for the education of youth. We could shorten the working time at both ends. The ideal should be toward a leisure state, with work freely done and not imposed by a dictator.

I hope hon. members will not deliberately distort what is said by members in this group. I suppose there is not a member in the house who has a family who does not regard it as his duty—and rightly so—to leave his family as financially independent as possible. I am sure that would be the first care and the first instinct of every father and mother in the house. If that is right, then surely that is the very best thing we can desire for our own children. Therefore, in the long run, it must be the very best thing for all children, and all people.

Of course it has never been possible, so long as the world was in a state of real scarcity. But in this day and age, when as a result of the war we shall have immensely increased our powers of production, the problem will not be one of production but, as has been said so often, one of markets. Some say that we shall have to give away to foreign countries a great portion of our production, through a favourable balance of trade and foreign lending—which is the same thing as giving.

I believe that charity begins at home; and if it is necessary—and I am sure it is—to give away part of our production, because there is no other way of getting rid of it, then I contend that we should set a good example in our own country and pay ourselves some dividends. If we did that, it would not be long before the world would follow our example.

Mr. D. KING HAZEN (St. John-Albert): Mr. Speaker, the word "reconstruction" is given a wide meaning in the interpretation section of the bill. It includes every undertaking by dominion, provincial or municipal authority or by any corporation or other person that may contribute to the reorganization of industry, in order to provide maximum production and full employment during and following the change-over from war-time production of industry to peace-time production.

I should like to take the opportunity this definition affords me to bring to the attention of the house very briefly a matter which I believe is of importance, if some of our reconstruction and interprovincial problems are to be considered and dealt with intelligently. It has to do with the lack of reliable information available respecting trade between the provinces.

If I were to ask the bureau of statistics for figures showing the trade between New Brunswick and Saskatchewan, or between any one province and any other province, the information would not be available. The bureau of statistics does not have such information. It seems to me it is important that such records should be kept, if we are to have a true picture of interprovincial business. Unless we have those records, it is impossible intelligently to study and discuss some of the economic problems and reconstruction problems which will arise after the war. Until such information is available we shall be travelling in the dark, and it will be impossible for us to obtain a true picture of Canada's interprovincial business. I am informed that this information could be obtained by the bureau of statistics and that it would not be difficult to obtain, although it would involve an additional expenditure of about $10,000 a year.

On April 7, 1926, the governor in council appointed Sir Andrew Rae Duncan, the Hon. W. B. Wallace, then judge of the county court of district No. 1, in the province of Nova Scotia, and Professor Cyrus Macmillan, Master of Arts and Doctor of Philosophy of McGill university, to be commissioners under the Inquiries Act for the purpose of conducting an inquiry into the conditions and claims of the people of the maritime provinces and to make such specific recommendations as in the opinion of the commissioners would result in affording relief from the conditions complained of. Mr. F. Maclure Sclanders, commissioner of the Saint John board of trade, acted as secretary of the commission.

The commission's report is dated September 23, 1926, and in it the commissioners urged that a system of statistics should be made regularly available from as early a date as possible on the trade of the maritime provinces with other provinces and with foreign markets as well. Section 39 of the report deals with this matter, and I should like to read the first and third paragraphs thereof. The first paragraph reads:

> We have had brought before us the lack of any comprehensive measurement of the trade of the maritime provinces with other provinces and with foreign markets. We were ourselves disappointed not to be able to pursue investigations on trade matters along lines which such statistics would have enabled us to do. We found on inquiry at the dominion bureau of statistics that consideration had been given some time ago to this very subject but, mainly through lack of organization in the statistics relating to certain phases of transportation, it was not possible to proceed with the plans that had been formulated. We strongly urge that these difficulties should be overcome, as they can be, and that on this phase of internal trade a system of statistics should be made regularly available from as early a date as possible.

The third paragraph reads:

> With regard to the general function of the bureau of statistics, we venture to draw attention to the importance of providing a comprehensive statistical organization in a country situated as is Canada with a series of provinces differing often in economic outlook. Very considerable progress has already been made in this direction, but we feel the bureau could be increased in efficiency by being given improved facilities for the kind of organization it is necessary to develop as an independent central agency covering the activities of all departments from the statistical side.

It has been suggested that the reason why this recommendation was not put into force was that representatives in the house from Ontario and Quebec objected because it would show the trade among the provinces to be in their favour. I do not consider that is the real reason, because I have always found members of the house from Ontario and Quebec ready and willing to give a sympathetic hearing to the other provinces in order to endeavour to find a solution of their difficulties.

Until statistics on this trade are obtainable we shall be travelling in the dark. It is not possible for us to obtain a true picture of our interprovincial affairs or to make an intelligent study of them until these figures are made available to us. I ask the government to implement this provision of the Duncan report and to take steps to see that statistics of trade between the different provinces are made available.

Mr. A. R. ADAMSON (York-West): Mr. Speaker, I have listened with a great deal of interest to this debate with regard to the setting up of a Department of Reconstruction. The more I have heard, the more it has become apparent to me that reconstruction is largely an engineering problem. I happen to be an engineer, and perhaps I can take some of the time of the house to express a few views which are diametrically opposed to some of those expressed by my hon. friends to my extreme left.

The definition of an engineer has been given as a man who can do something for a dollar which it would cost two or three dollars to have done by somebody else. If an engineer is given enough time, enough money and enough men he can do practically anything. Chauncey Depew has said that, given those three things, he could build a railroad to the north pole. Many of the plans that have been discussed in this house and have received publicity in the public press more or less fall into the category of building a railroad to the north pole. They seem to be very fine in debate and they look all right on paper; but having lived all over the world, having made my living in several countries besides Canada, perhaps I may be excused when I say that a great deal of what has been said is impracticable.

I am going to deal directly with the financial set-up, which has been mentioned in this house at considerable length. If we look at the beginning of chaos in the world we shall see that the first inevitable step toward this war started with the so-called managed currencies. We have the statement of Sir John Anderson in England that the beginning of Great Britain's chaos was with the adoption of the gold standard. That, I submit, is wholly inaccurate. With all due respect to Sir John Anderson, I take issue with him. England returned to the gold standard on the basis of the pre-war price of $20.67 an ounce, with a tremendously inflated currency and a tremendously inflated national debt. To say that that was a return to the gold standard is technically correct, but actually it was a return to an exchange standard between paper currency and metal which could not work because the paper was so tremendously inflated. That is the situation with regard to the adoption of the gold standard in England. Let us see what happened.

Despite everything that has been said, we in this country depend, whether anybody likes it or not, for our prosperity upon international trade, and when the war is over we shall depend for our prosperity a great deal more upon international trade. One fundamental about international trade, particularly forward trade, is that the buyer and the seller can deal in a standard whose value will remain constant when the contract is carried out. Throughout the centuries that has been the fundamental rule of success in international trade. Nothing has altered; nothing will alter.

We see that to-day we have a managed currency. All currencies are managed, fictitiously managed, with relation to the price of gold. In the United States they will purchase gold but not sell it at $35 an ounce, but on the free gold market both in Alexandria and in Bombay gold to-day sells for somewhat over $70 an ounce. The house may consider this an academic question but it is far from it. It means that the great bulk of the people with whom we shall have to trade, the great centres of population which are in the orient still have hard currencies. They believe and throughout years of bitter strife they have found it true that gold is the one thing they can trust to and to-day, despite the fact that large sums of United States currency are circulating in the orient through the American troops, United States currency is at a very great discount and the Americans have had to resort, so I understand, to two types of currency known as the blue seal and the yellow seal.

The pound sterling is an internal currency except in the controlled parts of the sterling block to-day. Its value outside England is extremely variable. Special invasion currency was issued for the attack in Normandy. I mention this because the United States dollar and the pound sterling are to-day, in the minds of the great centres of population in the orient, losing their intrinsic value because they are not convertible into a metallic base. Those are the facts. We may or may not like them. But all history shows that experiment after experiment has been made in fiat money from the time of Marcus Aurelius right down to the present day and it has inevitably brought chaos.

I mention this, Mr. Speaker, because I have lived in two countries where managed currency led to inflation, where I saw great poverty and tremendous distress caused by the printing press. One of those countries was Germany and the other Brazil. One of them after the last war was poverty-stricken; or the Germans said they were. The other country was Brazil, rich in natural resources. Both suffered from inflation, and the people, the workers, were the ones who suffered. I want to make that very clear because I have experienced inflation in those two countries and I know what it means.

It is said that the Americans have or had a hoard of gold which would never be of any use to them. But in the last three months the United States treasury has lost in the neighbourhood of $166,000,000 of gold for external purposes, and that despite the imports and the purchases she has made from Canada and other gold-producing countries which sell to the United States. Furthermore, their gold currency coverage which was over ninety per cent a year ago has dropped to slightly over sixty per cent and it may now be less than that. That is what is happening to the American gold. The American gold is one of the most useful assets the United States has ever had, as was our gold at the beginning of the war, as was admitted by Mr. Graham Towers, who said that Canada's gold saved Canada's bacon in the first year of the war.

We talk about divorcing ourselves from managed currency and having the printed dollar. If I thought it would work, I would advocate it.

Mr. BLACKMORE: Is it working in Canada? There is not a dollar of gold behind our money.

Mr. ADAMSON: We have no international payments at the present time. I have experienced personally the results of the printing press and because of this bitter experience I am speaking in this house to-night.

Mr. KUHL: The printing presses ran wild in the countries you are speaking of.

Mr. ADAMSON: I have seen the printing press start off quietly with just a little inflation. I saw this happen in Brazil. It did not run wild. It happened first with regard to the sale of some securities to build a railway. They found it was easy, and they liked it. It started off quietly, but then in a little while the milreis dropped from thirty-two cents to about six cents and no government could stop its descent. Unemployment became a serious problem and poverty, strikes and eventually a revolution followed the resort to the printing press. I saw that; I experienced it, and it is because I saw it happen in a rich country like Brazil, a country full of natural resources, that I am speaking here to-night. It is one of the most dangerous philosophies that we could accept here in Canada.

Mr. KUHL: There is such a thing as the right amount.

Mr. ADAMSON: They thought they were going to have the right amount. Everybody thinks they are going to get the right amount, but I have yet to know of a case where they stopped at the right point.

Mr. JAQUES: Well, you could not fight a war on that principle; at any rate you could not win a war on it.

Mr. ADAMSON: I have brought this up, as I said before, because this debate has taken a turn toward finance. As an engineer I have seen what happens to my profession; I have seen what happens to construction, housing and the like when the people of the country lose faith in the currency of their country; and they will lose faith again just as soon as we begin to print money without security. Bad money drives out good.

Mr. KUHL: You see what happened under deflation.

Mr. ADAMSON: That is the issue which faces us to-day. In considering all these plans, excellent though most of them are, we must remember that our future depends upon the development of the natural resources of this country and the increase of our trade. We cannot live by any specious theory of finance. That was not the way by which the pioneers of Canada built up this country; and we are to-day, because of the peculiar idea that we can live on the state, headed either for state socialism or chaos.

Mr. HARRY R. JACKMAN (Rosedale): Mr. Speaker, in rising to support the bill by which the Department of Reconstruction will be set up, I cannot be certain, nor do I suppose any hon. member can be absolutely certain whether it will have any great usefulness. It may result in merely a fact-collection agency; and its usefulness or otherwise cannot be foretold in advance of the events which will follow upon victory in this war.

Nevertheless, this Department of Reconstruction may perform a useful purpose, and with that possibility in view I am glad to support it and to advance certain suggestions to which I think the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) might give consideration.

It may well be that when victory is assured to us we shall find that our job will not be to provide work for people; on the other hand it may be a job for the government to put a damper on an incipient boom. We have, stored up in the hands of the people, a tremendous amount of savings, much of which cannot be spent at the present time because there are not civilian goods on which to spend them, and we shall see what will be the result, when the war is over, of this great unleashed amount of money which is available for consumer goods. It is, however, well to be in readiness in case there is unemployment and it is necessary to stimulate production and consumption in this country, and it may, therefore, be that the Department of Reconstruction will have a useful and important purpose to serve. In any event, the readjustment and rehabilitation will not be automatic, even if the natural demand for workers is sufficient to absorb all those who are willing to offer their services in the industrial and agricultural and mining fields of this country. However, that natural demand, if it is sufficiently great to absorb them all, is not likely to be facilitated or expedited by the setting up of this department. There is bound to be a time lag between the rehabilitation and the demobilization of the men and women from our forces and from our industries before they are placed in civilian goods industries.

As I understand it, it is not the policy of the present government to create jobs, either through public works or other expenditures of public moneys, if the natural working of the economic system is sufficient to give our people employment. One does not know whether the ministry of reconstruction will become a mere repository and exchange of information having to do with jobs, or whether it may have a general overriding power over other departments of the government which are specifically charged with carrying on certain projects. It will undoubtedly face a delicate position, because it will have a great deal to do, if it does have any function to perform at all, with other departments of the government and also with departments of provincial governments.

For example, the Department of Reconstruction would undoubtedly know about the amount of money and the amount of manpower involved in government projects of one kind or another. It would also likely know of the amount of money and manpower involved in the major private undertakings throughout the country. But I do not see how it could possibly know of the millions of private projects which will be undertaken by our citizens, whether they be the building of homes or the purchase of durable articles. That information, which is of the greatest importance, cannot be known or even estimated with any reasonable degree of accuracy by a department of reconstruction, and to some extent, perhaps to a very large extent, that deficiency will vitiate the work of the department itself. How is the department to know how individuals are going to spend their money? Will they spend it on homes or on autos, on taking out a new insurance policy or on a vacation, or will they, because of lack of confidence in the immediate future after the war, decide to hold whatever cash or victory bonds they have and refuse to spend their savings and thus take that money out of circulation?

What I should like to emphasize particularly is that the government should indicate what is to be the driving or motivating force in our workaday life in the post-war period, what is to be the machinery which, as they say makes the clock tick. Are we to have government direction and regimentation, being told what to do and unwilling to do more than our assigned tasks because there is no reward or incentive to do more than the minimum? Or are we to operate as free men under rules and regulations which are imposed by the government but which will guarantee opportunity and fairness to all our people? The answer to that problem strikes at the great question which confronts us all, as to whether we are to have a socialist state in Canada, or whether we shall operate under the system of free enterprise and individual initiative.

To-day the market is provided by the government for all our agricultural and industrial production. The government pays the whole bill and provides the incentive through paying whatever is necessary to produce the goods. There is little regard to cost, as we see by the evidence in the war expenditures committee, where some shipyards produce a 10,000-ton freighter at one price and others at a higher price. The important thing in fighting a war is to get production. Costs mean little and profits or earnings less. You must produce the goods in order to win the war, and whatever consequences fall in the wake of that must be considered in the later period and not while the fighting is going on.

Fortunately, the financial and economic system has been strong enough to stand the strain to date, and although we live and learn, speaking in terms perhaps of years, we do not know how much longer the system can stand the strain which is at present imposed upon it with the steadily mounting debt and the charges and other regulations attendant thereon. If we do not have a regimented, totalitarian state, then we shall have a free economy where every man will be his own master, able to choose the vocation or job which he wishes. May I point out particularly to the house that the greatest stumbling block to a return to the system of free economy is the present taxation and fiscal policy of the country. No better means could have been devised to bring about a socialist state than the present taxation policies of Canada, and if they are continued there is no question that free enterprise and initiative will expire.

At the outbreak of the war, taxation was used as the instrument to stifle civilian production, which was literally choked off. Certainly there should not be an increase in civilian production brought to the market to any greater extent than will enable our people to live in a reasonable degree of comfort. Certainly there should be no increase in standards. Wages were stabilized in civilian industries but certainly not in war plants, where workers were doing jobs at higher rates and war plants were attracting workers from ordinary fields of industry. We have only to look at the aircraft industry to find a typical example of the process. That was all to the good. But the reverse situation will obtain in the post-war period. No longer do we want to strangle civilian production. On the contrary, we want to cancel all war production and to turn all our man-power to production for civilian use. We shall turn from production to kill to production to live. It is, therefore, logical that we should reverse the process which we adopted at the outbreak of the war whereby we raised taxes to prohibitive levels, particularly on business, and to a large extent on individuals also.

Unless that is done, initiative and the motivating force which we have always had in a system of free economy will be lost to us and we shall lose that freedom which so many of us prize. At the present time the minimum tax on business is forty per cent; if that business earns more than the average earnings during the 1936-1939 period, the tax is 100 per cent; then whatever is left after that may be distributed to the shareholders, and they are taxed in their particular brackets at anywhere from thirty per cent to ninety-eight per cent. So that it does not take more than simple arithmetic to realize that there is no possible incentive for one to engage in business or to expand, or even for an individual who is not in business or corporation brackets to earn more money, because the brackets are so high that it is not worth the extra effort.

We find that not only in the upper brackets, whether they are connected with the war effort or not, is it no longer profitable to do this, but workers in the factories do not find it profitable to work the sixth day because that puts them in the higher brackets for the whole week's wages and there is so little left of the sixth day's wages that it is not worth while working. The consequence is that the nation loses production, and the Department of National Revenue loses what it might otherwise have obtained had the taxation been more reasonable.

It may be that such a system is necessary—I will not say that it is, but this is not the place to debate the question—during a period of war, but certainly during peace time and during the great conversion period after the war we must not have such conditions obtaining. There is nothing more important for the Prime Minister to announce than the government's intention with regard to post-war taxation; for the power to tax is the power to destroy, and that is what is happening as far as civilian production, particularly new production, is concerned. And rightly so, at the present time, because we have a war to carry on and we do not want more goods for civilian use. But companies as well as individuals must know whether they will be compensated for the risk they have to undertake and the enterprise and management they must contribute in the post-war period, and particularly is this so of new businesses.

[Mr. Jackman.]

Some government officials have left the impression that it would be their recommendation that taxes after the war should be substantially reduced. We are all aware that the treasury will need revenue in the post-war period, but it would be foolish to kill the goose that lays the golden eggs. People must know where they stand in the matter of taxation. While the question is important to all, it is of the greatest importance to those who are engaged in business to provide leadership through which jobs are created. Canadian citizens not government departments are going to do the major planning in this country, and it is time to think now of the deciding factor of post-war taxation; otherwise there is no use in having government commissions and boards and other public bodies set up to decide how much work can be created, how many jobs can be provided, how much capital expansion there may be. What we need is a clear chart so that business will know whether it can undertake new things and whether there is sufficient incentive for them, because unless there is some compensation for the risk involved there is not likely to be much go ahead; the green light is not likely to come on as far as business is concerned.

It is not necessary to bring to the attention of the house this fact, that not only does a nation perish without vision but that without leadership the nation is lost. We must, therefore, provide a chart whereby leaders in business and industry can guide their future plans, and a fair and equitable taxation policy applicable to the post-war period should be announced immediately. Let us know what our ascertainable post-war expenditures are likely to be. Let us know the over-all picture of social welfare costs. Inasmuch as it is in our power to provide it, let us give the people what they want and what they need. But it is also our duty to tell them what the cost is and how that cost is to be borne by our people. Reconstruction means reemployment and job creation. That is what the people want, not doles and hand-outs, even if it is their own money. Let us provide a fair day's wage for a fair day's work. Public ownership may well be desirable in some instances, but where there is room for competition and development let not the government become a limiting monopoly. For example, in the air transport field we find the present government excluding any likely competition even when the whole world is our oyster and there is plenty of room for not only the government line but for a number of competitors in what is likely to prove one of the greatest and fastest expanding fields of transportation.

anything about money, but I do know that the municipalities in British Columbia cannot possibly take their proper share in the reconstruction programme unless they get assistance from the federal treasury.

Another thing in which I do not agree with the Prime Minister is that he has not much fear, as I understood him the other day, of the immediate six months following the peace. Personally I think that the first six months following the peace are going to present a very serious problem. Possibly I am looking at it from the soldier's point of view. I do not think you are going to be able to keep the men in the army after the war. The men will look after that themselves. The desire of every soldier will be to get home as quickly as he can and to get out of uniform, with the possible exception of the air force. These men are going to be thrown on to the labour market immediately after peace is declared. They will have a certain amount of deferred pay, which was an excellent idea on the part of the department, and a certain amount of savings. But I hope that every young soldier coming back from the war will not make the same mistake that I made and that the Prime Minister and the Minister of Pensions and National Health (Mr. Mackenzie) made. I waited twenty years after the war before I got married. I hope these young soldiers will get married immediately, but I do not know how far their savings will carry them if they get married unless we have concrete plans ready for their employment when they return. So far as I know, no concrete plans have been made by the government and no blue-prints prepared to put these men to work immediately after peace is declared. If peace were declared next week, the federal government, so far as I know, has no plans complete as yet to put these men and women immediately to work. We have had a wonderful reconstruction committee which has studied and submitted various plans.

I will tell you how we do it in British Columbia. The government of the day in British Columbia set up a committee, not of the government, but of the legislature, and that committee toured every little district in the province and got ideas from the Canadian Legion, from boards of trade, women's institutes, municipalities, and every other organization they could think of, as well as from individuals. I want to tell you that I am proud of the fact that I come from the province of British Columbia because within one week after peace is declared the British Columbia government can call for contracts for $10,000,000 worth of constructive work. That is a wonderful record. I want hon. gentlemen to mark that. I do not know how it is in the other provinces, and I am not criticizing them. So far as I know the federal government has no plans ready with which they can proceed to put men to work immediately after peace is declared. They have suggested various ideas—public buildings, waterways, railway expansion, and so on. But I repeat that British Columbia, through its Department of Public Works and other departments, has blueprints already prepared and estimates already made so that within one week after peace is declared they can call for tenders of $10,000,000 of constructive work. I think that that is the attitude which the federal government should adopt. I may be wrong; the federal government may have its plans ready, but if they are ready, this house has never been told about any concrete plans.

There is another matter. But first I had better continue with the Prime Minister, because there are some other things on which I do not agree with him, and if you are going to disagree I think it is a good idea to disagree from the top down, starting with your leader. I am not going to speak in a sobbing voice and then stab him in the back unless I decide to move across the floor on the same day.

One thing in which I am particularly interested so far as the soldiers are concerned is farming. I should like to quote what was said by the chairman of the reconstruction committee, the man who I think is most intimately connected with the reconstruction programme next to the Prime Minister himself. We are very glad that he comes from British Columbia. He and his committee have done an excellent job, and I am sorry that the chairman is not here to-day. He happens to be in hospital, and I know that I speak for every member when I wish him a speedy recovery. I quote in part what he said with respect to food at page 3994 of Hansard of June 20 of this year:

> In this respect we welcome the conclusion arising from the united nations food conference that never again—

I repeat that.

> —that never again will food be destroyed simply because people have not enough money to buy it.

That is from the chairman of the reconstruction committee. I point that out because I want to speak of it in connection with the Veterans' Land Act. Coming from the chairman of the committee it may be presumed that he was speaking for the government. What notice are we giving to the boys overseas with respect to this matter at the present time? Are we telling them that we in this parliament are not going to permit the destruction of food in this country? Hon. members will recall that the great president of the country to the south made probably the only mistake he has ever made in his leadership when he allowed brood sows to be destroyed. Brazil also destroyed coffee. Here we state through the chairman of the reconstruction committee that never again will food be destroyed simply for lack of money. Actually what do we find in Canada to-day? We in parliament are not supreme. What is going on in Manitoba? I quote this from the Winnipeg Tribune: "Growers plough under Manitoba Strawberries." I quote this because the soldiers of Manitoba will scarcely think us sincere in our plans for reconstruction, particularly as regards agriculture, when they see that we permit a few bureaucrats to allow this sort of thing to go on. There is a picture in this same paper of strawberries being ploughed under by a tractor, and under the picture is this:

Goodbye, Strawberries: Strawberry growers near Winnipeg are ploughing under their strawberries, as Aleida Daman, 18, daughter of Peter Daman, St. Vital grower, is doing in this picture. The prices board set too low a ceiling for berries, they say, and growers see no sense in paying labour $4.50 a day to keep the bushes in shape.

That must be an extensive piece of ground to have a tractor ploughing under this food. This paper is going to the soldiers of Manitoba who are over there in Italy and on the shores of France. Yet at the same time we are telling them we shall never let the lack of money cause the destruction of food. It will take more explanation from the government than I have heard yet to convince the boys over there that that policy is being carried out when they see food being destroyed in this way.

The reason I refer to this matter particularly is that in British Columbia we have some 750 Japanese farms which were all producing berry farms before we seized them—no, we did not seize them; we were too generous; we bought them out. We are holding these farms for soldiers when they come back. What will our soldiers in Italy or on the shores of France think of our Veterans' Land Act when in British Columbia out of 171 farms 121 have been allowed to go to wrack and ruin, and the people on the remainder are producing at a loss to-day simply because of the dictates of the almighty dollar, orthodox finance and the war prices board?

We estimate that we have over 300,000 acres of land now surveyed and available, and on which soil analyses have been taken. The provincial government are prepared to grant a million acres of land to the men who are coming back. But all we are going to allow a man who wants to go on the land is $4,800 to buy a farm and $1,200 for the purchase of stock to equip that farm. I took the trouble to inquire of every organization in the riding which I represent, and they agree without exception that the figure is, to say the least, conservative. It will cost at least $175 an acre to purchase land; the average tax amounts to $4 an acre; yet we expect a man to settle on a farm, raise a family, clothe and educate them, with no more capital than $4,800 for his land and $1,200 for his stock and equipment. I know that many hon. members are not farmers, but there is no need to be a farmer to know that you cannot possibly buy enough stock and equipment for $1,200 to run a farm, repay the capital, pay taxes, feed and clothe a family. It simply cannot be done; yet that is what we are holding out to these returning soldiers under the Veterans' Land Act. Go to any soldier organization that I know of, and the first thing you will find them discussing is this particular bill, which they regard as almost entirely unsatisfactory and inappropriate to the needs of the present day and age. Yet we send literature to the soldiers telling them how much we are going to do for them.

I disagree with an hon. member from one of the Montreal ridings who expressed the opinion yesterday that there is not much hope of placing many of our returning veterans on the land. Land has always been and always will be a safeguard in our economy. I believe there is a tremendous opportunity to put men back on the land. We cannot continue all these factories, no matter what they desire to manufacture; but we can produce in the vast expanses of Canada to an unlimited extent if agriculture is given parity prices. I admit that I might find it difficult to give a correct definition of that term, but I believe that parity prices must be provided for in legislation as applicable to farm products. Every bit of legislation the government has brought forward—and we are proud of what has been done—affects the farmer. He is absolutely dependent upon what the floor price is; and if the floor price is to be set, not by members of parliament representing all parts of Canada and all the political parties, but by some economist in the Bank of Canada or a small town lawyer on some of these boards, you are not going to get real parity prices, I can assure you of that.

The original definition of parity prices is to be found in the United States Agricultural Adjustment Act of 1933, the object of which was " to establish prices to farmers at a level that would give agricultural commodities purchasing power with respect to articles farmers buy equivalent to the purchasing power of agricultural commodities in the base period." That is not in effect in Canada to-day. Anyone familiar with agriculture knows that it is not in effect. Of course agriculture is on a sounder basis than it was in previous years. With the general prosperity enjoyed in Canada at the present time it is bound to be, but what the farmer fears more than anything else is that there will be a collapse of these prices. We have the assurance in the speech from the throne that floor prices will be set, but what I am particularly interested in is, who is going to set them? If it is we in parliament who are to set them, I shall not be worried so much, but if they are to be set by a board with no knowledge of conditions across Canada, and particularly of local conditions, it is a totally different matter. It has been demonstrated in the past as far as the agricultural policy of the government is concerned that agricultural conditions all over the country are taken into consideration, and rightly so. For years other parts of Canada carried Saskatchewan and other provinces during their misfortunes, and no one objected to that. But this illustrates the fact that conditions vary across Canada and that they must be taken into consideration in setting floor prices. In many cases in the past that has not been done. I again insist that I do not care what kind of veterans' land act is brought in or what amendments are made; it is absolutely impossible for the veterans to go on these farms unless they are guaranteed a reasonable and fair price for the commodities they produce.

In connection with the farm problem I wish briefly to revert to the subject of money. Speaking in the house on June 20, the Prime Minister is reported in Hansard, page 3986, as saying in part:

> Later, as forecast in the speech from the throne, there will be some tax modifications to encourage industrial conversion, and also there will be an expansion of research.

I have no particular quarrel with this proposal. If industries are not allowed to build up again, are not permitted to prepare to convert their plants to peace-time activities, we cannot put men back to work. But I do want to insist that agriculture must have exactly the same treatment. For years farmers had to do without new equipment, not only because it was not available, but because in any event they did not have the money with which to buy it. Even in the last prosperous two or three years what money they did have has been used to pay off debt, not to buy new equipment. Therefore the farmer is entitled to exactly the same consideration in any adjustments respecting income tax.

I hope that the budget is not quite completed. I happen to have my office on the fifth floor, and as the Minister of Finance (Mr. Ilsley) is located on the same floor, there is a continuous stream going and coming. I wish they would come in to me for advice in preparing the budget. I was quite flattered about something which happened yesterday. My office is in about the centre of the block. One of the most popular and esteemed members of the cabinet has his office on the fourth floor immediately below mine. Inadvertently yesterday he opened the door of my office and walked in, and he said, "Goodness, I must have opened the wrong door." I said, "No, it is all right." I will not tell you his name; it begins with a C. Coming events cast their shadows before; it may be that he came in to look over my office before I move down to his. Seriously, I hope the Prime Minister takes into consideration this important fact that agriculture is just as much entitled as any other industry to money for reconversion. The farmer is in the same position as the industrialist. He needs new binders, new tractors, other new equipment, and he should have the same consideration in so far as income tax is concerned.

There is one thing to which, I think, not enough attention has been paid. I want to congratulate the leader of the opposition (Mr. Graydon), who made, I thought, an excellent address yesterday. Particularly I would like to compliment the hon. member for York South (Mr. Noseworthy), who, I believe, is the only member who in the course of this discussion has touched on education, although it is a factor in reconstruction which affects the entire dominion and one in which, I think, we all should be interested. His speech last evening was very fair and very constructive. It is not often, possibly, that I can say that. I wish I could say the same for the leader of his party, who goes around and makes strange statements, probably for vote-catching purposes, about what he thinks the soldiers want. If anybody stops to think, he will know that what the expression "the Canada he left" means is that the soldier wants to get back to the Canada he left, to peace-loving Canada, and particularly, his mother's cooking. The speech of the hon. member for York South, however, was helpful, and I congratulate him, and also the hon. member for Cape Breton South (Mr. Gillis), who is always interesting.

I do not want to take any more time, except to impress upon the government that we in British Columbia will not be satisfied with a dollars and cents approach to this matter. After the announcement made by the Prime Minister to-day I do not know how any member of this house or anybody else in Canada can think in terms of dollars and cents about what is to be given as a matter of right to Canadian men and women coming back from the war. Money must never be allowed to stand in the way of what we are going to do for those men and women, and I urge upon the government that representation of the soldiers and of the women serving in the forces should be considered in the setting up of these boards under the reconstruction department—above all, the women. Little has been said about the way in which we are going to deal with the women coming back to civilian life from the army and from war industry. That will be one of the greatest problems we shall have to tackle. Money will not always provide the solution so far as the women are concerned. With money you can always find work for men, but you cannot always find suitable work for women, no matter how much money you may have. I suggest therefore that the government would be well advised in the setting up of these boards to consider the representation of the women in the armed services. The government might take representatives from the women's institutes and from those serving in the armed forces, as well as representatives who will look after the interests of the men in the army.

I am a party member, but I say that if the government sincerely wishes this department to be a success, politics in any form must be kept out of it. If anything is to be kept out of the department it is politics. Irrespective of party we should initiate a programme that has been planned for the good of all and not for the advantage of the few.

Mr. HUGHES CLEAVER (Halton): Before addressing a few remarks to the points I intended to cover in this debate, I hope my hon. friend who just preceded me (Mr. Cruickshank) will not take offence if I attempt to give him the other side of the story in regard to the Veterans' Land Act. I wish to suggest seriously to him that he should add up the over-all benefits which the new Veterans' Land Act proposes to give to the returned man who might wish to go farming. If he does so, perhaps he will revise his views in this connection. If he will add up all the benefits, he will find that the dominion government is making a cash grant substantially close to $3,000 to every Canadian veteran who wants to go farming under the Veterans' Land Act.

Before discussing that, I might add that any boy who will make a good farmer will in my opinion be entirely successful if he starts with $3,000 cash assistance and when the balance of his liability carries interest at a rate of only 3½ per cent. In adding up these benefits we find the veterans' initial responsibility is to pay $480 down in cash. The government, on the other hand, makes a cash contribution of $2,320 of the purchase price, $1,120 on account of the farm and $1,200 for implements, in addition to supplying the finances. That is made up in this way. As regards stock and implements, if the farmer is successful he pays nothing for the stock and implements; that is $1,200 of the amount I have referred to. The criticism is that $1,200 is not an adequate amount to equip a farm with stock and implements. Well, I suggest that it was never the intention that $1,200 should fully equip a farm with stock and implements. The intention, as I understood it, was that it would supply a suitable foundation stock; it would supply the initial bare needs for implements, and the farmer would go on from there. In addition to these amounts, it is well recognized that farm income does not come in monthly, and so provision has been made, for the first year, for monthly payments where necessary to the farmer to maintain him. The single man will receive something like $44 a month and the married man $68, while the married man with children will receive additional allowances for the children. Adding all these benefits together, we have a total of at least $3,000 for one man if he wants to go farming, and I repeat that many farmers in this country, reasonably prosperous, think they do very well by their sons in setting them up in farming if they make a contribution anything like that.

There may be some reason for criticism on the score that the benefits that accrue with respect to a farm costing not more than $4,800 are not adequate. Another clause in the act, which is quite elastic, provides that if a farmer wishes to buy a farm in excess of that amount he is permitted to do so but he must finance the balance himself.

I am coming to the one and only criticism I have—and I would not dream of criticizing such an act without offering what in my opinion is a helpful suggestion. I think that in some parts of the country farms are at such a price that $4,800 would not buy a good up-to-date productive farm. In that event I think the amount should be increased, but I would correspondingly increase the mortgage liability at 3½ per cent which the veteran assumes. With that one minor amendment, I think the act would work well, and that is the only complaint I have received from veterans' associations in my riding with respect to the act.

In rising to take part in this debate on the second reading of the bill to provide for the setting up of a department charged with the sole responsibility of post-war reconstruction, I do so simply to emphasize one problem which I think we shall be facing in the post-war period, and one which I think should be given a No. 1 priority. The general field has been ably covered and I do not intend to spend much time in that regard. While I agree that Canada's post-war prosperity is in part dependent upon the extent to which we are able to assist in achieving world-wide recovery, and while I agree that Canada must assume her full responsibility in that regard, and fully realize that in so far as we do have world-wide recovery Canada as a trading nation will participate in the benefits which flow therefrom, yet I feel just as strongly that living conditions in Canada also depend upon the way in which we treat our own local domestic problems. If our national income, whether large or small, is equitably distributed among the different classes of the population, then we shall achieve a proper distribution of goods. I do not think that happened during the depression, but I will not take time now to discuss the causes.

To be permanently prosperous I believe the country must maintain a standard of living on a par with its ability to produce goods. I think that is axiomatic, but there is just one "if," namely, if a country produces goods in excess of its own needs, in order to maintain this high standard of living I am talking about markets must be found for the excess.

As to the production surplus over and above our own consumption needs, which amounts in round figures to one-third of our total production, we should of course exchange that surplus for goods of other countries which we can use. If by foreign trade we are able to do this, we achieve our maximum prosperity. If we cannot do this by foreign trade, I suggest that under the best of management we would only reach two-thirds of our maximum prosperity. If we do not take the necessary steps to dispose of that unexportable surplus and to prevent the endless distress which follows, such as falling prices and the like, we can get into a lot of trouble. Therefore I suggest, Mr. Speaker, that until world recovery takes place to the point where we shall be able to dispose of the exportable surplus we have three options. We can either give that exportable surplus away to needy nations; we can stop producing it, or we can store it up at fixed prices hoping to be able to sell it in the future. I do not know of any better illustration of what I am talking about than our exportable surplus of wheat.

The problem I have just outlined is one that should be studied very carefully in this country. On the one hand I do not think that we should accept the defeatist attitude and say that we have to wait until general world recovery comes about; nor on the other hand do I think we should fail to assume our responsibilities in the matter of helping to assist general world recovery. As I said a moment ago, I am not going to discuss to-day the general problem but there is one concrete matter that I should like to bring to the attention of the government and of the hon. members of this house. It is a post-war problem which I think will merit a No. 1 priority. We have an acute shortage of houses in this country. Estimates differ, but reliable sources agree that when this war is over we shall have a shortage of over three hundred thousand houses. It is only right and proper that in time of war, with its consequent shortage of labour and materials, we should try to get along with the housing accommodation we have. We have struggled to do that, Mr. Speaker. By rental controls and the like we have done our best to get by the present emergency without any needless expenditure of either labour or materials on the building of houses. While we have been quite correct in postponing house building to meet the needs of war yet in the long run I suggest it is going to turn out to our advantage, because during the immediate post-war period this postponed consumer demand for houses will have to be met, and it will put thousands of men to work.

At the moment we can reasonably hope that the end of the war is not in the too far distant future, and I think we should immediately complete plans for post-war house building. I should like to urge that pilot or key organizations be set up now, which can be quickly expanded when the war is over, to support, and direct house building schemes. In adopting this plan of postponing the supplying of our housing needs until the war is over we have of necessity caused some real distress. To-day many people are living under almost unbearable housing conditions. To some extent this has been the cause of increasing crime, ill-health and the like. In addition to those who are in actual distress, thousands of families are daily living under the threat that their houses will be sold over their heads and they will have to move, not knowing where they will go. People cheerfully and willingly endure that sort of thing during war time. But I suggest to you, Mr. Speaker, that the minute this war is over the Canadian people will demand—they have a right to demand—that their proper housing needs be met.

In addition to the acute housing problem which exists at the present time, when thousands of our service men return they will marry and want homes of their own. In addition to giving the housing problem the rating which I believe it deserves, namely, No. 1 priority, I should like to urge that the government sponsor a campaign for every man to own his own home. I do not know of any better time to start than now, when we have such an acute shortage. I should like to urge that credit facilities be made available for this need on a sound business basis. The advantages of home ownership and the disadvantages of tenant occupancy are so apparent that I do not need to labour the point. In these days we hear many discussions of the relative merits of our capitalistic system and socialism. So far as I am concerned the major complaint that I have in regard to the capitalistic system is that we have too few capitalists. I would urge that every man in this country own his own home; every man should become a capitalist. This proposal is not a dream impossible of fulfilment. It is a scheme which if undertaken as a national programme could be quite easily attained in a very short time. To-day many men have to pay rent for their housing accommodation. Is there any man in this country who would not rather pay the same monthly payments on a house which he will eventually own?

Let me say something as to the down payment. We all know that practically everyone in this country is accumulating savings which I suggest in most instances will be sufficient to take care of the ten per cent down payment at the end of the war. To those who have not been able to acquire the compulsory saving as a down payment I suggest that the new amendment to the Bank Act will meet their difficulties. The banks are going to enter actively the field of small loans repayable on a monthly basis at a reasonable rate of interest. A man desiring to own his own home would be able to acquire his down payment from that source.

In the National Housing Act we have a well-tried instrument at hand. We do not need to create anything new to get on with this programme. Do hon. members know that since 1937, under the National Housing Act, we have built something over 25,000 houses? They are practically all owner-occupied; and while the government has participated to the extent of a twenty-five per cent contribution toward the cost of those houses, the act was so well thought out and has been so efficiently managed that our losses to date on the 25,000 houses are less than $5,000, or twenty cents per house. I suggest that the present act should be used for this purpose—with some amendments, or streamlined if you like—in order to bring those advantages within the reach of every working man in the country.

My first suggestion is in regard to interest rates. Interest rates should be reduced to 4½ per cent, and to 4 per cent if possible. As all hon. members know, money is now available in the Dominion of Canada—that is long-term borrowing—at 3 per cent, or less. Let us take the government's contribution of 25 per cent, and figure it on a 3 per cent basis. Let us allow the loan companies 5 per cent on their 75 per cent loan content, and we have a resulting interest rate of 4½ per cent.

I suggest if we are to adopt a large building programme the lending institutions of the country may not have sufficient money to finance it on that basis, and that perhaps the government should enter the field on a 50 per cent basis with 3 per cent money. In this event, allowing the loan companies 5 per cent on their 50 per cent content, the interest rate would automatically fall to 4 per cent. With the interest rate at 4½ per cent—and the Minister of Finance has announced in advance that that is what is going to happen—the monthly payments for these houses, under which a man actually acquires eventual ownership, are to-day less than the normal rental for houses of that type. With a possibility of a further one-half per cent reduction, one can see what the effect would be in connection with monthly payments.

Coming to the second recommendation, in connection with the repayment of loans, I know something about these houses built under the National Housing Act. They are well-built. I say without fear of successful contradiction that homes built under the National Housing Act standards have a useful owner-occupancy lifetime of at least forty years. I therefore suggest and urge that the amortization period should be increased from twenty to at least thirty years. That again will assist in bringing down the amounts of monthly payments. The Minister of Finance has already announced that that proposal is under discussion, and that some progress will be made. I would urge as strongly as I can that thirty years should be the minimum, where an owner requires that time to pay for his home.

My next suggested change is a new one. In the mind of each of these home owners is the constant dread, the constant worry hanging over his head that something may happen, possibly through illness or accident, as a result of which the breadwinner would lose his life and the widow would be left with an unbearable mortgage load. If this is to be a nation-wide scheme for every man to own his own home, then I say that in the event of his death the mortgage should be paid off and the widow should be presented with the house free from encumbrances; and that this should be paid out of an insurance fund. I am told that this type of term insurance could be acquired at moderate cost, not exceeding one dollar per home per month.

My next suggestion deals with restraint in respect of alienation. Very serious thought should be given to this matter. So far as I am concerned, the owner of a house should be placed in the position where he could not, through bad business judgment or in any other way, lose his house. I would have the house in such a position that it will not be subject to execution levies. In addition, I think it might be wise to prevent the owner himself from selling his house, or possibly it would be well in the event of sale to freeze the selling price, or set it apart to be used only for the purchase of another house. That is only my own thought on the subject, but I offer it for what it is worth.

These five suggestions will in my opinion make the act workable and bring it within the reach of every working man in Canada. However we could not possibly succeed in reaching a point where every man would own his own home unless we were to provide for the use of existing houses already built. I suggest that an additional part be added to the housing act to make these second-hand houses, if I may so describe them, available for exactly the same purposes and on quite the same terms. I concede at once that the amortization period should not be so long—that is, it should not exceed the life of the house. In addition, money should be made available by borrowing, repayable in monthly payments, just as under Part I of the act, to provide for necessary permanent repairs and permanent alterations to bring the existing houses up to modern condition.

If those things are done, and a nation-wide campaign is instituted, it would be almost impossible to estimate the amount of human happiness and human satisfaction which might flow therefrom.

I have commented on the urgency for the need for housing. I have commented, too, on the benefits, peace of mind and human happiness which would flow from such a plan. I have one other reason why in my opinion housing should receive priority in connection with post-war reconstruction, and it is this: The labour content of every medium sized house is at least eighty per cent. Some members may question that percentage, but when I refer to labour content I am not referring only to the labour expended in the building of the house. I include the indirect labour—the labour content that goes into the manufacture of frames, doors, lumber, flooring, plaster, hardware, plumbing, and everything else used in construction. If one computes all that in the labour content he will reach at least eighty per cent labour content in a medium sized home. I do not know of any type of construction in which the labour content is as great. For that reason therefore I say that is one of the post-war schemes we should first adopt.

There is another feature in connection with labour content, and it is this: I do not know of any construction work in which the labour content would be so diversified, and spread out over the entire country. One might say it would be spread throughout all branches of industry. Benefits would accrue to all parts of the country.

For all these reasons I urge as strongly as I can that the present is not one day too soon to make plans and to complete the organization for the financing and the supplying of materials for the new houses we so urgently need.

Mr. R. W. MAYHEW (Victoria, B.C.): Mr. Speaker, I do not apologize for taking part in this debate in connection with the establishment of a Department of Reconstruction. I agree entirely with the hon. member for Essex East (Mr. Martin), who has said that this matter is next in importance to that of winning the war or prosecuting the war. Had I not said anything I am afraid I would have been apologizing to myself for some considerable time. I suppose when I finish my speech I will still be apologizing to myself because of having fallen far short of what I would have liked to say in the short time at my disposal and with my limited ability.

I have been interested in this matter from almost the start of the war. So far as I know the first committee on rehabilitation set up in Canada was one set up in British Columbia by the British Columbia branch of the Canadian Manufacturers' association. I happened to be chairman of that branch at the time. I believe that committee is still functioning and considering plans for rehabilitation and reconstruction. I remember one statement that I made at the annual meeting. I impressed upon all the manufacturers of British Columbia the necessity of watching their plants very closely in order that they should not run down. I emphasized the fact that obsolescence was a detriment not only to the particular plant but to the province as a whole.

I took another step at that time in an effort to enlarge the knowledge of this subject, both in the province and throughout Canada, but this was a somewhat disappointing experience. I offered an award for the best essay on post-war rehabilitation to be written by any undergraduate in Canada. This offer was made directly to the James committee when it was first formed, and it was also passed along to the Minister of Pensions and National Health (Mr. Mackenzie) who received it very warmly. However, the universities did not seem to rise to the occasion and give this suggestion the leadership which I thought it should have received. Instead of announcing this award to their students at the close of the year, they announced it when the college term opened, and the result was that only a few participated because they had only some three or four weeks to prepare their essays.

I would be quite prepared to continue this offer for the duration of the war. I think if it had been done we would have had a young people who were more enlightened on this subject. There are many young people reaching the time of life when they might make an active study of these matters, but they have not had the opportunity. If they are prepared to make full use of my offer I am prepared to renew it at this time.

I regretted that the statement was made in the house that this department was being set up to fill a temporary need only. I think that is a mistake. It should be a department for the development of Canada not only in the transition period from war to peace but for the many years to come. The department should be available for as long as it is necessary, and I am sure that that will be for the lifetime of Canada. There is so much in this country that is yet untouched. There are tremendous possibilities for development, and I cannot see anything better than to have an all-time department. This should not be a department with just a minister, a deputy minister and a few assistants; it should be a department with a minister, a deputy minister and a staff sufficiently large that its members could be selected from all parts of Canada, thus bringing together the necessary knowledge for this particular sphere of development.

The other day we heard a splendid speech by the hon. member for Athabaska (Mr. Dechene). He told us a little—no one could tell us all—of that great northland of which we know so little. There are over a million square miles filled with every kind of natural resource, such as minerals, forests, fisheries and oil. I am sure it will take some time fully to develop this particular district.

Speaking a few days ago the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) mentioned another possible field of development. He referred to the creating of Ottawa as a federal district, and the possibilities of beautifying the nation's capital. He told us how it was hoped to make the other bank of the Ottawa river in Hull a thing of beauty. There should not only be a physical development of Canada; we should have cultural development as well. There are many cities besides Ottawa where similar projects could be carried out. I am one who believes that it is not a waste of money to develop cultural things. Would anyone say that money has been wasted in the construction of this grand building we are in at the present time? We could actually do with much less in the way of a building. We could talk just as much, although there might be a greater fire risk. But will anyone say that it has been a waste of money? Will anyone say that what was done on Elgin street a few years ago was a waste of money? I definitely say that it was not. We could take every city in Canada and try to make it a city beautiful as well as a city useful.

Any schoolboy will tell you that we must develop our industries to their maximum. These things are so obvious that they scarcely need mention. But the others are things which we have been overlooking. It is a change of mind that we want towards our development. Take, for instance, the city of Winnipeg, or Saskatoon, Regina, Edmonton, Vancouver; or take my own city, the city of Victoria. I do not think there is a more beautiful spot in Canada than Victoria, and regardless of what anyone else says, it is the playground and will remain the playground of Canada so far as climate is concerned. The nation could spend in the city of Victoria many millions of dollars which would be of tremendous advantage not only to the people of the city of Victoria but to the rest of Canada who would be glad to get away from the winters you have in the east. People are coming into the city of Victoria from all directions, both summer and winter. It is the only place where you can have really warm salt water bathing practically the year round. By the expenditure of a few hundred thousand dollars you could make it not only a national but an international playground to the great advantage of us all. I had no intention of bringing forward the claims of my own city for development. I use it just as an illustration of the possibilities that we have in Canada for just such projects.

Mr. KUHL: But we need to know where the money is coming from.

Mr. MAYHEW: Where the money is coming from? The Prime Minister told us the other day, and I think he is right, that the money will come for the things which the people are interested in and desire to have.

Mr. KUHL: They were interested before the war too.

Mr. MAYHEW: We listened to the hon. member speaking the other night, and if I remember rightly he implied that it was humiliating to work.

Mr. KUHL: I did not say any such thing.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: He has never tried it.

Mr. MAYHEW: If the hon. member did not say it, he implied it.

Mr. KUHL: I said that compulsory work was humiliating. I did not say voluntary, but compulsory.

Mr. MAYHEW: The Lord made it compulsory because He told us that we must earn our bread by the sweat of our brow. Personally I do not think you can build character in a people or in a nation unless they have work to do.

Mr. KUHL: Voluntary work.

Mr. MAYHEW: Work is the fibre of achievement that makes a nation great, and you cannot have the fibre of achievement unless you have something to do and are willing to do it. That is what my hon. friend lacks.

Mr. KUHL: No.

Mr. MAYHEW: I was saying, Mr. Speaker, that I am anxious to see these developments take place; I emphasize this because there is not time to deal with the others, and I want if possible to get this point across.

I believe that we have to have full employment. I do not believe you can have half of your people employed and the other half unemployed. Someone has said that no man is free unless all are free, and I do not think we can be busy to the best advantage unless we are all busy. I think we could all be busy in the future.

In the programme which should be undertaken the matter of tempo enters. Some say that the tempo should be increased just as soon as the boys come home from overseas. Personally I do not think so. I believe that there will be sufficient work, more than sufficient work, for the first two or three and possibly four years after the war is over. It will be in the subsequent period that we may have to move in and find work for people to do; but this nation I think will do these things I have mentioned because they are in the end self-supporting. I want to emphasize that. I do not think you should bring the boys home from overseas and put them to work and at the same time leave the boys that are at home without work to do, because when one man is idle, somebody else is not fully employed. Only when all are employed can all be fully employed.

I am going to make four suggestions, and then I shall conclude.

First I think the name "Reconstruction" is a misnomer. It has come out of its association with rehabilitation. It is national construction, national planning on a long and broad scale which in my opinion is required. Rehabilitation is an entirely different matter. I do not say that they are separable, because you cannot have rehabilitation without reconstruction. But title reconstruction would mean that this country has been partly destroyed or that we intend to destroy it and rebuild it. There is nothing of the kind. We are to build on what we have. It is a gradual development on the basis of our imagination, and, I hope, of our courage, because I know that our ability to do it is there. I suggest that the name of this department be changed.

I suggest, too, that it be made a permanent department. I suggest that it have a large personnel, not a small one; that that large personnel be selected from all parts of Canada, and that in their planning they look towards developing not only the ribbon that runs across Canada from the Atlantic to the Pacific, but Canada as a whole.

I suggest also that the minister, whoever he may be, be appointed now. I do not think it is too early. The formation of this branch of government is very timely, and the minister should be appointed now for this reason. He would be able to sit in on and give a lead to the banking and commerce committee, because finance is going to come into the programme of reconstruction, and his advice and assistance in planning for the reorganization, if that is to take place, should be of some assistance both to him and to us.

I suggest that this department be not just another department of government, but that it be "the" department of government, because upon it depends the full work of our people; on the full work of our people depends our national income, and on our national income depends whether or not we can carry on with our social legislation. This department is the heart and the backbone of Canada itself in action.

Mr. THOMAS REID (New Westminster): Mr. Speaker, most allied nations have been laying plans during the past three or four years for post-war planning and rehabilitation; but I say to you as emphatically as I can, in view of statements which are being made outside the House of Commons, that no country among the allied nations is so far ahead in plans for rehabilitation as is Canada under the present government. That statement cannot be successfully refuted. I am sorry that the leader of the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation is not in his seat this afternoon, because I intended at this time to deal with one or two statements he has made; however I will defer until later most of the things I have in mind. I think it is most unfair for an hon. member, especially one who is the leader of a party, to make statements throughout the country which, I say, are not true. For instance, he is quoted as having said a short time ago that two million jobs would have to be found for service men returning to civilian life in Canada after the war, and that not a single plan has been devised by the dominion government to meet that situation. In that utterance there are two gross misstatements of fact. The first one is that two million jobs will be needed for service men. There are not over eight hundred thousand men and women in the armed forces of Canada, and to assert publicly that two million jobs will be required for them is a kind of mathematics which is beyond me. I rather thought that people in the country from which I come knew something about mathematics and education.

Mr. GILLIS: Will the hon. member permit a question?

Mr. REID: Yes.

Mr. GILLIS: Where did he get this statement which he alleges the leader of the C.C.F. made?

Mr. REID: I am glad that the hon. member for Cape Breton South asked that question. For every utterance I have made in the House of Commons I have been careful to have proof. The statement I have referred to is reported in the Leader-Post of Wednesday, June 14; and may I say to the hon. member who interrupted—

Mr. MITCHELL: The Leader-Post of Regina?

[Mr. Mayhew.]

Mr. REID: Of Regina; yes.

Mr. GILLIS: It is ridiculous on the face of it.

Mr. REID: The hon. member may say it is ridiculous, but may I say that there is something in this connection which is very strange. I do not know much about how the C.C.F. act in other provinces, but in British Columbia, from which I come, I know something of their actions, and before this session is over I shall deal with a good deal of what has gone on there. Any time that any paper in British Columbia has reported some statement against the C.C.F. or any of their leaders they rush to contradict it, but I have never seen any contradiction of this report. Are they carrying on some other policy in Saskatchewan and not repudiating things they object to?

Mr. GILLIS: It is so obviously ridiculous.

Mr. REID: I do not see how the hon. member is in a position to deny it. I might say to him, just hold your horses a little while.

Mr. GILLIS: Well—

Mr. REID: Mr. Speaker, have I to take care of myself?

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: You can do it.

Mr. REID: Because if I have to, of course it is all right with me.

Mr. GILLIS: If you want to make such statements, it is up to yourself.

Mr. REID: Some statements have been made during this debate, either in the speeches or in cross-fire conversations across the floor of the house, particularly by members of the C.C.F., regarding the years of depression, 1930 to 1939. Speakers of the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation group have gibed at both the Conservative and the Liberal parties with reference to the great amount of unemployment during those years. I have been frank to admit wherever I have gone that there was a great deal of unemployment at that time, but I do not understand the reasoning of those who remind us of it, or why Canada in particular should be singled out and our form of democratic government denounced because we were not able to solve the problem during those years. No country in the world, I care not what form of government it had, solved the problem. Oh, yes; someone is going to say that all were working fully in Russia, that they were fully occupied in Germany and Italy and Japan. But if all those countries had their people at work, it was simply because they were getting ready for war. We are not a warlike country. The facts are that no country in the world solved the problem of unemployment during those years—neither Russia nor Germany, Italy nor Japan. Yet members of the C.C.F. go up and down the country saying that we must have a new form of democratic government, that the old parties have failed, because from 1930 to 1939 they did not solve unemployment.

The thought has just entered my mind, and it is something I have long wanted to say in this house, that I have been astonished at the attitude of a number of those who, have come to Canada from other lands and who, had they stayed in the lands they came from, would probably not have owned very much; yet with all the possible things that God could give them in this great land, they have gone around denouncing the government of Canada. I remind the house, and it seems to me a strange and significant fact, that during the years of depression, and when we were hearing so much of the progress of Russia, although 60,000 persons made application to the Canadian government to be taken back to Great Britain, no applications so far as I can learn were made by any who came from the countries of continental Europe to be returned to the country of their origin or birth.

I say, Mr. Speaker, let us have some pride in our land. When one looks over the membership of this house and recalls that some thirty-one hon. members were born outside this country and came to it from nine different countries, it seems reasonable to ask whether there is any other land which has provided the same opportunities as this great country has provided to those who have come here from abroad. One quality in the Russian people which we might well emulate is their great love of country.

While I am not suggesting that this government should adopt the policies of militarily-minded states, it is my opinion that following the conclusion of this war we shall not allow ourselves for many, many years to revert to the condition of unpreparedness in which we found ourselves prior to 1939.

One thing we all admire about Prime Minister Churchill is the great frankness of his statements. It is a splendid thing to be frank. When he was speaking in the British House of Commons on post-war rehabilitation someone reminded him that after the last war British shipowners had bought German merchant ships at a cost of little or nothing. He replied that that was perfectly true, but, he said, "We won't make that mistake again, though I expect," he said, "being human, we shall make other mistakes." I recall that because we too admit frankly, at least I do, that we did make a mistake in 1930 to 1939. But we are not going to repeat that mistake; and when anyone goes through this country endeavouring to persuade the people that a new heaven or a new earth will come about if only some new type of democratic government is given an opportunity, I warn the public to be very careful before they take such statements too literally.

It is only of late that members of the C.C.F. party have admitted that trade may be at all a significant factor. Like most parties, they are keeping their ear to the ground too and moving along as they think the people want them to, so that they do not differ from any of the older parties in that political regard. That, after all, is democracy. I do not know what the future will bring forth, but if past history has been any guide to us at all it shows us this. To me at least it has proved that the nations that have gone out to trade, and to trade freely, have been the nations which have given most of this world's goods to their people, while the nations who have lived unto or within themselves have been the nations which have given the least of this world's goods to their people. That has been the history of mankind from the days of Adam to the present time, and it is my opinion that the same thing will hold good for many years to come. We must therefore pay greater attention to international trade.

This country is adapted to produce great quantities of grain, lumber, fish and agricultural products which could never be consumed at home unless we trebled our population, even though we were provided with twice the amount of food we consume at the present time. I find that the Liberal party is in pretty good company, because at the international labour conference held in Philadelphia in May last the following statement was made with regard to trade, enunciating the fact that we must take note of what is taking place in other lands:

> The war against want requires to be carried on with unrelenting vigour within each nation, and by continuous and concerted international effort in which the representatives of workers and employers, enjoying equal status with those of governments, join with them in free discussions and democratic decision with a view to the promotion of the common welfare.

And this is what I ask you to note particularly. This is an outstanding resolution:

> Poverty anywhere constitutes a danger to prosperity everywhere.

That is the point of view held by those of the Liberal party who are looking to the furtherance of trade, believing that we cannot remain in our shell or live unto ourselves and hope to prosper. Isolation, sir, is as dead to-day as the great wall of China. When one realizes that it takes only about sixty hours to travel completely round the globe, one realizes how close countries are to one another and that we must pay greater attention to the prosperity and well-being of other countries as well as the prosperity and well-being of our own. When we think of the brotherhood of man, we must realize that this brotherhood was not intended to be confined within the borders of any one country.

In British Columbia for many years, emanating from those belonging to the C.C.F. and emanating as well from members of the C.C.F. party in this house, there have come public utterances upholding the Dominion of New Zealand. The other day an hon. member pointed out, in answer to an interruption, that the general picture of welfare in this country was ahead of that of New Zealand. I have gone into this matter a little, and these are some of the things I find. Take the debt charges in New Zealand, for instance—and I have the debt charge translated into dollars so as to make it comparable with that of our own country. The public debt charge of this country is on an average $680 per head, while in New Zealand it is $1,010. Take interest charges. We have heard a great deal about interest charges and debt-free money, but there again we are still ahead of New Zealand. Interest charges in Canada amount to 2·90 per cent—and I understand even that has been reduced—whereas in New Zealand the interest charges are 3·42 per cent. We have heard a great deal about the load of debt on the Canadian people. Well, the load of interest debt in Canada works out at something like $14.65 per head, whereas in New Zealand the load of debt is $28.75. I have given the interest charges they are paying on loans, and I have given the public debt. Now, coming to taxation, this may interest hon. members. I have not time to go into it fully, but I shall be pleased on another occasion to elaborate on these matters individually. The single man in New Zealand earning $700 pays something like $53. In Canada it works out at $26, with $13 refundable. The married man with two children earning $1,500 per annum pays in Canada $49.50, with $24 refundable. In New Zealand he pays $154. This information I have obtained from the New Zealand Year Book.

Mr. GILLIS: But you are only quoting half of it.

Mr. REID: I am giving the full details on interest and debt, and I shall be glad to discuss the entire New Zealand situation with any hon. member of the house, because the picture gets better as it goes on.

[Mr. Reid.]

Mr. GILLIS: It is not fair to put half of it on the record.

Mr. REID: That is the old way of putting something across, by rising and making such statements. You are putting that in my speech; it is very cutely done but you are all wrong. It is a habit you have had for a number of years, and I would ask you to keep your seat and possess your soul in patience. I can discuss it with you in committee.

Mr. GILLIS: You are insulting a sister dominion.

Mr. REID: I resent that. I am not insulting anyone. I am putting these facts before the house only for one purpose. It has been held up to the people of this country by the C.C.F. that if we adopted a government similar to that in New Zealand all the good things people hope for would be bestowed on the Canadian people. I am not bringing this forward for any other purpose than to answer my hon. friend. I do not wish to introduce division between sister dominions, but it is said so often by members of the C.C.F., both in British Columbia and here, that I am impelled to correct their statements and keep the record right and true. When it comes to taxation, it would appear that they soak the workers there. We in Canada place the burden of taxation where we believe it can best be borne. For in the matter of income tax they pay more in New Zealand until the sum of $10,000 per annum is reached, and thereafter it gets less, whereas in Canada it increases very greatly indeed. I could quote bond interest too, which is less in Canada. In regard to New Zealand's financial position I doubt, Mr. Speaker, had it not been for the help of Great Britain during the war, whether she would have been in as good a financial position to-day as her books would seem to indicate.

With regard to Canada and rehabilitation, may I say without fear of successful contradiction that the provision we have made for our service men is not bettered or equalled by any other country of the allied nations. There is only one thing that I believe New Zealand has done a little better than we, and that is with regard to the matter of clothing allowance. I hope that will be adjusted in Canada before very long. In the matter of treatment, pensions and hospitalization for service men, I know of no country which is doing more than we are. In saying that I do not want to leave the impression that we have finished or reached the ultimate in the treatment of our service men and women. I am merely stating the fact. If anyone has any statement to make to the contrary I shall be glad to hear it.

British Columbia is taking quite a part in the work of rehabilitation. The government of that province set up a committee composed of representatives of all parties in the assembly. The report of that committee emphasized the matter of finance. The hon. member for Fraser Valley (Mr. Cruickshank) in his speech this afternoon touched on the subject of municipal finances. While I realize that no definite projects can be outlined at the moment, the general plans are, however, outlined, and the government of the day should as soon as possible let the cities and municipalities know what their position will be in regard to loans. If the municipalities could obtain loans at cost, say, three-quarters of one per cent, I feel sure that every city and municipality would immediately set to work to outline post-war works. Remember, Mr. Speaker, that a great deal of the burden of rehabilitation will fall on these cities and municipalities, because when a man is seeking relief, and sometimes when he is seeking employment, the first place to which he goes is the municipal council. In every recommendation presented on behalf of the government of British Columbia that one point was brought out.

I am not going to weary the house because this document is too voluminous for me to place on Hansard, but I wish to read one of the recommendations that was put before the dominion government. It is as follows:

> No information seems to be available as to what procedure will be followed by the dominion government in allocating proportions of cost under any of the rehabilitation programmes where they operate to the benefit of municipalities. Naturally a programme involving one and a half million dollars is entirely beyond the capacity of most cities.

Then further:

> Your committee appeared before the provincial government rehabilitation committee early this year—

That was 1943.

> —presented their report, and entered into a discussion regarding some of the proposals, especially regarding the method of financing post-war schemes. We feel that until the question of finances has been settled, the whole work of all post-war committees has been futile. The provincial committee themselves have not a solution, as they in turn await the decision of the federal government on this point.

Therefore I urge upon the Prime Minister and the government the necessity of arriving at a decision as soon as practicable, and so that the municipalities, cities and provincial governments be informed as to what help they may expect from the dominion government and what rates of interest will be charged for loans.

I would make one other proposal to the Prime Minister and to the government. Before the programme of rehabilitation starts, steps should be taken with regard to the debts owing the dominion government by provincial governments. I was looking over this matter before I came down to the chamber this afternoon, and I was surprised to find that according to the last auditor general's report the provincial governments owed the dominion government something like $313,309,016—and by the way, Saskatchewan did very well in that respect because that province was lent a considerable sum of money, according to the record; they owe the government $79,828,017. As one looks over the staggering amounts one realizes that that is one of the things that should be taken up at either the forthcoming dominion-provincial conference or as soon as possible thereafter, to see if some means can be devised for clearing up those debts which hang like a cloud over the provincial governments. The provincial governments in turn have lent large sums of money to municipalities, and those debts also hang like a cloud over the municipalities.

In his speech of yesterday afternoon the hon. member for Royal (Mr. Brooks) made some reference to the fisheries. I am not going extensively into the matter of fisheries this afternoon, but in looking through the recommendations and statements made by the government I notice that fisheries have been mentioned as one form of rehabilitation. May I point out to you, Mr. Speaker, that in so far as British Columbia is concerned I doubt whether we can take many more men into the fishing industries. We may be able to take more men, women and youths into the canning factories, but I doubt whether we can place or take care of any more men as fishermen. I say that for this reason: the quantity of fish in our waters is, after all, limited, and the more men put into the industry the smaller the return will be for the individual fisherman. However, there is one branch of the fishing industry into which we could place more men. I refer to the halibut fisheries. Under the provisions of the international halibut treaty the yearly allotment of the United States and Canada is something like fifty million pounds. We have never been able to take more than one-third of our share. The United States fishermen have been able to take the larger part, up to three-quarters of the amount allotted. They can do that because they have larger and better fishing vessels which can go farther afield. They are better fitted to withstand the rough seas one or two hundred miles off our shore. Canada is bearing fifty per cent of the cost of the halibut fishery commission. Is there any reason why our fishermen should not be encouraged to take their fifty per cent of the allotment?

Since 1939 some ninety large fishing vessels have been taken from the fishing industry in British Columbia for military purposes. These boats, or better ones, should be put back for the specific purpose of fishing for halibut. Everything that it is possible to do should be done to enable our fishermen to compete with United States fishermen on the halibut banks. When the Japanese were taken out of British Columbia and the fishing licences were curtailed in 1941, it was stated that the fishing industry would suffer. It may interest the house to hear actual figures, and to know what the results have been since the Japanese left the fishing industry.

There were 1,337 Japanese fishing vessels taken over from the Japanese, and sold, the money being held to the credit of the individuals concerned. In 1941 there was a total of 13,602 fishing licences in all issued in British Columbia. Of that number the Japanese held 2,080, or 15·4 per cent. In 1942-43 the number of fishing licences increased until, at the last issue, they amounted to 15,379, an increase of 1,777. The actual picture is that 3,857 more fishermen have entered into the fishing industry since the Japanese left British Columbia. I would ask this very practical question of the C.C.F. In their rehabilitation programme will they allow the Japanese to return to the fishing industry of British Columbia? I would like to have that question answered. My stand is that they should not come back. The fishermen of British Columbia, however, should be told. They should be told whether if the C.C.F. were elected to power the Japanese would be allowed to come back into the fishing industry, because at the present time, with 15,379 licences issued, there is not a decent living for many more.

Mr. GILLIS: The hon. member said a moment ago that the British Columbia legislature had instituted a reconstruction committee report, of all parties?

Mr. REID: Yes.

Mr. GILLIS: Did they make a recommendation?

Mr. REID: In the book I have before me, they might have; but in the report I have not seen it. I want to be fair, and say that they might have. However, I have not seen any. In the report of the post-war rehabilitation council, the members of which are named, I could not find any recommendation regarding fishermen.

Mr. GILLIS: That is the body which should make a decision, because it is a British Columbia matter.

Mr. REID: The issuing of licences is not a British Columbia matter. It is not the provincial government which will make the decision; it is the people of British Columbia who will make it when the proper time comes. However, I want a statement in that connection, because I do not want the people to be misled. When they vote they should know what they are voting for.

I see my time is going on, and I shall proceed with my closing observations. In connection with rehabilitation I would say that first consideration must be given our fighting men; for without their sacrifice no rehabilitation or social security would be possible for us. While plans are being laid now to rehabilitate the men and women in our active forces after the war, and likewise to provide employment and other social measures for our citizens generally, much more thought will have to be given to world conditions than has been given to them by our people. Social security cannot be assured us unless we can be assured of a reasonable and lasting peace following the end of this war; and there can be no national security in a policy of isolation. One of the great problems facing the allies now, aside from the winning of the war, is how we can prevent another blood bath in the future; for the winning of the war may not bring peace.

For the past few years statements have been made throughout Canada about the danger of winning the war and losing the peace. While what is meant by losing the peace is open to many interpretations, to my mind one danger facing us is that owing to careless thinking on our part, or to not thinking at all, we may lose what freedom there is left. To many people, thinking is hard work. History can show many examples of peoples who have lost their liberty because they were too lazy to think out for themselves the problems that all free peoples must solve if they are to continue free. To my mind dangerous fires are being lighted in the minds of the people these days, fires which may flare up and consume us before we fully realize what it is all about.

Underneath a lot of the loose talk uttered to-day the real issue is not readily seen. That real issue is not so much economic as it is philosophic. The real issue is whether we should trust to the state supreme power over our lives. Never let us forget that our fathers found out long ago that complete power over our lives could not be trusted to anyone, no matter how wise or how virtuous a king or even a government might be. Men preferred to live their own lives; and so there was devised a society with power of its own to resist the government. If ever the state obtains complete mastery of our lives, freedom will be gone for ever. Once a single power, whether the state, the capitalist, the labour unions or any other group, undertakes to run our lives according to a certain plan and to guarantee by that plan to produce certain results, then it can brook no interference; for if the plan fails the rulers lose either their jobs or their lives.

It must not be inferred from what I say in this regard that I am advocating that we must not have new rules to prevent greed and the exploitation of the great masses of our people. New rules will have to be provided—yes, and enforced—so as to ensure a fuller and better life for all our citizens. In doing so, however, let us be very careful that we do not throw away for a mess of pottage the most cherished jewel of all, namely our individual freedom. The right to live one's own life, the right of free speech, the right to worship God in our own way—all these are a heritage which to me is priceless, and can never be compensated for by material things alone. It is as true to-day as when spoken by Christ, when he said, "Man shall not live by bread alone."

Mr. G. G. McGEER (Vancouver-Burrard): Mr. Speaker, I rise to say a few words to-day in the debate on this bill, because I believe it brings into focus the culmination of a long series of events since the turn of the century. This happens to be the first time any government in Canada has assumed the responsibility of setting up a department of economic direction.

The powers in the bill, which are to be vested in the minister and which are being delegated by parliament to the governor in council, vest in the new ministry a power over the economic well-being of individuals in Canada which, in itself, would have caused a revolution only a few years ago. Just what the exercise of those powers may be will be for history to disclose. But I think the acceptance of the provision for the wide powers extended to the ministry indicates that the government is well conversant not only with the seriousness of the problems which lie ahead, but also with the enormous difficulties which will attend their solution.

I for one hold the firm conviction that Canada is well provided to meet with success the post-war period, notwithstanding my belief that the difficulties will be just as great and just as costly as have been the problems of sustaining the economy of the nation through this period of war. There is no chart to guide us now as there was no chart to guide us when we embarked on the war in 1939.

I think some facts stand out, and here are what I consider the general broad conceptions of the main problem. Gainful employment will have to be provided for some five million Canadians, two million of whom are now engaged in the fighting services and in war industry. We have a public debt already of $14 billion, and upon any reasonable basis of estimation this will be rising for some time to a figure much larger than that. Already we have $11 billion of national federal debt, $2 billion of provincial debt and $1 billion of municipal debt.

Do not make any mistake about the condition of our provinces and municipalities. Representatives of both have appeared before the reconstruction committee. The Hon. Mr. Garson, Premier of Manitoba, pointed out in great detail that that province will have revenues wholly inadequate to provide for a greatly expanded programme of expenditure. I am confident that while every province has gleaned something from deferred maintenance during the war and from war revenues, there is not one which under its existing revenue powers has the financial resources to hope to make up in the post-war period the deferred maintenance that has accumulated during the war years.

Those who are interested in Mr. Garson's views will find them in the evidence of the reconstruction and reestablishment committee, No. 19, page 486, June 2, 1942. On November 27, 1943, representatives of the mayors' federation of Canada appeared before the committee and stated:

> The financial resources of the municipalities are wholly inadequate for any large scale post-war public works programme such as probably will be required.

That was not so after the last war. At the close of the last war the provincial and municipal governments embarked, not only upon a programme of making up deferred maintenance but upon a progressive programme of general expansion. On the other hand, the dominion government curtailed expenditures and moved toward a programme of balanced budgets with the objective of reducing the national debt.

Many people ask, and with some justification, "Are we going to move from this war into a period of illusionary prosperity and then collapse into a condition of hopeless inactivity?" There was never anything wrong with the wealth of Canada from 1930 to 1939, but there was something wrong with the machinery that maintained in circulation the economic power of the collective society of the people of Canada. We were told after the last war, "You have spent your money; the war has caused this debt; you have to tighten your belt and meet your obligations." No one can find much fault with that kind of honest theorizing.

Unfortunately, however, when the government stopped spending the country lost the power to expand, and all of a sudden the complete collapse of the economic structure took place. I should like to draw to the attention of the government and the minister some facts which are indicative that the financing of this war has followed closely the pattern of the financing of the last war. There are some details which vary greatly, but let me direct attention to the fact that in 1941 our total bank deposits were $1,052 million, while in 1918 they were $1,942 million. We increased our bank deposits by $842 million.

What have we done in this war? In 1938 our bank deposits were $2,498 million, and in April, 1943, they had risen to $5,297 million. Do not make any mistake about what that means. It means that the debt claim currency of this country, which was the cause of the trouble after the last war, has shown a proportionately larger increase during this war than it did in the last. That is not national currency circulating as a servant of the people; that is not currency issued in terms of public need; that is debt claim currency which is not spent into circulation as an operating medium of exchange but lent into circulation as a debt claim upon the nation to provide a monopoly. Make no mistake about what that means. If that is not changed, this system of frustrating every effort of progress, breaking down every power to move forward, all the plans, yes, all the sacrifices of this war will have been in vain.

Let me refer to another similarity. We have gone through this before and we are going through it again. Do not think for one moment that we on this continent will be given any special dispensation. What will permit us to escape the consequences which have befallen the people of Europe if we make the mistakes the people of Europe have made? In 1914 our public debt load was $335 million. By 1918 it had risen to $1,191 million, an increase of $866 million. But let me give the increase in the debt load since 1939. In 1939 we owed a debt of $4,693,000,000. On December 31, 1943, it had increased to $11,300,000,000. The increase in the federal debt in 1918 was $866,000,000, and to-day it is already $6,609,000,000. That debt must be serviced. Our interest charges have risen, although the rate has beeen cut, from $169,000,000 to $304,000,000. Our interest charges at the close of the last war were less than a hundred million dollars, and yet we heard those responsible for the government of Canadian cities, those responsible for the government of our provinces and those responsible for our federal government declaring throughout the whole of the period from 1920 to 1929 that the crippling power, the all-evading restricting force upon Canadian democracy in all its services to the people lay in the fact that there were fixed charges that could not be reduced; it lay in the fact that the debt load had increased to the point where nothing could be done without deficit budgeting, which is against sound, practical, financial economy.

What is the solution of that problem today, for it is not going to solve itself, and the men of to-morrow in our cities, in our provincial governments and in this parliament cannot escape finding a solution of this problem. I have listened to a great many ministers of finance. But I have never heard one minister of finance who approved deficit financing. I have never heard a responsible public man declare that a nation or a province or a city or an individual could go on and maintain its or his economic security by pyramiding an ever-increasing load of interest-bearing debt. There is plenty of evidence to prove that that debt load is a menace to-day.

You see, Mr. Speaker, it is all very well to say to the people: Your debts must be paid. The moment you start regimenting your people or imposing upon them a burden of taxation, you face one of two things. You face open revolt and repudiation of the government, and at the same time you face the line of diminishing returns. We are already at that point in Canada.

I support heartily what I thought was a splendid presentation of the situation by the hon. member for Parry Sound (Mr. Slaght) the other evening. But men say: How can you reduce taxation and increase public services? How can you call upon the government to cut down its levy of taxes on the people and to extend its expending power to provide services and improvements which the people are demanding? And we come to that easy phrase, You cannot get something for nothing. That on the face of it seems to be reasonable. But certainly under the existing system of issuing the medium of exchange, not in terms of public need, but in terms of private gain, through a toll-gate of interest imposed by private monopoly, you cannot escape the disaster of overwhelming and unpayable debt.

What is there in the way of solution? There was a time when men believed that the medium of exchange available to the people depended on the amount of money metal they could dig out of the ground. When the cycle of trade depression came around, unless you could discover a gold mine in California or Australia or perhaps the Cariboo, poverty would have to remain. As late as 1930 I heard the then Prime Minister of this country declare that gold is an asset necessary to our credit and that without our gold reserves our money would be valueless.

What has happened to that theory? It has gone, and gold has not lost its value. Gold plays a great part, as well as silver, in our international world to-day, and it probably will continue to play that part. But make no mistake about it, we have been released forever from the restricting powers of gold upon the volume of our internal currency, and to-day The Bank of Canada dollar, printed with a printing press upon a piece of paper, has behind it the integrity of the government, the resources of the entire nation and the intelligence of the Canadian people.

We have a means of creating a medium of exchange and putting it into circulation without accumulating an ever-increasing burden of debt. I just want to go back a little while, because what I am preaching is not new. I came to Ottawa many years ago and I laid before the banking and commerce committee of 1934 these proposals:

> The successful operation of the New Deal for humanity proposed by the Liberal party necessitates the establishment of the administrative foundations which I outlined to the banking and commerce committee on May 1, 1934, namely:
> (1) A national banking system controlling the issue of all currency and monetization and issue of credit transferable by cheque.
> (2) A department of taxation empowered to prevent excessive accumulation of currency and credit in issue;
> (3) A department of economy for the regulation and control of all internal trade, commerce and credit;
> (4) A department of foreign trade for the development, control and regulation of international trade, commerce, currency and credit.
> This plan does not involve the socialization of private finance or the wiping out of the legitimate business of the merchant banker. It can and should be confined to the national administration of currency and public credit devoted to the financing of all public enterprise and the maintenance of an adequate stream of consumers' buying power. Under this plan the national government, working in cooperation with the provincial and municipal authorities throughout the dominion can eliminate the disastrous costs which the private money system now imposes upon the financing of all public enterprise. We can eliminate unemployment, reestablish a rising standard of living, and advance our internal and external trade. Education may continue to iron out the social and economic inequalities which unfortunately persist. Steps to secure a greater measure of equity in the distribution of wealth may be undertaken with greater hope of success. Government will be able to function more effectively in maintaining a fairer balance between the city, agricultural and industrial communities. We do not assume that the Dominion of Canada can maintain economic independence, but we do say that under this plan the government of the dominion will be able to maintain, in cooperation with those nations who are willing and anxious to trade with us, a measure of economic security that has never been enjoyed in the past.

How much of that plan has been put in effect since 1934? All of it in some degree. The only thing lacking to give the government of Canada to-day power which every democratic government should have is the power to issue currency through its own national institution as the spending power of government.

I asserted at that time that we could not go on indifferent at the head of national government under our constitution to the financial needs and taxation powers and responsibilities of provincial and municipal governments. We found ourselves in those years in the junior branches of government hopelessly without the means of financing undertakings which would have eliminated much of the unemployment in our cities. School-teachers went unpaid. May I say that there is a great group of people throughout our national economy to-day who are underpaid, who are not receiving adequate compensation for the increase in the cost of living, or for the positions which they hold in our social and economic life, or for the services they render to the community at large.

If we are to have a peaceful period of secure progress after the war we have to meet some other problems. After the last war the number of airmen returning was comparatively small as compared with the numbers that will return in the uniform of the Royal Canadian Air Force after this war. The training they have secured and the record they have written in the skies entitle them, yes, entitle them all, to a place in the social order and economic life which will be worthy of the place they now hold. They will rightly demand a place in a nation enjoying a high state of progressive prosperity and they will not be satisfied with anything less. The men and women who will return in the uniform of Canada's navy are highly trained. They have held an important place. Do you think they are going to be willing to return to be mere hewers of wood and drawers of water? Are they to return to a life in which they may be told to-day that they can have a job and to-morrow that it is not available? So it is with the men and women of our army. They are trained to be leaders in the great forces of mechanized power. Do you think the problem of reestablishing the demobilized forces will be in any respect similar to what it was after the last war? Go through any of your modern factories; look at the people engaged there. The surroundings, the work they are doing, the wages they are receiving, are industrial conditions of the highest standards. Do you think for a moment that they will return to a standard of living such as obtained in Canada from 1930 to 1939? They will not do so. They will not be satisfied to accept it.

How then can this problem be faced? It certainly cannot be faced under the present debt claim system. It cannot be faced under a system of taxation which has already passed the line of diminishing returns and is destroying private enterprise—

Mr. BLACKMORE: And human life.

Mr. McGEER: —and private initiative. There is not any question about that.

Here is a new standard to be developed, an enormous debt to be reduced, and a condition of taxation which has already gone beyond the limits of reasonable acceptance.

That brings me to what I rose to speak on to-day, the problem of changing our banking and monetary system so that it will conform to a new order. Can we do that? Yes, Mr. Speaker, I believe we can, but I believe that it involves fundamental changes in our whole banking law. I believe that on the changes which are made in this regard depends more than anything else the success with which we shall be able to assume and fulfil the responsibilities which lie before us.

The Bank of Canada as at present formed has the power to finance our federal government by a straight issue of national currency, but it has no power to take deposits and no power to take advantage of deposits as a means of obtaining the benefit of a circulating currency or of controlling the circulation of currency. Those amendments are necessary.

A further amendment of the banking law is required to compel the Bank of Canada to be the financing authority for all public enterprise and to stop the chartered banks from issuing currency in the form of bank deposits as a substitute for Canadian money. They should be empowered to lend their own deposits and to lend their own capital; but to leave with them the power to issue a bank deposit debt claim as a substitute for currency, as a substitute for the Canadian medium of exchange, and to compel all Canadian governments and the Canadian people to be dependent upon that type of medium of exchange, is to leave us at the mercy of a private monopoly. It is because we have depended upon that kind of thing in the past that we have suffered both from inflation and from deflation, and so long as the present system continues we shall find that recurring condition inescapable. But, you say, how is that going to help our provincial and municipal governments? I would suggest that the time has come when we should have associated with the Bank of Canada a bank in each of the provinces of the dominion, a bank which will have close association with provincial and municipal governments, working in conjunction with each other and in conjunction with the federal bank, that is, the Bank of Canada, so as to be able to provide whatever finances are necessary to sustain the provincial and municipal economy.

Would such a system as that involve us in an inflationary condition? I do not think it would; but I am sure of one thing, that it would be possible under that system to avoid the disaster of inflation in the future. We have always suffered from deflation. We have never suffered from inflation. It was the deflation in 1921 that caused the disaster; it was the deflation in 1930 that caused the disaster. Where was there ever any inflationary condition from which the people of Canada have suffered? We have never had any means available to us to lift the people out of depression other than by piling up a new load of interest-bearing debt. We have never suffered from inflation and we never shall under the present system; but we shall invariably suffer from deflation, and that is what has happened in the past.

Should a government be provided with adequate means of financing a progressive rate in the standard of living? We are told in this house to-day that the problem of financing old age pensions is something which should be carried on by the provincial governments, and because we say that the cost will be too great a burden upon our national finances we leave the old age pensioners to struggle along on a miserable pittance. Take the burden of taxation as it moves across the under-strata in every class of society, taxed below a decent standard of living to-day. The power to avoid that kind of thing is the power that modern democratic government must take unto itself, and it must take it to itself through a sound and correct amendment of our currency laws.

We in Canada can look forward to an enormous expansion. We have a young country, the development of which is barely touched. Remarkable as it may seem, as yet we have not a single trans-Canada motor highway across the dominion. You can start at the eastern boundary line and go right through to the shores of Vancouver island, and in every part of the dominion there are millions of jobs crying to be done. Let me point out just one. Technical training is one of the great opportunities in Canada. We have built up during the war, around the national research council, a great organization that has made a splendid contribution to the war programme. Is there not an opportunity to take our national research council as it is to-day and consolidate it into a great technical training and scientific research training school to be applied to the development of our Canadian resources? There is one extension to our educational system that can be closely related to the whole development of our resources in line with the new age that is approaching. That is only one example. But none of these things will be available to us in all their full value if they are to be frustrated by a continuing and progressive load of unpayable debt with its burden of taxation and its ultimate burden of stagnation and repudiation.

RECONSTRUCTION

ESTABLISHMENT OF DEPARTMENT TO FORMULATE AND CARRY OUT RECONSTRUCTION PLANS

The house resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. Mackenzie King for the second reading of bill No. 82, to establish a Department of Reconstruction.

Mr. E. G. HANSELL (Macleod): Mr. Speaker, I have no desire to detain the house any longer than is necessary for me to make a few remarks on this bill to set up a Department of Reconstruction. At the outset may I say that I do not believe I have ever before experienced such a tense house as I experienced this afternoon, when the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) gave his official statement respecting some of our men who were among those who had been shot in Germany as they attempted to escape. Every heart here seemed to be hushed as we thought of it. I may say, too, that I think all hon. members agree with the Prime Minister when he says that such action should not be allowed to go by without punishment eventually being meted out to those who are responsible. I trust, too, that that punishment will be a penalty to fit the crime.

Some of us have boys in this war; some of us have lost sons in this war; some of us have sons who are prisoners of war, while others have sons who are facing the enemy on the seas, on the battle field and in the skies. Those brave lads who were shot gave up their lives for their country, and I trust that their sacrifice shall not have been in vain.

If the present administration are sincere in setting up this new Department of Reconstruction—and at the present time I have no reason to believe they are otherwise—and if they put their hands to the task and really attempt to bring about a new order in Canada which will give all men their security, and at the same time retain for all men their individual freedom, they will then have done something worthy of the sacrifices made by those young men.

The term "reconstruction" is something of a misnomer in Canada, because it appears to me that one cannot reconstruct something that is not broken down. So far as Canada is concerned—and the Prime Minister recognized this in his speech on the bill the other day—we have suffered no bombings. Our entire country is still intact. Our industries have already been built up. It will be a matter of transferring Canada from a war-time industrial nation to a peace-time nation. So far as reconstruction is concerned, I must say that I do not see what there is to reconstruct.

I believe, however, there is a great job we need to do. When I think of reconstruction I am wondering if the Prime Minister and his government are not a little bit behind the times. I can recall when as early as 1935 a certain well-honoured gentleman arose in this country and, recognizing that some reconstruction had to be done in those days of depression, brought into existence what was known as a reconstruction party. I believe that was the time when we had need to recognize that something was wrong in Canada. That was the time when this government, the one now in office, should have set its hand to the task of making Canada what it ought to have been.

I know a good deal of reference has been made in this debate to the past. Hon. members, particularly those on the government side, have said, "Oh, well, that is all in the past; we do not want to know about that. We want to know about the future." But I am at a loss to know, and particularly as I analysed the speech of the Prime Minister, what there is he hopes to get in the future that he could not have had in the past. There must be some reason for reconstruction.

The strange thing about it is—and I suppose it is quite explainable—that there have come from all quarters of the country, and I suppose from other countries which have found themselves in similar circumstances, the recognition of a need for reconstruction. We have boards of trade; we have chambers of commerce; we have industrialists; we have committees of the House of Commons and of the government. Why are there all these demands for reconstruction? I think I can say they have their background in the experience of the past.

While I am talking about the many plans offered for reconstruction, may I, in passing, call the government's attention to a little book I hold in my hand, a book of only seventy-three pages, entitled, "A Report on Post-War Reconstruction Policies," and issued by the post-war policy committee of the Vancouver board of trade. I do not know if the government's attention has been brought to this book, but I would say that I have read it diligently and I declare that of all the voluminous reports I have read with respect to reconstruction I have never discovered anything containing such valuable information as does this small book. It was not issued by the Social Credit government of Alberta. It was not issued by the Social Credit party of Canada. It was not issued by the Social Credit group in the House of Commons. Rather, it was issued by a committee appointed by the Vancouver board of trade, and it does something that many post-war reconstruction reports have not done, in that it analyses the reasons for our trouble. It shows the defects that exist in our present economic and political system. It diagnoses the trouble and then prescribes the remedy. Before the submission concludes, a series of resolutions is presented for consideration. I state this in passing, because I am certain that the committee who worked hard and long on this problem—for they must have done so—have submitted something that I believe will solve Canada's problems in the post-war period.

Many reconstruction submissions which I have read dealt with certain things that Canada might do, what could be built and so on. Submissions have been made, especially to the reconstruction committee of parliament, as to the roads that could be built, the number of bridges that could be constructed, the number of irrigation schemes and what-not that could be carried out. The report of the Vancouver board of trade says nothing about that, it simply asks a fundamental question, how are you going to do these things? This report deals with a question which I have failed to see answered in any other submissions I have read so far.

I remarked a little while ago that it is strange that there are so many reports being submitted. I think the reason is to be found in the history of the past number of years, perhaps the last ten or fifteen. We all recognize that there was something wrong with what is termed to-day to be the hungry thirties. We all saw ourselves pass from a period of depression into a period of apparent prosperity. I do not know that Canada has ever had such financial prosperity as she has to-day.

People are now saying the obvious thing—it has been asked hundreds of times—"You could not find the money for peace, but you can now find it for war." I do not believe that any government from this day on will be able to offer the excuse that they do not know from where they can get the money. If ever the question arises again, surely the people of Canada will be wise enough to know that that answer or that excuse will not hold.

There is one little observation I should like to make right here. There seems to be the unanswerable question of why we had such a period of poverty in the midst of plenty. I have never heard any politician answer that; I have never seen an answer by any professors of the old school of economics. The fact of the matter is that the bygone, orthodox financial expert has not yet answered that one question. The Prime Minister has not answered it. Upon analysing his speech I believe I can come to the conclusion that successful reconstruction depends upon whether or not we can sell our goods abroad. If my logic serves me as I think it should, my other conclusion is that the only reason why we had a depression then was that we could not sell our goods abroad. I am not making that statement; that is the conclusion I come to from what the Prime Minister seems to have said the other day. I do not believe that is the reason at all. I believe the only reason why we had those hungry thirties, the only reason why we lived in poverty when abundance abounded, was that the government refused to adjust its monetary policy in order that the goods that were available could be distributed adequately to the people of this country.

It always seems strange to me that apparently we have sufficient brains in Canada to tackle almost every problem except the one of finance. The other night Lieutenant Commander Todd gave members of the House of Commons a lecture on the invasion. I could not help feeling at the time that behind that huge fleet, that huge army and that huge air force were the brains that so strategically managed the whole campaign as to have it meet with the success it did. I thought of the genius that must have been behind it all. I think it is one of the greatest wonders of history. Yet we know that this genius is not confined to those who hold the rank of admiral, general or air marshal. Surely there is some intelligence in Canada. Are we to admit that we can solve every other problem but that of the distribution of our goods and services to bring our country to a place where it will have the highest standard of living possible in this world? Surely no one will deny that we have the genius for that. Surely it must be somewhere. Surely that problem is not beyond solution.

I should like to refer to Hansard of June 20 when the Prime Minister spoke on this debate, and analyse one or two of the remarks he made and attempt to point out some of the matters which I think need a little criticism and some others which need a little clarification. As reported at page 3980 of Hansard the Prime Minister recognizes that there is an aspect of reconstruction which might be termed economic reconstruction. In referring to this type of reconstruction he said:

> That has to do largely with the transforming of industry from making war supplies to making goods for human consumption and with restoring and increasing the capital equipment of the nation, together with the provision of employment for those who are being transferred from the one activity to the other. It is in connection with this economic reconstruction that the new Department of Reconstruction of the federal government will be primarily concerned.

The only reference of the Prime Minister to economic reconstruction is in connection with the transference over to a peace-time industry that will supply goods for human consumption. There is one thing sadly lacking in what I would term to be a description of economic reconstruction. Surely, if there is anything that needs to be reconstructed in order to get a vast amount of peace-time goods to our people, it is our financial arrangement which has never been able to do it. We have had the goods; we have the railways; we have the trucks and we have been able to get the goods right up to the retailer, but we have never been able to get them from the retailer to the larders and parlours and bedrooms of our homes. That is one thing that has been lacking in our economic system. If economic reconstruction is to mean anything, it must solve that one vital problem.

The Prime Minister is at the head of the present government, and surely what he says should be taken as having some authority as far as the Liberal administration is concerned. In all that speech there was not a single solitary stand taken or statement made as to what economic change must take place—actual economic change—actual change in monetary or fiscal policy—not a single suggestion.

I go along a little farther and here, at the top of page 3981 of Hansard the Prime Minister is dealing with markets, and repeating what he said a few days ago:

> Markets must be found and retained for our greatly increased food production unless we are not to face an agricultural depression.

Then farther on he says:

> First and foremost—

I want you, Mr. Speaker, to get those words.

> First and foremost there is the obligation to ensure the establishment of what may be most effective in the way of world organization for peace.

Then, after saying that this comes under the Department of External Affairs he says:

> Probably more than any other single question requiring attention in the post-war period will be the securing of wider markets and the extension of trade.

That may sound very well and good to the man who may not be thoroughly alert. But let me ask this question. Suppose this country is not able to gain the foreign markets that we require in order to sell our surplus goods—and no one is so foolish as to believe that every other country in the world will not be looking for the same thing, so that it will be the same old story over and over again and we shall find that foreign markets will not solve our problems for they never have before, not in this modern age, and I do not believe they ever will again—suppose we are unable to get the foreign markets we require, then what? There is absolutely no answer, Mr. Speaker. I repeat, then what? No answer.

Mr. BLACKMORE: From the Prime Minister.

Mr. HANSELL: My hon. friend the member for Lethbridge says that there is no answer from the Prime Minitser. Of course, we in this group have the answer; never worry about that.

Mr. BLACKMORE: They will find that out after a while.

An hon. MEMBER: When?

Mr. BLACKMORE: When you have bumped your heads a little more.

Mr. HANSELL: As some one has said, if people have to suffer in the post-war world, if they have not suffered enough already, it is their God-given right to suffer more. But we do not want them to. We believe that there is a solution of this problem and that that solution is not to be found in foreign markets. I am not saying that we do not want foreign trade, but I say that there is much ado made about this foreign trade business. It seems strange, does it not, that we have to feed the world before we ourselves can eat? But that seems to be the philosophy held by a lot of people who talk so much about foreign trade.

The Prime Minister in his speech also made considerable mention of cooperation by the provinces with the federal government. I shall read this one passage from his speech as reported at page 3981 of Hansard, where he said:

> In times of peace, on the other hand, we have to strive, in carrying out any policy, to get the good will and effective cooperation of every province, as well as carrying out our own work. I hope and believe, as a result of what has happened during the past five years, and of the cooperation which the federal government has had in large measure from the provincial governments, that following conferences still to be held between the provinces and ourselves we shall be able to work out some means whereby we can, in the period after the war, secure still greater cooperation for the benefit of all.

I do not know whether I am right in reading between the lines there, but I should like to make sure to-night that the Prime Minister is not putting the responsibility for this whole post-war picture on the shoulders of the provinces. I hope he has not in mind here that if one or two provinces refuse to accept his proposals at the forthcoming dominion-provincial conference he will turn around and say: We will see what the country has to say about this. That would be an extremely good excuse for bringing the representatives of the provinces here. I trust that the Prime Minister has no such motive.

I wish to say this in connection with provincial governments. The more that power is taken away from provincial governments and put into the hands of a powerful central government, the more is power taken away from the people. Let that be stated in unequivocal terms. The fact of the matter is that you get nearer to the people when you get out to their local governments. The more that provincial governments take responsibility away from the municipal governments, the more is power taken out of the hands of the people. I say this, too. When the hon. member for Essex East (Mr. Martin) the other night brought into the picture the Rowell-Sirois report which one or two provinces refused to accept, the tenor of his argument was that there was no cooperation. Well, why not? Simply because the Rowell-Sirois report to all intents and purposes would have placed more power in the hands of a centralized government and taken it away from the hands of the people, and one or two provinces would not bow down to that sort of thing. The strange thing about the Rowell-Sirois report, which in the end would have established more centralized power and more centralized control, is that it had every banker and every chamber of commerce behind it, and they sent out their literature and arguments to the various boards of trade which did not know what it was all about and which followed in father's footsteps. All the big chain newspapers were for the Rowell-Sirois report and all the big industrialists and, without mentioning any names, a good many politicians were also for it. I say that if this government at the forthcoming dominion-provincial conference attempts to take power away from the provinces, this group is going to stand by the provinces in their argument to retain their power for the reason that their power is more abundantly the people's power.

Let me ask this question. I do not suppose I shall get an answer but it does not make any difference. The central government, namely the government here at Ottawa, have complete control of our monetary system; at any rate they are supposed to have; no other government has it. Am I to be told that this government will not receive the cooperation of the provincial governments if it says to them, "We will see that you get all the money necessary to make financially possible what is physically possible and desirable in your province"? If the government said that, does anybody believe that the provinces would not cooperate? Certainly they would; there is no doubt about that. It is all a question of whether the dominion government is willing—I am not going to say "able"—to make financially possible that which is physically possible.

The other evening, while the Prime Minister was speaking, the hon. member for Lethbridge (Mr. Blackmore) interrupted him—

rightly so, I believe—by asking him where he was to get the money; was he to get it without increasing our debt? I am not going to enter at this time into all the Prime Minister's argument; but I ask him if, some time when he goes home and cannot sleep very well at night, he will turn to page 3987 of Hansard and analyse his answer. He went all the way round but he never touched the question. Finally he wound up his explanation by talking about a man having a family and, of course, he would need a home, and of course the home would have to be furnished, and so on. But is that a new condition which has suddenly come upon the scene of this world's economy? It seems to me that that has always been the case. Was it not so in the hungry thirties; was it not even so in the days of those two renowned people known as Adam and Eve? Is this part of a new idea? Is this part of the new order? I should like him to read what he said. I quote from Hansard, at page 3988:

> That is the way progress is made, through demands which arise from conditions of peace and prosperity;—

Let me ask him, how can a man make a demand if he has not the money? I know the Prime Minister has studied this subject, and I am positive he knows there is never enough money coming out of industry to buy back all the goods it produces. The Prime Minister continued:

> —and where you get demands of the kind which lead to the fuller employment of labour I do not think my hon. friend need fear about the increase of the public debt or taxation. . . .

Imagine that! The only answer is, "My hon. friend does not need to fear." Well, I say to-night that here is one who does fear that if we are not going to change our monetary policy, if we leave it to business, to industry—all well and good in its place—to sell its goods when people have not got the money to buy goods, we shall go back once again into the hungry thirties. But, oh no, the answer is. "Don't fear, my boy, don't fear; everything is all right; everything is going to be under control."

One other thing I should like to say here. I do not know whether the Prime Minister intended this as a promise or not, but he said, as reported at page 3988 of Hansard:

> . . . I believe the nation can go ahead with the great work of construction and reconstruction and at the same time reduce its taxation and reduce its debt.

He added:

> That at least is what I would hope to do if this government is in office when that period comes.

I do not know whether that is an election promise, but I am going to mark that page for reference when I come back here in the post-war period—and I shall come back.

Mr. MITCHELL: The hon. member is just bragging now.

Mr. HANSELL: I say that I shall be here if the Prime Minister is.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: You are working together, eh?

Mr. GRANT: Do you intend to turn Liberal?

Mr. JOHNSTON (Bow River): Who will? I have not found any in my part of the country; there are no such animals out there.

Mr. HANSELL: Since I wish to refer to one or two other things and I have only a minute or two to spare, I must hurry along.

As I have looked over these speeches I declare that the speech made by the hon. member for Jasper-Edson (Mr. Kuhl) has not yet been answered by his critics. Two or three hon. members have referred to it, but they have not given him an answer. What did the hon. member for Essex East say? I turn to page 4015 of Hansard:

> I am satisfied that no longer will our people go and receive a dole without at the same time receiving work for which they will be remunerated. Our people will not want to subscribe to the doctrine of the hon. member for Jasper-Edson.

The hon. member for Jasper-Edson never advocated any relief roll or what was commonly known in the relief days as a "dole." What he recommended was a reduction in the hours of labour and a national dividend to make up the purchasing power which was always lacking to buy back our production. When the hon. member for Essex East assumes to say what "our people will not want," is he speaking for our people? How does he know? He must be one of those three tailors of Tooley Street whose manifesto began, "We, the people of England." I want hon. members to get the logic of this:

> Our people believe in the dignity of work They do not want to be idle.

Who said they want to be idle?

Mr. GRANT: The hon. member for Jasper-Edson (Mr. Kuhl).

Mr. HANSELL: He never did. What we believe, and what the hon. member for Jasper-Edson said, is that work by compulsion from anyone at the top is something which takes away man's freedom, and that with the advent of technological skill the hours of labour could be reduced by scientific methods to four hours a day. The hon. member for Brant (Mr. Wood) asked, "How would I milk all my cows in four hours?" Can you imagine the logic of that?

Mr. CASTLEDEN: How does he do it now?

Mr. HANSELL: If he wants to work more than four hours that is his affair. We do not care if he pulls—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. HANSELL: I am sure hon. members do not mind if he milks cows all night if he wants to. We are not going to object to it.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: Five hundred pulls for one cent.

Mr. HANSELL: I see that my time is exhausted.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Go ahead.

Mr. HANSELL: I was only going to say this, that anything that is done to the people of Canada by compulsion from anyone else at all is the absolute antithesis of a Christian democracy. When man was created he was endowed with freedom of will to choose; and every satanic system which has been brought about since the old boy entered upon the stage has contained some device to take that freedom away from him.

Mr. JOHNSTON (Bow River): Even the Liberal party.

Mr. HANSELL: The only way to retain that freedom among men is for them to be able to choose to work at the work they want to do, and to be free to refuse work if conditions are undesirable. The man himself should be able to decide that, and if he wants to turn his talent to the writing of a concerto or the painting of a picture, then he should be free to do so. Compulsion brought to bear upon anyone by any other person is satanic. If it is natural compulsion it is different; but if it is compulsion exercised by any human individual over another it is satanic and I care not whether it is done by Liberals, Progressive Conservatives, the C.C.F. or Tim Buckism. If it is done it is satanic. A glorious Christian democracy is that which gives mankind the blessings the Creator has bestowed upon them and at the same time gives them absolute freedom. I thank you, Mr. Speaker, for your patience.

Mr. NORMAN JAQUES (Wetaskiwin): I should like to associate myself with the ideas expressed by the speaker who has just taken his seat (Mr. Hansell) and with the observations of the hon. member for Jasper-Edson (Mr. Kuhl). I have listened to this debate and to the other discussions on reconstruction and to what is called the new order, and all that it amounts to, so far as I can see, is that everybody is to be put to work. If there is anything new in work, I do not know what it is. Surely work is the oldest order in the world. But when the state undertakes to put everyone to work that is new; it is state socialism, and it does not matter whether it originates on that side of the house or in that corner of the house. It is state socialism just the same and you are all going the same road.

The hon. member for Essex East (Mr. Martin), referring to the hon. member for Jasper-Edson, made this statement:

> Our people will not want to subscribe to the doctrine of the hon. member for Jasper-Edson. . . . Our people believe in the dignity of work.

Exactly. Well, is there any dignity in slavery? Is there any dignity in work performed by a man who is compelled to work, unless from natural causes? If there is, then surely slavery was the noblest institution we have witnessed, and the slave was the noblest of mankind. We know, however, it is not so. Natural dictatorship and the struggle against it is an ennobling thing; nobody denies that. But the Almighty, or Providence, has permitted mankind through science and so forth, to make it possible to lift the burden of a struggle for mere existence from the backs of mankind. And when human beings step in and presume to take the place of the Almighty and to say to men, "You shall work or starve," that is dictatorship and it does not matter whether it is called Liberalism, Progressive-Conservatism, C.C.F.ism or Tim Buckism. It is all the same and it all originates from the same idea, or philosophy. What differentiates not only our group but our movement throughout the world, particularly in the British empire, the movement known as social credit? It is this. We believe in voluntary effort. We believe that the time has come when it is no longer necessary to impose a struggle upon everyone for the bare necessities of life. That has been solved. Struggle there must be, but the struggle should be lifted to a higher plane than the mere struggle for existence. We have always advocated dividends for all and that has been ridiculed. First of all, the question was raised, where would the money come from? Well, at the present time over fifty per cent of the production of this country and of our allies is being given—I say given because it is given in the form of munitions—to Germany and our other enemies. That is a national or if you prefer, an international dividend. We ask nothing in exchange. As a consequence of that, even though the cream of the nation is either in uniform or in munition factories, while essential retail goods and the necessities of life are being produced by the very young and the very old, in spite of that fact, and that we are giving away over fifty per cent of our production, right out of the country, the present standard of living in Canada is higher than ever before.

I know there are certain inconveniences and restrictions, but I think I am right in saying that, if you average Canada right through, the present standard of living is higher than it ever was before. Certainly it is a great deal higher than it was for the ten years preceding the war. The reason for that is surely obvious. The problem of marketing has been solved. There is no trouble about marketing and therefore there is no trouble about producing. And if you solve the problem of consumption you automatically solve the problem of production. I might say, in passing, that the paying of a dividend is not new. Not only is the idea of it not new, but as an actual fact it is not new. I have here a book entitled, "Monetary Experiments", by Richard A. Lester, and in a foreword by Professor Kemmerer the following appears:

> This study is one of a series being published under the auspices of the international finance section of the Department of Economics and Social Institutions in Princeton university.

This book is published under the auspices of the university of Princeton, and in the chapter headed, "Social Dividend in Maryland", I read:

> When Maryland first issued paper money in 1733 most of it was given away—a certain sum to each inhabitant over fifteen years of age. This was done in order that the paper money might be "the more useful to the inhabitants" and its circulation might be "as speedy and diffusive as possible." The legislature hoped by this means "to remove the difficulties under which the inhabitants had long laboured." In a sense this was a sort of "social dividend" similar to that advocated by Major C. H. Douglas in his books on social credit.

At the end of the chapter there are a few words which sum up the experiment, and they are as follows:

> From his detailed study of forty-five years of money in Maryland, Professor Gould concludes: "Considering the peculiar benefits to grain and tobacco culture, the conveniences offered to trade, and the faithful redemption of every shilling at face value, it is hardly too much to say that this was the most successful paper money issued by any of the colonies."

It can be seen that the national dividend is not even new; this was done before and it was a great success. To those who, like the hon. member for Essex East and others, have been so fond of saying that it would demoralize and pauperize the people, I would say that it was the recipients of that dividend who a few years afterwards fought and won the war of independence.

I shall now quote a few lines from Douglas himself. He has this to say on state socialism:

> State socialism is based on the premise that, firstly, the control of policy is resident in administration, and, secondly, that it is possible to "socially" control administration, and thirdly, that the state should be able to supply economic pressure to the individual; whereas I suggest to you that the control of policy is resident in credit, and its financial derivations, of which money is one, while administration is a technical and expert matter not susceptible of being socialized, and, lastly, that the only possible method by which the highest civilization can be reached is to make it impossible for either the state or any other body to apply economic pressure to any individual.

That is the reason for the dividend. It should be obvious to any thinking person that the world is coming to the parting of the ways. People speak of a new order. We believe in a new order. A new order should mean individual freedom. After centuries of struggle we have won political freedom but the world has not yet won individual economic freedom. The only offer that I have any knowledge of from any other movement but our own is this: People are being offered economic security at the price of individual freedom. That is what they are being offered. That is what they were offered and received in Germany, Russia and Italy. That is what they are being offered to-day not only in Canada but throughout the British empire. The so-called new order is state socialism. It is based, not on individual freedom as it should be, but on collective security at the price of individual freedom.

Quite recently the hon. member for Jasper-Edson was criticized for a statement he made about the leisure state. We well know that there is no room for a leisure state in war time. That is one of the reasons why war is hell. There is no leisure. But surely after the war is over and when the worst of the damage of the war and the waste of war have been repaired we should look to the ideal of a new order, and that should be toward a leisure state and not a work state; that is, work for the sake of working. Major Douglas has this to say on that subject:

> The more the maintenance of life can be shifted from the backs of men on to the backs of machines, the more important it is to find a creative outlet for the human energy released, and the more certain is it that a considerable portion of this energy will, without compulsion, be devoted to the improvement of the industrial machines. That is to say, that if a practical policy based on these considerations be pursued there will be a fall in the man-hours required for routine or operating work, and a consequent rise in the man-hours available for design and research work. The industrial machine is a lever continuously being lengthened by progress which enables the burden of Atlas to be lifted with ever-increasing ease. As the number of men required to work the lever decreases, so the number of men set free to lengthen it increases.

I shall read one more quotation from Major Douglas on the leisure state. It is as follows:

If we assume that the constant effort to reduce the amount of labour per unit of production are justified, and we recognize the unquestionable fact that the genuine consumption capacity of the individual is limited, we must recognize that the world, whether consciously or not, is working towards the leisure state. The production system under this conception would be required to produce those goods and services which the consumer desires of it with a minimum and probably decreasing amount of human labour. Production, and still more the activities which are commonly referred to as business, would of necessity cease to be the major interest of life and would, as has happened to so many biological activities, be relegated to a position of minor importance.

This movement of social credit is a great deal more than a mere method of finance. Monetary reform is not enough. Social credit is a philosophy of life, and the financial part of it is merely the means to gain the ends of the policy. The basic philosophy of social credit is freedom for the individual.

There are only two methods of production in the world—there can only be two—compulsion and persuasion. So far, the world has been more or less under persuasion. If there has been compulsion it has been imposed by Providence, by God or by Nature, whichever you prefer. But that has been overcome, and now we are threatened with production by compulsion—a compulsion imposed, not by nature, but by individuals who have assumed powers which, rightly, belong only to the Almighty. That is, in my opinion, the essence of all dictatorships.

We propose that everybody should be guaranteed—every man, woman and child—at least the necessities of life, whether they work or not. I do not mean to say that this would apply, of course, in war time and probably for some time after the war; but it is an ideal to guide us. All work would be voluntary, and that would be a noble thing. As I said before, I see nothing noble in being compelled by the state to work at a task which one must accept or starve. That condition is all right when it is imposed by nature. But that condition we have overcome; the problem is no longer one of production. As every speaker has said, consciously or otherwise, the problem is to market, to sell, if you like, or to distribute what we now can produce in such large quantities.

Therefore there is no longer any reason why all work should not be put on a voluntary basis. We could begin, of course, by lowering the age for pensions, and increasing the amounts. Perhaps we could raise the age for the education of youth. We could shorten the working time at both ends. The ideal should be toward a leisure state, with work freely done and not imposed by a dictator.

I hope hon. members will not deliberately distort what is said by members in this group. I suppose there is not a member in the house who has a family who does not regard it as his duty—and rightly so—to leave his family as financially independent as possible. I am sure that would be the first care and the first instinct of every father and mother in the house. If that is right, then surely that is the very best thing we can desire for our own children. Therefore, in the long run, it must be the very best thing for all children, and all people.

Of course it has never been possible, so long as the world was in a state of real scarcity. But in this day and age, when as a result of the war we shall have immensely increased our powers of production, the problem will not be one of production but, as has been said so often, one of markets. Some say that we shall have to give away to foreign countries a great portion of our production, through a favourable balance of trade and foreign lending—which is the same thing as giving.

I believe that charity begins at home; and if it is necessary—and I am sure it is—to give away part of our production, because there is no other way of getting rid of it, then I contend that we should set a good example in our own country and pay ourselves some dividends. If we did that, it would not be long before the world would follow our example.

Mr. D. KING HAZEN (St. John-Albert): Mr. Speaker, the word "reconstruction" is given a wide meaning in the interpretation section of the bill. It includes every undertaking by dominion, provincial or municipal authority or by any corporation or other person that may contribute to the reorganization of industry, in order to provide maximum production and full employment during and following the change-over from war-time production of industry to peace-time production.

I should like to take the opportunity this definition affords me to bring to the attention of the house very briefly a matter which I believe is of importance, if some of our reconstruction and interprovincial problems are to be considered and dealt with intelligently. It has to do with the lack of reliable information available respecting trade between the provinces.

If I were to ask the bureau of statistics for figures showing the trade between New Brunswick and Saskatchewan, or between any one province and any other province, the information would not be available. The bureau of statistics does not have such information. It seems to me it is important that such records should be kept, if we are to have a true picture of interprovincial business. Unless we have those records, it is impossible intelligently to study and discuss some of the economic problems and reconstruction problems which will arise after the war. Until such information is available we shall be travelling in the dark, and it will be impossible for us to obtain a true picture of Canada's interprovincial business. I am informed that this information could be obtained by the bureau of statistics and that it would not be difficult to obtain, although it would involve an additional expenditure of about $10,000 a year.

On April 7, 1926, the governor in council appointed Sir Andrew Rae Duncan, the Hon. W. B. Wallace, then judge of the county court of district No. 1, in the province of Nova Scotia, and Professor Cyrus Macmillan, Master of Arts and Doctor of Philosophy of McGill university, to be commissioners under the Inquiries Act for the purpose of conducting an inquiry into the conditions and claims of the people of the maritime provinces and to make such specific recommendations as in the opinion of the commissioners would result in affording relief from the conditions complained of. Mr. F. Maclure Sclanders, commissioner of the Saint John board of trade, acted as secretary of the commission.

The commission's report is dated September 23, 1926, and in it the commissioners urged that a system of statistics should be made regularly available from as early a date as possible on the trade of the maritime provinces with other provinces and with foreign markets as well. Section 39 of the report deals with this matter, and I should like to read the first and third paragraphs thereof. The first paragraph reads:

> We have had brought before us the lack of any comprehensive measurement of the trade of the maritime provinces with other provinces and with foreign markets. We were ourselves disappointed not to be able to pursue investigations on trade matters along lines which such statistics would have enabled us to do. We found on inquiry at the dominion bureau of statistics that consideration had been given some time ago to this very subject but, mainly through lack of organization in the statistics relating to certain phases of transportation, it was not possible to proceed with the plans that had been formulated. We strongly urge that these difficulties should be overcome, as they can be, and that on this phase of internal trade a system of statistics should be made regularly available from as early a date as possible.

The third paragraph reads:

> With regard to the general function of the bureau of statistics, we venture to draw attention to the importance of providing a comprehensive statistical organization in a country situated as is Canada with a series of provinces differing often in economic outlook. Very considerable progress has already been made in this direction, but we feel the bureau could be increased in efficiency by being given improved facilities for the kind of organization it is necessary to develop as an independent central agency covering the activities of all departments from the statistical side.

It has been suggested that the reason why this recommendation was not put into force was that representatives in the house from Ontario and Quebec objected because it would show the trade among the provinces to be in their favour. I do not consider that is the real reason, because I have always found members of the house from Ontario and Quebec ready and willing to give a sympathetic hearing to the other provinces in order to endeavour to find a solution of their difficulties.

Until statistics on this trade are obtainable we shall be travelling in the dark. It is not possible for us to obtain a true picture of our interprovincial affairs or to make an intelligent study of them until these figures are made available to us. I ask the government to implement this provision of the Duncan report and to take steps to see that statistics of trade between the different provinces are made available.

Mr. A. R. ADAMSON (York-West): Mr. Speaker, I have listened with a great deal of interest to this debate with regard to the setting up of a Department of Reconstruction. The more I have heard, the more it has become apparent to me that reconstruction is largely an engineering problem. I happen to be an engineer, and perhaps I can take some of the time of the house to express a few views which are diametrically opposed to some of those expressed by my hon. friends to my extreme left.

The definition of an engineer has been given as a man who can do something for a dollar which it would cost two or three dollars to have done by somebody else. If an engineer is given enough time, enough money and enough men he can do practically anything. Chauncey Depew has said that, given those three things, he could build a railroad to the north pole. Many of the plans that have been discussed in this house and have received publicity in the public press more or less fall into the category of building a railroad to the north pole. They seem to be very fine in debate and they look all right on paper; but having lived all over the world, having made my living in several countries besides Canada, perhaps I may be excused when I say that a great deal of what has been said is impracticable.

I am going to deal directly with the financial set-up, which has been mentioned in this house at considerable length. If we look at the beginning of chaos in the world we shall see that the first inevitable step toward this war started with the so-called managed currencies. We have the statement of Sir John Anderson in England that the beginning of Great Britain's chaos was with the adoption of the gold standard. That, I submit, is wholly inaccurate. With all due respect to Sir John Anderson, I take issue with him. England returned to the gold standard on the basis of the pre-war price of $20.67 an ounce, with a tremendously inflated currency and a tremendously inflated national debt. To say that that was a return to the gold standard is technically correct, but actually it was a return to an exchange standard between paper currency and metal which could not work because the paper was so tremendously inflated. That is the situation with regard to the adoption of the gold standard in England. Let us see what happened.

Despite everything that has been said, we in this country depend, whether anybody likes it or not, for our prosperity upon international trade, and when the war is over we shall depend for our prosperity a great deal more upon international trade. One fundamental about international trade, particularly forward trade, is that the buyer and the seller can deal in a standard whose value will remain constant when the contract is carried out. Throughout the centuries that has been the fundamental rule of success in international trade. Nothing has altered; nothing will alter.

We see that to-day we have a managed currency. All currencies are managed, fictitiously managed, with relation to the price of gold. In the United States they will purchase gold but not sell it at $35 an ounce, but on the free gold market both in Alexandria and in Bombay gold to-day sells for somewhat over $70 an ounce. The house may consider this an academic question but it is far from it. It means that the great bulk of the people with whom we shall have to trade, the great centres of population which are in the orient still have hard currencies. They believe and throughout years of bitter strife they have found it true that gold is the one thing they can trust to and to-day, despite the fact that large sums of United States currency are circulating in the orient through the American troops, United States currency is at a very great discount and the Americans have had to resort, so I understand, to two types of currency known as the blue seal and the yellow seal.

The pound sterling is an internal currency except in the controlled parts of the sterling block to-day. Its value outside England is extremely variable. Special invasion currency was issued for the attack in Normandy. I mention this because the United States dollar and the pound sterling are to-day, in the minds of the great centres of population in the orient, losing their intrinsic value because they are not convertible into a metallic base. Those are the facts. We may or may not like them. But all history shows that experiment after experiment has been made in fiat money from the time of Marcus Aurelius right down to the present day and it has inevitably brought chaos.

I mention this, Mr. Speaker, because I have lived in two countries where managed currency led to inflation, where I saw great poverty and tremendous distress caused by the printing press. One of those countries was Germany and the other Brazil. One of them after the last war was poverty-stricken; or the Germans said they were. The other country was Brazil, rich in natural resources. Both suffered from inflation, and the people, the workers, were the ones who suffered. I want to make that very clear because I have experienced inflation in those two countries and I know what it means.

It is said that the Americans have or had a hoard of gold which would never be of any use to them. But in the last three months the United States treasury has lost in the neighbourhood of $166,000,000 of gold for external purposes, and that despite the imports and the purchases she has made from Canada and other gold-producing countries which sell to the United States. Furthermore, their gold currency coverage which was over ninety per cent a year ago has dropped to slightly over sixty per cent and it may now be less than that. That is what is happening to the American gold. The American gold is one of the most useful assets the United States has ever had, as was our gold at the beginning of the war, as was admitted by Mr. Graham Towers, who said that Canada's gold saved Canada's bacon in the first year of the war.

We talk about divorcing ourselves from managed currency and having the printed dollar. If I thought it would work, I would advocate it.

Mr. BLACKMORE: Is it working in Canada? There is not a dollar of gold behind our money.

Mr. ADAMSON: We have no international payments at the present time. I have experienced personally the results of the printing press and because of this bitter experience I am speaking in this house to-night.

Mr. KUHL: The printing presses ran wild in the countries you are speaking of.

Mr. ADAMSON: I have seen the printing press start off quietly with just a little inflation. I saw this happen in Brazil. It did not run wild. It happened first with regard to the sale of some securities to build a railway. They found it was easy, and they liked it. It started off quietly, but then in a little while the milreis dropped from thirty-two cents to about six cents and no government could stop its descent. Unemployment became a serious problem and poverty, strikes and eventually a revolution followed the resort to the printing press. I saw that; I experienced it, and it is because I saw it happen in a rich country like Brazil, a country full of natural resources, that I am speaking here to-night. It is one of the most dangerous philosophies that we could accept here in Canada.

Mr. KUHL: There is such a thing as the right amount.

Mr. ADAMSON: They thought they were going to have the right amount. Everybody thinks they are going to get the right amount, but I have yet to know of a case where they stopped at the right point.

Mr. JAQUES: Well, you could not fight a war on that principle; at any rate you could not win a war on it.

Mr. ADAMSON: I have brought this up, as I said before, because this debate has taken a turn toward finance. As an engineer I have seen what happens to my profession; I have seen what happens to construction, housing and the like when the people of the country lose faith in the currency of their country; and they will lose faith again just as soon as we begin to print money without security. Bad money drives out good.

Mr. KUHL: You see what happened under deflation.

Mr. ADAMSON: That is the issue which faces us to-day. In considering all these plans, excellent though most of them are, we must remember that our future depends upon the development of the natural resources of this country and the increase of our trade. We cannot live by any specious theory of finance. That was not the way by which the pioneers of Canada built up this country; and we are to-day, because of the peculiar idea that we can live on the state, headed either for state socialism or chaos.

Mr. HARRY R. JACKMAN (Rosedale): Mr. Speaker, in rising to support the bill by which the Department of Reconstruction will be set up, I cannot be certain, nor do I suppose any hon. member can be absolutely certain whether it will have any great usefulness. It may result in merely a fact-collection agency; and its usefulness or otherwise cannot be foretold in advance of the events which will follow upon victory in this war.

Nevertheless, this Department of Reconstruction may perform a useful purpose, and with that possibility in view I am glad to support it and to advance certain suggestions to which I think the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) might give consideration.

It may well be that when victory is assured to us we shall find that our job will not be to provide work for people; on the other hand it may be a job for the government to put a damper on an incipient boom. We have, stored up in the hands of the people, a tremendous amount of savings, much of which cannot be spent at the present time because there are not civilian goods on which to spend them, and we shall see what will be the result, when the war is over, of this great unleashed amount of money which is available for consumer goods. It is, however, well to be in readiness in case there is unemployment and it is necessary to stimulate production and consumption in this country, and it may, therefore, be that the Department of Reconstruction will have a useful and important purpose to serve. In any event, the readjustment and rehabilitation will not be automatic, even if the natural demand for workers is sufficient to absorb all those who are willing to offer their services in the industrial and agricultural and mining fields of this country. However, that natural demand, if it is sufficiently great to absorb them all, is not likely to be facilitated or expedited by the setting up of this department. There is bound to be a time lag between the rehabilitation and the demobilization of the men and women from our forces and from our industries before they are placed in civilian goods industries.

As I understand it, it is not the policy of the present government to create jobs, either through public works or other expenditures of public moneys, if the natural working of the economic system is sufficient to give our people employment. One does not know whether the ministry of reconstruction will become a mere repository and exchange of information having to do with jobs, or whether it may have a general overriding power over other departments of the government which are specifically charged with carrying on certain projects. It will undoubtedly face a delicate position, because it will have a great deal to do, if it does have any function to perform at all, with other departments of the government and also with departments of provincial governments.

For example, the Department of Reconstruction would undoubtedly know about the amount of money and the amount of manpower involved in government projects of one kind or another. It would also likely know of the amount of money and manpower involved in the major private undertakings throughout the country. But I do not see how it could possibly know of the millions of private projects which will be undertaken by our citizens, whether they be the building of homes or the purchase of durable articles. That information, which is of the greatest importance, cannot be known or even estimated with any reasonable degree of accuracy by a department of reconstruction, and to some extent, perhaps to a very large extent, that deficiency will vitiate the work of the department itself. How is the department to know how individuals are going to spend their money? Will they spend it on homes or on autos, on taking out a new insurance policy or on a vacation, or will they, because of lack of confidence in the immediate future after the war, decide to hold whatever cash or victory bonds they have and refuse to spend their savings and thus take that money out of circulation?

What I should like to emphasize particularly is that the government should indicate what is to be the driving or motivating force in our workaday life in the post-war period, what is to be the machinery which, as they say makes the clock tick. Are we to have government direction and regimentation, being told what to do and unwilling to do more than our assigned tasks because there is no reward or incentive to do more than the minimum? Or are we to operate as free men under rules and regulations which are imposed by the government but which will guarantee opportunity and fairness to all our people? The answer to that problem strikes at the great question which confronts us all, as to whether we are to have a socialist state in Canada, or whether we shall operate under the system of free enterprise and individual initiative.

To-day the market is provided by the government for all our agricultural and industrial production. The government pays the whole bill and provides the incentive through paying whatever is necessary to produce the goods. There is little regard to cost, as we see by the evidence in the war expenditures committee, where some shipyards produce a 10,000-ton freighter at one price and others at a higher price. The important thing in fighting a war is to get production. Costs mean little and profits or earnings less. You must produce the goods in order to win the war, and whatever consequences fall in the wake of that must be considered in the later period and not while the fighting is going on.

Fortunately, the financial and economic system has been strong enough to stand the strain to date, and although we live and learn, speaking in terms perhaps of years, we do not know how much longer the system can stand the strain which is at present imposed upon it with the steadily mounting debt and the charges and other regulations attendant thereon. If we do not have a regimented, totalitarian state, then we shall have a free economy where every man will be his own master, able to choose the vocation or job which he wishes. May I point out particularly to the house that the greatest stumbling block to a return to the system of free economy is the present taxation and fiscal policy of the country. No better means could have been devised to bring about a socialist state than the present taxation policies of Canada, and if they are continued there is no question that free enterprise and initiative will expire.

At the outbreak of the war, taxation was used as the instrument to stifle civilian production, which was literally choked off. Certainly there should not be an increase in civilian production brought to the market to any greater extent than will enable our people to live in a reasonable degree of comfort. Certainly there should be no increase in standards. Wages were stabilized in civilian industries but certainly not in war plants, where workers were doing jobs at higher rates and war plants were attracting workers from ordinary fields of industry. We have only to look at the aircraft industry to find a typical example of the process. That was all to the good. But the reverse situation will obtain in the post-war period. No longer do we want to strangle civilian production. On the contrary, we want to cancel all war production and to turn all our man-power to production for civilian use. We shall turn from production to kill to production to live. It is, therefore, logical that we should reverse the process which we adopted at the outbreak of the war whereby we raised taxes to prohibitive levels, particularly on business, and to a large extent on individuals also.

Unless that is done, initiative and the motivating force which we have always had in a system of free economy will be lost to us and we shall lose that freedom which so many of us prize. At the present time the minimum tax on business is forty per cent; if that business earns more than the average earnings during the 1936-1939 period, the tax is 100 per cent; then whatever is left after that may be distributed to the shareholders, and they are taxed in their particular brackets at anywhere from thirty per cent to ninety-eight per cent. So that it does not take more than simple arithmetic to realize that there is no possible incentive for one to engage in business or to expand, or even for an individual who is not in business or corporation brackets to earn more money, because the brackets are so high that it is not worth the extra effort.

We find that not only in the upper brackets, whether they are connected with the war effort or not, is it no longer profitable to do this, but workers in the factories do not find it profitable to work the sixth day because that puts them in the higher brackets for the whole week's wages and there is so little left of the sixth day's wages that it is not worth while working. The consequence is that the nation loses production, and the Department of National Revenue loses what it might otherwise have obtained had the taxation been more reasonable.

It may be that such a system is necessary—I will not say that it is, but this is not the place to debate the question—during a period of war, but certainly during peace time and during the great conversion period after the war we must not have such conditions obtaining. There is nothing more important for the Prime Minister to announce than the government's intention with regard to post-war taxation; for the power to tax is the power to destroy, and that is what is happening as far as civilian production, particularly new production, is concerned. And rightly so, at the present time, because we have a war to carry on and we do not want more goods for civilian use. But companies as well as individuals must know whether they will be compensated for the risk they have to undertake and the enterprise and management they must contribute in the post-war period, and particularly is this so of new businesses.

[Mr. Jackman.]

Some government officials have left the impression that it would be their recommendation that taxes after the war should be substantially reduced. We are all aware that the treasury will need revenue in the post-war period, but it would be foolish to kill the goose that lays the golden eggs. People must know where they stand in the matter of taxation. While the question is important to all, it is of the greatest importance to those who are engaged in business to provide leadership through which jobs are created. Canadian citizens not government departments are going to do the major planning in this country, and it is time to think now of the deciding factor of post-war taxation; otherwise there is no use in having government commissions and boards and other public bodies set up to decide how much work can be created, how many jobs can be provided, how much capital expansion there may be. What we need is a clear chart so that business will know whether it can undertake new things and whether there is sufficient incentive for them, because unless there is some compensation for the risk involved there is not likely to be much go ahead; the green light is not likely to come on as far as business is concerned.

It is not necessary to bring to the attention of the house this fact, that not only does a nation perish without vision but that without leadership the nation is lost. We must, therefore, provide a chart whereby leaders in business and industry can guide their future plans, and a fair and equitable taxation policy applicable to the post-war period should be announced immediately. Let us know what our ascertainable post-war expenditures are likely to be. Let us know the over-all picture of social welfare costs. Inasmuch as it is in our power to provide it, let us give the people what they want and what they need. But it is also our duty to tell them what the cost is and how that cost is to be borne by our people. Reconstruction means reemployment and job creation. That is what the people want, not doles and hand-outs, even if it is their own money. Let us provide a fair day's wage for a fair day's work. Public ownership may well be desirable in some instances, but where there is room for competition and development let not the government become a limiting monopoly. For example, in the air transport field we find the present government excluding any likely competition even when the whole world is our oyster and there is plenty of room for not only the government line but for a number of competitors in what is likely to prove one of the greatest and fastest expanding fields of transportation.

Has this government for one moment considered what the effect already is on young Canadians with competing air transport companies? Are they likely to continue to engage in air transportation in Canada with the devitalizing hand of a limiting monopoly apparently to be laid on this great industry of promise? Is it any wonder that the brightest of our young men, those who would provide leadership in the field, are already being attracted to the United States where there are no less than half a dozen companies engaged in international transportation? If we are to have a real reconstruction policy in this country, let us not adopt halfway measures and for want of political courage fall between the two stools of national socialism and free enterprise, If we are to have an incentive and not just to obey orders, let this government announce its post-war taxation policy; for how can business which creates jobs be bold and forward-looking if it does not know the environment in which it is to operate? With the war providing a sure market for the proceeds of industry and agriculture there has been little business risk The taxation policy may have been rigorous but not unsound in principle. After victory, with production to satisfy the needs and desires of millions of our people, with all its attendant risk and the necessity of finding markets, let the government proclaim a fair system of post-war taxation for all, so that consumers will have money to buy and producers some incentive to go ahead and take the risk and produce.

If the government is interested in reconstruction as are all our people, and particularly those of the armed forces and in war industries let it announce without delay the conditions under which business will be called upon in the post-war period to carry on.

Mr. W. J. WARD (Dauphin): I am sure that the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) has reason to have a feeling of satisfaction at the general acceptance of this bill by the house. I should not have taken part in the debate at this time had it not been for some remarks made by the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell). Fearing that I might be called to order if I attempted to deal with his remarks when the bill comes before the house I take this occasion to reply to my hon. friend.

Not only is the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar running true to form in his actions on this measure but also in the actions of those who surround him when they speak on matters of which they have no knowledge. The general social programme that was inaugurated by the Liberal party many years ago had its beginning long years before there were any Cooperative Commonwealth Federation members in this house. And this includes such measures as old age pensions, with which the hon. member attempted to deal. I wish to refer to old age pensions particularly. Hon. members in that corner of the house have frequently taken unto themselves the entire credit for having instituted and, as they frequently put it, forced old age pensions through this house and upon the leaders of of that day. As a matter of fact, they had as much to do with the formulation and passage of old age pensions as had the mummies of Egypt.

I am sorry that the hon. member for Comox-Alberni (Mr. Neill) is not in his place at the moment, because for the first time that I can recall they have given him credit for having had some part in bringing about the passage of old age pensions. That is quite true, but the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar was overgenerous that evening. However, what is the history of old age pensions? I distinctly recall the seven members—I have the names here—who met in a room on the fifth floor in the latter stages of the session of 1922. Who were the seven members? They were as follows: George G. Coote, the then member for Macleod; T. W. Bird, the then member for Nelson; Henry E. Spencer, the then member for Battle River; Miss Agnes C. MacPhail, the then member for Southeast Grey; E. J. Garland, the then member for Bow River; J. S. Woodsworth, the then member for Winnipeg North Centre and W. J. Ward. These were the seven members who met in that room. Neither the then member for Winnipeg North, nor the hon. member for Comox-Alberni were present. As time went by, our organization gathered momentum; by 1923 we had gathered around us usually from twenty to twenty-five members who would meet with us, and by 1925 there were anywhere from forty to fifty members who met frequently to deal with old age pensions. And who were the forty or fifty members? Well, regularly there was a member of the Conservative party, the then member for New Westminster, and we always had a considerable number of Liberal members, but mainly they were Progressive.

The hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar referred to a letter which was written in 1926 to our present Prime Minister and to the Right Hon. Arthur Meighen, who was leading the opposition. The letter was in the form of an offer of support. The hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar would lead the house and the country to believe that that letter came from the then member for Winnipeg North Centre, the then member for Winnipeg North and the hon. member for Comox-Alberni, which was entirely untrue. The members of the Labour party of that day were nothing more than a mere incident. Old age pensions had no particular force in so far as the two Labour members who were in the house at that time were concerned. It was the Progressive members, supported by two or three Conservative members and a number of Liberal members, but mainly Progressive members, who made old age pensions possible.

I wish to remind the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar when he speaks of the amount of $20 a month not being sufficient, that that was the amount agreed upon by Mr. Woodsworth, Mr. Heaps and all the other members at that time. Seventy years of age and $20 a month was all that was asked for. Therefore I think it is well that we put the record straight and that the country should know who was responsible for placing old age pensions on the statute books of this country.

I should also like to refer to some of the remarks made by the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar in reply to the hon. member for Essex East (Mr. Martin). Surely the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar—and he is nobody's fool—must have known the facts, or was he deliberately attempting to mislead the country, talking with tongue in his cheek.

Mr. GILLIS: I rise to a point of order. The hon. member is imputing motives when he charges the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell) with making false statements to the house. I ask for a withdrawal.

Mr. WARD: My answer to the hon. member is that the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar said in his remarks the other night—and he was not called to order as follows:

> I wish to say this, that to-night after twenty-five years most of those promises, as far as social legislation is concerned, remain unfulfilled.

That is untrue. No one called the hon. member to order when he made use of what was an unfair and untruthful statement.

Mr. GILLIS: I am asking for a withdrawal of the statement that the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar was talking with his tongue in his cheek. That is imputing motives. And I ask the hon. member to withdraw the statement that the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar was misleading the house.

Mr. GRANT: Where would he keep his tongue?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): What is wrong with that?

Mr. GILLIS: I am asking you for your decision, Mr. Speaker.

[Mr. Ward.]

Mr. WARD: I did not intend to impute motives. My intention was only to have the facts straight. Let us keep the record straight. The hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar has been in politics for quite a long time and has been a student of economics. I have no doubt he has studied the programme of the government of this country for a considerable time, and I think he knew when he made that statement that it was an unfair if not an untrue statement.

After all, we are living in a country to-day which is second to none in the world, so far as social progress is concerned. We are living in a country where the wage level is the second highest in the world. We are living in a country where our economic standard is perhaps as high as that of any other country.

Mr. BLACKMORE: Heaven help the other countries!

Mr. WARD: I read in a newspaper account of a statement made by the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar before a rally in the Masonic hall only the other night, at which time he indicated his disgust with respect to cartoons appearing in the press. He pointed out that those cartoons pictured boys in foxholes in Italy who were hoping and praying that Canada would remain the same country they had left. I never was in Italy, but from what we can learn about it—and especially since war broke out—it must be a terrible place, as compared with Canada. The world does make progress, on a basis of comparison; and I can well imagine that, on that basis, those boys would hope to God that they would come to the same Canada they had left.

I think many of those soldiers, too, would hope to come back to a free Canada, one where free enterprise is here, waiting for them. I could not help feeling when I read this press report of the hon. member's statement that he is not fair to Canada or to the Canadian people.

We do not have to cross the world, away to the other side, to find intelligence. I know our Prime Minister—and I can say this truthfully—is one of the greatest humanitarians in the world to-day. That is borne out by every thoughtful person in Canada. I think it can be declared that he has done as much in a humanitarian way for the downtrodden people of this country as any man has done for his people in any other country of the world. I do not think we are fair with ourselves, with our country or with our government when we continue, as do our friends in the C.C.F., to belittle our country, blacken it in every possible way, and discount the motives of all others. It would seem that nobody is honest but the C.C.F. I can visualize what would happen if they ever took office, and discovered that a country cannot be governed on a basis of destruction and irresponsibility. That is all we got from the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar the other night when he spoke about social matters, old age pensions included.

I have spoken only to put the record straight, and I hope that never again shall we hear that sort of twaddle. I got a letter the other day from the president of an old age pensioners' association in Manitoba, and he used the very same words. Perhaps he learned them from the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar. He used the very same words in his letter to me, going so far as to say that the late Mr. Woodsworth and Mr. Heaps had forced the hand of our Prime Minister in 1926, and that if it had not been for those two members there never would have been an Old Age Pensions Act on the statute books of Canada.

Mr. GILLIS: He knew history.

Mr. WARD: It is quite evident that the hon. member who interrupts knows very little about the history of old age pensions.

Mr. GILLIS: Some time I shall take time off to tell you what I do know.

Mr. WARD: However, I do not wish to get into a controversy with the hon. member. I appreciate this opportunity, Mr. Speaker, to put the record straight.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and the house went into committee thereon, Mr. Golding in the chair.

Section 1 agreed to.

On section 2—Definitions.

Mr. STIRLING: Would the Prime Minister give an explanation with respect to paragraph (e)? It states that reconstruction means the reestablishment in civil life, "and includes every undertaking by dominion, provincial or municipal authority", and so on. Would he explain the relationship which will result from the operation of this department in connection with provincial authority?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: The definition of the word "reconstruction" is made very broad, intentionally, in order that it may cover all forms of reconstruction, including reconstruction taking place in any part of Canada and by any public body.

So far as possible, the Department of Reconstruction will seek to take a comprehensive view of reconstruction, as it is being carried on throughout the country, by federal, provincial and municipal bodies. It will seek to do so, by means of conferences with these bodies, either individually or collectively, as was suggested the other night by the leader of the opposition. It might act in connection with a conference called ad hoc, for the purpose or by a continuing conference. But the object would be to prevent overlapping, and at the same time to avoid gaps and omissions and, so far as possible, promote a consistent national effort toward full employment in Canada.

Mr. GILLIS: I should like further explanation respecting paragraph (e). I notice the merchant marine is not included. It states that reconstruction means the reestablishment in civil life and reemployment on demobilization of the men and women of the armed services, of persons released from war industries, and so on. I think the merchant marine should have been included.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: My hon. friend will realize that there is no intention to omit the merchant marine. They can be viewed as being part of the scheme, since they are serving in the forces having to do with the war. The definition of reconstruction is, I think, broad enough to take in any form of activity that is known, provided it is constructive in character.

Mr. GILLIS: That may be all right, provided the Prime Minister is interpreting the clause, but it will be interpreted by many people. An amendment to the bill setting up the Department of Veterans' Affairs was needed to include the merchant marine. I have no doubt as to the intention.

Mr. HOWE: The merchant marine will not be demobilized.

Mr. GILLIS: Nor will workers in war industry, and they are included under this clause.

Mr. HOWE: Some of them will be.

Mr. GILLIS: The merchant marine definitely will be.

Mr. HOWE: The merchant marine will be larger.

Mr. GILLIS: Than it is now?

Mr. HOWE: Oh, yes.

Mr. BLACKMORE: As we consider this paragraph I think it would be a good thing to make sure that we all realize, as I think the Prime Minister does, that it involves, first, that there shall be a maximum domestic market in Canada for all the goods which will be produced in Canada or for all the goods for which our products may be exchanged. I think the Prime Minister will agree that that is a fundamental premise. There must be a maximum domestic market in Canada for all the goods produced in Canada and for the goods for which the surplus goods of Canada can be exchanged. In other words, the purchasing power in the hands of the people of Canada must be raised to a level at which they will be able to consume Canadian production to the fullest extent of their needs. That will be involved in this paragraph and I want to make sure the Prime Minister appreciates that fact. If our primary and secondary industries are to be able to carry on to the maximum of their efficiency there must be a level of purchasing power among Canadian consumers which will enable them to consume to the ultimate extent the production of Canadian industry, both primary and secondary. That is involved in this paragraph.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Full employment would mean as much in the way of employment as it is possible to achieve, but it does not necessarily mean the guarantee of employment to everyone at every hour of the day. We must not fail to take into account such matters as seasonal unemployment and the like. But it does refer to what we generally consider as mass employment, the employment of large numbers. The aim of reconstruction will be to strive to achieve the fullest possible employment from domestic and foreign trade or commerce. I do not know if I have caught the purpose of my hon. friend's question, but I am trying to answer it.

Mr. BLACKMORE: The Prime Minister's words would indicate that he has, but I am not entirely sure that he appreciates to the full the meaning of what I said. This involves that all consumers in Canada shall be able to buy to the limit of their needs the goods which Canadian industry will be able to produce. If these words really mean what they should, that will be involved. That means that the standard of wages in Canada will be such that we shall not have a large percentage of Canadian wage earners getting less than $500 a year. That will be a condition not to be tolerated in Canada.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: My hon. friend understands that there is a difference between an objective and a guarantee. The objective is set forth here quite clearly, but I would not say that any government measure could go so far as to guarantee to individuals what their purchasing power is to be from day to day. The objective we are seeking is to enable all classes to have a minimum standard of living. That is the government's policy with respect to reconstruction, not confining reconstruction merely to the producing of commodities and the sale of goods, but extending it to the social and economic needs of the people, and to meeting economic hazards.

Mr. BLACKMORE: I think that is fair enough. I am going to be a little more specific. If men are to have the greatest opportunity to work in the production of shoes, then the people of Canada must be in a position to buy the maximum number of shoes that they need. The same principle would apply to all the commodities Canada is able to produce. If the people are not able to buy shoes, then people certainly are not going to be employed in producing shoes. The same is true with respect to all industries in Canada.

This means that probably we are not going to depend upon the wages which industry at present feels able to pay; we are going to find means of supplementing wages and incomes. We may even go so far as to make use of a dividend in order to enable the people to consume. I have not said much about dividends, but probably it is about time that many members of this house began to contemplate them seriously. The family allowance is an example, although that is just a meagre, halting, hesitating little device; in the light of the potential productive capacity of Canada, it is almost contemptible. However, I think the Prime Minister deserves credit for taking a step along this line. I just wanted to make sure that the Prime Minister saw the possibilities that were involved. The paragraph reads:

> "reconstruction" means the reestablishment in civil life and reemployment on demobilization of the men and women of the armed services, of persons released from war industry, and the reorganization of industry, in order to provide maximum production. . . .

You cannot have a maximum production of cheese unless every person in Canada can eat all the cheese he needs. Nor can you have a maximum production of strawberries unless everybody in Canada can have all the strawberries he needs. You can say the same about the whole list of commodities. In drafting this statement the Prime Minister has gone a long way, provided that it can be worked out to mean just what the words should mean. This paragraph goes the full limit of social credit. I just wanted to make that clear, although I do not believe the Prime Minister had any such thing as that in mind. However, I hope he did and I thought it would be worth while to bring it up.

There is another point involved here and I want to make sure that the Prime Minister agrees with this. Not only must prices of wheat, milk, beef and other primary products have a floor, but the floor must be high enough to stimulate the maximum desired production of all those commodities in Canada. This does not mean that the increased price, we will say, of beef or milk or any other primary product must be paid by the consumer. In other words, there will be a subsidy perhaps, where necessary, paid to the primary producer which might raise the price of a bushel of wheat, for example, to $1.25, whereas the consumer would have to pay only seventy-five cents a bushel. This sounds strange to orthodox ears, but it is not strange to men who see visions of the possibilities of a new order. The device has already been used in Britain of paying to primary producers seventy-five cents a dozen for eggs and letting the consumers have the eggs for fifty cents a dozen. Under a new order the difference will not be paid through taxing the people or by borrowings from the people, but will be paid with money which will represent the production of the country and will be governed only by the extent of the production of the country.

I set out to point out that this really means that prices to primary consumers will be so high as to include not only the cost of production but a fair remuneration which will justify the primary producers in going forward with a generous production programme. I presume that the Prime Minister had that in mind.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: If I may refer first to the question asked by the hon. member for Cape Breton South as to whether the merchant marine is included, I was perfectly sure that it was included. If it had been twenty-five minutes past ten o'clock on Monday morning, instead of twenty-five minutes past ten o'clock on Friday night I would have caught my hon. friend's point at once. In the definition of "industry" my hon. friend will see that transportation is included. Paragraph (b) states:

(b) "industry" includes merchandising, manufacturing . . . transportation, . . .

And so forth. He will also see that the definition of "reconstruction" includes "maximum production and full employment during and following the change over from war-time production of industry to peace-time production". So that, reading the two together, my hon. friend will see that the merchant marine is included. I felt that it would be there in one form or another. There is extra emphasis given to what relates to the armed forces.

In answer to the hon. member for Lethbridge I do catch at times what I think is his meaning. Then it sort of fades out because I catch something else from what he is putting forward. As nearly as I can gather, he is concerned that this legislation aims at maximum employment, and I agree with him in that.

Mr. BLACKMORE: I am merely pointing out what it really involves. If the legislation is to attain actually and in fact what the wording of this paragraph implies, then a technique will be involved which will include the measures I have indicated. It will include a scientific adjustment of prices, a scientific adjustment of wages by wage bonuses, the distribution of consumers' purchasing power which will probably make the dividend advocated in Alberta look rather pale. I hope that all members on the treasury benches can get this idea without too much suffering on the part of the Canadian people, because it is the Canadian people who will suffer; it is not you men, not directly. I hope that you can get this idea before it is too late. You cannot be sure that you are going to be able to sell Canadian cheese abroad, but if you manage the economy of this country aright you can be sure that you will be able to sell in Canada all the cheese that all the Canadian people will eat. That is what is involved.

Mr. MITCHELL: What about wheat?

Mr. BLACKMORE: You can sell all the wheat in Canada that all the Canadian people can eat. The same rule applies to every commodity.

Mr. MITCHELL: You would have a great time eating all the wheat we produce.

Mr. BLACKMORE: I did not say that you would eat all the wheat. You will have a hard enough time getting this into your head if you take just what I say, and do not imagine things I did not say. That is one of the difficulties with a lot of men. They do not take what was said but take what they imagine was said. What is said is strong enough.

What I have to say, Mr. Chairman, is simply this, that if we take pains to see that the Canadian people have consumer purchasing power with which to absorb and use the products of our industry, both primary and secondary, at fair prices, we can be sure of that much. We cannot be sure of selling any given amount of our goods abroad. We want to sell as much as we can abroad without hurting anybody else, but we do want to make sure of this home market. I believe that th way in which this paragraph is worded implies all these things, but I am not at all sure that the draftsman of this bill had these things in mind.

Mr. ISNOR: Mr. Chairman, I have so far refrained from taking any part in the discussion of this bill because I felt that what I have to say could be very well said on this section. Because of the mention of casual labour by the Prime Minister I should like to draw to his attention and that of the government the position of the waterfront worker. In 1936 Canada brought into effect the national harbours board, which took in the eight national harbours throughout the dominion with an investment of something like $224,000,000 A large number of men are employed at the various ports as casual labour handling incoming and outgoing freight. On the Atlantic coast at both Halifax and Saint John these men work for something like four to five or six months a year on the waterfront and they have to depend for the rest of the year on what they earn during the period they are employed. I feel that if we are to take care of labour, it is that type of employment that we must provide for. The present Minister of Labour brought into effect last year a measure under which he organized a labour pool and guaranteed a certain number of men, roughly seven hundred, a floor wage at waterfront work during the full season. I am going to suggest to the government that the national harbours board consider taking over the complete handling of freight at all ports throughout Canada. It would give the national harbours board something definite to deal with. They deal with transportation, and the handling of incoming and outgoing freight is part of the transportation problem.

I am suggesting that, with the large investment which the government now have in national harbours throughout the dominion, they could very well take up this question of labour and guarantee the men an annual wage instead of three to six months' employment, so that the men may be on hand at all times and able to handle freight in the most expeditious manner. They might also extend their activities by buying proper equipment for handling freight in the various ports and thus add to the efficiency of the operations. I believe that the government would be well advised to take over, under the jurisdiction of the national harbours board, the work of the longshoremen, the checkers, the freight handlers and all skilled and unskilled labour on the waterfront. If a plan were inaugurated whereby this could be done it would lead to greater efficiency. I would further suggest a preference such as was brought into effect by the late Right Hon. W. S. Fielding. He allowed a ten per cent preference for freight coming through Canadian ports. I believe that the ten per cent preference should be again allowed in respect of all outgoing freight and at least five per cent for all incoming freight handled through Canadian ports. This would add to employment on the waterfronts; and I advocate, as a measure of fairness and justice to the men engaged there, that the government give serious consideration to setting a floor weekly wage for those who are now known as casual labour. I offer these as constructive suggestions.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: My hon. friend has anticipated what is implied in section 6, as giving power to the minister to enable him to perform the duties imposed upon him by the bill. I might mention paragraph (c). The minister may—

> . . . consult with representatives of primary producers, industry, science and labour upon any question connected with reconstruction.

The section also mentions the possibility of conferring with other parties. I believe that under that section the minister would take up immediately with the Minister of Transport what my hon. friend has suggested, and also confer with labour organizations on the matter to which he has referred. My colleague the Minister of Pensions and National Health has directed my attention to the clause which gives the minister power—

> . . . to coordinate the actions of other departments and agencies of the Government of Canada for the purpose of ensuring that the transition from a war-time to a peace-time economy shall be effected as quickly and as smoothly as possible.

There are apparently several clauses which have been drafted for the purpose of enabling just such steps to tbe considered by the minister as my hon. friend has suggested; and his suggestion is a helpful one.

Section agreed to.

On section 3—Establishment of department.

Mr. MacNICOL: I assume that the meaning of subsection 3, that such employees as are necessary may be appointed in the manner authorized by law, means, through the civil service commission?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: That is correct.

Section agreed to.

On section 4—Duties of the minister.

Mr. STIRLING: Were it not for the last six words of this section I should look upon this measure as one which provided for the coordination of plans only. But "provide for the carrying out thereof" may imply a good deal more than that. Would the Prime Minister say what he means by the six words?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Yes. My hon. friend has the correct interpretation. The duty of the minister will be not merely to see that plans are formulated, but to see that such plans as have been framed for the purpose of reconstruction are carried out. The minister will be a member of the cabinet. So far as the plans relate to those made by government departments, I assume he would proceed first of all by consulting his colleague of the department concerned. If that were not adequate to ensure the carrying out of the plans, he would bring the matter up in cabinet, and the cabinet itself would exercise its collective authority to see that the right steps were taken.

Mr. STIRLING: What would be the relation between this new department and the other departments of government? For instance, the Department of Public Works deals principally with construction. After these years of war, when money has been spent for little other than war purposes, there certainly will be extensions of public buildings, for instance, to mention one thing. I can imagine that the Minister of Public Works might have fairly strong opinions as to what programme should be laid before council and what should be undertaken. Would that programme have to be submitted to the Minister of Reconstruction for his approval before it goes forward to the council?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I assume the first step the Minister of Reconstruction would take would be to get in touch with every department of government which is undertaking any form of reconstruction work. He would assemble their various projects; he would see, first of all, if there were any overlapping in government departments, whether there was a symmetry about the whole. Any question which was likely to arise, he would take up, in the first instance, with the minister of the department concerned. If there were a difference between them he would bring that matter to the cabinet to be settled there. That would be the method of proceeding.

Mr. GILLIS: The parliamentary committee on reconstruction made two reports to the house and certain specific recommendations of projects across the country. Will these reports be considered by the new minister?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Undoubtedly, yes.

Mr. GILLIS: Are the recommendations in the reconstruction committee's report to the house to have any weight, or has the new ministry the authority either to implement or reject them as it sees fit?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I am sure the minister will welcome, above everything else, any recommendation which comes to him from a committee of parliament. I have no doubt the minister would be the first to recognize that the work which has been done by the committee on reconstruction is just the kind of foundation he requires to begin his work effectively. If it came to a question of whether or not a recommendation should be accepted, someone has to make the final decision. I would say that the minister would be the person who would decide, unless it was some question which should come up to the cabinet as a whole.

Mr. ADAMSON: I think the hon. member for Cape Breton South is referring also to the subcommittee reports, the James committee and the Wallace committee, particularly the one on natural resources, which was, I think, an excellent report and should receive careful consideration.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Yes. I believe that, in speaking on the second reading, I took care to refer to these different reports, all of which are exceedingly valuable and practically all of which have been carefully studied already by government officials in the different departments and to a considerable extent by members of the government.

Mr. ESLING: Would the Prime Minister say how far the jurisdiction would extend in relation to the construction of buildings? Does it extend to the municipalities, or is the extent of a piece of construction governed by the cost?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: The question my hon. friend has asked is, I think, very much to the point. He has just mentioned the construction of buildings by municipalities, and reference has been made to the construction of buildings by the federal government. We may assume that there will also be construction of buildings by provincial governments. Part of the task of the minister—I do not mean actually the minister himself, but his deputies and the experts who are advising him—would be to collect all information possible on what has been done in the construction, for example, of public buildings. If it were found, say, in one community that the municipality intended to construct a building, the province a building, and the federal government a building, part of the duties of the minister would be to call attention to that fact and to say, "Can we not in some way see that these three buildings are not put up all at once? We may have a shortage of work later on and we had better reserve this project against such a contingency." That is only an illustration, but the minister's main job would be to apply common sense to the situation which all would be interested in meeting in the most satisfactory way.

Mr. ESLING: Does it apply to private enterprise or only to public buildings? You cannot construct a building, even a $2,000 building, in a municipality without having first secured a permit from the city clerk or the municipal authorities. Therefore the point is: Is the jurisdiction of the municipality subservient to that of the minister or to this section of the bill? It seems far-fetched surely that this federal government is going to the municipalities to say whether a man shall put up a building or not.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: My hon. friend has entirely misunderstood my view if that is the interpretation he puts upon what I have said. The municipality itself, I believe, would welcome all the information it could get with regard, for example, to public buildings to be constructed within its boundaries. The dominion will not invade the jurisdiction of a municipality; it will not invade the jurisdiction of the province. It will give all the assistance it possibly can both to the municipality and to the province with respect to the best way of maintaining employment in the community, not for to-day only but for a period of years.

Mr. ESLING: I do not care to be persistent, but I should like the Prime Minister to make this clear. Does the federal government invade the jurisdiction of the municipalities in the construction of buildings by private enterprise, or does this section refer only to public buildings? As it stands, it certainly means jurisdiction over the erection of buildings in municipalities, just exactly as it assumes jurisdiction to-day under the building controller. If it does not mean invasion of the jurisdiction of the municipalities, then I think it should certainly be made specific in this clause because one cannot interpret it in any other way.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I think the word "observation" would be better than the word "jurisdiction" or the term "invasion of jurisdiction." It will be part of the duties of the minister to observe widely what is taking place, but not to seek to enforce jurisdiction on any one. Perhaps what my hon. friend has mostly in mind is this: Is this an effort to have the government do things which private enterprise ought to do? If that is the point, the government would prefer to have private enterprise do whatever it can in the first instance, and it will encourage enterprise as much as possible. But where private enterprise is clearly not able to provide the needed employment, the government ought to come in and assist in preventing unemployment.

Mr. ESLING: I hope I shall be forgiven for being persistent, but I should like to ask whether, in the construction of a block, let us say, it will be necessary to apply to the minister for a permit, or does he relieve himself of all that responsibility? To-day such an application is necessary under war conditions, under the building controller. The minister has before him an application from, let us say, the city of Nelson. Let us take a particular case in point. A man was required by the chief of the fire department or by the city authorities to remove a certain building which had been constructed a number of years before. All right. By so doing the city loses taxes on that building; it loses revenue from taxation. At the same time, the owner is saddled with about $250 annually of taxes on property from which he receives no revenue. He arranged with the two adjoining buildings to use the fire walls of each building. In order to secure supplies he tore down an old mining building to obtain the necessary steel beams and the necessary heavy timbers and joists, but he has to come to this department to secure a permit to reconstruct that building under such conditions. My simple question is: Under the terms of this section, must a private citizen in any municipality, large or small, come to the federal government or to the minister for a permit in order to proceed with the construction of a building?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: There is nothing in this section which imposes that obligation or establishes that jurisdiction. The condition to which the hon. member has referred is one arising out of the war. During the war it has become necessary for the federal government to give priority to war purposes over other civilian requirements when there is a limited supply of materials. But we hope that as soon as the war is over, the restrictions which have been imposed will be gradually removed and that we shall get back to a condition where there will be as little interference as possible with private initiative and enterprise.

Mr. ESLING: But this applies to post-war conditions and we must accept these clauses as the English language expresses them. It is not made clear whether one will have to apply to the federal government for a permit. If that is the case, why not make it clear?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: The condition to which my hon. friend refers is one that arises out of restrictions imposed for a specific purpose, namely, to meet situations that have developed during the war. There is nothing to be gained by putting in this statute a provision that these particular restrictions will be removed later on. They are imposed by virtue of the War Measures Act. I cannot say at the moment how soon these restrictions can be removed. It may be possible to remove some the day after the armistice; it may be necessary in some cases to wait a little time. But there is nothing in this section that creates any permanent restrictions.

Mr. STIRLING: Is not this the point? This bill does not empower the minister to forbid any piece of construction in a municipality?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: That is correct.

Section agreed to.

On section 5—Duties of the minister.

Mr. MacNICOL: I have a few questions with regard to paragraph (a). Reference is made to employment in industry. My first question is: Does this refer to employment of men and women in industrial plants engaged in some way in the production of munitions, or does it refer to men and women in private plants not in any way engaged in producing munitions as coming under the minister's duty to provide employment?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: As I read the section it first of all emphasizes the importance of the minister giving his attention to the members of the armed forces and those who are engaged in war industries. That is the purpose of the section.

Mr. MacNICOL: Does that apply to plants not engaged in war work?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: That particular section does not apply to them, but the general purpose of the minister would be to seek to further full employment in industry generally. To that extent it is part of the minister's business to get as much information as he can that will help towards that end.

Mr. MacNICOL: Paragraph (c) of section 5 reads:

to formulate plans for industrial development and conversion. . . .

In carrying out his duties would the minister be able to initiate programmes such as obtained in England prior to the beginning of the war when the British government by regulation insisted on the necessity of fifty per cent British content in any goods imported into England for exportation to Europe, or any goods made in England for exportation to Europe. Would the minister have anything to do with making a regulation like that?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I think that would be a matter of government policy as to the extent of assistance to be given to industry and the like. That would be a matter of policy to be settled by the government. The reference here is to formulating plans for industrial development and conversion. The emphasis is rather on the general policy of bringing forward different projects for new developments or civilian uses for war plants, with a view to having them carried out. There is nothing to prevent the minister from making a recommendation such as my hon. friend has mentioned, but the paragraph does not impose on the minister any obligation of the kind.

Mr. MacNICOL: That is a fair answer. The paragraph refers to formulating plans for industrial development. Would that enable the minister to surround himself with capable industrial advisers to inaugurate new lines of manufacturing by making a survey of what we now import with a view of ascertaining if some or all those lines could be manufactured in Canada?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Yes. I think the next section answers my hon. friend's question as to how he might go about it. The explanatory note refers to powers of the minister. The section reads:

The minister, to enable him to perform the duties imposed upon him by this act, may: . . .

And then paragraph (e) is as follows:

inaugurate conferences of representatives of primary producers, industry, science and labour as well as representatives of dominion, provincial and municipal authorities engaged or likely to engage in any reconstruction plan.

The minister can bring together any experts he believes will be helpful to him, whether they are individual experts or representatives of industry or officers of industrial establishments, and get their advice with relation to plans for industrial development.

Mr. MacNICOL: Under paragraph (c) would the minister have power to consider and perhaps order, as a means of giving vast employment, the initiating of works such as a canal around the Fort Vermilion rapids on the Peace river and again around the Fort Fitzgerald and Fort Smith rapids on the Slave river, since the elimination of those rapids would permit the free transportation of coal from Hudson Hope on the Peace river right down to Aklavik, and that Canadian coal could be used for the heating of the north country? Would he have the authority to initiate such works as that?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: My reply would be that undoubtedly the minister will welcome suggestions from all sources, and particularly from members of parliament, as to where it might be possible to further some national need or purpose by particular industrial or public works projects such as my hon. friend has mentioned. In the case mentioned by my hon. friend, if he were to speak to the minister himself, the minister would then, I assume, confer with the officials of the Department of Public Works, or the Department of Transport, or whatever departments are concerned, and would ask: "Has this project been considered? Here is a matter that ought to be looked into. If it is thought that that particular area is in need of development works, had we not better consider this among others?" I would not say that the minister would be able to get his way all the time, but certainly that would be one of the things which he would wish to bring to the attention of the departments concerned. In the light of the expenditures involved in the whole programme it might be necessary for the minister to weigh those different projects and come to the cabinet and say: "Here are so many. I would strongly recommend that we do a certain amount." He might not recommend the whole. The government policy as a whole would decide on how far it would be possible to go.

Mr. MacNICOL: I have in mind northern Alberta. I am not sure that the government of Alberta have assisted but I am sure they would. In northern Alberta there is a movement to develop the vast coal resources at Hudson Hope and to take them by water down the river. They could then come down as far as Peace River town with very little dredging in the river. The construction of the two canals I mentioned would permit them to take the coal right down to Aklavik at the mouth of the Mackenzie river where they certainly need coal and where coal now costs a tremendous sum of money, because it is taken from away to the south of Edmonton by rail up to Waterways and then on down from there another 1,661 miles. I certainly would strongly advise the new minister to consider that as a project. It would create a lot of work and help open up that great country.

QUESTIONS

(Questions answered orally are indicated by an asterisk.)

CIVIL SERVICE—ADDITIONAL SERVICES AND REMUNERATION

Mr. BLACKMORE:

1. Are there any permanent civil servants who have been paid, in addition to their regular salaries, for performing, together with their official work, additional duties assigned to them, (a) by reason of the organization of new war services; (b) as a result of the absence of other civil servants who have joined the army, navy and air force?

2. If so, what are their names and what additional remuneration was paid to each of these permanent civil servants?

3. Are there any such permanent civil servants who have not received additional payments, and who are they?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): I understand the hon. member for Lethbridge is willing to withdraw the last part of this question, and I should like to ask that the other two parts stand.

Mr. BLACKMORE: That is correct.

Part 3 withdrawn; parts 1 and 2 stand.

2. If so, when did they acquire it?

3. What was the name of the lawyer or firm of lawyers engaged?

4. How much did they receive in legal fees, agent's fees, transfer fees and registration fees?

Mr. LaFLECHE:

1. Under construction.

2. See answer to No. 1.

3. Friel & Friel, Higgins building, Moncton, New Brunswick.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre):

1 and 2. As the Department of Pensions and National Health has no record of Dr. G. A. Deveau, it is assumed that the questions refer to Dr. G. R. Deveau who is departmental medical representative and port physician at Arichat, N.S., and paid in accordance with schedule of fees.

* SECRET ORGANIZATION TO CREATE SEPARATE STATE IN QUEBEC AND PARTS OF ONTARIO

Mr. ROSE:

1. Is the Minister of Justice aware of the existence of a secret organization in Canada, plotting to create a separate corporatist state within the province of Quebec and parts of Ontario?

2. If so, what steps have been or are being taken to investigate such organization?

3. What is the name of such organization?

Mr. ST. LAURENT: Perhaps I might be allowed to deal with this question orally. As the first question is framed, the answer must necessarily be in the negative. As Minister of Justice I am certainly not aware of the existence of a secret organization in Canada plotting to create a separate corporatist state within the province of Quebec and parts of Ontario. As the other two questions are predicated upon there being an affirmative answer to the first, no answer would be possible.

Assuming that the hon. member is referring to some recent assertions or rumours, I may say that the Royal Canadian Mounted Police have always investigated with the utmost diligence all assertions or rumours as to the existence of any subversive organization anywhere in Canada, and they are continuing to do so. No evidence has been found of the existence of any organization plotting to create a separate corporatist state in Quebec or any other part of Canada.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): That is, by the Royal Canadian Mounted Police.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: Yes.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Mr. Speaker, with your permission, because of the statement made in the other place by an hon. member of that body holding a very high position in the public life of Canada, and the assertions which he there and then made, may I ask whether the minister is not of the opinion that a royal commission should be set up to investigate the whole problem and report to the people of Canada?

Mr. ST. LAURENT: The Minister of Justice is not of that opinion.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): That is the answer.

How many children are there in each province of Canada, (a) under six years of age; (b) between six and less than ten years old; (c) between ten and less than thirteen years old; (d) between thirteen and less than sixteen years old?

MANUFACTURE OF ALCOHOL AND SUGAR FROM SAWDUST

Mr. FRASER (Peterborough West):

1. Are there any plants in Canada engaged in making alcohol and sugar from sawdust?
2. If so, where are they located?
3. Are they in full production?
4. If not, when will they be in full production?
5. Are the plants owned by the government or under government control?

Mr. MICHAUD:

1. No.
2, 3, 4 and 5. Answered by No. 1.

QUESTIONS PASSED AS ORDERS FOR RETURNS

PERMITS FOR CONSTRUCTION OF GRAIN ELEVATORS AND STORAGE PLANTS

Mr. FERLAND:

1. Has the construction controller granted any permits for the construction of grain elevators and grain storage plants?
2. If so, (a) to what persons or companies; (b) in what localities; (c) at what dates?

SOLDIER SETTLEMENT—REQUESTS FOR CLEAR TITLES WITHOUT FURTHER PAYMENTS

Mr. FAIR:

1. From January 1, 1943, to May 31, 1944, how many requests from, (a) organizations; (b) individuals, have been received by the Prime Minister, the Minister of Mines and Resources, the director of soldier settlement and Veterans' Land Act, or any other department of the government, asking that veterans of great war one who now hold land under contract with the soldier settlement board be given clear titles without further payments?
2. During the same period, how many letters or other communications were received by the director or other departments of the government stating that if clear titles, as above requested, were granted, requests for refunds by those who have already paid up or are continuing to make payments, would be made?
3. What are the names and addresses of those from whom such letters and communications have been received?

GENERAL de GAULLE

INQUIRY AS TO VISIT TO CANADA

On the orders of the day:

Mr. GORDON GRAYDON (Leader of the Opposition): In view of the fact that General de Gaulle, head of the French Committee for National Liberation, is said to be expected in Washington between July 6 and July 14, can the Prime Minister inform the house whether or not any arrangements are under way for General de Gaulle to visit Canada while he is on this continent?

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): I would say to my hon. friend that thus far the government has no definite word as to whether or not General de Gaulle will be visiting the United States. As soon as word comes to that effect, if it does, the government will be prepared immediately to consider what invitation should be extended to General de Gaulle to visit Canada.

CANADIAN ARMY

INQUIRY AS TO CLOSING OF BRANDON TRAINING CENTRE AND ALLEGED DESTRUCTION OF EQUIPMENT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. E. MATTHEWS (Brandon): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Minister of National Defence. I might explain the question by saying that some four years ago there was a large training centre known as A-4 established at the city of Brandon. A short time ago that training centre was deemed by the department to be no longer necessary and it was absorbed by the larger camp at Shilo. I have heard no criticism at all of the closing of the camp, but I have heard from reliable, responsible and fair-minded men strong criticism on another point, and it is upon that that my question is based. I would ask the minister if there has been brought to his notice the fact that a large amount of surplus supplies at that depot, supplies that obviously would not be needed at Shilo, were taken out, piled up and destroyed by an axe and conveyed to the nuisance ground instead of being turned over to citizens who could have used it?—for much of it was good material. If the matter has been brought to the minister's notice, what steps are being taken in regard to it? If not will he be good enough to make inquiries into the circumstances?

Hon. J. L RALSTON (Minister of National Defence): I knew about A-4 being closed but I have not heard of the circumstances to which my hon. friend refers. I shall certainly see that inquiries are made forthwith, and whatever action is necessary will be taken.

SOLDIER SETTLEMENT

REFERENCE TO ARTICLE IN "THE LEGIONARY" FOR MAY, 1944—CLEAR TITLE TO LANDS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. ROBERT FAIR (Battle River): Mr. Speaker, I wish to ask a question of the Minister of Mines and Resources based on an article appearing in the Legionary for May, 1944, and written by Mr. Gordon Murchison, director of soldier settlement and the Veterans' Land Act. The concluding paragraph of the article reads as follows under the heading "No Change":

> In conclusion I am authorized to say that the proposal is not deemed to be in the public interest and, consequently, it is not being entertained by the government. Therefore, the best advice I can offer to the soldier settlers concerned is to get into step with those who manifestly prefer securing titles to their farms by complying with the terms of their agreements.

This statement, I might say, was in response to a demand, which has been made by several organizations as well as by the soldier settlers themselves, that clear title be granted to them without the making of further payments. My question is, was this statement which I have quoted made with the consent of the Minister of Mines and Resources?

Hon. T. A. CRERAR (Minister of Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, the question scarcely comes within the range of questions that may be asked on the orders of the day, but with the consent of the house I have no objection to giving a reply.

The statement referred to was made with the approval of myself, and it represented government policy. Since it was made a delegation of ex-soldiers of the great war waited upon several members of the government and made the request that all their debts be forgiven and that they be given clear title to their land. This request is at present receiving consideration.

Mr. GRAYDON: Favourable consideration?

Mr. FAIR: I have two supplementary questions to ask based on the minister's reply. Was the article published just prior to the dominion convention of the Canadian Legion at Vancouver for the express purpose of discrediting the Soldier Settlers' Association and blocking any action by the convention? My second question is, why was this statement not made in parliament by the minister instead of being sent to a magazine by a civil servant?

Mr. SPEAKER: These are questions that must be put upon the order paper.

RECONSTRUCTION

ESTABLISHMENT OF DEPARTMENT TO FORMULATE AND CARRY OUT RECONSTRUCTION PLANS

The house resumed from Friday, June 23, consideration in committee of bill No. 82, to establish a Department of Reconstruction—Mr. Mackenzie King—Mr. Bradette in the chair.

On section 5—Duties of the minister.

Mr. BRUCE: Mr. Chairman, section 5 of this bill to establish a Department of Reconstruction states that it shall be the duty of the minister, amongst other things, to formulate plans for housing and community planning and to provide for carrying out such plans. In my opinion there is no project for reconstruction which is more urgently needed and which will yield a richer harvest in the betterment of our people, than that of housing.

It is now ten years since a committee of which I was chairman, after several months' investigation on housing conditions in the city of Toronto, issued a report which will be found in the parliamentary library. I recall having spoken on this subject before the Canadan club, Ottawa, on November 28, 1936, when I had the honour of having the Prime Minister present, as he is to-day.

Incidentally, as a method of giving employment there is no other public work which will produce the same result. In a recent Maclean building report covering the first six months in each of the last nine years in the Toronto area, it was found that housing constituted over eighty per cent of all building construction. This was confirmed by the national employment commission under the chairmanship of the late Arthur B. Purvis, which made an exhaustive study of unemployment and recommended to the government a housing policy which was later the basis of a National Housing Act of 1938; also the home improvement plan which was passed in 1937. Under this plan the government guaranteed fifteen per cent of loans made by the banks, amounting to $50,000,000. As a result a great many of our citizens were able to make much needed repairs to their homes. It is interesting to note that in lending this large sum of money only about one per cent was lost. However, we have a larger problem still to deal with, that of at least one-third of our population who cannot afford to pay an economic rent; and it is for these that provision must be made as speedily as possible. Although the report of my committee disclosed slum conditions and overcrowding in Toronto in 1934 which no doubt could have been duplicated in many other cities, no remedial action was taken. In order to show that these conditions have grown steadily worse through the passing of the years I will quote from an article in News of last week, June 24:

> In a house assessed for $400 are 12 people; in another assessed at $900, 11 people. One assessed at $1,300 shelters three families; 13 people in all. A pair on Dundas street assessed at $500 and $800 have 11 people in each. The prize-winner is on Gerrard east. It is assessed at $900 and into it two families are crowded; 24 people.
> In the district surveyed 93 single-family houses shelter more than one family.

Since the last war Great Britain has built over four million houses, and it is estimated by Mr. Ernest Simon that about five million more will be needed in post-war England. Most of them will have to be let at rents which can be paid by the poorer half of the population, and therefore at uneconomic rents, the difference being made up by the government.

Catherine Bauer, an adviser of the United States Housing Authority, claims that one-third of all residential construction requires public assistance in some form. This is in accord with statements made at a recent housing conference at Toronto to the effect that twenty-five per cent of all urban families in Canada cannot afford $15 per month rent and that fifty per cent cannot afford over $25. According to Mr. Somerville, vice-president of Wartime Housing Limited, the income of over half of our population is only $1,000 a year or less, and in a very large proportion $600 or less.

It is an accepted fact that those in the low income group can afford to spend only one-fifth of their wages on housing, if provision is made for other necessities and health is not to be seriously affected. It is clear, therefore, that housing will have to be provided for this group, at a rate of from $10 to $17 per month, which, as you all know, cannot be done on an economic basis.

In the United States, where they have had under way for a number of years very large housing and slum clearance projects, it has been found that two-thirds of all housing done by private enterprise was for the highest income group. Only one-third of the new homes built were within the means of the family in the middle income group; and, except for a few shacks, the lowest income group have had no homes provided for them at all. This latter constitute about one-third of the population of the United States and, although I have no figures to substantiate it, I imagine the same would apply to Canada.

I am speaking not only of urban centres but rural as well, for it has been found that slum conditions are just as serious on the farms. The United States Housing Act embodies a plan for producing new housing at rents equivalent to those charged in the slums. This is accomplished by authorizing the federal government to perform two separate financial functions: that of banker and that of donor of annual rent subsidies.

As banker, the United States Housing Act lends to the local housing authority, by purchase of its bonds, up to ninety per cent of the capital cost of a project. After a project is completed, the United States Housing Act assumes its second financial function. It grants annual subsidies in an amount sufficient to cover the difference between the annual economic rent and the rent which low-income families can afford to pay.

Local housing authorities have been able to market bonds running up to the year 1985 and to sell these bonds at interest costs which average less than two per cent. The way has thus been paved for establishing the public housing programme of the post-war era on a basis of financing which will relieve the federal government almost wholly of the responsibility for providing the capital funds.

May I add that a public housing programme under the United States Housing Act conforms to the characteristics of an ideal public works programme. Moreover, public housing, of all types of public works, produces the greatest amount of employment at the smallest cost to the taxpayer. A dollar spent by the government to build roads, schools, or airports results directly in the production of one dollar's worth of industrial activity. A dollar spent by the federal government for housing subsidies, however, produces about forty dollars' worth of new construction.

May I express the hope that the Prime Minister and the Minister of Finance will study the United States plan which I described a moment ago, now in operation in the United States, and make a similar plan available for that unfortunate group of our citizens in the lowest income brackets.

The government has built thousands of wartime houses under a crown company called Wartime Housing Limited and I think, on the whole, this company has done a splendid job under the chairmanship of Mr. Joseph Piggott. I presume that all these houses will ultimately be placed under the authority of the crown assets company for disposal.

It is very important to know what disposition the government intends to make of these houses. While they have served a very necessary and useful purpose, may I point out that if they are to be disposed of so that they may be retained as permanent residences, then the government will be responsible for creating one of the largest slum areas in Canada.

These houses were erected hastily for temporary use to meet a pressing need. They were substandard on the day that they were thrown up for occupancy. May I express the hope that these houses will not be sold at a small fraction of their cost to speculators who may wish to perpetuate them as substandard homes, eventually producing slums.

I am informed that the total loans made by the government under the Dominion Housing Act amounted to $19,619,442. The loans made under part I of the National Housing Act up to March 31, 1944, amounted to $64,375,775. I was interested to learn that the net loss in the case of both these loans was only $2,147.04, a very creditable performance. The amount lent under the home improvement act of 1937 was about $50 million through the banks on the terms I indicated a moment ago. The Minister of Finance gave a very interesting speech on housing on May 11 last in which he said that the government expected to introduce another comprehensive measure of housing legislation. I hope that this measure will be brought down during the present session.

I note that under part 1 of the National Housing Act the interest rate to borrowers has been reduced to 4½ per cent and that the government advances twenty-five per cent of the amount of the loan at the rate of three per cent to the lending institutions, which means that the latter will receive five per cent on their seventy-five per cent share of the mortgage loan. I think the minister would be wise to extend the time of the loan for at least thirty years, and it should be safeguarded by requiring that the communities in which houses are to be located shall be protected by zoning or regional planning, as he has pointed out.

I am glad to know that the officials of the national housing administration will assist the municipalities in the preparation of plans. Mr. F. W. Nicolls, the director of housing, and his present limited staff are doing excellent work, but I suggest that their department should be very greatly extended in view of the heavy responsibility which they will have to meet very soon. However, it is the second part of the National Housing Act in which I am particularly interested, and under which up to the present no loan has been made until perhaps recently, the one to Mr. G. W. Spinney and his associates of Montreal, who came forward with a project of low-cost housing for that city. I wish to commend Mr. Spinney for his public spirited action and can only hope that someone with a similar urge may be found in Toronto and in other cities and towns throughout Canada to organize limited dividend housing corporations to build the large number of housing units which are immediately necessary for our people.

In view of what has been done in the United States in the building of these low-rental houses, I urge on the government that it carefully consider this plan and adopt it for Canada so that the interest rate of three per cent which was allowed for the Montreal plan may be reduced at least to two per cent.

The general impression prevails that private enterprise cannot produce low-rent dwellings, first, because of the high pay demanded by labour, and second because building materials cost too much owing to artificial price restrictions. If the wages paid labour employed on the site in construction of a housing project were cut in half, the annual cost of the housing produced would be reduced by only about ten per cent. If the cost of materials entering into the production of the housing were cut in half, the annual cost would be reduced by only about fifteen per cent. But a reduction in the financial charges, interest and amortization, by half would effect a greater reduction in annual cost than the cutting in half of the cost of both material and labour, and therefore I commend the latter method to the government.

The city of Toronto has had a planning board of experts under the chairmanship of Mr. A. G. Partridge, president of the Goodyear Tire and Rubber company, who have been working for some time on city planning, and they have recently issued a very illuminating second annual report. They are therefore in a position to take immediate advantage of a national post-war construction programme to be assisted by the federal government under terms which I hope will be as generous as those of the United States.

The Ontario government is in a position to cooperate with this plan in consequence of having recently set up a department of planning and development under a separate minister, Mr. Dana Porter. May I add that as housing is intimately connected with health, this department should more properly be placed under the Department of National Health. One third of our population would mean four million in the low income group, and to house these would require at least one million housing units. If these cost, say, $2,000 per unit, it would mean a loan of $2 billion. May I point out that this does not mean a gift of this amount of money, but only that it shall be made available as a loan at a low rate of interest to be recovered later on. There is no expenditure that will bring greater returns in health and happiness than housing.

Section agreed to.

Sections 6 to 8 inclusive agreed to.

On section 9—Orders and regulations.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I think the Prime Minister ought to give the committee a better idea of what is proposed to have done under the enabling sections with regard to regulations. He was not in the house the other day when I protested against power of legislation being vested in a minister under a bill which was to come under the Minister of Pensions and National Health (Mr. Mackenzie). I was chastised by the minister because—

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): It was the aeronautics bill.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I think it was under yours too.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): No. Mine was flawless.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I do not think so. The practice has grown up under all governments in recent years of legislating under the guise of regulations not only for purely administrative affairs but in executive matters and in others that apply to judicial functions, really establishing in the minister the power to set up policy—a principle that is comparable to what a celebrated Lord Chancellor in England characterized over twenty years ago as the new despotism. I think parliament ought to be jealous about delegating to the government the power to make orders in council on the recommendation of a minister, because usually these are matters of routine, I imagine, so far as the council itself is concerned, providing that the ministers may do thus or so in regard to matters which were never contemplated by the enabling statute. I am trying to state a principle in general terms and I think the Prime Minister will agree with me. Take this section 9 (a). Provision is made to transfer to the minister any powers or duties of a government department or agency whether conferred by statute or otherwise and to provide that such powers or duties shall be exercised or performed concurrently or otherwise by the minister. On its face that is a very innocent looking paragraph. Parliament delegates to one department of government the power to carry on certain functions; but here the powers which were delegated to it, particularly by parliament, are being switched or are capable of being switched by order in council to this new minister. What is contemplated by that? It must be put in there for a purpose. Its purpose does not appear on the face of it. What is envisioned by the authority to make a regulation of that kind?

I have no objection at all to paragraph (c) because on its face it relates purely to administration of the act itself. A government which is promoting a bill cannot think of every little administrative authority that ought to be put into it, and those are the things that can be best handled by order in council. So far as I can recall I have never made any protest against the delegation of powers of that kind. But paragraph (b) provides that the minister may set up one or more boards or advisory councils to exercise such functions in connection with the administration of this act as may be assigned to them by order or regulation. That is a new thought. We are delegating authority to a minister to do certain things, or to a department of government to do certain things, and in paragraph (b) we are giving authority to the minister, to whom parliament has already delegated powers or authority, to redelegate those powers or authority to some unknown board, governmental agency or department not envisioned by parliament by statute or otherwise. I should like to know what is contemplated by this. It seems to me it is carrying the power of delegation almost to the nth degree. The Prime Minister ought to justify the redelegation, if I may use that term, of such powers as are contemplated by paragraph (b) of section 9. The authority conferred by paragraphs (a) and (b) of section 9 are open to question at least. I am trying to be moderate in what I say about it. Until we have had some further explanation from the Prime Minister I do not think this ought to pass.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: First of all may I say I am sorry I was away when my hon. friend was chastised. Had I been here I would have done the best I could to save him any affliction.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): It did not do any harm; it left no scar.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Let me say at once that practically speaking I agree with him when he says it is desirable that there should be as little in the way of delegation of important powers as possible, and that it is important that powers should be set forth in the statute rather than given under order in council or by regulation. On the other hand, I think my hon. friend will agree that the business of government to-day has become such that unless there were delegation of power it would be altogether impossible to have it carried on. No minister could begin to discharge the duties that are assigned to him in a statute unless he were given some authority to delegate some of those duties and to bring to his assistance whatever he might need in the way of advisory boards and councils. In debating this matter the other day the leader of the opposition suggested that it would be well for the government to consider the advisability of having some kind of a permanent board set up by the minister which would have on it representatives of the different provinces, and, I think he also added, representatives of the municipalities.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): That was for the purpose of reconstruction.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Yes, and reconstruction is the subject of the bill with which we are dealing. The section my hon. friend is complaining of, if he is complaining, is the one that is intended to help meet a situation of the kind. Recently the premier of Ontario suggested that there should be a joint board of the dominion and the provinces for certain purposes. Well, that may be a very good suggestion, and it may be desirable to carry it out; but unless there were a clause in the statute which gave the minister the necessary authority to effect that end he would be unable to do so without the passing by parliament of another act. I can assure my hon. friend that this section is not intended to go any farther in the matter of conferring powers on ministers of the crown, or on deputy ministers or boards, than is absolutely essential for effective administration.

I would recall to my hon. friend a statute passed when, if I am not mistaken, he was a member of the ministry. It may have been before he was a member of the ministry, because it was in Sir Robert Borden's time. There was an act passed during that time to authorize the rearrangement and transfers of duties in the public service. That statute gives the power to a minister of the crown by order in council to transfer from one department of government to another department many of the duties assigned, in the first instance, to a particular department. As I read this section, particularly paragraph (a), it really goes no farther than that. The governor in council may make such order or regulation as may be deemed necessary or advisable to transfer to the minister any powers or duties of a government department or agency whether conferred by statute or otherwise and to provide that such powers or duties shall be exercised or performed concurrently or otherwise by the minister. That paragraph may have been unnecessary in view of the powers which are given by statute to authorize the rearrangement and transfer of duties in the public service.

Paragraph (b) reads:

> To establish one or more boards or advisory councils to exercise such functions in connection with the administration of this act as may be assigned to them by order or regulation.

That is desirable to enable the minister to get the best advice that he can obtain in dealing with the large questions that will come before him. For example, the minister may wish to have the advice of labour and of industry on a great many matters, just as is done to-day in connection with work of the Department of Labour, and beyond question this would give him that power.

On reflection I think that my hon. friend will see that there is nothing being done under this paragraph that will in any way widen existing authority.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): It is rather reassuring to have the Prime Minister make that statement. I thought that the statement of the general principle which I made would find response in his mind, because I recall on a good many occasions through the long period of time that I have been in the house that he himself has been in the very van in opposing the principle incorporated in this paragraph. It seems to me that it all depends on where you sit in this house as to whether a principle is good or bad. I can quite understand the government desiring to enlarge its powers irrespective of parliament for the purpose of convenience. I am not unimpressed by the statement of the Prime Minister that government is a very complex problem at the present time. Speaking generally I think that is the best argument he has. The government could not be running back to parliament every day or two for a new enabling act. The executive must have some authority to meet new situations. When I make that statement of fact I think the Prime Minister will agree that I am very fair-minded about this thing; but I had in mind that from time to time heretofore the government had been allocating departments, branches, bureaux or whatever they may be—I think "government department" is the term mostly used—from one portfolio to another. It has been doing that as long as I can remember, and I know the power existed long before I had any connection with parliament.

The Prime Minister has referred to a statute which is still unrepealed. I wonder if my right hon. friend opposed it at the time it was passed. It would be a matter of historical curiosity to find out what his attitude was in regard to it.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I am not sure I was in the house when it was passed, though I may have been if it was in the session of 1919-1920.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): That may be so. If my hon. friend was not here I venture to suggest that those who were here did not accept the principle without scrutiny and examination and a good deal of protest. Generally speaking this power ought to be limited purely to administration; I think we are both in agreement on that.

[Mr. Mackenzie King.]

I am not yet sure that the Prime Minister has made out a case for subsections (a) and (b). Certainly if subsection (b) means anything at all; if it is anything more than window dressing; if these boards or advisory councils are to have any authority, something more is required, because all they can possibly do under this section is give the minister advice, and he can get that advice without the power to set up a board. He can consult those who are in a position to give him advice on any of the points with respect to which it is suggested that power should be vested in these councils; in fact they have no powers at all, they are merely consultative bodies from which the minister may request advice. My colleague from Yale points out that this power already is conferred by subsection (d) of section 6, so that it would look as though there were redundancy. Section 6 (d) provides:

> The minister, to enable him to perform the duties imposed upon him by this act, may establish committees or boards and use existing organizations and agencies to assist him in carrying out the purposes of this act.

That would include the right of consultation; so that it would seem that the draftsman here had gone beyond what was required, or that something more is contemplated by section 9 (b) than has been intimated by the Prime Minister.

The Prime Minister did make a point with respect to the setting up of joint boards. Inasmuch as the jurisdiction relating to reconstruction is almost entirely a matter of property and civil rights, and therefore within the ambit of the powers of the provinces, I think it would be a good thing if the jurisdiction and constitutional rights of the provinces were recognized specifically in the bill. With all this talk about rehabilitation and reconstruction I am afraid we are going to see a multiplicity of boards and authorities and powers set up in the country, all having one good end in view, but with a tremendous overlapping of personnel and of cost to the taxpayer, whether provincially or federally, unless there is some coordinating authority. That, of course, is the distinguishing point of this bill; it is an attempt, and I think an honest attempt, to arrange for the coordination of these bodies that are to be set up. Every province will have its own ideas. Only the other day I read with a good deal of interest that the premier of Nova Scotia had given to the public a scheme of reconstruction and rehabilitation for that little province which would cost anywhere from $70,000,000 to $100,000,000. He expects the federal treasury to bear half the cost, and then he wields the big stick and says if they do not bear half the cost he is going to reenter the field of income taxation. I may not be quoting him accurately, but that was the impression left upon my mind. So that there is great need of a reorientation of the whole field, and certainly there is great need of joint operation, joint thought and joint action on the part of the dominion and the provinces.

I am sure the Prime Minister will agree that the constitutional field is within the provinces, and the dominion's only excuse for stepping in, I assume, is the fear that the provinces will not undertake or carry out the job in a satisfactory manner, perhaps for lack of funds. The dominion now has almost a monopoly of the whole taxation power, under arrangements made since this war started; the taxation field of the provinces has become extremely limited and narrowed. The dominion now is in a position to finance works for reconstruction and rehabilitation, but in provincial circles there is a strong feeling that the autonomy of the provinces ought to be respected. Nowhere, I think, is that feeling more prominent than in the old province of Quebec, where they have always been very jealous of their autonomy, and rightly so. There has been a constant encroachment upon their rights.

I do say to the Prime Minister that there is a good deal of padding and filling in section 9, that he has all the powers he needs without that. If he would limit it to subsection (c) I would not have a word to say; for I think it should be limited to matters of administration.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: In his opening remarks my hon. friend suggested that the way one viewed the power of delegation would depend upon where one sat. I do not quite agree with that; I think it depends a great deal upon the changed times and conditions. As my hon. friend well knows, the war has made it necessary to have a number of boards and to have powers delegated to an extent that no one would wish to see at any other time. I feel as strongly as my hon. friend does about the delegation of power. At the time Lord Hewart published his book on "The New Despotism" I thought it the best treatise of the kind that had been published up to that time, and I hold that view more or less at present. I do think it is unfortunate that there has to be this delegation of power ad infinitum, if not ad something else—

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Ad nauseam.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: At any rate the government could not be carried on to-day, with the questions that have to be met and dealt with, without some extension of the power of delegation. Undoubtedly delegation of authority will go on in the period of reconstruction, but I hope it may be reduced little by little.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Does the Prime Minister hold that opinion with respect to peace-time projects as strongly as he does with respect to the conduct of the war? I agree with him as to the latter, but not as to the former.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Certainly I do not. I was just saying that as we get away from the war and back to a peace economy, many of these powers and restrictions will gradually disappear. Some will have to be maintained, but the reasons for them will have to be made obvious.

In reference to this section, my hon. friend began by being critical, asserting it went too far. He concluded by saying it was not really necessary, that we had all the powers anyway. Perhaps it is as well for us to make perfectly sure there can be no misunderstanding.

Mr. HAZEN: Section 9 reads:

> The governor in council may make such order or regulation as may be deemed necessary or advisable—

Last week we considered a bill to establish a department of veterans' affairs, of which section 7 read as follows:

> Subject to the approval of the governor in council, the minister may make such regulations, from time to time, as he may deem necessary and advisable—

In this section the words are "such order or regulation" while in the other bill the words were, "such regulations." Is there any reason why the word "regulations" should be used in the one bill and the words "order or regulation" in the other? Is there any distinction between a regulation and "order" as used in this bill? In section 7 of the bill to establish a Department of Veterans' Affairs it was provided—I quote subsection 2:

> All regulations made hereunder approved by the governor in council shall be laid before parliament within fifteen days after they are made if parliament is then sitting, and if not, then within fifteen days after the commencement of the next ensuing session thereof.

There is no similar provision in the bill now before us. I suggest to the Prime Minister, and if necessary I so move, that a subsection similar to subsection 2 of section 7 of Bill No. 83 be added to the end of section 9 of this bill.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I have not the other bill before me, but listening to my hon. friend I would judge that as to the use of "order" or "resolution," it would appear to be entirely a matter of drafting and of what appears in the interpretation sections of both bills. Evidently in connection with the other bill, the house felt that for that particular department the drafting was proper, and I hope the committee will take a similar view of the drafting of this bill. It does not follow because two measures are not in identical terms that power is being given in the one which should not be given simply because like power does not appear in the other. Section 7 of this bill provides:

> The minister shall submit annually a report to parliament in such form as may be prescribed by the governor in council.

I would feel that what the governor in council would prescribe would be just the sort of thing my hon. friend says he feels should be inserted in the bill itself.

Mr. HAZEN: I hardly think that would include regulations.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I am very sure that any report on the Department of Reconstruction made to parliament by the minister would carry in it the fullest details in regard to all orders or regulations that had been made under the statute.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Section 9 contains no provision for making public the regulations. One of the difficulties facing the legal profession to-day is to know what the law is. I recently discussed this problem with a leading counsel and he said that because of the day to day changes in statutes by orders in council issued under the War Measures Act no one could tell a client with any degree of authority what was the law of Canada to-day in connection with a particular matter that had been the subject of amendment by order in council.

In this case no one will be able to ascertain or declare or advise unless some provision is made to make public these regulations. I wish the Prime Minister would give some consideration to that point. I do not think it is as important as it is in relation to some of the other measures that have been before the house, but there is a principle involved. It seems to me that in the public interest there should be some publication of these regulations and I suggest to the Prime Minister that he take this matter under consideration before the bill receives third reading. Perhaps this section could pass but the bill could be held over until he can consult with his advisers and devise some scheme whereby the regulations may be made public.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: As my hon. friend knows, my legal training and knowledge is not as up to date as it should be.

[Mr. Mackenzie King.]

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): It is not bad.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I can, however, assure my hon. friend that the highest legal authorities of the government have carefully considered this measure and have expressed the view that it is adequate in all particulars. I believe that what my hon. friend has just said about the necessity of publishing these regulations is met by an order in council already existing which requires the publication of regulations and orders which have the effect of law. It is called, if I remember aright, the statutory orders and regulations order. I think that would meet the situation my hon. friend has in mind.

Mrs. NIELSEN: Mr. Chairman, although I am a member of the reconstruction committee I have not made a speech of any length on this subject of reconstruction. I am in agreement with the setting up of this department. Section 9(b) provides for the setting up of boards or advisory councils to exercise such functions in connection with the administration of this act as may be assigned to them by order or regulation. It is in connection with this section that I should like to make one suggestion to the Prime Minister with which I believe he will be in general agreement.

We have had a great deal of discussion during the past while about the problem of giving employment to our people. I agree that a need exists in connection with the basic foundation of our whole life—that is, employment for our men and women so that they will have adequate wages and a chance to live decently. But I think in this connection the Prime Minister will also agree that we cannot neglect the other side. There is the well known quotation that man cannot live by bread alone. One thing which the Atlantic charter has promised to mankind generally is that in the new era which opens before us man shall not only live; he shall have life more abundantly.

We cannot leave the whole question of reconstruction without recognizing the cultural side of Canadian life. Just last week the committee on reconstruction had before it representatives of cultural groups in Canada who presented one of the most comprehensive briefs yet placed before that committee. They outlined the possibilities which lie before the people of Canada in this direction. Their brief contained two main premises. The first was that in our relationship with the rest of the world Canada needs to become cognizant of the fact that her cultural activities will be of assistance in maintaining friendly relations with other nations. Second, the cultural development of our people will help to give them that more abundant life which we believe can and must be theirs.

This group of artists, musicians and other representatives of cultural groups asked that a sum of money be set aside for these purposes. They were asking for only a small amount, merely $10,000,000, with which they hoped to start a planned system of what might be called adult education under which the natural talent and abilities of the Canadian people might be directed and encouraged by government supervision. They advised the setting up of community centres where there would be cultural and recreational activities, particularly in the rural areas where we have had such a dearth of culture.

There is in this proposal I believe the realization of how much can be done in the future toward binding together the peoples who make up Canada. There is the great cultural heritage of the province of Quebec, which is perhaps more typically Canadian than any other section of the country. Those people should be welded with the Anglo-Saxon, with the Ukrainian, with the Scandinavian, with the Polish, and with members of other minority groups. Not only would this give the Canadian people a new vision and a new outlook upon life itself; it would be a means of providing employment to many hundreds of people who possibly have no way by which they can give to this country of their natural talent and ability except through the channels of music or art or literature. Definitely I am of the opinion that a start should be made now, perhaps with the creation of a separate branch to deal with cultural relations and cultural matters. I believe that a beginning can be made at this time by the setting up under this section of a national arts board, so that the Minister of Reconstruction, whoever he may be, might have members of cultural groups in this country to advise him and give assistance in the various things which might be accomplished during an era of reconstruction.

Certainly when you think of the question of international trade you begin to realize that in competition with some of the other countries—the United States, for example, and Britain perhaps—we might suffer in this country from having other people take our designs and use them, and being themselves in a position to produce more cheaply than we could, thereby stealing our trade. Industry in Canada should be protected; and I feel that in the field of design there is a need for laws to protect Canadian artists and whatever they may be able to accomplish by way of industrial development. It would be very necessary I think to have a board to take care of matters of this kind.

I mentioned the other day in the committee, when this group was before us, that there may be some things attributable to the Chinese for which they are not responsible. But at all events I believe the Chinese have a saying which goes something like this: that if a poor man has two yen, it is wiser for his soul's sake that he spend only one yen to buy a loaf of bread and that with the other he buy a rose. I believe that in the hurried rush of the years the people of Canada have been intent upon the bread and have as yet paid little attention to the rose. Although some hon. members may think this unrealistic, I would definitely place before the Prime Minister the importance of realizing the vast possibilities of the Canadian people whose talents and abilities could be given expression to through cultural channels, and I should like to see set up under section 9 of this bill a national arts board, so that this aspect of reconstruction shall not be overlooked.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: There is just one matter I should like to bring to the attention of the Prime Minister; it is one which has been before the house on previous occasions and has to do with the question of the delegation of legislative powers to a minister of the crown.

The Prime Minister to-day pointed out that the reason for his change of opinion was that with time there had been a change of circumstances that made it necessary to confer on ministers of the crown legislative authority to make law, and in certain cases to make substantive law. I would point out to him that similar conditions exist in the United Kingdom. Actually the legislative field in the United Kingdom is much wider than that which this parliament has, and although the United Kingdom is legislating for a very much larger population than Canada's; it has not yet gone on an order in council spree to the extent that Canada has. The total number of orders in council and regulations made in the United Kingdom since the war began is not more than some 6,700, if my information is correct, while in Canada the number is approximately 43,000.

The hon. member for St. John-Albert has made out a good case for the addition to this bill of a provision which, while recognizing the necessity for a degree of delegation, nevertheless will retain in parliament control over the legislative powers delegated to the minister. A commendable step was taken by the Prime Minister some months ago when a suggestion of mine was accepted that an appendix or list be made up at the end of each session setting out the orders in council which had been passed. This has been of great assistance, not only to members of the judiciary and the legal profession, but to the citizens in general; because so many orders in council have been passed during the war interfering with the exercise of substantive rights that few lawyers were until recently in a position to advise with authority on the state of the law at any given time. The publication of this list or appendix has at least made available the sources of the new legislation, and as such has been helpful.

The hon. member for St. John-Albert suggested that there should be a provision, similar to that contained in a bill previously introduced, under which a report is to be made to parliament of the orders in council as passed. While he was speaking I sent out for the report of the committee on ministers' powers, presented by the Lord High Chancellor to the British parliament in April, 1932. That report supports the request of the hon. member for St. John-Albert and reinforces him in the stand that he has taken. On page 67 of this report, following the admission that the complexities of modern legislative authority make it necessary that there be a degree of delegation, particularly in matters of technical or special legislation, this distinguished royal commission says:

> There should be uniform procedure in regard to all regulations required to be laid before parliament, namely, that they should be open to annulment—not modification—by resolution of either house within twenty-eight days on which the house has sat, such annulment to be without prejudice to the validity of any action already taken under the regulation which is annulled.

Then it goes on to make this further recommendation. Recognizing the necessity for delegation of powers in order to cover eventualities that could not be contemplated by parliament, it says:

> Standing orders of both houses should require that a small standing committee should be set up in each house of parliament at the beginning of each session for the purpose of—
> (A) considering and reporting on every bill containing a proposal to confer law-making power on a minister:
> (B) considering and reporting on every regulation and rule made in the exercise of delegated legislative power, and laid before the house in pursuance of statutory requirement.

It further points out that a standing committee looking into these regulations would only report on the question whether any matter of principle was involved, whether there was any special feature of the regulation or rule meriting the attention of the house, and whether the regulation or rule should receive special consideration on the ground that it was exceptional in its legislative power and result. I realize that in war time we have gone a long way in delegating authority. We have not only delegated authority to ministers but have delegated wide authority to boards not directly responsible to parliament—indeed to such a dangerous extent that the actions of these boards, however illegal they may be, are not subject to examination by the courts. I am sure the Prime Minister will not contest what I say, because throughout the years, as I read Hansard of previous parliaments, he was the great protagonist of the retention by parliament, in parliament, of legislative authority.

Now that we can believe that peace will not be too long removed, we in parliament must again examine strictly all delegations of authority which are proposed to be effective in peace time. I submit that while recognizing the necessity of delegation to cover unusual circumstances or conditions which are bound to arise and cannot be foreseen, on all sides of the house there will be agreement that the exercise of delegated authority should be circumscribed in order to ensure that interference with private rights shall not take place without an opportunity being given to parliament to examine the regulations pertaining thereto, to the end that parliament may retain to the largest possible extent the legislative function.

This is not a controversial matter. If in all our statutes containing a delegation of authority it be provided that so far as such delegated legislative authority is concerned the terms of the pertinent orders in council be laid on the table of parliament, it would go a long way toward removing the present objection that few of us have the opportunity of knowing what is being done under the delegated authority conferred.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I agree with very much of what my hon. friend has said. I thank him for having expressed the view that I was a great protagonist for retaining in parliament the necessary legislative authority in these matters. May I say to him that I shall become more strongly than ever a protagonist of retaining as much power as possible in parliament once we get to a time that it is possible for parliament to cope with the many matters which come before it. Parliament at a time of war, could not cope with all the matters which require decision, and to a lesser degree, but still a very considerable degree, will require decision in a time of reconstruction. The power to delegate, in any event, has to be authorized in the first instance by parliament.

I do not yield a particle of the view that I have held on the supremacy of parliament and the need of preserving the control of parliament over the ministry, and of the ministry preserving to the full its responsibility. But I am surprised that the hon. member should attempt to estimate the extent of the legislation under order in council by the numbers of orders in council which are passed rather than by what is contained in them. If he does not mind my saying it, that seems to be an absurd method of estimating in any true way the quality or amount of legislation. To judge these things by the numbers of orders passed is, I think, proceeding in a quite erroneous way. One enactment might require no end of orders to meet a mass of detail, whereas another would take a much broader scope and not require anything like the same amount of detail to be dealt with by orders.

My hon. friend compares the extent of legislation by order in council in Britain and Canada, but the reason that so many more orders in council are passed here is that in Britain the minister of a department is given powers which in Canada can only be exercised by authority of the governor in council as a whole. We shall find as time goes on that it will be essential for this parliament more and more in that regard to follow the example of the United Kingdom parliament, and to trust ministers with responsibility, rather than to limit a minister's action and authority by requiring, in regard to many matters of detail, that these powers are to be exercised only by the governor in council as a whole. That is the real reason why orders in council are so much less numerous in Britain than they are here.

As to the publication of what is enacted by order in council or by delegated authority under regulation, I have already referred to a general order in council which, I think, covers the matter. May I read, however, from the revised statutes of Canada, 1927, chapter 162, the Public Printing and Stationery Act, section 29, the following, which seems to me also to cover what the hon. members for Lake Centre and St. John-Albert have requested:

> All proclamations issued by the governor general or under the authority of the governor in council, and all official notices, orders in council, regulations, advertisements and documents relating to the Dominion of Canada, or matters under the control of the parliament thereof, and requiring publication, shall be published in the Canada Gazette, unless some other mode of publication thereof is required by law.

So that there is already the provision made under a general statute for the publication of regulations.

A comparison has been made between the bill respecting the establishment of the Department of Veterans' Affairs and this bill establishing a Department of Reconstruction. There is this difference, which is a very important one. The legislation respecting the Department of Veterans' Affairs is of the nature of permanent legislation; the department is being established for a long time to come. The present legislation is in the nature of what is temporary legislation. The measure specifically states that this legislation shall not be in force for a period longer than is regarded as essential to tide over the period of reconstruction, and that period is estimated at about four years. That, I think, is a substantial reason why one would not expect to find, in a measure which relates to a situation which is temporary, some of the provisions which do exist in regard to a measure such as the Veterans' Affairs Act.

Mr. MacNICOL: I want to ask four questions. First, what will be the powers of the new minister in connection with works which might be considered international? For instance, if it is decided by the two countries to provide work, and the proposed conservation work is that—for which plans and specifications are fully prepared—for the raising of the levels of lake Erie by building a dam across the Niagara river, would this new ministry have any powers to negotiate in that connection? That is international. Second, in connection with interprovincial works such as the rehabilitation of the Saskatchewan river—and it is something that must be done, something that has been too long neglected, something that the whole country owes to the west, the placing of that river under control so as to enable it to perform what in my judgment is its God-given function, that of assisting the west—what will be the powers of the new minister in an interprovincial labour problem of that magnitude? Third, what will be his powers in a purely provincial-municipal programme such as the flood-proofing and water conservation works of the Thames or any other river in Ontario or any other province? Finally, in connection with industry, the post-war planning information sent out by the war-time information board refers to the reconstruction period after the war, and among other statements it declares that the object is to encourage private enterprise. The report recommends that the corporation profits tax and the excess profits tax be eliminated at the earliest possible moment. It recommends the removal as soon as possible of controls designed to restrict consumption.

All this is essential if industry is to have an opportunity to go forward and, as the Prime Minister so well said in his opening remarks, take a larger place in providing employment during the reconstruction period. If industry does that, it will conform to the principles laid down at the conference at which the Prime Minister of Great Britain, the Prime Minister of Russia and the President of the United States declared for a stable peace with full employment and the raising of the standard of living. I would impress upon the Prime Minister the importance of these four matters which I have brought to his attention —international projects, interprovincial programmes, provincial-municipal works, and abolishing war-time regulations, as suggested in the post-war planning information sent out by the war-time information board.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: The powers the minister will have in regard to all these matters are set out in sections 5 and 6 already passed. I do not wish to evade giving a full answer, but that would be an appropriate reply at this moment. The minister, broadly speaking, will do all that he thinks advisable and desirable in the way of coordinating efforts which will lead towards full employment and reconstruction, whether in the field of international affairs, interprovincial affairs, or intermunicipal affairs, so far as these might be in any way related to the work of reconstruction carried on by the federal administration. In other words, if the minister thought in connection with some international project that it would be possible to further employment to a greater extent in one particular way rather than another and that the way he had in mind would involve the consideration of authorities in another country, he would bring that matter to the attention of his colleagues in the cabinet and the international aspect would in the first instance, be dealt with, if the cabinet approved, by the Department of External Affairs, which has responsibility for international negotiations. Similarly, as between the provinces and the dominion, the minister would see that there were conferences arranged of a kind which he thought desirable to bring the province and the dominion together to discuss those matters that might further reconstruction. Similarly also with regard to the municipalities. This act does not give the minister arbitrary powers of a kind that no minister of the crown possesses to-day, but it does give him the fullest authority to get in touch with as many other authorities as may be possible where he sees an opportunity of coordinating work which thereby will more efficiently further reconstruction.

Mr. STIRLING: The Prime Minister referred just now to an order in council having been passed providing that orders in council shall be published. Surely the one he is referring to deals with orders and regulations passed under the War Measures Act. These have been published and they have been of the greatest use. I do not think that order in council covers such orders and regulations as are referred to in a bill of this sort, and it seems to be most essential that the public should be able to find out what regulations and orders are passed under a measure such as this. I consider it parallel to the other one we dealt with the other day arranging for veterans' affairs. There it is enacted in the measure that regulations shall be published, and it seems to me a most desirable thing that these orders and regulations should somehow see the light of day. It is so difficult for the public, apart from lawyers who may have ability and facilities which the ordinary man has not got, to ascertain what regulations have been passed. To the ordinary member of the public who desires to look up a certain subject it is most difficult to find out what has actually been passed in the way of regulations.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: A moment ago I read from the revised statutes the particular section of the act dealing with printing and publishing which necessitates the publication of orders and regulations, and the like, in the Canada Gazette.

Mr. STIRLING: Under any statute?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Yes. It is a general authority. Apart from any matter that relates particularly to what has been done under the war measures act, section 29 of chapter 162 of the revised statutes of 1927, public printing and stationery, provides:

> All proclamations issued by the governor general or under the authority of the governor in council, and all official notices, orders in council, regulations, advertisements and documents relating to the Dominion of Canada, or matters under the control of the parliament thereof, and requiring publication, shall be published in the Canada Gazette, unless some other mode of publication thereof is required by law.

Mr. NEILL: "And requiring publication".

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: There is a comma, "or matters under the control of the parliament thereof, and requiring publication".

Mr. NEILL: That means if publication is deemed to be required. That endorses the statement of the hon. member for Yale.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): That leaves a loophole, that it is in the discretion of certain people to publish or not to publish. Why is it put in one statute and not in another? Clearly, a strict construction of the section which the right hon. gentleman has just read indicates that these matters may not all be published, and certainly they are not all published.

I did not intend to speak again, but the Prime Minister renewed his faith in parliamentary institutions. On one celebrated occasion within recent months he slipped. I may forgive him that, because it is said that even Homer nods. But his government passed an order in peace time altering a civil statute that had nothing to do with the war at all. In March of last year an amendment to the Companies Act was put through which altered the law, and I doubt if it ever saw the light of day until somebody dug it up. Did that come to the attention of the Prime Minister, and did he give his imprimatur to it? It was done because the Minister of Transport desired to seize jurisdiction unknown to the people of Canada and to the legal profession. On examination the Prime Minister will find out that it is not all as he would suggest it is. Things are being done to-day by order in council which ought never to be done. I make that statement to the Prime Minister in general terms. I know he cannot watch everything that goes through council. He cannot be there every day. He has to take the statement of his minister on the recommendations and reports that are made by various departments; but there are official acts given the imprimatur of the governor in council as to matters unrelated to the war that ought never to be approved. That is what we object to. I realize that the government must have large and important powers to carry on the war, and emergent powers in relation to those other things that they have set up, although I do not concur in the theory. Powers are delegated to boards that are created, and those powers are not reviewable by the courts. That is an offence committed by the government in relation to certain boards that have been set up during this war. They are not even open to question by the courts. The subject is denied access to the courts. That is a pretty serious thing to happen in this country. On general principles the Prime Minister will agree with that. Denial of access to the courts of Canada should in no circumstances be made, and no government which thinks the thing through would ever permit that sort of thing to be done.

I know in days gone by that governments have seized jurisdiction. I suppose no greater controversy ever arose in the United States than arose when Mr. Lincoln suspended the writ of habeas corpus at one stage in the civil war. No action on the part of his government, in theory at least, ever raised such a controversy as the seizure of power by his administration at that time. And it subsequently turned out that the attorney general of his administration—I think it was Mr. Chase—wrote a learned disquisition in which he condemned the action of the government of which he was attorney general. I say to the government, let us forget about the past in regard to these things and let us not have a repetition of what has been done improperly in days gone by, especially on the question referred this afternoon to by the hon. member for Lake Centre, the denial to the citizens of this country of access to the courts. I think that is one of the greatest offences of the administration, at least from the point of view of the legal profession and the people of the country.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: I should like to refer to one matter in connection with the statute that the Prime Minister read a moment ago as a justification for the non-observance of the publication of regulations as part of the statute. I believe the section in question covers only the regulations that are required by the statute to be published in the Canada Gazette. In that connection I should like to refer the committee to section 18 of bill No. 133, to amend the Aeronautics Act. This section requires the regulations to be published in the Canada Gazette. The section is as follows:

> All regulations enacted under the provisions of this act shall be published in the Canada Gazette, and, upon being so published, shall have the same force and effect as if they formed part of this act.

Apparently section 18 of the Aeronautics Act is intended to cover such cases as those referred to in the statute of 1927. That is borne out by section 19 of the Aeronautics Act, which reads as follows:

> Such regulations shall be laid before both houses of parliament within ten days after the publication thereof if parliament is then sitting, and if parliament is not sitting, then within ten days after the next ensuing sittings thereof.

The hon. member for St. John-Albert has asked that a similar section should be included in the bill we are discussing.

Mr. HAZEN: It is extremely difficult to understand a section of an act when it is read across the floor of the committee. It requires some study, but I think the hon. member for Lake Centre correctly interpreted section 29 of the revised statutes of 1927, chapter 162, when he said that it provided that the regulations were to be published only when it was so provided in the act or statute. I think that is the interpretation to be put upon that section. I am going to move that section 6 of the bill be amended by adding thereto a subparagraph to read as follows—

The CHAIRMAN: Section 6 has been passed.

Mr. HAZEN: I bring it to the attention of the Prime Minister and ask him if the interpretation of chapter 162, section 29, as laid down by the hon. member for Lake Centre is correct. Would the Prime Minister entertain such an amendment to this bill?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I was just about to say if it will make perfectly clear the desire and the intention of the government to see that there is full publicity given to orders and regulations, I shall be very happy to add another subsection to section 9, and I am prepared to take the section which appears in the other act to which the hon. member has drawn attention. I would ask one of my colleagues to move that to section 9 there be added subsection (2) to read as follows:

All orders and regulations under this section shall forthwith, after approval by the governor in council be published in the Canada Gazette and laid before parliament within fifteen days after they are made, if parliament is then sitting, and, if not, then within ten days after the commencement of the next ensuing session thereof.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): I move accordingly, Mr. Chairman.

Amendment agreed to.

Section as amended agreed to.

On section 10—Information not to be disclosed.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I agree with the underlying principle of this section that there should be secrecy in relation to the business of any person, and that information of a private nature or relating to a private business, an individual business or a corporation, should not be disclosed, for reasons which I think will commend themselves to everyone. But I gravely question the provisions of section 11. I wish the Prime Minister would direct his attention to that. What is meant by the words "without lawful excuse"? Suppose the minister demands certain information which I do not wish to give. Notwithstanding the provisions with respect to secrecy, in section 10, we know that it is impossible to keep all this information secret, and I protest against the provision that a man who refuses to speak shall be found guilty of an offence against the act. On general principles that provision is bad.

I will give the Prime Minister an illustration of what I mean. Recently the wartime prices and trade board sent out to shook manufacturers a questionnaire including dozens upon dozens of questions, calling upon them, under the authority of some order in council, to disclose to that board the fullest possible information about these individual businesses. This is information which is given to-day only to the taxation department, and which ought not to be given even to the department in the detail required in this instance save and except on the theory that it is necessary to protect the public revenue. Here the wartime prices and trade board are asking me, as a box manufacturer, to disclose my business in great detail to an army of officials—because that is what it will come down to in its final essence; and while I know an attempt is made in the regulations to hide the identity of the individual by using a code number, or something of the kind, still I say it is asking just too much of human nature. I can tell the Prime Minister that in the case I mentioned the demand will be thoroughly ineffective, because in eastern Canada at least the shook business is not distinct and apart; it is wrapped up with, it is a corollary or branch of, the lumber business. As a rule shooks are made from the lumber left over from the general trade, and they are set up in one corporate enterprise. It is impossible to break that down, from an accounting standpoint; therefore what is required is the disclosure to the wartime prices and trade board of information they ought not to have, because it is information relating to a much broader subject matter and information which, if it came to the notice of a competitor, might do a great deal of damage to the subject under review.

Without pursuing the subject further I ask the Prime Minister to state upon what principle he suggests that this house should enact a punitive clause against some of the people of this country for refusing to give information with respect to a broad subject such as reconstruction. Of course any good citizen will comply with a proper request, but it might go far beyond that; it might become an inquisition in the hands of an improper official. I do think this is going a long, long way, and that the Prime Minister would never tolerate it in his own private business. Certainly I would be quite against it, if I came up against a statutory provision of this sort, that because I found it in my own interests and in the interests of my shareholders, we will say, that I should not answer certain questions put to me by the minister, I should be classed as a quasi-criminal and made subject to a penalty. If you can imagine any more bureaucratic method of carrying on business than legislation of this type, I should like to know what it is. I suggest to the Prime Minister that if the public knew this provision was in the bill they would condemn this legislation out of hand, not because on its face it is not a good measure but because attention would be diverted from the good features of the bill to this drastic feature which I suggest should be eliminated.

What reasonable excuse is there for putting in this provision? It ought not to be there at all. The minister has all kinds of power to get advice, to set up committees and do everything else that may be necessary. I cannot imagine why this provision should be included, why it should be fastened upon a long-suffering public in the face of all the regimentation, the regulation and the bureaucracy we have in this country to-day. That is the sort of thing that is killing government; that is the sort of thing the Prime Minister is going to meet when he goes to the country. I am not particularly anxious to help the Prime Minister when he goes to the country, but if I had no other canvass against this government I would not want a better one than this question of regimentation and bureaucracy.

A moment ago I was facetious; now I am serious, and I do suggest to the Prime Minister that he consider the elimination of section 11. It is undemocratic; it is unnecessary; it is uncalled for. I cannot think of a single useful purpose it will serve. As to the secrecy of information, of course I commend section 10, but certainly I intend to vote against section 11.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: My difficulty is that, to use my hon. friend's own words, I cannot tell when he is being facetious and when he is serious.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Well, I am telling you.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I am taking it now that he is serious, and I am going to appeal to his experience as a minister of the crown, as to whether or not that experience would not lead him to see the necessity of the very provision which now to a certain extent he condemns. In the first place an obligation is placed upon the minister, a very serious obligation which this committee already has recognized and agreed to, in section 5, which reads:

> It shall be the duty of the minister:—
> (a) to inform himself fully of the needs for new employment of the men and women in the armed forces and in industry and the opportunities that will be available to meet those needs as men and women are demobilized from the armed forces and as war production declines.

How is the minister to inform himself fully if he has not authority to make requests that are fair and reasonable and have his requests met? We all know something of human nature. Some people will do all they can to assist a government. Unfortunately there are a great many who will do all they can to embarrass a government and to resist its authority, and a minister might find the whole obligation which parliament has placed upon him nullified by the omission from the statute of the necessary powers to carry out what has been imposed upon him. A part of that necessary power is to have some penalty attach to neglect on the part of those who will not assist the minister to meet the obligations that have been placed upon him in administering the statute. Section 11, which my hon. friend has been discussing along with section 10, reads:

> Every person who, without lawful excuse, fails to comply with any proper request—

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): What is a lawful excuse?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: If some questions were asked which would mean disclosing a man's income, for example; there would be a lawful excuse for not answering a question of the kind.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): That is prohibited by law now. That is not a good illustration.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: My hon. friend has been emphasizing the importance of the courts. In this case nothing would be done in the way of imposing a penalty until the matter had come before some judicial authority. I am perfectly sure that in a matter of this kind no judicial body would be unreasonable in interpreting this section. They would not permit any broad interpretation. The person would have to make his case that he had lawful excuse for refusing.

On the other hand, if he had what looked like even a reasonable excuse and there was evidence that the minister was trying to get information he really should not have, or trying to get something that would be injurious to some party, I am quite sure that no judicial body in this country would enforce any penalty.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): What does the Prime Minister say about the burden of proof? This casts the burden of proof right on the accused.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Does my hon. friend think it ought to be on the minister? These clauses have to be interpreted in the light of ministerial responsibility. If the minister was not responsible to parliament for his every act there might be some objection offered to the authority being given. I would point out that this does not concern power that has been delegated; it is ministerial responsibility. One has to take very much into account the fact that the minister is the one who has to decide what questions are to be asked and what inquiries are to be made.

I submit that you cannot ask the minister to seek to get men who are returning from overseas back into industry if he is to be precluded from asking an employer to supply information as to the number of men in his employ who have not been overseas or who have taken no part in the war and the like. Those are the kinds of questions it may be necessary to ask.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Apparently the Prime Minister is not familiar with the bill. Under section 6 the minister may "require of any person in Canada a return of information which the minister may require relating to reconstruction." That takes care of the form of instruction to which the Prime Minister referred a minute ago. This section sets up a penalty against the subject. It makes the man who refuses to disclose information requested by the minister subject to a charge and the burden of proof is thrown on him to show why he does not give the information.

I suggest to the Prime Minister that it is a fundamental principle of British justice that when a charge is laid against a man for an infracton of the criminal code, of a quasi criminal piece of legislation or for the commission of a prohibited act, the burden is on the crown, not on the subject. This is on a par with the old prohibitory laws we borrowed from Texas, and other places like Texas, where they had the sumptuary type of legislation which takes away from the subject all his rights and puts him upon the defensive the minute an information is laid. This is not the type of legislation we ought to have if we expect co-operation from the people of Canada.

I know precedents can be given. I see the Minister of Justice is interested in this debate and I know he will tell me there are lots of precedents. But that does not make it right; far from it. The Minister of Pensions and National Health is always referring to the antiquity of certain principles that have been drafted into legislation. That does not make them right, simply because they have been there before and have extended over a period of years. I am simply pointing out to the Prime Minister what I consider is an inherent injustice in this measure.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: My hon. friend has just drawn my attention to a section in the bill which I might have quoted. He referred to section 6, which reads:

> The minister, to enable him to perform the duties imposed upon him by this act, may:
> (d) require of any person in Canada a return of information which the minister may require relating to reconstruction.

What good would there be to have this section without there being some penalty which could be imposed upon the man who would pay no attention to what the minister asked?

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I do not think I have made my point clear.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): You have not.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: You certainly have not.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Just the mere assertion by the Minister of Pensions and National Health does not prove anything. I call the attention of the Prime Minister that under section 6, which has been passed, this committee has already given to the minister the power to "require of any person in Canada a return of information which the minister may require relating to reconstruction."

It is limited to that. Suppose the minister and the subject differ as to whether the things required relate to reconstruction? The minister gives his ipse dixit that it does relate to reconstruction, but the citizen says, "No; it relates to my private business; it has nothing to do with reconstruction." The government of the country then says, "An information will be laid against you and you will have to prove that you have lawful excuse."

An hon. MEMBER: No.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Oh, yes. There is the burden of proof.

Mr. CLAXTON: The step the government must first take is to show that there has been failure to give information in respect of reconstruction, and the burden of proof is on the government with respect to that. It is only after it has proved that to the satisfaction of the court that the defendant need even establish that he has a lawful excuse. The burden of proof is laid squarely on the shoulders of the government.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): That does not follow at all. The bill states that the minister may "require of any person in Canada a return of information which the minister may require relating to reconstruction." Somebody must form an opinion as to the proper interpretation to give to that part of section 6 which relates to reconstruction. I want to emphasize the point I made a moment ago. The minister and his advisers may say, "This relates to reconstruction," but the subject who is under inquisition may say, "It does not relate to reconstruction at all; you are wrong; it relates to something else." The minister then causes an information to be laid. All he has to do is allege that he requires certain information which he says relates to reconstruction.

Mr. POTTIER: No.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I have been interpreting statutes in the courts for forty-two years. I have had a little experience and I know how these things work. I know that in certain classes of legislation the courts give a strict construction. In other classes of legislation the courts follow a middle course, and in other classes the courts interpret the provisions of the law quite liberally. There are the three schools of thought in the judiciary with regard to the interpretation of statutes depending upon the nature of the statute. A taxing statute is always construed strictly against the crown. A statute that gives special consideration, like the Bank Act under section 88, is construed strictly.

Here is a statute containing language in express terms which states that the excuse must come from the subject, not that the minister must show that he is in flagrante delicto. The machinery of the law is started immediately and the burden of proof is placed upon the citizen. I am not going to argue the matter any further, but I did want to state my objection.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: The hon. gentleman did not state this last time that he was not being facetious, but I will assume, in spite of the substance of his argument, that he was not intending to be facetious.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): That is a quip and a gibe that is quite unnecessary.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: I will ask the hon. member who has had some little experience in interpreting statutes if he will read and interpret section 164 of the criminal code, compare the language of that section with the language of this bill, and then tell us whether it would make any difference whether this section was in the bill or not.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I have not section 164 of the criminal code before me, and I should like to know what the context was before I gave an opinion. I was quite serious, and the minister's gibe at me was quite unworthy of him.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: Section 164 of the criminal code reads:

> Everyone is guilty of an indictable offence and liable to one year's imprisonment who, without lawful excuse, disobeys any act of the parliament of Canada or of any legislature in Canada by wilfully doing any act which it requires to be done, unless some penalty or other mode of punishment is expressly provided by law.

The hon. member has read section 6 (b) of this bill and says: There is authority given by parliament to the minister to require certain information to be supplied; now that being something required by an act of parliament, if he from whom it is required fails to supply it or, in other words, omits doing something that an act of parliament requires, if he has no lawful excuse as provided by section 164 of the criminal code, he is found guilty and condemned accordingly.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Provided it is wilful. The minister knows there must be mens rea. In the case which the minister suggests under section 164 of the criminal code the crown would have to show disobedience. The burden does not shift until the crown shows it.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: Similarly here the crown would have to show that the information had been required of the person who is accused and that it had not been supplied. That constitutes the offence unless a lawful excuse is shown by the accused. There is no more shifting of the burden there than in the ordinary application of the law.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Will the minister be good enough to let me see section 164?

Mr. ST. LAURENT: Certainly. There is no more a shifting of burden of proof here than in the other case. It is merely indicating the elements of the offence—the requisition of the information and the fact that it was not supplied. That constitutes the offence unless there is a lawful excuse. The crown would have to show that it was information that the minister was entitled to demand and that it had not been supplied. That being established, a case would be made out unless the defendant showed a lawful excuse for not supplying the information.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I follow the minister's argument but he misses one salient factor. Under the general law as contained in section 164 of the criminal code there must be a wilful disobedience or failure to do that which it is commanded to do. The crown must in the first instance assume the burden of proof under the general law.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: Here as well.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I do not think so. That is not the way I interpret it. If the minister will put in this statute mens rea, it would take away from me some of the objection which I have. The Minister of Justice is an old practitioner. I do not know whether he practised in the criminal courts, but I assume he did, and he knows how difficult it is to get a conviction in certain circumstances in relation to criminal intent. The two cases are not parallel. I suggest to the minister that, under section 11, all that the crown has to do is to show that under section 6 they required the information; they may simply say, "In our opinion it was relating to reconstruction," and on that mere prima facie case the accused must answer. I do not think that ought to be the law. They ought to go beyond what I have suggested and prove that it was in point of fact and in law a matter relating to reconstruction. I suggest as a matter of public policy that the courts of this country would not compel a subject to give to a minister or to a group of ministers information that would be detrimental to his private business. It ought not to be the policy of parliament to ask that he should do so. I know that an attempt is made under section 10 to surround with secrecy the information that is given, but that is just not possible. Even in the taxation department, which is surrounded with as much care as it is humanly possible to take to preserve secrecy, there is the gravest doubt whether it is 100 per cent effective so far as secrecy is concerned. I do not say that with any specific case in mind at all, but so many people cannot know so much about so many different things and these things still remain secretive. I shall not labour the point further. I suggest that this is pretty stringent legislation, and this provision ought not to be put in there unless it is strengthened. I hate to see the burden of proof immediately transferred to the accused, and I believe that that will be the construction placed upon this section.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: I suggest that the burden of proof is not changed at all in this section. The hon. member says that we know how difficult it is to get a conviction when there is an express provision that you have to have proof of mens rea. This statute is not being put on the statute book so that it may be difficult to apply. It is put there for the purpose described in section 2 (e), to bring about "the reestablishment in civil life and reemployment on demobilization of the men and women of the armed services, and of persons released from war industries." It has been drafted for the purpose of being an effective instrument, and it was not thought in drafting it that it would be proper to make it difficult of application. Here, if information is requested which the accused has lawful reasons for not giving, his reasons can be urged before the court; but if the information is requested for the laudable object of providing reestablishment for those persons in the armed services or in war industries and that information is not forthcoming, it should not be difficult to deal with the person who is thus thwarting the object of the legislation.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Even though it reveals his private affairs?

Mr. ST. LAURENT: Even so, because I think it is fair to ask all of us to submit to such inconvenience as may be necessary to provide for the reestablishment of those who have done so much for us during the war.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): The minister puts it on a very lofty plane, and I take second place to no one in that regard. But I would not use these means and methods. This is to go on for years after the war.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: For the period of reconstruction.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Nobody has defined the period of reconstruction.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): Yes. Read the bill. Five years after the war.

Mr. NEILL: Four years.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): That means after the declaration of peace. That may mean ten years. This war is not over yet. All this talk about reconstruction and rehabilitation is predicated on the theory that the war is to cease within a very short time. I tell this house and the country that the major battles of this war are still to come. I think we are losing sight of the main chance when we are spending time on setting up an administration to make blueprints for the future when we do not yet know whether there is to be a future. We are all, of course, hopeful. But too much emphasis is being laid in Canada to-day upon these subject matters, to the exclusion of the war. How often do we hear now from the Prime Minister a stirring address to the nation to gird its loins because this war is not over? Not very often. I suppose that people are inured to the suggestion that the war has yet to go a long way. But I am appalled at the modern trend wherein people talk about the post-war period to emphasize, and emphasize only, the theory that we are to make men richer and richer instead of better and better. Whoever speaks about the spiritual side of future trends in this country? Nobody. Yet we ought to be thinking about that. But nobody emphasizes it. Hon. members of the socialist group never talk about making people better and better; what they are interested in is making one class poorer and another class richer; that is the main element in their programme to-day.

Mr. GILLIS: Mr. Chairman—

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): The hon. member for Cape Breton South can hold himself in patience. He promised the Minister of Munitions and Supply the other day to make a reply about the situation in Cape Breton, in the coal fields, but I have not heard it.

Mr. GILLIS: You will hear it.

The CHAIRMAN: Order. I ask the hon. member to keep within the limits of the item.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Well, then, Mr. Chairman, please ask the hon. member not to interrupt me.

Mr. GILLIS: You started it.

Mr. KUHL: Do you think we would be better with a tightened belt?

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I heard the hon. member for Jasper-Edson speak the other day of a world in which nobody is going to work any more. I for one would be interested to see that kind of world. I was taught a different theory, that you could not eat unless you worked; but according to the hon. member and those who think as he does we are to have, in the reconstruction days, a world wherein nobody will work.

Mr. BLACKMORE: The hon. member has misrepresented what the hon. member for Jasper-Edson said.

The CHAIRMAN: Order.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I heard him read an essay on the subject.

The CHAIRMAN: We should now have reached a stage in the discussion of the bill when it is possible to keep the discussion to the item itself.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I agree, but, with all respect to the Chair, I should like to make this observation: we had the hon. member for Jasper-Edson read an essay taken out of some book written by somebody who was going to remodel the world along the line I suggested, that hereafter nobody would work.

Mr. BLACKMORE: You never have.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I should like to have had the hon. gentleman follow me for forty years, with the midnight oil I burned.

Mr. KUHL: I should not like to turn out the same, though.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): That is all right, but I will take my chances on heaven along with the hon. member. I admit at once, Mr. Chairman, that we have strayed from the item; perhaps it has been a little entertainment to break up an otherwise dull afternoon.

I suggest to the treasury benches and to the Minister of Justice in particular that this is pretty drastic legislation. I am not going to take up any more time in arguing against it; I have stated my objection in reasonable language, and I am going to let it go at that.

Section agreed to.

Section 11 agreed to.

On section 12—Penalty.

Mr. NEILL: I am glad we have had this battle of legal wits, because it has furnished me with a good background for the protest I now wish to put in. I refer to the wording of this section, which is as follows:

> 12. Every person who commits an offence against this act is liable on summary conviction, if an individual, to a fine not exceeding five hundred dollars and, if a corporation, to a fine not exceeding five thousand dollars.

I respectfully submit that that is far too much power to put into the hands of an ordinary, average, run-of-the-mine justice of the peace. The subject with which this bill deals is entirely new; it constitutes, I suppose, a new departure in the jurisdiction of the world. We have seen able legal men on both sides of the chamber spend over two hours debating the meaning of one of the simplest sections of the bill, and with a certain amount of apparent justification on both sides.

The subject matter is so wide, and there is no precedent to govern the unhappy justice of the peace, who is to be called upon to decide on a matter involving a penalty of five thousand dollars. The lawyers have, as I said, argued ably this afternoon. How much longer would they have argued, I wonder, if some fat-fee-paying client had been involved?

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Have a heart.

Mr. NEILL: They would have been talking here not for hours but for days, and quite justifiably; that is what they are paid for—to try to interpret the law for the benefit of their clients.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): That is not what we are doing here. We are trying to understand the law.

Mr. NEILL: Yes; quite true. I want to tell the Minister of Justice, because I take him to be a man of the cities rather than of the country, that when he deals with the cities he generally finds that the justices of the peace or local magistrates are men of some considerable knowledge of law, either lawyers or having some practical experience in law offices or the like of that; but in the country the situation is quite different. In the country men are often appointed simply to meet the need of having someone available to acknowledge a deed, or a conveyance in the case of a man selling a piece of property, when he has to acknowledge his signature before a justice of the peace. Those are about the principal purposes for which they are appointed. Occasionally they deal with the odd drunk, but that is a very simple matter. The justice of the peace, I submit, in all kindness to them—many of them are my personal friends—do not know the law. When there is so much uncertainty among experts as we have seen this afternoon, how do you expect a country storekeeper or game warden or someone of that kind to be familiar with the law? These men may be well educated, but that does not teach them the law. I will give you three instances, two of which came within my personal knowledge and the other was well advertised.

I am myself a magistrate, although I have not acted for many years. On one occasion I had to get a justice of the peace to sit with me on a case, since it required the presence of two justices of the peace, and I had a horrible time persuading my brother magistrate not to send the three defendants, who were charged with something not very much worse than a bad drunk, to penal servitude for fourteen years. He was a capable, sensible man, but he did not know anything about the law. We finally compromised on three months.

On another occasion, in a little country place some petty ill-feeling led a man to lay a charge against another man for the theft of a mink trap. The trap was worth only fifteen cents new, and this was a second-hand one. The case got before a justice of the peace; a small settlement took sides, and in the end the whole thing was remitted to a court about one hundred and fifty miles away. The justice of the peace was told to serve subpoenas upon the crown witnesses, and in his broad, generous mind he thought he would act fairly and issued summonses to everybody, including witnesses for the defence. By this time the entire village had divided itself into two clans, and nearly half the residents went down to the trial and had a nice holiday. In the end it cost the provincial government $500 to decide the ownership of that mink trap. I have forgotten what happened to the trap, but I know it cost the provincial government $500 because the case came before a country justice of the peace who had the best of intentions.

I give another instance, and it comes home to the hon. member for Yale because it occurred in his district. There are several large lakes there, and a man was charged with the theft of a boat or canoe worth not more than $10. The case was brought before the local justice of the peace, a thoroughly educated gentleman also animated with the best of intentions. The accused was his personal friend; they had social relations with each other. The magistrate thumbed over the criminal code and said to the accused, "I am awfully sorry, old man, but the nearest case I can find to yours is piracy on the high seas and that is punishable with death. I don't know what else can be done." If somebody had not interfered, I suppose the man would have been sentenced to the extreme penalty. These are facts, and this is only an illustration.

Now, you cannot expect knowledge of the law on the part of a country justice of the peace, and yet you are going to give him the power to punish a man with a fine of $500 or in the case of a firm $5,000—and it is sometimes popular but not always wise to hit the big firm in a country place. I suggest that the offence ought to be made indictable. If the Minister of Justice will think the matter over I believe he will agree with me. This is tricky legislation; it is a new measure for which there is no precedent; the justice of the peace cannot run his finger down the page of any statute and find comparable offences. It is entirely new. These cases are not likely to any great extent to come before country justices of the peace, and in the towns a higher authority will be easily accessible. It would be very much better to have the prosecution made under indictment and not under summary conviction, because this would bring it before a judge who has knowledge of the law.

It might be said that it is necessary to impose heavy penalties in order to enforce the law, but it does not by any means follow that by putting absurdly heavy penalties within the discretion of an untrained man you are going to have a successful enforcement of a statute. The minister at the present time has before the house a bill for the amendment of an act which has been on the statutes for fifty or sixty years, which provide that if a man is caught stealing anything, however small, from a letter in the mails, he shall go to the penitentiary for not less than three years, and he explained when he introduced the bill that it had been found necessary to amend the law because as it stood it was not fair to the petty thief and did not result in a successful enforcement of the provision. The reason for that is obvious. Rather than send a man to gaol for three years for a trivial offence a magistrate will suspend sentence, or the matter will be hushed up. That is what I am impressing on the minister now. If he makes his punishment too heavy the penalty will not be enforced, because the matter is likely to be hushed up. It is said of a certain ruler of Turkey that, having found a baker giving false weight, he had the man put into his own oven and baked, and he said that he had stopped that crime for the future. Well, that is neither the British nor the Christian way of doing things. In the long run, certainty of punishment, rather than undue severity, is what deters crime, and I suggest to the minister that what we should aim at here is certainty rather than unduly harsh punishment. For that reason I suggest that the matter should be taken by way of indictment.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: An indictable offence is usually looked upon as much more serious than matters that are punishable by summary conviction, and this here was regarded merely as an offence and not as something which formerly would have been considered a felony. It having been declared an offence, a penalty had to be provided in the bill itself, or the penalty would have been that fixed by the criminal code under section 164, which is much severer than the one here set out.

Mr. NEILL: On indictment?

Mr. ST. LAURENT: On indictment. Unless the procedure and the penalty were fixed in this statute it would constitute an indictable offence, which is usually regarded as something more serious than offences punishable by summary conviction.

Mr. NEILL: Five thousand dollars is a very heavy penalty.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: That is the maximum. The bill that I have before the house is to remove the minimum. When the minimum is not fixed, article 1029 of the criminal code provides that the penalty may be anything from a farthing or a cent to $500 in the case of an individual and from one cent to $5,000 in the case of a corporation, absolutely in the discretion of the court. I think the hon. gentleman knows from his experience with the Department of Justice that when it happens that what appears to be an exorbitant fine has been imposed there is no hesitation in coming to the Department of Justice and asking them to recommend to his excellency clemency and a reduction of the fine. There have been some cases where fines which appeared to be out of proportion to the seriousness of the offence have been imposed, and there have been quite a number of cases where the Department of Justice has recommended to his excellency, in the exercise of clemency, a reduction of the fine. I would fully agree with the hon. member if we were fixing a minimum, but there is no minimum fixed in this case. It is merely a maximum, and as to that maximum, the purpose of the bill is to do for reconstruction what was done for war purposes under the Department of Munitions and Supply Act. There the penalty was up to $500 in the case of an offence by an individual and up to $5,000 on a corporation. There is no minimum being fixed in this bill, and there may be cases where a substantial fine would be felt to be in order.

Mr. NEILL: I see the force of the minister's logic, but I do not think it was improved by his falling back to some considerable extent on the argument that if a wrong judgment were given the Department of Justice would see that it was rectified. Would it not be better to obviate the wrong judgment by setting up machinery of such a nature as would reduce the possibilities of such a thing occurring? The country justice of the peace is not a lawyer; he is not familiar with law, and he should not be given such power.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: It may be that these summary conviction cases are frequently prosecuted before justices of the peace in British Columbia. I was so informed the other day, although I had not been aware of that fact. In most of the other provinces they are prosecuted before magistrates who have been appointed under statutes which require them to be lawyers and to have practised for a certain number of years.

Mr. NEILL: Not in British Columbia.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: I am told that there are many districts in British Columbia where summary convictions are taken before justices of the peace who have not been practising lawyers, but I think the hon. member knows his community well enough to feel that the possibility of imposing a fine of $500 on an individual will not be apt to occasion any serious injustice in cases brought before such justices of the peace.

Mr. NEILL: Oh! I was not worrying about my constituency but about the constituency represented by the member for York-Sunbury (Mr. Hanson).

Mr. ST. LAURENT: In the province from which the hon. member for York-Sunbury comes these matters are usually prosecuted before magistrates.

Section agreed to.

On section 13—Expenses.

Mr. BLACKMORE: I should like to make a few remarks on the general question that is dealt with in this section. May I read it so that it will appear on Hansard.

> The expenses of administration of this act and any other expenditures to be made by the department or by any other department hereunder shall be met out of the war appropriation or other moneys appropriated by parliament.

The other night I took occasion to comment upon the wording of paragraph (e) of section 2, which reads:

> "reconstruction" means the reestablishment in civil life and reemployment on demobilization of the men and women of the armed services, of persons released from war industries, and the reorganization of industry, in order to provide maximum production and full employment during and following the change over from war-time production of industry to peace-time production, and includes every undertaking by dominion, provincial or municipal authority or by any corporation or other person which may contribute to such reorganization.

May I call the committee's attention to the very wide field which is covered by paragraph (e) of section 2, and the enormous expenditure of money which will be involved? I doubt very much whether the average member of this committee, including myself, can form even a vague guess of the astronomical figure which will be required to express the amount of money which would bring about full employment in Canada. Notice what it says:

> . . . maximum production and full employment during and following the change over from war-time production . . .

I am raising the question, where is the money coming from? If I may direct my remarks for a few minutes constructively to the proposal that the money must not come entirely from debt or taxation, I may make a worth-while contribution to the proceedings of this committee.

I believe it is well known by the members of this committee that the organization which I represent in this house believes in the use of the national credit for the financing of projects which are incidental to raising the standard of living in the country; that it maintains that money can be created by the state debt-free—or shall we say "currency" instead of money; and that the amount of such money that can be created bears a direct relation to the productive and consumptive capacity of the nation. If it is accepted that the amount of currency or money which a nation can create depends directly upon the goods and services which that nation can produce and consume, then we reach a realistic concept of the amount of money which the government may have available for the prosecution of any project which it may deem advisable.

We have a way of determining the amount of money we can have, because the amount will depend upon our resources and our skill in working up those resources into consumable goods which our people and people abroad can enjoy. May I cite to the Prime Minister two or three little excerpts from documents which I believe he will find thoroughly reliable and authentic? First I suggest that he take the report of the royal commission on banking and currency in Canada of 1933 and turn to page 22, paragraph 47. There he will read the following words:

> In the war session of August, 1914, parliament raised the partially covered issue to $50,000,000. Subsequently an issue of $16,000,000 was made against the deposit of railway securities guaranteed by the dominion government, as well as an uncovered issue of $10,000,000 for government purposes.

May I pause just there to reason with the Prime Minister for a minute or two on what is contained in that statement? The only backing behind the $16,000,000 was railway securities; and behind the $10,000,000 there was no backing at all. But the $26,000,000 which were produced as a result of this creation of money were spent by the government for governmental purposes. That was back during the last war, in a time when ordinarily it is dangerous for the state to create money, because there is usually or likely to be a scarcity of goods in the country while war is progressing. May I continue with the passage:

> In 1917 an emergency issue of $50,000,000 of dominion notes was made to finance war purchases in Canada by the British government. The notes were secured by imperial treasury bills. In due course, this indebtedness was liquidated by payments from the British treasury and all of this issue had been redeemed by 1927.

That passage has no particular bearing on the matter under discussion this afternoon. The next passage is:

> No changes have since been made in the Dominion Notes Act except that by a statute passed on March 30, 1933, the governor in council was empowered to suspend the redemption in gold of dominion notes, and an order in council to this effect was made on April 10, 1933.

It is to be gathered from that passage that after April 10, 1933, it was no longer possible for any one holding a Dominion of Canada note to demand gold in redemption of it. This put the country on a fiat money basis purely and simply, and roughly speaking the country has so continued from that time to the present.

What is there behind the fiat money which can give it stability and value? Only the goods and services producing power of the nation; for the more goods and services a nation can produce the more readily is it possible to buy goods with the money which the nation may create. This truth has profound significance for Canada in the post-war period. It will have a tremendous importance in its bearing upon this act if it is applied successfully, and I wish the Prime Minister and anyone who is in power in the country during the post-war period every success in the application of it. But a tremendously important part in the successful application of this act and the achievement of the objective which is envisaged by it will be played by created money, debt-free. I warn the Prime Minister or anyone who holds his position during those trying times that if we in Canada must depend upon the money which can be collected by taxation from the Dominion of Canada for the application of this act, then the whole process of reconstruction will be a disappointment of the bitterest kind, and many of the fine ideals which actuated those who framed this bill will be discarded, because men will rise and say: "The war is over; we have to pay for the war. Let us tighten our belts." Immediately there will be induced a period of retrenchment which will bode ill for the success of the application of this act and will tend to results as deplorable as those which resulted from the last war.

On one or two occasions I have offended the Prime Minister by rather severe remarks directed towards the way in which we were treating the returned men of the last war. I do not propose to refer to them this afternoon. I have not changed my opinion one iota. The men who fought the last war were my friends, my companions, the boys who were my age, my school mates, my university companions; and the way those men were treated after the war will be held by me as a condemnation of the administrations which have conducted affairs in Canada since that time. Offhand I cannot recall a single man who received the treatment to which he was entitled. The Prime Minister knows we promised these men "homes for heroes." He has read of that, but what returned man ever received a home befitting a hero?

Now may I go on with this general question of the creation of money, just to show what there is in the records which are available to all hon. members of this house. I wish to quote further from the report of the royal commission on banking and currency in Canada, this time at pages 22 and 23, and to read what was said by a former minister of finance of the dominion government, a man for whom I should think the Liberals in particular would have a high degree of respect:

> But extensive use continued to be made of the power to issue dominion notes to the banks against approved securities with the result that it was decided in 1923 to make this part of the Finance Act mechanism a feature of the normal Canadian financial system. In introducing the new legislation, Mr. Fielding, the Minister of Finance, made the following brief explanation of its purpose: "The act (Finance Act) was adopted as a war measure, and no doubt was exceedingly useful in the financial operations during the war. It may be said that the war being over we no longer have any need for the act, but experience has shown that the act is still required; indeed, I am inclined to think that something of the kind will have to become almost a permanent part of our financial system."

I wonder why the Liberal party has so long neglected the wise counsel implied in those words. May I now refer to another semi-official document, the Canada Year Book, 1932, at the bottom of 759, where hon. members will find a footnote containing the following words:

> The Finance Act, 1914 (5 Geo. V.C. 3) makes provision in case of war, panic, etc., for the issue of dominion notes against approved securities. This emergency arrangement was made a permanent feature by c. 48 of the statutes of 1923.

One cannot help but wonder why, before we allowed our returned men to suffer degradation, we did not use these powers. I believe the fact that we did not do so constitutes a solemn warning to this generation that unless something is done we will continue to ignore these possibilities. I must say that I am really discouraged by reason of the fact that the Prime Minister, the hon. member for St. Lawrence-St. George, the hon. member for Essex East and the hon. member for Cariboo, who were the government representatives and advocates in the discussion which preceded the introduction of this bill and in the discussion of the bill itself, referred to nothing but taxation and debt. In a vague sort of way the hon. member for Cariboo reminded us what the banks did when they had to market a crop of wheat, but beyond that he did not go, nor did the Prime Minister. What does it mean? It means that the people of Canada are left out on a limb at the present time, with no idea whatever of how the government proposes to do all the things it envisages in this act. If the government has no financial device for financing the projects involved in this act, beyond borrowing and taxation, all I can say is that this whole measure is nothing in the world but another means of deceiving the Canadian people.

As an indication of the possibilities of the use of debt-free money, state-created, I should like to read two or three passages from the report of the Bank of Canada dated February 10, 1944, wherein the governor of the bank, or whoever wrote the report, suggests the tremendous productive capacity of Canada in the post-war world. I have already indicated that the amount of money a state can create debt-free depends upon the goods the state can produce and consume. If, then, it can be shown that we are capable of producing an astounding amount of goods, then the possibility of the use of this debt-free money, which is indicated in the three excerpts which I have read, becomes very encouraging. Now I read from page 11 of the report of the Bank of Canada:

> By the end of 1943 the gainfully occupied population had risen to approximately 5,100,000 but about 1,900,000 of these were engaged in the armed forces, in supplying the weapons of war, or in producing the food required for special wartime exports. The number available to meet civilian needs had therefore fallen to about 3,200,000, but at the same time the average standard of living had risen materially and was probably higher than it had ever been.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Would my hon. friend permit me to interrupt, since it is just a minute to six o'clock? I should like to move that the committee rise, report progress and ask leave to sit again this day. I have to make that motion now in order that the committee may continue after the Minister of Finance has made his statement on the budget.

Mr. BLACKMORE: The Prime Minister will not mind if I read one more sentence?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Not if my hon. friend is going to stop then for good.

Mr. BLACKMORE: Yes, I am going to stop then, because I understand that at eight o'clock we are going on with the budget.

> This increased output of consumption goods by a smaller working force can be accounted for in part by longer hours of work, favourable crop conditions and the abnormally small number now employed in private capital development and maintenance work. Another important factor, however, has been the improvement in production techniques worked out under the stress of war.

In the next paragraph the governor of the bank goes on to point out that there will be an enormous increase in the goods produced in this country, which would indicate that if only we will be realistic in the matter of money and use the power which is implied in the three quotations I have read, we will not need to be anxious at all about implementing this measure for the rehabilitation and reconstruction of Canada.

Progress reported.

At six o'clock the house took recess.

After Recess

The house resumed at eight o'clock.

THE BUDGET

ANNUAL FINANCIAL STATEMENT OF THE MINISTER OF FINANCE

Hon. J. L. ILSLEY (Minister of Finance) moved:

> That Mr. Speaker do now leave the chair for the house to go into committe of ways and means.

He said: Mr. Speaker in laying before the house the government's proposals for meeting the financial requirements of the present fiscal year, it is proper that I should give some account of the economic conditions and the financial results of the fiscal year which closed on March 31. In doing so, I refer the house to the white paper, which I shall table before sitting down, for the detailed record with which I do not wish to burden the house now.

I.

ECONOMIC AND FINANCIAL REVIEW

The whole of the fiscal year was marked by high and sustained levels of production and employment. The employment index on April 1, 1944, was at almost exactly the same level as on April 1, 1943, despite the withdrawals to the armed forces. While there were marked changes in individual industries, the over-all variation was only in the amount of the unfilled demand for labour and in the incidence of shortages. This is a condition which we may expect to persist as the European military operations gain in scope and speed. The net demand for labour, as registered at the national selective service offices, has already mounted far above the levels reached in the spring.

Roughly estimated, national income in 1943-44 was something like twelve per cent higher than in the preceding fiscal year. Aside from the pay and allowances of the armed forces, much the largest increase relatively was in farm incomes. Salaries and wages were up more moderately while investors' and other enterprisers' income experienced still smaller increases. In contrast, rising costs were bringing about a decrease in corporate profits.

Consumer spending also increased through the year, and was in part reflected in an increase in retail sales which was most marked in country stores. It was reflected also in increased revenue from some of our luxury and quasi-luxury taxes.

Prices rose, and the cost of living index moved up one and one-half points during the year though on April 1 it had fallen somewhat from the higher levels established last fall. There are other occasions for discussing at length the government's policy of controlling prices, wages and salaries. However, I believe that that policy in its broad principles has the support of all parties. The need for it is evident on every side. It is not without its irritations and disadvantages but its beneficial results are beyond dispute. It is only necessary to remind the house that the government reaffirmed its policy in November last and again in March, and that the successful maintenance of that policy, through the period of active military operations in Europe and in the readjustment which will follow, will be even more important to this country than it has been in the past and that it will be at least as difficult.

GOVERNMENT ACCOUNTS AND FINANCING, 1943-44

The financial results of the past year reflect these economic changes as well as the unfolding development of the war program and the application of the revenue measures. Though the public accounts for the year are not yet made up, I am able at this date to give close estimates of the final figures.

REVENUES

Total revenues for the year, including $155 million dollars of refundable taxes, were $2,856 million, an increase of $537 million, or twenty-three per cent over the revenues of 1942-43. Of this increase, total tax revenues at $2,592 million supplied $455 million.

The receipts from the personal income tax were $813 million, $279 million or fifty-two per cent above those for the preceding year. Of these receipts, an estimated $115 million was refundable. The large increase arose from the application of the higher rates of the 1942 amendments to the full fiscal year 1943-44, and the substantial increase in taxable incomes themselves. Revenue from the corporation tax amounted to $311 million, about ten per cent less than in the previous year in which the yield had been abnormally large because the time of payment had been moved forward. The excess profits tax yielded $469 million, slightly more than in 1942-43, reflecting the application of the higher rates of the 1942 budget for a full fiscal year. Succession duties at $15 million were also slightly higher.

Revenues from indirect taxes, with the exception of excise duties, in the yield of which there was little change, were very substantially higher. Customs duties produced $168 million, an increase of $49 million. The net revenues from the sales tax were $305 million, $72 million more than the previous year. The war exchange tax yielded $119 million, or $24 million increase. These are substantial increases. It should be noted, however, that the government itself, as a payer of taxes on its war and ordinary purchases, contributed a considerable part of the increases.

Excise taxes, other than the sales tax and war exchange tax, yielded $215 million, an increase of $54 million. Taxes on cigars, cigarettes and tobacco provided more than half of this increase, while those on beverages, candy and chewing gum, transportation and communication and the proceeds of sales of excise stamps which reflect the retail taxes, contributed substantially toward it.

Among ordinary non-tax revenues, which totalled $140 million, the post office, following last year's increase in rates, produced a revenue of $61 million, an increase of $12 million. The return on investments was $52 million, $11 million more than in the previous year. Among special receipts, the income surplus of the Canadian National Railways amounted to nearly $36 million, or almost $11 million over the figure for the previous year.

EXPENDITURES

Ordinary expenditures were $630 million. The interest on the public debt was $243 million, and, of the total increase in ordinary expenditure of $69 million, it accounted for $54 million. To the remaining increase of $15 million, the cost of loan flotations and amortization contributed $5 million; compensation to the provinces in respect of the guarantee of revenues from gasoline taxes, $4 million; unemployment insurance $1 million, increased expenses of the Department of National Revenue $3 million; and the post office $4 million.

Capital expenditures, at $3 million, were slightly reduced. Special expenditures amounted to $37 million, and were $6 million higher than in 1942-43. Higher payments under the Prairie Farm Assistance Act and the wheat acreage reduction plan accounted for the whole of the increase. Government-owned enterprises required somewhat more than $1 million, about the same as last year. Other charges amounted to $64 million and were slightly lower than in the previous year.

Under the war appropriation acts, including Mutual Aid, expenditures were $4,625 million, an increase of $901 million over war expenditures for 1942-43.

Total expenditures for the year thus were $5,360 million, an increase of $973 million over those of the previous year, but slightly less than the amount estimated in the budget of last year. Total revenues for the year exclusive of refundable taxes were $2,701 million. Deducting these, we arrive at the over-all budgetary deficit of $2,659 million—the amount by which the net debt was increased during the year. The proportion of expenditures met out of current revenue, slightly more than fifty per cent, is somewhat better, it will be noted, than I predicted last year.

FINANCIAL REQUIREMENTS AND BORROWING

The budgetary deficit is the amount by which the net debt increased during the year. It is not the cash deficiency, that is the amount which we had to borrow to meet our cash requirements. As contrasted with total expenditures of $5,360 million, our total requirements for cash in Canada were $5,841 million. The difference between this sum and the amount of our expenditures, is made up of the amounts required to make recoverable advances in connection with war purchases, to pay off indebtedness abroad, and to purchase securities, foreign exchange and other active assets.

Our first source of cash to meet these requirements was our revenues which produced $2,662 million in cash. The refundable portion of the income and excess profits taxes provided $155 million, net receipts in trust, insurance and superannuation accounts contributed $50 million, and miscellaneous receipts and credits resulting from the working of various accounts, $39 million. The remainder, $2,935 million, is the amount of the cash deficiency.

It is this cash deficiency, not the budgetary deficit, which measures the amount of our borrowing requirements, and it is often much the larger amount. In the past year, the cash deficiency was only ten per cent higher than the budgetary deficit, but in three of five of the war years, when we were greatly extending our war programme, repatriating securities and accumulating sterling, it was more than double the budgetary deficit. Over the five years as a whole, it was nearly fifty per cent greater than the budgetary deficit. I lay some emphasis on this distinction because not only has it been of great importance in the past, but it is likely to be very significant in the future.

To a small extent, the cash deficiency was met by drawing down our cash balances by $42 million. The total cash borrowing for the year, $2,962 million, met the remainder, and in addition provided $60 million to meet bond maturities in cash and $9 million to reduce the floating debt. In addition, securities to the value of $696 million were renewed or converted, not including the annual renewal of $33 million of school lands debentures. Of the cash obtained by the issue of new securities, $60 million came from the increase in the treasury bill issues, $170 million resulted from the sale of $200 million 2-year notes to the chartered banks less a reduction of $30 million in the deposit certificates outstanding; the remainder, $2,732 million, was the proceeds of borrowing from the general public. War savings certificates, together with the accumulated interest thereon, yielded $47 million net, non-interest-bearing certificates $1 million and sales of victory bonds $2,684 million.

In the budget speech of last year, I charged national war finance committee with the duty of promoting continuously the sale of war savings certificates and stamps and of organizing and conducting two victory loan campaigns. This task they faithfully and brilliantly accomplished.

Sales of securities and stamps, including conversion sales, by the national war finance organization amounted to about $2,947 million. Of this total, sales to individuals, excluding those in the special names canvass, amounted to $1,239 million and the number of applications on the occasion of the fifth victory loan rose to 3 million. With the permission of the house, I shall put on Hansard a brief table giving the detail of these sales:

Security	Total amount (millions)	Sales to[1] individuals (millions)	Sales to others (millions)	Number of applications (millions)
Fourth victory loan cash sales	$1,308·7	$ 529·5	$ 779·2	2·7
Fifth victory loan cash sales	1,375·0	599·7	775·3	3·0
Conversion sales	195·6	42·2	153·4	0·0
Total	$1,570·6	$ 641·9	$ 928·7
War savings certificates	66·5	66·5	....	10·2
Stamps[2]	1·4	1·4	....	....
Total	$2,947·2	$1,239·3	$1,707·9	....

[1] Excludes individuals covered in the special names canvass.

[2] Net increase in public holdings; certificate sales include certificates issued against payments in stamps. Total stamp sales in the year were $12·2 million.

This is the largest volume of securities which has ever been sold to the Canadian public in any year, but probably it will have to be exceeded in the present year. Further, bonds and certificates are now held by more people than ever before. It is estimated that there are at least 2½ million persons holding war and victory bonds, and perhaps over 3½ million individuals holding war savings certificates.

The costs of our public borrowing operations are very low considering the magnitude of the loans, and the number of individual transactions. In the year ended March 31, 1944, costs incurred by the national war finance committee, with respect to the sale of victory bonds, and war savings certificates and stamps, amounted to only about 87 cents for each $100 of securities sold—that is, seven-eighths of 1 per cent of total sales. To achieve such outstanding results at this cost, is, in my opinion, a proud record of accomplishment. It is a record which is made possible only by the voluntary services of the tens of thousands of people who form the voluntary staff of the national war finance organization, by the tremendous energy and enthusiasm they bring to the discharge of the war-time responsibility which has been entrusted to them by their fellow-Canadians, and by the unremitting and wholehearted support given to our victory loans by business firms, by the press, the radio, the motion picture industry, and by labour, agricultural, and many other organizations and groups throughout the country.

There is one point at which the record of our war financing is not as good as I would wish. On several occasions over the past two years, I have referred to the fact that many investors are disposing of victory bonds they bought during campaign periods, and that many people are presenting war savings certificates for redemption. I should like to say here a further word to the millions of Canadians who now own victory bonds and war savings certificates.

Last year, I said that when a person buys a victory bond or a war savings certificate, that person is helping his country to get the materials needed for war use, and, in doing so, is doing his part to fight the home-front battle against inflation. I went on to say that when people sell their bonds or have their certificates redeemed, they are withdrawing this help. These statements are true to-day as they were a year ago. This is a time for increasing our support of our fighting forces. It is not the time to withdraw it. We are giving and maintaining this support when we set aside the largest possible amount of savings for the purchase of victory bonds and certificates, and when we hold on to the bonds and certificates we now own.

Emergency needs for cash are one thing. Unnecessary spending, financed by the turning of bonds or certificates into cash, is quite another. Unnecessary spending at this time is a betrayal of our obligation to the men who are risking their lives and dying in the great battle for world freedom.

Everyone who owns bonds or certificates should always remember that a reserve of savings will be of great value to the individual and to the nation after the war. When materials and productive facilities can again be devoted to civilian use, more and better-quality goods will be on sale than are available to-day. Now is the time to lay aside funds for building something after the war, or for buying something new and durable, or to start one's own business—or to expand it.

In the meantime, the money invested in bonds and certificates is ready for emergency use at any time it may be needed because there is always a ready market for victory bonds, and war savings certificates are redeemable any time after six months from date of issue. But before any person sells his bonds or presents his certificates for redemption, I would ask him to weigh his real or imagined need for cash against his country's need for his continued support at this critical stage of the war and against the advantages, national and personal, which can be realized by the postponement of spending until after the war is over.

THE FUNDED DEBT

At March 31, 1944, the gross unmatured funded debt is estimated to have been $10,689 million, of which ninety-seven per cent was held in Canada. The net debt at the same date was $8,842 million. The annual interest charge on the funded debt was $274 million or an average rate of 2·57 per cent. On March 31, 1939, the average rate of interest on the funded debt was 3·52 per cent. In addition to the funded debt, there are outstanding bonds and debentures, guaranteed by the government of Canada, in the amount of $699 million, a decrease of $17 million during the year.

From time to time, concern is expressed over the growing size of the national debt. The increase in our national debt as a result of war should be viewed in perspective. There are other considerations than the amount, which is determined chiefly by the necessity of war expenditures. In the five years from 1914 to 1919, the debt of that day had increased nearly seven times, but because the average rate had risen from 3·579 to 5·022 per cent the annual interest charges had risen more than nine times. Further, about one-third of the debt was payable outside the country and a substantial portion of the debt was in tax-exempt securities. Commodity prices had more than doubled, and were about to fall.

In the past five years, while the funded debt has increased slightly more than three times, the average rate of interest has declined from 3·52 to 2·57 per cent, and the annual interest charges have risen two and a quarter times. If we take into account the revenue received by the government then the net interest charges have increased only by a much smaller amount. The share of the debt payable outside the country has fallen from twenty-six to scarcely more than three per cent; there are no tax-exempt bonds, and we have every expectation of a post-war price level not seriously lower than the present.

I do not wish to push historical comparisons too far; they do give some perspective and draw attention to significant facts. I would emphasize rather that, while the national debt has increased, our national income, and with it our capacity to carry the debt has fully doubled since the beginning of the war. I would point out that the debt is almost wholly domestic. What is paid in debt charges goes into the pockets of taxpayers whose taxpaying capacity is thereby increased. We have, through the great efforts of the war finance committee and as a matter of deliberate policy, succeeded in distributing our new borrowing very widely so that the interest on the public debt will be paid, not to a few institutions and men of wealth, but to probably not less than sixty per cent of the income-earners of this country. These are reasons why I have confidence in the ability of the country to carry this debt and in the soundness and stability of these bonds as an investment.

II

BUDGET FORECAST 1944-45 AND PROPOSALS

The record of 1943-44 has been made reasonably clear. It is quite a different task to make realistic estimates and proposals for 1944-45. The events and circumstances which will determine the course of the year's activities have not yet unfolded.

The expenditure estimates for the year now current are known to the house. For non-war expenditures as covered in the main estimates $702 million is required. The war estimates stand at $3,650 million, about $62 million less than our war expenditures last year. The Mutual Aid appropriation is $800 million. The estimated expenditures thus reach a total of $5,152 million. This is some $350 million less than the total estimates for last year and $208 million less than the actual expenditures last year, but as will be pointed out later this amount does not represent the whole of our requirements.

On the revenue side, it is estimated that, under the present tax laws, revenues in 1944-45, not including the refundable portion of taxes, will be $2,617 million as compared with $2,701 million in the past year. I shall place on

Hansard a statement showing the details of this estimate in comparison with the revenues of 1943-44:

	1944-45 (millions)	1943-44 (millions)
Customs duties	$ 160	$ 168
Excise duties	150	142
Sales tax	290	305
War exchange tax	120	119
Other excise taxes	225	215
Income taxes:
Personal	830	813
Corporate	300	311
Excess profits	425	469
Interest and dividends	27	27
Succession duties	17	15
Miscellaneous	8	8
	$2,552	$2,592
Non-tax revenue	145	140
Total ordinary revenue	$2,697	$2,732
Special receipts	$ 75	$ 124
Total revenue	$2,772	$2,856
Net total revenue	$2,617	$2,701

The table shows that, under the present tax laws, we anticipate declines from customs duties and sales tax. These, it is thought, will result from two sources. In some lines there is likely to be a reduction in volume. To some degree, these taxes are being removed from individual items as administratively a more practical alternative than paying subsidies where such are necessary to maintain the price ceiling.

It is expected that revenues from the personal income tax will increase but that revenue from the corporate income tax and from the excess profits tax will decline. Non-tax revenues are likely to show a small increase.

If these expectations are borne out, there will be a decline of slightly less than $100 million in our total revenues this year. Expenditures of $5,152 million and revenues of $2,617 million will result in a budgetary deficit for 1944-45 of $2,535 million, about $124 million less than that for 1943-44. These estimates are carefully made, but I shall say frankly that I do not attach much importance to the anticipated decline in the deficit. We have entered the period of the most active and widespread offensive operations of the whole war. I consider it not only probable but certain that the swiftly moving events of this year will require expenditures which could not have been anticipated months ago when our appropriations were made up—expenditures which no one would for a moment hesitate to make. In short, while I am bound to subtract our anticipated revenues from the expenditures for which parliament has been asked to make appropriations, I cannot conceal my own conviction that when the accounts for 1944-45 are closed, we shall find that the budgetary deficit has, in fact, been greater, not less, than that for 1943-44.

I have already explained at some length that the amount of our cash deficiency differs substantially from the budgetary deficit, and that our total cash requirements do not coincide with our total expenditures. I have reason to believe that, even though our expenditures do not turn out to be greater than the present appropriations, our cash requirements will exceed those of last year.

The probable circumstances affecting various asset accounts are involved in this prediction, but I shall mention only the main ones. The house and indeed the whole country is aware that, after some reduction in the output of war materials and equipment of which great stocks had been built up, there is now intense pressure, in this as in allied countries, to increase war output to the highest possible peak so that the tremendous operations which have been begun so successfully on the continent of Europe may not be limited nor men be sacrificed for lack of fire-power, equipment and supplies. This vast flow of food, supplies and equipment from field and factory to the advancing fronts of Italy and France is a miracle of organization and a prime requisite of victory. Some of these supplies go to our own forces and are covered by the war appropriation which may have to be supplemented before the end of the present fiscal year. Others go to our allies under an arrangement that, in consideration of their being used by their forces for the defeat of the enemy, no payment will be required now or later. These are covered by the Mutual Aid appropriation. Beyond these, there will probably be large shipments, payment for which is not provided under the war appropriation or the Mutual Aid appropriation. For these we shall have to take payment only in the future or present payment in a currency other than Canadian. Whatever the arrangements, they have this in common that, economically, we can at present get no additional goods in exchange for what we send, and, therefore, the pressure on our man-power is increased, and, financially, we have to find the cash, here and now, to pay for their production and transportation.

There are other factors affecting other asset accounts, but I think I have said enough by way of explanation. As nearly as we can now estimate, even though our expenditures chargeable to the budget should prove to be lower than those of last year, our cash requirements are likely to be some $200 million in excess of those of 1943-44, in other words something over $6,000 million, and mainly because of the need for arms and supplies to press the invasion and secure the victory.

BASIC CONSIDERATIONS

The cash requirement is the first, and most stubborn fact, with which we have had to reckon in framing financial proposals for the current year. This is the measure of the goods and services which must be acquired for war and other governmental uses. Whether in acquiring them, we incur an expenditure or make an investment has some significance for the future but none for the present. It is not unexpected that in this critical year our cash requirements should be high, and, in fact, as I have explained, they are higher than in any previous year.

The second consideration is the urgent need to achieve and maintain the highest possible production of goods and services of which our available working force and management is capable. The urgency of production is very great, and it is immediate. This is not a matter of building up a great organization from which output will flow in one or two years' time. The need is for maximum production now—from our present capacity and working force. It cannot be met except by maximum production per person.

A third consideration is the desirability of relieving cases of special hardship which very frequently arise when tax rates are heavy, and of removing some anomalies which experience has revealed in the working of our laws.

Finally, we have felt it necessary to keep in mind that we are nearer the end of the European phase of the war than we were. It is not in any spirit of foolish optimism that I state this consideration. The most gruelling part of the race is ahead of us, and if, by great good fortune, the coming months should bring victory in Europe, the Japanese phase of the war will still call for great efforts. Nevertheless, it is no more than prudent to give sober consideration to some of the problems which will arise when we are able to release some portion of our productive capacity for the purposes of peace. Let no one misunderstand me. This is no time to begin the execution, as distinguished from the making, of post-war plans. There is other work for every pair of hands at the moment. I am concerned only with clearing away some of the uncertainties of fiscal policy—opening the way for business firms, both large and small, to proceed on as definite as possible a basis with the drawing up of plans for the post-war conversion and expansion of industry and trade on which employment after the war will depend. If the planning and designing can be done, the execution of the plans will come in good time.

These are the considerations which we have had in mind in framing the financial proposals for this budget.

PERSONAL INCOME TAX

In reviewing the personal income tax, we have given consideration to many contentions that our rates of tax are too heavy and entail serious hardship particularly on persons with low incomes. Realizing that war-time taxation can never be light, we have, nevertheless, carefully reviewed our taxation in its effects on the lower incomes and in comparison with the taxes of other countries.

The main features of our income tax as they affect persons of low income are these: The personal income tax, including the compulsory savings element, consists of two levies. A normal tax of seven per cent is levied on the whole taxable income of single persons who receive more than $660 a year and of married persons who receive more than $1,200 a year. A tax credit is given for each child. In addition, a graduated tax is levied in ascending rates on the taxable income in excess of $660 and tax credits are given for wives and dependents. In order that incentive might not be destroyed by the abrupt application of the seven per cent rate to incomes slightly in excess of $660 or $1,200 there was at first a provision that the income could not be reduced below $660 or $1,200 by reason of the tax, including the compulsory savings portion, and later there was substituted the present provision that the total tax could not be more than two-thirds of the amount by which the taxable income exceeded $660 in the case of single persons or $1,200 in the case of married persons. Thus for single persons whose taxable income is between $660 and $820 the tax on each additional dollar of income is 66⅔ per cent, of which half is compulsory saving and only the other half is pure tax. For married persons, the same rate applies to a range of incomes above $1,200. For those without children the range is considerable, while for those with children it is less extensive.

The suggestion most frequently made is that we should increase the exemptions from $660 and $1,200 to $750 and $1,500 or even higher figures. This would relieve a considerable number of present taxpayers from income tax altogether and would reduce total taxes substantially for all others, no matter how large their incomes. There is a variety of other ways in which taxes could be reduced.

In considering the level of taxes, we are all inclined to look back to the exemptions and rates in force in Canada in 1939. It will improve our perspective if we look also at the exemptions and rates provided in the laws of other countries to-day. In the United States, the basic exemptions under the 1944 income tax law are $500 for single and $1,000 for married persons. In the United Kingdom, they are the equivalent of $356 for single and $623 for married persons. In Australia, the exemption for single persons is $372 and for married persons without children there is no additional exemption though the rates are lower than for single persons. In New Zealand, there is no exemption whatever in respect of the basic 12½ per cent national and social security taxes, which are levied on the whole income, no matter how small, without exemption, while the exemptions for the graduated tax, and for that only, are $713 for single and $897 for married persons.

In comparing our tax rates with those of other countries, we must remember that our tax is divided into two parts: the first is pure or fixed tax, and the second a refundable or savings portion which will be paid back with interest after the war, and, unlike the compulsory saving in the United Kingdom, it has not to be paid by any taxpayer who is making equal, contractual savings voluntarily. In any comparison of tax rates with those of allied countries, we must compare tax with tax, not with savings. I am not sure that it is generally understood that on this basis Canadians in the lower income groups are not taxed more heavily than the people of other countries.

On the contrary, on the basis of non-refundable taxes, single persons, in the United States, getting from $500 to $1,000 are more highly taxed than in Canada; at higher incomes the Canadian taxes are higher. Married persons without dependents and with incomes from $500 to $1,500 are more highly taxed in the United States; from $1,500 up, our taxes become higher. In the United States, a married person with two children pays a higher tax than our law imposes until the income rises above $1,600.

For each of the three categories, single, married with no dependents, and married with two dependents, and for all levels of earned income up to $2,000 at least, the fixed or non-refundable income taxes payable in the United Kingdom, Australia and New Zealand are substantially higher than in this country.

Mr. GRAYDON: Have those other countries compulsory savings?

Mr. ILSLEY: The United Kingdom has.

Mr. GRAYDON: The other two, Australia and New Zealand, have not?

Mr. ILSLEY: I do not think so.

With the permission of the house, I shall place on Hansard tables showing these comparisons in detail for incomes up to $2,000. I commend these tables to the careful attention and study of the house:

The combined rates of tax and savings levied in Canada on nearly all incomes up to $2,000 are higher than the pure tax rates payable in the United States. They are at no point as high as the combined tax and compulsory savings rates payable in the United Kingdom, and they are rarely as high as the rates of pure, non-refundable tax levied in Australia and New Zealand.

These are the facts regarding the relative height of our tax rates, and neither they nor the financial requirements of the year offer any support to proposals for tax reduction. Nevertheless, I appreciate that there are among the lower income groups cases of hardship where individual circumstances increase the severity of the deductions from income required under our law. We had this in mind when we provided so large a refundable portion in the combined tax and savings levy. We had it in mind in providing that the savings portion need not be paid if the taxpayer was making equal contractual savings voluntarily, and when provision was made for an allowance against unusual medical expenses. In framing the present law, great importance was attached to the large savings portion to be returned with interest after the war. Yet I realize that any large compulsory payments, whether they are refundable or not, will create hardships in the particular circumstances affecting some family budgets. It is the chief virtue of voluntary saving in comparison with compulsory saving that it is more flexible and can be adjusted more readily to fit the particular and changing circumstances of different individuals and families.

Other considerations have also given concern. It has been widely represented that the high rates of deduction for income tax purposes is having an adverse effect on production, particularly as many taxpayers apparently do not make any distinction in their minds between refundable and non-refundable taxes but regard them all as simply taxes. The fact that it is not administratively possible to issue certificates for the refundable portion until a considerable time after the deductions are made contributes to this misunderstanding. At this stage of a long war, there are many causes contributing to absenteeism, unwillingness to work overtime and lack of application on the job. But it is alleged that the high rates of deduction for tax and savings are a contributing factor. I am not in a position to judge fully how far this is true, but I do know that now is the time when the need for greater production is urgent and immediate.

In the period of the war in which we have been building up our income tax and savings law and our collection machinery, we have also been building up a voluntary savings organization, which has achieved a notable record of success. Under the national war finance committee, the organization and stimulation of voluntary savings have been brought to a very high level indeed. The work of the national war finance committee now permeates the whole nation to a degree which had not been attained when compulsory savings were instituted.

In reviewing all the circumstances, I have been impressed with an undesirable feature of our income tax. As I have already indicated, our law moderates the abrupt application of the seven per cent normal tax to incomes slightly in excess of $660 and $1,200 by providing that the total tax, including the savings portion, shall not be more than two-thirds of the amount by which the taxable income exceeds $660 or $1,200. Nevertheless, this is a high rate of levy on each extra dollar earned and though it extends over a limited range of incomes, it is undesirable if it seriously blunts incentive.

In the second place, as I mentioned earlier, we cannot overlook the number of cases of special difficulty and hardship which result from high combined tax and savings rates when the savings rate is as rigid and as compulsory as the tax rate.

I have been forced to the conclusion that it would be a desirable change in our income tax law to discontinue the refundable feature of the income tax leaving as the full rates of taxation, the rates of pure, non-refundable tax as they now stand, and depending on voluntary savings to replace the proceeds of the compulsory saving provision. This step will reduce the total tax deductions from each additional dollar of income earned, by one-half for those in the lower income ranges who, being without contractual savings, had to make the full compulsory savings contribution. It will substitute the flexible instrument of voluntary saving for the more rigid method of compulsory saving. The refundable feature of our income tax law provided simply a method of borrowing and of borrowing for progressively shorter terms as the war goes on. With its provision of allowances for contractual savings, it embodied a principle of fairness which I regret to relinquish. Nevertheless, if this particular method of borrowing, despite its virtues, has the one fault of discouraging production at this critical period of the war, or if by its rigidity it creates hardship among those income groups whose incomes leave little room for adjustment, then another method of borrowing must be found.

It is recommended, therefore, that no further deductions for the refundable or savings portion be made after June 30, 1944. This will mean that for the year 1944 as a whole, the liability for compulsory savings will be reduced by one-half, deductions having been made during the first six months of the year. For 1945, it is recommended that the total tax liability shall be reduced by the amount of the required savings portion applicable to each taxpayer. More simply, the rates and deductions now applicable to those who have full offsets in contractual savings will apply to all taxpayers.

I must repeat and emphasize that this proposal does not imply that the need for saving is less. On the contrary, from every point of view, the need is greater than ever before.

Civilian goods continue to be in relatively short supply; the demands from the war fronts are more imperative; and overall cash requirements are mounting to new high levels. Only the desire to remove a barrier to production, to do away with misunderstandings and to meet legitimate complaints of hardship could have induced me to recommend at this time a step which tests still further the willingness of our people to respond to the appeal for voluntary savings. It is on voluntary savings that the country must rely to replace the $110 to $115 million dollars a year which will be relinquished by the change. If our people understand the need, I am sure that they will answer the call.

The other changes which are proposed in the personal income tax are changes in detail designed to relieve cases of special hardship. I shall state only the principle of each change and defer fuller explanation until the house discusses the resolutions.

To make the medical expenses allowance now provided in the Income War Tax Act more fully and fairly available to those who have the misfortune to encounter unusually heavy medical expenses, it is recommended that medical expenses incurred outside of Canada should be allowed on the same basis as if incurred in Canada.

In recognition of the additional expenses which they incur, it is proposed that persons suffering from blindness, as defined in the Old Age Pensions Act, be permitted an allowance of $480 in the form of a deduction from income. This is to be an alternative and not an addition to the allowance for the wages of a full-time attendant now provided under the medical expenses section of the act.

The dropping of the refundable or savings portion of the income tax will help to alleviate many of the cases where our taxes result in some measure of hardship. There are other recommendations to which I now wish to refer respecting dependents, which are intended to recognize more fully than before the varying circumstances of family responsibility. These I believe will be thoroughly in keeping with the greater emphasis that we shall be placing upon family welfare after the war. With the introduction of family allowances we are taking a great stride forward in improving the position of those with low incomes and family responsibilities. Now with respect to dependent children, it is proposed to authorize the extension of the tax credits now granted in respect of the taxpayer's children to include illegitimate children and other children dependent on the taxpayer. In the registration records covering all children, which are necessary for the administration of family allowances, there will come into existence a dependable basis for administering this extended provision which has not hitherto existed. In respect of dependents other than children, I am recommending that the allowances now given for the support of blood relatives be extended to include relatives by marriage supported by the taxpayer.

Our present provision that when the wife or husband, as the case may be, of a taxpayer has an income from investments in excess of $660, both shall be taxed as single persons, has resulted in very severe penalties. There is no concern over cases in which both the taxpayer and his wife have substantial incomes, but when the wife's income rises a small amount over $660, the husband who is a taxpayer loses the tax credit of $150, becomes liable to the higher rates of normal tax imposed on single persons, and has his refundable portion reduced even though the family income may have increased by only a few dollars. It is proposed to provide a method for avoiding these penalties in the marginal cases by allowing a gift to be made to the crown in the right of Canada and to allow such a gift as a deduction from income. Thus, a husband whose wife has an income exceeding $660 need not be taxed as a single person unless her income exceeds $660 by an amount sufficient to equal the additional tax resulting from the single status.

The present provision, whereby a person paying alimony or comparable payments to a divorced or separated wife or husband, as the case may be, is allowed, as a tax credit, the amount of the tax for which such wife or husband is liable on that income, has worked great hardship in the case of persons with relatively low incomes and making relatively low payments. It is proposed, therefore, to amend the law so that the amount of such payments shall be allowed as a deduction from income.

There are a number of amendments related to the retirement of employees from service and contributions to pension funds. It is proposed to allow those who receive long-service gratuities in a lump sum on retirement from service to spread the sum over five years for tax purposes. Contributions of an employee to an approved pension fund are now allowed as a deduction from income up to $300. It is proposed to allow, additionally, payments up to the same amount into such funds by employees, if required to make up past deficiencies. Contributions to approved trade union pension funds paid in the form of union dues are to be allowed as a deduction from income, as is now done in the case of other approved pension funds. It is proposed that persons reaching the age of sixty-five shall be entitled to the return of refundable taxes standing to their credit after the end of the year in which they reach sixty-five.

The present period of thirty days allowed for making an appeal against income tax assessment is much too short to be fair to members of the armed forces and I am recommending that for them it be extended to one year, or such longer period as the Minister of National Revenue may allow.

To the various powers to require information, it is proposed to add the power to require anyone accepting deposits to report the interest paid on such deposits.

There are some amendments affecting the status of those who maintain in the words of the act "self-contained domestic establishments" which will require detailed explanations into which I shall not enter now. Other proposed amendments would allow taxes paid to foreign governments to be deducted from the non-refundable portion of our tax rather than the total tax, change the penalty for late filing, and the rate of interest on unpaid tax, and limit the time within which assessments can be reopened, except in case of fraud or misrepresentation, to six years after the first assessment.

There are two special income tax problems to which we have given a great deal of study in the past year and to which I wish now to refer. The first of these is the treatment of annuities and other like payments, such as the various types of pension and retirement plans. I have been strongly urged, both in the public press and by letter, to alter the present basic rule under which life annuities are taxed in the same way as any other form of income. The principle upon which our law is founded is the same as that which underlies the income tax in Britain, where so many of the fundamentals of income tax law were developed. This English law has been thoroughly tested in many appeals to the courts, and affords us a well-established foundation on which to base our act and its application. The essential principle we follow is that a life annuity contains no element of capital repayment which the law should recognize. This general principle was commended by the distinguished royal commission which reexamined the income tax in Great Britain in 1920.

The critics argue, however, that just as we recognize an element of capital repayment in an annuity for a fixed term of years, so we should, by taking into account normal life expectancy, recognize a portion of a life annuity, in any one year, as a return of capital rather than income. Nevertheless, in dealing with the matter there are more than actuarial considerations to be taken into account. Our basic concept of income—the essential distinction between income and capital payments—is involved. Moreover, we must relate the treatment of annuities to the treatment of pensions and retirement plans of various types. We should, in fact, reconcile the treatment under income tax of the various forms of the accumulation and use of savings. This is a complicated task, and there are many conflicting considerations. In this respect, it may be necessary to consider not only the form of the annual payment but also its origin. Furthermore, we should, I believe, have in mind the relation of annuity and pension plans to succession duties as well as to income tax, and not only the position of the individual taxpayer but the broader aspects of public policy. If the wealthy are to convert their capital into annuities and live upon a presumed return of capital tax-free, we shall lose substantial succession duty revenue.

If we should recognize a portion of a life annuity as return of capital, we are faced with many complex questions in our treatment of pension plans. For example, could we with fairness regard partly as capital the pension given in the form of an annuity by a generous employer to an old employee on retirement, while treating entirely as income the wages of another, whose employer is unable or unwilling to retire him in similar circumstances? How should we reconcile the treatment of life annuities with the payments out of pension funds at present entirely free from income tax because the payments by employees into the fund have not been exempt? Would it be fair to continue to allow as a deduction from income the contribution of employees to approved superannuation plans? If we should change this practice, how much return of capital are we to recognize in the resulting superannuation payments? Should we not reconsider then our practice in overlooking, as income of the employee, the contribution made on his behalf to the pension fund by his employer? How can we best achieve fairness in the combination of income tax and succession duties when applied to various types of provision for retirement and family security, including, for instance, various life insurance and endowment plans, periodical payments under wills which may or may not be supported by the corpus of the estate, various types of annuity and superannuation plans, and even the normal accumulation of property or securities? If we continue to adhere to the British principle, where should the line be drawn in its application to the various combinations of term and life annuities, and between annuities and pension plans? Finally, must we recognize inevitably the wastage of capital in its financial forms and not the wastage of human capital which all must suffer who work for a living?

I mention these difficulties merely to demonstrate that much careful, detailed review of our law is necessary before we embark upon a new course in the basic treatment of annuities and pensions.

The second income tax problem to which I referred is much less common but probably more difficult and incapable of any wholly satisfactory solution. It was briefly discussed last year in the house and I said we would try to work out some form of alleviation for what we recognized to be cases of unfairly heavy taxation. It is created by the combined incidence of income tax and succession duties upon the holdings of deceased persons in private corporations with accumulated surpluses, when these holdings cannot readily be sold to others—as can shares in larger and public corporations—and funds must be obtained through the transfer of the surplus to the taxpayer's estate. I have seen a number of cases where after the payment of income taxes on the lump sum distribution of the surplus the amount left would not be sufficient to pay the succession duties. Since the enactment of our Dominion Succession Duties Act in 1941 and the raising of our income tax to its present heights, this problem has become most acute. In addition to confronting many families with grave difficulties, this problem, it is alleged, may endanger the whole future of private and family businesses, forcing them to consider either selling out to larger companies or the distribution of their shares through the securities markets, thus sacrificing the advantages of personal management by the proprietors—one of the sound and well-recognized virtues of small businesses. My colleague, the Minister of National Revenue, and I have looked into dozens of cases of this kind and tried out quite a number of formulae designed to avoid the inequity arising from this combination of taxes without creating unfairness either to the taxpayers or the crown. We have not yet succeeded in finding a satisfactory plan for dealing with these hard cases. We believe that with further study, a plan can be devised that will afford a measure of justice, relieving at least those cases where the present laws would leave little, if anything, for the family of the chief shareholder in a private company, while the estate of an equally wealthy man owning more readily marketable shares in a large, well-known corporation would pay only the fair rate of tax which parliament and the provincial legislatures intended. When a solution is achieved, I would recommend that it should be applied in respect of those cases now pending.

In the hope of securing the best and soundest solutions of these two difficult problems, I am proposing to make use of the procedure which has frequently been found of value in dealing with particularly difficult tax problems in Great Britain, and therefore to recommend the appointment of a special commission to inquire into these problems in detail, to examine the various types of cases involved, to hear evidence if necessary, and to make recommendations for their solution. As a consequence, I am expecting that in next year's budget, answers to these difficult basic problems of our income tax can be proposed which will not only appear as reasonable and practical under war conditions, but which may be expected to stand the test of time as well.

EXCESS PROFITS TAX AND CORPORATE INCOME TAX

Business profits are taxed under the Excess Profits Tax Act and corporate profits are taxed additionally under the Income War Tax Act. Profits withdrawn from business are again taxed as personal income. As a result of this overlapping of taxes, high wartime rates, and the strict definition of income, our tax treatment of business profits is severe. I imagine that most members of the house are unaware of the great extent to which our taxation of business profits as such is more severe than that of either the United Kingdom or the United States. I have always taken and still maintain the view that our policy in this regard is right and proper in war time. I have no amendments to propose which will in anything but a minor way affect our current revenue from taxes on business profits.

One of the great dangers in imposing high rates of tax on business profits is that of inadvertently going beyond the taxation of profits and making inroads on capital or to put it another way that the taxes collected shall turn out to bear a much higher rate to the ultimately realized income than was contemplated in the law. The danger has its origin in the fact that business taxes are imposed on a yearly accounting basis whereas only a period of years, taking the good with the bad, will reveal the true earnings of an enterprise. Our present law makes some allowance for this, but, generally, we tax the yearly profits at very high rates and disregard the losses. We cannot shut our eyes to the fact that with the change from war to peace many firms may encounter temporary losses and under our present practice, taxes paid over the whole period of war and readjustment may bear considerably higher rates to the full realized income than those prescribed in the law. I am particularly concerned lest for this reason, when the time comes to replace war industries with peace industries, business enterprises should be handicapped in making the necessary changes or should be hesitant rather than prompt in action.

I am proposing, therefore, for the purposes of the corporation income tax and the excess profits tax, that business firms shall be allowed to charge their losses in any one year back to the profits, if any, in the preceding year and forward to the profits, if any, of the succeeding three years. This will permit a firm to charge losses which it may encounter in the first post-war year against the profits of the last war year. It will give such a firm the further assurance that losses which it incurs in the period of converting and expanding its business may be made a first charge on the profits of the succeeding three years when it may hope to be reaping some of the results of its enterprise.

This recommendation will bring our taxation of business profits nearer to the principle of taxing only what is actually realized in income over a period of years and should be of substantial assistance to business enterprise in the post-war years.

Another point, at which our taxes on business income have gone beyond the taxation of true income, is in the matter of expense for maintenance and repairs. These, of course, are a normal expense of doing business. For the past two years, in certain industries at least, it has been impossible, by reason of shortages of materials and labour and the necessity of continuous operations, to carry out the maintenance and repair work that would be normal and necessary to prevent the deterioration of plant and equipment. As a result, deferred maintenance expense is accumulating, and, in the meantime, profits are inflated because full maintenance is not charged. We have tried in the past to find some equitable formula for permitting the setting up of a maintenance reserve, but it is extremely difficult to devise one which will fit the varying circumstances of all industry.

We are now recommending a provision for the future which I hope will meet the problem in at least a partial way, and will speed up the work of plant repair in a period when additional employment may be needed. The proposal is that one-half the expenditure on maintenance and repairs, incurred in a period to be fixed by the governor in council, may be charged against the income of a previous fiscal period but not farther back than the fiscal periods ending in 1943. In the case of the mining industry, maintenance and repairs will be held to include also underground development work.

I have also some important recommendations which should facilitate the expansion of industry after the war. All will agree that Canadian industry must expand its research and technical development if we are to apply the most advanced technical knowledge to our resources, and maintain our competitive position. By all means, let us borrow whatever is best from other countries, but what we can borrow is not always what we need. The present tax treatment of expenditures for research is somewhat less than generous, and has some arbitrary results. Two classes of expenditure for research are not allowed as an expense of doing business: capital expenditures such as for laboratories, pilot plants, et cetera, and current expenses for research which are not directly related to the firm's immediate production activities. It is recommended that these limitations be removed and that all expenditures on research of a current nature be allowed in the year of expenditure and that research expenditures of a capital nature be written off as an expense over a period of three years.

There is a practical problem of the very greatest significance to which consideration has been given. Our drastic Excess Profits Tax Act is entirely a war-time measure. It has been appropriate to a war economy, but, in my opinion, it would be highly inappropriate as normal peace-time legislation. On the other hand, it would be a great mistake to repeal the measure until the conditions, which it was designed to meet, have disappeared. We do not know when the end of the war will come. Whether it comes soon or late, we do not know how closely the need for industrial and commercial conversion and expansion will coincide with the end of the war. What we do know is that at some time on fairly short notice it is going to be necessary to say to business, now is the time to put into effect your post-war plans. It is quite clear to everyone that present rates of taxation are, as they are intended to be, very discouraging to new enterprise, other than necessary war enterprise, and that the prudent course of a business man would be to delay his new ventures until the new level of taxation had been established. On the other hand, it is impossible and improper for a Minister of Finance to announce what will be recommended to parliament in future budgets.

I am making a recommendation which I think offers a practical way out of this dilemma, maintaining our present revenues and conforming to the principle of restricting taxation, as nearly as possible, to taxation of income. It is that we provide that, in respect of bona fide new investment in depreciable assets carried out after a date to be designated by the governor in council, the taxpayer should be allowed rates of depreciation which may vary at the option of the taxpayer between maximum rates double the present ordinary rates and minimum rates which will be one-half the ordinary rates.

The significance of this proposal is twofold: first, it will allow the taxpayer to recover a part of his capital whenever earnings are good but will still leave all the income or profit, actually realized from the venture over its whole life, subject to taxation; second, it will allow him, in respect of such new investment carried out at a time when the government has declared the conversion and expansion of industry to be desirable, to transfer some of his income from a period when war-time tax rates may still be in effect to a later period when he may expect normal taxation to be lower. To this extent, it will relieve such investment for post-war purposes from such war-time taxation of business profits as may still be in effect at the time the work of conversion or expansion is carried out. It should be borne in mind that the taxpayer can write off no more than the full value of his new investment and to the extent that he reduces his taxable income in the early years he will increase it in the later years. There is nothing in the proposal which allows income to escape taxation.

There is a further recommendation to facilitate the plans of private industry for post-war expansion. It is desirable that, when the time comes to encourage such expansion, business firms shall be able to use the post-war refunds due to them under the Excess Profits Tax Act. On the other hand, although some firms may need them before others, it does not seem desirable that the government should make refunds available on a selective basis. It is, therefore, recommended that the act be amended to permit the assignment by way of security of the refundable portion in cases in which the governor in council is satisfied that the funds so obtained will be used in capital expenditures in preparation for post-war business giving desired employment.

The other recommendations which it is proposed to make on business taxation concern the detailed provisions of the act, and I shall try to explain only two or three of them.

[Mr. Ilsley.]

The first affects new businesses under the Excess Profits Tax Act. At present, a company starting a new business enterprise cannot know in advance of the beginning of operations what standard profit will be subsequently awarded by the board of referees. This uncertainty makes it difficult for a company to proceed with its plans. The amendment which I am recommending will provide that for the first fiscal period of a bona fide new business, taxes shall be levied at the flat rates which, in the ordinary case of corporations, will be forty per cent. This will give certainly to the tax position of the company for its first year. Thereafter, taxes will be levied in accordance with whatever standard profit is awarded.

Since the beginning of the excess profits tax in 1940, many businesses have substantially increased the volume of capital employed through ploughing back earnings. This has enabled them to expand productive facilities to meet the needs of war production. Unless a company has made an equivalent issue of capital stock, annual increases in the capital employed have not been taken as justification for any increase in the standard profits of the business, even though as a result of this reinvestment of earnings the business is substantially larger than it was in the standard period. It is now proposed, after four and one-half years of the operation of the Excess Profits Tax Act, to allow one adjustment upward in standard profits. The allowable adjustment upward will be an amount equal to five per cent of the increase in capital employed since the coming into force of the act where, under other provisions, no adjustment has been allowed in respect of new capital used in the business.

Those familiar with the technical features of our corporation income tax are aware that at present dividends paid from one Canadian company, whose earnings have been taxed, to another Canadian company are not taxable income in the hands of the receiving company. Furthermore, under certain conditions dividends from a wholly-owned subsidiary operating outside Canada are not taxable in the hands of the recipient Canadian company. In view of the fact that the profits of Canadian subsidiaries earned abroad will have already borne tax abroad at rates comparable to our own, it is now proposed that these dividends shall not again be taxable in the hands of the Canadian company receiving them. They are, of course, taxable when distributed by the Canadian company to its shareholders.

During recent months we have been urged to introduce a number of drastic changes in the tax structure as it affects the mining and oil producing industries. These industries are very properly considering their post-war position and the contribution which they can make to the solution of post-war problems. Needless to say, the government has very much in mind the need of a comprehensive and many-sided programme to encourage the efficient development of our natural resources and to assure that these industries will make the maximum contribution to the expansion of employment, national income and national wealth after the war. Natural resources, of course, are for the most part in the hands of the provinces, but the dominion, it is believed, can do much to promote full development and wise conservation. Tax policy may be one of the devices which it may appropriately use to these ends but it will be by no means the only one. The dominion's programme should be part of an integrated programme worked out in cooperation with the provinces. At the forthcoming dominion-provincial conference, this programme, it is proposed, should be discussed with provincial governments and agreement reached as to the contribution to be made by the respective levels of government.

For these reasons I believe that any radical changes in tax policy of special application only to the mining and oil companies would be premature at this time. The Excess Profits Tax Act already includes a special formula for the taxation of oil wells and gold mines. New companies in the metalliferous mining field enjoy a three-year exemption from excess profits tax. In last year's budget we made a number of important concessions to encourage exploration and drilling for oil and also made it possible for mining companies to write off exploration and prospecting expenses incurred in prospecting anywhere in Canada for base metals or strategic minerals. With this measure of encouragement the oil and mineral industries have been able to make a very important contribution to the country's war effort. They have also been willing to bear their full share of the burden of financing the war and they well recognize, I believe, that the need for war revenue continues at least as great and as urgent as ever. The changes I have announced in respect of income and excess profits taxation and the indications I have given in regard to future tax policy will apply to these industries as well as to other industrial enterprises and I hope that it may be possible to announce at the next session of parliament the comprehensive and integrated programme for the development and conservation of natural resources to which I have already referred.

While changes of a general nature in this field cannot be announced at this time, there is one situation which I believe calls for some immediate attention. My colleague, the Minister of Munitions and Supply, has recently reported to this house the serious situation in regard to supplies of oil. It is, I think, in the national interest that some additional encouragement be offered to the Canadian oil industry to undertake the drilling of several deep test wells in certain areas with a view to proving up significant, geological structures. The budget resolutions therefore include a recommendation to provide a tax credit of fifty per cent of the cost of any well drilled in the selected areas and spudded in between June 26, 1944, and March 31, 1945, if such well proves to be unproductive. This tax credit will be allowed only with respect to projects recommended by the Minister of Mines and Resources and approved by the governor in council.

With regard to the encouragement of prospecting for base metals or strategic minerals, it is proposed to extend for a further year the provision whereby a tax credit has been given in respect of contributions to prospecting syndicates.

TRADE AND TARIFF POLICY

For the present, the customs tariff is without any great influence on the scope or direction of external trade. Scarcity of supplies, agreed allocations, bulk purchasing, import and export permits, and import subsidies—these are the instruments which determine, for the time being, the extent and pattern of world trade. Changes in the customs tariff would here and now have little, if any, effect on the supply or cost of goods. The government continues, however, to have the most lively appreciation of the importance to this country, and, indeed, to all other trading countries, of entering a post-war world which has been freed or is assuredly being freed not only from the extraordinary wartime restrictions on trade, but also from the high tariffs, quotas, import licensing, and other restrictive and discriminatory trade practices which so paralyzed and dwarfed world trade in the inter-war years. As the time approaches when we and other countries must convert our productive resources to the purposes of peaceful prosperity, it becomes increasingly important that we should be able, in agreement with others, to set out the broad pattern of post-war trade policy, so that producers may know toward what markets they may orient their post-war plans.

The government's policy was clearly set out in the budget speech of last year and it may be appropriate to quote from that speech. After a reference to the obligations the government had assumed to enter into conversations with other countries on international economic policies, the following words were used:

> Committed to these objects and having in mind particularly the vital concern of this country in access to the selling and buying markets of the world, the government is prepared to discuss with the government of the United States, the government of the United Kingdom, or the governments of other countries with which we trade, reciprocal trade arrangements wider in scope and longer in duration than have hitherto been made, provided always that the advantages of such arrangements shall be open to other countries willing to adhere to the same terms.
> We believe that questions of post-war commercial policy must be tackled broadly and boldly; we believe that world trade must have a more liberal and dependable charter than it has had in the past two decades; and that countries, such as Canada, for which world trade is the very blood stream, should be prepared, not merely to accept desirable arrangements but to take the initiative in working out a plan mutually of benefit to ourselves and to other countries. We believe that countries, which have had long experience of friendly relations should associate themselves with that initiative and furnish to others examples of concrete accomplishment in the distribution of the world's products for the mutual welfare of all people.

On several occasions in the fifteen months which have elapsed since the budget of 1943 was presented, our officials have had exploratory and noncommittal conversations with officials of other countries on a wide range of economic matters, including, among others, monetary arrangements, international lending, the control of cartels and monopolies, international cooperation in promoting high levels of employment, and commercial policy. We have pressed forward studies of our own on these matters both with a view to contributing to these international discussions and to lay the basis for domestic measures in these fields. As has already been made public, the most progress in the international discussions was made in the field of monetary arrangements where agreement was reached among experts on the establishment of an international monetary fund. While equal progress was not made in the much more complex field of commercial policy, our officials pressed vigorously the need for a bold initiative in the orderly and agreed unshackling of world trade, if the ideals of economic expansion, higher incomes, full employment, adequate nutrition and the progressive abolition of poverty are to become realities. Considerable progress has been made in the definition and solution of the technical problems involved, and we shall continue to press at the appropriate time for the rapid development of a broad programme.

It is not, therefore, our intention to present at this time proposals for comprehensive alterations in our tariff structure. Such alterations would have no great immediate effect, and it is desirable that, if possible, we should make them in conformity with reciprocal arrangements made by other countries.

However, the government desires to give concrete evidence of the direction which it is endeavouring to follow in the formulation of post-war commercial policy. It desires also to give to agriculture assurance in respect of some of the conditions under which it may expect to operate after the war, just as it has tried to give to industry some assurance in the field of taxation policy.

Canadian agriculture will be faced with important opportunities in the post-war period and if it is to take full advantage of them, its costs of production should be at the lowest practicable level. Recognition of this fact was given by the farm improvement loans bill and several important provisions of the bill for the extension of the bank charters now under consideration by the banking and commerce committee. These measures have as one of their most important objectives the provision of credit facilities to farmers which will enable them to purchase agricultural implements at the lowest cost on a cash basis. With the same end in view, the government believes it appropriate to provide at once and without waiting for the completion of reciprocal arrrangements with other countries for the removal of all customs duties on agricultural implements. It is therefore recommended that agricultural machinery, including cream separators, and parts thereof, be made free under all tariffs. While it is impracticable from a revenue standpoint to remove the war exchange tax on the general range of commodities, the war exchange tax on agricultural machinery and cream separators and parts thereof is being removed along with the customs duties.

The removal of the customs duties and war exchange tax on farm implements will not increase the supply of such implements coming from the United States because they are subject to restricted allocations. The wartime prices and trade board will however amend its order setting ceiling prices on imported farm implements and repair parts in such a way as to give effect to any decreases in the laid-down cost to importers which will result from the action taken.

There are a number of other changes in the tariff but they are changes of detail made to remove anomalies and reduce administrative difficulties. They need not be explained until the resolutions are before the house.

THE WAR EXCHANGE CONSERVATION ACT

An important amendment to the War Exchange Conservation Act is proposed. The house will recall that this act was passed in December, 1940, as one of the means taken to reduce the demand for United States dollars at a time when our payments in that currency were running far in excess of our receipts. It was estimated at the time that the restrictions of imports then enacted would save $5 million to $6 million a month in badly-needed foreign exchange.

By that measure, a long list of articles enumerated in schedule I was prohibited entry into Canada, if imported from any country other than the sterling area and Newfoundland, except under permit granted by the Minister of National Revenue. It was understood that for the items under part I of the schedule no permits would be granted, while for those in part II permits would be granted on a restricted and declining scale.

Schedule II of the act contained an extensive list of items on which customs duties were reduced for imports entering Canada from the United Kingdom. Since 1940, there have been amendments to this part of the act extending the list and further reducing the duties. Duties on imports from the United Kingdom have in all cases, except liquors, tobaccos, sugar and silks, been reduced by at least 25 per cent, in the great majority of items by at least 50 per cent, and, on a great many, been removed altogether.

The house will realize that the discriminatory prohibitions of imports contained in the War Exchange Conservation Act would not in normal circumstances be compatible with our trade agreement with the United States and in taking the reluctant step of recommending the measure to parliament, the government evoked the war clause of that agreement. It was made very clear to our own people also that the measure was an emergency measure, and would not be maintained for protective reasons. In introducing the resolutions on December 2, 1940, I emphasized that it was "not for the purpose of assisting any producers or any industry . . . but to protect our exchange position."

As I explained to the house in my statement of April 21 of this year, our position in respect of foreign exchange has greatly improved, and the government is of the view that we are no longer justified in maintaining these severe restrictions of imports from the United States. We do not wish to deprive our own people of any supplies which may be procurable nor do we wish to retain these emergency prohibitions after the emergency is past. We wish further to make perfectly clear that this type of emergency trade regulation has no place in our normal trade policy.

It is recommended, therefore, that schedule I of the War Exchange Conservation Act and the relevant clauses be repealed.

There are some further explanations which I should add. It must not be assumed that there will forthwith flow into this country a flood of imports. Because of the scarcity of supplies in the United States, many of these prohibitions have been quite nominal in effect. Further, it is not proposed to extend import subsidies to luxury goods, and it will not be profitable in many lines to buy at United States prices and sell at the Canadian ceilings.

The house should understand also that import permits are required in many cases under other authority than that of the War Exchange Conservation Act. For purposes of allocating shipping space, to assist in the equitable allocation of short supplies among our own industries, and under arrangements made by the various combined boards, orders in council under the War Measures Act have imposed the requirement of import permits either for overseas imports or for imports from all sources. In some degree, these controls have been built around the War Exchange Conservation Act. It will, therefore, be necessary to determine what, if any, extensions of these orders in council are required by the amendments being proposed to that act. It may be that in some cases it will be necessary to supplement somewhat our import controls because of the amendments now proposed. Any such supplementary measures will, however, not discriminate against countries outside the sterling area. In order that there may be time to examine the effect of the withdrawal of schedule I from this act, on our whole system of import controls and make any necessary adjustments in it, I am recommending that this amendment should be effective as from August 1 of this year.

The changes proposed in the Succession Duty Act this year are quite minor in character. The details will be found in the resolutions which will be tabled. Similarly, the changes in the Sales Tax and in the taxes levied under the Special War Revenue Act are neither sufficiently numerous nor important enough to require explanation here.

CONCLUSION

This completes the changes in legislation which we are recommending. None of these changes will affect current tax revenues to any significant degree, although the dropping of compulsory savings will mean a loss in non-tax receipts estimated at $70 million for this fiscal year and $110 million for a full year.

To recapitulate the financial outlook for this year, taking account of the changes which are being recommended, we must start with the statement that our total cash requirements are likely to be $6,000 million or more, that is, about $200 million more than last year. Our revenues will probably be about $50 million lower than last year, and we are giving up receipts of about $70 million from compulsory savings. Our borrowing requirements will, therefore, be some $320 million more than in 1943-44 or more than $3,200 million.

To meet these requirements, having discontinued compulsory saving for individuals, we must turn to voluntary saving and to the national war finance committee, on whom the government depends for mobilizing the voluntary savings of the country and for whom this year I bespeak the active assistance of every member of this house and every Canadian citizen.

Throughout this speech, I have laid emphasis on the importance of the savings programme to Canada's war effort, on its importance to the continued success of our efforts to hold down the cost of living, and on its relationship to the preservation of an orderly economy. Everybody who has participated, in any way, in the work of the national war finance committee can take great pride in its past achievements, and in the valuable patriotic work they are doing for their country. These men and women command our respect and our thanks.

The work of the national war finance committee is an integral part of our economic life, and it will continue to occupy this important status for some time to come. The need for large scale public borrowing operations is very great this year, and will continue as long as the war goes on, and, in my opinion, will extend into the period of reconstruction which will follow the termination of hostilities. I hope and believe that the men and women who have brought our wartime savings programme to its present stature—the men and women who have the experience and the knowledge necessary to the successful organization of these huge public loans—will continue to perform this patriotic work for the balance of the war period and after the war until the time when the need for this type of borrowing will have passed. This whole speech has made clear that the need for large public loans is greater than ever. There can be no slackening in the support of the activities of the national war finance committee. On behalf of the government, and of the people of Canada, I urge all those now associated with the national war finance organization to continue the good work they have done thus far. The need for this form of national service is not drawing to a close. The need for determined, persistent effort, for undiminished vigour, and for imaginative planning will be particularly important this year, and must continue for some time to come.

Looking to the current fiscal year ending March 31, 1945, I would request the national war finance organization throughout Canada, firstly, to continue their efforts to encourage the maximum volume of personal savings by the Canadian people; secondly, to promote, by every possible means, the retention of bonds and certificates now owned by Canadians; thirdly, to organize and conduct another victory loan in the fall of 1944, with greater emphasis than ever on the sale of bonds to individuals; and, fourthly, to promote continuously the sale of war savings certificates and stamps.

They have already carried out a part of the borrowing programme for 1944-45 with conspicuous success in the sixth victory loan. Full report on that loan will be made to the house but I would point to a notable achievement, the record of cash sales to individuals of $644 million.

Let me explain why we attach so much importance to increasing the sales of bonds and certificates to individuals. We must borrow some $320 million more than last year. This additional amount we must borrow mainly from individuals. The real investing ability of business firms and corporations, apart from such as the insurance companies which act as intermediaries in mobilizing personal savings, will not exceed during the current fiscal year the amount of bond purchases which they made in the year ended March 31, 1944. We cannot hope to increase our sales in that quarter.

We have not avoided borrowing from the Bank of Canada and the chartered banks in the past, but we wish to keep it to an absolute minimum. Borrowing from the banking system has its place when it is desirable to expand credit and increase purchasing power. But when as now, purchasing power in the hands of the public is far in excess of what is needed to buy what is available for sale, and is an ever present danger to the price ceiling and the orderly distribution of goods and services, borrowing from the banking system is to be avoided as much as possible.

It is on an increase in personal savings and on the work of the war finance organization in mobilizing those savings that we must rely. Borrowing the personal savings of individuals for the temporary use of the nation at war is the only type of borrowing which will relieve rather than increase the inflationary pressures which are continuously at work. The trend of personal incomes is still upward, and, despite taxation, the excess of personal disposable income over the cost of necessary wartime living standards is greater than ever before.

If anyone thinks we Canadians at home are being asked to do too much, let him make some comparisons. Let him compare the small privations and the limited self-denial that we at home have endured up to now with the hardships and difficulties which are being endured by our armed forces on world battlefronts. Let him consider the standard of complete, selfless devotion to the common cause shown by our men who are serving in the navy, the army, and the air force. As long as this war goes on, as long as Canadian lives are at stake, we here must not let down in any phase of our war effort. The burden of our responsibility is heavy indeed—but given the will to succeed, we have the strength to carry it.

We are told that victory in Europe may come soon, that victory in the Pacific may not be long postponed. I do not know. I do know that we are well on the road to victory. I do know also that now, when victory is within our grasp, is no time to falter. The fruits of victory will go to those countries which can hold steady on the threshhold of success, and whose people can, in mutual trust, work together for peace and a better world as they have worked together for victory. To finish this war in triumph, not only in the field, but in our production and financial programmes at home, will carry us far toward the realities of better things after the war.

RESOLUTIONS

Mr. ILSLEY: Mr. Speaker, I desire to give notice that when we are in committee of ways and means I shall move the following resolutions:

INCOME WAR TAX ACT

Resolved, that it is expedient to amend the Income War Tax Act and to provide:

1. That for 1944 the total tax on individuals be reduced by one-half the amount of the refundable portion thereof, less one-half credits for savings, and that for 1945 the total tax on individuals be reduced by the full amount of the refundable portion thereof, less credits for savings.

2. That dependents as referred to in the said act be extended to include parents-in-law, grandparents-in-law, brothers-in-law, sisters-in-law, sons-in-law and daughters-in-law in the same circumstances and subject to the same conditions as parents, grandparents, brothers, sisters, sons and daughters respectively.

3. That the provision under which a tax credit is allowed in respect of a child of the taxpayer be extended to include an allowance in respect of any person under eighteen years of age and dependent upon the taxpayer for support, including an illegitimate child.

4. That the allowance in respect of unusual medical expenses be extended to include such expenses incurred outside of Canada.

5. That the deduction in respect of unusual medical expenses be extended to allow as a deduction in any taxation year such expenses actually paid in any twelve-month period ending in the taxation year.

6. That in lieu of the deduction in respect of unusual medical expenses of the amount of salary or wages paid to a full-time attendant upon a taxpayer who is totally blind, the taxpayer shall have the option of deducting $480 from his income in the taxation year.

7. That the basis for taxation under the normal tax and the tax credit against the graduated tax allowed to an unmarried person who maintains a self-contained domestic establishment and actually supports therein a person wholly dependent upon him and connected with him by blood relationship, marriage or adoption, be extended to a married person separated from the spouse.

8. That, if a taxpayer maintains one of his children in a self-contained domestic establishment in which he employs a full-time housekeeper or servant, the tax credits of $80 against the graduated tax and $28 against the normal tax be allowed to him in respect of the child notwithstanding that he is entitled to the tax credit of $150 against the graduated tax in respect of that child.

9. That the basis of taxation under the normal tax and the tax credit against the graduated tax for a married person be limited to a married person who supports the spouse.

10. That individuals may reduce income for taxation purposes by the amount of gifts made in money to His Majesty in right of Canada if such gifts are made within the year when the income was received or within four months from the end thereof.

11. That payment by an employer to an employee upon retirement, other than a payment out of a superannuation or pension fund or plan, if the Minister of National Revenue is satisfied that such payment is in recognition of long service, be deemed to be income of the retired employee over a period of five years rather than income in the year when received.

12. That an employee be allowed to deduct from income the amount, not exceeding three hundred dollars per year, paid by him to an employees' superannuation or pension fund or plan approved by the minister with respect to service rendered previous to the taxation year when he was not a contributor to the fund or plan.

13. That a member of a trade union be allowed to deduct from income the amount, not exceeding three hundred dollars per year, paid by him in the form of union dues to a superannuation or pension fund or plan approved by the minister.

A. Review of Government Accounts, 1943-44.

B. Tables on Economic Conditions, 1943-44.

A. Government Accounts, 1943-44

Comparative Summary Statement of Revenues and Expenditures

1. Although the Dominion's fiscal year ends March 31st, the books of the Dominion for each fiscal year remain open for some time thereafter in order to record expenditures made to April 30th as provided by Section 32 of the Consolidated Revenue and Audit Act and to provide for adjustments which affect revenue and expenditure accounts as well as asset and liability accounts. Final figures for the fiscal year 1943-44 are not yet available, and accordingly the statements which follow, in so far as they relate to 1943-44 revenue, expenditure, investment and balance sheet items, are preliminary. However, it is expected that when the books of the year are finally closed variations from the figures shown herein will be of slight importance.

2. The following tables show, by main categories and in detail, revenues, expenditures and the increase in net debt for the fiscal year 1943-44 together with comparable figures for the four preceding fiscal years:

3. Although not all figures are as yet final for the year it is anticipated that total revenues in 1943-44 will be about $2,855,701,000, a total which represents a peak never before reached in the Dominion's financial history. The increase over the previous year was $536-205,000 or 23 per cent, and over the last pre-war year, 1938-39, was $2,353,530,000, or about 469 per cent. It is interesting to note also that in the six full fiscal years ended on March 31, 1920, which embraced the war and rehabilitation periods of World War I, total revenues of the government amounted to $1,461,395,000, or only slightly more than one-half the revenue of the single year ended March 31, 1944.

The forecast of revenue given in the budget of March 2, 1943, after taking account of changes made subsequent to the budget presentation was for $2,702,200,000, which figure the actual revenue of the year exceeded by about $153,501,000. On page 16 there is given a detailed comparison of the forecast and the present estimate of actual revenue for the year. It will be noted that in some instances revenue exceeded the forecast by a considerable margin, while in others it fell short of the forecast. Further comment will be made in this connection in later paragraphs.

A prominent feature of the overall picture for the year was again the large part played by direct taxation. This form of tax is generally recognized as being most equitable, since it is possible in levying it to take account of family responsibilities in the case of the individual and impose a burden in proportion to the taxpayer's ability to meet it. When levied on corporation incomes at high rates under both the excess profits tax and the corporation income tax it assures that no abnormal or unreasonable profits should be derived from production for the war effort.

In 1943-44 the proportion of total revenue derived from the direct taxes on incomes and profits was 56·7 per cent, compared with 28·3 per cent in the last pre-war year, 1938-39.

Of the total revenue of $2,855,701,000, it is now estimated that $155,000,000 will be refunded after the war under the provisions of the Income War Tax Act and the Excess Profits Tax Act. This is in addition to the sum of $70,000,000 refundable out of taxes collected in the previous fiscal year, making a total to the end of 1943-44 of $225,000,000 repayable after the war.

4. The five-year table of revenue receipts to be found on pages 4207 and 4208 is in the same form as that of earlier years. This table is divided to show tax revenues under the appropriate headings with considerable detail given in the case of excise duties, excise taxes and income taxes. In the following paragraphs each source is discussed in the order in which it appears in the table.

ORDINARY REVENUES

5. Revenue from customs duties for the fiscal year 1943-44 is now estimated at $167,882,000, which compares with receipts of $118,963,000 from this source during the preceding fiscal year and with the budget forecast of $100,000,000.

Prior to April 1, 1943, importations into Canada or purchases in Canada by or on behalf of allied governments were granted exemption from customs duty and as well from sales tax, excise taxes and any other taxes that would normally have applied, although purchases by the Canadian government for its own account were subject in full to all applicable taxes. With the adoption of the mutual aid programme, the Canadian government became the purchaser of a substantial amount of the munitions and other war supplies procured in Canada for the use of other governments. Since the beginning of the 1943-44 fiscal year, therefore, only those supplies which were purchased for cash in Canada by allied governments have been eligible for tax exemption and this exemption is now provided for by a drawback of duties or taxes included in the purchase price. The effect of this change in procedure was to bring within the scope of taxation a substantial volume of war supplies previously exempt from tax. At the time the budget was presented on March 2, 1943, it was not possible to take account of the probable effect of the above change in procedure in making the forecast of probable revenue receipts for the fiscal year 1943-44.. This change in procedure is the principal factor explaining the extent to which revenues from customs duties during the year were substantially higher than had been forecast or had been collected during the preceding year. The increase in the volume of imports was also somewhat greater than had been anticipated.

6. Excise duties are levied exclusively on alcoholic beverages and tobacco products. Revenue in the fiscal year 1943-44 amounted to $142,124,000, some $3,403,000 in excess of the previous year, which increase arose almost entirely from higher revenue from cigarette and tobacco consumption, particularly cigarettes, consumption of which alone increased some 5 per cent over the peak figure of the previous year. Revenue from alcoholic beverages would have shown some decline from the previous year due to the restrictions on consumption had it not been for the fact that the increased rates of tax imposed in the budget of June 23, 1942, were in effect during the whole of the fiscal year 1943-44 compared with at the most ten months in the fiscal year 1942-43.

The extent of the smokers' contribution to the federal treasury is indicated by the fact that revenue from tobacco products, taking account of the additional taxes imposed under the Special War Revenue Act on tobacco, cigars, cigarettes and on cigarette papers and tubes, amounted in the fiscal year 1943-44 to almost $140,753,000, or a sum almost one-third of the total tax revenue of the government in the last pre-war year, 1938-39.

7. The term "excise taxes" connotes in general the commodity taxes levied under the Special War Revenue Act, including the sales tax, the war exchange tax, and a group of some forty or more miscellaneous taxes on a variety of commodities. The revenue under this general heading in the fiscal year 1943-44 amounted, after deducting refunds, to $638,619,000, or $149,907,000 in excess of the previous year, and $130,419,000 in excess of the forecast. Of this increase the larger part is attributable to the sales tax and the war exchange tax, which both exceeded the forecast figure in considerable part because of the change in tax procedure resulting from the mutual aid programme which has already been discussed in section 5. It is now estimated that these two taxes contributed almost $96,345,000 to the increased revenue, whereas a slight decrease had been provided for in the budget forecast.

The balance of the increase over the previous year arose from the variety of taxes on goods and services of domestic consumption, in the case of many of which the rates either were increased in the budget of March 2, 1943, or were increased in the budget of June 23, 1942 and were effective during the full twelve months of the fiscal year 1943-44, compared with at the most ten months of the previous fiscal year. These taxes as a group yielded $214,792,000, exceeding the revenue of the previous year by $53,562,000, and the forecast by $16,592,000. The major increases arose under the following headings (the amount shown is the increase in 1943-44 over 1942-43):

1. Cigars, cigarettes and tobacco	$28,393,000
2. Transportation and communication	6,296,000
3. Beverages (soft drinks)	4,940,000
4. Candy and chewing gum	4,418,000
5. Stamps, etc., including payment on jewellery, chinaware, cabaret attendance, etc	4,225,000
6. Tires and tubes	4,009,000
7. Purses, bags, trunks, etc	1,983,000
8. Amusements	1,635,000

Certain of these revenues, on the other hand, suffered some reduction due to curtailment of production or to rationing of domestic consumption. These sources, and the amount by which the revenue decreased, were as follows:

1. Electric and gas appliances	$ 2,004,000
2. Sugar	1,903,000
3. Phonographs, radios and tubes	700,000
4. Wines	297,000

8. The personal income tax, now the largest single source of tax revenue, yielded $813,435,000 in 1943-44, $279,297,000 or 52 per cent in excess of the combined revenue from graduated income tax and national defence tax in the previous year. It should be indicated, however, that this revenue fell below the revised budget forecast of $880,000,000 by $66,565,000, or about 7 per cent. This discrepancy may be accounted for by two factors: (a) the level of employment and incomes was slightly lower during the year than was anticipated at the time of making the budget forecast; and (b) the amount of taxes refunded during the year as a result of the cancellation of 50 per cent of the 1942 liability under the transition to the "pay-as-you-go" system was larger than had been anticipated. These refunds are deducted from the revenue of the year in which they are repaid, and the amount shown for 1943-44 has thus been reduced by the amount of such repayments.

At the present time it is estimated that the savings portion of personal income taxes levied against 1943 incomes and repayable to the taxpayer after the end of the war was in the neighbourhood of $110,000,000. It was estimated in the previous year that the corresponding amount in relation to 1942 incomes would be $50,000,000, which it is now proposed, on the basis of more complete information, to increase by an additional amount of $5,000,000. These amounts taken together thus give an estimate of the total amount refundable on the dominion's books at the end of the fiscal year 1943-44 of $165,000,000 repayable after the war in respect of the 1942 and 1943 taxation years.

9. Corporate income tax and excess profits tax, both of which are levied on business incomes, may appropriately be discussed together. Revenue from the corporate income tax amounted to $311,379,000, slightly in excess of the forecast of $300,000,000, but below revenue of the previous year by $36,591,000. This decline was due to the fact that in the previous year collections were somewhat above normal because of inauguration of the compulsory monthly plan of tax payment in July, 1942, which brought forward into the fiscal year 1942-43 revenue which under the old system of one single annual payment would not have been received until the following fiscal year. In 1943-44, as the monthly payment plan was in effect for the full twelve months, there was no comparable overlapping of revenue, and collections were reduced to a level closer to normal.

Revenue from the excess profits tax, at $468,718,000 fell substantially below the forecast of $550,000,000 for the year. This discrepancy is largely explained by the extreme difficulty of forecasting from the distance of a year in advance not only the total amount of corporation profits during a year but also the extent to which such profits are excess profits, that is, in excess of standard profits. In the present instance it can only be said that because of these difficulties, for which there does not appear to be any ready solution, a substantial error was made in forecasting excess profits tax revenue for the fiscal year 1943-44.

It is now estimated that in respect of excess profits taxes collected in the fiscal year 1943-44 an amount of $40,000,000 will be refunded after the war. This figure can only be regarded as tentative until assessment of excess profits tax returns has been completed for the year in question, and the refundable amount finally determined in each case. It will be some time however before this work will be completed, and it is felt desirable in the interim to establish on an estimated basis an approximate figure for the amount of such refundable taxes. The addition of this $40,000,000 to the $20,000,000 set up in the previous fiscal year brings to $60,000,000 the total amount of refundable taxes as at March 31, 1944.

10. Revenue under the heading of dividends, interest, etc., is derived from the special taxes imposed on certain income under Section 9b of the Income War Tax Act. In 1943-44, this revenue amounted to $26,943,000, reduced by $1,138,000 from the previous year, and was derived for the most part from the 15 per cent tax levied on dividends and interest paid to non-residents.

11. The dominion government has levied succession duties only since 1941, and revenue from this source is only gradually reaching its full anticipated level. Such revenue amounted to $15,020,000 in 1943-44, compared with $13,273,000 in the previous year.

12. Small amounts of tax revenue are derived from the tax on note circulation of the chartered banks, which decreases from year to year with the decline in such circulation as provided by statute; from taxes on the net premium income of insurance companies, reduced considerably in 1943-44 from the previous year because in the previous year two years' revenue was collected in one following certain arrangements made under the Dominion-Provincial Tax Agreements; from a tax on the export of electrical energy from Canada; and from a tax on the export of furs from the Northwest Territories. Revenue from all these taxes amounted in 1943-44 to $7,692,000.

13. Total non-tax revenues are estimated at $139,865,000, an increase of $23,786,000 over 1942-43. Receipts from the Post Office total $61,071,000, an increase of approximately $12,200,000 which was due to the one cent increase in letter rates effective April 1, 1943, as well as to a greater volume of post-office business during the year. The receipts from the Post Office will, it is expected, exceed cost of operations by about $12,587,000 without taking into account any credit for services rendered other departments free of charge and without adding to the cost of operations, rentals and other costs of premises occupied by the Post Office. Returns on investments are expected to realize $52,152,000, an increase over the previous year of about $10,910,000. The larger items making up this total are: interest on advances to Canadian National Railways, $18,724,000; Bank of Canada profits, $14,118,000; interest on loans to Foreign Exchange Control Board, $3,467,000; interest on loans to National Harbours Board, $3,250,000; interest on loans to provinces, $2,861,000; interest on loans to Canadian Farm Loan Board, $1,092,000; Soldier Land Settlement loans, $992,000; and interest on advances made by the Department of Munitions and Supply to commodity companies, $3,970,000.

SPECIAL RECEIPTS AND CREDITS

14. The total amount shown for the fiscal year 1943-44 under this heading is $124,024,000. The items making up this total are: Special receipts, War Appropriation Acts, $81,000,000 (divided as follows: refunds of previous years' war expenditure, $32,500,000; sale of surplus war assets, $6,000,000; profits on certain war operations and miscellaneous war revenues, $42,500,000); operating surplus of the Canadian National Railways for the calendar year 1943, $35,640,000 and the capital gain on repatriation of Canadian National Railways securities, $2,430,000. These last two items increase the book valuation of the Canadian National Railways securities trust capital stock, and accordingly are offset by contra amounts appearing on the expenditure side under the heading "Other Charges".

The Canadian Pacific Railway company repaid a loan of $1,000,000 advanced under the authority of the Relief Act, 1932. This loan which was non-interest bearing was charged to non-active account and accordingly the repayment is shown as a revenue item.

Another item which is recorded under the heading of special receipts and credits is an amount of $2,971,000 representing a reduction in the reserve account established to meet the operating deficits of the Canadian Wheat Board. This adjustment is occasioned by a further improvement in the board's balance sheet based on calculations made as at July 31, 1943 with respect to the 1939 and 1940 crop accounts. This reserve account now stands at $8,816,210.36.

15. The table which follows gives a summary of the forecasts made at the time of the last budget of the probable receipts from the various sources of revenue during the fiscal year 1943-44, and a comparison of these forecasts with presently estimated receipts for the fiscal year. A comparison of presently estimated receipts with the original forecasts has already been given in respect of the major items of revenue. The increase in total receipts over the amount forecast, in terms of percentage, excluding estimated refundable portion of income and excess profits taxes, is 5·6 per cent.

* The actual revenue forecast given in the Budget Speech at March 2, 1943, was $930 millions for personal income tax revenue. The moving back of the date for filing annual returns from March 31 to April 30, which was provided for subsequent to the Budget Speech, however, resulted in a reduction in the revenue expectation for the fiscal year 1943-44 amounting to $50 millions. The figure given in the table has been adjusted to take account of this reduction.

EXPENDITURES, 1943-44

16. The comments which follow deal with expenditures classified by the usual main categories: (1) ordinary expenditures; (2) capital expenditures; (3) war expenditures; (4) special expenditures; (5) operating deficits of, and non-active advances to, government-owned enterprises; and (6) other charges. All disbursements under these headings, with the exception of active loans and investments chargeable to war appropriation acts, are included as expenditures in arriving at the over-all deficit or increase in net debt.

[Mr. Ilsley.]

ORDINARY EXPENDITURES

17. It is estimated that ordinary expenditures for the year will total $630,215,000. Of this total a few of the larger contractual and uncontrollable items, such as interest and other charges on the public debt, pensions, unemployment insurance, post office, subsidies and payments to provinces under the dominion-provincial taxation agreements represent $509,891,000 or approximately 81 per cent.

The above total of $630,215,000 is greater than the actual amount of ordinary expenditure during the previous fiscal year by $68,964,000. Some of the larger items making up this increase are:

Increased interest and charges on public debt	$59,572,000
Increase in post office expenditure	3,742,000
Increase in administrative cost of Department of National Revenue, including income tax	2,543,000
Increase in unemployment insurance	1,387,000
Increase in cost of treatment and after-care of returned soldiers (war 1914-18)	1,380,000
	$68,624,000

Less important increases, as well as decreases effected during the year, are readily ascertained by referring to the five-year table. It may be noted, however, that the increase in ordinary expenditures is due to increased expenditures made necessary by or arising out of the war.

CAPITAL EXPENDITURES

18. Total expenditures charged to capital are estimated at $2,657,000 compared with $3,276,000 in the previous year. The main items in this category are expenditures arising out of dredging the St. Lawrence ship channel, improvements in connection with civil airways and airports, and a payment in connection with the construction costs of a new Prince Edward Island car ferry.

WAR EXPENDITURES

19. Of the $4,890,000,000 appropriated by the War Appropriation Act, 1943, and the War Appropriation (United Nations Mutual Aid) Act, 1943, $4,665,192,113 was disbursed. Of this sum, $40,595,500 was for loans, advances and investments treated as active assets, and the remainder, $4,624,596,613 was classed as war expenditure. The following table lists the same classifications for the last five fiscal years.

Fiscal Year	Charged to Active Assets	War Expenditures	Total
1939–40	9,092,742	118,291,022	127,383,764

21. The table in the preceding section does not include recoverable outlays made under the provisions of section 3 of the War Appropriation Act which are also classed as active assets rather than expenditure. Under this section, the Government of Canada may act as the agent of an allied government for any purpose which will aid directly or indirectly in the prosecution of the war and any obligations or costs incurred temporarily or assumed may be paid out of unappropriated moneys in the Consolidated Revenue Fund. Furthermore, any expenditure required to be made by the Government under any contract for war supplies entered into for the purpose of enabling any company wholly owned by the government to fulfil its obligations in respect of orders received by such company from an allied government may also be paid out of unappropriated moneys. The amount disbursed under this authority during the fiscal year 1943-44 are included in the loans and investments described in sections 33 to 48.

22. The principal items of war expenditure have already been detailed in the table on page 4210, where the comparable items for the last five fiscal years are also shown. In this connection there are two points worth noting in comparing 1943-44 expenditures with the corresponding figures of the previous year—both of which concern the Department of National Defence for Air. The first is the large increase in the expenditure for the Overseas War Establishment, from $23,666,000 in 1942-43 to an estimated $384,725,000 in 1943-44. This is largely explained by the increase in the number of squadrons for which the dominion has assumed responsibility, involving an increased expenditure of approximately $308,000,000, and by the arrangement whereby Canada has assumed the responsibility for the pay of all R.C.A.F. personnel overseas, resulting in a further increase in expenditure approximating $50,000,000. The second point is the substantial decrease in the charges under the British Commonwealth Air Training Plan —from $366,897,000 in 1942-43 to $225,550,000 in 1943-44. This apparent decrease merely reflects the apportionment of the costs as between Canada and the United Kingdom; the gross expenditure for the Plan for 1943-44 totals approximately $496,500,000 but approximately $270,950,000 has been deducted and treated as a recoverable advance to the Government of the United Kingdom in accordance with the responsibilities assumed by the two governments under the terms of the Agreement. This sum of $270,950,000 is an adjustment for the United Kingdom's share of the expenditures made by Canada between July 1, 1942 and March 31, 1944; offsetting it there is an estimated total of $93,000,000 in credits to the United Kingdom in this account for other adjustments during the same period under the terms of the Agreement.

23. The table which follows gives a more detailed account of the estimated expenditures during 1943-44 from the war appropriation (excluding Mutual Aid, of which more will be said later). The expenditures of the three armed services and their supply department, the Department of Munitions and Supply, are of course the principal components; they are estimated at 90·3 per cent of the total. It is not possible, however, to fight an all-out war without involving nearly every department of government in war activities of one kind or another as this table clearly shows.

24. Out of the $1,000,000,000 appropriated for Mutual Aid purposes, $912,603,000 was spent by March 31, 1944. Of this amount $723,754,000 was for the United Kingdom, $20,960,000 for Australia, $874,000 for the British West Indies, and $482,000 for India. Expenditures for Russia were $23,282,000, and for China $4,102,000 despite the difficulties of transportation to that country. The remainder, except for a relatively small sum ($25,472.14) for administrative expenses, was spent for goods that were still in transit at March 31st, and not finally allocated among the recipient nations. The table on the following pages gives some further details as to both the distribution among countries and the type of aid involved in each case.

SPECIAL EXPENDITURES

25. Expenditures classified as Special Expenditures for the fiscal year 1943-44 are estimated to total $37,458,000 compared with $31,288,000 for 1942-43. The largest single item, $30,097,000, represented payments of awards to farmers under the wheat acreage reduction plan administered by the Department of Agriculture. Administration costs of the plan amounted to $814,000. Advances to the Prairie Farm Emergency Fund and the costs of administration under the Prairie Farm Assistance Act are estimated at $2,578,000 and $217,000 respectively. Expenditure for Dominion relief projects and the Dominion's share of outstanding Dominion-Provincial relief projects amounting to $3,752,000 accounted for the remainder of the expenditures under this heading.

GOVERNMENT-OWNED ENTERPRISES

This classification of expenditures comprises the losses of and non-active advances to Government-owned Enterprises which were established before the war and are operated as separate corporations. As the Canadian National Railways has shown substantial annual surpluses since 1940, charges to this account since the fiscal year 1940-41 have been of minor importance, the total for 1943-44 being $1,306,000.

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS

26. The operating revenues of the Canadian National Railways for the calendar year 1943 totalled $440,616,000, an increase of $64,961,000, or 17·3 per cent over the former high record established in 1942.

Operating expenses of the railway amounted to $324,476,000, an increase of $35,477,000 or 12·3 per cent over the preceding year. In addition to the normal operating expenses for the year, the sum of $19,069,000 was appropriated from revenue for Pension Reserve.

After deducting the appropriation of $19,069,000 above referred to from the net operating revenue of $116,140,000, there remained a balance of $97,071,000. Various accounts consisting of taxes, equipment and joint facility rents totalled $15,437,000, leaving the net railway operating income at $81,634,000. Other income, less deductions, amounted to $3,668,000, and accordingly the net income available for payment of interest amounted to $85,302,000. After payment of interest charges of $30,998,000 on debt held by the public and interest charges of $18,665,000 due to the Government in respect of temporary loans for capital and refunding purposes, there was a net cash surplus of $35,639,000. This cash surplus was paid over to the Government in redemption of loans and advances.

The operating deficit of the Prince Edward Island Car Ferry and Terminals during 1943 was $698,000.

CANADIAN NATIONAL STEAMSHIPS

27. The operations of the Canadian National (West Indies) Steamships Limited in the calendar year 1943 resulted in an operating profit of $1,303,610. After payment of $521,700 for bond interest and exchange, the remainder, $781,910, was paid to the Government as interest on advances (current and arrears). The amount received on account of 1942 profits was $781,215.

NATIONAL HARBOURS BOARD

28. The operating income of the National Harbours Board for the calendar year 1943, after payment of interest to the public but before depreciation and interest on Government advances totalled $4,596,917 compared with $4,118,127 in 1942. Interest on government advances received during the year amounted to $3,250,069.

Financial assistance provided by the Government to the National Harbours Board and charged as expenditure under the heading of Government-owned Enterprises totalled $608,000, made up as follows: $29,000 for the operating deficit of the Churchill Harbour; $370,000 for non-active advances in respect of the deficit of the Jacques Cartier Bridge at Montreal; $41,000 for the retirement of maturing debentures of the Saint John Harbour Commission; and for capital expenditures, Saint John Harbour, $153,000; Halifax Harbour, $14,000 and Three Rivers, $1,000. Expenditures charged to the War Appropriation are shown under "War".

The elevators at Port Colborne and Prescott operated at a profit during 1943 and the Government received $97,905 from these sources.

OTHER CHARGES

29. The total of Other Charges, the final main category of expenditures, is estimated at $63,889,000.

Included in this total is $25,000,000 which has been added to the reserve to meet possible losses on ultimate realization of assets treated as "active" in the Dominion balance sheet. This is the same amount as was provided for in the Public Accounts for the last three fiscal years and the total now provided to meet such possible losses is therefore $100,000,000. The annual write-off from active assets of Soldier and General Land Settlement Loans amounted to $553,000, and cancellation of Canadian Farm Loan Board Capital Stock amounted to $5,000. These two write-offs, and the provision for the further reserve of $25,000,000 resulted in a proportionate increase in the net debt of the dominion.

The total write-off from non-active assets includes two items: (a) $232,000 written off from the Canadian National Railways Securities Trust Stock representing line abandonments for the calendar year 1943; and (b) $29,000 representing the estimated yearly established losses on Seed Grain and Relief accounts administered by the Department of Mines and Resources. As both these items are non-active assets and are therefore already included in the net debt of Canada, they are offset by similar amounts on the Revenue side under "Other Receipts and Credits."

The remaining debit items, classified as Other Charges, and totalling $38,070,000, relate to the Canadian National Railways Securities Trust Stock. The value of this stock which represents the dominion's equity in the Canadian National Railways was increased by $35,640,000 due to the surplus earnings of the System for 1943 and also by $2,430,000 due to the capital gain in respect of Canadian National Railways sterling securities redeemed during the year at a price below par in Canadian funds. The Canadian National Railways Securities Trust Stock is carried in the dominion's books as a non-active asset, and as the two items just mentioned necessarily appear as credits under the heading Special Receipts and Credits, the net debt of Canada is not thereby changed.

SUMMARY OF EXPENDITURES

30. The grand total of expenditure for the fiscal year 1943-44 under the various categories enumerated, namely Ordinary Expenditures, Capital Expenditures, War Expenditures, Special Expenditures, Losses of and non-active advances to government-owned enterprises, and Other Charges, is estimated at $5,360,122,000.

31. The following table shows the percentage distribution of estimated revenues and expenditures for a number of important items. Receipts from various taxes and other revenue sources, after deducting the $155,000,000 of income and excess profits taxes estimated as refundable after the war, are shown as percentages both of total revenues and of total expenditures. Similarly, several of the main items of expenditure or groups of such items are shown as percentages both of total expenditures and of total revenues. The purpose of this table is to enable broad conclusions to be drawn as to the relative burdens imposed on the public treasury by the war and the main services or obligations of government.

It should be noted that many expenditures attributable to the war are not charged to the war appropriation; for example all the interest on the public debt and practically all the expenses of war-expanded departments like the Post Office and National Revenue are charged to Ordinary Expenditure. So-called non-war expenditures have therefore increased substantially during the war despite the fact that the controllable portion has been cut from $112,900,000 in 1938-39 to an estimated $106,400,000 in 1943-44—a decrease of 5·8 per cent—as the following table shows:—

(5) The Government's contribution and the cost of administration.
(6) Controllable expenditures not specially affected by the war. Note, however, that the war has increased the costs of many of the services concerned, for example by necessitating cost-of-living bonuses.

OVERALL DEFICIT

32. As total revenues for the fiscal year 1943-44 have been shown as $2,700,701,000 and total expenditures as $5,360,122,000, the estimated overall deficit (or increase in net debt) for the year is $2,659,421,000.

LOANS AND INVESTMENTS

ACTIVE ASSETS

33. In addition to the estimated expenditures for the year as already outlined, disbursements are made for the acquisition of investments which are treated as active assets in the Public Accounts. The active assets are deducted from the total direct debt in arriving at the figure of net debt. The net increase in active loans and investments for 1943-44 was $119,314,000 compared with an increase of $523,791,000 in 1942-43. The net increase is fully itemized in the table in section 48.

LOANS TO PROVINCES

34. As was shown in the Public Accounts for the fiscal year ended March 31, 1943, loans made to the Western Provinces under authority of relief legislation and outstanding at the close of that year totalled $156,775,604.70. Repayments received during the year totalled $312,548.70 as follows: Manitoba $153,589.82; Saskatchewan $42,648.83; Alberta $26,500 and British Columbia $89,810.05. The repayments left the net amount outstanding as of March 31, 1944, at $156,463,056.00, divided by Provinces as follows:—

Manitoba	$ 24,774,950 27
Saskatchewan	71,247,784 25
Alberta	25,907,000 00
British Columbia	34,533,321 48
	$156,463,056 00

35. During the year the Province of Nova Scotia repaid $37,000, the last of its indebtedness to the dominion on account of Housing Loans made at the close of the last war (1914-18). This repayment by Nova Scotia completely liquidates all such loans made following the last war.

36. Subsidy overpayment to the Province of Alberta secured by a Treasury Bill of the Province was reduced during the year by a payment by the province of $50,000, thereby reducing this indebtedness to $350,000.

OTHER LOANS AND INVESTMENTS

38. Additional advances totalling $185,000,000 were made to the Foreign Exchange Control Board during the fiscal year bringing its total indebtedness to the Dominion to $585,000,000, this amount being shown as an active asset on the Dominion's balance sheet.

39. The Canadian dollar obligation of the Government of the United Kingdom under authority of The War Appropriation (United Kingdom Financing) Act, 1942 totalling $700,000,000 was reduced during the year by $42,392,000 leaving a balance outstanding of $657,608,000.

40. Pursuant to an agreement between Canada and the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics for the purchase of Canadian wheat and flour, a further advance on credit was made during the year of $9,083,000. In 1942-43, $917,000 was advanced. Thus, the total credit of $10,000,000 has now been made use of.

41. Accountable advances were made during the year to the Commodity Prices Stabilization Corporation Limited, the Canadian Wool Board Limited and Wartime Salvage Limited. The amounts which have been taken into the accounts as Active Assets represent cash and inventory holdings of the corporations as at March 31, 1944. The balance of advances made are included as war expenditures. The assets with respect to each corporation as of March 31, 1944 were:

The Commodity Prices Stabilization Corporation	$19,505,000
The Canadian Wool Board	23,745,000
Wartime Salvage Limited.....	321,000

42. Advances to Commodity Corporations and other Companies by the Department of Munitions and Supply were reduced during the year by repayments of $7,272,000, leaving a balance outstanding of $44,474,000.

43. The Canadian Farm Loan Board during the fiscal year repurchased from the Government out of surplus funds $5,000,000 of its 3½ per cent bonds due January 2, 1960, reducing the total amount of its bonds held by the Government to $21,700,000.

44. In the period from April 1, 1943, to March 31, 1944, 1,647 loans were approved under the National Housing Act for an amount of $5,209,745, bringing the total approvals to March 31, 1944, to $83,995,217. In this period the Dominion advanced $921,730, and borrowers' repayments amounted to $1,454,032.28, making net repayments for the period of $532,302.28. The net amount of loans under the authority of the National Housing Act and the Dominion Housing Act, estimated to be outstanding on the books of the Dominion at March 31, 1944, is $15,960,689.67. Loans under the authority of the National Housing Act are made jointly by the Government and approved lending institutions, and are secured by first mortgage or hypothec, running jointly to the Government and an approved lending institution. Previous to December 8, 1942, loans were normally made not in excess of 80 per cent of the cost or appraised value of the completed property whichever was the lesser. In the case of owner-occupied houses, where the lending value did not exceed $2,500, a loan might be made up to 90 per cent of the said lending value. On December 8, 1942, an Order in Council was passed enabling loans to be made up to 90 per cent of the lending value for any house where the lending value does not exceed $3,200, and on a sliding scale down to 80 per cent when the lending value does not exceed $4,000. Since January 1, 1940, new applications for loans are received only in respect of the construction of houses containing one self-contained dwelling place and where the loan does not exceed $4,000.

45. Under the Municipal Improvements Assistance Act, 1938, total loans approved to March 31, 1944, less amounts not required to complete projects, aggregated $7,036,000. The net amount outstanding as at March 31, 1944, totalled $5,711,000, being a net reduction from the previous fiscal year of $30,000. These loans bearing interest at the rate of 2 per cent per annum are amortized over a period not longer than the estimated useful life of the project. The province in which the municipality is situated guarantees the payments for interest on, and amortization of, each loan.

46. Small amounts only were advanced during the fiscal year to the National Harbours Board for capital construction purposes at the ports of Montreal and Vancouver, totalling in all $14,000. Repayments of loans made in previous years amounted to $141,000, leaving a net credit for the year of $127,000. In addition, $140,000 was advanced for Churchill Harbour under Section 28 of the National Harbours Board Act, 1936, and repaid six days later with interest at the rate of three per cent per annum.

47. Loans for Soldier and General Land Settlement were reduced during the fiscal year by payments of $1,537,000. In addition, $553,000 was written off and charged to Consolidated Fund.

48. The following statement shows in summary form the net estimated changes in active investments for the current year, together with comparable figures for the four preceding years. It should be noted, however, that this statement does not include certain of the recoverable advances made under authority of section 3 of the War Appropriation Acts, as described in section 21 on page 4220; they are excluded from the statement because they will be substantially offset by amounts payable by Canada to allied governments. Accounts of this nature which show increases during the year with the increase in each case, were: (1) Department of Agriculture, purchase of food for United Kingdom, $13,246,000; (2) Department of Munitions and Supply, purchase of munitions for India, $2,782,000; (3) Department of National Defence for United Kingdom and other Allied Governments, (a) Army, $8,987,000; (b) Navy, $8,839,000 and (c) Air, $203,586,000 and (4) Department of Transport for British Air Ministry, $94,000. On the other hand, the Department of Munitions and Supply account for War Supplies, Limited, was reduced during the year by $11,884,000.

LOAN FLOTATIONS

49. In the fiscal year ended March 31, 1944, the Dominion issued in the domestic market securities in an estimated amount of $3,680,737,146. This amount includes the net increase of $60,000,000 in Treasury Bills outstanding and the net decrease of $30,000,000 in Deposit Certificates outstanding, but does not include the amount of recurring issues of Treasury Bills and Deposit Certificates made to refund similar securities during the year.

It is estimated that in the fiscal year $894,951,042 of Dominion obligations matured or were called for redemption, leaving the sum of $2,785,786,104 less cost of flotations, available for direct and indirect war expenditures.

50. The following table gives the details of the issues sold during the year, divided as to original issue by sales to the Bank of Canada, the chartered banks and the general public (it does not include the $33,293,471 4 per cent School Lands Debentures which were again renewed for one year):

The Fourth Victory Loan was sold entirely for cash in the amount of $1,308,716,650, the number of subscriptions being 2,668,420. The Fifth Victory Loan was sold in the amount of $1,374,985,800 for cash and $195,591,500 in conversion of bonds maturing or called for redemption on October 15, 1943. The number of cash subscriptions was 3,008,336 and the number of conversion subscriptions was 24,715.

(5) These issues were vested by the Treasury of the United Kingdom in August, 1941. The amounts (at par of exchange) purchased in the fiscal year 1943-44 were cancelled.
(6) Total from previous table $695,591,500 and School Lands Debenture Stock viz. $33,293,471.

53. The fortnightly issue of three months' Treasury Bills was continued during the fiscal year. The last issue in the fiscal year was sold at a discount of ·387 per cent. The lowest rate on this class of financing was obtained on the March 3, 1944 issue, viz., ·386 per cent. The amount of Treasury Bills outstanding at the close of the fiscal year was $360,000,000, an increase of $60,000,000 during the year.

54. The average rate of interest on the Dominion's direct funded debt (including Treasury Bills and Deposit Certificates) outstanding on March 31, 1944, was estimated at 2·57 per cent. This compares with 2·60 per cent on the debt outstanding at the close of the preceding year.

CASH DEFICIENCY

55. It may be in order here to summarize the cash transactions of the Dominion before going on to the final sections, which will deal with the national debt and the statement of estimated assets and liabilities at March 31, 1944. The purpose is, firstly, to correlate the information already given, and, secondly, to show the total requirements for cash during 1943-44 and the ways in which those requirements were met. The table which follows gives such a summary. In general, it differs from what has already been given in the way that a statement of receipts and payments differs from a statement of revenue and expenditure; the footnotes give such information as is required for reconciliation. It should be noted that it includes as "active loans, advances, investments, etc." some items that do not appear in the statement of active loans and investments on page 4234. That statement treated only items which may properly be described as investments, in the sense that they represent agreed contractual amounts, whereas this table includes such items as recoverable advances and payments on behalf of other governments, where the total liability may not yet be finally determined and without any allowance for possible offsetting claims which the other party may have to present.

The table follows:

(1) "Cash" and "non-cash" transactions are sometimes difficult to define; for example, interest payments to certain trust and other accounts are left on deposit with the Receiver General. Those here treated as non-cash are limited to adjustments to the valuation of assets and liabilities, and the amortization of loan flotation charges.

(2) War requirements means outlays under the war appropriation acts and such other accounts as obviously relate to the war; non-war means all other requirements.

(3) Excluding the amortization of bond discounts and commissions, $10·7 million.

(4) Excluding the write-down of assets, $25·8 million. and adjustments of the valuation of C.N.R. Securities Trust Stock due to the net income surplus and capital gain, $38·1 million.

(5) For details see page 72. The advances treated as relating to the war are those for the repatriation of sterling securities, those for the oil drilling campaign, and the purchase of equipment leased to the railway under the terms of the 1940 and subsequent agreements.

(6) Including both matured and unmatured funded debt, and the premium or discount on foreign funds.

(7) This represents that portion of the outlays that was met out of foreign exchange previously accumulated, and therefore was not a requirement for Canadian dollars during 1943-44. The figures exclude changes in funds held for special purposes.

(8) In effect this is expenditure deferred from 1942-43.

(9) Adjusted by the addition of $2·7 million (net) with respect to Premium, Discount and Exchange, arising out of the fact that foreign exchange is valued at par on the balance sheet, but is valued at current levels for the purpose of this table.

(10) Excluding the adjustment of the reserve against losses of the Canadian Wheat Board, the entry recording the increase in value of the C.N.R. Securities Trust Stock as a result of the net income surplus and the capital gain, and the contras to the write-down of non-active assets, all of which total $41·3 million.

(11) Includes the increase in value of War Savings Certificates during the year due to interest accruals, $10·2 million.

The significant thing is that, whereas the budgetary deficit for 1943-44 is estimated at $2,659,400,000, the cash deficiency (that is, the excess of cash outlays over cash receipts other than from borrowing) was approximately $2,935,100,000. It is the latter sum, and not the former, which had to be met by borrowing from the Canadian people. (It is true that in fact some of the deficiency appears to have been met by drawing down free cash available at the start of the year, but when cash requirements exceed cash receipts the change in cash is a residual item dependent largely on the timing of borrowing operations.)

[Mr. Ilsley.]

NATIONAL DEBT

56. It is estimated that the gross unmatured funded debt (including Deposit Certificates and Treasury Bills) of the Dominion outstanding at the close of the fiscal year 1943-44 will amount to $10,689,491,000. Other liabilities consisting chiefly of Annuities, Superannuation and Insurance Funds, Post Office Savings Bank deposits, and various trust and contingent funds outstanding as at the same date are estimated at $1,841,097,000. The gross liabilities of the dominion therefore are expected to total $12,530,588,000 as at March 31, 1944. On the other side of the balance sheet will be found active assets estimated at $3,688,318,000, consisting of cash and various active loans and investments, less a reserve of $100,000,000 to provide against ultimate loss on their realization. If, therefore, we deduct the amount of the net active assets from the amount of the gross liabilities, we arrive at a figure of $8,842,270,000, representing the estimated net debt of the Dominion as at March 31, 1944. This net debt shows an increase over the corresponding figure for the close of the preceding fiscal year of $2,659,421,000, which of course is the estimated amount of the over-all deficit for the fiscal year 1943-44.

INDIRECT LIABILITIES

59. Bonds and debenture stocks bearing the guarantee of the dominion and outstanding in the hands of the public totalled $699,443,-345 as at March 31, 1944, or a decrease of $17,-466,516 during the fiscal year under review. This decrease is occasioned mainly by the redemption on February 1, 1944 of a Canadian National Railway Company bond issue in the amount of $15,500,000 by means of a loan from the government.

60. There were also outstanding at the close of the fiscal year other contingent liabilities assumed under Relief, Seed Grain and other legislation.

61. Guaranteed bank advances to the Canadian Wheat Board outstanding at March 31, 1944, on account of wheat amounted to $21,-622,710. This amount constitutes the Board's gross liability to the banks and is related to the purchase of wheat for the 1943 crop.

62. By Order in Council passed in 1943 the Canadian Wheat Board was empowered to deal in sunflower seed and rape seed. In order to finance these operations, guaranteed bank loans were obtained from certain chartered banks. The amount of such advances outstanding on March 31, 1944, was $214,783, all in respect of sunflower seed.

63. Under the terms of an Order in Council dated February 16, 1943, the Commodity Prices Stabilization Corporation, a Government-owned corporation, was authorized to guarantee certain advances and interest thereon obtained by any person from a chartered bank in order to purchase coal, coke or briquettes in the summer of 1943. The liability of the Corporation is limited to fifteen per cent of the aggregate amount of advances made by each bank, but the maximum amount of guarantee is $500,000. The contingent liability of the Corporation at March 31, 1944, was $51,369.

64. Under the terms of an Order in Council dated August 11, 1943, the Commodity Prices Stabilization Corporation was authorized to guarantee certain advances, obtained by any person engaged in the production of logs or lumber, from a chartered bank. The liability of the Corporation is limited to twenty-five per cent of the aggregate advances made by each bank. The contingent liability of the Corporation at the close of the fiscal year was $174,153.

65. Under the terms of an Order in Council dated May 4, 1943, the government guaranteed bank overdrafts obtained by certain crown companies and management-fee companies doing business under the Department of Munitions and Supply. Prior to the establishment of this system of financing, funds advanced by the government to the contractors remained idle for considerable periods. The amounts of the various overdrafts are repaid monthly; so no liability is outstanding at the close of the fiscal year in connection with this guarantee. The maximum amount of guarantees authorized at March 31, 1944, was $190,985,000.

66. Before operations under the Home Improvement Loans Guarantee Act were discontinued (October 30, 1940) 125,724 loans had been made by banks and other approved loaning institutions to home owners under the terms of this Act and the total amount of such loans was $49,959,055. The dominion's contingent liability arising out of these loans is limited to 15 per cent of the aggregate of such loans made by approved lending institutions, but as the balance of these loans on March 31, 1944, was $811,652.26, the contingent liability of the government is limited to this amount. Up to March 31, 1944, 1,224 loss claims for an aggregate amount of $446,234.17 had been paid. In terms of total losses to total volume of loans, this loss ratio is only ·893 of one per cent.

67. Under the provisions of the Appropriation Act No. 5, 1942, the home extension plan was started. It provided for loans not exceeding in the aggregate $2,000,000 by banks under regulations similar to those of the Home Improvement Loans Guarantee Act for the purpose of financing the creation of additional self-contained housing units by alterations or additions to a building used solely or partially as a dwelling at the time application is made for the loan. To March 31, 1944, 56 loans for a total amount of $106,475.28 had been made. The dominion's contingent liability arising out of these loans amounted to 15 per cent of the aggregate of such loans made by the banks or $15,971.29. There have been no claims for loss made by the banks.

68. Under the Dominion Housing Act, 1935, and the National Housing Act, 1938, the dominion has accepted and is accepting certain obligations arising out of its contracts with approved lending institutions which, while not expressed in the form of a guarantee, may nevertheless be regarded as contingent or indirect liabilities.

The manner in which losses in respect of any loan are to be borne by the dominion and the lending institution is fixed by the contract. The general principle is that the dominion bears two-thirds of the loss if at the time the loss is sustained the principal amount of the loan repaid, less any other amounts due, is equal to or less than the amount advanced by the dominion and one-third of the loss if at the time the loss is sustained the principal amount repaid, less any other amounts due, is more than the amount advanced by the dominion. In the case of small loans (that is, loans not in excess of $4,000 in the case of a single family dwelling or not in excess of $700 per habitable room in the case of a multiple family dwelling) the share of the loss to be borne by the dominion is not more than 80 per cent and not less than 50 per cent of the loss. The above provisions apply to loans made under both the National Housing Act, and its predecessor Act, the Dominion Housing Act. Under the National Housing Act, a new provision was added to encourage the making of small loans in such small or remote communities and in such districts of other communities as may be designated by the Minister of Finance in any contract. In respect of such loans, the dominion has agreed in contracts with certain lending institutions to pay losses sustained by any such lending institution up to certain amounts determined by the contract which are not less than 7 per cent and do not exceed 25 per cent of the total amount of such loans made in such areas by each such lending institution.

Order in Council of December 5, 1939, provided that after January 1, 1940, applications would be received only for loans for the construction of houses containing one self-contained dwelling place and where the loan does not exceed $4,000.

An amount of $2,000,000 was appropriated for the fiscal year 1943-44, to provide for advances under the National Housing Act, not exceeding with the advance made jointly by the approved lending institution, $3,200 in respect of any one house, for the construction of houses where the minister is satisfied that permanent houses can be constructed to relieve a serious housing shortage without threatening to create post-war surplus. Loans to the number of 20,831 have been approved at March 31, 1944, under the Dominion Housing Act, 1935, and the National Housing Act, 1938, in the amount of $83,995,217. Losses recorded and paid to March 31, 1944, amounted to $2,644.78, covering the dominion's proportion of the loss on seven loans. This amount represents total losses to date under both the Dominion Housing Act, 1935, and Part I of the National Housing Act, 1938. These losses are offset in part by a profit of $497.74 realized by the sale of eleven properties. The net loss to March 31, 1944, is therefore only $2,147.04.

69. The following is a statement of bonds and debenture stocks and other indebtedness guaranteed by the dominion outstanding on March 31, 1944:

RECONSTRUCTION

ESTABLISHMENT OF DEPARTMENT TO FORMULATE AND CARRY OUT RECONSTRUCTION PLANS

The house resumed in committee consideration of bill No. 82, to establish a Department of Reconstruction—Mr. Mackenzie King—Mr. Bradette in the chair.

Section 13 agreed to.

On section 14—Duration.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): Does the Prime Minister propose to bring in legislation in connection with housing?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Housing is mentioned in the speech from the throne as one of the subjects that will be further dealt with at this session. It is the intention of the government to bring in further legislation on the subject.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): At this session?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Yes.

Section agreed to.

Bill reported.

Mr. ILSLEY moved the third reading of the bill.

Mr. C. E. JOHNSTON (Bow River): I should like to say a few words before this bill gets its third reading. There is no doubt that this new department which is to be set up is one of the most important acts that the government has performed so far this year. It has the prospect of being a very important department in the coming days after the war is over. This afternoon some hon. members expressed the opinion that this was not the time to be wasting our efforts in trying to set up anything in regard to reconstruction. It was suggested that that should not be done until the war had been definitely won. I do not agree with that idea. Along with the other hon. members of this party I say and have always maintained that the very first consideration of this country should be the successful prosecution of the war and that everything that is humanly possible should be done to facilitate that objective in every shape and form. While that is going on I would not agree with the opinion of the hon. member for York-Sunbury (Mr. Hanson) that at this time we should not make some preparations for the period after the war and that we should not be setting up a department of reconstruction. I think that is one of the necessary steps.

When the men and women of the armed forces come back they must be properly cared for. If we are to rehabilitate them as they have every right to expect, we must begin to prepare now. It will not do to wait until they return home and then start preparing. I take it that in setting up the department at this time the government intends to start now. Unless we take some constructive and active action with regard to those who returned from the last war I fear we shall not do as much as we should do for those who come back from this war. I was very much impressed with the views expressed by the hon. member for Battle River (Mr. Fair) this afternoon when he spoke of the veterans of the last war and advocated that they be given free titles to their land. He pointed out, and I think rightly so, that one of the first things that should be done is properly to care for those who came back from the last war, and then we could go on and prepare for those coming back from this war.

He pointed out that one of the government officials, with approval of the present Minister of Mines and Resources (Mr. Crerar), had made a statement to the effect that nothing could be done for those old veterans who are now on the land; that they should be satisfied and abide by the contracts into which they entered. That is not good enough for our returned men of the last war. If we are to use that as a precedent and treat the men and women coming back from this war in the same way, then I am afraid that things will not be arranged satisfactorily. I think we can rightly judge what the government is going to do in regard to the men and women returning from this war by what they have done for those who came back from the last war. I am sorry that such a statement should have been made by a government official at this time, because it certainly does not give those old veterans of the last war much encouragement.

It is true, as the Minister of Finance (Mr. Ilsley) has indicated in his budget speech this evening, that when a nation is at war it reaches the peak of production. We in this country are exceptionally fortunate in that we have never been invaded. We have not had those terrible air raids to contend with, nor have there been battlefields on our territory as is the case across the seas. Our productive capacity is at its maximum and will continue to be or should continue to be at its maximum until the war ends, because we have had nothing happen to this country which would affect that production. It is also true that when the war ends and the armed forces are being demobilized the production of those industries will begin to slow down. As soon as those industries begin to slow down, and in some cases shut down entirely, a loss of purchasing power in the hands of the people immediately becomes evident, because the industries are beginning to release men from employment. These men become unemployed unless arrangements have been made to employ them in some other places. When the men and women of the armed forces return they, too, will be out of a job and their purchasing power will decrease. There you have a piling up of the unemployed; you have an ever-decreasing amount of purchasing power in the hands of the people, and the vicious circle begins which will lead us straight to the depression which we had before unless we make proper arrangements now. That is why I say I do not agree with some of the statements that have been made in this house to the effect that we should not prepare now; that all our attention should be given to the war.

Certainly no one in this house or outside it can point a finger at the Social Credit party and say that we have ever belittled our war effort in any sense of the word. In fact, we were the ones who were first for an all-out war effort and we are still for it. But at the same time I think we can and should begin to prepare now for the post-war period. Unless we are extremely careful we are bound to have after this war periods of depression with all the misery and poverty that go with them That is bound to happen unless we begin to prepare now. Therefore I say that one of the first things which must be done by this new department is to make a complete survey forthwith to ascertain the nature and the volume of the products of industry which will be required by the Canadian people for purposes of rehabilitation after the war and to raise their standard of living to the level which our natural resources consistently can maintain. That is one of the first steps necessary; we must ascertain the nature and the volume. That entails a tremendous amount of research work. In my opinion there is no use in going to those industries now and saying to them that they must carry on their production after this war and that they must give full employment when no proper guidance has been given to them beforehand. We should find out, for example—and I think we are capable of doing it with the intelligence we have here—the amount of farm machinery that it will be necessary to manufacture in Canada. We should be able to find out the number of automobiles that will be required in this country. When that is done we shall be able to go to those concerns and point out to them with some definiteness what will be required. Having that information, they in turn will be able to arrange and plan their production accordingly.

Not only will it be necessary for us to find out the nature and the volume of the production which can and should be carried on for our home markets, but there is a field farther away that must be thoroughly investigated so that those industries will be properly guided in their establishments after the war. The field I refer to is the foreign market. I think there will be a great potential market there if the industries are properly guided in that respect. Some provision will have to be made by this department to enable business firms to go farther afield, into those countries which have been ravaged by war and which have been released from the slavery and drudgery imposed by the enemy, in order to estimate the kind and volume of production that will be required from Canadian industry for those markets. Then, when our industries have that information, they will be in a much better position to carry on the work that is expected of them.

The next step which I think must be taken is a complete survey of Canadian industries to determine the extent to which they can be adapted to peace-time requirements, and to make the necessary preparations for conversion at the end of the war. I believe this is one of the most important steps that will have to be taken, but as far as I know nothing is being done along that line. It may be the intention of the minister in charge of this new department to carry on that work, but unless that is done I see great dangers ahead of us. For instance, I fear that after the war some of our great industries will close up, because they will not know what will be required of them. An example that comes to mind is the automobile manufacturing industry. I do not believe these companies will be able to continue, at least for very long, their present rate of production. There must be some survey made to determine whether these industries are capable of being adapted to some other type of production. Their equipment may be such that they can convert to the manufacture of farm implements. These plants should be surveyed very carefully; instead of having these big factories torn down and the machinery thrown on the junk heap, we should make every effort to convert them to peace-time production. Some may not be adapted to the production of farm machinery; some may be more adapted to the manufacture of cream separators, or household requirements, or boots and shoes, or something else. Certainly I see a great danger that these industries may be scrapped instead of being properly converted to peace-time production. The other day, as reported at page 3980 of Hansard, the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) dealt with that point; at least I believe it was in his mind, although I do not believe it has been given proper attention. He said:

> There is one aspect of reconstruction which might be termed economic reconstruction. That has to do largely with the transforming of industry from making war supplies to making goods for human consumption and with restoring and increasing the capital equipment of the nation, together with the provision of employment for those who are being transferred from the one activity to the other.

I believe that can be done if we have proper supervision. Then he went on to say:

> The great industrial plant created for war purposes must be transformed to meet peace-time demands in Canada or abroad.

That is one of the matters to which I think great consideration must be given; otherwise we are not going to have the proper results. I am very much concerned about this. What are we doing in that regard? In my opinion we are doing just the reverse. What have we done so far in the matter of the actual preparation for the conversion of industries from war-time to peace-time production? The only concrete step we have taken so far has been to set up Surplus Crown Assets Corporation. In my opinion that corporation has not been set up primarily for the purpose of converting industry from war-time to peace-time production. It is only necessary to look at the bill to see the purpose for which the corporation has been set up, or at least what a large part of its work is going to be. I refer to section 12:

> Subject to general or specific instructions given by the minister, the corporation may, when so directed by the minister,
> (a) sell, exchange, lease, lend or otherwise dispose of or deal with surplus crown assets either gratuitously or for a consideration and upon such terms and subject to such conditions as the board may consider desirable.

Some other recommendations are set out, but one of the purposes of the Crown Assets Corporation is to dispose of all this material; to get rid of the factories that now belong to the government, to deal with the machinery which is now in the possession of the government. I am not for a moment advocating that the government should take over these factories and this machinery and go into the production of consumer goods, but the whole purpose of the Crown Assets Corporation is to dispose of these assets without giving consideration to their conversion to peace-time production. I think that is bad; I do not believe these assets should be disposed of by the government in too much of a hurry. I can see some benefit in disposing of much of this material now, instead of holding it until it becomes obsolete, but one of the purposes of this new department should be to make this survey before the Crown Assets Corporation takes over all these materials and disposes of them recklessly. We have great aircraft factories, great ship building plants, great munitions factories. These are wonderful institutions, equipped with the most modern and up-to-date machinery. I have visited many of these factories, and I say that the production organization that has been created during the period of this war is a marvellous achievement. I have never belittled the work of the government in building up such a machine. In travelling from one end of Canada to the other with the war expenditures committee I have seen a wonderful example of industrial organization in this country. That industrial organization has been carried to the point where, if we take proper care, we can convert from war-time to peace-time production and have the greatest nation the world has ever seen. Certainly there should be no lack of consumer goods in this country if we take the proper care. I do say, however, that if the Crown Assets Corporation carries on its work without the new Minister of Reconstruction having some control over it, we shall lose a wonderful opportunity. Instead of this great industrial expansion for which we all hope when our men and women come back from the war, by our own acts in this parliament we may put ourselves in an unfortunate position, when that could be avoided by the proper control.

It is true, as has been stated, that you cannot go on and produce these goods unless you have markets. Already we have some markets and we hope we may have more in future. I believe that great attention should be paid to the foreign field; yet I do not think that is the primary market for our producers. After we have properly surveyed the whole field of domestic production and consumption—which is vital, since without proper consumption there is no use in having production—then we may turn our attention to the foreign field.

In my opinion the only time that we should be allowed to ship goods out of the country is when we have a true surplus. I do not mean just a surplus like those we had in the days of the depression. All of us remember those dreadful days, those days referred to as the hungry thirties. We had an abundance of production, but the vital thing then was underconsumption. When you have that state of affairs you have a surplus of goods, but the effective demand in the hands of the people is not sufficient to buy the goods that they require. But when you have completely satisfied the home market, then you should pay attention to the foreign market. That is the only time we should look for foreign trade.

There is going to be a good field for foreign trade in those countries that have been ruined by the war. We are going to have to assist in building up those countries, but by the use of modern methods of invention and the great genius that man has to-day it will not be long before we have built them up to the point where they themselves will be looking for foreign markets. The more they get built up to the point where they themselves are looking for foreign markets, the fewer foreign markets we shall have.

I am not one of those who look forward with a great deal of pleasure to the building up of foreign credits in foreign countries. The greater the foreign credit you build up, the poorer you are going to be. It is all right to ship out surplus goods, provided that we get back goods in return. It is all right to do that if you have purchasing power in the hands of the people to buy them.

I do not underestimate the importance of foreign markets, but I think the first and most important market we must look to is our home market. We have a tremendous industry in agriculture. In his budget address to-night the Minister of Finance pointed out the possibilities of agriculture. Agriculture is one of those industries which will enable us to ship out more goods to foreign nations. If we cannot make it possible—it is not a case of being able because we can make it possible—for agriculture to produce goods and still have the cost of production plus a fair profit, then we shall be sadly lacking in our organization under this department.

I said a moment ago that there was no use in producing abundantly unless our people have the purchasing power with which to buy. During the period of reconstruction after the war there will be a large field for employment, but if we are to continue that employment we must make sure of the income of the people. I suggest that one of the best ways of ensuring continued purchasing power for the people so that they will be able to buy the goods we produce, is the old age pension.

I think it has been generally recognized in this parliament during the last year or two that when you give out money in the form of old age pensions you are establishing a great consumer market; you are creating a home market. We could very well lower the age limit to sixty years and increase the amount above what it is at the present time. I would suggest $50 a month. In that way we would ensure purchasing power being put into the hands of the people so that they will be able to buy the goods which industry will make.

There is no doubt that as time goes on there will be an unemployment problem with which we shall have to deal. If we can take a greater number of people out of active production by lowering the age limit for the payment of old age pensions, then we shall be solving to a degree our unemployment problem.

Then, as has been indicated, we could start at the other end and provide the young people with an educational grant sufficient to enable them properly to fit and equip themselves intellectually to be able to assist us in our production when they come to that time of life. Here again we shall be providing purchasing power with which to buy a portion of the goods which industry can produce. We shall thus be providing a market for industry.

I believe that too much is being expected of agriculture and other secondary industries. It has been said that industry must put everybody to work, but I do not agree with that. I do not think that is the function of industry. The purpose of industry is to produce goods as cheaply as they can be produced by using the most modern methods of machinery and intellectual abilities that our organizers have. We have plenty of inventive genius. If industry could employ all the people in this country it would be a utopia; it would be wonderful, but I do not think that can be done. But everyone who is capable of working, everyone who is desirous of increasing his purchasing power, everyone who is physically and mentally fit to work should be given that privilege. Every encouragement should be given to these people to work.

The Prime Minister was speaking about this previously, and I should like to quote what he said as to how this was to be done, how we were to keep our industries in operation, how we were to put purchasing power in the hands of the people. I was very much disappointed at the answer given by the Prime Minister to a question asked by the hon. member for Lethbridge (Mr. Blackmore) as to how he proposed to do this. I have marked carefully what he said because I think it holds the key to the success or failure of this new department which is to be set up.

I agree with the hon. member for Parry Sound (Mr. Slaght) and the hon. member for Acadia (Mr. Quelch) when they say that we shall not be able to do this unless there is a proper and systematic and scientific change in our financial system. Apparently the Prime Minister did not agree with them. This new Department of Reconstruction will not have a chance unless it is given the power to provide the people with the necessary additional purchasing power to carry them through this reconstruction period. I am afraid that every time this new department want to do anything and they go to the treasury board, the treasury board will kick them out of the office and say, "We cannot do that because of the expense."

Look at the way in which we are treating our returned men from the last war. A minister, a member of the treasury board, makes a public statement through a civil servant that we are not going to do anything more for the returned men from the last war, that they should abide by their contracts. No matter how sincere this minister may be, that is what will happen with this department. That is the way in which the Prime Minister said the thing would be carried on financially. The hon. member for Lethbridge asked how it would be financed and the Prime Minister said:

> I will put it this way to my hon. friend. In this period of war we have been able to raise money through loans and taxation, for what purpose? For the purpose mainly of spending the money on destruction, on the destruction of property, the destruction of community and national life, and human lives; all of which indicates that instead of having our taxes serve a useful constructive purpose, they are serving, of necessity—it is not our fault, it is the part of the penalty of war—the needs of destruction. When the whole picture is reversed, and it comes to be a matter of carrying out constructive work—

Mind you, this is the reconstruction period to which he was referring.

> —work for the rebuilding of communities, for the supplying of homes, and the needs of homes, the necessaries and conveniences of life, many of which have been absolutely prohibited in the period of war, there is going to be a demand for employment the like of which has not arisen at any other time, and as one want is satisfied another want is sure to be created.

He said further:

> That is the way progress is made, through demands which arise from conditions of peace and prosperity; and where you get demands of the kind which lead to the fuller employment of labour I do not think my hon. friend need fear about the increase of public debt or taxation to accomplish these things. If—

And this is the big question:

> If we can get a sufficiently large demand for labour through an increasing demand for goods and commodities and things which are constructive and serviceable, I believe the nation can go ahead with the great work of construction and reconstruction and at the same time reduce its taxation and reduce its debt. That at least is what I would hope to do if this government is in office when that period comes.

These are pious hopes, hopeful platitudes, but I hardly think the Prime Minister really believes that they will bring the results for which he hopes.

We have the banking and commerce committee discussing the Bank Act and the changes that should be made in it. While I cannot prophesy what their conclusions will be, I think it is safe to say that there will be no major changes in the financial policy of this government. The Prime Minister in his speech here indicated that he hopes that this period of reconstruction will be a success, though financing it in exactly the same way that we followed before, by loans and taxation. The Minister of Finance, in his budget speech to-night, indicated that he intends to follow the same course. Yet our national debt is climbing and climbing and climbing, and while interest rates have been lowered, annual interest charges are climbing and climbing and climbing. Every loan means an additional interest charge on the incomes of the people.

Mr. SPEAKER: Order. The hon. gentleman is now dealing with the budget.

Mr. JOHNSTON (Bow River): I am not attempting to deal with the budget, Mr. Speaker, but when the hon. member for Vancouver-Burrard (Mr. McGeer) was speaking he gave figures of the national debt and it was those figures I had in mind. I did not have in mind the figures given by the Minister of Finance. The hon. member for Vancouver-Burrard, speaking on this bill, referred to the national debt. He gave the public debt of Canada as $335,000,000 in 1914 and showed that the national debt had increased by 1918 to $1,191,000,000. Then he gave what I thought was an excellent comparison. He gave the national debt in 1939, when the war started, at over 4½ billion dollars. In 1943 up to December 31 the debt had risen to nearly 11½ billion dollars. He did not make reference to the debt as of to-day, but the Minister of Finance indicated that it had increased in the last year by about two billion dollars. At all events our public debt on December 31, 1943, was about 11½ billion dollars. In other words, it had increased about 6½ times since 1914-18. The annual interest charges, according to the figures that have been put on Hansard by the hon. member for Vancouver-Burrard, are over $304,000,000, or an interest charge for every man, woman and child in this country of over $27 per annum. That is a tremendous load to carry and the charges are continually rising, with no prospect of lowering them. Yet the Prime Minister vainly hopes that we shall be able to carry on through the reconstruction period by following exactly the same financial policies of the past. It does not take any stretch of the imagination, for anyone who sits down and analyses these figures and sees the tremendous increase which there has been from year to year ever since confederation almost, in our national debt and in the interest charges, which have increased year by year, to see that we cannot continue financing like that.

I recall the Prime Minister's great expression in 1935 when he said that if he were elected he was going to do battle with the money powers. Well, we see the results of his battle to-day, and if this is the great battle that he was going to carry on, then I have not great hopes for this reconstruction period, and I feel that the Prime Minister himself has no very great hopes in that regard either.

There must be some change in the financial policy of the government. I have already indicated two of the major steps which must be taken. Regardless of the pious hopes expressed by the Prime Minister, without some change in our financial policy there is no chance of success in the reconstruction period, nor shall we have a success made of the reconstruction department, for which we all hope, not only the minister but all of us. One of the major steps that must be taken, a step essential to the satisfactory establishment of Canadian industry to peace-time conditions is that the control of currency and credit should be removed from present private monopoly and restored to parliament and that parliament should so order the financial policy of Canada as to make available sufficient money for the financing of post-war rehabilitation and reconstruction and to ensure the consuming public of sufficient purchasing power to enable them to enjoy a standard of living limited only by the productive capacity of industry and the natural resources of the country instead of by a man-made scarcity of money.

At the present time we have a man-made scarcity of money. Without going into details of the financial reconstruction that is necessary, it seems to me that if we are to have a proper Department of Reconstruction charged with the responsibility of seeing that our country is changed over from a war-time industrial nation to a peace-time industrial nation, we must have proper control of our currency and credit, and it must be issued in terms of public need, and not of private gain. Until we have achieved that goal I am convinced that we shall never have the success we hope for, and those who have been overseas will find, when they return home, that they have fought their fight in vain. We cannot afford that; this country cannot afford it. Therefore, let us start by putting our own house in order, getting the finances of this country on a scientific and sound basis, establishing such a financial structure that we can make financially possible anything which is physically possible and desirable. Then we shall have a Canada that our men and women overseas will be proud to return to and we shall be proud to say to them when they return: We appreciate the job which you have done, and we are going to reward you in part for all you have accomplished.

Mr. W. F. KUHL (Jasper-Edson): Mr. Speaker, I crave your indulgence for just a few moments. I am rising more on a question of privilege than for the purpose of attempting to argue any points in connection with this bill.

Several of the members who have spoken on this bill found occasion during the course of their addresses to refer to the remarks which I made on the bill. I feel that several of them either deliberately or otherwise misconstrued and misinterpreted what I said. In fact, I consider that some of the members went so far as to question even my character. I therefore wish to rise on a question of privilege in that connection.

I believe that there were as many as four members who referred to my remarks, the hon. member for Victoria, British Columbia (Mr. Mayhew), the hon. member for Essex East (Mr. Martin), the hon. member for Fraser Valley (Mr. Cruickshank), and the hon. member for York-Sunbury (Mr. Hanson), and indicated that I in my remarks had advocated a set of circumstances in which there would be maximum idleness—in other words, a loafer's paradise. Read the remarks of the hon. member for Victoria, British Columbia. He said, as reported in Hansard, at page 4109:

> We listened to the hon. member speaking the other night, and if I remember rightly he implied that it was humiliating to work.

The hon. member for Essex East said, as reported in Hansard, at page 4015:

> Our people will not want to subscribe to the doctrine of the hon. member for Jasper-Edson. . . . They do not want to be idle.

These statements, Mr. Speaker, definitely imply that I advocated idleness in the post-war period for our people.

Mr. GRAYDON: The hon. member did not advocate much harder work, anyway.

Mr. KUHL: Neither does the hon. member.

Mr. GRAYDON: I have to do it, though.

Mr. KUHL: So do I.

Mr. JOHNSTON (Bow River): What? being a lawyer, and having to work hard?

Mr. KUHL: I wish to reiterate for the information of these hon. gentlemen and others who, perhaps, think like them, that at no time have I advocated idleness. I challenge the hon. members I have named and any other hon. member now in the chamber to read my address through and pick out one sentence, one phrase, in which I advocated idleness in the post-war world. I should like to see them take up the challenge. Yet each one of these hon. members implied and, indeed, stated directly that I was advocating idleness. The type of activity to which I took exception and against which I protested was that of artificial work.

Let me give you an example of what I mean by "artificial work." In my own constituency in the so-called depression years, under both Liberal and Conservative administrations, roads were built with pick and shovel. Young men, some of them university graduates, were out building highways in my constituency—the Jasper-Edson highway and other roads—with pick and shovel, and machines were standing everywhere which could have been used in their place. I call that artificial work, and that is the type of work I protest against and object to. As the hon. member for Bow River (Mr. Johnston) indicated in his remarks to-night, it is certainly the privilege of mankind to take advantage of all that inventive genius and productive enterprise can devise, and machinery of this kind should certainly be used to the maximum advantage. But we did not do that in the so-called depression years. It is the type of work to which we resorted then that I referred to as slavery. I did not advocate idleness; what I advocated was an opportunity for the people to put themselves to work; and if hon. members will take the trouble to read my remarks through they will find that I proposed that we so arrange our economy that all the people, instead of merely a select few, shall have an opportunity to indulge in voluntary activity.

Some hon. gentlemen went so far as even to bring my character into question. I hesitate to make an issue of this, but no other hon. member would take it lying down, nor do I intend to. The hon. member for Victoria, British Columbia, made this statement, as reported in Hansard, at page 4109:

> Work is the fibre of achievement that makes a nation great, and you cannot have the fibre of achievement unless you have something to do and are willing to do it.

He concluded by saying this:

> That is what my hon. friend lacks.

I consider that a definite questioning of my character.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: You ought to hear some of the things they say about me. I would not worry about that.

Mr. KUHL: I observe that whenever any remarks of that kind are made in the house concerning the right hon. gentleman, he is always very quick to rise to a question of privilege.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: No.

Mr. KUHL: So that I say I do not think it is becoming for any hon. member to question the desire of any other hon. member to perform his share of responsibility in the national life of this country; and I think, if the hon. member is the gentleman that he wishes me to believe he is, he will make appropriate apologies for such a remark.

I wish to make one observation only with regard to the principle of the bill; it has been referred to repeatedly, but I think it will bear repetition. According to this bill, the whole success of reestablishment of members of the armed forces as well as of civilians in civil life after the war will depend upon finding jobs. I would ask the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King), or the government as a whole, or anyone, what will happen in the event that jobs cannot be found? The whole success of reestablishment in civil life of these people, two millions or thereabouts, is to depend upon finding jobs. We know that the Liberals and the Conservatives had five years each in which to attempt to find jobs, and they were unable to do so. How do they expect us to believe that, if given another five years, they will do any better?

Mr. JOHNSTON (Bow River): They do not. That was just for public consumption.

Mr. KUHL: What is to be the condition of the people of Canada if these jobs are not forthcoming? Are we going back to the dole, the relief line and the soup kitchen? What has the government to say with respect to this question? The hon. member for Bow River has again indicated as we in this corner of the house have always insisted, that the purpose of industry is not to provide employment but to supply goods in the greatest abundance with the least amount of work and trouble. Of course the government, realizing that there will not be places in industry for all these people, are suggesting tremendous schemes of public works. When it comes to public works, is it going to be possible for the government to find jobs in public works if they are not available in industry? I happen to have on my desk a pamphlet illustrating some of the most modern machines. On the back cover is illustrated one of these huge modern dredgers, capable of lifting thirty-two tons of earth in one bite. I should like to know whether in the post-war period the government intend to permit machines of that and similar types to be used in carrying out public works of various kinds, or are they again going to do as was done before the outbreak of the war, namely, leave the machines sitting on the side of the road and put people to work with picks and shovels?

For curiosity's sake, I figured this machine out on the basis of manpower—thirty-two tons of earth in one bite. If men were put to work with picks and shovels to do the work of that machine, how many men would be required? Five pounds of earth to one shovelful would be 12,000 or more shovelfuls of earth; in other words, this machine would do approximately the work of 12,000 individuals. One can go all the way through industry and public works or any other activity of man in these days and duplicate incidents of this kind. Personally, I think it is folly on the part of this government or any other government to suggest that they will be able to reestablish the members of the armed forces and others by finding jobs for them or making their entire source of income depend upon jobs that will be found either in industry or in public works.

Motion agreed to and bill read the third time and passed.

NATIONAL HEALTH AND WELFARE

CREATION OF DEPARTMENT FOR MANAGEMENT AND CONTROL OF SOCIAL SECURITY AND WELFARE

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister) moved that the house go into committee to consider the following resolution:

That it is expedient to provide for a Department of Social Welfare to include that part of the Department of Pensions and National Health not to be included in the Department of Veterans' Affairs and to assume the management and control of and to consolidate in such department matters relating to the social security and welfare of the people of Canada as may from time to time be assigned to it; and to provide further for the appointment of such officers, clerks and employees as are necessary for the proper and efficient administration of the act.

[Mr. Kuhl.]

Mr. STIRLING: Is the Prime Minister going to make a statement?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I was going to ask in the first instance that this resolution be amended by substituting the words "Department of National Health and Welfare" for "Department of Social Welfare." I spoke of this a day or two ago and mentioned that when the resolution was drafted it was thought that social welfare being a wide term would probably serve to include health as well, and that there was an advantage in having a short title. But there has been a very natural feeling that, as the department of health has existed since 1919, and as the new department will take over that part of the work of the Department of Pensions and National Health which will be left after what has been taken out of the department by the war veterans' measure, it would be desirable to continue specifically to associate the words "national health" with that department. Further, changing the name might give the impression that the government was not as much concerned with national health as with some other features of the measure, whereas the contrary is the fact. National health will continue to be, through the years, more and more an all-important consideration of the government. I would ask my colleague the Minister of Pensions and National Health (Mr. Mackenzie) kindly to move the necessary amendment.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): With the consent of the house I move accordingly.

Motion agreed to.

Hon. GROTE STIRLING (Yale): This resolution anticipates the passage of a bill, the purpose of which is, in the words of the resolution, to assume the management and control of the social security and welfare of the people. I think it would be a highly desirable thing if such a department were set up to do this, if it has the power to do it. The department of health has existed for some time, as the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) said, and it will be incorporated in this new department. The department of health has not entered into the life of the people to any considerable extent. If one examines the terms of the British North America Act and looks through the twenty-nine matters which are referred to the jurisdiction of the dominion, one finds no mention of either health or welfare. In fact, all that one does find is that quarantine and marine hospitals are put under the direction of the dominion government. It is not wonderful to me, therefore, that in these twenty-five years the department of health has existed it has not entered into or directed the life of the people. It has accomplished very little in preventing disease or preventing those mischievous actions of people who might do things deleterious to the health of the nation.

If one looks at these matters which are directed by the British North America Act to the jurisdiction of the provinces one finds several guides thereto—the establishment, maintenance and management of hospitals, asylums, charities, eleemosynary institutions other than marine hospitals. One will find property and civil rights and all matters of a purely local and private nature. So that all the nine provinces have provided themselves with departments of health or branches of welfare, and the dominion government seems to me to be assuming a very large task and perhaps an impossible one when it undertakes the management and control of the social security and welfare of the people. It does appear to me that it would be not only undesirable but harmful if this went out to the public of Canada, giving them the idea that the dominion government is able to accomplish a great deal more than in my opinion it will be able to do under this department. It is that note that I wish to sound at the very commencement of the discussion, and I call it to the attention of the Prime Minister.

Mr. GORDON GRAYDON (Leader of the Opposition): I do not know whether the Prime Minister intends at this stage to say anything with respect to the matter, but if he desires to make a statement on the second reading I have no objection. At any rate, I wish to identify our party with the position which has been taken by the hon. member for Yale (Mr. Stirling). The situation with regard to the name of such a department does not go very deep so far as the problem of social welfare, social security and health as a whole is concerned. All we are doing is to establish under a certain department, the department of social welfare, a new department which will take over the departmental duties of health and additional duties which may be assigned to it in connection with social welfare legislation such as the dominion may be competent to deal with within its jurisdiction.

I think it should be made clear, and the hon. member for Yale did make it abundantly clear, that it would be a great mistake if the people of Canada got the idea that by means of a high-sounding name the government through some magic would do something to benefit the whole dominion in social welfare when, as the Prime Minister will readily agree, a great deal of that work is within the jurisdiction of the provinces themselves under the British North America Act

In agreeing to the resolution going through and allowing the introduction and the first reading of the bill, we should like to make our position clear, namely, that we at this stage reserve the right to take a position in the discussion which will indicate our stand perhaps more clearly than it has been indicated in a general way to-night.

Mr. HARRY LEADER (Portage la Prairie): Before the resolution passes I should like to have an opportunity of discussing a question which, in my opinion, has been delayed too long. If it will facilitate matters I have no hesitation in allowing the resolution to pass to-night, but I would rather say what I have to say on the resolution than on the bill. As a reason for my stand may I state that it is not always possible for me to be in the house. This is one of the very few evenings that I have imposed upon myself the task of being here after the dinner recess. Rather than sit around day after day and hour after hour waiting until I have an opportunity to speak on a matter upon which I must speak I would prefer to go on now, but I wish to intimate to the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) that it will take at least forty minutes for me to say—

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: May I say to my hon. friend that I think the house would like to have the bill based on the resolution before it. The bill cannot be presented to the house until the resolution is passed. It was my hope that the house would permit the bill to be introduced to-night and then to-morrow we might go on with a discussion of its provisions. If my hon. friend is going to take forty minutes, I should think that it would be in his interests, as well perhaps facilitating the business of the house, if he were to wait until to-morrow when the bill is taken up again rather than speak for fifteen minutes now and twenty-five minutes to-morrow.

Mr. LEADER: I will agree with what the Prime Minister has said in his last sentence, if the bill is taken up to-morrow.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I hope it will be.

Mr. LEADER: I would not have the temerity to suggest terms to the Prime Minister, but if the bill is to be taken up to-morrow well and good. If not, I do not want to miss this opportunity of discussing this subject which I believe in some ways is more important than the war itself. If it is the understanding that the bill will be proceeded with to-morrow, and if the Prime Minister will be kind enough to allow me to adjourn the debate or something like that, it would suit me fine.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: My hon. friend realizes that adjournment of the debate would not help matters any. It would not enable the bill to be introduced. The bill is not before the house at the present time. All that is before the house is simply a resolution to permit the bill to be introduced. I hold in my hand a memorandum of what I was intending to announce at the end of the evening as to to-morrow's business. I cannot say whether the house will permit it or not, but the government's thought was first of all to take the two measures which were mentioned by the Minister of Finance (Mr. Ilsley) this afternoon, amending two banking bills, to provide an additional two months before their expiration in order to afford opportunity of discussing matters at greater length than would be the case if we had only until July 1 to discuss them. Immediately after that I intended to suggest that the national health and welfare bill be taken up. Of course, I wish I could give my hon. friend an undertaking as to what hon. members of the house generally would do, but he will recognize I cannot do that. As far as the government proceeding with the matter is concerned, I have indicated our intention.

Mr. LEADER: I will await my chance.

Mr. J. H. BLACKMORE (Lethbridge): Briefly I wish to say that we have no objection to the resolution passing and the bill being introduced. I should like to say, though, as has been pointed out by the hon. member for Yale (Mr. Stirling) and the leader of the opposition (Mr. Graydon), that there is a possibility that the dominion government is intruding itself into a sphere that properly belongs to the provinces. I realize, as everyone does who understands the situation confronting the Canadian economy, that there are a good many items which properly come within the jurisdiction of the provinces in which they need a good deal of assistance, in which they need that assistance from the dominion government because the dominion government is in a position to have more money than the provinces.

There is no danger involved in so far as the British North America Act is concerned if everything that the dominion government does is designed to supplement what the provinces do. If it is definitely recognized that this is a matter of provincial jurisdiction and that the problem of the dominion is simply that of helping the provinces, then all is well. But ever since the iniquitous Rowell-Sirois report and the attempt of the government at Ottawa to jam that thing down the throats of the provinces, there has been suspicion from all over this land that the administration in Ottawa is not friendly to the British North America Act; that it is seeking to destroy the British North America Act and centralize control over the affairs of Canada in Ottawa, control that the fathers of confederation in their wisdom put in the hands of the provinces.

May I just make this suggestion, that in all these matters where the central government thinks it advisable to supplement the work of the provinces it be recognized that the provinces should take the steps and that the central government put at their disposal the means to accomplish the ends which the provinces themselves may consider ought to be accomplished, so that the dominion government does not exercise control—it may exercise administrative direction but not control. May I suggest, too, that the all-important matter in all these affairs is money. There is not a province that does not know what it wants to do with respect to health and social services if it could only find the money with which to do it. The dominion government is in a position to get that money. All the dominion government needs to do is to exercise the power which was conferred upon it by the British North America Act when it was given control over money and banking. It can make available to the provinces the money which they need. Until the men in power in Canada come to realize that, they will be faced with difficulties and do things which will endanger the Canadian commonwealth.

I have nothing more to say except to urge that the dominion government take the attitude that it will find the money with which these fine projects are to be achieved and will supply that money to the provinces in accordance with their need and then work with the provinces toward the attainment of the objectives of sound social security and social programmes in Canada. That being understood, I do not hesitate for a moment to support the resolution and the bill to be founded on it.

Motion agreed to and the house went into committee, Mr. Bradette in the chair.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I should like to say just one word. I would have made a statement on the resolution were it not that I was anxious to get the bill introduced to-night so that hon. members might have it before them at once, and we might take up second reading to-morrow. All I wish to say is that this is one of three measures referred to in the speech from the throne which have to do with post-war planning. The first one is the war veterans' measure; the second, the one on reconstruction, and the third, national health and welfare. To-morrow on second reading I shall have something to say about the matters which have been referred to more particularly to-night.

Resolution reported, read the second time and concurred in. Mr. Mackenzie King thereupon moved for leave to introduce bill No. 149, to provide for a Department of National Health and Welfare.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

On motion of Mr. Mackenzie King the house adjourned at 10.55 p.m.

Tuesday, June 27, 1944

The house met at three o'clock.

DAIRY PRODUCTS

FREQUENCY OF COLLECTIONS OF CREAM FROM FARMERS IN ONTARIO AND QUEBEC

On the orders of the day:

Mr. G. K. FRASER (Peterborough West): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the Minister of Finance a question, the wartime prices and trade board being under his department. Why is it that Quebec creameries are allowed to collect cream from the Quebec farmers twice as often as Ontario creameries are allowed to collect cream from the Ontario farmers, the collections being three times a week in Quebec and only three times every other week in Ontario?

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: Ontario cannot have as much cream.

Mr. FRASER (Peterborough West): It is pretty tough on the Ontario farmers.

Hon J. L. ILSLEY (Minister of Finance): I shall have to make inquiries and give an answer to the hon. gentleman on Thursday.

NATIONAL HEALTH AND WELFARE

CREATION OF DEPARTMENT FOR MANAGEMENT AND CONTROL OF SOCIAL SECURITY AND WELFARE

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister) moved the second reading of bill No. 149, to establish a Department of National Health and Welfare.

He said: Mr. Speaker, the purpose of this bill is to establish a new department of government to be known as the Department of National Health and Welfare, under the direction of a Minister of National Health and Welfare. The bill carries out one of the undertakings in the speech from the throne which relate to the establishment of new departments of government to deal, amongst other things, with post-war planning. I shall read the passage from the speech:

> My ministers believe that the time is rapidly approaching when a minister of the crown should be responsible for each of the three broad fields of post-war planning. You will accordingly be asked to approve the establishment of the following departments of government:
> (1) A Department of Veterans' Affairs to have charge of the rehabilitation and reestablishment of members of the armed forces, and the administration of veterans' pensions and allowances;
> (2) A Department of Reconstruction to promote and coordinate planning for national development and post-war employment; and
> (3) A Department of Social Welfare to organize and to assist in administering activities of the federal government in the fields of health and social insurance.

The words "Social Welfare" as the designation of the department have since been changed to "National Health and Welfare."

As to the scope of the new department, it divides itself broadly into two parts, the first of which has to do primarily with health, and the second with social welfare.

The first part, concerned primarily with health, takes over from the old Department of Pensions and National Health those branches which relate particularly to health. As the house is aware, there has already been taken from the Department of Pensions and National Health the portion of the work of that department which relates more particularly to veterans' affairs. Apart from veterans' affairs, there remain the branches of the department which relate to national health. All these will be brought under the new Department of National Health and Welfare, and the present Department of Pensions and National Health will disappear.

The other main division of the new department will be social welfare. This will include such branches of the public service of Canada as relate to social welfare which may be transferred from existing departments to the new Department of National Health and Welfare, as well as the administration of such new social welfare measures as may be enacted. As the house is aware, there are several social security measures which are already on the statutes and which are administered by different departments of government. One of these is that pertaining to old age pensions administration, which has been under the Department of Finance. The Minister of Finance has indicated that in some respects it would be preferable that a department other than the Department of Finance should administer the old age pensions. I cannot say just at what moment the transfer may be made, but, at some convenient time, the administrative work in connection with old age pensions will be transferred to the new Department of National Health and Welfare.

There is also the statute relating to pensions for the blind, the administration of which will likewise be transferred to the new Department of National Health and Welfare. At the last session of parliament a statute was enacted having to do with physical fitness. At the present time it is being administered by the Department of Pensions and National Health. It will now come under the new Department of National Health and Welfare.

A number of measures relating to social welfare and human well-being are contemplated in the programme of social security already outlined by the government. One of the most important of these is that which relates to family allowances. Hon. members will have seen on the order paper a notice which I have given of a resolution upon which a bill will subsequently be based dealing with family allowances. It is intended when that measure is enacted that it will be administered by the Department of National Health and Welfare. Hon. members will realize that the administration of a measure so important and far-reaching as that will require much careful preparation. It is therefore desirable that the new department should be formed at an early day so that the measure may be in full operation at the time fixed for it to come into force.

These were measures specifically set forth in the speech from the throne, but, in addition, the speech refers to some broader aspects of social security, and to these I should like to quote in the terms of the speech itself. One paragraph to which I would draw attention is the following:

> A considerable measure of social security is already provided under federal and provincial legislation, but the working out of a comprehensive national scheme, in which federal and provincial activity will be integrated and which will include nation-wide health insurance, will require further consultation and close co-operation with the provinces.

It will be seen from this paragraph that the government hopes a means may be found of integrating matters relating to social welfare, to prevent overlapping and bringing about the effective coordination of activities as between the federal and provincial governments. We contemplate working out a comprehensive national scheme in which federal and provincial activities will be integrated and which will include national health insurance.

National health insurance is a subject which has already been referred to the important committee on social security which was appointed last session and again this session. This committee has been making a full and careful study of the whole question of health insurance. It will be necessary, at some stage, for the dominion and the provinces to have conferences in order to work out a comprehensive scheme which will serve the best interests of the dominion and provinces alike.

With regard to health insurance I would point out that it is a means to an end. The end of all this social legislation is social security. Social security will be brought about by such measures as will be undertaken under the veterans' affairs and reconstruction departments and those that relate to insurance against the social and economic hazards encountered in the life of the people. The necessity for a nation-wide plan must be apparent to everyone.

As was natural, the work of social welfare was taken up in the first instance by municipalities and the provinces. Many of the provinces have social legislation on their statute books to-day. They began first with such measures as those relating to workmen's compensation, mothers' allowances, child welfare, hospitalization and other social measures. More recently the provinces have been giving much closer attention to health measures. Some have departments or branches of departments dealing with health.

It has become quite clear that without some assistance and cooperation from the federal government there cannot be anything in the nature of a national scheme. Differences exist between provinces in connection with the legislation enacted. Nothing could be more inimical to a nation-wide plan than to leave to mere chance, and to conditions as they arise, the enactment from time to time by the dominion and by the provinces of different measures which may be regarded as necessary. There is a necessity for some central agency that can be helpful, in cooperation with the provinces, in coordinating services, in preventing duplication and overlapping, and in seeing, when one department is behind another in some important enactment, how that difficulty may be overcome. One of the functions of the new Department of National Health and Welfare will be to cooperate in that way with the several provinces.

There is no intention whatever in this enactment of attempting to invade the jurisdiction of the provinces in these matters. I will refer to that in just a second, but before doing so I should like to read another clause of the speech from the throne which relates to this matter. The speech contemplated that this nation-wide measure of health insurance would be effected only after there had been ample opportunity for study, in both provincial and dominion fields, and after there has been opportunity of conference between the provinces and the dominion. It is not the intention of the dominion to seek to force upon any province any legislation, no matter how good it may be, by invading provincial jurisdiction. What the dominion will endeavour to do in these matters is to bring about to the advantage of the provinces and the dominion alike, proper coordination of all efforts to improve the health and well-being of the people.

The speech continues:

> When suitable agreements are reached with the provinces, my ministers will be prepared to recommend measures to provide for federal assistance in a nation-wide system of health insurance, and for a national scheme of contributory old age pensions on a more generous basis that that at present in operation.

That statement in the speech makes it clear that the dominion contemplates having at some time, we hope it may be soon, not only a nation-wide system of health insurance but, as well, a national scheme of contributory old age pensions. The administration of the contributory scheme of old age pensions would be a very important function of some department of government, and it is the intention to have the Department of National Health and Welfare administer the contributory scheme once it comes into being. In the interval one of the duties of the new department will be to help to gather the necessary factual information which will be required in conferences between the provinces and the dominion, and also to gather from the experience of other nations the kind of knowledge which would be essential for the most efficient working of the old age pension scheme.

The Minister of Finance has made it clear that once the contributory scheme is enacted it will be possible for the government to consider, to use the words of the speech, a more generous basis than that which is at present in operation. "A more generous basis", I should say, would include a lowering of the age at which persons would become entitled to old age pensions and also an increase of the amounts of the pensions themselves.

Will the house pardon me if I mention that my colleague the Minister of Finance has just sent me a note indicating that this debate should be adjourned shortly in order to enable the bills respecting the amendment to the Bank Act and the Quebec Savings Bank Act to pass this house so that they can get over to the senate as soon as may be possible, because if they are to serve the purpose for which they are intended they will have to be assented to before the 1st of July. I will conclude more quickly than I otherwise would what I have to say on the second reading, and after a reply on the part of some hon. member opposite, with the permission of the house will ask that the debate be adjourned in order that we may take up the other measures.

I have indicated fairly well the scope of the work which the new department will be expected to carry on. I should like, however, to set forth more concretely the different measures the department will be called upon to administer and over which it will have supervision. That cannot be better done than by quoting section 5 of the bill, respecting the duties, powers and functions of the minister:

> 5. The duties, powers and functions of the minister shall extend to and include all matters relating to the promotion or preservation of the health, social security and social welfare of the people of Canada over which the parliament of Canada has jurisdiction, and, without restricting the generality of the foregoing, particularly the following matters:—
> (a) the administration of such acts of the parliament of Canada and of orders or regulations of the government of Canada as are not by law assigned to any other department of the government of Canada or any minister thereof relating in any way to the health, social security and welfare of the people of Canada;
> (b) investigation and research into public health and welfare;
> (c) the inspection and medical care of immigrants and seamen, and the administration of marine hospitals, and such other hospitals of the government of Canada as may be committed to its administration by order of the governor in council;

(d) the supervision, as regards the public health, of railways, boats, ships and all other methods of transportation;

(e) the supervision of federal public buildings and offices with a view to conserving and promoting the health of the civil servants and other government employees therein;

(f) the enforcement of any rules or regulations made by the International Joint Commission, promulgated pursuant to the treaty between the United States of America and His Majesty relating to boundary waters and questions arising between the United States of America and Canada, so far as the same relate to public health;

(g) the administration of the Food and Drugs Act, The Opium and Narcotic Drug Act, the Quarantine Act, the Public Works Health Act, the Leprosy Act, the Proprietary or Patent Medicine Act and The National Physical Fitness Act and of all orders and regulations passed or made under any of the said acts;

(h) subject to the provisions of the Statistics Act, the collection, publication and distribution of information relating to the public health, improved sanitation and social and industrial conditions affecting the health and lives of the people;

(i) cooperation with provincial authorities with a view to the coordination of efforts made or proposed for preserving and improving the public health and providing for the social security and welfare of the people of Canada.

Just a word with regard to the question of jurisdiction. On the introduction of the resolution one or two hon. members suggested that this measure might be—I will not say that they did not go farther than that—an attempt on the part of the federal government to invade the jurisdiction of the provinces, or that it was an effort to centralize health and welfare matters in the federal government. Let me call attention to the words I have quoted from section 5:

. . . matters relating to the promotion or preservation of the health, social security and social welfare of the people of Canada over which the parliament of Canada has jurisdiction.

Nothing could be clearer than that. The bill relates to measures over which this parliament has jurisdiction.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I suppose the right hon. gentleman will agree that that is very limited jurisdiction.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: What I have read, I submit, indicates a large number of matters with which the federal government is concerned in relation to health. So far as the municipalities are concerned, and on the question of any possibility of intervention there, the hon. member who raised the point would do well to read section 8 of the bill. I quote:

8. Nothing in this act or in any regulations made hereunder shall authorize the minister or any officer of the department to exercise any jurisdiction or control over any provincial or municipal board of health or other health authority operating under the laws of any province.

The question of jurisdiction, therefore, need not be seriously raised in relation to this measure.

As to the necessity for a measure of this kind, a great deal has been said, particularly since the beginning of the war, of the need to conserve human resources and to give them priority in our thoughts over the conservation of what are generally referred to as natural resources. There is no doubt that the views of the world are changing with respect to the weight to be given to human values in comparison with material wealth. Human well-being to-day has the place in the thoughts and minds of men and women of practically all countries which was given to material wealth in years gone by. In the early years of this country's history most legislation on so-called progress was concerned with the development of the country's resources, and that work will have to go on; it should go on. But too often in the development of our natural resources we have completely neglected, indeed we have in many cases destroyed, our human resources. There is no doubt at all that factory legislation and laws relating to social amelioration have been placed on the statutes for that very reason. It was recognized that without limitations as to the hours of work, without some regulation fixing minimum rates of wages and maximum working hours, instead of conserving our human resources we were helping to destroy them. In these last four years there has been so much in the way of destruction of human life that the world probably will not for generations to come be able to make up the loss of man-power, to say nothing of the undermining in many countries of the well-being of their peoples. For this reason the necessity for having a department of government which will deal with human welfare, which will be concerned primarily with human beings and their well-being, is becoming increasingly apparent.

In the past we have had, for example, our Departments of Public Works, and debates have been carried on at great length in this house in the discussion of public buildings, and other forms of public works. In comparison how much time has been given to discussions on those measures so necessary for the greater health and well-being of the population? Questions like this are forcing themselves to the front, and the time has come when it should be the obligation of some minister of the crown to be specially concerned with matters that relate to human well-being and human welfare, whether they have been thought of in connection with provincial legislation in the past or whether both the provinces and the dominion have been concerned. Human personality, its recognition and development are of more importance than the protection of property, privilege or position and the increase of human well-being of infinitely more importance than the increase of material wealth.

The legislation which is before the house at the moment is for the purpose of developing a department of the federal government which will be primarily concerned with the human aspect of our national life. The new department will first of all continue existing services and functions of the national health divisions of pensions and national health. It will administer social security and welfare measures assigned to it from time to time. It will serve as a centre of planning and research in the fields of health, welfare and social security. It will coordinate federal administrative activities in the fields of health and welfare. It will assist in the coordination of health and welfare activities of the dominion and the provinces with a view to bringing about a comprehensive national scheme to include nation-wide health insurance; it will be charged with the administration of family allowances and when it is enacted with the administration of the national scheme of contributory old age pensions.

A word in conclusion as to one or two matters that the department will not immediately concern itself with. It is not a department of social security. Social security is a comprehensive aim and is the objective of all social legislation. The means to that end differ. Health insurance is one of the means to that end. Health insurance and social insurance of other kinds are means of helping to ensure social security; but the most important means of achieving the end of social security is full employment. Therefore all measures that will contribute to full employment may be regarded as social security measures. But these must come under many departments of the government. For example, we have been discussing in the last few days, matters under the Department of Reconstruction which have to do with employment in one form or another. Employment is the concern of the Department of Labour and other departments of government. The Department of Veterans' Affairs is a department that by its different measures will help to effect social security. Unemployment insurance is one form of social insurance; it is not itself social security. It is a means, as I say, to that end. The administration of unemployment insurance is entrusted at the present time to the Department of Labour. At the moment it is not the intention to transfer its administration from the Department of Labour to the Department of National Health and Welfare, and the reason is obvious. A very important part of the work of the Department of Labour related to reconstruction is that connected with selective service and the various offices which have to do with employment services. These two services are closely interrelated, for that reason alone it would not be desirable to think at present of transferring the administration of unemployment insurance to the new department. As time goes on, it may be, as social services increase, there will be here or elsewhere as between different departments of government of the federal administration, further transfers and arrangements.

The magnitude of the problems involved in a broad extension of social security and welfare makes it essential to have a separate department and a full-time minister, if the federal programme is to be administered efficiently and federal policies properly coordinated with provincial and local activities.

We have talked a great deal about the new social order that is to come into existence after this war is over. Speaking on that subject, as I have from time to time, I have emphasized the note that unless that new social order is well under way before the war itself is over we may look for it in vain after that time. I hope that the measures which the government has introduced at this session, establishing these three departments, veterans' affairs, reconstruction, national health and welfare, and all of which relate in an immediate way to post-war planning, are sufficient evidence that this administration has very much in mind the great social problems which will confront this country immediately the war is over, and that we are not waiting for the end of the war before providing the means needed properly to effect their solution.

Mr. GORDON GRAYDON (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I wish to say a few words with respect to our position in connection with the measure that is now before the house for second reading. I believe there will be pretty general agreement with the statement of the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) that as a nation we are steadily advancing in our recognition of the responsibilities that rest upon us in connection with the matter of human welfare. The day when no one was his brother's keeper, even in a remote sense, has gone once and for all; in our political, economic and social thinking we have advanced far beyond that stage. We have to assume responsibility for others than ourselves. It may be that it has taken a long time to translate this feeling into action; perhaps the war has accelerated the process, but I do believe that our attitude toward the well-being of the children of the nation and under-privileged people of all ages is becoming more advanced. I think it may be said that what was considered heretical thinking during the last generation has become almost orthodox in this generation, which indicates the progress that civilization has made in that period of time. This nation has led the world in many matters in the past; I am convinced that we are well up with the most progressive nations in the world at the present time, and we cannot afford to be anywhere but in the forefront in connection with matters of social welfare in the future. I hope the developments that have been outlined by the Prime Minister will be undertaken, and that we may go much beyond what has been suggested.

I want to range myself and this party in support of the advancement of human welfare in our politics, our economy and our society; for I do not think the importance of these matters can be overemphasized. I can understand the position in which the government finds itself in seeking to make progress with respect to these matters. The question of jurisdiction as between the dominion and the provinces, as set out in the British North America Act, of course requires special attention and consideration on the part of the municipalities, the provinces and the dominion. In this connection I would say to the Prime Minister and the government in a constructive sense—because in matters such as these there is no room for petty criticism—that I am afraid we are not making an all-out frontal attack on this problem of social welfare. I am afraid the leadership given in the dominion is not the sort of leadership the nation actually wants and requires, because in my opinion it is not sufficient to deal piecemeal with these problems. The moves we have made are in the right direction, but in these days it is not enough simply to keep moving in the right direction. That is all to the good, but we must move in the right direction in unison, on a broad front.

As the situation stands at present—and this was pointed out during the discussion of the bill setting up the ministry of reconstruction—we find the municipalities doing certain things and making certain plans. We have the provinces with their ministries of reconstruction, and finally we have a similar ministry set up by the dominion. With respect to this measure, I think a similar criticism can be made. We are about to constitute a health and welfare ministry. Most people, I believe, are asking whether as a nation, having in mind the fact that we have a constitution, we should not take that into consideration and have the closest possible cooperation, consultation and collaboration with the provinces and municipalities, and whether there should not be a broad national scheme to deal with this matter, instead of the hit or miss method, if I may so term it, that we are offered at the moment in this bill. I know the Prime Minister and the government will say, "Well, you cannot do everything at once," but I am not satisfied that we are doing together all the things that should be done.

I should like to know in the first place what this government proposes to do in order to bring about greater cohesion with respect to the various plans and schemes advanced by the dominion, the provinces and the municipalities in connection with health and social welfare. These are matters, of course, which go to the very root of the well-being of our people. I should like to know whether or not the government has consulted the provinces as fully as they should have been consulted. Some move has been made with respect to obtaining expert and other advice in the social security committee which was set up by this parliament and which has done excellent work. That work has been carried on now for two sessions. In common with most hon. members I have carefully read the reports of the committee; and I am sure anyone who has done so must be impressed by the magnitude of the problem and the great industry that has been shown by those who have worked on that committee. The government itself recognized that the problem of health insurance was of such vital consequence to this country that before any bill was brought into this house the point of view of the committee should be obtained in that connection. Personally I felt that a bill might have been brought into this house first and then referred to the committee, but of course the policy of the government was followed.

The point I should like to make is that the whole problem of social welfare must be attacked with a great deal more vigour and in a much more united way than has been the case up to the present. We must show a great deal more respect for the various constitutional entities that exist within this nation than has been shown heretofore in the policies of this government. I suggest to the Prime Minister that with respect to the status our people enjoy under municipal and provincial law, there is a great need for many more conferences and a much closer contact being made between the provincial authorities and this government as to matters which concern both, where the jurisdiction may be concurrent and where perhaps in many instances the dangers of overlapping are present. Since the administration of much of this rests with the provinces, and in some instances with the municipalities, before any nebulous intrusion is made by the dominion into the whole provincial field I suggest to the government that there should be a fuller cooperation and prior consultation with provincial governments.

I believe the Prime Minister, and particularly the Minister of Pensions and National Health, will realize that with respect to the old health branch—and perhaps I should not use that expression, because the branch is still operating—there has always been some doubt so far as its powers and actual position were concerned. The problem as to just how far the administration of national health should be carried out in the dominion field, and how far it should be permitted to encroach upon provincial jurisdiction, is one which has never been fully cleared up, and has been constantly under review. That condition must not be carried into the new ministry. As I pointed out last night when the resolution was before the committee, I am hopeful that the fact that the dominion government is attempting to set up a ministry to deal with health and social welfare will not be taken by the people of Canada as an intimation that the matters over which the federal government is empowered to deal have been enlarged in any way, or that in any way the jurisdiction of this government has been increased. That cannot be done under this legislation as I read it; the formation of a new high-sounding ministry of health and social welfare is nothing more than window-dressing so far as the government is concerned, since the jurisdiction remains the same and cannot be altered by the provisions of this legislation. I think, however, that special emphasis should be placed upon this matter of health and social welfare. As I pointed out in my opening remarks, the economic, occupational and geographic sections of the country must be taken into consideration in respect of all these matters. There are markedly different needs in the various communities and localities. In many instances matters affecting the intimate problems of families, groups and communities must be dealt with in their own setting, if legislation suggested by a ministry is to be as effective as it should be. For this reason I think it may properly be pointed out that in connection with health and social welfare there are four different fields or areas. In each area different methods of approach will be required, and there will have to be a variation of technical resources employed in connection with each.

Let us consider the matter of health, which is first mentioned in the name of the new department. To my mind health includes health education, preventive measures, curative services, and the like. All of these, subject of course to coordination and cooperation with the dominion, are administered by the provinces. In the matter of health the position of the dominion until now has not been clear and, if I may say so, its contribution has been small.

May I add something further which in my view cannot be disregarded in any discussion of social welfare and health, and is closely integrated with the problem. I refer to the conditions under which people live. Social welfare and the general health of the nation are tied up closely with the question of housing. The dominion's jurisdiction in connection with housing is mainly confined to financing and to the supervision of standards. This is taken care of by the Department of Finance in Ottawa. Hon. members know there is a further wartime housing administration under the jurisdiction of the Department of Munitions and Supply. Municipal and provincial authorities—particularly municipal—have a vital interest in this matter, as will be readily understood by the Prime Minister and other members of the government. I did not hear the Prime Minister mention this matter which will have to be considered by the new ministry, and when he replies I shall be glad if he will indicate whether housing and the like will be grouped under one great programme to be administered, so far as it is related to dominion field, by the new department. As I pointed out, up until the present time these matters to a great extent have been handled municipally, with, in later years, aid and supervision given by the federal administration.

Then arises the problem of social assistance and social utilities. In my view social assistance is a matter which comes almost entirely under the jurisdiction of the provinces. Social assistance broadly covers that area in which a condition of need has been shown, and where remedies based on need must be found. Under the heading of social utilities come the provision of hostels and general shelter, neither of which could be classified as social assistance in the ordinary sense of the term.

Then, what will happen in connection with social and unemployment insurance? Will unemployment insurance be administered by the new department? I ask these questions because my fourth point has to do with insurance generally. I take it that social insurance, provided it is on a contributory basis, in a similar manner to unemployment insurance—as a contributory scheme of old age pensions may be—and when I say that I have no desire to enter into a discussion of old age pensions at this time, because I do not know what is in the government's mind in that respect—would come, naturally, within the jurisdiction of the dominion.

We see that the whole problem of social welfare and health is strangely divided among various jurisdictions, and the matter presents peculiar problems to a ministry such as is now about to be set up. I would therefore offer the constructive suggestion to the Prime Minister that in setting up the new ministry—I should have preferred to take this action before the ministry was set up, but I do not like to place obstacles in the way of any movement which is in the right direction, and will not do so now—there should be an expert review of the whole problem of social welfare and health in Canada as it applies to the dominion and the provinces. In such a review reference might properly be made not only to the provinces and to other interests concerned but also to the major voluntary welfare agencies in Canada which have done such excellent work and whose knowledge on this subject may be regarded as particularly expert.

But the administration has decided that this ministry will be set up in any event. It only goes to show, I think, the necessity which I pointed out in the first place, the really great need for a complete movement in unison with the provinces and other interests which are specially concerned in order that we may tackle this whole problem of social welfare together, and not in any piecemeal fashion, because it is one of the most important and vital problems that face this nation to-day. I make this suggestion to the Prime Minister, and I am hopeful that it will be accepted. In view of the fact that of the four different areas, four different fields if you like, which I mentioned, three are within the local jurisdiction of the provinces and the municipalities, and the fourth is more particularly within the field of the dominion, there should be two bodies set up. One of these bodies, if I may suggest it, would be the dominion health, welfare and assistance body, comprising representatives of the dominion and the provinces, a body which would work continuously and concurrently to try to solve the problems which normally would rest upon a ministry such as this in dealing with these three particular areas which I mentioned a moment ago and which are divided in their jurisdiction.

In addition to that there should be a body to deal with a dominion insurance and social savings fund which would have full administrative power over all contributory social provisions. That would cover the area which is peculiarly within the purview and the jurisdiction of this parliament.

I make that suggestion to the Prime Minister with a view to strengthening the bill. As I said a moment ago, I have no desire to do anything that would in any way delay the passage of a measure which is moving in the right direction. My only purpose is to speed it on its way and to make it more workable and more efficient.

I do suggest that the Prime Minister might well consider sending this bill to the social security committee. That would give us the opportunity of hearing witnesses on behalf of the provinces with respect to the measure itself, so that we might have the very best possible measure and the most advanced scheme of health and social welfare which this parliament and this nation could devise. We are anxious to obtain the very best, and it is for these reasons that these suggestions are put forward—not, as I have said, as obstacles to the passing of a measure which is a move in the right direction, but rather that we may have as complete and as advanced and as workable a measure as we would like to see. In times like these, when, we are dealing with problems of such magnitude, affecting the very lives and the human welfare of our people, we cannot afford to have anything less than the very best in the way of legislation. This may not be the best.

With these suggestions, which I hope will be found to be constructive by the administration, may I say to the Prime Minister that if there is anything which we in His Majesty's Loyal Opposition can do towards bringing about a better deal, and a squarer deal, if I may say so, for our under-privileged people and for those who need assistance, that help will be freely given in a cooperative and special way which I hope will not only meet with the favour of the nation and of this parliament but will be a credit to those of us in the House of Commons who attempt to do and give our very best in the advancement of this worthy work.

Mr. LEADER: Mr. Speaker, I have been asked to adjourn the debate but before doing so I want to say a few words on a question of privilege. Last night there was an understanding that we would take up first this legislation, which we have done. Now we are to revert to other bills which the Prime Minister declares it is imperative to have passed before the 1st of July. No intimation had I received that this procedure was to be followed. Can you imagine the howl which would have gone up from the other side of the house had an arrangement been made with them and then this sudden change was made in the procedure? They would never have stood for it. But as a humble member of this house I must accommodate myself to the convenience of the government to facilitate the business of the house if there are other measures which they wish to take up. I have been told that these other two bills will pass swiftly because members on the opposite side of the house have agreed not to discuss them. But I know what might happen to what I have to say if I move the adjournment of this debate, because I have seen it happen in the house before. I have seen a member move the adjournment of a debate, and the debate was never resumed during that session. That might happen in this case. I have no guarantee. I assume it is understood that this bill will be taken up again immediately after the two money bills are disposed of. If for any reason, as I explained to the Prime Minister last night, I am unable to be here, may I claim the privilege to speak on section 5 of this bill before it passes? I do not ask for an assurance, but that is the position I am taking in adjourning this debate. I may sit here if I am able to until it comes on. If I can I will be here. With these remarks, Mr. Speaker, which I make with no particular animosity but with a little disappointment, I move the adjournment of the debate.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: In reply to my hon. friend, as a matter of privilege, if he will recall, I intimated last night that the bank bills would be taken up first.

Mr. LEADER: That is true.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: My hon. friend said that he wished to speak for forty minutes on a matter of importance relating to health. It was then twenty minutes to eleven o'clock and, out of what I felt of consideration for him, I suggested that instead of his taking twenty minutes then and going on again and concluding what he had to say to-day, it would be better for him to wait until to-day to make his speech without having it broken. My hon. friend agreed to that.

Mr. LEADER: I appreciated the arrangement.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Then may I say, having in mind my hon. friend's desire to speak early in the debate and to be free before the afternoon was over, before adjournment came last night at eleven o'clock I announced to the house that I had changed my mind about the order of proceedings, and I changed it in the hope that I might be accommodating my hon. friend by having this measure called first, thereby letting my hon. friend make his speech before we took up the other measures. I proceeded in that way. While I was speaking this afternoon I received unexpectedly a note from the Minister of Finance and, as hon. members saw, was obliged to pause and read it. My colleague indicated that it was very important, as royal assent would have to be given before July 1 and as the other house would have to pass them first, that these banking measures should go through this house as soon as possible. Having that imperative request before me I said, before continuing with my remarks that I thought the debate should be adjourned after a reply had been made, in order that the other measures might be taken up.

I know nothing about any understanding, but I should be surprised if these measures would take any time. I thank my hon. friend for moving the adjournment of the debate, and I can assure him that as soon as these measures have passed we shall continue this debate immediately.

Motion (Mr. Leader) agreed to and debate adjourned.

BANK ACT AMENDMENT

EXTENSION OF CHARTERS TO SEPTEMBER 1, 1944

Mr. D. C. ABBOTT (Parliamentary Assistant to the Minister of Finance) moved the second reading of bill No. 147, to amend the Bank Act.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time, considered in committee, reported, read the third time and passed.

QUEBEC SAVINGS BANKS

EXTENSION OF CHARTERS TO SEPTEMBER 1, 1944

Mr. D. C. ABBOTT (Parliamentary Assistant to the Minister of Finance) moved the second reading of bill No. 148, to amend the Quebec Savings Banks Act.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time, and the house went into committee thereon, Mr. Bradette in the chair.

On section 1—Certain charters continued.

Mr. COLDWELL: Mr. Chairman, as we have always hoped that some day the banks of Canada may be owned by the nation, perhaps I might say a word at this time. The bill to extend the charters of the banks has been approved by the house, and the banking and commerce committee is now in session discussing the amendments to these charters. I see no objection to this bill going through. I think it is proper for the government to extend the charters for two months in view of the anticipated report of the committee to the house. I wanted to make this brief explanation of our support of the extension of the charters for the ensuing two months.

Mr. FRASER (Peterborough West): I should like to ask the parliamentary assistant to the Minister of Finance if he expects that we shall get to the Bank Act by September 1?

Mr. ABBOTT: I have always carefully refrained from indulging in prophecy, and I think I will continue that practice.

Section agreed to.

Bill reported, read the third time and passed.

NATIONAL HEALTH AND WELFARE

CREATION OF DEPARTMENT FOR MANAGEMENT AND CONTROL OF SOCIAL SECURITY AND WELFARE

The house resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. Mackenzie King for the second reading of Bill No. 149, to establish a Department of National Health and Welfare.

Mr. HARRY LEADER (Portage la Prairie): Mr. Speaker, this bill affords me an opportunity to discuss what might be termed the almost forgotten man. Lest anyone should have any doubt as to the theme of my remarks this afternoon, I state now that I intend to deal with the Davidson cancer cure and try to give the latest developments which have taken place since this matter was first introduced into this house.

I was glad to note the reference by the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) to the intention of cooperating with the provinces under this legislation. I know that that is extremely necessary, because under that musty old statute called the British North America Act, which was passed seventy-seven years ago, the federal government is pretty well tied up when it comes to dealing with matters within the jurisdiction of the provinces. That has happened in connection with the investigation which we tried to have into Doctor Davidson's work, and I think this bill will have the effect of creating a better understanding between the provinces and the federal government.

When I first undertook to press for a recognition of Doctor J. R. Davidson's work, I approached the medical association of the city of Winnipeg where Doctor Davidson resides.

I thought that that was the proper procedure to follow. However, I was informed that Doctor Davidson was a stubborn old man who would not play ball with the rest of the profession. That statement astounded me, because I was under the impression from my conversations with Doctor Davidson that he had offered everything he had discovered to the medical profession through the medical periodicals which are printed from time to time. However, he did tell me that there was some difference of opinion and that he found it better to explore his own clue and follow it through to the end without having any suggestions from others, however well-meaning they might be. He was carrying on his research work more or less independently of the medical profession. At all times the information in regard to his experiments was available to the medical profession if they so desired. I found Doctor J. R. Davidson of Winnipeg a very amiable and conscientious man, willing to cooperate with anyone, and as evidence of the truth of what I say I will read a short paragraph from a letter he wrote to the medical committee of the national research council when he applied for a grant. And by the way, let it be remembered that the medical committee of the research council refused Doctor Davidson the grant to carry on research work on the ground that the answers he had given to their questions were not on a scientific basis. Let me say in passing that I have never heard Doctor Davidson say one word derogatory to the medical profession or any person belonging thereto. This is what he writes:

> It is my earnest hope that through the decision of your committee the medical profession of Canada will be able to preserve for the future whatever elements of value there may be in my treatment. In that event I would be happy and would feel that my life work had not been done in vain.

That is the attitude he took towards the medical profession even to the last, when he was turned down by the medical committee of the research council.

And now may I say a word with reference to the doctors. I know they can speak for themselves, but I have had a good deal of experience with doctors. They have helped me in many crises in my life, and I am not going to say that they are one of the finest classes of people; I will say that they are the finest men we have in our citizenry. More particularly do I say this having regard to the old pioneer doctors who, without the aid of automobiles or any of the other modern methods of transport, went to their patients, no road being too long, no night too dark, no fee too small for those men in the pioneer days. And all through the years the doctors have conformed to that pattern, even the modern doctors of to-day.

It has been said that I have no right to speak on a scientific question of this sort. Mr. Speaker, I speak from experience; I speak from the practical standpoint; and while I have said a word for the doctors, I am speaking at the same time for those who are afflicted with this terrible disease, and from my experience as a victim of it, coming from a clinic after an exploratory operation taking two hours. It was not just a physical exploration, because there is a ten-inch incision where they operated and found my case hopeless. I speak from experience, knowing what Doctor Davidson has done for me, and my heart bleeds for those in a similar condition. I therefore dare to get up and speak even on a scientific question.

I have done what I could to spread this gospel. Of 7,000 copies of the speech which I made in this house on February 7 last, over 6,000 have been distributed throughout Canada. I am receiving letters from all over the country, and public opinion is behind my efforts. If the government does not know it, it is time it did. I had occasion to be in Calgary during the first week of April and they arranged a meeting for me. We did not have a large meeting, but it was a meeting that was in deadly earnest, and I am still getting reports from people who are working throughout that city asking that the government take some steps to safeguard the discoveries of this great Canadian, Doctor J. R. Davidson. I had a meeting in my own city and later I am going to read a resolution that was passed there. I may say that a Mr. Pugsley, who represents the legislative committee of the railway associations of British Columbia, has been in Winnipeg during the past week making a private investigation of the work of Doctor Davidson. That is the work that is going on throughout the country, and yet we find the federal government and the government of Manitoba, who are just as guilty, passing the buck. There is no other term that fits the situation.

The resolution from which I am about to quote was endorsed by the city council of Portage la Prairie, by the rural council of Portage la Prairie, and, the other day, by the Manitoba federation of agriculture. I am not going to quote the whole resolution because it would take too much time.

Mr. MacNICOL: Take time to quote it. It is important.

Mr. COLDWELL: Put everything on the record.

Mr. LEADER: I want you to notice that the resolution asks for a full and fair investigation open to the press and to the public, and in passing I would say that the very opposite is the attitude taken by the medical committee of the research council. While I was in Winnipeg a representative of the research council said to me, "Mr. Leader, we will have an investigation if you are determined, but let it be in camera. These patients that you talk about do not want their private affairs exposed to the world. I think it would be better for you, for the patients, and for the medical profession, if we are to have an investigation, not to carry it out in the daylight." These resolutions, however, and the attitude of Doctor Davidson, request a fair investigation open to the press and to the public. Their idea is to let the people judge as well as the tribunal which will make the investigation. I quote from the report of the meeting that was held in Portage la Prairie:

> A full and fair investigation into the Doctor Davidson cancer treatment, to be open to the public and the press, was also endorsed by resolution.

Reverting to the resolution passed at the meeting in Portage la Prairie, it was held under the auspices of the board of trade, being a mass meeting in the largest theatre in the city, which was filled almost to the doors. Those present were enthusiastic and the resolution was endorsed unanimously. I will not read the preamble, but here is the substance of the resolution—the Prime Minister has a copy; if he has not, then they did not follow my suggestion:

> Now therefore be it resolved that in view of the ever growing menace of cancer to the national health, we urgently request the federal government and the provincial government of Manitoba, acting either separately or in co-operation, to hold without further delay a full and fair investigation into the Davidson cancer treatment. It is essential in our opinion that this investigation should be open to the press and the public.

Now perhaps a word in regard to mortality from cancer as compared with war. I made the statement last night to the Prime Minister that the matter which I wished to discuss was in my opinion, in some aspects, more important than even the war itself. Anyone who wishes to do so may qualify that statement, but in my opinion there are aspects of this disease which present a more important problem. In the first four months of the war—scarcely four months, in 1939—there were estimated to be 4,383 deaths from cancer.

Mr. MacNICOL: In Canada?

Mr. LEADER: In Canada. These figures are from the bureau of statistics and they are complete. In 1940 there were 13,332 deaths from cancer; in 1941 there were 13,417; and in 1942 there were 13,654. In 1943 there were 14,000; in the first six months of 1944—this is an estimate—there were 7,000. The house can see that there is a progressive increase year after year, and this goes on not only in war time but in peace time. One would think that any government or individual would be so keen to find anything that would stop the ravages of this fatal disease that they would jump at almost any clue that was submitted. That makes a total of 61,403 deaths. I have not the latest figures of the casualties of this war, but I think the number of heroes that we have lost amounts to 20,000. I think I am conservative in saying that that number have given their lives in the service of their country. That means that for every Canadian soldier who has lost his life so far in this war three people have died in this country from cancer. This would verify the statement that in some respects it is even of more importance from the point of view of casualties than the war itself.

Now, in regard to cancer, I am not a scientist, yet I have received information from those who are. I am told there is no cure for cancer unless it is treated in its early stages. That is the information I have received from the Mayo clinic; that is the information I have received from many doctors. Do not confuse my argument. I am not saying there is no cure for cancer, but I am saying on the authority of the best medical men in this country that there is no cure for cancer in its late stages. Doctor Davidson, that poineer doctor, when as a consulting physician in the hospital in Winnipeg he saw case after case of cancer coming in for treatment, diagnosed as cancer in which an operation was the only thing that would solve the problem or help the situation, and most of them dying, decided that he would give the rest of his life to trying to find a preventive. I want the house to remember that above all others his work has been along that line. He has been seeking the prevention of cancer rather than a cure.

Doctor Davidson believes that cancer is caused by a nutritional deficiency in our diet. I do not know how true that is, but I can speak of my case. I would not be here to-day were it not for the vitamin treatment of Doctor Davidson in Winnipeg. You can take that for what it is worth. I have been told that the patients do not know anything about it. Well, we may not know how it is done, but we do know when it is done. Doctor Davidson is not the only man who has been experimenting along this line. I was told by a friend of mine in Winnipeg that I would find information in a publication, the name of which I forget at the moment, but I think it is the annual review of the national research council, to the effect that many medical doctors are experimenting in England and in the United States, and quite a number in Canada and perhaps throughout the world along similar lines.

Mr. MacNICOL: I know of three in Ontario.

Mr. LEADER: They have been experimenting along this line, and some day we are going to honour the medical man who finds either a cure or a preventive for cancer. The medical profession is looking for it. Doctor Davidson said that he wanted the medical profession to receive all the information that he has. He believes that they are the ones who should carry on the work. With all these doctors and scientists throughout the world, along with Doctor Davidson, exploring the theory of deficiency in diet, it may be that he is the one who has the clue. Perhaps Doctor Davidson is the one who will show the light to the rest of the world in regard to the prevention of cancer. If we could get some preventive for cancer we would need no cure. That is obvious.

On this point I wish to say that I think more money—and I believe it was announced by the Minister of Finance (Mr. Ilsley) last night—should be made available for research work, especially medical research, in Canada. But at the same time, if Doctor Davidson's work is ignored, how is it going to affect the young scientists who want to follow that line of work? It would not be an incentive to any young doctor to undertake this work if men like Doctor Davidson, a pioneer doctor, experimenting for over thirty years, and who has something which I will show the house before I finish if I am given the time, is ignored.

I said something about the medical profession not being keen on accepting Doctor Davidson's theories, and that is very evident. I wish to tell you, Mr. Speaker, that my last speech had much publicity. I had it printed in pamphlet form, and one of the requests I received came from one of the South American republics. I sent a number of copies and to-day those speeches are translated by the government into the Spanish language and are used by the government cancer clinic of the Dominican republic. I saw two letters in Doctor Davidson's office from research men—I believe they were institutes—asking Doctor Davidson if he would come to California and carry on his experiments there. I have recently received word that two requests have come from England for Doctor Davidson to give some information on his work and perhaps emigrate to the old country. He does not want to go. Do we want to lose him? Is there not room in Canada for men of that type? I say to the Prime Minister that if Doctor Davidson's method is sufficiently attractive to foreign countries to cause them to seek information about it, it should be taken up by the Canadian government.

It is nearly a year since this matter came before the house. It was brought up by the hon. member for Fort William (Mr. McIvor) and then by the hon. member for St. Boniface (Mr. Howden). Both hon. members suggested that the government should assist Doctor Davidson in some form or other to carry on his research work. As I said before, nearly a year has gone by. It might be well to go back and look at the figures I submitted a while ago. Approximately 14,000 of our people have perished from cancer in that time and no action has been taken. Speaking according to my own conscience, Mr. Speaker, I will say it would charge me with criminal negligence if I did not undertake to bring this matter before the house at every opportunity that presents itself until some action is taken by those in authority.

It would be unfair for me to leave the impression that the Minister of Pensions and National Health has not been very sympathetic; I believe he tried to do his best within his limited power but sympathy is not going to get us anywhere in regard to this case. We want definite action.

Mr. KUHL: Who was the nigger in the woodpile?

Mr. LEADER: It was first referred by the minister to the medical committee of the research council, which was not the proper thing to do, and I so stated in my first speech. Why? Because it was prejudged by some of the members of the research council, at any rate. That is not a proper tribunal to make an investigation into this matter. Nevertheless it was submitted to the national research council and they gave their verdict which, as I expected, was that Doctor Davidson was not entitled to a grant to help him carry on his work. Then the minister referred the matter to the Manitoba government, and asked the medical faculty of the university of Manitoba to conduct an investigation. The president of the university said they would be glad to do so, but made his acceptance provisional. He said, "We want to make a thorough investigation, and to call witnesses. This will entail some expense, which we expect the federal government to defray." That was the condition on which the university undertook to carry on the investigation. I know the minister explored the possibility of giving the province some financial aid, but came up against the British North America Act and could not make a move.

Then what happened? The minister referred the matter again to the national research council, and I do not agree with that action. Now let me give the latest information as to what the government has in hand at the present time. The document I have in my hand, which is authentic, declares that——the dominion has no jurisdiction to investigate its remedial aspects. It would, therefore, appear to be a provincial matter, and it is regretted that there is no further action which can be taken.

So it is left to the government of Manitoba, and perhaps we should look into the attitude of that government, which is set out in a short quotation I have here. It is a statement in the press attributed to Premier Garson, and reads:

Premier Stuart S. Garson suggested in the Manitoba legislature Monday that no financial assistance be given to Doctor J. R. Davidson of Winnipeg in his cancer research until a report on the work is made by the medical faculty of the university of Manitoba.

Mr. Garson said dominion pensions minister Ian Mackenzie had requested the medical faculty to conduct a further examination of Doctor Davidson's vitamin cancer treatment experiments. "We would be derelict in our responsibility if this house made a grant to assist Doctor Davidson before the report has been received," he said.

To be fair to the premier of Manitoba it must be stated that when he made this statement he was under the impression that an investigation was to be undertaken by the university of Manitoba; but that is the attitude of the government of that province. Now I am coming to the most important part of my remarks.

Mr. COLDWELL: What would prevent the federal government from making a grant?

Mr. LEADER: The British North America Act.

Mr. COLDWELL: But under the War Measures Act we are making grants of all kinds for every purpose.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): The Department of Justice advised against it.

Mr. LEADER: The Prime Minister said I had asked for an hour; I really thought it was forty minutes, but it will take me fifteen minutes to read these letters; for this is the evidence I want to submit to this house. This is the evidence I am breaking my heart to bring before the appropriate authorities in the matter of an investigation into Doctor Davidson's work. This is worth more to me than all your scientific questionnaires or scientific methods of carrying on your work. These letters are from the patients themselves. I have ten letters here, written to me at my request. I asked Doctor Davidson's office in Winnipeg to get me some personal testimonials if possible, that it might be necessary for me to have some more ammunition. These letters were written and sent to me direct, with authority to use them in any way that might assist Doctor Davidson in his research work. I can give the name and address of the writer of each letter if it is the wish of the house that I do so.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Go ahead.

Mr. LEADER: The first letter is from the wife of a man who was suffering from cancer, and is as follows:

Dear Mr. Leader:

Received Dr. Davidson's letter to-day requesting we write you giving details of my husband's case. We have felt, like you, there should be some recognition of his treatment before his own health fails.

My husband's illness was caused by X-ray burns, the same being given for treatment of cancerous growths. The first growth appeared on his forehead about eleven years ago and diagnosed as cancer. A skin grafting was done. Four years later another growth and more grafting. Two years ago another growth which did not respond to grafting and ulcerated. X-ray taken which showed bone involved and diagnosed carcinoma, type 4.

Dermatologists who saw him in Detroit in April, 1943, said he could live only a matter of a few months.

June 1943 doctors at Mayo clinic who saw X-rays said nothing more could be done.

In July he was losing weight and strength rapidly and weighed 149 pounds. Considerable pain in head. In desperation we left the 24th of July for Winnipeg to see Doctor Davidson after reading in the papers about him. In fact, Mr. Leader, you opened Doctor Davidson's office door for us the morning we arrived. You were just leaving and Doctor Davidson told us who you were.

The first week in Winnipeg he spent in bed except to walk from the Marlborough Hotel, one-half block from Doctor Davidson's office, once a day. After the first week's treatment he was able to be up the greater part of the day. He now weighs 169 pounds—twenty pounds gained and is very active with scarcely any pain. He continues faithfully with the treatment.

Doctor Davidson did not say he could cure him due to the extreme X-ray burn which destroyed cells of the skin but he did say he could retard the progress of the disease which he certainly has done and we are certainly grateful. My husband is only 44 years of age and he certainly is not willing to give up and has two lovely children to live for. If there is anything we can do please let us know. Thank you for the good work you are trying to do.

Sincerely,

(Sgd.) Mrs. Frank Penhole,
98 Gladstone Avenue,
St. Thomas, Ontario.

The next letter is from West Kildonan, Winnipeg, and is as follows:

Sir,

I am a housewife of Winnipeg.

I have had a very serious illness, and had to be operated on for cancer. The operation was performed on the 20th of March, 1943.

Afterwards my doctor said there was nothing more could be done for me and that I could only live six months, or a year, at most. I had heard of Doctor Davidson so consulted him. I underwent his treatment (and still do) and I must say that I have improved greatly from it. I have gained about seven pounds in weight. I eat well, and what is more important I sleep well, and I have every confidence in Doctor Davidson and feel quite sure I will be cured. I have been examined by my previous doctors (since undergoing this treatment) and they are astonished at the change and they report that there is no further growth of the cancer.

I had read of your taking up Doctor Davidson's case in the house so I thought I would write and let you know the benefit I have got from being treated by him.

Very truly yours,

(Sgd.) Mrs. Annie Faickney,
184 Belmont Avenue,
West Kildonan,
Winnipeg.

The next letter is from a gentleman who lives in Miami, Manitoba, as follows:

Dear Sir,

In 1939 I had a large painful growth on my left groin. I had it examined by five surgeons, including Doctor Rutherford MacCharles and they all agreed it was a sarcoma. The only treatment they could advise was an operation, and I was given to understand an operation for sarcoma was very unsatisfactory and usually caused it to spread to other parts of the body. I went to Doctor Davidson and commenced the high vitamin diet and in November radio malt, wheat germ, high vitamin pills, etc. For two weeks I stayed in Winnipeg and he gave me a hypo in the arm daily of egg serum. I went home then and continued the diet and the fertile incubated egg treatment. The growth began to soften first and gradually got smaller. After a month's treatment I could walk short distances without pain. By spring the growth had disappeared and I had the full use of my leg again.

I went to Morden hospital near the end of March and had Doctor Menziers remove a gland where the growth had been and sent to Winnipeg for a biopsy but I was too late doing this as there was nothing left of it.

The treatment, in addition to taking away the growth, improved my health greatly. At fifty-seven I can do more heavy work on the farm than I could for many years.

Yours truly,

(Sgd.) H. H. Storey.

The next letter is from Mrs. Frances Eakin, addressed to me, and is as follows:

Beaver Valley Fur Farm,
Ootsa Lake, B.C.
March 3, 1944.

Mr. Harry Leader, M.P.,
House of Commons,
Ottawa, Ont.

Dear Sir:

This letter is with reference to the treatment for cancer I received from Doctor J. R. Davidson of Winnipeg.

Here is a short history of my case. I went to Vancouver in January, 1942, where I was operated on and a growth removed from the womb. A frozen analysis was taken of the growth by the pathological at St. Paul's Hospital in that city and it showed that the growth was cancerous. The operation was followed by x-ray and radium treatments. When I got well enough I returned to my home and before six months were up found myself with a secondary growth in the bowels. I returned to Vancouver where they performed a colostimy operation, supposedly to relieve me. When I got back on my feet again after this operation they told me I would only live six months or a year at most which was quite a blow as I was only 32 years of age.

In March 1943 I went to Doctor Davidson and took his treatment for five months. At the end of that time I was so well I was able to come home. I have been home now for almost six months, feeling fine and able to do my own work.

Doctor Davidson's treatment benefited me to the extent that I know I would not be living to-day if it had not been for his treatment.

At the present time I am feeling fine and have no trouble except with the colostimy operation which was unnecessary in the first place.

My husband joins with me in wishing you every success in your appeal to the government for help for the doctor. We think he richly deserves it.

Yours very truly,
Mrs. Frances Eakin.

The next letter is as follows:

Libau, Manitoba,

H. Leader, M.P.,
Ottawa, Canada.

Dear Sir:

Having followed your sincere endeavours at obtaining a grant for Doctor J. R. Davidson's cancer research through the daily papers I would like to help you all I can in that direction. It is not necessary for me to outline Mrs. Wanag's case history in this letter as you already have it among other of Doctor Davidson's case histories. I do wish to emphasize the fact, as you will note from enclosed letter, that the Winnipeg clinic could do nothing more for her in July, 1943. She took her first treatment from Doctor Davidson on July 23, 1943, and continued improving remarkably until about the end of November, 1943, when due to scarcity of help Mrs. Wanag did too much work at home and her improvement has been considerably retarded. Then she also had a severe attack of lumbago during January, 1944, which caused her terrible pain and suffering. The lumbago has now all but left her due to Doctor Davidson sending her to a masseuse for eight treatments. I expect she should now continue to show some improvement in her fight against the cancer. She strictly follows all diet and prescriptions, et cetera, and has faith in Doctor Davidson's treatment, because she is definitely better than she was during July of last year.

Then follow two short paragraphs which, to save time, I shall not read.

Mr. COLDWELL: Take all the time you wish.

Mr. LEADER: The letter I have just read is from J. L. Wanag. The next letter is as follows:

Kenora, Feb. 25, 1944,
327 2nd Street South.

Mr. Harry Leader, M.P.,
House of Commons,
Ottawa, Ontario.

Dear Mr. Leader:

Having seen through the medium of the newspapers of the interest you are taking in trying to bring to the attention of the government the wonderful strides in cancer research being made by Doctor J. R. Davidson, of the Somerset Building Winnipeg, Manitoba. And feeling that every bit of evidence which may be placed in your hands should be provided, in order to get the government to realize that the Doctor is worthy of their support in every way. I am writing you this letter to be used in any way you think best, hoping that it may in its own poor way aid you in bringing about that recognition.

I was suffering from cancer of quite long standing and, like so many so afflicted, deferred getting medical attention until it was almost too late. Having the natural human antipathy to anything surgical, when I did commence to get medical advice about my trouble, tried those mediums which I believed would give me relief without recourse to the use of the knife. But to no avail, for these things did me no good whatever. Finally I heard from an acquaintance of long standing that she had been cured of a cancerous growth by taking the treatments afforded by Doctor Davidson, and I became one of his patients.

Doctor Davidson did not mince matters when he examined me, but told me what disease I was suffering from and that it was a case of operation, for I had left it too long to be cured otherwise. But, I did start to take the treatments provided by him and continued them for several weeks, as a build up, preparatory to the operation. I am as convinced as I am that I am alive right now that the treatments that I received in Doctor Davidson's office laid the foundation for me to come through the operation as I have, for that is behind me now. I also firmly believe that a continuation of the treatment for a period of time will eventually cleanse my blood of anything cancerous, and that I will again be as healthy as ever I was in all my lifetime.

I believe that the citizenry of the country owe a great debt of gratitude to Doctor

Davidson for his untiring research for a cure for cancer. I know that I do personally and I am sure that you are making no mistake in furthering his cause. I am.

Respectfully yours,
Pearly Doan.

The next letter is as follows:

% Sobie Silk Shops,
Regina, Sask., Feb. 23, 1943.

Mr. Harry Leader, M.P.,
Portage la Prairie, Man.

Dear Mr. Leader:

I have just received a letter from Doctor J. R. Davidson, Winnipeg, stating you have requested that patients who have been treated by him for cancer write to you direct, and it gives me a great satisfaction to be given the opportunity. Following is a brief history of my case and a statement of the present condition of my health.

I was operated on for an abdominal tumor at the Grey Nuns hospital, Regina, on February 8, 1943. A large cyst envolving the right ovary was removed and section of same showed signs of malignancy. I was referred to the Cancer Clinic on report of section and was given a series of forty deep X-ray therapy treatments after which I was given a complete examination and informed there was not any sign of a recurrence. However, with the gradual return of pain even while I was still receiving X-ray treatments I naturally became alarmed. By the end of June there was a steady throbbing pain in my lower left side where an unnatural fullness was evident. I attempted to go back to work in July (my occupation being that of a saleslady), but toward the end of the second week in August I did not feel equal to work any longer. On the 16th of August I went to Winnipeg and consulted Doctor Davidson who immediately began treating me. At the end of five weeks of treatment the pain was definitely subsiding, and after ten weeks of treatment the pain was negligible and the distended feeling was also disappearing. By the time I had received three and one-half months' treatment I did not have any more pain, had more energy and slept better and felt better than I had for years. I came back to Regina on the 21st of November, have worked every day since and have gained in weight and strength while working.

Sincerely hoping Doctor Davidson's method of treatment of Cancer will be made available to all with the least possible delay, I am,

Gratefully,
Perley B. Dohlen.

The next letter is as follows:

Miami, Man.

Dear Mr. Leader:

I want to tell you how much I have been benefited in health by Doctor J. R. Davidson's treatment for cancer.

Three years ago I had cancer in the throat. It was as large as a good sized plum and I spent most of the summer in and out of bed. I took the treatment by Doctor Davidson for three weeks.

In two weeks it made the lump soft and let down enough swelling so that Doctor Davidson could get in my mouth to heal the sore. I stayed one week more then came home and continued on the treatment at home. By spring it began to feel pretty good and was able to do a little work. Now I am able to work from morning until night. In summer I look after 25 hives of bees, help with the chickens and do all the home sewing. I am sure if it had not of been for Doctor Davidson's treatment I would not be here to-day.

Miss Frances Fry.

The next letter is as follows:

Inwood, Man.
Feb. 23, 1944.

Mr. Harry Leader, M.P.
House of Commons,
Ottawa, Ont.

Dear Mr. Leader:

I read with much interest your speech given in the House of Commons on February 7, re Doctor J. R. Davidson and his work on cancer. I wish to say that I developed cancer in the breast and I went to Doctor Davidson for treatment, which I am sure helped me very much in building up my resistance prior to the operation which was very successful, after which I went to Doctor Davidson for further treatment which is proving to be a great success. The present condition of my health is very good thanks to Doctor Davidson's treatment.

With best regards, I remain,

Your truly,
Mrs. Julia Lanham.

Mr. SPEAKER: The hon. member's time has expired.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Go ahead.

Mr. GILLIS: Put it on the record.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Mr. Speaker, I rise to a point of order. I do not in any way seek to curtail the remarks of the hon. member, and I quite agree that he should be given permission to continue until he has concluded. There are special reasons why I think the house should be specially considerate of the hon. member, when he brings forward a matter for consideration concerning which he feels as deeply as he does about the one on which he has been speaking. I believe, however, it is important that there should be some understanding as to the latitude to be allowed in the discussion of measures on second reading. We are now dealing with a bill to create a new department of government. It is a matter of administration, and the question for debate is as to whether a department is or is not to be established. We are not being asked to decide upon or to debate all the possible matters which may or should come before that department; we are not at present to discuss the merits or otherwise of such matters.

This afternoon the hon. member—and from his point of view, very sincerely—has been discussing the question of the treatment of cancer, and the action the government should take. It seems to me that is a subject which the house might properly consider when an estimate is before us, as for example when we are discussing grants by the federal government to public bodies for purposes of research. I do not see how we can possibly get through the business of the session this year if latitude of the kind being permitted at the moment to the hon. member is to be permitted in connection with the discussion of further measures. I know that there was wide latitude granted in discussing the question of reconstruction, but matters of reconstruction were related immediately to the bill, because there is not in existence a department in the nature of a reconstruction department. But we have at the present time a Department of Pensions and National Health; it is in existence, and it seems to me that, if the particular subject of cancer research were to be discussed at all, it should be discussed in connection with the work of that department and not mixed up with the question as to whether we are to establish a new department of government. I submit very respectfully to Your Honour that there should be some very careful limitation placed on the rights of members when discussion takes place on all kinds of things on second reading of a measure that is specifically for one purpose and one purpose only.

Mr. COLDWELL: Mr. Speaker, may I say something on the point of order raised by the Prime Minister? Private members have been denied the right to discuss private members' resolutions during the session, and that may have something to do with cases of this sort arising. May I point out, too, that the hon. member himself is not in particularly good health. We do not know when the departmental estimates upon which this matter could be discussed will be taken up, and I think it is in the interests of the house and of the government and of the country that the hon. member should be accorded the courtesy which I know the Prime Minister wishes to accord to him, and that he should this afternoon, in spite of the fact that the business of the house presses as I know, be given all the time he requires to present the case that he is making. I hope that the hon. member himself, and you, Mr. Speaker, will not feel obliged to curtail his remarks in any respect.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: May I say to my hon. friend that I made it quite clear that I did not wish to curtail his remarks. What I am seeking to impress on the house and on His Honour the Speaker is that if we are going to regard this as a precedent we may have some other member follow the hon. member and begin to deal with the question of tuberculosis, and then someone else take up some other disease about which he also feels very deeply. It is part of my duty as leader of the house to see that its business is expedited and also that it is carried on in accordance with the rules.

Mr. COLDWELL: I think the house will support the Prime Minister if some other member attempts to regard this as a precedent. That is what should be done, except under the very special circumstances under which the hon. member is speaking this afternoon.

Mr. SPEAKER: I recall, as the Prime Minister has pointed out, that in the debate on reconstruction I was in extreme difficulty to know what was relevant and what was not relevant, but it seemed to be the wish of the house that there should be more or less latitude given in that debate, and it was so given. To-day I have also been considering the relevancy of the remarks made by the hon. member for Portage la Prairie (Mr. Leader) and I came to the conclusion that while his remarks were not strictly relevant to the bill I would prefer that the point should be raised before the house. To-day the hon. member has spoken with the full acceptance of the house under circumstances in which I have perhaps extended my powers in order to give him this opportunity.

But the point of order having been raised I must say that the hon. member's remarks are somewhat irrelevant to the bill and might more properly be discussed on some estimate or other proceeding before the house. The hon. member is now concluding, but I would point out this, as I did in the debate on reconstruction, that while relevancy after all is a very broad term, it has some degree of certitude with regard to the provisions of a bill. We are dealing with the setting up of a department, and now that the point of order has been raised, I shall endeavour to keep the house to the terms of the bill.

Mr. HOWDEN: I would like to point out to Your Honour that in the body of the bill reference is made to research. The subject which the hon. member for Portage la Prairie has been discussing is a festering sore which has to be dealt with at some time in this country, and we might as well deal with it at some convenient time because it will go on until we get to the bottom of it. Truth will prevail, and we might as well know just what the truth is. Let us get to the bottom of it and know just where we are at.

Mr. SPEAKER: The hon. member realizes that the hon. member for Portage la Prairie has now exceeded his time. His forty minutes have expired.

Mr. LEADER: I wish to speak to the point of order, Your Honour. I appreciate the Prime Minister's anxiety, but I cannot say that I am so sanguine over his point of order. This is a bill to establish a department of national health, and if the subject of cancer is not a part of national health, I am all wrong. I was going to make this suggestion: I could have been finished by now if I had not been interrupted. There are three more letters here that I wished to read. May I ask that they be included in Hansard without being read, with the permission of the house? Then I shall conclude my remarks.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Certainly.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): Yes.

Mr. COLDWELL: I think the house would wish to give that permission and to hear the hon. member finish what he has to say.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Yes.

Mr. LEADER: I thank the hon. member and those who agree with him. The three letters are as follows:

428 Wardlaw Ave.,
Winnipeg, Man.,
Feb. 23, 1944.

Mr. Harry Leader, M.P.,
House of Commons,
Ottawa, Ontario.

Dear Sir:

I have been following your efforts as published in the local press regarding a government grant to Doctor J. R. Davidson to further his work on cancer research, and thought you might like to hear of my mother's case.

I took her to Dr. Davidson when she was eighty-one years of age. He has treated her for several years. Last summer she was able to travel to Toronto alone to visit Ed. Young, who is no doubt a friend of yours, as he was member for Weyburn for many years. She will be eighty-six in March. I would not say she has been cured, but the lump which had been diagnosed as cancer has disappeared from her breast and she has not suffered. It was difficult for the doctor to get her to eat the things she should as people of that age dislike changes in their diet.

I am quite certain of one thing, and that is that she would not have been spared this long had it not been for Dr. Davidson's treatment. I was in to see him a short time ago and he does not look any too well.

I do hope something will be done to further his work and honour him for he is a real doctor. If there is anything else I can do to help this worthy cause please advise me.

I might state that we are real old timers in Winnipeg having lived here for over sixty years.

Yours sincerely,

A. W. Peebles.

Mr. H. Leader, M.P.,
House of Commons,
Ottawa.

Dear Sir:

I have been interested in your efforts to point out to the dominion government the valuable work being done by Dr. J. R. Davidson. As a recent patient, having been dismissed just three days ago with a 100 per cent cure, I would like to add my testimony in the hope that it may have some small weight in promoting Dr. Davidson's discovery.

A short time ago I consulted Dr. Davidson with regard to a lump in my breast. I had known of this condition for over two years, but as it was not inconvenient or painful, I postponed medical attention. A few months ago the lump grew larger and I became worried. At the time I consulted Dr. Davidson I was very run down physically and suffering from nervous strain. When the doctor examined my condition he advised six weeks' treatments, diet, and injections, then an operation. After five weeks' treatments I had an operation for breast amputation by Dr. Blakie. The quick recovery was marvellous owing to the previous build-up. Two days after the operation I was able to sit up for a short time and walk around the room without any feeling of weakness. Two days later I was allowed to leave the hospital. In one week from the operation I was able to walk to Dr. Blakie's surgery, have the stitches taken out, then go over to Dr. Davidson's office and continue the injections. I took more injections for three weeks, then returned home. At the present time I am in better health than I have been for years.

I would like to think that something could be done to enlarge the field for this wonderful discovery. As things are now it is very difficult for people out of town to take advantage of the serum treatments. In my case it meant leaving my position and living away from home for weeks when the injections only take a few minutes a day. Then again, unless help is given, only a limited amount of serum can be obtained. Having benefited so richly by these treatments myself and talked to many patients who, when hopeless, have been given a new lease on life, I would like to see these treatments within the reach of all who need them.

I sincerely hope that your efforts with the powers that be will be successful.

Yours sincerely,

Miss J. E. Waites.

Winnipeg, Man.,
February 21, 1944.

Mr. Harry Leader, M.P.,

Dear Sir:

I see by the Free Press that you are endeavouring to further the research work of Doctor Davidson in his treatment of cancer. And I for one do want to add my own personal experience as to what Doctor Davidson has done for me. About two years ago I was very run down in health weighing only 137½ lbs. My normal weight before that was around 150. In this run down condition I developed a growth in my breast which caused me very much concern. I went to three or four different doctors in the city and they advised me to have an operation and have it analyzed and if necessary have my breast removed. One doctor said I had a definite growth in my breast. Another doctor, one of the best authorities in Winnipeg on this sort of trouble, said there was no doubt it was malignant and strongly urged me to have an operation, which I very nearly did, but I am so thankful to-day that I did not. I was told about Doctor Davidson by a neighbour. I myself laughed at the idea of being treated by a diet. I mentioned this to a couple of the other doctors, giving no names; one said, don't be foolish. The other said, you are just loosing good time. My health being so run down I was really afraid to chance the operation so I thought I would go and see Dr. Davidson anyway and see what he had to offer me. The very first thing he told me was that I was very run down and removing the breast would not cure the trouble. So he made out a complete diet of very nourishing foods, also advised me to take plenty of wheat germ, raw milk, etc., and gave me a prescription of vitamins to take. I began to regain health and strength almost immediately. It took quite a few months for the growth in my breast to disappear, but as I got stronger and my normal health and weight returned, this trouble has entirely disappeared, taking the growth with it. I would be more than willing now to have any doctor examine my breast and I certainly give Dr. Davidson all the credit. He saved me from an operation and most likely death, for I was in such a run down condition; none of the other doctors that had advised me to have an operation ever considered my run down condition. This is one point I especially do credit Dr. Davidson with. Now my general health is fine, I can now do all my own house work and just about back to my normal weight which I never thought I would be. Everyone saw me failing and wondered what was wrong. I only hope that more of the doctors would get next to this sort of treatment by building up the body to resist growths, which I have proven to be a fact, much superior to the knife.

Yours very sincerely,

Mrs. Ben Hardy,

56 Ruby Street.

I just want to conclude by asking this question: Is the Davidson treatment effective? If it is not, the public is being duped. In either case a thorough investigation should be instituted. All we want is a fair investigation to allay the suspicion which has been aroused in the public mind and to get to the bottom of this thing. I am sure that no one, certainly not myself, and I do not believe Doctor Davidson, would for a moment question a verdict brought in by a competent tribunal. If Doctor Davidson has got something, the world should know it. If he has not, the public should know that at once.

I conclude by saying that now that health is to be considered a provincial matter the federal government should make a grant to the province of Manitoba or to the university of Manitoba in order that this investigation may be made. We want the investigation to be made at the very earliest opportunity, and we want it to be free and open to both the press and the public.

That, Mr. Speaker, is the substance of my whole remarks, that a proper investigation be made of Doctor Davidson's work; and that can be done only by furnishing the necessary funds from the federal treasury to the province to make the investigation. I thank the house for its courtesy.

Mrs. CORA T. CASSELMAN (Edmonton East): Mr. Speaker, I wish to express my very great pleasure at the setting up of this Department of National Health and Welfare.

Health is under provincial control chiefly, and we already have progressive legislation and effective administration in many of the provinces. But there are many inequalities between province and province, complicated at times by the question of domicile. That is particularly so when the province passes the responsibility on to the municipality. The federal department has given increasing assistance in recent years, especially through its research bureaux and publications and through consultation with provincial administrators. All these contribute to the welfare of the people. But there is a much wider field, that of curative and preventive medicine, which affects the individual more directly. Two provinces have tried to bring in broad health acts, Alberta in 1935 and British Columbia in 1936, but they found too many complications for provincial control alone.

In the parliamentary social security committee, of which I am a member, consideration is being given to a dominion health bill. Study has been given to this matter by men who have wide knowledge concerning the legislation of other countries. It is remarkable that the three countries with the highest standard of living have been slow in producing an over-all health bill—Canada; and Australia is just now considering a further extension of its health measures. Progress in the United States has been slowed down to some extent. This may be owing to the fact that these are federal states and that these other countries, like ourselves, have difficulty in arranging matters which are partly under one jurisdiction and partly under another. I hope that consultation on these matters between the provinces and the dominion will straighten out these matters in order that the new department will have the power to go ahead with the plans placed before it.

I hope that we shall have the health bill before the house during this session and I will reserve any discussion of its terms until that time. If such a measure is adopted it will go a long way toward raising the whole standard of living in this country. Sir William Beveridge has stated that one of the two main causes of poverty is illness with its attendant loss of income, and large doctors' and hospital bills. Many a family dates its fall from security to an expensive operation or the long-continued sickness of one of its members. The adoption of health insurance would prevent these heavy expenses from falling all at one time. Year by year payment of premiums will spread the cost of treatment. There will be a spread among those who have different incomes as well as a spread over the years for the individual. Preventive measures will reduce the incidence of disease. Then, too, all income will increase in value. There will be more left as purchasing power for other needs, because medical and hospital charges will be borne by the insurance fund. Old age pensioners will benefit, as will all children under sixteen years of age, and many others whose medical bills will be paid through health insurance. Think of the peace of mind in knowing that there is benefit by health insurance right through all the years of one's life. Through the cooperation of the provinces and the dominion there should be a much healthier population. The national fitness bill which was passed last year is just now coming into operation and will play its part in building up the positive health of the nation.

The second responsibility of this new department of welfare was also allocated to the provinces by the British North America Act. Each has set up its own machinery and most provinces provide for mothers' allowances, widows' and orphans' benefits and workmen's compensation. The federal and provincial authorities share the administration of old age pensions, while unemployment insurance is under the dominion. Canada has recognized already the need, and partly applied the remedy, but it is not broad enough, not deep enough; there are too many gaps and inequalities as between province and province. This dominion department should help to eliminate some of these inequalities.

I am most anxious to see the benefits to be provided by this social welfare measure set at as high a level as possible. We want to make available a decent standard of living. We want to see that the basic needs of food, housing, clothing, cultural privileges and recreation are provided. This income security should be a stabilizing influence in setting a level below which no one's income may fall. It is recognized in all these studies that there must be measures to ensure full employment. That is fundamental in providing a satisfactory standard of living in any country. Our aim is full employment of man-power and resources, but there will be emergencies when the individual finds it impossible to provide for himself through his own exertions. Then the state must come to his help.

This question of social welfare was one of the subjects of deliberation at the recent Philadelphia conference of the International Labour Office which I had the privilege of attending. I was assigned to the committee dealing with social insurance and medical care. The Canadian government delegation was in general agreement with practically all the recommendations made in the comprehensive survey. These run to many pages and seek to make continuous a minimum level of income regardless of the interruptions caused by those five great evils which Sir William Beveridge calls want, disease, ignorance, squalor and idleness. I should like to quote from the official bulletin of the International Labour Office. First I quote from paragraph 2 on page 6, which reads:

> Income security should be organized as far as possible on the basis of compulsory social insurance, whereby insured persons fulfilling prescribed qualifying conditions are entitled, in consideration of the contributions they have paid to an insurance institution, to benefits payable at rates, and in contingencies, defined by law.

I wanted to read that because of the word "compulsory" which was put in at the suggestion of the workers' delegation. Next I read section 7 on page 7, as follows:

> In order that the benefits provided by social insurance may be closely adapted to the variety of needs, the contingencies covered should be classified as follows:
> (a) sickness;
> (b) maternity;
> (c) invalidity;
> (d) old age;
> (e) death of breadwinner;
> (f) unemployment;
> (g) emergency expenses; and
> (h) employment injuries.
> Provided that benefits should not be payable at the same time for more than one of the following contingencies: invalidity, old age and unemployment.

I read that to show the broad coverage which was discussed similar to that found in the Marsh and Beveridge reports. The suggestion was made that all these measures could not be put into effect at one time because of lack of trained personnel to carry them out. We will remember that there was some difficulty when we brought in unemployment insurance because of lack of trained personnel, a very important item in putting into force any measures such as these. I quote now from paragraph 22 on page 8:

Benefits should replace lost earnings, with due regard to family responsibilities, up to as high a level as is practicable without impairing the will to resume work where resumption is a possibility, and without levying charges on the productive groups so heavy that output and employment are checked.

I read that to show that the International Labour Office and others who have drawn up somewhat similar plans realize that there is a danger that income security may be coupled with indolence, complacency and unpreparedness on the part of the individual. That contingency has been considered and met by the provision that the thrifty and provident may increase their earnings through their own efforts and that those who do so will have a higher income. There is a fear in some quarters that those who show good common sense and prudent management in their economy will have to pay for the shiftless who will not take advantage of their opportunities. Mr. Churchill referred to this in one of his speeches. In order to prevent this, contributions are required from individuals during their earning years.

In New Zealand a registration fee, as well as income tax, is required. I asked Mr. Walter Nash how they collected the registration fee, and he said the applicant had to show his registration card when asking for employment. That would look as though the right to work is conditioned by the payment of the basic fee. You may remember, Mr. Speaker, that I tried to inform the hon. member for Cape Breton South (Mr. Gillis) of that fee on June 2. I should like to quote from an official publication entitled "Social Security, Monetary Benefits and War Pensions in New Zealand", as follows:

For the purpose of providing the necessary finance the act—

That is the social security act of 1938.

—establishes in the public account a separate account, called the social security fund.

Every person of the age of sixteen years and over is required to register under the act and, unless exempt, pay a registration fee, which for youths aged sixteen to twenty years and all females over sixteen years of age is 5s. a year, and for all males over twenty years of age 5s. a quarter.

In addition to the registration fee there is payable into the fund a social security contribution calculated at the rate of 1s. in the pound on all salaries, wages, and other income, and any other moneys that may be appropriated by parliament for the purposes of the social security fund, or that may otherwise be lawfully payable into the fund.

It will be noted that the rate is one shilling in the pound for every pound of salary. There is no graduated scale of income tax for this fund in New Zealand. The poor man pays as much proportionately as the rich man. In the case of our income tax a much higher rate is taken from the rich. The chief virtue of New Zealand's measures is, I think, the completeness with which they cover the contingencies that may arise. We admire the many-sidedness of the programme in New Zealand and Australia, and in that connection I would read a couple of paragraphs from a speech delivered at an International Labour Office conference by Mr. Barnard, chairman of the Australian parliamentary social security committee; and a member of the house of representatives:

In 1943 widows' pensions, invalid pensioners' wives' benefits, old age pensioners' funeral benefits, and a new style of maternity benefits were introduced with the support of the committee. More recently, unemployment and sickness benefits, and pharmaceutical benefits were passed into law. These two pieces of legislation will not begin until the government departments concerned have been staffed to operate. This should involve a delay of only a few months. The Australian government is meeting the cost of providing the people with these services out of the nation's consolidated revenue, and also from a special welfare fund established in 1943. The fund is financed by a graduated tax on all incomes and is collected through ordinary revenue channels. $90,500,000, or 25 per cent of the annual total amount collected in direct taxation each year, is paid into the fund.

I think it is worthy of note also that most of these benefits are at a minimum level in New Zealand and Australia. The New Zealand pound is worth around $3.50 of our money. The old age pension stands at thirty-two shillings a week for an unmarried person, and that works out at $25 a month in our Canadian funds. New Zealand, however, is ahead of us in making more liberal allowances for retention of property and other income. Their social security act of 1938 provides for universal superannuation benefits and states definitely that no person may receive these two benefits at the same time. Of course, to qualify for universal superannuation the individual must pay his contributions from time to time to the social security fund. The Australian benefits are not high either. Children's allowances begin with the second child, and are five shillings a week.

One more sentence from Mr. Barnard's address:

While these are not regarded as being by any means a high standard of subsistence, they form a basis upon which our social legislation can be built in future years.

I simply want to give these facts to the house, because I believe that a knowledge of the underlying principles which have guided our sister dominions along this line should enable us to create a stronger department and to pass better measures for the department to administer.

There is much that I should like to say on this topic, but I will refrain from saying anything more at the moment. As we move forward along these lines we are inspired by the high ideal of bringing the ordinary comforts to all our people. Of course, that in itself will not bring them happiness, because I believe that your chief happiness consists in what you are and not in what you possess. It consists in being and not in having. And yet, as we enter this new age, which I firmly hope will be one of greater prosperity for everyone, and which will lessen man's inhumanity to man, participation in organizations such as the International Labour Office and other conferences in which Canada is represented can be of great help to us in instituting these services and in coordinating all our efforts in this direction. To gain and enlarge freedom from fear and from want is our objective.

Mr. T. L. CHURCH (Broadview): I wish to say a few words in regard to this particular bill. It was unfortunate that at confederation education and public health were not made subjects of concurrent jurisdiction as between the federal government and the provincial authority. That is one of the greatest mistakes ever made at that time. Here you have the federal authority and two other authorities, the provincial and the municipal. The fathers of confederation, in my opinion, made a mistake in creating the provinces at all; they were created for political and not for economic purposes.

As regards this particular bill, in the first place it has been unfortunate that the federal authority has not seen fit in many years past, between the two wars, to come to the aid of the provinces and the municipalities in regard to hospitals, public health and security and welfare, science, preventive medicine, surgery and so on. The federal department of public health from time immemorial, judging from what I have seen of it—and I have had a great deal to do with these problems—has been merely a skeleton department. It has done magnificent work in the last few years. Especially has it cooperated in public health matters and in science as well. It is regrettable, however, that something was not done long ago in this connection. The work of public health and hospitals has been largely left to the municipalities and private initiative by the provinces. Under our constitution, for the past thirty or forty years there has been a local board of health with jurisdiction over the municipalities. There is a provincial board of health and these provincial boards have been to a large extent simply regulatory bodies. They spend very little money and as far as one can see they confine their activities to regulation. The larger municipalities have had to bear practically the whole burden. Large municipalities like Montreal, Toronto and many other Canadian cities have had to give many of these services in connection with public health and hospitals and have also supplied water, sewers, transportation, and have provided good roads and assisted in housing and in the distribution of cheap light and power. All these matters affect public health to a preeminent degree.

Then there is the question of housing. Every health officer has declared, and it is indeed a well-known fact, that the public health has been suffering these many years by reason of the fact that we have never had a national housing policy. I will go farther and say that diseases of many types could have been prevented, and slums removed, especially in the larger cities, if a national housing scheme had been adopted years ago.

There should be a national system in connection with hospitals, because the first duty of a government is to look after the health, peace, happiness and prosperity of its citizens. That is the function of the state and always has been. Owing to our complicated constitution, however, we have been handicapped in our efforts to attain anything like that end.

Another important matter is the fuel supply. That has a direct bearing on health, because in this country very often it is necessary to have a fire nine months in the year. That has to do with public health and has its bearing on certain diseases from which our people suffer during the winter and spring months. I was chairman of a local board of health, also of the city hospital commission, and I was at other times a member of that body for a great number of years and I can speak with some experience. We came here frequently and asked different governments for help, but we got none at all. The result is that the municipality and the local board of health must safeguard the local water supply. I may say in passing that the grandfather of the present Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) was our first mayor of Toronto. The present Prime Minister was educated in Toronto. He is one of the most distinguished graduates of the university of Toronto. He is conversant with all the work of the local board of health in that city.

We have safeguarded the water, milk and food supply. There has been supervision of environmental sanitation, active control of communicable diseases, home visiting and the conduct of health clinics, vaccination against smallpox and immunization against diphtheria and whooping cough. All these and many other services have resulted in better health for our large city, and the whole surrounding area of North York. The general death rate now stands at 12·4 per 1,000 population. I shall only read one or two pages of the summary of the department of public health of Toronto to show what can be done by a municipality alone without any provincial or federal help. This is what the municipal handbook, compiled by Mr. J. W. Somers, O.B.E., city clerk, says:

The general death rate now stands at 12·4 per 1,000 population. It is worthy of note that the prevailing average age at death is sixty years, representing an increase of longevity of approximately twenty years over the past quarter of a century, and that only twenty-five per cent of all mortality now occurs in persons under fifty years of age, whereas the proportion in 1910 was sixty-five per cent. Cardio-vascular-renal conditions, together with cancer and diabetes, all afflictions more commonly found associated with later adult life and difficult of control by public health measures, were responsible for over two-thirds of the recorded mortality for the year.

One of the highlights to be recorded is the appreciable decrease in maternal mortality. The present rate of 2·2 per 1,000 living births is the lowest in thirty-five years, and when taken into consideration with the increased number of births, the decline is even more significant.

Toronto's present birth rate is 22·5 per 1,000 population and represents an increase of 46 per cent over the 1937 rate. Non-resident mothers, taking advantage of Toronto's excellent hospital facilities, were responsible for 30 per cent of all births occurring in the city.

Deaths of infants under one year of age numbered 566 or a rate of 37·2 per 1,000 live births. The value of intensive health measures in infant care is thus easily recognized when we realize that the rate existent just seven years ago was 56 per 1,000 live births.

Notwithstanding the additional hazards of war-time conditions, Toronto has achieved an enviable record of mortality from tuberculosis. The current rate per 100,000 population is 31·6, including deaths of residents occurring in sanatoria located outside the city limits. Physical examinations in large industrial plants accounted for 18 per cent of all cases reported last year, and is indicative of the value of well-planned health supervision.

In reviewing the total incidence of communicable diseases during 1943 it is to be noted that while the total of such cases reported during the year was in excess of that for 1943, there were nevertheless certain favourable features to be recorded. Scarlet fever, for instance, to the number of 1,501 cases, showed a substantial decrease from the 2,101 cases reported in 1942. Only eleven cases of typhoid fever, with one fatality, were reported during the year, the source of infection in all instances being definitely established as outside the city. Meningococcic meningitis registered a decrease over 1942 from sixty-seven to fifty-three cases. Unfortunately, thirteen of the cases occurring in the current year terminated fatally as compared with but six fatalities in 1942.

For the fourth time in ten years Toronto has witnessed a year without a single fatality from diphtheria, and only sixteen cases were reported among residents of the city. The effectiveness of the diphtheria immunization programme can be appreciated when the current figures are compared with the 1929 records of 1,022 cases and sixty-four deaths.

This brief resume of the various indices of public health will serve to demonstrate that the city's endeavours to improve the health of its inhabitants have met with a reasonable measure of success.

In the attainment of all these worth-while results credit should be given to all those public-spirited individuals and fine citizens who spent a large sum of money on preventive medicine in the large hospitals and university. Appreciation should be given to the physicians and hospitals, the health and welfare organizations of the city, the women and the citizens who have worked toward this end. My argument is that the federal power could, under peace, order and good government, make some of those grants with or without the consent of the provinces, because they would be glad to receive that recognition which they should have had long ago.

Under this new bill I hope that some money will be spent. I trust that this new bill will not be just a skeleton department, a department all dressed up with no place to go. I should like to see a national policy on hospitalization and housing and a national policy with regard to medicine in the universities so that the great scientists in medicine would be recognized. Cancer and many other problems are now being studied by great research work in the universities by men specializing in these matters. On the question of scientists I wish to refer to what has been said by a very able man, McNeill Dixon, in his Gifford lectures at the university of Glasgow. He referred to what has been done by science in recent years in the world of medicine, and this is what he said:

Take modern medicine alone, the child of science, the most promising and brightest-eyed of her family. If it has not mastered, it has so diminished as to rob bodily pain of its terrors. Plagues and pestilences have been stayed, a multitude of diseases—diphtheria, rabies, smallpox, typhus, yellow fever, Maltese fever—to name only a few—almost exterminated. Great scourge-ridden tracts of the earth's surface rendered habitable, food values understood, vaccines and anti-toxins discovered, antiseptic surgery so established as to open up new fields of remedial agency, ailments of the mind as well as of the body controlled and relieved. This is a record, indeed, to which no previous age in history can produce a parallel. Within a century the expectation of life in all civilized countries has amazingly increased—in our own by sixteen years, in Denmark by seventeen, in parts of America by fifteen.

That just shows, Mr. Speaker, what can be done by science.

Section 5 of the bill deals with the duties, powers and functions of the minister. The administration of the measure comes under him. No definition of social security was given. No definition of social welfare was given. Paragraph (b) of section 5 reads:

> Investigation and research into public health and welfare.

That would refer to cancer and many other diseases and the work of the national research council on cancer and all that sort of thing. Dear knows there is a lot of remedial work to be done yet, although great progress has been made. It is only in its infancy as yet and needs a lot more of federal aid to hospitals and universities.

Paragraph (c) reads:

> The inspection of medical care of immigrants and seamen . . .

And so on. At this point I should like to call the attention of the house to what has been done by Australia. Sixteen thousand of our Canadian young men in the navy, army and air force overseas have married British girls in the old country. Australia is doing something in that connection on immigration. I suggest that under paragraph (c) something might be done by Canada. Seven hundred wives of Australian servicemen who married in Britain will in future have full ocean passage paid for them to Australia. The union of wives and husbands who have already returned to Australia will be speeded up. I have noticed a large number of soldiers who are returning to our city have difficulties in that connection. I do hope that under paragraph (c) we shall adopt the commendable programme of Australia.

Paragraph (d) deals with the supervision of public health on railways, boats, ships and all other methods of transportation. There is great room for improvement in that connection. I will agree that even if the bill does nothing more, in paragraphs (b), (c), (d) and (e) it will be of great use. The other day we had a disaster at Port Stanley, in which sixteen lives were lost when an unseaworthy boat capsized. In my opinion the criminal code should be amended as to criminal negligence to provide that anyone who takes people out in boats which have not been inspected from a public health or a navigation point of view may be prosecuted for criminal negligence. There was also considerable loss of life in a dance hall fire in Hamilton, where the people had no chance to escape. That would come under the inspection of public buildings, I should imagine, and the negligence clauses of the criminal code should be amended to cover buildings of that kind as well. The supervision of federal buildings and offices will be under this bill with a view to conserving and promoting the health of civil servants and other government employees; this opens a great field of usefulness, and I think a good deal could be done also in connection with public health in our penal institutions, some of which were built before confederation, and many provincial and municipal ones have been condemned by public health officers as unfit for human habitation. The government should give the lead in an educational campaign along that line by aiding the provinces and municipalities.

Paragraph (f) deals with the enforcement of rules and regulations made by the international joint commission, presumably in regard to the pollution of streams. I believe this has constituted a serious menace across Canada to public health for many years, but very little has been done.

It would appear that not until comparatively modern times has the federal government taken any steps to prevent outbreaks of disease. In 1929 the administration of the Food and Drugs Act was improved, and in later years we have dealt with opium and narcotic drugs, the Quarantine Act, the Public Works Health Act, the Leprosy Act, the Patent Medicines Act, and more recently the Physical Fitness Act. That is surely a provincial matter, and little or nothing has been done under it. The positions to be filled under that measure should be given to returned men. The other day I noticed a statement by the director of recreation in Vancouver that the secondary schools of the country do not have time for sports. If he would visit the Brampton high school, or the high schools and collegiate institutes in the constituencies of the hon. members for Davenport and St. Paul's, I am afraid he would find that at times sports take a prominent place in education, and rightly so. So that I think some of these people do not know what is going on.

Under another section of this bill the governor in council may establish such boards or committees as may be necessary to assist and advise the minister, and there is to be a dominion council of health consisting of the chairman, who will be the deputy minister, the chief executive officers of the provincial departments of health and such other persons, not to exceed five in number, as may be appointed. Section 8 provides that provincial or municipal boards of health are not affected by this legislation. Of course their jurisdiction arises under section 92 of the British North America Act, and could not be interfered with by this legislation in any event.

In conclusion I should like to say that within the last two years a great British educationist said that we in the British empire should be careful about making national decisions during the war, because such decisions might be ill-judged since in a time like this no one is perfectly normal. I think this is good advice. People are beginning to wonder what has become of the war, because for the last few days it seems to have been forgotten in this chamber. The conduct of the war is primary; all these other matters are secondary. For years I have supported progressive measures in connection with public health and social affairs; in regard to pensions and hospitals, old age pensions, health insurance and many other matters. I can tell you, though, as President Roosevelt has said, that neither victory nor any kind of planning will bring about the millenium. I believe the time has come when we should relax the controls which have been adopted by Canada perhaps more than any other country in the world. We have had the regimentation of labour, controls over men, women and children under which people have been sent to gaol for offences which in days of peace would not have been regarded as offences. We have set up a great bureaucratic system, but when the war is over I hope these controls will be removed and we shall have no more of this regimentation, for in my opinion you cannot create a limited utopia in the way that has been suggested in this house during the last few days.

While I am in favour of adopting all up-to-date social measures which are adapted to our situation and circumstances, in view of the budget which was presented last night I must ask, whose taxes are to be increased? The state has no money of its own for all these utopian plans, dreams and castles in the air which are supposed to bring about a new heaven and a new earth, except that which is provided by the taxpayers. There is no use in merely shadow-boxing on these matters and setting out window-dressing and passing mere statutes and no way to carry it out, and forgetting all about the war. The Prime Minister of Great Britain gave us a warning when he spoke in the British House of Commons on March 21, 1943. He said that we must beware of trying to build a society in which nobody counts for anything except the politician or the official, a society where enterprise gains no reward and thrift no privileges. While I wish to support anything that is practical in the way of social changes—and dear knows we need something new for the working classes of this country—I believe some of these proposals are not practical and cannot be carried out.

I should hope that something could be done in connection with housing and fuel, because I believe those are the greatest practical health problems that we have to face. With regard to state medicine, I am in doubt as yet. Ever since the period between the two wars I have supported such measures as health and sickness insurance.

I should like to quote from the Daily Mail of Friday, May 12, 1944, in which it is stated that the leaders of the medical profession, including Lord Dawson of Pen, the king's physician, condemned the government's health plan on nine major points, which were as follows:

1. Doctors, as members of an expert profession, should not be subjected to non-expert direction by civil servants.

2. They object to the profession being controlled by the treasury or by the treasury outlook.

3. They oppose the "civil direction" in peace time; they do not want a doctor to be told by a civil servant where to practise.

4. The white paper calls for "a high degree of certification." This, they say, might well mean that a doctor, convinced that a patient needed a week off from work, would not dare to give a certificate because he might be questioned by a government inspector.

5. The government plan, in practice, would destroy the doctor's professional freedom and the doctor-patient relationship.

6. They oppose any attempt to introduce insidiously, by means of health centres, the idea of a state salaried service, because it would substitute for the present loyalty to patients a loyalty to the state.

7. The "health areas" into which the country is to be divided are too small and will multiply, instead of reducing, the "departmental mind."

8. Health centres should be built up slowly and be the fruit of accrued experience, and not limited, as proposed, to surgery.

9. The white paper makes no provision for training in, or practice of preventive medicine.

I have quoted from the Daily Mail of Friday, May 12, where Lord Dawson of Penn, the king's physician, presented his memorandum to the council of the British Medical association, condemning the government's health-for-all plan, on nine major points.

I saw a letter from one of the leading surgeons of Johns Hopkins university, namely the brilliant Doctor Thomas Cullen, who graduated from the university of Toronto and was born in that city. He pointed out that the suggested measure would not be in the interests of the medical profession or the practice of surgery, or in the interests of the advances made by that great university in years past.

I do not rise for the purpose of preventing the passage of the Prime Minister's bill. On the contrary I commend it, so far as it goes. I believe that if money is well spent liberally there may be some good effect in the country. I have noticed that in the past thirty years health departments in municipalities have dealt with these problems. I believe that if we can get agreement with the provinces whereby the jurisdiction might be made concurrent, hundreds of millions of dollars might be spent federally in the five years following the war. That money could be spent on national housing, national hospitalization, and a national scheme in connection with science, and particularly that branch of science in medicine about which I have been speaking. And I would draw particular attention to the rapid strides made by medicine, as indicated by McNeil Dixon.

Mr. F. W. GERSHAW (Medicine Hat): Mr. Speaker, in making a few remarks in connection with the setting up of the Department of National Health and Welfare I wish to say, first of all, that my observation and experience is that the medical doctors of this country are only too anxious to grasp any new treatment that can be discovered. They would welcome with open arms any treatment which even in a small way would lessen the ravages of cancer. They have grasped the liver treatment for anaemia, the insulin treatment for diabetes, the sulpha drugs for numerous infections, and penicillin, where applicable. All they want is an assurance from some research body with respect to the safety of action in connection with new methods of treatment. These things can be obtained, and these problems can be worked out only in a national research body.

After the evidence given to-day by the hon. member for Portage la Prairie (Mr. Leader), I believe that various research bodies should again be approached, and that some real interest should be taken in probing this matter to its depths. Other cancer cures have been probed, and we have always hoped that one would be found which would really help to destroy this great scourge.

During the lifetime of this parliament and the term of office of this government, many important social security measures have been taken. We have a long list of labour legislation placed on the statute books. We have pensions, bonuses and grants. We have The Unemployment Insurance Act. We have health insurance, and we know of the efforts made by the nutritional council to make generally known the advantages of proper diet, proper foods, and the preparation of foods. The provinces have mothers' allowances and workmen's compensation acts. Now we are to have family allowances, which will be a great blessing to many people.

There is one problem, however, which has not yet been touched, and I refer to help for those who are disabled. If a man is disabled while working under a compensation act, he can get some means of living. But if he is not under a compensation act, and suffers some injury or is sick, he may find himself in a very bad situation. None of the new measures seems to give any relief in that respect.

I wish to emphasize one feature in connection with social security which has not yet been stressed, namely, that in my opinion individuals and nations will have to return to the observance of the cardinal virtues. Those virtues were called cardinal because the whole structure of our economic system hinges upon them. I believe that there will never be contentment until those virtues are restored to their old-time position.

One of the first speeches I heard in the House of Commons was during the hectic session of 1926. I can still remember the late Mr. Forke saying in effect that a man who has not contentment in his breast may be great, or rich, or wise, but never can be blessed.

We are at present engaged in a colossal conflict of arms, when war has upset the whole progress of the world and plunged it into misery and bloodshed. Why? I would say that this has happened because one nation turned its back upon those cardinal virtues. Hitler substituted the swastika for the cross and "Mein Kampf" for the Bible, disregarded the lessons of history and failed to recognize enduring truths. He even boasted that he would tear up Christianity, root, stem and branch. Instead of teaching his people humility, he taught them that they were a superior people. Instead of observing the second commandment he inflicted punishment and cruelty upon the German people and upon others, which nothing can ever excuse.

I bring up these points because I believe that a condition of affairs spoken of in the Psalms has arisen, where it is said that the dark places of the earth are full of the habitations of cruelty. We must approach the problems of social security in the light of knowledge gained in the past, and the experience of these tragic years.

At six o'clock the house took recess.

After Recess

The house resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. A. M. NICHOLSON (Mackenzie): Mr. Speaker, when the hon. member for Edmonton East (Mrs. Casselman) was speaking before six o'clock she mentioned that she would defer some remarks until the bill respecting health insurance was before the house. She appeared to me to be unduly optimistic, if that bill is to come before the house this session I fear that we shall be here until Christmas.

The Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King), in speaking this afternoon, indicated that this bill would provide a sort of clearing-house which would coordinate the health services in the different provinces of the dominion. That is not good enough at this stage. The people of this country expect and deserve that legislation be placed on the statute books by this parliament to remove the inequalities in the medical services in different parts of Canada, so that the health of the Canadian people may receive the attention which it deserves. If the British North America Act does not place responsibility for the health of the people on the right branch of government, the conference which is to be held between the provinces and the dominion has been too long delayed. Too often the excuse has been given when important legislation has been proposed that this is not a matter in which the federal government can act. In turn, the provincial governments say that they have not the jurisdiction or the funds, and the municipalities are unable to find the resources to introduce the changes desired. When war breaks out it is in the interests of us all that we should have a maximum number of able-bodied men and women to give their services in defence of our institutions. Then it is important that our young people should have their defects of vision corrected, their teeth put in good shape, that they be free from tuberculosis, that they be able to stand up to the rigours of modern warfare. If it is important in time of war, it is equally important in time of peace to be concerned about the health of our people and to see that sufficient hospitals and nurses and doctors and dentists are available to give the very best services in different parts of the country.

While some hon. members who have spoken this afternoon appear to be satisfied with the progress we have made in Canada, members of this group are far from being satisfied. Here again Canada lags. I have before me "A Distinguished Report on a Proposed Reorganization of Medical Practice in Great Britain." This group of younger doctors are not only concerned about having medicines and hospitals but with some of the wider medical problems. They speak of two groups of problems connected with but not strictly a part of medical planning. First, they say that medical organization is largely determined by the social pattern of the society in which it exists. The second group of problems, they point out, which are connected with but not strictly a part of medical planning are those of environmental planning for health and happiness. They go on to point out that the people of Great Britain can have as high a standard of medical hospitals as they want to. In connection with their studies they give some attention to the control of industry, rationing, price fixing, nutritious food, adequate supplies of heat, light, potable water, sewage disposal arrangements, and fresh air. They say:

> Since it has been discovered that finance, as such, is no longer a limiting factor in national endeavour, it will only be offered as an excuse for not taking action by the ignorant, the prejudiced, or the wicked.
> There is no need for a return to pre-war poverty, slumps or unemployment, if we are prepared to impose certain disciplines on ourselves. By continuing to sacrifice some freedoms, which we have willingly sacrificed in war, we can gain greater freedoms than we possessed before.

They go on to point out:

> A planned health service is an A1 priority. The best that the medical and allied professions can provide must be available for everybody. Provided this does not encroach on other A1 priorities we need not count the cost. Since the productive wealth of Britain has never been greater, we can plan if not prodigally at least boldly.

They mention the importance of eliminating poverty, caused by the unemployment of the chief wage-earner or his sickness; sickness benefits, provision for old age and many other important proposals.

In the United States a survey has been made, and I have here an interesting report in News of Toronto, in its issue of March 18, 1944, regarding some of the discoveries that have been made in the United States, among which are:

> More than 40 per cent of the counties in the United States contained no registered general hospital to serve their total of 17,000,000 people in 1938.
> Nearly a quarter of a million women had no medical aid in childbirth.
>
> In eighty-four cities, 28 per cent of children had neither physician nor hospital care in illnesses which disabled them for a week or more
> One-third of the 35,000,000 children under fifteen years old in the United States were in families unable to afford medical care.
> Two-thirds of the United States rural areas were without child health centres or clinics.
>
> More than a billion days were lost from work each year by 70,000,000 sick persons.

They go on to say:

Poor people . . . get sick more easily and oftener than well-to-do people. Because they are poor, they cannot afford to buy adequate medical care. And if they live in a poor county there is not enough tax money available with which to buy medical care for them. Hence they tend to get sicker and consequently poorer. The more poor individuals in the county, the poorer the county. In the end, there are so many sick people who cannot afford a doctor that the doctors begin to complain about the competition of the free clinic—if any—or even to move away. Whereupon more people get sicker and poorer, poorer and sicker. . . .

A similar record could be written about conditions in Canada. The legislation which is now before this house is not going to provide a single hospital; it is not going to make possible the spending of even ten thousand dollars to carry out the research work advocated this afternoon by the hon. member for Portage la Prairie (Mr. Leader). I thought, after hearing him on two occasions, and considering the very small amount of money which would be required to consider carefully all the claims made by the hon. member on behalf of Doctor Davidson, that this government would have little justification for not making the necessary appropriation under the War Measures Act to conduct the investigation. The amount required would be very small. I understand that the Minister of Pensions and National Health (Mr. Mackenzie) indicated that the Department of Justice had indicated that such an appropriation would be irregular.

Apparently the government is following the same sort of policy followed in connection with old age pensions. It is not introducing a programme with a view to giving Canada the best possible medical services at the earliest possible date; the policy seems to be to do as little as possible. When one considers representations which have been made by organizations like the federation of agriculture and the Canadian Congress of Labour it would seem that these lay organizations are more progressive and have a clearer grasp of the problem. The federation of agriculture in a brief presented a year ago stated:

The large majority of the people are unable to pay for adequate medical care with its rapidly increasing scope and costs; while at the same time, those who give the services are not receiving a just remuneration. This state of affairs is having a serious effect on the welfare of our dominion.

And further now:

Health is a national problem which is becoming more and more evident under the stress of war conditions. The responsibility of the federal government in calling on man and woman power from all classes entails federal responsible for the people's health. . . .

A national health plan would encourage a strong national sentiment. Confederation was intended to foster a national economy. There is now urgent need to revive this interest.

The Canadian Congress of Labour presented one of the most critical analyses of the proposals which had been submitted by the government. They took strong exception to the proposed plan of financing the scheme and they point out:

The congress believes that the only equitable method of financing health insurance or health services is by taxation based on ability to pay. The whole cost should be met out of the proceeds of steeply graduated income and inheritance taxes levied by the dominion. Any other system is bound to be unfair as between different classes of contributors, and bound also to penalize the poorer provinces and delay their adoption of this scheme.

In justifying his proposals, the Minister of Pensions and National Health (Mr. Mackenzie) said:

It has been suggested that a completely free or non-contributory system should be adopted, but it is considered that such a system encourages the pauper mentality and may create a delusion that the public purse is bottomless thereby encouraging extravagance and maladministration. It is more consistent with the dignity and independence of man that he should purchase the necessities of life with his own money. Under a contributory system of health insurance, benefit becomes a right and not a charity. Moreover, the beneficiaries who are contributors feel a sense of responsibility in regard to the cost of services and administrative procedures.

I wonder if there is anyone who would suggest that the soldier, sailor or airman should pay for the medical and dental services he receives? Is there any suggestion that they are paupers when they accept medical and hospital services provided for them? Is there any question about the type of service given? Recently I visited the R.C.A.F. station at Dafoe, Saskatchewan, and while there the air ambulance came in from Winnipeg to take back an airman who was in a serious condition. He was to be taken some four hundred miles. There was no question about costs; it was considered to be in the public interest that that airman should have the best attention which could be provided and that care was available in Winnipeg. While they had an excellent hospital with a competent staff, as well as X-rays and the latest facilities, at Dafoe, better facilities were available in Winnipeg. That man was transported in a few hours to Winnipeg to receive that attention.

I think the argument advanced by the Canadian Congress of Labour that the funds necessary to give the people of this country the best medical and hospital care possible should be secured from taxation is one that cannot be dismissed lightly. In their brief they deal with the inadequacies of the proposals and state that they make no provision for cash benefits to maintain minimum income during interruption of earning power on account of illness. It is very important that when the breadwinner goes to a hospital his family should not be compelled to go into debt. They also point out

> The draft bill makes no provision for the extra medical, dental and nursing personnel who are even now urgently necessary, and who will be not less but more necessary under a health insurance scheme. The American committee on the cost of medical care considered that there should be one doctor in every seven hundred of the population and one dentist to every thousand.

We have never been able to reach that goal in Canada. The medical procurement and assignment board report that in Canada we have one doctor for every twelve hundred of the population. In Saskatchewan there is only one doctor for every 2,078. As I mentioned before, in my riding there is only one doctor for about every 5,700 people. I think in this enlightened day we should provide for our civilian population at least as good medical care as we do for the criminals in our penitentiaries. If my people were located in one of the penitentiaries they would receive much better medical and dental care. For example, I find that in Kingston penitentiary they have a part-time doctor who is paid on the basis of $3 per year per convict, and the dentist is paid on a similar basis. I found one day that in addition to the dentist at Kingston there were two convict dental assistants. They were dressed in white uniforms and were doing the type of work normally done by a qualified dentist located in a small town or village. I do not think it would be too much to hope that the non-convict in Canada should have as good hospital, medical and dental care as his fellow citizen behind the stone walls of a penitentiary.

According to the brief presented by the Canadian Congress of Labour we are short of nurses in the country. Again Saskatchewan has the worst record. The average for all Canada is 2·06 nurses per thousand of population, with Saskatchewan having only 1·23. The congress of labour complains about the proposed cost of medical services. I would not complain about this cost if the federal department were planning on collecting and spending all the money. As we listened last night to the Minister of Finance (Mr. Ilsley) we were reminded of how easy it is to get, not millions but billions in time of war.

If we want to spend the amount suggested by the advisory committee, there would not be much cause for criticism if it were all collected by means of federal taxation, but we find that a large percentage is to be charged against the people in the communities who will be required to pay on a per capita basis. The proposed amount for medical services of $9.50 per person works out in a rather surprising manner for a rural municipality such as Kelvington.

The doctor there is providing very satisfactory services for $5,000 per year, but this proposal would give him $23,325. He tells me that if he were collecting on a fee for service basis he would earn a little more than that in the average year, but he does not expect that the farmers in that community, who are having to sell their produce at fairly low prices, will be able to pay him an annual return of $25,000 for his services. He is making a real sacrifice by working in that northern community. He is doing surgery which compares very well with what is being done in our large cities and I think he could earn several times as much as he is now getting. He is doing an important public job. It would be difficult to convince the people of that particular municipality that they should be taxed to pay for medical services to the extent of $23,325 a year when it is assumed that we have sufficient doctors in Canada.

The Canadian congress brief emphasized the importance of having additional medical schools so that we shall have sufficient doctors available to care for our peace-time needs. Even with the accelerated policy of training students, we cannot hope to train enough in the colleges that are available to provide a standard such as the Americans suggest, namely, one doctor for 750 people. They emphasize the need of new mental hospitals, hospitals for the care of communicable diseases and for senile patients, many outpost hospitals, industrial health service, et cetera.

A valuable contribution to the subject of health has been made by the state hospital and medical league of Saskatchewan. Most members of the organization are laymen, but those who have read "Medical Quest" by E. R. Powell, the secretary, a copy of which has been sent to every member of parliament, will appreciate the constructive suggestions that are made by this organization. Every member will be well repaid for a careful reading of it. I would mention particularly their reference to the health of animals as a part of a national health programme. So far, the importance of the health of animals has been overlooked by the administration and we find ourselves talking about health insurance programmes with no provision having been made for the training and paying of veterinary doctors to look after the inspection of cows for tuberculosis or for Bangs disease, or for the inspection of meat in the rural areas. We do have on federal pay a number of graduates from veterinary colleges, but they are paid such scandalously low wages that there is no incentive to encourage young men from the high schools to go to a veterinary college. If a young graduate from a veterinary college wants to set up in private practice his only hope is to go to Montreal, Winnipeg or Vancouver and open a pet hospital. Is it not a serious reflection on our civilization when we train young men to look after canaries, kittens and pups and leave large sections of Canada in such a condition that it is impossible to have cows tested for tuberculosis? We see children admitted to sanatoria because it has been their misfortune to drink milk from tuberculosis infected cows. The federal government says that this is a matter for the provincial government and the provincial government says in turn that, while the health of animals is in their jurisdiction, they have not the resources to train or to pay graduates in veterinary science to go and supervise properly the health of animals and test cows for tuberculosis.

This brief points out there are a number of diseases such as swine erysipelas and Bangs disease, found among animals and easily communicated to human beings. It also points out that there are large areas throughout Canada where veterinary medicine is a forgotten science. Since the horse and buggy are disappearing it seems to be assumed that we no longer require anyone to go through veterinary college to inspect meat or to test animals for contagious diseases. I submit that the contribution made to this important subject by the federation of agriculture, by the Canadian Congress of Labour and the state hospital and medical league in Canada should be carefully considered by the government and by members of this house.

Of course we are supporting the legislation. We are glad to have something rather than nothing, but we hope that the federal government will give much more courageous leadership in bringing this important question of health before the different provincial governments and will refrain from passing the buck to the provinces or municipalities. Through the kindness of the Minister of Pensions and National Health I sat in at a conference when ministers and deputy ministers of public health from various provinces were here. It was evident from the discussions that all the provinces are most anxious to cooperate with the federal government as soon as possible; but most of the provinces are in this position, that many of their sources of revenue have been taken over by the federal government and they cannot see their way clear to launch the type of programme which is necessary at this stage of our history. Unless the federal government gives leadership and an assurance to the provinces that ample funds will be available, we shall find ourselves, when the war is over, with the men and women in the armed services coming back to civilian life with a poorly planned programme ahead and with very poor medical, hospital and dental services available for them.

Mr. J. J. McCANN (Renfrew South): I wish to make a very few brief observations with reference to this bill which has to do with the setting up of a department, to be called the Department of National Health and Welfare, for the purpose of looking after the health, social security and welfare of the people of the country. I am glad that the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) in introducing the bill has seen fit to retain in it the name "national health." It was at first proposed that it should be a department of social welfare. The term "national health," to the medical fraternity at least, means a great deal, because a fight was waged in this country, starting back in 1919, brought about by conditions which obtained more particularly after the last war with reference to venereal disease, to set up a department of national health. Many countries throughout the world have departments of national health. There is one in Great Britain, one in Australia and one in New Zealand. There is a department having to do with national health in the United States and in almost every democratic country in the world there is a department of national health and in some a department of national health and security. So that it is with some satisfaction that we see that the name has been retained and that the principle which has been fought for by the medical profession throughout Canada has been vindicated.

I am not sure that this department is going to be all that we would desire. I am very sorry that it appears to be what will be the remnants of the present Department of Pensions and National Health when the matter of veterans' affairs is taken away and put into a department entirely its own. Under the bill which was put through lately, the Department of Veterans' Affairs will have to do entirely with the treatment of returned men. I submit that, in these times particularly, when we have a shortage of hospital accommodation and of personnel, both of trained medical help and of nursing services, it would be much better if all the medical services which come under the jurisdiction of the medical department were put into one department. What is the condition at the present time? Under the Department of Veterans' Affairs the treatment of returned men will be taken care of. Under the Indian affairs branch, for the treatment of those people who are wards of this country and with whom we have both contractual and moral obligations to look after their education and health, we have a separate division in the Department of Mines and Resources which has to do with the treatment of 125,000 Indians in Canada.

There is delegated to this department which will be set up the supervision and treatment of those who will be in the marine hospitals. Therefore you have three separate divisions of medical treatment under three different departments. From the point of view of economy and efficiency, having regard to the reduced number of medical men who are practising to-day, it would be much better if all the medical services came under one department. According to the statement of the Prime Minister old age pensions, pensions for the blind, physical fitness and family allowances will be transferred to this department. I submit that they should come under the Department of Pensions because they are exactly what they say they are, pensions for the old people, pensions for the blind and family allowances, which is to be a type of pension. If the department were called the Department of Pensions and looked after pensions which go to veterans, pensions which go to the blind, pensions which go to the old people and family allowances, which are a type of pension to people having big families, then you would have concentrated in one department and under one administrative unit all those particular branches that have to do with the administration of pensions. However, we cannot obtain all these things in a day. But in view of the fact that because of a comprehensive study and review of the situation with reference to medical treatment there has been recommended by the assignment and procurement board an amalgamation of the medical services of the three branches of the armed forces, I am hopeful that some day it will come about that all the medical services with which the federal department has anything to do will be concentrated in one particular department.

This new branch of the service under a minister who will look after the health, social security and welfare of the people of Canada, has a splendid opportunity to do an extensvie piece of work if it fulfils the objective which is set for it. The health of the people of Canada should be of primary importance because, after all, it is people who count in this world, not material things. The federal government has not given the health of the people that consideration which is their due and to which they have been entitled throughout the years. I was glad to hear the Prime Minister say to-day that more attention will be given to the health of the people of Canada and that it was a matter of some concern to the government.

If we look at the record we find that the Department of Agriculture has spent many times more money on the health of animals, under the health of animals branch, than has been spent by this government on the health of the people. That is because due importance has not been given to the value of people as an asset to the country. Much work has been done, and there has been some measure of cooperation between the national health department and the provincial departments of health, but there has not been throughout the years that spirit of cooperation between the provincial departments of health and the federal department of health that there should have been. I place no blame for that upon the minister because his function has been one of administration, but I have repeatedly heard it said by men high up in the health departments of the different provinces that they did not often get that degree of cooperation or coordination of effort in health matters which they might reasonably expect between their various departments and the national department at Ottawa. I hope that that will be changed, because, after all, these problems are not provincial problems; they are not federal problems; they are a common problem; they are the problem of all the governments in this country whether they be municipal, provincial or federal And the problems which confront the people can be solved only by the closest type of coordination and cooperation.

I do not think that throughout the years any science has made greater advances than has the science of medicine. The expectancy of life of the people has been materially increased within the last twenty or thirty years. The matter of prevention has played a very important and prominent part and has given splendid results. The greatest difficulty has been the inability of people to take advantage of the services which could be theirs if they were in an economic position to take advantage of them. The one great step which is being made to bring that about is the aiming at social security for our people and the adopting of the proposed health insurance in which we should have the full cooperation of federal and provincial governments if we hope to obtain that objective. As I said a moment ago, a great deal had been accomplished through the adoption of preventive measures by organized departments of health. These people, aided by physicians, nurses and dentists and the work of voluntary health agencies, have made many important contributions. For instance, we have a reduction in the death rate of tuberculosis in one province alone to one-fifth of what it was in 1900; a reduction in typhoid fever to one-fiftieth of the rate in 1900; a reduction in the diphtheria death rate to 1/85th of what it was in 1900. These are just a few illustrations of what has been accomplished.

There has been a marked reduction, too, in the number of infants who have died in the first year of life, so that the infant mortality rate for the whole of Canada has fallen from ninety-three per thousand living births in 1926, to sixty in 1940. These great reductions in the number of deaths of infants and young children have resulted in an increase in the life expectancy. In the United States the life expectancy in 1900 was 49·2 years. This was raised to 63·7 years in 1942, which represents an increase of approximately 13½ years. The position in Canada with reference to life expectancy is very similar. Primarily that increase in life expectancy is due to the great reductions in the death rate among infants and young children. Gratifying as are these results in sickness and deaths very much remains to be done. In 1942 there was something over 6,000 deaths from tuberculosis and something like 250 from diphtheria; far too many. I merely state these things, Mr. Speaker, to point out to hon. members that there is a great field for preventive medicine in Canada and that it can be carried out only if the federal government gives leadership, guidance and financial assistance to the provinces and health educational agencies.

I should now like to say a word or two with reference to the particular matter which was brought up this afternoon by the hon. member for Portage la Prairie (Mr. Leader), who spoke of Doctor Davidson's supposed cure for cancer. I am not going to make any attempt to refute the arguments or the statistical data he presented to the house. However, lest the impression go abroad in this country that nothing is being done by the medical profession in regard to the study and treatment of cancer, I want to place on record the fact that we have in this country several agencies and men high in the medical profession making a continuous study of the cause and treatment of cancer. There is, for instance, the Rockefeller foundation of New York, which has been one of the greatest benefactors of mankind in reference to medical research. It has not placed any limit upon the amount of money it has made available to universities and research bodies on this continent in the attempt to find out the cause of cancer and what can be done for it. In addition, we have in this country what is called the Canadian cancer research foundation, which has been carrying on this work for several years. Every university in Canada, particularly the university of Toronto through the Connaught laboratories, carries on from day to day, every day, research in that particular line; and any worth-while suggestions are brought to the attention of one of these bodies and investigated. The British are doing the same thing; they have the British research society for cancer. In this country the medical societies, including the Manitoba medical association, the Canadian medical association, the public health association and many others, are carrying on this work.

The American medical association and the British medical association review each year what has been done and the advances that have been made, and state definitely the position of the medical fraternity and the medical schools in reference to cancer. They have come to this conclusion, that as yet they do not know what the causal factor of cancer is. They do know, however, as we put it in medical terms, that it is excessive proliferation of a type of cell, which means an excessive growth. Whether that is due to infection; whether it is due to some glandular disturbance; whether it is due to some nutritional disturbance, has not been determined. But just as a few swallows do not make a spring, neither do a few sporadic cases which have obtained benefit from a particular kind of treatment warrant the profession saying, "Here we have a cure for this particular disease."

It has been accepted by the medical profession that no case can be counted cured unless for a term of at least seven years after treatment there is no evidence of any recurrence. To put it briefly, I think I can say that the position of the medical profession to-day is that the cure for this particular disease is surgery and X-ray and radium treatments. I am sympathetic to the point of view which has been put forward by the hon. member for Portage la Prairie, but this form of treatment having been investigated by the medical society of the province of Manitoba—

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): And by Sir Frederick Banting.

Mr. McCANN: —and by Sir Frederick Banting and other authorities. I do not believe this government, the department of health or the national research council should be called upon to spend the money of the taxpayers in further investigation. As far as I am concerned that is sufficient to deal with this matter, and I have placed on record the position of the medical profession in that regard.

I have said a few words in regard to health conditions, and I should like to make one or two observations with reference to social security, which really is to be the objective of this new department. There are many methods by which social security can be obtained for the people of this country. There are avenues which will have to be explored and broadened as the years go by. We have the preventive feature with reference to illness. We must take into consideration whether or not our people are properly housed, whether or not their nutritional requirements are being met sufficiently, and so on. We are a signatory to the Atlantic charter, and if we are to do our part we shall have to give the people of this country freedom from fear and freedom from want. Perhaps the greatest fear the people have is the fear of sickness or of invalidity in their old age, and of their inability to secure a living. These are all avenues which will have to be explored. There is great scope for activity in connection with health, social security and social welfare, open to whoever will be given the duty of guiding this new department. I am sure, with these objectives in mind, together with many others, the condition of the people of this dominion may be very greatly improved in reference to both health and social security.

Mrs. DORISE W. NIELSEN (North Battleford): I think most hon. members are in agreement with the setting up of this department. Personally I welcome it; while not in exactly the form I should have liked, nevertheless it is an advance, and I believe will be generally welcomed by the people of Canada. Naturally the creation of a department such as this opens a very wide range of discussion, but I think there will be other opportunities to discuss the matter of health services, particularly, so that I do not intend to deal with that question this evening.

As I see it, the two main functions of the department as it is now being set up will be these. First, it will provide for intelligent and equitable methods of meeting the modern hazards of our economic life. I believe it definitely implements what was placed before the country in the Marsh report which, at page 10, quotes the report of the Sirois commission, as follows:

> For a large proportion of the population incomes are not sufficient to take care of these contingencies through their own resources. . . . It is impossible to establish a wage which will allow every worker and his family to meet the heavy disabilities of serious illness, prolonged unemployment, accident and premature death. These are budget-shattering contingencies that strike most unevenly.

Second, the department will help to develop greater economic and social stability by providing a more equitable distribution of our national income. That, itself, is a most important thing.

I noticed a short while ago a report in the Montreal Gazette of June 3, with respect to a speech made before the Canadian Political Science Association. The report is as follows:

> "Social security has so far received less than adequate recognition as a method of creating employment which is probably more effective than public investment in terms of financial cost," J. R. Beattie of the Bank of Canada in Ottawa declared yesterday at one of the afternoon sessions of the 16th annual meeting of the Canadian Political Science Association at McGill university. "It is true that social security expenditures do not leave bricks and mortar to show in government balance sheets," he said, pointing out that their effect is seen in a higher standard of living and better people, and there is a practical value for every group in the community in the greater ecoonmic and social stability which results.

If my memory serves me correctly, the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) did say this afternoon that some of the measures which now exist, such as unemployment insurance, will remain under other ministers. I feel that this is rather a pity. Of course, that is possibly the only thing that can be done at the present time, but I believe the ideal objective toward which we should all strive would be that of developing an integrated security and welfare programme to cover all hazards, under one department. I hope that condition will develop as time goes on.

In the United States at the present time a bill, known I believe as the Murray-Wagner bill—proposes just that sort of thing. I recognize that certain conditions exist in Canada which do not exist to the same extent in the United States. Difficulties in connection with dominion-provincial relationships which now exist will be, I hope, not exactly ironed out but at least clarified in the coming dominion-provincial conference. I hope that as a result what I have suggested may be made easier of achievement.

The wide range of discussion which perhaps might be allowed under this bill is not what

I wish to indulge in this evening. I should, however, like to concentrate particularly on one thing. I must say I was a little disappointed when I looked through the various sections of the bill, and gave special attention to section 5. To-night I should like to devote a few minutes of the time at my disposal to speak about one very large group of Canadians, a group which, although not specially represented in the house, commands the interest of every hon. member. The group of which I speak consists, roughly, of 2,000,000 children in Canada. I should have liked to see in the bill—and I still have hopes of seeing it—a separate paragraph in section 5 stating that under the powers given to the minister he may set up a special branch to deal with all matters pertaining to child welfare. In my view the time has definitely come when we should have a certain group of officials dealing specifically with all problems relating to children.

If we tackle the needs of children at the present time, and if we give all the attention that is required to the development of their health and their upbringing, then within a short space of time—possibly only fifteen or twenty years—we shall seriously reduce our needs for hospitalization, and for all the cares and cures we require to-day.

At the present time we have only two sections of government which deal specifically with the needs of children. Under the Department of Pensions and National Health work is being done by Doctor Couture, who has published an excellent book entitled, I believe, "Mother and Child". The book has had some circulation; but I must confess that in my opinion it has not reached the homes it should have reached. I must be honest and state that although I have copies of it in my office in this building, I have not once seen a copy of that book in any rural home I have visited—where it is needed so desperately. Then, in the Department of Labour we have special officials whose duty it is to look after the day nursery scheme, and creches. I cannot help feeling, however, that this service is quite inadequate to meet the needs of the children of this country.

I would say that any section of the new department, whose officials would be charged with looking after the needs and care of children, would have as its main task the carrying out of a very wide range of educational services, through all types of propaganda available to a department of that kind. This would include the press, women's magazines, radio and films. All matters regarding child hygiene and child welfare should be brought before the public with much greater force than has been done in the past, and I believe there would result very rapidly a growing consciousness on the part of mothers with respect to the things required by their children.

It would seem that we are about to enact legislation to provide children's allowances. Much as I hesitate, or rather dislike saying this publicly, yet I am a little afraid that, through a lack of knowledge, in many instances those children's allowances will not be used in the best interests of the children concerned. While I am going to support the idea of children's allowances, still I feel that much of their value will be wasted unless, at the same time, they are accompanied by a wide educational campaign which will provide mothers with the information they need to have respecting the best way of spending the money in the interests of their children.

Definitely I believe that the child welfare branch should take over from the Minister of Labour (Mr. Mitchell) that section of his department which deals with creches and day nurseries. I know the minister likes dealing with men, but I am wondering whether he likes dealing with matters of this kind.

Mr. MITCHELL: I like dealing with babies, too.

Mrs. NIELSEN: I think those matters could be dealt with more adequately by a branch such as I have mentioned.

There is a great need, particularly in rural areas, where we have not the same facilities as are found in cities and larger centres, to have more propaganda and more widely circulated information for mothers, by way of literature, with respect to pre-natal and post-natal care. I cannot appraise too greatly the marvellous work which could be accomplished by officials in such a branch in that field.

There is one other thing which I believe would bring very good results, and that is to have such a department carry on a special campaign with respect to child nutrition. This would be not only an educational campaign, but something of a practical nature. Again, as I said before, the spending of money for children's allowances should be done in such a way that the children would actually receive the value from the expenditure of money. Personally, I cannot think of any single project which could be carried out in Canada where, for the same expenditure of money, the government could provide Canada with the same amount of good returns as by expending it on a nutritional campaign. This could start out by having a practical application in the form of a programme organized throughout the whole of Canada for school lunches.

Some hon. members may feel that that is rather small potatoes, and that it is beneath the dignity of members of parliament to discuss. But, as I said before, I cannot think of anything which would give greater results for the money expended, or which would bring in better returns by way of health and strength for a growing generation, than by bringing into the schools of the nation the practical food requirements which will ensure healthy bodies for our children.

There are various ways of estimating the cost of such a scheme. I am in a position to know that already within the Department of Pensions and National Health there are officials who would do everything within their power, if they were only free to be able to start such a plan, and organize on a wide basis throughout the country. It could be done very amicably, I believe, with the provincial officials also. There need be no friction over it. If the federal government had a department which could organize on a wide scale, it would give impetus to the provincial governments which have already, I know, started programmes so far as they have been able to do so. The whole plan could be issued as information; it could encourage not merely hot lunches where they are feasible but even in some places could do what we are doing for some of the Indian children, issuing a special candy with a vitamin content. That is being given to Indian children in some areas, and I can think of many white children, particularly in my part of northern Saskatchewan, to whom it would be well to issue such candy. I see no reason why Indian children should not have it; I am not against that at all. I am saying what a pity it is that our own children cannot have it in areas where it is badly needed also.

There are no figures to prove to hon. members that malnutrition exists among the children. I have not been able to find any figures; yet that it does exist I am certain, Poverty has been one of the main causes but not the whole cause. I will admit quite freely that ignorance on the part of young mothers and in some degree a slight indifference to these things has also been responsible. I believe that in a school lunch programme you could make the focal point the teaching of good eating habits not only to the children but through them to the parents. In that way the scheme would be of very great importance.

I was thinking only the other day of the marvellous work done by women's groups all over Canada in support of the war effort. We have Canadian clubs, the I.O.D.E., the Red Cross, church groups, the Y.W.C.A., little tiny clubs of women everywhere who have been giving of their time and energy to provide comforts for our soldiers, sailors and airmen. I have often thought to myself, what is going to happen to the energies of all these women when the war is over. Why cannot we, with the setting up of this department, enlist all the energy and ability and willingness of these groups to work on behalf of the children in this country who are in need of help and care so badly? I believe that many of these women's groups would welcome the idea if the department started to organize these many things which are needed on behalf of mothers and children in Canada. So far as the work which is being done for the soldiers, sailors and airmen is concerned, the women do not care what rank a man has so long as he is in uniform. Then comforts and all kinds of things are provided for him. So it is with children; there is no difference between them. Whether they come from the homes of the poor or from middle-class homes, there are many things which need to be done for them, and I believe that this department which is being set up could help to give the women of this country something to go on fighting for and working for after the war is over rather than letting all their effort and energy and initiative lapse for want of stimulation, coordination and organization from a government department. I believe that nothing should be done in this regard in a dictatorial way. It should be rather a matter of suggestion in the beginning. In many local communities you could get action committees set up, organizing programmes to suit the needs of the localities. There need be nothing stereotyped about it, but a wide range should be open for the exercise of the abilities of the women who would take up this work on behalf of the children. It would be a challenge to our women to win the peace which is to come after the war.

I would ask the Prime Minister, who has introduced this bill, if before it passes he would not consider setting up under section 5, among the functions of the minister—I shall not attempt to word the clause—the setting up of a certain group of officials in his department whose special function it should be to care for the welfare and basic needs of the children of Canada.

Mr. JEAN FRANÇOIS POULIOT (Témiscouata): Mr. Speaker, I am fortunate indeed in addressing the house after the two hon. members who have just spoken. One of them, the hon. member for Renfrew South (Mr.

McCann) belongs to one of the learned faculties, and the other, the hon. member for North Battleford (Mrs. Nielsen), is fully qualified as a mother to speak on behalf of the children.

As I did not agree with the so-called social legislation which was introduced in 1935 by the Bennett government, I do not agree with this kind of legislation, and for several reasons. The main one is that I strongly object to centralization. In my view the more centralization we have in any field, the less efficiency we have.

This bill is astonishing in many respects. It refers to health, social security and social welfare. That is the basis of the bill. Every hon. member who has already spoken on the bill has repeated time and again health, social security, social welfare. What is that? There is no definition in the bill. We have to guess what it is. We have so much difficulty with the interpretation of our obscure legislation as it is now that the least we can ask is a definition of these three terms, "health," "social security" and "social welfare," which together form the cornerstone of this bill, if I understand it well. Why are these terms not defined? Is it to make the bill vague? Is it to circumscribe the operation of the measure to the narrowest possible application? I do not know; I hope not. But here in this bill I point out is a legislative deficiency for which there is no excuse whatever.

What is social welfare? I do not know. What is social security? Who knows what social security is? It may mean everything, and those who are charged with the interpretation of the legislation may remain silent when the question is asked of them. What is health? Health is not defined in the bill. Nobody can say what is the lawmaker's intent with regard to a definition that does not exist. That is the first observation that I have to make in that regard.

The department is defined. There is a very bright definition of it in clause 2, which says:

"Department" means the Department of National Health and Welfare.

Very able! Most profound! The second definition is also very profound. What is the minister?

"Minister" means the Minister of National Health and Welfare.

Most profound! The third definition apparently has been written by some solon of no common genius, because it reads:

"Deputy minister" means the deputy minister, or deputy ministers, of national health and welfare.

Those are the only definitions given in the bill, and I do not understand how the Prime Minister can introduce a bill containing only those definitions when others are so badly needed. I agree entirely with some statements of the hon. member for Renfrew South. He has told us that the purpose of a bill like this is to promote the health of the people of Canada. I cannot, however, share his views regarding centralization.

The next section deals with the establishment of the department, and the second subsection states:

The minister shall have the management and direction of the department and shall hold office during pleasure.

Section 6 of the bill reads:

The governor in council may establish such boards, committees and councils as he deems necessary, to assist and advise the minister and to cooperate with provincial authorities for the purposes of this act.

The minister is to have the management and direction of the department, but on the other hand he will receive assistance and advice from boards, committees and councils which are to assist and advise him. This means that the deputy minister or deputy ministers who are to be named apparently are not considered competent enough to advise the minister. If that is not carrying bureaucracy to the utmost, I do not know what it is. We are to have not only one deputy minister, but perhaps two, as well as all sorts of bureaucrats surrounding the minister and preventing him from seeing the sick man on the street or anywhere else.

Subsection 2 of section 4 reads:

Such other officers, clerks and employees as are necessary for the proper conduct of the business of the department shall be appointed or employed in the manner authorized by law.

All appointments are supposed to be made by the civil service commission. Years ago the present Minister of National Defence for Air (Mr. Power) said that all appointments to the national defence purchasing board would be made by the civil service commission. We know very well that no dollar a year men have been appointed by the civil service commission up to now. It is true that that board is now the Department of Munitions and Supply. Subsection 3 of section 4 gives me some anxiety. It reads:

Notwithstanding anything contained in the immediately preceding subsection of this section, the governor in council may designate persons who, prior to the commencement of this act, were members of the staff of the Department of Pensions and National Health to be members of the staff of the department, and, upon such designation, such members shall be deemed to have been transferred to the department on the date of the commencement of this act, but no person shall by reason of such designation be eligible to be certified as permanent by the civil service commission.

All the bureaucracy of the present Department of Pensions and National Health is to be embodied in the new Department of National Health and Welfare. If I am dissatisfied with the bureaucracy of the Department of Pensions and National Health, no matter what may be said in their defence, because people are suffering on account of their incompetency; if I complain I shall be told that I am a coward because I attack people who are not here to defend themselves. The fact is that I shall have to go before bureaucrats who will be transferred from the present department to the new one. The name may be different, but it will be the same. Is it possible to think of that? It is most unfortunate.

It may be said that I do not want the Canadian people well looked after, that I do not want them to receive medical care, that I am not sincere, that I use extravagant language, that by opposing this I am against progress. I may be told all that, but I have deep-rooted convictions. During his western tour of 1940 or 1942, I do not know which, the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) said that he regretted that he could not come in contact with the people the same as do private members. It is because I, like other private members, come in contact with the soldiers and the sick people that I express myself as freely as I do.

One main objection is that we do not know what is meant by the bill. The so-called objects of the bill are not defined. My next complaint against the bill is that it is in conflict with the constitution of this country. It goes farther than any other bill has gone to bind provincial executives to dominion boards, to make them subject to dominion legislation. They are to be subject not only to dominion legislation, but to the orders which may be issued by this bureaucracy that we have now and that we shall always have in the future if a check is not put on them.

Let us come to section 5 which reads:

The duties, powers and functions of the minister . . .

There is a lot of redundant language there which means nothing; it is just legal phraseology.

. . . shall extend to and include all matters relating to the promotion or preservation of the health, social security and social welfare of the people of Canada over which the parliament of Canada has jurisdiction, and, without restricting the generality of the foregoing, particularly the following matters:

(a) the administration of such acts of the parliament of Canada and of orders or regulations of the government of Canada as are not by law assigned to any other department of the government of Canada or any minister thereof relating in any way to the health, social security and welfare of the people of Canada.

I object again. Why say "orders or regulations not by law assigned to any other department of the government of Canada"? If all orders concerning health are to be under the new Department of National Health and Welfare, is it not possible to provide that any matter relating to health, if we are to have a department of health, shall be placed under the minister of health? It ought to be easy to draft the legislation accordingly.

Take, next, "investigation and research into public health and welfare"—I am referring to paragraph (b) of section 5. I suggested to the government years ago that they should appoint Sir Frederick Banting as president of the national research council. He was appointed to one of the committees of the national research council after that suggestion was made. But that was not the same thing. The loss of Sir Frederick Banting is still regretted because of the important discovery he made, which has meant so much for the benefit of mankind. But there is no use in making any constructive suggestions. When a suggestion is made it is accepted in so far as the bureaucracy accept it, in so far as it does not affect the privilege and power of the bureaucracy; otherwise it is rejected.

The Department of Mines and Resources will be affected by the bill, as will be seen by reference to paragraph (c) which has to do with "the inspection and medical care of immigrants and seamen, and the administration of marine hospitals, and such other hospitals of the government of Canada as may be committed to its administration by order of the governor in council." What about the admission of immigrants? Will immigrants be admitted under the present immigration law, which is under the jurisdiction of the Minister of Mines and Resources (Mr. Crerar), at the present time, and then looked after and be examined by another department? The immigration branch should be considered as a complete entity, and immigrants cannot be admitted into this country when their physical condition is not up to the standard established by law. How is it then that they will come under the jurisdiction of the Minister of Mines and Resources, and afterwards the Minister of National Health and Welfare will decide whether or not they are physically fit to get into the country? There is no reason for that. That clause is absurd except—

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): There is no change from the present.

Mr. POULIOT: The whole care of immigrants should be put under one minister, either the minister of health or the minister of immigration. Otherwise the two will play ball with every immigrant.

But not only that; "the supervision, as regards the public health, of railways, boats, ships and all other methods of transportation," is mentioned. Imagine the countless inspectors who will be appointed, good doctors or fake doctors who will be on all trains, boats, ships and all other methods of transportation. I wonder if there will be a bureaucratic doctor on each bus that travels from township to township. In the streets of Ottawa, on the street-cars, it would be important to have inspectors, just as important as to have them anywhere else, because when these vehicles are crowded there is danger of contagion. There is no limit, and I do not see why there should not be an inspector on every vehicle.

Then there is "the supervision of federal public buildings and offices with a view to conserving and promoting the health of civil servants and other government employees therein." We have the supreme court building, and notwithstanding what was said by a cabinet minister, I remember that when the present Minister of National Defence for Air was Minister of Pensions and National Health he sent me a complimentary copy of the report made by one of the officers of his department telling about the rats that were in the supreme court building—the rats and the draughts and everything else—and the judges were complaining bitterly about the insanitary condition of that building. Now the judges are still in the same building, which has not been improved, and the new supreme court building is a garbage pail—we shall be told afterwards that there will be good inspection of the building under the new bill. Do you think Jean-François Pouliot can believe it? Never! I have had experience in the past with inspection and it was a farce from beginning to end. When I fought hard to have a better fireproof library I was given more than a library; I was given a supreme court building that cost millions, the cornerstone of which was laid by Her Majesty the Queen—and now it is a garbage pail for salvage, at least for the time being.

And now we come to "the enforcement of any rules or regulations made by the international joint commission, promulgated pursuant to the treaty between the United States of America and His Majesty relating to boundary waters and questions arising between the United States of America and Canada, so far as the same relate to public health." That is the kind of drafting to which I object. I was interested one day in international affairs and suggested that the item which was in the estimates for the League of Nations should be made use of to buy radium for cancer treatment, and the minister of pensions told me to wait until the estimates of external affairs were brought down. When the Prime Minister brought down the estimates of that department I asked the same question and he told me to ask the Minister of Pensions and National Health. Since they were both in the house at the same time I asked them to make a decision there and then. But there is nothing for cancer and the item for the defunct League of Nations is still in the estimates. I appreciate what the hon. member for Macleod (Mr. Hansell) has said in regard to the purchase of radium for cancer.

There are certain acts mentioned in paragraph (g) of this section. For instance, there is the Food and Drugs Act. I had occasion once to complain about a kind of compound gin that was advertised called John de Kuyper. The formula for gin is the distillation of grain with grain alcohol, with juniper herb and other aromatic herbs; and for a time the department was right. They sent instructions to the customs and excise collectors not to consider as gin any kind of concoction made otherwise. But afterwards, under the pressure of an eminent lobbyist, I saw that there was a change in the description of John de Kuyper's. It could not be called gin but a compound gin, but it was advertised as gin and I made complaints. I mention this because the Food and Drugs Act is mentioned in this section. I complained that the Food and Drugs Act was not being respected with regard to advertisements which were infringing the act and that it was a fraud. It was a kind of poison that was advertised as gin. I complained of that in the house. I quoted the Food and Drugs Act and finally action was taken in Montreal against the company, but it was postponed, postponed, postponed, until all liquor advertisements were forbidden. I would not be surprised—and I say this so that the press will be informed—if it was precisely because the advertisements of John de Kuyper's compound gin could not be published any more as gin that the press were not allowed to publish any advertisements for liquor and beer.

I now come to the Opium and Narcotic Drugs Act. It comes to my mind that the man in charge of this is a former policeman from Vancouver. He appeared before the civil service committee. I asked him if he knew anything about chemistry and narcotics. He said, "Yes." I said, "What is it? Have you had any experience with narcotics?" He said, "Yes." I said, "What narcotics?" He said, "Nitric acid." He had had experience with that. He is the head of the opium and narcotic drugs branch. What does he do? He has a staff. He has one chemist.

Mr. GRAYDON: That would put him to sleep.

Mr. POULIOT: To eternal sleep. It showed that he did not know what he was talking about. He has a staff of twenty. He had a chemist there. And do you know what they do, sir? They prepare data for the League of Nations. I brought the matter up in the house after I had all the dope in the committee. It is time to speak of dope when you speak of opium and narcotics. He was there. He was a good and honest civil servant doing so well. He is doing positively nothing. All seizures are made by the Royal Canadian Mounted Police, as are all analyses. That man is doing positively nothing. But because he has patronage he has been appointed to that position for which he is entirely incompetent, and given a staff, and now he is an important man and signs narcotic treaties with other nations with his own name, a very important man.

The Quarantine Act comes under immigration. We know about the Public Works Health Act. We then come to the Leprosy Act. Let us pass quickly over that. The next is the Proprietary or Patent Medicine Act. If that is as conscientiously applied as the Food and Drugs Act, I do not know what may happen. The National Physical Fitness Act is the next one. We know that old age pensions, pensions for the blind and family allowances are put in here. I have already said what I thought about them, namely, that the minimum age for old age pensions should be put at sixty-five for those who need them. Pensions for the blind should be given to each human being as soon as it is acknowledged by reputable medical doctors that the child is blind. But those important matters should be under provincial control. If they are under the control of Ottawa we shall have no more success than we had with the farm loans. I very well remember the correspondence I had with the farm loan office here in Ottawa when I tried to secure loans for farmers who had no assets in the form of liquid money. They could not get anything here and it was only after a provincial farm loan was put in force.

Mr. SPEAKER: The hon. member is now straying far afield. He should confine himself to the bill.

Mr. POULIOT: I am referring to centralization, sir.

Mr. SPEAKER: The comparison was made with the farm loan board, and that does not come within the terms of the bill. The hon. member has travelled far afield. He should confine himself to the bill.

Mr. POULIOT: Sir, you know the respect I have for you. Therefore I will not say a word about farm loans.

I now come to paragraph (i) and I find something that is unbelievable. Here we have provincial officers, provincial ministers who will become dominion bureaucrats. Let us read this together: The minister, meaning by that the Minister of Health and Social Welfare, will have jurisdiction particularly over the following matters. Here is one:

> Cooperation with provincial authorities with a view to the coordination of efforts made or proposed for preserving and improving the public health and providing for the social security and welfare of the people of Canada.

We have health units in the province of Quebec that have been established with the assistance of the Rockefeller foundation, and they have done marvels. Those who do not believe what I say and who are not sure about the fact I will refer to the Quebec minister of health, the Hon. Mr. Groulx. I suggest that they write asking him for the last statistics of the Quebec health department.

We now come to section 6, which reads as follows:

> The governor in council may establish such boards, committees and councils as he deems necessary, to assist and advise the minister and to cooperate with provincial authorities for the purposes of this act.

I have compared that with subsection 2 of section 3. Subsection 1 of section 7 reads:

> (1) There shall be a dominion council of health consisting of the deputy minister, who shall be chairman, the chief executive officer of the provincial department or board of health of each province,—

Meaning the provincial minister of health.

> —and such other person, not to exceed five in number, as may be appointed by the governor in council, who shall hold office during good behaviour for three years.

Imagine a provincial minister of health being appointed to a council during good behaviour, if he behaves well, for three years! They are not sure that the provincial minister of health will behave well. It is an insult to all the provincial ministers of health of this country. I do not see how any one can accept a position to sit on such a council by virtue of legislation of this kind.

Subsection 2 reads:

> Such dominion council shall meet at such times . . .

And so on. Section 11 says that a report is to be submitted. I shall not read section 12, but I draw hon. members' attention to it. If hon. members read it they will see that it reads like this well known French sentence:

Quand un gendarme rit dans la gendarmerie, tous les gendarmes rient dans la gendarmerie.

We go on like that. Sir, I want my Canadian people to be healthy. I want them to be well cared for. But I still believe in the old family doctor who is the adviser of every family and who knows the health history of each of his patients. I see in this house hon. members who are well-known family doctors. They are on both sides of the house. They enjoy the respect of all those whom they have known. One of them told me how touching it was to bring into the world a young child when he had assisted the grandmother at the time of the mother's birth. They are the confidants of the families. They are respected; they are helpful; they are available day and night. Can you expect the same degree of devotion from the blacksmiths whom I have denounced, who are now in the army? I wonder if the purpose of this bill is not to give them jobs when the war is over; if it is not intended to give jobs to the very men about whom I have been complaining bitterly, while I have been insulted just because I was defending the soldier and the poor who could not be heard.

The hon. member for North Battleford (Mrs. Nielsen) said that she spoke for the children, who had no representative in this house. I believe that any man who is a father, or any woman who is a mother, is always a defender and protector of children, even after being elected to high office. I wonder, however, if the purpose of this bill is not twofold. I wonder if it is not to give jobs to those who will be unable to have their own clientele when the war is over and, second, if it is not intended to make this country more attractive for immigrants after the war, immigrants of every description who will be let loose upon this country without check. I am not opposed to controlled immigration, but I am opposed to uncontrolled immigration, the kind that has been preached.

I want my people to be looked after first. When I fought to have second-hand clothing from the war department given to the poor people, that could not be done. The Indians could get it but my people could not. In 1940, after the war began but before the United States entered the war, I went to that country to make a special study of the WPA. I made my report to this house, and I was told that it contained too many statistics. What is the use? It is hopeless.

[Mr. Pouliot.]

Mr. G. K. FRASER (Peterborough West): Mr. Speaker, when the hon. member for Renfrew South (Mr. McCann) mentioned the Indian affairs branch I remembered that not long ago I saw a letter in which the Minister of Mines and Resources (Mr. Crerar) said that his department would pay only $2.50 a day for the hospital care of an Indian, a ward of the government. In that particular case I know it cost the city $3 or more a day for the hospitalization of that patient. I believe that the Indian affairs branch should pay prevailing hospital rates if they have to place any of the Indians in those institutions.

There is only one item on which I should like to speak this evening; that is, the lack of hospital accommodation for children who are mentally and physically ill. There are hundreds of these children in Canada, and we have not hospital accommodation for them. Some of them are misshapen; some are unable to understand what is said to them; some are unable to talk; some cannot hear; some cannot walk or look after themselves at all. Their parents must keep them in their homes and look after them as long as they live. I believe that one of the first things the minister of this new department should do is see to it that proper hospitals are provided for these children. He should help the provinces to enlarge the present hospital accommodation in order that these children may be looked after. There is not room for them in the existing hospitals; they have waiting lists of hundreds of children. I know that in many cases the parents of these children would not like to see them go into a hospital, but in many homes these children are causing dissatisfaction and discontent not only on the part of the parents but also among the other children in the home. It is unfair to the other children to have these mentally and physically ill children left in the homes. I am sure that if the minister had been around and had seen some of the cases I have seen, he would do everything possible to see that one hospital was established in each province to take care of these children.

Mr. C. E. JOHNSTON (Bow River): Mr. Speaker, I believe that the setting up of this new department is a worth-while step, if properly handled, but I think it would be a mistake if this department is not given control of all health services. I feel very sympathetic toward the hon. member for Portage la Prairie (Mr. Leader) who spoke so well this afternoon in regard to a cure for cancer. I agree wholeheartedly that the government should assist in every possible way all the research that can be carried on in the hope of finding a cure for this disease. I do not agree with the hon. member for Renfrew South (Mr. McCann). I know there are two schools of thought on this subject. There are those old die-hard medical practitioners—thank goodness they are not all that way—who put their whole faith in surgery and X-ray treatment. If that matter were gone into thoroughly I am quite sure that statistics could be brought down to prove that this method has not been very successful. To me the information given this afternoon by the hon. member for Portage la Prairie was convincing, and more than ample to warrant the government in making further investigations.

While I am on that point I should like to say that there are several treatments for cancer. I am not a medical man, but from my general knowledge of the subject I believe that several treatments have been effective, and they do not include surgery and X-ray. I do not know of one case that has been completely cured by surgery, but I do know of a number of cases which have been cured by other means. A year ago when I was in Calgary I was met by a committee in the Palliser hotel. They were much concerned over this question of the treatment for cancer. If I remember rightly the committee consisted of about twenty to twenty-five persons. Nearly all had suffered from cancer; one or two had goitre as well. In each case the doctors had recommended surgery, even for those who had goitre. I vividly recall one case in particular; that person was given no more than two months to live. Each of these people told me he had been cured, though not by the treatment mentioned to-day by the hon. member for Portage la Prairie. In these cases the treatment had been administered by Doctor Arnott, who lives in Ontario. Doctor Arnott has been to this government and to the research council seeking assistance to extend his treatment, but he met with exactly the same consideration which was shown Doctor Davidson, and which was mentioned this afternoon by the hon. member for Portage la Prairie. I do not think that is right, or conducive to the best health treatment of our people. We might find some who are quacks; I have not the slightest doubt about that. But if we investigate 100 cases which are unworthy, we may find that the 101st case might be well worth any expense involved.

Nor am I one who believes that all our health services can be handled efficiently by medical doctors. In this new department I believe it would be a mistake if we excluded all but medical doctors. I recall that the social security committee, which dealt with the subject of health, heard a gentleman named Doctor Davidson, I believe it was.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): Yes; president of the child welfare council.

Mr. JOHNSTON (Bow River): Yes. He was not a medical doctor, but I venture to say that he had more knowledge respecting the general health of the people than did ninety-nine per cent of the medical doctors, and he gave a most excellent presentation to the committee, one which was most beneficial to all concerned. Men like that are worthy of consideration. If the minister who is to be in charge of this department can get the services of such men, regardless of whether they are medical doctors or not, then I believe the department will be well worth while.

Mention was made this afternoon by the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) about calling a conference of the provinces. There may be some urgent need for such a conference, and I think it would be a good thing. There has already been a conference of ministers and deputy ministers of health from the provinces, who have met in Ottawa within the past two weeks the health officials of the dominion department. This government will not meet any opposition from the provinces, when it comes to a matter of health. In almost every case when health authorities have come to meet dominion officials, it has been the desire of those authorities to go to the full length of instituting health measures. The only thing that has stood in the way has been the financial question. They wanted to extend health services, but invariably they were met with the protest, "We cannot afford it; we have not the money; the dominion government will have to supply it." That, too, is a question which will come before the new department; it cannot be avoided. The same will apply to the new Department of Reconstruction, set up only a few days ago. One of the major questions will be: Where are you to get the money? This government, if it is to give the degree of welfare which will be required in this country, will have to solve that problem.

I agree that family allowances are a step in the right direction, but I do not agree at all with the way in which they are to be administered. However, that is another question, which can be dealt with at the proper time. One of the best ways to improve health is to prevent sickness, rather than to try to build up the health of the individual after sickness has broken it down.

The hon. member for North Battleford (Mrs. Nielsen) said that one of the greatest enemies of health is that malnutrition brought about, in many cases, by undernourishment, which, in turn, is the result of insufficient financing. Family allowances, to a degree, will take care of that difficulty if, as was pointed out by the hon. member, there is proper supervision, and proper information is given to the families concerned.

I am not going to oppose the setting up of this new department, because I believe it is long overdue. It is my hope that the government will hasten the implementing of these improvements to the full.

Mr. G. T. FULFORD (Leeds): Mr. Speaker, I should like to deal briefly with a matter existing in Canada to-day which I believe the new Department of National Health and Welfare will have to consider immediately at the conclusion of the war. I do not recommend that what I shall suggest should be undertaken right away, because I am aware of the difficulty connected with securing materials and, second, that of securing the necessary workmen to complete buildings.

Speaking, however, as a governor of the Brockville General hospital, I feel that as soon as this war is over, material grants will have to be made to the public hospitals of Canada. Brockville is a town of over 12,000 people. We have two hospitals; one is the Protestant General hospital, and the other is the Roman Catholic St. Vincent de Paul hospital. Since the introduction of the blue cross plan, a plan whereby for so much a week each member of the family is cared for, conditions in the hospitals have become intolerable. To give hon. members an idea of the conditions let me say that in the Brockville General hospital, built originally to accommodate seventy-two beds, there are to-day 116 beds, and there has been no increase in the size of the building.

I have known of cases concerning women, who, upon being sent to the maternity ward, have found that ward so crowded that they have been obliged to wait in the corridors. The agony that these poor women suffer is beyond comprehension. Furthermore, it is not fair to those patients who are suffering, perhaps, from serious maladies, but who find themselves placed in rooms adjoining the corridor.

Very few hospitals in the smaller towns have the required isolation facilities for contagious diseases, nor have they proper equipment. I realize that conditions are far better in Eastern Canada than they are in the west, chiefly owing to the fact that our distances are not so great, but serving the town of Gananoque, in the county of Leeds, with a population of 3,600, there is no hospital nearer than Kingston. I might add that as late as last week there was no doctor in that town, and had it not been for the good graces of the Canadian army there would be none to-day. Fortunately, however, through the procurement and assignment board, they were able to secure one.

Under any health scheme people will flock more and more to their doctors and the hospitals. I believe that the blue cross hospital scheme has proven that. Therefore, when a health insurance programme is adopted in Canada we must be prepared greatly to enlarge our hospital facilities. And, having Gananoque as an example, we shall also have to be prepared to educate many more young men in the study of medicine. Certainly, as conditions exist to-day, and even taking account of those doctors who will return from overseas, we shall definitely not have enough to satisfy the common needs of the people.

I urge, therefore, that serious consideration be given by the new department to the giving of grants to smaller communities to enlarge those hospitals which now exist and, where they do not exist, to enable communities to build community hospitals.

Mr. J. G. DIEFENBAKER (Lake Centre): Mr. Speaker, up to the present I have not referred to any of the social legislation that has been introduced in connection with the various departments which have been set up. Speaking for myself, I am rather disappointed at the fact that while these new departments of government are being set up, the problem of social security and social welfare is not being faced by this parliament at this time. Everywhere throughout the world to-day, particularly since the war began, there has been an intensification of the desire of people for a maximum of security. Only to-day I was reading a report of the national resources development board of the United States wherein is epitomized the aims and purposes of social security and social welfare in a way that I do not believe has been equalled anywhere else. In this report is set up a bill of rights for the people not only of the United States but throughout the united nations. It summarizes the viewpoint of those who believe that there can be social security and that there can be an extension of our social horizons under a system of private initiative. That bill of rights reads as follows, and with the leave of the house I intend to put it on Hansard:

1. The right to work, usefully and creatively through the productive years;
2. The right to fair play, adequate to command the necessities and amenities of life in exchange for work, ideas, thrift, and other socially valuable service;
3. The right to adequate food, clothing, shelter, and medical care;
4. The right to security, with freedom from fear of old age, want, dependency, sickness, unemployment, and accident;
5. The right to live in a system of free enterprise, free from compulsory labour, irresponsible private power, arbitrary public authority, and unregulated monopolies;
6. The right to come and go, to speak or to be silent, free from the spyings of secret political police;
7. The right to equality before the law, with equal access to justice in fact;
8. The right to education, for work, for citizenship, and for personal growth and happiness; and
9. The right to rest, recreation, and adventure, the opportunity to enjoy life and take part in an advancing civilization.

That, Mr. Speaker, summarizes the aims of social security. I have been struck by the fact that while in the last few days a number of bills have been brought before the house to set up departments of government, there has been no facing up to the issue of making provision for social security. All of us admit the necessity for social security. The only question we have to determine is this—and that challenge comes directly before the members of this parliament—whether or not social security as an actuality can be secured while at the same time we retain our freedom, or whether it is necessary in order to attain that security that we submit to state regimentation.

I submit, after looking over this bill that, while to read it in general would leave the impression that measures of social security are to be brought in, as a matter of fact all that the bill provides is for the machinery, with as yet no provision for the adoption of social security. The result is this: Legislation such as this, this kind of circumlocution, if I may call it so, provides an ideal incubation for political unrest in this country. I feel that the time has come for the government to introduce its measures of social security, for the machinery provided for the measures will be entirely meaningless without the measures themselves being provided.

When I look over this legislation it promises much in the matter of the powers and the duties that will rest on the minister, but it makes no provision for bringing into effect any legislation. Section 5 is a section that I should like the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) to explain. I cannot understand why it is necessary to place in that section these words:

. . . the promotion or preservation of the health, social security and social welfare of the people of Canada over which the parliament of Canada has jurisdiction.

Why is there any necessity for these words? Why is there any necessity for a later provision, section 8, which provides:

Nothing in this act or in any regulations made hereunder shall authorize the minister or any officer of the department to exercise any jurisdiction or control over any provincial or municipal board of health or other health authority operating under the laws of any province.

These two sections are redundant; they are unnecessary. The parliament of Canada has jurisdiction only over those matters that are provided for under the constitution. While I do not know what the reason may be, I wonder whether those provisions are placed in the bill with a view to being able to explain later, when social security measures that are believed about to be implemented are not brought into effect, that the explanation will be available that they are not within the powers of the parliament of Canada

The Prime Minister should place before the country fairly and adequately the powers which this parliament has in the matter. Today we find all over this dominion, as a result of political unrest—the consequence possibly of political unrest—that many people think they can be the beneficiaries with everyone else being the contributors. By doing so we will guard against the various political parties placing themselves in a position of bidding in competitive benevolence, and promising things that cannot be carried into effect, for the reason that the legislative authority of this parliament does not permit some of these promises being carried into effect.

I feel that a great deal of good would be done if the Prime Minister would set out in detail the extent to which this parliament can legislate under the powers that it now has to provide for the essentials, food, housing and medical care, so that people everywhere in this dominion will know just how far this parliament can go and beyond which it cannot go.

We have now been in session for several months. Promises were made in the speech from the throne. As an example, health insurance seems as far removed from being carried into effect as it was two years ago before the committee was set up.

I realize the difficulties in connection with jurisdiction and in the matter of the distribution of powers as between the federal and provincial governments, but these matters must be faced. We who believe in a system of free initiative are faced with a challenge more strongly than ever before, that we assure the people of the same measures of social security as promised by those who believe in state regimentation. We must assure the people that those measures can and will in fact be implemented by this parliament and that where parliament lacks the power immediate measures must be taken by cooperation with the provinces to establish a comprehensive system of social security.

We must face the fact that everywhere in this dominion people are saying that we who believe in a system of free enterprise will promise social security but are unready to take the responsibility of seeing that it is brought into effect. I fear very much that legislation such as this will add to the fears of the people in that connection. We have a greater responsibility than the mere passing of legislation granting powers, and must face, I repeat, the responsibility of assuring social security under our present system with freedom; otherwise those who believe that these things cannot be secured under our present system will follow the leadership of those who believe that freedom is incompatible with the adoption of social security.

As far as the setting up of a ministry is concerned, the Progressive Conservative party advocated that at its convention in Winnipeg. It advocated the appointment of a minister of social security and reconstruction who would be charged with the administration of social security in this country, and also that the state's share of the cost of the social security system should be borne by the dominion in order to secure an equality of social security throughout the country as a whole.

As I look over this legislation, section 5 would lead me to believe that a great measure of social security is promised and will be adopted, whereas in point of fact, practically the outstanding matters under that section that can be carried into effect will be those in paragraph (g) which refers to the administration of certain acts which will come under the jurisdiction of this department, and the enforcement of rules or regulations made by the international joint commission.

I ask the Prime Minister to place before the country fairly and squarely the powers of this parliament. In addition, I ask him to bring in at the earliest possible date legislation to implement the social security programme and make it applicable to-day and not as of July 1, 1945. What the people are asking is this: What are you going to do? What is your plan? What instrument are you going to set up to carry the plan into effect? What machinery have you in mind? We need more than just the machinery provided here; we need the actual adoption of measures which will assure this country that degree of security which all the united nations are asking for while at the same time maintaining our freedom.

Mr. G. H. CASTLEDEN (Yorkton): Mr. Speaker, in making a few remarks on the establishment of this department I should like to point out the great need there is in Canada for health and social security. These reforms are long overdue. Canadians in our armed forces and Canadians at home have not forgotten the depression of 1930-39 when under both a Tory and a Liberal regime this country knew want, insecurity and deplorable depression. A million Canadians were on relief and the youth of this land was denied the ordinary right of life. When you want to kill a tree the best method is to cut its roots. If you want to destroy the well-being of a country deny to its youth the right of life. It was only six short years ago when the prayer of the young men of this land, as was stated the other day before the reconstruction committee, was, "give us war in our time, O Lord." I do not think we could have a more glaring comdemnation of the failure of the Canadian economic system.

Then overnight Canada blossomed forth into great production. Has not Canada shown what she is capable of producing? With a large percentage of her labour population away she has exceeded any production records that ever existed. She surprised even herself. If the natural resources of this country were properly developed we could exceed the powers of the Canadian people to consume.

Canada reaped a harvest from those years of depression in the fact that when her young men were called to the armed services the records show that between forty-five and fifty per cent were unfit physically or mentally to don the king's uniform. In thousands of homes throughout this land ill health, insecurity, poverty and want have brought our national standard to a point possibly lower than any of the other self-governing dominions of the Britsh empire. The crime of the whole thing was that it was so unnecessary, as has been proved since this war began.

This bill to set up a Department of National Health and Welfare is in the same category as the other bill to set up the Department of Reconstruction, but I am afraid it is only a gesture to hide the failure of our economy.

Reconstruction and reform in Canada's social life will not come from the setting up of departments. First of all, this department must have the desire to change what is wrong in our economy. Then it must have the power to change that, a power given by a democratically elected government. Unless there is a change in the viewpoint of the industrial life of this country, such departments as these will be useless. Unless there is a change in the motivated force of our economic life I can see nothing but a return after this war to want and insecurity which will lead ultimately to another war. Under the economic system under which we have operated in this and other countries where irresponsible private enterprise and monopolistic organizations control the economic life of peoples and make money out of war, wars will continue. One would imagine, from reading such bills as have been before the house, that the Canadian people are undergoing a change; that there is a new outlook on life in Canada. Unfortunately, however, when we see what is going on in the industrial life of the country, we find private enterprise so strongly entrenched—

Mr. MacNICOL: You are talking about something you know nothing whatever about.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: That is splendid. The hon. member for Davenport has expressed on other occasions the view that he does not think—

Mr. MacNICOL: You are talking about something you know nothing about. We have heard that before.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: The hon. member has told us before who, in his opinion, should be sitting here.

Mr. MacNICOL: We are perfectly fed up with that. You may know something about schoolteaching but nothing about industry.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: The hon. member does not think anyone should sit in the House of Commons except those who have provided jobs in the past.

Mr. MacNICOL: You have never provided jobs to anyone but the man cutting the lawn. You should talk about something you know something about.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: That is what I am doing. I am talking about the depression and about unemployment, about young men who could not make a living on the land, who could not find work—thousands of them—and about the million people who were on relief under the industrial set-up of the country prior to the war, and I claim that all this is unnecessary in a land where there is such abundance as exists in Canada. I am sorry to see that the trend of private enterprise in these days is rather toward the continuation of the strengthening of their position. Now, when they find the profit motive does not work, they want the guarantee of the state to maintain them in their position. Several glaring examples of this appeared in the evidence given before the committee on reconstruction. I should like to quote the following:

> It might be pointed out that some firms engaged in war industry at the present time are faced with the element of uncertainty because the dominion government has not, as yet, laid down a clear policy concerning what is to become of dominion-owned machinery and equipment that is presently in the hands of these companies for their war work.
> One such company, in a brief presented to the reconstruction council stated categorically that if they were allowed to purchase these machine tools, equipment and raw materials in their possession for a nominal sum on proof that it would be put to productive use, they could guarantee employment for the 480 of their present employees who wish to remain with them after the war, as well as between 250 and 300 personnel who will be returning to them from the armed services.

Several instances of that kind came before our committee. The Canadian people have the resources wherewith to provide themselves with the food, the clothing, the shelter and the various services which can be made use of in this country. They have the resources to provide themselves with all that they need. These resources exist in abundance in Canada. Knowing this, the Canadian people will not tolerate a return to the conditions that have prevailed heretofore. Our social security and welfare will depend upon our ability to distribute these goods and services to the people who need them for their use. What has happened in the past? These natural resources of this great country have been handed over to irresponsible private enterprise and in many cases monopolistic organizations have exploited them at their own desire. I refer to Beauharnois, to the mineral areas of Canada, to the developments of International Nickel, to the vast timber limits handed over to private enterprise, and more recently to such things as power development and the development of oil rights in the Yukon and Northwest Territories.

Until these natural resources, which we hold to be the birthright of the Canadian people, are developed by the people themselves as something which they own, through either state or cooperative organization, to be used by the people themselves and not merely for the purpose of producing profits, where the genius of the Canadian people, their ability and their engineers have developed and processed the things they require in order to produce the social security, improvement and welfare of the Canadian people, so as to make the benefits of science available to the masses —until these things are done for the welfare of the people, we can look in vain for any improvement in the social condition of the people of Canada. To the extent to which we can provide ourselves with these requirements we shall have abundance; and when we have surpluses arrangements can be made to exchange them for the things we require from other nations. When that is done we can look for the day of social security in Canada and then provide ourselves with the health services which we need.

It has been implied by other speakers that such a system would mean state regimentation. A democratic cooperative commonwealth in Canada will bring the first real freedom that the Canadian people have known for some decades. This house will do well to remember that we can never have real democracy in this country, political democracy, until we have an economic democracy. Until that is achieved, the passing of such bills is like putting a patch on an old tire. We are not opposing this bill, but we do not look upon it as being very helpful.

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): I shall not say more than a few words, since I am anxious to get the bill through. I appreciate the general expression of approval of the principle of the bill to establish the new Department of National Health and Welfare, though some hon. members, like the last speaker (Mr. Castleden), have damned the measure with faint praise, while my hon. friend the member for Lake Centre (Mr. Diefenbaker) has been unduly suspicious about the good that is likely to come out of it. As he was speaking my mind went back to the time over forty years ago, when I received a communication stating that the Liberal government of the day had decided to establish a Department of Labour in Canada, and I was asked if I would undertake the organization of the new department. When I read through the debates I found that the hon. gentlemen opposite had for the most part been questioning the advisability of starting a Department of Labour, and the line of argument they presented almost parallels what the hon. member for Lake Centre has said to-night.

First of all, there was the question of jurisdiction. Was the government sure that parliament was within its jurisdiction in establishing a federal Department of Labour? Was not that something that belonged to the provinces? Up to that time labour questions had been dealt with either by the municipalities or by the provinces, and was it not a waste of public money to start this new department? Then, there was the argument that it was in the nature of class legislation, caring for people who did not know how to take care of themselves. It was said that every man ought to be able to look after himself without having a department of government to look after him. There were other questions as to what was to be done. Was the government prepared to give some guarantee as to measures that would be carried out, and so forth and so on. Well, the department was started. I am rather proud to say that, when I came to Ottawa to begin the organization of the new department, I had first of all, with the assistance of the then Postmaster General, to find a building in which it could be housed and I had to ask for the loan of his stenographer, so that I might have the stenographic assistance necessary in beginning to organize the work of the new department. I will not say more than that, except to indicate that if a cause is right, the purpose is a good one, and the necessity exists, there is every reason why what may have small beginnings will grow into a service that will be of great national importance.

Is there anyone, to-day, who would say that we ought to abolish the Department of Labour? Is there anyone who would say that the Department of Labour has not been performing its duties within the jurisdiction of this parliament and that it has not been a means and the instrument for furthering the enactment of law after law which has been of the greatest possible benefit to people of all classes in this country? Up to that time there had been no machinery to deal with industrial disputes. The first act that was passed was one having to do with conciliation in industrial disputes. That was followed later by a special measure to deal with disputes on the railways. That was followed still later by the Industrial Disputes Investigation Act. That measure has been followed by others dealing with industrial disputes. I think I am safe in saying that the work which has been done by the Department of Labour in the last forty years in the prevention and settlement of industrial disputes represents a contribution to the national life whose value it would be very difficult indeed to estimate. And as is the case with all these things that are good in themselves, what they may have served to prevent is something in addition which cannot be estimated.

If we had not to-day the machinery we have for dealing with industrial disputes, which has been developed over the years, I should like to know where we would be at the present time in the matter of prosecuting this war, and in procuring the supply of munitions and supplies which we are producing. The wisdom of a measure of this kind is in what it anticipates, how far it looks into the future and may help to meet the needs of the future. I mentioned only one or two enactments of the Department of Labour. They are enactments with which I had personally to do at that time, and I have followed them with interest ever since, for that among other reasons. I should mention another act which, as a matter of fact, when later I became Minister of Labour, I introduced in this house. It was the Combines Investigation Act. That again was the outgrowth of the then Department of Labour and its work. What had become the method of dealing with industrial disputes became the method of dealing with trusts, combines and monopolies and their anti-social methods in some of their developments. Will anyone say that that work has not been of national service or that it has not been very much needed? If we had not had that act on the statutes, I venture to say the growth of monopolies, trusts and cartels in this country would have been such as few of us at the moment can conceive.

I recall that the first labour legislation that was passed in this parliament was a measure dealing with fair wages on government contracts. That was a measure that subsequently led to the establishment of the Department of Labour. That measure dealt only with government contracts. Comment was made this afternoon from the opposite side of the house in these words: "Tell us what there are in the way of government services that deal with the question of welfare that this department is to have anything to do with? Just what are the federal government services that are to be controlled?" A list of them has been given in section 5 of the bill; but what I wish to point out is that the first work of the federal government in Canada dealing with labour questions related to government departments. It began by seeing that the workers on government work were given a fair day's wage for a fair day's work. That measure subsequently led to the enactment of maximum hours of work and minimum wages which should be paid on all government contracts. That has led to a service throughout this dominion which has secured for the working classes of this country, not only on federal government work, but on work of the provinces as well, working conditions, wages and hours which may be regarded as fair and just. There is a great measure of social justice applied to government contract work which, but for the establishment, at that time, of the Department of Labour in this country, would not have existed until much later.

I might go on and refer to other measures. I speak of these measures particularly, because I have had to do with them myself. I have watched the effect of the establishment of departments dealing with social questions and where they are likely to lead. Mention has been made several times in the debate in this house of old age pensions. Some hon. gentlemen on the opposite side of the house have been seeking to take credit to their groups for having had to do with the establishment of old age pensions. May I say that if there had not been a Liberal administration in office at the time, which was interested in social questions we would have no old age pensions established at the time we did in Canada. It was the hon. members on this side of the house, who had the majority, who were able to put through measures of social legislation and who, to a man, supported my proposal in this house that we should have old age pensions established in this country. But I recall that there again objection was raised on this score of jurisdiction. It was said, what jurisdiction had this dominion in matters of old age pensions? We had to recognize the fact that we had no jurisdiction to establish an old age pension measure and administer it under this federal government. To administer such a measure it was necessary for us first of all to secure an amendment to the British North America Act. If we had been indifferent to the matter of our social legislation we probably would have taken refuge in the fact that the British North America Act was too big a measure for us to attempt to change; but we appreciated the need. We felt that the provinces could not be expected to take up a measure of this kind unless we gave them some assistance, and in order to ensure an old age pensions act being established in Canada we agreed to give assistance to the provinces, provided that they would join with us in enacting the necessary legislation. We passed a measure, a provision of which was that, if the provinces would contribute half, the federal government would contribute half of what was necessary to pay old age pensions, in the several provinces. So as to avoid any question of jurisdiction we agreed to leave the administration of the measure to the provinces.

In saying the British North America Act had to be amended, I had in my mind more particularly the unemployment insurance measures. I shall speak of unemployment insurance in a moment. In dealing with pensions we did not wait for an amendment to the British North America Act. But to make perfectly sure that we would meet a great social need in this country, a need that was being felt very keenly at the time, this Liberal administration undertook to see that old age pensions were established. When it became obvious to us that there was a demand for a higher outlay than the provinces were able to meet, at a subsequent session we increased the amount of the dominion's contribution. This was done in order to make sure that this much needed social legislation would go farther in meeting the needs of those whom we are still trying to help because of the difficulties they are experiencing in an industrial age where people, once they can no longer perform certain services in industry, are thrown out of employment without any further recognition of the services that they have rendered throughout their working lives. Well, that is another measure that grew out of the establishment of the Department of Labour.

I come now to unemployment insurance, and here may I say again that, if there had been no Liberal administration in office at the time, there would have been no unemployment insurance. It was in this connection that the objection was again raised that we had no jurisdiction. But we did not let that stop us. We made every effort we could to secure cooperation from the provinces to get the British North America Act amended to give us the required power to enact the legislation. We succeeded in having the British North America Act amended; we secured the jurisdiction, and to-day we have in existence an unemployment insurance measure very far-reaching indeed in its provisions, which, along with the other enactments I have mentioned, forms a very substantial beginning in social insurance. I am told that the fund already has reached the proportions of $200,000,000, which will indicate the scope of that measure.

I could refer to other matters. I recall one in particular, because I was a young minister at the time and felt pretty sensitive over some of the attacks that were made by the opposition. It was in connection with an endeavour to have the dominion take some part in the all-important question of research. I brought in a measure providing for the appointment of a royal commission to deal with the question of technical education. The moment the government spoke of that measure we were told that education in all its aspects belonged to the provinces; that we had no business interfering with the provinces; that we were invading their jurisdiction.

Mr. GRAYDON: That is what you said in 1935, too, was it not?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: If my hon. friend will just be quiet I will deal with him in a few moments, if he wishes.

Mr. GRAYDON: I did not think you would like that interjection, but neither did I think you would make that reply.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I repeat; the objection was raised from the opposite side of the house, as it has been raised to this measure to-night, that we were seeking to invade provincial jurisdiction, and that therefore we should not proceed. Fortunately we did not listen to that argument; we went ahead and appointed our royal commission, which made very important recommendations with respect to assistance the federal government might give the provinces in the development of technical education throughout Canada. That development has expanded and extended from that day to this, and has been of infinite service to this country. That has been so not only in time of peace; its usefulness has been demonstrated time and again during the period of this war. To-night, when we bring in a measure which I firmly believe will result, through further education in the matter of health, in the prevention of disease and improving the health and well-being of the people, again it is said, "Beware! You are going into a field that is sacred to the provinces; you are stirring up political strife," and so forth. My faith is stronger than that. I believe the day will come, though some of us in this room at the moment may not live to see it, when the service that will be rendered to this nation through the establishment of a department of health and welfare, in helping to preserve health and in preventing illness and disease, will be looked upon as one of the greatest contributions ever made by the parliament of Canada to the national life of our country.

I could go on to mention other measures, but I hope I have said enough at least to entitle me to say with conviction that I have faith in the good that will come from what this government is doing at the present time. I resent very strongly the attitude of some hon. gentlemen in attacking a measure of this kind and in alleging that it lacks sincerity, that it is a paper gesture. I could excuse the hon. member who made that statement because he is new to this house, but I might say to him that it ill becomes an hon. member of parliament to speak of any important piece of legislation brought forward for enactment by the parliament of Canada as a mere paper gesture.

Then I come again to what was said by the hon. member for Lake Centre (Mr. Diefenbaker), who said, "We have had several measures put on the statutes. We have had several departments created. Tell us something this department is going to do; tell us some measure with which it is going to be concerned." I do not know whether my hon. friend was in the house this afternoon when I drew particular attention to one of the most important measures ever placed before any parliament in any country, notice of which appears on the order paper of this house at this moment, in my name; that is the measure to establish family allowances in Canada. That measure will require to be very carefully worked out. Its administration is not going to be easy. The government does not imagine for a moment, human nature being what it is, that there may not be occasions when efforts will be made to show that the purposes which the measure seeks to attain have not been fulfilled in their entirety. In administering that measure we shall require ample safeguards that the money voted by this parliament will be used for the purposes for which it is intended. Some considerable time will be required to prepare for the administration of a measure of such proportions, to make sure that the moment it comes into operation, we shall be in a position to carry out the obligations of the statute in a way that will amply ensure that all expenditures are devoted to the particular purpose for which they are intended. But that is one measure the administration of which might at that well call for a department of welfare.

While I am on this subject I should like to say a word on a matter which arises out of it. This measure, being on the order paper, no hon. member of this house is by the rules permitted to discuss it. It cannot be discussed until it is brought before the house. Knowing this, and knowing that he must know the rules that govern in these matters, I was not a little surprised to read the other evening that the leader of the Progressive Conservative party, Mr. John Bracken, had come out in the public press with a statement that this important piece of social legislation constituted a national bribe, giving as his reason for that statement that the date on which the allowances are to commence has been fixed as from July 1 of next year. I wish Mr. Bracken were in this house. I would ask him to repeat that statement, though I am perfectly sure he would not; Mr. Bracken does not remain out of this house without reason. If he would repeat such a statement here I would appeal to His Honour the Speaker, and ask if any man, leader of a party or not, is entitled to use such an expression with respect to legislation before this house He would be obliged to withdraw the term, and he knows it. In what position are we placed? This is something I wish to emphasize to hon. members and to the people of this country. In what position is this parliament being placed before the people of Canada when the leader of a political party is granted licence to say what he pleases with respect to legislation before this parliament, and no one can call him to order if he violates the rules that have been laid down to safeguard debate and public discussion on great issues? There will be a reckoning one of these days in the matter of lawmaking, where those who are responsible because they are representatives of the people and have seats in parliament are bound to observe rules in the discussion of public questions and discussion is permitted to be carried on outside parliament with no regard or respect for rules by those who have been chosen as leaders of great parties and cannot be obliged to make good their assertions.

I did not intend to speak of that matter to-night; I shall have occasion to speak of it at another time. I wish to say, however, with respect to that particular measure, that I was responsible for fixing the date at July 1 of next year. I took that responsibility for this reason; I have told this house and this country that there will be an election either during the present year or next year, before the efflux of time of the present parliament, which means that this parliament will be dissolved before that measure can come into force. How then can it be said to constitute a bribe? I was seeing to it that it could not be made anything of the kind. I am not going to do what a former leader of the party opposite once did on the eve of an election. I remember an important election when money for wheat in storage was distributed throughout the whole of western Canada within a couple of days before the polling took place. I am going to take great care to see that no one can say that a great social measure of this kind is to have its prestige lowered by being introduced in any way which could be open to question.

Mr. GRAYDON: Why do we have social welfare thrown into politics, like you are doing to-night?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Mr. Speaker—

Mr. GRAYDON: It is nothing but Liberal party politics.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: If that is so it is because the Liberal party is the only party in Canada that has placed social legislation on the statutes.

Mr. GRAYDON: The Prime Minister only believes that.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I believe that and—

Mr. GRAYDON: You are only whistling while you are going through the cemetery.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Every measure to which I have referred to-night has been a measure with which I have had a great deal to do, and for which I have had a large measure of responsibility. It has been part of a consistent endeavour on my part, as leader of a political party, to see that while need exists in the ranks of the less fortunate in our country, and while something can be done to ameliorate the burdens of the people, and while the opportunity to help is still ours, the party head, the Liberal party, should take all such measures as would enable us to feel that by our fellow men we were doing our full duty in our day and generation.

Mr. GRAYDON: Mr. Speaker, I did not wish to interrupt the Prime Minister's remarks. May I just say that I do not believe—

Mr. SPEAKER: Order.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: The hon. member has spoken.

Mr. GRAYDON: May I just say this, that you are very much afraid of John Bracken.

Motion agreed to, bill read a second time and the house went into committee thereon, Mr. Golding in the chair.

On section 1—Short title.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: It is now five minutes to eleven. I would therefore move that the committee rise, report progress and ask leave to sit again.

Section stands.

Progress reported.

At eleven o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.
