House of Commons Debates

OFFICIAL REPORT

Thursday, January 12, 1939

FOURTH SESSION—EIGHTEENTH PARLIAMENT—OPENING

The parliament which had been prorogued from time to time to the twelfth day of January, 1939, met this day at Ottawa, for the dispatch of business.

The house met at three o'clock, the Speaker in the chair.

Mr. Speaker read a communication from the Governor General's secretary, announcing that His Excellency the Governor General would proceed to the Senate chamber at three p.m. on this day, for the purpose of formally opening the session of the dominion parliament.

A message was delivered by Major A. R. Thompson, Gentleman Usher of the Black Rod, as follows:

Mr. Speaker, His Excellency the Governor General desires the immediate attendance of this honourable house in the chamber of the honourable the Senate.

Accordingly the house went up to the Senate chamber.

And the house being returned to the Commons chamber:

VACANCIES

Mr. SPEAKER: I have the honour to inform the house that during the recess I received communications from several members, notifying me that the following vacancies had occurred in the representation, viz:

Of Frederick Cronyn Betts, Esquire, member for the electoral district of London, by decease;

Of Alexander McKay Edwards, Esquire, member for the electoral district of Waterloo South, by decease;

Of Samuel William Jacobs, Esquire, member for the electoral district of Cartier, by decease;

Of David Wilson Beaubier, Esquire, member for the electoral district of Brandon, by decease.

I accordingly issued my several warrants to the chief electoral officer to make out new writs of election for the said electoral districts, respectively.

NEW MEMBERS

Mr. SPEAKER: I have the honour to inform the house that the clerk of the house has received from the chief electoral officer certificates of the election and return of the following members, viz:

Of Peter Bercovitch, Esquire, for the electoral district of Cartier;

Of Karl K. Homuth, Esquire, for the electoral district of Waterloo South;

Of the Hon. Robert James Manion, for the electoral district of London;

Of James Ewen Matthews, Esquire, for the electoral district of Brandon.

NEW MEMBERS INTRODUCED

Hon. Robert James Manion, member for the electoral district of London, introduced by Mr. Robert Smeaton White and Hon. Earl Lawson.

Peter Bercovitch, Esquire, member for the electoral district of Cartier, introduced by Right Hon. W. L. Mackenzie King and Hon. Fernand Rinfret.

James Ewen Matthews, Esquire, member for the electoral district of Brandon, introduced by Right Hon. W. L. Mackenzie King and Hon. T. A. Crerar.

Karl K. Homuth, Esquire, member for the electoral district of Waterloo South, introduced by Hon. R. J. Manion and Hon. H. A. Stewart.

HON. R. J. MANION

CONGRATULATIONS UPON HIS ELECTION AS LEADER OF THE NATIONAL CONSERVATIVE PARTY AND OF HIS MAJESTY'S LOYAL OPPOSITION

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, with your permission and the permission of hon. members of the house, I should like to extend to my hon. friend immediately opposite (Mr. Manion), not only personally but on behalf of all hon. members, very warm congratulations upon assuming, as he does to-day, the office of leader of His Majesty's Loyal Opposition in this House of Commons. I should like to renew as well the congratulations I previously extended to him on his having been chosen on July the seventh of last year as the leader of the National Conservative Party of Canada, and upon the confidence thereby expressed in him on the part of members of his party.

My hon. friend will not expect me to say anything at the present time with respect to his leadership either of the opposition or of the Conservative party. No doubt I shall have occasion to refer to both from time to time as we go along. I should like, however, to say to him at once how pleased I am, and I am sure I can say the same on behalf of all hon. members who were associated with my hon. friend in previous parliaments, to see him again in the House of Commons.

My hon. friend brings to the two positions which he now holds personal attainments and professional achievements of a high order, a wide and quite exceptional parliamentary experience, and, also, in other ways, a long and intimate association with the public life of our country. I am sure I may say to him that in the discharge of his responsible duties as leader of the opposition he will have the understanding and the goodwill of members of all parties in this house. Personally may I extend to him in the position he now holds my very best wishes.

Hon. R. J. MANION (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I should like to express to my right hon. friend (Mr. Mackenzie King) my very sincere and deep appreciation of the kindly and courteous manner in which he has welcomed me to the house. May I extend as well to the whole house my deep appreciation of the generous reception which they have given me on my reentrance, after an absence of three or four years.

I realize, of course, that the acclaim which I am given is not personal, but is a recognition of the position which I have the honour to hold of leader of one of the great parties of Canada. It is a recognition also of the constituency of London, which at the moment I have the honour to represent, some of my friends in which constituency were good enough to send this gorgeous bouquet of roses which stands here to-day before me.

In expressing my appreciation of the remarks of the right hon. gentleman I desire at the same time to commend his invariable courtesy in all the amenities of parliamentary life. I have been associated with him—perhaps I should say associated against him—for very many years. He and I have crossed swords probably more often than any other two members in this house; but in spite of all that, if he will permit me to say so, we have ever remained good friends. I did say before the Canadian Club on one occasion that this fact probably speaks more to his credit than it does to mine, because I am rather a more rough and tumble fighter and he has therefore more to forgive.

I assure you, Mr. Speaker, that I am also deeply conscious of the responsibilities and the heavy duties of the position which I am attempting to fill, and I do hope that in the discharge of those duties in this house I shall always live up to the traditions of fair play which are accepted and adhered to by those who, opposing each other in public affairs, believe in the better elements of public life.

One of the things of which I feel rather proud is the fact that after so many years in this house, nearly twenty, and many bitter fights, I believe—in fact, at the moment I am sure—that I can count more friends on the other side of the house than I do on this side. Of course, it will not be the same after the next election.

I hope that in serving in this house as leader of His Majesty's Loyal Opposition I may fill the office in such a manner as never to cause hard feelings. It is also my hope that while serving Canada through my party in this house I may always assist in the facilitation of public business. And—if I may express one last hope—I trust that I shall fill my position so well that the right hon. gentleman will shortly be willing to change places with me.

OATHS OF OFFICE

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister) moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 1, respecting the administration of oaths of office.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

GOVERNOR GENERAL'S SPEECH

Mr. SPEAKER: I have the honour to inform the house that when the house did attend His Excellency the Governor General this day in the Senate chamber, His Excellency was pleased to make a speech to both houses of parliament. To prevent mistakes, I have obtained a copy, which is as follows:

Honourable Members of the Senate:

Members of the House of Commons:

The announcement that Their Majesties King George VI and Queen Elizabeth have graciously decided to visit Canada in the months of May and June has been received with rejoicing throughout the dominion. The honour of welcoming their king and queen, in person, on their own soil, is a privilege which will be shared with enthusiasm and pride by all His Majesty's Canadian subjects. The visit will be the first paid by the reigning sovereign to any of his self-governing dominions. It will be the first time a British king and queen have been in North America. It is deeply gratifying that their majesties' tour will embrace all the provinces of Canada.

The official visit paid Canada in August last by the President of the United States was the occasion of unusually warm demonstrations of friendship and understanding upon both sides of our common border. It is particularly pleasing to the citizens of our country that the king and queen have found it possible to accept the invitation of the president to visit the United States before the conclusion of their Canadian tour.

My ministers have found it necessary to give anxious and continuous consideration to developments in the international situation and their effects upon Canada. Our own relations with other countries continue friendly, but the aggressive policies actively pursued in other continents have inevitably had a disturbing effect upon every part of the world.

The government shared in the general sense of relief that the appalling disaster of war, which threatened Europe during the month of September last, was averted, and in the recognition which that crisis manifested of the widespread will of the peoples for peace. They are hopeful that the efforts now being made to find a solution for the specific differences which are causing friction will meet with success. They recognize, nevertheless, that time is required for these forces to work, and that the possibility of further tension in the meantime must be faced. In this situation, the government have considered that the uncertainties of the future, and the conditions of modern warfare, make it imperative that Canada's defences be materially strengthened.

Two years ago, the appropriations for defence were substantially increased, and a beginning made on a program of modernization to safeguard the country from the dangers of attack. The government intend to pursue this policy vigorously, and to propose to parliament that the program of defence should be further augmented, and that particular emphasis should be laid upon air defence.

Legislation will be introduced to establish a defence purchasing board with power to purchase equipment for the defence services and to ensure that, where private manufacture is necessary, profits in connection with such are fair and reasonable, and that the public interest is protected.

While taking the measures necessary to assure the maintenance of our national integrity against the possibility of external aggression, the government have sought in positive ways to strengthen the mutual interests which unite Canada in friendly relations with other countries.

You will be asked to approve the trade agreement with the United States of America, signed at Washington on November 17, 1938. This agreement fulfils the hope expressed in the speech from the throne, last year, for an agreement with the United States, which would confirm and enlarge the advantages of the agreement concluded in 1935.

Simultaneously with the conclusion of the new agreement between Canada and the United States, a far-reaching agreement was effected between the United States and the United Kingdom. Taken together, the agreements constitute a constructive contribution toward a betterment of world conditions. It is deeply gratifying to the government that in their efforts to increase, and to ensure over a longer period of time, the advantages to Canadian producers and consumers secured in earlier agreements, they were able, at the same time, to further the ends of international goodwill.

The Canada-United States agreements have involved, in addition to the wider markets secured for Canadian products, a thoroughgoing revision of the Canadian tariff structure, and a reduction of taxes on trade much greater than that made by any previous parliament, or by any other country in recent years.

Notice has been given, effective December 31, 1939, terminating the Canada-West Indies agreement concluded in 1925. My ministers hope that negotiations will shortly be entered upon leading to a new agreement which will be mutually beneficial to the West Indian colonies and to Canada. In connection therewith the tariff board has been directed to make a careful examination of the sugar preferences and duties.

Unemployment in Canada continues to receive the unremitting attention of local, provincial and federal authorities. Having regard to the existing division of powers and obligations under the British North America Act, responsibility for unemployment and the solution of its problems is necessarily divided. There has been an increasing assumption of obligations on the part of the federal government.

Employment in war industry and the regimentation of masses of men for purposes of war have, to appearances, afforded in some countries a solution of their problem of unemployment. In Canada other methods of dealing with the problem have been followed.

The dominion government have taken active measures to stimulate private employment through the home improvement plan, the National Housing Act, and the Municipal Improvements Assistance Act. Under these measures certain local taxes have been assumed, and loans made to individuals, organizations and municipalities. The sales tax has been eliminated on important building materials. Special aid has been given to the mining industry by subventions, tax exemptions and improved transportation facilities. At the same time, direct employment has been increased through a substantial expansion of federal public works, and through assistance given to the provinces in the construction of highways, for land settlement, for special projects for farm employment and for forest conservation.

Provision has been also made by the dominion government for grants-in-aid to the provinces to assist in the care of those suffering from unemployment and agricultural distress.

The various measures adopted to stimulate employment and afford relief to those in need have operated most successfully in those provinces which have supported them with full cooperation.

In Canada, the problem of unemployment has been aggravated in recent years by recurrent crop failures in the western provinces, and by the serious business recession experienced in the last year in other parts of the world. The intensification of the problem has set forth in bold relief the obstacles which the existing division of constitutional authority places in the way of a solution.

The report of the commission on dominion-provincial relations will be presented to parliament in the course of the present session. In accordance with the purpose for which the commission was instituted, its report will provide the basis for, and the material essential to the deliberations of a national conference, at which, among the important subjects to be dealt with, will be the problem of unemployment and social services generally. The government have not altered their view that a national unemployment insurance scheme is essential to a permanent policy of meeting the problem of unemployment.

My ministers recognize that the plight of those who are still unemployed cannot await necessary constitutional amendments, nor the summoning of any conference. They are prepared therefore, notwithstanding constitutional impediments to effective action, to join with the provinces in a further determined effort to meet the immediate situation.

To this end it is proposed further to expand the government's long range program of public undertakings. In pursuance of the policy of the active encouragement of employment, it is also proposed to undertake, with provincial co-operation, to provide assistance to municipalities which, as an alternative to the provision of direct relief, desire to expand their normal programs of civic improvements.

As a means of providing an opportunity for useful work and national service to single unemployed men, the assistance given to forest conservation will be extended to include other work of national importance.

The beneficial results of the youth training program, have demonstrated the wisdom of this experiment, and a measure will be introduced to increase its efficiency and expand its usefulness.

Notwithstanding the embarrassments and handicaps encountered in coping with the problem of unemployment, it is gratifying to be able to record that, during the past year, there has been a material reduction in the number of those receiving agricultural aid, and a reduction also in the total number of those receiving public assistance due to unemployment and agricultural distress. At the beginning of the present winter the number of those receiving such public assistance was almost forty per cent less than two years ago. Over the same period the number of persons actually in employment has largely increased.

Continuous improvement in the position of the fishing industry as a whole has been reflected in annual increases for the past few years in the aggregate amounts received by the fishermen from their work. The Department of Fisheries have given, and will continue to give, increased attention to the problem of marketing. The government have also assisted fishermen substantially through direct aid.

In order to avert economic disaster to a large part of our population, my ministers, under the terms of the Wheat Board Act, approved, for the current crop year, an initial payment for wheat as recommended by the board.

The prairie farm rehabilitation plan will be continued, the experience of the past year having demonstrated its efficacy in improving the agricultural areas of the west.

Bills will be introduced to regulate grain exchanges along the lines laid down in the report of the royal commission on grain marketing, to revise the Canada Grain Act, and to assist further in the marketing of farm products.

The Trans-Canada Airways will shortly provide a passenger service, in addition to the air mail and air express services already in operation. Preparations for the inauguration of the transatlantic air service are being actively continued in collaboration with the governments of the United Kingdom and of Ireland.

In order to implement the recommendations of the royal commission to investigate the penal system of Canada, a bill to appoint a commission to administer the penitentiaries will be again introduced.

Other legislative proposals will be laid before you and proceeded with as time and opportunity offer.

Members of the House of Commons:

The estimates for the public service, together with the public accounts, will be laid before you.

Honourable Members of the Senate:
Members of the House of Commons:

In this critical time of the world's affairs, I pray that Divine Providence may guide and bless your deliberations.

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister) moved:

That the speech of His Excellency the Governor General to both houses of parliament be taken into consideration on Monday next, and that this order have precedence over all other business, except the introduction of bills, until disposed of.

Motion agreed to.

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister) moved:

Motion agreed to.

Euler, Minister of Trade and Commerce, to act with the Speaker of the House of Commons as commissioners for the purposes and under the provisions of chapter 145 of the revised statutes of Canada, 1927, intituled An Act Respecting the House of Commons.

TRIBUTES TO DECEASED MEMBERS

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, from time to time at the beginning of a session it has been my sad task to have occasion to make reference to some of our number who have been taken from us in the interval between prorogation and the reassembling of parliament. No previous parliament in the history of Canada has suffered a loss in its membership comparable to that which has already taken place in the present parliament. No fewer than seventeen members of this house have passed away since we assembled here in February, 1936. Of that number eight were taken away last year. Two of the number were with us throughout the three sessions but have since passed away. The two to whom I refer are the late Samuel W. Jacobs, K.C., who represented the constituency of Cartier for twenty-one years, and the late Lieutenant Colonel David W. Beaubier, who represented during the past eight years the constituency of Brandon. Mr. Jacobs was in his sixty-seventh year, and Mr. Beaubier in his seventy-fourth.

The passing of Sam Jacobs, as he was familiarly and affectionately called, has been to those of us who sit on this side of the house a very great, indeed an irreparable loss. Having regard to the place he occupied in parliament over so long a period and particularly to the high esteem and great respect in which, throughout that entire time, he was held by members of all parties, I think I may truly say that his passing constitutes one of the most serious losses which in many years this House of Commons has sustained. By early training, by wide experience in the profession of law, by character, temperament, and abilities, and above all perhaps by his knowledge of and outlook upon world affairs, Mr. Jacobs was admirably equipped for a foremost place in public life.

Mr. Jacobs had a brilliant career as a young man, receiving important degrees at an early age from both McGill and Laval universities. He was admitted to the bar at the age of twenty-three and was created a king's counsel in 1906. As hon. members know, he reached a place of high distinction in his profession, was entrusted with many important briefs, and acted as counsel in some of the most important cases in his province. He was honoured by his own profession in being selected as treasurer of the Law Society of Montreal and also as representative for the province of Quebec on the council of the Canadian Bar Association.

But it is with respect particularly to our own associations with him as a member of parliament that we are thinking of him to-day. To my mind, Mr. Jacobs might well have been termed an ideal House of Commons man. He loved its associations, and all of its members greatly respected and, many of us, deeply loved him. He had exceptional gifts to qualify him for a place of first importance in this house. His was an exceptionally attractive personality; he had a positive genius for friendship. Though he spoke but rarely he was one of the best speakers we had in Canada. His broad human interests and his fund of knowledge made him a delightful conversationalist.

He had a very ready wit. All of us I think recall his native gift of repartee. There are many anecdotes which relate to the corridors of these buildings which will long retain a close association with his name. As a member of parliament he not only took a continuous interest in the affairs of the house but was one of the most active and useful members on its committees, and in the party caucuses took his part in a ready and able way. Indeed he entered into all sides of the life of the commons and of parliament generally. He was constructive, tolerant, broad-minded, liberal in every true sense of the word.

It was little short of tragic that the closing years of Mr. Jacobs' life should have been really saddened by the unfortunate lot which in some parts of the world has overtaken many of those who belong to his race. We think of him, as indeed he was, as one of the outstanding leaders of the Jewish people in this country; one who was proud of his race, and of its faith, always prepared to fight for its rights, and to uphold its traditions with tenacity and dignity. That he should have seen, before the end came, what he saw so clearly approaching, namely the increased persecution of those who belong to the Jewish race, and what perhaps troubled him even more, the growth in our own country in some quarters of prejudices against members of his race, was, I think, one of the most unfortunate and cruel things that could possibly have occurred in relation to his life and work. The last conversation I had with him was in company with some other hon. members of this house, in my office adjoining this chamber, when he came with them to plead on behalf of members of the Jewish community. He earnestly expressed the hope that the government and parliament of this country would maintain an attitude of toleration and moderation in viewing all questions of racial difference and the difficulties to which they might give rise.

I think we do well to remember that Mr. Jacobs never failed to bring into the debates of this house a note of moderation. He was never extreme, he was always ready to see the different and often many sides of a question. He only asked of others that they view difficult situations in a large way. He sounded too that other note which is very greatly needed in these times, and of late increasingly needed, I think, in our own country, the note of toleration. He held to the belief in human personality as the most sacred of all things in life. I think we can best honour the memory of our friend by seeking in whatever we say or do here to keep constantly before us these notes of moderation and of toleration.

I ought perhaps to add that Mr. Jacobs was the first to see that such questions as those of the rights of minorities are often among the most difficult questions with which any government or any parliament may be faced. He was not one who demanded extreme action; but I know what he did hope for above all else was that his fellow members in the house would do all they could, both here and throughout the country, by way of educating the public mind to a generous, kindly and liberal attitude of men towards their fellow-men, to whatever race or class or faith they might belong.

I cannot begin to say what the death of Mr. Jacobs means to me personally. When I reentered this House of Commons in the capacity, with which I had been honoured, of leader of my party, he had been here two years; we had known each other for some years before; from that time on, through the nineteen years that succeeded, we were close friends and associates, and he was always helpful in the matter of his counsel, always ready to give it in a generous and kindly way. No political leader could have had a more loyal supporter or more helpful colleague than myself and all the members of this administration had in our friend Sam Jacobs. His memory will be dear, I know, to all in this house who were privileged to be associated with him. I look upon Mr. Jacobs' passing as a loss not merely to this House of Commons and to our country, but, as an international loss coming at this critical time in the world's affairs, when he perhaps more than any other man of his race in Canada was capable of interpreting to his fellow-men all sides of some of our most difficult problems.

Hon. members opposite have also suffered a serious loss in the passing of Mr. Beaubier. Like Mr. Jacobs, Mr. Beaubier was greatly respected in this house. He had a long, an interesting and useful career. As a young man he had the courage and the vision to go to the west in its pioneering days. He settled at Brandon and his life in large part was identified with the growth of that city. He shared its commercial and social life. At the time of the great war he organized the 181st battalion, took it overseas, and was made a lieutenant-colonel in England. Two of his sons were lieutenants in another battalion and a third son served in the Royal Air Force.

Mr. Beaubier contested the contituency of Brandon four times. On the first two occasions he was not successful, and I think it was a great tribute to him that, having been defeated in two elections, his party should have thought him the strongest candidate to contest the constituency for the third time and that he should have been returned when he so contested the riding. That was in 1930, when the fortunes of hon. gentlemen opposite were better than they are to-day. But what was perhaps the highest tribute of all was that in the last general election, that of 1935, when the Conservative party suffered very heavily in western Canada, Colonel Beaubier was the one member of his party to be returned from the province of Manitoba and one of three members of his party to be returned from the three western provinces.

I do express to my hon. friend the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Manion) the very sincere sympathy of all of us on this side of the house in the loss, particularly at this time, of one who, had he been spared, would have been to him a most helpful and valuable colleague.

May I ask you, Mr. Speaker, on behalf of all hon. members of the house, to convey to Mrs. Jacobs and to Mrs. Beaubier the deep sympathy of this House of Commons for each of them, and for the members of their respective families in the bereavements which they have sustained?

Hon. R. J. MANION (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I should like to join my words to those of the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) in expressing to the families of the two members who have left us the deep sympathy of this house. In that I am speaking particularly for the party to which I belong.

With the Prime Minister I realize full well the very heavy toll which has been taken of this parliament. We on this side particularly feel that we have been rather heavily afflicted in that regard, considering the small numbers of the party which came back from the election of 1935.

David Wilson Beaubier was a very close personal friend of mine. I think I had the opportunity and pleasure of participating on his behalf in every one of his elections, beginning in 1925. As the Prime Minister indicated, he was born in the east. That was in 1864, so that he was blessed with being allotted more than the biblical span of three score years and ten. When he went to the west he was not quite twenty years of age, and he became acquainted with pioneer conditions in that growing country. He knew something of the life out there which many of the present members of this house experienced, as I did, in those early eighties. He lived on the pioneer fringe and no doubt experienced some of its hardships—the very hardships that reinforce courage and contribute so greatly to the building up of character in a man.

Dave Beaubier, as everyone who knew him called him affectionately, was highly respected by all who had the privilege and pleasure of his acquaintance, not only in this house but in that section of the country wherein he spent the greater part of his life. The very fact that he was always called Dave, both in the House of Commons and in his own neighbourhood, is an evidence of the respectful familiarity with which he was regarded by all who came in contact with him. Indeed, as I heard the Prime Minister this afternoon refer to him, and quite properly, as Colonel Beaubier, it struck me as being the first time that I had ever heard anyone so describe him. I mention this fact merely to illustrate, and to bring out more clearly, the friendly feeling which everyone had for him throughout the time that I had known him, going back to 1925. His high standing in his own community was demonstrated in the recent by-election, by the fact that his son, who was a young man without much experience and who had been carrying on business in a different part of the country and therefore was not so well known in Brandon as was his father, carried on such an admirable campaign against a very well known, an old and respected citizen in that community, who succeeded in winning the seat for my right hon. friend opposite.

Without in any way detracting from the merits of the younger man, I think I am safe in suggesting that the respect with which he was treated, as was shown by the support he received in the election, was due in large measure to the love which the people of Brandon and vicinity felt for Dave Beaubier the father.

Dave Beaubier had a genius for friendship, and a love of all classes and creeds, which bespeak that broad-minded type of charity, religion and friendship which enriches life. He came into the House of Commons in 1930 and, as the Prime Minister has observed, he was reelected in 1935. The latter election, at any rate, proved his high standing in that western country; for when a wave against the party to which I belong swept the country in the election of 1935, Dave Beaubier was the only man who came back from Manitoba to represent that party. This was a further proof of the respect with which he was regarded in his constituency.

It is true that in the House of Commons he did not speak very often; nevertheless he was of great value to us not only on committees but as a counsellor. His common sense and the humanitarian spirit in which he looked at every question made him an invaluable colleague to all of us on this side of the house.

The Prime Minister has mentioned his service in the war. In 1916, when he was well into his fifties, he organized the 181st battalion and took it overseas as lieutenant-colonel. Three of his sons joined up, one of them actually throwing down his books at McGill university, where he was a student, and joining the forces.

I should like to join with the Prime Minister in asking you, Mr. Speaker, to pass on to the late Mr. Beaubier's family the deep sympathy of all members of the House of Commons and particularly of the party for which I have the honour to speak. Dave Beaubier was an exemplary husband and father and a very fine citizen. I should like to thank the Prime Minister for the kind words he has used with reference to this member of our party who has gone to what I am quite sure is a just and happy reward.

The late Mr. Samuel Jacobs, who was taken from the other side of the house since the closing of the last session, was born in Ontario, as was Mr. Beaubier. Mr. Jacobs and I came into the house in the same year, 1917, and we became fast friends. In the twenty sessions during which he and I sat as members of the house we remained the best of friends. Sam Jacobs, as we all called him, came of a race that has given to the world leaders in all walks of life. After all, it was his race that gave to the Christian people the greatest religious teacher that the world has ever known. But since that time, in all the centuries that have gone, the same race has produced leaders in the arts and sciences, in the professions and in business. I have sometimes wondered whether the persecution of the race to which Mr. Jacobs belonged, reference to which has been made by the Prime Minister, has not been due in part to the fact that eminent members of that race have led the world so brilliantly in so many different walks of life.

Sam Jacobs was endowed with all the gifts with which the members of his race have been favoured, gifts that made him a successful lawyer and author; and in addition to that common heritage of his he was gifted, as those of us who sat with him for so many years know, particularly with a vein of wit and humour. I emphasize the humour rather than the wit of Mr. Jacobs, because his habit of mischievous interruption, his clever interjections and his witty observations were rarely of the barbed sort that hurt the feelings of others. They were always kindly and generous, characteristic of humour rather than of wit. The last time I saw him was a few months before he died. Quite by accident, we had had lunch together in the Rideau club and afterwards sat for the better part of an hour in the lobby, discussing the famous witticisms and humorous incidents that had occurred in this house during the eighteen years that he and I had been fellow members.

I always found Mr. Jacobs not only a warm-hearted friend but a fair opponent, a witty and interesting companion. Moreover, as the Prime Minister has remarked, he was possessed of great breadth of mind, which is so valuable in any citizen. It has often occurred to me that, in Canada at any rate, the gift of wit and humour such as Mr. Jacobs possessed has unjustly prevented many a man from attaining in parliament the heights which his merits deserved. In other words, it seems to me that in this country we have been prone to regard the witty and humorous man, the man possessing this gift to any marked degree, as somehow not quite so forceful as others who, seemingly more solid, may not be quite so well equipped mentally. I suggest, in support of that observation, the names of the two greatest public men on this continent. Well, I had better modify that statement, because I do not wish to make comparisons; I will say, therefore, two of the greatest public men on the continent. I refer, so far as Canada is concerned, to Sir John A. Macdonald,—and I might add the name of Sir Wilfrid Laurier, though he was not quite the humorist that Sir John Macdonald was—and, as regards the United States, to Abraham Lincoln. I doubt whether in the annals of the public life of any country in the world, certainly any of which I have knowledge, any other two men possessed the quality of humour so markedly as did Sir John A. Macdonald in the Canadian parliament and Abraham Lincoln in the United States republic. Yet to my mind they were, if not the greatest, certainly among the greatest men produced on this continent. Sam Jacobs was another man with a very fine wit, who showed that a man can exemplify splendidly the humorous side of life and still be outstandingly clever. I am told that he was a great lawyer—I cannot judge that very well myself—and an excellent writer on legal matters.

I join with the Prime Minister in expressing, on behalf of this party, the deep sympathy we feel with the family and friends of Mr. Jacobs, and also our sincere sympathy with the right hon. gentleman and his party in the loss of such a capable member.

Mr. J. S. WOODSWORTH (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, we in our group desire to associate ourselves with the tribute of respect which has been paid to those of our number who have departed. For many years in my childhood I lived in the town of Brandon, and in those days the elder Mr. Beaubier and his son were well-known and respected citizens. In the last year or two, during the illness of Mr. Beaubier, when almost daily I passed his door, usually open, I came to know him and his wife more intimately. One could not but feel that it was his qualities of honesty and kindliness which led to his being so well and favourably known both here and in western Canada.

As one of the senior members of the house—I think I must now regard myself as such—I have known Mr. Jacobs for a good many years. In the earlier days I think of him in association with Mr. A. R. McMaster. We always regarded him as genial. Perhaps enough has been said with regard to his wit and humour. I wonder whether it would be altogether out of keeping if I expressed a wish that he could have been present to-day to hear what is being said about him. I think he would have smiled. His kindliness endeared him to us all. Reference has been made to the fact that he belonged to the Jewish race. I am glad that has been recorded to-day, because he was very proud of the contribution which that race has made to the history of civilization, even though at the same time he could laugh at some of the foibles of his people. In his early days he was brimful of fun, but as the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) has mentioned, in recent years I think he was somewhat saddened by certain movements. In view of the anti-Semitism which has developed in some countries I am rather glad that Mr. Jacobs belonged to that Jewish race; for he exhibited qualities of which any race might be proud. I hope his memory and example may long remain with us in these days when there is special need for tolerance.

We would ask that the sympathy of this group be conveyed to the friends and relatives of our fellow members who have left us.

Mr. J. H. BLACKMORE (Lethbridge): Mr. Speaker, our group desires also to be associated with the others in honouring the memory of these two men and expressing sympathy with those they have left behind in sorrow. I have myself been deeply impressed with the personality of both these men. I had more opportunity to know Mr. Beaubier than Mr. Jacobs, but what I did know of Mr. Jacobs enables me to appreciate what has been said regarding him. For Mr. Beaubier I had great respect. He exhibited the finest ideals of Canadian citizenship; he made great sacrifices in the cause of Canada and the British Empire, and he made these sacrifices uncomplainingly. I feel safe in saying that he was a great and good man, though a quiet one. Both these men died full of years and, I am sure we can say, as full of honour as of years.

Hon. W. D. EULER (Minister of Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, although the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) and others have paid eloquent tribute to the memory of a man who was, I believe, the friend of all of us, I should like to be permitted to add just a few words of appreciation, because of the fact that I was associated with him for some twenty years not only in parliamentary contacts but in the bonds of a sincere and deep personal friendship.

Sam Jacobs—I can think of him by no other designation; that was the name by which he was affectionately known, I think, to every hon. member of this house and to many thousands outside—was, as has been stated, elected to parliament in 1917. Of the 235 members elected at that time there are now in this parliament only about eight. Being one of those, I probably had better opportunities of becoming acquainted with Sam Jacobs and getting to know his character and disposition and qualities than were afforded to most hon. gentlemen in this house to-day. During those years I was growingly impressed with his many attractive qualities, of which I would mention as outstanding his great kindness of heart. I would join with those who have made reference to the troubles of his race in recent times; I think it is quite probable that these so weighed upon his mind and heart as to contribute to his decease. Further, I could speak of his generosity—I have experienced it more than once—not only in material things but in his judgments of those with whom he was associated; also his tolerance; his free and open mind towards those who differed with him; his loyalty to his party, which was constant, and his loyalty to his friends, which was just as great. And his friends were legion. To know Sam Jacobs was to like him. To call him friend was a privilege. His ability, both as a lawyer and as a parliamentarian, was well known. His devotion to duty was always constant and always notable. A good deal has been said, and I think very properly, as to the flashing, spontaneous wit which he sometimes showed in this house in his earlier days, which in my opinion helped to lighten the amenities of debate and made him such a delightful companion at all times.

In a country of diverse races, such as we have in Canada—and perhaps I may speak with some feeling in that regard—races which we hope are gradually merging into a characteristic or typical Canadian people, Mr. Jacobs will be always remembered as an outstanding example of Canadian citizenship. If I may, Mr. Speaker, I should like to express my own sense of personal loss in his passing, and to join with all other hon. members of the house in conveying to the members of his family our sympathy in the bereavement that has come to them.

Mr. PETER BERCOVITCH (Cartier): Mr. Speaker, I feel that I would be recreant to the mandate which was given me unanimously and so graciously by the electors of Cartier division did I not say a word or two on this occasion with regard to my late lamented and well beloved predecessor.

I knew Mr. Jacobs for the greater part of my life; I knew him as a humanitarian, as an able lawyer and as a fine parliamentarian. As a humanitarian, Mr. Jacobs had a passion for social service. He was always anxious to help the under dog; he was always keen to assist the underprivileged, and he always tried to seek out someone whom he could help and to whom he could so some good. I know quite a number of young men in Montreal who owe their education and professional training to the generosity of my late predecessor. I know many families in Montreal who were helped, very unostentatiously, by Mr. Jacobs to get on their feet and earn a livelihood. Mr. Jacobs was a kind-hearted man, as has been said. He was a good man, and nothing pleased him better than to be of service to his fellow-men.

As a lawyer it was my privilege to appear in quite a number of cases opposed to Mr. Jacobs, and I can say that no member of the bar of Montreal was more jealous of the fine traditions of the bar than he. Samuel Jacobs was a fighter who would never take an unfair advantage of an opponent. He had a great respect for authority. He had great respect for the judges who presided over the courts in which he appeared. He always tried to be helpful, and made the task of the judges as easy as possible by the able way in which he prepared his cases, both as to facts and as to law.

It was outside of this house that I knew Mr. Jacobs best in his capacity as a parliamentarian. I know he built up a great reputation in this chamber, and the splendid tributes that have been paid to him to-day by the leaders of the various groups go to show how much he was thought of on all sides represented in parliament. Mr. Jacobs was perhaps the most beloved man in the Cartier division. He was literally worshipped by his electors, and any candidate who contested that seat soon found that he had met a formidable opponent. I doubt very much whether any opponent of Mr. Jacobs ever succeeded in saving his deposit. He was so well thought of by his electors that when they heard of his death I can assure you, Mr. Speaker, there was not one who did not grieve and mourn his loss.

May I thank the right hon. leader of this house (Mr. Mackenzie King) and the leader of the opposition (Mr. Manion), as well as the other hon. gentlemen who have spoken, for the kindly references they made to my race. May I thank them also for the splendid tributes they have just paid to a loyal Canadian, a devout follower of the religion of his forefathers, a man who was one of nature's gentlemen.

BREN MACHINE GUN CONTRACT

TABLING OF REPORT OF COMMISSIONER MR. JUSTICE DAVIS

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): I desire to lay on the table copies of the report of Hon. Mr. Justice Henry Hague Davis, a commissioner appointed by order in council P.C. 2251, dated September 7, 1938, to inquire into the Bren machine gun contract dated March 31, 1938, between His Majesty the King, represented by the Hon. the Minister of National Defence of Canada, and John Inglis Company Limited.

I anticipated, Mr. Speaker, that there would be a desire to have this report in printed form as soon as the house met. Therefore immediately upon its receipt I arranged with the clerk to have his requisition made upon the king's printer for the printing of the report. I also arranged for its translation, so that I am now able to lay it upon the table in printed form in both English and French, and to announce that it is available for immediate distribution.

On motion of Mr. Mackenzie King the house adjourned at 4 p.m.

Monday, January 16, 1939

The house met at three o'clock.

INTERPRETATION ACT

AMENDMENT TO MAKE ANNIVERSARY OF SIGNING OF STATUTE OF WESTMINSTER A STATUTORY HOLIDAY

Mr. WILFRID GARIEPY (Three Rivers) moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 2, to amend the Interpretation Act.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Explain.

Mr. GARIEPY: Mr. Speaker, the object of this bill is to amend the Interpretation Act so as to make the eleventh day of December in each year a statutory holiday. On December 11, 1931, what is commonly called the statute of Westminster was assented to, confirming the present status of the Dominion of Canada. It is fit and proper to celebrate this anniversary so as to impress upon the people of this country its extraordinary consequence to Canada.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

RAILWAY ACT

LANGUAGE REQUIREMENT IN QUEBEC PROVINCE RESPECTING EMPLOYEES OF RAILWAY AND TELEGRAPH COMPANIES

Mr. WILFRID LACROIX (Quebec-Montmorency) moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 3, to amend the Railway Act.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Explain.

Mr. LACROIX (Quebec-Montmorency): Mr. Speaker, the effect of this amendment would be to allow the Board of Transport Commissioners to make orders and regulations to provide that all employees of railway and telegraph companies coming within its jurisdiction shall have the requisite knowledge of the French language in the province of Quebec to enable them properly to perform their duties and to be understood by and understand the majority of the persons with whom they are required to do business.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

POST OFFICE ACT

AMENDMENT TO PROHIBIT THE SENDING THROUGH MAILS OF COMMUNISTIC LITERATURE

Mr. WILFRID LACROIX (Quebec-Montmorency) moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 4, to amend the Post Office Act.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Explain.

Mr. LACROIX (Quebec-Montmorency): The purpose of the amendment is to enlarge the powers of the Postmaster General as to the making of regulations. At present the Postmaster General may prohibit the sending of obscene or immoral publications. It is intended in this bill that he should also have the power to prohibit and prevent sending of communistic literature.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

71492—2½

CRIMINAL CODE

PROVISION AGAINST REFUSAL TO EMPLOY OR DISMISSAL FOR MEMBERSHIP IN TRADE UNIONS

Mr. J. S. WOODSWORTH (Winnipeg North Centre) moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 5, to amend the criminal code.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Explain.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: This is the same as Bill No. 4 of last year. The purpose of the bill is to prevent employers from refusing to employ, or from dismissing employees, or conspiring with others therefor, for the reason that they are members of a trade union.

As it is lawful for workmen or employees to form themselves into trade unions and to bargain collectively, it should, as a matter of public policy, be unlawful for employers to seek by overt acts or intimidation, threats or conspiracy to prevent them from belonging to such trade unions.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

MODERNIZATION OF ELEVATOR EQUIPMENT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. F. E. LENNARD (Wentworth): I should like to call the attention of the government to the antiquated elevators we have in this building. It is about time they were replaced with safer and more modern equipment.

Hon. P. J. A. CARDIN (Minister of Public Works): I shall have the hon. gentleman's observations taken into consideration, but I wish to have the benefit of his information on the subject.

LIGHTING OF COMMONS CHAMBER

Mr. NORMAN J. M. LOCKHART (Lincoln): May I again gently refer to the shadows that fall across these back seats? Last year it was pointed out to the government that there was considerable trouble in this regard. Some improvement has been effected, but I am wondering whether by changing bulbs or by some other means we can do away with these shadows.

Hon. P. J. A. CARDIN (Minister of Public Works): I make the same answer as I made to the hon. member for Wentworth (Mr. Lennard). Some changes have been made in connection with the lighting on the other side. It may be unsatisfactory from my hon. friend's point of view, but from this side I can see him very well.

BREN MACHINE GUN CONTRACT

TABLING OF EVIDENCE AND ARGUMENT HEARD BEFORE COMMISSION OF INQUIRY

On the orders of the day:

Mr. C. G. MacNEIL (Vancouver North): Will the Prime Minister indicate at the earliest possible day, not necessarily to-day, whether the house will be placed in possession of copies of the evidence and the argument heard before the commissioner during the inquiry into the Bren machine gun contract?

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): I may answer my hon. friend at once. I shall be very glad to lay on the table of the house the evidence and the argument in connection with the Bren gun inquiry. They are in the possession of the government and I shall have them tabled to-morrow.

RADIO BROADCASTING

REFUSAL OF BROADCASTING PRIVILEGES TO PUBLISHER OF TORONTO GLOBE AND MAIL—STATEMENT OF CANADIAN BROADCASTING CORPORATION

On the orders of the day:

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): Before the special order is called I should like to make a statement to the house. Hon. members have doubtless seen reports in the press to the effect that the government had refused the privilege of broadcasting to the publisher of one of Canada's leading newspapers. I simply wish to say that the government has had nothing whatever to do with refusing any application that has been made to the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation. Neither the government nor any member of the government had any knowledge that an application had been made to the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation by the publisher of one of Toronto's leading newspapers, nor had any member of the government any knowledge that such an application had been refused.

As hon. members know, the business of controlling and regulating radio broadcasting has been placed by this parliament under the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation, which is an autonomous public body and with which the government does not interfere and has no desire to interfere. The general manager of the corporation has issued to the press a statement which gives a full explanation of the application itself and the grounds on which it was refused. I have in my hand a copy of the statement and if hon. members will take it as read I shall place it on the table that it may be printed in Hansard with the remarks I have made. The statement is one which, I think, will be of interest to hon. members.

CBC Statement given to the Press by Mr. Gladstone Murray, General Manager of the CBC, January 15th, 1939.

Mr. George McCullagh applied to the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation to buy time for a series of broadcast talks on the national network of the Corporation in order to give his views on public questions. The application was refused in accordance with the policy of the Corporation in dealing with controversial broadcasts. This policy is based on the principle of encouraging the free discussion of all subjects of public interest in round-table discussions, debates, talks, and forums, for which the Corporation provides time without charge. No individual may purchase any network to broadcast his own opinions and no profit-making corporation may purchase any network to broadcast opinions. Far from being a restraint on free speech, the Corporation's policy is an assurance that liberty of discussion is preserved, that all main points of view are fairly presented, and that the possession of wealth does not confer the right to use network broadcasting to influence opinion.

Having failed to secure time on the national network Mr. McCullagh attempted to buy time over a network of privately-owned stations. As all network broadcasting in Canada is under the control of the Corporation, under the specific authority of the Canadian Broadcasting Act of 1936, the permission of the Corporation would have been required to give effect to the new plan. As the same general principle in controversial broadcasts applies to all networks in Canada, the second application was also refused.

Mr. McCullagh had already been invited to participate in the Corporation's Sunday evening National Forum at no cost to him. Mr. McCullagh declined the invitation, which, however, remains open.

The Corporation's decision and the reasons for it were communicated to Mr. McCullagh in a letter, dated January 5th, which is now released for publication.

The decision was taken by the Corporation on its own responsibility in accordance with the policy laid down by the Board of Governors.

It is pointed out that the Corporation's policy regarding this class of network broadcasting is similar to that of the National Broadcasting Company of the United States.

On the same date Mr. Gladstone Murray released the following letter to Mr. McCullagh:

Ottawa, Ontario
January 5th, 1939.

Dear Mr. McCullagh:

Thank you for your letter of the 4th instant. I shall be glad to set out fully the reasons why the corporation was obliged to reject your application to purchase network time for the purpose of placing your views on public questions before the listeners of Canada.

In order that the answer may be complete, it is necessary to indicate the origin and evolution of the policy upon which it is based.

As you know, the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation was established by act of parliament as a non-partisan public trust to control all broadcasting in Canada in the public interest. In accordance with this purpose the corporation was endowed with exclusive control of all network broadcasting and with a general responsibility for the character and content of all programs.

The relevant provisions of The Canadian Broadcasting Act, 1936, respecting the control and direction of network broadcasting are paragraphs 21 and 22, as follows:

"21. No private station shall operate in Canada as a part of a chain or network of stations except with the permission of, and in accordance with the regulations made by the corporation.

"22. (1) The corporation may make regulations:

(a) to control the establishment and operation of chains or networks of stations in Canada."

The relevant provisions of the act relating to the corporation's control of all matter broadcast in Canada is section 22 (1) (c), (d), and (e) as follows:

"22 (1) The corporation may make regulations:

(c) to control the character of any and all programs broadcast by corporation or private stations;

(d) to determine the proportion of time which may be devoted to advertising in any programs broadcast by the stations of the corporation or by private stations, and to control the character of such advertising;

(e) to prescribe the proportion of time which may be devoted to political broadcasts by the stations of the corporation and by private stations, and to assign such time on any equitable basis to all parties and rival candidates."

I have deliberately set out the above provisions in order to indicate the intentions of parliament. That the authority vested in the corporation has been exercised as intended is perhaps best illustrated by the following quotation from the report of the parliamentary committee on broadcasting of 1938:

"The bulk of the evidence concerned the program, technical and financial policies of the corporation. Your committee is of the opinion that these policies are well designed to carry out the purpose for which the corporation was created. Your committee is also of the opinion that the policies of the corporation are being executed in a business-like fashion."

Now, a brief outline of CBC policy respecting the discussion of public problems and issues and the position generally in the related fields of party political, and non-party controversial broadcasting.

On the first point, the Broadcasting Act, as you know, requires the corporation to prescribe regulations for all broadcasting, both on privately owned and CBC stations. No censorship is imposed, restrictions being confined to those specifically set out in the regulations. The policy of the corporation is to encourage the fair presentation of controversial questions which indeed is regarded as part of the educational function. To this end there are organized round tables, talks, discussions, debates, commentaries and forums, distributed through CBC stations and networks. Moreover, facilities have been provided on a sustaining basis for organizations such as the Canadian Association of Adult Education and the Workers' Educational Association. Individual privately owned stations are encouraged to discharge similar public service on a local basis.

With regard to party political broadcasting during elections, new arrangements under consideration will aim to have issues and policies placed more adequately before the whole electorate. Individual privately owned and CBC stations will remain commercially obtainable to rival parties and candidates, subject to the relevant provisions of The Canadian Broadcasting Act and the regulations issued thereunder.

With respect to party political broadcasting between elections, any legal political party may purchase time either on networks or individual stations. Non-party statements of political leaders of sufficient general interest are carried by the corporation on a sustaining basis.

Rulings recently approved by the board of governors regarding the sponsorship of non-party controversial broadcasts are as follows:

"(1) No individual may purchase any network to broadcast his own opinions;

(2) No profit-making corporation may purchase any network to broadcast opinions;

(3) Properly constituted societies may purchase network time subject to the following condition: (a) that the society accepts responsibility for the broadcast, indemnifying the CBC against the possible consequences of libel or slander; (b) that each broadcast is prefaced and concluded by an appropriate announcement making clear the nature and auspices of the broadcast and indicating that equivalent facilities are available to opposing views on the same basis; (c) that there is no interference with normal CBC program arrangements; (d) that the broadcast is of sufficient popular appeal and interest to justify its inclusion; (e) that the broadcast is within the wording and spirit of our regulations and not in violation of any law."

These rulings, which apply also to individual CBC stations, but not to individual privately owned stations, were the subject of the most careful consideration. The admission of the right of an individual to buy network time to propound views would entail, for example, the approval of (a) the representative of a profit-making corporation influencing public policy in favour of his corporation; (b) a profit-making corporation using opinions as a direct or indirect sales medium; and (c) an individual sponsoring his own opinions by virtue of the advantage of wealth.

Nothing in the above is of course intended to suggest that the ordinary commercial facilities, network or local, are not available to the Globe and Mail as to any other reputable company.

I hope you will excuse the length of this letter. I felt that you would understand the reasons for the decision I was obliged to take if I were to set out the general background.

I still hope that you will feel inclined to consider my suggestion that you participate in occasional programs, forums or otherwise, arranged by us. We are most anxious to make available to our listeners the views of Canadians with a real contribution to make to the solution of our many national problems.

Yours sincerely,

Gladstone Murray,
General Manager.

Mr. MANION: The statement has already been published in the press?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Yes, but I thought it would be of interest to hon. members to have it on Hansard.

Mr. MANION: I merely wanted to know whether it was the statement published in the press by the chairman.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Yes, my hon. friend is right.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: May we not have the assurance of the Prime Minister that the government will stand behind the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation in this matter?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I think so, yes.

GOVERNOR GENERAL'S SPEECH

ADDRESS IN REPLY, MOVED BY MR. J. E. MATTHEWS AND SECONDED BY MR. LIONEL CHEVRIER

The house proceeded to the consideration of the speech delivered by His Excellency the Governor General at the opening of the session.

Mr. J. E. MATTHEWS (Brandon) moved:

That the following address be presented to His Excellency the Governor General, to offer the humble thanks of this House to His Excellency for the gracious speech which he has been pleased to make to both houses of parliament, namely,—

To His Excellency the Right Honourable Baron Tweedsmuir of Elsfield, Knight Grand Cross of the Most Distinguished Order of Saint Michael and Saint George, Member of the Order of the Companions of Honour, Governor General and Commander in Chief of the Dominion of Canada.

May it Please Your Excellency:

We, His Majesty's most dutiful and loyal subjects, the House of Commons of Canada, in parliament assembled, beg leave to offer our humble thanks to Your Excellency for the gracious speech which Your Excellency has addressed to both houses of parliament.

He said: In making this motion I desire at the same time to express my sincere accord with the remarks made on Friday last by hon. members of this house touching upon the memory of those members who passed away during the recess. I desire to express my personal appreciation of the fine tributes that were paid to the sterling qualities of my predecessor, the late member for the constituency of Brandon. I can add little, if anything, to those tributes that have already been paid, and I would merely say that Mr. Beaubier was a worthy citizen, a man who gave good service to his country, one for whom I had a very sincere regard and whose friendship I was privileged to share. He has left behind a large circle of friends of every class and every creed.

Before going further I should like to extend my congratulations to the hon. the new leader of His Majesty's Loyal Opposition (Mr. Manion) upon his elevation to the leadership of a great and historic party. We all realize his heavy responsibilities, for upon his shoulders has fallen the mantle of outstandingly able men. In the discharge of his onerous duties we wish him a large measure of success, although possibly there may be some in this house who would desire that that success have its limitations! The hon. gentleman paid my constituency the honour of a visit, early in November last I think it was. I did not have the privilege of meeting him at that time, because other duties were crowding upon me; but I can say this, and I think he will corroborate what I say, that he received a warm and cordial welcome there and formed many very fine friendships.

The speech from the throne made fitting reference to the prospective visit to Canada in May next of the King and Queen of the British Empire, the King and Queen of Canada. No words of mine can adequately express the admiration and respect of the Canadian people for our beloved sovereign and their loyalty to the crown. Our minds go back to his majesty's famous broadcast on New Year's Day, 1937, which concluded with these sincere and memorable words:

My wife and I dedicate ourselves for all time to your service, and we pray that God may give us guidance and strength to follow the path that lies before us.

These are noble sentiments, and they were expressed by a sovereign who, we all feel sure, will ever play a kingly part. Somehow, whenever I think of Her Gracious Majesty, the product of a Scottish clan, those words of Tennyson's come back to me, words which I believe are as applicable to Queen Elizabeth as they were ever applicable to her illustrious predecessor, Victoria the Good:

Her court was pure, her life serene,
God gave her peace, her land reposed,
A thousand claims to reverence closed
In her, as mother, wife and Queen.

I should like to express my gratitude to the right hon. the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) for having asked me to move this address. I regard it as a distinct honour, not to myself but to the constituency which I have been chosen to represent. I think all hon. members will agree with me that not for a considerable time has there been a by-election held in Canada in which interest was more intense and more widespread. The voice of Brandon constituency was interpreted, whether correctly or incorrectly, as the voice of western Canada. It was taken as a representative western constituency—one hundred miles from east to west, fifty miles from north to south, and the home of a type of people whom any member may feel honoured to represent. As far as voting strength is concerned, it is fifty-seven per cent rural and forty-three per cent urban, so that that voice may be taken as being fairly representative.

I do not think any of my western colleagues will disagree with me when I say that the constituency which I have the honour to represent has long been regarded as the crowning constituency of the west in agricultural progress. Its summer and winter fairs have won outstanding favour all over Canada. In this respect a sense of modesty almost impels me to refrain from making mention of the Royal Winter Fair at Toronto. Manitoba exhibitors sent to the Royal a few weeks ago 169 head of live stock for exhibition. Some of these animals were shown in groups, thus reducing the number of single entries to 146. Of those 146 single entries Manitoba exhibitors carried off 134 cash prizes and 12 awards. Now here is where the modesty enters in. Of those 134 cash prizes that came to Manitoba almost fifty per cent were won by farmers in my own constituency.

I make these observations, Mr. Speaker, not from any narrow or parochial viewpoint but as an indication of the interest that is felt by the farmers of Manitoba and the west in the new trade agreements that will presently come before this parliament, and particularly as they relate to the live stock industry. Under these trade agreements the whole tariff structure between Canada and the United States has been revised, in some cases very drastically, and in such a way that I believe every home in Canada will be benefited. Canada has made tariff adjustments on 1,489 products of the United States, and has also removed the three per cent excise tax. This means that every consumer in Canada, whether residing in the east or the west, should be able to buy his supplies more cheaply, and hence in larger quantities. On the other side the United States has lowered her tariff walls very materially as applied to 400 Canadian products. These reductions apply in marked degree to the products of the farm and of the sea. Lower tariffs on what we buy, a readier market for what we sell: the Canadian producer, it seems to me, is benefited both in his going out and his coming in.

Experienced cattle dealers have told me that they have found a distinctly healthier tone in the cattle market ever since this agreement was announced. These men are convinced, after years of experience, that the tariff reductions and the increased quota admissible to the United States, now 225,000 head, will mean a very decided impetus to our live stock development. An alert business man with an analytical complex remarked to me a few days before I left for Ottawa that, having studied this agreement, he had come to the conclusion that it was the smartest—that is the word he used—piece of business legislation enacted in Canada since confederation.

There is another side, a very significant side, to the finer relationships established by this agreement. We have been living for months past under the shadow of an impending world tragedy. We knew not when the fatal hour might strike, but of one thing we felt assured, that we are still far removed from that ideal day portrayed by Robert Burns, when—

> . . . man to man the warld o'er
> Shall brothers be for a' that.

Under that dread shadow it is safe to say that we all became more aware of the fact that democracy was seriously threatened. We also became more aware of our own responsibility. It is a matter for profound thankfulness that after such dread suspense wiser and steadier counsels prevailed. Otherwise, instead of the king and queen coming here, as we hope they may, in time of peace, we might even now have been wading through the horrors of a world war that would have shaken civilization to its centre and possibly led to its utter annihilation.

I refer to this because the completion of trade agreements between three great democracies of the world undoubtedly constitutes a tremendous advance towards the preservation of world peace. The thought I have in mind was well expressed not long ago by the New York Times. I quote:

> The mutual tariff concessions which have been agreed upon ought to have a beneficial effect on both American and British trade. But the real significance of the agreement goes far beyond this probable result. The treaty marks a closer union between the two most powerful democracies, achieved at a particularly decisive moment in the world's history. It increases the hope of more effective cooperation among all the democracies in defence of peace and order.

The same thought has been expressed in Toronto Saturday Night:

> It is a definite move in a general drawing together of the great democracies for common action towards the upholding of the way of life to which those nations are dedicated. It is symbolic of an entirely new relationship between the two greatest English speaking countries.

The more we study those agreements, Mr. Speaker, the more obvious it becomes that we are very fortunate indeed in having liberal-minded statesmen, using that word in its broadest sense, of the type and temperament of the present leaders of those two great nations who, together with Mr. Cordell Hull, brought the negotiations to a successful conclusion.

Any remarks along this line might be considered incomplete if they did not contain some reference to the visit to Canada last summer of President Roosevelt. It was a significant illustration of the friendly relations which exist between two of the youngest, but at the same time two of the greatest, exponents of present day democracy. Both countries are wielding, in their own way, a strong, steadying influence in a world that is now torn by hatred and strife.

Speaking of agreements and their probable bearing on the trade of the countries involved, one naturally turns to a review of the achievements of the past, and the review is interesting. Our total imports for the fiscal year ended March 31, 1938, amounted to over $799,000,000, an increase over the previous year of more than $117,000,000. This was the largest total since 1931. Turning to our exports, we find an increase of about $10,500,000 over 1937, and a total of $1,084,000,000, which was the highest total since 1930, and more than twice as large as the figure for 1933. Or if we consider the increase of trade on a percentage basis, from the standpoint of declared values, using 100 as the key, we have this result:

1934	78·4
1935	89·1
1936	100

If we consider our exports from the standpoint of physical volume, the results will be found to be approximately the same. I submit that in the face of world conditions and the adverse trend in the United States, this result is a wonderful endorsation of the efforts which have been made to develop world trade.

Just here let me say that we are all greatly interested in the negotiations with the West Indies, referred to in the speech from the throne, and we agree with the hope there expressed that a new agreement will be arrived at which will be mutually beneficial to the West Indies and to Canada.

[Mr. Matthews.]

It is cheering to note that in the speech from the throne cognizance is being taken of the wheat situation in Canada. I have the honour to represent a constituency that has been long known as one of the leading wheat producing centres of the west; in fact Brandon is known in many parts of Canada as the wheat city. Our farmers were considerably disappointed last season when the price of wheat was set at 80 cents per bushel, but when the market price started to fall, eventually going below 60 cents, they began to realize that in reality they were receiving a bonus of twenty or more cents per bushel, and the feeling of disappointment gave way to a feeling of appreciation, in that they felt that the other parts of Canada, through their representatives in parliament and the government, were playing fair in this emergency. However, even the price of 80 cents per bushel was of little avail to those upon whose lands the rain did not fall, who through no fault of their own had little or no wheat to sell, or to those who had a little wheat of inferior grade which had to be sold at starvation prices. The fact of the matter is that with production costs as they are to-day, and with the cost of the articles the farmer is compelled to buy twenty-five per cent greater than it was before the war, the farmer cannot raise wheat,—even if he gets the best grade, which seldom happens—pay transportation charges and other costs, and sell that wheat at 80 cents per bushel, or considerably less for the lower grades, and break even or nearly even. It is well known that for many years the grain of the western provinces has been the biggest single factor in our export trade. It is also well known that year after year western purchases of eastern goods have coincided almost exactly with the revenue derived from the western wheat crop. I believe the Dominion Bureau of Statistics is authority for the information that in 1929, a good crop year, western Canada bought from the east goods to the value of 380 million dollars, but that in 1933, with a poor crop and low prices, those purchases were reduced to 80 millions. That is quite a drop.

In view of the difficulties experienced in the growing and marketing of wheat, therefore, I heartily agree with the Toronto Financial Post, which said:

> One-quarter of our total Canadian population are entirely dependent upon the growing of wheat—another quarter are vitally concerned. Our elevator system, our railways, most of our leading companies, our huge milling and farm machinery industries have been developed on the basis of western wheat growing. Without wheat or a satisfactory substitute, one-half of Canada faces bankruptcy; a main prop is gone from our vital export trade.

Then the Financial Post goes on to say:

A permanent policy must be developed, with all factors taken into consideration.

With that declaration I believe the western wheat growers will heartily agree. Briefly, then, for the reasons I have mentioned, together with a good many others, I believe deep interest will be aroused in this announcement contained in the speech from the throne:

Measures to assist further in the marketing of farm products will be introduced during the present session.

It is most gratifying to find in the speech from the throne a note of deep concern regarding unemployment and relief. I have the most sincere sympathy for people who are caught in the net of either of these national difficulties. To be sure, we will always have with us a considerable number of people too young and too old to be employed. We will also have with us those partly or totally disabled, through mental or physical disability, who are thus prevented from obtaining employment; and in Canada particularly we will always have seasonal unemployment. People belonging to these three groups form a large proportion of the number listed as unemployed or on relief. One task of government, and a great task of the Canadian people, is to see that unemployment, as it applies to capable men, is reduced to a minimum.

Then we come to the question of relief. The fact that over 31,000 people have been taken off relief lists at their own request—that is at the request of the adults, because this number includes children—and placed upon the land, is a hopeful sign, together with the further fact that 19,000 young men are employed in Canada right now under the farm employment plan. This does not include 2,000 placed in forestry and allied work in British Columbia—also a hopeful sign. At the same time, according to figures recently released, the grand total of all classes of persons benefiting by aid showed a substantial decrease from the year 1937.

I have always taken a deep interest in the youth of our land. When it has been possible I have never failed to lend to them a helping hand—and I do not say that in any spirit of boastfulness. This is one reason why the youth training program now being carried on appeals to me very strongly. It is giving to many of our young men and women, in a simple and inexpensive way, an opportunity the better to fit themselves for the responsibilities of life. I am delighted to find that out of over 5,000 who completed the course in 1938, forty-five per cent were placed in gainful occupations prior to November 30. That is a good record.

A few weeks ago I had the privilege of visiting two of those schools, one in the city of Brandon and a smaller one in the town of Oak Lake. May I say I was profoundly impressed with the type of training being imparted. It was of a practical kind; it was not training those young people for life in the clouds, but rather was fitting them the better to discharge the everyday responsibilities of their lives, and training them in the principles of good citizenship. No one can tell me that in the future there will not be many happier homes and a greater measure of contentment because of the good training imparted in those various schools.

If there were time, Mr. Speaker, I should like to discuss some other subjects mentioned in the speech from the throne, and particularly the work done by the Department of Agriculture in connection with the Prairie Farm Rehabilitation Act. This work of conserving the spring flow of water for uses of stock during the year is a tremendous boon to thousands of farmers in the west, and an expansion of the area to which it applies would be a further help to many others.

Permit me to say in conclusion that although some of my remarks have applied more directly to western Canada, they are not made in any sectional spirit. I am interested in Canada as a whole. I believe, with Roger Babson, that Canada has the brightest future of any nation in the world. I was born in eastern Canada; I have always lived in Canada. I know Canada fairly well from coast to coast. I know something, too, of the aspirations of its people, and I am aware, as we must all be aware, that Kipling did not have Canada in mind when he said:

East is east, and west is west, and never the twain shall meet.

So far as Canada is concerned, east and west have already met. Central Canada, eastern Canada, and western Canada are knit together by ties of kinship and bound together by bonds of nationhood. Surely by this time we have all come to realize that that which is detrimental or beneficial to one part of Canada is, as a matter of necessity, either directly or indirectly, detrimental or beneficial to the other.

For my own part I am confident, as I saw suggested a few days ago, that eastern and western Canada working together can unite on policies which will bring back stability to the prairies and increased progress to eastern industries. Regardless of what the pessimist may say, I will still maintain that if east and west in a spirit of mutual helpfulness will agree to merge their difficulties and share their triumphs, Canada will continue in the future, as in the past, a united and progressive nation, the brightest star in the British crown.

Mr. LIONEL CHEVRIER (Stormont) (Translation): Mr. Speaker, in accordance with an old parliamentary custom, one of the two speeches made in moving and seconding the address, is delivered in French.

This year the honour of making the French speech has fallen to your humble servant. I am indeed most grateful to the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) for having chosen me. His choice was undoubtedly intended to honour the county of Stormont, which is rapidly gaining more and more importance in our national economy. The county of Stormont contains a large population of workers and farmers to whom this quotation from Longfellow's "Evangeline" may be fittingly applied:

> Men whose lives glided on like rivers that water the woodlands
> Darkened by shadows of Earth, but reflecting an image of Heaven.

There are to be found also in the county of Stormont great potential hydroelectric resources which the United States are endeavouring to develop jointly with Canada, and which, when developed, will make that area one of the richest and most prosperous in the Dominion. In choosing me, the Prime Minister also wished to pay homage to the French-speaking population of Ontario, who, in the days of Laurier, and even before them, embraced the Liberal faith, and have since remained faithful under the guidance of Mackenzie King. In the name of the French-speaking people of Ontario, and in the name of my own constituents, may I express my deep gratitude to the Prime Minister.

At the outset, in greeting you, Mr. Speaker, let me say how pleased we all are to see you again in the chair, ready to resume your sessional duties. We know that you will preside over this house with the same tact, courtesy and patience you have shown in the past.

I also wish to take this opportunity to pay tribute to the former leader of the Conservative party, Right Hon. Mr. Bennett, who, unfortunately is not in his seat at present. It was with deep regret that we heard last summer that he was to leave Canada to reside in England. May I be permitted to say that his departure will be a serious loss to his own party and to Canada as a whole. All members will join with me in wishing him health, long life, and a long and fruitful career abroad.

[Mr. Matthews.]

Since last session the Conservative party has chosen a new leader, who is well known in this house, I wish to congratulate Hon. Doctor Manion upon the high honour bestowed upon him. His qualities as a leader and as a fearless debater and experienced parliamentarian will be invaluable assets to his party. I wish him long life as the Leader of His Majesty's Loyal Opposition.

The dominant note of the speech from the throne is undoubtedly the reference to the visit of Their Majesties, King George VI and Queen Elizabeth, next May. No news has ever been received with greater enthusiasm in Canada than the announcement of their coming to this country. All Canadian citizens, without distinction of race or creed, rejoice at the prospect of this visit. I am sure that, from near and far, they will hasten to pay homage to their majesties and give expression to sentiments of loyalty and devotion to these two illustrious personages, representing the supreme authority. Our people will be eager to manifest their allegiance and fidelity to the British sovereigns, who, under the statute of Westminster, are also King and Queen of Canada.

(Text) During the course of the summer this country was singularly honoured when it received as its guest no less a person than the President of the United States. Jointly with the Prime Minister of Canada he officiated at the opening of an international bridge near Brockville. His visit will long be remembered by those who were present and his statements marked the beginning of a new era in our relationship with the United States. At Kingston, where an honorary degree was conferred on the president by Queen's university, he declared that if Canada were ever attacked by a foreign nation, the United States could not and would not stand idly by. I need not labour the importance of this declaration so far as we are concerned.

At Ivy Lea the president discussed with his vast audience the project of deepening the St. Lawrence waterway, which often has received the attention of this house. He invited consideration of the draft treaty laid on the table of the house during the last session. In view of the serious unemployment situation which prevails in the country at the present time, this problem should receive the most careful consideration. The president's visit was a momentous one and helped greatly to strengthen the ties which already unite us to our neighbours to the south.

(Translation) Leaving this pleasant part of the speech, may I now turn to a situation laden with grave consequences for us all. Towards the end of September last we passed through tragic days, hours full of anguish. We were on the verge of war. Never since the fateful year of 1914 had we faced a crisis so full of momentous events, where the slightest blunder on the part of certain statesmen might have started a European conflict in which our whole civilization would have perished.

The Czechoslovakian crisis was provoked by the coming into play of the interlocking alliances and ideological passions of two important groups, one led by Hitler and the other by Mussolini. These two leaders of men are characterized not only by the dictatorial organization they have given Germany and Italy, as Paul Van Zeeland tells us, in effect, but by the personal magnetism with which they succeeded in galvanizing their peoples and expanding their forces, thus increasing the power of the two countries to a formidable degree. What brings them still closer together is the fact that, in order to attain their purpose, they both took advantage of the struggle against communism, destroyer of internal order and a menace to the peace of the world.

The Sudeten Germans, encouraged by Berlin, demanded autonomy and a radical change in the foreign policy of Prague. Hitler, encouraged by the successful Anschluss, sought to extend the influence of the Reich towards the east. The problem was all the more serious as France was bound to Czechoslovakia by a guarantee of assistance, the validity of which she publicly affirmed on several occasions. Military preparations and unfortunate border incidents made the situation worse. London attempted diplomatic manoeuvres but conferences and negotiations proved unsuccessful. Hitler wanted war at all costs, and massed his troops on the Czechoslovakian border. It was then that Chamberlain, a man who had never travelled by air, made his historic flight which resulted in the Munich agreement. This pact has been the butt of bitter and violent criticism. Now that the storm has abated, however, and calm is restored, who can in all sincerity affirm that Chamberlain did not act wisely? Could France effectively defend Czechoslovakia had Germany attacked? Had England completed her rearmament program, and was she ready for war? Would Russia have intervened in the conflict in the face of a domestic crisis? And, inwardly, was Rusia not rejoicing at the prospect of a war which would have weakened the four European powers and left her a free hand towards the west? These questions must be answered in the affirmative if Chamberlain is to be condemned.

And what of the attitude of our Prime Minister, who at the time of the crisis was also severely criticized by extremists clamouring for a promise of intervention? He remained calm and wise, as usual. Strengthened in the attitude he took at the time of the Chanak incident, he stated that the Canadian parliament alone could decide whether Canada should participate in a war which might affect other parts of the British empire. After the Munich conference, the Prime Minister approved of Chamberlain's peace gesture, and all right-thinking citizens endorsed the government's policy.

(Text) At this juncture I should like to turn to another subject mentioned in the speech from the throne and which to my mind is equally as important as the one I have just discussed. I refer to the tripartite agreement which was signed at Washington in November of last year. Ever since this government has been in office it has sought by all the means at its disposal to break down the barriers of economic nationalism by opening up channels of trade. No sooner had the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) been returned to office in 1935 than he succeeded in negotiating a treaty with Washington which expired in January of this year. The treaty which was signed recently is more important and will have far wider effects than the previous one. It may be considered from two points of view.

In the first instance, a challenge had been thrown out to democracies in recent months that they were impotent, unwieldy and slow and that their hope of preserving liberty and freedom was on the wane. The treaty was a complete answer to totalitarianism. It showed the world that the democracies were no longer paralyzed, but were very much alive. In the matter of trade at least it showed that they had left the dictatorships lagging far behind. This treaty, coming as it did after the dark days of September which brought us closer to world conflagration than anything that has taken place since 1914, had the desirable effect of uniting in a common bond of friendship the great democracies of the world.

In the next place, the treaty may be regarded as conferring great benefits upon Canada's primary industries. The fishermen in the maritimes and the potato growers in New Brunswick and Prince Edward Island have easier access to the markets of the United States through larger quotas. The lumber operators were able to get unanticipated benefits in connection with British Columbia fir, red cedar shingles and hemlock. The farmer of the prairie provinces was not forgotten. The dairymen of eastern Canada have obtained important concessions on milk, cream and cheese.

The manufacturers of textile goods fear that they are being injuriously affected. The raison d'être of their fears will be confirmed or dispelled with the operation of the treaty. It must be remembered, however, that they may now import their raw material upon easier terms and that certain of their textile products may be exported to and sold on the American market. If the dumping of American products can be averted by the relevant sections of the Customs Act I do not believe that the manufacturers will fare too badly. In any event, in the consideration of this treaty there is one thing that should be kept in mind. When great achievements are obtained, very often great sacrifices must be made. Sacrifices had to be made by Great Britain, the United States, and Canada in the interests of peace on behalf of the cause of democracy, and I believe that those sacrifices should be and will be generously accepted.

(Translation) The speech from the throne mentions another momentous question—the problem of youth training. There are great numbers of young men and women at present unemployed, and a great many others who, upon graduation from our colleges and universities, know not where to turn. It must be remembered, however, that the youth of to-day will be the nation of tomorrow. We must rely on youth if the ship of state is to be kept on an even keel. Therefore, we must find means of training youth for the part it is to play.

The government voted a large amount for youth training, and I wish to congratulate the Minister of Labour (Mr. Rogers) on the manner in which the money has been expended. In cooperation with the provincial governments, youth training programs have been set up which are classified as follows:

(a) training projects of an occupational nature;

(b) learnership courses in industry;

(c) work projects to combine training with conservation and development of natural resources;

(d) physical training programs to maintain health and morale.

Those provinces which have adopted this plan have derived great advantages from it. It is only a beginning, however, and much remains to be accomplished. It would seem that a greater measure of publicity should be given to those programs for the rehabilitation of youth, since a great many communities appear to be unaware of what has been done.

The Canadian Corps Association has recently set up a program of youth training which seems to be commendable in many respects, and certainly deserves to be given careful consideration.

[Mr. Chevrier.]

Mr. Speaker, we are passing through a difficult and dangerous period of our history. Hate and distrust are everywhere. Nations are arming to the teeth in anticipation of war. Subversive ideas are being spread everywhere, class consciousness is being fostered, and our whole social order is threatened. We must fight those agitators preaching hate and disorder. In order to fight them effectively, it is not sufficient to affirm the superiority of democracies over dictatorships. We must show by our actions that such superiority actually exists, and that in our midst there is always room for social justice and peace.

We must come to the help of those who suffer: the worker who lives in constant fear of unemployment; the farmer who does not obtain a fair price for his products; the unemployed who are willing to work. We must make plain to those who are embittered against society that the cause of their ills is not our social order, but the abuses resulting from the doctrine of individualism; that socialism would only aggravate their predicament; that the aim should be, not to destroy our present order, but to reform it without delay, since otherwise it is futile to attempt effectively to defend society against the assault of revolutionary forces.

(Text) In order to preserve democracy and promote its welfare, the state must guard against two dangers; first, the danger of leaving too much to private initiative; second, the danger of leaving too little to the effort of its citizens. It must avoid the two extremes of individualism and paternalism. Whenever the general interest of any particular class suffers or is threatened with evils which can in no other way be met, the public authority must step in to meet them. This indicates that there are some situations where it is the duty of the state to intervene, and others where it must refrain from intervention. Democracy, therefore, in the true sense is that in which all classes will find representation—the poor as well as the rich, the feeble as well as the strong, the farmer and the wage earner as well as the high salaried director. In such a state more justice and charity would be meted out, and equilibrium among the various classes of society would be restored.

(Translation) The present government, by various legislative measures, has contributed to bring about the proper balance among the various classes of society. The speech from the throne mentions other proposals which, I hope, will be carried to a successful conclusion. I have much pleasure, therefore, Mr Speaker, in seconding the motion of my hon. and distinguished friend, the member for Brandon (Mr. Matthews) for the adoption of the address in reply to the speech from the throne.

HON. R. J. MANION (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I should like first to offer my very hearty congratulations to the mover (Mr. Matthews) and to the seconder (Mr. Chevrier) of the address in reply to the speech from the throne. On a good many occasions in this house I have listened to new members, to young members and some not so young, performing this duty, and I say at once that the two hon. members who moved and seconded the address to-day did so as creditably as any other two whom I have ever heard. The air of the constituencies of Brandon and Stormont must be conducive to good speaking, because I well remember that during the campaign to which my hon. friend the member for Brandon (Mr. Matthews) referred, in which I myself made a couple of speeches—but not very effectively, apparently—the young candidate who ran against him, George Beaubier, surprised me with his splendid gift of eloquence. And in regard to the constituency of Stormont, the predecessor of the present member of that constituency, Frank Shaver, was also a splendid speaker upon any subject in connection with which he took part in debate. So that the house was favoured to-day, Mr. Speaker, in these two addresses by members from constituencies where, if we are to judge from their performance here, the air is conducive to a high quality of public speaking.

May I add one word in regard to the hon. member for Stormont? It always surprises, I think, those of us of English extraction to note the ease with which Canadians of French extraction shift from one language to the other. I have perhaps never heard anybody shift quite so often or quite so easily as my hon. friend (Mr. Chevrier) did to-day. At the same time it does make some of us English-speaking people a little ashamed that only from French Quebec do we get this gift of the two languages, which is such an asset to any member of this house, but which unfortunately does not exist to any very considerable extent outside the province of Quebec.

Unfortunately, I find myself not altogether in agreement with everything the two hon. gentlemen have said, but they would hardly expect me to agree with them entirely. The hon. member for Brandon was not happy in his reference to the voice of western Canada. He argued that his success in Brandon was an indication that the voice of western Canada had spoken emphatically in support of this government. As I recall, however, the vote did not quite show such a result. On looking up the vote I find that the present member for Brandon received 6,583 votes and his opponents 9,177. If that distribution of votes represents the voice of western Canada, then I am rather afraid that it is not very encouraging to the government. Indeed, the hon. member received just over 41 per cent of the votes. If therefore the voice of Brandon was the voice of the people of Manitoba, then the voice of Waterloo South was the voice of the people of Ontario, because I find that the hon. member for Waterloo South (Mr. Homuth), the able and active gentleman who represents that constituency, with ten or twelve years of very valuable experience behind him in the provincial house at Toronto, swamped his two opponents, both the Liberal and the representative of the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation—swamped them to such an extent that they both lost their deposits. That makes me rather strongly of the opinion that, if we must judge by by-elections, the government has no reason to regard the results as very encouraging. The Liberal received in the constituency of Waterloo South just 24 per cent of the vote. The Conservative received over 50 per cent and the representative of the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation got the remainder. The Liberal received altogether just under 25 per cent in Waterloo South. I repeat, therefore, that the hon. member for Brandon was not quite fortunate in that reference. However, I will let it go at that.

My hon. friends opposite made a gallant attempt to win the Brandon by-election and they succeeded through a minority vote. They sent to the constituency three ministers, ten members of parliament and three members of legislature. They did pretty well. They missed one of the ministers, however. The hon. member for Port Arthur (Mr. Howe), the Minister of Transport, was to have appeared there the day I was there but through an accident he did not arrive. The other day he said that it was a good thing that he did not because every by-election that he had taken part in had been lost to the Liberal party. That is his joke, not mine. On the other side, we had in support of our candidate, the Hon. J. L. Bowman and myself among privy councillors, two members of legislature and one member of parliament. We were altogether outnumbered and, from what I have heard, the odds were against us so far as cash was concerned. That is the information that has been given me.

May I say one other word about the hon. member for Brandon. The hon. gentleman spoke of the importance of wheat growing to the people of Canada, and with that remark I am wholly in agreement. No one coming as I do from the head of the lakes, for many years the spout of the funnel through which passes the wheat of western Canada, can fail to grasp the importance to this dominion of the wheat-growing industry of the west.

Perhaps I shall be forgiven if I express now, in this my first set speech since my return to the house, something in the way of appreciation of the honour that has been conferred upon me in being chosen as leader of one of the two great parties that have governed this country for the last seventy years or more. In spite of all the criticism that has been heaped upon these two parties, I believe that they have done fairly well in the government of Canada throughout these years. I would express my appreciation of the honour that has come to me in being made the representative of the constituency of London. Many able and outstanding men have represented that constituency, and it is a matter for pride that I should now be its representative. I highly appreciate the honour of representing that fine old city.

I have already expressed publicly, and I should like to do so again in a word, my appreciation of the courtesy shown by the Liberal party in refraining from opposing me in the by-election. After all, it is only in keeping with the traditions of our parliamentary life. If you will go back over the years you will find that the same course was followed by the Conservatives in 1919 when the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) ran in Prince Edward Island. The same courtesy was extended by the Liberal party to my friend Arthur Meighen when he ran in Grenville-Dundas in 1922. May I therefore express again my deep appreciation of the courtesies shown me by the Liberals on the occasion of the by-election.

I realize sincerely the duties and responsibilities that devolve upon me as leader of one of the parties in Canada; yet, having been chosen by a great convention, I feel that no more can be expected of me than that I should do my best. For that convention did display a feeling of unanimity and progress, and there was on its part a realization of the changing times in the progressive attitude which it took on a great many questions. After all, we are living in a time when men of all religious and political beliefs must see that in a changing era all the world must continue to change. I may fittingly conclude these observations by thanking both the public and the press of the country for the kindly way in which they have received my first efforts since my election in July to the leadership of the National Conservative party.

And now I should like to deal with the speech from the throne. I have read it carefully two or three times, and whatever else we can say about it, we must admit at once, I think, that it is preeminent at least in regard to quantity. I have the word of one very industrious member behind me, who has measured the space in Hansard taken up by the speech from the throne in the past twenty-three years, that no speech from the throne has occupied quite so much space as the one with which we are now favoured. Whatever criticisms I may have to make of this document, therefore, the right hon. gentleman can rest assured that, in that one respect at any rate, it is preeminent.

May I deal briefly with the different paragraphs of the speech. With the first, announcing that Their Majesties King George VI and Queen Elizabeth have graciously decided to visit Canada, and that that announcement has been received with rejoicing throughout the dominion, I think that not only all hon. members in this house but the people in all parts of Canada will fully agree. Their majesties, as one of the previous speakers properly observed, are as much the king and queen of Canada as they are the king and queen of Britain or of any other part of the empire. When we look at the romantic picture of the young man and the young woman who have assumed the very onerous duties of their office, when we realize that at the coronation not so very long ago they dedicated themselves to the service of the empire, and that they have since honoured that pledge as well as did his majesty's father King George V and his mother, Queen Mary, we cannot help feeling the greatest admiration and the sincerest affection for their majesties. I believe, sir, that is the feeling of everyone in this country. I do not believe there are any sections or groups that are not entirely loyal to the king and the empire, although there may be some differences of opinion here and there as to how that loyalty should be shown.

Another attribute of the present king and queen, and this applies equally to King George V and Queen Mary—I have mentioned it on other occasions, in Canadian Club addresses and so on—is that they have given throughout their lives such a splendid example of fine home life. After all, the home is the cornerstone of the nation; and for that as well as for many other things I think we owe a debt of gratitude both to the former and to the present king and queen. I can add my words to those the Prime Minister has put into the mouth of his excellency, that our king and queen will certainly receive from every part of Canada and from all groups in this country a most hearty welcome when they visit this great dominion.

In regard to our friendship for the United States, which is referred to in the next paragraph, I believe it is true that next to the empire all of us in Canada feel an exceedingly deep friendship for the great republic to the south. I heartily endorse that part of the speech in which reference is made to the friendship of Canadians for the people of the United States.

Then there is reference to the rejoicing at the peace brought about by the work of Prime Minister Chamberlain and Premier Daladier in September last. Certainly all sane people in the empire appreciate the magnificent work that was done by these men in keeping the peace of the world. It seems to me that only a madman would want war in a world such as we have to-day, with the possibilities of destruction that exist.

Coming to the next item, the question of defence, the government says that Canada's defences must be materially strengthened. With that statement I certainly will not quarrel. I say most sincerely that I believe, and all thinking Canadians must believe and realize, that under conditions as they exist at present, when there are men who seem bent on destroying democracy and on controlling the world, Canada cannot alone be without defences. Especially when you think of the dictators and of the threats they have made and are making almost daily, when you have in mind our huge area, rich resources and sparse population, you realize that Canada would be a very choice morsel for any of the dictators. Some time ago I made it my business to make a comparison of certain geographical areas, and I found, as I had expected, that the area of Germany, Italy and Japan, the three chief dictator nations of to-day, taken together, is just a little greater than that of the province of Ontario; yet in those three dictatorships they have just under two hundred million people, while in Ontario we have less than four million. I do not think any further words of mine could make clearer the significance of that comparison. And nothing I could say would demonstrate more fully the need of a proper defence system. Many authorities on air fighting, of whom I do not claim to be one, have expressed the opinion on several occasions recently that Canada and the United States, this whole continent of America, north and south, are in danger from the air. While I profess no expert knowledge of the matter, personally I think those experts are probably right. For these reasons I wholly endorse the idea that we should have in this country a proper defence system.

I am now going to suggest something which in these remarks will be perhaps the first monkey wrench that I throw into the machinery, and it is this. If some of the right hon. gentleman's lieutenants from the province of Quebec had not been so assiduous in years gone by in preaching to the people of that province the doctrine that this party was the militaristic party because we believed in a certain amount of defence, about half of what we have to-day—if they had not been so assiduous in that regard they would not to-day find it so difficult to remove the prejudice which they built up in regard to defence.

The next paragraph with which I shall deal is that relating to the defence purchasing board. I am more or less in accord with the idea of a defence purchasing board, but before commending it completely I should like to know its personnel; I should like to know for example that it is not going to be a political purchasing board, that it will not be a case of picking one man and ignoring all others in regard to competition, picking a man and financing him while he runs around the world getting ideas about defence and then giving him the contract without permitting anyone else to tender. I should like to know that, before I unqualifiedly endorse the idea. But as a Canadian citizen who for a long time has been familiar with public opinion I am convinced that the making of large profits from the manufacture of munitions or armaments is repugnant to the ideals of the Canadian people, whether such profits be made directly through a percentage of the amount of the contract, or by selling stock, or in any other way. The making of huge profits on munitions is looked upon by many of our people as taking blood money, as profiteering in patriotism. Some time ago I expressed this view, and I am going to read from a statement which I made in Toronto to a non-political group, the Canadian Commercial Travellers' Association, on December 16 last, just a month ago to-day. In fact I had made the same statement with almost no modifications about two months earlier before the Kiwanis Club in London, during the by-election in that city. I read it because it is exactly as I gave it to the Canadian press, and it expresses my opinion perhaps better and more concisely than I could state it in these remarks. I am quoted as follows:

"All arms and munitions needed for the direct defence of Canada should either be manufactured by the government itself or under the complete control of the government, with profits eliminated", Hon. Dr. R. J. Manion, leader of the National Conservative party, said last night at the annual banquet of the Commercial Travellers' Association of Canada.

"In addition there should be complete control of profits in the manufacture of arms and munitions of all kinds for the United Kingdom", said Doctor Manion.

"These proposals are fair", he said, "because they leave plenty of opportunity for private enterprise; they give a real opportunity for service to Canada; they assure cooperation and a fair deal to the empire and thereby assure Canadian producers of their share of the immense British contracts for munitions and armaments which are required."

Doctor Manion said he offered government control and elimination of profits as an alternative to complete nationalization of armament manufacture, because "I don't like to see the governments getting too much into business and because of the large capital expenditures complete government manufacture might involve."

That statement expresses my opinion to-day. It is open to modification in detail, but again I say I do not wish to quarrel with the proposal of a defence purchasing board. I do want to know the set-up and the ideas back of it and the principles on which it will work.

The next paragraph of the speech from the throne refers to the trade agreement with the United States. Even in the speech from the throne there is a certain amount of propaganda on behalf of that trade agreement, propaganda which was put out on a very large scale as soon as the agreement was signed. It was signed on November 17, and on the following day and for many days thereafter the press was printing the forty-six pages, I think, of comment handed out by the government, all of it commendatory. A little later I shall deal with that in a very general way, but I want to say that in my opinion there is too much propaganda being put out by the government in regard to such things as the trade agreement and other matters. It is being put out over the radio on various occasions; in fact I made it my business to try to get a list of all the ministers who have been speaking on the radio across Canada for the last six or eight months. I have here a list of some ten or twelve ministers who have been speaking on the air, supposedly explaining the workings of the various departments of the government and, of course,—perhaps justifiably, since they are on the air—throwing in the odd word which would show their great work in looking after their various departments.

I suggest here, sir, that in future, whether it be the present government or the one which will succeed it next year, when we want propaganda of that sort put out, the men who write the statements should read them, because I venture to assert that not one of the ministers wrote the statements which they so carefully read over the radio. I speak with some authority and knowledge, because I did that myself on one occasion. At any rate I have the idea that it might be well if the deputy minister or the assistant deputy minister or the secretary, or whoever writes the statement, should read that address, in order to avoid the impression—which is probably false—that some of the ministers might try to put over a little political propaganda. I mention this partly as a result of what I was going to call the action of the government, but according to the statement made by the Prime Minister I willingly refrain from blaming it on the government. However, I do want to refer very briefly to the incident which occurred as between the radio corporation and George McCullagh.

It strikes me, sir, that this censorship, because that is what it amounts to, is not appropriate while all the time we—all of us—are talking so much about our democracy. We all talk a great deal about the value of free speech, a free press, free religion, free assembly, and so on; I have done it many times myself. But with all due respect to the officials of the radio corporation, and with all due respect to the statement made by the Prime Minister this afternoon, I submit that in this country it is not sufficient that any one man should have the power to say who shall or shall not speak over the radio. We all know that in Italy, Germany and Russia no one may have the freedom of speech we have here, but I resent the idea that any prominent man who is a law abiding citizen, who does not advocate anything in the way of revolution, who does not offend any great body of people, whether in connection with religion or in any other way, should be forbidden to speak over the air, when other men have been given that privilege.

Take the example of Mr. George Drew, who was recently elected leader of the Conservative party in the province of Ontario. According to a statement which I read in one of the Toronto papers just yesterday or the day before, George Drew said he was permitted to do what George McCullagh was not allowed to do. Mr. Drew stated that it was put up to him that he should have the backing or endorsation—I have forgotten the exact word—of some organization, such as the Conservative party, for example; but he said he refused to ask for any endorsation and spoke as a private citizen. I do not mind saying that I do not agree with very many of George McCullagh's views, but I do not think he should be placed in any different position from George Drew in that regard. In addition, in the correspondence between Mr. McCullagh and Mr. Gladstone Murray, which I glanced over this morning and which I have before me, Mr. McCullagh states that even a communist gets the opportunity to speak over the air which is denied George McCullagh. Well, I have some objection to communists speaking over the air. I have no objection to socialists, but my objection to communists being allowed to speak over the radio is that the fundamental principle and the whole doctrine of communism is revolution. They believe in world revolution; they believe in upsetting governments not by evolution, not by the ballot but by the bullet. Yet Tim Buck or some other communist may have the privilege of speaking over the radio—and this was not denied by Mr. Gladstone Murray—in order to air his views, while George McCullagh, a business man, may not do so.

I repeat, sir, that I believe any law-abiding business man who is willing to pay for the time he takes on the radio should have the right to speak over the air, so long as there are not so many of them that they take up the time that should be used for the legitimate purpose of entertainment. I believe it is the right of George McCullagh to express his views over the air; at least as yet I have not been convinced to the contrary, and I do not believe that any individual, Mr. Gladstone Murray in this case, should have power to say who may or who may not speak over the radio. If this system is to be carried on there should be something in the way of a commission or a committee, some body of men—it should not be limited to the judgment of any one man, I care not who he is—to decide who shall or shall not speak over the air. After all, sir, I should be glad to listen to some of these big business men, as I was glad to listen to George McCullagh yesterday, though he was not very complimentary to the Prime Minister, to myself or to anyone in this house. As I say, I should be glad to listen to the views of these men, because I think for the past twenty years, at least during my experience in public life, it has been too much of a habit on the part of too many big business men to condemn out of hand, as sort of half-witted men, those of us who dared go into public life, and I should like to know some of their reasons for so doing. When they get on the air, as George McCullagh did yesterday, we may hit back if we choose to do so. When they are deprived of that opportunity while others who have messages perhaps not so appropriate or not so sincere are permitted to broadcast them, then I do not believe the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation is carrying out its full duty. After all, if the radio is to be controlled in this manner we might well ask ourselves if it is the press that is going to be controlled next.

To show the foolishness of it all let us consider the position of George McCullagh. In a sense he owns the Toronto Globe and Mail. He is backed by one of the richest men in Canada, if not the richest; I refer to Bill Wright, who largely owns the Wright-Hargreaves mine. If McCullagh wants to do so he can not only publish his ideas in his own newspaper; he can broadcast them in every paper across Canada. He chose a very expensive method yesterday of circumventing the order of the radio corporation, and if he so desired he could do that on a very much more extensive scale. It seems to me that the whole ruling shows a lack of judgment which is not good for this country; that is my opinion for the present, at any rate, until I know more about the matter than I know at present.

We have to listen to all kinds of people on the air. Last night, in order to make myself forget the difficulties of my present position, I listened for a while to Jack Benny and Charlie McCarthy. After all, probably I profited more by listening to George McCullagh in the early afternoon than I did by listening to Charlie McCarthy in the evening, although I did not laugh so much at George. There are others who have been on the air for some years, and whom we could very well dispense with, much better than we could dispense with George McCullagh. For example, there is one commentator in the United States—I do not like to name him, because I am not sure enough of his name, though I think I know it—who was born in England but who came to the United States and became naturalized. Now, his chief pride is in abusing the British empire, abusing England, and telling about the tyrannies from which he escaped when he came to the United States. When I listen to a fellow of that sort talking over the air, across our country, as he has been, and giving opinions, it annoys me very much indeed. And when I listen, as I did during the international crisis of last September, over the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation network, under the same management, to broadcasts made by commentators from Germany who were giving nothing but the German aspect of the whole affair, it also makes my blood boil. Again

I say we are much safer in the hands of a man like George McCullagh than in the hands of men such as the two groups I mentioned a moment ago. And so I suggest that if there is to be any censorship such as this, the right hon. gentleman should forthwith have something in the way of a censorship broader than that which can be afforded by one man, no matter who or how able that one man may be.

I furthermore suggest, in view of other things which are being said about the radio corporation, that we should have set up this year a committee of the House of Commons to deal not only with the question of censorship but with other matters as well which affect the broadcasting corporation.

I now come to the question of unemployment. I shall deal with it more fully later; at this time I shall confine my observations to one paragraph in the speech from the throne dealing with that subject. The statement is made that under the British North America Act the responsibility for unemployment and the solution of its problems is necessarily divided. The legal responsibility is perhaps divided, but, sir, to a large extent the solution of the problem is the duty of this government and parliament. It was pointed out even by the Purvis commission appointed by the right hon. gentleman opposite—and I shall speak of it in greater detail later—that the financial responsibility for unemployment is a direct responsibility, and that that financial responsibility is federal, not provincial. The relief question, of course, is another question. But they have pointed out what I have now stated. So that when the suggestion is made that the responsibility is perhaps divided, I may agree so far as the question of legality is concerned, but I do not agree in toto so far as the responsibility for the cure of the condition is concerned.

I shall next deal with the paragraph referring to the royal commission on dominion-provincial relations, which is as follows:

> The report of the commission on dominion-provincial relations will be presented to parliament in the course of the present session. In accordance with the purpose for which the commission was instituted, its report will provide the basis for, and the material essential to the deliberations of a national conference, at which, among the important subjects to be dealt with, will be the problem of unemployment and social services generally.

This government has been in power nearly four years. We find that at the expiration of that period the government says, "We are going to call another national conference to tell the government and the members of the house what we must do about unemployment." This is the same government, led by the same right hon. gentleman, who was going to cure unemployment, and attacked us because we had not cured it.

Some hon. MEMBERS: No, no.

Mr. EULER: It was the other government.

Mr. MANION: I do not know what hon. gentlemen are cheering about. If they are applauding me, I appreciate it; but I did not catch what they said.

I repeat that this is the very government—all its members, and the right hon. gentleman particularly—which attacked us, over and over again in the house for our inability to cure unemployment. And now, after four years of power, it is going to call a national conference to tell it what to do about the problem! Well, I think almost any conference could tell it to do something much better than that which it has done. I make that statement frankly. It is a reflection upon itself to put it into the mouth of His Excellency the Governor General that it will have to call a conference.

Hon. gentlemen opposite reiterate their faith in unemployment insurance. Somewhere in the bible it is stated that faith without good works is dead. The right hon. gentleman opposite and his group for a long time have been reiterating faith in unemployment insurance, but this is still a faith without good works.

Another paragraph in the speech from the throne is in these words:

> It is also proposed to undertake, with provincial cooperation, to provide assistance to municipalities which, as an alternative to the provision of direct relief, desire to expand their normal programs of civic improvements.

May I point out to the right hon. gentleman that to-day very few municipalities in Canada can afford to do any such thing? Certainly all municipalities are taxed to death, because of relief costs. Certainly all municipalities are unable to cooperate financially with the dominion government or any other government in connection with a program of public works such as is proposed in the speech from the throne. I repeat what the Purvis commission said, namely, that the responsibility for the cure of unemployment is not municipal or provincial; it is federal.

I now come to another statement in the speech from the throne, and because I question it I shall read it. I know that if I am right in my conclusion the right hon. gentleman is mistaken, in good faith. If I am right, however, then he exaggerates by just about one hundred per cent. Here is the paragraph in question:

> Notwithstanding the embarrassments and handicaps encountered in coping with the problem of unemployment, it is gratifying to be able to record that, during the past year, there has been a material reduction in the number of those receiving agricultural aid, and a reduction also in the total number of those receiving public assistance due to unemployment and agricultural distress.

And then comes the part to which I draw particular attention and which I question:

> At the beginning of the present winter the number of those receiving such public assistance was almost forty per cent less than two years ago.

I do not know where the right hon. gentleman got his information but I could not get any such information as that. I have endeavoured honestly to get it, but the information given me is entirely at variance with this paragraph. I find in the report released by the Minister of Labour (Mr. Rogers) on January 14—only two days ago—that the total number on relief at the present time amounts to 809,000. So far as I have been able to ascertain—and there is some difficulty in getting actual facts—in November of 1936 there were 1,046,000 on relief. A comparison of the two figures indicates a decrease of only 22·68 per cent, not 40 per cent, as the right hon. gentleman has suggested.

I have no objection to the right hon. gentleman setting me right at the present time, if he knows how to do it, because I do not wish to misrepresent his position. But I know of no figures differing from those I have given. If the right hon. gentleman would prefer to substantiate his figures when he is on his feet, it will be all right with me. I must point out however that I am giving the figures I received, as I got them, and according to those figures the number on relief in November, 1938, as compared with the number in the same month of 1936, has been reduced by only 22·68 per cent. The right hon. gentleman may have been thinking of another month; that is possible. I do not know whether he did take a different month, and it is a fact that different months vary. I know only this, that I have given the facts as I received them. I believe November is the beginning of winter in Canada. Perhaps there was some such difference in some of the summer months, but in my comparison I am sticking to the beginning of winter, to his own words, "at the beginning of the present winter," and I repeat that winter in Canada begins about November. That is one statement in the speech from the throne to which I take exception, because it is not in accordance with the facts.

Then, in the same paragraph we find this:

> Over the same period the number of persons actually in employment has largely increased.

That of course is a period of two years. I admit the fact, but I also point out that according to the best authority I can get the number of unemployed also has increased.

The next paragraph begins in this way:

> Continuous improvement in the position of the fishing industry as a whole has been reflected—

And so on. That statement is very much disputed. There has been a great deal of dispute about the fishing industry. My opinion is that those engaged in the fishing industry would not agree that their conditions are much better, if indeed they are any better. It is reported by fishing people, particularly from around Nova Scotia, that a large portion of the population in that section of the country is in very bad shape, even in so far as earning a living is concerned.

There is one paragraph I miss from the speech from the throne of this year which did appear in the speech of last year, the one in which the right hon. gentleman boasted a little bit about conditions—and I do not use the term offensively. This paragraph appeared in the speech from the throne delivered on January 27, 1938:

> It is gratifying to note that, during the past year, there has been a further substantial advance in Canada's economic recovery. Revenues have reached new levels. Trade with other countries has materially expanded. There has been a general increase in employment and a marked decrease in the numbers receiving unemployment aid.

He did not mention that this year. He did not mention improved conditions; he could not truthfully do so, because conditions generally ha e gone back. My authority for this is not the Minister of Labour but my hon. friend the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Euler), who issued a statement around the turn of the year, as did a number of other ministers. He was quite right in doing that, but I should like to give a few quotations from his statement. He said that business had shown a slight falling off, that manufacturing had been slightly lower and that construction contracts were down 17 per cent. I might interject here that construction contracts never did go up very far. They have gone down despite the fact that they were well down anyway. He stated that the gross earnings of the railways were down $10,000,000 in the first ten months, and that retail sales were lower.

That does not quite agree with what the speech from the throne has to say. Naturally I have abbreviated the statements made by the Minister of Trade and Commerce. However, there was one thing that I missed in his statement. According to a statement put out last night, the pulp and paper business, part of the backbone of the industrial life of our country, is down twenty-eight per cent this year as compared with last year.

It is rather strange that the hon. gentleman did not mention the drop in total trade. According to my figures, which I believe are correct, the total trade of Canada, that is our imports and exports, was down $336,000,000 in 1938 as compared with 1937—quite a drop.

Only one industry in Canada seems to have improved, at least from the standpoint of production, and that is agriculture. I am not discussing prices now; I am referring only to production. Perhaps the mining industry may be up also, but I did not get the figures. Practically every line of agricultural production is up. It is a strange coincidence that this is the only industry with which this government has had nothing to do. In other words, providence has helped agriculture. The acts of this government have had an effect upon every other industry in Canada. Agriculture alone depends upon providence, and I think that industry ought to thank providence that it was not interfered with by the present government. I point this out because last year and every year since the right hon. gentleman and his government came into power he and his government have taken credit for the improved conditions.

An hon. MEMBER: Sure.

Mr. MANION: One of my hon. friends says "sure". All right, let him say "sure" when I finish this sentence. If they take credit for the improved conditions up to last year, then they must take the discredit for the adverse conditions of last year. I do not hear the hon. gentleman saying "sure" now.

When the hon. member for Brandon spoke this afternoon he made some comparisons between 1933, when we were in power, and the present time. The right hon. gentleman can do the same, but it is a most unfair comparison to make. We were in power for two years after 1933; we were in power until 1935. The great depression, perhaps the greatest that the world has ever known, certainly the greatest in a hundred years, started a year before this government went out of power in 1930 and continued until about the middle of 1933. It was not a Canadian depression, it was a world depression. According to the best statistics of the League of Nations, thirty million people were unemployed in the industrial countries of the world. There was a decrease in world trade of two-thirds; in 1933 world trade was only one-third of what it had been during the peak in 1929. I was in the house until 1935, and I well remember the right hon. gentleman and his supporters getting up over and over again to blame us for the depression. They did not give us much credit. Unfortunately for us we were in power only for three years or less after there had been an improvement, and then the right hon. gentleman and his government came into power in 1935. Conditions continued to improve for another year or year and a half, and then they turned back in 1937.

I point out that if the government of the present day is to take credit when conditions are good, it must take some discredit when conditions are bad. Since 1937 conditions have not been good in this country. But I intend to adopt a different attitude. I do not say that this government is totally to blame for the change in conditions in Canada. These conditions are world wide, as was the depression of 1929, which continued for two years and a half or three years during our regime from 1930 to 1933.

Apparently my hon. friends opposite feel a little guilty about taking the credit for the pick-up in business, because they are putting out excuses. I notice that four different statements have been issued. One was by the Minister of Finance (Mr. Dunning), an old and true friend of mine whom I am delighted to see back in his place and looking as well as he does; I hope his health continues to improve until it is once more one hundred per cent. But I want to say that even he put out a statement making excuses. The Minister of Trade and Commerce put out one, as did the Minister of Labour. These excuses for conditions were made I suppose because of guilty consciences for having taken credit for the pick-up in business.

This government is very strong on excuses. This government is very strong on propaganda. I mentioned before the fact that ten or a dozen of its ministers—there may be many more but all I could hunt up was that number —have made statements which were broadcast across the continent over the radio stating what good fellows they were. Floods of ballyhoo have issued forth about all kinds of matters. The people have been practically drowned in it. For example, take this trade treaty or trade agreement that has been entered into—I suppose the two words are more or less interchangeable. There was, as I say, such a flood of ballyhoo and propaganda about this agreement with the United States that the press release took, as I said a few moments ago, about forty-six pages of small print. Those who might have opposed the treaty were shocked into silence. Almost no one has attempted to state even a few truths about it. However, I have not been frightened off and I am going to say a few words. I think it is worth while for the house and the country to know something about it.

I shall endeavour at this time to show some of the weaknesses in this treaty. The government have attempted to show what they claim are its advantages, but no one in or out of the house is capable of judging at once the full effects of the treaty. Only time can tell. This probably gives my right hon. friend a little advantage, especially after the ballyhoo that has been issued, because he has the power to call an election before that necessary time has elapsed. But I am going to show a few of the weaknesses. I am not going to attempt a complete discussion of the matter; I shall make only a few general observations.

I want to state frankly that I believe in trade agreements. I believe that it is one of the methods by which we can build up world trade. Trade agreements are necessary under the conditions of to-day. The world is made up of interdependent countries. It is of advantage, not only to us but to the world generally, to build up trade, provided always that any trade agreement which is made is fair to both sides. I do not think we should try to take advantage of the other party to the agreement, but I believe we should get as fair a deal as he does. I do not question the statement that certain groups in this country are benefited by certain provisions of the agreement. But I say, Mr. Speaker, that we must consider this country, not as nine provinces, not as nine different nations, not as different sections or different groups, but as one nation. We must take the treaty as a whole and endeavour to see if it is just and fair to us. Let us see what the advantages are from the treaty as a whole, and not consider it simply from the standpoint of its effect upon, for example, the cattle raising industry of the west, which effect may be more than counterbalanced by the treaty's effect on some industry in the east, or on perhaps some other industry in the west.

There have been perhaps more or less sub rosa, many complaints against this treaty, but the industries of the country may have been too frightened to express their opinions about it. Some of them appear to think it would be more or less unpatriotic to express an opinion against the treaty. I shall deal with the patriotic side of it in a few moments.

To take a specific example, there came under my notice a protest which was being sent to the Minister of Finance (Mr. Dunning) from the boot and shoe industry, pointing out the great damage that was going to be done to it, and setting forth that imports of boots and shoes from the United States in 1938 were more than double the amounts imported from the United States during the previous year.

Mr. EULER: Less than two per cent of the consumption.

Mr. MANION: All right, perhaps, but we must not overlook the fact that every pair of boots and shoes that is imported from the United States takes work out of the hands of some of our Canadian workmen and food out of the mouths of some of our Canadian people. It was some of the people who manufacture boots and shoes in that part of the country from which the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Euler) comes who made this protest to the Minister of Finance.

Some hon. MEMBERS: No.

Mr. MANION: I saw the protest. I suggest this, that if our people were being charged more for Canadian boots and shoes, or if our boots and shoes were not the equal of the United States product, there might be some reason for encouraging imports; but my submission, and my personal observation, from what I have been able to observe on various trips to the United States, is that our Canadian boots and shoes are just as cheap and just as good as those made in the United States, so I cannot see any great advantage in damaging our own boot and shoe industry. I said that last year we imported from the United States twice as many boots and shoes as in the previous year, and my hon. friend the Minister of Trade and Commerce interjected that the imports were less than two per cent of the consumption. I do not know what the percentage is, and so I cannot quarrel with his statement. But I repeat that, without this new trade treaty, our imports of boots and shoes from the United States last year were twice what they were in the previous year, and under the new treaty our imports will probably be much greater than in the past.

Another Canadian industry that is going to be injured by this treaty is the textile industry, and injured not only by the United States but perhaps much more seriously by Japan, where women are paid five or six dollars a month and men twenty-five dollars a month for the ordinary type of labour. Our wages in Canada are many times that amount. But Japan gets the benefit of this treaty, as well as the United States, because the former is one of the favoured nations, and without doubt Japan's exports of textiles will seriously injure the textile industry of this country.

On the other hand take a natural product like potatoes. I have seen many articles in the press, and in particular one press release, with respect to the great gain it is going to be to Canada to have under this treaty an increased quota of Canadian potatoes going into the United States. I speak subject to correction, but well informed people in New Brunswick have told me that one county alone in that province could supply the whole quota of potatoes permitted to enter the United States from Canada. If the statement is not correct, people from New Brunswick can correct it. I am giving the house just what has been stated to me, that the quota allowed under the treaty is so small that the increase will make no great difference.

Time alone can tell what will be the results of this treaty, and we must just judge it as a whole. But there are a few outstanding facts about the treaty which I wish to mention.

Unless the increase in trade is sufficient to make it up, there will be a loss in revenue. Take, for instance, the three per cent excise tax, which is being removed from the articles included in the agreement, and which without doubt will have to be removed from a number of other articles. That tax brought in last year a revenue of just under $19,000,000. The Minister of Finance is probably beginning to worry where his revenues are going to come from. I think the removal of the three per cent excise tax will hurt Canada materially in the way of decreased revenues.

Another outstanding feature of the treaty of which everybody is aware but which should be emphasized, is the removal of the six cent preference on Canadian wheat which was obtained for Canada in 1932 at the empire conference in this city by the government of which I had the honour of being a member. To me the removal of that six cent preference is a serious matter. The history of preferences granted by Great Britain to Canada goes away back to the Liberal party under Fielding in 1897, and from 1897 right down to 1932 efforts were made by both Liberal and Conservative governments to obtain from the British something in the way of reciprocal preferences. The six cent preference on wheat, obtained in 1932 was an important one, but it has been wiped out by the treaty, and its removal will hit us in many ways. Perhaps the west are not objecting to this so much, may be on account of the fixed price on wheat; and after all it cannot affect the west very much this year. But there is this consideration, that every bushel of United States wheat that goes into the British market, the biggest wheat market in the world, and a great market for many other products, replaces just that much Canadian wheat. It means just that much more competition against Canadian wheat. It means just that much more Canadian wheat that we cannot sell because the United States raises the same type of wheat that we do.

But that is not the only disadvantage we suffer from the wiping out of this six cent preference on wheat. There is the question of how business going through our own Canadian ports will be affected. This very day I received a letter from the port of Saint John advising me that business through that port has fallen off markedly since this treaty went into effect, and undoubtedly all the ports of Canada—Montreal, Quebec, Saint John, Halifax, Vancouver—will be affected. Under the six cent preference on wheat, the grain had to go through Canadian ports. I well remember, coming as I do from the head of the lakes and knowing something of the wheat business, that before the war about two-thirds of our Canadian wheat instead of passing through Montreal or Saint John or Halifax went through Buffalo and New York. I tried to get the figures, but it is not easy to get them. I did not get the figures for before the war, but I got them from 1921 on. I find that in 1922—I take the worst year—only 29 per cent of Canadian wheat went through Canadian ports and 70 per cent through United States ports, whereas last year, 1938, eighty-two per cent of our Canadian wheat went through Canadian ports and only 15½ per cent through United States ports. That is a marked change. I am not going to give the figures for all the years, but I say that undoubtedly the removal of this six cent preference on Canadian wheat is going to hurt Canadian ports. Does anybody suggest that it is not going to do so? I cannot imagine that any such suggestion could be made.

Why, Mr. Speaker, the very day after the treaty was signed, word came from New York that the United States was going to get back their port business because of this removal of the six cent preference on wheat! Dow, Jones and Company, one of the best known financial news agencies in the United States, an agency with which everybody is familiar, was quoted in the Ottawa Journal of November 17 last in these words as forecasting what would happen as a result of the removal of the six cent preference.

> The agency said the result of the preference, in effect since the empire trade agreements of 1932, had been to divert most of the Canadian grain traffic from United States ports to Montreal, Saint John and Halifax.
> The agency said the move "is considered likely to restore to United States Atlantic ports a large share of the export grain traffic."

And it is doing it. And, Mr. Speaker, from Washington also on that same day there came out statements boasting of the improvement that would take place in the business of United States ports because of the loss of this six cent preference on Canadian wheat. Then we lose the sheltered market of the British wheat buyer, by long odds the greatest wheat buyer in the world.

There are some other commodities on which we also sustain a loss. Take the preference on fruit. The Minister of National Revenue (Mr. Ilsley) has felt a little worried from time to time regarding the ultimate effect on the Annapolis valley so far as apples are concerned. We have lost about half the preference on apples. We are also suffering in regard to pears, honey and frozen salmon. In other words, whatever else we can say about the treaty, the fact is that it is the death-knell of the preferential system under which we have been trading with Great Britain.

I have before me a United States business publication Business Week, and in the issue of November 26 the following statement appears:

> The British pact is more important diplomatically, but the biggest trade concessions are made in the Canadian pact. The two new pacts, while they do not wipe out the system of empire preferences which was set up in Ottawa in 1932, mark the first important move to break down that system.

That comment appearing in this United States business journal published in New York gives the United States view of the treaty, and I repeat that in breaking down the system we are breaking down a connection with the greatest market in the world. And for what are we giving up that system? We are giving it up for the most uncertain and erratic market in the world, that of the United States. There has been no other market for the sale of our goods in which Canada has had less assurance. All one has to do is review the history of our dealings with that country to the south.

In 1922 the United States adopted the Fordney-McCumber tariff, which was a tremendous slash at our exports to that market. In the year before that tariff was passed, that is to say, 1921, they were exporting to us nearly two dollars' worth of goods for every dollar's worth that we sold to them, and in spite of that discrepancy they passed the Fordney-McCumber tariff the following year. In 1921 we imported from them goods to the value of $856,000,000 and we exported to them $542,000,000 worth, giving us an adverse balance of $314,000,000. They increased their tariff against us at a time when hon. gentlemen opposite were in power, the same hon. gentlemen who constitute the government to-day. Again, take the Hawley-Smoot tariff. It is true that tariff was erected largely against the world as a whole; nevertheless, as the trade figures will show, it hit us very hard. I do not intend to give all the figures. The comparison was practically the same, showing an unfavourable balance so far as we were concerned, because our adverse balance was $364,000,000; that is to say, they were buying from us $364,000,000 less than we were buying from them at that time. And yet they raised the Hawley-Smoot tariff against us.

An hon. MEMBER: Did it make them prosperous?

Mr. MANION: That is not the question. My hon. friend will not divert me from my argument. Certainly it did not make us very prosperous. Can anyone suggest that a country of 125,000,000 or 130,000,000 people, who apparently resent the importation of Canadian goods, even to the amount of half as much as they export to us, to the extent of putting up trade barriers like the Hawley-Smoot and Fordney-McCumber tariffs, is a market upon which we can depend? Take the twelve months of 1938 as compared with the twelve months of 1937, and what do you find? In these past twelve months, just before the putting into effect of this agreement which has been signed by the right hon. gentleman and the United States representative, the figures show that we had a drop of $133,000,000 in exports to the United States. They dropped from $481,000,000 in the twelve months ending in November, 1937, to $348,000,000 in the twelve months ending in November, 1938, and that despite the 1935 agreement about which the right hon. gentleman has spoken so much. Before the 1935 agreement we had a balance of $1,000,000 in our favour in our trade with the United States, whereas last year there was a balance of $82,000,000 against us. Trade as a whole had increased, but we had a balance of $82,000,000 against us. It will take more than half the gold produced in this country to meet that balance against us. Does anyone suggest that it is good for us to sell to that huge country less than they buy from us? The Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner), who was in the west at the same time as I was, pointed out, in the course of a speech in criticism of myself, that exports and imports of Canada had increased since 1935. That is true in general, because world trade had been increasing from 1933 on. But if the 1935 treaty was so good, why is it that our adverse balance has been getting larger and larger?

It is the same old story. Every time this government deals with the United States it gets the worst of the deal. Usually my hon. friends opposite give two for one; and it will be found, when this trade agreement can be properly evaluated over a period of time, that we shall have suffered in the same way as we have always done whenever the government led by the right hon. gentleman has dealt with the United States.

Let me give another interesting figure. In the last twelve months ending in November, 1938, we bought from the United States $40 worth per capita—it may be a little more or a little less, $39 or $41. How much did they buy from us? They bought $3.50 worth per head of population.

Mr. EULER: That is not a fair comparison.

Mr. MANION: Why not? What is wrong with it? I do not see anything unfair about it. I can see no reason why one Canadian should buy eleven times as much as an American buys from Canada. But that is precisely what happens when my hon. friends opposite deal with the United States.

An hon. MEMBER: One rabbit, one horse.

Mr. MANION: We get the rabbit and they get the horse. We buy eleven times more per capita from the United States people than they buy from us. I cannot see anything unfair in the comparison. I submit that it is perfectly fair.

Take the three per cent excise tax. As I have said, last year it brought in $18,000,000 or $19,000,000. Those who have read the treaty carefully will remember that this three per cent excise tax was taken off only the items in the schedule. That is correct; the Minister of Finance (Mr. Dunning) nods. As a result it created a most ridiculous situation. For example, a friend of mine who looked into the matter points out that the tax was taken off mushrooms and cut flowers but was left on all sorts of necessities of life. According to the press it was also pointed out emphatically to the Minister of Finance, by letter and telegram, that this would be most unfair to Canadian manufacturers, owing to the fact that because the removal of the three per cent tax applied only to items in the schedule, Canadian manufacturers were still faced with the tax on their raw materials, whereas finished products entering into competition with their goods in other countries enjoyed the removal of the tax. It was a most unfair position for the manufacturers to be placed in and they protested most strenuously to the Minister of Finance. Let me read a statement from one of the morning papers. The following appeared on November 23, a few days after the treaty was concluded:

> Communications have been pouring into the finance department from manufacturers protesting the tax on raw materials when the finished product is relieved of taxation.

A perfectly just protest, I think, and the Minister of Finance no doubt agreed, because he issued this statement:

> The government has had under consideration the situation that will arise with the removal of the 3 per cent special excise tax from the articles enumerated in section 1 of the new trade agreement with the United States. The government will make certain when the necessary legislation is introduced that it will be of such a character as to eliminate any unfairness that might otherwise be expected to result from the exemption from the tax of the particular articles enumerated in the agreement.

All right. Since the treaty is signed and has been in effect since the first of the month I agree that the Minister of Finance is quite right in making that correction. I do not quarrel with that at all; but I say that by making that correction this government is handing to the United States another concession of great import, and incidentally handing another concession to all the twenty-five or thirty other most favoured nations with which we deal. But did this government when dealing with the British and United States governments tell them that in addition to the concessions mentioned in the agreement they were going to add the concessions to these other countries? They did not tell the people of Canada until some days later, when the matter was drawn to their attention. Did they know they had to make these concessions? I do not think so.

Mr. DUNNING: I know my hon. friend does not want to proceed on a wrong premise. The treaty itself does not as of January 1 remove the three per cent special excise tax from anything. The treaty merely says that the government of Canada will propose to the Canadian parliament legislation which will have the effect of removing the special excise tax on those articles. So that to-day while the treaty is in effect with respect to its tariff provisions, it is not in effect at all and was never intended to be in effect with respect to the three per cent special excise tax until this parliament has acted with respect to that. I assure my hon. friend that all the negotiating parties were quite aware of that throughout the whole proceedings.

Mr. MANION: I understand that. That is nothing new. I did not say the three per cent tax removal was in effect. I said the treaty was in effect, and the cancellation of the three per cent special excise tax does not come into effect except by legislation of this parliament. But does my hon. friend suggest that, having promised in the treaty that they would submit the matter to this house, if they failed to carry that provision they would not look upon it as a complete defeat of their government? Certainly not; they will put it through. In other words, it is as good as done.

Mr. DUNNING: If my hon. friend will permit me, that was not the point. What my hon. friend has just said is quite correct. My point is that any addition to the items mentioned in the schedule of the treaty to which the removal of the excise tax will apply is not in itself a matter of treaty but a matter in the judgment of this government and of this house.

Mr. CAHAN: It is a matter of international agreement and international honour.

Mr. DUNNING: No; the international agreement applies simply and solely to the items mentioned in the schedule.

Mr. CAHAN: But there is a promise collateral thereto that the three per cent excise will be removed.

Mr. DUNNING: No—

Mr. MANION: Mr. Speaker, I think this is my speech. I do not mind interruptions, but I do not want speeches interjected in the midst of mine. I understand just as well as the Minister of Finance the facts as he puts them. I did not say anything to the contrary. I said the treaty is in effect from January 1. I take it for granted that the removal of the three per cent excise tax has to be a matter of legislation by this parliament. But I was pointing out that in addition to the products mentioned in this treaty from which the three per cent excise tax is to be removed there will be a number of other products, not mentioned in the treaty, from which the tax will be removed. And I ask this question, whether the British knew this and understood that a number of other concessions were to be given? Did the people of the United States know; did we know, that we were going to give a number of other concessions? My suspicion is that we did not, that there was a lot of bungling done. Now they find, after having made concessions of the utmost importance not only to the United States but to Japan, Germany and Italy, the three dictator nations, that they are going to have to make more and get nothing in return; that when they bring in this treaty and deal with it in this house they will have to submit a long list, probably much longer than that in the treaty itself, of materials and articles from which the three per cent excise tax will be totally eliminated. What return are we getting for that extra concession to the United States? And, what is worse, what return are we getting for that concession to the other favoured nations? We have most favoured nation clauses in our treaties with some twenty-five or thirty other nations. Three of the outstanding nations which receive this most favoured nation treatment, in other words which get the same concessions as the United States by virtue of this agreement, without giving anything in return for them, are Germany, Italy and Japan, the three dictatorships. What do they give in return for getting the same concessions as we are handing to the United States at the present time? What do we get from Germany, Italy and Japan more than we have already been getting from those countries? Those three countries which have been disturbing the peace of the world for the past two or three years get the same concessions that we are giving to the United States. And what do we get in return? We do not get anything so far as I know.

Mr. EULER: May I answer that in regard to one country we would receive this: If Germany did obtain any benefit—and I do not think she will obtain any benefit whatever—by reason of being a most favoured nation, we shall sell more goods to her, because she is bound under our agreement to provide exchange to an amount at least equal to the amount of the purchases we make from her.

Mr. MANION: But that gives her favours anyway. Germany wants foreign exchange; she is having great trouble getting it at the present time. And what do we get from Italy and Japan? My hon. friend has not answered that. We do not get anything. A little more exchange in regard to Germany, but that is exactly what Germany is fighting for all the time.

Mr. EULER: They have increased their purchases from us by over 100 per cent.

Mr. MANION: I did not look up the figures, but I know very well it is not a very good bargain when you hand out these concessions to twenty-five or thirty nations who give nothing in return to the people of this country, especially when you have a tariff system under which you can ask something in return. Evidently this government works on the principle that it is more blessed to give than to receive, forgetting the other principle that charity begins at home. I submit also that, as many others have said on other occasions, it might be well to attend to the straightening out of this most favoured nation business, because I do not believe any government should be handing out favours to countries which are not asked to give anything in return. I am not questioning that there are advantages in this agreement; it would be a queer kind of agreement if it did not produce any benefit. But when the losses and gains are weighed, my submission is that there is grave doubt of the advantages being more than the disadvantages so far as we are concerned.

I want to deal with another aspect which has been greatly stressed. One speaker who preceded me, I think the hon. member for Brandon (Mr. Matthews), spoke of it this afternoon, and it is mentioned in the speech from the throne; that is the supposedly patriotic ground on which we should receive the gift of this trade agreement. In the speech from the throne it is stated that this treaty will further the ends of international goodwill. Perhaps it will. I am not going to quarrel with that statement, but I do not think the fact that we make a trade treaty with some countries is going to further the ends of international goodwill. The implication is—and it has been advanced and fostered by members of the government—that on account of our having a trade treaty with the United States, therefore the United States is going to be very much more friendly to the British Empire than in the past, and if there should be international difficulties, the United States will be much more ready to jump in and fight for the British Empire than it has been in the past. That is the suggestion, that because of this treaty the United States is going to be very much more inclined to tie itself up to the empire for war purposes. I do not admit any such suggestion. Does the Prime Minister think that is true?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I will answer my hon. friend later on. I do not want to interrupt him.

Mr. MANION: Perhaps it is just as well. No doubt the right hon. gentleman thinks it is true, or pretends he thinks it is true, which I suppose comes to the same thing. But I should like to point out that the United States has trade treaties with nineteen or twenty different countries. I jotted them down this afternoon, and they include a trade treaty with Czechoslovakia. They had that treaty before the trouble which arose last year. Did anybody notice the United States jumping into armour to go and fight for Czechoslovakia? The only thing I heard from the United States was a great deal of abuse heaped upon Neville Chamberlain for bringing about peace because, as they said, he was selling out the democracies. They have trade treaties with Belgium, with Sweden, with The Netherlands and with France. Does anybody suggest that if Germany should choose to invade Sweden or Belgium or The Netherlands, the United States are going to fight any more readily because they happen to have a trade treaty? My impression is that all this is just so much twaddle. Incidentally, we have twenty-five or thirty trade treaties with other countries, including Germany, Italy and Japan. Does the fact that we have trade agreements with these dictator nations make us any the less likely to oppose their ideas or their principles of dictatorships? Does it make it at all likely that we are going to favour them if there is any international trouble? Why to me, I repeat, the whole idea of putting the matter on patriotic grounds is just so much twaddle. I do not think trade is based on patriotic grounds; trade is carried on under business principles. The trouble is that the people of the United States—and again I say this without disrespect, because I am very fond of them—are very close traders. They are hard-headed business men, and when they trade with this government or at least this group they always get the best of it. That is the principle they work on, and they carry it through.

It has been said that, because of the claim that on patriotic grounds this treaty is going to help the empire, the agreement may be the issue at the next election. Until the recent imbroglio in Ontario there was the suggestion that national unity might be the issue. Well, sir, this government is not going to choose the issue. That will be done by the people; that has been done by the people already, and the issue is going to be the record of this government, its activities and its masterly inactivity, to my mind much more inactive than masterly. What I suggest is that we should have less ballyhoo and propaganda, fewer excuses, less boasting, more facts, and particularly more action. The trouble with this government is that it got elected and then went to sleep; or, if I might use Mitch's phrase, it pulls up the blind, takes a peep out, then goes back and hibernates for another three weeks. I like to quote Mitch because he is good when he is expressing his opinion of his friends.

Let me repeat that I quite agree that trade agreements are good, as long as they are on a fair basis; but so far as I am concerned I want to see them on such a basis. I want to see Canada get at least as fair a deal as the other side, and I doubt very much if we got it in this case. After all, one of the great objects of a tariff is to further trade with other nations; that is, to bring about trade agreements with other countries. You can saw off this tariff or the other and you get some concession in return. One of the great disadvantages in a country which attempts to operate on the basis of free trade is that it has nothing with which to bargain. We have a tariff with which we can bargain, and I think we should bargain a little harder.

Speaking of the tariff let me say that I believe in the tariff system, not only because the tariff is an instrument with which we can bargain but because I think it protects our industry against the unfair competition of countries such as Japan, where wages and standards of living are so low. It protects our labour from that sort of competition and helps our people to retain their jobs. It protects agriculture against unfair competition from certain sections of the United States, for example, where the climate is quite different from ours, and it builds up markets for the farmer in our own country. Indeed, we know that our agricultural products have been sold in our own markets to the extent of something like ninety per cent over the year.

I do not admit the truth of the idea, which is so prevalent, that because we have a tariff it necessarily follows that prices of goods are increased. In some instances that is undoubtedly so; we can all think of certain items on which prices have been raised by this means, but that is not always the case. I do not travel north and south as much as some of my hon. friends opposite; but occasionally I do go to the United States for a holiday, and time after time I have made it my business to compare prices of goods of like quality. Very often I have found prices much lower in Canada than in the United States, despite the fact that we may have had a tariff of thirty or thirty-five per cent in this country. I could mention various lines of goods. I referred to boots and shoes a short time ago. I could mention automobile tires, made by the same company, with a thirty per cent duty against them coming into Canada from the United States. I found that I could buy these tires in Fort William for less than I had to pay for them in Chicago. I could refer to good woollen clothing, which is undoubtedly cheaper in Canada than in the United States, and so on down the line. The idea, as put forth by some, that because you have a duty of thirty per cent on a certain article therefore you pay thirty per cent more for it in your own country, is, in my opinion, quite wrong, and it is not borne out by the facts; it is not true.

It is not for the purpose of raising prices that we have a tariff system; it is in order that we may hold our own Canadian markets. That is the reason for a tariff system. But I believe that if the system we have in this country permits people to be exploited, and if industry does exploit the people of Canada, then those tariffs should be removed, whoever may be the producer. To-day we must have a tariff; practically every country in the world has one. It is true that Great Britain was a free trade country from 1846 until some time after the war, but it is now highly protectionist. The other day out of curiosity I looked up the customs revenues of Great Britain and Canada and found that last year Great Britain collected in this manner some £210,000,000, or over a thousand million dollars, which works out at about $25 per head. In Canada we collected about $91,000,000, which works out at about $8.50 per head. In other words, to-day Great Britain is collecting just about three times as much per head in customs duties as we are. As I have said, to-day practically all the countries of the world are protectionist, and that is one reason why I believe in the tariff system. I mention that because it is a system under which we can trade on a fair basis with the United States, a system under which Canada can get a fair deal, if in dealing with the United States the Canadian ministers and their assistants hold out for a good, straight, business transaction.

I am now going to leave the trade treaty. I have made a good many general remarks about it, but undoubtedly we shall deal with it more fully when it is up for discussion here. Even then, if it is discussed, as the right hon. gentleman suggested the other day, as soon as this debate is over, I do not think we shall be able to judge as to its merits or demerits, though I anticipate that we shall hear from some men, coming from various sections of the country, interested in certain industries, who may feel that they have been benefited or hurt.

But the real charge against this government is that apparently it absolutely fails to realize Canadian conditions. Despite all the statements made by the Prime Minister prior to the election of 1935, some of which I shall quote, and which tended to show that apparently he understood conditions in Canada, the government he now heads has given no indication that it really understands Canadian conditions. There has been a decided lack of action towards rectifying these conditions and no indication that there has been any planned method through which rectification could be brought about. The right hon. gentleman has been following a sort of hit-and-miss policy. That fact is evidenced in the speech from the throne when we find that to-day, after almost four years in office, he considers it necessary, upon receiving the report of the commission on dominion-provincial relations, to call a national conference to discover what is wrong with Canada. To my mind the greatest charge which can be made against the government is that it is continually broadcasting the information that all is well in Canada when, in fact, all is not well.

I am not by any means a pessimist. In fact, speaking generally, I believe I may be classed as a pretty good optimist, but I do say that throughout Canada to-day there is unrest, discontent and disharmony to an extent which perhaps has never before existed. I see unemployment to the extent of hundreds of thousands—not 125,000 as was published in a statement released a few days ago by the Minister of Labour (Mr. Rogers). It is true that he has said there are 125,000 people on relief. The unfortunate part of it is that the press pick up that figure and tell the country that there are only 125,000 unemployed in Canada. I have one such statement before me, and I could have brought many more. In making such a statement the Minister of Labour is not frank with the people, and I would point out that statements such as the one I have indicated should be corrected. It is not a fair deal. I do not impute motives, but I must say that such statements hoodwink many of the people. In one of the packages on my desk I have an item stating that there are only 125,000 unemployed. The information is published in that form when, as a matter of fact, the best information I can obtain from the statistics branch operated by the government is to the effect that last month there were 398,000 unemployed in Canada—not 125,000, but 398,000—plus any figure you may wish to add to include the youth who have never been employed. Partly because of a seasonal change there are 50,000 or 75,000 more unemployed to-day than there were last month.

The bureau of statistics estimate that there are 64,000 youth who have never been employed. For the youth congress in Toronto a gentleman named Woodsworth has made an estimate of something like 400,000. As I have stated, however, the figure given by the government bureau stands at 64,000, a most optimistic figure, and represents the number of young men who have never worked. So, if hon. members will add this 64,000 to 398,000, the official estimate, they will get a figure well over 450,000, a figure nearly four times the one given by the Minister of Labour.

I do not wish to misrepresent the position taken by the minister. He refers in the press release to "unemployed but fully employable persons on aid" in October—

Mr. ROGERS: On relief. They were the ones on relief.

Mr. MANION: I have explained that fully; I do not wish to misrepresent the minister's position. That is the number on relief. But the point I make is that that is not a fair type of statement to offer the people of Canada when actually there are 398,000. And you could add to that figure almost any additional number to include the young men in Canada who have never worked, a group which the youth congress estimated at 400,000.

It is almost impossible to get proper unemployment figures. That is a complaint which the right hon. gentleman has made against us, and at a later time I shall quote him. It was he who said that we should have something by way of registry. Where is the registry to-day? Yet he said four years ago that that was needed. Where is the present registry of unemployed? My secretary and I spent hours trying to get honest figures of unemployment because I do not wish to misrepresent anything. I suggest that if the Minister of Labour wishes to be completely frank with the people of Canada, he should in the future publish not only the number of unemployed on relief but also the number of unemployed in the country. We must remember there are tens of thousands, possibly hundreds of thousands, of people in the country who are out of employment but will not go on relief if they can get along without it. I say therefore that we should avoid misrepresentation. No doubt the misrepresentation by the Minister of Labour was made unconsciously, but I suggest it should be made known that there are 398,000 unemployed, plus the number of unemployed youth who have never earned anything. May I add that to-day ninety per cent of the unemployed are willing to work.

There is another way of checking unemployment figures. I have before me figures of the unemployed in trade unions of Canada between 1935 and 1938. I am not sure as to the author, but the figures are official. They say that unemployment among members of trade unions in the month of November, 1938, was greater than in any previous November as far back as 1935, when this government took office.

There are other ways of estimating the numbers of unemployed, but I shall not labour the point, or go into further detail. I submit, however, that in future the figures should be corrected, and I shall look forward to such correction. Because of these hundreds of thousands of unemployed there is fear, discontent and demoralization throughout the country, particularly among our youth. Is that a healthy condition in which to exist? The present leader of the government knew those conditions in 1935, and I shall prove that statement from his own mouth. I have in my hand a little book entitled Mackenzie King To The Canadian People, 1935.

An hon. MEMBER: That will be good.

Mr. MANION: It will be good; the hon. member is right. It is one of the best books I have read. In fact, I would place it among the productions of the humorists of our country. Had I had a weak heart I believe I should have laughed myself to death as I read it; fortunately my heart is quite strong. The book is so full of good things I hate to begin it at a time so near recess. If my right hon. friend would permit me to discuss it in one piece after dinner, I should be pleased.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I would do anything to oblige the hon. member.

At six o'clock the house took recess.

After Recess

The house resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. MANION: Mr. Speaker, when the house adjourned at six o'clock I was referring to the pleasure I had gained from reading this latest published book of the right hon. leader of the government. He, like myself, has revealed the weakness that induces a man to write. Somebody has said oh that mine enemy should write a book. The right hon. gentleman has been weaker than I because he has written a number, but I am quite sure that when he had these statements put into book form he was not counting on its being read the way it will be to-night. This book was put out for the delectation of the people before the last election. I suppose that all of us get a little exuberant at times when elections are coming on.

I do not intend by any means to read all this book this evening. Do not be afraid that I am going to quote all the fifty-six pages, but I do intend to give occasional extracts from it in the hope that there will be brought back to the mind of my right hon. friend some of the pledges he made to the people of this country. Perhaps he will be given an opportunity between now and the time he goes out of power next year to put some of these pledges into effect. I am not going to quote this book in any particular order; I shall refer to just those parts that come up from page to page.

On page eight the right hon. gentleman refers to the years of depression during the Conservative regime. For example, he says:

> It will be found that, for the most part, third parties owe their origin to one or other of two causes. They are bred of hard times, or of quarrels.

That is interesting. Then he goes on:

> Third parties, in Canada, have invariably had their rise during years of Conservative administration. These have been years of depression, due, in large part, to reactionary policies.

He forgets that during his own regime there have been years of depression. Certainly the past year has not been quite as prosperous as the previous one. He goes on:

> As Conservative administrations have given place to Liberal administrations, the country, through the substitution of Liberal for Conservative policies, has been brought out of depression into prosperity. With returning prosperity, discontent has vanished, and with it the third parties, which discontent had helped to bring into being.

Discontent may have vanished, but at the present time there are a good many signs of discontent in the country. Not only is there discontent in the country, but there is discontent in the party opposite. On page ten he said:

> With the return of a Liberal administration to office, and the adoption of Liberal policies, carried out on broad and generous lines, and with more concern for human relations, than for the methods of big business, and of high finance, and of high pressure salesmanship, there is no reason why this period of depression should not be followed by a new era of prosperity; and why the unrest and discontent, which have brought these third parties into being, and to which they owe their existence, should not also disappear.

Just listen to that.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Mr. MANION: I have not noticed any diminution in the number of parties. They still go on.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. MANION: The hon. member (Mr. Stevens) has seen the error of his ways and has come back to the party to which he always belonged. But other parties such as the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation, the Aberhart social credit party and various others still go on. It does not look as though the number of parties were decreasing. As I read these references to human relations, big business, high finance and high pressure salesmanship, I can hear the right hon. gentleman rolling these phrases over his tongue. I repeat that the unrest and discontent which was to disappear, has not disappeared.

Turning over a few pages I find on page 19 the beginning of his second address, made on August 2, 1935. He said:

Ladies and gentlemen: The Liberal party does not stand before the electorate in this campaign with an armful of promises, nor upon a platform of assurances—

An hon. MEMBER: Hear, hear.

Mr. MANION: Who said, "hear, hear?"

An hon. MEMBER: Everybody.

Mr. MANION: Everybody! Well, it is easily seen how forgetful are hon. members opposite. I am going to refer to a few of the promises the right hon. gentleman made. He said:

The Liberal party does not stand before the electorate in this campaign with an armful of promises, nor upon a platform of assurances, constructed expressly for the purpose of a general election.

Oh, no, the Liberal party is too high-minded for that.

It believes the public is heartily sick of that kind of thing.

I shall deal with this later. I do not intend at this time to read the long list of promises which the right hon. gentleman made and which appear a little later in his book, but I shall name them just as I pass along. He advocated control of currency and credit. He was going to bring about social justice. He was going to wipe out trusts, combines, and mergers. He was going to bring about harmony and cooperation. He did not. He was going to appoint an investment control board. Where is it? He was going to cure unemployment. Where is that? He was going to bring about prosperity. He was going to wipe out third parties.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Where does it say that he was going to cure unemployment?

Mr. MANION: I shall quote it when it suits me. I am making a speech at the present time. The right hon. gentleman would not answer me this afternoon, and I shall treat him in the same way. I shall quote these things as I go along. He was going to wipe out third parties. He was going to have a more equitable distribution of wealth.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Where does it say he was going to wipe out third parties?

Mr. MANION: I just read it. The right hon. gentleman is almost as much asleep in this house as he is about the affairs of this country.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Well, now, he is awake.

Mr. MANION: I shall have to quote it again. I did not want to repeat this, but apparently the right hon. gentleman likes his book. This is what he said at page eight:

Third parties, in Canada, have invariably had their rise during years of Conservative administration. These have been years of depression, due, in large part, to reactionary policies.

Then a little later on he says:

As Conservative administrations have given place to Liberal administrations, the country, through the substitution of Liberal for Conservative policies, has been brought out of depression into prosperity. With returning prosperity, discontent has vanished, and with it the third parties, which discontent had helped to bring into being.

What about all these parties?

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. MANION: The hon. gentleman's party was the fifth or sixth party. What about the third and fourth parties of which the right hon. gentleman speaks? I think, however, I have proved that I was right in quoting my right hon. friend. He promised that there would be a more equitable distribution of wealth. He even went so far, not in this book but in other places, as to say that proportional representation would apply. I have quoted fifteen different promises, and I could quote many more. One promise was that the Liberal party would continue the Liberal policy of British preference. Well, the Liberal policy of British preference has been practically wiped out by this particular trade treaty or agreement.

Some hon. MEMBERS: No.

Mr. MANION: Oh, yes. The British preference has been practically wiped out.

If it has not been wiped out entirely, it is so close to being wiped out that there is really no difference. That preference was obtained by the Conservative party in 1932, and yet the right hon. gentleman and his party, by means of this trade agreement with the United States, has practically wiped it out. This afternoon I quoted different United States statements on that.

Then the right hon. gentleman said that he was going to control credit. This is what he said:

> The Liberal party believes that credit is a public matter, not of interest to bankers only, but of direct concern to the average citizen. It stands for the immediate establishment of a properly constituted national central bank, to perform the functions of rediscount, and the control of currency issue, considered in terms of public need.

We established the central bank.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: No.

Mr. MANION: We established the central bank.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Not a government owned bank.

Mr. MANION: I admit that the right hon. gentleman has changed the control over some of the stock. The government now has control over all the stock; but as far as the control of the central bank is concerned, I venture to assert that there is no more control to-day than there was before the stock was taken over by the government. The central bank is being run to-day, and rightly so, as it has always been run, from the office of Mr. Towers. Unfortunately the Minister of Finance (Mr. Dunning) has been ill for the last six months, and I venture to say that during that time nobody opened his mouth to the central bank about the control of currency and credit.

Mr. DUNNING: I assure my hon. friend he is quite wrong.

Mr. MANION: My hon. friend was sick, and I do not understand how he knows so much about the situation.

Mr. DUNNING: I was not as sick as that.

Mr. MANION: I quote again, not because I wish to criticize but because I think it should be repeated. The right hon. gentleman said:

> Let me repeat what I said in parliament, in protesting against the surrender, to a private institution, of the state's control over the nation's currency and credit: "Once a nation parts with the control of its currency and credit, it matters not who makes the nation's laws. Usury, once in control, will wreck any nation. Until the control of the issue of currency and credit is restored to government, and recognized as its most conspicuous and sacred responsibility, all talk of the sovereignty of parliament and of democracy is idle and futile."

That is a popular quotation from the right hon. gentleman's statement, and it is well put, just as he always puts things very well; but so far as any practical application of it is concerned, I do not think there has been one one-hundredth per cent of it put into effect.

Then he says, dealing with the control of investments, and what he says in this book is absolutely refuted by the inaction of the government:

> The Liberal party believes the financial mismanagement of industry is largely responsible for many conditions obtaining to-day.
> To prevent exploitation of the public through the sale of watered stocks and worthless securities, it believes an investment control board should be established, with supervision of issues of securities by companies incorporated under federal charters.

Where is that investment control board? Is that not a promise? Why do not hon. gentlemen opposite say "hear, hear," now? That is a distinct promise, and there is no sign of its ever being put into effect.

On the next page he says:

> Democratization of industry. The Liberal party believes that industrial reconstruction is the problem of the future. It will seek in industrial relations, as opportunity offers, to give to workers and consumers a larger share in the government of industry.
> On the subject of industrial reconstruction, I shall have much to say throughout the campaign.

If there has been any more control of industry since this government came into power than before, I should like to know where it has been.

Then the right hon. gentleman delivers this old statement:

> Liberalism stands, as always, for the principle of a free parliament, and for the supremacy of parliament.

When was parliament not supreme in this country? It has been supreme ever since 1867. What did my right hon. friend mean? When was parliament not free?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I shall reserve my remarks until later.

Mr. MANION: It is perhaps just as well. The parliament of Canada has always been in control. There has not been a minute since 1867 when it has not been in control. No matter how much the right hon. gentleman talks about dictators or a one-man government, parliament has always been in control in this dominion and is in control to-day; at least it could be if it were to put out of office a government that has shown itself so futile in relieving the troubles of this country. This is another delectable bit from the right hon. gentleman.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Finish reading the last one.

Mr. MANION: I am not going to read the whole book, because if I did I should laugh myself to death, as I said this afternoon.

This is another quotation from the next page:

The Liberal party believes the aim of every government should be the balancing of its budget.

This government has not got very close to balancing its budget. He goes on:

It would seek to effect that end, by retrenchment of public expenditures—

Never have public expenditures been so heavy as since this government came into power, and I do not notice any denials coming from the other side of the house.

The right hon. gentleman went on:

—by reduction of principal and interest on the public debt—

There has been a certain reduction of interest, but we were taking action in that regard before we went out of power. Every government has done that, by the process of refunding. He went on:

—by a reduction in taxation—

When has there been any reduction in taxation? There has been an increase in the sales tax since this government came into power, but I do not know of any tax that has been taken off. The right hon. gentleman goes on:

—and by increased revenues through the encouragement of trade.

There has been an increase in the revenues; but increased revenues certainly mean increased taxation, and these increased revenues must come out of the pockets of the people. Then he said:

The government will seek to effect a reduction of the cost of government in Canada by a careful inquiry into federal, provincial and municipal costs.

When was that inquiry made? It has not been made. The right hon. gentleman goes on:

The record of Liberal administrations in the reduction of expenditures, taxation, debt and interest, and in transforming deficits into surpluses, is the best guarantee that Liberal policies, if given their opportunity, will be able again to achieve these results.

There has been no reduction in taxation. On the other hand there has been an increase in the sales tax; the cheque tax is still on; the three cents postage is still on; the sugar tax is still on. In the next budget something may be done by way of reductions in view of the possibility of an election, but that is the only hope the people have of getting a reduction in taxation.

But this is something more than the right hon. gentleman said; this is a sweet bit:

More equitable distribution of wealth. The Liberal party recognizes that the problem of distribution has become more important than that of production and believes that personality is more sacred than property.

That is a discovery! He goes on:

It will devote itself to finding ways and means of effecting a fair and just distribution of wealth with increasing regard to human needs, to the furtherance of social justice, and to the promotion of the common good.

Human needs! Social justice! The common good! How those terms would roll over the right hon. gentleman's tongue when he was speaking over the radio! I myself was trying to gain a few votes for others at that time, but I did not succeed very well. He did. Social justice! The right hon. gentleman, when out of power, has been the greatest reformer the country has ever produced; but when in office he has been the greatest reactionary we have ever had. Out of office he is a theoretical reformer; in office he is a practical reactionary.

A little further down on the same page he says:

To-night, I hope I have answered, once and for all, the unwarranted and unworthy charge, so often made by our political opponents, that the Liberal party has no policy.

Well, Mr. Speaker, the Liberal party has had so much policy that nobody knows what it has had. It has had plenty of policy, all right, but it has lacked the principle of putting the policy into effect. Like the old woman in the shoe, it had so many policies it did not know what to do. That analogy is not quite correct; for the old woman in the shoe was dealing with children, and the Prime Minister, being a bachelor, would not, of course, adopt children. But if he did adopt children and treated them as he has treated his own policies, he would be arrested for cruelty. Or if he treated that dog of his as he has treated his own policies, he would be arrested for cruelty to animals.

I think it was Mr. Bourassa who said in this house that the only principle the Liberal party had was to have no principles, and it was Mr. Fielding who said—I think I have heard him say it in this house—that a platform was to get in on, but not to stand on. The principles which the right hon. gentleman is expounding in this little booklet remind me of that southern politician who said, "Them's my principles, but if you do not like them, I can change them."

Let me now deal with the question of unemployment. Speaking on August 5, 1935, the right hon. gentleman said:

> Ladies and gentlemen . . . unemployment is Canada's most urgent national problem. You do not need to be told that.

He repeats that in this book over and over again, and with that statement I wholly agree; it is just as true to-day as when he said it on August 5, 1935.

Mr. SPENCE: More true to-day.

Mr. MANION: Yes, perhaps more true. On the next page the right hon. gentleman, speaking of our government, says:

> One thing the government might have done, but which has never been properly done, is to have supplied parliament and the country with accurate information, year by year, as to the numbers of unemployed and the numbers on relief. There is nothing, even to-day, in the nature of national registry.

That is as true to-day as when he said it.

Some hon. MEMBERS: No, no.

Mr. MANION: There has been no national registry. I spent days trying to get legitimate and accurate figures. I pointed out this afternoon that the figure which the Minister of Labour has been giving was 125,000 of unemployed on aid, whereas the actual number of unemployed is 450,000. If there is such a thing as a registry, I should like to know where it is, because I do not want to waste as much time as I have had to do in the last few days in order to get figures that are dependable.

The right hon. gentleman went on to say:

> The statistical departments of the government have never been given the necessary instructions or authority to collect detailed information.

They have exactly the same instructions to-day. There has been no change whatever in the instructions to the statistical departments, and no change in their methods of keeping these figures.

On the next page the right hon. gentleman says:

> In order to conceal the growing magnitude of the problem, and, at the same time, its own growing incapacity to deal with it, the government either did not seek to obtain information which, at all times, should have been available to the people's representatives in parliament, or it deliberately withheld such information as it had from them.

We are in exactly the same position now. The government may be able to get better information than I can, but I am a member of this house and I cannot get the information. I was able to get it only after running around to the labour department, the statistical branch, the national welfare council and various other bodies, and then finally I got something in the way of an estimate that was in no way different from the estimates we had when we were in power. To use his own words, is it to conceal the growing magnitude of the problem and at the same time its own incapacity to deal with it that this government does not give us in this house the proper figures with regard to unemployment? I do not know, but I think what the right hon. gentleman says here is as applicable to his party as it was to us. Again, he says:

> Taking the latest figures on employment supplied by the bureau of statistics, it can be shown that, on the most conservative basis, there are to-day over 400,000 wage-earners out of work.

I gave the figures this afternoon and, from the information that I could obtain from the labour department or from anyone else who had any knowledge of the subject, it appears that the number to-day is 398,000. That was the number of persons out of work in November, and in addition there were 64,000 young men who had attained the employable age but could find no work. That is the estimate of the bureau of statistics. I am speaking from memory, because I do not wish to take up the time of the house now to look it up. Well, we can add to that number, for the month of December, another fifty or sixty thousand, if we are to judge by our experience every December as compared with November. So that in December the number would be well above 500,000. There is no doubt about that; those are the figures given by the bureau of statistics after they had worked on the question at considerable length in order to furnish the information I desired. This 64,000 estimated by the bureau as the number of young men out of work in November, it must be remembered, is the lowest estimate, because the youth council made an estimate of 400,000 as the number of unemployed wage-earners. With the December increase the number will be over 500,000.

Further on the right hon. gentleman says:

> It is not with statistics, but with human lives, that we are concerned. You cannot measure fear, privation and want, by any yardstick, or adding machine.

I agree with that, but that is as true to-day as it was then.

> Is it any wonder that to-day there is widespread unrest and discontent throughout the land, and that, in the case of young and old alike, many are in a condition of despair.

The position is exactly the same to-day. On page 46 he states what he will do for the unemployed:

Unemployment of First Concern.

The Liberal party believes unemployment is Canada's most urgent national problem. It would deal with the present emergency conditions through a representative national commission, which would cooperate with the provinces and municipalities in the administration of unemployment relief and in an endeavour to provide work for the unemployed.

As permanent measures, the Liberal party is pledged to introduce policies which will serve to provide employment by reviving industry and trade; and to introduce a national system of unemployment insurance.

Nothing has been done with respect to any of these undertakings except as regards the representative national committee. That was appointed; but instead of becoming an administrative commission, instead of helping the provinces and the municipalities, as the right hon. gentleman promised, to carry out measures for the relief of unemployment, that body was dissolved a year ago. Its recommendations have not been accepted. It submitted at least a dozen recommendations, two or three of which have been carried out in part; but most of them have been absolutely ignored.

On the next page I find the following:

Release from rather than increase in the burden of the cost of government—

I have dealt with that.

—reductions, rather than increases, in taxation—

I have dealt with that.

—cooperation and goodwill between the federal and provincial administrations—

We know how much cooperation and goodwill there has been.

—and between all parts and classes of the country, must also be achieved, if commerce and industry are to revive.

None of these things has been achieved. And remember, these are all promises. Then he compared the representative national commission with the Canadian patriotic fund or with the Department of Soldiers' Civil Reestablishment. That reference will be found on page 48, where he tells about the commission acting as an administrative body. With regard to Liberal cooperation he makes this statement at page 49:

Liberals would get provincial cooperation.

There will necessarily be two main divisions in the commission's work. The one will have to do with the administration of unemployment relief. The other will have to do with the endeavour to provide work for the unemployed. . . . A guarantee of provincial cooperation is to be found in the fact that, save in one province, out of nine, Liberal governments are already in office.

[Mr. Manion.]

Then listen to this pathetic appeal:

Would it be possible to conceive a finer example of the kind of national government necessary to cope with social and industrial problems, which depend for their solution so completely on the co-operation of federal and provincial governments, than would be afforded by a Liberal government at Ottawa, and Liberal governments in all the provinces of Canada?

Then he turns to the group to the left:

Perhaps Mr. Woodsworth and members of the C.C.F. will be equally moved to see how constitutional difficulties, which stand in the way of industrial and social reform, may be removed, and any necessary amendments to the B.N.A. Act secured, through governmental co-operation of this character.

We have not observed the fulfilment of any of these.

They profess the aim of their party is the establishment of a cooperative commonwealth. Where could they find anything more closely resembling such an ideal, than in having all governments of the one mind?

Whose mind, the right hon. gentleman's or Mitch's? I might go back to a previous page, which is rather interesting. On page 27, speaking of the Liberal party, he says:

We are not only a united party, with traditions and a past in which we all share a pride, but we are a happy party as well.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): Hear, hear.

Mr. MANION: The Minister of Justice says, "hear, hear." He knows better than anyone else how happy they are.

Mr. Bennett must know by now that no broad scheme of social reform can be carried through successfully in Canada without close cooperation between the dominion and the provinces.

Heaven help us if social reform must wait upon cooperation between this government and the provinces. It is certainly time for a change. I refer next to page 55:

Unemployment is the hardest cross which a working-man, I might almost say any man, is called upon to bear.

That sentiment is repeated throughout the book and I agree with it.

Even in a period of great emergency, such as the present, it is too much to hope to secure the united effort of all, but the effort of a political party, united in its aims and policies from one end of the country to the other, can go a long way towards effecting even that result. Of this, at least, I am sure: the task which confronts Canada to-day is one to which Liberalism can give its whole heart.

Then he goes into the bible:

"To loose the bands of wickedness, to undo the heavy burdens, and to let the oppressed go free, and that ye break every yoke," is, if anything, more the aim of Liberalism in this twentieth century than it was even in ancient days.

One hon. member, more familiar with the bible than I am, reminds me that this is from Isaiah. When we were in power the right hon. gentleman was addicted more to the Lamentations of Jeremiah than he was to Isaiah. There is a delicious touch on page 46. I shall read it and then I shall dispense with the book:

> The ancient Greeks had a clear understanding of human nature and behaviour, and of inevitable sequences, when they accorded Nemesis the place they did in most of their tragedies.

Nemesis, Mr. Speaker, if you will recall your classical studies, was the goddess of retribution. The right hon. gentleman has dodged rather a few goddesses in his time and I have no doubt he is still dodging. In that sense he is the Artful Dodger, something which I really regret because I do believe the country would be better off if some of these goddesses could catch up with him. However, I fancy that this one will. I am afraid that in time this goddess Nemesis will catch up with him and deal with him.

I have read some selections from this book, and I assure you, Mr. Speaker, that you can get more amusement and enjoyment, more of sheer cheerfulness out of it than out of any book of jokes published in Canada. I have a notion to suggest to the right hon. gentleman that he ought to get the National Liberal Federation, which I am told has plenty of money, to publish another edition or other editions of this little book and call it The Prime Minister's Joke Book. There was a time, when I was very young, when about the only literature we got in that western country was the old almanac, which was a combination of astrology, recipes, jokes, advice and so on, and it very much resembled this book. I remember on the front page there was a picture of a man dressed in something resembling a lady's bathing suit of to-day; in other words, he had very little on. Thus, he was able to show that he had what people in the smooth language of to-day call "intestinal fortitude." I do not think you could show that on the front of this book, because I do not think this government has any of that "intestinal fortitude." I promise that if the right hon. gentleman will have the book issued, we will distribute it; we will distribute it with our comments. And I should like the right hon. gentleman to autograph it, because I think that would be of some use to us. Even if the book were not of very great use, it would at least add to the gaiety of nations.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Before my hon. friend puts down the little book, he promised to read the passage where he said, I had said I would cure unemployment. He has not done that.

Mr. MANION: Oh, by implication. I do not think I can look through the book just now, but I have no doubt I could find he made that promise more than once. By implication; the very attacks the right hon. gentleman made on us for not curing unemployment imply it. Surely the right hon. gentleman was serious in what he said. What did he mean by attacking us for not curing unemployment?

An hon. MEMBER: You said you would.

Mr. MANION: I thought I had that part marked. I cannot read the whole book; the whole thing is so many promises; I picked out just a few of the select ones.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: My hon. friend promised he would read the statement.

Mr. MANION: Well, that is nothing to the promises the right hon. gentleman made in the last election. I may have to renege on that promise to-night because I cannot go searching through the book, but the right hon. gentleman promised, oh so many things. He was going to reduce taxation; he was going to lessen expenditure; he was going to retain the British preference, to bring about harmony and cooperation, to bring about social justice, to appoint an investment control board, to remove unemployment, to bring about prosperity, to wipe out third parties, or to bring about conditions which would cause third parties to disappear. He was going to bring about more equitable distribution of wealth, to control currency and credit, to set up proportional representation. And hon. members will remember the promises of the right hon. gentleman in earlier speeches to bring about senate reform. The older members of this house will remember how he rolled that promise from coast to coast, telling everyone he was going to reform the senate, to lower the cost of living and to wipe out trusts and combines.

Let me read what the right hon gentleman said on the night of the election. In the Toronto Daily Star of October 15 there are two or three pages of it, but I shall not read it all. He was going to banish poverty.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Please read that. I made no such statement, that I was going to banish poverty.

Mr. MANION: Well, this is what the Toronto Daily Star of Tuesday, October 15, 1935, said. The heading is:

A New charter of Liberalism in statement by Mackenzie King.

"Faith in the ancient and beneficent precepts that it is only by sharing each other's burden, and doing unto others as we would have others do unto us, that men and nations can serve their own interests and the common good."

Ottawa, October 15—From Laurier House, where last night he received returns of the overwhelming Liberal victory, the Right Hon. William Lyon Mackenzie King issued the following statement to the people of the dominion.

I am not going to read the whole statement, but I shall read one paragraph. It is headed, "Banish poverty and adversity."

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: The hon. gentleman states that I said I would banish poverty. I said nothing of the kind.

Mr. MANION: Well, the heading is there, the right hon. gentleman will have to quarrel with the Toronto Daily Star. I shall read it, and perhaps the right hon. gentleman will be sorry he interrupted. These are his words; the heading may not be his; it is divided into paragraphs, and whether the headings are by the Daily Star or the right hon. gentleman I do not know. He is reported as saying on the night of the election:

In the new era which dawns to-day the struggle for the rights of the people will, in the realm of economic liberty and security, be carried on as never before. Poverty and adversity, want and misery are the enemies which Liberalism will seek to banish from our land.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Yes, "seek to banish".

Mr. MANION: The right hon. gentleman now falls back on the words "will seek"; in other words, they sought but did not find. They were only going to seek; it was just put out for the benefit of the people.

Then he goes on:

They have lain in wait at the gate of every Canadian home during the past five years, and their manacing mien has served to destroy the souls, as well as the minds and bodies, of an ever increasing number of men, women and children in our land. We take up at once, as our supreme task, the endeavour to end poverty in the midst of plenty; starvation and unnecessary suffering in a land of abundance; discontent and distress in a country more blessed by Providence than any other on the face of the globe, and to gain for individual lives, and for the nation as a whole, that "health and peace and sweet content" which is the rightful heritage of all.

With those words I have no quarrel at all, but I should like to know what the right hon, gentleman has done to implement those promises. What has he done? With every word of it I agree, but he says now that he was only going to seek to wipe out poverty and adversity. Well, the people of this country are still seeking to find anything done by him to do away with poverty and adversity. Was this just some more ballyhoo, just some more of the propaganda that has been so prevalent since this government came into power? Was he just attempting to fool the people? He says now he was going to seek; did he not expect to find? What have they done for the youth of this country who are without work, who are estimated by the youth council of Toronto to number 400,000? What have they done for the security of the people? What have they done to bring about social justice? What have they done for the fishermen or miners of Novia Scotia? What have they done to cure unemployment generally? What have they done for Canada generally?

Let me read another little extract which is not a political article at all. The Canadian Welfare Council issued a statement on January 5 last, just the other day. They show this, as far as Canada is concerned—and they are not a political organization; they are not criticising the government but merely setting out the facts:

Relief costs $900,000,000 since 1930.

Of all the factors in the situation at the present time the most disturbing is probably realization of the fact that by the end of March 1939 Canada will have disbursed in nine years approximately 900 million dollars on direct aid, works and projects for the relief of unemployment and agricultural distress, and at the end of that time has more dependents on public funds voted for this purpose than when she started.

A little further down:

The discouraging fact is that after all these years, in part because of the clashing jurisdictions of the dominion and its provinces, Canada still lacks long term legislation, comprehensive planning, and any integrated and adequate program for a fundamental attack upon the serious national ills which have occasioned these heavy expenditures.

Then further down:

Energetic attack the need.

All in all, a weary country and a disillusioned people have been in a mood of drift, but there appears to be a growing realization that the situation cannot continue, that the attack must be basic, and much more than merely a matter of this or that relief policy, or the relative allocation of functions and costs among different units of government.

And finally:

. . . for it is possible that the threat to Canadian well-being now lies not so largely in the actual sag in employment which we are facing as in the "let-down" of spirit and morale of the country as a whole.

That is the contention of the Canadian Welfare Council, which is not in any way a political organization. I read it because they describe the condition better than I can. May I ask my right hon. friend whether these statements of his before the election, and particularly his statement after the election, were merely flights of eloquence and a weaving of words and dreaming of dreams, or did he believe his own words? I find myself wondering whether the right hon. gentleman did believe them. If he did, why has there not been some action in regard to these matters? Perhaps it is all theory; perhaps the right hon. gentleman did not have—I do not think he did—in his early days sufficient contact with the difficulties of people who are poor, to realize how serious a picture he painted, and painted so well that one might think he understood, he really saw the picture that he painted.

I should like to ask the Minister of Labour: Is it just a coincidence that Canada, of all nations of the empire, is the least advanced in social legislation, and that this government, led by the right hon. gentleman, has been in power since 1921, with the exception of five years? Is it just a coincidence, Mr. Speaker, that Canada has practically no social legislation as compared with Great Britain, Australia or New Zealand? Is it a coincidence that the right hon. gentleman has been in power and that Canada has been so reactionary, despite the fine words and the weaving of beautiful thoughts by the right hon. gentleman, than whom no one can weave them better? I do not think it is a coincidence; I think it is largely cause and effect. During the last election the papers were full of "King or chaos" and the common joke throughout the country to-day is that we got both. Another slogan was "Vote Liberal and get action." Did we get action? We have got inaction, reaction, laissez-faire and do nothing. That is what the people are calling this government to-day, the do-nothing government, and the devil take the hindmost. That is the picture.

So far as I can see, neither the right hon. gentleman nor any of his ministers seem to know conditions in Canada. On occasion I have been struck with this thought, that the right hon. gentleman is too much interested in external affairs to be really interested in or understand internal affairs and the needs of the people. Does he know their needs? Does the right hon. gentleman realize that this country is made up of nine provinces? I find myself wondering if he really does. Since he became Prime Minister, has he visited the nine provinces, in order to get the viewpoints of these people? There is no answer. If I am not mistaken, the right hon. gentleman since the last election has not been within a thousand miles of his own constituency. I am open to correction; if I am wrong I shall withdraw that statement, but I think I should have said fifteen hundred miles. I repeat, Mr. Speaker, that the trouble is that this has been a government of reaction, of inaction, a Micawber-like government. That is the trouble. You will remember the fine old character of Micawber in David Copperfield. I am very fond of him, because he had such a comforting philosophy. The old fellow was always in debt, you will remember, and when things got particularly bad and his creditors chased him, he would give them a promissory note and thank God that debt was paid. Many years ago I referred to the same picture and said then, as I repeat now, that the right hon. gentleman always reminds me a great deal of Micawber, because when he is driven too hard by the people in regard to the conditions that exist throughout the country he gives them another promise, another oration or a royal commission. No wonder the people call this a do-nothing government.

The real problem in Canada to-day, to my mind, is unemployment, just as much as it was the problem in 1935, and I admit quite frankly that that was the case then. It is the problem of giving opportunity to our youth. It is the problem of giving security to our older people. If we are going to justify this democracy of which we boast so much; if we are going to justify this system, we must compete with the dictatorships. In such countries as Russia, Germany and Italy they claim that they are keeping their people occupied. They are keeping them occupied, in a way; I think at too high a cost. They have taken away freedom of the press, freedom of speech, freedom of assembly and freedom of religion, all of which we have in this country, thank heaven, under the British parliamentary system for which our ancestors fought for more than a thousand years. If we are to justify this democracy, and this economic system under which we live, variously called the capitalist system, the profit system, the reward system, the system of private property, of private enterprise; if we are to prevent our country from becoming a dictatorship of one kind or another, we must cure the defects of our system, and the great defect to-day is unemployment. I repeat to-night what I have previously said before various organizations in Canada, and what I said just a year ago before the Canadian Club of Ottawa, in the presence of my right hon. friend and some of his ministers: If we do not cure that defect, within twenty years the democratic British parliamentary institutions in which we believe will be in very great danger of being completely wiped out, and our whole democratic system is likely to disappear. To my mind those who do not see this are blind. They are people without vision, and when the leaders of a country have no vision the people are in danger of perishing. More and more the well-to-do middle class are realizing the truth of that very statement, and after long, deep consideration I say solemnly that not since 1867 has Canada had a government that has so completely failed to realize the needs of the country or a government with more limited vision as to the methods by which we might cure the defects of democracy, such as unemployment, absence of security and lack of opportunity for youth—the cure for which must be brought about if we are to preserve not only confederation but our whole social system.

As everyone knows, youth is demoralized in our country. Never has there been a time when our youth have been so completely demoralized, being fed by relief and, in many instances, driven to crime. We were criticized for putting the single unemployed men into camps. Where are they now? A great many are being put into gaol because they cannot earn a living. A great many have drifted into lives of crime. I say this is a national calamity, and again I am going to quote a published statement of the Canadian Welfare Council under date of January 5, 1938. I am going to quote this at some length because it expresses the danger better than I can. They say:

A Grave Danger

But now, as for the first sustained period in many years, there seems a breathing space, there emerges in too many quarters to be disregarded, a danger as grave as the crisis which has shaken us. It takes its rise, in part, in the increasing docility and indifference reported among the recipients of public help in the face of continuing or threatened idleness. A "spiritlessness" and a loss of essential dignity perhaps could not but be by-products of our emergency mass treatment of individual human lives. But more and more, there are signs that the old, loyal and proud submission of the subject to constituted authority is giving way, in fear and insecurity, to a cringing subservience, and unwillingness to venture or to risk. The sense of uncertainty and dependency is sapping at the very foundations of individual initiative, of self-reliance, of an appreciation of the values of spiritual and intellectual freedom. Freedom, to-day, of itself is too generally regarded as a quantity to be despised and scorned as "fredom to suffer and to starve."

There are not wanting signs, in certain quarters, that authority is tightening rein and threatens to ride hard. Ruthlessness alone will not revive broken men. If through our mass treatment of individual disaster, we have destroyed personal enterprise and independence, and if, realizing this, we fail immediately to take measures to retrieve and preserve these qualities, then there slips away the very bulwark of our democratic life. We are indeed a lesser people if the depression has taken from us our appreciation of our ancient liberties,—of thought, of belief, of speech, and of action,—as verities of greater value than life itself.

What did the right hon. gentleman do when he appointed the Purvis commission? That commission was appointed in 1936; that was one promise at least he partially carried out. This was to have been a continuing, administrative body, but instead of that the Purvis commission was dissolved about a year ago. Perhaps I have no right to mention this, but the fact that it was intended to be a permanent body is obvious to anyone who takes a look at its personnel. Mr. Tom Moore, for example, was a well known labour leader who gave up a permanent position to become a member of that board. Did Tom Moore understand that at the end of the year he was going to be dropped? He thought it was going to be a permanent commission. Apparently that was the intention.

Mr. ROGERS: May I correct my hon. friend? Mr. Moore was a member of the social insurance commission appointed by the previous administration, and while a member of that commission was transferred to the national employment commission.

Mr. MANION: I am not quarrelling with that. I simply say that probably he would not have taken the transfer if he had thought that at the end of a year the Purvis commission would be dissolved. I believe he had a permanent position, but he transferred to this one because he was interested in social security, and thought he was going into a permanent position. I wish to make it absolutely clear that not in any shape or form am I quoting Mr. Moore. I am drawing that conclusion from my knowledge of Tom Moore.

However, the commission was dissolved, and their recommendations have not been carried out. I shall read twelve of them briefly, as I find them in their report. Only two of these or, at the outside three of them, have been touched. They are as follows:

1. A great national cooperative effort to end unemployment.

That was one of them.

2. Employment services to be national.

None of these has been carried out.

3. Commission to be administrative, not just advisory.

4. A proper registry of unemployed and their classification.

I know of no such registry.

5. Local communities to help in the work through local committees.
6. Wiping out dole, which was to be replaced by rehabilitation measures.
7. Slum clearance.

Nothing done about that.

8. The national body to be succeeded by a small administrative committee to be helped by an interdepartmental committee to prevent overlapping.
9. Financial provision for and administration of unemployment aid should be the responsibility of the dominion government.
10. Apprenticeship and learnership.
11. Youth training.
12. Housing plans.

I do not know whether apprenticeships and learnerships would be included in youth training. I do not know anything about that. Perhaps the Minister of Labour could tell me?

Mr. ROGERS: It would be included to some extent.

Mr. MANION: It is partly carried out, then. Youth training is partly carried out, and housing has been partly carried out. Those are the only three that have, to some extent, been dealt with, out of the twelve recommendations. There may have been more, but those are the recommendations I saw as I read the report.

For the moment I shall leave unemployment. I am sorry to be taking so much time; I have never committed that crime before, and I hope I shall not do so again.

Another important question is that of national understanding and harmony. Everyone sees the need for harmony. I do not think it is the prerogative of any individual to know the need of what is called by some, national unity, and by others, national harmony. But I say that to-day there is less national harmony and less harmony among our governments than there has ever been, without any exception, in the history of Canada.

I am sorry to see these family quarrels going on, but at the same time I do not intend to get into them, because after all the family quarrel which did start was finished by what one of the newspapers called a comical caucus, where the whole result was that the members from Ontario passed a resolution of confidence in the right hon. gentleman. Did they need to call the members of Ontario by telegram to attend a caucus to find out if they were loyal to the right hon. gentleman? I should have thought one might have taken that for granted.

However, that is not what I intended to say. One side of the quarrel which struck me as rather strange was the statement put out by the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner). He made a statement, which I have before me, in which he suggested that he had seen Mr. Hepburn in an attempt to bring about peace in the troubled family. And he said, apparently in an effort to keep Mr. Hepburn quiet, that he suggested that judges, senators and cabinet ministers might be recommended. The implication was that Mr. Hepburn could name them. I believe he used the word "recommendation," or something of that sort. If Mr. Hepburn only recommended them, and the recommendations were not going to be acted upon, it would not be much of a reward for Mr. Hepburn. However, I do not care how many senators or cabinet ministers he recommends. But I do think that recommendations for judges by anybody but the Minister of Justice, particularly by anyone like Mr. Hepburn or myself, who is not a lawyer, is a serious matter.

Our judiciary has always been kept on a high plane. It has always been chosen largely —there have been exceptions—through merit. That is one of the great advantages we have over the United States. Many of us believe that a great deal of the criminal activity in the United States is due to the election of their judiciary, due also to the laxity in their courts and to the fact that the judges are elected rather than selected through choice because of merit and good conduct. Our courts have been the bulwarks of justice and fair play. Our whole national life in a large sense depends upon fairness and justice in our courts. The appointment of judges has been the highest prerogative of the crown. The Prime Minister appoints them on the recommendation of the Minister of Justice, and the appointees hold office during good behaviour.

Yet the Minister of Agriculture in a published statement suggests that he has advised Mr. Hepburn that—he does not put it in these words—if Mr. Hepburn will recommend some judges for this country, they will probably be appointed.

Mr. GARDINER: Did you never recommend any?

Mr. MANION: Did I?

Mr. GARDINER: Did you never recommend any?

Mr. MANION: I do not think I ever did. Anyway, I am not a provincial premier. If I did recommend any, I was a member of the dominion cabinet.

Mr. GARDINER: You are rather an exception, then.

Mr. MANION: Possibly so. But I submit that the recommendation of judges by a premier, and particularly by one who, like myself, is not a lawyer—and I say that without intent to reflect on anyone—is an extraordinary offer to make. The minister, in a certain statement—not in the same one, I believe—says that he discussed the matter with the Prime Minister, and then he went back to Mr. Hepburn. He does not say that the Prime Minister raised any objection to this course of action.

I do not wish to go into the matter further, but I submit again that such a suggestion by the Minister of Agriculture was one of the most extraordinary suggestions ever made in this country, namely that the premier of one province should have the right to nominate judges. As a matter of fact, if Mr. Hepburn were to have the right to nominate judges, what about the premiers of the other eight provinces? Were they to have a like right?

Mr. GARDINER: That is not in the statement at all. This is about as near the truth as what the hon. member has been saying all evening.

Mr. MANION: Well, the hon. gentleman had better be more careful of his own statements. He probably knows better than any other hon. member how far away from the truth people can get. Let me quote his words:

I went down to Toronto to attend the Royal Winter Fair on November 16 and 17, and not as an emissary from dominion government authorities to offer "concessions" to Mr. Hepburn.

And then, farther on:

In the meantime, at noon on the 16th, Right Hon. W. L. Mackenzie King, finding I was in Toronto but having no previous knowledge I was going and wishing to leave for Washington to sign the trade agreement, telephoned to get my comment on a certain feature of the agreement. After completing this he stated he would be pleased if I would consult some of our friends regarding the results in the South Waterloo by-election.

I do not blame him. And then the hon. member goes on:

I stated I was likely to see Mr. Hepburn, and inquired as to whether there would be any objection to discussing it with him. Mr. King replied, "Certainly not, by all means do so."

And then, farther down in the same article:

Mr. Hepburn states, "I was told I could have some say in Ontario appointments."

Then the Minister of Agriculture goes on to say:

My memory is that in justifying certain things which happened in Waterloo, Mr. Hepburn took very strong exception to certain actions of the dominion government including certain appointments. I replied that I could see no reason why he should not make recommendations as other Liberal leaders do indicating that there are certain senatorial, judicial and possible future cabinet vacancies to be filled but making it plain that I had no authority from anyone to make proposals.

A little later on he says:

Mr. GARDINER: That is not "nominations".

Mr. MANION: Recommendations.

Mr. GARDINER: Yes.

Mr. MANION: Do I draw the conclusion that he was trying to flim-flam Mr. Hepburn? He is supposed to be a friend of Mr. Hepburn. The talk is that he was one of the men mixed up with Mitchell in an attempt to overthrow this government. That was the kind of talk. He was supposed to be a friend of Mitchell's, and yet he is virtually saying to-night that Mitchell would have the fun of recommending people knowing they would not be appointed.

Mr. GARDINER: My hon. friend said I had said that he had the right to nominate.

Mr. MANION: What is the difference between "nominate" and "recommend"?

Mr. GARDINER: No comparison at all.

Mr. MANION: What is the difference between "nominated" and "recommended"? "Nominated" means that someone is put forward and it is up to the government to appoint him. Nominating is not appointing, nor is recommending appointing. The only conclusion that one can draw is that the hon. gentleman is suggesting that he would tell Mr. Hepburn about the recommendation and that he was just putting it over Mr. Hepburn. Then he said:

After I returned to Ottawa and before Mr. King returned from Washington, Mr. Hepburn telephoned me and asked me to return to Toronto the following Friday. I stated that I would discuss the whole matter with Mr. King upon his return and let him know whether I would return to Toronto. I did so and returned to Toronto on Friday, November 25.

In other words, the Prime Minister did not make any objection. That is the only conclusion one can reach. The hon. gentleman and his party and the people of this country can form their own judgments on the whole case. The facts are as I have stated.

In closing this particular phase of my remarks—I shall soon be finished—let me say I notice that before he left this country the premier of Ontario asked for an explanation of the word "conspiracy." "Conspiracy" means a combination for unlawful purposes. Ordinarily I would think that that word would be considered as slander and I think Hon. Mr. Hepburn is quite within his right in asking for something by way of explanation of the word "conspiracy." I hope, when that explanation is given, my hon. friend will lay it on the table of the house.

I have one or two words to say about royal commissions. While this government has not cured unemployment, it has appointed at least nine royal commissions. These are:

Rowell commission.
Veterans assistance commission.
National employment commission.
Textile industry commission.
Wheat marketing commission.
Penitentiary commission.
Lobster and smelt fishing commission.
Coal commission.
House of Commons committee on farm implements.

According to a press report under date of April 13, 1938, the total cost of royal commissions prior to that time was $1,123,000. I do not know what the total cost would be to the present time. What has been the result of the appointment of these royal commissions? Were they created to provide jobs? Very little attention has been paid to any of the recommendations made. May I interject here that I think now as I have thought for a long time, even when we were in power—the same thing was done then—that there are too many lawyers throughout this country drawing $200 a day to appear before royal commissions. In many instances it would require a great stretch of the imagination to think that these lawyers could earn $200 a day, and yet they are put on these commissions. In addition to that, they are given very liberal allowances—living allowances, although liberal is probably the word I mean.

Our magnificent country, with its tremendous area, its rich resources, and its small population, should be able to rid itself of unemployment, relief, social injustices and the demoralization that goes with youth unemployment. I am a Canadian. When I say that, I mean that I am interested in the nine provinces of this dominion. I am just as much interested in the welfare of the prairie provinces and the maritime provinces as I am in the welfare of Ontario and Quebec. I make that statement because of propaganda, I suppose put out by friends of this government, to the effect that I had decided to take no interest in the prairie and maritime provinces. That propaganda was spread throughout western Canada, particularly in the prairie provinces. The imagination of the writer bloomed like a rose, and he put out that information for all the papers of western Canada.

I believe that every province of Canada is complementary to every other province. We are one big family. One province should help to take care of another if it is in difficulties. I am just as much interested in western Canada as I am in eastern Canada. Our country has survived many trials and tribulations. We have a magnificent future provided we have no fear of being great. But we need vision and courage. We need not regimentation, but long term planning. Let me illustrate what I mean. About a year or a year and a half ago Great Britain allocated £500,000,000, or $2,500,000,000, to provide housing after the completion of armaments. That is an example of long term planning.

I believe that this government has failed utterly to realize the needs of this country, and I desire to move the following amendment, seconded by the hon. member for St. Antoine-Westmount (Mr. White):

That the following paragraph be added to the said address:

"We desire respectfully to express regret that the government has failed, since its accession to power in 1935, to show a proper realization of the serious economic conditions existing in all sections of Canada, as evidenced by unemployment and insecurity for hundreds of thousands of Canadian people, lack of opportunity for youth, and widespread distress in agriculture; and has failed to take appropriate measures to relieve such conditions."

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I hope my hon. friend will not deem me discourteous if I do not try to follow him in all that he has said to-night. I prefer rather to seek to follow the speech from the throne in what it indicates of the business before parliament during the present session. I am happy, however, that my first words may be those of agreement with my hon. friend on many of the things which he has said, particularly with remarks made at the opening of his address. I should like to thank him at once for his courteous references to the mover and seconder of the address, and for his characterization of their remarks on this occasion. I agree with my hon. friend that the two addresses to which we have listened, made by the hon. member for Brandon (Mr. Matthews) and the hon. member for Stormont (Mr. Chevrier), were two of the best addresses that have ever been made by hon. members in moving and seconding the address.

The hon. member for Brandon has come to the House of Commons without previous parliamentary experience, but he has devoted his life and time industriously to the study of public questions. He has taken his part in educational work and has had experience in journalism as well as in business. All these activities have been reflected in a very real way in the able manner in which he addressed this house this afternoon. On behalf of hon. members on this side in particular I should like to congratulate him very warmly on his achievement in winning the constituency of Brandon in the recent by-election. His actions on that occasion speak even louder of his abilities and attainments than his words this afternoon, eloquent as they were.

The hon. member for Stormont also made an exceptionally fine address. He has been in the house now for some three years. We have heard him on different occasions, and on each occasion have admired his facility in speaking in either English or French and in always contributing something of value to the debate under discussion. May I say to my hon. friend that by his speech this afternoon he has greatly enhanced the already very high reputation which he holds as a member of this house.

Naturally I am more than pleased to join with the leader of the opposition (Mr. Manion) in recording the expressions of delight with which the people of Canada from coast to coast have learned of the decision of their majesties to visit Canada in May and June of the present year. The king and queen, when they come to this country, will receive a right royal and truly loyal welcome from the people of Canada.

I should also like to join with the Leader of the Opposition in my expression of admiration of the fine personal qualities of their majesties, of the beauty of their home and family life, and above all, of the manner in which they have consecrated their lives to the public service. I believe it is literally true that no sovereigns in the history of Britain, and it is a fine history, have ever devoted themselves more whole-heartedly and completely to the service of their subjects.

The visit of their majesties to Canada will be a great historic occasion. It will be the first time that the citizens of this country will have had the opportunity of personally welcoming on their own soil their king and queen. We are all delighted that their majesties have found it possible in connection with their visit to Canada to pay a visit also to our good neighbour, the President of the United States, and to spend a few days in the United States while they are on this side of the ocean. It is not only the first time that a British sovereign has visited the North American continent, but it is the first time that a British sovereign has been in the western hemisphere. Taken altogether, I am sure the visit will be one which will go down in the annals of history as of outstanding importance in the story of the great empire of which Canada is a part.

The house might be interested in just a word regarding one or two features of the visit. The arrangements with respect to the royal tour have been placed by the government in the hands of an interdepartmental committee composed of prominent members of the public service under the supervision of the senior members of the cabinet. The committee will work in close cooperation with provincial and municipal authorities.

I should like to stress, in speaking of the visit, how difficult it is both for the committee and for the members of the government to seek to meet the wishes and demands of different localities as to having their majesties visit them while they are in Canada. The main purpose of the visit, of course, will be to enable their majesties to see as much of the people of Canada as they can, and to enable the people of Canada to see as much of their majesties as they can. For that reason it has been found necessary to eliminate most of what otherwise there might have been in the nature of functions and ceremonies. Their majesties are undertaking a very extended tour, and I should like to emphasize how generous they have been in consenting within the space of one month to travel from one end of Canada to the other, thereby visiting all the provinces of the dominion.

There have been and naturally will be many disappointments that it is not possible for the king and queen to visit certain localities. But may I say that, having personally gone carefully into the whole matter of the itinerary with the members of the committee and with the railway authorities, I know that the itinerary has been worked out with the utmost care, having regard to what the distances are in this country and to what the strain is certain to be upon our royal guests during the time that they are here.

Their majesties have expressed a wish not to travel at night in order that they may see as much as possible of the country and of the citizens of Canada. When one eliminates travel by night on great journeys such as they will be taking, and confines travel mostly to the day time, it will be seen at once that the arrangements which have been made as to localities to be visited go perhaps about as far as it is possible to have them go. The itinerary will be gone over again with great care by the railway authorities when they are fixing the minutes—I might almost say the seconds—to be given to the different localities to be visited, in regard to train services the movement of trains and the like, and if it is at all possible in any way to make any extension which will not involve too great a tax upon the energies of our royal guests, that exception will be made. But I want to make it perfectly clear that any attempt by pressure on the part of individuals or organizations or communities to have some change made in the itinerary is not likely to prove the best way to go about securing it.

May I express my warm appreciation of the spirit and the way in which generally the people of Canada and the different localities have accepted the situation. I should like to mention particularly the city of Toronto and the city of Montreal, the two largest and two of the oldest cities of Canada. The stay of the king and queen in each of these two cities will not be beyond a day, and part of that time will be taken up in travel, but it was the most that it was at all possible for the committee in charge to accord.

Hon. members will be interested in knowing that when their majesties arrive in Canada, it is the intention of the king to speak at Quebec. His majesty will also speak in this city when he is unveiling the National War Memorial. He will speak again at either Victoria or Vancouver, and will also speak at Halifax at the time of his departure. I understand that the day his majesty will be in Winnipeg is Empire day, and that the king intends to deliver from the city of Winnipeg an empire broadcast. That includes the number of speeches that will be made, all of which will likely be broadcast to all parts of the country.

I am happy to be able to announce that Her Majesty the Queen has graciously consented to lay the cornerstone of the new Supreme Court of Canada building when their majesties are here in the city of Ottawa, and the queen may on that occasion deliver a short address.

There are other features of the tour that I should like to mention, but they will perhaps come better at some later time by way of question and answer in this house.

There is, however, one other feature which I should like to speak of in particular, and that is the relation of their majesties' visit to the business of this house. I have seen it stated in the press, on what authority I do not know, that His Majesty the King would prorogue parliament when he is in Ottawa. May I say there is no authority whatever for that statement. It has not been given out by the government or by any authorized body. I make that clear for this reason, that I wish hon. members of this house to understand that so far as the royal visit is concerned, it must not be expected in any way to interfere with or to hasten the proceedings of this House of Commons or of this parliament. We are here to do the country's business, and on behalf of the government I wish to say to hon. members that we want that business done in the most businesslike way possible. We as a government intend on our part to bring forward the different measures as rapidly as the convenience of the house will permit. If we are through in time to have prorogation when their majesties are here, the effort will be made to secure prorogation by his majesty himself; but if we are not through at that time and there remains business to be considered, an adjournment of parliament will be made and the house will resume consideration of public business after their majesties' visit. I wish to make this very clear, not only for the reason I have already mentioned but also because I am sure there is no one who would regret more the thought that in any way the visit was responsible for hastening the business of parliament than the king himself.

I confess I hardly know where to begin in attempting to comment upon what my hon. friend the leader of the opposition has said. I might perhaps remark that in a broad way the speech from the throne seems to fall naturally into three or four distinct parts, each of them having to do with matters which the government believe the country is most interested in at the present time. The first part I would mention, apart from the royal visit to which I have already referred, is the question of defence. The defence of our country at this time in the affairs of the world is of special concern. The second division relates to the trade treaties which are a constructive contribution to the solution of problems not only in our own country but also, we believe, in other parts of the world. The third part is concerned with the great problem of unemployment, which has been the concern of every parliament, of every legislature and of every municipality for the past eight or nine years, and, I might add, not only in Canada but pretty much throughout the entire world. The remaining part of the speech has to do with other measures that are likely to be brought forward and discussed as among the most important ones in the present session.

With regard to the question of defence, may I say that here I am happy to find that my hon. friend opposite appears to be, to some extent at least, favourable to what is set forth in the speech from the throne as to the government's policy. I do not wish to hold him down in any narrow way to any particular set of words; but broadly speaking he has received that part of the address with a certain measure of approval, no doubt reserving to himself the right, as measures are brought forward from time to time, to express his views upon whether or not those measures adequately meet what he and his party conceive to be the present need.

I should like to take this opportunity at once to express to the leader of the opposition my appreciation of his attitude at the time of the great crisis last September. By his silence he sought not to embarrass the government at a very critical time. It is true that he was not at that time a member of the House of Commons nor was he the leader of the opposition. He could not be leader of the opposition until he came into the house. He was, however, the leader of his party and I understand, in fact I read, criticisms directed at him for his failure to attack the administration for not having come forward at the time and indicated whether or not it was prepared to have Canada engage in a European war. I thought my hon. friend showed good judgment on that occasion, and not only good judgment but also true patriotism. He has been long enough in a government to know something of the responsibilities that a ministry incurs when dealing with great problems that affect the well-being of nations, particularly to the extent of involving war. If there are hon. members who think the attitude taken by the government last fall was wrong in maintaining a steady, thoughtful and careful position while matters were in a very critical state in Europe; if there are any hon. members who are of the opinion that the government's attitude on that occasion should have been different from what it was, I wish to say that the government will gladly afford them ample opportunity to debate that issue at an appropriate time during the course of the present session. I believe, as I felt at the time, that the greatest service that this or any other country can render at a time of great need or peril is to be prepared, in whatever it does, to act in a united and wholehearted manner. The administration, knowing the critical situation that existed last fall, took the view that if at all possible no premature word or utterance on its part should in any way become responsible for the slightest occasion of disunity or even of question in the minds of the people of Canada. I believe that our attitude in that respect has been proven to be more than justified.

Some members of my hon. friend's party were, however, very critical of the administration. They seemed to feel that we ought to declare that Canada was prepared to go into a European war the moment war broke out, and make that declaration even before it was at all apparent what the particular issue was likely to be in the event of war, or whether or not Great Britain herself was likely to be involved. It might as well be said now, at the beginning of this session, because it will be the attitude of this government for its time, that before this country goes into any war this parliament will be consulted.

The other day I was reading a most interesting book recently published, a work which is full of valuable personal and political information, written by a well known former hon. member of this house and, I am happy to say, a former colleague in a previous Liberal administration. The volume is one of Recollections, Political and Personal, by the Hon. E. M. Macdonald, and has just been published. Mr. Macdonald's book contains amongst other of its contents, a great deal of valuable historical material in reference to the policies which have been adopted by the respective parties in bygone years. In reading Mr. Macdonald's book I came across a statement of the Liberal position with respect to participation by Canada in conflicts which might take place in other parts of the world and the attitude taken thereon by the Right Hon. Sir Wilfrid Laurier as long as thirty years ago. I should like to read that statement to-night because at the time it was made it was expressive of Liberal policy concerning the relation of this country to other countries at a time of war. It was a statement of the Liberal policy which was accepted then, a statement which sets forth the Liberal policy as it has been followed ever since. I wish to give it as a statement of the Liberal policy as it is to-day and as it will continue to be under the present Liberal administration.

At page 331 of Mr. Macdonald's book, referring to the debate that took place in this House of Commons on the Naval Service Act in 1910, the author quotes Sir Wilfrid Laurier speaking in that debate as follows. Here are the words of Sir Wilfrid:

> I am a Canadian first, last and all the time. I am a British subject by birth, by tradition, by conviction; by the conviction that under British institutions my native land has found a measure of security and freedom it could not have found under any other regime.

Then in another place at that time:

> If England is at war we are at war and liable to attack. I do not say we will always be attacked; neither do I say that we would take part in all the wars of England. That is a matter that must be guided by circumstances, upon which the Canadian parliament will have to pronounce and will have to decide in its own best judgment.

My hon. friend made reference, in speaking of defence, to the paragraph in the speech from the throne which refers to the intention of this government to appoint a defence purchasing board, and expressed the hope that it would not be a political board. May I say to my hon. friend I think that when the government's legislation is brought down he will have every reason to feel that in this matter, as in all others, the government has sought to do that which will commend itself to the people of this country at large; and that the board which will be appointed will be a board which will command the respect and confidence of hon. members of this house. I agree with my hon. friend when he says that he believes there is no right thinking person in Canada who wishes to see unwarranted profits made out of anything that has to do with war. The whole question as to what is best in the matter of the manufacture of war materials, munitions and other implements of war, whether it is better to have this done under government ownership, or private ownership properly controlled, is one which will come up for full discussion and debate in this house this session. I shall not go into that question now, but I wish to say immediately that for myself, and I speak as well for every member of this administration, and I think I may say for every hon. member in this house, we are determined to see that, where it is necessary for the country to engage in the manufacture of war material, matters are so safeguarded that their manufacture cannot be made a basis for profiteering.

I come now to the next part of the speech, which has to do with the trade treaties. But I recall that before my hon. friend came to that part he brought in a matter which rather surprised me, because it was touched on only a few minutes before the debate opened, one which it seemed to me he sought to stress unduly, namely the question of the refusal of an application made within the last few days to the radio broadcasting corporation by the publisher of one of our Canadian papers to be allowed to use the corporation's network for the purpose of delivering addresses setting forth his personal opinions on some public matters. Now I have already said that as far as that application is concerned the government knew nothing whatever of it. No member of the government had any knowledge that such an application was being made; no member of the government had even heard anything about the application having been refused until he saw mention of it in the press; although in the press, which apparently is not to be censored in any way, the statement was made quite emphatically that the government was responsible for the refusal of that particular application.

My hon. friend says, What we ought to have in this house is a committee dealing with radio. I think it would be a kindness to my hon. friend to say at once that there are a number of things that he has missed in the three years he has been out of the house recently. His address to-night gave evidence of that repeatedly, and this is one instance. This house has had for a couple of years past a standing committee on radio broadcasting.

Mr. MANION: I knew that all the time.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: If my hon. friend knew that all the time and yet asked for a committee I am somewhat surprised.

Mr. MANION: May I ask my right hon. friend as a matter of information whether that committee is a standing committee that continues this year without further appointment?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: There has been a committee for the last two sessions, a select standing committee. A motion was passed:

> That a select committee be appointed on radio broadcasting to consider the annual report of the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation and to review the policies of the corporation with special reference to revenues, expenditures and development, with all the powers vested in the standing committees under standing orders and the resolution passed by this house on the 7th February, 1938.

Mr. MANION: But I am afraid that does not answer my question. Is that committee automatically appointed for this year also?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: No; it will require the appointment of another committee.

Mr. MANION: That is exactly what I was saying.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: The inference I drew, and which I think hon. members of the house will have drawn, from my hon. friend's remark was that there was need of such a committee.

Mr. MANION: This session.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Oh, at previous sessions, all the time.

Mr. MANION: No, I knew there was a committee; I read the press.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Then if my hon. friend knew, he evidently forgot some things. The committee reported, and its report was accepted unanimously by this house. One feature was approval of the policies of the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation, because it was into those very matters that the committee was obliged to look. As I said this afternoon, in order to remove the possibility of any control on the part of the government over radio broadcasting in this country, this parliament passed an act establishing the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation. There was appointed to govern the affairs of that corporation a board of nine governors. These members were selected from different parts of Canada, covering pretty much the entire dominion. Every member of the board of governors is recognized as a person well qualified to hold such a position. And the board of governors was given power to lay down regulations with respect to radio broadcasting. The board has laid down certain regulations, not within the last twenty-four hours, or the last two months, but regulations that have been in force for the last year or two. Among these regulations is one to the effect that the national network cannot be bought up by any individual or any corporation except under certain conditions for the purpose of giving his or its views to the nation at large over the national network.

Mr. MANION: What about George Drew?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Did he have the national broadcasting network?

Mr. MANION: He had a broadcast across Ontario, and George McCullagh could not get that.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: This was an application for the entire national network.

Mr. MANION: I appreciate that, but later he tried for less and could not get anything.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Well, I think he succeeded in getting something, because my hon. friend heard him. But may I point out, as far as the application is concerned, that it was not rejected because it came from one individual; it was rejected because the rules and regulations of the broadcasting corporation which set forth the conditions under which the use of the entire network may be acquired by any person apparently did not permit of the application being granted. The point, as I understand it, is this, that the governors of the corporation have provided that there shall be round table conferences, debates, a forum, where there shall be opportunities given from time to time for discussion of different questions of importance, and that subject to the existing rules and regulations facilities will be provided alike to all parties who take part in these discussions when they wish to put forward particular views. I understand that the publisher in question made application and was told by the corporation that he might appear in connection with any of these opportunities which are given to all persons alike, and make his statement there. But the rule of the corporation, as I understand, is—

Mr. MASSEY: If the right hon. gentleman will permit me, he was told that he could make his statement on the forum, but he would be given his subject.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Well, the hon. member for Greenwood (Mr. Massey) seems to know more about the details than I do. However the letter explaining the situation, written by the manager of the broadcasting corporation, will make perfectly clear what the reason was. This afternoon I placed that communication on the table and the house having given its consent, it will appear in Hansard to-morrow. I should be very much surprised if in any particular there has been an exception made to any rule, either by way of refusing such an application or by way of granting a special privilege to others. If any such thing has occurred of course the manager and governor will quite properly be liable to be taken to task for it. But may I again draw the attention of hon. members to the fact that all members of this house had full opportunity last year to consider or take exception to the policies of the radio broadcasting corporation. Having done this, I wish now to read one or two paragraphs from the report of the radio broadcasting committee which was submitted to this house and carried unanimously, which report approved the very policies designed to see that radio broadcasting, as carried on by this corporation, should be so conducted that there would be equal opportunity for all concerned, regardless of their particular circumstances one way or the other. I quote now from page 194 of the proceedings of the committee on radio broadcasting, under date of May 20, 1938:

> Your committee held seven meetings and had as principal witnesses the chairman and vice-chairman of the board of governors and the general manager. During seven sittings an exhaustive examination was conducted. All information required by the committee to carry out its terms of reference was supplied, confidential information not susceptible of publication in the public interest being made available privately. The committee was impressed by the ability and frankness of the principal witnesses.
> The bulk of the evidence concerned the program, technical and financial policies of the corporation. Your committee is of the opinion that these policies are well designed to carry out the purpose for which the corporation was created. Your committee is also of the opinion that the policies of the corporation are being executed in a businesslike fashion.

And further:

Your committee believes that the constitution of the corporation, ensuring a proper division between policy and management and a degree of flexibility and independence essential to the medium of broadcasting, together with ultimate parliamentary control, is well suited to the purpose for which it was created. Public service broadcasting in Canada must necessarily continue to be free from partisan control, and your committee is gratified to report that the activities of the CBC have been free from any nature of partisanship whatsoever. Your committee also wished to pay its tribute to the governors of the corporation for their vision, public spirit and efficient conduct of the trust imposed upon them by parliament.

That was after an examination of the corporation's policies, and I think I am right when I say that the regulations referred to by the manager of the broadcasting corporation, which govern in the matter, were in existence at the time this report was made. I think the hon. member for Greenwood, who interrupted me a moment ago, was a member of one of the committees of this house which investigated radio broadcasting.

Mr. MASSEY: The first committee.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: And I believe those regulations were in existence at that time.

Mr. MASSEY: I hesitate to interrupt the right hon. gentleman, but it is the interpretation of the regulations which is causing the difficulty at the present time. I do not wish to attempt to make a speech at the moment; I expect to speak on this matter later on; but if the Prime Minister will permit me, he will recall that at the time the committee sat two members of the committee withdrew because they were not permitted to call witnesses to go into just such a matter as has arisen at the present time.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: May I say that as far as the government is concerned we would welcome the appointment of a committee again this year, and every opportunity will be given hon. gentlemen opposite to name their members of that committee. Opportunity will be given the committee to call the general manager, the governors and any others connected with the corporation, and they may go very fully into all the rules and regulations that have been drawn up.

What I want to point out, Mr. Speaker, is that as far as radio broadcasting in Canada is concerned, when this parliament has put the whole business into the hands of a broadcasting corporation it seems to me that we as members of this house in our public capacity ought to be prepared to support the corporation in seeking to make rules which will cause radio broadcasting throughout this country to show favours to none but equal privileges and opportunities to all. I believe it was in that spirit that the regulations at present in existence were laid down.

I hope I am making it clear that as far as censorship is concerned this government has no desire whatever to effect any censorship with respect to anything excepting what may be distinctly contrary to the public interest; but that so far as the broadcasting corporation is concerned such censorship as is exercised there is not the censorship of the government but of the corporation which parliament itself has established and to which has been given certain rights and powers.

Now I come to the question of the trade treaties, and here first of all, may I remind the house of the sequence of events, because it is only in the light of such that one can properly appreciate the significance and effects of any government policy. May I recall that from the time of confederation until the late administration went out of office there had been repeated efforts—not excluding those of the last administration— to bring about a reciprocal trade agreement with the United States, an agreement which, as between our two countries, would have mutuality of benefit and which would be reciprocally helpful. Every effort towards that end failed until the present administration came into office after the general election of 1935. The first task undertaken by this administration was that of bringing about an agreement with the United States if such was at all possible. We succeeded in getting that agreement, which was approved by this parliament and was to remain in force for three years, to continue thereafter subject to cancellation on six months notice. We have had three years of experience with that agreement, and I ask hon. members of this house: Are there those here who think this country would have been better off if an agreement had never been effected?

Some hon. MEMBERS: We certainly would.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I hear very little in the way of rejection. I am certain the people of Canada generally whole-heartedly approve that agreement. They know there is not a single part of this country that has not benefited under the provisions of that trade agreement during the last few years. At the time this agreement was negotiated there had to be certain concessions on our part which affected certain interests here and there. Equally there had to be concessions on the part of the United States which affected interests in that country. But so far as Canada is concerned, during the last three years the benefits of that agreement have been so apparent that the country has altogether forgotten the concessions that had to be made here and there in order to bring the agreement into effect.

We know that the increased trade resulting from the agreement has helped materially in keeping conditions better than they could possibly otherwise have been. A great deal has been said to-day about there still being numbers of unemployed. I wonder what the present position would have been if it had not been for some of the measures that have been brought in by this government. We would have had not the mere question of the numbers unemployed to-day; we would have had unemployment to four, five or perhaps ten times the extent it exists at the present time, with what consequences having regard to world conditions no one can say.

Mr. SPENCE: Better explain.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Better explain? The improved condition has been due to the fact that under these trade agreements we have had wider markets for our primary products. These wider markets secured to those engaged in the primary industries of Canada have brought to this country a quantity of purchasing power which has gone towards the purchase of manufactured and other goods; a purchasing power which but for those agreements would not have existed. That purchasing power has helped to give employment to men in industry, in agriculture and in all the branches of our economic activity.

We came to the point where we had to consider where we would be when the three years were up. When the 1935 agreement was negotiated it was to a certain extent an experiment. The United States was then within a short space of a presidential election. There were concessions which at the time that country was hesitant about making, until they saw how the agreement was likely to work out. We were in the same position in regard to some things we should have liked to have done. At the time it was distinctly understood that the three years would be a testing period and that if after a trial the agreement proved to be mutually beneficial an effort would be made anew to extend and expand its provisions. Not only would the effort be made to extend and expand the provisions but to secure them for a further period of time. I want hon. members to keep that factor in mind.

When this government began its negotiations to have the agreement enlarged and extended it was facing the possibility of the then existing agreement ending at the expiration of the three year period, if we should not be able to secure the goodwill of our neighbours to the south, as we had before, when we began to negotiate. We began early, knowing how difficult these negotiations are, and how many considerations there are of which account has to be taken. We found that the governments of Great Britain and the United States were considering the making of a trade agreement between those two countries. When some of us were present at the imperial conference in England it was made quite clear to us that an agreement between the United States and Great Britain in matters of trade not only would be beneficial to those two countries but might help to point the way to a method of dealing with international affairs better than that which was existing in some other parts of the world.

May I say at once to my hon. friend that when we discuss trade matters we are almost certain to differ diametrically because we view matters in an entirely different light. I believe the way to help to improve economic conditions, employment and the like is to encourage trade and to obtain as much in the way of trade as we possibly can. My hon. friend opposite believes in the policy of economic nationalism.

Mr. MANION: Nothing of the sort.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Oh, yes.

Mr. MANION: Nothing of the sort.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Well, then, the government of which he was a member went farther in that direction than all other governments in Canada put together. I am not aware that he offered any objection. At any rate, he certainly did not—

Mr. MANION: I assume the right hon. gentleman is not aware of many things which happened in council.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: That is true. But I am aware that my hon. friend sat here at one time when we were discussing trade matters, when I was putting forward the argument I am making to-night, and on that occasion he said that trade was war. I think his words are still on Hansard.

I do not entertain that view. On the contrary I regard the promotion of trade as a means of avoiding war. I believe if policies of economic nationalism continue to make headway among the different nations, that war will follow as certain as night the day. It is not too much to say that such a policy perhaps above all others lies at the root of conditions in Europe to-day. Some of those countries have abandoned the old policy of promoting the interchange of goods and have sought to become water-tight compartments in matters of production and purchase within their own boundaries. There can be no doubt in the world about that.

To-day opinion in the world is divided in large part between the two points of view, as to whether nations are to continue to seek to develop along lines of economic nationalism or whether something more is to be sought by way of international trade and greater freedom of intercourse between nations. This government believes in the latter policy. We have been pursuing it, and pursuing it successfully. Since the world has become as disturbed as it has been in recent years the first great step towards furthering better international relations was the step taken by the present government when it negotiated its first trade agreement with the United States.

Inevitably when the British and United States governments were seeking to develop a trade agreement between themselves the question came up with respect to the agreements which Canada had already had with each of those countries. We had an agreement with Great Britain which originated at the time of the economic conference of 1932, since modified and renewed in part but which expires in 1940. We had our agreement with the United States which with six months' notice would have expired this year. Those two countries were stressing to us their desire to reach a trade agreement between themselves. They kept pointing out that while they were seeking to negotiate a trade agreement between themselves they had in some particulars to bring up for our consideration some of the features of the agreements which were already in existence, one between Canada and Great Britain, the other between Canada and the United States.

Suppose we had assumed the attitude that under no circumstances would we consider—whether or not we got compensation, adequate or greater than adequate—the clause in the agreement between Great Britain and Canada which said that with the consent of the two parties modifications might be made in the agreement at any time, where each of the parties was likely to benefit in the long run. If we had taken any such attitude where would this country have been in 1940 when it came to seek a renewal of our agreement with Great Britain? I want this house to understand just where the country would very shortly be, if policies such as those suggested to-night by my hon. friend opposite were to govern, instead of those which the present administration has followed.

In matters of government it is always wise to look ahead—sometimes a long way ahead. I want to repeat that a consideration of which this country had to take full account when negotiating these agreements was just where would we be when the period of each of the present agreements expired, if we were not able to retain the friendship of the two countries with which we had negotiated our previous agreements? I say any government which would not have considered that aspect of the question would have been recreant in its duty alike to the future and the present, because even within the space of the few months when these negotiations were going on, notice could have been given to terminate at the end of the year the agreement already existing with Canada. Instead of having an enlarged trade agreement, good for the next three years and I hope many more, which will be discussed in the house within the next few weeks, we might well have found ourselves with no agreement at all. I ask hon. members in all parts of the house if that is a position which anyone would have welcomed.

What we have got has been the result of trying to deal in a fair and honourable way with the two countries closest to us, the two countries which are our best customers, the countries with which we have the closest relations and upon which we are dependent for very much of what we enjoy in the way of freedom and security. The government was glad to view the situation in a large way. We indicated, however, at once to our friends alike in Great Britain and in the United States that we would consider modifying our position in the British market only if we were to be ensured of adequate compensation, either by the British or by the Americans or both together, and that only upon that basis were we prepared to consider suggested modification. We believed that once together to discuss matters in the light of a larger agreement calculated to affect many countries, we would be able not only to review the existing agreement but to make a much better agreement for the next three years than the one we had at that time. Such has proved to be the case.

I am not going into the details of the agreement to-night, but I venture to say that when it is discussed in this house hon. members will find that for the next three years and beyond we shall have an agreement much more beneficial to Canada than the one we have had for the last three years. Not only that, but I think it will be found that we in Canada shall also benefit considerably from the agreement that has been made between the United States and Great Britain. We receive extra advantages that arise out of that particular agreement.

But I ask: Are we in times such as the present, going to view everything merely in terms of material values, in terms solely of quantities of trade? This afternoon my hon. friend began examining in microscopic fashion some of the concessions that had been made and that involved for the moment some sectional interest somewhere. Then he passed on to do the same sort of thing elsewhere, but confining the concessions granted to those on one side only. May I say to my hon. friend that agreements are not generally made without concessions by both sides?

He did not go over the other side of the agreement to see what we got in return. He did not tell the house this afternoon of the larger market for cattle that would be available. He said nothing of milk, of other dairy products, of fish, of potatoes, and other products. Nor did he go over the many other additional advantages that would accrue to other primary industries the products of which are to obtain wider markets. What is most extraordinary of all, my hon. friend seems to deplore the fact that there has been a reduction in taxation. One of the many things that he said to-night was that this government had made no reduction in taxation; yet a large part of his remarks this afternoon was in the nature of an attack upon us for having taken off the three per cent excise tax. If the three per cent excise is not taxation, what is it?

The truth of the matter is that since it has been in office this administration has done more in the way of reducing taxes on trade than has been done, not only by any one previous parliament but by any other two or three previous parliaments. This government has done more in the way of relieving consumers and industry of taxation where it affects trade, than has been done in many years previously in the history of this country. If you remove taxation, such as the three per cent excise, it is a removal of three per cent taxation on everything that comes into the country subject to such tax. Are you not thereby helping all consumers throughout the country? Are you not helping to put the equivalent of so much more purchasing power in the hands and pockets of the great body of consumers throughout Canada? Are you not helping to make the cost of living easier for the people of the country?

I say that so far as the agreements are concerned, this government has done a great national service. But it has done something much more than that. It has helped to make one of the most substantial contributions towards improving world conditions that has been made in this last decade. I venture to say that at this time in the world's history nothing has been more necessary than that every effort should be made in that particular direction. Is it not literally and absolutely true that the basis of the civilization which we cherish is dependent above everything else upon the friendly relations which exist between the English speaking countries of the world? By the English speaking countries, I mean this Dominion of Canada, the United States of America and Great Britain with the other dominions. It is literally and absolutely true that at this time in the world's affairs, when different forms of government have control in other lands, that the nations which cherish common ideals of freedom and liberty cannot be brought too closely together. There are no nations anywhere in this world that hold to the great ideals which those who love freedom cherish more than do the peoples of Great Britain, the peoples of the United States, and our own people. By these two agreements—I have put it broadly because the negotiations were carried on side by side—we have been able to bring together in a more friendly way these great elements of the English speaking world.

My hon. friend said that there were some interests in this country opposed to this agreement, but that their protests were being made sub rosa. He said that they were too patriotic to do anything about it.

Mr. MANION: I said that my right hon. friend pretended that they should be too patriotic. I did not suggest that they were too patriotic; I said that their patriotism prevented them from saying anything.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: It is a pity that patriotism does not prevent my hon. friend from saying a great many things.

Mr. MANION: I do not think I have to learn anything about patriotism from the right hon. gentleman.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I was rather surprised this afternoon to hear what my hon. friend had to say about the actions of the President of the United States at the time of the crisis last year. Considering the situation that exists to-day in the world; considering the part that the United States, along with Great Britain and France and other democratic countries, have played in seeking to work together to preserve the liberties and freedom which they enjoy, I was astonished that my hon. friend, a leader of a political party in this house, should have said in the hearing of all present that the most he thought the United States had done at that time was to criticize Mr. Chamberlain for the action which he had taken. May I read to the house what Mr. Chamberlain had to say about the United States at the time of the crisis? I should like to quote from a statement made in the parliament of Great Britain by the present Prime Minister, as reported in the London Times of October 4. After referring to Mr. Daladier and others, the Prime Minister said:

> There is one other power which was not represented at the conference—

That is the Munich conference.

> —and which, nevertheless, we felt to be exercising a constantly increasing influence. I refer, of course, to the United States of America. (Cheers). Those messages of President Roosevelt, so firmly and yet so persuasively framed, showed how the voice of the most powerful nation in the world could make itself heard across 3,000 miles of ocean and sway the minds of men in Europe.

I say to my hon. friend that if he had given that quotation to the house instead of saying what he did, he would have been more patriotic in his attitude. I can conceive of nothing less patriotic in these times than an effort on the part of any Canadian public man or citizen to try to create prejudices between this country and the United States. If ever there was a time when good will was required between different countries, and especially neighbouring countries, it is the present. It is with a great deal of pride that the present administration is able to look back upon the past three years during which it has been in office, the time during which our trade agreement has been in effect, and find ourselves able to say what cannot be denied from any source, that never have the relations between any two countries in the world been more friendly and more mutually helpful than have the relations between Canada and the United States during those three years. I think I can say with equal truth that there has been no time in Canada's history when the relations between this dominion and Great Britain and other parts of the British empire have been more friendly and mutually helpful than they have been during the last three years.

And so, without going further into the matter of these treaties at the present time, because we shall be debating their economic aspects later on, I shall content myself with repeating what appears in the speech from the throne, namely that the agreements constitute in no uncertain way a real and constructive contribution towards a betterment of world conditions, at a time of this world's greatest need.

If there is any doubt that that view is also held by other governments, let me quote from a telegram which I received the day of the signing of the treaty from the Secretary of State for Dominion Affairs on behalf of the government of Great Britain. It was received at Washington on November 17, 1938, and reads as follows:

> To: The Prime Minister of Canada.
> From: The Secretary of State for Dominion Affairs.
> On occasion of to-day's signature United Kingdom-United States trade agreement I should like to express again to Canadian government cordial appreciation of their readiness to facilitate our agreement with the United States by consenting to such modifications of their rights under their existing trade agreement with United Kingdom as were necessary to enable it to be concluded. It is our confident hope that agreement now signed together with complementary agreement between Canada and the United States which is being signed at same time will assist substantially in reducing barriers to trade, and will thereby prove a real contribution to world appeasement.

I sent the following telegram in reply, in acknowledgment of the message I have just read:

> From: The Prime Minister of Canada.
> To: The Secretary of State for Dominion Affairs, London.
> Washington,
> November 18, 1938.
> I have been much pleased to receive your telegram on the signature of the trade agreements. My colleagues will be not less pleased than I am to know that in the negotiation of the Canada-United States agreement, we have been able to facilitate the conclusion of the agreement between the United Kingdom and the United States, thereby strengthening the friendly relations between the two countries with whose fortunes those of Canada are so closely associated. I earnestly hope that the agreements signed yesterday will provide to other countries an example of the mutual advantages which flow from the broadening of trade relations not only in the realm of material well-being, but in the wider sphere of human understanding and good will.

Let me say this further word in concluding this part of my remarks. During the present session, if hon. members in any part of the house so desire, they shall have the opportunity of voting on this trade agreement and of letting the country see by their votes just where they stand, whether they are in favour of it or against it. We then too shall know how fully this treaty meets with the approval of hon. members of this house, as we know, and as hon. members know, it has already been approved by the people of this country.

May I come now to the matter of unemployment. As I said a moment ago, the problem of unemployment is not a new one in this country. It became a serious problem nearly nine years ago. It was worse during the period when hon. gentlemen opposite were in office than at any time. It has continued to be a most difficult, perplexing and baffling problem—and why? For the reason that it is a world problem. It is not a problem peculiar to the city of Ottawa, or a problem peculiar to the province of Ontario, or a problem peculiar to the Dominion of Canada. It is a problem with which every country in the world has been confronted within recent years—and why? Because of the policies that are being made to prevail in certain parts of the world, those policies of economic nationalism which, instead of bringing nations closer together and permitting more and more in the way of trade, are putting countries, as I said a moment ago, into isolated compartments where their dealings with each other are narrowed down to small margins, and where, as a result of the shrinkage of trade throughout the world, there has been a consequent and inevitable shrinkage of employment as well. In many countries of the old world the problem, to outward appearances, has been solved to a certain extent; but when one stops to ask oneself how that solution has been made, one begins to understand why it has not been possible to solve the problem in the same way in Canada.

Take the countries of Europe to-day with large numbers of men employed—take any of them, if you wish—and ask yourself this question: How many would be in employment in those countries if they were not employed in making armaments or munitions, if they were not regimented into armies, if they were not putting in their time building fortifications, if they were not engaged in the work of preparation for war? Ask yourself that question and you will find the explanation of why the labour problem is what it is in the world to-day, and what it is in this country to-day. These men are being employed in war industries, in the case of some nations possibly for aggressive purposes. It is not for me to say whether that is the case or not. It is for each to judge for himself. But what has been the result? The result has been that that form of solving the unemployment question has necessitated other nations doing much the same thing. There is an old law that applies to the precious metals, what is known as Gresham's law, according to which, as Gresham discovered, where you have two metals in circulation at the same time, the one base coinage and the other pure coinage, the base coinage sooner or later drives the pure coinage out of circulation. The pure coinage is either hoarded or melted down and used in the arts, and the baser coinage gets into circulation. I believe that is only part of a more comprehensive law which may be termed the law of competing standards, and which applies to the behaviour of nations and of men just as much as it applies to the circulation of the precious metals. You have different nations beginning to arm, beginning to try to maintain their own on the basis of force, and by the spreading of fear throughout the world; it then becomes inevitable that other nations have to begin to protect themselves against that kind of thing, and as they begin to protect themselves against the dangers of war, they too get drawn into this business of competitive arming. They too find it necessary to manufacture munitions and armaments, to regiment their men in large numbers, with the results that we see. And what do we see?

Look at the financial statements of Britain to-day; look at the financial statements of the United States to-day, and see what proportion of the national income is going into war armaments or munitions and into the training of men for war. That has had another effect. It has had this effect. It has thrown capital out of productive industries and put it into unproductive industries, with the result that there is much less capital left to invest in anything of a productive character.

But it has had an even worse effect than that. It has helped to prevent the investment of capital altogether. It has had a paralyzing effect upon the investment of capital. That is the position, above everything else, of this country and of some other countries to-day. Men will not put out their money to invest in the different industries. They are withdrawing their capital from industry. Ask the Minister of Finance (Mr. Dunning), who is sitting here to-night, how much of the investment of capital to-day is going into government securities at a low rate of interest in comparison with what took place in former years. It has deprived manufacturing industry and our primary industries, and the like, of the capital they need. Why is that? Fear is paralyzing people with regard to their savings, and they are not investing them for productive purposes.

You cannot increase production, you cannot increase the means whereby men get their livelihood, if there is a failure to invest capital or a failure to supply labour. Labour and capital are both essential to production, and whatever paralyzes one paralyzes the other in the matter of effective production.

It is well that that truth should be kept in mind. It is this paralysis of fear, which has spread throughout the nations to-day, which more than anything else, as I have said, is responsible for the fact that we have not the extent of industrial development that we should otherwise have. Where there is faith and good will between nations you begin to get natural investments of capital and labour alike in industry; but until that condition is restored we shall have this problem of the unemployed with us.

My hon. friend the leader of the opposition, says it ought to be the business of the federal government to solve the labour problem. He chided me this evening with not having tasted hardship in my early days. I am not going into that sort of thing to-night. My love for the poor goes a good deal farther back than that. Since he has said what he has, however, I will give to the house to-night a passage that is dearer to my heart than any other. It is from the life of one of my ancestors who played in the history of this country a part that had a good deal to do with the well-being of the working classes. They are words he uttered when, as I am to-night, he was chided because of his interest in the poor and humble. This is what he said:

> Well may I love the poor. Greatly may I esteem the humble and the lonely, for poverty and adversity were my nurses and in youth were want and misery my familiar friends. Even now it yields a sweet satisfaction to my soul that I can claim kindred with the humble, obscure cotter of my ever-loved, ever-honoured Scotland.
> "Long may thy hardy sons of rustic toil
> Be blest with health and peace and sweet content."

If my hon. friend wishes to know where those words came from, in one of the addresses he read to-night, I have given him their source. They have been a real inspiration to me in all my public life and in all my work, and they will be until the day I die. I do not forget to-night, nor have I forgotten at any time in my public life, that my own mother was born when her father was in exile at a time when her parents had not the wherewithal to buy food sufficient to feed their own family. If I have taken some interest, and I have taken a little, in the welfare of the working classes; if I was inspired to try to help to build up a Department of Labour in this country in which I served first for eight years as deputy minister and subsequently as minister; if as Prime Minister I continue to be interested in the cause of labour and seek by legislation to effect what may be helpful to the great body of the working people, the hon. gentleman now knows the reason for it.

My hon. friend talks about my having written a book. He has read from a pamphlet containing some of my radio addresses. I am very glad that he read from it, because this house will have an opportunity now to contrast the kind of writing that appears in that book with the writing that appears in his own. My hon. friend has also written a book, "Life is an Adventure", and it, too, is bound in red. Red was once a colour familiar to him. What has he to say? I will read something from page 294 that he has written on the question of unemployment:

> The other three causes for that overwhelming defeat—

He is referring to the defeat of the Conservative party at the last election.

> —were: (a) world-wide depression with its accompanying unemployment and unrest.

Is not that what I have been speaking of to-night? That is the cause, unquestionably, but he gives other causes.

> (b) the absolute lack of any organization or publicity bureau until it was too late.
> (c) the so-called Reconstruction party—

He has had a good deal to say to-night about the abolition of third parties. He is very proud of his association at the moment. But listen to this:

> (c) The so-called Reconstruction party leader's frank attempt to wreck the party and friends with whom he had been associated for a quarter of a century in the egotistical expectation that he would be at least the leader of the opposition with its emoluments of office.

I will not say that, in the passage I have just read, you have the measure of my hon. friend's colleague the former leader of the Reconstruction party, whom he has now at his side, but I will say that you have the measure of my hon. friend the Leader of the Opposition.

Now let me return to some of the figures with regard to unemployment. My hon. friend this afternoon sought to have it appear that there was no such thing as a board of registration. He said that we had this commission on employment, but that it had done nothing. Well, I tried to excuse him a little earlier by saying that he had been out of the house in the last three years and that there were therefore some things that he was not aware of. One of them was the fact that the employment commission did start a system of registration, the first of its kind we have had, of registering those who are on relief. The statistical bureau has kept a record of those employed, but the first records kept of those who are in receipt of relief have been the records made under the national registration system which has been carried out as a result of the work of that commission. The system of registration has been in force for two years, and that is why the two years were taken in the comparison made in the speech from the throne:

> At the beginning of the present winter the number of those receiving such public assistance was almost forty per cent less than two years ago.

I have in my hand the figures on which that computation was based and they are from the national registration given to the Department of Labour. It includes only persons assisted from federal grants in aid, excluding persons employed on works. This is a comparison of the numbers on aid in September and October in 1936 and 1938, showing the percentage changes to 1938:

	September 1936	September 1938	Percentage change 1938 from 1936
Urban	707,293	444,292	—37·2
Agriculture . .	248,327	108,819	—56·2
Total	955,620	553,111	—42·1

That is over 40 per cent.

Mr. MANION: May I ask my right hon. friend if he considers September the beginning of the winter? In the speech from the throne he uses those words.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: No; my hon. friend said this afternoon that he regarded the month of November as the beginning of winter. When the speech from the throne was prepared the figures used were the latest figures the government had; they were the figures for September and October. I have given the figures for September, and I shall now give them for October. The result as put in the speech from the throne was obtained by combining the two sets of figures and dividing by two, which I think was a fair basis.

	October 1936	October 1938	Percentage change, 1938 from 1936
Agriculture . .	279,269	185,461	—33·6
Total	1,008,796	659,273	—34·6

Taking the September and October figures together, they make a total of —38·3, that is within $1\frac{2}{3}$ of 40 per cent. The speech from the throne says "almost 40 per cent."

Mr. MANION: I do not quarrel with the figures the right hon. gentleman gives, but I made it clear this afternoon that I used the November figures.

[Mr. Mackenzie King.]

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: My hon. friend is quite right, and I hasten to say that when the November figures were prepared they did show that there were more receiving relief in November than at the first of November. The moment the November figures were prepared the Minister of Labour gave them to the press so that they would be available to this house and the country before the debate on the address took place. But the figures I have given this afternoon were the only figures and the latest figures the government had at the time the speech from the throne was prepared.

But I question very much whether we shall get far towards a solution of this problem if we spend our time on statistics, and fail altogether to get the larger view which it is necessary to take on a question of this importance. The leader of the opposition has admitted that technically and legally it is correct to say that the problem of unemployment is a local problem, a provincial problem and a dominion problem; that under our constitution there is a division of powers which assigns certain responsibilities to the provinces and others to the dominion, and, under the provinces, certain responsibilities and powers are given to the municipalities. As a consequence of that division of powers the problem of unemployment arises to-day from conditions in municipalities which municipalities alone can control, which this government cannot control. As long as the division of powers remains as it is, this government cannot control those situations over which the municipalities have control under the provinces. Similarly, when we come to the provinces, this government cannot control a situation that arises in the provinces in consequence of their powers as set forth in the constitution of this country, by which we are governed. All that we can possibly control are those matters which come under our powers under the provisions of the British North America Act.

We have realized that we have not sufficient power to cope with the problem. We tried as a first step to get more in the way of power by seeking to get the British North America Act amended so that this dominion government could introduce an unemployment insurance act. We have no power to compel this parliament to act as we wish in the matter of an amendment or to compel the British parliament to amend the British North America Act. We have to get that power by persuading the provinces, or enabling them to see, that it is in their interest as well as ours, that it is in the national interest, to see that that power and right is given to the federal government. Some years ago when my hon. friend the leader of the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation party (Mr. Woodsworth) was speaking of unemployment insurance and when I also was speaking on the same subject, an effort might then have been successfully made to get the British North America Act amended had hon. gentlemen opposite accepted our advice and sought amendment at that time. Whether they could have succeeded or not I cannot say, but it would have been much easier than it is to-day or has been in the last couple of years. What is the reason for the present opposition in some quarters? The reason is that an effort was made by the administration of which the present leader of the opposition was a member to force through this House of Commons a series of measures which this parliament had no authority whatever to enact, with the result that when the provinces saw that the dominion was seeking to take to itself powers to do certain things which they regarded as within their control, they began to be suspicious of the federal government, and the consequence has been that ever since it has been much more difficult to get the provinces—or some of them—to see where, in their own interest as well as in the interest of this nation as a whole, it would be well to allow this government to assume certain obligations. In seeking to get an amendment to the British North America Act which would enable us to introduce a national unemployment insurance scheme we were not asking the provinces to increase their burdens; we were proposing to take that whole burden upon ourselves. This government was asking that the dominion parliament should have that power, and made clear that the government itself would be prepared to raise the taxation necessary to that end, thereby relieving the provinces of part of the burden they already had.

I ask hon. members, What would be the effect of a course such as my hon. friend has suggested to-night, namely this federal government undertaking as its sole obligation to solve the unemployment problem? What would be the effect on the provinces, with the constitution remaining as it is to-day, if that theory were admitted for one moment? What authority has to do with the control of the whole question of employer and employee, of master and servant? What authority has to do with the regulation of hours and conditions of employment in mines? What authority has to do with workshops, with factories? What authority alone has any power with respect to wages and hours of labour? Only the provincial authorities. And as long as the provincial authorities have the control of these matters which are all-important in dealing with the question of employment, they must necessarily have some responsibility for the solution of unemployment. Imagine the situation in certain of our provinces to-morrow if a government were in power here which had come to power on the declaration that it was going to assume all the burden of dealing with unemployment and had assumed that obligation as its own? Imagine what some of our provinces would do with respect to many matters that were causing them trouble or embarrassment. I can think of one or two provincial governments in this country which, having no responsibility for the unemployed, would soon enact some very curious legislation. We should soon as a consequence have hundreds of thousands instead of thousands out of employment. They could do it very readily. The one check to-day on extremely foolish legislation is that it would almost certainly result in that very thing, throwing half a province out of employment. Relieve other authorities altogether of any responsibility in dealing with the question of unemployment, and under the circumstances of to-day instead of making things better they would be made infinitely worse.

How has this government sought to proceed with the matter, realizing that the constitution as it exists to-day places impediments and handicaps not only upon the federal authority's action but upon the provincial authorities and the municipalities as well, and this because our constitution was not framed to meet times and conditions such as we have been going through for the last ten years, nor was it framed for a country of the character Canada has become to-day. When our constitution was framed it did not look to the central authority assuming any of the social obligations to which we attach so much importance; they were not thought of at all. The matters which were left to the central authority can be seen in the act, and matters concerning social services as will be seen were left to the several provinces. Now we have come to the time when the provinces cannot, from their own revenues, carry on the social services they would like to carry on. In some cases they are going deeper and deeper into debt simply because they are trying to meet certain social obligations while they have not, as they claim, the sources of revenue which they need for that particular purpose. We sought, as a necessary first step in disclosing conditions as they have become, with a view to securing necessary adjustments or amendments, to deal with that question by appointing a royal commission to investigate the relations between the provinces and the dominion in regard to financial matters, those matters relating to the very questions we are discussing to-day. We believe that only as there is exact information to be placed before this House of Commons and before the legislatures of the different provinces with regard to conditions as they have become will there ever be a basis for the working out of a solution of the problem of unemployment, the constitutional question and other matters therein involved.

That commission was appointed a year or two ago. It met with a very serious loss in the regrettable retirement of the chief justice of Ontario, its first chairman, but the members composing that commission are all able men, and they have enlisted the services of many of the best minds of this country in helping to gather information and data and appraise its true value. Their report will be placed on the table of this house, according to what I am told by the chairman, within the course of another couple of months. When that report is submitted it will give to this parliament, to the legislatures and to the press of this country exact information of a character which will enable discussion to take place between parties interested in this question, which we believe will be effective in bringing them more into harmony with each other on adjustments and amendments which require to be made.

It has been said repeatedly back and forth throughout this country that the purpose of the commission was to say what is to be done and that we were leaving it to a commission to settle the whole matter. That is not the purpose of the commission at all. The commission has the authority to make recommendations, but this parliament alone can bring about any amendment of the British North America Act, and it will require with respect to some matters the consent of at least some of the provinces, in regard to some, possibly all. If we are to get the act amended it would seem we must bring about some kind of conference between representative men in the provinces and representative men in this parliament. I believe such a conference can be brought about and that it can be both successful and helpful, because I think the experience of the last couple of years has made it plain to all citizens of this country that there must be a getting together of representative men from all parts of Canada and, as a result of conferences between them, agreement reached on some very necessary amendments to the British North America Act which will meet with the acceptance of the provinces and the dominion.

That is what is meant in the reference in the speech from the throne to a national conference. It is not a national conference to tell the government what it ought to do or should not do. It is a conference to give this country the fruits of discussion, between representative men, based upon information that is absolutely essential and reliable, and which would enable those interested to work out intelligently the amendments to the British North America Act which sooner or later must be worked out if we are to have a solution of more than one of our present day problems. An all-important matter of the kind cannot be carried out in a day or over night. I believe this government showed foresight and wisdom in appointing, as long ago as a year and a half, a commission to undertake the work of getting the information available for those who might require it. In the meantime we have made it perfectly clear, as it is also made clear in the speech from the throne, that we do not intend to wait for the report of any commission to assume obligations in regard to doing our part in the solution of the problem of unemployment, but that we are prepared to go further than we have gone in the past in cooperating with the provinces of this country in order to make still more of a contribution to a solution of this very difficult problem.

There was one part of the speech from the throne to which my hon. friend scarcely alluded at all. I was not surprised at that, but it is a part which I hope hon. members will read very carefully. I refer to the record therein contained of what this government has done towards helping solve the question of unemployment. I am surprised that members of this parliament, I care not to what particular party they may belong, should seek continually to persuade the people of this country that this parliament has not been doing what it should for unemployment, or that the unemployment question is what it is to-day because of some lack of effort here at Ottawa. Hon. members of this house are responsible for what is done with the public funds of this country raised by federal taxation. Instead of belittling what has been done, why do they not point out to the people of Canada what has been done by the parliament to which they belong and by the government at Ottawa, since this government operates by virtue of the power given it by this parliament? Why do they not take upon themselves to show the people that session after session this government has passed measures to assist in the relief of unemployment; that year in and year out it has been giving more and more and more in the way of public funds to the provinces to help them in working out their share of the solution?

What is happening? We are taking money out of the federal treasury in millions of dollars and giving it to the provinces to help meet the cost of relief there. But instead of the federal government getting any credit at all for that, the people are told that all this has come from the provincial governments themselves. That is the situation. If federal members of parliament will be honest with themselves and with the people they will make a point of showing how under the British North America Act, as it is to-day, in order to solve this problem we must raise taxes federally and then hand over the money to some other authority, which has not been required to raise the funds at all, and allow that authority to spend the money. That is fundamentally wrong, and it is that circumstance as much as any other that is accountable for a good deal that is other than what we would wish it to be in Canada at the present time.

I am not going further into that question to-night because we shall be dealing with the whole question of unemployment at a later stage of the session. All I wanted to make clear this evening was that within the compass of our authority we are not only meeting all the obligations imposed upon us under the provisions of the British North America Act, and helping the provinces and municipalities as best we can, but we have been and are still trying to have this act amended in a way that will enable us to relieve both provinces and municipalities still further by assuming additional powers with regard to unemployment insurance, and we are taking steps which we hope will help us before very long to have the British North America Act still further amended in other ways which will be helpful alike to the municipalities, the provinces and the dominion.

I see that we are near the hour of adjournment. I shall therefore conclude with just one further word in reference to another remark which my hon. friend has seen fit to make to-night. The Leader of the Opposition has said that I have not been across this country since this parliament was returned and that I have not been in my own constituency since this government came into office. He is perfectly right in his latter statement. I stand here as representative of the constituency of Prince Albert. I have been returned election after election, and I still represent Prince Albert, which is more than my hon. friend can say with regard to the constituency of Fort William.

Mr. MANION: But no man in all Canada has been defeated as often as the right hon. gentleman.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: May I say this in reply to what my hon. friend has said. Anyone who holds the office of Prime Minister in these days must view his duties not from the point of view of whether or not he is going to be returned to parliament at the next election. He must not be thinking only of his own seat in the House of Commons—or even, may I say, mainly of whether or not his own party is to be returned. He has to do his duty as he sees it, day by day, in the light of his conscience with the knowledge of world conditions as they exist.

After all, we can each of us give only so much of our time and energy to our work. If there is any hon. member in the house who will point out to me wherein I have wasted any day in my life since I have been Prime Minister, and wherein I have not performed my public duty I wish him to speak now or forever after hold his peace. I confess I am not in a position to travel back and forth across the country and be in Ottawa at the same time. I confess I have been greatly concerned with international affairs—much more than I wish had been necessary. I said to the House of Commons during the last session that I thought we were in perilous times, that we were coming dangerously near to a crisis in the world's history. I have spoken to members of my party in party caucus perhaps much more confidentially than I should care to speak to the public about how little, in comparison, some of this petty strife amounts to with respect to the large concerns which ought to occupy the minds of men and women these days. So far as I am concerned, each day I have to ask myself: What is the most important thing to do this day, with the time at my disposal?

I came here after the general election, and the most important thing seemed to be to get under way the negotiation of a trade agreement between Canada and the United States. I went at once to Washington—I did not go to my constituency or out to Vancouver or Victoria. I went to Washington, with the result that we got a trade agreement which has been in force for three years. We now have another agreement which will be in force for a great many more years. And I venture to add that but for that agreement there would not to-day be the agreement which exists between Great Britain and the United States.

The next year was a year in which the League of Nations was holding an important meeting, a meeting at which the question of sanctions was to be discussed. But first let me say that I believe when parliament is in session the first duty of the Prime Minister is to parliament. I have not found it possible to be in the house every day of every week when parliament is in session, for the entire time of each sitting. I have tried to be here for the question and answer period, following the practice of the prime ministers in England. But I have not stayed in the House of Commons all afternoons and listened to all debates because there are many matters which have to be considered by the Prime Minister which cannot be taken up unless he has the time to do it. And the only time which presents itself is such time as he can make for himself while other business is proceeding. I have kept an eye on the business of the house and have tried to see all the members I could, and I have tried to get through all the work I could which was most pressing.

In the year I have mentioned there was the question of attending the League of Nations. I felt it was my duty to attend at that critical time; it was after the Abysinian episode. Events even then were shaping towards the state of affairs which have come about recently. I went to the league assembly and placed frankly before the different countries Canada's point of view. I think what was said at that time was more important to the constituency of Prince Albert or to Victoria or Vancouver or Halifax, or to any other constituency in Canada than anything I could have done by way of travelling and speaking across the country. We have far too much travel and talk these days on the part of many people—far too much of it, and from too many sources. The difficulty to-day is to get time quietly to think about the great problems which confront this and other countries.

The next year it was my duty after a parliamentary session to attend the coronation of their majesties in Great Britain. I may be wrong, but had I not attended the coronation I question very much if their majesties would be visiting Canada this summer. I believe I am right in making that assumption. I should be sorry if the visit of their majesties in Canada will not mean much more to the people of the dominion than anything I could be saying in any part of the country. At the time of the coronation there was also an imperial conference which it was my duty and which I had the honour to attend, and in the proceedings of which I participated as completely as possible, again with more advantage, I believe, to Canada than had I been travelling about and speaking in different constituencies.

It is quite true that this year I did not get away to the west, including my constituency, as I had hoped I might be able to do. It was a bitter disappointment to me. But it was no fault of my own—yes, it was a fault of my own. I was confined to my bed for a month during the summer, from what?—the effects of exhaustion, fatigue, nothing but that, seeking, though confined in that manner, to do the best I could with respect to many matters which were before me, and from having had on my mind for the last year or two what I dreaded above everything else, namely the possible developments which would involve this and other countries in a war. I ask this house to-night: Was I right or wrong in believing that the nations were nearing a stage where another world war was about to take place? I say to hon. members I have a two-fold duty. I am holding not merely the office of Prime Minister, but also that of Secretary of State for External Affairs, which is equivalent to that of a foreign minister. In the nature of things a foreign minister and Prime Minister must give his attention to matters which are of greatest importance to the world. I wish that shadow had passed. I wish all of us in the house to-night could feel secure as to what may take place in the course of this very year. May I add this: If he is going to deal intelligently, carefully and thoughtfully with the problems facing the world and Canada to-day, in relation to what may take place in the next few months or before this year is out, the Prime Minister of Canada cannot be going back and forth across the country making political speeches and making personal appearances before local audiences. He has this House of Commons to speak in. What better forum is there in the world? He has the radio to speak over. Is it not much better to give a few nation-wide addresses in carefully chosen words than to be giving the kind of oration to which we have listened this afternoon and tonight?

Let me say only this in conclusion: The position of the leader of a government in Canada to-day is not unlike that of the captain of a ship when the ship is in a storm. The captain of the ship must not be spending his time wandering among the passengers on the decks; his place is at the helm. Mr. Speaker, I intend to remain at the helm of this ship of state just so long as I have the confidence of the people of Canada and have the strength to perform the duties of my office. But if I have to gain that confidence by going back and forth across the country, making speeches here and there, and by seeking to cater to local tastes and prejudices, I do not wish to occupy office for a day. So long as God gives me strength to do my duty I shall seek to serve this country as best I can, according to the best light my conscience may give me.

On motion of Mr. Blackmore the debate was adjourned.

At eleven o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

The house met at three o'clock.

UNEMPLOYMENT

DISCHARGE OF MEN FROM CULTUS LAKE, B.C. FORESTRY CAMP

On the orders of the day:

Mr. C. G. MacNEIL (Vancouver North): Has the Minister of Labour (Mr. Rogers) received reports on the situation of Cultus Lake forestry project camp in British Columbia? If so, are any steps contemplated to prevent undue hardship if any number of single unemployed transients are now compelled to accept transportation to points in eastern Canada?

Hon. NORMAN McL. ROGERS (Minister of Labour): The hon. member gave me notice of the question. I have received a report with respect to the matter to which he has referred. Disciplinary action was taken in this forestry camp against two men who had broken regulations. As a result of that disciplinary action forty-seven men went on strike. They were subsequently discharged from the camp and offered transportation to their homes. No steps have been taken or will be taken to cause unnecessary hardship to anybody.

RADIO BROADCASTING

REFUSAL OF BROADCASTING PRIVILEGES TO PUBLISHER OF TORONTO GLOBE AND MAIL—REQUEST FOR TABLING OF CORRESPONDENCE

On the orders of the day:

Hon. R. J. MANION (Leader of the Opposition): In the absence of the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) I desire to direct a question to the Minister of Transport (Mr. Howe) with reference to the incident of the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation and Mr. George McCullagh. Has all the correspondence been tabled? The Prime Minister yesterday tabled Mr. Murray's reply and I think it is only fair that the whole of the correspondence should be brought down. I can see no objection to this being done, and it would suit the convenience of hon. members who would like to look into the matter.

Hon. C. D. HOWE (Minister of Transport): I will table all the correspondence I have and, I will also make sure that there is no more in the possession of the broadcasting corporation.

BREN MACHINE GUN CONTRACT

TABLING OF EVIDENCE AND ARGUMENT HEARD BEFORE COMMISSION OF INQUIRY

On the orders of the day:

Right Hon. ERNEST LAPOINTE (Minister of Justice): In the absence of the Prime Minister I desire to lay on the table the documents asked for by the hon. member for Vancouver North (Mr. MacNeil) in connection with the Bren machine gun inquiry.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

RIGHT OF MEMBERS TO SECURE INFORMATION FROM DEPARTMENTS AND PROCEDURE RELATING THERETO

On the orders of the day:

Hon. H. H. STEVENS (Kootenay East): May I ask a question of the right hon. gentleman who for the moment is leading the government? In view of the uncertainty of some of the figures and data used in the debate yesterday, is it permissible for members of the House of Commons to ask the various departments for information in order to be assured of the accuracy of that information, or to what extent is a limitation placed upon giving to hon. members information which they may desire?

Hon. NORMAN McL. ROGERS (Minister of Labour): Perhaps I might be allowed to answer the question. The question, I take it, relates to the figures with regard to unemployment or more particularly the unemployed on relief. If I may say so, the figures given by the leader of the opposition (Mr. Manion) with respect to unemployment in Canada are from the bureau of statistics and they do not pretend to be a registration. They are, I believe, accurately described as an estimate based upon various indices of unemployment in different parts of Canada. So far as the unemployed on relief are concerned, we have had for the past two years a national registration and each month a summary of the registration is released to the press. I believe that for some months past a copy has gone to the leader of the opposition. Certainly the desire of the Department of Labour is that the figures of registration, which are the most accurate we have, should be made available at all times. There is, of course, in the publication of these figures, a time lag sometimes of two months. For instance, the figures for October cover the entire month of October up to the first of November and they might not be available until the middle of January, let us say. But these figures are the most accurate that we have and they are available to all members of this house.

Mr. STEVENS: That is not my question. I was not referring to any particular department. The Prime Minister is now in his seat, perhaps I might put the question again. It concerns the extent of the right of members of the House of Commons to secure access to accurate information. My question was: What rights have members in the matter of requesting information from departments where they know it to be, and what limitation is placed upon officers of the government in giving information to members?

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): I understand that the procedure in respect to information which is not available in public documents is that any hon. member may ask for it by way of resolution. I think that answers the main point of my hon. friend's question. Certainly as far as the government is concerned, in supplying information the wish would be to give to hon. members at any time the fullest information that it is possible to let them have. There are of course documents that are confidential, and they must be so treated. But with regard to general information I see no reason why any hon. member should not inquire of the minister of any department with respect to any data that he may wish to have. But there is always the method of proceeding by resolution with respect to information that is not available in public documents.

Mr. STEVENS: One question further. Am I to gather from the Prime Minister's reply that it is not possible for a member of the House of Commons to go to a department where he knows certain public information is to be found, and discuss the matter with the deputy or any other officer of the department who understands the matter and to whom he can explain what he desires to secure in the way of information?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: My hon. friend knows as well as I do that under the system of responsible government a minister must be responsible for everything that relates to his department. I should think that the proper procedure in respect to what my hon. friend has just mentioned would be for the member wishing to get certain information from a department to go to the minister of the department and inform him of what he desires. The minister would then give instructions to those in his department to accord the facilities, or not to do so. If an hon. member were not treated with the courtesy with which he should be treated, the minister would be responsible. But I do not think it has ever been the practice, nor do I think the practice would be a right one, to have officials in departments interviewed by hon. members without the knowledge of the minister responsible, or be obliged to give out information without the minister being consulted in reference thereto.

EUROPEAN SITUATION

REQUEST FOR PUBLISHING OF CORRESPONDENCE RELATING TO CRISIS OF SEPTEMBER, 1938

On the orders of the day:

Hon. R. J. MANION (Leader of the Opposition): I should like to ask a question of the Prime Minister. In view of the fact that yesterday, both in his speech and in mine, and perhaps in the speeches of other hon. members, the international situation of last September was referred to a number of times, would it not be wise to have, either laid on the table or published in some form, the correspondence, so far as it is not of a confidential nature, between this government and the British government relating thereto? After all, no one knows much about the situation except the government, and I am wondering whether the correspondence could be published—say in a white book, or a blue book, or even a red book, but published in some form for the information of the house.

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): As my hon. friend knows, correspondence between governments, particularly where it relates to the possibility of war, is necessarily highly confidential. To make it public would require the consent of the governments concerned. I shall be glad to communicate at once with the British government to ascertain to what extent, if at all, they think the correspondence which passed between the Secretary of State for Dominion Affairs and the Secretary of State for External Affairs in Canada should be made public, and I shall be glad to inform my hon. friend and the house of the result of the communication.

May I add that I am sure my hon. friend and the house will realize at once that the correspondence referred to contains many references to other countries as well as to Great Britain and Canada; and I believe it is the practice where other countries are referred to in confidential correspondence not to have any such correspondence produced. I make that statement at once so that the house will understand the limitations on the government.

Mr. MANION: I fully understand that, and I excluded confidential information when I put the question. I am speaking in entire good faith, but I do feel that in view of the references to the subject by the Prime Minister himself in his speech yesterday and the probability that the matter may again be discussed during the session, hon. members should be familiar with the situation. There are of course certain matters which should not be made public, but I accept the right hon. gentleman's assurance that so far as the correspondence can be brought down it will be made available to hon. members.

CONTINUATION OF DEBATE ON ADDRESS IN REPLY

The house resumed from Monday, January 16, consideration of the motion of Mr. J. E. Matthews for an address to His Excellency the Governor General in reply to his speech at the opening of the session, and the proposed amendment thereto of Mr. Manion.

Mr. J. H. BLACKMORE (Lethbridge): Mr. Speaker, as I have moved about from place to place in Canada this year I find that the underlying thought expressed by men in the cities and in the country is this: "democracy is a failure. And the democracies supposed to be the greatest are the greatest failures." Now I submit, without committing myself either for or against that statement, that the prime task of this parliament is to see that democracy shall not be a failure, that it shall succeed.

Why do men feel that democracy in Canada has failed? The hon. leader of the opposition (Mr. Manion) yesterday gave some information, as reported on page 23 of Hansard, which I believe should be a challenge to every hon. member of this house. He said he found that Germany, Italy and Japan, taken all together, were only just a little greater in area than the province of Ontario, and that in those three countries there are cooped up, so to speak, 200,000,000 people, while in Ontario there are only 4,000,000 people. Now if the province of Ontario under the guidance of this government and the government at Toronto cannot support 4,000,000 people with a reasonable standard of well-being, while those distressed nations to which we have referred are struggling to keep 200,000,000 people, the evidence seems conclusive that something is radically wrong with the type of democracy we are trying to apply in this dominion.

As evidence of the extent to which we are succeeding in Ontario and in Canada, let me refer to a Canadian Press dispatch from Toronto dated January 11, containing the following statement of Hon. Mr. Cross, minister of public welfare for Ontario:

> Mr. Cross said he believed that unless there is a pronounced improvement in business conditions during the current year, Ontario's relief bill for 1939 will be well above the 1938 figure.
> He estimated that by the end of this month approximately 283,000 Ontario citizens will be receiving direct aid as against 253,430 during the same month last year. Expenditures during the fiscal year 1938-39, which ends March 31, are expected to exceed the 1937-38 year by at least $1,000,000.

The astonishing thing to me, Mr. Speaker, is that so many people who are placed in high positions in this country, who are reasonably well to do, seem not to find anything very seriously alarming in a situation of that sort, and seem not to feel that there is any particular responsibility resting upon them because those conditions exist. The truth, I think, is quite the opposite. The simple fact remains that when in a country as rich as Canada, with such a small population, conditions are so contemptibly and shamefully bad, the people will realize that certainly there must be something wrong somewhere.

Another bit of knowledge which fires a man's blood as soon as he acquires it, is conveyed by Harold Loeb in his book called The Chart of Plenty, published in 1935, concerning conditions in the United States. He points out that without any change whatever in the industrial equipment of the United States, that country could produce enough goods and services to supply every family in the country with $4,400 a year. Any person with a disposition to face things as they are naturally asks, "Well, why don't they do it?" That is common sense. Why don't they do it? Where is the fault?

There is an astonishing thing that hon. members will discover if they will just refer to their knowledge of geography. The hand that has guided the English-speaking people of this world has given them control over virtually all the valuable areas on this earth. There is hardly a section of the globe in which British people are settled that does not abound with wealth to a greater extent than the people, up to the present, have been able to use. Yet in every single state, and perhaps in Canada most of all, there exists this tragic suffering, this failure to register somehow or other and enable the people to use that wealth.

I do not wish to spend any time in recriminations; I believe we saw enough of that yesterday, and too much of it becomes a weariness to the flesh. I do wish to point out, however, that as I see it, as a representative of one considerable section of this country, about all the two old line parties ever do when they get into this house is argue over tariff and trade. If we say anything regarding trade, immediately some thoughtless enthusiast leaps to his feet with the idea that social credit people do not believe in trade, and a lot of kindred nonsense. It is dishonest to make any such statement. I will say, however, that if trade would solve the problems of this country and of the world, is it not high time we discovered how that can be done? After all the generations during which we have been struggling along in this country with respect to tariff and trade, to an ordinary person who tries to face realities it would seem that we should be somewhere near the right way of managing tariff and trade. And if, at the present time, there exists such violent disagreement between two sections of the Canadian people with regard to these two important matters, that again seems to indicate something radically wrong somewhere. Both these conditions, I maintain, tend to make the ordinary person in the street say, "Well, what is the use? What a contemptible, despairing mess it all is. It matters not whom we put in or what he tells us he will do when we put him in. We have the same old fare dished out to us from generation to generation."

What do Canadians want? If democracy is a government of the people for the people, it should give the people what they want. Everyone knows what they want. First of all this country wants plenty of jobs for everybody, and if jobs cannot be found for all our people something must be radically wrong. As soon as people get jobs they will want higher wages. Why? For the simple reason that when you are living in a country in which you can easily produce at least $3,000 worth of goods and services yearly for every person, or at least every family, it is disgusting in the extreme to think that men are working in Canada in such large numbers for less than $800 a year.

The next thing they want is equitable prices, and I think this applies to everybody. Last year the government did one commendable thing, among others. I am not disposed to criticize harshly or unreasonably, and I wish to commend the government for setting the 80 cent price for wheat. Probably they knew, as I knew, that 80 cents was not enough. There must be more money than that for a bushel of wheat or the farmers simply cannot carry on; and that statement is not the result of imagination. I should like to refer to a letter dated November 16, issued by the Searle Grain Company, to support what I have just said:

> The Searle index of the prices of Things Western Farmers Buy (147 items) now stands at 136·6, 1913-14 = 100, which means that these things cost farmers in the west at the present time 36·6 per cent more than they did before the war. The price of wheat—No. 1 Northern—as of November 15th, basis the open market price, is 38 per cent lower than it was in 1913-14, and basis the board price is 10 per cent lower. This means, therefore, that a bushel of wheat in western Canada has a purchasing power in relation to the Things Farmers Buy, on the open market, of 45 per cent in comparison with the purchasing power of 100 that it had before the war. Basis the board price its purchasing power is 66 per cent of what it was.

If one is disposed to be fair and has any business judgment at all it is only necessary to look at that statement to see immediately that the farmers are faced with an impossible situation. The government has given 80 cent wheat. Let us suppose that thereby twenty cents is lost to the government. That twenty cents has to be collected from somebody by means of taxes or must be borrowed from somebody, which means that the government will incur a debt. I do not think anyone in this dominion will fail to agree that this is an unsound condition. There should be some way of paying that twenty cents without taxing it out of somebody else, because if we can depend upon these figures with regard to Ontario it is abundantly clear that the people of this province cannot stand any more taxes, and no more can the people of Quebec. Then where is the money to come from? Yet not only does the farmer need a just price for wheat; he needs the same sort of consideration for oats, barley and rye, for all kinds of meat, for eggs, milk, cream, butter and wool. How are we going to give that to him? It must be done, or the farmer will simply go out of business and any province which is made up largely of farmers will go out of business too. That is the thing which I believe a good many of us fail to notice. The provinces of western Canada, Alberta, Saskatchewan and Manitoba, whose citizens are largely employed in primary production, will simply find it utterly impossible to carry on unless something is done to adjust that inequality. So that whether you are talking about agricultural machinery or shoes, the products of the farmers or the fishermen, you must have equitable prices. Therefore I say the third thing Canadians want right now is equitable prices, and if this government cannot give equitable prices, then it cannot govern the people. That is abundantly clear.

We need an increase of purchasing power all the way round; there need be no comment on that. We need more and better markets, not only externally but internally. We need reduced taxation and reduced debt. How are these changes to be effected? I ask in all simplicity and honesty: did any hon. member notice in anything said yesterday by either of the leaders of the two main parties any inkling or even a suspicion of a suggestion of any way in which these improvements can be brought about? I did not, and I think every hon. member who followed the debate carefully, as no doubt all hon. members did, will agree that nothing was said along those lines.

I now turn to the speech from the throne, although I have not time to consider the whole thing with care. I am glad I have not. There is this one part of it which vitally concerns all of us:

> My ministers recognize that the plight of those who are still unemployed canot await necessary constitutional amendments, nor the summoning of any conference. They are prepared therefore, notwithstanding constitutional impediments to effectual action, to join with the provinces in a further determined effort to meet the immediate situation.

What is that determined effort going to be? One idea which seems to be spreading throughout the country, especially in the west—and I do not know whether or not the government is to blame for it—is that as a result of little remarks such as those to which I shall refer in a few minutes the government is attempting to create among people the idea that something has got to happen to the British North America Act, is attempting to get the people into a state of mind favourable to changing it, and, that in the course of that change they will steal away from the provinces some of the powers they now have. If that idea exists, do not blame me. I merely tell the house the idea that is developing—and there can be no doubt about it.

Hon. members will notice at least three places in the speech from the throne where there is a sort of whine, if I may use that word—probably I should say "complaint"—about constitutional difficulties in the way of the government doing its duty towards the people. For instance we find this:

> Having regard to the existing division of powers and obligations under the British North America Act, responsibility for unemployment and the solution of its problems is necessarily divided. There has been an increasing assumption of obligations on the part of the federal government.

It is well that there has been. But that is just one hint; here is another:

> The intensification of the problem has set forth in bold relief the obstacles which the existing division of constitutional authority places in the way of a solution.

Altogether the paragraphs I have read constitute three attempts to impress upon the people of Canada the idea that the government cannot do what it wants to do unless the British North America Act is changed.

It would be interesting to spend a few moments in a discussion of certain passages of the Prime Minister's speech delivered last night in which I believe he indicated the kind of change he thought ought to be effected. May I say that so far as my native province is concerned, and I believe so far as all the provinces with which I am familiar are concerned, they certainly are not prepared to grant those changes. Whether or not the Prime Minister meant those expressions as I have interpreted them, I do not know. However, we will talk about that matter later, and shall not take further time in the discussion of it to-day. Is the government trying to filch from the provinces some of their provincial rights? Are the provinces too powerful? That is the question being asked by men throughout the country.

Then, in the speech from the throne there are references to proposed expenditures which, apparently, indicate another thing the government is going to do in order to make their determined effort. At page 3 of Hansard we find reference to the home improvement plan, the National Housing Act, and the Municipal Improvements Assistance Act. Aid has been given to the mining industry by subventions, and there is reference to federal public works, the construction of highways, land settlement, special projects for farm employment, forest conservation, and grants in aid to the provinces to assist in the care of those suffering from unemployment and agricultural distress. Then on the next page we find reference to a long-range program of public undertakings. It is proposed to undertake, with provincial cooperation, to provide assistance to municipalities. It is stated that the assistance given to forest conservation will be extended to include other work of national importance. The youth training program is to be extended to increase its efficiency. In addition to that we are to have a development of the wheat board's activities, and a further development of prairie farm rehabilitation.

Every one of those things is good; there can be no debate about that. Everyone must realize the wisdom of these proposals; but the question is, where will the money come from? Is it to come from taxation? If so, who is to be taxed, and by what means? Is it to come from borrowing, and, if so, who is to pay it back? When we find the burden of taxation now resting upon us so utterly insupportable, how are our children to survive under the burden of taxation which will be thrust upon them by us? Is the money to be raised by tariffs—only another form of taxation? According to the tenets of orthodox finance the money must be raised in one of those several ways. That fact alone so completely limits the extent of the possible efforts that they will be simply not adequate to meet the situation.

There is a tendency for the leaders of the two parties to promise practically everything under the sun; in fact they will promise the sun, the moon, the fixed stars, and paradise and the millennium into the bargain. But they never take the trouble to tell the people how they are going to pay for it. The people vote them into office because they tell what they are going to try to do. I do not wish to be critical, but on several occasions I have noticed statements purporting to have come from the leader of the opposition (Mr. Manion) in which he has told the people what he is going to do. He will put everybody to work, and all sorts of things. What is the sense of telling people what you are going to do before you tell them where you are going to get the money with which to do it?

I fail to find in the words of either of the leaders who spoke yesterday any indication as to where they can get any more money. If I remember correctly, the leader of the opposition said there must be a basic change, but he did not indicate along what lines that basic change was to come. Where is this basic change? Ever since the right hon. gentleman who preceded the present leader of the opposition, in his famous first radio broadcast in 1935 said, "The old order is gone; it will not return; you are living among conditions which are new and strange to you" the people have been wondering what the new order is. They are still looking for it.

One word from the leader of either of those parties would comfort us tremendously, because we would see some hope. Does this government know what to do? That is the first question. If it knows what to do, does it lack courage?

Mr. MacNICOL: It lacks everything.

Mr. BLACKMORE: If the government does know what to do and it has the courage to do it, has it the power? If there is some power controlling the activities of the sovereign people of Canada, if there is some power that prevents this government from doing what the people sent it here to do, then we should know what that power is. If there is no such power, then we are entitled to demand of this government to the fullest degree.

What is the fundamental change? I shall use an illustration which I hope hon. members will pardon, since it is rather crude. The present government, as it were, is trying to put out a great conflagration with streams of coal oil. All they argue about is how large the stream of coal oil should be, or whether it should be played on the top, on the bottom, or on the middle of the fire. They argue whether we should have three, four or five fire engines. The question whether the coal oil will put out the fire never seems to enter their minds.

Of what are the flames of this fire composed? They are made up of discontent, of bitterness, of hostility caused by misery and poverty and resentment. The people see that they could have good things, but for some unaccountable reason these are denied them. The result is that bitterness is rising, not only in our own country but in far countries. If you want to find the cause of war, I think it will be found right in that neighbourhood.

What are the causes of poverty? There are four. The first is debt; the second is taxation; the third is our faulty financial system—faulty either in its essential aspects or in the manner in which it is applied; and the fourth is our faulty method of distribution. Both our faulty financial system and our method of distribution are completely outmoded. They ought to have been put on the scrap heap a generation ago.

Frankly, we must have some money. The problem for this house to solve is where we are going to get that money. Is there any other way of getting it than the three ways which have been mentioned? Every proposal of the government and every desire of every Canadian requires more money. That money should be provided without increased debt and without added taxation. Trade helps. Of course trade is good, but it is not good enough.

In our economic system, money can be likened to water in an irrigation system. There are people throughout this country who because of their dishonesty or ignorance are contending that the social credit people say that money is the only solution. Nothing of the kind. You might as well say that water is the only thing in an irrigation system. You could have no irrigation system without water. In the economic life of a country money is as water in an irrigation system. Water is not everything in such a system, but it is indispensable. You may spend considerable money on elaborate ditches, laterals, head-gates and the like, but what good will they be without water? So it is of industry without money.

Money consists of currency and credit. Social credit maintains that currency should be state created. There are a good many who smile when that statement is made. Those who say that it cannot be done will have their attention arrested if they turn to the report of the royal commission on banking and currency in Canada, published in 1933. On page 22, paragraph 47 of that report they will find these words:

> In the war session of August, 1914, parliament raised the partially covered issue of $50,000,000. Subsequently an issue of $16,000,000 was made against a deposit of railway securities guaranteed by the dominion government, as well as an uncovered issue of $10,000,000 for governmental purposes.

Twenty-six millions were created—there is no laughing that off. They did not cause inflation, although there was no gold behind them. The new money did not cause a rise in prices. It was sound money. If you had $1,000,000 of that money to-day it would buy $1,000,000 worth of any commodity in the Dominion of Canada, and perhaps anywhere on the face of the earth. That was good money. But the government created it. Some men will say, "Oh, you cannot trust the government with the creation of money." The government handled that money, did it not? It stopped at $26,000,000. Why did it stop there?

Now if the government could create $26,000,000, will any man who knows tell me that they could not have created $27,000,000? That is an important consideration.

Apparently here is what we are doing. We have turned over the power to create money, the power to create almost a limitless supply of water, to use the irrigation illustration, to the Bank of Canada. Every dollar we get, we have to borrow. Will anyone tell me how we are any better off than we would be if the Bank of Canada was owned by the greatest financier in the world? If this is to be the case, if this is the way we propose to handle the Bank of Canada, if this is the way we are to get money from the Bank of Canada, then for the last ten or fifteen years the people of Canada have been deceived by one of the greatest hoaxes in the history of the dominion The man on the street had the idea that when the dominion got control of the Bank of Canada, it would have control over the money created by that bank. We have given away the power to create money. The question now is: can we get it back? The question is: will we get it back?

There is the currency. How much could Canada in 1916 have created? Might it have been $200,000,000? I asked an eminent banker in my neighbourhood a series of questions about this matter. I asked him if it could have been $30,000,000, and he said, "I believe it could." I asked if it could have been $35,000,000, and he replied, "I believe it could." "Forty-six million"? "Yes." Then I asked him if it could have been $50,000,000, and he replied, "There is a place where you have to stop." I asked him to tell me where that place was, but he did not know.

We have never taken the pains to teach our members of parliament, the heads of our banks or anyone else in this dominion upon what the amount of money that a nation can create depends. The result is that we are all helpless. We are just as helpless as our ancestors of three hundred years ago would be if they were placed in a modern power plant. They would not dare to move for fear that they would touch the wrong button and blow themselves up. That is the position in which we find ourselves with respect to our monetary system. We just do not know.

We now come to the matter of credit. Where can we get credit for money? If hon. members will turn to the findings of the Macmillan committee on finance and industry, they will find where credit can come from. The first fifteen or sixteen lines on page 34 of that report are quite enlightening, but I shall not take the time to read them. Next let us turn to a passage which was read into Hansard last year; it will be found in a book entitled The Canadian Banking System, published in 1938 by James Holladay, Ph.D., professor of economics at the university of Alabama.

He tells us that to-day the Canadian banking systems can take one dollar of gold and by the time they are finished with it it has grown into four one dollar bills and $80 of credit. That is how money grows in Canada to-day. If banks can thus create money, why not do it for the government? That is the point. Why should we have to borrow the money when it is so easily produced? Of course I know the answers which are commonly given, that bank money has to be backed, and all this. We will grant that that is true. But there is a way of managing these matters for the public good, that is for the people's good. The question is have we the courage; have we the vision?

How much money can we have in the Dominion of Canada? A little experiment was conducted by the island of Guernsey between 1815 and 1829. The island of Guernsey through its government created three thousand one-pound notes, and with that money constructed a market house. They proposed to tax the one-pound notes back again by means of a yearly rental of three hundred pounds, and thus have all the money back within ten years. Long before they had the money all withdrawn they discovered that the economic conditions within that island had greatly improved, with no apparently disadvantageous results, so they issued more, and they continued to issue more—as hon. members may read in the book to which I will refer in a minute—until in 1829 they had in circulation 48,183 one-pound notes, and apparently there was no inflation, and there was no ill effect. The experience there is a challenge to men to-day. It occurred; it is of record. You will read of it in the Story of Money, by Sir Norman Angell, published in 1929, between pages 266 and 271; and on page 271 you will find a statement of Sir Norman Angell, that great monetary authority, that the Guernsey island experiment was a success.

How big was this island of Guernsey? What was there about Guernsey island which enabled it to support such a tremendous amount of money? Guernsey island is a little piece of country roughly triangular in shape—you will find this in the Encyclopaedia Britannica—nine and a quarter miles long at its greatest length, five and a quarter miles wide at its greatest width. What are its industries? Has it gold mines or something else to give its money backing? No, it has not. It is engaged in gardening; it is engaged also in dairying, using the famous Guernsey island cow; it probably had at that time a stone quarry, as well as several minor industries which we would consider of hardly any importance at all. If an island nine and a quarter miles long and five and a quarter miles wide, not more than twenty-four square miles in area, could support that amount of money, how much could a province like Ontario support?

"Oh, but", people will say, "it will cause inflation." Well, what is inflation? I think there is no word used by the English people to-day which is as little understood as the word "inflation". Last year the Minister of Finance (Mr. Dunning) after I gave a talk on March 8 rose and spent a considerable amount of time talking about the proposal of the hon. member for Rosthern (Mr. Tucker) that a certain number of Canadian bills should be created and used for public works. The minister pointed out that if bills were created and so used they would get into the hands of the banks and the banks would be able to multiply them ten times, and that would cause inflation. I am not going to say very much about it, but I will raise this question. Take any bank of which hon. members know; would you be able to increase the amount of money it would lend merely by putting twice as much money in it? Not by any means. The banks to-day have loaned all the money they will loan. As far as their present loans are concerned it would not matter if they had fifty times as much money. All one needs is that one fact to be able to say that the Minister of Finance might possibly have thought the thing through a little more carefully.

I am going to read a statement which will probably impress hon. members. This struggle about money is going on all over the Anglo-Saxon world, and it is high time that it should. We have been enslaved long enough. This quotation comes from Senator Owen's testimony before a special committee of the United States Senate, on June 9, 1937. His words are as follows:

> Inflation does not occur until maximum employment and production is achieved.

In other words you cannot have inflation as long as you have unemployed men and unemployed resources. You see what a widely different interpretation that puts upon inflation from anything which has been used in this house by, at any rate, members of the government.

I have not time to deduce other evidence backing this up, but there is plenty of it. The testimony continues:

> If it should occur, the volume of money could be immediately reduced by selling bonds, by sales tax and other taxes, and retiring such excess money from circulation.

The whole of the evidence before that committee is of great value.

I contend that there is simply no solution under the sun to be found except by using a monetary technique. I am not contending that money will solve it all, but you can go no further to-day until you do attack your monetary problem. People will say, "You will cause the exchanges to be set against you." Just a word concerning the exchanges. They are set against you because you are buying more goods than you are selling, making it so that there is a greater demand for foreign dollars than for yours. You will overcome a condition like that first by having plenty of production of all kinds, for the more honey you produce in your country, for example, the less you will import from the United States; the more sugar you produce in your country the less you will buy from the United States, and the more coal you produce and use in your country the less you will bring in from the United States. All these things will help your exchange situation. The prime task for you is to see that you are producing all you need of as many products as you can produce. That is the first point.

The second question is, are your prices down low enough so that the other man will come and buy? You can reduce those prices, as apparently Japan has reduced her prices, by using the power to create credit, as I have already explained with respect to wheat. If you set the price of wheat at a given price, created national money and paid the difference, how far could you go with the process? You could go far enough to put your wheat on any market in the world. There is the answer to the contention that new money would cause an adverse exchange.

Mr. SPEAKER: Order. I do not wish to interrupt the hon. member, but he has exhausted his time.

Mr. BLACKMORE: May I just finish the sentence? Now, Mr. Speaker, I have laid before you a solution. It is a possibility. It is a way by which the problem can be worked out.

Mr. J. S. WOODSWORTH (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, private members have some advantages in living outside the capital for six or seven months in the year. Perhaps they come to realize that Ottawa is not Canada. The opening ceremonies are very far from being representative of the life of Canada. In my judgment there is altogether too much gold braid and too many social functions in evidence. I have sometimes played with the fancy that it might be good if parliament should be held in a different part of Canada each year,—among the lumbermen of British Columbia, or the farmers of the prairies, or the miners of northern Ontario, or the steel workers and coal miners of Cape Breton. I suppose that is not practicable, but I fancy it would help to give the cabinet ministers and the large mass of civil servants rather a different idea of what Canada really is.

Mr. FINN: What about the fishermen?

Mr. WOODSWORTH: The fishermen I gladly include, and I intend to speak of them later. Here in Ottawa we are apt to become too comfortable and we are also apt to adopt a false set of values. In fact, I am afraid Canada is becoming top-heavy. As I come back to the capital I notice that work is being started on the new building for the Supreme Court of Canada. It is said that it will cost two and a half millions. We can discuss it in the estimates, but I could not help contrasting that with a letter that I received not long ago from a woman in Saskatchewan. It is written on sheets torn from a school exercise book, the only paper she had. She says:

> I am a teacher, a married woman, a mother and housekeeper all in one. I took over the home school a year ago March at a cash salary of $18. Immediately the relief agent cut me off relief. We had no crop, not even a green spear on over 400 acres of wheat. My husband sold a few cattle, I believe ten head, getting around $180. Then he and our three children were cut off. We got no relief groceries, no clothing order, no coal or wood order.

I do not give that isolated example as typifying the whole of the west, but I would say that there are thousands upon thousands of people in Canada, just as good Canadians as there are in this house, who are in some such position as that to-day.

I notice a new monument is being erected. It may be very artistic; I am not discussing that. But there are some 50,000 unemployed veterans on relief, as the Winnipeg Free Press in a recent editorial reminds us, the equivalent of more than two army divisions. I have wondered what it would look like if we had a long procession of these veterans passing through the archway of that monument. This would really represent conditions such as we have them in Canada to-day. It is only a few weeks ago that I saw a number of these returned men having dinner at the soup kitchen, as we call it, in my own city of Winnipeg. There daily, three thousand men, transients, are being fed. That is going on from day to day, from week to week, from month to month. Many of these men are becoming unemployable. A number of them are still young men, although an attempt is being made to force them out on the farms. That is a situation that should be brought to the attention of the government.

Since coming to this city I have noticed that most elaborate arrangements are being made for the visit of their majesties. It would seem as if every department has been pressed into service. I recognize that the king of Great Britain is king of Canada. I recognize that he is the outward and visible symbol of the tie that unites us to Great Britain, and I think he and his consort should be given a dignified, though I would say a simple, reception. As a representative of one constituency and one who knows something of Canada, I would urge that lavish display need not be an indication of loyalty, and that the lack of such display is no indication of disloyalty. Lavish display may merely minister to the vanity of a comparatively small group of people in Canada.

I was a little perturbed in the last day or two upon reading an account in the Montreal Gazette of one of the functions here in Ottawa. I read:

Prologue to court functions anticipated during the royal visit to Canada in the late spring, this year's drawing-room assumed a more regal tone than those of former years.

Royal purples and blues, glistening diamante trimmings, and gold and silver metallic gowns in full-skirted styles were favoured by women attending. Bouquets gave way to feather fans, but dainty nosegays were carried by hoop-skirted debutantes who made their formal bows to society on this occasion. Conventional court weathers—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I know it should be "feathers" but I am reading it as it appears in the Gazette.

Conventional court weathers were worn over piled-high coiffures.

I should like to compare that with a front page story from the Winnipeg Free Press under date December 20:

Meagre savings have dwindled away; clothes are becoming shabby and threadbare; household furnishings are in tatters; the bare minimum of food is all they have to offer.

There are literally hundreds of such homes scattered across Manitoba. Homes where, through no fault of their own, families are facing destitution. Perhaps the crops have failed or father lost his job; it may have been sickness or some other cause. But whatever it is, they have been left with nothing, not even hope.

Children in such homes—the future men and women of Canada—are undernourished and underclothed. They face wasting sickness every moment of their lives and there is nothing the parents can do about it. They are helpless—entirely dependent upon the good will and generosity of those others who are enjoying better circumstances.

Or take another description of life as it is in Canada. I should like to quote from the introduction to Harold Dingman's articles. He is a staff writer on the Globe and Mail. Here are the headlines:

Life of Grim Squalor Lot of Fishermen on Atlantic Coast—Parents Helpless as They Watch Scurvy-Stricken Children Grow Weaker Day by Day.

No Relief Given Because Taxes Unpaid.

And then this paragraph follows:

This is a story of human degradation, and misery, and poverty, and despair, and starvation.

Here on the shores of the blue Atlantic, here in the garden of Canada, here in this tourists' paradise with all its rugged beauty, ten thousand people who live in tiny fishing villages along the Atlantic seaboard are on the verge of starvation.

Yes, starvation. This is a true story—a story of the inshore fishermen who are a forgotten group of men and women and children. They are hungry to-day, and they will be hungry to-morrow. They will be hungry in the coming winter months, when the icy winds whistle out of the North Atlantic and batter their wooden shacks on Cape Breton Island and along the barren shores of Nova Scotia and New Brunswick.

Whether the Prime Minister's grandparents were poor is no great concern of this house, but we are concerned with the condition of the people I have spoken of. In view of such an appalling contrast as I have given in these different stories, some of the ministers of the gospel may well be asking whether the church has failed, and we may well be asking the other question, whether democracy has failed. I suggest that either democracy must solve these problems or democratic institutions as we know them must pass. In his well-known definition Abraham Lincoln said that democracy was government of the people, by the people, and for the people. Will anyone claim that we should have these social functions and elaborate displays, for any purpose whatever, while we allow these conditions to prevail year after year?

Several important events have taken place since parliament prorogued, and I should like briefly to call attention to them. The government have refused either to disallow the "padlock law" or to refer it to the courts. In my judgment the Minister of Justice sidestepped the issue. He speaks of the fundamental principle of local autonomy, but the Minister of Justice knows that the provinces have local autonomy only within a very clearly defined jurisdiction. In my judgment the decision was clearly a political decision.

The Minister of Justice may represent a Quebec constituency, but surely he is minister of justice for Canada. And he is minister of justice in a so-called Liberal government. Suppose that the organization which I represent is what the leader of the opposition represented it to be to the people of London, and assuming that to be communicated to Premier Duplessis, how would the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation stand in the province of Quebec? Are our public assemblies to be banned because our organization does not please the premier of Quebec province? Is that a matter of local autonomy? Is that political freedom? After the election the Prime Minister promised that we should now have political freedom in Canada, yet this government has permitted this kind of infringement of liberty to continue. In practice it is extremely difficult for private individuals successfully to bring this question before the courts.

Another matter not mentioned in the speech from the throne is the recognition of Ethiopia. From my standpoint the conquest of Ethiopia was one of the most shameful chapters in recent history. I have only to read—though it is hardly necessary—certain clauses from the covenant of the League of Nations to which Canada was a signatory. Article 10 states:

> The members of the league undertake to respect and preserve as against external aggression the territorial integrity and existing political independence of all members of the league. In case of any such aggression, or in case of any threat or danger of such aggression, the council shall advise upon the means by which this obligation shall be fulfilled.

And again, in article 16:

> Should any member of the league resort to war in disregard of its covenants under articles 12, 13 or 15, it shall ipso facto be deemed to have committed an act of war against all other members of the league. . . .

And so on. And again:

> The members of the league agree, further, that they will mutually support one another in the financial and economic measures which are taken under this article. . . .

Has anything of that kind been done by the signatories of the treaty? Canada is one of those signatories. I cannot feel proud of my country when I realize that she is weakly following the lead of other nations and acquiescing in such an arrangement as this.

The speech from the throne further tells us that the government is giving "anxious and continuous consideration" to the international situation. I am not going to discuss that to-day; the Prime Minister has given us assurance that we shall have ample opportunity to discuss it later. But I should like to ask what happened at the time of the Munich crisis. Was Canada in effect committed to war? From the papers one would judge that to be so; is it true? Parliament should know. It is all very well for the Prime Minister to tell us that parliament would be called, but what is the use of calling parliament if there are certain commitments already made? It is like the calling of parliament two years ago to decide on the abdication of the king and the coronation of the new king; but before we were allowed to consider the matter in this chamber we all had to swear allegiance to the new king. What is the use of going through a pro forma affair of that kind? I ask then, what happened at the time of the Munich crisis? Is Canada in effect committed to the Chamberlain policies? Sometimes I think that Mr. Chamberlain is to all intents and purposes Canada's foreign minister. This country should know. Can we maintain our neutrality? I have introduced a resolution, and hope to have it discussed later in the session, which asserts that we in Canada ought to be free to enter upon a war or free to keep out of it. We shall see where the government stands on that matter.

We are told that Canada's defences are to be materially strengthened. So Canada enters upon the same old armament race, a bloody pathway which all through history has led to disaster. We are told now that force is the final arbiter. To me this is the supreme apostasy. Is force the final arbiter? Then it would be just as well for our Christian churches to go out of business.

Against whom are we to be prepared to defend ourselves? Germany and Japan are mentioned as possible aggressors. Well-informed people tell us that shipments of chromium are being sent to Hamburg. We all know that shipments of scrap iron and nickel are steadily going to Japan. During the last year our exports of metal to Japan nearly doubled. Is that to go on and are profits to be made out of shipments to nations which might possibly in the near future be enemy nations, or who are invading nations which under the covenant of the league we are pledged to protect? In 1937 the government took power to prevent individual Canadians from involving this country in foreign wars. We had the Foreign Enlistment Act and an amendment to the Customs Act, giving the government discretionary power in peace or war to—> —prohibit, restrict or control the exportation, generally or to any destination, directly or indirectly, or the carrying coastwise or by inland navigation, of arms, ammunition, implements or munitions of war, military, naval or air stores, or any articles deemed capable of being converted thereinto or made useful in the production thereof, or provisions or any sort of victual which may be used as food by man or beast.

The dominion government exercised its powers under this legislation in the summer of 1937, when the act was made applicable to Spain. Why should not this act be made applicable to Japan? I hope the government will take an early opportunity to inform us of the reason.

This year the United States took a leading part in the summoning of a pan-American conference at Lima. I ventured to write to the Prime Minister urging that Canada should be represented. He was good enough to reply; let me read the last paragraph of his letter, dated December 3, 1938:

As regards the specific suggestion that Canada should take part in the present conference, I should perhaps point out that Canada is not a member of the conference and, under the present wording of its constitution, is not eligible for membership.

Now Canada is situated on the north American continent. Why should we not participate in such a conference with regard to matters that pertain particularly to American affairs? It seems to me that anything which can be done to promote better feeling on this side of the Atlantic should be done. I should like the government to take an early opportunity to inform us why we should not cooperate with other countries here in the western hemisphere. It may be said that the present constitution of the pan-American conference forbids it, but I think it has been generally understood that a chair awaits Canada as soon as she cares to occupy it.

The speech indicates that the government proposes to continue its present inadequate relief policy. The other day the Prime Minister once more trotted out the British North America Act. It seems to me that act can be classified as an ever-present help in time of trouble. I admit the difficulties under the British North America Act; I recognize that we have been giving grants in aid; but means were found a few years ago to bring in old age pensions, though for years the British North America Act had been quoted as a reason why it was impossible to enact such legislation. That legislation is on the statute book to-day. Why not other legislation? It may be that the Prime Minister will tell us that if we had unemployment insurance it would have to be contributory. At the present time contributory unemployment insurance is out of the question so far as the great mass of the unemployed are concerned. Why should not the federal government act in a matter of this kind? As I heard the Prime Minister's speech I could not but turn to a pamphlet issued immediately after the general election of October 14, 1935, entitled The Voice of the People. Here is the message the Prime Minister gave the people of Canada:

In the new era which dawns to-day, the struggle for the rights of the people will, in the realm of economic liberty and security, be carried on as never before. Poverty and adversity, want and misery, are the enemies which Liberalism will seek to banish from our land. They have lain in wait at the gate of every Canadian home during the past five years, and their menacing mien has served to destroy the souls, as well as the minds and bodies, of an ever-increasing number of men, women and children in our land. We take up at once, as our supreme task—

Not the arranging of elaborate functions for their majesties.

—the endeavour to end poverty in the midst of plenty, starvation and unnecessary suffering in a land of abundance, discontent and distress in a country more blessed by Providence than any other on the face of the globe, and to gain for individual lives, and for the nation as a whole, that "health and peace and sweet content" which is the rightful heritage of all.

Brave words; but now all we have is a recital of the difficulties inherent in the British North America Act and more talk about the objection to grants in aid. We had a royal commission appointed, and now we are told that after the commission reports we are to have a dominion conference. I am not sure but that the provincial people must come in on that also. I should like to know whether any province has definitely objected to the government assuming a much larger proportion of the cost of unemployment.

What is the situation to-day? I should like to quote again what was quoted yesterday by the leader of the opposition, from the report of the Canadian Welfare Council:

All in all, since 1930, Canada will have spent by March 31st, 1939, about 900 million dollars on "direct" relief, relief works and projects, —and she has more people dependent on such relief than when she started. She has neither legislation nor comprehensive planning to deal with the problem beyond the jurisdiction of each current fiscal year, and she has a population, in large part dispirited, on the whole uncertain, and yet natural resources, whose per capita ratio is perhaps unsurpassed in any state to-day.

And again:

As to the actual totals with which December opened, it would appear that, when all the facts are totted up, we are not going to be any very encouraging distance from the totals for the same date last year, which the Canadian Welfare Council estimated at 925,000 and which official figures later set at 948,000.

And again:

General dependency, itself, is on the "up and up" in Canada.

That is the situation. I should like to quote and endorse a brief paragraph, together with the headline, which appeared in the Halifax Herald of October 3:

Canada Marshalled Resources for War Why Not For Peace?

Let it once be realized that the perils of a reactionary peace which dooms men to idleness are as great as those of destructive war, that internal economic tyranny breeds no less dangers and is no less intolerable than the rule of a foreign tyrant, and there will be in this country such a forward march that an orderly and prosperous future will be assured.

This government has enjoyed office for four years. Where is its constructive program?

Industrial profits may be satisfactory. I would refer hon. members to the Monetary Times of December 10. I think the situation is fairly well summarized by Angus and Company, members of the Toronto Stock Exchange, in dealing with December dividends:

Dividend payments by Canadian corporations for 1938 and for the month of December established new high records. The total for the year of $313,108,335 as reported to us, compares with $305,759,403 in 1937 and $256,475,684 in 1936, while that of $92,622,238 for December contrasts with $90,072,908 for December, 1937, and $72,849,846 for December, 1936.

Or, to present evidence from another quarter, I quote from the statement of Sir Charles Gordon in his review of business at the one hundred and twenty-first annual meeting of the Bank of Montreal. In discussing business in Canada he——characterized the past year as "not unsatisfactory" having in view the conditions which have prevailed in other countries.

As to his own bank—

—the financial statement was equal in strength to any that had been issued during his eleven-year tenure of the position of president.

Not so bad for the banks; not so bad for the great corporations, but I have already shown what it meant for the ordinary people of this country. Then the president of the bank suggested a policy for the government, which they would seem likely to adopt:

Among the more immediate factors which he felt would have a stimulating effect on business was the prospect of Canada contributing to the armament requirements of Great Britain.

There we have the cold-blooded calculation as to how we in Canada can make money out of the distress of others!

Whatever may be true of eastern Canada, let me say that the conditions in the west are decidedly unsatisfactory. In the old days people generally believed there was almost unlimited good land and, secondly, that there were almost unlimited markets. Both assumptions have proved to be false. This was openly acknowledged a few weeks ago at the wheat conference called by Mr. Bracken.

The fact is that Canada, and especially western Canada, has been passing through a period of rapid expansion, with over-expansion of many facilities. Now the bills are coming in, and there is a very limited income with which to meet them. I believe the general attitude of the west is fairly well indicated in a satirical article which appeared in the Winnipeg Free Press six months ago. The article, urging the formation of a national government, is in part as follows:

Prime Minister: Mitchell F. Hepburn, whose views on assistance to the west and the C.I.O. are so well known as to need no further explanation. . . .

Minister of Justice: Maurice Duplessis, whose padlock bill has destroyed free speech in Quebec, and whose views on the C.I.O. coincide with Mr. Hepburn's.

Minister of Finance: Sir Herbert Holt, whose ability as a director of a hundred companies and as a banker fit him admirably for the task of maintaining a fiscal system designed to promote the policy of a sound business administration.

Slogan: "Desoak the Rich."

Minister of Transport: Sir Edward Beatty, whose views on the railway problem should place him in a position to render a great service to the C.N.R., which would be, of course, his primary responsibility.

Minister of National Revenue: Sir Charles Gordon, whose intimate and profitable connection with the textile business has proved he knows how to keep goods out of the country.

Minister of Agriculture: Mr. John I. McFarland, who can hold wheat longer and sell less of it than any man in the country Minister of Propaganda and Public Enlightenment: C. George McCullagh. The publisher of the Globe and Mail has already declared his position on certain issues which render him competent to fill this post with complete success.

I would suggest there is a great deal more truth than fiction in a satire of that kind, because these individuals or the classes they represent have largely dominated the policies of Canada.

I suggested a little while ago that the question was being asked in our local papers: has the church failed? I believe it has failed to apply the teachings of Jesus to modern economic and international problems. We are asked, "Has the league of nations failed?"—It has—not the underlying principle of collectivism, but the organization through the refusal of the great nations to give up power politics and their own imperialistic claims. The predominance which was enjoyed for a long time by Great Britain is now being challenged, and challenged by methods which resemble closely the very methods by which that predominance was attained.

Has democracy failed? I suggest it has never really been tried. The system which gives wealth and power into the hands of the few and reduces the vast majority to insecurity and poverty cannot long endure. The leader of the opposition thinks some of us would like to do away with private property. We would like to see corporation property controlled so as to permit the acquisition of a little private property. He fears that private initiative would be lost. As a matter of fact there is precious little opportunity for a development of initiative by the majority under the present system in Canada. This is possible under a properly organized cooperative or collective system.

Our people would welcome arrangements under which the older Canadian ideals of personal independence and security and good neighbourliness could find their chance to express themselves.

I move the following amendment to the amendment, seconded by the hon. member for Athabaska (Mr. Rowe):

That the amendment be amended by adding the following thereto: "We are of the opinion that these conditions can be remedied only by the effective control of financial institutions and monopolistic enterprises which are exploiting the Canadian people."

I believe the amendment to the amendment is in such simple terms that it is unnecessary, even if I had the time, to enter into any detailed exposition of it. It puts in a few words the point of view which we in this corner for many years have been trying to bring to the attention of the house, and which calls for changes which are more essential to-day than they ever were before.

Mr. J. H. HARRIS (Danforth): Mr. Speaker, let my first words be these, that the announcement that Their Majesties King George VI and Queen Elizabeth have graciously decided to visit Canada in the months of May and June has been received with rejoicing by all people in my constituency. In like manner it has been received with rejoicing by a great number of the people with whom it has been my pleasure to come in contact since the announcement was made.

I cannot help placing first in that category an experience I had on Christmas day when visiting over one hundred patients who were left in hospital while others were home for Christmastide enjoying themselves. Some of these patients were deserted by their people, all were on the sick list, and in discussing the affairs of Canada one could see their faces radiate when they were told that the king and queen were coming to see them in the months of May and June. I hoped and they hoped that they would be able at that time to witness the occasion of the first visit to Canada of their majesties.

During the same week it was my pleasure to go through the basement of the institution to which I have referred. Here was an Irish lady over seventy years of age, a seamstress, who does not receive an old age pension, and who was applying all the art of sewing she had learned in Belfast, Ireland, in repairing the linen of the institution. Her first words were to indicate how glad she was that their majesties were visiting Canada. Working outside the buildings was the gardener, an old gentleman from Devon, who had learned his art in beautiful England and who in the summer months looks after the flower beds and during the winter removes the snow and carries out the ashes for a mere pittance. "Thank God," he said, "I have lived to see the day when their majesties will visit Canada. How fine it will be for my children and grandchildren!" How thrilled is the Scottish maid at home who can tell you all about the family tree of her gracious majesty the queen, all about her forebears and her charming characteristics mentioned yesterday by the leader of the opposition (Mr. Manion). How thrilled are the Scottish people that their majesties are coming here. How thrilled are the carpenters, the bricklayers, the plumbers and other artisans who through no fault of their own find themselves unemployed. Hungry and jobless they may be, but they will show some of our Canadians the real meaning of the word "loyalty."

A lady in my constituency whose grandmother was a cousin of Laura Secord was kind enough to write me a note two days ago expressing her feelings about this. She is a second cousin of Alexander Muir, who wrote The Maple Leaf. Her greatgrandmother was one of the first white settlers in her part of the country. The Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) will remember the Thomsons of Scarborough and East York. Some of them were up in North York in the days when he tried to be elected to represent that constituency. I cannot say that the members of this family followed the grandfather of the Prime Minister in the carryings on at that time, but one of the descendants of that family, Mrs. Edith Thomson Trudell, of 19

Walter street, Toronto, has dedicated the following words to His Gracious Majesty the King:

God save our gracious king,
Triumphantly we sing,
God save the king,
With flag unfurled o'er land and sea,
The union jack of Liberty,
Our emblem bold, that knows no fear,
By loyal subjects held so dear,
God save the king.

Then join with voices loud and long,
The air waves fill with joyous song
And let us make the welkin ring,
God bless our empire and our king.

Our fathers held the torch,
Of courage—all mankind to see
In sacred honour bound
For our democracy.
"Long live the king" Oh God, we pray—
To guide and lead us day by day,
And may His efforts never cease,
To bring this world a lasting peace.

Then join with voices loud and long,
The air waves fill with joyous song,
And let us make the welkin ring,
God bless our empire and our king.

This is a tribute by a Canadian of the fourth generation.

Their majesties are going to tour Canada. When they do I say to leaders of industry, to manufacturers and to merchants: Give your employees a half holiday and pay them for it, the same as is done on Christmas day; give them an opportunity to witness this ceremony. I say to the mayors and reeves of the cities and towns throughout Canada: declare a holiday. I say to those in charge of our schools: let the children have a holiday; let them turn out en masse to pay homage.

One word now to some others. Let no politician use this event in any way to further his own political advantage. Brass hats, top hats, and even prime ministers and members of parliament should stand aside to let the people of Canada see their sovereigns. They are the head of the greatest democracy the world has ever known. More than that, they are the head of the greatest civilization the world has ever known. It has stood the test of time for a thousand years, and may it do so for another thousand.

Yesterday the Prime Minister said that he would follow the speech from the throne. I shall try to do the same and I hope I do not wander as far as he did last night.

The President of the United States visited Canada. Our Prime Minister has visited the United States many, many times. Let us just close our eyes and think calmly of these two events. Do they have the same significance? Not to my mind. Nor do I think they would have the same significance to the mind of Laurier when he said that when Britain is in trouble, we in Canada are in trouble. We are part and parcel of Great Britain, and we will not submit to becoming an adjunct of the United States.

According to the speech from the throne, our ministers find it necessary to consider the international situation. That statement sounds rather humorous to me. Ten million of us are to consider the international situation. Last night the Prime Minister opened his arms and said that the United States and Great Britain are in one great circle. Is there room in those arms for Great Britain and the United States? I could not help but think of something I heard when I was a boy; it reminds me of the tail trying to wag the dog.

Since we met last we have lost from this chamber a very eminent statesman, the right hon. member for Calgary West (Mr. Bennett). Tributes were paid to him last night in the city of Toronto and have been paid to him all across the continent. I think we all agree that he is worthy of what has been said. We of the National Conservative party are blessed greatly in having another privy councillor as our leader, (Mr. Manion). He is an excellent parliamentarian, he is a lovable character, and I was going to say that he is filled with the milk of human kindness. The leader of the opposition is a man whom we will love to serve, a man with whom we will love to work. Understanding radiates from his countenance, and he will do a great job for Canada. He was a soldier, he was the author of a little red book, and now he is a statesman. May he live long to serve Canada. What great opportunities we all have to serve Canada.

I do not intend to go back to the days of our grandfathers as did the Prime Minister. I shall go back just for two or three years. I ask the people of Canada this question: what has this administration done on your behalf during the last four years; what of real value has been done for you? When I refer to the administration, I absolve at once the Minister of Finance (Mr. Dunning), first, because of his serious illness, and, second, because of the great amount of work he has done. Hon. members will remember that a year ago I said that the hon. gentleman was saddled with too much work. I repeat those words. I think the time has come when perhaps the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Euler) or some other minister might prepare a large part of the budget. He would be in the house to answer questions and thus relieve the Minister of Finance of much of his burden. The Minister of Finance has found it almost impossible to carry on and he has broken down partly under the task. He has been recovering his health and I hope he will regain it completely and that he may live long to serve this country in many capacities.

I excuse also in part the Prime Minister. We were all sorry to hear of his illness, but he seemed to be in robust health last night. His mind seemed to be running quite clearly; nevertheless I want to say that I am sorry he was laid aside for a month during the summer because of illness. For the rest of the ministry I have not much of commendation. Most of them sat on the platform in Maple Leaf Gardens or were listening to the radio when certain promises were made to the people of Canada. Hon. gentlemen opposite promised action. They promised unity. They promised leadership. The people took them at their word. They got power Then they introduced the 1936 speech from the throne and made some more promises:

1. To cooperate with the provinces and municipalities in an endeavour to provide work for the unemployed; to increase the opportunities for gainful employment.

2. They would immediately amend the British North America Act.

3. They would restore parliamentary control over taxation.

4. They would substitute stability for uncertainty in the administration of customs laws.

I note that the Minister of National Revenue (Mr. Ilsley) is in his seat, and I hope he remains in the chamber until I deal with the last item.

5. They would amend the Canadian National Railways legislation to give a greater measure of governmental authority and responsibility to parliament and cut out some of the losses.

6. Radio broadcasting would be the subject of inquiry by a special committee.

7. Parliamentary secretaryships would be submitted for consideration.

8. Parliamentary responsibility would be restored.

9. A trade treaty would build up rather than undermine living standards.

So the government said in 1936. Those are the general headings. I will read in a little more detail the reference to unemployment:

In 1936 unemployment continues to be Canada's most urgent national problem. While there is an increase in the number of persons employed, the number of those on relief shows no abatement.

As a means of dealing with present emergency conditions, you will be asked, with the approval of the governments of all the provinces of Canada, to make provision for the establishment of a representative national commission, which will cooperate with the provinces and municipalities in an endeavour to provide work for the unemployed, and the supervision of unemployment relief. The commission, which will be assisted by a representative advisory committee, will aim at effecting nation-wide cooperative effort toward increasing opportunities of gainful employment.

Where is that representative advisory committee to-day? In fact, where is the commission itself to-day? And what did that commission do? And what did the government do with the recommendations of that commission? Practically nothing. The commission started work and gathered some statistics, most of which we already had; and then in the night they folded their tents and silently stole away. That is all they have done, and to-day the morning paper tells us that some hon. members are annoyed because young men are begging from them on the streets. There are more young men begging on the streets than at any previous time that I can remember. At the hour of twilight more men come to my door and to the doors of others asking for a hand-out than at any other time that I am able to recall. Panhandlers are on the increase. The government has had four years to deal with this matter, and what has it done? Practically nothing. "Oh," they say, "we have passed some trade treaties." I shall deal with that in a moment, but I should like at this time to make a general observation based on the Purvis report which was placed before us some months ago. When the government entered into these trade agreements it forgot the very important fact that nine hundred thousand of our employable people find their place of work in secondary industry whereas only one hundred thousand find a place in primary industry. That is shown in the government's own report; yet little by little they are paralyzing secondary industry and taking away the opportunity of gainful employment which is provided by that type of industry, hoping that they may absorb some of the men who wish to go to work in the primary industries.

The speech from the throne in 1936 also states:

A conference between the dominion government and the governments of the provinces of Canada was held at Ottawa during the month of December. Continuing committees have since carried on consideration of the more important subjects discussed.

What have these "continuing committees" accomplished? Nothing. The government is directly responsible for the charge which the man in the street is making, namely that it is a do-nothing administration. What has it tried to do? It established what is known as the Rowell commission, and the statements which have been made before that commission have rent this dominion asunder. It has put Canada back into the position of nine independent, separate colonies as far as the thinking people of Canada are concerned. It certainly has done nothing to foster unity in the broad sense of the word. Nothing which has come out of its proceedings so far has helped the general situation. Last night hon. members heard a very carefully worded sentence from the Prime Minister to the effect that in two or three months we shall have a report from that commission. After that, I suppose, we shall have a general election, and I imagine I can see in that report some phrases which, although they may not be of a kind that will make for unity in the country, may help the Liberal administration to save a few seats. The expression, "discord and confusion," describes the situation. The government is now having a little holiday, a little respite from this discord and confusion, because one of the main factors in this situation, the Hon. Mr. Hepburn, has gone off to Australia to find out how to run a country. I thought that last night we were hearing the swan song of the Prime Minister. In certain sections the swan seemed to die; then suddenly it would come to life again. By the time the Prime Minister had concluded his speech I did not know whether the swan was alive or dead. If last night's speech was the swan song of the Prime Minister, perhaps the young man (Mr. Hepburn) who is visiting Australia will be back to tell Canada, after he has looked over the situation in the antipodes, how this country should be run.

The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Woodsworth), who is not at present in his seat, said a few minutes ago that the government was able to do something about old age pensions and about this, that and the other thing, but that it could not do anything about the unemployed. I agree with him that the government has not done anything for expansion of employment. He asked the question whether any province has refused to accept assistance from the dominion government in looking after any aspect of employment. Could the government not at least have given the Canadian people some confidence in this parliament of ours by taking over the unemployed employables? That at least would have been a move in the right direction, instead of the many excuses which the government have put forward for not dealing with the situation. Let them cut across some of the red tape and give us some of that action which they were talking about in Maple Leaf Gardens prior to the last election.

Then it was said that parliament would have its control over taxation restored; that the cost of living would come down, and that the people would have an opportunity to spread their income over some of the amenities of life which they required. What have the government done in that regard? To-day the iniquitous sales tax is in the first category of tax producers, when in my opinion it should be in the third. Why should $138,000,000 be taken from the masses of our people on everything they want and everything they use, when there are other methods of indirect taxation? As I said last year, with this eight per cent sales tax we take from the babe in the cradle and from the octogenarian in his casket. We catch them all. I may be asked, What would you put in the place of it? I would put in the place of it those forms of taxation which bear a little heavily on countries other than Canada as well as on Canada. Customs and excise are not all paid by the Canadian people, no matter how hon. members opposite try to make themselves believe the contrary. They know and I know that foreign countries which want to dump their surplus wares in Canada absorb the customs and excise taxes. That indirect tax is the one which bears the least heavily upon our Canadian people. It is one which should not be lessened; it should at the least be maintained where it is.

All this administration has to its credit is that it has lessened the possibility of revenue from sources other than within Canada, and at the same time it has taken away from the Canadian citizen the opportunity to apply his artisanship in the secondary industries. I shall give the figures to back up my assertion. Last year the government extracted by taxation from the Canadian people $516,000,000, whereas in 1936 it took only $372,000,000. That is an increase of forty per cent. In other words, whereas three short years ago the government took one dollar, now they are taking $1.40; yet they say that they are interested in keeping down the cost of living and controlling taxation. The fact is that taxation has been running wild, and it will be wilder still, because if you lower the barriers and let in more and more goods, even if the rates are lower and revenue comes into the country, the important point is that the jobs are gone.

We are told that customs administration will be stabilized. Well, perhaps the Minister of National Revenue is getting a little bit tired of trying to stabilize things. Every day there come new rulings from his department. He is blessed in having close to him a very efficient tariff board which is doing a good job if only he would pay some attention to its recommendations. I see the Minister of Mines and Resources (Mr. Crerar) looking inquiringly at me. I say to him, let the tariff board function freely and put its recommendations into effect, and the government will get some use out of the board. It helps very much in the administration of the customs laws, but there are so many rulings every day that people are confused. The most favoured nation treatment is extended to twenty nations. In 1936 it was extended to the United States, as well as eighteen new articles of agreement, and altogether there are so many new regulations that the ordinary business man in Canada is bewildered. We are in the midst of an excise tax muddle, and in the next three weeks the situation will be worse. We do not know what we are going to do about it. Instead of stability we have instability in the conduct of the Department of National Revenue. The regulations all make it harder for the business man to carry on. That top profit of one, two or three per cent which he counts on is skimmed off by the rulings, and it is more difficult for him to do business.

I am glad to note that the Minister of Transport (Mr. Howe) has entered the chamber. I wanted to say something about clause 5 of the 1936 promises. In regard to the Canadian National Railways parliamentary responsibility was promised, and the hope was held out that railway losses would be reduced and capital expenditures curtailed wherever possible. I ask the minister this question: Will he spend twelve and a half or twenty-five millions in Montreal on the Canadian National Railways? Can he say that the government has restored to parliament the responsibility for the conduct of that road and that it has reduced losses? Are the assets in better shape than they were three or four years ago? The government may reply in the affirmative, but what about the cost? Will the cost of operating that system be less this year than it was last year? Will it be reduced in accordance with the promises made four short years ago?

The radio system is operated under my hon. friend's department. According to clause 6 of the 1936 promises, a radio inquiry was promised, and it was said that an independent corporation would be set up. What have we had? The conduct of radio in Canada has been vexatious to the Canadian people. Last year, as the minister will remember, he proposed to increase the fee, but after some consideration he rose in his place in the house and said that the fee would not be increased. In my opinion the fee system is wrong. It is excessive and unnecessary, and you cannot make the ordinary man in the street understand why he should pay for the use of the air. The fee should be abolished. Now the government is faced with a greater difficulty. In the old days before the introduction of radio, men could stand on boxes at the street corners or in the parks and exercise the right of free speech to their hearts' content, and the then government instituted section 98 of the criminal code. This government wiped out section 98 and substituted censorship by the radio corporation. That body censors whatever goes over the air to the Canadian people. In my opinion the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation should be told in plain language that we have made enough capital expenditure for the time being and that they should slow down and be more responsible to parliament.

Last night the Prime Minister seemed to be a little weary. Although he was master of the ship he could not leave the helm but had to stay there all the time in order to guide the ship of state. He has guided it through stormy waters, he says; but "around and around in a circle it goes, and where it is going nobody knows." In his younger days, as I remember him when I first came to this house in 1922, he must have been a midshipman or cabin boy, because he said that the 1919 platform of the Liberal party was merely a compass or a chart to go by. He had his eyes glued to the compass. Now that he is entrenched in the leadership of his party he has moved up to captain. He is now captain of the ship and he stays at the helm—doing what? Is he carrying out the pledges of 1936? Most of them we have heard nothing about.

For instance, take the parliamentary secretaryships. They have been put down the hatch, away down below the water-line, and have been covered over with excess baggage. We have heard nothing about that subject. I am rather in accord with the idea of parliamentary secretaryships. When I see some of the ministers unable to do all the work that comes to their desks, I think parliamentary secretaryships should be established. Some of the men I see here who are not doing a real day's work when in Ottawa, in the House of Commons, could be put to work as secretaries under ministers to help them in the discharge of their duties. When municipal bodies or the public generally come to Ottawa to see a minister of the crown, whom do they see? You cannot get close to the minister. The efficient secretaries—and they are good secretaries and do work hard, being quite tactful in their positions—serve as so many buffers to hold you off. You cannot find what you want. How happy one would feel if, instead of having to disturb, say the Minister of Finance, one could talk to a parliamentary secretary. He would be one of our fraternity. A previous occupant of the chair once declared that this house was the greatest club in Canada, and it is. When I come to Ottawa to discuss something with a minister, I do not necessarily wish to disturb the minister, and if I could talk to a secretary who was one of our own fraternity, that would be perfectly satisfactory. He would honour my given word and I would honour his. But the Prime Minister has failed to introduce legislation to make this possible. Nothing has been done about it—another example of the do-nothing policy of this government.

Restore parliamentary responsibility! My time is going too fast to permit me to do more than refer to the twenty commissions, which cost the country nearly $2,000,000 and created a few jobs, as my leader said yesterday. When his party was sitting here and we were sitting there, how the present Prime Minister railed about the commissions that we appointed! But did the right hon. gentleman restore parliamentary responsibility? I do not think he did. It is another broken promise. These commissions are set to work while I and other hon. members, sent here by our people for that purpose, could do a great deal of it.

The government did put through some trade agreements, and are probably going to put through another. In 1936 the following words were put into the mouth of the governor general:

> My ministers believe that the Canada-United States agreement will mark a great improvement in Canada's international economic relations; also, that the principles embodied in this agreement, extended and applied with vigour and determination, will contribute to the reversal of the trend toward extreme economic nationalism, which has been undermining standards of living. . . .

This is 1936, mind you. There is no such reference to "vigour and determination" in the 1939 recital.

I think that when the Prime Minister is really tired, a good position for him would be at the league of nations, giving lectures on economic nationalism. Perhaps he could tell dear old Britain that she should not have an import advisory board advising the board of trade, or have the board of trade represented in the cabinet. Perhaps he could lecture on civilization. But of all the countries to be lectured on economic nationalism this country is the last, for a few reasons which I shall recite. And when I recite them I ask hon. members and the country to visualize what I bring to their attention. When under the old agreement imports into Canada were permitted to jump from $300,000,000 in 1934 to $430,000,000 in 1937, an increase of 42 per cent, hon. gentlemen may have thought they tore down some economic nationalism, but in fact they tore away from thousands of people the possibility of applying their workmanship to the manufacture and production in Canada of required goods. In secondary industry alone, imports jumped from $120,000,000 in 1935 to $215,000,000 in 1937, an increase of 80 per cent. The Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Euler) knows, I know and the house knows that the maximum amount of work is provided in these secondary industries. To put it in figures, look at a dozen balance sheets; you will find that raw material costs, say 50 per cent; labour, 20 per cent; cost of production, another 20 per cent, and interest and so on, 5 per cent; and if there is 5 per cent left he is fortunate. Take the 20 per cent which is straight labour; on that basis the trade agreement of 1936 took away the opportunity of work from 50,000 Canadian people. That is the fact with regard to that agreement I have not time to go into details.

In the speech from the throne this year we are told that we are to approve another trade agreement, fulfilling the hope expressed in the speech from the throne last year that an agreement would be reached which would confirm and enlarge the advantages of the 1935 agreement with the United States. And we are told that, taken with the United Kingdom-United States agreement, it constitutes a constructive contribution toward a betterment of world conditions. When were we in Canada put in charge of world conditions? Is it not about time we looked after the condition of our own people a little more? That is the way I feel about the situation; when we have distress at home, let the world look after itself and let us look after ourselves. Are the nations to be saved by making us hewers of wood and drawers of water for the United States? That world appeasement, in my opinion, is all humbug and eye-wash. I do not see the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) in his seat; I do not know whether he is feeling too friendly towards this agreement. Speaking to the Halton County Liberal-Progressive association at Milton, Ontario, on November 18, he is reported in the Toronto Telegram as follows:

> He pointed out that he had reason to believe that the concessions Canada was compelled to give would not do the dominion any harm.

My question is, Who compelled Canada to give those concessions? Have we been in the hands of a dictatorship? Canada demands that the Minister of Agriculture rise in his place and defend his position, tell us who compelled us. Empire democracy is not built on force or dictatorship.

Nor do I see the Minister of Fisheries (Mr. Michaud) in his seat. In the days of my youth someone asked me to make a noise like a fish. I asked him what he meant, and he said, in order to make a noise like a fish you do not make a noise at all. The Minister of Fisheries does not make any noise at all. Let him rise in his place and defend this agreement from the viewpoint of the maritime provinces. Perhaps he and the Minister of National Revenue should go into a huddle and decide how they are going to vote on the apple concession. The Minister of National Revenue, if he holds to the convictions of his youth, will vote against this agreement, as he was brave enough to vote on another occasion a few years ago. Do the coal miners of the maritime provinces give thanks for the removal of the three per cent excise tax on coal? Will the port authorities of Saint John and Halifax give support when they find millions of bushels of wheat which should be flowing through Canadian ports going through ports of the United States and making work for citizens of that country instead of Canadians? Will those engaged in secondary industry thank the Minister of National Revenue when they find themselves compelled to become importers rather than manufacturers employing men and women in this country? Will they thank the Minister of National Revenue and this government for turning them from one class of trade to another? No one can turn around as quickly as the manufacturer; if they will not let us manufacture we can import; but on behalf of those men and women who work in secondary industry, I ask this government to let us manufacture and produce in Canada; do not make us traders, do not make us importers. We shall become importers if we are forced to do so in order to save ourselves; but in saving ourselves we do not save the job for the work-people of Canada, and they are the people who need saving at this time.

Mr. DANIEL McIVOR (Fort William): Mr. Speaker, I am not going to make an oration, but I have something to say, which I shall say in a few well chosen words. First, permit me to congratulate the hon. leader of the opposition (Mr. Manion) on the honour that has been done him by the party which has called him to its leadership. I have known him for some time. The first reports I got on Doctor Manion in Fort William related to him as an athlete, and I should like to say that any man who has proved himself a clean athlete will make a worthy opponent for anyone to stack up against. I notice that he played the game of hockey and did considerable sprinting on the track, and swimming, but chiefly did he shine in the game of lacrosse. I would suggest to the government, in connection with the arrangements for the entertainment of the king and queen on their visit to Canada, that the leader of the opposition get a place on the lacrosse team. I also should like to have some consideration there, to get into training for a couple of months and back him up.

Because of the love of the leader of the opposition for athletics, I should like to refer to something reported in the Times-Journal of Fort William. I do this to show the hopefulness of the youth of Fort William. There was a dog called Prince that got into trouble, and the boy who owned that dog went to the pound-keeper, who was a kind man to both dog and boy. This dog was let out; the boy trained him and entered him in the dog derby in Westport for a three mile race, and he came off with a cup. This dog derby was run off as all sports should be run; there was no bet or any sweepstake in connection with the race. This shows what a boy can do, and if that lad's father can help him to become a winner he may some day sit in this house and give leadership to others.

I should like to thank the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) personally for advising that the leader of the opposition should not be opposed in the recent by-election. This is a courtesy which should be extended regularly, and if I dared make a suggestion I would say this: When a member of parliament has been called to the great beyond, it always hurts my feelings that there should be a by-election. I would far rather see some member of his household, if any were available, take his place. I do not think the government, the opposition or any other party would lose anything under that arrangement.

I am not forgetting the mover (Mr. Matthews) and the seconder (Mr. Chevrier) of the address; I congratulate them on their efforts. When a man is capable of doing what I am not able to do, I can congratulate and thank him. It happens that I was guilty of making a short speech in the town of Souris in the constituency of Brandon. I always like to return to a place where I am known to make a speech, because the people know whether or not I am practising what I preach.

I should like to congratulate the government on the set-up of the radio corporation. I was very much touched when I saw the report of what occurred when the use of the radio was denied one of our great editors. The Prime Minister told us something of the set-up of the corporation. I have nothing but respect for our great editors or, for that matter, for the editors of our local papers, but I am thankful that no editor or millionaire can buy a place on the CBC. If the editor of the Globe could buy a place because he happened to be backed by a millionaire, what would happen to a trade unionist, a member of an executive playing an important part in the life of this country, if he had not millions behind him? He would have to take some other means than that which might be open to a man who had money. So I say thank heaven for a corporation that cannot be bought. Some of us are in the house today because there are some things that cannot be bought with money. One of our greatest struggles in Canada is between capital and labour. We want fair play; fair play to the man who invests his money; fair play to the man who manages a corporation, whether he be an editor or a manager; fair play to the toilers that their work may be secure and they may obtain a living wage, and fair play to those who buy the finished products.

I should like to congratulate the government upon its housing scheme. In Fort William this summer we felt some of the effects of that scheme. It was very difficult to find a first class carpenter who was not working, and one could not find an idle bricklayer. We had to send for them, east, west or wherever we could get them, because, thanks to the housing scheme, there was more work than the bricklayers could do.

I should like to thank the government also for the fact that its ministers have spoken in no uncertain terms against the amalgamation of our two railways. I make no apology for opposing the amalgamation of these roads, because I believe such amalgamation would bring about far more unemployment. The cure for the difficulty is, in my opinion, more trade; if we get more trade we shall need both our railways.

I should like to congratulate the Prime Minister upon preparing the way for the Prime Minister of England to visit that great German leader, Mr. Hitler. It has been said that in times of peace we should prepare for peace. When the Prime Minister of Canada was in Europe he did not hesitate to take the risk of visiting the national leader of Germany, and there is no doubt that he sowed seeds of truth in the mind of Mr. Hitler so that when Mr. Chamberlain came to visit him the way had been prepared, and I think the right hon. gentleman did a great piece of work.

Later on we shall have something more to say about peace and rearmament, but in my opinion we have greater cause to fear the enemies within our country than the enemies from without. The old book says that our foes are those of our own households. It has been well said by one of our leaders that we have enough for the world's need but we have not enough for the world's greed. Selfishness is the great curse of mankind, so that we need the help that comes to our country from the Christian church. I greatly admired the work in this house of the former right hon. leader of the opposition (Mr. Bennett), but I do not agree with him when he says, nor do I agree when any bishop or moderator says, that the church has failed. I do not believe they can say that unless they can estimate the value of a Christian mother or a Christian dad, or of unselfish servants from the Salvation Army lassie right up to the Archbishop of Canterbury. Who can estimate the value of Christianity, of unselfishness, throughout the length and breadth of our country and say the church has failed? Such a statement is in line with that of those who always say the government has failed when it may not have been able to do anything.

I should like to offer a suggestion to the Minister of Mines and Resources (Mr. Crerar), who is an old friend and who will know whereof I speak. In Fort William we have suffered in connection with the shipping of coal from the west under the coal subvention. As I said last year there is a three and a half million dollar plant which is practically idle. In the national school of Ireland I was taught that there is a law of compensation. The teacher said, "If you lose your eyes your hearing becomes keener. If you lose your hearing your observation becomes better." One kid said, "Begorra, that's right; if one leg is short the other is longer." I should like the Minister of Mines and Resources to realize that there ought to be a law of compensation, because forty-five or fifty miles west of Fort William we have iron ore in abundance. I am sure that in dealing with that deposit he will measure up to his task just as he is helping in connection with coal subventions. One may pick-and-shovel this iron ore out of the rock, and it is there in an abundance which is probably not known to the speculators. When I think of the first class haematite ore in the Atikokan district, and the efforts we have made in Canada to develop our iron and steel industry, I realize that if war came upon us we would have within our grasp that which we need.

The conditions around the head of the lakes is known well by men such as ex-judge McKay, and I believe it is the duty of the government to give us a bounty on iron ore —I refrain from using the word "protection." "Bounty" is the better word for those who believe in free trade. However, I shall have more to say on this subject at a later time.

So far as unemployment insurance is concerned, I believe the time has come when we must go ahead or, to use the word of another, blast our way through. Unemployment insurance is a necessity, and I have confidence the government will see a way to put it into effect.

I would suggest to the Minister of Pensions and National Health (Mr. Power) that our highways be patrolled by returned men who have served their country well. United States tourists would be drawn to Canada if they knew that while here they would be protected by men who stood shot and shell, but who were spared to come back and have shown a willingness to keep our highways open.

As I began with some observations respecting athletics, I should like to close by saying that in Fort William we have the second greatest ski jump in Canada. In that city in February we are holding the Canadian championship ski contests. The skiing officials have constructed a trail extending 130 miles. Most of it has been constructed this year, and it is paid for. I would suggest that the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) and the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Manion) would do well to take three days off and visit Fort William while the ski jumping contests are in progress. Both gentlemen enjoy thrills and spills, and they would have their fill if they attended the contests. However, if they cannot come, it might be possible for them in some other worthy way to indicate to the executive of the ski club that the efforts of that organization for the benefit of the youth in Canada are appreciated.

Again I express my good wishes to the leader of the opposition. I know he will play fair. He will play hard; he will be honest and he will be true, because any man who has been educated and has practised in Fort William has the ability to fight a good fight and do it fairly.

Mr. W. A. TUCKER (Rosthern): Mr. Speaker, first of all I should like to extend my congratulations to the mover (Mr. Matthews) and the seconder (Mr. Chevrier) of the address in reply to the speech from the throne. I am sure it is the sense of the whole house that those hon. members acquitted themselves very satisfactorily and in a manner which reflected credit upon them.

May I congratulate the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) upon arranging for the visit of the king and queen during the coming summer. It has been borne in upon even those of us who are the strongest of democrats that our sovereign represents a useful institution in our system of government. He is a living symbol of a living empire, and I believe the British commonwealth of nations is destined to uphold and make a greater contribution to the cause of world peace than any other organization in existence. Anything which may serve further to symbolize and to cement that unity, and in that must be included the visit of our reigning sovereign, must be welcomed with all our hearts. I am sure our people are also pleased to learn of the proposed visit of the king and queen to the United States. It will be a most historic occasion when a British sovereign sets foot on soil which was once British, over which the British flag once waved, and when he goes there as a friend to welcome them into closer collaboration with our commonwealth, all pledged to the cause of world peace, the ideal for which English-speaking peoples stand the world over. I am sure the king will carry a message of good will from all parts of the British commonwealth, and it would be our wish that his visit in the cause of world peace may be blessed.

I cannot help recalling, when I think of that visit, that were it not for the Tories of an earlier day crying out for what they believed to be right, the British sovereign might be visiting the most important country in the commonwealth instead of a foreign but friendly nation. The whole course of history might have been different had Liberalism instead of Conservatism prevailed at that time.

I should not let this occasion pass without referring to the signal service done for the cause of mankind by the Prime Minister of Great Britain. As one who did some service in the front area and saw something of the horrors of war, I was amazed when I learned that a man who had not seen it seemed fully to sense its horror and was prepared to do almost anything to spare mankind from once more going through those horrors. I do not say that I approve everything done by the British government under its present or previous leaderships in not tending at all times to bring the whole force of the British nation to the support of the League of Nations. Faced with the crisis last September, however, I do submit that Mr. Chamberlain did everything he could and is deserving of the thanks of mankind.

May I point out further that the attitude of our own Prime Minister, in those days when all of us were filled with worry and the thought that we were possibly faced with a condition parallel to that of 1914, was most commendable. His statesmanship on that occasion was worthy of the highest traditions of all past great prime ministers in British countries. His efforts followed closely the high example set by former great Canadian leaders such as Sir John A. Macdonald, Sir Wilfrid Laurier and Sir Robert Borden. Canada was well represented in the crisis. I would not be fair did I not say that by his attitude at that time the leader of the opposition (Mr. Manion) showed himself to be a worthy successor in the leadership of the Conservative party of the great leaders who have preceded him.

I must admit that when I listened to the hon. member for Danforth (Mr. Harris) giving expression to some of the hoary theories which have been served up to the country election after election and time after time, theories which have not and never will solve our problems, I was tempted to answer him. I believe, however, that the people and particularly the youth of Canada expect more from parliament than the threshing of old straw, such as we have witnessed to a certain extent in the past. They expect from this parliament proposals which will solve in a definite and sweeping way the problems that face the Canadian people. Does the hon. member for Danforth suggest that the people of Canada should believe that the policies which he espouses, the policies which were tried for the five years before this administration came into office and failed, are going to solve these problems? Does he expect the people of Canada or anyone else to believe that?

During the dark days of the war it was found that the only possible way of winning the war was by the mind of man applying itself to the situation and working out innovations which would help to win the war. But it was necessary to fight against the Tory minds in the high command of the army. The establishment of unified command, without which I am satisfied the war would have been lost, was opposed to the last ditch by the Tories in the high command of the British army. The preponderance of artillery, the use of tanks and many other definite innovations which were conceived by the mind of man as being necessary to win the war in the interests of civilization were opposed or accepted with hesitating reluctance.

I put it to you that faced with the crisis with which we in Canada are faced to-day, the mind of man in Canada is quite capable of evolving the innovation in policies necessary to solve the situation. It is with that that I wish to deal to-day. I desire to suggest an innovation to this house and to this country, not with any idea of its being perfect but simply as a contribution towards the solution of the problem that faces us. No one pretends that the situation to-day is satisfactory when hundreds of thousands of people, particularly young people, find themselves unable to devote their lives to the service of their country and to earn a living for themselves and their families. Unemployment has two definite aspects, both of which are undesirable.

First, there is the effect on the individual There is the loss of morale. If any one of us had been unable to obtain work when we first left school; if we had been unable to set ourselves up in an independent way; if we had been condemned, as thousands of young people in Canada to-day are condemned, to live at home and to accept money from our parents, probably we would have lost our self-confidence and never would have managed to make anything of our lives. Many of the present generation are having their morale and self-confidence thus destroyed. If this parliament is to be true to the great traditions of parliamentary government it should make a contribution toward the solving of this problem. Instead of condemning one another for the things that are past, we should be looking to the future and trying to evolve something to meet this situation.

The other aspect of the situation is the effect of unemployment upon the nation. Unemployment leads to stress and strain between different sections. A daily newspaper in western Canada took a poll of its readers on the question of secession, and to the amazement of everyone it carried by a small majority. Something else which I deplore is the outbreak of racial feeling in Canada. Who ever would have thought that that could happen in our country? In other words, we have this dominion being shaken to its very foundations because so many people are unemployed and are unable to establish homes for themselves and support those whom they love.

No nation ever grew wealthy by keeping thousands of its young people unemployed, by leaving them on the dole when great natural resources are unexploited. Some hon. members may have had occasion to read the primer which is used in the schools of Germany and in which reference is made to the unused natural resources of Canada. Are we not going to put our unemployed to work to exploit our great natural resources and produce wealth? This country is largely underpopulated and is a standing temptation to the overpopulated countries of the rest of the globe. I submit we owe a sacred duty to our forefathers to devote ourselves to using our natural resources to the fullest possible extent and to populating our country with our own people as quickly as possible in order that we may be able to hand on unimpaired the great heritage that we have received from their hands.

Do we lack natural resources? Does anyone suggest that Canada is not well endowed with natural resources? Do we lack labour? There are hundreds of thousands of unemployed who are anxious and willing to work. Do we lack capital? Our banks have plenty of capital or potential credit, but they say they cannot make loans. Everyone knows that all that is necessary is labour, capital, and natural resources. What is the trouble? Some people I know seem to believe that there is a lack of capital. I should like to read a short report which appeared in the Winnipeg Free Press of January 11, dealing with a speech by the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner), who said:

> If peace were assured, Britain would be using some of her great financial resources to develop Canada's great natural resources. In western Canada there is a great potential for industrial growth. Half the mineral wealth, half the coal of the country are enclosed in an area close to the Rocky mountains. There are no industries there. Development would create great wealth.

With the latter part of that I am in hearty accord. We have great mineral resources in western Canada, but I suggest that we do not need capital from abroad to develop them. Under our present Bank of Canada set-up the only reason for wanting foreign capital would be the necessity of buying things abroad that cannot be produced at home or which could not be procured with goods produced at home. During the war Great Britain found it necessary to get foreign credits in the United States for this reason. But are we in Canada in that position? We have the man power and we have skilled leaders. As I say, we have great natural resources. What about the necessity of foreign capital? There is one thing about foreign capital. If you do not need it, it is a bad thing to import. You must go on paying interest on it until you repay it, and sometimes you have to repay it two or three times. This constitutes a continual drain on the resources of the country. Anyone who knows anything about the capital invested by the United States in Canada knows that it has been paid time and time again, and still we must go on paying interest on it. That is a drain upon a young country. If you do not need foreign capital, you should not import it.

I suggest that we do not need foreign capital. I suggest that our present financial set-up makes plenty of capital available. I should like to refer to some figures in this connection. According to the January 4, 1939, report of the Bank of Canada, gold coin and bullion in the hands of the bank amounted, in round figures, to $186,957,000. Under the Bank of Canada Act the Bank of Canada has the right to print against that gold four dollars for every dollar in gold that it holds. On that four dollars to one ratio it could print or make available to the bankers as deposits with the Bank of Canada a total of $747,831,000 of money. On the basis of our financial set-up as it was described by the Minister of Finance (Mr. Dunning) last session, the banking system of this country can and does tend to make loans and investments to the extent of ten dollars for every dollar that they have by way of such liquid reserves in the form of Bank of Canada notes or deposits in the Bank of Canada. So that on the basis of the present gold holdings of the Bank of Canada, the banks of this country could make loans and investments to the extent of $7,478,000,000. They have the financial power to do it. The banks do not deny they have that right and that power. Well, then, I suggest, we do not need capital from abroad; we have the situation well in hand at home.

But somebody may say, regardless of the legal power to do it, it is not wise to issue Bank of Canada currency on the basis of printing four dollars' worth of money against one dollar's worth of gold. It was suggested last session by the then leader of the opposition (Mr. Bennett) that the 25 per cent gold basis was an absolute minimum. Very well let us be sure, and give twice the coverage which is provided by law. The value of our gold production last year was, in round figures, $141,000,000. If we kept that in our hands for one year and added it to the gold already on hand, we would have a total gold supply, in round figures, of $328,875,000. On a two to one basis, that would enable us to issue $657,000,000 worth of Bank of Canada notes, and on that issue the banks of this country would have the right, in a perfectly sound way, carrying out their present policies, to issue loans or make investments to the extent of $6,577,000,000. I cannot go into the details in the time at my disposal, but to-day the banks have loans within Canada to individuals and corporations and investments in Canadian securities to the extent of $2,470,000,000, which means that if we kept one year's production of gold in Canada and issued Bank of Canada notes on a two to one basis instead of the four to one permitted by law, the banks could issue almost twice as much credit again as they have issued to date.

The suggestion may be made. If that capital is available, why the difficulty? As a Liberal I am particularly interested in this because I believe our policy was that we regarded credit as a public matter, not of interest to banks alone but of direct concern to the average citizen: we believed that credit should be controlled in the interests of the people and not solely in that of private bankers' profits. As the trouble to-day is lack of capital or credit to those wishing to develop our resources, and the banks to-day have the power to provide capital to the extent of a further four billions of dollars, are we controlling it in the interests of the country, or are we allowing the banks to continue to control credit in the interests of their own private profit? I ask that question, and I do not attempt to answer it but leave it to hon. members. But I do say this, that at the time the Bank of Canada was set up, it was believed that the powers given to the Bank of Canada, viz: power to re-discount and to conduct open market operations would enable it to control credit. I am satisfied all honestly believed that we were taking full control over the credit policy of this country when we gave the Bank of Canada those powers when setting it up. If it has not worked that way, I submit it is the duty of our party, pledged to control credit, to study the problem and take further powers of control so that we do control the credit of this country.

Our government has been trying to follow a policy of credit expansion. I just wish to give the figures to indicate that this policy has not succeeded in controlling the credit of the country by causing that credit to expand. We followed an easy money policy designed to increase the amount of credit available for the development of the dominion. We increased our Bank of Canada notes and deposits of chartered banks with the Bank of Canada, taking the daily average for September, 1935. and for September 1938, to this extent: The average amount of bank deposits in the Bank of Canada and Bank of Canada notes held by the chartered banks which were the liquid reserves of the banking system in September, 1935, was $219,971,000. By our easy money policy, trying to force credit out to develop this country, we increased that to an average, in September, 1938, of $262,766,000, an increase of $42,795,000 in the liquid cash reserves of the banking system of this country. Was that reflected in an increase in loans to business institutions and the public, as it was designed to be and as it should have been if we had control over the credit of this dominion? It was not. In loans to corporations and individuals in Canada there was an actual decrease of $26,784,000 in those three years, although the population was increasing and the need for expansion existed. The banks did not increase their loans to the public, although we did our best by means of the Bank of Canada, operating in the way provided, to force them to do so. After the recess I intend to indicate why that was so.

At six o'clock the house took recess.

After Recess

The house resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. TUCKER: When the house rose I had just been endeavouring to show that although the policy of the present administration, operating through the Bank of Canada, was an easy money policy designed to increase the amount of credit available to the business institutions and generally the enterprise of the country, by increasing the cash reserves available to the chartered banks of Canada, upon which reserves they might create a larger amount of credit to lend to our business institutions, the result had not been an increase but rather a decrease in the amount of money lent by the chartered banks to our business institutions. I sought to indicate that the policy of stimulating the amount of credit available for our business institutions, through the operations of the Bank of Canada, had not worked during the past three years, and I said that I would show why that was so. Of course, the basic reason is that the only way by which credit can reach the people who need it is through the chartered banks, and the mere fact of giving them adequate reserves is no assurance that they will use those reserves in making loans to the country's business enterprises.

On that point I wish to read from the Winnipeg Free Press of January 14, 1939, a statement by Mr. S. G. Dobson, managing director of one of the chartered banks of Canada, indicating the attitude of the banks in that regard. Discussing commercial loans and credits, he says:

We hear from time to time the criticism that banks are investing too large a portion of their funds in government bonds and too little in assisting business enterprises. Thinking people will realize at once that such a charge is illogical and unjustified. Our primary business is commercial banking, but as has been pointed out on numerous occasions, we cannot compel unwilling borrowers to use our surplus funds if, because of lack of confidence or for other reasons, they are not prepared to expand their business; and prudent bankers must of necessity guard against taking unwarranted risks. Consequently, the only way in which surplus funds can be put to work is to invest them in government bonds, and in order that these funds may be made available for commercial purposes if the demand arises, only short-date securities are purchased.

It may interest you to know that this bank's portfolio of dominion government securities only nets approximately two per cent per annum and this fact should in itself be an effective answer to the charge that we accumulate these securities from choice rather than increase commercial loans. It would be a strange type of banker who would prefer this small return to the more remunerative commercial rate.

The interest return on government securities is low, largely because of the "easy" credit policy of the Bank of Canada and the resultant surplus of funds seeking profitable employment.

Many people become confused in their minds regarding the term "credit" and the statement has been loosely made that the right of issuing credit has been passed on by the government to the banks. This is untrue. Control of credit is one of the prerogatives of the Bank of Canada. They alone can decide whether a policy of "easy" or "tight" money is to be pursued. Their facility for doing this is to purchase securities if they wish the banks to be supplied with additional funds, or to sell securities if they wish cash in the hands of the banks reduced. As far as the chartered banks are concerned, their supply of funds is regulated and they have available such surpluses as the Bank of Canada wishes them to have. Most people, when talking or thinking of the term "credit" look upon it in terms of the amount they individually can borrow from a bank, but in the broader sense—as applied to the country as a whole—whether credit is "easy" or otherwise is a matter within the control of the Bank of Canada. This volume of credit they regulate according to the needs and requirements of the country as a whole.

What I wish to emphasize is that, as the general manager of this bank points out, although the policy of this administration has been an easy money policy, the banks declare that fundamentally because of their reluctance to take chances they have been unwilling to make loans to business enterprises and have been investing in government bonds and securities. In other words, the last word is with the chartered banks.

[Mr. Tucker.]

Now then, what are we faced with as a Liberal party? The whole situation comes down to this: We have ample man power; we have skilled engineers who could give leadership in taking charge of the industrial enterprise of the country, the opening up of mines and so on; we have the natural resources; and, on the admission of the banks and according to the figures that I have put before the house, we have ample credit. But the banks, for what appear to them to be good reasons, do not choose to put that credit in the hands of business enterprise. What is to be done?

In the short time still at my disposal I intend to lay before the house a suggestion which I believe would be at once fair to the banks and a means of solving the problem. But before I offer that suggestion I should like to say a word to those who take the attitude that there is nothing in any such ideas as these that are being put forward. To such people I say: Have you any idea which will solve the problems that face this country, and solve those problems adequately? If you have not, then I suggest that you should get busy—every member of this house should get busy—and try to figure out something that will. I do not suggest that the idea I submit is the only one or that it is necessarily the best. I offer it simply in the hope that it will give rise to some comment, and that if there is some virtue in it, some effect may be given to it. At any rate it will lead to a study of the great difficulty to-day, namely, the fear of capital of investing in enterprise for the purpose of putting our people to work and developing our natural resources.

It was my privilege last summer to spend four days flying over the northern part of Saskatchewan. I visited Goldfields where the Consolidated Mining and Smelting Company operates. That company, before taking one cent out of the ground by way of profits, will probably spend ten millions by way of developmental work. You cannot put labour to work on mineral resources in our north country to any great extent unless you have great resources of capital behind you; but there are not many large companies who are able to go to the banks with the necessary security in order to get such large supplies of credit with which to develop our natural resources. You have, therefore, the suggestion that credit should be sought abroad. I say, however, that if these enterprises are worth developing at all; if they would justify our seeking credit from abroad, then we have the right to say to the banks: "You must make available the necessary capital to develop the resources of this country." Someone may say that this is unfair to the banks. Well, let me suggest how it could be worked out. A board of bank commissioners could be set up and if anyone had a worthwhile mining scheme—something similar to the Consolidated Mining and Smelting proposition at Goldfields, Saskatchewan—and engineers reported favourably upon it, the only difficulty being lack of capital because the would-be borrowers had no collateral security to enable them to borrow from the banks, such board would engage geologists to investigate the proposal and, if the report were favourable, they would order the banks to furnish the necessary credit, each one sharing pro rata in the risk. This, I may be told, would be unfair to the depositors and shareholders. To meet this, I would then say to them: "On these risks which you are ordered to take we will guarantee you an aggregate return of not more than two per cent. In individual instances that return may be seven, or six, or five per cent, but we will guarantee you, on all the risks we order you to take, an aggregate return of two per cent, so that you cannot lose." To the persons sponsoring the undertaking I would say: "In the case of private capital you would have to give a share in the enterprise to the people furnishing that capital. And where you have to apply to the government for the necessary capital, through the chartered banks, I would say that a half interest in the enterprise when developed should accrue to the government."

I am satisfied that in that way, if our natural resources are as good as they are supposed to be, and I believe they are, there would be not a loss but a profit to the government even after paying the two per cent in cases where the proposition did not turn out well. There would be ample capital for the development of our natural resources, and enterprise could proceed, because there is ample man power. That would be taking control of the credit of the country in the interests of the people.

After all, the whole trouble to-day is lack of credit to develop the natural resources of Canada. If we did something of this sort—say in connection with mining to start with—the principle could ultimately be extended to other industries. But we might confine ourselves for the moment and at the start to mining. If, for example, in western Canada we could have half a dozen enterprises being developed like the one at Goldfields—and there are the mineral fields discovered to do so—instead of one, giving employment to our people, there would be no need to force young people on to farms to try to earn their living with consequent over-production of farm products. There would be a great demand from the mining industry for the things the farmers produce. This development would contribute to the solution of the railway problem and at the same time to the upbuilding of the manufacturing industry. In other words, a good many of our problems for which we seem to have at present no solution would be taken care of.

I offer that suggestion in all seriousness as providing a means of carrying out our policy of securing control of the credit of the country. If we did put the credit power of the country behind the youth of Canada for the development of our resources, the present bad feeling between one section of the dominion and another, the racial feeling that I fear is beginning to show itself between people of different origins, would suddenly and rapidly recede into the background. I suggest that if we were to take hold of the situation in that fashion, we could, east and west, regardless of racial origin or religious creed, work together in the interest of the future of Canada; we could once more do our part to justify democracy in the eyes of the world and our own people, and we could establish on the northern half of this continent a people working together in harmony, serving their country, making homes for themselves and able to earn a reasonable living. And by such an innovation of policy much as in the war we would win the peace. We in our turn would do our part to build up and hand on to posterity the great country foreseen by the fathers of this nation, a country which we would be proud of and which would not suffer from the difficulties and sense of frustration that we have to face to-day.

Mr. E. G. HANSELL (Macleod): Mr. Speaker, having listened to the speech from the throne and had opportunity to digest it somewhat, we notice several things in it that might be debated. I am not going to take time to go through the speech from beginning to end, but coming to those parts which refer to the wheat board and the royal commission on grain marketing and its effect upon the grain exchanges, also the Prairie Farm Rehabilitation Act, I was immediately reminded of what happened at the last session of parliament with regard to some of these matters. I suppose that on account of the prospective visit of their majesties to Canada this year it will be the desire of the house to hasten its business as much as possible in order that prorogation may be reached before the time of their majesties' visit. Last session there was ample time to conclude in good time for his excellency to have prorogued parliament himself. I have referred to one or two items in the speech from the throne because some of these items were left until the dying days of the last session.

I might take a moment to review the business of this house at the last session. It will be recalled that the budget was considerably delayed, the reason given, and perhaps it was a legitimate one, being that the Canada-United States trade agreement was expected to be brought down at any time. Day after day, week after week it was about to come, but at last budget day was announced and the trade agreement did not come down. We all know what happened. I am certain that if we had waited for the trade agreement to be consummated, we would have had to stay here several months later than we did. However that is past and gone.

The report of the grain commission was brought down in this house on May 9. The appropriate item under which the report could be discussed was not brought down by the minister until June 30, the day on which it was expected parliament would prorogue. His excellency had arranged passage and was to sail on July 1. Many of us wanted to speak on the grain commission report, but it would have been very unpopular for us to have taken time to make our speeches when the whole house was expecting parliament to prorogue perhaps within a few hours. We all know the result. One hon. member from the government side spoke upon the report at length, and one hon. member from the Conservative party spoke on it; those two men were quite capable of speaking on it, and the rest of us felt that in order to facilitate the business of the house we should refrain from speaking. But some of us felt that it was rather unfair for this particular item to be brought down on the last day of parliament, when it could have been brought down several weeks before.

That day, June 30, wore on, and it was almost midnight when the Minister of Mines and Resources (Mr. Crerar) brought down some of his estimates. I have particular reference now to the estimate for subventions on coal, some $2,250,000. That estimate was brought down toward midnight of June 30. The subject of coal mining is of great interest to many hon. members, those from Nova Scotia and Alberta perhaps in particular. It was going on to midnight; parliament was expected to prorogue at any minute, maybe at one or two or three o'clock in the morning, and the whole house was continually crying, "Carried", "Carried", "Carried", when an item of this kind was still to be discussed. Such items as this are of tremendous importance. Nova Scotia has a coal mining industry which is very important to that province, and the same is true of Alberta. Ample time should be given for discussion of these matters. Of course I know it will be said that there is no desire to shut off discussion, but we all know how unpopular it is for one to take time to speak in those dying hours of the session when everyone wants to get away. Subsequently to that, along towards midnight the Minister of Mines and Resources brought down his estimates for highways. Some hon. members no doubt recall those particular estimates, and it is a singular fact that the appropriations to the provinces involved amounts from $100,000 to $500,000, except that the amount for Alberta was $75,000. The former leader of the opposition characterised that as being a punishment for Alberta rather than a reward. It is singular that such an estimate should be left until the very dying hours of the session.

I go a little further. That night we adjourned at twenty minutes after midnight, at which time there were still important estimates to be dealt with; estimates of the defence department; an amount of three and a half million dollars for rehabilitation; the estimates for the youth training program, and estimates concerning unemployment relief. On July 1 we assembled at 10.30 o'clock in the morning, and a message was read by you, Mr. Speaker, from his excellency's secretary, saying that the deputy of his excellency would proceed to the senate chamber at one o'clock to prorogue parliament. Still we had those very, very important items to consider. At 12.30 o'clock, about half an hour before the time set for prorogation, the estimate providing $3,500,000 for rehabilitation was brought before the committee. As we all know, one does not become very popular if one speaks at length when everyone is anxious to get away, but the item respecting rehabilitation was an important matter, concerning the drought area of the west, most of which lies in the provinces of Saskatchewan and Alberta. The peculiar thing about the matter, as far as some of us are concerned, is that there is no reason why such an estimate could not have been brought down very early in the session in order to provide ample opportunity for discussion. However, to resume, we adjourned at one o'clock and came back at three o'clock in the afternoon to continue the discussion on the rehabilitation estimate. The estimate for the youth training program, amounting to more than a million dollars, still had to be discussed.

I am pointing out these matters because some of us felt that it was not altogether fair to us to have these estimates left until the last hours of the session. We do not wish to imply that this was done on purpose, but it is certain that these particular items were of tremendous importance to this country and should have been far more generally discussed. We want to facilitate the business of parliament; but no one can further the business of this house better than those who sit on the treasury benches, and we would ask that during this session some of these important items be brought forward in the not too far distant future in order that they may be adequately discussed. We feel that, without becoming too unpopular, we should have an opportunity to discuss these matters. We do not want to put our request in the form of a warning, but we do want to urge that these estimates be brought down early.

There are other points that we might mention in connection with the speech from the throne. I might recall that the Liberal party went into power on that glorious promise of reforming the money policy of this country, based on the theory of issuing currency and credit in terms of public need. By this time that statement has been worn almost threadbare. It is to be noticed that in the speech from the throne this year such policies are conspicuous by their absence. This year nothing is said about doing anything in the way of monetary reform. Well, perhaps it has all been done; perhaps the battle that the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) promised to fight has been finished. We did not notice any smoke in the air; but perhaps if there was any it has been all cleared away, and the country cannot expect any more. However, I would not place too much reliance upon the fact that this subject is not mentioned in the speech from the throne, because it will be recalled that last year the speech from the throne contained nothing with regard to monetary reform; yet some time around the middle or towards the latter part of the session the Prime Minister was pleased to bring down a bill providing for the purchase of all the stock of the Bank of Canada. So perhaps a good deal of our legislation depends upon the political pulse of the country. I do not know, but last year's experience would seem to indicate that.

Well, Mr. Speaker, we in this corner of the house are somewhat disappointed that there is no reference in the speech from the throne to money reform. We have continually urged upon the government that the only solution to the problems of this country is a positive readjustment of our money policy. Nothing is being done. How much longer must we urge that action be taken? Perhaps the best we can expect is that the next time the people have an opportunity to speak they will speak in a voice that can be understood.

Mrs. MARTHA LOUISE BLACK (Yukon): Mr. Speaker, I should like to add my word of congratulation to the mover and the seconder of the address in reply to the speech from the throne. Especially do I wish to congratulate that younger member, the hon. member for Stormont (Mr. Chevrier). It has been my good fortune to know the hon. gentleman rather well, and when I see a young man speaking with equal facility in both French and English I am really consumed with envy. Ever since I have lived in this country, which has been for forty years now, and have known it as a bilingual country, I have felt it a shame that the young people of this day and age, as of forty years ago, have not been taught to speak both French and English. We have in the hon. member for Stormont a shining example of what the young people of to-day should know.

Perhaps it is unnecessary for me to touch upon the trade agreement. More and more as I come here each session I have a feeling of isolation; I feel more and more that I am alone. It is not that every individual member is not exceedingly kind and courteous; it is because of the fact that my constituency is so isolated and so far away from the rest of Canada. The trade agreement affects us not at all. In that north land we produce only the mediums of exchange, namely, gold and silver. When times are prosperous in Canada—or, as we in the north call it, on the outside—we pay higher prices for the goods we purchase. When depression is rampant throughout the country we are able to get our goods for less. So I think hon. members will understand when I say that from a selfish standpoint the trade agreement affects us not at all.

It seems to me that we on this continent are singularly blessed in the peace that we have, outwardly at least, throughout the country. We are free to use our own language. We are free to worship in whatever church we choose. We are free to move about whither we will. There is no one to say us nay, no one to regiment us as the peoples of Europe are regimented. I have been both shocked and surprised in reading papers throughout Canada to see that other people are demanding the rights of their languages. I have not been afraid that either this government or any future government will listen to those demands, because any government must have before it the horrible example of the continent of Europe, with its multiplicity of languages, which has become a modern tower of Babel. That factor must account for much of the trouble taking place in Europe at the present time.

During the September crisis we in the Yukon heard the voice of the world over the radio. We were thousands of miles from London, the heart of empire; yet there was not a heart in the Yukon but beat in unison with the tragedy which was taking place overseas. There was no one who did not feel the greatest amount of sympathy for that Prime Minister, Mr. Chamberlain. Not only did he turn the other cheek to the enemy but he turned it several times. Certainly he must have suffered the greatest agony of humiliation when undergoing what he did. But in undergoing that, while thoughtlessly many people have said that he gave away much that he should not have given away, for the time being at least he saved the world from a horrible slaughter.

Yesterday afternoon when the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) spoke, I heard him say that the danger was not past, a fact which I believe we all realize. Only the cool heads will be able to stave off the danger a little longer, and yet a little longer, until possibly the world may realize the utter madness of another holocaust such as those of us who are older went through between 1914 and 1918. There is nothing for a government to do but to do the best it can in times of such anxiety. Those of us who are not responsible can sit on the side lines and criticize. It is very easy to find fault; it is easy to criticize. But I sometimes wonder how much better we could have done ourselves. I doubt if there are many of us who would have done even as well. During the crisis the Yukon was deeply interested, dreading the thought of war. Yet at the same time every heart beat in unison with the empire and every person was willing to do as was done in the days of 1914, 1915 and 1916. If needs be, they were ready to answer the call of king and country.

Changing the subject very quickly, we come to the pleasant thought of the visit of Their Majesties, the King and Queen. In 1937 I had the privilege of suggesting to the Minister of Finance (Mr. Dunning) that silver coinage be issued by the government to commemorate the coronation. Not for one moment do I intimate that the minister followed my suggestion. But the fact remains that silver coinage was issued, and among my few souvenirs I cherish the coin issued at that time, as well as the silver dollar issued at the time of the silver jubilee.

We see by the papers the government will again issue souvenirs by way of silver coinage and stamps. I am particularly interested in the issue of silver because in the Yukon there is a large territory in the Mayo district devoted to silver lead mining. As hon. members from British Columbia will no doubt point out, that province also is interested in silver mining, and anything that can be done to encourage our miners will surely be of infinite help to that class of people, upon whom many governments depend.

In the royal couple about to visit this country we have a fine example of manhood and womanhood in the British Empire. Suddenly these two people were called upon to fill a staggeringly difficult position. Neither one of them had trained deliberately to occupy a throne. Her Majesty Queen Elizabeth is a commoner, though of royal descent through the female line. The king was a prince occupying a secondary position. Yet in the twinkling of an eye those young people accepted a huge responsibility. No one in the world can say they have not filled the position thus far with grace and dignity not only to themselves but to the empire at large. Courageously and prayerfully they are carrying on. We owe them a great debt and our best efforts to make their lives happier and easier. They are coming to Canada and from one end of the country to the other every respect is to be shown them.

Unfortunately the Yukon is not to be visited by the royal couple, but I am free to say that Yukoners one and all feel a steadfast loyalty and fealty to those young people who are carrying on so bravely and so well. Possibly they are fortunate in the example which has been set them by the late King George V and his royal consort Queen Mary for whom the world has the greatest affection. Although I was born and brought up in the republic to the south of us, from girlhood I was trained by a grandmother who had strict old country ideas, and later by the sisters of the Holy Cross I was taught to look on England as a shining example of what royalty could show to the rest of the world. That was taught, despite that conduct of England towards the colonies which made them rebel. Queen Victoria, later her son, then her grandson and then her great grandson have all been familiar figures to me, both from reading and through conversation at home and at school. I have lived here now for forty years and have grown to realize what this country can be, what it has been and, pray God, what it will be for many years to come.

It is possible that the most interesting thing to us in the Yukon at the present time is the Alaska-Yukon highway. Many years ago the building of the road was advocated, and I well remember when Mr. Tolmie, the then premier of British Columbia, in the company of his ministers, took a trip as far as he could in northern British Columbia. My husband was appointed a member of the Canadian commission, and he now has in his office hundreds of photographs, surveys, letters and reports dealing with that road. I could give to the house a hundred reasons why the road should be built, and possibly I could give as many why it should not. If the road is built, I trust that men who know that northern country will be put in charge. It will be an enormously expensive work. The government of Canada cannot afford it, and certainly the government of British Columbia, debt-ridden as it is, cannot afford it.

We are told by the public men of the United States that that country wants this road for defence purposes. We have to face the fact that should the United States be at war, Canada would be at war. We have to face the fact that if any untoward incident brings Canada into a war, the United States will be at war. That country could not stand by and see Canada fall. That would be impossible. She would not allow foreigners to touch Canadian territory any more than we would feel that we could allow foreigners to touch United States territory. The United States wants the road, and if the government is going to allow it to be built, I would urge that the United States be asked to pay every cent of the cost of building the road through Canadian territory, employing only Canadian labour and giving to Canada a free port of entry at Skagway. Some hon. members may smile at the mention of a free port of entry at Skagway, but we have a precedent. A free port of entry was allowed during the reign of Queen Victoria at Sault Ste. Marie and in the Gaspé.

Mr. FINN: I am in favour of a free port.

Mrs. BLACK: I believe that was done in 1860, but the permission was revoked after six years. At one time there was a Canadian customs office in Skagway. The stars and stripes and the union jack flew side by side. That was a great convenience, but unfortunately some one with more of what he thought was patriotism than brains objected to "that rag," as he called the union jack, flying in God's country. I was not a British subject at the time, but I stepped up to him and I said, "Another fool"! He looked at me and said, "That is like all you English women." I said, "As it happens I am the eighth generation born and brought up in the United States." I told him that that had been done for the convenience of Yukoners going through United States territory. I told him that the United States would have to apologize, that Canada would have to accept the apology, but that the Yukoners would have to have their baggage and other possessions examined at the summit. So I suggest that if the road is built, it should be understood that we have a free port of entry at Skagway.

It is difficult for Alaskans and Yukoners to put up with the tariffs between the two countries when they pass from one country to the other. Perhaps this trade agreement of which we have heard so much will change conditions, but at any rate if the road comes to pass, as it probably will—the Hudson Bay railway came to pass—we should try to get the best bargain we possibly can. My confreres in the United States are good bargainers. I say that without any disrespect. I come from a family of down-east Yankees who made money selling wooden nutmegs. If they could do that then, I am sure they have not lost that ability at the present time.

When coming to the house many members display a spirit of optimism, while many others display a spirit of pessimism. We in the Yukon have been greatly favoured by not having the large numbers of unemployed that you have on the outside. A few drifters came in this summer, one or two of whom did not want to work. However, I must say that I believe I could count on the fingers of one hand the men who did not want work. One man came to me and said that he was tired of trying to get work. I asked him if he had tried pick-and-shovel work. When he told me he had not, I asked him what he had come there for. He said, "I heard you say that the Yukon was a place where every man could get a job." I said, "I may have said that, but what I meant was that every man who wanted a job could get a job provided he was willing to do gruelling, back-breaking work." I told him he could not get anything for nothing in that country. He leaned back and looked at me and said that I was a fine member. He told me, "The government has to take care of me or else send me out." It is not often that I lose my temper, but I did then. I used language that he understood. I am sure you would ask me to retract that language, Mr. Speaker, if I used it here. I said to him, "Why don't you walk from here to Skagway?" He said, "How far?" I told him it was only about four hundred miles. He said, "What do you mean by insulting me?" I said, "My husband and my brother have walked that distance and they are much better men than you will be even though you live to be a thousand." He said, "This is no country for a white man to live in." Under the circumstances, I was forced to agree with him.

The Yukon is a good country; it is a cruel country; it is a kind country; it is a wicked country. It is a country that you can love; it is a country that you can hate, depending upon your attitude. I have lived there for forty years; I have travelled from one end of Canada to the other, as well as across the United States; I have travelled overseas; but I have never in my life seen a country that could thrill me as does the Yukon. We have our cruelties; we have our hardships; we have our glories, and we have our magnificent summers. We have our flowers, our vegetables, our gold and silver, but only when we work for them. If we come down here, it is because we have worked, not because we have sat back and folded our hands.

I wish that hon. members were more familiar with that country. Then, instead of smiling when I ask for a favour, instead of thinking that the Yukon wants all and gives nothing, they would remember the many men from that part of the country who have paid off the mortgages on their farms; they would remember the many men who served overseas during the great war. Out of a population of less than 5,000, over 500 men enlisted before conscription was brought in. All of us are ready to serve this country in time of peace and in time of war. We pray for the glory of peace and hope for its beauty.

Mr. E. O. BERTRAND (Prescott): Mr. Speaker, in my first attempt to speak the language of the majority in this house, may I crave your indulgence, and ask my colleagues not to be too severe in their criticism.

The hon. member for the Yukon (Mrs. Black) will undoubtedly forgive me if I do not follow her in her remarks. But I want to say that I am always very much interested in what she has to say to the house and also in the interest she takes in the far and cold country that she inhabits.

I also want to congratulate the proposer and the seconder of the address in reply to the speech from the throne. The hon. member for Brandon (Mr. Matthews), a newcomer in this house, has surely done credit to himself and to his constituency; and the hon. member for Stormont (Mr. Chevrier) has shown once more that he is well informed in politics, that he is a good debater, that he is a thorough bilinguist, and one for whose future his compatriots have great hopes.

As was so well said in the speech from the throne, every citizen of our country rejoices in the coming of our sovereigns to Canada this year. We French-Canadians are proud to say that we are not the ones least honoured by this visit. Might I suggest that when Their Majesties King George and Queen Elizabeth are in Ottawa, the capital city of Canada, we as the first civilized settlers in this country should have an official representative to express in our own language to their majesties our homage, our past and present loyalty to the crown, with the strength of our traditions and our true aspirations for the future.

Might I express on behalf of my compatriots and my constituents our wholehearted gratitude for the non-committal attitude taken by the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) and his government during the dark days of the European crisis in 1938. It is, undoubtedly, similar steps that are conducive to the maintenance of peace in the world. Canada can be proud of the attitude of its Prime Minister and its government in that instance, and, by the way, of the cooperation that was given to the government by the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Manion).

It is also refreshing to consider the friendship expressed to other nations by our government in the conclusion of trade agreements with other parts of the world, but principally at this moment with the United States of America. We are all sure that every part of our dominion will greatly benefit from that new trade agreement. The last trade agreement between the United States and Canada brought a great deal of comfort to our population, and we hope for still better consequences through the new regulations which are placed in the present trade agreement.

Here, I think, it would be only timely to suggest that special attention be given to trade possibilities with the countries of South America, where there is a population of eighty-five millions of people, who produce commodities which are not produced in our country and who necessarily buy commodities which are produced in the country we inhabit. Let us hope that goodwill will be the governing factor in all our relations with other countries, and that this point of view will be always fully considered when questions of armaments and defence are under study. May I add that my compatriots dislike war; they have a very strong feeling against it, and they are not always ready to approve any move which looks like preparation for it.

Everyone regards with anxiety the unemployment problem in Canada. I do not hesitate to say that this is a very difficult problem, and that probably too much was said during the past year to the effect that it should be treated as a national question. I am not afraid to say in this house and elsewhere that this problem should be dealt with in all instances by the nearest competent body, by which I mean the municipality. Outside of large cities, almost every family is known intimately by the mayor, reeve, aldermen or councillors, or any one of them. May I then ask who is in a better position than they are to deal with these individual needs and these problems which arise in these different places? Instead of taking the matter away from them I would suggest rather that adequate assistance be given to those municipalities where the situation is the worst; it should not be removed from those who are best able to make the people understand that, after all, the state cannot give them a living for all time.

For this reason I am pleased to learn from the speech from the throne that a public works program will be undertaken by this government to face the situation, and also that laws will be made to help local work programs and local improvements. In making this statement may I venture to say that we should not fritter this program away by asking for problematical provincial guarantees when these works are done by the municipalities. The said guarantees have been given by some provinces and refused by others in the past year, and some municipalities which are positively in a good financial position are therefore denied the privilege of benefiting from the agencies to help unemployment in their districts. If the necessity of a provincial guarantee is enforced, I am afraid the result will be that work will be done in places where the security is problematical and will be refused to municipalities where a great deal should be done by way of local improvements and that this would be justified to help the situation as regards unemployment through loans so granted for local improvements.

Passing to another item of the speech from the throne, I want to say that there are no more important works than the youth training program. We are all satisfied to learn that it will be continued and enlarged. Youth is the future of our country. Means should be taken to help each and every young man to improve his situation and to give him some help to learn some trade or craft so that he may be able to make his own struggle in the development of the future of our country.

I wish now to make a few comments on the paragraph of the speech from the throne which reads:

> In order to avert economic disaster to a large part of our population, my ministers, under the terms of the Wheat Board Act, approved, for the current crop year, an initial payment for wheat as recommended by the board.

In this paragraph I take the words, "a large part of our population," to mean the population of the prairie provinces. I hope it is unnecessary for me to give further explanations to convince anyone of the correctness of this interpretation. For a few months now we have seen all sorts of articles and propaganda concerning the difference in the situation as between eastern and western Canada, and when I speak of western Canada I mean the prairie provinces. Comparisons have been made in this propaganda on platforms and elsewhere. It is sufficient to say for the moment that it is unfair to compare the problem of the prairie farmer with the problem in eastern Canada when you take into consideration the secondary industries in other parts of the dominion.

Let us examine the position of the prairie farmers and that of farmers in other parts of the country. I desire first to present figures with regard to the rural population of Canada. These figures, which are taken from the Canada Year Book, 1938, at page 145, are as follows:

Prince Edward Island	67,653
Nova Scotia	281,192
New Brunswick	279,279
Quebec	1,060,649
Ontario	1,335,691
British Columbia	299,524

This is a total of 3,323,998 or 69·20 per cent of the total rural population in Canada. Now let us take the prairie provinces. The figures are:

Manitoba	384,170
Saskatchewan	630,880
Alberta	453,097
Northwest Territories	12,593

This is a total of 1,480,740, or 30·80 per cent of the total rural population of the country. What about the returns of this rural population in different sections? In 1938 the prairie provinces' proportions of Canadian production were:

Commodity	Per cent
Wheat. .. .. (335,430,000 bushels)	93·0
Cattle..	46·1
Hogs..	38·2
Sheep..	45·3
Eggs..	42·1
Butter..	36·8
Milk..	28·0

From these products they enjoyed a corresponding ratio of revenue. In other words 30·8 per cent of the rural population of Canada produced the proportions just enumerated. But the prairie provinces did not enjoy this bountiful production only in 1938. Let me quote from the special edition of the Ottawa Citizen of January 13, in which there appeared an article dealing with the resources of western Canada. This special edition of the Citizen gave the situation very fully. It is most interesting reading and is enlightening to anyone who takes an interest in the problems of the farmers in different parts of the country. I quote:

> In the past twenty years cattle on the ranges and farms of the prairie provinces numbered on the average 3,500,000 per year. These cattle had an average gross value of $130,000,000.
> The marketings of cattle from Manitoba, Saskatchewan and Alberta over the twenty-year period under review averaged approximately five hundred and twenty thousand head. These marketings provided an average gross income from cattle of $48,000,000.

Let me give some other figures to show that this bountiful production did not characterize only 1938. I quote again from the same review appearing in the Citizen of January 13. I have already given the figures for 1938.

Value of cattle..	$ 11,747,540	$ 18,815,284	$ 21,595,225	$ 28,294,208
Value of calves..	1,208,336	1,991,236	2,307,959	4,143,213
Value of hogs..	25,601,235	24,654,448	28,535,492	28,396,707
Value of sheep..	1,722,244	1,676,906	1,981,045	2,128,938
Total value live stock..	40,279,955	47,137,874	54,419,721	62,963,066
Value of dairy products..	37,357,000	39,419,538	44,502,022	46,761,300
Total value live stock and products	77,636,955	86,554,412	98,921,743	109,724,366
Wheat production (bushels)	263,800,000	264,096,000	202,000,000	159,000,000
Value of wheat production..	$153,368,000	$159,677,000	$185,580,000	$157,560,000

True, these provinces, in spite of the revenues I have mentioned, suffered from drought. On that ground the assistance to these sections provided by this parliament was never questioned. But compare the aforementioned revenues with the revenues of the farms in other sections of Canada. Not that I have any grudge against the guarantee of the price of wheat that was given to the west by the government, but if it can be given to the west my contention is that it can be given to other parts of the country as well. When these provinces joined confederation, it was to be supposed that their administrations would increase their services in about the same ratio to population as other parts of Canada. Let me state that the cost of education in the prairie provinces has increased six times more than the increase in population, and the cost of public services has increased thirty times as fast as the increase in population.

In the east it will be found that people managed to make both ends meet; this was done by economy and thrift. And may I say that the further east you go, the thriftier are the people. If anyone took the trouble to visit parts of the maritime provinces and see what the fishermen of that country live upon, he must admit that they must be thrifty, and very thrifty. But many slices of the savings of the people of the east by thrift and economy were taken in taxes to help the prairie provinces in one way or another. I shall not undertake to state amounts so transferred or to state the help given to that part of Canada; but I do say that if in order to avert economic disaster in the western provinces it was necessary to fix a guaranteed price of eighty cents a bushel for No. 1 hard wheat f.o.b. Fort William, it is the opinion of the farmers of the east and of other parts of the country who have been really battling with troubles and difficulties in the last few years, who were also hard hit by the crisis or by poor crops, that it is also necessary to fix and guarantee a reasonable price for commodities produced by the agricultural population in other parts of Canada, shall we say cheese, or butter, or potatoes, or maybe wheat, oats and barley, seed clover or timothy, or vegetables, and all commodities sold—may I draw attention to this proviso—sold at less than cost of production in this year or past years.

The farmers of my county strongly oppose price fixing by the state. They claim that this is something which governments should not undertake. They claim that it is far from Liberal policies. But if it is to be done, let it be done so as to do justice to farmers in all sections of the country. May I add, let it be done to do real justice to all classes of the population.

Let me end my remarks with one quotation from an address delivered by Premier Bracken of Manitoba as reported in the Ottawa Citizen of January 13, 1939, at page 6:

> No large economic area of the country can for any length of time remain impoverished by failure of federal policies to secure markets and during this period be expected to meet its indebtedness, or be enthusiastic about national unity.

Of course this declaration is not made by anyone in the east. But if this declaration can apply to the difficulties of the farmers of the west, I say it is doubly applicable to the farmers of the east in the past year, and it is my plea on their behalf on this occasion.

In this great Canada of ours, for whose future we have great hopes, we want to build for this future on unity of population and an equal chance for all. I do not want to be too severe or to condemn what has been done; probably the situation was urgent, and it was practically impossible to do otherwise than fix this wheat price for the west for last year's crop; but let me say that to promote this unity and have our people feel that they are given an equal chance, I simply thought it my duty to raise my voice at this moment and to plead for just and fair treatment for all, to make this Canada of ours a place in which all will be satisfied to live and where people will feel that all are on exactly the same footing.

Mr. T. A. THOMPSON (Lanark): At the outset, Mr. Speaker, I wish to express my deep gratitude that Their Majesties the King and Queen have graciously consented to visit Canada. We have in this country our differences, political and otherwise; we have men of different races, different creeds, different nationalities, different outlook on life; but we all join together in honouring the same king. And I think this coming visit of their majesties will have a great unifying influence upon the Dominion of Canada, and that our people are looking forward to their visit with great pleasure as well as pride.

The speech from the throne is rather a meagre bill of fare to be presented to this house at a time when the masses of our people are looking for leadership; when they are looking for some national policies which will give them a greater sense of economic security, and looking to be eased of their burden of unemployment and debt and taxes.

As to the proposal to increase the appropriation for defence, and particularly for air defence, I have no criticism to offer, so long as the contracts for the material required shall be honestly awarded and that precautions are taken to see that private individuals do not make undue profits out of them. The Canadian people at the present time are in no mood to countenance any further Bren gun contracts. The effectiveness of the proposal to form a defence purchasing board will depend entirely upon its personnel. If this government continues to do as it has done in the past, and to appoint political partisans as a reward for services rendered, this board will be nothing more or less than just another of this government's royal commissions that have been of no effect.

Unemployment, debt and taxes are the nightmares that disturb the peace of every thoughtful citizen in Canada; yet in the speech from the throne no mention is made of either our debt or our burden of taxation. Nor is any solution offered for our unemployment problem, nor any redress for the men and women who have been forced on relief by the policies adopted by this government, by their injurious trade agreements and by their continual tariff tampering. During the campaign of 1935 we remember with what eloquence the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King)—and he is an eloquent man—cried from one end of this country to the other that unemployment was Canada's most urgent national problem; that poverty and adversity, want and misery, were the enemies which Liberalism would seek to banish from this land. Further he said, "We take up at once, as our supreme task, an endeavour to end poverty in the midst of plenty." He also promised that the government would practise economy in the conduct of public affairs and that credit would be issued in terms of national need.

With all the eloquence at his command the right hon. gentleman used such beautiful phraseology and enunciated such high ideals, but where are the results? After every promise made by the right hon. gentleman during the last campaign can be written the word failure, dismal failure. We find that the Canadian Welfare Council, after a thorough investigation of the whole situation in Canada, said that no fundamental attack upon the serious national ills which have occasioned these heavy expenditures had been taken by the present government. That is an expression of opinion by a non-partisan organization in regard to what has taken place in the last three years. We have spent $900,000,000 and we are no better off than when we started. There is no improvement to-day.

It is quite true, Mr. Speaker, that the former right hon. leader of the opposition (Mr. Bennett) made promises in 1930. He said he would end unemployment or perish in the attempt, but of the right hon. gentleman and the government of that day it must be said that they did introduce those principles and policies which under normal conditions would have brought prosperity to this country. Hon. gentlemen opposite forget that from 1930 to 1935 the government of the day was piloting this country through the greatest depression the world has ever seen. But the present government, in normal times, has failed to redeem the promises it made to the electorate. The commission on employment and the trade agreements which have been negotiated by this government, and which it hoped would bring great prosperity to this dominion, have not relieved our economic situation, and as I travel throughout Canada I find that the people are tired of the present physician and are crying aloud for a new doctor to heal their wounds, a new leader to bring them out of this wilderness.

Increased trade, world trade, as advocated by the present government, will never solve our unemployment problem. A nation that depends for its economic welfare and security upon its exports to foreign countries places in the hands of the foreign buyers the prosperity of its people; for it has absolutely no control over the markets to which it sends its goods. Industry and agriculture in this country are not enemies; they are partners in our development. Agriculture supplies the raw materials; industry supplies the manufactured articles, and they must work in cooperation. In future, industry, to a far greater extent than agriculture, must take up the slack of our unemployment. As farmers, we are producing a surplus of every food that can be profitably produced in Canada. We are not only feeding our own people; we are exporting large quantities of foodstuffs. But what about our manufactured articles, our machinery, our clothing and everything in the manufactured line? At least fifty per cent of it is being bought from foreign countries. We are sending our money out of this country instead of building up markets for our farmers at home. After all, with the exception of wheat, we consume over ninety per cent of our agricultural products at home, and when we build up industry here we build up markets for the farmer. The greatest market the farmer has to-day consists of the men and women engaged in the industrial life of this dominion, who are non-producers of agricultural products. When we build up industry we build up agriculture and the country prospers, but the very moment industry is at a low ebb we find our farmers in distress.

I represent a constituency in which there are many large textile mills. Between 1930 and 1935, when a Conservative government was in power, many of these mills ran day and night. What is the situation to-day? One of the largest mills in my riding is closed while several are running only part time. When I was home last weekend I was talking to the owner of a great mill, who told me that between 1930 and 1935 his mill ran day and night. To-day it is running only three days a week, and his goods are not being sold but are being put in storehouses. He said, "I am running my mill because I do not want to have my people go on relief, I am trying to retain my employees." The men and women who are getting relief to-day are not the people who are suffering the most. We have a class of people who are being employed only two or three days a week, who are earning just enough to keep body and soul together, and who are too proud to ask for relief. These are the people to whom my heart goes out.

In the county of Lanark there is one mill which is at present running day and night. That mill is manufacturing cloth from shoddy. I went to examine it the other day, and the proprietor told me he did not buy one pound of wool. It is a good looking cloth which he sells to the ready-to-wear clothing manufacturers who, in turn, produce cheap suits. The policies of this government have so reduced the purchasing power of the average person that he is not able to afford to buy a good suit of clothes. The mills making good cloth are idle, while this mill, turning out a cheap quality product, is running day and night. That is the condition in which we find industry.

The policies of the present government have not effectively dealt with unemployment, much less solved it. The situation is as it was when the government took office, unemployment is still Canada's greatest national problem. If we work together in unison, I believe there is not any problem concerning the whole country which cannot be solved by the combined effort of our Canadian people. But if we are divided we are lost.

A few years ago, prior to this government taking office, internal discord was a cloud on the sky no bigger than a man's hand; to-day it darkens the whole horizon and threatens the very foundation of our confederation.

Canada is fast disintegrating into nine sovereign provinces. Where is the dream of the fathers of confederation of a great, united Canada? Where is the happy family of Liberal governments the Prime Minister predicted before the last election?

Reference was made in the speech from the throne to the Canada-Uuited States trade agreement which I shall not discuss at length at the present time. I trust I shall have an opportunity to make further observations when the agreement is before the house.

The speech from the throne offers no relief to the already overburdened taxpayers of Canada. We cannot continue this process of pyramiding our national debt and yearly adding millions of dollars of deficits. If we do so continue a huge debt will be left as a burden on our children and our children's children. Are we going to pass this country on in that condition to those who will come after us? That is not the way in which we received it from our forefathers, and it is up to us to see that we pass it on without unduly hampering those who will come after us. Posterity will have enough problems of its own to solve without the people of this day heaping ours upon their backs. Let us bear our own burdens. The eleven million people in Canada are to-day carrying almost all the taxation they are able to bear. I should like to see it made compulsory for every government to live within its means and to balance its budgets or, failing that, to be placed in a position, except in case of war, where it would be obliged to resign and go back to the people.

The speech from the throne was replete with beautiful phrases which meant anything or nothing, but which were characteristic of the present do-nothing government. I was surprised last evening as I listened to the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) twitting the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Manion) with lack of patriotism. When the great war broke out, there were in Canada people in the prime of their lives who had no families and who could have rendered good service to their country, but instead of that they slipped quietly across the border into the United States and secured good positions. Following the war they came back quietly, when they thought all was quiet on the western front. Compare that, I say, with the record of the Leader of the Opposition. When war was declared, he was a married man with a family of small children and with one of the largest medical practices in central Canada. He was rapidly becoming one of the most promising surgeons in Ontario. What had he to leave? He left his wife, his family and his business, donned the king's uniform and for three years offered his life in the defence of Canada. It ill becomes the Prime Minister or any other man to twit the present leader of the Conservative party with lack of patriotism.

I ask in all sincerity: Whither is the Prime Minister leading Canada? Whither are we bound?

Mr. MacNICOL: Up a back street.

Mr. MARTIN: To victory.

Mr. THOMPSON: His first act after the election of 1935 was to hie himself to Washington and, while there, sign a trade agreement which the leader of the former government (Mr. Bennett) had refused to sign because, big business man as he was, he realized that its provisions were detrimental to the best interests of the Canadian people. What has happened since then? Since that trade agreement became effective, our exports to the United States have fallen off every year and our imports have increased by millions of dollars. The former leader of the Conservative party foresaw that.

Last year, 1938, the Prime Minister sent a few civil servants to Washington, and, while there, they negotiated a trade agreement bargaining away Canada's birthright for a mess of pottage. In 1932, when the trade agreements were signed in Ottawa, my former leader called a special meeting of parliament and placed the agreements before it for endorsation prior to their becoming effective. He did not ignore parliament or the elected members of the house. What about later trade agreements? In 1935 the present government signed a trade agreement on the first day of January and called parliament together a few weeks later. Then the government's supporters were jumping up like a lot of jacks-in-the-box voting for something which had been in effect before being presented to parliament. What about the trade agreement which was signed recently? It became effective on January 1, 1939, and parliament was called on January 12. Again members of the House of Commons have been utterly ignored. Where is responsible government going? Where is our much boasted democracy? We have a government that has been governing this country without paying proper respect to the members of this house. We have had orders in council. We have had royal commissions in connection with which many of their Liberal lawyer friends were paid daily fees that they could not possibly earn in months in their own business. Some of them have drawn in fees during the last three years between $30,000 and $40,000 from the public treasury of this country to produce reports similar to the one the hon. member for Témiscouata (Mr. Pouliot) threw on the floor of the house last session stating it was fit only for the waste-paper basket. That is how hundreds of thousands of dollars of the money of the taxpayers of Canada has been spent in the last few years.

What this country needs, and needs in the worst way, is a public conscience. We must arouse a public conscience in the electorate. If a government have been honestly and wisely discharging the duties of their office; if they have been fulfilling the promises made to the people, then I say that they have every right to be returned to office. If they have not, then the people should tell them so with no uncertain sound. We have been prone to form ourselves into political camps. We are too ready to go out and fight for our side as we used to do in school when playing football, lacrosse or some other game. We have been fighting for our own side. Let us awaken in this country a public conscience so that any government, I care not what it may be, will be afraid to go back to a discriminate electorate when they have not faithfully, honestly, and wisely discharged the duties of their office.

I do not wish to speak at any further length at the present time, but I think we should cease harping on the past. I know that the Conservative party has nothing to regret in that regard. That party has had a glorious past in Canada. It has been associated with the development of this country and it has a record that we are proud to bring forward. But let us live for the present and for the future. That is all that matters. Let us like business men face the problems that confront Canada. Let us cease this party strife. No grain is ground by the water that passed by the mill yesterday.

Mr. L. A. MUTCH (Winnipeg South): Mr. Speaker, as a member from Manitoba I was proud of the performance of the hon. member for Brandon (Mr. Matthews) who moved the address in reply to the speech from the throne. After three years of association with him in this house I was prepared for the eloquent speech of the hon. member for Stormont (Mr. Chevrier). This is the first time I have risen in my place this session, and I should like to say to the leader of the Conservative party (Mr. Manion) in this house that as a western Liberal I was delighted over his elevation to his present position.

But it is of more serious things that I would speak. The people of Winnipeg South rejoiced to learn of the visit of their majesties. I can say on behalf of the people of that city that when that visit does occur, their majesties will indeed receive a royal welcome.

Since this house met last, the world has walked in the valley of the great shadow, and it continues. I think every hon. member and every person in the country are delighted over the fact that for the moment at any rate the dark clouds have lifted. But the whole experience has left a bitter taste in the mouths of many of us. We have deep apprehension because we have had a glimpse of ourselves as people. To say the least, this has been disconcerting. The conclusion has been forced upon many of us that after twenty years we have learned nothing. Diplomacy as practised in the world to-day is not something that decent people can view with any degree of complacency. When we view the welter of hypocrisy, timidity, treason and greed, it is poor consolation to remember that a year ago most of what has happened was predictable and was predicted in this house. Then we might have said as was said in the sixteenth century, I think by John Selden:

> Thou little thinkest what a little foolery governs the world.

There is little profit in evaluating the past unless we are to learn from our observations, unless we can hope to use the lessons of the past as a guide in the future. Here at the beginning of a new session we had better realize again that yesterday is gone, that to-morrow never comes, and that to-day waits while we hold post-mortems on yesterday or build fanciful structures on the sands of to-morrow.

I think if an object lesson were needed by members of this house, this new session provides an excellent one in the passing from this chamber of the previous leader of the opposition (Mr. Bennett). We have watched him in recent years fighting a rearguard action inspired by a political philosophy that may never again become invigorated in Canada. He made the assumption of infallibility seem more impressive than truth. He was a product of an age and generation when every Canadian boy knew that if he minded his own business, worked hard and saved his money, he might one day make a million dollars and be Prime Minister of Canada. The last great exponent of that theory having accomplished both, we can now turn the page and gaze on the reality of the opportunities of youth in Canada in 1939.

The last three years have been years of accomplishment. For what has been done we shall have no lack of praise and explanation, of criticism and condemnation. Neither my tongue nor my temper is suited to the task of flattery. Even honest praise, well merited, must for me be tempered by the meaures of opportunity and need. First, have we done that which was crying out to be done? Second, have we done all we might have done? I think it was Rousseau who envisioned men as being born free and equal and everywhere in chains. To-day, of freedom and equality we have still precious little. Unhappily only a few voices are raised to cry out against this condition, and man is everywhere in chains. Even in Canada, where as yet we keep the outward and visible emblems of liberty, the substance is disappearing. We have given too little thought to the preservation of our heritage, forgetting the truism that eternal vigilance is the price of liberty.

I find the most disconcerting evidence of that in the youth of the world. Irreverence, independence, intolerance, is the natural heritage of youth. Do we find it? We do not. I suggest that we find indifference, dependence and docility making great inroads into the spirit of youth. My generation has been called the lost generation. We were those who were young in the war. That was tragedy, but a worse tragedy threatens another generation who may yet be called the legion of the damned. Damned to what and by what? Obviously I do not mean that they are damned morally, spiritually or for the hereafter, but I do suggest that it will take superhuman effort to salvage them economically, at least from a condition of affairs not of their own making. They are a generation in economic chains and their political liberty is, I submit, threatened. They ask us what can be done. For my part I answer—honestly, as youth ought to be answered—in so far as their immediate economic liberation is concerned I do not know what anyone can do that they cannot do for themselves. But I think that there devolves upon us in this house a duty to preserve, for them particularly, the political liberties which they might in their extremity be tempted to forego. I am not a revolutionary. Time was when perhaps I was, but now I would be prepared to build before I would be willing to tear down. I suggest that we have not exhausted the avenues of approach to work. Although I have nothing but praise for the long term policies of the present administration, I suggest that a wasting generation cannot afford to wait.

We have not examined to my satisfaction the possibilities of making industry bear its own burden. It is nonsense to say that they can pay no more. They are bearing the burden and adding to it by the wasteful systems of exploitation of labour which I am sorry to say are current in the country to-day. They are bearing the burden and adding to it. Labour pools do exist in this country; they are increasing at the present time, and this particular evil is getting by unnoticed in the guise of seasonal unemployment.

What do we need? What is our Canadian objective for youth, for mankind? Do we adopt the materialistic Huey Long concept of a radio and a two-car garage for every home, or do we seek some measure of competence, a reasonable hope of security in labour, and a world at peace where men and women work out their destiny with some relationship between ability and reward? When this or any other government is criticized as a do-nothing government, almost always the foremost critics are those who are wailing because the government has done nothing for the critic or the critic's business or the interests that are lying near and dear to the heart of the critic. Most of those who are contributing to the undermining of our democratic order proceed selfishly and without reckoning the cost. Most of those whether they are young or old, who decry governments, criticize politicians or damn the system, are howling because in some way they hoped to live off the taxpayers and have not succeeded. Is it not time that we in Canada faced up to this attitude? Why should governments do anything for the individual? What is the function of government? What are the oft orated rights of youth? Is not this the function of government and the main right of youth, that the government should see that every youth has a chance to exercise his talents within the range of opportunity available? Because too many youths desire to be doctors, should the government poison people to bring them patients; or because there is a desire on the part of too many people to be architects, must we go on forever and ever building government buildings in order to employ them?

We have a youth problem in western Canada. There is nothing new about youth problems, but they are new to us in the west. Three decades ago the youth problem was an eastern problem, easily solved because the frontiers of the west were calling to the second and third and fourth sons of back concession farmers, presenting an opportunity which has departed from this country at the present time. The young men of the east, more than eastern dollars, builded western Canada, and the youth of the west too was quickly absorbed in an ever-expanding economy. To-day there is no new frontier other than the north. Truly as yet the limits of northern development are far from being reached, but it has also little appeal to many of a generation who have been educated to "ask, and it shall be given unto you." I do not blame them. You cannot blame them; but we can and we should blame ourselves, and in my opinion it is time to stop.

Whenever the largesse demanded by the indigent is threatened, the venerable leader of the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation (Mr. Woodsworth) thunders in effect that to those who ask for bread we offer a stone. I ask, cannot discussion ever be honest? The choice is wider than to give bread or a stone. Why not recognize the fact that organized society is being blackjacked into providing for some at least who insist on pointing their lives in one particular direction or else sit tight and let someone else do it. We have a youth problem in western Canada. During the civic elections in Winnipeg I heard a young man say, and I took down his words, "I spent years in preparing myself for a responsible position." He should have prepared himself for a job. Responsibility comes with experience, not with education. Education should speed up the process.

The economy of the west is still agricultural, and no economy can provide for youth which plans to live off it rather than in it. In Winnipeg the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation has been loud in its condemnation of the farm placement scheme. Naturally. That party has thrived by organizing the discontented, the dissatisfied and those ever ready to follow any glimmer that promises to lessen their responsibility for their own existence. That party has no interest in an agricultural society save to exploit the farmer's real or fancied grievances for their own political advantage. That party is the real parasitic, political growth, battening on misery and discontent. Please bear in mind that I deliberately discriminate between my friends of the labour party and their political associates in the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation.

[Mr. Mutch.]

Even in the so-called normal days between 1922 and 1930 young Canadians left Canada at the rate of about fifty thousand a year. Why? Who were they? Hon. members know the answers. Were they farmers, miners, fishermen, lumbermen? In the main, no. Few of them were primary producers. Many of them were educated beyond their opportunity, or so it seemed to them. They were definitely young people who could not, or would not, fit into the Canadian economy and could not live off it. And at that time we did not take care of them if they could not live off it. I am told that in one year every member of a western graduating engineering class went to the United States or to South America.

The last Conservative government while in opposition in these years wailed incessantly because we were losing these exotic blooms from our educational hothouse. In power the same party dammed up every possible avenue of approach to a job in Canada by stifling our trade and so smothering our productive industries. To-day more youths are finding work. But who are they? They are mainly the newest recruits to the ranks of youth. The boy who was too young for a job ten years ago is now refused the same job because he is too old. The generation from twenty-five to thirty-five has to be considered in Canadian economy.

Our problems are not all insoluble. Honest facing of them will pave the way to some solutions. Clearly there is no obligation to provide for employment in any particular job or profession. There is perhaps an obligation to render labour as fluid and mobile as possible. Establishment of the projected dominion government employment agencies will clearly help in that direction. I regret that no mention is made of it in the speech from the throne. If we had it, no excuse would need to be accepted. If we are to accept the theory that every man has a claim on the state for his living, then the state will ultimately have to say how he shall earn it and where. Is that what youth wants? Ultimately perhaps it offers a measure of security, but at the price of liberty. The only countries in the world without a youth problem to-day are those where youth has been enlisted in state organizations or those which are at war. The story of those states is on every front page. Is that the best the world has to offer youth? Mr. Speaker, there are those of us who do not think so. There are those of us who still contend that there is no economic necessity for the degradation of another generation of mankind. I could not help but regret that the leader of the opposition was more anxious to prove conditions were worse than formerly than to suggest a remedy.

Those of us who hold this view ask of our government two things, both of them within their power to do. They are these: First, that they stand four-square for peace, not for the hope of peace, not for peace if the price is not high, but for peace that is absolute. How can they do so? We believe that this and any government can foster peace and security by being well informed and by backing reliable information, by being always on the side, not of sentimentalism, not necessarily of nationalism, but, on the highest of all grounds, of morality, the expression of which is justice. Paradoxically, it is possible that justice can be done only by force, but our government must know; they must not be swayed by hysteria, emotionalism, sentimentalism, or business expediency. When we know, then we can act. When we know, we must not count the cost because, secondly, we believe that the cost of failure to restore confidence and friendly relations in the world is ultimately either a war which will eliminate western civilization as we know it, or alternatively the complete break-down of world trade with the inevitable result of starvation in a world of plenty and an equally inevitable world revolution.

Fear holds the world in its thrall. We ask our government to join in with each and all who will contribute in any degree to the re-establishment of good relations among men.

We are proud that our government has been a party to the recent tripartite trade agreements. The immediate economic results can be left to consequences. Those who believe as I do are confident that the results will be good.

But, sir, some of us are more impressed with the political significance of the trade agreements. We see the dawn of a realization that no nation can live to itself alone. We see the faces of the two greatest creditor nations turned to the sunlight of freer trade and better relations with the world. We rejoice that the ramparts of the Ottawa agreements have been breached. We hope that they may crumble to the inglorious dust whence they came. Born of fear, they throve to engender hate. For the mirage of momentary advantage we conspired with our commonwealth associates to encourage the rabid nationalistic orgy which is the greatest threat to the world.

We ask our government not to be too modest. Let them proclaim to all who will hear that we are not prepared to let a generation of Canadians perish because we must wait until mightier powers show us the way to renewed willingness to do business.

The Prime Minister's grandfather had a vision of a great opportunity and a great duty. The man was matched with the hour. How often in the years of his distinguished service to his country must my leader have hoped for this opportunity to match his talents with the nation's need. He is a man of peace. He is a man whose imagination and sympathy have kept him close to the realities of human experience. He is a man of deep conviction and the courage to fight when only a fight can meet the emergency.

Here, Mr. Speaker, is the emergency. Throughout the world all that he and we have held most dear is threatened. All around us a generation of Canadians are threatened with a living death. To-day, now, is the hour to strike! The walls of intolerance that have cramped the world have been breached—behind him sits a majority unparalleled in history. Around him sit men, good company in any fight—and, sir, there is time left. Time enough, to say as Holland has said for generations: Come, let us reason together, let us trade together. Time to say again to those fearful nations of the world, let us help you to help us. We have made a grand beginning; we dare not falter now.

Two thousand millions of people in the world need bread, motor cars, machinery, lumber and iron, paper, pulp, everything that we have to sell. Two thousand millions of people await only some way to pay in order to buy all those commodities which go to make possible the higher standards of living which man to-day in every corner of the world desires. Did I say, "only"? Alas, that is but half true—other restrictions do exist, but we can do more to break down the barriers. Many of our business men lack the imagination to visualize their opportunity. Their employees tremble for fear of losing a precarious living—failing to to see the possibilities of expansion. Motor car manufacturers, for example, shudder lest they lose a part of a two or three million market and fail to see the possibilities of a seventy million market. They try to sell us motor cars on the basis of the number of eggs they eat, or apples, or fish, while the parent companies, located in the United States where they have no competition, spend their advertising dollars trying to persuade United States consumers to let down the bars against foreign imports, realizing full well that, if they do, more United States cars will be exported.

Some misguided farmers turn to a plea for permanent price protection when they should be stiffening the determination of our government to trade our way into the markets of the world.

Professional calamity howlers urge restricted production in a world that is a potential consumer of the maximum of production. Reduce acreage, bonus acreage, combine, restrict; their tongues and pens create a new Babel.

Professional agitators yelp for the redivision of wealth, for its restriction, for social dividends, for anything and everything except the opportunity to make wealth do its real job in the bettering of the living conditions of the world.

Our people realize that we have not come to the end of the road. The Canadian public will not forever be content to be cribbed, cabined and confined by a few chiselers with a good thing, by the fear of our industrialists or their employees or the lack of courage of legislative bodies.

Canadians cannot bring about the economic millennium, but we can have the courage to make a start—this government has done so. Is it too much to hope that we shall seize every opportunity, and make new ones, to go farther along the road to the economic salvation of ourselves and the world?

Dare we falter before the often expressed fear that by trading freely we may hurt our own pampered industries? "Oh, ye of little faith!" I, for one, am confident that Canadian brains and ingenuity, Canadian capital and Canadian labour can compete and hold their own. I believe they can. But, sir, if they cannot, let us count the cost. Must we contribute to the destruction of a generation of Canadian youth to protect such an industry, as would, by its failure, admit its incompetence and uneconomic establishment? The future is not devoid of hope. In seventy years England grew from seventeen millions to forty-six millions. We are ten millions and more. We have raw materials, power, geographic advantage, brains and brawn. Capital can be enticed from cover to promote the projects of a nation that is on the march, that knows where it is going.

Leadership is essential. Since business does not give it, parliament must. Courage is needed—the history of Canada is the story of undaunted courage. Faith is needed; for faith is the bed rock of confidence. We have all faltered in these last ten years. We need a touch of evangelical fervour in our attitude toward our problems.

We Canadians need to consider our political and social creed. May I give you mine? I believe in Canada, in her vast resources, and in the courage and ability of her sons and daughters. I believe in my neighbours, in the duty I owe them, and in the brotherhood of man. I believe that the peoples of the world have a right to a decent livelihood, and that this is possible with advantage to all. I believe that "fair exchange is no robbery," and that in peace and better trade relations lies the economic salvation of the world.

To this end we have made progress. But I come again to the need of the moment. May I say that in this I am motivated by a sincere desire to see immediate succour for those young people for whom I plead. For myself I can wait for the long pull; or, if I cannot, the great constituency which I represent has come through greater adversity than my departure from the scene would entail. At this moment the greatest reclamation problem in Canada is a human one, and its slogan and watchword is, Save our sons and daughters. The speech from the throne recognizes the need and makes it known that something more is to be done. May I reiterate what I have said every session since I came to this house, that the problem has become—indeed to my mind it always was—a federal one. I am not critical of proposals which have not yet been explained, but I warn the house that the municipalities where the need is greatest are broke. Let this government assume full responsibility for employable unemployed on aid; then perhaps with this government's cooperation the municipalities may be able to cope with the problem of those employable unemployed not on aid, among them our youth. I am not fool enough to imagine that any government can by legislative act or series of acts end unemployment. I do not believe that our banks or financial system are either the bulwark or the bugaboo of our existence. We have put on money the emphasis that we should have put on morality; we examine coinage when we should probe conscience.

I would not fool around with the British North America Act for five minutes. In time of war governments assume extraordinary powers. Well, this is a struggle for survival. What if it beats a ministry, if it saves a generation? I have boasted that I know of no hon. member in this house who does not wrestle with all the earnestness and ability at his command to find a way out for our people. The sharpest-tongued partisan in this house would wear the same uniform as the rest of us to defend our homes. Are our homes more important than the flesh and blood within them? Can we not either abolish or ignore these restrictions which hamstring the honest desire of every member, and get on with the job that has to be done? Then, if it is still necessary, we can let the lawyers argue the legality afterwards. If we can do that, then perhaps Canada-loving, Canada-serving legislators, federal, provincial and municipal, may be able to effect an approach to the settlement of the problems of our people, which is the honest desire of every hon. member of this house.

Mr. GORDON GRAYDON (Peel): At the outset of my remarks to-night I should like to pay a very well deserved tribute to the mover and the seconder of the address in reply to the speech from the throne. I was particularly taken with the splendid way in which the task assigned to these hon. members was discharged. The mover of the address (Mr. Matthews), a new man in the house, received the kind of welcome that this house is accustomed so generously to give. The seconder of the address (Mr. Chevrier), whom I have the privilege and honour of calling a very close friend, impressed, I think, every hon. member present not only with his sincerity and earnestness but also with the great facility with which he spoke the two languages in his address. Such men in public life do much to promote national unity in its widest and broadest sense. Therefore I congratulate both these hon. members.

I should also like to echo the widespread and general feeling of keen appreciation and eager expectancy so evident throughout the dominion in regard to the coming visit of Their Majesties the King and Queen. During the course of this debate many allusions have been made to that visit. The house may well spend considerable time in emphasizing the importance to Canada of the visit of these prominent personalities in world affairs. In these days of international unrest, and sometimes, perhaps, internal unrest, it is a very fine thing for Canada to experience the visit of our monarch and his consort. I am sure that throughout Canada all citizens will be vying with one another in an earnest and sincere effort to give to the king and queen one of the most spontaneous and affectionate welcomes that any monarch or ruler has ever received in the history of the world. I look for nothing less than that as far as the Dominion of Canada is concerned.

Also I want to congratulate the committee in charge of arrangements. These arrangements may not always meet with the approval of every hon. member, but with a fine regard for the king's wishes the itinerary does provide that their majesties pass through the county of Peel. I want to thank the committee for the privilege and honour bestowed upon our county in arranging that their majesties pass through that admittedly attractive part of this dominion.

It was appropriate that the speech from the throne should refer to the disturbed international situation. But it omitted to refer to the determined feeling which existed during that September crisis, and which was so prominently exhibited throughout the whole dominion; I refer to that feeling of loyalty and patriotism to the British Empire. I should like to have seen in the speech from the throne some reference made to the fact stated by the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) just last evening, that when Great Britain is at war Canada also is at war. I was glad to hear him say that. If we are bold enough to say that ordinarily in this country, surely it is not too much to ask this government to include at this time a paragraph to that effect in the speech from the throne.

Then we have in the speech from the throne reference to a new defence purchasing board. Throughout the dominion, so far as I have been able to discover, there is not much feeling in favour of either commissions or boards. But if this board should be a strictly non-partisan and non-political organization, perhaps it will not meet with so much criticism. But here again this government is delegating its administrative duties to another commission. Whether you call it a board or a commission, it is still the same type of organization against which many people in the dominion to-day rebel strongly. I am hoping that this board shall not be just another spending body, or as expensive as other commissions which have preceded it, because a great many people in Canada, a majority of them I think, to-day are searching for means to reduce the cost of government and the burden of taxation generally.

In the speech from the throne much stress is laid upon the question of trade agreements. That is only natural. At the commencement of my remarks in regard to trade agreements may I say that I should like to see matters such as this treated in this House of Commons with a fine balance of common sense and some idea of the proportion of things. In dealing with such questions—and I know there must have been sins committed on all sides of the house from time to time in connection with matters of this kind—let us not be guilty of over-emphasis in offering criticism with respect to agreements of this kind which have not been long in operation, and on the other hand let us not make extravagant and reckless claims in regard to what the agreements will do. Surely it must be apparent to most hon. members, as it must be to the man on the street and the man on the farm, that when someone says these agreements are going to be great factors in international peace for the future, there is quite a dash of colour added. I would not for a moment suggest that agreements such as these may not have some bearing on questions such as peace, but so far as we in Canada are concerned, we as members have a trust and this government has a trust for the Canadian people. We must never lose sight of the fact that we are trustees for the people of this country, and before this government loses itself in a cloud of international understanding it must be sure that everything is well on the ground below. To me, Mr. Speaker, that seems to be one of the cardinal principles on which we must proceed to deal with the pros and cons of an agreement such as this. I do not believe Great Britain would ask, let alone permit, this dominion to jeopardize its interests in behalf of anything so fantastic as the suggestion that has come from some quarters that this agreement means the binding together of three great portions of the Anglo-Saxon world.

It is not difficult, of course, to recall the glowing hopes which were expressed some three years ago. I remember so well the supporters of the government suggesting that the agreement of 1936 was going to do—what? Well, it was to be a blow at economic nationalism; it was to encourage greater international understanding; it was to be a great benefit to agriculture, to business and to industry in general. Let us hurriedly examine what has happened with regard to the lesson in international understanding which the agreement of 1936 was supposed to teach. I would be the last one in this chamber to suggest that this agreement was the cause of what happened; but when an hon. member suggests in this house that the agreement of 1936 was to be a great step towards a broader international understanding and a way to peace, perhaps I may be excused for very humbly and quietly pointing out that since that agreement went into effect, in 1936, there has been scarcely a moment when the tension has not become greater, until we had the crisis of September last when an armed holocaust almost resulted. I give that illustration, Mr. Speaker, not with any desire to discredit the agreement as far as it went at that time, but merely to point out the fallacies under which we may labour when we attempt to advance extravagant and reckless claims for agreements which have been scarcely entered into.

Let us look at this new agreement. May we not perhaps also remove a little of the colour from some of the statements we have heard in this house with regard to its part in international affairs? As yet I have not been able to come to the conclusion that it is going to be the means of ridding the world of the trouble with which it is confronted. I think most historians and students of foreign affairs will agree that our troubles in this world have deeper roots than the mere question of changing some of the items in the tariff schedules of the Dominion of Canada.

Let us look at the benefits which came from the 1936 agreement, so far as our people were concerned, leaving aside for the moment the lesson in international understanding to which I have just referred. Before that agreement came into operation, the balance of trade between the two countries was in favour of Canada. I am sure there will be plenty of hon. members who will say that the balance of trade is a worn-out theory; but in spite of that I should like to place upon Hansard the manner in which the trade balance was reversed, for the benefit of those who still cling to the theory that perhaps, after all, there is something in the balance of trade as far as a country is concerned. Canada, a country of eleven million people, bought from the United States last year goods to the value of $487,000,000. During the same period we sold to that country goods to the value of only $423,000,000, leaving an adverse balance of trade amounting to $64,000,000. Before the agreements were entered into, as I said before, we had a balance of trade in our favour in our trading relations with the republic to the south.

Let us consider fresh fruits and vegetables, in which I am particularly interested. In 1935, before the agreement went into operation, we imported approximately $13,000,000 worth of fresh fruits and vegetables. In 1938, after the agreement had been in operation for three years, we imported no less than $17,500,000 worth, or an increase of 35 per cent. Someone may ask, "Well, how did the agreement work"? I would not suggest that any public speaker supporting that agreement should go into any area where these fresh fruits and vegetables are produced; I am doubtful as to the welcome he might receive from some of those people.

But we must not confine ourselves entirely to that particular branch of agriculture in this country. Taking the figures for 1935 and 1938, covering the periods both before and after the 1936 agreement, I find that there was some little appreciation in the price of cattle. On the other hand, the general price level of field crops and dairy products dropped to extremely low levels in the interval. In other words, the glowing and extravagant claims made for the old agreement were not, in all instances, substantiated by the results. Of course it must have helped some lines of business, but undoubtedly it also harmed others. So I think it would be a bold man indeed who would rise in this chamber to-night and say that the old agreement resulted in any overwhelming business recovery in the Dominion of Canada.

This subject of agriculture is very near to me, and perhaps hon. gentlemen will excuse the constant references to this question by one who represents a rural area, as I do. After all, however, there is something about the condition of agriculture that some people who come from urban sections seem to fail to appreciate. I was disappointed, yes, I was discouraged to find that the speech from the throne contains nothing that looks like a forthright, vigorous or aggressive plan for the rehabilitation of agriculture in Canada. It has been said many times that national agriculture in this dominion provides the best barometer of business conditions. I agree with that statement, and would couple with agriculture the condition of the working man. Those of us who represent constituencies where eastern agriculture is carried on at its best are deeply concerned. May I point out that no one is raising his voice in regard to the reasonable alleviation of the distressed condition of western agriculture. We realize that, after all, we cannot think in Canada simply as "I"; we must think as "we," because when we speak of one part of Canada we think of it all. May I point out, however, that this year eastern agriculture has experienced great hardships and low price levels, and many farmers in eastern Canada feel that perhaps the eastern end of agriculture ought to have some measure of rehabilitation too.

Last year I listened to an eloquent exposition of agriculture delivered by the hon. member for Portage la Prairie (Mr. Leader) whom I see in his seat to-night. He pleaded with the government for assistance in promoting and arranging a market in the United Kingdom for Canadian chilled beef. There are many practical farmers in Canada who feel that in England we have a market of consumers, a great market where there is a heavy demand for high grade products of agriculture. One cannot wonder when he hears the farming population of Canada crying out for real opportunities to sell beef and bacon in the British isles. I should like to see the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) begin to-night on a program of rehabilitation, so far as agriculture is concerned, and provide for the farmers of Canada a market in Great Britain for bacon and chilled beef. It always seems to me—and perhaps I am wrong in my premise—that we lay too much stress upon the market in the United States. We lay stress upon a market which is not alone a consumer's market but a market which has close to it competitive farmer producers who compete every day with our products sent in. On the other hand in the great British market that is not so to the same extent. The government is losing sight of the principles and policies which will help the farming population of Canada, and should make some aggressive and vigorous move to capture the market for bacon and beef in the British isles as quickly as it can be done.

One hears a great deal of talk about agriculture being the backbone of the country. I do not mind so much hearing a farmer make that statement, but I do not like to hear anyone who has not come from a farm or who does not understand farming, make it. Every member of the house must realize that the farmer—and I speak more particularly of the eastern farmer with whose conditions I am more familiar—is to-day caught between low prices and high overhead. I believe most practical farmers realize that this is one of the greatest problems they face. A great basic industry such as farming cannot survive with the increasing overhead which seems to come with every improvement in farm machinery and farm conveniences, when prices are not proportionately higher than they were when general overhead was much lower.

The prosperity of the farmer is reflected, in good times or bad, upon every class of person in Canada. It is the nation's business barometer; let us make no mistake about that. During the discussion of the trade agreements we shall hear about the prospective benefits which will accrue to the farmers, particularly in connection with cattle and milk. I do not wish in any way to detract from the glowing picture which has been painted. I should not like to spoil a good picture, even one painted by a Liberal government. On the other hand, with great respect I should like to point out that with relation to cattle weighing over 700 pounds the duty has been cut one-half cent per pound. But our farmers are still faced with a quota which prevents them from shipping into the United States and taking advantage of the entire market, so far as the sale of their cattle is concerned. I have made some calculations—I do not know whether they are correct—but they seem to indicate that even under the new agreement we can ship only one and one-quarter per cent of the total number of cattle slaughtered in the United States in previous years. That is not very great consideration, to say the least. It seems to me the United States farmers have taken due precautions to see to it that they are not going to meet with very great competition in that regard. Then, the agreement restricts the entry of cattle to the extent of 60,000 for every quarter year, so that when the market is good over there in any particular season we are cut down to that 60,000, again protecting the United States farmer. Let us make a simple computation. If every twelve of our farm population were to pool their farm stock in any single year for export to the United States, they would be able to ship only one head of cattle weighing over 700 pounds. If we figure it out on another basis, actually only one in every twenty-six of our total cattle population in Canada comes within the restricted quota.

Then I ask hon. members to look at the situation with respect to milk. The rate of duty has been reduced on milk entering the United States to the extent only of a yearly quota of three million gallons. That would seem to be quite a bit of milk. However, I looked up the figures, and I found that three million gallons means only one gallon in every 570 produced every year in Canada, or four gallons for every farm in the dominion. These figures may sound fantastic, but may I point out that the milk production in the county of Peel, which I have the honour to represent, is no less than nine million gallons per year. We produce in that county three times as much as the government permits for the whole of Canada under the quota. I repeat that in that one county we produce three times as much milk as under the new agreement there may enter the United States under the lower tariff rate. I do not wish to criticize the government unduly, but I must say that they will have to pardon me if I say that this is not likely to revolutionize agriculture to say the least, and is not likely to put our dairy farmers and cattle breeders in the higher income tax brackets for the year 1939.

May I draw the attention of hon. members to one further important matter. In the town of Brampton, which is in my constituency, there are cut-flower producers, about whom I have spoken many times in the house. We have been affected in that connection by a reduction of fifteen per cent in the duty on cut flowers coming into Canada. I must admit that a similar concession has been granted on the product entering the United States, but we must remember that climatic conditions in the two countries are entirely different. The cost of production in one country cannot be compared with the cost in the other. The result is that all we can do is to hope that this agreement will not work any serious hardship. A good many workmen in the cut-flower industry are not enjoying very prosperous times to-day, and I am hoping that this agreement will not work to their disadvantage.

There is one more injustice of which I should like the government to take cognizance. A sales tax of eight per cent is imposed on cut-flower sales, although no sales tax is imposed on the sale of ordinary agricultural commodities. The cut-flower industry must face competition from outside sources and from many growers who do not have to pay the sales tax, and I think this item might well be the subject of exemption when the next budget is brought down.

I am interested also in the boot and shoe business. In one of the towns in my riding great difficulty has been experienced because of "short time" schedules in this industry. While it is perhaps too early to forecast what will be the result of this trade agreement, I cannot see where it will help the men and women working in the shoe industry to take away their protection to the extent of even five per cent on goods entering from the United States, plus the elimination of the three per cent excise tax.

A change has been made in the preference granted on apples and other fruits entering the British market from Canada. I was hoping against hope that the British preference would not be changed by this agreement. We have built up a great export market for apples and other fruits, and since the empire agreements came into force there has been an increase in the prosperity of our fruit producers generally. But now part of the protection is being taken away from our fruit growers. The preference on the British market is to be reduced, and it is possible that as time goes on the United States producer will enter that market to the detriment of our growers. I also want to make as vigorous a protest as I can on behalf of the vegetable growers. Before 1936 the general tariff protection offered to these men amounted to thirty per cent. This has now been reduced to ten per cent under the general tariff, with further restrictions in connection with dumping duties.

I am speaking on behalf of these hard working men who are able to obtain only a small return from their labours in the vegetable industry. If there is going to be a progressive drop in the tariff by various agreements that this government may enter into, there will be eventually little left of this great industry. While I am discussing this matter I would suggest to the Minister of Agriculture that he pay some attention to the recommendation I made last year to provide in his estimates for the furnishing of a proper statistical set-up in connection with fruits and vegetables. The vegetable growers of this country feel that they are penalized because of lack of statistical information. I believe the minister would be well advised to take this into consideration.

I want to make reference to the omission from the speech from the throne of any really vigorous policy with respect to the working man and his family. I do not make any apology for being the spokesman for the working man in the riding which I represent. One of the best lubricators of the machinery of business is the wage envelope of the working man who spends his money freely on the necessities of life. He provides business with the greatest impetus that it can possibly have. This government might well be criticized for not promoting any scheme to help the working man.

Let me now consider unemployment insurance. What a hackneyed word that has become throughout Canada. Nineteen years ago a great Liberal convention met in the city of Ottawa. That was the convention which elected the present Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) as leader of the Liberal party. That convention solemnly nailed in the platform of the Liberal party the plank of unemployment insurance. Last night the Prime Minister made an eloquent address. He said that we are coming closer to unemployment insurance legislation. The time to have introduced that legislation was during the nine years from 1921 to 1930 when Liberalism was in power and when this country had a share of world prosperity. At that time there was more in the pay envelopes of the working man. We had not entered the depression, and we did not have the spending on public affairs that we have to-day. That was when the Liberal government should have brought in unemployment insurance legislation.

But it was left for the Conservative party to enact in 1935 the only measure of importance with respect to unemployment insurance that we have had since the days of confederation. That legislation was sent to the courts where it became a legislative wreck. To-night I heard a Liberal member, the hon. member for Winnipeg South (Mr. Mutch), state that he believed that policy of putting through unemployment insurance was one which should be pursued to-day, even by this government. The Conservative government answered when urgency and emergency called, and I think their legislation will always stand as a monument to their efforts to solve the problems of the working man. If this government will bring in a workable scheme of unemployment insurance, I am sure they will have the support of every hon. member and of every man and woman in the Dominion of Canada. All they have to do is to enact the legislation and see that that happy family of provinces which was spoken of before, is a reality. There should be some real measure of assistance for the working man of the dominion.

The hopes of the working man seem to be raised every year by some mention of unemployment insurance in the speech from the throne, but nothing is ever done. No longer than two weeks ago a working man said to me, "Will there be unemployment insurance after this year?" I said, "I think there will be, because there will be a Conservative government to give it to you the same as they did in 1935." He said, "I hope your party gives us a little more leadership and shows a little more aggressiveness than this government has done, because we do not want any more sit-down strikes in Ottawa."

Not one thing was said in the speech from the throne with regard to the relief of real estate holders in the Dominion of Canada from the burden of taxation. It has been said at mayors' conventions; it has been stated from municipal platforms all across the dominion, that there is a need of easing the heavy burden of taxation on real estate. Along with the great majority of Canadians I believe that we must provide some policy to coax and persuade private capital once more to get into business. Governments are into business. They are into business sometimes too far, I believe. If we can reduce our taxes, cut down our overhead, show the people that we mean business in parliament instead of delays and promises, we shall once more get private capital into circulation in our business in this country, and the wheels of industry will turn and prosperity will be with us once more. I am in favour of a drastic reduction in governmental overhead throughout this country. Perhaps I need do no more than mention that, because the need for a pay-as-you-go policy in the dominion, as pointed out only a few moments ago by the hon. member for Lanark (Mr. Thompson), is one of our crying needs. The county I represent is a representative county of Ontario, and in the last eight years we have not only paid as we have gone in the county of Peel, but reduced our debenture indebtedness by sixty per cent. Is it too much to ask the government of Canada to do what municipalities are already doing. This parliament should be giving a lead; the municipalities should be following only; the cart has gone before the horse much too long.

In closing, I wish to revert to a matter which was referred to yesterday. Throughout the country confidence in the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation has not been strengthened in recent times. One hears criticisms all over the land with regard to the control exercised over radio broadcasting in general. The idea of having to pay a radio licence fee of $2.50 still rankles in the minds of most people. May I offer a friendly piece of advice to the government of the day; they will be surprised at the extent to which public opinion in this dominion is rebelling against the payment of any kind of radio licence fee. That is one matter which ought to receive the careful and immediate attention of the Minister of Transport (Mr. Howe) and the government as a whole. If we are to have some kind of radio control, it must be such as will have the confidence of the people generally, and it should not be associated in the minds of everyone with what they regard as an annoying nuisance tax.

In this country we have talked a good deal about national unity. Perhaps we have not reached the point of achieving what we should like to do in that direction, but if we are to have national unity it must be predicated upon aggressive and vigorous leadership in the dominion House of Commons. Instead of blaming all the provinces of the dominion for our troubles, let us analyze our own short-comings as a national legislative body and government. Let us provide in this country leadership which will lead, not merely compromise and delay, leadership which will compel every corner of Canada to think in terms of the nation as a whole. Our responsibility for the reconfederating of Canada has become greater in these days when jealous and eager foreign eyes are cast upon us. Let us measure up to the job we have before us and provide efficiency in government, virile and progressive leadership in administration, and a strong national feeling of strength and unity before it becomes too late. That, in my opinion, is one of our tasks in parliament to-day.

[Mr. Graydon.]

On motion of Mr. Coldwell the debate was adjourned.

At eleven o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

Wednesday, January 18, 1939

The house met at three o'clock.

PENSION ACT

ABOLITION OF PENSION APPEAL COURT AND EXTENSION OF TIME FOR PENSION APPLICATIONS

Hon. C. G. POWER (Minister of Pensions and National Health) moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 6, to amend the Pension Act.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Explain.

Mr. POWER: Under this bill it is proposed to amend the Pension Act to provide for the abolition of the pension appeal court and to set up, in lieu of both the court and the quorums, appeal boards of the commission, each consisting of three members wherein the applicant's right of appeal and personal appearance will be preserved.

The volume of business coming before the appeal court has been steadily decreasing and will continue to decrease. It is considered that the abolition of the court as at present constituted will accelerate the final settlement of applications. It is not proposed to provide for the reopening of any applications heretofore disposed by the court, other than to the extent now existing in the legislation, whereby in special circumstances leave to renew an application may be granted.

With reference to those who saw service in France, there is at present a dead-line on the date of their application for pension, which is set at January 1, 1940. This amendment proposes to extend the dead-line to January 1, 1942. The remaining sections of the bill provide for amendments to methods of procedure consequential upon the disappearance of the court.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

INTERNATIONAL FORWARDING COMPANY

CARRYING OF UNITED STATES GOODS IN BOND BY TRUCK OVER ONTARIO HIGHWAYS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. NORMAN J. M. LOCKHART (Lincoln): Pursuant to a brief intimation I gave to the Minister of National Revenue I desire to ask him a question. It has come to my attention within the last two or three days that alarm is prevalent in the Niagara peninsula with reference to a supposed application, which was referred to in this house last year, of the International Forwarding Company in regard to the carrying of bonded freight. Has there been an application or any indication of an application to the minister with respect to the carrying of United States goods in bond by the International Forwarding Company over Ontario highways? If such an application has been received, would the minister indicate the attitude of the government in this connection?

Hon. J. L. ILSLEY (Minister of National Revenue): No application has been made to the Minister of National Revenue, and I have had no notice of any such application. I may say however that the Minister of National Revenue has no discretion in the matter as the law now stands, and possibly those desiring to secure the legalization of the trucking of goods in bond would not come in the first instance to myself; perhaps they would proceed in some other way, as by private bill. However I have no knowledge of it.

Mr. LOCKHART: May I then ask the minister to whom in his opinion that authority would go?

HON. C. G. POWER

BIRTHDAY GREETINGS TO THE MINISTER OF PENSIONS AND NATIONAL HEALTH

On the orders of the day:

Hon. R. J. MANION (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I desire to ask the government a question, but before doing so may I say that I noticed the hearty applause which greeted the Minister of Pensions and National Health (Mr. Power) when he entered the chamber, and someone whispered that to-day is my hon. friend's birthday. Since the minister is an old friend of mine, and since I may not have a chance to do so later in the day, I should like to offer to him my congratulations and the congratulations of those on this side of the house. The minister is still young enough to feel that congratulations rather than commiserations are in order on his birthday. May I add that I hope he may decorate either this or the other chamber for many long years to come. I am not sure that I would not prefer to have him go to the other chamber, though I cannot speak with certainty on that, because he might do us more damage there than he can do here.

Hon. C. G. POWER (Minister of Pensions and National Health): May I thank my hon. friend the leader of the opposition (Mr. Manion) for his kindness and courtesy in extending his best wishes and those of his party on this occasion. I do not suppose I have reached an age when I can afford or would like to enter into any philosophical dissertation as to the experiences, good and bad, which I have had in the twenty-five years during which I have been a member of this house, but there is one thing I should like to point out, and it has been well exemplified to-day. It is this: Whatever else the house may be, it is tolerant, as has been indicated by the remarks of my hon. friend and the applause, coming from all sides of the house, which greeted them.

DOMINION ELECTIONS

RETURNING OFFICERS AND ENUMERATORS—METHOD OF APPOINTMENT

On the orders of the day:

Hon. R. J. MANION (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, perhaps I should have given notice of this question, but I assure the government that my failure to do so was not due to any bad faith. I remember that until 1930 it was the custom for the government of the day to appoint returning officers. In 1934 our government passed legislation dividing the duties of the returning officer and providing for the appointment of a returning officer and a registrar of electors. The appointment of the returning officer was made in the same way as before; that is, if I remember correctly, the government appointed him. The registrar of electors, who had the duty of drawing up the electoral lists, was appointed by Colonel Thompson. These men were appointed on the basis of forty-five per cent from our side of the house, though we were very much in the majority, forty-five per cent from the Liberal side, and I think the remaining ten per cent from the third, fourth, fifth and sixth parties.

I desire to ask if it is true that now the returning officers have been given once more the work of not only providing the machinery for carrying out the election but also the work of drawing up the electoral lists. That has been represented to me in many letters I have received. The government need not answer until to-morrow, if they so desire, but I should like to know if it is true that the returning officers are now being appointed on a direct patronage basis, in all constituencies. That is the charge which is being made to me, and I should be glad to have any comment from the minister who is in charge of that department.

Hon. C. G. POWER (Minister of Pensions and National Health): With respect to this question, which is perhaps somewhat more controversial than the matter of a birthday, I believe, speaking from memory that prior to 1930 there never was any question at all as to who should appoint the returning officers. The government of the day, through the Secretary of State, appointed the returning officers as they pleased, and invariably those officers were supporters of the party in power. In 1928 and again in 1930 I was chairman of a committee of this house which brought in legislation which had not been heard of prior to that time. First, it was provided that in the appointment of enumerators for the making of electoral lists there should be a representative from each of two parties for each polling division. Second, it provided that the returning officer should be chosen not by a political officer, such as the Secretary of State, but by the chief electoral officer.

In 1930 the chief electoral officer, in the pursuance of his duty, went from one end of the country to the other. It is true that he did not, in all instances, please the members sitting on the opposite side of the house at that time; but to a very large extent either the returning officers were chosen outside of politics, at the suggestion of the opposition organization or the opposition member, or in other instances the returning officer was a public official, a prothonotary, a clerk of the court or someone who had actually withdrawn from active political controversy. That was what occurred in 1930.

In 1934 the government of which my hon. friend was a member introduced into the house two pieces of legislation, one the Franchise Act and the other the Dominion Elections Act. Under the Franchise Act it was provided that there should be registrars whose duty it was to see to the making up of the electoral lists. By a resolution of this house, which was consented to by all parties, Colonel John Thompson was appointed dominion franchise officer; that is to say, he became the person whose duty it was to choose the registrars for making up the lists. He took his duties seriously and performed them in a non-partisan manner; and, as my hon. friend has pointed out, he appointed a very fair proportion of the registrars from the different political groups. At the moment I cannot say whether it was forty-five per cent or fifty per cent or ten per cent from any group; but in any case I think the appointments were made, so far as the opposition groups were concerned, in a way that gave satisfaction to them.

In 1934, however, when the Dominion Elections Act was brought in, over the protests of the then opposition the government took away from the chief electoral officer the power of appointing the returning officers, and placed it back in the hands of the Secretary of State.

Mr. CAHAN: In the hands of the governor in council, if you please.

Mr. POWER: Very well. In any event, the act passed at the last session of parliament, so far as the appointment of returning officers is concerned, was an exact reproduction, word for word, of the act passed when my hon. friend's party was in power in 1934, and that is the situation at the present time. The returning officers are named in exactly the same way as was provided by the legislation passed in 1934.

Mr. MANION: I do not suppose it is proper to carry on anything in the nature of a debate on this matter, and I am not attempting to do so; but is it not true that in 1934, while the returning officer was appointed by the government of the day, as my hon. friend says, the registrar of electors was still left to be appointed by Colonel Thompson? And is it not true that now these registrars of electors have been eliminated?

Mr. POWER: The Franchise Act is being eliminated, and there are no longer any registrars. I might add what I forgot to say previously, that the provision introduced by the committee of which I was chairman in 1930, whereby the actual compiling of the lists was to be carried out by enumerators, remains; and from each of the political parties, or at least from two of the political parties, there are enumerators who go together to make up the lists.

Mr. STEWART: That is in urban districts only.

Mr. POWER: Yes.

Mr. HEAPS: Can the minister inform the house whether new appointments are to be made on a purely partisan basis, the same basis on which they were made previously, namely forty-five per cent, forty-five per cent and ten per cent?

Mr. POWER: The only time there was any basis other than the partisan one was under the elections acts of 1929 and 1930. There were committees in both those years, and the result was the bringing in of one general elections act, known as the Dominion Elections Act, 1930. Under that act, which is the only time in my recollection the returning officers were appointed in what might be described as a non-partisan manner, the chief electoral officer had the right to choose them. However, last year the provisions with respect to returning officers were copied from the act passed in 1934.

Mr. CAHAN: And the minister might add that the registrars are not appointed by the chief returning officer, because registrars and deputy returning officers are the same individuals. Further, I understand, they should be appointed by the governor in council and their names published by the twenty-first day of this month.

Mr. POWER: As a matter of fact this whole matter was fully debated last year—

Mr. CAHAN: Quite so.

Mr. POWER:—when the elections act was discussed. I do not believe we want to debate it now; it was fully debated at that time. There is no element of surprise about it.

Mr. POULIOT: What may be the reason for complaint when they are all honest men?

WAR MUNITIONS AND MATERIALS

SHIPMENTS OF CANADIAN AEROPLANES TO TURKEY, ALLEGEDLY DELIVERED IN SPAIN

On the orders of the day:

Mr. T. C. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): Mr. Speaker, would the Minister of National Revenue (Mr. Ilsley) care to make a statement respecting the press report from Ankara, Turkey, to the effect that military planes manufactured in Canada, supposedly for the Turkish government, found their way into the hands of Spanish insurgents. Would the minister investigate the matter and assure the house that if the persons responsible for the alleged forgery are in the country, there will be prosecutions?

Hon. J. L. ILSLEY (Minister of National Revenue): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member was good enough to give notice of the question, and I am prepared to make a brief statement regarding the planes to which I believe he has reference.

Applications were made by a Canadian manufacturer for permits to export thirty-four aeroplanes to the Turkish government. These permits were issued by the Department of National Revenue in due course, the department having no discretion under the law to refuse permits to export to Turkey. Representations contained in the applications were checked by the officers of the department, who examined and found in order all documents relating to the purchase of the planes.

Subsequently, upon request from the United States government for information concerning these shipments, all the documents pertaining to the order and the shipments were rechecked by the departmental officials and found to be in order, and it was verified that the aeroplanes and parts had been loaded on the ships for export from Canada in accordance with the terms of the permits, and that the bills of lading were properly drawn to cover shipment to Turkey. The United States government was interested in the movements of parts of these planes exported by the United States to Canada.

The Turkish government later stated that it did not authorize the placing of the order for these planes. It would appear that the planes reached Spain, a country shipments to which are prohibited by order in council, not nationalist Spain as indicated in the question, but republican Spain. There is, however, no evidence before the department to indicate that the exporter acted in other than good faith in applying for permits for export to Turkey.

Inquiries have been made in Canada and the results do not indicate that any person or company in Canada was responsible for any of the alleged forgeries. The government has asked the government of the United Kingdom to make inquiries of the Turkish government as to the outcome of an official inquiry which it is understood the latter is conducting. When this information is received I shall be glad to make a further statement.

CONTINUATION OF DEBATE ON ADDRESS IN REPLY

The house resumed from Tuesday, January 17, consideration of the motion of Mr. J. E. Matthews for an address to His Excellency the Governor General in reply to his speech at the opening of the session, and the proposed amendment thereto of Mr. Manion, and the amendment to the amendment of Mr. Woodsworth.

Mr. M. J. COLDWELL (Rosetown-Biggar): Mr. Speaker, first of all I should like to join with other hon. members who have already spoken in congratulating the mover (Mr. Matthews) and the seconder (Mr. Chevrier) of the address in reply to the speech from the throne.

The address itself covers a wide range of subjects. I do not propose this afternoon to traverse the whole of it, but shall confine myself to several topics indicated therein. It contains in respect to unemployment a new confession of failure. The amendment moved by the leader of the opposition (Mr. Manion) quite properly condemns the government for its failure, just as the Liberal party in opposition in 1935 condemned the government of which the present leader of the opposition was then a member for similar failure.

Hon. members in this group maintain now as they did then that only intelligent planning and control of our monopolistic industries and financial corporations will help us to find a way out of our own domestic difficulties. That is why the subamendment was moved yesterday by my leader (Mr. Woodsworth).

In our view social and economic progress is possible to-day, despite the difficulties which confront us. This statement is proven by what has occurred in New Zealand, where a government with a philosophy and ideals similar to those to which we adhere has been able since 1935 to assist the people of that country to solve problems which, according to the speech from the throne now before us, seem insoluble. In New Zealand in the three years following 1935 something like a miracle has occurred, because the government in that country had a plan and a determination to put it into effect. Unemployment has ceased to be a grave problem in New Zealand. The actual number of unemployed officially reported in August of this year—the depth of winter in the Antipodes, may I add—stood at only 1,273. In 1935 large numbers of the farmers of that country, the other major class suffering from economic difficulties, faced bankruptcy, the statement being made by their organizations at that time that at least 50,000 New Zealand farmers were in a very bad financial position. Three years later, however, it was very largely the votes of the agricultural community which in November last returned the Savage government to power, with a new mandate.

In 1935 schools were closing and school grants were being reduced, just as they have been in our western provinces during the past few years. To-day new schools are being built, teachers' salary schedules have been restored and improved, and educational facilities are being extended all across the country. Contrast that condition with the condition of schools and teachers in the province of Saskatchewan. I suggest we cannot be proud when we make the comparison.

With respect to housing the fact is that in Canada we have signally failed to provide any volume of new homes for the Canadian people. In 1935 not a single house was built in New Zealand by the government, but since that time thousands have been built. Last year 3,500 were constructed. Multiplying their population to equal ours would mean that on a similar basis the government of this country would provide over 30,000 houses this year for the Canadian people. Not only have government houses been constructed in New Zealand, but in order to prevent increases in rents by those who built houses privately, rents are being controlled and restricted by legislative enactment. In 1935 pensions for the veterans and the blind in New Zealand had been cut by one-third. The sick and the aged were dependent largely upon charity or their own friends. These pensions have been restored and pensions are now granted to widows. The old age pension has been increased from $20 to $30 per month, and the age limit has been lowered to sixty years.

What effect has all this had upon the business of our sister dominion? Business in this country languishes while in New Zealand it has shown a steady advance during the past three years. The figures for bankruptcies show that last year New Zealand had the smallest number of business failures in sixty years. Since the present government took office, more than a thousand new shops and six hundred new factories have been opened. According to a government report which I have studied, the railways of New Zealand had a record volume of business last year. Another indication of what has occurred under a policy such as we recommend is the fact that last year the number of automobiles in New Zealand increased by twenty-five per cent, while the number of new telephones installed last year exceeded all previous records. This improvement was due, at least in some degree, to the fact that the government of New Zealand, under the leadership of the minister of finance, the Hon. Walter Nash, used the newly nationalized central bank of that country, not as a social credit instrument but as an instrument of public policy.

Mr. MITCHELL: What is the difference?

Mr. COLDWELL: I hear one of my Social Credit friends asking what is the difference. There is a great difference between those two conceptions. Under economics that are sound the issue of money by the national bank of New Zealand is intelligently related to the actual production of the country.

Mr. MITCHELL: What is the difference between that and social credit?

Mr. COLDWELL: Wages have increased forty per cent while hours of labour have been shortened. Farmers' prices are guaranteed and the farm labourer, that forgotten man in our own country, has been given better conditions of work. Of course we were told when all this was attempted that it would result in inflation and increased costs of living. As I said a moment ago, wages and salaries have increased forty per cent. The cost of living has increased also, but only to the extent of between ten and eleven per cent. That is due, of course, to the mild inflation that has occurred because where you have any sort of inflation you have an increased price level. Under some circumstances that is justifiable, but it may be another form of taxation when carried to excess.

Laws against profiteering have been enacted and enforced. Cooperatives, both consumer and producer, have been encouraged and are to-day making good progress. As I said before, the improved condition of the farmer and the worker has made the retail merchant more prosperous. The redistribution of wealth and purchasing power has proven beneficial to these classes of the community. This government may say that there are no constitutional difficulties in New Zealand to prevent social reforms. That may be true, but the fact is that the Liberal party talked social reform and unemployment insurance back in 1919. They held office from 1921 to 1930 without interruption, but they made no real attempt to remove or resolve the difficulties which they tell us to-day prevent them from carrying out overdue social reforms. We are in the fourth session of the present parliament and are still waiting for a report on constitutional matters by the Rowell commission. Eighteen years have passed since the present Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) first took office. Our subamendment suggests that the solution lies in the course taken by our sister dominion of New Zealand, but we fear that this government will not even begin to travel that road.

In the meantime, what is the condition of the country in which we live? All across it we find unemployment, misery and want. Yesterday our leader spoke of the fishermen in the maritimes, and others have referred to the unemployed. While western Canada enjoyed a more bountiful crop this year, and to that extent conditions have been relieved, the fact is that many people, because of poor grades, low prices, and crop failures, are languishing in poverty. We ask ourselves: what is to be the fate of western agriculture? I can find little hope for western agriculture in the speech from the throne.

The trade agreement as a trade agreement is to be warmly welcomed, but I ask what compensating adjustments are going to be given to western Canada for the loss of the six cent preference on wheat in the British market? I believe in wider and freer markets, but, as I have often said, as long as we maintain protection for industry, when our farmers lose an advantage because of some treaty, compensating adjustments, as the hon. member for Melville (Mr. Motherwell) called them last year, should be provided for the farmer and the producer. With that in view we moved a subamendment to the budget last year urging the government to fulfil its own promises and place agricultural implements on the free list. At that time it was indicated to us that we must wait until treaty negotiations with the United States and Great Britain had been concluded. We waited, but agricultural implements are not on the free list and, except for a few reductions by one company, the prices of farm implements remain substantially where they were one year ago. They are much higher than they were when this government took office in 1935.

We are told that we have a compensating adjustment in the guaranteed price of wheat at 80 cents per bushel for No. 1 northern at Fort William. It has been said that the cost to the Dominion of Canada, of what is sometimes called a bonus, may amount to $30,000,000 or $40,000,000. May I say that even though it does cost the dominion that amount of money this year, it would be only a partial return for the contribution that western Canada makes every year to industrial Canada. According to the Manitoba brief, submitted to the Rowell commission by a Liberal government and by a Liberal premier, the net cost annually to the prairie provinces of protection for eastern industry amounts to $58,000,000. That is $4,000,000 higher than the figure presented by the Minister of Labour (Mr. Rogers) when he appeared several years ago to give evidence before a maritime commission. We have been making that contribution, Mr. Speaker, not just for one year, but according to the Manitoba brief and the Minister of Labour, every year for many years, and we believe the time has come when, if we are to be denied an advantage in the British market, we should have adjustments made in other directions.

I happened to be in the United States when the treaties between Canada and the United States and Great Britain were signed. I picked up the western United States papers, and I could find very little in them about those treaties except that the agreements represented a great gain for the United States wheat grower, that once again he had been able to get back into the British market, and that Canada's unfair advantage, as he regarded it, had been eliminated.

Moreover, though the price of wheat has been fixed in Canada, eighty-cent wheat does not meet the average cost of production. This is substantiated by figures prepared not by me but by our universities, and by figures presented to the Rowell commission, not by members of my party, but by speakers on behalf of the Liberal governments in western Canada. What we want to know to-day, and what I am asking the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner), if he participates in this debate, to tell us, is this: What is the government's wheat policy for the coming year? Surely a policy, and a very direct and certain policy, is needed in face of the world situation; for the appalling picture painted by the International Bureau of Agricultural Economics is one which we in this parliament and in this dominion cannot pass over lightly. I have on my desk the figures supplied by that organization, and they show that for the current crop year there is available approximately 1,175,000,000 bushels of wheat to meet an estimated import demand of 545,000,000 bushels. If the United States winter wheat belt has only an average crop this coming summer, then there will be on hand ready to supply the world next July before a binder turns in one of our western harvest fields, enough unused wheat to meet the present world demand for two whole years. I can see no indications of that condition improving in the near future.

What does the government propose to do? What proposals has it to offer at the forthcoming world wheat conference? What policy is it prepared to support at that conference? I submit that the parliament of Canada, which is held responsible for marketing policies, ought to be told what the government proposes to do in this connection. What we who represent western Canada, and have a very direct interest in this problem, are anxious to know is what the government proposes to do during the coming year.

Some say that our farmers must change to mixed farming. If they did, what would be the effect, I wonder, upon eastern agriculture and the eastern farmer? Already our western farmers are producing large quantities of dairy produce, and if they went into such production in a big way, into the production of butter, for example, of which we already have a surplus running into many millions of pounds, what would be the effect upon the eastern dairy farmer, having regard to the present world demand?

But I think this can be said, that over large areas of the prairie provinces, particularly south and southwestern Saskatchewan, lack of water and peculiar climatic and soil and growing conditions make it unprofitable for our farmers to enter that field, and consequently we have to regard that part of the prairies as a wheat producing area. So we ask again, what does the government propose to do in relation to this problem, which is becoming more acute as the days go by?

Again, if our farmers are to grow wheat, they must secure good seed. We now know that good seed must be of some rust-resistant variety, and that is perhaps particularly true this year because moisture conditions are above normal over a large part of western Canada, and normal moisture next summer, with certain other climatic conditions which are not unlikely to occur, may encourage rust in heavy crops. Last year the rust-resistant varieties stood up well, and there is plenty of seed to seed the land with rust-resistant wheat provided it is properly distributed. But the government's exchange plans are not satisfactory to the western farmer. They require two or three bushels of low grade wheat to be given in exchange for one bushel of good seed, and I am informed that the wheat board is selling commercial wheat for feed purposes on the basis of the open market price less the freight. Many farmers throughout the west have only low grade wheat of an inferior quality, and in view of this, farmers and municipalities are urging upon the government a policy of the distribution of good seed.

I have received, and I have no doubt the same is true of other western members, a number of resolutions dealing with the matter. I shall quote only one—to get it on the record—which I received from the municipal council of Perdue, Saskatchewan, in my own constituency. It reads as follows:

> That the Canadian wheat board sell to the farmers of Saskatchewan the rust-resistant varieties of wheat of such quality as to be usable for seed, which are now held in store in the dominion government interior elevators, at the same price as it now sells commercial wheat to the flour mills for milling purposes; that is, at Fort William open market price less freight charges; and that the said wheat could be coloured with some substance not injurious to germination so that it could be easily detected if offered for resale to the wheat board and, as a further protection to the wheat board, that a farmer's application to purchase such seed wheat be first approved by a responsible municipal official who would know the acreage cultivated by the applicant and the quantity of rust-resistant wheat required by him.

Mr. BOTHWELL: May I ask, for information, whether the hon. member can tell me who the father of that resolution is? I have received a number of similar resolutions from municipal councils, all couched in the same words, and I should like to know whence they emanate.

Mr. COLDWELL: Mr. Speaker, I am as ignorant of the person who drafted this resolutinon as my hon. friend from Swift Current (Mr. Bothwell). I have received, as he has done, a number of these resolutions, quite a number from my own constituency, and because I have received them from my own constituency and know who the movers and seconders are, and the officials who forwarded the resolutions to me, I am placing this one before the house.

Mr. EULER: I do not want to interrupt my hon. friend, but may I ask him this: If that policy were adopted by the wheat board would it not mean that a farmer who had sold his wheat to the wheat board at eighty cents would buy it back for himself at sixty cents and make a profit of twenty cents?

Mr. COLDWELL: I understand the government will not distribute seed now to farmers who sold wheat to the wheat board. It seems to me that the policy could be carried out so that the sales could be safeguarded. I do not know how practicable all the suggestions in this resolution are, but I believe the principle involved is a sound one, and I would recommend it, not for adoption in toto but for the consideration of the government as a constructive proposal.

Mr. GARDINER: If the hon. member does not mind, I might point out to him that the proper way really to deal with that resolution is to send it to the government of Saskatchewan. This government does not conduct any of the transactions referred to in that resolution; they are all carried out by the provincial government.

Mr. COLDWELL: No, but the government of Canada, Mr. Speaker, set up the wheat board. The wheat board is a creature of this parliament, and this particular resolution involves the proposal of a method of operation of the wheat board.

Mr. GARDINER: There are already negotiations between the provincial government and the wheat board, and the wheat board has been instructed by this government to continue to carry on the negotiations, with authority to deal with the matter if and when a policy which can be properly applied is developed by the province.

Mr. COLDWELL: That is all the more reason why a constructive proposal of this sort should be placed before parliament and the Minister of Agriculture at this time, and I am glad I had the opportunity to bring it to the minister's attention this afternoon.

Mr. GARDINER: I signed about a dozen replies to resolutions this morning.

Mr. COLDWELL: I permitted the Minister of Agriculture to ask me a question, but I would ask him not to interrupt.

The whole problem, may I add, is one which parliament must tackle this session. A solution is imperative in the interests of western agriculture, and I hope to say something more about it when a resolution on the order paper in my name is debated. I realize that the problem of wheat and of marketing is made more difficult because of the present international situation. Threats of war and recurring crises have resulted, too, in a decrease in the value of the pound sterling. We remember the disastrous effects of the decline of the pound sterling in 1932 and 1933. Our attempts then to retain parity with the gold dollar penalized very severely the primary producers of this country. A year ago the pound sterling was worth five dollars in Canadian money; to-day it is worth approximately $4.70, which means, of course, that if we sell a pound's worth of goods in Great Britain, instead of getting the five dollars in our local currency which we got last year we are getting only $4.70. There might be a much more severe fall than that. In the years to which I referred the governments of Australia and New Zealand took exactly the opposite view to ours, with the result that the farmers of those countries received higher prices in their own currency for their own produce, enabling them to meet their own local obligations in that currency. That, I submit, is an aspect of the agricultural situation which ought to be considered by the Minister of Finance and by the government before it is too late.

I do not wish to deal extensively this afternoon with the international situation. We were assured by the Prime Minister that the house would have ample opportunity to discuss international affairs, and I am looking forward to that occasion. But I do want to say something this afternoon about one of the results of the recent tragic series of events.

To-day the victims of fascist and nazi terror cry aloud to all civilized people for consideration and for aid. I am wondering what is going to be Canada's response to that cry. Pro-nazi papers printed in Canada and pro-nazi literature printed in Germany and widely circulated in Canada are trying to poison us with anti-semitic propaganda. It strikes me as being a strange thing that again and again in this chamber and other legislatures of this dominion we hear of communistic propaganda, and the need, so it is said, to meet it, to keep it out of the country; but so far nowhere in parliament or in any legislature has an attempt been made to keep out this vicious nazi propaganda which is attacking a minority in the country in which we live. Bear in mind that two-thirds of the refugees who to-day suffer in central Europe are non-Jews. I do not suggest of course that with our present problems of agricultural depression and unemployment we can open wide our gates to all who seek admission. The Cooperative Commonwealth Federation, in common with others in this country, has always opposed immigration schemes fostered by certain vested interests that had an economic axe to grind, land to sell, transportation facilities to use, and so on. Canada, however, should to-day be willing to join with other democracies in offering asylum to a fair quota of sufferers, both Jews and Christians, in a broad humanitarian effort to relieve their distress and with proper safeguards that they will not become public charges or increase our problems of agriculture and unemployment. I submit to the government that this policy will conform to the principles of what we sometimes call traditional liberalism.

What is "traditional liberalism?" Last evening I read an old Montreal newspaper file regarding Canada's reaction to similar but much less serious atrocities in Russia in 1905, now thirty-three years ago. At that time a great protest meeting was held in Montreal and a resolution of protest and of horror was passed unanimously and forwarded to the Czar. Protestants, Roman Catholics and Jews in the province of Quebec joined in expressing their abhorrence of crimes which pale into insignificance before the cruelties of nazi persecution in Germany and the areas under Hitler's iron heel. Many notable people who could not be present sent messages. Here is one written at that time by his excellency the Archbishop of Montreal to Mr. D. A. Ansell of that city. I will read the English translation. It is dated at Montreal, November 15, 1905, and is as follows:

[Mr. Coldwell.]

Sir:

I have received your letter of the 13th instant. I greatly deplore, as you do, the massacres that have taken place at Odessa and in other parts of Russia. Such massacres are contrary to the spirit of Christianity and to the laws of humanity.

However, I do not consider it advisable for me to take part in the meeting to which you invite me.

Yours sincerely,

Paul, Archbishop of Montreal.

I understand that the last sentence simply means that as a rule high ranking prelates of the Roman Catholic Church do not participate in public demonstrations. The Anglican Archdeacon of Montreal wrote a very fine letter at that time:

The Archdeacon of Montreal and Mrs. Norton regret that another engagement will prevent their being present at the meeting on Monday evening. They beg to enclose ten dollars as a small expression of their sympathy, and of the disgust and horror with which they regard the massacres in Russia of law abiding and innocent Jews, whose nation has in God's good providence given to the world its greatest moral and spiritual instructors, and has contributed enormously towards the upbuilding of the British empire by the loyalty and genius of such Jews as Lord Beaconsfield, Lord Herschel and Lord Goschen.

After over thirty years more of education and Christianity are we going to say anything less than our predecessors did thirty-three years ago?

May I place on the record a telegram forwarded from this city by the great man who was then the prime minister of Canada? I have before me the original telegram from Sir Wilfrid Laurier, dated at Ottawa, November 20, 1905. It reads:

I beg you to accept expression of my regret that other duties will not allow me to attend meeting to be held this evening to protest against recent massacres in Russia. I heartily sympathize with the object of meeting and I earnestly concur in your laudable efforts.

(Signed) Wilfrid Laurier.

Thus some of the leaders in church and state in Quebec and in Canada thirty-three years ago expressed themselves forcibly and freely; and I wondered when I read that telegram what Sir Wilfrid Laurier would say if he sat in this house as prime minister to-day. At that time Great Britain was endeavouring to bring about an entente cordiale with Russia, having completed one with France; yet in spite of the fact that negotiations may have been difficult, the prime minister of this country at that time did not fear or fail to express himself in the terms I have just read. To-day we are granting most favoured nation treatment under our tariff and other treaties to Germany, and when we make a concession to other countries Germany participates. Therefore Germany gets her chromium, her nickel and other supplies from this dominion under most favoured nation terms, while the victims of the fascist terror hammer at our gates in their desperate search for refuge.

The Canadian people are democratic. They are warm-hearted, and I believe we have an opportunity to demonstrate our humanitarianism now. We are urging the Prime Minister to take the house into his confidence and tell the house immediately whether this country will receive—not a large influx, unregulated, of the victims, because there are a million and a half of them, but whether in common with other democratic peoples we will take our fair quota of those who are suffering from the terror in central Europe. May I add that under a proper policy, just as in days gone by when our forefathers received the Huguenots from France and exiles from other places, these refugees may do much to help us in this country to build up a balanced economy. And may I say that in the suggestion I have just made I am expressing not only my own views but those of the national council of the movement of which I have the honour to be the chairman.

Mr. SPEAKER: Order.

Mr. COLDWELL: May I just read this resolution passed by the national executive:

> The national executive of the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation expresses its sincere sympathy with the victims of religious, racial and political persecution in central Europe, and requests the government to admit, on humanitarian principles, in the same manner as other democratic nations are doing, a reasonable number of the victims of persecution to this dominion.

That is all we ask the government to do.

Mr. R. J. DEACHMAN (Huron North): I listened as I always do with a great deal of interest to my hon. friend the member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell). In regard to his statement of the situation in western Canada I have of course the deepest sympathy. I lived there for twenty-five of the happiest years of my life, and one of the pleasantest memories I have is that of my association with the people of the west. I am not so sure that I can follow my hon. friend in his picture of conditions in New Zealand. I imagine they are now experiencing what may be termed the honeymoon of inflation, and the bright and vivid story we have had of their situation to-day may change somewhat in the next year or two. I have before me a copy of the London Economist. Before I quote from this I want to answer the reply that can readily be made that this is a capitalistic journal and looks at things from a capitalistic viewpoint. Of course the countercharge might be made that the statement we heard from my hon. friend is from a socialist viewpoint. But there are two points of view, and I submit this one from the London Economist; I do not know myself whether that view or the view expressed by my hon. friend is right, but I suggest that hon. members keep these things in their minds for a year or two and then pass judgment when the test of time has brought its result. These are the words of the Economist:

> In other words, it is evident that the success of the New Zealand government's control scheme depends, not so much upon the effectiveness with which it is worked, as upon the manner in which the fundamental economic problems of New Zealand are tackled. If the New Zealand government temper their grandiose public works schemes and their progressive policy of social services with caution, and if they have the luck of good export prices, the exchange control scheme may happily prove to have been a valuable, but temporary, expedient to tide over a difficult period. Mr. Savage however has gone far to shatter this hope by his declaration that these measures were intended to form a permanent part of the government's plan for "insulating the economic life of New Zealand from outside disturbance." If, in the course of this insulation policy, the control scheme is merely used as a means of evading the fundamental issues involved, if it serves only to "plug the clinical thermometer," it will land the patient in a much graver crisis than that in which he finds himself to-day.

I call attention to that proposal to "insulate the economic life of New Zealand." I call to mind the fact that the United States tried for a number of years to insulate the economic life of the United States. They succeeded in "plugging the clinical thermometer," but when the time came the crisis was thereby made much worse than it would otherwise have been. I ask the house not to accept my judgment or the judgment of the Economist or even the judgment of the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar. Time gives the answer to most of these questions.

I was very much interested in the speech delivered by my hon. friend the leader of the opposition (Mr. Manion) the other day. I cannot help but think how greatly the conditions of this world would change if our foresight were as good as our hindsight. The hon. member for Kootenay East (Mr. Stevens) was a candidate in the city of Vancouver in the anti-reciprocity campaign of 1911. Yet in 1936 he voted for the reciprocity agreement, and at that time, in a speech in this house, he stated that his work in the Department of Trade and Commerce had convinced him that an inquiry ought to be made into the idea of expanding trade with the United States, and that he believed the expansion of trade would result in the betterment of conditions as between the two countries. As I read the speech of the leader of the opposition to-day I thought that if only the hon. gentleman could have worked in the Department of Trade and Commerce for a few brief months he too would have found that to be true; and instead of having one dissenter from the party, or perhaps more, we would have a united vote on the part of the Conservative party in favour of the policy which they condemned in 1911.

It would be pleasant if these memories could come to Sir Wilfrid Laurier. It must be a great thing for the leader of the Liberal party in this house (Mr. Mackenzie King), when he recalls the campaign of 1911, in which he took part; when he recalls how the Conservative party at that time fought as they never fought before, how they wrapped the flag around them, how they came weeping with every eye they had, bleeding in every pore, talking of patriotism and telling of the disasters which would follow if we accepted the suggestions made in 1911. Now, with softened tones, I read these words from the speech delivered just the other day by my hon. friend. Referring to the Canadian manufacturers he said:

> Some of them appear to think it would be more or less unpatriotic to express an opinion against the treaty.

What a marvellous change indeed! But if we have a change in view we still have the old arguments. The other day we heard the story of the balance of trade. That was first brought up in Canada, I think at the time of the first reciprocity treaty, in 1854. We have had eighty-five years of it. In all friendliness I suggest to the Conservative party that they spend another fifteen years discussing the balance of trade and then let the matter drop. The other day we heard that we should have our trade balanced with the United States, that we should reduce our imports from that country so that the trade would have an approximate balance. There is no man or woman within sound of my voice who balances his or her trade exactly. No man has a favourable balance of trade with his tailor. Every man buys where he can buy the cheapest, and the balance of trade is what is represented at the end of the year, regardless of whether it is carried on with one person or a thousand persons. Well, when one cannot balance his trade, how can the combined trade of eleven million people, with every nation with which they do business, be expected to balance?

I am not going to discuss this suggestion for very long, but I want to give a few brief facts in regard to the balance of trade. Since confederation we have had twenty-seven favourable balances of trade, of which sixteen were under Liberal governments and eleven under the Tories. I have left out the years 1919 and 1920, because then we were under a war economy, shipping munitions and other war material which affected the result. In 1925 and 1926, under the Liberals, the favourable balance of trade exceeded all the favourable balances of trade under all Tory governments from the time the dominion was formed right down to 1938. I am suggesting, in kindness to the Tories that they drop this suggestion, because the argument is entirely on our side. The greatest adverse balance of trade which ever took place in the Dominion of Canada was in the years 1912, 1913 and 1914, under a Conservative administration. I went through the files of Hansard for those years, but I found nothing, not a word, about the balance of trade. Why should they worry about it? Every Conservative in the house kept repeating to himself, "Why should I fear? The Tories are in power." Yet they come back with this story to-day, and that is why I suggest that they take another fifteen years and then get rid of it for good.

But there was one delightful thing in regard to the remarks of the leader of the opposition that I cannot miss. My hon. friend the Minister of Fisheries (Mr. Michaud) suggested that it was a fifty-fifty deal, one horse and one rabbit. At once my hon. friend said, "That is it. We ship a horse to the United States and get back a rabbit."

Mr. MANION: No, I did not say any such thing. Stick to the book.

Mr. DEACHMAN: All right; for curiosity's sake we will stick to the book.

Mr. MANION: I said we got a rabbit and they got a horse, on the trade treaty.

Mr. DEACHMAN: All right; it was on the trade treaty, but that does not alter the suggestion. We got the rabbit and they got the horse.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Mr. DEACHMAN: That is quite right; we got the rabbit and they got the horse.

Mr. MANION: On the trade treaty.

Mr. DEACHMAN: Quite so; and that means that we shipped a horse to the United States and got back a rabbit, that our exports were more than our imports, and that the nation was prosperous. That is the Tory theory: favourable balance of trade; exports exceeding imports. But I want to point out something else to my hon. friend. If we had got back only the ears of the rabbit or the hair from the end of its tail we would have been still better off, because we would have received less for what we gave; and according to Tory theory that would form a bigger and bigger balance of trade.

I want to add this word. All these discussions that have taken place in the house have not been in regard to the balance of payments. They have referred almost entirely to the balance of commercial exchanges, of goods for goods. I suggest to my hon. friend that if he is going to discuss the balance of trade again, he should take the balance of international payments and show what is the total of our earnings from investments, our payments of interest, our earnings from the tourist traffic and all the great multiplicity of exchanges which take place. But despite that little lapse with regard to the rabbit, for which I shall forgive him, I want to point out that there were some exceedingly delightful arguments in the speech of my hon. friend. In particular I like this one: Last year we bought from the United States $40 per capita; they bought from us $3.50 per capita.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. DEACHMAN: Well, I can make it worse: Last year we bought from the world $100 per capita and the world bought from us sixty cents per capita, and what is to save us? Nothing but the goodness of God. Last year we bought from the United Kingdom $14 per capita and the United Kingdom bought from us $9 per capita. Yet our trade with the United Kingdom was very fair, as I see it. Our imports from the United Kingdom were $145,000,000 and our exports to the United Kingdom were $409,000,000.

There is another little item. My hon. friend was worried, or at least he tried to worry the Minister of Finance (Mr. Dunning), in regard to the loss of the three per cent excise tax. Well, let me point out that the former Conservative government removed the excise tax against Great Britain. I do not think it worried very much about it after it had done it, only in so far as it felt that it was going outside its usual course, because that to a certain extent reduced the tariff which was imposed. But the loss of revenue was not a serious matter. The loss of revenue in this instance will not be a serious matter, either, because I venture to suggest that when the previous government removed the excise tax against Great Britain, they did the only thing they ever did during their entire period in office which helped to increase employment throughout Canada. On the other hand, when the Liberals remove the three per cent excise tax on all imports, as I hope they are now going to do, they will have done not the only thing they have ever done but certainly the biggest thing they have ever done to cure unemployment.

I come now to another point in connection with which I shall probably differ from the hon. member. In that connection I shall follow his suggestion and shall try to get the facts. Speaking about our export of wheat he said:

> I find that in 1922—I take the worst year—only 29 per cent of Canadian wheat went through Canadian ports, and 70 per cent through United States ports, whereas last year, 1938, 82 per cent of our Canadian wheat went through Canadian ports and only 15½ per cent through United States ports.

That is correct—at least, I take it as it stands there. But what the hon. member did not tell, and I should have liked him to tell, is that in 1922 there were 89,000,000 bushels of United States grain which passed through Canadian ports; in 1927-28 there were 88,000,000 bushels; in 1928-29 there were 83,000,000 bushels, and in 1937-38 there were 64,000,000 bushels.

I submit to the house that when a person attempts to present a story of the export of Canadian grain through United States ports he ought also to tell the story of the export of United States grain through Canadian ports. There is a proper way of putting the situation before the House of Commons and the people of Canada. I do not quarrel with my hon. friend's making a mistake of this kind. For some years he lived in Fort William and caught the Fort William spirit. He thinks everything that goes out of Fort William is much more important than anything which goes through in any other direction—and that is quite all right. I must point out, however, that it is not a fair statement, and an hon. member ought not to take one side of a story, state it in a certain way, and then leave it before the house with the suggestion that we are using the transportation services of the United States and not using our own transportation facilities, and therefore that we were not doing the right and proper thing for the Canadian people.

Mr. MANION: May I interject? The export of United States grain via Canadian ports is not affected in the trade agreement, whereas the export of Canadian grain via United States ports is affected.

Mr. DEACHMAN: Yes, but here is the point: Why did not my hon. friend point out the other side of the story as to the balance which was taking place? Why did he not point out that when Canadian wheat was going through United States ports, it was probably going through for the simple reason that Canadian ports were glutted with United States grain.

Mr. MANION: No, no.

Mr. DEACHMAN: And there was a balance between the two. While we were carrying the products of the United States they were carrying our products. We were working together, using the transportation systems of both countries. Does the hon. member wish to appeal to the west and tell them he will confine that movement only to Canadian waterways? What would have happened if in some years, for instance back in 1929 when we exported 370,000,000 bushels of wheat, we had been confined to Canadian ports? All channels would have been glutted, and we would have been left wondering what had happened. Every elevator would have been filled; transportation facilities of both countries would have been fully employed.

I care not what the hon. member says; that statement should have been placed fairly and squarely and both sides should have been balanced properly. But there is another item —and I like this; I am delighted with it. My hon. friend went to the United States; he wanted to see the prices of United States products so as to compare them with those in Canada. He went to several places, and while looking he investigated the prices of automobile tires. But he did not look at the rest of the automobile; he got just as far as the tires, and then stopped. Automobile tires were practically the same price on both sides of the line; but he would have found there was a difference of $500 or $600, in some instances, in the prices of automobiles. He did not look at that. What would the house think of a physician who was called in to look at a man who was very ill and found that he looked only at the patient's feet and then declared, "He is all right"? What would the house think of a physician who under those circumstances never looked at the engine, the chassis, the hood, the top or any other part of the patient? It is much better to look both ways.

There is another matter, in an entirely different line, to which I wish to direct attention. It has very little to do with freedom of trade, but it has some connection with freedom of discussion. The question has arisen in regard to the right of a certain newspaper publisher to speak over a radio network and to present to a large and extended audience the important views he may have on many questions. The publisher in question is very active in Canada to-day. Among other things he is deeply interested in the Canadian railway problem. He believes in the unification of railways and, believing that, he has unified two newspapers. I suggest we might wait to see how he gets along with them before we decide that he is in a position to give advice with regard to railways. The question arises as to the right of this gentleman to speak over the radio. I quote now from the Globe and Mail:

> Let us see how the heel of authority is cracked down—

I like that "heel of authority."

> —the publisher of the Globe and Mail cannot use a network of private radio stations for the simple reason that he is able to do so. By the same brand of reasoning he should be prohibited from publishing a newspaper; there are others who cannot. If he wishes to telephone to Winnipeg he must content himself with speaking to Long Branch; every one is unable to make a long distance call. He must not ride in a parlour car because some other person cannot do so. He should not drive an automobile; there are people who cannot.

We have freedom of the press in Canada, and we have it for a certain reason. There has been a constant process of evolution in the development of the press. Those men who had charge of its development had a high sense of honour and responsibility. Connected with the press of the world are the names of many of the greatest and most influential men who lived, men like Scott of the Manchester Guardian, Delane of the Times and our own George Brown, whose statue stands outside this building. But if in the future the press is to develop to the stage where men who do not know its traditions and who have made their money in other fields of effort may use the press for their own purposes, and instead of leaving the news fairly to the public, presenting their own personal views to the editorial page, I fear that the boasted freedom of the press will to some extent cease, and some measure of restriction may eventually be adopted.

What followed in this particular instance? If a man publishes an argument or a letter or an editorial in a newspaper, there is a chance to answer him in the same paper. But when a man acquires a monopoly of the time on a radio in which to speak, in which to state his own views, unless another man has an abundance of money to buy similar time, he has no opportunity to answer. If you are going to have freedom of the radio there must necessarily be some restrictions. Those restrictions must be such as will serve to retain freedom and not something that limits it. As for the other argument, that when he wishes to telephone to Winnipeg he is compelled to telephone to Long Branch instead, let me say that there are other methods of reaching both Long Branch and Winnipeg. But there are no other ways of meeting the situation when a man of wealth, demanding power, seeks the right to express himself over the radio unchallenged by other people who may also want the right to express their opinions but lack all possible means of doing so.

I do not make these statements without particular affection for the Toronto Globe. I owe that paper too much. It was my guide in my youth. The opinions which I hold today were founded largely upon the sound arguments that were used by that paper in the days when it had youth and vigour and freedom and fearlessness. I can remember, after ploughing all day, walking three miles to town in order to read the Globe. I feel too strongly to say anything against that paper, but freedom must be defended and you cannot defend freedom by giving privileges to some which are denied to others.

I come now to the other point. I want to touch upon the question of unemployment. The story that I desire to put before the house I think is somewhat difficult, but it is one to which I have given considerable thought. Speaking the other day with reference to the causes of unemployment the right hon. Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) stated that the primary causes were war, intensive nationalism and trade restriction. I agree with that, but in what way do those things cause unemployment? When the efforts of a nation are thrown into preparation for war, there is within the nation a smaller total volume of production of consumable and capital goods. For that reason there is less to be distributed, and less wealth is created. There is another way in which this might be expressed; it might find expression not in reduction of employment, but in a lowering of the standard of living. When you have violated an economic law; when you have restricted the trade of a nation; when you have lowered production, then I suggest that there will be punishment for that through economic laws from which there is no escape. Nothing can stop them. The only thing that can happen when that is done is one of two things. There will be a general lowering of the standard of living and a reduction in wages and profits or, in the alternative, there will be unemployment. The measure of your unemployment will be the measure in which you have been unwilling to face the whole problem in the way which I have suggested.

I want to put this before the house as an illustration which may be a little difficult to explain. I have before me a book and in it I have marked a wage scale starting at $1 and continuing with $2, $3, $4, $5, and $6. We will say that my deskmate, the hon. member for Edmonton West (Mr. MacKinnon), and I are working in a factory of which the manager is the Minister of Labour (Mr. Rogers). We have a quarrel, not political but over labour matters, with the manager, and we go to him and demand a higher wage. The attitude of the hon. member and myself is simply this: We do not care for the Minister of Labour. He is the boss; we are going to fight for the highest possible wage we can get. We do not care particularly for the other men who are employed in the factory because we feel that as we are the senior men, we shall retain our jobs anyway. We do not take into consideration for one moment the interests of the consumer. We are fighting simply for an increased wage, and we are ready to take the highest wage we can possibly squeeze out of the capitalist who controls the plant, who happens, fortunately or unfortunately, to be, in this instance, the Minister of Labour.

Our quarrel with the Minister of Labour, having been settled, the following day the government appoints a commission or a committee the object of which is to fix a wage scale in the Dominion of Canada which will produce the largest total volume of wage funds out of which all wages are to be paid. At once the attitudes of my deskmate, the Minister of Labour and I change with reference to this problem. We then say to ourselves: We must fix a wage scale which will employ the largest total number of men, so that the number of men employed multiplied by the wage scale will give us the largest total wage fund out of which all wages must be paid. I do not think there is any dispute in regard to that. That is what we would do. While we were working as individuals, if we were getting $3 per day, we would try to shove it up to $6; but if we were working on behalf of the nation to create the largest possible wage fund, we would try to fix that at the point where, multiplied by the total number of employed, it would create the largest wage fund.

I put the same illustration last summer to a labour leader in western Canada. At that time I was working for a newspaper, and he said to me, "Am I speaking to a reporter for a newspaper, to a member of parliament or to a chap named Deachman?" I told him that it was purely personal, that I would never use his name in connection with it. I asked him if that was the answer to the unemployment problem and he told me that I was right. However he said that labour could not give way because, if it did, what would follow? If labour lowered its wage scale, he said the capitalist owner of the plant would take the difference, and the only thing labour would get would be less wages and a lowering of the standard of living. Then I asked him what would happen if something could be done to lower prices, if, for instance, the tariff could be reduced sufficiently to compel a lowering of the price of goods. He said that the result would be an increase in the volume of employment. There would be a larger total number of men working for a slightly lower wage, but there would be a lower cost of living. They would have a relatively low nominal wage, but they would have something far more important as far as labour is concerned—they would have a higher standard of living than they had before.

I submit that is how this problem must be approached if this government is going to solve unemployment. It must be willing to bring about a better distribution of what one United States economist has called the pie of production. Throughout the Dominion of Canada we find little groups of men fighting desperately to increase their standard of living. We are missing the opportunity that ought to be ours and is ours of increasing the standard of living by working steadily for the better distribution of the wealth which is produced. What is to be done? I submit to the Liberal party that we have made a start in the reduction of the tariff by means of the abolition of the excise tax. That has been the greatest single move since the depression towards the restoration of normal conditions.

The government has mapped out for itself a further course. It proposes now to examine into the tariff upon sugar and into the West Indies treaty. I wish it would be willing to act without examination, because that situation has been examined before, and the record is so clear that he who runs may read. There is one of the worst examples of exploitation that we have in this dominion. But I feel confident that the government will do everything it can to facilitate that investigation so that action may be taken in the situation before this session is over. That is a next-door way to escape. Then, having expanded our trade with the United States and with the West Indies, keep on going. There is no fear so far as the Liberal party is concerned regarding the expansion of trade. We are not afraid to deal with any class of people, wherever they may be. We are not afraid that they will take too much from us or that we shall give them too much or that we shall get too much from them. I never worry about that; I leave that to my Tory friends. Forward, then, under those methods. Forward towards the expansion of trade; forward for a better distribution of the wealth we are producing, forward for a better distribution of our production. That is the task of Liberalism. That is the task before the people of Canada to-day.

Mr. O. B. ELLIOTT (Kindersley): Mr. Speaker, the debate has progressed into very deep channels, and at the moment I feel impelled to make a few remarks about some of the major speeches made thus far.

Judging from the courteous exchanges which took place between the two sides of the house on the first day of the session I had expected that the addresses in this debate would be confined more particularly to the business of the house, and I must confess that when I listened to the leader of the opposition (Mr. Manion) on Monday I had a rather sinking feeling. The very strong preelection speech which he made, supported by quotations from the red book with which we are all familiar, did not give me the reaction that the exchange of courtesies which took place on the opening day would lead one to expect. I have no desire to show partiality for either of the two old major parties, for in my opinion there is very little difference between them except on their tariff policies.

It was gratifying to me that the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) confined his remarks for the most part to the important business of the session and largely refrained from replying to the criticism that had been made by the leader of the opposition.

The mover (Mr. Matthews) and the seconder (Mr. Chevrier) of the address in reply to the speech from the throne well merited the praise accorded to them from all parts of the house. I was myself greatly impressed with the fluency with which the hon. member for Stormont (Mr. Chevrier) addressed the house in both French and English. We as westerners do not meet with that same demand to use the two official languages, and therefore perhaps we have not availed ourselves sufficiently of the opportunity to use the French language. We are more inclined, in fact, to feel pressure from the German element in the west to use the German language.

The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Woodsworth) gave us his usual kernel of logic in his contribution to the debate, and I have no hesitation in predicting that after the next election he will be sitting in the seat of the leader of the opposition. No comment, favourable, or otherwise, has so far been forthcoming on the excellent speech made by the hon. member for Lethbridge (Mr. Blackmore). Apparently what he said cannot be refuted or contradicted. His contributions to the debates of this house always contain material for thought, and I would predict of him that he will soon be called upon to assume the very important office of prime minister. In that event he will be confronted with the task of finding cabinet material. Some of it has already proven itself. What better minister of defence, for example, could be chosen than the hon. member for Bow River (Mr. Johnston) with his bigger and better armies and navies that ought to make the present Minister of National Defence blush with envy? He would get the necessary money, of course, from the new minister of finance, the hon. member for Calgary East (Mr. Landeryou), and the British North America Act would readily be amended by the member for Jasper-Edson (Mr. Kuhl) and one deputy by the name of Roger Smith.

Those responsible for the visit of the President of the United States to Canada last August and for the forthcoming visit of Their Majesties the King and Queen should be congratulated upon these attempts to foster better relations within the empire and with our great neighbour to the south. I am of opinion that better relations could be fostered with other countries by an exchange of visits between their respective leaders. While doubtless the results in some cases would be nil, in the final analysis a clearer understanding of each other's problems would follow and conduce to better relations.

The itinerary of their majesties' tour across Canada, so arranged as to prevent social exploitation, thereby permitting a wider territory to be covered within the short space of time available, should meet with general satisfaction. My constituency regrets that no provision has been made for a stop by their majesties at any important point within its bounds, but understands the difficulties in arranging an itinerary of the magnitude proposed.

Prominence has been given in the speech from the throne to the necessity of increased armaments because of developments in the international situation and their effect upon Canada; while at the same time it is acknowledged that there is a widespread desire for peace in the minds of the people. But what I am concerned about at the moment is what will happen when the present armament race is over. I hope that in preparing the estimates and legislation to come before the house this session the government will take into consideration the very unpleasant situation that is sure to arise when the resources of the nation will have been spent to produce scrap metal. In the event that no disastrous war culminates there will be thousands of men and women, released from the occupation of manufacturing armaments, demanding work by which to obtain food, clothing and shelter. Judging from present day difficulties in solving the problem of unemployment by methods now in effect, war preparation which ends in peace is more awful to contemplate in its social and economic reactions than if war had ensued with its casualty list or perhaps thousands of Canadian lives.

From about 1870 to 1940 in north America men were overrunning the continent and words could not seriously deflect the course of hustling and impetuous action. But those of us who lived through the great war, the great boom, the great depression and now observe the rise of dictators abroad are not so easy in our minds as were our fathers.

Even if not caught in a catastrophe of fighting, financial ruin, personal suppression, deportation and violence, one reads the headlines morning after morning with a kind of dazed incredulity.

What is the matter with people? What is the matter with governments? And, perhaps, more particularly, what is the matter with ourselves?

First, a war that killed thirty million human beings; then a speculative boom which, after producing more bad language to sell more propositions than in the entire previous history of finance, explodes like the airship Hindenburg. Finally, when a little headway has been made against economic disaster, the peoples of Europe, more civilized than any other group, prepare solemnly and deliberately to blow one another to molecules. By a course as relentless as a Greek tragedy they now move, white faced and slow, to that end.

If this government is contemplating the expenditure of fifty million dollars or more on preparations for war or defence, the program will doubtless be put over and men will welcome it as an opportunity to earn wages and get work. Business will also welcome it as an opportunity to make its profits. But if the urgency is so great for the security of our people—and from the information which we are able to obtain at the present time it would seem to be—it behooves this government to assume the entire responsibility for the provision of armaments at cost. The appointment of a commission or a purchasing board to limit profits is to my mind entirely inadequate. Definite steps should also be taken to protect the general public against the rise in commodity prices in the eventuality of war,—a rise against which, we have been taught by the recent increase in prices in Great Britain, we should receive ample protection. The appointment of a purchasing board seems to me to be an acknowledgment on the part of the government that business cannot be trusted to play fair even where the lives of our people are at stake. Yet they laboured under the impression not so long since that business would assist in solving the unemployment situation. Doubtless they promised to do so in so far as it did not interfere with their profits. Blame has been attached to crop failures in the western provinces and business recessions in other parts of the world, but I ask you, has there ever been a time when there were not crop failures of some sort or a business recession in some part of the world which assisted governments, possibly, to evade their responsibilities? Blaming unemployment on such causes seems to me a very lame excuse; it gives the impression of an underlying desire for disaster somewhere in the world in order that business may be improved at home. How could the shortage of a commodity of which the world already has an abundance be a cause of depression, provided that we had the proper transportation and exchange facilities? As it stands now, the world has so much wealth that we are poverty stricken.

The National Housing Act, which was relied upon to provide some measure of relief from the present situation, cannot be said to be a success, and never will be until the people have steady incomes, even though small, and the security of living in the same locality long enough to enjoy a home. At the present time employment is somewhat like the weather; there is seasonal employment and seasonal unemployment, but unfortunately the people have to eat every day. Only a couple of months ago we had seasonal employment on the railroads. Business was heavy and in many parts there was a shortage of men until proper adjustments could be made in the staffs. In the meantime the men carried on to the best of their ability, in many cases working long hours without extra compensation. When depression or lack of business appeared on the horizon almost as suddenly as the boom, men were immediately laid off in large numbers and many positions abolished which had never been inactive before. In such circumstances—and we have the same conditions in all lines of business—how can an employee feel any security?

In connection with the railroads, the opinion is widely held that this government has not declared itself with sufficient emphasis on problems of amalgamation. Those who are in favour of and have continually broadcast propaganda throughout the dominion in support of amalgamation have not been met with the proper counteracting authorities whereby employees of the railway might be given the feeling of security to which they are entitled.

I have no desire at this time to prolong the debate on questions that will come up later, but I must say that the efforts of the government and the results obtained thereby have not alleviated the mental depression caused by our plight. I believe that the present situation can be appropriately summed up in the words of Oliver Goldsmith in The Deserted Village:

> Ill fares the land, to hastening ills a prey,
> Where wealth accumulates, and men decay.

Mr. J. R. MacNICOL (Davenport): Mr. Speaker, as the subject that I propose to speak about will likely take up my full time, I would appreciate it if the hon. members who introduced the address in reply to the speech from the throne will pardon me for omitting, so far as they are concerned, the usual amenities of debate.

Also, for the same reason I shall have to forego the pleasure I otherwise would have of referring to the coming visit of the king and queen, whose coronation I witnessed in Westminster Abbey. I want to refer to something left out of the speech from the throne which might well have been included in it. In the third paragraph of the speech on page 3 of Hansard we find these words:

> Our own relations with other countries continue friendly—

I maintain that after that might very well have been added the words:

> We regret to advise this country that with several of our provinces our relations are unfriendly.

I am going to deal with one reason why the relations of this government with the government of Ontario are unfriendly. I do not know that I particularly blame either government. Recently there has been a rather bitter disputation between this government and the government at Toronto over the question of the diversion of water from lakes and rivers of northern Ontario. The immediate cause of the flare-up was an article which appeared in the Toronto Telegram I believe on November 26, written on the subject of the Long Lake diversion by a staff writer, Mr. Roy Snider.

I do not believe there is a more competent and able writer in Canada on that subject, because he has thoroughly traversed the area and knows what he is writing about. His article contained illustrations of the dam on the Kenogami river some fourteen miles north of Long Lake, and a dam and diversion canal within six miles south of Long Lake. These diversion works are designed to divert waters from the Albany river, a watershed wholly within the Dominion of Canada, into the international watershed.

A local reporter representing one of the Toronto papers, I do not know his name, but one apparently thoroughly well posted on this subject, probably after having read the article written by Mr. Snider, approached the government to ascertain what would actually take place providing the Ontario government did, as was intimated in Mr. Snider's article, open the sluice gates five miles south of the height of land in the international watershed, and pour Kenogami river waters into the great lakes in violation of both the Boundary Waters Treaty and the Navigable Waters Protection Act. The government spokesman who replied to the reporter in Ottawa said:

> The federal government could not stand idly by and allow any violation of a treaty to occur by such diversion, unless the consent of the United States to the plans for diversion is first obtained. President Roosevelt declined Ontario's request last May for these diversions affecting the Albany river basin until the question of the St. Lawrence deep waterways scheme was decided upon.

That statement was quoted in the Toronto Star of November 29.

The purpose of my remarks is to lay the situation before the government, in the hope that they will refrain from permitting the Ontario government on any consideration to divert the waters of the Albany river watershed into the watershed of the St. Lawrence, because there is involved in that diversion a national menace and also an international menace.

Perhaps before going any further, as I have studied the subject so long, I ought to give a brief description of two types of diversion. First, there is the type of which the power canals at Niagara are an example. There, water is diverted out of the Niagara river south of the falls, and, after passing through the turbines in the power houses, flows back into the Niagara river north of the falls. This type of diversion does no harm to a watershed because the water is not taken out of it. But the second type is that illustrated by the diversion effected by the Chicago drainage canal. That canal diverts water from lake Michigan, part of the St. Lawrence watershed system, and carries it some thirty-four miles west into the Des Plaines river, which is part of the Mississippi watershed. The Kenogami river diversion is of that type, as would also be a diversion from the Ogoki river, to which I shall refer later. Both these diversions would be most injurious to the Albany river watershed, just as the Chicago diversion, which hon. members know has been the cause of a large proportion of the lowering of water levels on the great lakes and the St. Lawrence, has been injurious.

This opinion is not held in Canada alone. For several months last winter in Washington there was an application before congress for the passage of a bill called H.R. 8327, to permit Chicago to take 5,000 cubic feet per second from lake Michigan from January 1 of this year. As hon. members know, Chicago had to reduce its diversion on January 1 of this year under the decision of the Supreme Court of the United States in 1930. The bill of last year, which I believe is coming up again this year, was to forestall the effect of the reduced quantity of water to be taken by Chicago into the Illinois canal and the Chicago drainage canal.

In Washington on January 17 of last year, the mayor of Milwaukee, Mr. D. W. Hoan, speaking before the committee on rivers and harbours, after giving his version of the effect of the Chicago drainage canal on the water level of lake Michigan, said:

> It (the Chicago drainage canal) violates every moral right and every right of decency.

I say that statement applies to any diversion from the Albany river or the Kenogami river or the Ogoki river into the St. Lawrence watershed.

Hon. F. D. Culkin, member of congress, speaking of the Chicago diversion in the House of Representatives on January 18, quoted Hon. Charles Evans Hughes, one of the justices of the Supreme Court of the United States, when he was acting as special master on this question, in a proceeding between certain great lakes states and the state of Illinois and the city of Chicago, as saying:

> There was no warrant at law or in nature for this diversion.

And I say the same statement applies to the Kenogami river diversion or the Ogoki river diversion if this government permits either to take place.

Then Hon. F. D. Culkin himself said, on January 20:

> If anybody asks me I am going to tell them I do not think the congress of the United States has any power to take water from one watershed and place it in another.

I do not think so either. I think if either of these two rivers is diverted it will be a calamity to the watershed of the Albany river, one of the great rivers of the north.

The cause of the disunity as between the government of Ontario and this government is the neglect of this government to enforce section 4 of the Navigable Waters Protection Act, which states:

> No work shall be built or placed in, upon, over, under, through or across any navigable water unless the site thereof has been approved by the governor in council, nor unless such work is built, placed and maintained in accordance with plans and regulations approved or made by the governor in council.

The governor in council did not give the Ontario government authority to build those works; yet the works have been built. This government should have informed the Ontario government in ample time that it could not proceed with this undertaking. The construction of those works is one of the reasons for the disunity that exists between the government of Ontario and the federal government. There they stand, out in the open, and I doubt very much if they will ever be placed in operation. In 1937 the public press quoted statements to the effect that the Ontario government intended to proceed immediately with the erection of the works in connection with the diversion of the Kenogami river, so that the federal government must have had full knowledge of it. The Ontario government also knew very well that it could not proceed with those works. Back in 1924, the question of diversion was brought to the attention of the present Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King), and Hon. Charles Stewart, at that time Minister of the Interior, advised the government of Ontario that they could not proceed because of the Navigable Waters Protection Act and the Boundary Waters Treaty. In spite of that knowledge, however, the Ontario government went ramstam ahead and built a diversion control dam fourteen miles north of Long lake. It stopped work for a while, but later also proceeded to build a diversion canal and another diversion control dam south of Long lake.

On July 21, 1937, the Ontario government concluded that they had better let this government know that they proposed to carry on this work, and they did so through the provincial secretary. The Prime Minister replied to that letter, but not until September 7, when he wrote a letter recalling to the attention of the provincial secretary the fact that the diversion of rivers or lakes into the international watershed was a matter for the dominion government. He wrote a long letter to explain that. All he had to do was tell the Ontario government that they could not proceed with those works for three very good reasons; namely, that to proceed with them would be a violation of (1) the Boundary Waters Treaty; (2) the Navigable Waters Protection Act and (3) the natural flow of the waters of that river. In spite of that, however, the Ontario government proceeded with the construction of those works. In fact after receiving the Prime Minister's letter, in which the Prime Minister outlined to the Ontario government why this matter came under the two acts to which I have referred, the Ontario government proceeded with greater dispatch than ever in an attempt to finish the pouring of the concrete for the dam fourteen miles north of Long lake before hard frost set in. The work south of Long lake was stopped temporarily.

On February 14 last, the premier of Ontario wrote a letter to this government, which will be found in the white paper placed in the hands of each member of this house last session. I am going to deal with three passages contained in that letter. The first is as follows:

> In addition to this, the diversion would provide sufficient water to develop 35,000 horsepower, which will be required for the natural development of the district within the next two years—

I want the house to bear in mind that the Nipigon river flows some sixty or seventy miles west of Long lake and that, on that river, there are at present two very large power houses, at Alexandra Falls and Cameron Falls, developing some 60,000 horsepower. If those two power houses did not have sufficient extra capacity to provide the power, which Mr. Hepburn in this letter stated would be required within two years, then just a little further north on the same river, or I might say just south of the commencement of the river, at lake Nipigon, there are several magnificent falls, White Rapids falls, Rabbit Rapids falls and others, all very beautiful, which I am told could be utilized for the development of not less than from 90,000 to 100,000 horsepower. In addition, the publication of the Ontario government dealing with water powers in Ontario, in connection with the Kenogami river points out that within a few miles of the commencement of that river at Long lake—I went down the river myself, so I know the situation—there is ample capacity for the development of 20,000 horsepower. So that in my judgment, Mr. Speaker, the diversion of the Kenogami river is not necessary at all for the development of power. All the power required could be developed on the Kenogami or the Nipigon rivers.

Further, the diversion of the Kenogami river would destroy the 20,000 horse-power that can be developed north of the source of the river and north of Long lake. A further sentence, commencing at line 43, reads:

Since the attitude of your government was made known—

That is, made known in the Prime Minister's letter of September 7.

—we found it necessary to modify our proposed plans and we are now proceeding with only sufficient works to permit the transportation of pulpwood.

I went down the Kenogami river last summer, at which time I made a thorough survey north and south on the river and lake, and within the international watershed south of Long lake. The guides with me informed me that when Mr. Hepburn wrote his letter of February 14 to the Prime Minister the dam north of Long lake was completed. It was completed when I was there, and the work south of Long lake was well on towards completion. I can tell the Prime Minister today that all of the works are practically completed—the dam fourteen miles north of Long lake, the dam six miles south of Long lake, and the canal between the southerly dam and the south end of Long lake.

I beg the government to observe that five miles of the diversion canal and the control dam south of Long lake are located five miles within the international watershed, in absolute defiance of the Boundary Waters Treaty. That is a fine way to govern a country. I cannot help censoring both governments, this one for not enforcing section 4 of the Navigable Waters Protection Act, and the provincial government for proceeding to construct these works without authority. I ask the government. There are two good reasons why they should have acted, first, the Boundary Waters Treaty and second, the Navigable Waters Protection Act. What amazes me is the defiance of this government by the provincial government.

Then we come to the third quotation from the same letter from Mr. Hepburn, as it appears at line 17 of page 53. He writes in reference to the possibility of the Ontario government being able to obtain at Niagara Falls, a further diversion of water, equivalent to what they might pour into the great lakes from either the Kenogami or Ogoki rivers. He says this:

While recognizing the right of Ontario to further divert these waters at Niagara—

That is, for the generation of power. I want to warn the government, as forcibly as I can, under no circumstances to consider the revision of the clauses in the Boundary Waters Treaty pertaining to the division of water at Niagara Falls. At present, under that treatey, Canada receives 36,000 cubic feet per second, the United States receives only 20,000. Last summer, while pursuing this study in Washington, namely the whole subject of diversion, I came in contact with a sentiment there of which this government ought to take notice. It was that if Chicago can get along with the 1,500 cubic feet per second, which it now diverts out of lake Michigan, instead of the 10,000 it was taking some few years ago, the probabilities are that we will be asked for a revision of the Boundary Waters Treaty. So that instead of the Ontario government obtaining the right to divert an additional 1,200 cubic feet at Niagara Falls for the Kenogami diversion, and 4,000 cubic feet per second for any diversion from the Ogoki, a total of 5,200 cubic feet per second, they are likely to receive from the United States a request to redivide on a fifty-fifty basis. I warn the government under no circumstances to permit the diversion of those waters from the Kenogami or the Ogoki, and not to ask for a change in the Boundary Waters Treaty, if Chicago can get along with a lesser diversion than it has been taking.

I have been under the impression for some time that the reason the United States allowed us 36,000 cubic feet per second at Niagara Falls and took only 20,000 themselves, was that out of our 36,000 cubic feet per second they received the power developed from 13,600 cubic feet per second of our water. But it appears that is not the reason. They allowed us that extra water on account of the Chicago drainage canal diversion, a fact which came out last winter at the hearing in Washington of the application of the Chicago people for more water. At that hearing Hon. C. A. Newton quoted the late Hon. Elihu Root. At the time the Boundary Waters Treaty was written Mr. Root was Secretary of State for the United States. In explaining to the senate committee why he permitted Canada to obtain 16,000 more cubic feet per second at Niagara Falls than was received by the United States, he is quoted by Mr. Newton as having said:

Elihu Root, then Secretary of State in 1909, in explaining the treaty to the United States senate, said that the Chicago diversion was taken into account. He said that the reason the state department permitted Canada to take 36,000 cubic feet per second for power at Niagara falls, while the United States only got 20,000 cubic feet per second was that this country—

The United States—

—was taking 10,000 cubic feet per second out of the St. Lawrence watershed at Chicago.

Again I say to the government that if Chicago does get along with 1,500 cubic feet per second instead of 10,000, we might anticipate that the United States would ask for a revision of the Boundary Waters Treaty. I would not bring it up, and I would not permit diversion from the Kenogami river as an excuse for bringing it up.

May I comment further on the whole Long lake area. After making a thorough survey of it, I cannot see why in explaining its attitude in reference to the exportation of pulpwood the Ontario government contends that there would be difficulty in getting the pulpwood out of the area, and further that the pulpwood could be ground into paper at Schreiber on lake Superior. The pulpwood could be ground into paper at Long Lac where there is a good townsite. The power required could be developed on the Kenogami river, and it would be cheaper to grind the pulpwood into paper there than to divert the wood to some other point. If there is determination to take the pulpwood down to lake Superior, it would be a simple matter to do it. The height of land south of Long lake is low, and is only a mile south of the lake. It would be a simple matter to run a light railway over the height of land to transport the material to the lake five miles south of the height of land, from which point it would go naturally by water down to lake Superior.

There is no reason whatever that I can see for that diversion. If the Ontario government follows my advice it will do what was done in connection with the Newmarket canal. At the present time the locks of the latter canal are located out in the fields. The canal itself will never be used, because it has long since filled in. I suggest to the government that they leave this dam south of Long lake as an example of governmental folly, just as the Newmarket canal is an example of governmental folly. Fill in the ditch south of Long lake. In any event do not become entangled internationally over the diversion of water from these rivers to the ruination of the Albany river watershed.

I should like to refer to the Prime Minister's letter of February 22 last, which appears in the white paper. He stated:

> Your letter, after indicating the benefits of the Kenogami diversion project to the province, goes on to suggest that because of the attitude of our government the works under way have had to be partially suspended or cut down.

They were stopped for a short time but later on were rushed to completion. The letter continues:

> As the works were started before the necessary consent under the Navigable Waters Protection act had been assured, or the discussions concluded as to the possibility of an arrangement with the United States, it is apparent the responsibility for the situation which has arisen does not rest on the Canadian government.

Of course it rests with the Canadian government. Why was the Ontario government not stopped from proceeding with these works? Why was the Ontario government permitted to erect these diversion works north and south of Long lake? They certainly had no authority to proceed with them. It sems to me that our Navigable Waters Protection act is not tight enough and I suggest an amendment to conform with the United States act. The word "commenced" should be added to the first line of section four. If that word had been in the act then the Ontario government would be wholly to blame, but under the present circumstances this government must bear part of the blame.

The diversion of water from the Kenogami river will have a disastrous effect upon the Albany river, and the proposed diversion of water from the Ogoki river will be four times as disastrous to the Albany river. The Ogoki river has about four times the volume of the Kenogami. It is proposed to divert 1,200 cubic feet per second from the Kenogami and 4,000 cubic feet per second from the Ogoki. That is just about the amount of water that Chicago is asking for. There seems to be more behind this whole business than appears on the surface. I do not think the movement of pulpwood and the generation of power south of Long lake is the whole reason for this diversion. I may be entirely wrong, but I have the idea that what is behind it is the delivery into the great lakes of 5,000 cubic feet per second so that Chicago may take that much more water from the great lakes without further lowering their level. The diversion should not be allowed to go on.

The Ogoki river is a fine, beautiful river. Its width varies from five to six chains, I have been over a good deal of it. The proposal of the Ontario government is to erect a dam at Waboose falls on the Ogoki river. At the present time the stakes are in outlining the location of the dam at these falls. It is proposed to erect a dam 35 feet high. The falls themselves are 1,035 feet above sea level and the dam will raise the water level sufficiently high to back up the waters of the Ogoki river a distance of about forty miles.

Calm lake is about forty miles west of the falls and if the water is raised 30 feet, it will submerge Calm lake, and create a new lake of about 750 square miles.

If water is diverted from the Ogoki river, it will be ruinous to the Albany river. I am told by those who use the Albany river for transporting supplies into the hinterland of northern Ontario that if the suggested diversions are made from the Kenogami and Ogoki rivers, the Albany river will not be navigable during the summer months. Navigable waters are under the control of this government, and it seems to me that the government has been asleep at the switch so far as these diversions are concerned. This government should have acted to stop the proposed works on the Kenogami river, and they should have taken a definite stand in connection with the Albany river. This government ought to have taken a stern stand; they should have said to the Ontario government that navigable waters are under their control and that no diversion may take place from these rivers because it would destroy the navigability of the Albany river.

I want to point out to the government and to this house how difficult it is to revoke an agreement to divert water. I refer hon. members to the Massena diversion under which some 25,000 cubic feet per second is diverted from the St. Lawrence. This diverted water flows for three miles across New York state and is then poured into the Grasse river. It appears that about 1896 an engineer was canoeing up the Grasse river and he observed that there were practically no obstructions going up that river and scarcely any current to contend with until Massena was reached. He also knew that some three miles away were the Long Sault rapids in the St. Lawrence river. From a point north of Massena, on the Long Sault rapids, to the foot of the rapids is a distance of eleven miles. The Grasse river flows into the St. Lawrence at about the foot of the rapids. Within the eleven miles on the St. Lawrence the river drops forty feet, whereas the Grasse river in its eleven miles hardly drops at all. It was a clever idea, and of course, on being presented to the St. Lawrence River Power Company, the company obtained a charter to build the Massena power canal. That was prior to the Boundary Waters Treaty. It would never have been done had the Boundary Waters Treaty been in existence.

In 1918, the last year of the war, the St. Lawrence River Power Company applied to the International Joint Commission, which had been created under the Boundary Waters Treaty, for the right to place a weir or dam across the Long Sault or south channel of the St. Lawrence river. On this application from the St. Lawrence River Power Company being presented to the International Joint Commission, on the ground that they required additional power in order to supply the allies with very necessary war materials, the commission granted the company the right to place a weir across the south channel. That was a violation of the Webster-Ashburton treaty, which forbids any obstruction in any branch or part of the St. Lawrence river, and provides that the water shall run free on either side of the river. But permission having been granted, the St. Lawrence River Power Company commenced to erect a weir in the fall of 1918, and the agreement was that the weir, within five years or at the termination of the great war, was to be removed from the river. But as this government well knows, that weir is still in the river. I looked over the whole territory last summer and saw the weir myself. The result is that navigation in the south branch of the St. Lawrence river is impossible to-day. Even a canoe cannot go down the south branch without making a portage because of the weir.

The federal government—I do not mean this particular government—in 1922 made a very strong effort to have the diversion stopped and the weir taken out of the river; but they achieved neither object. The fact is that the weir is still there. Once the right has been given to divert water from or into an international watershed, since the United States has to be a signatory to the agreement its signature is also necessary to stop the diversion. I submit that if this government entered into any agreement with respect to the Kenogami river to divert water into the international watershed, once that was done nothing could stop the diversion, because we have not been able to stop the Massena diversion. Furthermore, I believe that the diversion of these rivers into the great lakes is not necessary.

Mr. SPEAKER: I do not want to interrupt the hon. member, but I must inform him that his time is exhausted.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Go ahead.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): Yes, by leave of the house.

Mr. SPEAKER: With the consent of the house.

Mr. MacNICOL: Thank you, Mr. Speaker; I shall take only a moment or two longer.

I am one of those who believe that, if and when the St. Lawrence canal is considered, it will not be necessary to divert water from Canada into the great lakes watershed because there are other engineering means of taking care of any lack of water.

In reference to diversions of water generally, I might say, now that I have been accorded extra time, that this whole scheme of diversions is built on a misapprehension. This whole fantastic, bizarre scheme of diversions springs from a mistaken conception of the real situation in northern Ontario. Perhaps the first man to bring this subject to public attention was an eminent engineer, for whom I have a very warm regard—I know him well—Mr. Ralph Keemle. I believe Mr. Keemle was up in that country in 1922, and he conceived the idea of making a lake up there, not a large one, by confining the waters of lake St. Joseph and lac Seul, and diverting them across into the Ogoki river, thence down into lake Superior via the Little Jackfish river, then on east. Mr. Keemle conceived the idea only as an interesting engineering problem; and it is an interesting engineering problem. He presented his idea to the late Sir Adam Beck, but, as far as I can ascertain, Sir Adam Beck did not do anything about it except to send out a reconnaissance party. I met a couple of parties up there myself later.

But Mr. Lorne Campbell, another engineer, wrote an article on Mr. Keemle's proposal, and he himself conceived the idea of making a very large lake in that country, of an area of about 15,000 square miles. His idea was to run a dam across from a point near Waboose on the Ogoki river to the Albany river, about thirty miles away, to dam the waters of these two rivers and make a great lake; and then the waters would be poured south into lake Superior. He wrote an article upon his scheme, and that article is commented upon in the Canadian Engineer of October 6, 1925, in these words:

"You would have a lake with an area of approximately 15,000 square miles," says Mr. Campbell. "You would have a flow of water from this lake estimated to be from 15,000 to 18,000 cubic feet per second, easily controllable at the canal gates. It would permit a volume more than ample to meet every difficulty with which we are now confronted, and permit Chicago to take an even greater amount of water for drainage purposes than she is now using."

When Mr. Campbell's article was brought to the attention of Mr. Keemle, who had first conceived the idea of making a lake in that territory but had thought of it only as an interesting engineering possibility, he wrote a letter to the Canadian Engineer of November 3, 1925, in which he says:

The sixth great lake, as suggested by myself, covered merging lake St. Joseph and lac Seul into one large lake by constructing dams at the outlets of both lakes and flooding out of the height of land. This lake could be used for storage for the Great lakes and the English river basin, and might lead the way for a ship canal to the west. It would flood 1,000 square miles of land and necessitate raising sections of the Canadian National railways. The value of the lake scheme is problematical and was not stressed by myself, but mentioned only as an interesting engineering possibility. Mr. Campbell seems to have conceived the same idea in practically the same words, although at a later date, but he has mislocated this lake on the map and exaggerated its dimensions.

So it was, Mr. Speaker, because of the Chicago diversion the question became a continental one and was taken up by many engineering papers.

The whole scheme of these diversions or proposed diversions was built on an impossible lake located in an impossible position. In closing, I would warn the government not to allow the Ontario government to proceed as they are proposing to do with the opening of the sluice gates south of Long lake. It was that which probably caused the recent blow-up between this government and the government of Ontario. I warn them, that if they permit those diversions to take place, they may rightly expect that when they apply to Washington to permit Ontario to take that much more water at Niagara Falls, which will result from the diversion of those two rivers, namely 5,200 cubic feet a second, they may anticipate an application from Washington to revise the clauses in the Boundary Waters Treaty pertaining to the diversion at Niagara Falls, probably to permit of a diversion on an even basis, provided the necessities of Chicago can be taken care of by the diversion now taking place at Chicago, namely 1,500 feet a second. It would be much better, as I said a few moments ago, to let that dam south of Long lake stand there, idle as the locks in the Newmarket canal stand idle. Better fill up the canal south of Long lake and never let water pass through it.

All governments occasionally make errors, and while I believe that the works have already cost in the neighbourhood of two million dollars, it would be better to forget that expenditure than to get into trouble internationally with our cousins to the south. The fact that this government did not stop the Hepburn government from proceeding with these works in 1937 is one of the reasons for the disunity between the province of Ontario and the government of Canada.

On motion of Mr. Gardiner the debate was adjourned.

At six o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

Thursday, January 19, 1939

The house met at three o'clock.

RADIO BROADCASTING

REFUSAL OF BROADCASTING PRIVILEGES TO PUBLISHER OF TORONTO GLOBE AND MAIL—TABLING OF CORRESPONDENCE

Hon. C. D. HOWE (Minister of Transport): I desire to lay on the table, as requested by the leader of the opposition (Mr. Manion), all correspondence relating to the broadcast of Mr. George McCullagh.

LORD'S DAY ACT

PENALTY FOR OFFICERS AND DIRECTORS PERMITTING VIOLATION OF THE ACT

Mr. H. E. BRUNELLE (Champlain) moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 7, to amend the Lord's Day Act.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Explain.

Mr. BRUNELLE: This bill, Mr. Speaker, is similar to the one which passed this house last session, but which was rejected by the senate. Its purpose is to change the method of punishing those who violate the provisions of the Lord's Day Act. It is felt that the penalties should be more severe.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

FRUIT

EMPIRE CONTENT REQUIREMENT AFFECTING UNITED STATES FRUIT CANNED IN CANADA AND EXPORTED

On the orders of the day:

Mr. GORDON GRAYDON (Peel): A Canadian Press dispatch from Hamilton, Ontario, carried in the local press this morning, under the headline "U. S. Fruit is Masked as Canadian Product." states that United States fruit is being canned in the dominion and exported to Great Britain under empire preferential tariffs. This charge was made by delegates attending the Ontario Fruit Growers' meeting in Hamilton yesterday. Will the government give assurance to the house that these charges will be fully investigated at once and that such steps will be taken as may be necessary to ensure that the entire fruit content of each container of processed fruit exported to Great Britain is of empire origin?

Hon. W. D. EULER (Minister of Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, a letter was addressed to me by the hon. member which, through no fault of his, did not come to my attention until just a moment or two before I entered the house.

My recollection is that the canners, at certain seasons of the year, when a supply is not available in this country, do import certain fruits for canning, which fruits are later exported. The rule, of course, is that in order to get the advantage of the preference in the British market there must be a certain percentage of Canadian content. I think it is fifty per cent, but I am not going to commit myself on that point because I am not quite certain on the point.

I need only say to the hon. member that I shall be very glad to make an investigation with regard to the matter.

OLD AGE PENSIONS

PAYMENTS TO THE OLD AND THE BLIND IN THE PROVINCE OF QUEBEC

On the orders of the day:

Mr. VINCENT DUPUIS (Chambly-Rouville): In the speech from the throne read yesterday by the lieutenant-governor of Quebec I find the following paragraph:

> Owing to the measures carried out by the present government, the old and the blind of Quebec are receiving monthly a sum of approximately one million dollars.

As this statement is bound to lead the people into error I should like to know from the Minister of Finance (Mr. Dunning) first, who established the old age pension in Quebec—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. DUPUIS: I would like hon. members opposite to be patient. First, who established old age pensions in Quebec; second, how much of the $1,000,000 paid monthly is paid by Ottawa?

Hon. CHARLES A. DUNNING (Minister of Finance): The hon. member advised me a few moments ago of his intention to ask this question, and in the short time available I have endeavoured to obtain information which, if it is not complete, I will supplement later.

The old age pensions paid in the province of Quebec have averaged in the neighbourhood of $855,000 per month for the last three months. For the same period they have averaged about $29,000 per month for pensions for the blind.

With regard to the second question, the agreement between the government of Canada and the government of Quebec with respect to old age pensions, my answer is that it was initiated not by the present government of that province but by its predecessor. I should have pointed out this most important fact, that of the $855,000 per month and the $29,000 per month seventy-five per cent comes from the federal treasury.

TARIFF BOARD

INQUIRY AFFECTING RADIO INDUSTRY—REPORT ON RADIO TUBES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. C. LANDERYOU (Calgary East): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the Minister of Finance (Mr. Dunning) whether the report of the inquiry into radio tubes which has been conducted by the tariff board will be submitted at an early day?

Hon. CHARLES A. DUNNING (Minister of Finance): I have no report at the present time, but I shall make inquiries in the matter.

GOVERNOR GENERAL'S SPEECH

CONTINUATION OF DEBATE ON ADDRESS IN REPLY

The house resumed from Wednesday, January 18, consideration of the motion of Mr. J. E. Matthews for an address to His Excellency the Governor General in reply to his speech at the opening of the session, and the proposed amendment thereto of Mr. Manion, and the amendment to the amendment of Mr. Woodsworth.

Hon. J. G. GARDINER (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, rising to speak to the motion for an address in reply to the speech from the throne and the proposed amendments thereto, I desire to join with all other hon. members who have congratulated the mover (Mr. Matthews) and seconder (Mr. Chevrier) upon the very able manner in which they addressed the house. May I also extend congratulations to the leader of the opposition (Mr. Manion) upon his having again taken a seat in the house, and particularly upon his having assumed leadership of the Conservative party in Canada. Further, may I join with all those who have spoken so kindly and affectionately of the coming visit of the king and queen to Canada.

On the order paper there are several resolutions having to do with agricultural matters, and particularly with the question of policy in regard to wheat, and in that connection I wish to place on Hansard some information which I believe will be of interest and assistance to hon. members in arriving at conclusions in connection with some of the matters which will come before parliament during the present session.

There has been considerable discussion in connection with the increase in acreage for the production of wheat in different countries, and there is some indication that that discussion has had an effect upon the line of thinking of hon. members. Particularly has there been discussion with regard to the increase in acreage in the four great exporting countries, the United States, Australia, the Argentine, and Canada.

The first set of figures I should like to place upon Hansard has to do with the average annual acreage sown to wheat between 1926 and 1935 in the following countries:

	Average acreage for period, 1926 to 1935 (million acres)
United States	66·4
Australia	14·1
Argentine	19·4
Canada	24·8

During that period of ten years in these four countries there was little variation in acreage as between one year and another. During the last five years of that time the price was low, averaging in Canada about 81 cents Fort William. The acreage sown to wheat in 1936, the year following the ten year period to which I have just referred, is as follows:

	Acreage sown to wheat in 1936 (million acres)
United States	73·6
Australia	12·3
Argentine	17·5
Canada	25·6

In three of those countries it will be noted there was no considerable increase in acreage over the ten year average. There was however an increase of seven million acres in the United States. The average price of wheat in Canada for the 1936 crop was $1.22 per bushel, No. 1 northern, Fort William. The figures for 1937, the last year for which they are complete, show the following acreages:

	Acreage sown to wheat in 1937 (million acres)
United States	81·4
Australia	13·7
Argentine	18·9
Canada	25·6

In three of the countries the acreage seeded to wheat again remained practically the same as for the previous ten year average, while that seeded in the United States increased by about eight million acres over the preceding year and by about fifteen million acres over the ten year average. Wheat sold in 1937 in Canada at an average price of about $1.31 per bushel No. 1 northern, Fort William.

I wish to comment upon those figures only to indicate that there has been a certain obstruction put upon trade between this country and the United States, in relation to wheat. During all that period there has been a duty of about 42 cents per bushel on wheat going into the United States. The result has been that while during a considerable part of the period we had in Canada a surplus of wheat stored in our elevators, for which we had not found a sale in the world markets, and while during considerable part of the period there were dry years in the wheat growing areas of the United States, our wheat did not move as freely into that market as it might have done under entirely different circumstances. In other words, obstructions of that kind have resulted in our friends in the central part of the United States trying to produce sufficient to supply their own market, with the result that their acreage has increased by about 15 million acres in the last two years, when prices were fairly good, and with rainfall of an average quantity in 1938 over that area the United States produced a bountiful crop and placed at the disposal of the world 300,000,000 bushels of wheat that we scarcely know what to do with to-day. That 300,000,000 bushels of wheat represents just 20 bushels to the acre over the 15 million increase in acreage which took place in the United States.

Then, returning to these four countries and dealing with them in another way, we find the following acreages for the year 1914, just prior to the war:

	Wheat acreage in 1914 over (million acres)
United States	53
Australia	9
Argentine	14
Canada	10

In other words there were 87·76 million acres sown to wheat in those four great exporting countries in the year prior to the war while in 1937 there were 139·6 million acres.

Commenting upon that great increase in acreage I would call the attention of the house to the fact that the increase in Canada was from 10 million to 25 million acres, an increase of approximately 15 million acres in that period of time. I believe hon. members will agree when I say that whether or not there had been a war, in view of the policy which had been pursued prior to the war of bringing immigrants in large numbers from all countries to Canada, that development of wheat acreage would have taken place. In other words it is only natural that wheat acreage should have increased in a great and new country such as Canada in the period between 1914 and 1925, during which time the lands in Canada were for the first time being broken up and settlers were being placed in sections of the country previously undeveloped.

Coming now to the countries of Europe—because not only do they produce wheat, but it is in Europe that we need a market for our surpluses—we find that Great Britain, Ireland, Belgium, Denmark, The Netherlands, France, Germany, Italy, Austria, Czechoslovakia, Switzerland, Norway, Sweden, Greece, Portugal, and Spain, were all affected more or less by the war in Europe in so far as wheat acreage was concerned. In 1914 the acreage in all those countries totalled 46,190,000. In 1937, the last year for which I have complete figures, the acreage in these countries totalled 51,090,000. There was an increase of approximately 5,000,000 in the total acreage of these countries. The greater part of this increase occurred in the Scandinavian countries which were not directly engaged in the war. During the war period and the further period of high prices these countries naturally increased their acreages. The point I wish to make is that Germany, France, Italy and some of the other larger countries which under certain circumstances might be considerable importers of wheat had not increased their acreage materially in 1937 or 1938 over that which they were cultivating prior to the war. The increase in acreage which did take place in Europe between 1918 and 1925 was to recover that which had been lost during the years when armies were marching over the natural wheat fields of those countries. There is nothing we can say by way of criticism with regard to the increased acreages in those particular countries.

On the other hand, there has been a very material improvement in Germany and Italy in the methods of producing wheat. Methods of cultivating and fertilizing have been improved to such an extent that these countries now obtain a much greater bushelage than they did previously. With a good season they are able to produce at the present time more wheat from the same acreage than they did in the years prior to the war. I think it is important that we should have these facts before us when discussing matters pertaining to that part of the agreement which has to do with the production of wheat, and I place them before the house in order that they may be available to hon. members when they are discussing this matter from day to day as the session goes along.

There were two statements made by the hon. leader of the opposition (Mr. Manion) with regard to wheat and the actions of the government in relation to wheat, and that part of the trade agreement which has to do with wheat, and which I wish to comment upon for a few moments.

The first statement was that every bushel of United States wheat that goes into the British market replaces just that much Canadian wheat. I do not agree entirely with that statement. Every bushel of United States wheat that goes into the British market does not necessarily replace a bushel of Canadian wheat. Every exporting country in the world is attempting to enter the British market, and practically every exporting country in the world does enter the British market. The extent to which we are not able to compete with our United States friends and with all other producers of wheat throughout the world may and does have some effect upon the amount of wheat which we can sell in the British market, but every bushel of wheat that goes into the British market from the United States does not necessarily prevent a bushel of Canadian wheat from entering that market.

Reference was made by the hon. gentleman to the so called six-cent preference which we have on wheat entering the British market. Before going on to deal with this in detail may I say that when we were asked by the British government to consider releasing them from their obligation to give a six-cent preference to Canadian wheat, we were not the only country in the empire asked to do this. Australia was asked also, and Australia consented. Australia is the greatest competitor within the British empire that Canada has in the British market. Australia consented and Canada consented. Why did these countries consent? Because we realized that if these two countries could sell all their wheat in the British market, if there was no other country permitted to enter that market, then the six-cent preference might have some effect upon the sale of our wheat in that market, or upon the price that we might receive for the wheat we sold there.

However, the moment that either Australia or Canada has more wheat than it can sell in the British market, it must enter the world market in order to obtain a market for its wheat. Immediately we go into the world market outside of Great Britain we must accept the world price. I think everyone in this house will realize that in spite of sentiment the British always have been wise enough in a business way to buy their food products from the country in which they can get them cheapest, provided they are of the same quality. In other words, because of the good, hard business sense of the purchaser of wheat in Great Britain we are forced on to the world market level. So far as we have been able to make out during the period this agreement has been in existence, the six-cent preference has not benefited the wheat growers of the western or any other part of Canada.

I should like to deal with a further question which was raised by the leader of the opposition. He said:

> There is the question of how business going through our own Canadian ports will be affected.

He was referring to the removal of this six-cent preference. I think I can best answer that statement by calling attention to what has actually happened. Quite properly the leader of the opposition said that it is impossible for any member at this particular stage in the development of these agreements to determine just what the results are going to be. The agreement which put into effect the so-called six-cent preference was in existence from 1932-33 until January 1 last. Wheat has been going through Canadian ports for the last eleven years and longer. I ask you, Mr. Speaker, to bear with me while I place on Hansard the particulars of the shipments of wheat through Canadian ports for the five years prior to 1932-33 and the five years following 1932-33. What do we find? For the five years prior to 1932-33 the shipments were as follows:

	Canadian wheat bushels	United States wheat bushels	Total bushels
1927-28	184,594,000	53,376,000	237,970,000
1928-29	229,952,000	46,779,000	276,731,000
1929-30	93,171,000	16,434,000	109,605,000
1930-31	148,620,000	9,988,000	158,608,000
1931-32	135,503,000	8,784,000	144,287,000
Total 5 years	791,840,000	135,361,000	927,201,000

For the five years following, the shipments were:

	Canadian wheat bushels	United States wheat bushels	Total bushels
1933-34	127,650,000	682,000	128,332,000
1934-35	95,216,000	....	95,216,000
1935-36	140,784,000	....	140,784,000
1936-37	124,590,000	120,000	124,710,000
1937-38	63,575,000	5,259,000	68,834,000
Total 5 years	551,815,000	6,061,000	557,876,000

The total amount of Canadian wheat shipped through Canadian ports in the five years prior to the coming into effect of that agreement was 791,840,000 bushels; and the total shipped in the last five-year period was only 551,815,000 bushels. Of United States wheat 135,000,000 bushels were shipped in the first period, and 6,000,000 bushels in the second period. That makes a total shipment in the first period of 927,000,000 bushels, and in the second of 557,000,000.

My hon. friends of the opposition will no doubt tell me exactly what came into my own mind when this matter was being discussed the other day, that a great many factors enter into the shipment of wheat through Canadian ports, and that this is not the only factor that might have a bearing upon such shipment. But the leader of the opposition the other day based his percentage argument on the fact that 84·9 per cent of Canadian wheat passed through Canadian ports in a certain year, the last year for which he had the figures, and only 15·1 per cent through United States ports. I call his attention to the fact that there were only 63,000,000 bushels shipped through our Canadian ports in 1937-38, in spite of the fact that it constituted 84·9 per cent of the wheat shipped through the different ports. But in another year, when the percentage figure was entirely different, there were 140,000,000 bushels shipped through Canadian ports; in another year, 135,000,000 bushels, and in another year, 229,000,000 bushels. I venture to suggest that the people of Saint John and Halifax, if they are to be affected by this argument at all, would much rather have the conditions prevailing in production, acreage and marketing where there is an annual shipment of 229,000,000 bushels through our ports rather than the 63,000,000 bushels that went through in the year when my hon. friend's percentage argument seemed to be a strong one.

Mr. MANION: I do not wish to interrupt my hon. friend, but has he the figures of the Canadian wheat crop in those various years?

Mr. GARDINER: I have not the figures here, but I frankly admit that the crop has a great deal to do with the figures, and that is the point I am trying to make, that the removal of the six-cent preference has very little, if anything whatsoever, to do with the amount of wheat that is to be shipped through the maritime ports. As a matter of fact I looked up some other information which has a much greater bearing on the shipment of wheat through maritime ports than anything having to do with the six-cent preference, and this is the information I have. Most of the grain exported through Saint John and Halifax is drawn from Canadian bay ports and it is carried by water from the head of the lakes during the season of navigation. For a great many years past the Canadian railways, with respect to grain for export, have placed the ports of Saint John and Halifax on a footing of equality, so far as railway rates are concerned, with competing United States northern Atlantic ports—Boston, Portland and New York. In other words, you can ship wheat from bay ports on lake Huron for Halifax and Saint John for the same rate that you can ship wheat from Buffalo to United States ports on the Atlantic coast, and that will explain why a great deal of wheat under certain circumstances has gone through our Canadian ports. It is a special arrangement made through our board of transport commissioners and otherwise to give rates to our Canadian ports which will make it possible for wheat to pass through them. So that in addition to the crop figures in any particular year, you have this other factor which has a bearing on the shipment through Canadian ports.

And there is another which should be considered. Something was said the other day by way of comparison of the shipments through Canadian ports before the war and now. But in 1913 and 1914 the storage facilities in all the ports of Montreal, Quebec, Halifax and Saint John for the handling of wheat on the eastern borders of Canada amounted to only 9,000,000 bushels; in other words there were only 9,000,000 bushels of elevator storage in the harbours of eastern Canada in those years. In 1923 that had increased to 15,000,000 bushels, and quite a considerable part of that increased storage capacity was installed in the year 1922.

In 1928 there was space for 19,000,000 bushels and in 1938 for 21,000,000 bushels. I believe that that increase in the facilities, which was provided largely by the government under my right hon. leader during the time he was in power previously, had considerable to do with the increased shipments of wheat from our Atlantic coast, so far as it was not brought about by crop increases and otherwise during that period; and as my hon. friend the Minister of Finance (Mr. Dunning) suggests to me, that is true particularly of the shipment of United States wheat. The facilities in our eastern ports to-day for the handling of wheat are much greater than they were before the war.

Something has been said with regard to the effect generally upon business of anything that might decrease the shipment of our wheat through these particular Canadian ports. I have in my hand a copy of an article published in the St. John Telegraph-Journal of January 10, 1939, which contains several columns of comment on this very question, but the only passage I shall quote reads as follows:

> But, as stated, freight follows grain; and if St. John is to hold her place in world trade traffic, all the available pressure must be brought to bear now.
> The federal government has bonused western farmers, at a cost estimated at $60,000,000, guaranteeing the price of eighty cents per bushel for grain which to-day sells for sixty-five cents.

They go on to argue that because of that, and because of the importance of wheat to business in our Atlantic ports, the government of Canada should do something to see to it that wheat goes through our Canadian ports. The point I wish to emphasize in connection with that statement is that wheat is not only of great importance to Halifax, Quebec, Saint John and Montreal, but it is equally important in the business build-up of cities like Fort William, and of a city like Vancouver on our western coast. It is just as important to Vancouver as it is to any of these cities on the Atlantic coast that are mentioned in this article. In other words, as has been stated time and again in this house and throughout the country, wheat produced in the central part of this continent to be shipped to the importing countries of the world is a commodity that affects the whole financial set-up and business set-up of this country; and because of that, there are certain arguments that can be adduced with respect to this particular commodity that do not apply with nearly the same force to some other commodities.

I have not time to deal further with the question of wheat to-day; in any event there are so many resolutions on the subject on the order paper that I do not think it is necessary for me to say more at the moment. But I have put this information on Hansard so that it will be available to any member of the house who wishes to have it.

There has been some discussion since this debate opened as to whether the policy of the government was sound when we contended prior to the last election—and we have followed that policy since—that trade has a great deal to do with the settlement of unemployment and other problems having to do with the development of the Dominion of Canada. The argument was summed up by the leader of the opposition the other day somewhat to this effect, that under our agreement with the United States we were paying $40 per head for what we purchased from the United States while they were purchasing goods from this country to the extent of only $3.50 per head. Now if we followed that argument to its logical conclusion we in Canada would have to sell $2,400 worth of Canadian products per family in order that the Americans might be on the same per capita basis as the Canadians who are purchasing goods from the United States. In other words the argument of my hon. friend is reduced to ridiculous proportions.

Mr. MANION: Why not have the Americans increase their purchases?

Mr. GARDINER: He started out to argue that the United States should purchase from us per capita as much as we purchase per capita from them. We, being the smaller country of the two, a country in its stage of development, a country producing great quantities of natural products which are consumed by a dense population, naturally sell a great deal to the American people; but if my hon. friend wants us to sell as much to 130,000,000 people per capita as they sell to us per capita, with our 11,000,000 people, the United States would have to buy $2,400 worth of goods from every family in the Dominion of Canada. If my hon. friend works out the figures he will find that that is correct. Anyone who follows out the argument knows that while that might be desirable for Canada, so far as the United States is concerned it would be an absolute absurdity.

Then we have the question raised whether this is a matter which could settle our unemployment problem, or whether the world situation to-day has had the effect upon our unemployment which we as a government maintain it has. I would call attention to the fact that experiences such as the present are not new. We had a similar experience just fifty years ago; we had another twenty-five years ago, and on each of these occasions exactly the same results ensued as those produced by the influences of this present period. The other day I picked up a copy of a western paper which was edited fifty years ago by a gentleman who either at that period or a little later was a member of this house, and I was surprised to find in it this statement, in the editorial column—this relates to the year 1888:

> From this distance war in Europe seems inevitable. War is a dreadful curse, yet it will put up the price of wheat.

Fifty years ago they were talking about the same influence as we have been talking about in these recent months.

> A dispatch from Rome said France must sooner or later endeavour to break the iron circle in which the unity of Italy and Germany has bound her.

That statement is identical to one which might be seen on the front pages or in the editorial columns of a newspaper to-day. And everyone who remembers the eight-year period from 1888 to 1896, about the same in point of duration as the period of stress through which we have just passed, recalls that the conditions were similar to those we have just experienced. Unemployment was just as rife, unemployment camps were just as numerous, people were getting lower wages and lower prices than we are getting now.

But, not to prolong the argument as to what happened fifty years ago, let us come down to twenty-five years ago. I ran my first election campaign in 1914, in the period immediately preceding the war, and I recall that the arguments at that time were similar to the arguments we hear now. I recall that in June of 1914 young men were sitting on the curbstones of the city of Regina and elsewhere waiting for jobs, in a period when we still had homesteads available in the western part of Canada. I recall that very shortly after that a disturbance arose which had been threatening the world for two and a half years and which convinced us as to what was the cause of unemployment. And recently, within the memory of everyone who is sitting in this house, no matter how young he may be, we have had proved to us that there has been an accumulation of causes leading to a similar result which was staved off in September of last year only by the efforts of Mr. Chamberlain, the Prime Minister of Great Britain. Knowing that, we are convinced that the greatest problem which confronts the people of the world to-day is that of maintaining the peace of the world. I have said on a previous occasion, and I repeat it now, that if the world could be assured of peace during our generation unemployment as a national problem would sink into insignificance inside of twelve months. Some of my friends of the opposition have twitted me with trying to explain away or in some way to remove from this government any responsibility it has in the matter of dealing with unemployment. If they tell me that trade has nothing to do with unemployment I will again place on Hansard the figures with regard to this matter. The figures are for December of each year:

Fiscal year	Canada's trade (000 omitted)	Wage earners unemployed
1928-1929..	$2,600,000	47,000
1929-1930..	2,400,000	90,000
1930-1931..	1,700,000	313,000
1931-1932..	1,200,000	472,000
1932-1933..	900,000	658,000
1933-1934..	1,100,000	580,000
1934-1935..	1,300,000	465,000
1935-1936..	1,400,000	388,000
1936-1937..	1,700,000	356,000
1937-1938..	1,900,000	242,000
1938-1939..	(Down)	378,000

My hon. friend said the other day that trade decreased during 1938. I agree although I have not the figures. If trade has decreased, one has only to examine the unemployment figures for that year to note that unemployment increased. Further, one might examine the figures for the past ten years in Canada to realize that as trade went down unemployment went up and as trade went up unemployment went down. In other words the figures of trade, whether this government was in power or not, will convince anyone who examines them that in Canada trade has a direct relationship to unemployment.

What about the figures for the world? In order not to weary the house I will not read a long list of them, but they bear out the same idea:

Year	World trade index	Unemployed 24 countries
1929..	100	4,225,000
1932..	74·5	11,692,000
1937..	97	5,769,000

In almost exact proportions to reductions or increases in trade, Canadian or world-wide, you have increases or reductions in the numbers of unemployed.

There is only one other matter I want to deal with, and it has to do with comments of a more or less personal nature. I would not have referred to the matter at all had the leader of the opposition (Mr. Manion) not made this particular statement. At page 48 of Hansard he is reported as having said:

> Do I draw the conclusion that he was trying to flimflam Mr. Hepburn? He is supposed to be a friend of Mr. Hepburn. The talk is that he was one of the men mixed up with Mitchell in an attempt to overthrow this government. That was the kind of talk.

And then I am asked whether I am a friend of Mr. Hepburn's. Well, I hope I am; that is a question only he can answer, but that does not mean that I must follow all my friends in all the courses they may map out for themselves. I should hope too that I am a friend of the leader of the opposition. I have known him, not intimately, but slightly, for some years and I hope I am a friend of his. But I trust the good Lord will preserve me from travelling the devious political routes which he has found it necessary to follow to reach his present position. I do not think it necessary that in order to be a friend of any person I should follow that person all the way in every direction in which he may desire to go in connection with political or any other matters. I do hope, however, that I can still sit down and discuss, both from another man's point of view and from the standpoint of the future welfare of the country, at any time, any question that may arise. I would even do so with my hon. friend in the hope of being able to convince him that he should come back to his first love. He says:

> The talk is that he was one of the men mixed up with Mitchell in an attempt to overthrow this government.

I simply wish to make this statement finally. I have been in the public life of Canada since 1911. I have been a member of a house either provincially or federally for the last twenty-five years and I consider that in that time the highlights of the political life of Canada were 1911, 1917, 1929, so far as I am concerned, and 1934 as a completion of the experience. As early as 1911 those of us who sit on this side of the house had to make up our minds whether or not we were in favour of trade arrangements with great countries like the United States, and we made up our minds in spite of the fact that the majority of the people of the country did not agree with us at that time. We are pleased, however, to find them in agreement with us now.

Again, in 1917 as a member of the Liberal party I had to make up my mind whether I was going to follow the grand old leader of the party or do what looked like the best and easiest thing for the time being. I decided, Mr. Speaker, that whatever the future might have in store, I was compelled on that occasion to stand for the principles that he had taught me to believe in, and I stood by the leader of the party of that particular day.

Then in 1929, as the leader of a party in a province, I had to make up my mind whether I would throw down a mere minority on a matter of principle, or whether I would submit to defeat, and I adhered to principle and took defeat, with the result that the people of Saskatchewan said in 1934, what they were not successful in saying in 1929, that they were prepared to wipe out the entire support of the principles that were put up in opposition to us in the election of 1929.

In other words I have found from my experience that it is a good thing to stand by principle. Personalities do not mean so very much in politics. Individual men do not mean so much in themselves. We happen to be fortunate on this side of the house in having our present leader. Someone said the other day that he was so much engaged in external matters that he had not time to deal with internal affairs. Well, I have learned to follow the leader of the Liberal party in Canada to-day because I know that when we are confronted, as we were in September, with one of the greatest crises that can face this world, we have the one man in Canada who is most capable of handling the situation to the satisfaction of the people.

Let me say this to my hon. friend. If ever I find it necessary to try to defeat a government in Canada I will try to defeat it from the outside. While I sit on the treasury benches of the dominion or of any province, any one who is writing editorials or taking any other action in connection with politics will be wise to check up the records. If he does he will come to the conclusion that I shall stay with the principles of the party no matter if the ship sinks. And I will say further that if ever I wish to oppose the government of Canada of which I have been a member I will do what my hon. friend from Kootenay East (Mr. Stevens) did—I will leave the government, I will resign, I will relinquish the emoluments of office and go to the country and fight for the principles in which I believe. But if some friend should leave, I will not remain in the government until the people of the country defeat the government to which I belong, leaving the impression I am in agreement, and then say that my hon. friend was right by taking him back and having him sit on my right hand in this house.

The position which we hold as a party in the Dominion of Canada, if we really acknowledge the trust that has been placed in us, is one that calls upon us to support principle, to support leadership, so long as it stands for principle, and to go down to defeat for principle if necessity requires it.

Hon. W. EARL ROWE (Dufferin-Simcoe): The Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner), who has just preceded me, will pardon me if I do not follow him in all the variations of his argument. However, I am delighted to find at last that he and I have something in common, because I observe from the last part of his speech, when he told the house the story of his life, that he met defeat in his life as I did in my native province.

I wish to congratulate the hon. member for Brandon (Mr. Matthews) and the hon. member for Stormont (Mr. Chevrier) on the excellent speeches they made in moving and seconding respectively the speech from the throne. I am also glad to say that I express the truest sentiments of the people of Dufferin-Simcoe when I say that it was with genuine pleasure and sincere delight that I heard in the speech from the throne of the proposed visit to Canada of Their Majesties the King and Queen. I know that every citizen in my riding is filled with renewed British pride and security and hope as he anticipates the unique occasion of this proposed royal visit. When one listens, in this section of the empire, to those who underrate our British institutions, to those who prefer the red flag to the union jack, to those who would choose the "isms" of another people, and to those who would make our national security dependent upon foreign relationships, one may very well say that the proposed visit is not only timely and appropriate but almost a necessity. I hope that visit may bring pleasure to their majesties and inspiration to Canada. I hope our people, as they pray God Save the King, may in turn resolve to save this Canada as part of the great British empire. I feel sure that this visit will renew, in no small degree, our pride in our own country and, in a greater degree, bring renewed confidence in our own empire.

I regret, Mr. Speaker, that we are about to lose from this house one of Canada's most colourful statesmen, Right Hon. R. B. Bennett. It has been my pleasure and privilege to follow him during all his years of service as our leader on this side of the house, and I know his departure will be a loss to parliament and to the country. However, I am delighted to congratulate the hon. member for London (Mr. Manion) who has assumed the great task of Leader of His Majesty's Loyal Opposition. He brings to his task an excellent character, a unique personality and splendid ability. He represents true Canadian life. In every activity in which he has engaged he has been a star performer. He excelled in the field of sports; he excelled in the field of learning; he was decorated on the field of battle and he has been made a king's privy councillor in the field of parliamentary activity. I am satisfied that he brings to his task the qualifications to make not only a splendid leader of this party but an excellent prime minister of this dominion. The right hon. Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) smiles, but may I advise him that it will not be long now.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I was going to applaud the first part of my hon. friend's statement, but I checked myself at the latter part.

Mr. ROWE (Dufferin-Simcoe): I think I have mentioned the chief feature of the speech from the throne, that is, the announcement of the visit of their majesties; because even you, Mr. Speaker, will agree that the remainder of the speech from the throne is a somewhat tiresome document, written by his majesty's advisers who sit to your right. It is pretty well filled with the glittering generalities which have epitomized the political skill of the Prime Minister for a long time, and it brings very little relief to the people of this dominion. It mentions matters of defence, trade treaty policies and unemployment, but that mention only reminds the people of Canada of the insecurity, instability and uncertainty that surround those issues to-day. The remainder of the speech is made up of gestures, and excuses, before a new election, for promises which were made before an old election.

I cannot help but think, Mr. Speaker, that the reference to our defence policies does little to remove the insecurity that surrounds that issue in the minds of the Canadian people. I would like to commend the government, however, for their declared intention to remove the profits from the manufacture of munitions. Even though it is a year late I believe that is a most commendable step to take at the present time, and I am satisfied that the government will receive support from this side of the house in any effort that may be made to control such blood money in these difficult times. However, I do feel that the people of this country, in connection with defence, are not concerned so much with the details of a certain contract or even the general details of the defence department. I believe our people are more concerned with the details of a definite national defence policy for Canada. I have not heard any hon. member to your right, Mr. Speaker, tell us where this defence policy might lead if an unfortunate crisis should arise. They have not told us that they stand shoulder to shoulder with the British Empire; and just yesterday in another place we heard the government leaders state that they were not even sure that the old land would stand by us.

I think it only fair to ask whether our defence policy is as strong as some may assume it to be. It is not nearly as strong, I submit, as it should be. I do not want to be misunderstood. I will support this government if they spend two dollars for every one dollar they are now spending in connection with defence. I believe that in the past all governments failed to assume their proper share of responsibility in connection with preparing for any crisis that might arise, a crisis that in these days sometimes seems almost inevitable. I sometimes think it would be better to spend more, knowing where we were going, rather than less if we did not know where we would be when the need did come. Is ours to be a more or less imaginary, independent defence policy? Is it to depend for its chief source of strength on some magic plan of economic appeasement to avoid attack; or in time of trouble is it going to be clearly in line with that of the friendly country to the south; or will it consist of closer cooperation with the mother country? I do not know the reason for all this mystery that surrounds this important department. One often wonders if a policy of this kind can be maintained as a political convenience for an era of peace without defining upon whom we are going to depend if an era of war should arrive.

I have already stated that the trade treaties of this government do very little to remove the instability and insecurity which exists to-day in regard to trade matters. I regret to say that I have not much confidence in the government opposite in regard to fiscal matters. I have seen them in action and I think I understand the tendencies of my right hon. friend the Prime Minister. I saw his party in power before 1929. I saw them in opposition in more difficult days, and now I have seen them in power for the last four years. I well recall the number of trade agreements that were brought into this house between 1925 and 1929. We were told that they would give the farmers higher prices for their products and allow them to buy where they could buy the cheapest. And I recall that in almost every instance those agreements opened the gates wider for the importation of cheap finished products, sweatshop articles produced in foreign countries, at the same time facilitating the export of raw and unfinished products from Canada. It has been my privilege to observe these things at close range, so I cannot help it if I am a little suspicious at the present time.

I was amazed to hear the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) suggest to-day that because we have fewer people we should buy more than the United States buy from us, with their much greater population; and having large resources we should allow them to sell us more than we should hope to sell them. I could not help thinking, "Oh for the days of 1911." Unfortunately I was not able to vote, but I thank the Lord that reciprocity was defeated without me. I cannot help recalling the arguments laid before us in those days. We were told how 120,000,000 people—probably it was about 115,000,000 then—would buy so much from 10,000,000 people, and that we could hope for a great development. I recall also the tendencies of trade and the fiscal policy of the administration in those years. I cannot help recalling that before 1929 the government of that day rode on the crest of prosperity throughout the world and derived the advantages of bountiful harvests at home. As the minister to-day made his argument which he hoped the maritime people would read, I could not help thinking that the maritime people would be surprised to find him comparing drought years with bountiful years.

During those years the government boasted of prosperity, and yet it failed to give employment to our own people. I recall that the government's fiscal policies between 1921 and 1929 left us, in the latter year, at a point where we were buying a million dollars worth of goods every day the sun rose, goods of a class or kind our own workmen could have manufactured, more than we were selling. To no small extent that is the reason why between the years 1921 and 1930, the time to which the government to which the minister has referred held office, more people left Canada to find employment in the United States than were born in this country.

What further evidence could we have of the weakness of a fiscal policy which could not survive even in days of bountiful harvest and world prosperity? Yet to-day we are asked to believe that this same policy of fiscal laissez-faire will bring about economic appeasement which will make all well. The Minister of Agriculture pleads of course for world peace. The Prime Minister prays for world peace and good weather, in order to bring back prosperity as in years past. We were told during those years that we must not provoke the United States. We are now told that we must take the lead and show the magic way by a new plan of economic appeasement. We are told we must make our tariffs lower than those of any other country, and all this during the most highly competitive industrial period of our age.

It is not my purpose on this occasion to review at length the Canada-United States agreement. I do feel however that I must make some observation to indicate how it appears to me. We are told by the Prime Minister that the agreement will be brought down in the near future. I cannot help thinking that the Canadian people as yet have not studied it carefully. The doubt I entertain as to the treaty-making ability of the party sitting to your right, Mr. Speaker, is not relieved to-day. I view the proposed treaty with much more alarm than I should like to express.

I observe that last year we bought from the United States $130,000,000 worth more of goods than we had bought the year before of a class or kind which could be made by our workmen who are tramping the streets to-day. This condition to no small extent can be traced to the weakness of the trade agreement of 1935. For that reason I am asking how we can have much confidence when we view the agreement and find it is proposed to reduce the tariffs to a point lower than that which obtained in 1935. Not only is the tariff placed at a point lower than it was placed in 1935, but it is reduced on a greater volume of goods. The United States can reduce its tariff only to the extent of fifty per cent. We lower ours all the way along the line, and all for fear we may provoke them and for the purpose of developing this great policy of economic appeasement.

I observe the three per cent excise tax is removed from the produce of United States manufacturers, but the eight per cent sales tax is left on the Canadian manufacturers. One cannot help but view with alarm the advantages gained under the treaty by twenty five or twenty-six other countries under the most favoured nation provision. These advantages are given to the sweatshops and cheap products of other countries and there is very little hope for a quid pro quo.

As a farmer I can see very little advantage for the apple growers in the east or the fruit and vegetable growers in the central part of Canada. Not only do they lose advantages in the British market but under the proposed treaty they will meet new competition in their own. I can imagine the advantages which will be paraded before the producers of western Canada by the Minister of Agriculture. The producer will be told that he can ship more cattle than he could last year. But that producer will find that by a peculiarly smart provision he has a larger quota when he has less to sell and a lesser quota when he has more to sell.

To my mind the treaty bristles with dangers, bristles with possible destruction for the major industry of Canada, and offers very little to the other primary industries. As I see it, it is a sacrifice on the altar of a so-called economic appeasement. It sacrifices the great advantages gained in the empire agreements of 1932 and accentuates the weaknesses of the 1935 agreement with the United States. It surrenders jobs to United States workmen and forfeits the three per cent excise tax so sadly needed for our revenue. Yet we are told that we should support it, because it is a step towards the economic appeasement of the world.

These are only a few of the first impressions I have gathered from the proposed treaty. In the light of the government's record I would say that the most alarming feature is the basis of fear upon which the treaty seems to have been made. Do not let us confuse the issue. Sound and solid trade policies in Canada have never in the past and will not in the future interfere with or prejudice our friendly relations with the great republic to the south. Do not let anyone camouflage the issue by telling us that until we give the people of the United States everything they want they will be provoked. There seems to be a suggestion that we should throw down our barriers to permit the sale of mass production from the United States, in order that we may get our raw products into that market so that they may fabricate them. The suggestion is that unless we do that we will be guilty of some form of provocation or that we will not be working towards economic appeasement and that we will be endangering those cherished and friendly relations which we have long had and no doubt will continue to have, no matter what type of policy we may pursue.

We might just as well say that the spineless and haphazard fiscal policies of this government would soften the stubborn and heartless military policies of some European dictatorships. We might as well say that you must give everything, if you are going to have peace, even with a friendly country. The economic appeasement of the world is a high and lofty motive. I commend the Prime Minister upon having made that reference. But as long as we have ablebodied men in Canada pleading for jobs to restore their morale, men whose wives should be spending more earned money and thereby improving our prosperity, I say that our first duty as Canadian public men is towards the economic appeasement of the idle men in Canada.

This brings me to the subject of unemployment. The Minister of Agriculture has said that in those years when we had great prosperity only 100,000 or so were unemployed. I can remember the hon. member for Kootenay East (Mr. Stevens) stating, I believe in 1928, that 1,100,000 men had left this country between 1920 and 1930 to find employment.

The hon. member says there were only 100,000 left at home that were unemployed. Why should there be any unemployed after all the boasting of prosperity that we heard?

May I remind him that during the years 1931, 1932 and 1933, when the party to which I have the honour to belong was being condemned and criticized by the opposition because there were a few hundred thousand unemployed in Canada, according to a return by a department in Washington over 400,000 Canadians who had gone to that country to find jobs had returned to Canada and no more were being allowed to enter. Why would we not have unemployment?

Unemployment is a condition that gnaws at the very heart of this young dominion. I was disappointed the other day when I read a speech made in Montreal by the Minister of Agriculture. He said that fundamentally we had no unemployment problem at all. I could not help thinking of the days that are gone and the years that are past when I sat in this house and heard the present Prime Minister say in 1930 that there was no unemployment. Yet we have the Minister of Agriculture stating now that there were a hundred thousand unemployed. Just a few days after the Prime Minister made that statement he had to call out the militia and the horse guards to keep them away from the front of the parliament buildings. They did not see the problem then and they do not see it now.

This is and has been a national problem. The man who first saw it as a national problem was the former leader of this party, the hon. member for Calgary West (Mr. Bennett). He recognized it as a national problem and in 1930 called a special session to deal with it as such. However, I think he would be the first to admit that perhaps he did not go as far as he should have gone at that time. Since 1929, since unemployment was assumed as a national problem, we have spent one billion dollars. What for? To give direct and work relief. But we have not even touched the real problem itself. We are waiting for the fears of war to disappear, we are waiting for bountiful crops, we are waiting for the curtailment of wheat production in other countries; we are trusting to the peace of the world and the Lord of the weather. We are relying too much on the policy of laissez-faire and do nothing.

It is no longer a problem merely of dealing with the man or the woman who is unable to work. That problem was dealt with long ago. Even Queen Elizabeth with her poor laws gave relief in 1601 to the poor people who were unable to work. This problem is not one of direct relief, but it is the direct responsibility of the national government. It is a problem not confined to the boundaries of our own nation but one that goes into international circles. It is not a matter of dealing with poor people who are unable to work; it is a matter of providing employment for the employable men and women of Canada.

A commission was set up by this government to investigate the labour situation. Every time this government is faced with a problem it appoints a commission and prays that there will be an election before any action has to be taken. To my mind it is most important and essential that the major aspects of the relief problem should be dealt with by this government. No longer can the government rest upon its oars and say the municipalities should deal with this form of aid. The municipalities can deal with those who are unable to work, but responsibility must be assumed by this government for those who are able to work. We must differentiate between the two. We must have a new outlook on the unemployment situation. It is national in scope and it should be a national responsibility. The provincial governments may be left to deal with those who are unemployable, with those who are unable to work, but the larger issue of employment should be met by national measures. It should be under national control and be assumed as a national responsibility.

I hope that before another election comes around this government will be prepared to assume responsibility rather than continue to dodge the issue. We hear there is to be an unemployment insurance policy for Canada. I submit that the people of this country do not want an unemployment insurance policy, they want an employment assurance policy. That is what our people need. We want the assurance of work for our people rather than insurance against defeat and relief. We take out insurance against damage by hail, by storms, against death and so on. Perhaps that is why this government is suggesting an unemployment insurance plan. Apparently they admit the death of the issue, apparently they realize the hopelessness of it all unless the weather changes and the peace clouds rise.

I could elaborate upon this if I had more time. There are national advantages that lie behind an employment assurance plan and there are dangers that bristle in an unemployment insurance plan. One of the great dangers in relief is the loss of morale and initiative by those who accept relief for nothing. This problem should be fitted into the fiscal policy of the government as well as any public works plan. There should be some recognition of the problem by the dominion and the provincial governments. I regret that at the present time it is being found quite difficult to have a friendly conference by the so-called happy family of Liberalism as it is constituted in disunity to-day. I am glad the Minister of Agriculture has said that all is well and that this danger is soon to disappear.

If the government recognizes this problem as I have indicated it sketchily there will have to be a readjustment in the revenues of the dominion and the provinces. Everyone who has any knowledge of industry and finance knows something of the inequitable burdens imposed by the many variations of duplicate taxation. No doubt the adoption of a national employment assurance policy would require some adjustment in the revenues of the provinces. I do not want the Prime Minister to think that I am critical of everything he does, because I have seen him do some things that would have been done even by the leader of the opposition. However, I do suggest to him that I believe the time has come when we should deal with this matter as a national problem. Consideration should be given to national revenues in order that this national emergency may be met. In this connection I would suggest that all income tax be placed under the federal authority. More than that, the stock transfer tax and the corporation tax might well be transferred to one central body. I do feel that if that were done and the federal government assumed full responsibility for a national employment assurance scheme, our people would be satisfied to meet the obligations it would involve.

Income taxes more than any other form of tax should be used for the protection of income. In other words, the mass income of the earning people of Canada may very properly be the bulwark protecting income for the employable masses of Canada. If my proposals were accepted, which would involve the income tax being more broadly based than it is at the present time, and those earning income in Canada had an opportunity to contribute to such a plan of national employment assurance, I believe that no one would be averse to making an income tax contribution to a sound national employment assurance plan applicable throughout this dominion.

I do not want to be understood as suggesting that this should be the only tax to be diverted to the federal treasury, although I suggest it is the most important one; I believe that the other taxes I have mentioned might well be considered in this connection. I do not wish to labour the point as to what advantages would accrue, but I know that there are few in business or industry to-day who would not say that it would be a great relief if they even paid the same amount of tax as they do to-day into one central fund rather than to half a dozen different sources. If some definite effort were made by the government along this line it would go a long way towards encouraging industry.

I consider that the capital and earnings of industry other than those paid in salaries, wages and dividends, should be free so far as possible from tax impositions in order that some of the shackles may be removed from industrial enterprise and national expansion.

The adoption of such a policy would not only be a step in the direction of doing away with the duplication of taxation that exists to-day, but would mean a corresponding saving in the cost of administration.

There might be some objections, it is true, from those who believe that we are centralizing too much authority in the federal government. But I do not believe it ever was the intention of the fathers of confederation that we should be nine sovereign states within a state. It was never their intention that the provinces should flout and exploit the very basic sovereignty of their autonomous rights. I do not believe that a limited centralization of authority along some of the lines that I have suggested would constitute any premature centralization that might aggravate the disharmonies inherent in a federation. The whole system seems to me to have grown almost out of hand. It was not expected that the provinces should surrender their sovereign rights, but I believe that the fathers of confederation intended much to be left to the good sense of the men they hoped would be in power, knowing that there must be some things that are definitely federal in character and others definitely provincial. I do not believe you can wipe out functions that are definitely provincial, but there are certain forms of taxation that should be centralized in the central body, for primary and productive efforts. There are certain functions that are definitely provincial, and others that are definitely national in character and which must always be considered a dominion responsibility.

I believe the government should give careful consideration not only to a plan of national employment assurance but to plans for reducing the cost of government in so far as our constitutional machinery will permit. There is only one way in which it can be done and that is by the time-honoured British custom of conference, compromise and conciliation between the provinces and the dominion, and I want to compliment the Prime Minister in this connection. I believe that he has excellent ability and can achieve something through conference, compromise and conciliation between the provinces and the dominion. I hope that something along that line will be done in order to bring about a more friendly relationship between the provinces, to show the way to those who are to-day confused by the present duplication of taxation, to give hope to those who are tired of waiting for jobs and relief to those who are disappointed in the present lack of action.

I can conceive of no plan or ideal of national service that is more necessary at the present time or more worthy of a democratic people than something along these lines. I can conceive of no national policy which would more effectively protect, encourage and develop the ideals of democracy than one which will gainfully employ our people and thereby assist them to reestablish themselves—a policy that will give gainful employment to those who seek jobs, a type of employment that will enable the family spending their earned income to keep their self-respect. I think that is the only way in which we can hope to restore confidence in our institutions and in national leadership.

The people of this country are pleading to-day for a national policy. They are pleading for a national hope, for a release from a policy of laissez-faire and do-nothing, before doubt, discontent and disunity further threaten the progress which our people desire.

May I commend to the government and their supporters, and especially to the Minister of Agriculture, who I regret is not in his seat at the moment, the issue of the Financial Post of January 7 last, where they will find, neatly compiled, editorial comment from newspapers representing districts both of our near east and the far west. Among these are—

Mr. SPEAKER: The hon. gentleman has exhausted his time.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): Finish the sentence.

Mr. SPEAKER: With the consent of the house.

Mr. ROWE (Dufferin-Simcoe): I do not wish to trespass beyond my time, Mr. Speaker, but if I have the consent of the house I shall take only a moment to finish. I hope that the government will read this editorial comment in the Financial Post coming from newspapers representing practically all sections of Canada and including the Toronto Telegram, Fort Erie Times Review, North Bay Nugget, Brantford Expositor, Winnipeg Free Press, Northern Pas, Saskatoon Star, Calgary Albertan, Swift Current Sun and Prince Rupert News. I shall quote only a short extract or two.

The Prince Rupert News "sees all faces turned to Ottawa for action." It recalls that Laurier did not have to be prodded into action but that the present Prime Minister seems to be lagging in leadership. It says:

> What the country sees to-day is that many people are idle, and having no Liberal leader, they are listening to subversive leaders who will destroy them as those who followed the pied piper were destroyed.

The Swift Current Sun speaks in similar vein. It refers especially to the vicious, demoralizing influence of Canada's present relief policy. It urges the need of leadership in respect of unemployment and relief to end the moral and social stagnation of the present situation. It says:

> There is at present a most vital challenge to the statesmen and leaders of Canadian national life, which to our mind is paramount to all other problems, that of finding some solution to the unemployment problem with which is tied up the moral and social stagnation which it engenders. Everyone is agreed that continual dishing out of relief cannot ever solve the dilemma; it merely hastens the evil day when the national structure would crumble because the fibre is eaten away.
> Happiness, contentment and national well-being come only by honest work and an adequate recompense giving a measure of security for the people. The course we are drifting along now is an unpractical one and a vicious one because it is destroying something which wont be built up so easily again.

I thank you, Mr. Speaker, for my overtime, and I trust that the government may give what the country is asking for, the action which they promised in 1935.

Mr. J. C. LANDERYOU (Calgary East): Mr. Speaker, the speech from the throne, I am sorry to say, does not indicate any effective solution of the many difficulties that confront the people of Canada to-day. There is no solution offered for the many problems which have vexed our people now for many years, and many of which have increased in severity since the Liberal party have occupied the seats of authority. The leader of the opposition (Mr. Manion) has stated that the present administration is a do-nothing government. With that I agree. But we must also remember that the government of which the hon. member himself was a member occupied the seats of authority in the years 1930 to 1935 and were defeated, in fact suffered the greatest defeat that party has ever experienced.

Reference has been made to the coming visit to Canada of Their Majesties King George VI and Queen Elizabeth. All classes of the Canadian people view with pleasure the coming visit. However, greater pleasure would be evidenced in many quarters if economic conditions which now obtain in Canada were not in such a chaotic state, if the widespread and needless suffering and misery which now abound in this country had been corrected by the present administration. In the speech from the throne we find the following words:

> The government shared in the general sense of relief that the appalling disaster of war, which threatened Europe during the month of September last, was averted, and in the recognition which that crisis manifested of the widespread will of the peoples for peace. They are hopeful that the efforts now being made to find a solution for the specific differences which are causing friction will meet with success. They recognize, nevertheless, that time is required for these forces to work, and that the possibility of further tension in the meantime must be faced. In this situation, the government have considered that the uncertainties of the future, and the conditions of modern warfare, make it imperative that Canada's defences be materially strengthened.
> Two years ago, the appropriations for defence were substantially increased, and a beginning made on a program of modernization to safeguard the country from the dangers of attack. The government intend to pursue this policy vigorously, and to propose to parliament that the program of defence should be further augmented, and that particular emphasis should be laid upon air defence.

Thus we find that the government recognizes the danger in the European situation and intends to take steps to preserve Canada's national integrity against attack. In so far as the danger of attack is concerned I am not greatly alarmed, for I cannot think of any nation in Africa, in Asia or in Europe which could consider at the present time or in years to come any successful invasion of this country; and I say this after considering the statement recently made by the President of the United States to the effect that that republic was prepared to come to the assistance of Canada in case of attack. However, in view of existing conditions I am not opposed to the government strengthening Canada's defences providing the money expended will be issued debt free. The last war created much hardship; many problems arose, and I believe that the method we used in financing that war was responsible for a great many of these problems. We must take the profits out of war. It has been estimated that it cost $25,000 for every soldier killed in the last war. Someone was making a profit out of every body that lies on the fields of battle. It was blood-money. We are opposed to the method pursued during the last war of piling up debts which future generations are left to face.

The mad race for armaments has been going on in the world for many years. Billions of dollars have been spent. Tremendous wealth and energy have been expended. Germany, a country smaller in area than the province of Ontario, and with a population of over seventy millions of people, has spent billions of dollars. France, small in area, with a population of over forty million people, has spent billions of dollars on armaments besides providing for the needs of her people. Italy, also small in area, with a population of approximately fifty millions, has spent billions of dollars upon instruments of destruction. The same is true of England. Thus we find that in the four countries I have mentioned, where more than two hundred millions of people live, billions of dollars have been appropriated for the production of implements of war. How is it that Canada, having a large geographical area, with a population of approximately twelve million people, with more natural resources per capita than are possessed by any other people on earth, cannot maintain its institutions? How is it that our educational and health facilities are being undermined? How is it that municipal, provincial and federal governments are unable to finance the social and economic legislation which they feel is necessary? How is it that we are told that the deficits of the Canadian National Railways will bankrupt Canada? All this in spite of the fact that Canada is fifth among the great trading nations of the world? Something is radically wrong with our economic set-up. There is no good reason for the widespread suffering and want which exist in Canada, where we have only twelve million people, willing and anxious to provide from its tremendous natural resources all the commodities they may desire.

I wish to refer now to some questions by Mr. Hellmuth and some answers by the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Mackenzie) as contained on page 10 of the report of the royal commission on the Bren machine gun contract. The question was asked by Mr. Hellmuth:

> So that there has been no change in the actual policy of the government, or of the Minister of National Defence, that government ownership is the best and that the next is competition?

The answer was:

> Quite correct, provided you will give us the finances, the money.

Q. Yes; if you do not have money you cannot do anything?

A. Money is everything; when you are running the Department of National Defence you can't run it without money.

Q. I put it before you here, that the best plan is government ownership?

A. I thoroughly agree with you.

The minister said that there were two very definite schools of thought in the department and that he assumed all responsibility. One school, he said, was headed by the then chief of general staff and the other by the deputy minister, for both of whom he said he had equally great admiration.

The minister said that General Ashton (the then chief of the general staff) was very insistent upon the development of government arsenals and that the former chief of general staff, General McNaughton, evolved a very comprehensive scheme for Valcartier which would include practically all the requirements of the Canadian forces.

That was considered after I went into the department and I found that the cost of it would be something between $30,000,000 and $35,000,000. With my meagre $25,000,000 or $30,000,000, what could I do with a scheme like that?

I heartily agree with the Minister of Defence that money is everything. You cannot do very much without money. But I would remind the government and particularly the Minister of Defence that in 1935 the Liberal party went to the people of Canada with the outstanding promise of monetary reform. They stated that control of money and credit should be restored to parliament and considered as its most sacred obligation. They further stated that money and credit would be issued to meet the industrial, the public and domestic need. That promise has not been fulfilled, in spite of the declaration by the Prime Minister that all the promises of the Liberal party have been carried out. We find now that the Minister of National Defence is unable to carry out the policies in which he and his advisers believe. Why? Because they are short of money. I have no hesitation in saying that many of the other ministers who sit on the treasury benches are faced with exactly the same problem. They find it impossible, on account of lack of money, to pursue many of the policies they and their advisers support.

Increased purchasing power is Canada's most urgent need at the present time. Municipal and provincial governments as well as the federal government are in need of more money. The consumers of the country are in need of more money to purchase commodities and services that can be produced and rendered in Canada. When we advocate increased purchasing power for the Canadian people, the Minister of Finance (Mr. Dunning) at once sets up straw men and begins to knock them down. Others say that we are out to turn the printing presses loose and flood the country with Bank of Canada bills. We have never advocated such a policy. All we say to the government is that they should have our monetary system reflect our collective ability to produce and render goods and services in Canada; that when there is idle labour and unused material, money should be issued so that that unused material and idle labour can be brought into production. We say, go thus far. Issue purchasing power so that the amount of money available in the hands of the people will be sufficient to equate the value of the goods and services that can be produced and rendered in Canada. In other words, make financially possible that which is already physically possible.

Before the election in 1935 the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) said that in the next parliament a great battle would be fought with the money powers. Instead of battling with the money powers they battled with the provinces. They have battled with the provinces on many occasions. They have battled with the money powers against the provinces. They have even battled with one another. It is no wonder the premier of Ontario declares that he is no longer a Mackenzie King Liberal; no wonder the farmers of Saskatchewan advocate secession; no wonder the Liberal government of that province forwards a resolution to the federal government requesting them to carry out the promise with regard to monetary reform.

The policies pursued by this government are gradually undermining confederation and democracy in Canada. Ways and means can and must be found of correcting our economic ills without the surrender of any of our democratic rights, without centralizing authority in this government, without establishing a dictatorship, without making the provinces either politically or financially subservient. The democratic rights of our people can best be preserved by maintaining provincial autonomy.

The election slogan of the Liberal party in the 1935 campaign was "King or chaos." Unfortunately we got both. Where is the cooperation that was to exist between the federal government and the provinces? Among many things, the trade tariff and monetary policies pursued by this government have worked inimically to the best interests of many sections of Canada. The disabilities from which those sections are suffering must be corrected. I see no indication in the speech from the throne that the government intends to discuss these matters with the provinces apart from the possible discussion of unemployment. One would be led to believe, after listening to speeches made by members of the Liberal party, that all the loyalty in Canada was wrapped up in the bosom of that party. Let me say, however, that Alberta and we who represent that province are as loyal to confederation as are any of those who now occupy treasury benches, and I am sure the same could be said of the other provinces and their representatives, no matter to which party they may belong. However, any slogan of "King and unity" to replace the "King or chaos" slogan of 1935 will not be accepted by the Canadian people unless definite action is taken to remove the many injustices from which they are suffering.

Reference has been made to the new trade agreement recently signed by Canada and the United States. We are in favour of world trade, but not of trade war. We believe that more attention should be paid to the development of Canada's home markets. Much could be done in the development of our coal, oil and sugar industries. In fact, I have read recently many editorials in the Halifax Herald depicting the terrible condition that exists in connection with the miners and fishermen of Nova Scotia. I visited the coal mining areas of Alberta and asked in one particular section what the problem was there. They said that it was simply a problem of unemployment and partial employment. They said that if an order could be secured for two million tons of coal their troubles would be over. We import from fifteen to seventeen million tons of coal every year. Why talk about blasting our way into foreign markets when we cannot secure our own?

Let me read from a pamphlet put out by L. R. Lipsett, K.C., LL.D., O.B.E. Under the title, "National Coal Policy for Canada," the author writes:

> Had the provinces of Ontario and Quebec during the past thirty years, taken a broad view of what was necessary for the prosperity of Canada as a whole, and had those provinces adapted themselves to using Canadian coal, much might have been done to redress the adverse trade balance, but eastern Canada blindly continued to import millions of tons of American coal, for the sake of immediate savings in expense, regardless of the fact that this was bound to make other provinces, sooner or later, unable to pay for the goods they manufactured.
> Results, apparent to everyone to-day, might well have been foreseen for a number of years past, had a longer view been taken by the eastern manufacturing and financial interests, by the Canadian railways, and by the various governments from time to time in power.
> The drain on nation finances.
> The second outstanding fact which emerged from a study of the problem from the national standpoint, is the enormous annual drain on Canadian resources necessary to pay for importations of American coal. In the coal statistics for Canada (Coal Statistics for Canada, 1936. Page 18.), published by the dominion bureau of statistics, it is stated that about $450,000,000 were sent out of Canada during the last ten years for imported coal, practically all of which was sent to the United States of America. This was the figure paid to the American mine owners for coal, and when the railway freights from the American mines to the Canadian border are added, the money sent out of the country during these ten years, would far exceed $500,000,000, or a sum of over $50,000,000 each year.
> Consider for one moment what this sum, it it had been kept at home, would have meant to Canada, and the effect it would have had on the balance of trade as between Canada and the outside world. Consider also the effect, during these past ten years, of the creation within Canada of this $50,000,000 of new wealth each year, and its contribution to the well-being of the country, and to the problem of unemployment, which has been so acute during most of the period.
> If one assumes that $5 per day would represent an average day's wage, then this $50,000,000 annually sent out of Canada would represent approximately 10,000,000 days work each year, or enough to give employment to well over 40,000 unemployed men for about eight months each year.
> Direct prosperity would certainly accrue to the Eastern manufacturers and workers who would receive substantial orders, not now forthcoming, as a result of the enormously increased buying power of the workers and operators in the coal producing areas of Canada, and of the railways and railway workers, who would benefit by its transportation.

I ask the government to consider passing much needed social legislation. If they would reduce the age for qualification for the old age pension to sixty, this would provide an opportunity for employment for thousands of young men now tramping the highways and byways of this country in search of work. If they would provide pensions to widows of ex-service men who saw service in actual theatres of war, they would also be helping a very worthy class. From the letters I have received from many of these widows, I know how difficult it is for them to establish the fact that the death of their husbands could be attributed to war causes. I should like to read a letter from the Canadian Soldier Non-Pensioned Widows' Association:

> We the Canadian soldier non-pensioned widows request you to give your consideration to the following:
> First the sacred promise made by Canada's War Prime Minister—The Right Honourable R. L. Borden—"That, Canadians we are proud of you, you can rest assured that you and your kin will never suffer, Canada owes that to you for the great honour you have brought to our great dominion."
> Since the great war ended many of our Canadian heroes returned, but through their great sacrifices have gone to an early grave, leaving their dependents in unfortunate circumstances over which they had no control, have been forced to exist upon unemployed relief. As the widows of pensioners are receiving a full pension we request that as our loss is equal to theirs that we also be fully pensioned.

We gave our consent for our husbands to give their all for our glorious empire, that it would be maintained for the honour, glory and benefit of civilized christianity—we therefore ask that the War Prime Minister's promises be upheld.

I also have received a request from the city of Calgary that this government pass legislation to provide financial assistance to expectant mothers during the period of their confinement. The letter states:

The special health committee of the council of the city of Calgary, in meeting recently, gave consideration to a report from the city's medical officer of health, Dr. Hill, wherein it was stated that infant mortality in the city of Calgary, as elsewhere in the Dominion of Canada, was overly heavy due to the fact that expectant mothers were not being given any financial assistance either by the dominion, provincial or municipal governments. Dr. Hill believed, and so stated in his report, that the situation in this regard could be considerably improved upon if an expectant mother was assured some financial assistance during the period of her confinement.

I should like the government also to consider the advisability of reducing the age at which the blind may qualify for pension from forty to twenty-one years. That has been done in New Zealand.

Just here I should like to refer to a statement made by the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell), as follows:

This statement is proven by what has occurred in New Zealand, where a government with philosophy and ideals similar to those which we advocate has been able since 1935 to assist the people of that country to solve problems which, according to the speech from the throne now before us, seem insoluble.

I thoroughly enjoyed the address of the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar, but I cannot agree when he attempts to say that the ideals and principles of the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation are being implemented in New Zealand, or that the government of that country is attempting to translate the ideals of his party into reality there. I have read many speeches delivered by the Prime Minister of New Zealand and his colleagues, and in them I find no reference whatever to the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation or to socialism. I should like to read the statement made by the Prime Minister of New Zealand, Hon. M. J. Savage, when he was questioned as to his connection with the social credit organization:

The Prime Minister (Hon. M. J. Savage) said the leader of the opposition had accused the government of having made arrangements with the Douglas credit organizations. Now, what were the Douglas credit organizations trying to do? They were trying to get for the people the things that the people were capable of producing. Well, who had a better right to them than the people themselves? There was any amount of room for difference of opinion about this; that, unless the buying power of the people was enough to equate the value of their production they would never get out of the mudhole which the last government created for the country. Unless the buying power of the people increased with the increasing production, what was the use of increasing production?

They had the right to govern in the financial sphere; and everything they did in that sphere was based on the public credit. Had not the time come for basing their money system on the goods they produced and the services they rendered to each other?

Then, from the report of another speech made before eight thousand people at the King Edward barracks, Auckland, I quote:

The Prime Minister said that unless the government of a country controlled the credit of the country it could not control anything else.

"I don't suggest that this means socialization. . . . I am not prepared to predict what will happen to the money system in this or any other country at any long period ahead, but I do believe that there can be no freedom unless the mass of the people have freedom to buy, and that is economic freedom. Without economic freedom no nation can ever be free." The clear objective of the labour party was to make money the servant of man instead of the master.

So I believe the government of New Zealand is attempting to implement the principles and ideals for which the social credit party of this country stands. I should like to refer also to a statement by the right hon. Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King), appearing at page 60 of Hansard for January 16, 1939:

Men will not put out their money to invest in the different industries. They are withdrawing their capital from industry. Ask the Minister of Finance (Mr. Dunning), who is sitting here to-night, how much of the investment of capital to-day is going into government securities at a low rate of interest in comparison with what took place in former years.

Then he went further:

Labour and capital are both essential to production, and whatever paralyzes one paralyzes the other in the matter of effective production.

There are many factors that enter into this industrial paralysis. I do not believe it is as simple as saying that when capital is paralyzed, labour is idle and industry slumps. I believe that if the consumers of this country had more money, that money would be spent on goods and the wheels of industry would turn once more. The reason for industrial paralysis is not any fear of something external; it is the definite knowledge in the minds of those who control capital that if they were to invest their money in creating more products of industry, the people would be unable to pay for them; for to-day, as for many years past, we find the great production of Canadian industry being disposed of on the instalment plan, fifty cents or a dollar down and a dollar when you catch me. If we have to mortgage the future in order to purchase these goods to-day; if we have to allow these loan shark companies to loan millions and millions of dollars to the consumers in order to complete the purchase of goods bought on the instalment plan, it should be apparent to all that the only thing this country needs is more purchasing power. Municipal, provincial and federal governments require it just as much as the consumers require it. I plead with the government to take definite steps to deal with Canada's social and economic problems, so that a greater measure of peace, happiness and prosperity may be made available to all.

Mr. H. R. FLEMING (Humboldt): Mr. Speaker, at the outset of my remarks this afternoon I should like to offer my congratulations to the mover (Mr. Matthews) and seconder (Mr. Chevrier) of the address in reply to the speech from the throne.

During the parliamentary recess the right hon. leader of the government (Mr. Mackenzie King) again demonstrated to the Canadian people that he is one of our greatest statesmen. His handling of the international crisis through which we passed deserves the approbation and gratitude of the entire nation. His conception of the Canadian angle of the problem was dominated by past pronouncements made in this house and to the Canadian electorate; and while jingoistic newspaper writers from coast to coast thundered against him, he remained steadfast to those pronouncements and never once made a false move or issued an unconsidered statement.

We also have reason, Mr. Speaker, to be proud of the calibre of the men in the public life of this country. May I congratulate the leader of the opposition (Mr. Manion) upon his election to that high office and also upon gaining a seat in the House of Commons. He took the stand of a statesman and followed the best of British traditions when, in our hour of greatest peril, he offered no criticism of the government, but said that he was ready to stand by and aid in any emergency. That was the stand of a statesman and a soldier, and one which has enhanced his reputation in the hearts and minds of many Canadians. Such chivalry is characteristic of only one race, the Irish, to which he belongs.

Another event of extraordinary interest has occurred in the interval since parliament prorogued. Their Gracious Majesties the King and Queen have agreed to visit these shores, the first reigning monarchs ever to visit a dominion. We are deeply honoured and jubilant. Their visit will do much, if such were needed, to reaffirm our belief in the soundness of our political alliances. Their visit to the United States we may be confident will also do much toward cementing the friendly feeling which exists between the empire and the great democracy to the south of us, whose long and mutual accord and respect we deeply value, and of which we are so justly proud. No words of greater import were ever uttered in human history than when last summer at the opening of an international bridge, in the presence of the king's representatives and in the presence of the Prime Minister of Canada and responsible ministers of the crown, the President of the United States said that if Canada were ever attacked the United States would not stand idly by.

The visit of their majesties will give us an opportunity of showing them our loyalty and devotion to their persons. It has been my fond hope that my constituency might have had an opportunity of giving such a demonstration. While I realize that their majesties' time is limited, I thought it would have been a nice gesture on their part if they could have visited the largest German and Icelandic settlements in Canada. Many of my constituents come from the Munich area in Germany, where Mr. Hitler and Mr. Chamberlain signed the famous peace pact to keep peace in our time. The constituency of Humboldt would have given the king and queen a reception which might in other places have been surpassed in grandeur and volume but nowhere else in sincerity.

In the interval between the prorogation of the last session and the opening of the present one we have become parties to the signing of one of the greatest trade pacts ever negotiated in history. From a long term point of view I cannot help but believe that it will have tremendous beneficial effects, both economically and politically. But Mr. Speaker, as I review the accomplishments of the present government and of our own political term in office, and as I have listened attentively to the proposals in the speech from the throne, I begin to wonder how long it will be before the government will be willing to face fairly the fundamental issues, instead of permitting itself to be occupied merely with details of administration.

In my view we have been following the proper path externally. Faced with high tariff barriers throughout the world we have negotiated trade treaties with nations who have wished to trade with us. We did not simply sit back and trade among ourselves, an attitude which would have been disastrous to our position as the fifth trading nation of the world. In our political relations with other nations at least we have made no serious errors.

Of course there is the question whether or not we are putting our full weight behind our empire defence scheme. But generally speaking, under all circumstances, I think we have done perhaps considerably better than could be expected. On the other hand, internally, we seem to be floundering around, not that we have made so many mistakes. Someone will say, "Well, if you are speaking of social reform, the answer is that we cannot do anything until the federal government has more power." Any practical man will say, "Do it anyway"—and I am glad to find in the speech from the throne that this is the attitude of the present administration when it says:

> My ministers recognize that the plight of those who are still unemployed cannot await necessary constitutional amendments, nor the summoning of any conference. They are prepared therefore, notwithstanding constitutional impediments to effective action, to join with the provinces in a further determined effort to meet the immediate situation.

Once again I think the Prime Minister is on the right track, but progress along that track seems painfully slow. There is no sense in passing laws, if they are to remain inoperative. There is no use in passing laws if they are to be thrown out by the courts. As I hear hon. members opposite and people throughout the country criticizing royal commissions, I often wonder why members of the House of Commons and members of the Senate could not occupy positions on those commissions just as well as impractical university professors and editorial writers on the newspapers. In every session, after the opening days, the Senate adjourns. As a matter of fact it has just adjourned for about a month. In that chamber there are men occupying high positions in the state, men who are privy councillors of the empire, men who stand high in the business, financial and economic world. Why could we not place them on commissions, instead of appointing royal commissioners? In that regard I agree with some hon. members opposite when they say that every time we face a knotty problem we appoint a royal commission—and then the government does what it wanted to do anyway. The only thing I can ever say for a royal commission is that the government has a splendid goat at its disposal, and if the recommendations of the commission do not work out satisfactorily it can be blamed.

I am not complaining that we are not doing good. My complaint is that we are not doing enough good, or at least not getting round to it fast enough. That is the attitude of the people in my constituency. The British North America Act should and could have been amended long ago, but I hold the suspicion that in the minds of some members of the government and many members of the house there lurks this thought: If you amend the British North America Act, there goes the best alibi you ever had in your life. I say this: If we do not amend it, we shall drift into a mess for which we shall never be able to find an alibi.

In what manner did the speech from the throne convey to us the fact that we are facing a critical, if not a crucial, period in the history of Canada and the world at large? We came through one world crisis, and we have no assurance that we shall not have to face another one in the near future. The speech from the throne contains many first-class suggestions, but why do we dislike to face realities? Why do we struggle so hard to preserve the impression that we are still dealing with the "common round"; that the world around us is not changing, that the affairs of men move smoothly, and that we can be smugly complacent about the situation? National and world economy has become a hopeless tangle. Production for need has become all mixed up with exploitation for profit. In Canada we see poverty and desperation. When we have nearly a million people on relief and the granaries are filled with wheat, do we take the wheat and put men to work making bread for those who have none? No; we plunge the country farther into debt by borrowing money to get the bread. Goods are sacrificed for profit not only in this country but in others. Brazil dumps coffee into the ocean; California throws oranges on the dump heap; British Columbia allows her apples to rot in the orchards; the United States deliberately slaughters her hogs. While all this is happening, in my constituency there are children who have grown from babies and have never seen an apple or even an orange. There are hundreds and hundreds of families who for years have used roasted barley as a substitute for coffee—and yet we stick to this world-wide valorization.

What do we contribute to the problem? Before the house there are bills and still more bills, talk and still more talk, none of which touches the vital problems with which we are concerned. In my opinion no harm and perhaps a considerable amount of good would be done if, during an entire session, we threw every petty problem into the future and tried to work out a remedy for the defects of our political, social and economic organization. If that course did nothing else, at least it would permit us to see clearly the difficulties which confront us.

It is all too easy to think, in terms of ourselves and our supporters, of the problems of the moment. In other words, we think of those matters which, to the dominion as a whole, are only small. If we could solve the big problems, most of the small ones would never arise. If we do not solve the big problems, our power to solve them may be taken away from us. Those are neither idle words nor a threat, but a statement of grim reality.

Undoubtedly the biggest problem of all is the present plight of our people. "The people keep the government, but the government does not keep the people." By this I do not mean that we should keep the people on relief. The people ask for an opportunity to earn a living, and we give them charity. They do not want it; we do not want it, and the country cannot stand it forever.

Mr. L. T. Hobhouse, in his book on Liberalism, British Liberalism—and I consider that the excerpt I am going to give is equally applicable to-day to Canadian Liberalism—says:

> The right to work and the right to a living wage are just as valid as the rights of person or property. They are integral conditions of a good social order. A society in which a single honest man of normal capacity is definitely unable to find the means of maintaining himself by useful work is to that extent suffering from malorganization. There is somewhere a defect in the social system, a hitch in the economic machine. Now, the individual workman cannot put the machine straight. He is the last person to have any say in the control of the market. It is not his fault that there is overproduction in his industry, or if new and cheaper processes have been introduced which makes his particular skill—a drug on the market. He does not direct or regulate industry. He is not responsible for its ups and downs. But he has to pay for them. That is why it is not charity but justice for which he is asking.

That, Mr. Speaker, to me is Liberalism.

The individual cannot right conditions by himself, and so he looks to the government to do it. What is the government's answer? Direct relief cannot remain indefinitely the answer. We should do away with relief as soon as possible. I do not believe that we should let the people starve. But there seems to be a conception that because we are keeping the unemployed, we are relieved of all obligation to help them to secure employment.

But what have we done about our basic obligation as a state, which is to secure conditions under which mind and character may best develop by themselves? It is to me ridiculous, it is stupid, it is asinine that crops should be ploughed under, that fish should be thrown back into the sea, that hogs should be slaughtered, when so many people are starving or living barely above the subsistence level. Do we need people to work, to produce and feed them? They are more than available. We are supporting them in idleness. Do we need land and resources with which to produce? Millions of fertile acres are lying idle for the plough of the husbandman, waiting for their riches to be turned into gold. Idle men and idle acres do not add up to prosperity. And, Mr. Speaker, agriculture, our basic industry, lies crushed and bleeding from a thousand wounds. The leader of the Liberal party, now Prime Minister of this country, on that eventful night of October 14, 1935, issued the following statement to the Canadian people:

> We take up at once, as our supreme task, the endeavour to end poverty in the midst of plenty, starvation and unnecessary suffering in a land of abundance, discontent and distress in a country more blessed by Providence than any other on the face of the globe, and to gain for individual lives, and for the nation as a whole, that "health and peace and sweet content" which is the rightful heritage of all.

A back-to-the-land movement will not solve that problem because hundreds and hundreds of our experienced farmers on the plains of Saskatchewan and of western Canada are starving. The problem goes deeper, much deeper, than that.

One step that will have to be taken is to provide more money for productive purposes, for individual enterprise, and coincident with that there must be a better price to the primary producer for his products. If fewer people are to get more and more of the money, through a system which permits excessive profits to the few, then we can continue to expect more and more people with less and less money; and when less becomes nothing, the state has to support them.

For a long time I have been a believer in sound money, as some people call it. For a long time I have worshipped at the shrine of the Minister of Finance (Mr. Dunning), when he was Premier of Saskatchewan and while he has been Minister of Finance here. But, Mr. Speaker, the more I have read and the more I have studied the solutions that have been offered by the hon. member for Vancouver-Burrard (Mr. McGeer) the hon. member for Rosthern (Mr. Tucker), and other monetary reformers, the more convinced and persuaded I have become that we must get more money into circulation, even though we have to use methods of inflation. I do not think we need to be afraid of inflation, but we have been afraid of it ever since it was tried in the old post-war days in Germany. But in Germany they have inflation to-day, and Germany is apparently one of the most prosperous countries in the world. What I cannot understand is this: If there were a war to-morrow we would get all the money we wanted. It seems to me that you can get all you want for destruction, but as little as can be spared for construction.

As to the feverish armament race that is now going on in the world, on the one hand I can see the necessity for the empire rearming, but on the other I cannot help being suspicious about it. Of course, if we are not armed, we are certainly a temptation to ruthless aggressors, and surely our September scare must have indicated how rapidly we could all be drawn into the whirlpool before we knew anything about what was happening. In a madly rearming world, can we afford to remain blissfully insecure, while greedy nations eye our undeveloped wealth as one of the richest prizes on earth? Yet, no matter what we do in the way of armaments, I think we should let the world know we are certainly on the side of democracy, justice and peace.

But we cannot shirk much longer our responsibilities as part of the empire. The motherland is not going to force us into doing our part, but she has made known her desire that she would like the dominion to be able to look after its own defence. On the other hand, the world situation is far from hopeless. There have always been divergent opinions in the world. If those who are in the right have the intelligence, the courage and the morale of their convictions, they will win through. It is not inconceivable that the totalitarian states and the democracies can live and work together in peace. It is not any more for us to say that Germany should have this or that type of government than it is for Germany to say that democracies should give up their priceless privilege of freedom. Surely we who live in the democracies should count our blessings. But we cannot talk too enthusiastically about the virtues of democracy until we prove that democracy has those virtues. We would be better advised to spend less time in criticizing the Hitler regime and more time in bolstering up our own weaknesses. The best criticism anyone can give of a dictatorship is a perfectly functioning democracy.

Our freedom was hard won. Our forefathers paid for it in blood and tears. Are we to be unworthy of that heritage? Are we to let the world slip back into the dark night of oblivion because of our incompetency, because of our neglect, because of our failure to see our problems and to see them whole? Or shall we keep the beacon light of democracy burning to light the rest of the world which has taken the by-path back on the road to freedom?

Democracy is not perfect. It is as fallible as the people who compose it. In the democratic state, though the good generally prevails because the majority must be pleased, special or malignant groups cannot thrive for long, as larger groups will generally turn them out of power. On the other hand, it is true that the majority does not always realize its power, or even that it is being exploited. That is when an intelligent leadership is so desirable and necessary.

Conditions in most parts of western Canada this year, Mr. Speaker, have been, to say the least, desperate. It is a combination of poor wheat markets over a period of years, and no wheat or anything else to sell because of drought, grasshoppers and rust. Fortunately this year those who were lucky enough to have rust-resistant wheat had some grain to sell. The government fixed a price of eighty cents a bushel. This was done, I trust, after mature thought by the government, and not as the hon. member for Weyburn (Mr. Douglas) said, as the result of a by-election in the constituency of Humboldt. I do not know what we should have done if the government had not set a price for wheat. I believe a panic would have resulted in western Canada.

We all realize that the self-sufficiency policy of most countries in the last decade has led to a curtailment of our markets and to an increase in the production of wheat. But it sometimes seems to me as if the people of eastern Canada, and even Premier Hepburn and Premier Duplessis, wanted to add a few frills of their own and to turn the world's great wheat basket into a wastebasket.

The wheat farmer mostly competes in the open market to sell his products. But in order to produce he must buy his implements in a protected market, and we find right now that the western farmers and many of my constituents are not so much interested in the price they receive for their wheat as in getting the commodities which they use reduced in price. As to wheat this year, with the fixed price, the concession that we have made in the British market will not alter the selection greatly. What effect the six cent preference we enjoyed had on the actual market was sometimes disputed; but the selection would be vastly altered if we did not have that fixed price for wheat. So it further indicates to the government the necessity of retaining it over a period of years.

In giving up the British preference, what compensation has the west received? We were hoping that we could see a fairly certain gleam that there would be a reduction in the price of our tools of production or in our cost of living. Two things are of main importance to the western farmer, farm implements and gasoline. Gasoline was not mentioned in the trade treaty; and there is no lowering of the duty on United States implements coming into Canada. This may help the Canadian manufacturer; I do not know; but it certainly will not have any effect in cutting down the price of farm implements. In fact, I am not emphasizing the point because experience has shown us that even if the duty is cut, it does not succeed in lowering the price of farm implements to any great extent, if at all. When you take the duty off the manufacturing companies raise the price anyway. Shortly before the trade agreement was made public, the implement companies turned round and lowered the price. This was perhaps not so much related to what the tariff will be, as to the fact that there was not the tariff to bear it. After the duty was cut in 1935, the price of farm implements actually increased.

I have no hesitation in saying that the price of gasoline and the price of farm implements are out of all proportion and are far too high. Every investigation, including our own and the inquiry in the United States into the price of farm implements, has sustained that fact. The reason that reductions in duty will do little to force the price down is that there is a combination which acts as an international monopoly.

In the report last summer of the federal trade commission upon its investigation into the agricultural implement and machine industry in the United States, this statement is made:

> The effect on prices of this concentration of production is such that, with respect to the most important farm implements, the prices established by the leading manufacturers, especially International Harvester Co. and Deere & Co., constitute, in so far as the machines are of closely similar character, the price level which all manufacturers observe.
> The small companies generally cannot sell their products for more than the established prices of widely accepted similar products of the large companies; nor do they feel free to sell for less than the price leaders for fear of starting a price war in which their large and financially stronger rivals would have all the advantage.
> Lest their prices be out of line, it is the practice among lesser manufacturers to await the announcement of prices by the leading companies at the beginning of each season before announcing their own. Similarly, the price leadership of the large companies is followed in price changes made during selling seasons. In general, any price reductions are restricted to implements or machines for which the leaders of the industry have announced reductions.

In summarizing the effect of concentration on prices, the trade commissioner's report states:

> It does not take either imagination or insight to perceive that the same sort of thing obtains in Canada, where the market is dominated by subsidiaries of the American companies.

Not only do the rich get richer and the poor poorer, but it seems in these days as though the small corporation and the small business man have no chance at all. In the meantime the consuming public suffers. Let me quote again from the federal trade commission's report on farm implements. They say:

> Domination of the farm implement and machinery industry by a few leading manufacturers has resulted in the maintenance of the prices of their products at levels far higher than those of farm products and of the prices of other manufactured products of somewhat comparable material and labour. There was a more or less general decline in the prices of farm machinery from 1929 through the years of severest industrial depression, 1932 and 1933. However, this decline was slight in comparison with the decline in the farm prices of the principal farm products.

What can be done? Government fixing of a maximum price level would not, I think, be advisable because either labour or the quality of the goods would suffer. Yet if some way cannot soon be found to make the implement manufacturers toe the line, the government will have to set up manufacturing plants under the control of the government; or if we do not want to do that, we shall have to make arrangements with some other countries, like Germany, and get them to manufacture our implements and bring them into this country, because the farmers of western Canada absolutely cannot go on as they are doing for another period of years; conditions are going from bad to worse.

Something also should be done about the price of gasoline. It would not surprise me one bit, if we had an investigation into the price of gasoline, that we should find that the same international monopoly exists as is to be found in connection with the price of farm implements. Whatever it is that is sustaining the price out of all proportion to prices of primary products, the government should not wait until next year but should certainly take some steps this year to eliminate this condition.

No problem in this country demands so much immediate attention as the welfare of the primary producer, particularly the farmer. If the farmer is prosperous, never fear but that the city will be prosperous. One part of the problem is for the farmer to obtain a reasonable price for his products. Another part is that he should not have to pay an unreasonable price for other goods. To-day he is caught between the scissors. He is cut to the bone on the price paid to him for his products, and at the same time the pittance he receives for his goods is cut deeply by the price of the tools of production and the charge for the amenities of living.

No trade treaty ever designed could satisfy everybody. It is impossible at one and the same time to please the producer and the consumer. But the general object of such a treaty should be for instance, to permit Canada to sell in the United States goods which the United States is unable to produce as efficiently or in sufficient quantities, and to permit the United States to come to Canada with goods which we cannot produce efficiently here. If there is to be some sacrifice, it should be in the artificial industries. I would not look with favour upon destroying industry. I should be seriously concerned if for one moment I thought that by taking off the tariff we should be destroying the factories in the riding of the hon. member for Northumberland, Ontario (Mr. Fraser); but that consequence is always a debatable point. But if the factories where the hon. member for Northumberland lives, are making exorbitant profits in a protected market, and at the same time bleeding to death another part of our economy, not only do I fail to see the value of such protection, but I think it is vicious.

There are a number of items omitted from the trade treaty which I should have liked to see included. Yet the real test of the treaty, and only time will tell, is, will it result in a freer flow of goods between this country and the United States? For England we are a convenient factory to have in case of war, but she too can make better arrangements with her neighbours. Of course we do not wish to lose the British market, and I do not think we shall. But the United States is our natural market. Sometimes I think it would have been much better for us from the first if we had been trading from north to south in place of from east to west; if instead of travelling along a four thousand mile line we could have traded over a few hundred miles between the north and the south.

Definitely, Mr. Speaker, I believe that the treaty is a step in the right direction. It has lowered duties on a broad front, and it is designed to exchange goods. That is what we need if we are ever to get back to prosperity. It also links us with the two great trading nations of the earth. It has long been my view that belligerent dictators would be most vulnerable to an economic union of the democratic states. Democracy is worth fighting for, but we do not have to go around with a chip on our shoulder talking about the totalitarian state. Democracy is such a magnificent ideal, it would be a shame to let it perish from the face of the earth because of our incompetence or because we were unable to mould it to our purpose. If we could make this land and the system under which we live so desirable that the peoples of all countries would wish to come and live here, never fear, it would not be long before other countries would accept our system of government. No man can teach an entire nation for long. The people in Germany turned from democracy, just as the people in Canada will turn from democracy if the government of Canada and of the other democratic nations will not try to make the people happy and contented, but rather hold them down as economic slaves. In the name of the people of Canada, in the name of people with more ability than I have, I appeal to this house to do something for the starving inhabitants, and for the farmers, of western Canada.

At six o'clock the house took recess.

After Recess

The house resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. J. A. MARSH (Hamilton West): Mr. Speaker, I should like to congratulate the mover (Mr. Matthews) and the seconder (Mr. Chevrier) of the address in reply to the speech from the throne. I am not an old member of the house and therefore I am not a critic, but I think those speeches were very fine indeed.

Before proceeding to the matter of the speech from the throne, I should like to say a word about the opening of parliament and the delivery of the speech in the senate chamber. This may be regarded as a secondary matter, but I think it needs to be said by someone.

Each year the opening of parliament is a much anticipated event. We might even say it is the outstanding event of the year, because parliament has the power to add to or take away from the welfare of eleven and a half million Canadian people. From all parts of Canada come the commoners, members of the senate, their families and friends, business men and various people representing all phases of Canadian life. The focus of this interest is the speech from the throne. Seated in the senate chamber, in the galleries, back in the foyer and thronging the corridors are representative Canadian people, waiting, hushed with expectancy. The speech begins, continues and ends, and except for those people within a radius of perhaps twenty feet of the speaker the one hour message is not heard.

It is far from my intention to criticize the speaker, His Excellency the Governor General, the representative of the king; but I do think the senate chamber, which at best is a difficult place in which to hear or be heard, should be equipped with an amplifier, which I believe could be installed very easily, in order that those who have come so far, for such an important event, might hear the speech from the throne rather than read it in the morning paper over a cup of coffee. As I was standing at the back of the senate chamber I was considerably embarrassed by the conversation and noise going on about me; yet I could not criticize those who were chatting, because I knew they could not hear. I submit that all the dignity of parliament and British traditions, each of which has a meaning to us in Canada to-day, requires that the speech from the throne be heard as it comes from the cultured lips of the governor general. In fact, I would go further and suggest that hundreds of thousands of loyal Canadians would like to hear the speech from the throne over the air. I am sure the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation would allow that.

I have listened to the excellent speeches on the address that have been made so far. We have heard from hon. members from the east, from the west, from the north and from the south, and I think there is no doubt that this parliament is problem conscious. We know the problems that beset our country to-day, but I would point out that we knew those problems last year, the year before and the year before that; yet we have not gone very far towards solving them. It is very seldom that I find myself able to agree with the hon. member for Lethbridge (Mr. Blackmore), but he asked a very pertinent question. It was this: Does the government know what to do? The next question was: If the government knows what to do, will it do it? The next was: Has the government power? If the government has power, will it exercise that power?

From the press, from the pulpit, from newspapers throughout Canada and in private conversation with thinking men and women we have heard these questions asked: Has democracy failed? Has the government failed? Has community life failed? Has the family failed? Has the individual failed? Has the church failed? All these questions have been asked, and they have been answered by various people in various ways. I should like to take those questions now, put them all together, and unhesitatingly answer yes to all. Having done that, we can get ahead with the serious business of government.

There are some problems, Mr. Speaker, that are sapping at the very blood stream of Canadian life to-day. They are problems that are serious, and in this year of our Lord 1939, at this session of parliament, it is our job to do something about them. Therefore I say to the government—because we are in opposition here; we are handcuffed, tied hand and foot—"Give us legislation, and we will not obstruct it. Give us some policies and if they are any good we will not delay them. We will do our very best to augment, to push through, to pass any bills that are based on sound policy." But may we not flounder again as we have floundered during the past three years?

It is quite fresh in the memory of hon. members that last year we sat for almost six months. We wore the seats out of our trousers, while the man on the street was wearing the soles off his shoes hunting the job that it was our duty to create for him. We waited for the budget. The business men of Canada, the manufacturers and merchandisers, cannot buy; they cannot plan; they cannot budget until the financial statement of the government is brought down. We waited through February and March and April and May. I think it was June 16 when the budget was finally brought down for consideration in this house. In the meantime what was happening? In the city of Hamilton, where I live, there was very little smoke coming out of the chimneys, and there were very few wheels turning in our factories. There were men and women walking the streets of our city, while other men and women were working two or three days a week, getting very slim pay envelopes and depending partly upon relief.

What can we point to with pride in the work of last session? I should like to be fair; I should like to give credit where credit is due. There was a little housing; yes. Good. There was the removal of the sales tax on gopher poison, heavy harness and a few building materials. Good. The farmer buys heavy harness once every seven years, but at least it is a start. Then there was the removal of the sales tax on material for the making of fishermen's nets. Was there anything else? Was there anything about unemployment insurance? No. Was there a reduction in taxation? No. Was there closer harmony between the provinces? No. Was there greater economy in spending? No. Was there any increased revenue from the customs tariff? No. Were there increased exports? No. Decreased exports? Yes.

Then, Mr. Speaker, after several months had gone by, we came to the bill to assist municipalities to relieve unemployment by making available to them $30,000,000 at two per cent. When this legislation was enunciated I was quite enthusiastic about it; but when we went into the provisions of the bill, we were sobered with the realization that the number of self-liquidating projects was extremely limited. Then we found that the bill could not come into operation until the provincial legislatures met, and at that time they had all prorogued for the summer. So it was necessary for them to be called together before the municipalities could take advantage of that act. How successful has that legislation been? How much of this $30,000,000 has been made available to the municipalities? I speak subject to correction; but my information is that out of the $30,000,000 only $2,900,000 has been made available to the municipalities of this country, with nothing being spent in the province of Quebec or the province of Ontario. That is a ten per cent success as far as this legislation is concerned. A business man would have very great difficulty in operating his business if, in any policy, he had only ten per cent of success and ninety per cent of failure.

I should like to place on Hansard a news item from the Toronto Daily Star, under date of January 17, 1939:

> Premier Hepburn's refusal to have Ontario guarantee low cost dominion loans for self-liquidating public works has tied up thirty-three Ontario municipalities. They wished to share the $30,000,000 made available by Ottawa last year, for such works as electric light, sewer and water systems.
> The two per cent money was available if the loan was guaranteed by the province. Quebec and Ontario refused. In the other seven provinces loans aggregating $2,900,000 were made.
> Ontario's attitude halted Toronto efforts to secure aid for its large sewage disposal scheme, but thirty-three other municipalities did make applications which are pigeonholed until the provincial guarantee is forthcoming. The applications are:
> Owen Sound, city hall; Pelee township, draining system; Morrisburg, school; London, sewerage system; Burlington, water scheme; Kirkland Lake and Port Arthur, water and drainage systems; St. Thomas, nurses' home; Geraldton, water and sewerage systems; Hawkesbury, school hall and rink; Gravenhurst, sewerage systems; Western Ferris township, water system; Bowmanville, waterworks; West Lorne, waterworks; Dymont township, sewerage; New Toronto, sewerage; Blind River, water and sewerage system; Hamilton, water mains; Larder Lake, water and sewerage; Etobicoke, sewerage; Harrow, town hall; Arnprior, electric light plant; Sault Ste. Marie, public market; Timmins, water and sewerage; Oshawa, city hall; Peel, school; Elmira, school; York township, electric plant; Delaware, school.
> East York and North Bay were other municipalities which sought loans for various purposes.

I believe enough has been said respecting the self-liquidating project's measure for the municipalities.

On Monday last the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) in impassioned language pointed out the cares of his office and the multiplicity of duties which were his as Prime Minister of the country. I honour him in his position and I honour him because of his consciousness of his cares. But I feel myself called upon to say that he grossly overrates the impact which we in Canada have to make on world conditions. I believe that he grossly over-values the importance of Canada in world affairs, and that not one of his duties as Minister for External Affairs is as important as hand-to-hand contact and eye-to-eye conversation with the man on the street, his family, his sickness, his security, his job. The Prime Minister of Canada is out of touch with the common, ordinary man, and, if so, he is out of touch with Canada, because it is made up of common, ordinary men.

What is the greatest contribution we in this country can make to the world? What contribution can we make to world sanity and world business? What is the greatest contribution we can make to that highest of all pinnacles to be reached by human achievement—world peace? It is this, that we clean up our own door-step and solve our own problems. Do that, and we shall have made the finest contribution we could make to the British empire and the world at large.

I was much impressed with the speech made by our beloved leader (Mr. Manion). He pointed out that Great Britain has solved much of her difficulty through taxation—by collecting three times as much per capita, through customs and tariff charges, as we do in Canada. And yet under the trade treaty which was signed recently—and I shall have more to say about it at a later time—this government is prepared joyfully to lose a three per cent excise tax, which brings in about $18,000,000. Nevertheless it is content to continue to saddle the Canadian people with a sales tax which hits at the very root of the necessities of life, and which comes out of the pocket of the man who has to buy sugar, flour, shoes and those commodities he needs for his home and his work. We still have the sales tax; we still have the cheque tax; we still have the sugar tax. The hon. member for Danforth (Mr. Harris) brought it out very clearly, that in 1936 we collected $372,000,000 in taxation from the Canadian people, whereas in 1938 we collected $516,000,000 and, as he has said, the job is gone. I wonder how long a business man would stay in business if he practised the same methods our government has been practising for the last three years? With decreased revenues, would not a cutting down of expenditures seem to be a solution to the problem? Why should we spend money we do not have to spend?

Perhaps it may be urged that trade is the answer. A few days ago the Right Hon. Arthur Meighen pointed out in the senate that last year we exported $200,000,000 worth less of products and imported $90,000,000 less than we did in 1937. Now that we have opened our market to 120,000,000 people, what is going to become of our industry? It seems to me that in view of diminishing revenues there is only one way out, and that is to spend less money.

The hon. member for Peel (Mr. Graydon) never misses an opportunity to speak about his native county and, following his example, I should like to say a word about Hamilton. A few years ago in that city we were faced with bankruptcy. Our bonds were no good; our credit was not good. The mayor of Hamilton took it upon his shoulders to adopt a pay-as-you-go policy. It was his thought that if he took a dollar from the taxpayer of Hamilton, spent only ninety cents of it and put away the other ten cents to pay off our debt, conditions would greatly improve. Mr. Speaker, I am a very fortunate man; I have five children. As yet I have no grandchildren, but perhaps, being an optimist, I shall have. What right have I to spend a dollar that belongs to my children? What right have I to spend a dollar that belongs to the unborn child of a future generation? What right have I to borrow money which a future generation must pay back with interest, in order that I may now live?

I do not know how the home owner can continue to own his home. I do not know how the young man can buy a home, if the burden of taxation, which is greater than old Sinbad the Sailor ever carried on his shoulders, is permitted to continue. I should like to place on Hansard a submission made to the royal commission on dominion-provincial relations by the Canadian Chambers of Commerce on May 30, 1938.

Real estate taxes.

At the time of confederation, wealth was represented mainly by land, and consequently the chief source of taxation was real estate. Times have changed, however, and wealth has come to exist in many forms. In more recent years, also, municipalities have had to bear a new financial responsibility in respect of social and welfare services which was not contemplated when their taxing powers were granted. The burden of these new services has fallen upon real estate to such an extent that the result has seriously affected the tendency of Canadians to own their own homes, retarded the construction industry, and undermined the value of investment in real property.

Last March, speaking about the federal responsibility for direct relief, I said:

I desire now to say just a word or two about the ability of the property owner in Hamilton to pay his taxes. In 1930 arrears of taxes in our city amounted to $1,107,710 against an assessment of $165,440,160. Seven years later what do we find? We have tax arrears to the amount of $2,488,555 on substantially the same assessment, or a trifle less, namely, $164,127,200.

I had the figures for 1938, but I appear to have mislaid them. They show a picture worse than that for 1937.

From the evening paper of to-day I read where the mayors' association has met in Toronto. Our Ontario mayors are trying to do a good job of setting their house in order, and to do so they need help from the federal government. I shall not read the whole of their resolution, but shall be content to record the two following paragraphs:

That the municipalities of Ontario, in the preparing of their 1939 budgets, absolutely refuse to budget for or pay in excess of thirty per cent of their actual expenditures for relief.

That in case the two governments contribute less than seventy per cent toward relief costs, the municipalities will cut relief to conform to the amount paid by them plus the thirty per cent contribution by the municipality.

We should pay attention to this mayors' association. They are setting their house in order, and they are trying to do a job that requires the cooperation of this government.

We must face up to another problem, and this is one for this and the next government. Surely there is room in the various phases of the administration of this government for the curtailment of expenses. Where shall we find it? Perhaps the railway problem furnishes food for thought. I shall not discuss it in detail, but let me say that thirty years ago the ordinary section gang was composed of six or seven men. Their job was to take care of five miles of track and roadbed. To-day three men constitute a section gang. We have not been practising economy from the top down. Four men in each gang have been put out of work, but I submit to the Minister of Transport (Mr. Howe) that he should focus his attention upon private cars, luxurious hotels and the general supervision of the railroad, instead of cutting down the section gangs. More money will be saved and more men will be given work on the tracks and in the roundhouses.

I should like to say a word or two about royal commissions, though previous speakers have already mentioned this matter. The government does not seem to have shown a flair for economy in the numerous royal commissions that have been appointed. This afternoon I was very much taken with the address of the hon. member for Humboldt (Mr. Fleming). While he was speaking I wanted to say, "Hurrah! for Ireland." He said that too many royal commissions had been appointed, and he advanced the argument that perhaps these commissions should be made up from members of this house. Certainly a commission should not be doing work that we as members of parliament are paid to come down here to do.

Mr. FLEMING: I said also that the members of the senate might be able to do it.

Mr. MARSH: I agree thoroughly with my hon. friend, and I should like to place on Hansard a short newspaper article about commission government. It says:

> Actually, a royal commission represents the confession of a government that it doesn't know what to do about some given thing; or—what is just as bad—the confession of a government that it doesn't propose to do anything about a given thing. A. P. Herbert of Punch—

I may say that Mr. Herbert is a member of parliament as well as a humorist——hit the thing off perfectly in his famous poem:

> I am the royal commission on Kissing,
> Appointed by Gladstone in '74;
> The rest of my colleagues are buried or missing;
> Our minutes were lost in the last Great War.
> But still I'm a Royal Commission,
> My task I intend to see through,
> Though I know, as an old politician,
> Not much will be done if I do.

There is another problem which we have to face, which the leader of the opposition (Mr. Manion) pointed out. This is a matter that concerns governments, present and future. Since 1930 Canada has spent $900,000,000 on relief. More and more it is being impressed upon the members of the House of Commons and upon thinking men throughout the country that relief without work is an unsound policy which results among other things, in a decadent manhood and womanhood, meanwhile placing a heavy burden upon the shoulders of the thrifty.

I should like to say a word or two about the problem of youth. Last night when I should have been preparing this speech I went down to the railway committee room to attend the meeting in connection with the dominion-provincial youth program. We saw an interesting film entitled "Miners in the Making." I wish to compliment the Minister of Labour (Mr. Rogers) upon the start he has made, but I suggest that this problem is so serious, so far-reaching and so affects the very fundamentals of Canadian life that we should not be simply puddling around in the shallows, we should be getting right down to the depths of this problem. I learned that 22,421 of both sexes had been trained, or rather had been enrolled, but that only 2,319 had been placed in industry. When you break up the total of 22,421, you find that 15,796 received physical training, which is quite worthy, but only 2,319 young men and women had been trained and placed in industry or other gainful employment.

I submit that the greatest investment in Canada is not our forests of white pine, yellow pine and pulpwood; it is not our mines of nickel, gold and radium; it is our Canadian youth. May I give some conservative figures concerning our youth problem, and I will underestimate rather than overestimate. I have it on good authority that 280,000 young men and women between the ages of sixteen and twenty-six are unemployed, and that of that number 72,000 have never had a job. Last year we voted $2,000,000 for the re-establishment of youth. Mr. Speaker, if an international crisis should arise and it should be necessary to defend our country, we would take that army of youth, put rifles on their shoulders and equip them for war. We would find $100,000,000, if necessary, to do it. Cannot we find $10,000,000 or $25,000,000 to equip this army for peace? If the Minister of Finance (Mr. Dunning) were in his seat, he would probably criticize me and say that I am inconsistent, in that, in one and the same breath I am suggesting a curtailment of expenditure and an additional expenditure.

My thought is this: We can take the young men of Canada and put them in employment camps. We can further, on a large scale, the work that has been started in afforestation and reforestation, in mining, in the building of roads up into the north country and on flood control projects; we can put them to work in the husbanding and re-creation of the resources of our country.

Now, if we solve our youth problem, if we solve our unemployment problem, we shall solve fascism, communism, nazism, and many other secondary problems that beset this dominion. If we do not solve these problems, then we cannot complain if a nation with iron in its blood comes in and possesses the land that we regard as rightfully ours.

The speech from the throne places a necessary emphasis on the question of national defence. When $33,000,000 was voted in 1937 for national defence, I think most of us thought that vote was wise. When $31,000,000 was voted in 1938, we thought it was wise. The government now announces that $60,000,000 will be spent on national defence. I think we should be proud of that vote. If the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Mackenzie) has not already done so, I should like him to take into consideration the recruiting of the material resources of the nation for national defence. It is just possible that our national defence is based on the standards of twenty or thirty years ago. I hope that when his estimates are brought down they will contain a vote for the establishment of a staff school in order that toolmakers, expert mechanics, captains of industry and others in the mechanical world may learn something about the making of 1939 ordnance. I hope it will never be necessary to fight a war in Canada or to defend our country, but the fact remains that the incidents of the last few months have been sobering.

I also hope that it will be made as easy as possible for military units throughout the country to attract the right kind of young men into the national service. I remember well bringing to the attention of the Minister of National Defence in the house last year the fact that staff officers in the various militia units had sometimes to bring in military accessories required by the unit from another country, because they could not be purchased in Canada, and I asked him if something might not be done to relieve them of the cost of paying sales tax and duty on these items. I pointed out then that we should not as a government try to make money out of a man's patriotism. The minister's answer was that the matter did not lie within his department but within the Department of National Revenue. I hope that in the meantime he and the Minister of National Revenue (Mr. Ilsley) have gone into a huddle in order to see that our good officers who are trying to build up their units do not have to pay money to the government for the privilege of being patriotic citizens.

Not long ago I went down to the armoury in Hamilton and I saw young lads wearing low oxfords, and they had stretched their puttees down to try to cover them. The militia endeavours to build up their units by appealing to a man's pride in his personal appearance; yet one sees seven or eight different shades of khaki, ranging from a dirty yellow to a dark brown, and old boots that are worn out at the soles. I am not a military man, but I have heard it said that to have a good soldier you must keep him well shod and fill his stomach. Well, Mr. Speaker, some of those boys have not yet been able to find a job. They have not even a decent pair of boots in which to turn out on parade.

The motive force behind our militia units to-day is the veterans who served in the last war, and they deserve our best cooperation.

Just another word about equipment. How much of the equipment that you find in our armouries to-day is up to date? In Hamilton to-day in the armoury we have guns twenty-five years old. We have modernized them to the extent of putting pneumatic rubber tires on them, but they are still the same old guns. Concluding my remarks upon national defence may I say that the most valuable class of man power in Canada to-day, and I am sad to say it, is the returned veterans. They are better equipped to go to war because they know something about it, and it is too bad that our young men should not have been trained in national defence.

Just a word about the newly signed trade agreement. The Minister of Labour (Mr. Rogers) is reported in the Ottawa Journal of November 19 last as saying:

> Employment would increase for two reasons: first, through greater activity stimulated in the primary industries: second, through an improved domestic market for Canadian manufactures, arising from the greater spending power of primary producers.

The minister knows as well as I do that the primary industries in this country employ only 100,000 people, while the secondary industries employ 900,000 people, or almost one million. It is the secondary industries that are going to suffer from this trade agreement. Take iron and steel, for instance. The national employment commission reported that manufacturers of iron and steel products, who should normally employ 100,000 people, had dropped 35,000 from their payrolls since 1929. The trade agreement hits at the secondary iron and steel industries. The imports in this group from the United States amounted in 1937 to $22,000,000, subject to the old rate of duty which was thirty per cent. The new rate is the lowest ever. Take, for example, the basket tariff item for iron and steel products, 446A; the imports were $4,000,000 in 1933, and under the trade agreement of 1936 they rose to $10,000,000. With the lower duties in effect in the new agreement, where will the Canadian manufacturer of iron and steel fabricated products be? Our imports will double or treble under the new lower duties. The same applies to brass and copper products, imports of which jumped from $2,000,000 in 1935 to $3,000,000 in 1937; and to aluminum, imports of which jumped from $721,000 in 1935 to $1,727,000 in 1937. Again, machinery, exclusive of electrical apparatus and motor cars, was imported to the extent of $50,000,000 in 1937. This item represents the maximum of labour content, and yet the imports in many lines will double if parliament passes this trade agreement. So I say to the Minister of Labour that for every one extra employee engaged in primary industry—I am talking about the hewer of wood and the drawer of water—five artisans now engaged in the secondary industries will lose their jobs.

In conclusion, Mr. Speaker, I would point out that in the United States, and in Great Britain, before these trade agreements were signed, the authorities called into conference manufacturers and business men. They are the men who know what the effects of the agreements are likely to be on trade and industry. In Great Britain for example, there were called into consultation: Lord May, chairman of the import duties advisory committee; Sir Sydney Chapman and Sir Allan Powell, members of that same committee; also Sir Percy Ashley, the secretary. The federation of British industries was represented at the conference in Great Britain, and the Hon. Oliver Stanley, president of the British board of trade, was also called into consultation.

Finally, Mr. Speaker, the people of Canada are looking forward with unparalleled interest to the approaching visit of Their Majesties the King and Queen. May we see to it, above all else, that the boys and girls of this country see their king and queen? What do we matter? It is upon the shoulders of the younger generation that a greater and a better Canada is going to rest.

In the meantime may I beseech this government to shed its Rip Van Winkle mantle, arise from its long sleep, and bring down legislation early, so that when the king and queen come here in the month of May we shall have a better Canada to show them. Goodness knows, Canada needs a government.

On my way up to the chamber to-night I passed the parapet on which the snow had newly fallen, and two boys, seizing their opportunity, had written their names in the snow. They had seen their opportunity and had seized it. Never in the history of Canada, Mr. Speaker, has the extremity been so great, and never the opportunity so present for writing bold and courageous laws for a new Canada. I say to the government: You have failed. You have come to the last page of the book, and the book is now about to be closed, with little having been done to better conditions in this country.

[Mr. Marsh.]

Mr. A. J. LAPOINTE (Matapedia-Matane) (Translation): Mr. Speaker, as I do not want to trespass on the valuable time of the house, I will be as brief as possible. First of all I should like warmly to congratulate the mover and the seconder of the address in reply to the speech from the throne on the excellent way in which they have performed their delicate task. May I also offer my most sincere congratulations to the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) for the splendid address he delivered the other night. Such a speech not only raised him still more in the esteem of his own followers, but, I am sure, made a profound impression on all hon. members. On the other hand, the speech of the leader of the opposition (Mr. Manion) has been rather disappointing. I recognize that his duty is to criticize the actions of the government, but it would have been more in keeping with his position as party leader had he formulated constructive ideas instead of dwelling on the same old stories and launching mean attacks against the Prime Minister who will go down in history as one of Canada's greatest statesmen.

I listened with pleasure to the congratulations offered by the hon. member for Stormont (Mr. Chevrier) to the prime minister of Great Britain for his action in the tragic days of the latter part of September. By these actions, Mr. Neville Chamberlain saved the world from the most appalling disaster. During those grim days, when the peace of the world hung by a thread, Great Britain, through her prime minister, made wonderful history.

Now, sir, I want to thank the government, on behalf of the victims of the terrible fire that destroyed the village of St. Luc de Matane, for the aid given them on that occasion. Those unfortunate people lost, in the course of a few hours, the result of several years of toil, labour and sacrifice. Thanks to the aid received from the provincial and federal governments, they once again feel confident and they will always keep the memory of the generous deed performed in order to help their village to rise from its ruins.

There is a question of great interest at the present moment on which I do not wish to dwell to-night, and that is the proposed admission in Canada of European refugees. However, I should like to avail myself of this opportunity clearly to define my attitude on that matter. For my part, I am unequivocally opposed to the project. It is difficult enough, at present, to find work for our own unemployed without assuming new responsibilities.

I would fail in my duty as representative of the electoral district of Matapedia-Matane, were I to miss this opportunity of calling the attention of the government on the precarious situation in which our workmen find themselves during this winter. Owing to special circumstances, lumbering operations have been greatly reduced and accordingly a great number of workmen lost their livelihood. They are courageous men and what they are asking for is work. The government should start public works, without delay, especially in the industrial centres which suffer particular hardships.

The speech from the throne states the government's intention to expand its long range program of public undertakings as a means of relieving unemployment. I have already suggested to the government ways of ending this calamity in my section of the country.

My district offers great possibilities of development. Thousands of unemployed could be permanently established therein, but on condition that means of communication be provided, giving access to the interior of Matane county, which penetrates triangularly to the heart of Gaspé peninsula.

During the budget debate of the session of 1937 I had the honour of proposing to the government a five-year plan providing for means of communication giving access to immense forests which are going to ruin because of the ravages of the saw-fly and also because they have passed the age of maturity. Such a plan would also bring about the opening of a new territory eminently suited to colonization. During that debate I spoke as follows, on March 4, 1937, as recorded on Hansard:

> Since we still have acute unemployment, since all the remedies which have been used so far have proved to be mere palliatives and have not given the expected results, since the calamity of unemployment threatens more and more to disorganize our economic system, why not consider a scheme for the development of our resources on a large scale? How many countries are there which would not like to own the wonderful heritage with which Providence has blessed us, in order to make it productive?
> Industry will never be able to absorb all our working men. Yet, it is imperative that we should give up the baneful policy of relief initiated by the former government, which has spoiled our people in teaching them to rely upon the nation for their upkeep.
> Therefore, Mr. Speaker, work is what is needed. Work for our honest unemployed who are courageous and find it humiliating to be always appealing for help. Work for our young people who are losing their spirit through idleness.

Later, that is last year, when speaking, as I am now, on the address in reply to the speech from the throne and pleading before this house the case of our rural young people, I spoke the following words which are to be found in Hansard of February 1st, 1938:

> When, looking at the map of my constituency, I notice a vast district, comprising the townships of Laverendrye, Catalogne, Gravier, Clark, Casault, Lagrange, Bontet, Duniere, Richard, Cuocq, Leclerc, Joffre and Baribault, which have never been opened to setlement, I cannot but think that all the unemployed of my constituency could find work there. I reflect that there would be good prospects for all courageous and proud young men who are not afraid to face those hardships and sacrifices which, sooner or later, must be the lot of those who wish to succeed in life. I reflect that there would be good prospects for all our spirited young men in whose veins still flows the blood of the early settlers who opened to civilization the shores of the St. Lawrence. And I know, Mr. Speaker, that these young men are still numerous in my constituency, but they are awaiting the time when the government will open for them the way to those areas and help them to make a start.

Another essential undertaking closely connected with the development of my constituency is the improvement of Matane harbour, in order to make it as soon as possible a deep-water harbour. By its geographical situation Matane is destined to become a very important seaport. It is the natural outlet for the entire western section of Gaspé peninsula, including the interior.

Mr. Speaker, I know the people of my county. They are courageous and proud. They do not want charity; they want work. The government will, by granting my requests, contribute in a very large measure to the development of my district, while providing a large number of men now unemployed and penniless with the means of earning an honourable living.

Mr. T. L. CHURCH (Broadview): Mr. Speaker, reference has been made by the leader of the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation (Mr. Woodsworth), to the formalities at the opening but when the blowing of trumpets and the tumult and the shouting of the opening of parliament die, what will the harvest be for the working people of this country? It is not so much what the speech from the throne contains as what is left out. So far as any good to solve the economic problems of this country is concerned, it puts me in mind of old Mother Hubbard's cupboard. The government of the day have no constructive suggestions to give to the country how to solve the economic problems we have, and the duty is on the government of the day as long as they are the government to solve these problems. In a rich country like Canada, which has long been coveted by the dictators, with its magnificent natural resources, there should be nobody out of work. On the billboards during the last general election the government party made this reference to unemployment. "Vote Liberal and end unemployment." Well, all I know that they have ever done for unemployment is to find employment for a lot of useless commissions with their secretaries and lawyers and all that kind of thing. Right here in Ottawa they have established a great basic industry to solve the unemployment problem. It is known as the ambassadors' cure for unemployment, and ambassadors with three-cornered cocked hats, swords, epaulettes, spurs and all the rest of it are going to go to all the capitals on the seven seas to represent Canada. With its separatist policy, which this government is now pursuing, the appointment of all these ambassadors simply tends to separatist policies so fatal in war and destructive in peace. Reference has been made to the visit of the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) to Hitler in Berlin. The right hon. gentleman wanted to get Hitler's point of view, and he did; and Hitler certainly got the Prime Minister's point of view. Hitler knew how to shape his course when he discovered the separatist tendencies of the dominions. In the same way Emperor William in 1914, when he found a want of unity in the empire, after getting separatist views of South Africa and other dominions, decided to cross the Rhine, allowing treaties to become mere scraps of paper. And now Hitler is on the march. He has added Austria to Germany and is now going on to the Black Sea and the Mediterranean. Canada imposed sanctions against Italy and then repealed them, and after Ethiopia had been conquered, this foolish sanction policy drove Italy into the German orbit.

I find so many evasions and so many platitudes in the speech from the throne that I see no hope of the government's policy solving any of the economic problems of the country. Reference is made in the speech to the coming of the king and queen. It is not the first time that the present king will have been in Canada. I saw him at the Falls before the war, when he was a midshipman, and at that time he showed a keen interest in the industrial progress of Canada and its people. On this occasion he will receive a hearty welcome from the Canadian people, not because there has been any change in his title. He is now being described by the high-sounding title of King of Canada, but he has always been King of Canada. The British sovereign has been King of Canada ever since the treaty of 1763, so that high-sounding titles and coronations in India, Australia and elsewhere, which might satisfy the vanity of a few people who believe in the policy of separatism, are not at all necessary either by law, statute, usage or custom to make his majesty King of Canada. It seems to me that we are becoming more American than the Americans, and the capital of Canada is coming to be known as the Washington of the north, and Washington the Ottawa of the south. I doubt whether we have not been driven into the American orbit for keeps.

When the king does come to Canada I hope it will be recognized that the union jack is the only Canadian flag. It has been hauled down in South Africa and southern Ireland, but it has always been the flag of this country and I hope it will continue to be. Similarly, God Save the King is the only national anthem in Canada. It is both a hymn and a prayer, a prayer to the Almighty for the preservation of the king, the throne and the safety of his majesty's person and subjects. There has been no other national anthem in Canada since we have been a country. I was at a patriotic dinner function the other night, and at the conclusion the audience stood at attention and sang another anthem, O Canada, but that is not and was not the national anthem of Canada or our empire. I remember on one occasion when I was mayor of Toronto, some of those who attended a similar function in Massey hall, myself among them, declined to stand up when some other anthem was sung. As I say, there is only one national anthem for this country, and that is God Save the King.

We have lost one of the most brilliant men in the public life of Canada in the retirement of the former leader of this party (Mr. Bennett). He will sail at the end of this month for the old country, and I predict for him there, in the heart of the empire, as great a future as he has had a past in Canada. He is a marvellous man, a statesman and a patriot. He has been succeeded by our new leader (Mr. Manion), whom I have known since he was a medical student, who is very well liked, a man of good ability, a splendid type of Canadian, and in addition to that, one who is a returned soldier. I believe our new leader will give a great account of himself, as he has done already.

I should like to have seen in the speech from the throne a declaration in favour of the Christian religion in Canada. The Christian religion to-day, it seems, is being driven from pillar to post. Christianity is a part of the law of England, and by the constitutional act of 1791 it automatically became a part of the law of Canada. The National Conservative party of Mr. Chamberlain have made it a plank in their platform in England.

May I now say a few words with regard to the domestic policy of this government. After all, there is too much time and attention given to foreign affairs, since we are, as in 1812, for defence completely dependent on Great Britain. While foreign affairs are important, it must be remembered that we have to look after eleven million people in our own country, and I am surprised that in the speech from the throne there is not a single, definite, concrete proposal that promises any relief to the masses of the Canadian people, those whom Disraeli called the suffering millions. Canada has no policy but drift in matters of trade, defence and migration. In the speech from the throne there is no reference to these topics, nothing at any rate of a really concrete nature, though there are a lot of platitudes. One of the problems which this government has done nothing to solve is the problem of unemployment and distributism. What we should aim at is to restore Canada to the position she held under Macdonald, Laurier, Brown and Cartier. Canada was then a democratic country based and built upon the practical recognition of the principles of private property and freedom. But there is no freedom for the man who is at the mercy of arbitrary economic factors which are beyond his control.

One of the most important problems facing this country to-day was referred to in an address over the radio the other night, by the president of the Globe-Mail, Mr. McCullagh, namely the old way we have as a system of government. I believe this is the fourfold problem of constitutional, parliamentary, cabinet and law reform, and until these are satisfactorily dealt with we cannot have any economic reform. Let us take, first, constitutional reform. The constitution is three hundred years old. We have made no progress. As Mr. Grattan O'Leary said in a recent issue of Maclean's magazine, the executive have captured the government of Canada. It took over one hundred years of strife, turmoil and bloodshed for the mother of parliaments to get control over the executive, but where is parliamentary control in Canada to-day so far as the expenditure of money is concerned? Nowhere. On February 17, 1937, I introduced a motion to provide that, instead of 245 members in this chamber holding a post-mortem into the public accounts and estimates of the dominion, there should be estimate committees for the purpose. We should have the municipal system under which departmental heads could appear before an estimates committee and reductions made there. This, I have no doubt, would result in a considerable saving to the people of Canada in the maintenance charges of the country. But the government will do nothing about it. The same apathy has marked their attitude to the questions of parliamentary, cabinet and law reform. We are behind the times so far as these important questions are concerned. Indeed, it seems to me our constitution is well on the way to be upside down at the present time. I should like to bring in a bill dealing with the question of referendums in Canada. Then the people would have some chance to rule. The referendum would be held on the same day as the general election, as in the case of the municipalities. In that way we might get some expression of opinion on two of the most important problems which this country is facing, over-government and over-taxation.

The municipalities had their revenues reduced in 1918 when the dominion government invaded the income tax field. In my opinion the federal power should assume the full cost of relief and should also give direct aid in connection with public health and hospital deficits. Canada spends about three and a half million dollars on the health of animals, but all it can spend on the health of humans is about $400,000. As I see it, the the first duty of a government is to look after the health, peace, welfare, comfort and prosperity of its people. The city of Toronto has spent $7,524,513 on relief, of which the city contributed over $2,700,000, the balance being divided between the federal and provincial governments. At a meeting of the Ontario mayors yesterday at Toronto it was stated that in future the municipalities might have to pay forty-five per cent of the cost of relief. If that should be so, the municipalities will face bankruptcy. In 1915, when I first became mayor of Toronto, seven and a half million dollars was all the money we had to spend in controllable expenditures. Real estate cannot stand any greater burden of taxation.

There is a bonus or subvention given to the city of Ottawa by this government in exchange for fire, police and water services. Every grant has a principle behind it, and in this case I believe the principle should be extended to the other large municipalities of Canada, all of which have federal public buildings within their boundaries, and give exactly the same kind of service.

Ontario has been most unfairly dealt with by this government. Under the Municipal Assistance Act, which was passed in the dying days of last session, provision was made whereby the municipalities could borrow money under certain conditions, if such loans were backed by the province. Owing to certain differences of opinion between the federal and provincial leaders of the Liberal party, however, Ontario has been denied any relief in this direction, although Owen Sound wanted to build a city hall; Pelee township wanted to build a drainage system; Morrisburg wanted to build a school; London, a sewage system; Burlington, a water system; Kirkland Lake and Port Arthur, water and drainage systems, St. Thomas, a nurses' home; Geraldton, water and sewage systems; Hawkesbury, a school, hall and rink; Gravenhurst, a sewage system, and so on. These municipalities cannot qualify under that act because of the difficulty between the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) and the Premier of Ontario. That is too bad, because I look upon the principle of confederation as being similar to that old Cornish battle-cry, "Each for all and all for each," and there should be equality of treatment as between the federal government and all the provinces on these relief measures.

A moment ago I was referring to the amount spent on the health of humans. Today, right down in ward 2, which the Prime Minister's grandfather once represented as mayor, there are many people who are in rags, starving, and living under terrible conditions. Reverend Mr. Wilson, pastor of King Street United Church, a very prominent man in Toronto, speaking at a luncheon recently said:

> "We are striving to give the less fortunate boys and girls of the district a chance to gain a measure of success in life," declared Mr. Wilson. . . . "I have visited homes in this district where babies were born without even a towel to wrap around them," he told his listeners.

In my opinion the time has come for the dominion to increase its grants for public health, hospitalization, control of cancer, and so on. How can the government look after the health and welfare of eleven million people if they spend only $400,000 a year on it? I think it is time for a change, and I for one am sick of coming here and seeing such a bill of fare as is proposed in the speech from the throne, and all the hopelessness, inefficiency and do nothing policy in it.

I should like to offer one or two constructive suggestions to the government. I believe this country is afflicted with anglophobia on the radio, in the press and elsewhere. They have these debates over the radio, in the newspapers and elsewhere, by means of which people who do not even belong in this country can put before the people what they have to say in regard to foreign affairs. Such statements are full of half-truths, and they are believed by many who hear them. Our gaols are full of youths whose only fault is that they cannot find a job. There are forty-eight of these institutions in Ontario, and most of them have been condemned by a royal commission as unfit for human habitation. Last week I referred to a case in Timmins, where the magistrate sent seven high school boys to gaol for thirty days because they had no place to go, while he criticized the parliament of Canada in no uncertain terms for what it failed to do in not trying to solve the youth problem. Yesterday the youth council met in Ottawa. Some measure of relief for the youth of our country was adopted by this government after it had been suggested from this side of the house in 1936, 1937 and 1938. Many of us felt that the government in some way should utilize the services of the two hundred thousand youths who leave school every year, and that students in the universities and high schools might work in the summer in the development of our natural resources. That would be very much better than the export of brains from this country that has gone on in the past.

Even our history books are found wanting, in my opinion. Green, the great historian, whose History of England was Woodrow Wilson's favourite history, has been taken out of the high schools and other books substituted. I also believe greater care should be observed in the appointment of judges and magistrates, and that the bars should be consulted in regard to them. It is my belief the Magna Charta is becoming a dead letter in this country. People are sent to gaol for vagrancy, when they cannot get work, and there are fifty thousand youths roaming the country, riding the rods, looking for jobs. We have imprisonment for debt. Two years ago I introduced a bill asking that the law of England should be adopted here. I believe that instead of abolishing appeals to the privy council, we should have some definite measure of law reform which would help the working people of this country, and lead to people not being sent to gaol for debt or imprisonment without bail, in most instances.

Recently the Toronto Globe referred to by-laws which are passed by federal commissions. This parliament confers on commissions and officials of the government the power to make rules and regulations, which even this parliament has not power to enact, and which are thus given the force of statute. In my opinion, these by-laws and regulations should not be passed until they have been approved as being intra vires by the Department of Justice, which gives legal advice to the government and the various commissions which it creates.

I notice that there has been some talk in the Ottawa newspapers to the effect that the east and west blocks, those historic relics of confederation, which have housed the brains of our country and where the privy council has met since we have been a country, should be torn down. To some people the past seems nothing but error, but I look upon it as modern desecration to see such buildings and memorials torn down and replaced by others, when at one time they housed the best brains of Canada and great men like Macdonald, Laurier, Tupper, Borden, Bennett, King and Meighen.

I might say something about the high cost of living. As a matter of fact I should have expected something about the high cost of living in the speech from the throne. Three years ago there were some references sent to the tariff board for an inquiry having to do with motor cars, motor trucks, radios and other articles. What has happened to those references? When will parliament see the reports? I have received letters from my constituents, but I have seen no results of the efforts of the board. These letters complain that radios, motor cars, motor trucks and refrigerators cost thirty-five per cent less in the city of Detroit than they do in Windsor. I believe in adequate protection; I am strong for it; but I also believe that the Minister of Finance (Mr. Dunning) should place in the tariff schedules regulations whereby the manufacturer would get a fair profit on his capital, leaving some protection for the consumer and labour.

After all is said and done, where is the enemy of protection? The enemy lies in about five per cent of the manufacturers who want to grab all the benefits for themselves, and leave nothing for labour or the consumer. I believe some returns have been made in the interim by the tariff board to the minister, and something should be done along this line.

I have read where the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) has made some observations. May I add in passing that we were pleased to see him at the winter fair. In his speech in Montreal he made some observations about unemployment. If he had studied the Couzens report made to the United States senate and Mr. Purvis' report made to parliament a year ago, he would have found that unemployment in many forms will always be with us. There will always be large numbers who will not find work. I suggest the minister would be far better employed if he urged the government to give us some relief in connection with the intolerable conditions which now exist.

In the time left at my disposal I should like to refer to foreign affairs, to the Chamberlain policy, to the experience which has been gained through history, to pacifism and to education as they relate to these problems. I do not agree with the policy of silence in Canada about foreign affairs and about Canada's defence policy as set out in the speech from the throne. "Trust the people" should be the policy. The policy of silence has been condemned in England and the world over. If Britain fails, the whole world will go with it into outer darkness. The peoples of the empire and of the world will lose civilization, freedom, peace and the freedom of religion we enjoy. I am opposed to a policy of spineless pacifism and to the continuous making of pacifist speeches. I am opposed to a policy of letting the old country go it alone and bear the whole burden of the costs.

Let us not forget the lessons of history in connection with these matters. It was the armed strength of the barons and the suppression of tyranny in the days of King Johr which made Magna Charta possible. The disarmament of the free is the tyrant's chance now as it was in the days of King John. Guardians of freedom must always be on guard. So far as Canada is concerned, may I point out that an unarmed Britain simply invites invasion and insult and, in the end, extinction. Before God to-day Britain stands as the trustee for the peace of the world, but she cannot go it alone. Other states of Europe, the smaller states, look to England as if she were the policeman of the world. But she cannot do it alone, because these weaker and smaller states now follow Germany; they simply follow the leader or the crowd.

Great Britain seeks no conquest for herself, but wishes only to establish the Kingdom of God on earth and to bring about a greater freedom of religion and of civilization, a freedom of the press and of the pulpit, of the legislatures and of the universities.

If one were to accept the views of the Prime Minister and his officials in the Department of External Affairs, one might be led to the conclusion that they were conducting their own foreign policy, a policy of silence. That policy has been condemned in the British House of Commons. According to a report in the Times of March 18, 1938, Mr. Neville Chamberlain, Prime Minister of Great Britain, speaking before the parliamentary press gallery, said:

If the people are not allowed to know the facts; if they are not allowed to know what their rulers choose them to know, then that people are in danger of being led to embark upon a course which may presently lead them into disaster.

Then, on March 24, the Prime Minister in the British House of Commons defined the commitments of Great Britain which might lead to armed intervention for purposes other than our own defence or the defence of possessions within the empire. In the course of his statement he said:

There remains another case in which we might have to use force, under the covenant of the League of Nations to bring help to a victim of aggression, even though there should be no direct obligation to take such action.

Since those words were spoken, many things, for the greater part disastrous for us, have happened. Many policies are dead. Mr. Chamberlain and Mr. Daladier, when signing the Munich agreement, drove the last nails into the coffin of the League of Nations. It is time the Prime Minister of Canada permitted the people to know the facts of the situation. A policy of silence is condemned by the Minister of War in the British House of Commons, the Right Hon. Leslie Hore-Belisha; it is his view that it is better to be candid than to conceal the truth. He went so far as to tell the British House of Commons about the deficiency in the defence preparations in the city of London. He said they were not prepared for a war, and that Great Britain would have to make greater sacrifices. Edmund Burke said that government is a practical thing and not an agency to please and aid the fancy problems of ordinary politicians.

Before the war of 1914 Lord Roberts asked for more defences. I can recall no more sad or tragic spectacle in the history of the British empire than Lord Roberts pleading for an armed Britain, and that something be done about armaments. But he was laughed at by leaders in the government. He died in the early days of the war, but lived long enough to see his prophecy fulfilled, and to hear the sound of the guns. It is admitted that if his advice had been taken and the facts known of war near at hand, England would have had 400,000 men ready when Germany engaged in the first battle of Ypres, with a further 120,000 reservists for each additional year, and the fortunes of war would have been different. But before the British forces were ready, the western front had frozen into the deadlock of trench warfare, which was to last for almost three more years.

If democracies are to be preserved, then all Canada must accept certain sacrifices. It is worth while, when we realize the awful possibilities of last September. The people of Canada should know the facts. So far as Italy is concerned, sanctions were invoked, but were not enforced. I say that this government has adopted a policy of isolation.

Do we remember the isolationist and pacifist speeches made in the House of Commons in 1937 and 1938 by government members from the province of Quebec? Do those speeches now represent the policy of the government? Have they a different policy on foreign affairs and defence for each province in the dominion? I think the people in Canada are entitled to know what the policy may be before it is too late. It is all very well to depend upon the United States; we welcome them, but I am here to say that the Johnson act will prevent Hitler, France or Great Britain from floating loans in the event of war. On top of that there is a resolution about munitions. The policy of the United States government is well known. At the present time America speaks with two voices. One is the ambassadorial voice of the president and the other is the congressional voice of the senate and the house of representatives who have the say. I believe that Canada has been criminally negligent in defence matters. A national survey should be made of our man power, our industrial power, our food power and everything like that.

They are critical about Chamberlain at Munich, but he did all that could be done. I know of no dominion more responsible for that policy of disarmament than Canada which urged it. They scrapped the finest air force, the finest navy and the finest army the world had ever seen. That was MacDonaldism. What was the result? You cannot build up a force like that in a day or a generation. The result was that Great Britain was found to be unarmed. Mr. Chamberlain saved civilization and the world at Munich. It may be only a postponement, but he did all that was possible until Britain is fully armed.

What are we doing about youth in this country? I gave the government a policy last year. The Hon. Ernest Brown, Minister of Labour in England, has been trying to get them to do something for youth over there. His policy is set out in a report which appeared in the Times of September 11. He made a tour of the unemployment centres. Speaking at a civic luncheon held in the town hall at Liverpool, he said:

Last month, between the ages of 18 and 24, there were 74,034 unemployed in Liverpool, Bootle, Birkenhead and Wallasey. Assuming that one-third of these young men, say 24,700 are physically fit to join the army—if one-third should not be fit, what a reflection on our public health and education authorities—

This is what he should have said to the young men, according to the National Review:

Look here, young fellows! Employment is waiting for you in the army. If you take it you will get food and clothing; free housing; pocket-money; instruction and physical education; you can learn a trade, if you have not already mastered one, at a vocation centre before your seven years' service are up; also, while serving, you will earn deferred pay. You can widen your outlook by going abroad, and you can qualify yourselves to enter Sandhurst and get commissions. You may have heard a prime minister emphasize the slogan "Safety first." Young men! it is safer to be in the army than to walk on a public road in England. We lay these conditions before you. Should you decide not to take advantage of them, you must get a living wage elsewhere; but do not expect your fellow men who are at work to contribute to your maintenance and idleness.

I do not propose this policy for Canada, far from it; but I do contend that this government, having spent $900,000,000 on unproductive relief, should consult industry and labour as to a policy, adapted to Canada's special circumstances for our youth now on the dole. I am not suggesting anything compulsory; it should all be voluntary. We should have a suitable Canadian apprenticeship system like what they have in England. Our youth should be given an opportunity to learn a trade as well as obtaining other education; they should get part time employment and part-time education. They should be able to obtain at least a little pocket money, clothing, food, a home, deferred pay and security, instead of being forced to go round filling up the prisons of this country. A Presbyterian divine speaking in Toronto yesterday said that unemployment is the main reason why so many of our youth find themselves in our gaols.

This government has negotiated a treaty with the United States but it is simply a political treaty. We have lost the British preference of six cents per bushel on wheat which we obtained after twenty-six years. This preference was granted to Canada, Australia and the other dominions, but it has been taken away. We have also lost the three per cent excise tax. That means a loss of $18,000,000. The Minister of Finance (Mr. Dunning) should be providing for that in his budget, and then the government should use this money to relieve real estate and the municipalities, and increase our social services, as I have suggested and as has been suggested also by the head of the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation (Mr. Woodsworth). Something should be done along that line.

Something should be done for our youth. Some of the brightest minds in the country are to be found in our high schools; yet many of these youths are simply riding round the country. They come from some of the finest homes in Canada, but quite often they find themselves in gaol simply because the only thing against them is that they cannot get a job. I think the time will come when it will be shown that this agreement with the United States is very bad for this country. We have given up our preference on wheat in the British market which may never be regained. Governor Landon and the republican party are pledged to the repeal of this treaty. What will be the result when that happens? We shall have lost our preference, and our steady market in Great Britain, our best customer. Canada and the other dominions will be driven into the Washington orbit, and I fear that Washington will become the economic centre of the British Empire. The government has no policy along other lines. The policy of the government in reference to this treaty has been condemned by many capable authorities, and I shall probably have something to say again in connection with it.

I am sorry to see that politics and spending of money like water have again entered into the operation of the Canadian National Railways. The government has given its consent to the completion of the new terminal at Montreal at a cost of over twelve million dollars. I should like to read some questions that I now ask the government here in this debate:

1. Has the government given its consent to the proposed completion of the new Montreal terminal of the Canadian National Railway and at what cost and on whose recommendation was the work asked for started?

2. Will any plan of the said work be tabled and the reports relating thereto?

3. Was parliament asked to sanction said work and when?

4. Is the work to aid relief and relieve unemployment?

5. Did the government meet the corporation of the city of Montreal on the subject or others?

6. Does the province of Quebec contribute anything to the cost of the work or were they asked under relief and municipal assistance legislation to sanction or aid said work?

7. What sums have already been spent on this work and by whose authority?

8. Has the board of transport for Canada been asked to sanction such huge expenditures or report on them or their necessity as recommended by—

(a) Drayton-Acworth report.

(b) The Duff report on railways.

9. Will the cost of said work be raised by taxation from income or capital or will it be raised from income from sales or income tax or will part of it be raised for relief works by the government?

10. What efforts were made at coordination or to eliminate deficits before such work was started?

11. Have any objections to such an uneconomic work been received and from whom?

12. Will any reports on relief or the necessity of relief works of this kind be tabled and will other cities receive similar aid of unemployment relief works and be heard direct by the government instead of being directed to the provinces under the municipal assistance relief legislation?

13. What reports are in existence as to the financial, economic and engineering features of the work?

14. Will preference be given to Canadian labour and Canadian industries in its construction?

15. What other purely municipal relief undertakings and works in Montreal have been undertaken by the government either above or in conjunction with the province for the last three years of record?

16. Does the action taken or to be undertaken now supplement the provisions made by the Honourable the Ministers of Public Works and Secretary of State during the winter of 1938 in the by-elections for the House of Commons in the district of Montreal and reported fully by Canadian press at the time?

Again we are to have politics and inefficiency in the Canadian National Railways. There is very weak management in that road. With a deficit of $50,000,000, I am sure the people of this country will oppose this extravagance which is not necessary from an engineering or financial or railway standpoint, and we should have a joint committee of both houses of parliament to try to solve this railway problem. I made this suggestion last year, but the government rejected it.

Mr. J. A. MARSHALL (Camrose): Mr. Speaker, practically four days have been taken up with this debate; the flow of oratory still continues and the end is not in sight. It becomes increasingly difficult for those of us who are on the back benches to contribute much in the way of constructive thought so late in a debate of this kind. The leaders of the two main political parties have gone over the issues so thoroughly and carefully and have taken up so much time in doing so that those of us who are compelled to follow them find it almost impossible to make the contribution we would like to make.

The mover (Mr. Matthews) and seconder (Mr. Chevrier) of the address in reply to the speech from the throne are to be congratulated upon the excellent manner in which they carried out their tasks. Their speeches show what can be accomplished by speakers when the range of subjects has not been curtailed in any way by those who have preceded them. I should like to congratulate the hon. member for Rosthern (Mr. Tucker) upon the speech he made on Tuesday. He always contributes something constructive to every debate in which he takes part. I want to say the same to the hon. member for Humboldt (Mr. Fleming) who spoke this afternoon. I cannot agree entirely with all they said, but their remarks upon monetary reform were of special interest to me.

It is always a source of amusement to me, when I hear the leader of the government or the leader of the opposition or a private member speak about the result of a by-election. It is always looked upon either as an endorsement or condemnation of the policies of the government. The mover of the address (Mr. Matthews) stated that the voters of Brandon had emphatically endorsed the platform of the Liberal party by returning a Liberal member. He said that his election was generally looked upon as an endorsement of Liberal policies by the people of western Canada. The leader of the opposition (Mr. Manion) was quick to cite the by-election in Waterloo South as showing the attitude of the east. I well remember when the Edmonton East by-election was fought. Some cabinet ministers before the election result was announced were foolish enough to state that the result would clearly indicate how the west felt about Liberal policies; but when the result was actually known, we heard nothing about the west or what it had to say about the party system in general, or about the Liberal party in particular. I think it would be just as well if we dropped this old line of talk because it has been worked so long and so often that people are getting tired of hearing it.

I was very much interested in the computation which was made by a member of the Conservative party of the length of the speech from the throne this session. He told us that he had compared this speech with other speeches on similar occasions and found that the speech this year was the longest for many years past. The leader of the opposition, as reported at page 22 of Hansard, said:

> In spite of all the criticism that has been heaped upon these two parties, I believe that they have done fairly well in the government of Canada throughout these years.

An interesting computation which might be undertaken by the same Conservative member, or by a Liberal for that matter, would be to calculate what these two parties have contributed towards the debt of this country since 1870, during the last seventy years since confederation. It might also be of interest if the same gentleman would compute what Liberal and Conservative governments in the provinces have contributed by way of debt to the debt structure of the provinces. The total is astounding. On January 1, 1936, the total debt of municipalities, provinces, and the dominion stood at $6,950,000,000; in round figures; on January 1, 1937, it had amounted to $7,249,000,000; on January 1, 1938, it had reached a total of $7,267,000,000; on January 1, 1939, according to the information I have here it had risen to a grand total of $7,449,000,000. And now there stands on the order paper a resolution in the name of the Minister of Finance (Mr. Dunning) asking parliament to give him authority to borrow, by way of loan, the sum of $750,000,000.

I wonder, Mr. Speaker, from whom that money will be borrowed. We hear a great deal about the widows and orphans in this country. I wonder if they have anything to contribute towards this loan. In my humble judgment, they have already contributed all they had towards loans in the past. I do not think any private individual or any group of individuals has enough money to make up the amount of this loan. But I believe that it will be borrowed from the creators of money and credit, the biggest legal racketeering concerns in the country, the bankers and their allies and associates, the financial institutions. And finally, in due course, the people of Canada will be called upon to foot the bill by way of taxation; and the interest, which is not created at the time the principal is created, will have to be found as well. I think the day is not far distant when the people of this country will call for an accounting from these two old parties, and in due process of time I believe they will go out of existence just as the snow vanishes before the summer's sun.

I listened with careful attention to the leader of the opposition as he "cussed" and discussed the policies of the present government. Most of his criticisms were merited, but I should like to say to him in a kindly way that his speech was more destructive than constructive. It appeared to me that we were witnessing the same old drama that has been played so often during the last seventy years, of the pot calling the kettle black. That is exactly what it amounted to, and I can assure the Leader of the Opposition and the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) that their speeches deceived no one, particularly those of independent mind who do their own thinking, for their speeches were nothing but smoke screens.

I should like to make a few comments on one item which was discussed by the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell) and later referred to by the hon. member for Huron North (Mr. Deachman). It is true that the matter was touched upon this afternoon by a member of my own group, but I offer no apology for reopening it. The hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar described very carefully and exhaustively the benefits which had accrued to the people of the Dominion of New Zealand through legislation which had been enacted by a labour government, a government which went into power in the year 1935 and was reelected in 1938. He stated further that the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation group of which he is a member was advocating the adoption of measures similar to those carried out in New Zealand. Let me assure him that this group of which I am a member are advocating similar measures, but with certain provisos. I assume that were the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation to take over the government of any province or even the government of Canada, they would follow along lines similar to those in our sister dominion. Let me hasten to assure the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation that in spite of the fact that Major Douglas, the father and founder of the social credit philosophy, visited New Zealand some years ago and conferred with leading men in that country, we as social crediters do not claim that this philosophy is being practised in New Zealand at the present time. The government of New Zealand has not yet—and I use the word "yet" advisedly—commenced to put any social credit principles into effect; so that we as a group will not quarrel with the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar if he claims New Zealand for the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation. However, I believe there are certain facts which he in particular and the country in general should know. It is a well known fact that the labour party was returned to power in 1935, and they obtained on that occasion fifty-three seats out of a possible eighty. How was that election won? That is the question. I propose to read a paragraph from an article which was published in the New English Weekly, London, England. The first paragraph reads:

> A lifetime spent in New Zealand, including the first six months of the present labour government's regime, enables me to endorse the claim of the latter to be the first labour government in the British empire elected to power as well as to office.
> Standing on the main plank of monetary reform, this government rode to victory by an overwhelming majority in November, twelve months ago. That election was notable, for every daily paper of any consequence was actively engaged in opposition, and an unprecedented amount of money was poured out for propaganda of the most violent nature by the banks.

This is the part to which I wish to draw special attention:

> Yet the counter-effect of two to four years' hard spade-work by over three hundred social credit groups throughout New Zealand was sufficient to immunize the electors when it came to the test.

I notice that when I mentioned the New English Weekly, some hon. members on the opposite side of the house seemed to think it quite a joke. Perhaps that is not a very responsible magazine from which to take an article, and perhaps one might question its authenticity; but I have before me the report of a speech which was made in the city of Edmonton, and the authenticity of which no hon. member, more particularly my hon. friends sitting to my right, can doubt. In the summer of 1938 a splendid young woman from Edmonton visited New Zealand. I do not know her particularly. I know of her; I know that she is a woman of culture and intelligence. She is a teacher in that city. She went to New Zealand and studied conditions there carefully. Her name is Miss Mary R. Crawford, and she is the treasurer of the Alberta Cooperative Commonwealth Federation. In her opening remarks she had this to say:

The people of New Zealand have the light of social justice shining out brightly upon them, and compared to them we are laggards. I think it is time we began to catch up.

Going on with her talk, she said:

Social credit has been a corridor through which thousands of New Zealanders had marched to an acceptance of labour principles.

But, she said, social credit had not elected a single candidate in the 1935 election. That is very true, because social credit did not put any candidates in the field in that election. Continuing, she said this:

People in New Zealand were vitally concerned with monetary problems, and social credit apostles had served to heighten this already acute interest by their crusade.

So I think that we as a group of social crediters should be given some credit for the victory of the labour party in the 1935 election. Some of the legislation which has been enacted by that government since they were elected in 1935 has been, to say the least of it, wonderful. These are some of the things they have done:

A basic minimum weekly wage fixed by government decree of approximately twenty dollars, taking the pound's value as five dollars. In addition, an arbitration court must see that wages allow an adult male worker "to maintain a wife and three children in a fair and reasonable standard of comfort."

All citizens in New Zealand are entitled, as of right, to complete, universal, free medical and hospital care from general practitioners. This includes full maternity benefits, as well as special provisions for invalids of a minimum of five dollars per week for an adult incapacitated for work.

[Mr. Marshall.]

The forty-hour, five-day working week, without any loss of wages.

Old age pensions payable at the age of sixty instead of seventy as in Canada. The pension is more than 1½ times as much as that here.

I should like to see, and every member of this group would like to see, this government bring in legislation to provide for old age pensions for people at the age of sixty, yes, and even lower than that.

A system of unemployment insurance already in force.

The government pays a guaranteed price to dairy farmers—back-bone of agriculture in New Zealand—and the price must remain stable the whole year. It also set up a primary products marketing department to handle the export and sale of dairy produce. The government owns all dairy produce intended for export and takes the loss, if any, itself. Profit goes to the farmer.

Farm hands obtain a month's holiday with pay each year.

These are some of the amenities of life which have been brought to the people of New Zealand by the labour government, and I, for one, heartily commend that government for what they have done. But I take exception to the manner in which these blessings have been brought about. Let me quote again from Miss Crawford's speech—and in my opinion this lady is just as good an authority as can be found anywhere. This is what she says:

This elaborate social service program, Miss Crawford explained, is financed by a charge of one pound per person to register for these benefits, plus a further tax of one shilling in every pound upon all wages, salaries and income.

To my mind that is where the nigger is in the wood pile. These amenities have been brought to the people of New Zealand by means of an elaborate system of taxation. It takes $5 to register, five per cent, or one shilling in every pound, of wages, salaries and income. It is my firm belief that these blessings can be brought to the people of Canada, and they must be brought to the people of Canada, without an increase in taxation. I believe this can be done through the medium of controlling the currency and credit of the country and using that currency and credit in terms of the public need. They are not doing that in New Zealand at the present time, and that is the point. That is where we, as social crediters, do not agree with the prime minister of that dominion. The hon. member for Huron North said, in the course of his remarks:

. . . I suggest that hon. members keep these things in their memory—

Things which he had spoken of earlier in his speech.

—for a year or two and then pass judgment when the test of time has brought its result.

Well, he is not foolish enough to think that Premier Savage is going to remain idle, doing nothing within the next year or two. When Premier Savage spoke at Auckland before 8,000 people, he said:

. . . money must be provided for production, and money must be provided for consumption. Unless a country could buy what it produced, trade expansion was impossible.

. . . unless the government of a country controlled the credit of the country it could not control anything else.

It is therefore my humble but firm judgment that the battle which should have been commenced in 1935 by the Premier of New Zealand is just beginning now. He is just about to find the stiffest opposition of his life when he comes to fight those who control the currency and credit of his country.

May I now for a moment speak to one who used to have a seat very close to these two reform parties. I realize that the matter is not covered by the speech from the throne; but if the Minister of Justice (Mr. Lapointe) will leave his Beauchesne's Parliamentry Rules and Forms in his desk for a little while and forget about it, I shall take a few minutes to say what is on my mind.

I am sorry that the hon. member for Kootenay East (Mr. Stevens) has moved over from these groups. I do not believe he will be happy with his former love unless his party makes far-reaching changes in their program. In the last session of this parliament, on March 31, 1938, he had the following to say. I quote from page 1911 of Hansard. Speaking of the price of cattle he said:

There is serious distress; in fact, the interjection of the minister tempts me to point out that the price of cattle to the farmers in Canada is not a fair price or one based upon the law of supply and demand at all. It is fixed in Toronto by the heads of the packing institutions, and that condition is unfair to the farmers. I am going to have more to say about that later on. I feel strongly on this question, because next to grain, if not indeed equally with grain, the marketing of live stock is one of the largest items in the production of new wealth in this country. There is no question in my mind—and I have given the matter a great deal of study—that the farmers of Canada are to-day, and have been—I was going to use the word "defrauded"—deprived, and unjustly deprived, of millions of dollars annually that they should get. I am prepared to prove that, and I shall do so one of these days. I am almost tempted to proceed with an analysis of these conditions, but I did not rise for that purpose to-night. When it is suggested that these conditions apply to other commodities, that is true, but there is nothing in the whole realm of activity in Canada to-day comparable with the unfairness in connection with marketing live stock.

Then he was followed by the Minister of Agriculture who said:

With regard to the last few remarks of the hon. member for Kootenay East, while there may be a great deal of truth in the statement that we are not obtaining enough for our cattle, I think it is pretty well agreed, particularly by those of us who are raising cattle, that there is a feature of the present situation which should be mentioned when we are discussing it from that point of view.

May I say to the hon. member for Kootenay East that these words of his are known to every farmer and every cattleman in Alberta. They were the subject of a long discussion on the floor of a convention held in the city of Calgary under the auspices of the rural municipal districts association, where a resolution was passed calling upon the government to take immediate action. I hope the hon. member will take the earliest opportunity—perhaps during this debate—to lay bare all the facts, as they are known to him. Should he succeed in getting action in remedying this abuse, I can assure him that he will win the gratitude certainly of all cattlemen living in Alberta and, I am sure, of all cattlemen in the west.

In conclusion, Mr. Speaker, I want to repeat what the hon. member for Vancouver-Burrard (Mr. McGeer) said in this house during the session of 1936:

Now may I say a word by way of reminder, because I want to warn the government and the Liberal party to-day that if I am right in my conclusions as to the way in which the public has interpreted these promises that were made as pledge before election, if they are not fulfilled then it may be that the Liberal party is placing its footsteps on that trail of broken promises which leads not only through the valley of humiliation but down deep into the abysmal depths of eternal oblivion.

I want to bring those words back to the minds of hon. gentlemen sitting to your right, Mr. Speaker. I want to tell them that danger signals are flying all over this country, and I hope the Liberal party will heed those signals before it is too late.

Mr. MAURICE LALONDE (Labelle): Mr. Speaker, although by tradition the debate on the address in reply to the speech from the throne is an occasion for one side of the house to exalt the policies of the government and for the members of the opposition to decry them, the words of praise that I shall have for the government are in no way dictated by that custom, but by the government's record itself. In rising to speak on behalf of the county of Labelle I am performing a duty commanded by justice and equity.

I hold it as a principle that it is the duty of all Canadians to preach and practise Canadian policies. I submit that the policy enunciated in the speech from the throne and which has been preached and practised for the past three years by the government of this country is essentially Canadian and that therefore it is the duty of every patriot to give it his loyal and sincere support. It is unnecessary, Mr. Speaker, to dwell on the first of these statements. According as our young country, in the course of time, acquires the characteristics and forms of an independent state; according as through the slow but natural evolution of its national life, it obtains its majority rights and takes at the concert of nations the place of honour to which it is entitled; according as on its territory there develops a population deeply rooted in traditions of order and of peace; according as Canada, through her immense natural resources and the work of her children, increases her influence among the nations of the world, every Canadian worthy of the name owes it to his country and his race to promulgate and put into practice just and reasonable laws and a truly Canadian policy.

I say that the policies of the present government, taking into account what economists call intangible factors and what I would call unforeseeable factors, are truly Canadian.

There is only one policy worthy of that name, and that is liberalism as we, federal Liberals, understand it. Far be it from my mind to advocate that partly political and partly religious liberalism, or, if you wish, that partly economic and partly religious liberalism which our opponents, especially in the province of Quebec, are prone to connect with the liberalism of Laurier. By Canadian liberalism, I mean the political doctrine which glorifies individual freedom as far as it can promote individual and social welfare. Set against excessive nationalism of which it is the absolute antithesis, such a doctrine curbs the arbitrary demands of the powerful and the pundits by promoting free and legitimate competition. Canadian political liberalism owes its existence and its principles to French liberalism which, at the outset, was opposed to the absolute power of monarchy. Under the Restoration, it was the policy of those who fought the government of Louis XVIII and Charles X and sought the return of the conditions prevailing after 1789. Victorious in 1830, liberalism became conservative in 1848, as it was then opposed to socialism. Since then, liberalism has been the name assumed by parties advocating civil and political liberty and fighting extreme theories, whether of the right, the center or the left. To-day it is particularly the policy of those who fight state socialism, antireligious sectarianism and all attempts at dictatorship springing either from the right, the center or the left. It is, in a word, sir, the antithesis of toryism whose sole ideal has always been, particularly in this country, the protection of the privileged classes at the expense of the masses.

The foregoing statements lead us to the conclusion that liberalism as practised in Canada provides the ground for the full flowering of practical and theoretical freedom in the economic field. In conclusion, it can be safely stated that, in safeguarding the liberty of man and his most cherished aspirations which include his complete freedom of thought and speech, our political liberalism stands as the irreducible opponent of autocracy, of monopoly and of dictatorship.

Set against the dictatorial nationalism and excessive racism condemned by the Pope himself, our political liberalism has been able to accomplish great things for our beloved country. It has created and built up the code of a truly Canadian policy, as we shall see.

It is under a liberal government that our country conquered its sovereignty, later consecrated by the Statute of Westminster in 1931. It was by affirming the doctrine of reciprocity in 1911 that Laurier, with a display of self-abnegation which will go down in history as one of the most moving of all political sacrifices, became an exponent of the purest liberalism. Then in 1935 his successor, the present Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King), continuing the tradition, negotiated the first treaty of reciprocity with the United States, thus destroying the remaining vestiges of absolute protectionism so dear to the heart of our Tory opponents. Finally, on November 17, 1938, the prime minister signed in Washington a second treaty of reciprocity which will stand as the climax of the sovereignly human accomplishments due to the political liberalism of the present government of Canada.

I could praise this treaty by pointing to its beneficial results for the farmers and lumbermen of my constituency, as it will open a great market for our agricultural products and will tend, by a freer export of forest products, to reduce the latent unemployment existing in that part of the province as a result of a considerable reduction in lumbering operations. But the treaty will do more than that. In addition to its practical effects and its important pecuniary advantages, it will become one of the effective means of strengthening national unity in our country.

It is no secret that this unity is threatened. Underhand campaigns of chauvinism and separatism inspired by a presumptuous egoism have shaken the structure of confederation. Inhabited by people of different races and religions, Canada has to fight to maintain its national life.

It is greatly to the credit of the Prime Minister and his government to have been able to accomplish the marvellous feat of maintaining in stable equilibrium these contrary forces and dissimilar interests and to make of all these heterogeneous parts a viable whole that is called Canada. Amendments and additions will soon have to be made, in order to adapt the terms of the federative agreement to the needs of the various groups. Without destroying anything, we should seek to build a finer and larger structure. I am confident that the present government of this country will safeguard the rights of the Catholic and French minorities and guarantee them the full exercise of their privileges. Our national unity which was threatened by the world crisis is stronger and livelier than ever, following the setbacks of nationalism and the victories of the present government's political liberalism. This treaty, affecting the most cherished interests of all the classes constituting the great Canadian nation, will re-establish this spirit of solidarity and unity on more solid bases.

In the international field, the policy of the present Liberal government has been Canadian.

There may be some who prefer to the thoughtful and prudent statesman some buffoon of present-day politics. I prefer the wisdom of the present Prime Minister to the saucy verbosity of some of his opponents.

When the European dictators, driven by the imperious necessity of a display of strength essential to the maintenance of their prestige, and swollen by a pagan racism, had Europe within an ace of war; when in a moment of folly they demanded, gun in hand, further ransoms and further conquests, the entire Canadian people stood in those tragic hours behind the traditional serenity of their Prime Minister who had promised that parliament alone would decide the question of Canada's participation in foreign wars. This statement, Mr. Speaker, is the consecration of the Liberalism of Laurier such as we practise it.

A certain Montreal daily newspaper sought in its edition of January 18th, 1939, to spread about the government and its leader a falsehood that common sense itself will refute. Because the Prime Minister of Canada read passages of a book which quoted a statement of Sir Wilfrid Laurier who had said in 1910 that when England is at war Canada is at war, this paper concluded that the leader of the government was ready to launch the country in an adventure of military conscription should England be drawn into a conflict. It took good care, though, not to quote in full Laurier's words, which were these: "When England is at war we are at war and exposed to attack." That is an altogether different matter and, besides, in 1910 the imperial tie was an all-powerful factor. Our colonial and dependent status implied certain obligations on our part, and bound us, as it were, to the mother country's destiny. But the wonderful emancipation brought about by the statute of Westminster freed us from that responsibility. Had the leader of this government issued such a fateful proclamation, our very independence would have been sufficient to ensure our right to declare our neutrality. But there is no need to give more publicity to that misleading announcement. Further on, the same newspaper admits that the policy of this government as regards participation in foreign wars is that parliament only is supreme, not the government. I am not surprised that the semi-official organ of the nationalists in Quebec should have availed itself of this opportunity to do some hair-splitting in order to launch an anti-militaristic campaign in my province. They cherish the hope of setting up a national federal party, which would merely be, under another name, the old tory party with which no one wishes to be associated in our province. They fondly expect a repetition of the tragedy of 1911.

There is no occasion for doubting that, belonging as we do to the British Commonwealth, even as a free and sovereign partner, we may sooner or later, have to decide whether we should bleed our country white in order to protect the empire's interests. But I do say, most emphatically that the liberals remember too well the bloody experience of 1917, that we believe our patriotism to be at least as sincere as the patriotism of those worthy writers who may be publishing reputed newspapers; that, conscious of our responsibilities as representatives of the people who do not want war we are against any such venture, and that, as long as this government is in power, the Canadian people should have a feeling of security. The leader of this government took a clear cut stand when he said "Parliament will decide."

I now say to my compatriots that they need not fear to follow Mackenzie King rather than the leader of the opposition whose endeavour for military conscription in 1917 is still remembered by the people in my province.

I do say, Mr. Speaker, that such a policy is truly Canadian. That is how our beloved country has gained in international matters, the respect of other powers. Of such achievements is history made and future generations will find in it the record of a steadfast man who was a genuine Canadian.

Of course, an increase in the national defence estimates is forecast in the speech from the throne. I shall purposely withhold my opinion, but I understand that the Government will deal with the matter in the light of our financial resources and of the geographical position of Canada.

I now wish to congratulate the leader of the government on the very fine speech which he delivered last Monday. On that occasion the two leaders have tried conclusions. The right hon. the Prime Minister has fulfilled the expectations of connoisseurs in besting his opponent with his unimpeachable arguments, his rousing dynamism and the moderate tone of his remarks. The maiden speech of the Conservative leader was awaited with much interest in Ottawa. Being the successor of one of the most aristocratic and well informed parliamentarians he owed it to his followers to rise at least to the heights of eloquence and sophistry where the former Tory leader had soared. It should be admitted that his task was indeed tremendous. Let me say right now that the present leader of the opposition has completely failed. He has disappointed his own followers. He has gladdened his opponents. Where his predecessor was trenchant and curt, the new leader has been vague. While the former resorted to sound reasoning, the new Conservative leader has discarded logic and delivered a speech replete with irrelevant puns and anecdotes. While the former could put the speech from the throne to a thorough analysis which sometimes led to sophistical conclusions cleverly clothed with a semblance of common sense, the latter has only touched lightly upon that piece of parliamentary oratory which is persistently referred to as the speech from the throne without extracting therefrom anything substantial.

Then the liberal leader replied. It was a triumph for him. Never within living memory had he attained those sublime heights, in such a spontaneous, moving and complete manner. Realizing his superiority over the man who had just failed in his task and summoning all the eloquence at his command, he dazzled the entire house. The leader of the opposition had reproached the liberal leader with being ignorant of the plight of the people and having never endured the suffering of the toiling and despairing masses. He had stung the lion to the quick. With sparkling eyes, with menacing gestures and in ringing tones, the liberal leader described with sobs in his voice the hardships of his forefathers, obscure heroes of pioneer days, valiant knights of the primitive exiles, who have inscribed on the portals of our country their heroic deeds. And when he spoke of his dear old mother, whom he so dearly loves, his indignation rang in thunderous words hurled at the conservative leader. He had avenged the honour of his name, he had avenged his party. He had wiped out the insult.

Under the guidance of such men, I have no reason to doubt, much less to betray. Rather is it my duty to implore the coming generation to follow in the luminous path beaten by them.

Let them not be guided by false gods and false doctrines. Has not past experience taught us that the Liberal party of Laurier and of King has always been the beacon indicating the true road? Has not the political liberalism that we uphold always been the real liberating doctrine? Does not history teach us—and how truly!—that each Liberal administration since 1867 has restored to Canadians a certain amount of happiness and prosperity by combating the evil effects of protectionist nationalism and tearing away piece by piece from the Tory oligarchy the remnants of Canadian liberties.

Mr. Speaker, I have no hesitation in supporting the resolution moved by the hon. member for Brandon (Mr. Matthews), which eloquently sets forth the record of a truly Canadian government led by men who have no other earthly ideal but to give the best of themselves to their country and to their fellow-men.

Mr. DENTON MASSEY (Greenwood): Mr. Speaker, I am happy to make my first words those of congratulation to both the mover and the seconder of the motion at present before the house. I am sure that we all listened to the speeches of the hon. member for Brandon (Mr. Matthews) and the hon. member for Stormont (Mr. Chevrier), appreciating not only their ability but their agility to speak so well when there is so little they could say. We all admired particularly the synchromesh ease with which the hon. member for Stormont changed from one language to the other. I am sure that all the congratulations that have been showered upon him this week have been absolutely sincere.

My second words are words of congratulation to my hon. leader (Mr. Manion). I offer congratulations to him not only upon his election to the leadership of the National Conservative party of Canada, but upon assuming his position as Leader of His Majesty's Loyal Opposition. We regard ourselves as being peculiarly fortunate in having a man of his calibre as our leader, whose record as a Canadian is as distinct as it is distinguished. He has made a magnificent contribution to Canada both in time of war and in time of peace, and his presence in this house brings to it that which alone his own presence can bring.

I would congratulate him further upon his maiden speech as leader of the opposition. All of us who listened to him last Monday realized that his absence from the house for three years had served to sharpen rather than to dull the edge of his sword. We admired the forthrightness of his presentation. He did not dodge points by the recognized device of verbiage, but his presentation was forthright and to the point, and the acclaim that it received from Halifax to Victoria is one of which he must be duly proud.

My next words are in connection with an event to which we all in this country look forward. We are happy and proud that Their Majesties the King and Queen are to visit Canada this May. From coast to coast they will receive a welcome of spontaneous loyalty and devotion from those who live in this dominion. We are proud, yes, and happy, yes; and we anticipate that we may be able to demonstrate to their majesties that Canada as a dominion in the family of empire remains in the position where she has always been.

This evening, Mr. Speaker, I am fully conscious of the necessity of discussing some of the major problems that are confronting this dominion; but it is not my purpose tonight to ventilate my views and opinions on matters which have already been discussed at some length by those who have spoken before me. There is still plenty of time and opportunity before this session is completed for me to present what I feel to be the views of my constituents on all these vitally important matters.

To-night I wish to deal particularly with one matter which is of farther reaching importance than many are apt to consider, a matter which strikes at the very roots of the liberty which we enjoy in this country and for which our forefathers fought and bled. I do not wish to appear platitudinous; but let us remind ourselves that the liberty and freedom we enjoy includes the right of free speech, free assembly, free association, and free worship. For centuries these rights have been our priceless privileges. They have become basic in our scheme of things. By no possible stretch of the imagination can they be considered to be a policy of this or of any other government; for they are fundamental to our democracy, and any abridgement of these principles strikes a blow which is directed at the bedrock upon which our nation and our empire have been built. They are principles the practice of which is a privilege and the equal right of all free men, whether their means be mediocre or whether their means be great. They are principles that apply equally to all citizens.

As a citizen of Canada I respect those rights regardless of who exercises them. As one in public life I may protest with all the energy of which I am capable against what my opponent has to say; but I will protest equally against any curtailment of his right to say it. When we speak of free speech we are speaking of liberty, which is the inalienable right of all citizens of Canada and of Great Britain. It is only when that liberty is grossly abused to the extent of licence that any restrictions upon it should be tolerated at all.

I postulate, Mr. Speaker, that this is the principle which has motivated the action of successive governments in Canada from confederation down to the present day—the present day, when we are faced with the first example of the restriction of free speech, if not directed, at least condoned by this government in general and by the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) in particular in his speech on Monday last.

The argument that I am about to present deals with this principle, and may that be noted. It has nothing whatsoever to do with any particular individual—let me make that clear beyond peradventure of a doubt.

The particular instance of which I am about to speak concerns a man who notoriously and rather recently has attacked me bitterly both in his paper and on the air. I have no axe to grind for Mr. George McCullagh, or his Globe and Mail, as I have already said it was just over a year ago that he launched his attack on me, and I in return attacked his policies and his newspaper with no small degree of fervour. Let it further be noted that I have no knowledge whatsoever of what Mr. McCullagh has in mind to say in his next four scheduled broadcasts, no more than I had any knowledge whatsoever of what he was going to say in his first broadcast.

Still further let me state that my criticisms are directed against no one individual; that I have the highest personal regard for those who are directly responsible for the present situation. May I say that my own personal dealings with the broadcasting corporation, its officers and government representative, have been of the happiest. Thus it is that I am virtually amazed at this recent turn of events. It has been my pleasure to have many dealings with the broadcasting corporation, and my regard for its officers and its government representative has sprung from actual experience. In many ways I feel that the management of the broadcasting corporation are to be heartily congratulated upon their efforts to date; but the recent action on their part, which has received so much publicity not only throughout Canada but throughout the United States and Great Britain as well, cannot be allowed to go unchallenged by those of us who sit in this house.

Let me review briefly, Mr. Speaker, the events that took place between Mr. McCullagh and the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation during the last two weeks or so. On January 3 Mr. George McCullagh, publisher of the Globe and Mail, applied for the use of the national network of the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation in order to present to the public of Canada in a wider way than was possible through his newspaper the views of his paper concerning matters of public interest. He was to broadcast as publisher of the Globe and Mail, and not as an individual, the newspaper to use him as their air mouthpiece. Mr. McCullagh telephoned his request to Major Gladstone Murray, explaining to him the nature of the talks that were to be given, and stating his willingness and preparedness to submit his script in advance for approval. It was pointed out by Major Murray in a letter confirming the telephone conversation, that Mr. McCullagh's application could not be accepted, and it was suggested that he take part in the corporation's Sunday evening forum, which would require him to accept the subject allotted to him and to speak for fourteen minutes on one occasion. Mr. McCullagh wrote Major Murray on January 4 protesting and making his application anew. The following day Major Murray replied in a letter which quoted rulings recently approved by the board of governors, including this. I quote:

> No individual may purchase network broadcasts for his own opinions.

It is important to note that in this letter Major Murray also observed:

> These rulings which apply also to individual CBC stations but not individual privately owned stations, were the subject of most careful consideration.

Surely it is obvious from this statement in the general manager's own words—I am not using mine—that under the policy of the corporation time could be booked on privately owned stations for the broadcast of individual opinions. In accordance with this obvious conclusion, confirmed by Major Murray's letter of January 5, Mr. McCullagh proceeded to secure time on all the privately owned stations in Ontario, nineteen in number, I believe, for the period from five to five-thirty p.m. on Sunday afternoons for a series of five broadcasts to commence on January 15. On January 6, Mr. McCullagh received a further communication from Major Murray suggesting that he participate in a forum with Professor Taylor, of McMaster university, on the prosy subject, "Canadian trade—in what direction?" Mr. McCullagh replied to the effect that there were many problems which he wanted to discuss and that he did not wish to be limited and governed by an academic subject handed to him by any corporate body of the government. He further informed the corporation that he intended to broadcast over the available privately owned stations in Ontario,—which was, of course, as I have noted, in accordance with Major Murray's letter of January 5. On January 12, Major Murray again wrote Mr. McCullagh, and from that letter I quote the following paragraph:

> While the whole matter of private stations network is under review the board of governors has instructed that no permission for new commitments on non-basic networks shall be granted until at least the board has received the representations of private stations at the next board meeting which is expected to take place about the middle of March.

Let it be noted that as late as Thursday, January 12, three days before his first scheduled broadcast, Mr. McCullagh was denied the use of the privately owned Ontario stations on a non-basic network. Here, I postulate, was a new ruling on the part of the board of governors of the broadcasting corporation, and it is frankly so admitted in Major Murray's letter, for he says that this matter will not be under review until the middle of March.

I state here that no such occurrence has taken place before in the history of Canadian broadcasting and accordingly it appears clear that for some reason discrimination has been shown against Mr. McCullagh. That is the only possible interpretation of the action taken.

Feeling that a gross injustice had been done to him, Mr. McCullagh found a means of circumventing the restriction of freedom of speech by the corporation, and placed his speech upon wax and distributed the discs to the privately owned stations that were not permitted to be tied up in a non-basic network, while he himself conducted a live broadcast from the single station CFRB. I listened with particular care last Sunday afternoon to Mr. McCullagh's remarks. I have before me a verbatim copy of those remarks. The address was, I suggest, of definite and great interest to the people of Canada. It attacked no one in particular, but it challenged the people of Canada to attain to better government through determined action. His efforts were obviously directed to arouse the electorate to build up responsible government and demand courageous leadership. Whereas he was not very complimentary to any one of us in this house, no one can say that his speech was either damaging or destructive, but on the contrary it was constructive and will without doubt do good.

This statement, may I again remind hon. members, is coming from one who is a prejudiced witness in regard to Mr. McCullagh, for the last time when Mr. McCullagh was on the air, a year ago, he vigorously attacked me personally. No matter what Mr. McCullagh said; no matter who Mr. McCullagh is; no matter what Mr. McCullagh represents, I repeat that the broadcasting corporation has assumed and taken unto itself rights never in the world given to it under the Canadian Broadcasting Act of 1936. When I make that statement I know whereof I speak. As the Prime Minister reminded me when I took the liberty of interrupting him when he was speaking on Monday evening, I was on the committee which submitted the report from which the bill was drawn, and that report passed the committee unanimously. But I certainly had no thought in my mind that such an action would be taken based on the legislation drafted from the report of that committee.

I think we have covered certain phases of this subject, perhaps a bit hurriedly and perhaps not completely; but I do feel, and feel very definitely, that an injustice has been done Mr. McCullagh, and therefore I hesitate not at all to bring this matter to the attention of the house.

I should like to say further that not so very long ago—I believe it was under date of January 14—the Minister of Transport (Mr. Howe) was interviewed by that very able correspondent in Ottawa of the Toronto Daily Star, Mr. Robert Lipsett. I have in my hand the Star of January 14, in which there is a report of the interview with the minister. May I summarize what the minister had to say to Mr. Lipsett:

1. . . . Nor was the application of existing regulations in his, Mr. McCullagh's, case any different from what it was in at least twenty previous instances.

2. It is a fundamental principle applied everywhere where there is network broadcasting that no individual may purchase time on any network to broadcast his own opinions.

3. A privilege granted to Mr. McCullagh could not be withheld from others, nor could a privilege denied others be granted to Mr. McCullagh.

4. The government had nothing to do with the decision on Mr. McCullagh's application. "I did not learn of it until I received a copy of the correspondence from Major Murray."

In the first instance, the minister states that this case is no different from at least twenty previous instances. He cited one case in particular, that of a broadcast which was to be delivered by Sir Edward Beatty, permission for which was refused. I regret to say for the minister's sake that Sir Edward Beatty saw fit to deny this statement and stated that he knew of no such instance in his own experience; and it is rather unfortunate that the minister selected that case. Sir Edward further reminded his interviewer that on several occasions he had broadcast addresses coast to coast over CBC stations. I urge the minister, if he cares to reply to this speech, to give to the house his other nineteen "instances."

The Minister of Transport also stated that wherever there is network broadcasting no individual can purchase time on any network to broadcast his own opinions. Well, of course that statement is absurd, absurd because it is untrue. Such regulations may exist; but the minister knows this, that, if so, they certainly have not been carried out in Canada and the United States. Time and time again in both countries this has been the case. Let me quote section 326 of the United States radio law of 1934, which is in effect to-day:

> Nothing in this act shall be understood or construed to give the federal commission the power of censorship over the radio communications or signals transmitted by any radio station, or no regulation shall be promulgated or fixed by the commission which shall interfere with the right of free speech by means of radio communication.

Contrast the Canadian point of view that we have had manifest in the last few days with that held by the United States. It was a matter of interest to the Toronto Daily Star, and accordingly they had a reporter in New York city make several calls on the broadcasting station headquarters. In reporting the interview, the reporter, on January 16, asked a question of the heads of one of the broadcasting companies:

> "Suppose the publisher of the New York Herald Tribune wanted to buy time, would you sell it?"
> "I doubt very much we'd sell it," said Mr. Babb of NBC, "but we'd give it."

They would be willing to have a responsible individual broadcast, so far willing as to give him the time. The minister has only to look across the border to the United States to find there the example of Rev. Father Coughlin who, every Sunday afternoon, broadcasts from the Shrine of the Little Flower his personal views which are aired over a network of forty-six United States stations and for which he pays. I have in my hand a copy of a statement that appeared on the front page of the Globe and Mail on Monday last in which he said he broadcasts over a network of forty-six stations. Father Coughlin further says in part:

"I would not care to comment on the situation you have outlined to me," he told a reporter, "but if Mr. McCullagh should ever find himself unable to reach a broad enough audience through Canadian stations he will be welcome to use this chain at any time."

To compare the policy of the British Broadcasting Corporation with the policy of the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation in this regard is also absurd. The question of the airing of opinion cannot possibly arise in Great Britain because the British Broadcasting Corporation is simply not in commercial business, sells no time. It is not on a commercial basis but is self-supporting, and therefore a situation such as has arisen here could not possibly arise there.

Let us come back to Canada. I give the minister the example of Colonel George Drew who as recently as last November repeatedly aired his opinions to the province of Ontario through an Ontario network. At that time Colonel Drew was merely a private citizen, an individual holding no office whatsoever in any political party. Now, the most amazing example of all, which shows, I think, that there must have been some discrimination against Mr. McCullagh, more clearly than any that could be given. He had been sold a network before. He was sold a network in October, 1937, and he broadcast over a number of Ontario stations! He was just as much an individual then as he is now. Why should he be able to broadcast in 1937 at the height of an election campaign, if he cannot broadcast now? Can it possibly be that in 1937, in his broadcasts, he was obviously going to support the Liberal party in Ontario, whereas in 1939 it was presumed by many that he would attack the present Liberal government at Ottawa?

Let us recall the statement made by the Prime Minister in the course of his remarks on Monday. He used this language, which will be found at page 12 of Hansard:

I simply wish to say that the government has had nothing whatever to do with refusing any application that has been made to the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation. Neither the government nor any member of the government had any knowledge that an application had been made to the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation by the publisher of one of Toronto's leading newspapers, nor had any member of the government any knowledge that such an application had been refused.

As hon. members know, the business of controlling and regulating radio broadcasting has been placed by this parliament under the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation, which is an autonomous public body and with which the government does not interfere and has no desire to interfere.

Does the Prime Minister mean to tell the people of Canada that the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation has not only the power to execute a policy but, further, the right to establish a principle which affects the basic foundation upon which this country has been built, a principle which touches the very quick centre of our national life? Has any department of this government the power to restrict the time-honoured rights of the individual—free speech, free assembly, free association, free worship, or anything else to which the individual is entitled? Is any department, commission, corporation or company, responsible to the government of Canada, and owned by the Canadian people, free to upset established principles without any question on the part of the government? Yet that is exactly what has happened.

The action of the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation is extraordinary from many points of view. Do hon. members realize that the decision taken in regard to the McCullagh matter by the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation denies to the individual a privilege that is enjoyed by our political parties in Canada? If Mr. McCullagh claimed membership in a party instead of professing independence, as he does, he could without any question obtain time on a coast-to-coast network of the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation. But as he is an individual he is denied that right, a right which would be his were he a party man. What skinny justice is here? Let those who state that just because he has a wealthy organization behind him Mr. McCullagh should be denied the privilege of broadcasting his opinion, consider the accepted practice of the various broadcasting companies including the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation. The Canadian Broadcasting Corporation every Sunday evening carries the Ford hour, which brings to the listeners of Canada the delightful music of the Detroit symphony orchestra.

Mr. HOWE: Will the hon. gentleman permit a question?

Mr. MASSEY: Surely.

Mr. HOWE: Quite inadvertently, he is not correct. The Canadian Broadcasting Corporation has never carried the Ford hour.

Mr. MASSEY: I was thinking of Charlie McCarthy, but I saw the minister and I forgot Charlie. I meant to say that over a network in Canada the Ford hour is carried on Sunday evening. This program goes over a network in Canada.

Mr. HOWE: I am sure my hon. friend wants to be accurate, but that statement is not correct. There are one or two stations in Canada that are connected with the Columbia Broadcasting Corporation, perhaps two, and they carry the Ford hour, but it is not a Canadian network in that these stations are not connected in Canada.

Mr. MASSEY: The Ford hour has not been changed in Canada through this act.

Mr. HOWE: Not to my knowledge.

Mr. MASSEY: It is presented to listeners in Canada over single stations or a network, and this program is on the air for one purpose only, as the minister knows, and that is to sugar-coat the pill of Mr. Cameron's own opinions. We have fifty-five minutes of orchestral and vocal or instrumental music, and Mr. Cameron's speech, in which he airs his personal opinions. This is a case where one of the most mightily wealthy corporations on the continent is permitted to buy time without question on Canadian stations for the purpose of airing opinions.

Mr. SPEAKER: It is eleven o'clock.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): Move the adjournment of the debate.

Mr. MASSEY: I shall be through if I may be allowed to speak five minutes longer.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Go on.

Mr. MASSEY: Thank you, your honour, for the courtesy. The purpose of the broadcast in question, the Ford hour, is to air vigorous political opinions.

Again, a short time ago, one of the wealthiest corporations in Canada, General Motors of Canada, Limited, purchased time on a coast-to-coast network of the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation. For what purpose? To permit the airing of Mr. Beverley Baxter's personal views concerning the government and the foreign policy of the United Kingdom. That was the program.

Let us go even farther. I postulate to the right hon. the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King), who so tactfully disclaims any responsibility for the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation, saying that the administration of policy is entirely in the hands of the corporation, that this powerful organization, maintained by a nuisance tax on the public, is being used for political purposes and for furthering the interests of those who sit on the treasury benches. At regular intervals this autumn radio addresses have been made by various ministers of the crown, and made at the public expense; and in my opinion these addresses in great part have been little more than cunningly-designed political speeches, in an attempt to show the country, in spite of what the public may think, that these ministers after all are really capable men. I have endeavoured to obtain copies of these speeches to make quotations from them in order to justify the point I have just made, that they are political in character. Unfortunately, according to my information, the printed word will not be available for another fortnight.

In his speech on Monday night, however, the Prime Minister himself admitted that he could use the radio when he wished to do so. Let us listen to his words, as they appear at page 66 of Hansard:

> —the Prime Minister of Canada cannot be going back and forth across the country making political speeches and making personal appearances before local audiences. He has this House of Commons to speak in. What better forum is there in the world? He has the radio to speak over. Is it not much better to give a few nation-wide addresses in carefully chosen words—

Then I am afraid the right hon. gentleman did not become very complimentary, but I am sure he was facetious.

> —than to be given the kind of oration to which we have listened this afternoon and to-night?

Then too, at the public expense there comes blasting into our homes a forum conducted by various individuals, college professors and other men. I have listened to many of these forums. Some of them have been passably good; others have been ridiculous, and some have been fatuous. Still others have been destructive, irritably and irrationally anti-empire, isolationistic and bound to do harm rather than good in these days when Canadian unity is being so severely tried.

As I come to the conclusion of my remarks, Mr. Speaker, let me again impress upon hon. members that my purpose in taking up the time of the house this evening on this matter has nothing whatsoever to do with Mr. McCullagh as an individual, or his Globe and Mail as a newspaper. I am not concerned with what Mr. McCullagh has to say or what he thinks; but I am concerned, as I think every member of this house should be, when we lodge power in any one man or any small group of men to pass on one of the basic principles upon which this country has been established. And I am further concerned when one of the ministers of the crown, to whom this body is responsible, washes his hands of the matter and says, "This has nothing to do with me. It is a question of policy for the corporation." I am also concerned when the Prime Minister of Canada himself, who has made such eloquent speeches on constitutional rights and constitutional authority, disclaims any responsibility for the action of a body appointed by his government which abridges these rights, and makes the amazing statement in this house that he is prepared to back up that action. Let me quote from page 14 of Hansard:

> Mr. Woodsworth: May we not have the assurance of the Prime Minister that the government will stand behind the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation in this matter?
> Mr. Mackenzie King: I think so, yes.

That is a typical answer from the Prime Minister.

Just because a man may be possessed of a substantial quantity of this world's goods is no reason why his rights should be abridged or his voice unheard. Surely those who discredit this point of view are inconsistent when under the dictates of their worthy desire for justice they champion the right of free speech for him who is not so well to do—and all power to them in their effort—but why in the name of justice should they wish to restrict the right of him who happens to be well to do? I am firmly of the opinion that free speech is the right of any man, be he well to do or possessed of the most modest means. It amounts to this: Either we have free speech in Canada or we have not. Either we have free assembly or we have not. Either we have a free press or we have not. Either we have free association or we have not. Either we have free worship or we have not.

May it be remembered that there was a committee which submitted a report from which the present broadcasting act was drafted. I sat on that committee, and I know what was the purpose in the minds of those who approved that report. I postulate that the present action of the corporation goes far beyond the intent of that act, as admitted by the general manager of the corporation himself when he said that to settle this matter there would be a meeting of the board of governors in March. The corporation was to administer policy, yes; to administer policy independent of but subject to review by the Minister of Transport, yes; but to establish principle? No; a thousand times no!

Mr. HOWE: Would my hon. friend permit a question? He is very familiar with the broadcasting act. Can he quote any paragraph of that act which gives the Minister of Transport or the government power to interfere with a decision of the board of governors of the corporation?

Mr. MASSEY: Would the minister state for a single, solitary moment that if any civil servant attempted to abridge any basic national principle, he, the minister, would simply say, "That has no bearing on me at all. That is his job"?

An hon. MEMBER: It is not the same thing.

Mr. MASSEY: It is exactly the same; of course it is.

Mr. HOWE: May I point out that no member of the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation is a civil servant. They are employees of the corporation.

Mr. MASSEY: All right. Would the minister sit quietly in his place if some action were taken by an officer of the Canadian National Railways that grossly contravened established business practice; and, under questioning from this side of the house, would he rise in his place and say he could do nothing about it? He would not, and I have heard him do otherwise.

Mr. HOWE: I make that statement twenty times every session—and there is that word "twenty" again.

Mr. MASSEY: I think the minister picks that word "twenty" out of the hat rather glibly. When he makes his speech I am going to count carefully how many other "Sir Edward Beatty's" he has in it. I will guess nineteen.

I was relieved when the Prime Minister, speaking in this house last Monday, stated that a committee would be set up this session to review the activities of the broadcasting corporation. I need not take time to quote his words, but the remarks of the Prime Minister in that connection may be found at page 55 of Hansard. So much to the good, but let me urge the Prime Minister, and in his absence the Minister of Transport, that in setting up this new committee they keep clear of such terms of reference as were given the committee that sat last year, which terms were so cramped and restricted that, as the result of their interpretation by the chairman of the committee, no witnesses other than officers of the corporation could be called. In protest against this decision two members of that committee withdrew and sat no more.

Mr. McNEVIN: The two members referred to, withdrew for political purposes.

Mr. MASSEY: What is that? Who is speaking?

Mr. McNEVIN: I said it was very likely for political purposes.

Mr. MASSEY: I think it was exactly for political purposes; that is exactly why witnesses were not called, and I thank the hon. member for Victoria, Ontario, for putting the words in my mouth. So I say, let the terms of reference to the committee this year be sufficiently broad that any witnesses desired, whether or not they be attached to the corporation, may be called. As a test case let Mr. McCullagh appear before that committee and state his position, along with the officers of the corporation, so that the committee may weigh this matter and determine to their own satisfaction whether there has been any discrimination against Mr. McCullagh. Public opinion has been aroused, particularly in certain sections of the country, by this high-handed action on the part of the corporation, and that public opinion demands satisfaction at once.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): Might I suggest to my hon. friend that he move the adjournment of the debate? We are already ten minutes past the time for adjournment.

Mr. MASSEY: I am glad to move the adjournment of the debate.

Mr. SPEAKER: The hon. member has exhausted his time, so he should not move the adjournment of the debate.

Mr. MASSEY: I move the adjournment of the debate.

Mr. SPEAKER: The hon. member has exhausted his time.

Mr. MASSEY: I think I moved the adjournment of the debate before you, Mr. Speaker, informed me of that.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): My hon. friend cannot move the adjournment of a debate in which he is no longer able to take part.

Mr. MASSEY: I cannot quite see that. I had one further statement to make, and I would have been glad to make that statement, but the right hon. Minister of Justice (Mr. Lapointe) asked me not to make it to-night but to move the adjournment of the debate, which I did. Now I find myself faced with the ruling that I am through. If I had asked for one moment more I am sure the right hon. gentleman with his great courtesy, which I and all members of this house recognize, would have assented readily.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): If my hon. friend has only one or two more sentences, all right; but it is ten minutes after eleven, and I think many hon. members would like to see the house adjourn.

Mr. MASSEY: To oblige the Minister of Justice I said I would be glad to move the adjournment of the debate; otherwise I ask for the privilege of making my closing statement.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Go ahead.

Mr. SPEAKER: I understand that when the Minister of Justice suggested that the hon. member might adjourn the debate, the right hon. gentleman was of the opinion that the hon. member had a few minutes left to speak. I find from the clerk of the house that the hon. member for Greenwood (Mr. Massey), when he said he would move the adjournment of the debate, had exhausted his time to speak.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): Go ahead, if it is going to be short.

Mr. MANION: Mr. Speaker, if there could be unanimous consent of the house, and if the Minister of Justice (Mr. Lapointe) pleases, the hon. member would require only a few more minutes.

Mr. SPEAKER: Well, if it is only a few minutes more—

Mr. MASSEY: Before I take my seat, let me point out that the matters which have been dealt with in the speech from the throne, and with which I purpose to deal from time to time during the session, are matters to which I am by no means insensible this evening. Let it not be said I have neglected them; for I shall deal with them, as I stated in opening, from time to time during this session. Let me now merely state, Mr. Speaker, that I am supporting whole-heartedly the amendment moved by my leader to the motion that is before this house. I shall not support the amendment to the amendment, which is designed cleverly and adroitly by the leader of the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation (Mr. Woodsworth), who moved it.

I oppose monopolistic control and exploitation just as heartily as any member of this house, and despise it in principle and in result, but I shall vote against the amendment to the amendment for the obvious reason that a vote for it, as it is worded, would be a vote in favour of socialism in Canada, and that I do not support.

I thank your honour, hon. members in general, and my hon. friend the right hon.

Minister of Justice in particular, for the courtesy extended to me in allowing me to complete my speech at this hour.

On motion of Mr. Howe the debate was adjourned.

On motion of Mr. Lapointe (Quebec East) the house adjourned at 11.15 p.m.

Friday, January 20, 1939

The house met at three o'clock.

RADIO BROADCASTING

EMPLOYMENT OF WAR VETERANS AS CANVASSERS FOR RADIO LICENCES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. F. E. LENNARD (Wentworth): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask a question of the Minister of Transport (Mr. Howe) arising out of a Canadian press dispatch dated at Ottawa, January 17, as follows:

Employment of war veterans, where available, as convassers for radio licences will be made mandatory as from April 1.

Where and by whom will these appointments be made?

Hon. C. D. HOWE (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, the appointments will, as in the past, be made by the Minister of Transport.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

ADJOURNMENT AT SIX O'CLOCK ON FRIDAY OF FIRST FULL WEEK OF SESSION

On the orders of the day:

Hon. R. J. MANION (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, before the orders of the day are called I should like to ask a question of the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King). I am informed it has been the custom during most of the last few sessions to adjourn at six o'clock on the Friday of the first full week. It would appear that some hon. members on this side of the house have taken it for granted that that custom will be followed and, for that reason, have made other arrangements. I might add that while I am not insisting upon it, the party I lead would be pleased if the house did adjourn to-day at six. We have sat three evenings this week, and I think that is not bad for the opening week of the session.

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): What the leader of the opposition (Mr. Manion) has said with respect to adjournment in the last three or four years is quite correct. The house has adjourned at six o'clock on the Friday evening which closes the first full week of the session, not because of any rule, but simply because it seemed to be the general desire of hon. members. I understand there is the same desire this year on all sides of the house, and I shall be pleased to see that adjournment is moved at six o'clock.

PROCEDURE RESPECTING CANADA-UNITED STATES TRADE AGREEMENT

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): I should like to reply to a question asked last night by the leader of the opposition (Mr. Manion) respecting the procedure the government intended to adopt with respect to the trade agreement, once the resolution on the order paper is passed.

In a word the procedure will be the same as that followed at the time of consideration of the 1936 agreement. The Minister of Finance (Mr. Dunning) will move the house into committee of ways and means so that the agreement in detail, and particularly the schedules attached thereto, may be considered by that committee. This motion is required under standing order 60 of the House of Commons. When the committee has reported to the house and the report has been approved, a bill will be introduced, based on the resolution reported from committee of ways and means, giving the force of law to the new trade agreement and repealing the existing one, namely the Canada-United States Agreement Act of 1936. The bill will of course have to pass through all its stages, including committee of the whole.

Mr. MANION: In other words as soon as the resolution is passed that will be the procedure?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Yes. May I point out that I am answering the question of the leader of the opposition as it was asked last night, because it related only to the procedure to be followed after the adoption of the resolution. I wish to make it quite clear that the resolution will be debated fully before any reference is made to the committee of ways and means.

Mr. MANION: I asked only because some little discussion had arisen. I inquired from the clerk and he explained it to me very much as did the right hon. gentleman. At the same time I was not quite certain of the procedure, as there was some dispute about it.

UNEMPLOYMENT

ARREST OF SINGLE UNEMPLOYED MEN IN TORONTO

On the orders of the day:

Hon. R. J. MANION (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I have a matter to bring to the attention of the Minister of Labour (Mr. Rogers). I shall not make comments, but shall be content to read a letter which has come to my hand. This letter, of which I shall send him a copy, is from Mr. Kenneth Woodsworth, secretary of the Canadian Youth Congress. It was received by me only a few moments ago, but it seemed so urgent, as the last paragraph will show, that I feel it necessary to bring it to the attention of the minister immediately. It is as follows:

> It has been brought to our attention that some sixty-nine single transient unemployed men are now in gaol in Toronto, having been arrested for begging on the streets.
> These men in Toronto are, for the most part, under the age of twenty-five; they have formed themselves into an association and have even been able to rent a house to support about sixty of their number. However, they have no means of subsistence and have been driven to begging in order to live. Now they are in danger of being made into criminals.
> We have had occasion formerly to make representation to the Minister of Labour on the need for immediate public works projects to provide employment for Canada's unemployed youth. The present situation re-emphasizes the great urgency for action.
> In the immediate situation, we would ask your support and your influence in having these unfortunate young men released without sentence. We would further urge that they be given relief, until such time as they are provided with the means of livelihood.
> They are to be brought before the court on Saturday morning, so we ask your prompt attention.

I take it that they are to appear in court to-morrow morning. In view of this very serious, even tragic, affair, will the Minister of Labour take it into consideration with a view to seeing if there is not some way in which he and his department can help?

Hon. NORMAN McL. ROGERS (Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, information reached me this morning to the effect that a number of single unemployed men have been arrested in the city of Toronto, presumably for a violation of a city by-law. My understanding is that the questions arising out of these arrests are being discussed at the present time by representatives of the city of Toronto and the provincial government. In the nature of things, this and other matters relating to unemployment will receive the careful consideration of the dominion Department of Labour.

RADIO BROADCASTING

ADDRESS OF MANAGING DIRECTOR OF LONDON LIFE OVER NATIONAL NETWORK

On the orders of the day:

Mr. DENTON MASSEY (Greenwood): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Transport (Mr. Howe). Last evening at 7.15 over station CFRB, on a trans-Canada network of twenty-nine stations, Mr. Edward Reid, managing director of the London Life Insurance Company, broadcast an address which was advertised as:

> A message to the general public, which will be of particular interest to the owners of the 700,000 policies issued by this company.

Would the minister be good enough to explain to this house why, if Mr. George McCullagh, publisher of the Globe and Mail, was banned from the use of a network to broadcast a message to the general public and the readers of the Globe and Mail, Mr. Reid was granted the use of a network to broadcast a message to the general public and his policyholders?

Hon. C. D. HOWE (Minister of Transport): The hon. member for Greenwood (Mr. Massey) gave me notice of this question, which I received only a few moments ago. A question of this kind must of course be answered by the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation, and I shall be glad to ask them to forward an answer. However, I would point out that a question which is to be directed to an autonomous board should be placed on the order paper so that it may go to the proper headquarters in the usual way.

Mr. MASSEY: I only asked the question now because I thought the minister might want to deal with it in his speech.

TARIFF BOARD

INQUIRY AFFECTING RADIO INDUSTRY—REPORT ON RADIO TUBES

On the orders of the day:

Hon. CHARLES A. DUNNING (Minister of Finance): Yesterday the hon. member for Calgary East (Mr. Landeryou) asked me a question on the orders of the day regarding the likelihood of receiving the report in connection with the investigation into radio tubes. I have made inquiry regarding the matter and while I cannot say precisely when the report will be received, it certainly will be during the course of the present session.

GOVERNOR GENERAL'S SPEECH

CONTINUATION OF DEBATE ON ADDRESS IN REPLY

The house resumed from Thursday, January 19, consideration of the motion of Mr. J. E. Matthews for an address to His Excellency the Governor General in reply to his speech at the opening of the session, and the proposed amendment thereto of Mr. Manion, and the amendment to the amendment of Mr. Woodsworth.

Hon. C. D. HOWE (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, much has been said in well-earned commendation of the Speech from the Throne, and of the speeches of the mover (Mr. Matthews) and the seconder (Mr. Chevrier) of the address in reply. I shall therefore proceed immediately as spokesman in parliament for the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation to discuss the subject of a controversy that has appeared in current publications and has been discussed in this house. I shall attempt to dissipate some of the heat that has been generated and focus some additional light on the subject matter of that controversy.

The question under discussion is whether recent regulations of the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation were wisely made and have been wisely administered. This issue has been beclouded by a number of side issues, such as the doings and sayings of George McCullagh, the doings and sayings of the Minister of Transport, the right of free speech, the freedom of the press, all the fundamental principles of democracy, and various alleged plots by the government for one purpose or another. Before discussing my subject matter I shall try to clear up one or two of these side issues.

First let us discuss what Mr. McCullagh did, as disclosed in the correspondence recently tabled in this house. Mr. McCullagh applied to the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation to purchase time on a national network to broadcast a series of five addresses. The general manager of the broadcasting corporation replied to Mr. McCullagh that he welcomed to the network men of his type who wished to engage in a discussion of problems of the day. He explained to Mr. McCullagh that the regulations of the board made it impossible for the network to sell network time for the purpose desired by Mr. McCullagh. Mr. Murray invited Mr. McCullagh, as an alternative, to accept free time on one of the regular forums of the broadcasting corporation. Mr. McCullagh replied that the fourteen minutes suggested by Mr. Murray were not sufficient for his purpose.

Mr. McCullagh then seized upon what he thought was an alternative offered in the letter written to him by Mr. Murray, that he could acquire time on a number of privately-owned stations in Ontario and Quebec and speak over them as a network. Mr. McCullagh said that rather than be restricted in his time he would prefer the alternative which he thought he had discovered in the letter from Mr. Murray. It has been suggested in this house that the correspondence indicated that a subject would be assigned to Mr. McCullagh. A reading of the correspondence makes it quite clear that Mr. Murray told Mr. McCullagh that a suitable topic could be arranged between them. I think that possibly Mr. McCullagh was too anxious to take the other alternative. I think that if he had pressed Mr. Murray for more time in which to cover the subject he wished to discuss, the forum program could have been arranged accordingly, but in any event a certain time was offered to him on the network free.

The first letter from Mr. Murray to Mr. McCullagh indicated that the regulation which prevented the sale of time on the national network did not apply to individual privately-owned stations, and Mr. McCullagh possibly had some reason for reaching the conclusion that there would be no objection to buying time on some eighteen of these stations and proceeding to speak over a private network. However, when the necessary application was made to the board, the board decided that the regulation applying to the larger network must apply also to the smaller, and that while Mr. McCullagh was quite free to use individual stations, he was not free to connect the stations up with a wire network, network broadcasting being entirely a function of the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation, under the Radio Broadcasting Act, and subject to the regulations of the board.

Mr. McCullagh at that time had advanced his arrangements to the point where he decided to go ahead by a means that was obviously open to him, that is, making recordings of his address for delivery over eighteen stations, and making his personal address over the nineteenth.

Then Mr. McCullagh came into print. It was obvious that the sequence of events had made him exceedingly angry. I must admit that having studied the correspondence and listened to the discussions here, I would be the last to criticize Mr. McCullagh for feeling angry about the situation, but possibly he would now agree with me that it is not wise to write editorials or make public addresses while still in an angry mood. That, however, is a matter we need not go into here.

Much has been published about the doings and sayings of the Minister of Transport, and I wish to discuss that for just a moment. On the afternoon of Christmas day the Minister of Transport left Canada for a two weeks' holiday, the first, I might say, that he has had of that length in twelve months. He returned to Ottawa on January 8. During the progress of all the negotiations and discussions and correspondence the Minister of Transport was on a cruise ship in the gulf stream, his mind completely at ease. He heard nothing about this correspondence until some three days later after his return, when it was sent to him from the broadcasting corporation, with a brief covering letter which said that this correspondence was being sent as it was thought by the general manager that the matter might become contentious. I give the general manager full marks for his prediction in that regard.

The next I heard about the matter was when I was sitting in the house listening to an address by the Prime Minister. One of the new pages came to me and said that I was wanted outside in the corridor. I asked who wanted me, and he said he thought it was my secretary. I told him I could not go just then, but in a minute or two the page came back and said that whoever it was outside must see me. I went out and found that it was a reporter of the Globe and Mail. It was my turn to become a little annoyed, and I gave an interview of about one minute's duration, which has probably received more space than any previous one minute's interview ever received. The next day I was interviewed by a reporter from the Toronto Star, and this time I was better fortified. I passed over to him the letter from Mr. Murray which, I said, explained the whole situation, and his interview was based on the contents of that letter.

Those, Mr. Speaker, are the doings of the Minister of Transport throughout this transaction. Just why I should be held up as one of great wealth, one who can spend ten thousand dollars without a thought for a few hours' broadcasting, never travelling except in a fifty thousand dollar plane or in a private car, I cannot imagine. However, I suppose that is of no great importance.

Mr. MANION: Will the minister tell me where I can read that?—because I have never seen it.

Mr. HOWE: It is in one of the Globe editorials. I may say to those who are not quite as familiar with my situation as is the leader of the opposition that the story about my great wealth is not in any way true.

Mr. MANION: I am not so sure of that.

Mr. HOWE: Strange sidelights have been thrown into the controversy. I shall not go into those interjected by the press, but I might discuss some of those which appeared in the discussions in the house.

The leader of the opposition (Mr. Manion), in discussing this matter, referred to freedom of speech, the freedom of the press, the iron heel of the Prussian—

Mr. MANION: I did not mention that. That was not mine.

Mr. HOWE: I am sorry; it was mentioned by someone. And it was suggested that there were schemes by the Liberal party to prevent a speech being broadcast that might be damaging to the party.

The hon. member for Danforth (Mr. Harris) discussed this question, and somehow or other he got it involved with the question of radio licence fees. I was not quite able to follow him in his remarks. Last evening we had an address by the hon. member for Greenwood (Mr. Massey), who also mentioned freedom of speech, freedom of the press, freedom of assembly, freedom of religion, and an attempt to prevent someone making a speech damaging to this party. Even the right hon. member for Calgary West (Mr. Bennett) came out of his retirement, and issued a long and stirring manifesto in defence of free speech priced at $3,000 per hour over the air. I read that with great interest because I can just picture the bright galaxy of those who are able to indulge their passion for free speech at that rate.

But perhaps I can deal with these questions later. I come now to the root of the matter. I think it might be well to put on Hansard the regulations which caused all this furore. I will read them just as they were passed by the governors of the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation at their last meeting in Ottawa held, I think, on December 8 last:

> Rulings recently approved by the board of governors regarding the sponsorship of non-party controversial broadcasts are as follows:
> "(1) No individual may purchase any network to broadcast his own opinions;
> (2) No profit-making corporation may purchase any network to broadcast opinions;
> (3) Properly constituted societies may purchase network time subject to the following conditions: (a) that the society accepts responsibility for the broadcast, indemnifying the CBC against the possible consequences of libel or slander; (b) that each broadcast is prefaced and concluded by an appropriate announcement making clear the nature and auspices of the broadcast and indicating that equivalent facilities are available to opposing views on the same basis; (c) that there is no interference with normal CBC program arrangements; (d) that the broadcast is of sufficient popular appeal and interest to justify its inclusion; (e) that the broadcast is within the wording and spirit of our regulations and not in violation of any law."

These rulings apply also to individual CBC stations but not to individual privately-owned stations.

I might say a word in explanation of the last. Canada, as is known, follows in its entirety neither the British nor the United States system, but has really more or less a combination of the two. It has its own facilities, and operating alongside of it are certain privately owned facilities.

Mr. CAHAN: May I ask, were these regulations, which have just been read, duly published so that the public became acquainted with their terms and tenor?

Mr. HOWE: I cannot say as to that. I have made no inquiry. However, they are not new. They are a slight modification, perhaps, of existing regulations. I will deal with that later. But in regard to the private station, we think it has an important place in Canadian broadcasting, in serving the needs of a single community; therefore no very strict regulations are applied to individual privately owned stations. I am not speaking of these stations as a network, but simply as individual stations. They are for the expression of local opinion, and that same local opinion is an excellent regulator of what is proper and not proper for each individual station.

I might remind hon. gentlemen that the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation is an autonomous body, set up by this parliament under the Broadcasting Act of 1936, which superseded the Broadcasting Act of 1932 sponsored by hon. gentlemen opposite. In drafting that act and in its course through a committee of the house every effort was made to divorce the corporation from political interference, or, in fact, any direction from the government of the day. Many hon. members now sitting in this house were on that committee and can bear witness to the truth of what I say. It was left to the goverment to do only a few things: first, to appoint the nine men who are governors of the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation; second, to approve or disapprove the appointments made by that board of the manager and the assistant general manager; third, to approve the by-laws of the corporation.

Mr. CAHAN: Or disapprove as well.

Mr. HOWE: Approve or disapprove—yes. And the only way in which the Minister of Transport or any other minister has any relations with that board is that the Broadcasting Act designates the Minister of Transport as the channel through which the board shall communicate with the government and with parliament. There is no possible way in which under that act the government of the day can interfere with any decision of the broadcasting corporation. This government has never interfered with any action taken by the board. Personally I have often disagreed with action taken by the board, nevertheless the action taken has been that decided upon by the board. If I had felt disposed to interfere I would have reasoned that after all the considered opinion of nine men of the type that make up that board is much better than my own opinion, if for no other reason than that they are giving a great deal of time to studying the relevant circumstances, whereas I am not.

Hon. gentlemen recall that at the last session the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) joined on one occasion with certain hon. members sitting opposite in voicing disapproval of a certain commentator and the subject matter of his comments on foreign news. I think there was general agreement in the house that these comments were not in the public interest, but in spite of what was said here that same commentator continued for many weeks afterwards to make much the same type of comment as that to which objection had been taken in this house.

Mr. CAHAN: And he received pay from the treasury for so doing.

Mr. HOWE: I was outraged at the time. I simply mention it to show that we have a board operating the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation which is not disposed to take instructions from the government. I have never had anything to do with the appointment of any member of the staff of the broadcasting corporation, and I believe that every other member of the government can say the same. Similarly, I have never had anything to do with selection of any program or feature which has been broadcast by the corporation; and again, I think the government can say the same. I can say more, that if such a request had been made, I know the board well enough to be sure that the board would have probably leaned backward in refusing it, whether it could properly be refused or not.

That is the position with respect to the broadcasting corporation. May I also point out that the funds with which the broadcasting corporation operates are not voted by this parliament; they are collected from the listeners to the programs of the corporation who are in reality the owners of the broadcasting facilities and whose interests must be considered as paramount.

We hear in this debate that all this is going to be changed if and when the Conservatives come into power. We have heard from the hon. member for Greenwood that he is outraged that such a situation as now obtains could exist. I believe he said that he had had a part in framing the act and that it was outrageous to suggest that this board did not come under the direction of the Minister of Transport and under the direction of the government of the day. He made it perfectly obvious that if there were a change of government, all this would be changed.

Mr. MASSEY: Mr. Speaker, I hesitate to interrupt the hon. gentleman—

Mr. HOWE: I will read what he says. I do not want to misrepresent the hon. gentleman.

Mr. MASSEY: I do not think the hon. gentleman would put words in my mouth that I did not say.

Mr. HOWE: All right; I will read what he did say. On page 186 of Hansard he said:

> The corporation was to administer policy, yes; to administer policy independent of but subject to review by the Minister of Transport, yes—

Mr. MASSEY: Exactly.

Mr. HOWE:

—but to establish principle? No, a thousand times no!

Mr. MASSEY: Quite right. Does that not suggest that the present situation is going to be abolished?

Mr. SPEAKER: Order.

Mr. HOWE: Further on he said:

> Would the minister state for a single, solitary moment that if any civil servant attempted to abridge any basic national principle, he, the minister, would simply say, "That has no bearing on me at all. That is his job."

That clarifies the statement made by the hon. member for Greenwood. He is outraged to think that this government should allow a corporation, set up to function independently, so to function.

Now let us examine a few of the regulations I have just cited as compared with practice in other countries. I may observe here that the broadcasting act itself recognizes political broadcasting as a special problem requiring separate regulation and gives different definitions for political broadcasting than for ordinary expression of opinion. In every country in which there is broadcasting, it is recognized that there are certain special circumstances existing immediately prior to an election which make it desirable that the leaders of all political parties should be given a reasonable opportunity to discuss with the electors the policies of their parties.

An hon. MEMBER: If they have the money.

Mr. HOWE: There again I believe that a more enlightened attitude is being taken with regard to the financial question of political broadcasts, which is a bar on some occasions. I know that the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation's management is studying that very question at the moment with the general idea of making facilities more equally available.

Speaking of the English practice, the statement of the hon. member for Greenwood is quite correct, that the situation there is different in that the government owns all broadcasting facilities and does not sell time for any purpose whatever. The rules governing controversial broadcasts of opinions, while much more strict than our own, are, however, similar. Leading public men are given time on certain occasions to discuss events of the day and government policies. Similarly, topics of the day are debated from time to time, though on a much more restricted basis than on this continent and always, of course, without cost. In the United States we find a totally different system. There, broadcasting is privately owned and subject to very little direct governmental regulation. The sale of broadcasting time is a means of profit for the owners of stations and chains of stations and naturally the profit motive is an inducement to these chains to sell the greatest possible amount of time to purchasers. About the only restriction of broadcasting in the United States is that it shall not offend public opinion. But that very implied restriction in relation to the profit motive has led the larger chains in the United States to adopt definite policies with respect to controversial broadcasts, which are very similar to Canadian policies now being discussed.

I will not discuss the chain that was referred to last night, Father Coughlin's chain. In the United States there is nothing to prevent anyone from leasing a number of private stations and connecting them with telephone wires to make a broadcasting chain. I take it that Father Coughlin's chain is a free and easy affair, particularly after reading the statement in the Ottawa Journal that over that chain Father Coughlin delivered a speech which was almost word for word the speech written and delivered some two years ago by Doctor Goebbels of the German nazi organization. So we will not discuss the ethics of that particular chain at this time.

I will, however, discuss the two largest broadcasting institutions, the National Broadcasting Company and the Columbia Broadcasting Company, and in that regard I wish to read statements just issued by each of these chains. These statements came by wire addressed to the Mirror, 330 Bay Street, Toronto, under yesterday's date. The authenticity of these wires has been checked by direct communication with the head offices of both chains. The following statement is from the president of the National Broadcasting Company, Mr. Lenox R. Lohr:

The National Broadcasting Company since its inception has held to a policy of not selling time for the discussion of controversial issues upon which large groups hold divergent views and solution of which materially affects the life and welfare of the public. Sustaining time is furnished at NBC expense for discussion of such questions by recognized leaders. The company attempts at all times as nearly as possible to give equal representation to opposing sides. Any other method of procedure would give those with the most financial resources a monopoly of radio as a medium of influencing public opinion.

At a meeting of our advisory council held on January 9 the following policies long established by the NBC were reaffirmed.

(1) The NBC does not sell time for religious programs as this course might result in according a disproportionate representation to those individuals or groups who chance to command the largest purses. In view of the vast numbers of religious sects the company cannot attempt to serve each individually. It cannot of its own choice wisely single out particular individuals to represent special forms of faith. It has accordingly chosen responsible organizations representing the three dominant religious groups in America;—i.e. Protestants, Roman Catholics and Jews to suggest speakers and prepare programs. The NBC does not permit attacks upon religious faiths or upon racial groups.

(2) During the period of elections only the company sells time to the official representatives of the major political parties. It does not accept dramatic presentations of political issues for it is impossible to prevent essential misrepresentation and unfairness when this technique is employed.

(3) In connection with its own sustaining programs the company attempts at all times as nearly as possible to give equal representation to opposing sides of every controversial question which materially affects the life or welfare of any substantial group. If one side of such an issue is broadcast this fact does not convey as a matter of right an opportunity for the opposing side or individual to be given equal opportunities to reply. But in permitting the first broadcast the NBC has assumed an obligation to the public.

The NBC follows the same principle on sponsored programs where particular opinions on important controversial issues are expressed. In this case the sponsor may be required to yield time to a representative of views opposed to the sponsor's speaker.

(4) Freedom of the air is not to be construed as synonymous with freedom of the press or freedom of speech. Each form of bringing opinion to the public notice has its own characteristics and limitations.

5. A speaker having been granted time on the air the NBC does not censor or edit his opinions. It must however check for violations of the law and for libellous, slanderous or seditious statements, as the courts have held broadcasters responsible for any damaging statement made over their facilities.

Lennox R. Lohr,
President of the National Broadcasting Company.

I have a similar statement issued by Mr. Frederic A. Willis, assistant to the president of the Columbia Broadcasting System. I believe it is desirable for the house to have this, and as my time is almost exhausted I ask permission to place this letter on Hansard.

The Mirror,
330 Bay Street,
Toronto.

Relative to your inquiry the Columbia Broadcasting System's policy is as follows:—"We do not sell time to individuals or groups for the discussion of controversial public issues such as, for example, taxation, legislation, or regulation." Time for discussion of public issues is allotted free of charge and in accordance with other elements of program balance. By program balance we mean offering to the public all kinds of information, instruction, entertainment as well as the day to day developments and the shifting of public interest in topics available for discussion and the relative importance of each. We limit our advertisers in their messages to the sale of goods, services or promotion of good will for their industry. As an example, we would gladly sell time to a common carrier (railroad, bus or air transport company) for the promotion of travel but would not sell it to them to be used to agitate for new rates or different regulation.

The following are the reasons for refusing to sell time to individuals or groups for discussion of public issues and for allotting time free of charge instead. If time were sold for discussion of controversial issues or for the propagation of the views of individuals or groups, we would necessarily allow a powerful public forum to gravitate almost wholly into the hands of those with the means to buy it. We would in fairness have to sell to all with the ability and inclination to buy at a given moment, thus surrendering all possibility of maintaining well balanced broadcasting schedule and such discussions should be kept in balance by editorial judgment.

The sole exception to sale of time to individuals and groups is during election periods when time is sold to parties owing to their need of greater time than we can afford to give away free.

Columbia does not censor ideas nor do we seek that the views of any speaker agree with any member of our editorial staff. We are pledged not only to freedom of the air but non-partisanship and fairness of the air. By freedom we mean the right of a speaker to express his views subject only to general laws and the laws of libel and slander, the rule that he may not seek to provoke racial or religious hatred and the ordinary limitations of good taste and the decorum appropriate to the homes of the nations. By fairness we mean no discussion must ever be one-sided so long as any qualified spokesman wants to take the other side. The party in power must never dominate the air. No majority must ever monopolize. Minorities must always have fair opportunities to express themselves.

Frederic A. Willis,
Assistant to the President,
Columbia Broadcasting System.

Much has been said about freedom of speech and freedom of the press in relation to the regulations I have just read. As I understand it, freedom of speech gives every man the right to hire a hall, or if he cannot afford to hire a hall, to stand on a soap box and make any statement he likes, provided that statement is not libellous or seditious or profane. I may point out something that free speech does not imply; it does not supply an audience, a man has to get that himself. It does not give a man the right to an audience assembled in their own homes all across Canada to listen to a program of fine music or some usual entertainment feature.

Freedom of the press as I understand it is the right of an owner or editor of a newspaper to publish in his editorial columns anything he may see fit to publish, with the provisoes already mentioned. It also gives the editor or publisher the right to print or not to print anything he chooses to print or not to print in his newspaper. It does not give the public at large free entrance to his newspaper columns as a matter of right. The editor makes his decision, and the public has no recourse except to the editor or publisher himself. It is a strange thing that the claim that freedom of speech was denied should come so vehemently from the publisher of a daily newspaper. In my opinion the publisher and editor of a newspaper is in a most favoured position from the point of view of his ability to bring his ideas and policies to the attention of the public, and it is extraordinary that another medium should be criticized for stifling his views and opinions. Radio broadcasting is a different medium, and its proper use is neither freedom of speech nor freedom of the press, but rather can be stated as equal opportunity of discussion.

We all know that the radio is a mighty weapon for the dissemination of propaganda. It is a new medium, and rules for its control are being changed frequently, almost from day to day. The by-laws of the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation confer upon that body as of necessity the right to make regulations from day to day as conditions require. It is one of those regulations that we are discussing at this time.

Mr. CAHAN: But that is subject to government approval.

Mr. HOWE: No, not at all.

Mr. CAHAN: I beg the minister's pardon; the by-laws are.

Mr. HOWE: Not the regulations. Mention was made by the hon. member for Greenwood of the broadcasts of Mr. Beverley Baxter's comments on international affairs which came to Canada from the United Kingdom as an advertising feature for one of our motor car manufacturers. It was cited as a deviation of regulation 2. That is not an example of deviation. It was rather the cause for regulation 2. It was the first occasion on which a broadcast of that kind was made over CBC as a paid feature. The broadcast was very well done, I believe; I heard no criticism of its content. But I heard the question asked why a broadcast of that type by a prominent man in British public life should come to Canada as an advertising feature. When the question was asked of the broadcasting corporation the governors of the corporation met and decided that this was not proper material for use in Canada for advertising, and the regulation that I have just read arose out of that broadcast.

The first regulation I read has always been the view or policy of the CBC, as it is of chains in the United States. But the regulation makes it very definite that time will not in future be sold for the expression of opinions either by private persons or by profit-making corporations. Surely we have a national trust which imposes upon us the necessity of not permitting our radio broadcasting facilities to be used for propaganda. We all had a lesson on the power of propaganda over the radio in the recent broadcast on a Sunday afternoon by Orson Welles of an imaginary invasion from Mars. In spite of the fact that at intervals of ten minutes throughout that broadcast the announcement was made that "this is a play representing wholly fictitious incidents," a great part of New York City and the surrounding country was thrown into an absolute frenzy. We had also a demonstration of the power of radio in disseminating information at the time of the Munich crisis. I think on that occasion every one of us kept as close to the radio as we could for several days. It has been said that the broadcasting may have been overdone at that time, but I think hon. members will agree that if war instead of peace had come, people all over the world would have had a knowledge of the fundamental causes of that war and the responsibility for bringing it about that the people had never had at any former time.

Mr. CAHAN: I never before in my life heard so much of misrepresentation in a single week as I heard then through the Columbia and the National broadcasting systems.

Mr. HOWE: Radio is increasingly exerting a profound influence on our daily life. It is therefore necessary that every possible precaution be taken to the end that it shall never be used for selfish propaganda, either by corporate or by private interests. On the other hand radio can be most helpful in building up an informed public opinion, provided great care is taken to present as fairly as possible all sides of controversial public questions. The new regulations of CBC are designed to make this possible. It will continue to be the policy of CBC to encourage the discussion of public questions on sustaining programs without cost to the speaker. Competent observers will be encouraged to give their views in a manner forthright, challenging and stimulating, but always fair. CBC will continue to resist any attempt to regiment opinion or to throttle freedom of utterance. It is a truism that the free interchange of opinion is one of the safeguards of democracy, and CBC believes that it would be false to its trust as custodian of an increasingly important part of the public domain if it did not resist external control and any attempt to place the free air under the domination of the power of wealth.

This parliament alone has power to give directions to CBC, and a committee of this parliament will at this session examine the policies of CBC and report on their wisdom. I have no personal doubt that as in the past the report of that committee will be unanimous and an endorsement of present CBC policies, including those now under discussion.

Mr. A. B. HYNDMAN (Carleton): Mr. Speaker, rising to speak to the address in reply to the speech from the throne I do not think it is necessary for me to compliment the mover (Mr. Matthews) and the seconder (Mr. Chevrier). I need only say that I trust they will represent their constituencies with the same honour, dignity and reputation as did their predecessors. I should like to say, too, how pleased I was to learn about the visit of the king and queen to Canada, and to express my particular pleasure in the fact that they are to spend a longer time in Carleton county than in any other part of Canada.

I have read carefully the speech from the throne and, strange to say, it reminded me of former speeches from the throne. I have looked through the speches of the past three sessions, the first of which was delivered on February 6, 1936. In that speech unemployment was mentioned and there is reference of the appointment of a commission. Outside of that there is very little in it.

In the speech from the throne delivered on January 14, 1937, the following year, I notice this:

> The provision for large numbers still on relief remains a foremost problem.

The unemployed are still there. And we notice this further observation:

> Measures will be taken, in cooperation with the provinces, to assist in the establishment of unemployed young people.

Turning to the speech delivered on January 27, 1938—last year—I find that the government is still going to try to promote and to preserve Canadian unity and,—

> As a first step towards this end, a royal commission of inquiry has been appointed .....

That is about all we found in the speech from the throne of last year. Coming to the speech from the throne delivered at the opening of this session we find that after four years of effort on the part of the government the following reference is made to unemployment:

> In Canada, the problem of unemployment has been aggravated in recent years by recurrent crop failures in the western provinces, and by the serious business recession experienced in the last year in other parts of the world. The intensification of the problem has set forth in bold relief the obstacles which the existing division of constitutional authority places in the way of solution . . . . The government have not altered their view that a national unemployment insurance scheme is essential to a permanent policy of meeting the problem of unemployment.
> My ministers—

And I ask hon. members to note this.

> My ministers recognize that the plight of those who are still unemployed cannot await necessary constitutional amendments, nor the summoning of any conference. They are prepared therefore—

Mark these words.

> —notwithstanding constitutional impediments to effective action, to join with the provinces in a further determined effort to meet the immediate situation.

When I read that it recalled to my mind something which had appeared in the speech from the throne of 1936. Going back to the speech of that year I found the following paragraph:

> In order to determine the question of their validity, reference has been made to the Supreme Court of Canada of a number of measures enacted at the last session of parliament.

In other words when the last government tried to bring in measures to help the unemployed of Canada, a question was raised as to the constitutionality of the measures introduced. Now, a Liberal government, in spite of the constitutional difficulties which stand in the way, is apparently going to try to do something.

I was pleased, however—at least I was pleased until I came near to the end of the speech—that we were not going to have any more commissions. I could not find the word "commission" in the whole speech—at least, so I thought, until I reached the last sentence, when I learned that there is to be set up another commission to administer the penitentiaries. Let us hope that that will be the last of the commissions.

I believe that the pressing questions confronting the country to-day are three in number: first, national cooperation and understanding—I know the Liberal party calls that unity, but I prefer to call it cooperation, understanding and good-will; second, unemployment and third, the trade agreement.

As I have stated before, the king and queen are to visit Canada this summer and, with that thought in mind, I was disappointed when at the beginning of the session I found on the order paper certain resolutions standing in the names of the hon. members for North Battleford (Mr. McIntosh) and Quebec-Montmorency (Mr. Lacroix). The first of these resolutions deals with the changing of our flag. I would suggest that the hon. member withdraw the notice of motion. In Canada to-day there is enough disunity and lack of cooperation without introducing that contentious subject into debate. I am not sure whether or not we should have a distinctive flag, but in view of the fact that the king and queen are visiting Canada this year let us not discuss the subject. The resolution standing in the name of the hon. member for Quebec-Montmorency asks that we change the name of our country from "The Dominion of Canada" to "The Kingdom of Canada," and that we change the name of our governor general to that of viceroy. Let us not talk along those lines this year. I would ask the two hon. members to withdraw their motions.

I have listened with interest to the speech of the Minister of Transport (Mr. Howe) in which he discussed the controversy over the radio talk of Mr. McCullagh. I have in my hand a copy of that speech and, although I shall not comment upon the ruling of the broadcasting corporation, for the life of me I can see nothing in the speech which should not be broadcast throughout the dominion. It is headed "Marching On—to What?" I assure you, Mr. Speaker, that that is the very question which is on the lips and in the minds of our people. To what are we marching? When I look over the subheadings of the speech I find these: "Problem of leadership; tired of personal feud." Surely we are tired of personal feuds in Canada. Then, the third heading is "Jobless present challenge"—and I am sure they do. Then, "How will Canada appear?" and "Apathy ancient enemy." Surely we have had apathy on the part of the Liberal party for the past three years. Finally and most important of all, a stop to wild spending. I cannot see how there can be any criticism of topics of that kind. In the speeches from the throne for the past four years we have had outlined the doctrine of national unity, and it has been preached from the Liberal benches. At no time since confederation have we had so much unrest, such a lack of cooperation, and so much disunity as we have at the present time. I should like to place on Hansard what I believe to be the real condition throughout Canada as far as unity is concerned.

I shall start with British Columbia, that beautiful province that is fast becoming the land of the rising sun. I read this:

> Premier Pattullo of that province announces that he and his cabinet are to journey to Ottawa "not to discuss the needs and problems of this province, but to demand certain specific things under threat that if they are not granted there will be defection in the Liberal ranks and the Liberal party will no longer be able to bank upon the support of sixteen members from British Columbia."

Mr. REID: They did not say that.

Mr. HYNDMAN: They did not say that, but the premier of British Columbia did.

Mr. REID: No, he did not.

Mr. HYNDMAN: The premier of British Columbia did say that.

Mr. REID: I ask for the authority.

Mr. HYNDMAN: Then we come to Alberta. I do not agree entirely with the premier of that province, but in all fairness to him let me say that he has not had the least bit of cooperation from this house in even trying out his policy. I am not saying that I agree with his policy, but at least he is trying to do something, which is more than this house has done.

We come then to Saskatchewan. I am not criticizing the government for the money that has been spent in that province, but with all the money that was spent, even to win a provincial election, what do we find? They have raised the threat of secession. Let me quote from a report as follows:

> The United Farmers of Canada, Saskatchewan section, devoted a long debate to the subject at its annual convention and unanimously adopted a resolution instructing its board of directors "to assimilate and prepare authoritative material on the subject of setting up a western autonomous state within the British empire, governed by a single government elected democratically by the people."

Then we come to Manitoba, where there is another Liberal provincial government, and what do we find? We find Premier Bracken expressing a protest against existing conditions. For the moment I shall skip the hotbed of Ontario and Quebec, but I shall come back to those provinces later. I go now to the quiet maritimes. I cannot say very much about Nova Scotia. My wife came from Nova Scotia and I have lived peacefully with her for twenty-two years. If I can do that with a woman for twenty-two years, surely this government can live peacefully with the Nova Scotians for at least three years. As far as New Brunswick is concerned, we know that things are not too harmonious in the provincial Liberal party in that province. There is little to be said about Prince Edward Island; it is a province entirely surrounded by water. Water is always a purifying agency, and I feel quite sure that the infection of disunity has not reached them as yet.

I come back now to Ontario. What do we read about that province? Here is one headline:

Hepburn ready now for fight with dominion.

Here is what he says:

Let me ask this simple question. What has the King administration during its 3½ years in office done to deserve the support of the people who elected it in 1935?

Then we have Mr. Hepburn accused of having taken part in a conspiracy. We find the Minister of Transport (Mr. Howe) and the Minister of Labour (Mr. Rogers) coming into the battle. Here is one headline I read:

Howe and Rogers charge provincial leaders want to control federal government themselves.

Then we have Mr. Hepburn coming back as follows:

I don't think there ever was a government which was elected with greater promise and which has failed more dismally. Its attitude on all important policies has been one of laissez faire. Its performance has been one of drifting. Its ministers appear to be living in another age and generation altogether. They have failed completely to realize the problems of to-day and to deal with them as they should be dealt with.

Then there are replies by the Minister of Transport and the Minister of Labour. Here is what the Minister of Labour had to say in connection with the foundation of federal unity:

More often than not the fault of maladjustment lies not in the fact of union but in the failure of policies to meet adequately the requirements of national unity.

[Mr. Hyndman.]

Then there is another reply from Mr. Hepburn as follows:

My position is this—in a general election I could not conscientiously support a party led by Mackenzie King whose government, in a time when action on national issues was badly needed, holds the worst record in this respect in the history of the dominion.

Then we find the Minister of Justice (Mr. Lapointe) getting into the fight. He referred to a certain Liberal as not being worthy of tying the bootstrings of the Prime Minister. The newspaper report continues:

Asserting the dominion government was "determined" to establish a plan of unemployment insurance but "cannot because of the action of certain provincial governments," Mr. Lapointe said: "If there is failure in this, the people will remember and the workers will remember what caused failure."

I quite agree with the minister in that. Then we have, last but not least, the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) coming into the battle. His statement shows that this trouble has been brewing for at least a year and a half rather than for only the past six months. Here is his statement:

For a year and a half, I have refrained from saying a word or taking any step which might serve to widen the breach created by Mr. Hepburn's attitude towards myself and the dominion government. I have done this in the hope that legitimate differences, whatever they might be, would disappear or be removed.

I think we all know the reason for this falling out between the Prime Minister and the premier of Ontario. It was all over two water diversion plans. We have the premier of Ontario stating:

Prime Minister King was asked to convey to the United States government the province's request for permission to divert whatever water might be necessary into lake Superior.

Mr. King, without consulting Washington, replied that in his opinion Washington would not grant such a request without Ontario agreeing to the St. Lawrence waterway project.

In other words, negotiations would be broken off if Mr. Hepburn would not agree to the development of the St. Lawrence waterway. Then we have another headline:

Was foolish to support Mr. King in 1935 election, says Hepburn.

His statement continues:

Since 1930 Mr. King's attitude has been one of hostility to Ontario.

I shall not read the rest of what was said there, because I think sufficient has been given to the house.

This is a heading in the Citizen. "Hepburn voices pessimism over dominion affairs," and the dispatch continues:

"I am very optimistic with regard to Ontario," Mr. Hepburn said, speaking before a rally of Oxford county Twentieth Century

Liberal Clubs. "But I am most pessimistic over the condition in which I find the affairs of the dominion."

We have discord, shall I say, not only between Ontario and the dominion, but between different parts of Canada. We have the premier of Ontario stating that Ontario has been the milch cow for the west, and we have western Canada saying they have been supporting eastern Canada. Contrast the feeling between the premier of Ontario and the Prime Minister of this country with the attitude of the recently elected leader of the Conservative party of Ontario, who had this to say:

I wish to make it perfectly clear that if you honour me at that convention by choosing me as leader of the Conservative party in Ontario I shall cooperate to the very limit with Doctor Manion and with other Conservative leaders throughout Canada.

If we had a little more of that kind of cooperation in this dominion we would be much better off to-day. Before I leave Ontario let me say just this. People need not say that Premier Hepburn has done nothing for Ontario. That was put to me the other day and I replied that Premier Hepburn had done more for Ontario than the Prime Minister was doing for our province. I was asked what Premier Hepburn had actually done, and I replied, "Our township council received over one thousand dollars last year to apply on their taxes. That is one thing. In addition Mr. Hepburn has made a slight reduction in motor car licence fees." Then I asked him, "Now you tell me one thing that Prime Minister King has done for Ontario," and my questioner walked off without answering.

I come now to good old Quebec. Who would ever have thought there would be any question of disloyalty in Quebec? And yet we have the premier of that province stating that at least three members of the federal house are suffering from nightmare. The premier of Quebec in a Canadian Press dispatch says:

The policy of Ottawa just now is to impose on the provinces and municipalities burdens which it should bear itself.

The premier of Quebec went on to say:

State Secretary Fernand Rinfret and Justice Minister Ernest Lapointe, both had stated their belief unemployment was a matter for federal authorities. "What's the matter with them—do they lack influence?" he said. "Surely Premier King realized what he was doing when he took them into his cabinet."

Lovely, is it not? Grand! You may ask me, what is the premier of Quebec doing for his province? The government of Quebec, for one thing, is doing more for the farmers of that province than this government has been doing for them. The farmers of Quebec can procure loans and mortgages on their farms at a rate of three per cent payable over a period of forty years, while this government charges five per cent interest, and the loan is for only twenty-five years.

Now I leave the provinces and cite opinions by people outside Canada. Sir Evelyn Wrench, a well known English writer and student of imperial affairs has this to say:

As far as my own personal views are concerned, as I think you know, my whole life has been spent in trying to unite the British commonwealth, and during my three months in Canada last year I was disturbed to find a lack of unity such as I had never experienced during five former visits.

Conditions are certainly getting serious. Let me now give some opinions that have been expressed in this House of Commons by Liberal members who have become provoked by lack of action on the part of this government. Last year the hon. member for Huron North (Mr. Deachman) had this to say:

I want something done to-day. I want some consideration of these problems in order that something may be accomplished in our time. This is what I ask the house. This is what I know the country asks of us.

The hon. member for Winnipeg South (Mr. Mutch), speaking in this house last year, said:

I had hoped that for the rest of the session we would be through fiddling, and would perhaps devote more time to the fire protection of our Canadian Rome, which many of us think is burning. When responsible members of this or other legislative bodies waste their time in this sort of thing, irreparable damage is done to the institutions of democracy.

The hon. member for Springfield (Mr. Turner) stated in this house last year:

There is at present right across the dominion a general feeling of unrest and insecurity, which seems to be growing.

At the 1936 session the hon. member for Vancouver-Burrard (Mr. McGeer) said:

It may be the Liberal party is placing its footsteps on that trail of broken promises which not only leads through the valley of humiliation but down deep into the depths of eternal oblivion.

And last year that same member had this to say. He hoped that we would "do all we can to guide the Department of Finance out of that swamp of financial ignorance in which it seems to be lost."

I now come to this year. This house has not been in session very long, but on Tuesday last the hon. member for Rosthern (Mr. Tucker) had this to say:

The youth of Canada expects something more of this parliament than the threshing over of old straw such as we have witnessed. They expect measures that will cure their problems.

And no later than yesterday we had the hon. member for Humboldt (Mr. Fleming) saying this—and all these are Liberal members:

Mr. Speaker, as I review the accomplishments of the present government and of our own political term in office, and as I have listened attentively to the proposals in the speech from the throne, I begin to wonder how long it will be before the government will be willing to face fairly the fundamental issues, instead of permitting itself to be occupied merely with details of administration.

I do not want to suggest for one moment, Mr. Speaker, that we are going to have communism or fascism in this country, because we are not, but unless this government can prove that democracy is worth while, conditions that lead to communism and fascism are very likely to develop. Let me put on Hansard what the present Prime Minister had to say in 1935:

We take up at once, as our supreme task, the endeavour to end poverty in the midst of plenty, starvation and unnecessary suffering in a land of abundance, discontent and distress in a country more blessed by Providence than any other on the face of the globe, and to gain for individual lives, and for the nation as a whole, that "health and peace and sweet content"—

My, haven't we got that!

—which is the rightful heritage of all.

We have also the report of the Canadian Welfare Council, which has this to say:

The discouraging fact is, after all these years, in part because of the clashing jurisdictions of the dominion and its provinces, Canada still lacks long term legislation, comprehensive planning, and any integrated and adequate program for a fundamental attack upon the serious national ills which have occasioned these heavy expenditures.

The town of Aylmer, on the Quebec side, reports four hundred persons in destitute circumstances on relief. Mr. Draper, the president of the trades and labour congress, has this to say:

As long as Canada's constitution fastens on the provinces the major responsibility for social legislation, a proper system of social services—unemployment insurance, health insurance, adequate old age pensions—will be out of the question.

The hon. member for Southeast Grey (Miss Macphail), speaking in Toronto, significantly remarked:

We lost one generation of youth through the great war. We do not want to lose another through neglect.

No truer statement was made than that one. The cost of relief in nine years in the province of Ontario was $900,000,000, yet nothing is being done. We read that the All-Canadian Congress of Labour regrets 1938 saw little progress towards abolishing poverty and preserving national unity. They say:

It is deeply to be regretted that the intervening year has seen little or no progress toward their solution and that in some respects they have become intensified. . . . Good intentions are not enough; good-will is not enough. Surely the time has come for a national economic policy which will abolish starvation and unnecessary suffering in this richly endowed country.

The Minister of Mines and Resources (Mr. Crerar), speaking in Montreal, had this to say regarding taxes:

We must take stock of our expenditures. We must make improvements in a way that will add to the productive wealth of the country and leave to later years the other things that seem to be necessary in a modern civilization.

That refers to taxation and applies to the manner in which government is spending money at the present time on projects which are absolutely of no use to this country and never will be of much use.

I have received letters galore. There are two in my hand which I should like to read; they certainly touch one's heart. Writing the other day, one man says:

I am a married man, thirty-five years of age, with a wife and five children, four of whom are going to school, born and raised in Canada. . . .

I have tried, and never refused, any kind of work, even going as far as selling one's own life-blood as an aid to keeping one's family together. . . .

Quoting from another:

I sure do not know, but sure am discouraged, after living in Ottawa about fifty years things should be like they are, I often wish sometimes that I was a foreigner of some kind and I might be able to get some kind of employment.

I can tell the house that there are hundreds, indeed thousands of people in this country in a like position. The farmers too are in a desperate state at the present time, not only the western farmers but the mixed farmers of eastern Canada. I know of a number in my county who are forced to leave their farms.

Hon. members have the right to ask, "What did Mr. Bennett do about it? What did the previous government do about these matters?" Well, at least they tried. I looked up the different bills and trade agreements which the late government passed during its term of office, and I was greatly surprised to notice that the Liberal party, then in opposition, voted against the trade agreements introduced by that government. I also noticed that no vote was taken on certain pieces of legislation brought in by the Bennett government in the last few years of their term of office, yet even though the Liberals were agreed upon these pieces of legislation, the minute they got into office they sent those enactments to the old country to see whether or not they were legal. I refer to the Natural Products Marketing Act, the Farmers' Creditors Arrangement Act, the Employment and Social Insurance Act, the Minimum Wage Act, the Dominion Trade and Industry Commission Act, the Limitation of Hours of Work Act, the Weekly Day of Rest in Industrial Undertakings Act. Nearly all were thrown out by the action of the Liberal party. I feel that had they been carried through they would have improved conditions in this country.

I come now to the trade agreements. Apparently the Liberal government puts a great amount of stress upon trade agreements. I find that during the term of office of the Bennett government they consummated eight trade agreements, namely with Australia, New Zealand, France, Poland, the United Kingdom, the Union of South Africa, the Irish Free State, and Southern Rhodesia. What strikes me about this is that as regards all four trade agreements connected with the British commonwealth of nations, the Liberals voted against them. That goes to show that the Liberal party, when out of power, is not in favour of trading, at any rate with the British commonwealth of nations. Apparently there should be no truck nor trade with our best market. When the trade agreement with the United States was discussed in this house in 1936 the Minister of Finance (Mr. Dunning) stated that the proof of the pudding is in the eating and asked us to wait patiently and see what was the result of that agreement. Well, I can give the result of the eating of that pudding, and it is not very good. In 1935 the total exports from Canada to the United States amounted to $370,104,000, and our total imports amounted to $312,416,000. In other words we had a favourable trade balance in that year with the United States of over $57,000,000. What do we find as regards 1938? An adverse trade balance of over $64,000,000. When you add those two together you find that in 1935 Canada was better off as far as trade goes with the United States than she is in 1938 to the extent of $121,000,000.

Turn to the other side of the picture and consider the Ottawa trade agreements, the agreements against which the Liberal party voted when they were in opposition. Although they opposed the agreement with Great Britain, there was, I find, a favourable trade balance in 1935 of $191,000,000, in 1937 of $258,000,000; and for the eleven months of last year it was $225,000,000. I simply ask which is our best market? Why did the Liberals vote against the Ottawa trade agreements?

Great stress is laid by the Liberal government upon quotas. They are continually talking about the quotas—the preferences so to speak—they get from the United States. I looked up that item and I find that under the 1935 agreement which they made with the United States the quota on cream was set at 1,500,000 gallons, yet all the cream which we shipped into the United States in ten months of last year was only 4,572 gallons. Then we had a quota on cattle. The United States said, "Yes sir, you can ship your cattle into our country to the extent of 155,800 head of cattle weighing 700 pounds or more." I find, however, that we shipped only 33·5 per cent of the quota. As regards cattle, 175 pounds or less, it is said that we may ship 57,933 head, but I find that we shipped only 68 per cent of the quota. Of dairy cows they say that we can ship 20,000, but we shipped only 38·7 per cent. What, therefore, is the use of raising the quota? That is no advantage.

In the new agreement the quotas are increased, but that makes no difference. We have exceeded our quotas only in two commodities, shingles and seed potatoes, and the quota on potatoes is not increased in the new agreement. Under the old agreement we exceeded it by five per cent and so they said they would not increase that quota. Shingles have been increased five per cent.

In short, every time a Liberal government tinkers with trade agreements we get the dirty end of the stick. The other party takes the horse and gives us the rabbit. In matters of trade the United States gives too little and asks too much. That is the fault of this government. Take the importation of fresh fruits and vegetables from the United States. In 1935 we imported only $9,000,000 worth of fruits, whereas in 1938 our importations were valued at $13,000,000. Of fresh vegetables, in 1935 we imported only $2,000,000 worth, and in 1938 over $4,000,000 worth. Is it any wonder our market gardeners have a hard time? Then take cheese, milk and butter. The average price of butter in Montreal in December, 1935, was 26½ cents a pound, and in December, 1938, it was 21 cents. Farmers have asked me why the price of butter is so low, and it is not hard to tell them. In the eleven months ended November, 1938, we imported from New Zealand 2,871,373 pounds of butter, and from Australia, 1,400,000 pounds, or a total of 4,271,373 pounds. Butter in cold storage on January 1, 1939, amounted to 43,784,406 pounds as compared with 27,769,429 pounds in 1938. The increase in the quantity of butter in storage last year amounted to 16,014,977 pounds. Is it any wonder the price is what it is?

The total production of milk in Canada in 1937 was 17,188,617,000 pounds. We may ship to the United States under the quota 30,000,000 pounds of milk. Why, my own constituency of Carleton produced last year 131,000,000 pounds. That district could supply four times the quota which the United States allows us. And what about the rest of Canada? Was not the United States very generous when it said to the Liberal government that we might send 30,000,000 pounds of milk to that country?

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER: I regret to interrupt the hon. member, but he has exhausted his time.

Mr. JOSEPH NEEDHAM (The Battlefords): I ask the mover, (Mr. Matthews) and the seconder (Mr. Chevrier) of the address in reply to the speech from the throne to accept my appreciation of the manner in which they discharged the duty assigned to them.

In the speech the first place is given to the visit of their majesties to this country. All I wish to say in that regard is that I know they will receive a royal welcome from one end of the dominion to the other. I understand that during the course of his visit His Majesty the King is to unveil the memorial on the plaza here in Ottawa. I would make this suggestion to the government, that in connection with the unveiling of this memorial they provide free transportation for every citizen who served overseas and who wishes to be present on that occasion. It is to them more than to any other living person that this memorial is due, and it would be a very fine gesture as a means of saying "Thank you" to them.

The next item has to do with an increased appropriation for defence and I notice that a defence purchasing board is to be appointed. To those who have read the report of the Bren machine gun inquiry one thing at least is apparent, namely, that the department did not use ordinary business common sense in agreeing to that contract. It seems to me that there has been another setback to the idea of government ownership owing to the muddle that was made in connection with that first contract for defence purposes. All over this country the people have been demanding that profits be taken out of munitions, because that is regarded as the best way of dealing with the situation. It is felt that the best course would be to establish government ownership in the matter of munitions. But in the first contract that is entered into, we see what business ability the department exhibited. It is regrettable, and I hope that this defence purchasing board will be something more than a buffer to shield the Department of National Defence.

The new trade agreement with the United States is mentioned in the speech. That has been dealt with very fully by former speakers, and I think it would be more gratifying to the general public if there were a greater manifestation of the benefits that accrued from the former trade agreement with the United States. That is why there is so little interest and enthusiasm apparent at the present time. It seems as if this government is far more concerned with foreign markets than with the home market. One thing which has impressed me since coming to Ottawa is the lack of initiative on the part of the government in seeking to solve our internal problems. Canada's greatest problems are internal, not external. We are assured to-day that the most prosperous countries are those which are giving definite direction to the home market and home problems. If our government would place the emphasis on the home market rather than on external trade they would be doing greater service to this country.

As to the matter of reduction of tariffs I hardly know what to say, when facts like this are so manifest: When the Bennett government came into power in 1930 and raised the tariff on agricultural implements to 25 per cent, the price of implements came down. In 1935 the King government came into office and in the first budget presented by them the tariff on agricultural implements was reduced from 25 per cent to 7½ per cent, and the price of farm implements went up, not once but twice and three times.

Unemployment according to the speech from the throne is still one of our great national problems. The condition is still very serious, although conflicting statements are made as to its extent. One matter receiving special attention by the government is the proposal for youth training camps. These no doubt would be good for the youth and for the communities where the camps are situated. But something far more important than training for positions is creating positions. I do not think there ever was a time when youth did not qualify for the positions that were available. Neither do I think there ever was a generation of youth as well qualified by education, physique and otherwise to make a real contribution to their day and generation as the present one. If the positions are there, they will qualify to fill them. But the comparison we heard made last night of the number of youth who have been trained and the number of positions found, is not very encouraging from the point of view of youth. Until this government gives more attention to creating positions by increasing the home market and production this problem will be with us.

Now a word or two regarding contemplated changes in the British North America Act, which is again referred to in the speech from the throne. The hon. member for Humboldt (Mr. Fleming) yesterday referred to the British North America Act as the alibi by which this government has been shielded in the past. If the act were changed to the satisfaction of all concerned, he wondered where they would hide in the future. One thing I want to emphasize is that there is no need for the dominion government to wait for amendments to the British North America Act in order to give the provinces the assistance they need. If the government want to give assistance to the provinces, removing the sales tax would be a direct contribution; if the provinces wished to assess the sales tax themselves, they would then have at their command a source of revenue which is denied to them at the present time. Neither does it need a change in the British North America Act to enable the government to reduce the stamp tax or the cheque tax. The same applies to the income tax and radio licences. If this government would stop bleeding the provinces of every cent they can possibly get, they would have fewer loans to make or lend back.

An hon. MEMBER: Give back.

Mr. NEEDHAM: They may have to be gifts, yes; as long as they bleed the provinces at every possible source, it is no doubt a gift.

Mr. BLACKMORE: And why not?

Mr. NEEDHAM: Why should the dominion government bleed the provinces in every conceivable way until they have nothing at all left and then expect them to carry on? I cannot understand the common sense or the business sense of such a course of action. And there is a question whether the dominion is not invading the rights of the provinces in these matters. I do not think there is any doubt it is doing so, and that is what is causing the friction to-day between the provinces and the dominion. It is no wonder that the relation is becoming more and more strained. The various briefs submitted to the Rowell commission bear that out. Many believe that this commission was appointed for the purpose of recommending that even more authority be centred in the dominion government. The provinces, I am sure, will fight against such a recommendation to the last ditch, and rightly so. One has only to look at the personnel of the Rowell commission to know what to expect their recommendation will be.

An opinion generally expressed throughout the dominion is that we have too much government in Canada, and I am in agreement. And there is too much duplication and overlapping. But those who are chiefly advancing that idea are those who are trying to get more authority centred in Ottawa. They know it is easier to deal with one government than with ten. What is behind that idea is something worthy of serious investigation. There is too much government in Canada, but it is too much government at Ottawa rather than in the provinces. This is where the duplication and overlapping come in.

Let us now consider the Department of Agriculture. Agriculture is a purely provincial matter, and yet we have an expensive federal department. It is a puzzle to find out where the functions of the Department of Agriculture at Ottawa begin and those of the Department of Trade and Commerce end. I would suggest that the federal Department of Agriculture be abolished, and that the industry be left to the care of the provinces. The same may be said with respect to mines and resources. That is another purely provincial matter which should be left to the provinces. Instead of that, we always have conflicting ideas as to which body is in authority, and various angles of the question arise from time to time.

Another matter which has been mentioned in parliament before has reference to the senate. If any legislation respecting parliament is to be changed, I would suggest that the senate be given serious consideration, because in this twentieth century, in a democracy we love and of which we boast, it is very much out of date to permit the existence of a governing body or a body with legislative authority which is not representative of the people. When one looks at the business done in the senate, as reflected in the debates of that body contained each session in a volume of only about five hundred pages, one has cause to wonder. Last night the statement was made in the house that the senate had adjourned for a month. When we come to a consideration of costs of government and a realization of the fact that the people of Canada, some of whom are on relief, are struggling under the burden of those costs, then I say changes should be made where the best results would be obtained.

We hear talk about the centralization of power. We love to speak about the British Empire. The empire is united but, I must point out, not by the centralization of power. At the imperial conferences the dominions are more and more demanding their right to govern themselves. The same principle applies to Canada and its provinces.

The suggestion is made that unemployment insurance will be discussed during the present session. An hon. member who spoke earlier made a statement to the effect that no doubt every hon. member would support such a measure. I am not prepared to support such a bill until I know its contents. Of what benefit would unemployment insurance be to the unemployed person? None at all. Of what benefit will it be to the employed person? If it is going to reduce his purchasing power, I do not believe that I shall support it. If there is to be a contribution from the employer, we know that portion will be passed on to the consumer, and for that reason such a measure would fail to get my support. If there is to be a contribution from the dominion government and the money is to be raised by taxation, it would be of necessity a penalty on all of us. For these reasons, until I see the bill, I fail to see the benefits of an unemployment insurance scheme, and at the present time I reserve my rights as to whether or not I shall support it.

At the first session in which I appeared in the house I promised I would support the government if it brought down measures which appealed to me as being beneficial to the country and to my constituency in particular. I am sorry to say that after three years—and we are now beginning another—there is no indication that the goverment is worthy of my support.

Mr. VITAL MALLETTE (Jacques-Cartier): Mr. Speaker, may I extend my best congratulations to the mover (Mr. Matthews) and the seconder (Mr. Chevrier) of the address on the way in which they performed their important task. And may I express my satisfaction, and I have no doubt that of all other hon. members, upon the recovery of the Minister of Finance (Mr. Dunning). It would be our hope that his health has reached the point where for a long time to come he may be able to carry out his duties.

May I thank the government, or whoever is responsible, for the improvement of the lighting in the chamber. Speaking on the same occasion last year I pointed out that we who sat on the back benches were having difficulties in view of the lighting, and it is gratifying to note that improvements have been made. May I point out, however, that still another place in this building where lighting arrangements could be improved is the library. For the last three sessions of parliament I have been a member of the committee having to do with the library of parliament. I was pleased in the session of 1936 to hear the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) read my name as one of the members of the committee; but the committee never sat. In 1937 I heard my name read again, and again the committee did not sit. And in 1938 there was the same lack of action. I do not know whether the committee is composed of hon. members who are not qualified to give advice to the librarians, but the fact remains that the committee has never been called together. Although I admit I am not capable of giving much advice as to the choice of books, still I do believe I could give sound advice with respect to lighting. I am one who goes to the library often. As hon. members are aware, the lighting in the library is artificial, and at the present time it is a disgrace to a place like the parliamentary library.

In a few months we shall be honoured by the visit of King George and Queen Elizabeth. The whole country rejoices in contemplation of this important event, and no effort should be spared to make it the greatest success possible. It is the fond wish of the Canadian people that the royal visit of our king and queen be as pleasant as possible. I am sure Canadians will vie with one another in their endeavour to show their respect and affection for and loyalty to their sovereign. Throughout old Quebec, as well as in other French-speaking parts of Canada they will be heartily greeted by the French cry: "Vive le Roy; vive la Reine"—God save the king; God save the queen. We are deeply grateful to their majesties for devoting a few weeks of their time to a visit in Canada, especially in times like these, times which are arduous and require much care and attention. It was a happy thought to create this precedent, and from the bottom of our hearts we wish that during their stay in Canada the old French proverb may apply: " Heureux comme un roi; heureuse comme une reine"—"happy as a king; happy as a queen."

I trust in this connection it will not sound like levity if I tell a story which was popular in Canada about thirty-five years ago. This story has reference to a Canadian who had been away from home for some time. We must remember that in those days there were no radio broadcasts, and news did not travel as fast as it does to-day. It was common in those days for men to be away from home for months or even years at a time. This particular chap returned to his home in lower Canada. When he arrived he inquired as to the latest news; he wanted to know what had occurred since his departure three or four years previously. He was told that Queen Victoria had died. "What! the good Queen has died?" They told him that was so. "Who has succeeded her?" He was told that her son had succeeded to the throne. "Her son? Why, he must have had some pull with Laurier."

I wish to compliment the right hon. Prime Minister and his advisers in the Liberal party for facilitating the election to this House of Commons of the newly chosen leader of His Majesty's Loyal Opposition by refraining from placing a candidate against him in the recent by-election in London. I feel confident that this beau geste met with the approval of most Canadians, at least those who look upon politics as a field in which there still exists a remnant of the old spirit of chivalry. Surely in this twentieth century, nearly forty per cent of which has passed, we ought to be broad-minded enough to recognize that a political opponent should not always be looked upon as an enemy. Since it is part of our parliamentary institutions to have an official opposition, it was in the best interests of the country that the Prime Minister should act as he did. It is another proof of his real desire to strengthen the unity of Canadians.

Since the last session of this parliament the government has appointed a minister to Belgium and Holland. This marks a further step in the development of Canada's international relations. Step by step, carefully and cautiously, Canada must take charge of her own interests everywhere and not always leave that burden upon the shoulders of the mother country. In my humble and very sincere opinion, the appointment of a minister duly accredited to the courts of Belgium and Holland is a move for which the Canadian government deserves great credit. It is pleasing to note that the new minister, Mr. Jean Désy, has been reported as saying that he will do his utmost to improve not only the economic but the intellectual relations between Canada and Belgium and Holland. That is as it should be, and it ought to result in mutual and satisfactory benefits. We think most highly of the peoples of those two countries. We appreciate their business ability, their willingness to work hard and their accomplishments in all the crafts and beaux arts. Especially do we admire their sturdy patriotism.

There are so many interesting points in the speech from the throne that it is impossible to discuss them all thoroughly in the forty minutes allowed to each member of this house. Of course, I have no intention of trying the patience of my hon. colleagues for that length of time. However, with most of the items it would not be fair to dismiss them abruptly. One such item is the trade agreement with the United States. While the analysis of that agreement probably will await the time when it is submitted to the house, I think it is perfectly in order to say now that the Canadian people welcome the government's efforts to bring about closer relations with our neighbours to the south. This is natural. There is scarcely a Canadian family which has not a relative living in the great United States republic. Most Canadians have good friends as well as relations in that country.

Perhaps it would not be amiss at this point to note what other people think of this agreement. I should like to quote from the report of the annual general meeting of the Bank of Montreal, held in Montreal on December 5, 1938. The president, Sir Charles Gordon, had this to say under the heading of trade agreements:

> An important factor bearing on the economic situation comes from the tripartite trade treaties just signed by the representatives of the United Kingdom, the United States and Canada. These treaties will affect in more or less degree every industrial and commercial enterprise in this country. The situation has been a peculiar one for Canada, inasmuch as it has provided the most dramatic demonstration yet given of Canada's position as the natural liason between Great Britain and the United States. Without Canada's co-operation the agreement making for closer commercial co-operation between the two largest English-speaking nations, so important at this juncture in world affairs, would not have been possible. Canada has given that cooperation, not without sacrifices and not without some misgivings as to what these sacrifices may portend. Partly as compensation for giving way to American producers in the British market and partly as compensation for a lowering of our tariffs all along the line in favour of American manufactures, Canada has received advantages in the American market for a wide variety of the products of the farm, the forest, the fisheries and the mines. Primary producers in every province have long desired this freer access to the great market to the south, and we all hope that the advantages which it offers to them will result in such a general increase in the purchasing power of the nation as to offset the added competition which many manufacturing industries will be called upon to face.

The president of the Banque Canadienne Nationale, another important financial institution, had this to say at the annual meeting held on January 9, 1939:

> The new treaty, introducing as it does hundreds of changes in the tariffs of the three countries, embodies mutual concessions. Canada grants the United States many tariff reductions and loses the preference of six cents a bushel on empire-grown wheat. The high quality of Canadian wheat should minimize the adverse effect of free competition on the British market. Canadian products of the farm, the forest and the fisheries should find a wider market in the United States and this advantage should assist where help was needed most. Moreover, the price of many goods imported from the United States will be lowered, reducing industrial outlays and the cost of living. Furthermore, a necessary revival of international trade should ensue inasmuch as trade between Great Britain and the United States represents about twenty-six per cent of the total commerce of the world, in which Canada plays an important part. Another interesting aspect is the application of the most favoured nation clause to a score of other countries.

I have another bank report, that of the Provincial Bank of Canada. I shall read only a small extract, as follows:

A very important factor, is the recent trade agreement made between Great Britain, the United States and Canada, effective since the first of the year. Concessions were made by Great Britain in eliminating certain excessive trade barriers. The United States and Canada also made concessions, and indications are that these reciprocal trade agreements have laid foundations for considerably expanded commerce.

Hon. members will notice that these three banks are not obsessed with the spirit of defeatism, which seems to haunt our friends to my left in connection with this trade agreement, as is evidenced by their speeches since the opening of the present debate.

The government proposes to expand its long range program of public undertakings, and I assume that this will, to a certain extent, replace direct relief. Such a move will surely be hailed with satisfaction by the taxpayers. Direct relief has never been very popular. Many have always held the view that where the government has to help the unemployed, it is better to do it through the medium of public works. They felt it was a mistake to dole out money without getting any return. Let it be said to the honour of the beneficiaries of these distributions that they prefer work to the dole. Not only was this money that was doled out wholly unproductive, but because of forced idleness many good workers have lost the ability to practise their regular craft. The country has been impoverished to that extent. I am sure that any disposition on the part of the government to replace direct relief with useful public works will meet with the approval of the entire population.

Care should be exercised in the selection of the projects to be executed in a program of this kind. It would be ideal to promote only public works that will be self-sustaining or that will liquidate themselves within a reasonable period. The government should be careful to see that proposed public works do not conflict with established legitimate enterprises already providing employment. I am sure that numerous plans will be submitted to the government in connection with this program, and I am willing to do my share in making suggestions.

Here is suggestion number one. There is a great need on the island of Montreal for a new roadway at the western end. The need is great and very apparent. I am fifty years of age, and as far back as I can remember the building of that road has been discussed; so the idea is not new at all. I do not expect the federal government to be called upon to build the road, but it might help in this way. It would be necessary to do away with several level crossings, of which there are many in that section, and which have been the scene of several tragedies in the last few years. The only reason these level crossings have not been abolished is that the municipalities concerned did not have the necessary money; they need financial help. Inasmuch as this improvement would be for the benefit not only of the municipalities but of all the people using the road, I believe that this government should help, and I apply now to them to consider the expenditure of a certain sum of money for the abolition of level crossings in that section of the island when this famous boulevard is built, as we expect, in 1939.

There is another place where we have dangerous level crossings in my county. Running north and south on the island of Montreal, a road passes through Cartierville. Motorists know that road well. People going to the Laurentians for skiing in the winter also know it well. It is fairly wide in places, and then it narrows until when you get to the Canadian National railway tracks there is hardly room for two vehicles to pass. Representations have been made to the Quebec government in regard to improving the road, and a start was made on widening it throughout. There is a fair expectation that some work will be done on the road this year, but assistance will be needed in connection with the subway, and I ask this government to give consideration to assistance for that project.

But that is not all. I have often asked the department concerned to improve the Rivière des Prairies at the back of the island of Montreal, to permit navigation. We have enough space on the shores of the island of Montreal for a population of one million, but although Montreal is situated on an island there is no place for aquatic sports, no place where people can go boating on the river at the back of the island.

Lake St. Louis is also in need of being improved. I have received representations for its improvement at Pointe Claire, Lachine, and other places. So if this government do not know where to spend the money they are going to appropriate, let them come to me and I shall do the best I can to help them with good suggestions.

Speaking of unemployment, I feel in a general way that it would not be well to create and encourage the impression that unemployment is going to become a permanent institution with us, to be met by federal outlays for public works. That would be to adopt an attitude of defeatism, which is repugnant to the Canadian mind. On the contrary every effort should be directed towards the reintegration of categories of workers in gainful occupation according to their avocations. Some people say that all we need to do is to return to that favourite virtue of our ancestors, so dear to my hon. friend the Minister of Finance (Mr. Dunning), thrift, and dispense with non-essentials. I am afraid that individually as well as nationally we have somehow forgotten that good old English proverb that "one must cut his coat according to his cloth." It might be said that I have just been advocating expenditures, and here I am advocating economy; but in my county I have people of both persuasions, and I represent them all.

A few moments ago I gave a list of public works which could be undertaken in the fight against unemployment and which would incidentally greatly benefit the island of Montreal and the county of Jacques-Cartier, which I have the honour to represent in this house. I wish to remind hon. members that in this same county of Jacques-Cartier there is a considerable number of farmers and gardeners, and for them I ask for a continued intelligent application of the seasonal tariffs on competitive produce coming into Canada. A difference of a few days in the application of these tariffs means a great deal to these farmers and gardeners. We have a high type of farmer and gardener in our county, and they won many prizes at the Royal Winter Fair. The prize list is so long, indeed, that it has not yet arrived.

In common with workers of all classes, our agricultural workers have always received sincere, helpful and friendly cooperation from Liberal administrations. The Liberal party is a true friend of those in need, the friend of the under-dog.

May I say, en passant, that a few weeks ago I received a circular from the Massey-Harris Company, announcing substantial price reductions on tractors and general farm machinery effective November 1, 1938, and the circular states that these reductions are the result of a desire on the part of the company to share with its customers the benefits of economies effected, together with savings resulting from the slight decreases in the prices of raw materials. I have no objection to giving the company whatever credit is due for its good intentions; but members of this house, no matter to which party they belong, cannot fail to remember that an extensive investigation was made by a committee of this house not long ago into the price of agricultural implements.

Turning now to the question of armaments, in common with most people I have no liking for heavy expenditures on armaments. If every country would refrain from such expenditures the whole world would be much happier, but unfortunately those are not the conditions, and we seem to be very far from the millennium. It is not surprising, therefore, that the Canadian government deem it their duty to take steps properly to defend our well beloved country. It is impossible for a civilian to say exactly what ought to be done in that connection. We must trust those in office to assume their responsibilities, and we must support their efforts to defend our country. I intend to discuss this matter further when the National Defence estimates come before the house.

At the moment I think particular attention should be drawn to two items of importance. Every item in the Department of National Defence is important, of course, but somehow I feel that we should work up more enthusiasm among our people to join the militia. That enthusiasm does not exist at the present time. I am not blaming anybody for that, but I do think there is a great lack of enthusiasm. In the old French regime everybody joined the militia willy-nilly, because they were conscripted. I am not advocating that, but I do think we should work up enthusiasm among our young men to join the militia units.

I also believe that cadet training should receive more attention. I know there is a sum in the estimates each year for cadet training, and some training is done, but from what I have seen of it I am not satisfied that the government is getting full value for its money. If you want to work up enthusiasm for the militia you must start with the young people. This is not a party affair at all; it is a national affair.

The order paper contains quite a number of proposals for social reform. I have another one to suggest. I am not the originator of it and cannot claim its paternity; but it is a matter of serious importance and one which must eventually be dealt with by parliament, and at some time or another it will be translated into the laws of Canada. Men are paid in accordance with a wage scale; and from the point of view of producers this is quite correct because whatever the producers make must not cost them a price that would put them out of competition. That is quite clear. On the other hand, it is also abundantly clear—to use a favourite expression of the former leader of the opposition (Mr. Bennett)—that the man who is married needs more money than his bachelor companion, and a couple with one child needs more money than a childless couple; and that, of course, goes on increasingly with the number of children. It is evident that the ordinary worker making two or three dollars a day, with a family of, say five children, cannot give his family the standard of living which can be given by another worker in the same line getting the same remuneration and bringing up only one child or none at all. In the case of education alone the first man would be under a terrible hardship, and his children likewise. It is of them that I am thinking. It is of the loss thereby incurred by the nation that I am thinking, and I am sure that one of these days the state will have to go seriously into the question of family allowances. I say "the state" because employers taken by themselves are definitely unable to pay more than a certain level of salaries and wages. I wish that members of the government and of this house would give this aspect of our social life their earnest consideration. There is no doubt about the merits of the matter, although I understand readily the difficulties to be surmounted in curing this unfortunate condition. I do not expect either that very much will be done about it now. I am content to plant the seeds of this idea in the generous hearts of all the members of the House of Commons, knowing that it will germinate there with loving care and eventually will be brought to fruition.

A word with regard to the opposition. The hon. gentleman who now leads the opposition (Mr. Manion) but who is not at the moment in his seat—perhaps exemplifying the fact that the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) has to be absent sometimes—in a very friendly manner in his speech of last Monday evening chided us upon what he called family quarrels in the Liberal party. He quoted our manifesto of 1935, and said, according to the report in Hansard, at page 43 in advocating that a new edition of the manifesto be published:

> Even if the book were not of very great use, it would at least add to the gaiety of nations.

[Mr. Mallette.]

Well, I have before me something that may not add a deuce of a lot to the gaiety of nations but may add, for the moment, a little to the gaiety of Canada. I have brought here two editorials of the Montreal Gazette, dealing with the leader of the opposition, his party, and so on. I should like to take extracts from these articles, but that is hardly possible; they have to be quoted in full, or, as the intelligentzia say, in toto, so I shall ask hon. members to bear with me for a minute while I read this one, an editorial of Friday, August 12, 1938, entitled "Where is Doctor Manion Going?"

> The new leader of the Conservative party addressed a meeting at Barry's Bay on Wednesday. Barry's Bay is a small lumbering centre in the county of Renfrew. It was chosen by Dr. Manion for his first eastern Ontario address in his new capacity. He seems to have said some remarkable things. For example, he told his hearers that federal governments in the past have done little in the way of national planning of Canada's economic life, that the time has come for action on economic problems, and that the policy of drifting has brought about a fear psychology and "a danger of revolution which we must realize." Further on Dr. Manion expressed the opinion that one of the ways of protecting Canadian liberties is improvement of the economic system. The wealth of the country, he said, is badly distributed; hence the danger of revolution and the need of national planning, and so on.
> Where is this new leader going? The convention which selected him turned its back definitely on what is implied in national planning and upon the two principal apostles of national planning in the Conservative party. It dispensed with Mr. R. B. Bennett as leader and it would have nothing to do with Mr. Herridge or his heresies. It went back to Conservative principles. But now we find Dr. Manion talking the language of Mr. Bennett, even the language of Mr. Herridge, and if he does not know that this is an affront to Conservative thought in Canada, he has learned nothing from the temper of the convention which gave him his mandate. Dr. Manion's only chance of success for himself and for the Conservative party is through enlisting and holding the loyal support of the great body of Conservatives in this country who were dissatisfied with the Bennett regime, who called for a party convention and got it, and, through their representatives at that convention, laid down a platform which, if vaguely phrased—

Mind you.

> —in some respects, does substantially represent and express Conservative opinion. If the new leader has any inclination to move to the left he can, of course, indulge it, but he cannot take the Conservative party with him. In his own interest he should be warned against a false step which may lead him away from the great political element in this country upon whose support he must rely, a step which may conceivably compel that element to seek a new allegiance.

This is another leading article in the Gazette. The first was on August 12, 1938, the second on September 2, 1938—a Friday in both instances.

Mr. MacNICOL: But not the thirteenth.

Mr. MALLETTE: Not this time. That will come later. I hate to inflict this upon the house, but, you know—

Mr. SPENCE: Go ahead. Lots of time.

Mr. MALLETTE: I thank the hon. member. There are some of these words I cannot pronounce; I went to school only until I was about fifteen. "Whither Conservatism?" Listen to this; it is illuminating.

It begins to look very much as if the Conservative party has extricated itself from the frying-pan only to get into the fire.

Is that not nice?

Mr. MacNICOL: The fires of office.

Mr. MALLETTE: I continue:

At the party convention at Ottawa it turned its back upon radicalism and radical leaders and confirmed a policy substantially conforming to old Conservative principles and traditions as written into the record of the party in this country. The convention was clearly of the opinion that the party should keep to the right, and it affirmed that opinion in its platform. Upon that platform Dr. R. J. Manion was chosen as Conservative leader and he has no mandate extending beyond the four corners of the policy to which the convention subscribed. If he was not prepared then, as apparently he is not prepared now, to stand upon that platform and proclaim that policy, he should not have accepted the leadership. Conservatives, the great majority of them, were amazed and disturbed by Dr. Manion's speech at Barry's Bay in which he preached reform as the only alternative to revolution. Naturally, a declaration of that kind evoked strong criticism as being irreconcilable with Conservative doctrine and Conservative thought. Undeterred by such criticism Dr. Manion has gone down to Saint John, N.B., and has reaffirmed his Barry's Bay utterance. He is reported as predicting wreck, anarchy and barbarism, ushered in by revolution, unless pressing reforms are made in the economic system, and made soon, reforms that will assure the comforts and needs of life to many who are now without them.

There is an obvious difficulty in dealing with this soap-box solicitude for underprivileged persons, because Dr. Manion does not define reform or social justice or whatever else he has in mind. He does say that it is not radicalism, that it is not socialism, and that it is not communism. He calls it the attitude of commonsense tempered by justice and fair dealing, terms that are about as vague as any that he could have employed, and this very vagueness increases their mischievous potentiality. The Conservative convention had no welcome for Mr. W. D. Herridge, who had gone up and down the country advocating an unintelligible formula of economic reform, but Mr. Herridge apparently did make one convert, and the convention chose that convert to lead a party that was, and still is, Conservative in name as well as in policy. Dr. Manion says that he is going forward, that he will not be diverted from that course by any self-sufficient group which wants things to remain as they are and which will not recognize the danger to our political and economic system by standing still. No political party, he says, can stand still, and true Conservatives realize that it must move on. The new leader may intend to go forward, but it is abundantly evident that he has chosen a route other than that which the convention mapped for him. If turning sharply to the left is going forward, then he is doing it, but, as we have said before, he cannot expect the Conservative party to follow him. It will not do so, and if the Conservative rank and file find themselves obliged to acknowledge other leadership the responsibility will not be upon them.

It is sheer nonsense to suggest or imply, as Dr. Manion has done, that the Conservative party is standing still or that any of its elements wish it to stand still.

Dr. Manion has not always been a Conservative—

They remember that over there.

—but he has been a member of that great party long enough to know that he has cast and is casting a wholly unwarranted reflection upon it. No other party in this country looks back upon a finer record of progress under sound leadership, but it has been progress achieved through the observance of long-established principles of public policy and public administration. Never until recent years was the party ever guilty of fouling its own nest. Its leaders—until recently—were content to stand or fall by those principles, to build always upon solid foundations, to promote the welfare of all classes, and at no time—until recently—did any one of them attempt to capitalize for political purposes upon any kind of class disturbance.

Dr. Manion is in danger of departing from this proud tradition, if indeed he has not already dissociated himself from it. He has delivered two addresses which would be understandable enough as expressing the views of either of the small groups at the extreme left of the House of Commons. Like all such appeals they have failed to even indicate a remedy for the conditions he has described, and for any party leader to emphasize, much less to exaggerate, existing conditions of distress without having in his possession a remedy composed of anything better than a few meaningless words and phrases is to assume an exceedingly grave responsibility. To talk of revolution in this country is a downright absurdity, but it will become less and less of an absurdity as Dr. Manion continues to spread the idea among distressed and dissatisfied citizens. If that is Conservative leadership it is a brand which, fortunately, the dominion has never had before.

The hon. gentleman referred to certain posters used by the Liberal party, one of them entitled "King or chaos," and he said that one of the best jokes was that the country had got both King and chaos. This statement is undoubtedly clever, but with all due deference to the hon. gentleman I suggest that it is not strictly correct. It is true that one poster was circulated bearing the title "King or chaos," and some people in my own constituency, when they heard the results of the election, declared that the country got King and the Tory party got chaos. As a matter of fact, one big change that has taken place in this house since the last election is the disappearance of two parties from our midst. The Reconstruction party has gone, lock, stock and barrel, and the old Liberal-Conservative party, the party of Cartier and Macdonald, has likewise disappeared. What will the Conservatives of Quebec say? The party of Cartier gone! My hon. friends will find out at the next election.

Mr. MacNICOL: "A rose by any other name would smell as sweet."

Mr. MALLETTE: The hon. member for Davenport (Mr. MacNicol) introduces some of his classics; I have a couple of them which I am holding in reserve. It is true we have a party with a new name, the National Conservative party. Well, what was the party before? It was not national, nor was it international, because the leader of the opposition says that we take too much interest in world affairs. The word "national," I suggest, is intended for the good old province of Quebec. When elections are close at hand, how much study and care is devoted by the Tories to the old province of Quebec! Naturally, I can understand that, though we were caught once, in the year 1911, when I cast my first vote. There was an election in that year, and twenty-two candidates, led by Mr. Henri Bourassa and other patriots were returned to parliament; but when the time came for them to take their seats here, there was only one of them who was found true to Mr. Bourassa. I refer to Mr. Lamarche the then member for Nicolet, a gentleman who is still remembered for the staunch support he gave to his leader through thick and thin. Others got honours; to him was given honour —and please do not confuse honours with honour.

We have before us, Mr. Speaker, an amendment and a subamendment. I am not sure whether the hon. member for Lethbridge (Mr. Blackmore) intends to support the amendment; I read his speech and I could not decide. If he does, then it would seem that the three parties are voting together. In other words, the new leader of the opposition has succeeded, as Monsieur Blum did in France, in having a Front Populaire, a popular front. Well, the sort of success that has been achieved in France and Spain does not promise much for the future of this country, from fronts populaires.

I wish to refer for a moment to another matter which was brought up last night. The hon. member for Broadview (Mr. Church) spoke of certain ceremonies at which he was present when another anthem than God Save the King was sung, and he was not interested. The hon. member for Broadview is one of the finest men in this house. Not a day passes in the session when he and I do not have a friendly conversation. I am fond of him and the more one gets to know him the more one likes him. But on some points I think he is radically wrong. When he objects to a second national anthem in Canada I suppose he has in mind "O Canada," and I venture to think his remarks in that regard do not echo the sentiment of Ontario or even that of Toronto. One night, in my home, we turned on the radio and listened to a masterly execution of O Canada in French, without a trace of accent. The singing was beautiful, and you may be surprised to hear, Mr. Speaker, that this was a performance by that great, artistic organization, the Mendelssohn choir of Toronto. I am sure that performance would remove from the minds of the audience any such impression as that which the hon. member for Broadview expressed last night on this subject.

In closing, may I refer to the question of unity, which is very much to the fore. It is well that the position of every party be made clear, and in this regard I should like to read a few extracts from a speech made by Sir Wilfrid Laurier in 1889. Speaking at Quebec on St. Jean-Baptiste day, Sir Wilfrid said:

> Can we not believe that in that supreme battle here, on the plains of Abraham, when the fate of arms turned against us, can we not believe that it entered into the decrees of Providence that the two races, up to that time enemies, should henceforth live in peace and harmony, and henceforth should form one nation? Such was the inspiring cause of confederation.
> When the British provinces were united under the same constitution, the hope now acknowledged was to give to all the scattered elements therein a national ideal, to present to the world the spectacle of a nation diverse in its origins and retaining in all its groups respect for family and race traditions, but giving thenceforward to all one and the same aspiration.

This speech was delivered by Sir Wilfrid Laurier in 1889, nearly fifty years ago. Let me go back further—to the year 1841. I have before me an extract from a speech delivered by Monsieur Lafontaine, the then leader of the Liberal party, addressing the electors of Terrebonne. On that occasion he said—I am translating:

> Canada is the land of our ancestors. It is our homeland, just as it must become the adopted home country of different people who come from divers parts of the globe, to exploit its forests for the purpose of establishing themselves permanently with their interests. Like ourselves, they must desire above all things the happiness and prosperity of Canada. It is the heritage which they must try to transmit to their descendants in this young and hospitable land. Their children must be like ourselves, and before all, Canadians.

These are the sentiments of the Liberal party. They were expressed by Sir Wilfrid Laurier in 1889 and, in an earlier day, in 1841, nearly a century ago, by the then leader of the party, Monsieur Lafontaine; and they are the sentiments of the Liberal party to-day, expressed by the present leader of the government. By these sentiments we stand or fall. It is abundantly clear that if I vote with the hon. member for Greenwood (Mr. Massey) against the subamendment, I must also vote against the amendment.

On motion of Mr. Rogers the debate was adjourned.

On motion of Mr. Dunning the house adjourned at 5.50 p.m.

PRIVATE BILL

FIRST READING

Bill No. 8, respecting The Quebec Railway, Light and Power Company.—Mr. Parent (Quebec West and South).

SUPREME COURT ACT

ABOLITION OF APPEALS TO THE JUDICIAL COMMITTEE OF THE PRIVY COUNCIL

Hon. C. H. CAHAN (St. Lawrence-St. George) moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 9, to amend the Supreme Court Act.

He said: Mr. Speaker, I have a very short explanation to make with regard to this bill, which is different in some respects from the bill I introduced a year ago.

This bill is entitled an "Act to amend the Supreme Court Act." The Supreme Court Act was first enacted in 1875, and section 47 of that act now appears without any change as section 54 of chapter 35 of the revised statutes of Canada, 1927. This bill proposes the repeal of section 54 and, by way of its amendment, the substitution of a new section in a modified form.

In the earlier colonial period the governor of each of the British American provinces and the members of his council, who were selected and appointed by the governor, were constituted a court having supreme appellate jurisdiction in the province. Governors in council then exercised both political and judicial functions and an appeal from their decisions was allowed to the king in council, who then exercised political and judicial supremacy over all possessions and dependencies of the crown.

Appeals from the governor in council of a colony to the king in council at Westminster were regulated by a statute enacted by the parliament at Westminster known as the Judicial Committee Act of 1833. By the regulations made by the government at Westminster under the terms of that act appeals from the governor in council to the queen in council were restricted in commercial matters to cases in which the judgment appealed from was £500 or more.

In 1841, in a Prince Edward Island case, Samuel Cambridge, to obviate a multiplicity of suits, petitioned for leave to appeal from a judgment of a lower court of the amount of £135, although under the governor's instructions an appeal from a judgment of that amount did not lie either to the governor in council or the king in council. The judicial committee, Lord Brougham, then Lord Chancellor, presiding, declined to entertain this appeal and rendered its opinion that the appeal of Cambridge from the judgment of a lower court in the colony, other than the king in council, could not be entertained by the judicial committee under the terms of the Judicial Committee Act, 1833. Thereupon Lord Brougham introduced and the parliament at Westminster enacted a bill which has since then been known as the Judicial Committee Act, 1844. This act provided for the admission of appeals to the judicial committee from any judgment of any court of justice within any British colony or possession abroad. It thereby allowed appeals direct to the judicial committee from any minor court in any province or colony.

The fourth of the Quebec conference resolutions of 1864 stipulated that the general parliament then proposed for Canada should have power to make laws for:

> The establishment of a general court of appeal for the federated provinces.

Section 101 of the British North America Act, 1867, subsequently enacted that:

> The parliament of Canada may, notwithstanding anything in this act, from time to time provide for the constitution, maintenance and organization of a general court of appeal for Canada.

During the parliamentary session of 1875 the Supreme Court Act was enacted, constituting such a general court of appeal for Canada. This act, in the section which I am now proposing that this parliament should amend, declared that the judgment of the court, that is of the Supreme Court of Canada, "shall in all cases be final and conclusive." That declaration is again affirmed in the amending section now proposed.

But the judicial committee at that time took umbrage at the declaration of the Supreme Court Act that the judgments of the court should in all cases be final and conclusive, and prepared and submitted to the government at Westminster a memorandum in which they declared that to abolish this controlling power and abandon each colony and dependency to a separate court of appeal of its own would obviously be to renounce the last and most essential mode of exercising the authority of the crown over its possessions abroad.

Thus it clearly appears that eight years after the enactment of the British North America Act, 1867, Canada was still regarded as a colony, dependency and possession of the crown, over which her majesty's most honourable privy council, that is, the government of the United Kingdom, should continue to exercise dominion and supervision, although even then there was in Canada a growing consciousness of nationhood, which demanded that within well defined limitations the prerogatives of the crown should be exercised in respect of Canada by his majesty on the advice of the king's privy council for Canada.

Since then changes have gradually been effected in the constitutional powers of this dominion until the statute of Westminster, 1931, enacted that, except as to the provisions of the British North America acts, the powers of the parliament of Canada shall include the power to repeal or amend any act of the parliament of the United Kingdom, or any order, rule or regulation made thereunder, in so far as the same is now part of the law of this dominion.

In the exercise of the power then conferred this bill now proposes the repeal of the Judicial Committee Acts of 1833 and 1844 and of all orders, rules and regulations made under the said acts, in so far as the same are part of the law of Canada, in order and to the end that the judgments of His Majesty's Supreme Court in Canada which are rendered in the name and on behalf of his majesty, may, instead of the judgments of a committee of his majesty's government at Westminster, be and be deemed to be the final and conclusive exercise of his majesty's prerogative in all legal and constitutional controversies arising in respect of Canadian affairs.

As all such legal reforms should be effected without undue haste and with due regard for the public interest, the second section of this bill provides that the proposed act shall come into force upon a date to be fixed by proclamation of the governor in council, published in the Canada Gazette.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

THE MINISTRY

RESIGNATION OF POSTMASTER-GENERAL—CORRESPONDENCE BETWEEN HON. J. C. ELLIOTT AND THE PRIME MINISTER TABLED

On the orders of the day:

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, hon. members of the house will, I am sure, regret to learn that the Hon. John Campbell Elliott has thought it advisable for reasons of health to tender his resignation as Postmaster-General. Mr. Elliott's resignation has been accepted by His Excellency the Governor General. I am glad to be able to say that Mr. Elliott has told me that once relieved of the responsibilties of office, he hopes to be able again to take his seat as a member of this house and to continue to serve in that capacity.

I should like to lay on the table the correspondence which has taken place between Mr. Elliott and myself with respect to Mr. Elliott's resignation. Perhaps hon. members will allow the correspondence to appear in Hansard and thereby avoid the necessity of reading it at the moment:

Postmaster General
Canada

Ottawa, Dec. 31st, 1938.

Prime Minister of Canada,
Ottawa.

My dear Prime Minister:

While I have regained a good measure of my former health I feel as mentioned in a recent conversation that in the public interest I should not longer look forward to being sufficiently restored to strength at an early date to again actively assume full responsibility for the administration of the Post Office Department, and that before entering on another year, I should ask you to accept my resignation as Postmaster General.

In reluctantly requesting you to relieve me of the duties of the portfolio with which you entrusted me over three years ago I should like to express to you my sincere appreciation of your kindness and cooperation during the years that I have been a member of your government and the pleasure it has been to have been associated with you and all my other colleagues.

It is a real satisfaction to have been in the government during the time that the various trade agreements which have been made during this parliament were effected. I confidently hope that they will have a highly beneficial effect upon the trade and business of this country and upon the success and happiness of the Canadian people.

It will always be a source of pride to me to have had the privilege of serving under the leadership of one who will rank in history among the greatest upholders of democracy and whose public services have so materially strengthened the structure of the British commonwealth.

It is my sincere hope that you will be spared to give to this country the benefit of your guidance for many years to come.

With best wishes for the New Year,

Yours sincerely,

J. C. Elliott.

Ottawa,
December 31, 1938.

The Honourable J. C. Elliott, M.P.,
D.C.L., K.C.,
Postmaster General,
Ottawa, Ontario.

My dear Elliott:

I have just received your letter of to-day, in which, for reasons of health, you ask to be relieved of responsibility for the administration of the Post Office Department, and tender your resignation as Postmaster General.

As you are well aware, I have all along shared the hope that the impairment of your health would prove but temporary, and that, with rest and change, you would be in a position to continue to administer the affairs of the Post Office Department over which you have presided since the administration came into office in 1935.

I am delighted that your health is so much improved. I agree, however, with you that, instead of continuous improvement in your physical condition, you might encounter a setback were you, either immediately or in the near future, to attempt to resume the duties and responsibilities of a minister of the crown. In your own interest, therefore, as well as in the public interest, I feel you are right in asking to be relieved of the duties of your present office. I shall accordingly, early in the New Year, recommend to His Excellency the acceptance of your resignation.

I shall be deeply sorry to lose you as a colleague in the government. For over twelve years we have been together in the House of Commons, and, of that time, for more than seven years have sat together at the council table. I cannot be too grateful for the loyal and helpful cooperation which you have given me as leader of the party and of the government during the course of those years. I should be distressed indeed did your retirement from the government mean your retirement from public life. Happily, the reverse, I believe, will prove to be the case, and that the restoration of your health will be much accelerated by freedom from the duties and responsibilities of office. This, I trust, may mean for you many years of continued public service.

I thank you warmly for the much too kind personal references of your letter. I need not tell you how deeply they are appreciated, coming as they do from so close a colleague, and so old and true a friend.

May I add that my regret at losing you as a member of the government will be shared by every one of our colleagues. All, however, will rejoice that our association in the House of Commons is to continue, and we shall all hope for the early complete restoration of your health.

With every good wish for the New Year,

Believe me, as always,

Dear Elliott,

Yours very sincerely,

W. L. Mackenzie King.

CABINET APPOINTMENTS—MR. MCLARTY AS POSTMASTER-GENERAL AND MR. J. A. MACKINNON AS MINISTER WITHOUT PORTFOLIO

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, His Excellency has to-day been pleased to appoint as a member of the King's Privy Council for Canada and as Postmaster-General, Norman Alexander McLarty, K.C., member for the electoral district of Essex West.

His Excellency has also been pleased to appoint James Angus MacKinnon, Esquire, member for the electoral district of Edmonton West, a member of the King's Privy Council for Canada and to be a member of the administration and minister without portfolio.

Hon. R. J. MANION (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I should like to offer my hearty congratulations to the two hon. gentlemen who have been admitted to the King's Privy Council for Canada. I have not the honour of knowing at all well the hon. gentleman who has been made Postmaster General (Mr. McLarty). I know a good deal more of the hon. gentleman who has been appointed minister without portfolio (Mr. MacKinnon). I am sure that so far as within them lies they will do very good work as members of the government, and I heartily congratulate them and wish them well.

I am very sorry that Mr. Elliott's health makes it impossible for him to carry on his heavy duties as minister, and I wish him a full recovery to health.

UNEMPLOYMENT

ARREST OF SINGLE UNEMPLOYED MEN IN TORONTO

On the orders of the day:

Hon. R. J. MANION (Leader of the Opposition): On Friday last I asked the Minister of Labour (Mr. Rogers) a question about a number of single transient unemployed men in Toronto who were to come up for trial last Saturday. Since then I have been informed, and I presume the minister has had the same correspondence, that these young men have been remanded for a week, in which event they will come up for trial next Saturday. As the matter is so urgent I am bringing it up again to-day. The letter I have received states that there are some five hundred single unemployed men in the category of transients in Toronto, and as the Minister of Labour is to speak in the debate to-day, if he does not wish to answer at the moment, I would ask him in his remarks later to inform the house what responsibility the dominion government takes in respect of this very serious situation in Toronto.

Hon. NORMAN McL. ROGERS (Minister of Labour): My information with regard to this matter corresponds with that just given to the house by the leader of the opposition (Mr. Manion). The commissioner of welfare of the city of Toronto, Mr. Laver, was in Ottawa on Saturday, and brought certain information to me with respect to the transient situation in that city. I have since communicated with the Hon. Eric Cross, minister of public welfare in Ontario, and hope to be able to make a further announcement within a short time.

Mr. H. G. CLARKE (Rosedale): I am pleased to see that the question I had prepared to ask the Minister of Labour (Mr. Rogers) has been asked in part by our leader (Mr. Manion). I should like to ask further if the minister will intercede as soon as possible in behalf of the unemployed seventy-five persons who are in the Toronto gaol.

Mr. ROGERS: As has been already stated to the house by the leader of the opposition (Mr. Manion), the men who were arrested for violation of a city by-law have been remanded for a week. Any action to be taken with respect to the matter will be considered in the interval.

SITUATION IN AYLMER, QUEBEC—SUGGESTED EMPLOYMENT ON GATINEAU PARKWAY

On the orders of the day:

Mr. RODOLPHE LEDUC (Wright): Can the Minister of Labour tell the house whether any steps have been taken to deal with the critical situation in the town of Aylmer caused by lack of work and failure of the provincial government to arrange for granting relief to the needy?

Hon. NORMAN McL. ROGERS (Minister of Labour): The situation in Aylmer was brought to my attention by the hon. member who has just spoken, also by the mayor and a number of members of the council of the town of Aylmer. Following that interview I wrote to the premier of the province of Quebec bringing to his attention the fact that a sum of money amounting to $115,000 had been allocated to that province for the rehabilitation of older unemployed persons, and suggesting that, since that money had not been taken up by the province of Quebec, it might be possible that a portion of it could be diverted for the relief of this situation in Aylmer. The suggestion has been made that a considerable number of people in that area could be usefully employed on the Gatineau parkway. I have not yet received an answer from the premier of Quebec, but I am hopeful that either through an answer from him or in some other way early action can be taken to relieve the situation of which the hon. member has spoken.

FISHING INDUSTRY

LOSS OF LOBSTER TRAPS AND EQUIPMENT ON WESTERN COAST OF NOVA SCOTIA

On the orders of the day:

Mr. R. E. FINN (Halifax): May I direct the attention of the Minister of Fisheries (Mr. Michaud) to the lobster industry on the west coast of Nova Scotia, starting at Cole Harbour in the county of Halifax and running westward to the southeastern end of Digby county which is a part of Yarmouth county. A major disaster occurred there as the result of a terrific gale which swept away their traps and equipment. I wish it to be well understood that I am placing no blame upon the Minister of Fisheries or his department. My representations were made nearly six weeks ago. Upon coming to Ottawa, an amount of money was appropriated, namely $100,000. After the amount was fixed—

Mr. SPEAKER: Order. Will the hon. member put his question now?

Mr. FINN: I will ask the minister the question. I was going to relieve him of responsibility, but have been stopped, so therefore he will have to take it. I should like to ask whether the government of Nova Scotia, which has been interrogated many times, has given any final answer. In connection with that, I would ask the minister that all correspondence between the provincial government and the dominion government with reference to the reestablishing of the lobster fishermen be placed upon the table of the house.

Mr. SPEAKER: That is not a question which should be put on the orders of the day.

Mr. FINN: I cannot hear you, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. SPEAKER: I said that this is not a proper question for the orders of the day. It should have been put by the hon. member on the order paper.

Mr. FINN: I was not so advised, Mr. Speaker, by the clerk of the house. I was advised the other way.

Mr. SPEAKER: It should have been put on the order paper as a notice of motion.

Mr. KINLEY: With regard to the difficulties of the lobster fishermen of Nova Scotia, may I ask the minister whether he did not make a suggestion or offer to contribute towards the relief of these men?

Mr. SPEAKER: That question should be placed on the order paper and not be asked on the orders of the day.

Mr. KINLEY: I asked the question only because I feared that there might be some confusion in view of the answer given the hon. member for Halifax (Mr. Finn).

Mr. SPEAKER: No answer was given the hon. member for Halifax.

Mr. KINLEY: Perhaps the minister would like to answer my question, Mr. Speaker.

Hon. J. E. MICHAUD (Minister of Fisheries): In order to keep the record straight, I understood you to rule, Mr. Speaker, that the hon. member for Halifax did not ask a question but asked for the production of papers. In reply to the hon. member for Queens-Lunenburg (Mr. Kinley) I may say that his statement is correct. An offer was made by the Department of Fisheries to the government of the province of Nova Scotia looking to cooperation for the relief of the situation in that province.

FISH TRAPS IN PACIFIC COAST WATERS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. A. W. NEILL (Comox-Alberni): I have to ask a question of the Minister of Fisheries (Mr. Michaud)—perhaps he would allow me to make it two questions, seeing that the matter is urgent and the order paper route would be too slow.

Has the minister's attention been drawn to an item appearing on the front page of the Vancouver Sun of January 19, and dated Olympia, Washington, stating:

> Two fish trap bills designed to restore fish traps to Washington water . . . are being drafted by the Senate Fisheries Committee and will be filed within a few days.

The second question is: In view of that fact, is he prepared to take the responsibility of maintaining our traps, only 4 in number, as against their 219, knowing that the results will be that our catch in those waters will drop from eighty per cent, as it is at present, to thirty per cent, as it used to be when the American traps were operating.

Hon. J. E. MICHAUD (Minister of Fisheries): My attention was not drawn to the item as published in the Vancouver paper or to the subject matter that has been referred to. The further question of the advisability of reciprocating or of maintaining the policy of issuing fish trap licences is being considered at the present time.

RADIO BROADCASTING

REFUSAL OF BROADCASTING PRIVILEGES TO PUBLISHER OF TORONTO GLOBE AND MAIL—BROADCAST BY SIR EDWARD BEATTY

On the orders of the day:

Hon. C. H. CAHAN (St. Lawrence-St. George): I gave a short notice to the Minister of Transport (Mr. Howe) of some questions I desired to ask of him.

In an Ottawa dispatch to the Gazette, of Montreal, published on January 14th instant, the Minister of Transport, in referring to the McCullagh broadcasting incident, is reported as making a statement that—

> One case in point, which became an issue, was a similar request by Sir Edward Beatty. He wished to buy time on a chain and was refused.

I desire to ask three questions of the Minister of Transport. First, did the minister make the statement so reported? Second, has the minister since then informed himself of the relevant facts? Third, is the statement, so reported, true or false?

Hon. C. D. HOWE (Minister of Transport): I regret that I omitted inadvertently in my statement of last Friday to deal with this situation. I had intended to deal with it as well as with one or two other references that have been made in the house. I did refer however to the one-minute interview which I gave to the reporter for the Globe and Mail, and the unfavourable circumstances surrounding it. As I remember it, the reporter asked if this was the first occasion on which the rule had been applied. I said that it was by no means the first occasion. He then asked me to name one occasion on which it had been applied. My mind flashed back to a discussion in the board of governors which had been reported to me of the propriety or otherwise of Sir Edward Beatty having purchased a wire network to deliver a speech giving one side only of a very controversial question. It was my recollection at that time that the discussion had taken place prior to the application and that the application had been refused. I have since taken the trouble, however, to ascertain the facts. I find that it was the discussion of an event which had taken place. The broadcast had been given, and no further application had been made.

Therefore, to answer the questions categorically:

First, did the minister make the statement so reported?

The answer is yes, substantially. I will not argue about the variations in wording.

Second, has the minister since then informed himself of the relevant facts?

The answer is, yes.

Third, is the statement, so reported, true or false?

The statement I made was incorrect, and I wish to state while I am on my feet that I tender a public apology to Sir Edward Beatty for having brought his name into that interview.

EMPLOYMENT OF WAR VETERANS AS CANVASSERS FOR RADIO LICENCES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. F. E. LENNARD (Wentworth): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the Minister of Transport (Mr. Howe) the following question: Will the ex-service men to be appointed by him as radio licence vendors this year receive these jobs upon the recommendation of the officials of the local units of the veterans' organizations, where such organizations exist throughout Canada?

Hon. C. D. HOWE (Minister of Transport): I believe I answered the same question last Friday. In fuller explanation I may say that I was approached by the leaders of certain organizations of ex-service men asking that ex-service men be employed as vendors of radio licences. After some discussion I entered into an arrangement, which seemed to be entirely agreeable to the ex-service men, to the effect that ex-service men would be used for this work as far as they may be available. I pointed out, however, and the ex-service men's committee agreed with me, that the Minister of Transport being responsible for the collection of licences, must take responsibility also for the selection, from those available, of the particular ex-service men who will do the work. That is the situation as I stated it last Friday.

Mr. LENNARD: On whose recommendation would they be appointed?

ADDRESS OF MANAGING DIRECTOR OF LONDON LIFE OVER NATIONAL NETWORK

Hon. C. D. HOWE (Minister of Transport): On Friday last the hon. member for Greenwood (Mr. Massey) asked, on the orders of the day, a question which was sent to the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation and to which I have received an answer. The question asked by the hon. member was:

Last evening at 7.15 over station CFRB, on a trans-Canada network of twenty-nine stations, Mr. Edward Reid, managing director of the London Life Insurance Company, broadcast an address which was advertised as:

A message to the general public, which will be of particular interest to the owners of the 700,000 policies issued by this company.

Would the minister be good enough to explain to this house why, if Mr. George McCullagh, publisher of the Globe and Mail, was banned from the use of a network to broadcast a message to the general public and the readers of the Globe and Mail, Mr. Reid was granted the use of a network to broadcast a message to the general public and his policyholders?

The Canadian Broadcasting Corporation gives me this reply:

On December 3rd application was made on behalf of the London Life Insurance Company to buy time to enable the vice-president of the company to speak briefly to their policyholders dealing with the principles upon which life insurance was operated. The application for the CBC national network was refused. In view, however, of arrangements made independently by the agents of the London Life Insurance Company with privately-owned stations antedating the extension of CBC network regulations to all networks, it was decided to give permission for this fifteen-minute program of institutional advertising to be accepted by a network of privately-owned stations concerned.

REPORTED PURCHASE OF SITE FOR NEW STUDIO IN OUTREMONT

Mr. DENTON MASSEY (Greenwood): I should like to direct another question to the Minister of Transport (Mr. Howe) concerning a matter involving the expenditure of some $800,000 of public money. A dispatch in the Montreal Gazette to-day reads in part as follows:

CBC may purchase site in Outremont.

Proprietors asked to approve sale of land for studio. . . . New radio building project to cost $800,000. . . .

If the plan materializes, the building will be erected . . . immediately adjoining the Mount Royal cemetery.

No statement could be obtained last night from CBC officials as to whether or not the corporation had definitely decided to acquire the Outremont site if proprietors approved.

The minister may not be in a position to make a statement to-day, but I do feel that the house should be given information in this matter perhaps to-morrow. Would the minister make a statement concerning the matter?

Mr. HOWE: No formal application that would permit the construction of this building has been received by the government.

BRITISH FOREIGN POLICY

REPORTED CRITICISM BY VANCOUVER RESIDENT AND SUBSEQUENT ACTION OF MOUNTED POLICE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. S. WOODSWORTH (Winnipeg North Centre): In The Nation of New York, in the issue of January 14, there is a news item which I should like to read and upon it to base two or three questions. The item reads:

> Some weeks ago Mr. M. S. Reynolds, a resident of Vancouver, wrote a letter to Neville Chamberlain criticizing British foreign policy. Shortly afterward—on November 23—Mr. Reynolds was visited by two plainclothes members of the Royal Canadian Northwest Mounted Police. Producing a copy of the letter he had sent to Chamberlain and of another he had sent to Lord Lloyd, they warned him not to write such letters again.

I should like to ask these questions: (1) Is this incident, as reported, a fact? (2) If so, were the officers acting under instructions? (3) Is such action a part of government policy?

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): This is the first time I have heard of the article to which the hon. member has referred and therefore I am unable to answer his question in the way in which he would like to have it answered. I shall be glad to have it stand as a notice and I will reply to it later.

Mr. FINN: In view of the fact that $100,000 has been allocated and has been available for the reestablishment of lobster fishermen along the coast of Nova Scotia from Cole Harbour to the southeastern side of Digby county, which is part of Yarmouth county—

Mr. SPEAKER: Order. The question to which the hon. member is leading up is one that should be placed upon the order paper and not asked on the orders of the day.

Mr. FINN: I bow to your ruling, Mr. Speaker, but it did not seem to apply to the leader of the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation.

GOVERNOR GENERAL'S SPEECH

CONTINUATION OF DEBATE ON ADDRESS IN REPLY

The house resumed from Friday, January 20, consideration of the motion of Mr. J. E. Matthews for an address to His Excellency the Governor General in reply to his speech at the opening of the session, and the proposed amendment thereto of Mr. Manion and the amendment to the amendment of Mr. Woodsworth.

Hon. NORMAN McL. ROGERS (Minister of Labour): Before I proceed with what I had intended to say I hope I may be permitted to extend congratulations to the two hon. members who have just been appointed to the king's privy council in Canada. May I also express, what I am sure is in the minds of hon. members, regret that for reasons of ill-health the former Postmaster General (Mr. Elliott) has found it necessary to retire. Certainly, in the period of the present government, he has won the respect and warm affection of his colleagues, and I am sure that this feeling is shared by all members of the House of Commons.

In continuing the debate I should like to add my own congratulations to those already extended to the mover (Mr. Matthews) and the seconder (Mr. Chevrier) of the address, upon the exceptionally able manner in which they performed their duties a week ago. The tributes paid to their speeches in turn by the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Manion) and the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) have been repeated by other hon. members who have spoken from all sides of this house. There has also been complete unanimity and concord in the congratulations extended to the hon. leader of the opposition on his return to parliament. As we listened to him the other day I observed that he usually followed his most telling thrusts with a genial smile, and I can assure him now that when he is discussing questions of unemployment —and no doubt I shall be the target of his attacks quite frequently in the future—I shall try to remember the smile as well as the thrusts. As a matter of fact I was not entirely surprised that my hon. friend himself had to smile at some of his observations on trade and employment. I am quite sure that he did not intend them to be taken too seriously.

But the leader of the opposition has already scored one diplomatic victory which may have contributed something to his good humour on that occasion. He has succeeded, as his predecessor did not, in bringing back into the Conservative fold the sheep that was lost, and for better or worse has joined the fortunes of his own party and the Reconstruction party. We have yet to learn what the terms of reconciliation have been; we do not know whether the Reconstruction party is to be conserved or the Conservative party reconstructed. There may be no significance at all in the fact that in the physical sense at least the hon. member for Kootenay East (Mr. Stevens) has moved from the extreme left to the extreme right. But I was under the impression, as I think most hon. members were, that the Reconstruction party had principles and policies as well as a leader, and that there was also some reason to believe that these principles and policies were not entirely congenial to all the members of the Conservative party. But upon these questions no doubt we shall be enlightened when the hon. member for Kootenay East has spoken in the present debate.

For the remainder of my time I intend to confine myself entirely to the subject of unemployment, and in doing so I shall follow the speech from the throne and the comments thereon which were made by the leader of the opposition in the course of his speech of last Monday.

In the first place I want to point out that the reference made by the leader of the opposition to unemployment had little or no relationship to the amendment which he moved at the close of his speech. The amendment states in general terms that this government has failed to take appropriate measures to relieve conditions of unemployment and economic insecurity. The leader of the opposition did not refer to these measures, nor did he attack them at any time in substance. As a matter of fact, as pointed out later by the Prime Minister, he ignored entirely the paragraphs of the speech from the throne which referred specifically to the several measures taken by this government to deal with questions of unemployment and relief. Not only that, but he failed in the course of his three hours' speech to suggest any other measures which would be more appropriate to relieve the existing situation, and this despite the fact that the Conservative party held a national convention in this country six months ago and that my hon. friend has been leader of the Conservative party during the succeeding period.

I have examined closely the speeches made by the leader of the opposition in recent months. I did so because I hoped to find in them some alternative and more appropriate measures which he himself would apply to relieve the existing situation with respect to unemployment. I hope he will correct me if I am wrong when I say that as far as I have been able to examine his speeches concerning unemployment he has made only three specific proposals which have any actual connection with that problem. His first proposal was that the dominion government should take over the entire burden of unemployment relief. I hope my hon. friend will make it clear to the house and the country, either now or later, whether when he made that statement he had in mind the assumption by the dominion government of the existing relief burden in Canada, including the very large number of unemployables and indigents who have found their way upon relief rolls in the various provinces.

Mr. MANION: I am sorry to interrupt, but if I may do so, the fact is I did not take that attitude. If the hon. gentleman, who says he has read all my speeches very carefully, had read that one very carefully, he would not find that I made exactly the statement he has quoted at all. He would find that I said something to the effect of "in greater part." The Canadian Press in all its reports across this country said that. I admit that in many of the newspaper comments on my speech it was said that I made the statement that the dominion government should take it over completely. But if my hon. friend will look up the Canadian Press report or the report in the Toronto Globe and Mail he will find they confirm my statement that I did not say that, because I checked these reports myself and they are correct.

Mr. ROGERS: Then I understand from the leader of the opposition that he does not intend that the dominion government should take over the relief burden completely?

Mr. MANION: I am not going to make a statement of policy just now. I am discussing the subject which the hon. gentleman is discussing; I am not going to give in reply to a question the policy of the Conservative party.

Mr. ROGERS: Well, my hon. friend suggested that I was misquoting him. I quote from the Montreal Gazette, which at least would have no motive in misquoting my hon. friend—

Mr. MANION: I am not so sure of that, even.

Mr. ROGERS: This is from a speech delivered by the leader of the opposition at Barry's Bay on August 10:

The dominion government, must assume the burden of relief costs, enabling a reduction in existing heavy municipal taxation which is retarding business recovery. Hon. R. J. Manion, federal Conservative leader, said in an address here to-day.

Mr. MANION: If I might interrupt, is that a Canadian Press report or the report of a representative of the Montreal Gazette?

Mr. ROGERS: That is a Canadian Press report.

Mr. MANION: I have many of the Canadian Press reports upstairs; I particularly checked them, and they do not say that I said that the Canadian government should take over the whole burden of unemployment relief.

Mr. ROGERS: I have simply quoted the dispatch as I have it here.

Mr. MANION: Is that the heading or the body of the dispatch?

Mr. ROGERS: It is the lead of the dispatch.

Mr. MANION: Never mind the lead; quote what I said.

Mr. ROGERS: This indicates what the correspondent understood was in the mind of the leader of the opposition on that occasion. I see no reason to continue this digression. I shall be glad to pass over the dispatch to my hon. friend.

Another proposal was made by the leader of the opposition in the course of the Brandon by-election, to the effect that he believed that those who were on relief could be very usefully employed in constructing dustless highways in Canada. I have no complaint at all with respect to the suggestion of my hon. friend that it would be useful to construct dustless highways, but I am sure no hon. member believes that a project of that kind represents what might be termed appropriate and effective measures for curing unemployment in this country.

Mr. MANION: Again I am sorry to interrupt, but we want the matter clear as we go along. I gave that as an illustration. I pointed out in that speech and in others that we had spent about $500,000,000, in fact more, on relief, without getting anything in return. I considered that instead of getting nothing in return that money should be used for public works of various kinds, and I gave dustless highways as an example.

Mr. ROGERS: On that point I have not the Canadian Press but I have a report of tthe Brandon Sun, which has not been notorious for its support of the present government. That report says:

> The aim of the national Conservative party is to use money now spent on direct relief for such public works as dustless roads, Hon. R. J. Manion, the party leader, said to 1,700 people who gathered to hear him in the armouries Wednesday night. "It can be done and will be done by the party I'm leading when I get into power," said Doctor Manion.

Mr. MANION: "Such public works." I have no objection to that report. That is correct.

Mr. ROGERS: Then the third suggestion made by my hon. friend was that there should be established in this country, and there would be if he came into power, a ministry of youth. I am not going to comment on that at any length. But I would simply put this to him, that you do not solve a problem simply by appointing a minister to deal with it.

Mr. MANION: You ought to know.

Mr. ROGERS: I know something about it, and I am going to speak of that a little later on. You might as well say you can bring about prosperity in this country by appointing a minister of prosperity. You do not deal with the youth problem by appointing a minister of youth. May I say further that I have a keen interest in the youth problem, as anyone would who occupied the position I have occupied for the last three years. But if it is a matter of youth training it must, to be done effectively, be done in cooperation with the various provincial governments which control education, which have effective control over factories and which at the present time control the employment services of this country. Or if it is intended rather to establish special works projects for youth I would remind my hon. friend that the federal government has a number of departments already organized for that purpose and if, for example, it appeared to be expedient to establish special projects for youth such as forest conservation, obviously it is desirable that such a project should be set up under the department that now has a forestry service rather than by an entirely new department which would duplicate services already in existence.

I am not going to labour that point now. No doubt we will have occasion to deal with it later, but so far as I have been able to discover those are the only three specific proposals made by the leader of the opposition in connection with this great problem of unemployment.

Now may I refer briefly to the paragraph in the speech from the throne which sets out precisely and modestly what actually has been done by this government in the way of introducing new measures to deal with various phases of that general problem. This is the paragraph:

The dominion government have taken active measures to stimulate private employment through the home improvement plan, the National Housing Act, and the Municipal Improvements Assistance Act. Under those measures certain local taxes have be assumed, and loans made to individuals, organizations and municipalities. The sales tax has been eliminated on important building materials. Special aid has been given to the mining industry by subventions, tax exemptions and improved transportation facilities. At the same time, direct employment has been increased through a substantial expansion of federal public works, and through assistance given to the provinces in the construction of highways, for land settlement, for special projects for farm employment and for forest conservation.

The leader of the opposition and others of his group who have taken part in this debate from time to time have accused this government of inaction. They may say it has been wrong action, but in the light of that paragraph and in the light of the results obtained under those policies they cannot accuse the government of inaction with respect to this problem. And the policies indicated here are entirely apart from contributions made by the dominion government to the various provinces, to assist those provinces in the distribution of direct relief to those in need.

After we came into office one of the first actions taken was to increase the grants in aid, which prevailed under the late administration, by seventy-five per cent in order to relieve the burden upon the municipalities, an object which my hon. friend now says is one which thoroughly deserves the support of this parliament. But the various policies indicated here are a reflection of the conviction of this government that if you are going to deal with unemployment through the provision of work it is wise first of all to try to expand private employment rather than public employment. In the first opportunity I had to speak in this house I stated my own firm conviction that regardless of what might have to be done in the way of expanding public employment it was the first duty of government in a democratic state to take measures to expand private employment. And we have done just that. I took that view because in other countries I had seen that, apart from the regrettable loss of morale that comes from idleness, there is another form of lack of morale which comes from the increasing dependence of large bodies of our people upon employment afforded by governments. So we took the position, in the open, that we would meet our obligations as we saw them with respect to providing subsistence for those in need; that we would do what we felt reasonably could be done in the way of expanding public works if private employment would not do its part, but that above all we would take the measures that lay at our hands to stimulate employment in private industry, and we have done just that.

Mr. CAHAN: What have you done to stimulate private industry?

Mr. ROGERS: If my hon. friend will permit me to make my own speech I hope to convince him very shortly in regard to what has been done in that respect.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Tell us.

Mr. ROGERS: Yes, I propose to do that. When we came into office it was found that the natural outlets for our products in foreign countries had been lost, in some directions, and restricted, in some directions, by the policies of the late administration. We adopted policies of trade expansion which already have had their reflection in two reciprocal trade agreements with the United States, and through those trade agreements we have had markets for our products which we did not have before.

Mr. CAHAN: And destroyed private industry in this country.

Mr. ROGERS: Under those agreements we have also brought about, as pointed out the other day by the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner), an increase in the employment afforded in this country; and it could not be otherwise. Even the leader of the opposition, during the course of his speech, pointed out that on the basis of unquestionable surveys made by competent authorities there was a correlation between a decline in international trade and a decline in employment, between an expansion in international trade and an expansion in employment; and no one can say that this government has shown inaction in seeking to find new markets for the products of this country. Does it lie in the mouths of hon. members opposite to accuse us of inaction in that respect when the reciprocity negotiations of 1935 were left in mid air because hon. gentlemen opposite were not prepared to go the last mile in order to get that trade agreement for this country?

But that is not all, Mr. Speaker. In the nature of things trade in this post-war world has been difficult to expand, but this government has never adopted a policy of defeatism with respect to possibilities in that direction. We realized that there were other industries in this country that also might be stimulated by government assistance, and we have given assistance to the mining industry, through tax remissions and the improvement of transportation facilities. We have given assistance to the building industry, as a result of which already over $50,000,000 has been expended under the National Housing Act and the home improvement plan. Will my hon. friends suggest that that has not been a useful means of stimulating employment in private industry? Not only that, but this employment in the building trades has been of distinct advantage in that it has been distributed right across Canada. For instance, it has afforded employment where it was most needed, in the great industrial provinces where the percentage of unemployment is at the highest. And with respect to the home improvement plan, there are moneys still available and loans are still being made, while the National Housing Act, as expanded last year, is providing new means of affording a still greater degree of private employment in the building industry.

Now as to public employment. Under the Municipal Improvements Assistance Act—I place this under public employment but in one sense it might have been placed under private employment because it is not concerned with projects which come under the control of the federal administration—which has been in existence only a few months, useful self-liquidating projects are now being constructed in many provinces. For example, one of these projects is being proceeded with in Vancouver, representing an outlay of $750,000. Another one in Vancouver will cost $390,000. There is one in Nanaimo to cost $200,000; one in Edmonton, $150,000; one in Lethbridge, $100,000. Five projects are being carried on in Calgary. In Saskatchewan the amounts run up to $628,000, while in New Brunswick they total $402,000. Can anyone suggest that the works represented by these measures have not had the result of offering more employment than would otherwise have been given?

So far as public employment is concerned I would point out that through dominion-provincial works and federal works of conservation and development we have succeeded year by year in diverting a very considerable amount of money into expenditures which are not only increasing immediate employment, but developing the assets of this country, particularly in our national parks and tourist industry, in a manner that ultimately will lead to a large expansion of employment.

The other day my hon. friend spoke of his difficulty in obtaining statistics on unemployment. I am not going to deal with this question at any great length, but I think it will be useful perhaps to clear up any confusion which may exist in his mind because of the fact that the statistics with respect to unemployment and unemployed on relief come from different sources. First of all, as to the figure he obtained from the bureau of statistics with regard to the unemployment that exists in this country, I would simply remind him that it is only an estimate. If he had glanced over the return that came to him he would have found the following description of this estimate:

> These figures, prepared in the Dominion Bureau of Statistics, are, of course, only estimates. They are based upon—(1) the records of the trade union; (2) of the employment services of Canada; (3) the bureau's index of employment in firms; and (4) the population trend.

May I point out this further fact to all members of the house? Those figures were given out even before the onset of the present depression. I doubt if there is any other country where there is as large a proportion of seasonal employment as there is in Canada. Seasonal unemployment, which does not of necessity mean dependence upon the state, is included in the figures given by the bureau of statistics. I do not think it is necessary to say more in confirmation of that statement than to say that in January, 1930, before the onset of the depression, figures similar to those given the other day by the hon. gentleman showed an estimate of 297,000 wage earners unemployed. May I remind the house that at that time no one had suggested that a situation had arisen which called for the distribution of direct relief by this country. We may take it for granted then that this estimate of unemployed includes a very considerable number of those who could be described as seasonal unemployed.

Now, as to registration. I agree with my hon. friend that it would be extremely useful if we could have before us at all times an accurate registration of the unemployed. This country is not the only one in which this problem has arisen. I know of no country with which we are in active contact which has that kind of accurate representation of the unemployed from month to month. I suppose Great Britain comes closest to it. They have it because they have a system of unemployment insurance and labour exchanges which permits accurate returns from month to month with respect to insurable groups. But the British figures are confined to insurable groups in so far as they are actual registrations rather than estimates.

It may be recalled by some hon. members that about a year ago a demand arose in the United States for a registration of the unemployed, and congress voted an appropriation of $5,000,000 for that purpose. The president called in a very prominent industrialist —if I remember correctly it was the president of the American Rolling Mills—and asked him if he would head a commission to undertake what might be termed an accurate census of the unemployed. They set up an effective organization through the post office and cards were sent out to every person for whom an address could be obtained. When the returns came in, the head of the commission said that they were entirely unsatisfactory in so far as representing the actual situation was concerned. Indeed I have a statement here to the effect that the voluntary registrations were liable to an error of some thirty per cent; that is, thirty per cent of the unemployed did not bother to register, and naturally this factor of error would affect appreciably the result obtained.

The question of the registration of the unemployed as distinct from those on relief was considered by the national employment commission as one of its first tasks. They recommended that instead of setting out in this extremely uncertain way to register the unemployed, it would be preferable that we should obtain our statistics from those who are actually on relief. These people would be registered by compulsion, if you will. The registration which has been in existence for the past two years is the registration recommended by the national employment commission as being the most practical and, all things considered, as the most useful to the government. I would say to my hon. friend that that registration is a registration of those on relief. I shall be glad to give my hon. friend a copy of the form sent out from Ottawa for distribution to relief recipients in all municipalities in all provinces.

Mr. MANION: Is there not one province to which they are not sent?

Mr. ROGERS: All provinces.

Mr. MANION: I thought New Brunswick was missed.

Mr. ROGERS: I am glad my hon. friend mentioned that. This is a registration of those receiving material aid. For the last year—I may have to correct that and say the last two years, but I will make sure later—the province of New Brunswick has not distributed relief, and for that reason we do not get returns from them of material aid. All the other provinces do send in the returns. As these figures come in to the registration branch, which was transferred to the Department of Labour after the national employment commission was dissolved, they are carefully collected and the information is assembled by sorting machines. This composes the report from time to time of registration statistics of those on relief. This information has been found extremely useful, and not only in connection with the government's publication of these figures and the separation of agricultural aid from urban aid; it has proven to be of considerable value to the municipalities and the provinces. The registration forms go through these other agencies which distribute direct relief.

I should like to place on Hansard, as I did last year, the results of the latest registration by regions in this country. As hon. members are all aware, this country practically divides itself into four regions, the maritime provinces, the central provinces, the prairie provinces and British Columbia. In setting forth these registrations figures last year I thought it would useful if I indicated the trend in each region. I may say briefly that in the two years from November, 1936, to November, 1938, the three zones other than the prairie provinces showed réductions in total numbers of persons on aid. The maritimes recorded a reduction of 43·7 per cent; central Canada of 43·3 per cent; British Columbia of 14·3 per cent, while the prairie provinces showed an increase of 12·5 per cent. In urban aid alone all zones showed a decrease: 44·1 per cent in the maritimes; 37·7 per cent in central Canada; 2·3 per cent in the prairie provinces and 14·2 per cent in British Columbia. In agricultural aid decreases were shown in other than the prairie provinces, where an increase of 22·5 per cent was recorded. Agricultural aid is not a large factor in the three other zones, however. In the two years to November, 1938, the dominion total of persons on both urban and agricultural aid reduced by 22·7 per cent; in the same period the dominion total on urban aid reduced by 29·2 per cent and on agricultural aid, by 6·1 per cent.

I want to take the house entirely into the confidence of the government with respect to these figures. They are given, I need hardly say, exactly as they come to us from the registration branch month by month; and during the past year, particularly in recent months, the figures have not been as encouraging as they were earlier in the year.

From November, 1937, to November, 1938, the prairie provinces showed 20·2 per cent reduction in totals of all classes on aid, while increases were shown in the other zones as follows: Maritime provinces, 8·3 per cent; central Canada, 8·4 per cent; and British Columbia, 9·8 per cent. Comparing the changes in numbers on urban aid only as between the same dates, the maritime provinces showed an increase of 8·0 per cent; Ontario and Quebec, of 6·9 per cent; and British Columbia of 9·4 per cent; in this comparison the prairie provinces showed a reduction of 5·7 per cent. Agricultural aid showed a decrease in the prairie provinces from November, 1937, to 1938 of 26·4 per cent, but each of the other three zones showed increases in numbers on agricultural aid—though agricultural aid is not a considerable factor apart from the prairie provinces.

Net changes in the dominion totals in the year to November, 1937, were: a decrease of 7·7 per cent in the total of all persons on aid; an increase of 3·5 per cent in the totals on urban aid; and a decrease of 23·6 per cent in the total on agricultural aid.

To sum up: from November, 1936, to November, 1938, the grand total of all persons on material aid decreased by 22·7 per cent, and, comparing the same months in 1937 and 1938, there was a decrease of 7·7 per cent from 1937. Numbers on urban aid decreased by 29·2 per cent in the two years to November, 1938, although from 1937 to 1938 there was an increase of 3·5 per cent. Numbers on agricultural aid were 6·1 per cent more in November, 1938, than in November, 1936, but were 23·6 per cent less in November, 1938, than in November 1937.

If the house will permit me I should like to place this material on Hansard just as it is given, for the information of members, also tables which I think might be useful:

So much for the past; so much for the present.

Mr. MANION: Before the minister gets away from unemployment registration, might I ask him to make this clear, that there is not to-day outside of those on aid any registration of the unemployed, either transients or any other group of the unemployed. That is my understanding.

Mr. ROGERS: My hon. friend is entirely correct. The registration is confined to those who are in receipt of material aid, and who register for material aid. In fact, it is their registration that enables the figures to be got.

Mr. MANION: That was exactly the position I took the other day. The minister and his leader criticized us very severely because we had no registration of the unemployed, and I pointed out that there was still no registration of them.

Mr. ROGERS: Oh, but there is.

Mr. MANION: Of those on aid only.

Mr. ROGERS: Of those on aid. But my hon. friend did not say that.

Mr. MANION: Oh, pardon me; I made that very clear.

Mr. ROGERS: So far as the future policy is concerned I should like to indicate briefly now the principles which will govern this government in its agreements with the provinces during the next fiscal year, and I hope the house will grant me its indulgence if in order to avoid any error or misunderstanding I follow my notes rather closely.

1. Grants in aid. The dominion government is prepared to pay dollar for dollar with provincial governments for material aid (direct relief) up to a maximum federal contribution of forty per cent in each province. Under the maximum this would mean in general terms a forty-forty-twenty division of the costs of material aid among the three authorities, the dominion, the province, and the municipality. Under the proposed agreements the dominion government will provide for a sharing of the cost of aid given to transients on a fifty-fifty basis with the province.

2. Civic improvements. The dominion government is prepared to offer its cooperation to provicial governments which wish to enable certain of their municipalities to enlarge their normal programs of civic improvements as an alternative to direct relief. To this end the dominion government under its agreements with the provinces will contribute fifty per cent of the direct labour costs of such projects as have been submitted by municipalities and approved by the provinical and dominion governments, it being understood that the provincial government in the case of such approved projects will also contribute fifty per cent of the direct labour costs and the municipality will bear the cost of materials and supervision. In approving applications from municipalities for assistance to civic improvements, due consideration will be given to (a) the extent of unemployment in the municipality, and (b) the value of the proposed improvement to the community and the relative cost of materials in relation to the total cost of the project. The employment on approved programs of civic improvements will be supervised, at least in the larger municipalities, by a committee which shall represent each of the three contributing governments. This will ensure that the expenditures on civic improvements will have their maximum effect in reducing relief rolls, and will reduce at the same time the expenditures of the several governments in the municipality for material aid to the unemployed. This form of assistance to civic improvements will not be available to municipal projects which are accepted for another form of federal aid under the Municipal Improvements Assistance Act.

3. Single unemployed persons and transients.

(a) Youth training. Proposals will be submitted to parliament to increase the usefulness and efficiency of this project by ensuring its continuity over the next three years. On the basis of the existing federal appropriation, an annual sum of $3,000,000 is now available through joint contributions for the dominion-provincial youth training program.

(b) Other projects. As announced in the speech from the throne, the assistance given to forest conservation will be extended to other work of national importance in order to provide an opportunity for useful work and national service to single unemployed men. It is intended to develop both federal and dominion-provincial projects in order to extend the employment and training available to single unemployed men under the forest conservation and farm employment plans now in operation in British Columbia and the prairie provinces.

4. Public works. It is proposed to continue, and in some cases to extend, the various projects of conservation and development which have been placed before parliament in special supplementary estimates at previous sessions. These projects include—and I think it is only fair to emphasize the range of them—aid given to trans-Canada and tourist highways, mining roads, national parks, historic sites, airports, water conservation, rehabilitation of drought areas, elimination of level crossings, and harbour developments. Particulars of these projects will appear in the supplementary estimates.

I am afraid, Mr. Speaker, that my time has almost expired, but I felt it of particular importance not only to this house but to those outside that there should be as early as possible this statement of the principles that will guide the dominion government in its agreements with the provinces during the coming fiscal year. May I say that these are policies laid down in pursuance of the experience gained by us in dealing with this problem during the past three years. There is in these policies, I believe, not only the means through which the municipalities which have suffered under a very considerable weight of taxation in recent years will be relieved of a measure of that burden, as we relieved them before, a few months after we came into office; we believe that these, with other measures taken to stimulate the building industry, will lead to a still further increase in building construction in this country during the forthcoming year.

So far as civic improvements are concerned, because of the condition of the municipalities in recent years, there is no doubt whatever that there is now a very considerable body of deferred works which could usefully be done for the advantage of our people. I am not going to specify particularly any kind of a definition which will confine these civic improvements under these plans; but broadly speaking I would hope that under this plan it would be possible for us in this country greatly to increase our facilities for parks and playgrounds and swimming pools, and those things which will not only contribute as an aid to unemployment but assist also in the greater health and happiness of our people, particularly in slum areas.

Mr. HEAPS: May I ask the minister if housing would come under that category?

Mr. ROGERS: I do not believe that housing would come under that category. But the dominion government has, under other legislation, dealt in a very comprehensive way with housing. Under this legislation, however, very useful work could be done in clearing away condemned buildings as a means of opening the way for housing plans under part II of the National Housing Act.

Apart entirely from what has been indicated here, I should like once more to stress the importance of this government or any government receiving the broadest kind of co-operation from employers generally throughout this country in doing what they reasonably can do, even at some risk, to increase their working staffs during this coming year. I have been told sometimes of employers who have done this and who have received a large measure of satisfaction from knowing that in this way they were making their own contribution to the problem. Because—let us make no mistake about it—if private employment is not able to take up the slack; if private industry acting with governments, and having a knowledge that governments are doing their part, does not itself do its part toward that objective, there will be thrown ultimately upon democratic government such a pressure of opinion in favour of public employment that government itself will be asked to undertake burdens which it is not equipped to bear. I think we should remember that.

Attention is given from time to time to figures other than those that I have quoted. The other day my hon. friend quoted from the Canadian Welfare Council bulletin that some $900,000,000 has been spent since 1930 for relief in this country. I am not sure what purpose my hon. friend had in quoting that figure. I am not suggesting for a moment that he used it as an indictment of this government; because as a matter of fact if it was an indictment at all, five-eighths of the indictment belongs to the late administration of my hon. friend and only three-eighths of it to us. But that figure, I should like to point out, does not represent, to my mind at least, money wasted; it represents rather what this country with other countries has had to do in critical times to conserve its population and sustain them in a period of unemployment. One might as well figure the costs of education, of public health, of veterans' pensions and of other services and say, what is there to show for it? There is this to show for it. Apart entirely from the fact that a part of that $900,000,000, possibly forty per cent, includes money spent on useful works under both administrations—I am not confining this to our administration—surely we can say that this expenditure is one which was called for by the circumstances, and any government having a sense of its responsibility is bound to deal with it to the best of its ability.

Other figures were quoted by my hon. friend from the bulletin of the Canadian Welfare Council. He quoted figures, which up to now I have not been able to confirm, with respect to the numbers of youth unemployed in this country. I wish I had time to go into that question—I shall have another opportunity later—because there is something there which needs to be cleared up; and some of our papers in this country would, I think, be wise if before they published those figures they would allow those in authority an opportunity to make comments upon them.

There is no reason why we in this country should adopt a policy of discouragement or defeatism with regard to this or any other problem. The figures which I gave a moment ago, and which will be placed upon Hansard, represent I believe more progress relatively with respect to unemployment than has been made either in Great Britain or in the United States in the same period. As a matter of fact my hon. friend, if he had read down a little further on the bulletin of the Canadian Welfare Council, would have found this statement, that in the United States at this time there are 21,000,000 on relief. The population of the United States is about ten times that of Canada. If we had an equivalent number on relief here, we would have more than double the number which we actually have at the present time. My hon. friend would also have found this statement, that in the last year some 400,000 more unemployed have gone on the unemployed lists in Great Britain than in the previous year. I take no satisfaction in the fact that this situation exists in other countries, but I deplore the kind of attitude in this country which is willing to turn its back on the sunlight and think of this question only in terms of discouragement.

I should like to assure this house that this government from the beginning, although at times its progress may have seemed slow and at times perhaps it may have been open to the charge that we were taking too much care before we proceeded in a given direction, at all events has proceeded resolutely upon lines which we felt would lead us utimately towards a sound solution. There is no defeatism here; there is no discouragement; and although there are times, I confess, when one encounters reverses, let us remember that this battle of unemployment is not fought on one front alone; it is fought on a long battle-front, and sometimes we may have to retreat on one sector, sometimes we may have to consolidate our position along the whole line; there is not always an advance. But I believe that, given the kind of cooperation, the kind of enterprise and initiative that exists in this country, at least potentially, it is not beyond the powers of government, and citizenship, to make steady progress towards the solution of this problem of unemployment.

Mr. H. J. BARBER (Fraser Valley): Permit me first to tender congratulations to the two hon. members who have been chosen as members of the privy council. I think I can safely say that I can count them both among my friends in this house, and I am sure they will fill their respective positions to the satisfaction of the party to which they belong.

The announcement in this message to parliament that Their Majesties King George and Queen Elizabeth have graciously decided to visit Canada this spring has been received with rejoicing in British Columbia. The people of the Fraser valley, Mr. Speaker, will give their majesties a right royal welcome.

It is not my intention to deal at length or in detail with the several matters that appear in this message to parliament. I shall try to confine my remarks to what we in this country have come to realize is our greatest problem, that of unemployment and relief, a matter upon which we have had—I was going to say—during the last forty minutes a very informative address by the Minister of Labour (Mr. Rogers): I will qualify that, and say that at least part of it was informative; the other was a criticism of my leader and a request for cooperation not only from manufacturers but, I believe, from members of this house in connection with this great problem.

[Mr. Rogers.]

Speaking of cooperation, those of us who sat in this house from 1930 to 1935 realize what cooperation the government of the day received from the followers of the present government when they were seated in opposition. Every measure brought down which tended to improve conditions in this country was held up and criticized for days. At no time during that five years did we receive any cooperation whatever from the members of the then opposition; they played party politics all the time.

I quite agree that the program announced this afternoon by the minister, indicating the several projects that are proposed, will be of some benefit, and will, or at least should, relieve to a certain extent the conditions that now prevail. But by no means will that program solve the great problem that faces us. The minister has repeated the paragraphs in the speech from the throne which inform us about what the government has done in the past and for which great credit is claimed. And he has also told us what they propose to do this session. I do not think he quite completed that program, and it would be only fair to the house and to the country that I should fill in this government's record in the handling of the problem from the year 1935.

What have my hon. friends opposite done to correct the condition? We are told to-day of the only proposal which they have to remedy the situation. Let me first remind the government that the Liberal party was returned with a clear mandate in 1935 to deal with the unemployment problem. In this regard I cannot do better than quote from an editorial appearing in this morning's issue of the Ottawa Citizen. It puts the matter better perhaps than I can state it:

> The Liberals came into office in 1935 under circumstances as favourable as any party could desire. They had escaped the responsibility for conditions of depression in the five years from 1930. The blame had been fastened heavily upon Mr. Bennett. During the years without the responsibility of office, the Liberals had enjoyed ample opportunity to profit by the mistakes made in government policy. They persuaded the electorate that, with a clear majority in parliament, Liberal policy would correct the conditions of unemployment, transient youth and general insecurity. They were given an absolute mandate.

The people took them at their word and returned them to power with a majority larger than that given to any party in the history of this country.

The minister has told us about housing, about youth training, about assistance to agriculture, and something about forestry. May

I take the house back to 1936. If hon. members will read the speech from the throne presented at that session they will find in it a paragraph informing the house that the camps for unemployed single men were being transferred from the Department of National Defence to the Department of Labour and that at a very early date they would be closed. Of course the camps were never transferred from one department to the other, but they were finally closed. The equipment was carefully sorted, graded and packed, and finally camps and equipment were disposed of. The minister, speaking of these camps at the time, said:

> They cannot be supported on grounds either of social utility or of government economy . . . to continue them would encourage an attitude of hopelessness on the part of those for whom they were designed.

Well, within three years the camps were re-established in British Columbia.

Mr. ROGERS: But on a different basis, if I may say so.

Mr. BARBER: They are just about the same, no matter what basis they are on. There are some twenty-two in British Columbia to-day, and before leaving for the east I was informed that there were 1,900 men in the camps and about 2,000 on the waiting list. The minister says that they are on a different basis, but if you look at the speech from the throne you will find that provision is being made not only for the maintenance of these camps but also for their extension to other work. I wonder if the minister has decided, on the grounds of social utility and government economy, to return to that system.

Talking about camps, perhaps I had better tell a little about one of them. I have here an editorial that appeared on January 11, 1939, in a weekly publication, one of the best weekly papers in Canada, published in my district. This is what the editor has to say:

> The story of the forestry camp at Cultus Lake since early in November, the closing chapter of which is, we hope, about to be written, is another illustration of the futility of the country's method of dealing with the problem, and single transient unemployed particularly; of the wastage of public funds, and what is infinitely worse, the wastage of human fibre.
> Arrests for misbehaviour in the camp, in the city, and elsewhere have placed some 16 of the men in jail where they are kept at the expense of innocent ratepayers of organized communities. Others have been dismissed and turned into the highways to roam where they may. Brawls have taken place, women insulted, and generally a state of apprehension created as rumour followed rumour of planned outlawry.
> The camp here is not an isolated case. And this is the character of the fruitage after nine years of effort and an expenditure of $900,000,000. If this is democracy, what is worse? might well be asked.
> This canker of unemployment, aided by a clashing of jurisdictions, and the apathy of many, is sending out its tentacles in unsuspected directions. There is no question about it but that it is threatening the vitals of democracy and Canadian well-being. Yet the country fails to come to grips with the issue.

That gives you a fair idea of what the camps are. They have all the bad features which the minister complained of in the previous camps. Following the closing of the camps the minister had the bright idea of putting a large number of these men to work. He said he had made arrangements with the railways, through the minister in charge of that department, to take on some ten thousand men on what is known as deferred maintenance work. We find that less than eight thousand men stuck out the season, and the cost to the country was something over $2,300,000. We have not heard any more of that particular kind of project for the employment of those who are out of work to-day. Then we come to the appointment of the commission. We were advised of this in the speech from the throne in 1936. Provision was to be made—> . . . for the establishment of a representative national commission, which will cooperate with the provinces and municipalities in an endeavour to provide work for the unemployed, and the supervision of unemployment relief.

From that one would naturally take it that the commission would be clothed with administrative powers. I think that was generally understood by parliament, that they would have power to travel throughout the country, arrange matters on the spot with municipalities and cities, and supervise the paying out of relief. But we found that the powers of this commission were simply of an advisory nature. The chairman was an outstanding Canadian who undertook the work without pay or expense, solely in the interests of Canada, and I think all who have followed the commission's work and studied its report will admit that he was the brains of the commission. One member was a labour man; the rest were fairly representative of the Liberal workers in this country. They were brought down to Ottawa, furnished with offices and paid the handsome living allowance of $30 a day along with their travelling expenses. One thing that the government did themselves, and did not leave to the commission, was to keep these particular people off relief.

For two years this commission collected information and finally filed a report with statistics and recommendations. Did the government act on those recommendations? I think we can credit them with having acted on some of the minor ones, but on the major recommendation no action was taken and we hear no more of the report of this commission. After all these efforts, coupled with those of which the minister has told us to-day, in addition to the expenditure of hundreds of millions of dollars, this government has not even come to grips with this great problem of unemployment and relief. What have we to-day? The minister has told us that we have still a large number of unemployed. Among these there has grown up a class of shiftless, rudderless men, some at present concentrated in camps, others roaming the country and others walking the streets of our cities. That group has increased materially since 1935. There has grown up another class, hundreds and thousands of noble men and women who have struggled to keep off relief, a large army of Canadians who, depending on one or two days' work a week, support themselves and their families. Many have lost their homes; their little savings have disappeared. That class has greatly multiplied since 1935. Then we have the other class, those on relief. The minister told us, and we are also told in the speech from the throne, that there are fewer drawing relief. I am not inclined to give the government full credit for this; Mother Nature played a large part. Last year we had crops where there had been none for some years before; in many other districts crops were better than in recent years, and this went a long way towards relieving the situation. But let me point out in connection with relief that many of our people have become dole-minded; do not want to work; take the attitude that the country owes them a living. In 1935 that class scarcely existed. So that in spite of the statistics the minister gave, this problem seems to me to be much more serious than it was in 1935.

I warn this government that the people of this country have been looking to Ottawa every session since this government took office, remembering the promises and the slogans of hon. gentlemen opposite. There is no doubt they recall that speech of high resolve that the present Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) made on the night of the last election. Someone said it was a bleak October night. It may have been bleak for a number of Conservatives. My leader has already quoted, but I think it will do no harm for me to quote again—in fact I think hon. gentlemen opposite would like to hear this—the words which the present Prime Minister uttered that night:

> In the new era which dawns to-day the struggle for the rights of the people will, in the realm of economic liberty and security, be carried on as never before. Poverty and adversity, want and misery are the enemies which Liberalism will seek to banish from our land. They have lain in wait at the gate of every Canadian home during the past five years,—

An hon. MEMBER: And since then they have got inside.

Mr. BARBER:

> —and their menacing mien has served to destroy the souls, as well as the minds and bodies, of an ever increasing number of men, women and children in our land. We take up at once, as our supreme task, the endeavour to end poverty in the midst of plenty; starvation and unnecessary suffering in a land of abundance; discontent and distress in a country more blessed by Providence than any other on the face of the globe, and to gain for individual lives, and for the nation as a whole, that "health and peace and sweet content" which is the rightful heritage of all.

Almost four years have passed since that speech was delivered. We are reaching the end of this parliament; it is now the eleventh hour. Still we have with us poverty and adversity, want and misery; the announced enemies of Liberalism are still abroad in the land.

I do not want to appear to be altogether destructive in by remarks. It is my privilege to criticise, but I also consider it my duty as a member of this house to support and co-operate as far as possible in measures which I consider would tend to relieve the serious condition in which many of our people find themselves. In the works which the minister has announced to-day I am sure members of this party will cooperate, for the reason that such works will tend at least to relieve the situation. We are told in the speech from the throne as well as by the minister to-day that the government intends to provide a program of public undertakings. We have not the details yet, and the extent to which it will help depends on the nature and extent of that program. I doubt whether it is wise to spend millions on large public buildings. These huge structures may be very nice to have, but it always appears to me that the expenditure involved is not warranted by the employment given. And there are very few of them that are revenue producing; in many instances they are simply a luxury we cannot afford.

There are works of a revenue producing kind, and in this category I would include the construction and improvement of highways. We need highways and better highways in many sections; we might well divert some of the millions now going to relief to useful work of this kind. I have in mind some in British Columbia that might be taken over as federal undertakings instead of on the fifty-fifty basis, which would relieve the provinces and the hard pressed municipalities. I understand that the trans-Canada highway is already a federal undertaking. It should be pushed to completion. I would suggest that the portion paralleling the Fraser canyon should be improved and that safeguards should be placed at those points at which a number of fatal accidents have occurred during the last year. Then there is what is known as the Monkman pass. I think the Liberal party are pledged to an outlet for the Peace river district, and I would suggest to the government that this outlet be constructed. A number of noble citizens have been working on that construction themselves, and have been seeking the assistance of various public bodies and governments. I believe this should be given consideration. Then we have what is known as the Hope-Princeton highway, on which a good deal of construction work was carried on at both ends through federal assistance some years ago. Of the ninety miles I should say one-third remains uncompleted. If the government would undertake to complete that it would not only provide considerable employment to people in that section but also open up the southeastern section of British Columbia and bring the rich Okanagan and Kootenay districts within a few hours of the coast cities. Indirectly it would be a revenue producer, not only from the standpoint of the better facilities it would give those living in that district but also in connection with the tourist trade. Then north of the Fraser we have the proposed Agassiz-Haig section, the completion of which would connect with the Hope-Princeton highway and the trans-Canada highway, thus offering a direct route along the north bank of the Fraser to Vancouver. I mention these in particular because I think everyone will realize that in British Columbia road construction is very expensive, and means a tremendous burden on a province with such a small population. I also urge the government to take over these projects as federal undertakings, because I believe great revenue would be derived from the tourist traffic through the construction of highways in that province.

There is just one other matter I should like to mention. I drew it to the attention of the Minister of Mines and Resources (Mr. Crerar) last year, and he promised to look into it. That is a highway from the port of Huntingdon, from the international boundary line to the trans-Canada highway. It would involve only one mile of construction. Last year we had a measure before parliament providing quite a large amount to be expended in order to encourage the tourist industry. Huntingdon is the fifth largest port in Canada. As soon as the United States tourists leave the boundary line they come to what is known as a rough gravel road, over which they must travel for some miles before they reach the paved trans-Canada highway. The construction of a road a little over one mile in length would give direct connection with the trans-Canada highway, and I can assure the government that any money spent on that small section would bring great returns from visitors coming from the United States. All these works would provide useful employment, and indirectly would produce revenue and bring new money to this country.

We hear a great deal to-day about world trade which, according to the Prime Minister, would solve our unemployment problem. We are told that wider markets would do the job. Last year the speech from the throne boasted of increased trade, but we find no mention of that in the speech this year. As has been stated already in this house, the fact is that our export trade has diminished by some $200,000,000, with a decrease of $90,000,000 in our imports. It is true that during the last few years we have built up an enormous export trade in raw materials. We are taking our resources out of the ground, shipping them out of the country and boasting of our export trade. We are exporting our raw materials and buying back commodities fabricated from those materials. Will that solve our problem? No. This vast export trade is not doing anything compared with what could be done for the relief of unemployment in Canada if we were fabricating that raw material here and giving employment to Canadians. To-day the minister pleaded for the cooperation of industry. I wonder if he will give industry in this country a chance. The policies of this government up to the present time have made conditions in Canada so uncertain that industry is not in a position to expand and employ more labour. Yes; I am favourable to trade, if that trade means the selling of the products of the farm and of our primary and secondary producers at prices that will bring them a fair return for their labour; I am in favour of trade that will increase the employment of Canadians.

I have mentioned two proposals that have been put forward by the government, a program of public works and efforts to increase trade. There is just one other matter to which I should like to refer. It is the opinion of many Canadians, and, I think, of some members of this house, that if Canada is to survive some changes must be made in our capitalistic system, that there must be something in the way of reform. With this I think many agree. Unemployment insurance is mentioned as a remedy. That is very good, but we shall not get any immediate relief from that. Reforms of various kinds have been discussed in this house; some very able followers of the government have urged that certain changes be made. Monetary reform has been put forward as a remedy for our ills. The Prime Minister himself told the electors that he was going to wage a war against the money power. The Minister of National Defence (Mr. Mackenzie), while occupying a seat on this side of the house, had a very bright idea which I am sure we all recall. He reminded us that we had $170,000,000 in gold and that we could manage on a coverage of 25 per cent. Then we would have sufficient money to pay off our debt, at least in part, and provide for great public works. This would be done, he said, if the Liberal party were given a chance. Well, the Liberal party is in power; the hon. gentleman has a seat on the treasury benches, but we have heard nothing more about this scheme to give us money with which to clean up our debts and carry on a public works program. If our problems can be solved, if happy days can be brought back by the adoption of some sort of economic monetary reform, let us have it. The government has at hand all the necessary instruments to work out any such reform. It has trained technical men in the treasury department and there is our national institution, the Bank of Canada. Apparently nothing is to be done about monetary reform; there has been no mention of it or of any other reform on the part of the government this session.

We have now reached the fourth session of this parliament. Almost four years have passed since the present government took office, but we find that poverty and adversity, want and misery, which Liberalism sought to banish, are still with us. After four years of Liberal rule the great problem of unemployment has not been dealt with, much less solved. The Prime Minister admits that he cannot do anything about it. He says that a conflict of jurisdiction stands in the way. Constitutional impediments and a conflict of jurisdiction are the reasons given for not solving the problem. If that is what blocked the solving of this problem, why have almost four years passed without an attempt being made to get together a representative national conference? Why was there a delay of two years in the appointment of a royal commission on dominion-provincial relations? Almost another two years have passed since that commission was appointed, and we are now advised that its report will be filed some time this session and will be passed on to a national conference. This means that no action can be taken this session and probably not before an election.

The truth is that in connection with this and other problems the Prime Minister and his government have refused to assume responsibility. Matters that should have been dealt with have been passed on to other bodies. Royal commissions have been very popular with this government. Someone has said, I believe quite truly, that royal commissions are appointed to find out something that we know already. I think that is particularly the case with the commission we have been talking about to-day.

We have heard a great deal about the responsibility of parliament. I was surprised when the Prime Minister told us the other evening that this and other problems rest with parliament, that parliament is responsible for what is done with public funds raised by federal taxation. It is true that parliament votes the estimates presented by the government, but let me ask this question: When did members of parliament have the power to increase a vote? When did a private member have the right to bring in a measure providing for the expenditure of public funds? Parliament has no such power and parliament as a parliament has nothing to do with the shaping of policies to deal with any particular problem. Under our parliamentary system action must come from the government, the Prime Minister and his cabinet. Responsibility rests with the Prime Minister and his cabinet, and the Prime Minister assumed that responsibility when he took over the reins of government in 1935.

Ever since this government came into power it has shirked responsibility and followed a policy of drift, extravagance and high taxation that has done much to cripple industry. It has followed a policy that has created in this country an atmosphere of uncertainty. If our problems are to be solved, if democracy is to survive in this country, there must be a reversal of this policy, from one of drift to one of action, from one of shirking of responsibility to one of assuming responsibility. If Canada is to remain a united Canada instead of nine Balkan states, then we must have a strong central government. We must have a government that will give leadership to the Canadian people. Then and not until then shall we be on the road to solving our problems.

In conclusion, let me refer to the amendment to the amendment. One of my colleagues has already referred to it, but I think it would be well for me to touch briefly upon it. It reads:

> We are of the opinion that these conditions can be remedied only by the effective control of financial institutions and monopolistic enterprises which are exploiting the Canadian people.

This has been looked upon as a trick amendment. Any one who does not vote for it is likely to be branded throughout the country as being favourable to control by financial institutions and monopolies. Like the other members of my party, I am bitterly opposed to monopolies and to control by financial institutions. But what remedy do our friends of the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation offer? According to the policy they have been advocating, I take it that their remedy would be to scrap the present system and set up a socialistic state. I fear the remedy would be much worse than the disease. As I am utterly opposed to socialism or any pink shade of communism, I must vote against the amendment to the amendment.

Mr. ANGUS MacINNIS (Vancouver East): Mr. Speaker, despite the speech of the Minister of Labour (Mr. Rogers), I regret that in taking part in this debate my first word must be one of criticism. I regret that there is in the speech from the throne so little from which the hard pressed people of this country can draw new hope and new inspiration. The minister suggests that we should be optimistic. It is easy to be optimistic in this House of Commons. It is easy to be optimistic when you know where your next meal is coming from. It is easy to be optimistic when you know that you can go home at the end of the day to a good meal and a cheerful fireside. The people whom I have met in large numbers during the recess do not have those comforts, and consequently they cannot be as optimistic as my hon. friend the Minister of Labour. At this time people are particularly in need of something to bolster up their courage and determination.

The reason is this: During the past few years until midsummer, 1937, we were slowly getting out of the depression. Many of those who were unemployed in 1933 and 1934 had work in 1937, but they now find themselves slipping again into the depths of another depression. Consequently they are becoming hopeless and desperate. As I said before, they are not in the fortunate position in which the Minister of Labour, the members of this house and the members of the privileged classes in this country find themselves. They have a right to expect something more from the government than they can find in the speech from the throne. If ever there were a time when a strong frontal attack on economic conditions was necessary, it is now.

It must now be abundantly clear, and I believe it is becoming more clear to the Minister of Labour, that private enterprise can no longer assure sustenance for the masses of the people, let alone a decent standard of living and economic security. This government has sufficient proof of that fact, and the time is overdue when it should begin in a planned way to help the people to extract from the abundant resources of the country a decent living for the present and economic security for the future.

It is not my intention to touch on all the points mentioned in the speech from the throne. The royal visit has been mentioned by nearly all those who have spoken in this debate. I do not think it is necessary for me to say any more than that I associate myself with much of what has been said already in regard to the visit of the king and queen. However, I am convinced that if this government had shown as much energy, enthusiasm and thoroughness in improving the economic conditions of the Canadian people, who must remain in this land for fifty-two weeks in every year, as they have shown in preparing for the three week visit of the king and queen, there would not be as much misery, distress and want as one sees now on every hand.

The speech from the throne stresses the need of increased armaments and the determination of the government to meet that need. As the subject of defence will be discussed on another occasion, it is not my intention to say very much on that point at the moment. It does, however, seem strange that this government, which claims to be so much concerned over the defence of our country, should still continue to supply aggressor nations with war materials to carry on their aggression. Not only that, but as I pointed out in the house last year, while the government of Canada supplies the aggressor nations, Germany, Italy and Japan, with all the materials they are willing to buy from us, it maintains an embargo on materials for the loyalist government in Spain, thus helping Italy and Germany in their acts of aggression. While helping to arm the aggressor, and a potential invader, if we are in any danger of invasion, we refuse to sell to the legally constituted government of a friendly country the means by which she might be able to defend herself. As one travels through this dominion and realizes the sentiment of the people on this question, one wonders what influence behind this government compels it to follow such a stupid and undemocratic policy.

There have been expressions of congratulations and thankfulness on the signing of the Munich pact of last September. All peace-loving people were undoubtedly relieved that a clash was averted at that time; but we in Canada should hang our heads in shame when we contemplate our share in the disaster of Munich, for Munich was a disaster. War, of course, might have been a greater disaster. But no sooner was the pact signed than Europe began to realize what its real implications were and are. Daily the dictators are becoming more rapacious, and bolder in their demands. Yet Munich was not an accident, nor did it come upon the world suddenly. It was the logical and inevitable sequence in a chain of events—Manchuria in 1932, Abyssinia in 1935, Spain in 1936, China in 1937. Even Prime Minister Chamberlain realized that Munich did not mean peace; for in the very speech in which he extolled the pact to the House of Commons he asked for more and greater armaments, and since that fateful occasion every country in the world has intensified its armament building program. Consequently it is sheer humbug to represent Munich as in any way making for peace.

In my opinion, however, the most amazing comment on the Munich pact came from the Minister of Justice (Mr. Lapointe), who was attending the sessions of the League of Nations at the time of the crisis. He is reported as having said on his return to Canada that Chamberlain by his action had saved civilization. Now it is conceded on all sides that Munich was a victory for the European dictators, a victory for the rule of force over the rule of law; and if the Minister of Justice implied that any process in that direction is a process that is going to save our civilization, it is certainly amazing to me. I am sorry the Minister of Justice is not now in his seat. I can remember him referring in this house to dictators as gangsters and madmen; evidently then, the civilization that was saved at Munich was a gangster civilization.

As I have said, the Minister of Justice was attending the sessions of the league at Geneva during the crisis. The league, the only hopeful and good thing that came out of the last war, was organized to deal with just such situations as had led to Munich. But while the league's delegates at Geneva sat impotently twiddling their thumbs, four men sat around the table at Munich, two of them at least with their guns on the table, deciding the fate of a country, without a representative of that country being present or having an opportunity to be heard. That is gangster rule with a vengeance. That was the precedent set at Munich for the settlement of international affairs. And that is what the Minister of Justice called saving civilization!

I am glad to be supported in this opinion by at least one Liberal who has the courage to face realities and speak her mind. In a statement on the world situation issued to the press on Sunday, October 2, 1938, Senator Cairine Wilson, president of the League of Nations Society in Canada and vice-president of the International Federation of League of Nations Societies, had this to say—I shall not take time to read the whole of it but cite only one or two passages:

> We are rejoicing as a people to-day that there is peace, but there are some brutal truths which should be remembered, and which I hope will lead to a thoroughgoing examination by Canadians of the peace problem and thence to a more determined and comprehensive drive than ever for a world peace system based on law. Because of the expansion of Germanic power already effected or now to be expected, an even greater responsibility than before rests on the people of this continent.
> The first brutal truth is that while great advances have been made towards the goal of a world peace system, and that while the world last week may well have been on the verge of embracing such a system, our leaders continue to subscribe to a concept of anarchy which actually permitted the world war of 1914, and which might well have permitted its repetition in the last few hours. The dread of a general conflagration is still with us, and will remain until an alternative to anarchy is effectively established.
> The second truth is that under the threat of naked force in the hands of an unscrupulous dictatorship heretofore recognizing no obligation whatsoever to the world community, we have been obliged to make a surrender which is almost complete, abandoning in the process a nation which stands among the staunchest defenders of liberty and democracy; we did not even give Czechoslovakia an opportunity to plead its case in any of the tribunals or assemblies created by the world for the purpose.
> A fourth truth is that the new barbarism represented by Germany may now be free to extend to the Black sea and to other continents.

Mr. Speaker, I unreservedly support the statements made by Senator Wilson, and I am convinced that no amount of arming to-day can save Canada or the world from the horrors of a war, which was only postponed last September, unless we make collective security effective in the international sphere as we have already done in our community and national life. National defence must of necessity have some relation to foreign policy, and until we know what the foreign policy of this government is, we should not be asked to vote for its defensive measures.

I come now to unemployment. In dealing with unemployment this government has failed, and failed miserably. They have done that despite anything that the Minister of Labour (Mr. Rogers) may say. What is more, the government will continue to fail as long as it continues to show no more understanding of the causes of unemployment than the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) indicated when he spoke in this debate. I was amazed to hear him make the following statement the other evening on the causes of unemployment. I quote from page 59 of Hansard:

> May I come now to the matter of unemployment. As I said a moment ago, the problem of unemployment is not a new one in this country. It became a serious problem nearly nine years ago. It was worse during the period when hon. gentlemen opposite were in office than at any time. It has continued to be a most difficult, perplexing and baffling problem —and why? For the reason that it is a world problem. . . . It is a problem with which every country in the world has been confronted in recent years,—and why? Because of the policies that are being made to prevail in certain parts of the world, those policies of economic nationalism which, instead of bringing nations closer together and permitting more and more in the way of trade, are putting countries, as I said a moment ago, into isolated compartments where their dealings with each other are narrowed down to small margins, and where, as a result of the shrinkage of trade throughout the world, there has been a consequent and inevitable shrinkage of employment as well.

To give that as a cause of unemployment is sheer nonsense. No one who has made even an elementary study of the capitalist system could agree for a moment with that explanation. It is nonsense because, as the Prime Minister himself said only a few moments earlier in his speech, unemployment had become a serious problem nine or ten years ago, when industrial, commercial and trade activities were at the highest peak in history. Let me read from the speech from the throne of 1930. The present Prime Minister in that year also was Prime Minister. In the speech from the throne as reported in Hansard, volume 1, page 2, I find this statement:

> It affords me much pleasure to greet you at the commencement of another session of parliament, and to be able to congratulate you upon the continued prosperity of the country. The year 1929 was the most productive year in the history of Canada. In industries, other than agriculture, employment reached the highest point on record; new construction was the largest known. Mining production was of unequalled value. Manufacturing production surpassed all previous records. There was vast increase in the development of hydro-electric power. The products of our fields and our herds reached higher standards of excellence and quality than at any previous time. The dominion is already recovering from the seasonal slackness evident at the end of the year, and it is not to be forgotten that the bulk of the 1929 wheat crop still remains in Canadian hands for final disposition.

Evidently the economics of 1930 do not fit in with the economics of 1939. We do not rejoice to-day when the bulk of one year's crop is waiting to be disposed of in another year. The seasonal slackness has continued into 1939 and is getting worse again. The dominion did not recover from what the Prime Minister was pleased to call seasonal slackness. Unemployment struck this country, although the Prime Minister did not say so, when he was in office, but it was severe a long time before that in Great Britain and on the continent of Europe. Indeed, unemployment had been chronic in Europe for many years previously. Economic nationalism, the term which the Prime Minister is so fond of using, had made but little progress prior to that time. But let me say that economic nationalism is not a cause of unemployment. Unemployment is a cause of economic nationalism. In 1919 the Liberal party held a national convention, and one of the planks of the platform adopted at that convention, and of course forgotten immediately afterwards, was a plank pledging unemployment insurance. That fact alone is sufficient proof that unemployment is not a new problem, is not one that has come upon us suddenly in 1930 to 1939. It is true that it has become worse during that time, but as the Minister of Labour said to-day, hundreds of people were unemployed in this dominion long before that. But as long as they were able to carry themselves from one job to another, no matter how hard the times might be, unemployment was not considered a problem; in fact it was considered a good thing, because employers could thereby get their labour power cheaper than they could if everyone were employed.

The cause of unemployment is not that there is no work to be done nor that there are no willing hands to do it. The cause of unemployment is that work cannot be done profitably, that is profitably to those who own the means of production in this and every other country. When we put our economy on a basis of use instead of profit there will be plenty of work to do, and should this work give out, unemployment will not be the curse it is to-day, it will change to leisure. To listen to the Prime Minister one would think that we were living in a static world, that the world began with Gladstone and that it will continue just as it was then, time without end. Such, however, is not the case. To-day we are living as for many years we have been, in a world economy which is dynamic in the extreme. For untold centuries man got his living without tools or with very simple tools. But about 1776 a Scotsman in Glasgow found that steam could be used to drive machinery. Later other motive powers were discovered. A new age had dawned. The old order of hand production disappeared. The simple tool became a complicated machine. Wealth undreamed of before the advent of the machine became available. This great production and accumulation of wealth, however, has not turned out to be an unmixed blessing. With the increase of wealth came an increased centralization of wealth. I have not time to enlarge on this subject, but if there are any in this house who are interested in the centralization of wealth in Canada and its effect on the social and economic life of the country I would suggest that they go to the library of parliament and get a copy of the report of the price spreads and mass buying commission. If anyone should find the price spreads and mass buying report too hard to concentrate on, he or she can find the same result, put briefly but more poetically, in the broadcast made by the Prime Minister on October 14, 1935. I referred to this paragraph of that broadcast in a speech last year, and it has been quoted in this house several times during this session. But not only am I going to quote it, I am going to analyze it. I am going to point out just what it means. The Prime Minister, speaking on that occasion, said:

> We take up at once as our supreme task the endeavour to end poverty in the midst of plenty, starvation and unnecessary suffering in a land of abundance, discontent and distress in a country more blessed by Providence than any other on the face of the globe, and gain for individual lives, and for the nation as a whole that "health and peace, and sweet content" which is the rightful heritage of all.

Let us see just what this means. The leader of the opposition (Mr. Manion), when he spoke on the address, made reference to the fact that Conservative and Liberal governments have been the governments of this country ever since confederation. The hon. gentleman may take whatever comfort he can out of that fact; but when I point out what the Prime Minister's statement means, it will not afford him much comfort. The Prime Minister said:

> We take up at once as our supreme task the endeavour to end poverty in the midst of plenty.

What does this mean? It means that in this country we have plenty and it means that we have poverty. Who has the poverty and who has the plenty? The people who have the poverty are in every instance the people who produce the plenty, and the people who have the plenty are the people who own it.

He said: "We take up as our supreme task the endeavour to end starvation and unnecessary suffering in a land of abundance." Again, I say that this indicates that in Canada we have abundance and that side by side with that we have starvation and unnecessary suffering. Who are suffering, and who are starving? Every time, those who produced the abundance. And who have the abundance? Those who own it.

Then he goes on: "to end discontent and distress in a country more blessed by providence than any other on the face of the globe." May I ask, if providence has blessed Canada more than any other country on the face of the globe, who has cursed it so that we have poverty in the midst of plenty, starvation and unnecessary suffering in the midst of abundance, and discontent and distress? Possibly the leader of the opposition, who drew attention to the fact that the Liberal party and the Conservative party have governed Canada for the seventy years since confederation, can get some comfort out of what I have read. But if they are not responsible, if they cannot accept or do not accept responsibility for the state the country finds itself in to-day, they must say that governments have nothing to do with and have no part in either making or destroying the welfare of the people. They cannot have it both ways.

Let me now touch on unemployment. The figures for fully employable persons on relief in the first ten months of 1938 show a reduction of almost twenty-five per cent from the same period of 1937. I know that the government takes credit for this reduction. However, we find that when the figures are analyzed there is not much credit due the government. They constitute a damning indictment of the whole policy or lack of policy on the subject. Taken in conjunction with the figures of dividends and interest payments, they are also a perfect illustration of the class character of our society. While the figures of employables on relief were coming down, the figures of unemployment among wage-earners were going up. January, February and March, 1938, showed an improvement over the same months of 1937, but after that every month got worse. These are the figures:

Month	Increase in unemployment among wage-earners Per cent
April	7·3
May	22·0
June	31·6
July	46·9
August	47·7
September	53·7
October	56·1

These figures are based on a report of the bureau of statistics.

I wish now to discuss for a moment a serious situation in my own city, Vancouver. In a report from the chairman of the social service committee of the city council and the director of the social service department of Vancouver, made to the city council on January 9 of this year, I find that the situation there is worse than it has been at any time since 1932 The total number on relief, that is, the total number of cases on December 31, 1932, was 11,412. This was the peak of relief in Vancouver. In the following years, there was a gradual decrease until, on December 31, 1937, the total was down to 6,011. On December 31, 1938, however, the number of cases, not counting dependents, was 9,972. The total number of persons on relief has increased from 15,553 in December, 1937, to 20,130 in December, 1938.

This shows a desperate situation. It is an irrefutable demonstration of the failure of the policies of this government in regard to unemployment relief. The situation is becoming desperate for Vancouver. So far they have been able to supply bare subsistence, food and shelter, but clothing is now becoming a matter of the greatest urgency. At present about $10,500 is spent monthly on clothing, but the director of social services has pointed out that the bulk of it goes for children's shoes, necessities for indigents, and a little for special cases of need among relief recipients. There is nothing for the great mass of the unemployed. He said it would cost between $50,000 and $60,000 a month to provide the unemployed with clothing, and the city is not able to furnish as much as that.

This is an urgent situation which the city of Vancouver cannot meet. As one alderman said when the matter was discussed, "We are killing these people morally as well as physically"; and I say we are sowing the seed that will some day spring up in a violent demonstration of discontent. This is not a situation that prevails only in Vancouver; it is general in the cities throughout Canada. I received this morning from a labour councillor on the town council of Glace Bay, Nova Scotia, the following telegram:

> Conditions among Nova Scotia workers deplorable. Rapidly becoming unbearable. Streets filled with hungry unemployed. Actual starvation among part-time workers. Miners working one or two shifts weekly. All business suffering accordingly. No prospect of improvement.

The new leader of the opposition has had something to say about third parties. It would appear he does not like third parties. He is rather contemptuous of them; they irritate him. I suppose that is natural in one holding his position; yet I doubt whether the irritation on this occasion is a bad thing for either the leader of the opposition or the Conservative party. Having no policy, no program, it gives them something to talk about. The hon. gentleman's misconceptions in regard to political parties are simply amazing. To hear him talk one would think that the way to form a political party is for a few people to get together and say they will form a new party. Let him ask the hon. member for Kootenay East (Mr. Stevens) if that is the way political parties are formed. Political parties always represent economic interests. Political parties are merely the expression of economic interests. In this country we took the names of the major parties from Great Britain at a time when the words "Conservative" and "Liberal" meant something. The Conservative party came into being as representing the economic interests of the aristocracy and landed gentry of Great Britain.

Mr. MacNICOL: And the working man.

Mr. MacINNIS: They tried for a time to make the working men believe that, but they did not succeed.

Mr. MacNICOL: I am a working man.

Mr. MacINNIS: The Liberal party came into being as representing the interests of the rising capitalist and trading classes of that time. The people who to-day form the second party in Great Britain did not even have the franchise when these things occurred. The leader of the opposition, speaking somewhere in eastern Canada, I think in Saint John, said that he thought the two-party system was good enough for Canada, and he would like the two-party system on the same basis as in Great Britain. Well, he is likely to have it that way, but his party is not likely to be one of the two.

Mr. MacNICOL: His party will be the government party.

Mr. MacINNIS: Which one goes out does not make any difference; when the interests they both represent are in jeopardy they will come together in an instant. The reason the Reconstruction party did not succeed was that there were already two Conservative parties in Canada and there was no room for a third. In the four western provinces the standing of the Conservative party and the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation is as follows:

Provincial legislatures	Conservatives	Cooperative Commonwealth Federation
British Columbia. ..	8	7
Alberta..	2	..
Saskatchewan.		11
Manitoba..	16	7
	26	25

In the dominion parliament there are for the four western provinces eight Conservatives and seven Cooperative Commonwealth Federation members. But there is this difference, that recent elections indicate the Conservatives are going and we are coming.

Mr. MacNICOL: The Conservatives going into power.

Mr. MacINNIS: Oh, the hon. member can console himself with that for a while; it will not do any harm. It is like the optimism of the Minister of Labour (Mr. Rogers) in contemplating the unemployment situation.

In the two or three minutes remaining at my disposal let me say that the hon. member for Greenwood (Mr. Massey), in referring to the proposed amendment and sub-amendment, said on Thursday last that he was supporting the amendment whole-heartedly, and then, as the hon. member for Fraser Valley (Mr. Barber) did to-day, he referred to the sub-amendment as being cleverly and adroitly designed to put the Conservatives "on the spot" as it were. I assure my hon. friends that it was not designed for any such purpose—I helped to draft it myself. It was designed to put content into the negative amendment moved by the leader of the opposition for his party. We can all agree that the Liberal party since it came into office has not done anything worth while. They have practically been, as someone said, on a sit-down strike ever since. I am surprised that the Minister of Justice (Mr. Lapointe) has not taken action against them. I could read sufficient proof from official documents, from statements of leading men in this house, that financial interests and industrial monopolists control the very life-blood of the Canadian people. And I am satisfied that no government can even pretend to do anything for the people of Canada until that government is prepared to take effective control over those things that exercise such power over the lives of the people. In every country in the world where economic improvement has been made, it has been made to the extent that governments have taken that kind of control. The hon. member for Greenwood in the summer of 1936 visited the Scandinavian countries. He spoke here in glowing terms of the graceful curves of the streamlined pigs in Denmark, produced under a social democratic government. He spoke of the wonderful things done in Sweden, yet in Sweden there is also a socialist government. The hon. member for Greenwood and the hon. member for Fraser Valley and all hon. members who are going to vote against the sub-amendment because it would mean socialism in this country are doing exactly what has been done all through the years whenever anything new was suggested. What social service have you to-day which was not branded as socialism when first suggested? Old age pensions, mothers' pensions, workmen's compensation; all these things were branded as socialism. Let me tell my hon. friends that they are going to make no progress when they go to the country if they indicate beforehand to the people that they are not going to take effective steps to control the interests that are throttling our economic life.

[Mr. MacInnis.]

At six o'clock the house took recess.

After Recess

The house resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. E. J. POOLE (Red Deer): Mr. Speaker, this being the fourth and probably the last session of the eighteenth parliament, as usual I should like to take part in this debate on the speech from the throne, or, in other words, in this verbal marathon. The speech from the throne has been dealt with, at least in part, by every hon. member who has spoken so far. I am not going to make any attempt to-night to discuss the details of that speech. Sufficient it is to say that it gives every indication that the Liberal party has abandoned its ancient faith and relegated monetary reform to the land of hoary fallacies. I do not think any government that has been elected since confederation has had a better opportunity than this one to do something during its term of office. That it has dismally failed is evident to the people of Canada, and is shown by conditions that prevail throughout this country to-day.

For a moment let us review some of the events that have occurred during the depression years. In 1930 the Liberal government was removed from office. Conditions prevailing at that time were conducive to change, and in that year there was elected a Conservative administration. The major plank in the platform of the Conservative party of that day was the abolition of unemployment. During the course of the five years during which the Conservatives held power, the Liberal party, being out of office, had a wonderful opportunity to see what effect Conservative policies had upon the economy of this dominion. However, those five years have passed into history. In 1935 the Liberals were re-elected on the cry of "King or chaos," and the promise to issue credit in terms of public need. Since then another four years have passed, and the people who placed their faith in the Liberal party once again await an opportunity to remove from office those breakers of pledges, those who have broken their promises to the Canadian people. The abolition of unemployment was also mooted by the Liberal party then aspiring to office, but the conditions that existed four years ago still exist, and they are just as acute now as they were then.

Why is this? The hon. member for Vancouver East (Mr. MacInnis), speaking just before the dinner recess, referred to the two old-line parties. Permit me to say that there is no difference between a Liberal and a Conservative, except perhaps in some slight details. Once the Liberals were known as free traders, but to-day, under a Liberal administration, we have the highest tariff wall in our history. If in the old days there was any difference between the parties, that difference might have been found in the height of the tariff wall, that and no more. Both parties endeavour to maintain the status quo. Both are traditional parties. Both are unwilling to face facts and tackle the gigantic problems that confront a government in this country. Under the old-line party philosophy the economy of Canada is based upon foreign markets. Surely it must be evident to any child in the kindergarten that international trade, as it was carried on in the days that have gone, no longer exists. We can no longer depend upon foreign trade to give us internal prosperity. It is true that we are passing through a period of rapid change. No longer are there unlimited markets to exploit; no longer is there the opportunity that once existed for the expansion of capital. The democratic nations of the world are fighting over the last great, important market, which is Great Britain. This has resulted in a great deal of criticism of the British government by the agricultural people of that country because of the low prices received for home products there, on account of competition from overseas.

Under the Conservative regime we saw the completion of the Ottawa trade agreements. We are conversant with the negotiations that were carried on between Canada and the other nations of the world, and we also know that in spite of those efforts conditions became increasingly worse. This government has now signed an agreement with the United States of America. I predict here and now that the common man of this country will obtain no benefit from that agreement.

Why do we arrive at the conclusion that international trade has broken down, that it is unscientific to base our internal economy upon it? Let us look at Europe for a moment. We find Germany expanding its economic influence throughout Europe, and as the troops march in, so do the salesmen. We turn to Italy and find that last year they had more land under cultivation for the purpose of growing wheat than at any time in their history. We turn to Japan; as the army advances into China, so they will industrialize that nation. They have already intimated that in future the China trade will belong exclusively to the Japanese.

We as a nation are dependent upon foreign markets; this government still holds out the hope, in almost every speech that comes from the opposite side of the house, that if we can only expand our trade conditions will become normal. I was surprised to hear the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) making excuses the other day for the failure of his government to improve conditions. In 1935 we had a wave of optimism. The other day in this house a responsible minister of the crown took us back to the days of 1914. He told us that conditions which prevail now prevailed then. I feel convinced that the Minister of Agriculture knows differently. He knows that there has been considerable technological progress since 1914. He knows that the markets of the world have contracted. He knows that the world is to-day more heavily industrialized than it was then. Still they tell us, or at least, imply, that because we regained some strength and recovered somewhat from that economic epileptic fit, we shall also recover from this one.

I want to place on Hansard a timely article which appeared in the Western Producer in 1937. What was said then is more true to-day as the evidence comes more before us. I quote:

> There are still those, and many of them, who believe that the good old days will again return. The good old days that is, of flourishing trade, with its favourable balances and accompanying large-scale foreign lending. How any such delusion can be nursed by intelligent observers, in view of the facts as they exist to-day, is difficult to understand.
> What are the facts? One has only to read the papers. Take for the present purpose, agricultural products, which are much more difficult to develop and increase than manufactured articles. Over the past decade the increase in production of foodstuffs in hitherto importing countries is there for all to see. Only the other day it was announced that Italy, to meet a wheat shortage, had undertaken the greatest sowing in her history. She did that rather than buy the Canadian or any other surplus. That is merely a spectacular and recent instance. The same thing is going on in every country in Europe. There is a steady and persistent effort in each nation, and in the case of all products, agricultural and industrial, to reach as nearly as conditions permit and as soon as possible a state of economic self-sufficiency.

Canada along with other democratic countries is slowly but surely going to be drawn into that orbit of economic nationalism. Many people in this dominion are losing respect for parliament, the reason being that in spite of criticism of dictator nations they see that at least those countries can show more common sense results than we can. To-day in Germany there are only 280,000 or thereabouts unemployed, whereas in 1932 there were 6,500,000. They are producing more to-day than at any time in the history of that nation. There is an acute shortage of labour in most trades. They are making inroads into markets that at one time were almost exclusively British.

I have a high regard for a government that keeps its promises to its people. Democracy is a wonderful ideal, but it is unfortunate that it has never been tried in Canada. Our people have the right to vote, but they have never yet had the right to get the thing they voted for. In 1935 the people of this country voted for monetary reform. They sent the Liberal party here to issue credit in terms of public need. The public were not in any position to go into the technical details of how these things were to be brought about; that does not matter, but they did instruct parliament to bring about that condition. It seems that once a party gets into power it does not matter any more if it fails in its promises. After failing to solve these problems over a period of four years, this government is now endeavouring to divert the attention of the people from the thing they really want to something else.

A new cry has arisen, the cry of national unity. It is on this question that I want to say a few words. National unity! It is a great thought; it is a great ambition, but you cannot build national unity with lip-service. The farmers of the west have been accused of desiring secession. Who can blame them in view of the volume of evidence we have that the west is not getting a square deal? What privileges has western Canada in the eastern market? Where does the east buy its coal? Where does the east buy its oil and gasoline? In the constituency I represent there are many unemployed miners and there are many others who would be better unemployed because they are employed only one day per week. This state of affairs has continued over a period of four years. We ship into Ontario and Quebec coal from Pennsylvania and from Great Britain; in other years coal has been shipped in from Germany and Russia, but when it comes to western coal there is no market.

The same applies to oil. We have in western Canada possibly one of the best oil fields on this continent; yet we have a proration below thirty per cent. What inducement is there for western Canada to continue under the power of this government? Oil is shipped in from Peru and from the United States, but western oil can stay in the ground and the oil workers can continue to swell the relief ranks. It is from the east that you hear this cry of national unity. Let us have national unity by all means, but let it be composed of economic cooperation and common sense. Let us realize first of all that charity begins at home. If we have anything to buy, let us buy it from our own people and employ our own workmen. This question of national unity has been discussed many times in the house, and I have heard many after dinner speeches and read many reports in the press on the same subject; but I wonder if the people of Canada know just how much it costs the people of the west to be a member of this confederation.

Let us for a moment consider freight rates. Do you know, Mr. Speaker, that it is an impossibility for the people of western Canada to industrialize that part of the country? Do you know that there has been a discrimination against the west through the tariff structure, over a long period of years? Do you know that a commission was set up in 1922 to investigate these questions? But since that time nothing has been done about the matter. The people of the west are a positive people. They like positive action. We are tired of listening to maudlin sentimentality about national unity in the face of the facts as they present themselves to us in our daily lives out there. Everything we buy we buy from eastern Canada, while eastern Canada purchases nothing from us—nothing. Even in the recent trade agreement with the United States we have been deprived of the preference we had for our Canadian wheat in the British market. It seems as if the west were used simply as a pawn in the game of trade negotiations. On the subject of trade agreements I should like to make this point, that I do not see what hope there is of any government making a satisfactory trade agreement unless the people who are to be affected by it are represented in the negotiations. There should be a board set up representing each and every province, and before the negotiations are completed the views of this board should be sought so that the people of the west would know whether, when the agreement was completed, it would be in the interest of Canada as a whole, and not simply in the interest of eastern Canada.

Let me go back for a moment to the question of wheat and the future of the west. Premier Bracken, speaking quite recently, was quite pessimistic with regard to the future of the west, and no one can blame him. At the present time we have a minimum price of eighty cents a bushel for our wheat, but we also have the greatest world's carry-over of wheat since 1932, and with even a normal crop next year the price of wheat in the markets of the world will fall. There are those who say: Well, the United States government is purchasing wheat and taking it off the market. But so long as we are living under a system of cannibalistic competition which we describe as the law of supply and demand, the very fact that this large carry-over of wheat is in existence makes it, no matter who holds it, a drug upon the markets of the world, and the question I should like to ask this government or any member of it is this: What is our policy in view of the conditions which I have briefly outlined? The Liberal party has already discarded the major plank in its platform, monetary reform, and the evidence of contracting markets is before us for all the world to see; yet we continue to operate under a system that makes the country depend upon external markets for its internal prosperity. I notice, Mr. Speaker, that the members to your right are conspicuous by their silence just now. It is no use going to the country and asking the people to return you to power because you believe in national unity. However well that story might go in some parts of Canada, it will never go in the west because we are tired of talk; we are looking for action.

One other thing I would urge, Mr. Speaker, is that there should be a change in parliamentary practice. I do not think a government should be subject to defeat simply because a majority of its own supporters have voted against a measure which the government has introduced into the house. Such a practice makes members vote against their principles. It makes the party supreme over the nation. It means that men will vote to support their party while at the same time voting against their conscience. That has been evidenced in every session here. If that practice were changed, and the government were not to be considered defeated because of the defeat of some measure which it had introduced, the government's supporters could vote according to their conscience, and then we should have some really honest legislation.

We are on the verge of war; it is almost upon us. It is astounding to me that maybe in a few short weeks those in this country who have received the least attention, those who have been considered as units and dealt with as units rather than human beings, will for the first time in possibly nine years wear a suit or uniform. I venture to say, when that day comes, the question of where the money is to come from will never be raised in this house, because a national crisis will be upon us, and there will be no dispute; every member will join in raising the money. For the last nine years we have had an enemy within, that greatest of all enemies, that great demoralizer of the human family—poverty. But poverty was not looked upon as a major crisis that money must be found for. No; men could rot in the bread lines of this country; men could walk the streets; the very temper of a man's soul could be destroyed. While we all expressed sympathy for him, it was too bad but we simply had no money for him.

Democracy has passed away in many nations. In Canada democracy has not yet come. We have had a dictatorship masquerading under the name of democracy. We have elected parliaments which did not have the power to do anything when they got into power. They were made up of men who were ambitious for themselves; others of them did not seem to care, and those who did must have left this house at the end of every session despairing that anything of a really concrete nature would ever be done. In this country we are not twenty years from an open dictatorship. Nothing will kill the chances of a democracy faster than hypocrisy. The government must be honest with the people. Either it must give them monetary reform, or it should tell them, "We have no intention of putting in monetary reform." Let the people know exactly where they stand, and let them judge.

In the last nine years we have been destroying rapidly the greatest asset this nation has, the joy of life in the hearts of men and women. There are men twenty-nine years of age who left school in, say 1928, who have never yet had a job. To-day we are training men in training centres who will never have an opportunity to embark upon a career. We have provided no places where they can be absorbed. I have asked this government many times in the last two or three years what percentage of its supporters in the house have paid a visit to these camps, soup-kitchens and relief offices. I venture to say that ninety-five per cent of the government's supporters never saw the inside of any of these places and have never bothered to find out the conditions under which people are living. If one must be a legislator, to do the best by the people it is necessary to be conversant with the conditions under which the people are living. To live here until the end of the session, to wait until parliament is prorogued, or dissolved, and then just wait until the next session rolls around, is not being a legislator. At my home in the west an average of ten farmers a day come to me with their problems, problems of debt, and I have no option but to tell them that nothing can be done about the matter. Their debt condition is such that they will never in this world pay what they owe. Those who once were the proud owners of land are in a worse position than the tenant farmers of feudal times in England; they have the responsibilities but not the fruits of ownership. They are responsible for the debts which have been shackled upon them, while we just sit here and wait. A chap said to me the other day, "What is the Liberal party doing down there?" I said, "As far as I can see, they are just waiting for Santa Claus—for something to happen."

Is there any indication in the speech from the throne at this fourth session of the eighteenth parliament that the government is going to do anything? Is there any real release from the anguish which the youth of this country have suffered in the last nine years? Or, as has happened before, is it expected that the Canadian people, assuming they do not support the Liberal party, will turn back to the Conservative party? What a hopeless mess is this thing we describe as a democracy! Unless we discard our traditional way of trade as a way of life; unless we face the facts of superabundance; unless we practise the altruistic principle of economic security, commensurate with our intellectual, physical, spiritual and material resources; unless we coordinate our energies and loyalties for the common good of Canada, democratic and economic freedom will pass into that isolation and solitude aptly described as oblivion.

When I came into this chamber to-night it was most difficult to get a quorum. At other times I have listened to speakers here when the house was almost empty. I have heard men laugh when I described the poverty of the people—the laughter of members of this parliament who were sent here with a sacred mandate to legislate the people out of poverty. Did they succeed? If not, why? Now, in the dying days of the eighteenth parliament, we are going to divert attention by raising a new standard, the standard of national unity. Well, when government supporters come to the western country, at least to the part where I live, that will not be good enough. The people who elected them gave them a job to do when they first came to Ottawa, namely to issue credit in terms of public need. For four years the group to which I belong has endeavoured honestly to place before parliament a monetary system which would lift us beyond the realm of poverty. The only criticism which came from the opposition was, "it is inflation." They never gave us any evidence of it; they discarded all ideas of a discount rate, just prices, and the like. Yet we find that under a dictatorship in Germany they are operating with money, labour money issued on the ability of the people to labour.

The effects of this iniquitous and cruel monetary system are that it is driving the people of this country to distraction. I know that so far as the farmer is concerned he has abandoned hope. Men who purchased land when the price was high and bought implements at exorbitant prices are to-day being squeezed dry by mortgage and implement companies which demand not only their pound of flesh, but blood also; they must have interest, and compound interest. To these exploiters this government has been genuflecting for years. You cannot have on the one hand unlimited exploitation and on the other prosperity for all; the two do not work together.

I do not accuse members of the Liberal party of being less desirous than I am of doing something for this country, but one thing we must do is to find the source of campaign funds for the old-line parties. We must find out where these thousands of dollars come from. There is a suspicion that they come from big industry, and big industry has never been known to give anything unless it got twice as much in return. Parliament must be free, unfettered and courageous, depending upon no outside interests. When a member steps into this chamber, it is to legislate in the interests of the people, not of groups and individuals.

So there are two things which I have brought to the attention of the house to-night. One is that we should change our practice in this house of defeating a government whenever a government measure is defeated. I think we should replace that practice with a method whereby a government might lose on a measure introduced in the house and still retain office. This would give an opportunity for members on the government benches to oppose according to their conscience. The other is this: We must find some method of financing elections in Canada without depending upon big business interests. These are two things that must be done in order to remove some of the debris that stands in the way of progress.

Mr. SPEAKER: I am sorry to interrupt the hon. member, but his time is up.

Mr. POOLE: With the permission of the house I should like to finish the sentence.

Mr. SPEAKER: By unanimous consent of the house.

Mr. POOLE: In all kindness to the government I would say that we must concentrate our attention and energies on the internal problems of the country, because that is where the solution lies; for if we continually depend upon export markets as the measure of internal prosperity, this will lead us only into chaos and as a nation eventually into oblivion.

Mr. RALPH MAYBANK (Winnipeg South Centre): I have just listened to the hon. member for Red Deer (Mr. Poole) speaking as though he thought that from time to time, and I inferred from the way he spoke that he believed it occurred quite often, there was a violation of the dictates of conscience on the part of those of us who support the government. I do not know for how many I speak, but I think I speak for most when I say that I have not at any time been conscious of outraging my conscience when I have desired to support the government, and I have never supported the government unless I have desired to. Since coming to this house I have always felt that I could criticize this government—and in one or two respects I propose to do so to-night—with complete freedom. I may assure the hon. gentleman that whenever I believe the policies of this government are sufficiently far off the track to fail to enlist my support, I shall be voting against them, just as he will. He may be voting against them because it is the usual thing for him to do, and it may be that we sometimes support the government when we are not wholly in accord with them because the particular matter involved may not be sufficiently important to justify us in disagreeing. But the hon. gentleman need not worry about the virtues of those who support the government. By and large he will find that those members on this side of the house, or on the other, supporting the government, are just about as virtuous as are members within the social credit party. It is an entire mistake for anyone to get the idea that in his party there is a monopoly of virtue.

I had wished that my first words this evening should be words of congratulation to the two ministers of whose appointment we were advised this afternoon. I desire to convey my very hearty congratulations to the hon. member for Essex West (Mr. McLarty) and to the hon. member who has until a short time ago been my neighbour over here, the hon. member for Edmonton West (Mr. MacKinnon). I am glad that we knew these gentlemen before they were elevated because naturally it is a little easier to get to know a fellow when he is a back-bencher like yourself than it is to get to know a man when you meet him for the first time in the exalted position of a minister of the crown. We feel with reference to these two gentlemen that for at least six or eight months we can meet them on almost the same terms as heretofore.

This section of the house has been referred to as the "rump"—these thirty-eight or thirty-nine or forty seats on the immediate left of the speaker. It was my roommate, the hon. member for Portage la Prairie (Mr. Leader), who so denominated this Liberal section of the house. I may be wrong, but if it was not he, it was some other good farmer or butcher who knew that the best part of the meat is to be found on or near the rump. That is why he gave that name to this particular section. The Prime Minister (Mr.

Mackenzie King) is not in his place at the moment, but I wish to suggest to him through the pages of Hansard that he made a mistake in naming the hon. member for Edmonton West minister without portfolio; that hon. gentleman should have been designated Minister of the Rump. At any rate, although we lose him from this section of the house we are certainly all gratified at his elevation. I need not say that we are also pleased that the hon. member for Essex West has been similarly elevated.

I want in particular to speak to-night on the subject of employment and unemployment, but before doing so I wish to make a suggestion with relation to the royal visit. I must confess, at the outset, the suggestion is not entirely my own, and later I shall tell exactly where it came from. Ever since the accession of Victoria the Good, the British Empire has been blessed, I believe, with a royal family that has been preeminent among all the good monarchs of the world, and I think the virtues of the Victorian succession have been particularly well exemplified at all times by our present king and queen. It seems to me that the outstanding quality of this reigning house and of our present king and queen has been a thoughtfulness, a regard, and an affection for the common folk of the empire, and therefore I wish to make this suggestion—in fact I urge it most strongly—that at some time during this Canadian visit we try to give to their majesties that kind of pleasure which would go direct to their hearts. I suggest that we try to arrange that they visit some of the humbler homes in the country. For example, suppose we could arrange in Winnipeg—and that would be a very appropriate place—a visit to the home of someone among the humbler people of the community, the home of some man in the medium income brackets, a man receiving, say $100 a month, a man in whose home there are children, and whose wife does her own housekeeping. How excellent it would be if their majesties could visit a home of that sort and could have tea, or lunch, there. It does seem to me that it would give them an opportunity to become acquainted with the real Canadian people. They would in that way get to know more about the Canadian people than they could ever learn by all the garden parties, state receptions, soirees and that sort of thing that might be arranged.

Now I said that the idea did not originate with me. As a matter of fact a member of the press gallery came to me and made the suggestion, told me it was the idea of his own paper. And that paper, the Winnipeg Free Press, carries a story to-day advocating such a visit. I know that if this government would indicate consonance with the plan, the Manitoba committee would arrange the details as far as the city of Winnipeg is concerned, and I believe that committees in other provinces would act in a similar fashion. We have noticed in the papers from time to time accounts of such visits in the old country by royalty, and we know that nothing has endeared them to the hearts of the people more than their activities in that regard. It seems to me that visits of that kind would be entirely in keeping with the desire of their majesties.

I desire mainly to speak now upon the subject of employment. At once I wish to turn my attention towards a point that was raised by the leader of the opposition (Mr. Manion) in his speech and another point which arises from what he has written in his book. The leader of the opposition lamented in this house that his party had been attacked here and had been thrown out of power by reason of the fact that they did not cure unemployment. But the hon. gentleman is in error in such a statement. It was not because they did not cure unemployment that they were attacked, but because they had promised to cure unemployment, and not merely failed to do so, but aggravated the condition. If they had not promised themselves into office, they might not have been thrown out so hard. I would also draw his attention to another error which is properly chargeable to him, in this case an error of omission. It does not refer to what he said in this house but to what he wrote in his autobiography. He was giving certain reasons for the defeat of the Conservative party; prominent among them was the action he charged against the hon. member for Kootenay East (Mr. Stevens). But he failed to indicate one of the chief and very cogent reasons, one peculiarly related to himself. He was Minister of Railways during those five years, and during those years the Canadian National Railways were systematically sabotaged. The people of this country feared amalgamation. He undertook to amalgamate the telegraph lines and the express business, and it was naturally felt that this was a forerunner of complete amalgamation.

Mr. MANION: I just wish to contradict that statement, without going into details at this moment.

Mr. MAYBANK: I might draw to the hon. gentleman's attention that I do not think he had any right to rise and contradict me in that fashion. If anything is said which is clearly an error of fact in some definite way, he may perhaps have the right to rise and contradict it. But to rise and make little short speeches of that sort, surely he has no right to do. I have a right to draw an inference from his conduct. I draw the inference from his conduct as Minister of Railways that the systematic sabotaging of the railway that went on during those years was largely attributable to him.

Mr. MANION: That statement is absolutely untrue. There was no sabotaging of the Canadian National Railways at any time.

Mr. MAYBANK: It was sabotaged from the day the late government came into office until the day it went out.

Mr. MANION: That is not true.

Mr. MAYBANK: It is absolutely true. I do not say that the hon. gentleman went out and took up the rails and carried them home. I do not say that he himself told the railway people not to go out and look for business. But from the moment he took over that portfolio the manner of carrying on the business of the railroad was changed. We know that the men who were working for the railway during those five years were trembling every day that he went to his office as Minister of Railways. Certainly what I said in regard to telegraph and express business is true, and in the light of that it is a reasonable inference to draw that this was the first step towards complete amalgamation. If he was not responsible for it I should like to know who was; he was Minister of Railways and stayed with the government which was doing it. A few days ago he attempted to indicate to us that we ought to know what went on in the council at that time, meaning to hint that he did not agree with that policy. We have no record of that sort. I say that when he undertakes to revise his book he had better say that one of the chief reasons for the defeat of the Conservative party was his handling of the railway during that five years.

Mr. MANION: That is a misrepresentation.

Mr. MAYBANK: I object for two reasons: the first, a point of order, and the second, that the hon. gentleman is unparliamentary in his language. I know there is not much more chance of stopping him jumping up like that than there is of preventing the soda from coming out of the bottle too quickly when you shake the bottle, so I suppose I can do nothing more than register my objection. I again respectfully suggest to the hon. gentleman that if and when he revises his book he should insert the statement that one of the chief causes of the defeat of the Conservative party was his own handling of the railway question while Minister of Railways, because unquestionably that did contribute very greatly to their defeat.

I am not going to imitate the hon. gentleman in failing to take notice of anything which may be unpleasant. I do not for a moment suggest that conditions in the country are all as they ought to be. Frankly, I think my own party has been in some measure to blame. I think it is to blame as far as it has imitated Conservative methods in the handling of this employment and unemployment question. I am going to say what I think at any time, without either fear or hope of favour.

But it is idle for the hon. gentleman to suggest that conditions have not improved since the time he left office. Instead of peonage in labour camps we have at least managed to put some 20,000 of the younger men happily out on farms. We have somewhere in the neighbourhood of 35,000 who have been helped by the youth training policies. The general trade policies of this government have resulted in increased employment, whereas the economic nationalism of the hon. gentleman's party led directly to unemployment. Millions of dollars have been supplied to municipalities for work which they can undertake. The construction industry has undoubtedly been stimulated by the housing act, to the amount of about $28,500,000. When the former government was guiding the country's affairs we had nothing of that sort. True, an act was passed, but no machinery was set up for it to work. The home improvement plan was a simple and effective way of aiding the construction industry, and some $25,000,000 has been spent under that to aid employment. The former administration, it would appear, was more in favour of passing nugatory and invalid labour legislation which never did march and probably never was intended to.

Again, I do not think the late government was criticized so much for not having accurate records. Rather the criticism was that it had almost no records at all. Consequently it followed a hit-or-miss policy with respect to unemployment and employment; it was a hit-and-miss policy in the beginning, a hit-and-miss policy in the middle of its term and a hit-and-miss policy until the very end. But we did find that there were in the neighbourhood of a million on relief in the September following our return to power, and it was more than that when we started. By September of last year that figure had been reduced to a little more than half a million.

Urban unemployment, at the time the count was first made, was about 700,000, while two years later it was reduced to 444,000.

Many other comparisons could be made, all to the disadvantage of the administration of which the hon. gentleman was a member. I am not at all satisfied with present conditions, but I think the hon. gentleman does himself less than justice by merely gibing and jeering, and suggesting that there has been no improvement since we started to drag ourselves out of the hole into which they got us.

I am going to state seven propositions by means of which I think the government could improve the situation at the present time. In the first place I think the federal government should assume a bigger share of the relief needs of this country. This afternoon I heard the Minister of Labour (Mr. Rogers) indicate that a greater share would be assumed, and he fixed that share at forty per cent, which would leave forty per cent to the provincial government and twenty per cent to the municipality. I might as well say at once that I do not think that is adequate. I think it might have been adequate if it had been done in 1930, but now, in 1939, it comes after the municipalities have become pretty well bankrupt. And I do not think it is fair to place a burden of twenty per cent of the cost, plus administration costs, upon the municipalities which can raise money only by direct taxation, almost entirely upon real estate. As a matter of fact, in the past many municipaliites have had to pay from thirty to fifty per cent of the total relief costs. I still think the central government, which has an unlimited field of taxation, should assume a larger share. I should point out, however, that I realize that when this government assumes forty per cent of the cost it will be an improvement.

In the second place I should like to suggest that this government institute and do everything that can be done to make effective a policy of no relief without work. I believe that can be done to a very considerable extent. We should give work, not a dole. If that cannot be accomplished one hundred per cent, let us get as near to it as we can. Certain plans that have been put into operation in Manitoba point the way. Men have been working for their relief out there, and they have been allowed to work one-eighth more than the extent required for their relief. Just in passing I might say that the men on relief came out and did that work willingly. I am not suggesting that it should be done in exactly that way, because that is payment in kind instead of in money, and I am not in favour of that at all. I think a man who works should be paid in money and not in hand-outs of food. I believe we could have people work to the extent of their relief plus 25 per cent, and the same could be extended to the men who are not on relief but may be near to it. At the present time we spend a million dollars for relief and get nothing for it. We could spend a million and a quarter and get value for that amount of money.

Another point I should like to make is that if work is to be done in order to relieve unemployment, it should be done where that condition exists, not in some remote place. When you undertake public works, presumably in order to relieve unemployment, and carry them out where there is no unemployment situation, it savours too much of pork-barrel spending. In saying this, I do not mean to criticize the building of mining roads, for example; on the contrary, I believe they are excellent projects which will create much future employment, and which indeed have justified themselves already in that regard. Nor do I mean that I am at all critical of tourist roads, if they are properly designed and located. That leads me to say this, that we as a federal government should get ahead with the cross-country road. That should be carried on as a national undertaking. Some person may object that there is some difficulty about the route; that Ontario has not made up its mind. There is one way to cure that, I suggest; that is, to make the announcement that the road will be built. Before morning the route will be indicated.

Then I think much more should be done in the way of youth training. I do not intend to speak at length upon that subject, but will reserve what I have to say until some time later, when the minister is dealing directly with that matter. I should like to say, however, that after examining the various camps and training projects in which I found the youth of Manitoba, I believe a great deal can be done in the way of employing youth, at any rate sufficiently to keep up their morale in these times.

Finally I should like to say that I believe every effort should be put forth at this time in connection with the rehabilitation or reclamation of those who have been idle for a long time. I believe we should devote time, thought, energy and money to the reclamation of men who have been idle for many years. Idleness undoubtedly has ruined many, and many more are on the verge of being ruined, but it is not too late to save them. If the ordinary dictates of humanity would not impel us to do that, then the idea of saving money ought to turn us to the task. I say that for this reason. Every individual, who through idleness has become a particle of what has been termed the "hard core of unemployment," if he is not dislodged from that formation becomes a constant threat to the balancing of budgets, either civic, provincial or federal. It will cost some money to effect an improvement in morale to-day. It will cost more money to effect that reclamation tomorrow and still more money the next day. Before long it will be too late. Then the individual will become a charge on the community or the province or the federal government for the rest of his life. So, if we would not institute some special plan with respect to people of this type solely because of the good that might be done, we ought to do it because we would save money by doing so now. The poet has spoken of man's inhumanity to man, but I would put it in this way: If "man's humanity to man" will not compel us to do this sort of thing, then let the dollar be the urge. We shall be well repaid for every person whose morale can be restored in this manner.

Mr. D. G. ROSS (St. Paul's): Mr. Speaker, I wish to congratulate the hon. member for Brandon (Mr. Matthews) and the hon. member for Stormont (Mr. Chevrier) upon the splendid way in which they moved and seconded the address in reply to the speech from the throne. They both did themselves great credit. I should like also to congratulate the hon. member for Essex West (Mr. McLarty) and the hon. member for Edmonton West (Mr. MacKinnon) upon their promotion to the privy council.

I was very much interested just now in listening to what the hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre (Mr. Maybank) had to say. He said he was not at all satisfied. I would remind him that there are probably thousands of Liberals throughout the country who feel as he does. The Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) said that he was master of the ship of state, that he could not leave the helm, that he must stay there all the time to guide the ship through the stormy waters. The stormy waters have all but sunk the ship, but the trouble is that since 1935 it has not left the dock. The ship has been laid up at the dock and we have been paying wharfage fees. Wharfage fees for three years cost a lot of money. This is our money; this is the public's money. I do not think the Prime Minister had the courage to embark, but there is a pilot available who will launch the ship of state on these stormy waters. He is ready and he is willing. He is courageous. His record shows his courage, and he has ability as a soldier, statesman and parliamentarian. He is full of kindness and understanding and is just the man for the ship. We are all proud to sit behind the hon. leader of the opposition (Mr. Manion). He showed his courage in 1914, and he again showed his courage in 1938 by offering his services to his country which had been so devastated during the last four years by the government in power. Canada is very fortunate in having a man of his calibre and ability.

The announcement that Their Majesties, King George VI and Queen Elizabeth, had decided to visit Canada was greeted by all in my riding with a deep sense of gratitude and satisfaction of what they consider a recognition of the loyalty and affection which they hold for their majesties. Our only regret is that their majesties' visit will be all too short. I know they will receive a rousing and royal welcome from all, even from those who through no fault of their own are struggling against privation and, in some instances, starvation and destitution because of lack of work. How much better it would have been if their majesties had been able to look into the faces of happy throngs of people filled with that contentment which comes from a good day's work well done and well rewarded. This might have been possible if we had had the leadership and the virile and vigorous action which we were promised at the last election. There are no more loyal citizens of the Dominion of Canada than the people to be found in the riding of St. Paul's. Despite the inertia and ineptitude of this government their majesties will receive a royal and hearty welcome in my riding.

Three and one-half years ago we listened to a speech by the newly elected Prime Minister in which he said:

> . . . unemployment is Canada's most urgent national problem. It is an endorsation of the Liberal proposal to deal with this question by means of a representative national commission, and by policies which will serve to revive industries and trade.

A representative national commission was set up by the Prime Minister. Through it we found out precisely what we knew before. We all knew that there was a maladjustment of labour in Canada. It did not find out what that was or what the interdependency of labour in this country was. It collected figures and dealt with decimals and percentages. At the present time those rows of figures are in the waste-paper basket. Its reports have been pigeonholed and its findings are now covered with cobwebs; gone into inertia like the present government. The adding machines, the calculating machines, the desks, the furniture and the permanent personnel are scattered and gone with the wind. That commission did not put men in jobs. Unemployment remains. The commission has now been disbanded. The government are not dealing with unemployment as they promised to do, through a commission. They are not dealing with Canada's most urgent problem. As a result of the work of the commission we can now find out every month or so how many people are on relief, but we cannot find out how many workmen are unemployed. The newly elected Prime Minister in his dedication speech said:

> In the new era which dawns to-day the struggle for the rights of the people will, in the realm of economic liberty and security, be carried on as never before.

The people now regret that new era. Where is the economic liberty and security? The people still must depend upon the government for subsistence or continue to tremble at the insecurity of their jobs. The Prime Minister said further:

> Poverty and adversity, want and misery, are the enemies which Liberals, will seek to banish from the land. They have lain in wait at the gate of every Canadian home during the past five years, and their menacing mien has served to destroy the souls as well as the minds and bodies of an ever-increasing number of men, women and children in our land. We take up at once as our supreme task, the endeavour to end poverty in the midst of plenty, starvation and unnecessary suffering in a land of abundance.

After three and a half years, poverty, want, adversity and misery still lie in wait at the gate of the home of every Canadian workman. We still have poverty in the midst of plenty. We still find starvation and unnecessary suffering. Where are the opportunities for work which were to be provided? There have never been as many unemployed since 1935 walking the streets looking for jobs. The Prime Minister said:

> We take up at once as our supreme task, the endeavour to end poverty.

They took up the shovel and they are still working hard leaning on it. I was not surprised at the rosy picture painted by the Minister of Labour (Mr. Rogers). He had to do it. It was good government propaganda, but the public know better. However, he gave himself plenty of praise and gave the government of which he is a member a big hand. They do nothing, but they can give a good talk.

The direct relief figures for Toronto show that in the month of December, 1938, there were 66,519 individuals on relief, an increase of 4,642 over 1937. The 1937 relief costs for that city amounted to $7,194,954. In 1938 these costs had increased by $329,559 to $7,524,513. The cost to the city increased from $2,400,000 in 1937 to $2,575,000 in 1938, an increase of $165,000. These figures include administration. This amounts to 2·63 mills on the assessment. What a terrible burden to be saddled on the taxpayers of Toronto! But worse still. What a horrible situation we have when we think of 66,500 of our people receiving hardly enough for a bare existence! These people receive, on an average, $10 a month to take care of their entire living consisting of fuel, rent, light and so on. Just think of it! In December there were 66,500 of our people in Toronto receiving relief. These people do not want relief; they want work. Less than five per cent of them are unemployable. There are more people legitimately on relief to-day in Toronto than there were in 1935. I wonder if hon. members have ever tried to exist on $10 a month. Mr. Speaker, these people, who can work and will work, are entitled to the receipt of a larger monthly sum than $10.

What has the government done to take care of this situation? There have been a few relief works started where men have to go day after day on the chance of getting a few days' work, and applicants for these jobs, I might say, are pretty carefully scanned for their political colour. It is true that there is an opportunity through government loans and housing, but with high taxes and the high assessments which are necessary in Toronto there is no incentive to erect new buildings because there is no return for the investor. The down-town district of that city is becoming a section of isolated buildings surrounded by parking lots, as a result of tearing down buildings because the owners cannot afford to pay the taxes on them. What a terrible situation, this destruction of property! General unemployment in industry in Toronto is to a great extent responsible for the high taxes. Low wages, part-time wages and unemployment are responsible for the arrears of taxes. The corporation of the city of Toronto owns some eight miles of streets with their houses on both sides, the buildings having been taken over for non-payment of taxes. There is little revenue in Toronto from this type of property; in fact, property is a liability.

The speech from the throne says:

> My ministers recognize that the plight of those who are still unemployed cannot await necessary constitutional amendments, nor the summoning of any conference.

And the government proposes to expand its long range program of public undertakings. I suppose, Mr. Speaker, by this time the government has become thoroughly hardened to this chronic state of industrial unemployment.

In Toronto over 66,000 of our people are on relief, and I venture to say that another 60,000 are working only part time—66,000 represents ten per cent of our population, and with another 60,000, on part time, that accounts for twenty per cent of our population in Toronto. How ridiculous, then, it is to talk about a long range program—a long range program, mark you—after three and a half years of poverty, and with adversity, want and misery still before the gate of every Canadian home! This do-nothing government, with its long range program, is trying to shoot at the problem from a distance. Why not come close to the horrible spectre and grapple with it?

Let me quote from a letter just received from the principal of the Jesse Ketchum school in Toronto, which has turned out some of our finest Canadian citizens in the past one hundred years. He says:

> Recent graduates have been quite up to usual standards, but have been forced to step out into conditions which this country has never before inflicted on its youth.

He says he has never seen conditions worse in this country within his memory. He goes on:

> Few opportunities afford a living wage, and idleness is enforced particularly upon those of lower educational equipment. In the years of idleness the mental, moral and physical standards of that youth drop to such an extent that the nation's chief asset often becomes a liability.

He continues:

> I am writing you now because in the last month four boys from fair homes near here have been arrested for petty theft, victims of circumstances for which we citizens are responsible.

I am inclined to agree with him that a great many of our citizens are responsible because they elected this do-nothing government. He goes on to say:

> This situation is not merely local but is general to the whole city and to the whole of Canada. The citizen of all ranks is quite aware of it and wants immediate remedy not only for the sake of our valuable youth, but to protect society and to avoid the terrible future cost of indifference.

And yet we are told of a proposed long range program of public undertakings! He says further:

> We have no right to discriminate against youth as in our present thoughtlessly begotten relief system. We now cut youth off relief, mothers' allowance and pension at sixteen years, and do not again afford relief till marriage. We spend millions on relief for all except youth, in a most questionable and many think a demoralizing method. We discriminate against youth at the worst possible time in life.
> The youth leaving school with high ideals for the future, finding himself in an indifferent society, becomes hostile to that society. We to whom this country afforded such rare opportunity in our youth cannot blame him for the loss of morals.

He continues:

> The federal government has, we believe, devoted $1,000,000 in the form of so-called vocational classes of education. In cooperation with the province of Ontario there is a class in a Toronto garage where some thirty boys are paid seven dollars per week to take a course in welding, and in Galt there is a class of less than thirty taking a machine shop course.
> As a result of ten years' experience with this problem, no matter how smug we may be, this is a contemptible showing.

Something must be done, Mr. Speaker, to occupy these boys and girls who are coming out of school, and done, not in two or three years, or in two or three months, but done now.

I am sure there are dozens of other principals of schools such as the Jesse Ketchum school in Toronto who could tell a similar story. A long range program may be all right for some purposes, but something must be done now. A long range program! How typical of this do-nothing government throughout its three and a half years of inaction!

Let me quote from the Toronto Globe and Mail of January 20 of this year:

> Mr. Neeland, deputy provincial secretary, in commenting on the jump in crime stated that, "the number of prison sentences in Ontario would reach a new high—higher than the previous record of 21,421 in 1930."
> Chief Constable Draper, head of the prisoners' rehabilitation society, could not be reached for comment. But in his 1937 police report, in commenting on the increase of crime among the younger-aged groups, he said: "Improper understanding of the value of discipline, and failure on the part of responsible adults to administer it in an effective manner and at the proper time, breed a lack of regard for authority and obedience in child life which ultimately leads to crime and incorrigibility."

It was just running through my head whether the parental negligence of the Prime Minister had anything to do with the unhappy state of the Liberal family from coast to coast. I agree with Chief Constable Draper that the reason he cites is one of the reasons, but how can you expect parents who day after day have been trudging the streets in an effort to obtain work, with all the worries they have on their shoulders, to begin to pay the proper attention to their children? Again, Mr. Speaker, how can you expect children, who have been brought up in the surroundings of bitterness caused by the failure of the parent to obtain work and the loss of self-respect through having to accept relief, to have a right outlook on life?

And remember, this is the plight of over fourteen thousand families in Toronto. There is an emergency, Mr. Speaker, and something has to be done. Talking is no good. Action is required.

The principal of the Jesse Ketchum school makes this suggestion:

> But there is one field in which our youth could be developed, which is inexpensive, has no waste, has no conflict with labour and which is the most effective way of meeting the greatest dangers of our present apathy. It can be applied immediately right across this country, already provided with facilities inviting our use. The field of discipline, physical, mental and moral health training for good citizenship stands preeminent.
> We could easily open our armouries by day, and use instructors supplied by the Militia department, corps of commissaires, and others, to give these lads at least a six weeks' course of well disciplined physical training to send them out well set up, healthier, alert in mind, body and spirit, to be much more readily welcomed in any line of industry that may open, and in society itself.
> These lads could be paid one dollar per day to feed themselves, with an extra twenty-five cents for bedding if the youth cannot live at home. A unit of a thousand such could be assembled in Toronto armouries in twenty-four hours. Slight additional cost would provide a very small staff and perhaps a pair of boots and socks where needed.

He goes on at further length, and then says:

> It is better and more economical to give our youth a break than to break our youth. A stitch in time saves nine.

If constitutional difficulties stand in the way of action, it is the duty of this government to find some way of getting around those constitutional difficulties. What is the Department of National Defence for? It is for the defence of Canada. It is for the defence of Canada from without, yes. Has it not a duty to defend Canada by whatever methods it sees fit, not only from without but from within? Has it not a duty to defend Canada against the enemies that are springing up, on account of the physical and moral destruction of our youth which is taking place? The Department of Labour may not have the constitutional power. The Department of National Defence has. Let the Department of Labour use the Department of National Defence in the cause of the defence of the morale of our Canadian youth. Do it right away: it is urgent.

How disillusioned the voter of 1935 must be when he recollects the nicely printed election cards and flaming bill-boards, "Elect us and you will get action"; "Get off the relief roll, get on the pay roll"; "King or chaos." The Prime Minister gave that promise to the electors. Four hundred thousand workless in Canada know how it has been kept. The fact is that after three and a half years, unemployment, our greatest problem, on which rest so many of the other problems of this country—railway deficit, over-government, tremendous taxation, and over-expenditure on relief works of no pressing need—has not been dealt with, much less solved. It is far worse.

The theory that increased world trade would bring unemployment solution to Canada may have had more merit before the day of economic nationalism, but it has broken down and can no more be depended upon. Canada can depend for her well-being upon what she can expect to export to other lands; first, only in so far as she can trust the economic stability and integrity of those lands and those peoples who need and must have our products; second, by producing by Canadian labour those products which we can in Canada consume. How far have we gone towards producing those products? Is there any evidence that the Prime Minister recognizes these facts? No. The Prime Minister is chasing the mythical butterfly of foreign trade in these days of economic nationalism. He is trying to show the world what a good fellow he is, at the expense of the industrial worker of this country. The industrial worker is told that for the sake of foreign trade he must starve in competition with foreign slave labour, foreign bargain-counters of surplus goods, foreign depression bankrupt sales, foreign standards of living.

Is it not the duty of the Prime Minister to take some steps to see that this condition does not exist? Our workmen can produce products in competition with any foreign country on a fair and even basis. What encouragement has been given along these lines? The mechanic or the artisan wishes to work at his trade with future prospects and security. The young people coming of workable age wish to learn a trade that has future security. They do not want relief or work on relief projects. We shall never get this country better by spending money on palliatives, makeshifts, unnecessary public works. This will only increase the burden. Canadians want useful work in industry. The government gives aid and assistance towards many classes of trade and production, such as the tourist trade, agriculture, mining development by geological surveys, and certain primary industries by railways and roads, but the secondary industries in which such a large proportion of our workers are either unemployed or on part time, have been underpaid of necessity by competition, and get no encouragement. In fact, the aid given to these other departments of industry is obtained very often at the expense of and from the secondary industries. There is no mention in the speech from the throne with respect to the encouragement of our great secondary industries, and yet in 1935 these were the figures for the five major groups of our industrial life provided by the census returns. There are five groups, namely, animal products, vegetable products, iron products, textiles, and wood and paper products. The total gross value of the production was $2,050,000,000, and the number of people employed at that time was 480,000. Industries employing that many people surely deserve some consideration, but they are entirely neglected except when they are the target of criticism and abuse or are looked upon as a source of revenue.

We have the statistics with respect to the products of Canada. There is a prospective market in Canada for certain products now imported from other countries. Has the government considered these statistics with a view to increasing work for the industrial workers by taking advantage of the prospective market which we have? No. The industrial worker has been neglected for three and a half years.

Mr. Speaker, what a fair land Canada is! An industrial future is definitely forecast for us by the abundance and variety of our natural resources and the creative genius of our people. There is only one way for us to prosper and profit to the full from our resources. We cannot avoid becoming an industrial nation. This is essential not only to our national economy but to our place in the world. It is not possible for a great people just to be a market for the products of others while selling only raw materials to others. No nation grows great by what it sells; it grows great by what its people produce and use. Merely selling off our natural wealth will get us nowhere. It is economically wasteful and it retards the development of a national spirit. There is no growth in the mere selling of raw materials. Industry has socialising effects in creating a diversified market and a self-sustaining people. The best basis of prosperity is production. Mere trade, however big, is not enough. The best indication of prosperity is the full dinner pail. The barometer is how much money each man makes and how much he works, not the volume of trade. Spent money will never lift us. We can be raised only by producing more of the things of life. It is not the selling or the trading that is good for us but the making and using by the people.

The natural resources of Canada belong to the people of Canada. They are administered by the various governments of Canada, and it is the duty of the government to see to it that they are so administered that as many people of Canada as possible get the benefit; otherwise we are selling our heritage for a mess of potage. The people have the right of opportunity, under fair competition, to make supplies and machinery and supply labour which enter into the development of those resources. We should not think of allowing the importation of cheap, foreign Chinese or Japanese labour to develop these resources. Why, then, allow the importation of any more than is necessary of these supplies and machinery, which are made under unfair competition? Last year we imported six and a half million dollars of mining machinery from the United States. If Canadians had made it, or at least a great deal of it, there would have been just that much less unemployment. Last year we imported nineteen million dollars worth of agricultural machinery. If Canadians had made it, there would have been just that much less unemployment. These are only two examples. There are many others. What has this government done to explore this field? It has been chasing after the butterfly of foreign trade. Surely the mining development taking place in Canada and the future prospects for a demand for mining machinery provide an opportunity for lessening unemployment. This government has given no such encouragement with respect to this.

Mr. Speaker, I wish to say a word with regard to the method of making the so-called tri-party treaties. These tri-party treaties are terribly misnamed because they are twenty-five party treaties. I do not see any mention of the twenty-five party treaties in the speech from the throne. Why should the government fool the people into believing that these twenty-five party agreements are tri-party agreements? They are not only treaties between Canada, the United States and Great Britain; these treaties include concessions to Germany, concessions to Japan, concessions to Italy and many other countries, concessions equivalent to those to the United States, for absolutely no return by way of concessions to Canada. In some instances we have an arrangement for an equal dollar for dollar trade balance, but we have not a working hour for working hour balance.

Our workmen are in competition with lower standards of living, regimentation and slave labour.

However, a word or two about the making of these treaties. During the past eighteen months those who have been the guardians of the industrial worker have been sweating blood, afraid, in some instances to speak for fear of retaliation. During the negotiations for the treaties, requests by various industries for hearing were denied—a dictatorial attitude. I cannot help but view with alarm the far-reaching consequences to Canada as a result of this treaty. I ask the people of this country to keep an open mind. I ask them not to become prejudiced by the efforts to create a patriotic issue. It may have been necessary for Canada to forego some of the preferences to the British market that we were requested to forego by the government of Great Britain, in order that a closer relationship with Great Britain and the United States might be obtained. We were so advised by the Prime Minister; but before the people of Canada can come to an intelligent conclusion as to the course pursued by the government in making these treaties, they should be fully advised as to what we were requested to concede, and, further, what we were compelled to concede. All the relevant correspondence in the matter with respect to this treaty should be published. Our sacrifice of preferences is tremendous—quite sufficient for an exchange of considerable further concessions to Canada. The main issue is, will the consummation of this treaty give one more man a job in Canada?

Mr. Speaker, I submit that the government did not have to give the widespread increases in the concessions to the United States for the paltry advantages which we have obtained. Now, how was the treaty negotiated by Great Britain? Through the board of trade on the advice of the British import duties advisory committee composed of outstanding experts, who received advice and information and representation from various trade organizations. Then some thirty experts proceeded to Washington. In the United States information with respect to various products and industries affected was published; industries and farm organizations were notified that there would be public hearings of their cases. In Canada the treaty was negotiated by three civil service executives. I do not wish to belittle the ability or the knowledge of those directly connected with the making of the treaty; I have the greatest regard for their ability; but I do suggest that carefully selected executives of Canadian industry should have been asked to assist the government in reaching a fair and equitable course towards any trade relationship that Canada's economic position requires. A few executives of the government could not possibly have sufficient knowledge or a full enough understanding to be entrusted with the consummation of a treaty with such far-reaching implications, and I know they are the best brains in Canada. The best scientific brains possible should have been enlisted in a matter of such import and having such far-reaching effects on our Canadian people.

It may be the custom to negotiate such treaties secretly, but surely not so secretly that those industries which are to be affected should not have knowledge. This would certainly prevent inertia in those industries not to be affected by the proposed treaties. It would have allayed fear and encouraged any expansion that might be contemplated. It would not cause unemployment as has been the case in the unaffected industries.

Whom do we blame? I submit that the development of industry for the production of goods consumed or used by Canadians has been set back years by the ineptitude and inertia of this government.

And now, one word about the amendment moved by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Woodsworth). First of all, I submit that by the laws of Canada and through the Bank of Canada and various departments of government we have the machinery for a very effective control of financial interests and monopolistic enterprises. If monopolistic enterprises and financial interests are exploiting the Canadian people, it is not because the administrations of the various governments of the country are powerless or unable to control them or because these administrations are unwilling. And second, I think I have amply demonstrated a field which, if it had been thoroughly explored during the last three and a half years, would have amply proved that unemployment, at least in the urban centres, can be eliminated. Therefore, I intend to vote against the amendment.

When we consider that there are 400,000 workers idle in Canada, and 400,000 more people on part time, I do not think there is any gratifying reduction in the total number of unemployed. It is terrible to think that this situation exists and still has not been dealt with, and now we are told, after three and a half years, that the ministers recognize that the plight of those who are still unemployed cannot wait, and propose therefore to expand the government's long range program of public undertakings. Why such a hurry now after three and a half years of do nothing government? I submit, Mr. Speaker, that what we want is action.

The Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) has been so busy appointing commissions to man the ship of state that for the past three and a half years the ship of state has never been able to get away from the dock but is just where it stood in 1935, and the people of Canada, you and I, have been paying wharfage dues all these years. We must get a new skipper with courage. There are honest passengers waiting to get on, fine decent passengers willing to help. There should be no poor in Canada who are willing to work. Let us make the prophecy come true—the twentieth century belongs to Canada, not to the Liberal government.

Mr. JOSEPH A. BLANCHETTE (Compton) (Translation): Mr. Speaker, I desire first of all to congratulate the two hon. members who proposed and seconded the address in reply to the speech from the throne. Both performed most creditably the honourable task which had been entrusted to them. Allow me to offer my very special and warm congratulations to the hon. member for Stormont (Mr. Chevrier) for the high repute in which he is held and which reflects on his constituency, his mother tongue and his Canadian origin. He is a perfect gentleman, active and industrious, and always seeking to promote the interests of his constituents. The Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) could not have made a better choice, and we are most grateful to him for it.

Mr. Speaker, I shall have the opportunity in the course of the session to make some observations in my native tongue. On the present occasion I wish to continue my speech in English.

(Text) Mr. Speaker, at the very outset of my remarks I wish to add my sincere appreciation to that already expressed by speakers in this debate on both sides of the house with reference to the mover (Mr. Matthews) and the seconder (Mr. Chevrier) of the address in reply to the speech from the throne. The speeches of both these hon. members have been highly praised by the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King), and by the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Manion) and by the press, and rightly so, because the consensus of opinion is that they were of an exceptionally high order as regards both style and rendition. All this goes to show that great credit is reflected not only on the mover and seconder but also on the ridings which these gentlemen represent in this house.

The eastern townships are also especially gratified at the announcement that Their Majesties the King and Queen are to pay a visit to our section during their sojourn in Canada. I know their majesties will find the hearts of our Anglo-Saxon and Norman stock responsive and imbued with loyalty, fidelity and appreciative homage to our devoted rulers.

This debate, as do all similar debates, has brought forth comments both favourable and unfavourable upon the actions of the government. We may have found in some instances excess of zeal either in praise of the achievements or in condemnation of the lack of achievements of the government, but there is one point at least upon which I believe all hon. members will agree; that is, that exceptionally difficult times are being experienced not only in Canada but throughout the entire civilized world. Were unemployment and social and economic unrest prevalent in Canada only, in spite of my sitting on this side of the house I too might be prone to criticise the government and our Prime Minister. But when with a calm and open mind I survey conditions in other sections of the world, and the economic and social disturbances with which they are affected, in addition to those which we find here in Canada, all the miseries and privations and hardships that exist under dictatorships and that do not prevail in democratic countries, I feel that Canada is not such a bad country to live in and the government is not altogether derelict in its duties.

The government, after all, is a human institution. It is composed of men of some competence in their respective fields, but just as no individual is able to please everyone, is it possible for this government to do so? I speak of the cabinet as a whole; criticise them as we may, we must admit that we have as Prime Minister of Canada a statesman whose qualifications of foresight and statesmanship and whose knowledge of external affairs as well as of economics and social science are recognized not only in this country but throughout the British empire and elsewhere. In our private affairs we would not hesitate for a moment to confide our legal business to the Minister of Justice (Mr. Lapointe), our agricultural concerns to the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner), our financial affairs to the Minister of Finance (Mr. Dunning), our labour relations to the Minister of Labour (Mr. Rogers), and our structural undertakings to the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Cardin) and the Minister of Transport (Mr. Howe). All the ministers are doing their utmost to attain the ends which we are all seeking, the relief of unemployment and the betterment of economic and social conditions throughout Canada. This government may not have accomplished all that the opposition feel it should have done, but I believe the record of this administration compares favourably with that of the previous one.

Perhaps hon. members are a little more exacting when in opposition than when sitting on this side of the house. Certainly I find that the accomplishments of hon. gentlemen opposite in six sessions cannot compare favourably with what has been done by this government in the last three sessions. My memory takes me back to 1930, when unemployment was to be done away with within ninety days, when a way was to be "blasted" for our products into the markets of the world, and we were told that all the ills of civilization could be banished from this young country if the government would only do its duty. Time marches on: 1931, 1932, 1933, 1934, 1935. What improvement in 1935 over 1930? That was a question not for hon. members of this house, but for the electorate to decide. And their verdict was given at the polls with no uncertain voice.

What are some of the achievements of the present government? In 1936 the deficit was $160,000,000; in 1938 it was reduced to $13,775,000. The 1936 budget reduced the tariff on 192 items. In 1937 there were further reductions covering 354 more items, including a wide variety of household articles, wearing apparel and implements of production. In 1938 building supplies and materials were exempted from sales tax to encourage the construction of homes. Yet, despite the most sweeping tariff reductions in Canadian history, customs receipts increased from $74,000,000 in 1935-36 to $93,000,000 in 1937-38. More than $600,000,000 of the public debt has been refunded during the past two and a half years, resulting in a saving in interest charges in excess of $10,200,000. The annual interest bill for the last fiscal year was the lowest for any year since the war, despite the fact that in the past seven or eight years more than one billion dollars had been added to the public debt. The average interest rate on the Canadian public debt between 1931 and 1938 was diminished by 29 per cent.

This party, firmly believing that trade is the basis of industrial and commercial development, and that this country with its vast resources needs trade, upon its accession to power immediately declared its willingness to cooperate with other nations in examining current trade difficulties with a view to their removal. As a result, Canada's total trade in 1937 almost attained the two billion mark. In 1937 Canada's trade was greater by 50 per cent than in 1935. For the years 1935-36 and 1937-38 the increase of trade with the United States was $231,000,000.

In agriculture the policy of the government has been to lower the cost of production and enhance the selling price of the product. Likewise mining and fishing have been helped to a marked degree. The value of our animal products in 1937-38 represents an increase of more than $35,000,000 over 1935-36. The production of our fishing industry in 1932 was valued at $26,000,000 with an export value of $18,500,000, whereas in 1937 its value was over $40,000,000 with exports increased by some eight or nine millions.

Total mine products for 1935-36 were valued at $284,000,000 and for the fiscal year 1937-38 at $391,000,000, an increase of $107,000,000, or 37 per cent. For the fiscal year 1935-36 exports of products of the forest totalled $182,000,000, and for the year 1937-38 they were $253,000,000, an increase of $71,000,000, or 39 per cent. Total production of all industries for the year 1935 amounted to $2,559,523,000 and for the year 1937 to $3,044,189,500, an increase of $484,666,500. The estimated national income for 1935 was $4,094,000,000; for 1937 it was $4,870,000,000, an increase of $776,000,000. In each instance the increase amounts to 18·9 per cent.

In October, 1937, the employment index reached the highest point in the history of Canada, higher even than in the boom year of 1929. The housing act, the youth training projects and grants towards public works aided in the relief of the unemployed. The sums poured into the channels of unemployment relief since this government came into office afford proof that it is seized with the gravity of the situation. Referring to the joint grants which Quebec has received in order to relieve unemployment these may be summed up as follows, from January, 1936, to October, 1938: Total relief grants in monthly allocations aggregated $17,210,625; direct relief, $24,976; public works, $4,073,831; agricultural aids, $162,871; youth training, $86,227; other provincial assistance, $108,485, or a total of almost $22,000,000. In addition, from August, 1936, to September, 1938, there was contributed towards the cost of old age and blind pensions almost $15,000,000. In November, 1936, the Quebec provincial government submitted to the federal government eighty-seven relief projects, all of which were approved. In September, 1937, the same government presented a list of thirty projects in connection with relief, all of which were again approved. In other words, the provincial government submitted to this government its relief projects, and if these projects did not meet with the desired success or failed in their purpose, why should this government be held totally responsible? The administration and spending of these funds, together with the choice of the labourers, to a certain extent, and the location and nature of the project, were in the hands of the provincial government.

I do not wish to convey the impression, Mr. Speaker, that I feel the government has done all that its critics say it should have done, but I believe it has done its duty in view of world conditions prevailing. By no means do we consider our work finished, because this session is but beginning. During the past three years few of us, if any, have not found the ministers and the heads of the various departments hard at work in order to relieve the conditions that exist throughout the country, and I believe that to term this parliament the do-nothing parliament is as much a misnomer as it would be to call the previous parliament the do-all parliament.

In a cursory way I should like to touch upon three subjects mentioned in the speech from the throne. I refer to agriculture, unemployment and youth training. One of the most vital industries in this country, agriculture, has not been on a paying basis for a number of years, though conditions have been ameliorated to a certain extent in some quarters. Agriculture must be made more profitable if we wish our farming classes to be encouraged to continue in their vocation. This class has suffered more than any other, through the depression of its dollar purchase value. Our farmers ask, not for a minimum wage, but rather for a living wage in return for their investment and their labour; and I believe that no grant this government could make would be better or more fruitful in its results than that meted out to the farming population which forms the sinew and backbone of the nation. And if a particular agricultural crop or product should require temporary assistance, everything possible should be done to come to its rescue.

According to the 1931 census, 46 per cent of our entire population is rural. In the province of Quebec, roughly speaking, there are 136,000 farms of an average value of $6,452 per farm, with an average area of 127 acres. At the last census 36 per cent of the province of Quebec was rural. Those figures also tell us that the gross revenue for the average Quebec farm is $1,359, and that the cost of feed, fertilizer, spraying chemicals, seed and hired labour averages about $200. If we add to this the disbursements for insurance, interest on investment, depreciation and fuel, we must add at least another $212, giving a very conservative expense account of $412, leaving a net return of $947 to provide for an average family of eight persons. This modest amount must suffice for medical care, educational development, social diversion, clothing, life insurance and the purchase of food not raised on the farm, providing an annual amount of approximately $118 per capita of our farm population, or not quite $10 per month.

I believe, Mr. Speaker, it will be admitted forthwith that to cite the problem, by breaking down its factors, is to ask in no uncertain terms for a solution of this paucity in the revenue of the farmers in return for their toil. The farmer has helped greatly in the development of this country. He has maintained, step by step, each stage of progress which we have attained. He helped greatly to win the war. He has produced some of our greatest men. His achievements are an open book, and we may safely deduce his future by his past. It is seldom that we read of uprisings in his midst. The chief asset of Canada, as it is of any other country for that matter, is the farming class which offers a bulwark or a precious stability to its institutions.

The farmer is not asking for a minimum wage, but he has a right to a living wage. He should receive a reasonable return for his investment—his labour. If that return or remuneration is not sufficient to give him a living wage, if that return or remuneration is suicidal, then I believe that ways and means should be devised for his rescue for the time being, until such time as the price of his major crop or major product has been resuscitated. I feel that I have in a cursory way presented the case of the Quebec farmer and I trust that the Minister of Agriculture will do his utmost, when bringing down his estimates, to come to the assistance of the farmer who is in need of this assistance.

Of similar major importance is the question of unemployment. In this respect Canada is not unique; it resembles many other countries. None the less the gravity of this question demands the serious consideration and cooperation of all concerned. Much to my regret, the $30,000,000 made available by the Municipal Improvements Assistance Act, untouched as yet in some sections of the country, does not speak very eloquently of the cooperation of which we hear so often from some quarters, but which we do not always see translated into tangible actuality. Public works, tourist and mining roads, municipal developments, housing and the development of air ports—all of these are conducive to the relief of the unemployment situation, and in my opinion should be favoured and enhanced as much as possible. Neither has close cooperation been given in some quarters to the national housing act. Cooperation should have been whole-hearted, because this act, with the Municipal Improvements Assistance Act, could create employment to the extent of $150,000,000 with no increase in the debt or taxation of the municipalities or provinces and with very little expense to the federal government.

As a tangent to unemployment, and really as part of the problem although generally treated under a separate heading, I should like to say a few words about youth training. This training was begun in 1937 on a cooperative scale. It was continued in 1938, and I was pleased to hear in the speech from the throne that the policy is to be continued, I trust on a larger scale than in the past. The keystone of the next generation is inherently in the youth of to-day, many of whom have been forced to abandon trades, schooling or professions for lack of funds and who have become, through no fault of their own, wandering ships on our economic sea with no port to which to go. All this in spite of the vigour, vitality, earnestness and ambition of our Canadian youth.

One of the definite factors which must be taken into account in connection with this youth problem is the trend away from the farm to the city. This factor cannot be brushed aside lightly. Between 1921 and 1931 there was a decline of over 26 per cent in the number of farm operators under twenty-five years of age, and this decline is continuing. The depression has made employers, who in the past had catered to the teaching of trade, reluctant to assume the continuance of that practice. In support of this contention I would state that of 7,700 firms approached by the national employment commission, only 24 per cent had any youth training plan.

I believe it is a recognized fact that since 1929 industry and commerce in their various branches have lost many of their skilled and qualified workers. In my opinion both industry and commerce should endeavour to take as many of our youth as possible. Incidentally the various governmental departments might set an example by replacing incumbents of superannuation age with unemployed youth, thereby putting no hardship on the former and preventing the discouragement of the latter. One of the occupations in this country which is not overcrowded is aviation. What a field this industry offers in its many branches to the serious minded youth of to-day! I believe the government could help materially in fostering the development of aviation. With that aim in view it should establish training schools in provinces which heretofore have not been favoured with such. To my mind this would be of great assistance to our youth as well as reduce unemployment.

I know that all these suggestions for the relief of agriculture and unemployment and to provide youth training necessarily mean the spending of money. I realize that at times governments are criticized for increases in spending. If the moneys voted are necessary; if they are employed for a useful end and are honestly spent, I must say that I do not sympathize with such criticism in times of depression. When sickness attacks the human body, we do not cavil at the expense necessary to save it and to bring it back to health. To a great extent the economic body should be treated similarly. All that can be done to save it should be done, no matter how expensive the treatment, providing the expenditures are to relieve the ailments which are gnawing at our economic structure and at times threatening its very life. The existence of a nation, or by corollary the existence of any major or component part of it, cannot be measured in dollars and cents. To do so may seem to be good accountancy, but at times it may become a travesty on social justice, a shirking of our responsible duty and the opening of the door to greater want, privation and suffering.

Mr. LIGUORI LACOMBE (Laval-Two Mountains) (Translation): Mr. Speaker, it is too early yet to criticize or approve without reservations the sessional program in its entirety. The speech from the throne mentions, among others, measures relating to trade and commerce, unemployment and national defence. The commercial treaty signed with the United States, if the expectations of the government are to come true, will bring to the farmer, the industrial worker, the manufacturer and all citizens of this country the benefits to which they are entitled. At the dawn of a new economic era in our country, I sincerely hope that it will be so.

As the treaty signed at Washington, on November 17, 1938, is of paramount interest to the market-gardeners and farmers of my constituency and the whole country, I wish to call the attention of the house to the description of fruits and vegetables which will enjoy the benefits of a seasonal tariff. Such a tariff, which I have advocated incessantly for the past fifteen years, was unanimously approved by this house in 1936. Long before the conclusion of the last trade agreement with the United States of America, I had often called the attention of the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) and members of the federal government on the importance of protecting products that play such an important part in our economic life. I therefore see with much satisfaction that Canadian potatoes in their natural state will enjoy the protection of a duty of 37½ cents per hundred pounds over potatoes produced in the United States, from June 15 to July 31 inclusive. Asparagus will have a protection of a general duty of 10 per cent, plus 4 cents per pound for a period of 10 weeks. Green beans, in addition to a general duty of 10 per cent, will enjoy a protection of 1½ cents per pound during 14 weeks. On cabbage, there will be a general duty of 10 per cent, and a special protection of ⅘ cent per pound during 26 weeks of the year. In view of the clearness and the precision of that statement, may I read into the record the description of a number of items together with the duties on farm products of the United States. I find in the new trade agreement the following table relating to vegetables interesting the producers of my constituency and the whole country:

Brussels sprouts, 10 per cent.
Carrots (⅘ cent per pound: 26 weeks), 10 per cent.
Beets, n.o.p. (1 cent per pound: 26 weeks), 10 per cent.
Cauliflower (1½ cents per pound: 20 weeks), 10 per cent.
Celery (⅘ cent per pound: 26 weeks), 10 per cent.
Cucumbers (2 cents per pound: 26 weeks), 10 per cent.
Lettuce (⅘ cent per pound: 18 weeks), 10 per cent.
Parsley, 10 per cent.
Pees, green (2 cents per pound: 12 weeks), 10 per cent.
Rhubarb (1 cent per pound), 10 per cent.
Spinach, 10 per cent.
Tomatoes, but not less than, per pound, 1½ cents, 10 per cent.

Producers will no doubt be interested to learn the following particulars in regard to fruits generally produced in the Montreal district:

Plums and prunes, May to November, inclusive, (Plums 1 cent per pound: 10 weeks) (Prunes 1 cent per pound: 8 weeks), 10 per cent.
Strawberries (1⅜ cents per pound: 6 weeks), 10 per cent.
Raspberries and loganberries (2 cents per pound: 6 weeks), 10 per cent.
Berries, edible, n.o.p., 10 per cent.
Quinces and nectarines, June to February, inclusive, 10 per cent.
Apples, fresh, in their natural state (⅘ cent per pound), 15 per cent.
Cantaloupes and muskmelons (1¼ cents per pound: 8 weeks), 10 per cent.
Melons, n.o.p., each, 2 cents.
Fruits, fresh, in their natural state, n.o.p., 10 per cent.

To avoid any misunderstanding on the part of all concerned, I will read a very material clause of the new treaty:

Provided, That, as regards such of those articles dutiable under tariff items 84, ex 85, 87, 92, 93 and 95, as are marked with an asterisk in this Schedule, Canada reserves the right to fix the value for duty at a figure exceeding the invoice value by not more than the amount set forth in the parentheses following the descriptions of the several articles;

The values so fixed shall not be maintained in force in any twelve months ending March 31 for a period in excess of the number of weeks set forth in the parentheses following the description of the several articles: provided, however, as regards articles dutiable under subitems (d) and (e) of tariff item 87, the number of weeks during which the value so fixed may be maintained in force may be divided into not more than two separate periods, the combined duration of which shall not exceed the number of weeks set forth in the parentheses following the description of the article.

Provided further, that Canada reserves the right, after consultation with the United States of America, to substitute, in whole or in part, for the system of protection of these fruits and vegetables by means of advances in values for duty purposes, a system of specific duties which shall not be more burdensome on imports from the United States of America than that provided for in this Agreement.

Mr. Speaker, some other clauses of the trade agreement are of great importance to the farmers of Canada. It is those by which import duties are lowered on farm implements of American manufacture or origin. Mowers, binders, hay loaders, hay presses, scythes, hoes, forks, rakes will be admitted under a rate as low as 7½ per cent. Spraying machines, pressure testing apparatus for determining maturity of fruit, pruning shears, animal dehorning instruments will be subject to a duty of only 5 per cent when imported into Canada. A large number of parts, including roller and sprocket link chains, when imported by manufacturers of agricultural implements, will pay the same rate of duty. Internal combustion traction engines will be admitted free of duty; corn husking machines, threshing machine separators and wind stackers will pay an import duty of 7½ per cent.

It is to be hoped that the lowering of import duties will result in a corresponding reduction in the price of farm implements. Thus the farmer will be enabled to purchase at a reasonable price the implements essential to the tiller of the soil. A government worthy of that name must never lose sight of the well-being of the farmer as the future of Canada rests on agriculture itself. That is why on many occasions and particularly in the course of last session I insisted on the necessary reductions in the prices of farm implements. I have noticed since that in the autumn of 1938 certain companies have reduced their prices. However, the new tariff resulting from the recent commercial agreement will make it possible to effect further substantial reductions.

In spite of the government's undeniable efforts it has been impossible so far to find an acceptable solution to the unemployment problem. The present economic situation is to blame. The collapse of the labour market is not peculiar to Canada; it exists with few exceptions in all the countries of the world. The most effective remedy for this deplorable situation is to be found in more friendly and extensive commercial relations between nations. So long as nations look upon each other as enemies, so long as they refuse to entertain towards each other sentiments of friendliness, of justice and of charity, we shall have to despair of being able to find a definite solution for this important problem.

The financial and economic situation of a country can improve only in peace. Competition in armaments is only the prelude to infernal horror. Shall peaceful relations, goodwill and sound reason prove stronger than occult forces, merchants of death and abominable war profiteers? There is something dearer to the heart of every true Canadian than power. It is liberty; it is his country's autonomy. Since the enactment of the statute of Westminster, Canada is in no way subordinate, internally or externally, to any other country of the British Commonwealth of Nations. She is a sovereign country, freely associated with the other British nations. Her status is equal to that of these other countries. Should one or more of these nations be at war, Canada is not necessarily at war. Otherwise, the statute of Westminster would be nothing but a shameful mockery.

Canada being, according to the statute of Westminster, a self-governing country as regards England, any declaration contrary to this treaty must be considered, in the event of war, as outmoded and false. I need not repeat that I am irrevocably opposed to any increase in defence appropriations so long as they may serve to involve Canada in a foreign war. I go further. In the name of the country's most cherished interests, no decision should be taken as to Canada's participation in an extraterritorial war without an appeal to the people. For, is not the expression of the popular will the very foundation of our constitution and of our government? Neither an increase in military appropriations nor Canada's participation in foreign wars had been submitted to the people during the last general election. Consequently, should a conflict occur in central Europe, in America or elsewhere, I assert that the Canadian people alone would have the right to make a decision in such a serious matter. And public opinion, made wise by experience would certainly condemn any attempt to participate in a foreign war. The people of Canada know what the last war has cost and is still costing them. The Canadian taxpayer being called upon daily to make enormous sacrifices to pay the price of our last participation in a war, it is his privilege more than anyone else's to say what our foreign policy should be. At a time when so many able men take the attitude of indomitable champions of democracy, shall we refuse to the voters of the country the right to decide themselves whether the country is to survive or to perish? As a matter of fact, the supreme folly of another adventure in a foreign war would spell the permanent ruin of Canada.

Before closing my remarks I desire to draw the attention of parliament to the immigration question. I have no hesitation in saying that we do not want any immigrants no matter whence they come. In the name of democratic traditions and principles, some people considered they were acting patriotically in addressing to the members of this house pamphlets in favour of a certain class of immigrants. In my humble opinion, they have attained a result contrary to their aims. Should we sacrifice the vested rights of our own nationals to the inevitable competition of newly arrived foreigners in all lines of activity? The social, financial and economic situation of the country prohibits any attempt at immigration and enjoins to our rulers prudence, wisdom and a clear vision of the needs of the moment. I therefore consider it a national duty for Canada to close its doors to all immigration so long as the economic situation has not improved more substantially within her own borders.

Mr. Speaker, I have just one more word to say. The right hon. the Minister of Justice (Mr. Lapointe) has recently been censured by some hon. members of this house. In the interests of order, truth, faith and morals, he refused to be swayed by the insinuations, the representations and the threats of those who oppose the padlock law. All praise to him! The sound element in our population has no use for mischief makers and spreaders of false doctrines. Those who only seek to exploit materialism and envy by disregarding morals and christianity can have no place in a civilized country. That is why I have a deep admiration for the firm, courageous and patriotic stand taken by the right hon. the Minister of Justice.

In conclusion, I take pleasure in congratulating two new ministers of the crown: the hon. the Postmaster-General (Mr. McLarty) and the hon. the minister without portfolio (Mr. MacKinnon). Both have my best wishes for a long and fruitful career. As regards the hon. the Postmaster-General, I would urge him to give favourable consideration to the claims of our rural mail carriers. On several occasions during the three last sessions of this parliament, I have pleaded for a fair and reasonable remuneration for that class of civil servants. At the moment when a new minister is taking up his duties, I ask him to treat his majesty's mail carriers with the fairness they are expecting from his department.

Mr. E. E. PERLEY (Qu'Appelle): At the outset I desire to express my congratulations to the two hon. members of this house who to-day have been promoted to the honourable position of members of the privy council. I know the hon. member for Edmonton West (Mr. MacKinnon) very well, and from what I have seen and learned of the other hon. member (Mr. McLarty) I know that both of them will fill their positions with distinction to themselves and no doubt will extend to the opposition members that fairness which will cause us to appreciate the fact that they have been promoted.

I should like also to join with other hon. members in expressing congratulations to the mover (Mr. Matthews) and the seconder (Mr. Chevrier) of the address. They acquitted themselves well, but let me say to the hon. member for Brandon that he should not take any great credit from the assumption that the verdict of that constituency is the voice of the west; for if he will review the results in the rural polls, he will see that there the Conservative candidate, young Beaubier, made very considerable gains—a proof, I think, that the rural people of the west do not endorse the agricultural policy of this government.

I wish also to join hon. members in expressing my appreciation of the fact that we shall have this summer a visit from their majesties. I should like to enlarge upon the thought expressed by the hon. member for Humboldt (Mr. Fleming) when he referred to the fact in our province of Saskatchewan—and although he mentioned particularly his constituency I speak now of the province as a whole—we have possibly the most cosmopolitan population of any province in the dominion. Many nations are represented there and all are true Canadians and loyal citizens. Many of them are citizens not by birth but by choice, and I venture to say that the spontaneous expression of loyalty and devotion to their majesties will be no less in that province than in any other province of the dominion.

You, Mr. Speaker, having been on former occasions in a similar position, will appreciate the difficulty in which I now find myself. I did not expect to continue this debate to-night, but as you know, whips generally have to arrange things and sometimes find it necessary to change the program. I am in the difficult position of endeavouring to start a speech at a few minutes before adjournment. You have been very generous in your favours to hon. members, and as I propose to speak on only two or three problems that affect the west in particular, I do not desire to have my speech broken into very much. I am going to ask you, therefore, Mr. Speaker, to permit me to move the adjournment of the debate and to call it eleven o'clock at this time.

On motion of Mr. Perley the debate was adjourned.

On motion of Mr. Crerar the house adjourned at 10.45 p.m.

Tuesday, January 24, 1939

The house met at three o'clock.

CRIMINAL CODE

AMENDMENT TO PERMIT SWEEPSTAKES ORGANIZED BY PROVINCES FOR BENEFIT OF UNIVERSITIES OR HOSPITALS

Mr. VITAL MALLETTE (Jacques-Cartier) moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 10, to amend the criminal code.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Explain.

Mr. MALLETTE: Subsection 6 of section 236 of the criminal code has to do with the exceptions in favour of lotteries. One of these exceptions is found in paragraph (e), as follows:

(e) the Art Union of London, Great Britain, or the Art Union of Ireland.

This exception is now obsolete. However, all hon. members know that quite a few sweepstakes are now being held throughout Canada. It is the intention of the bill to repeal paragraph (e) and replace it by another which would permit the recognition of sweepstakes by the governments of the provinces, the benefits to go to universities and hospitals.

The bill, Mr. Speaker, speaks for itself.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

UNEMPLOYMENT

RELIEF HOSPITALIZATION—ARREST OF SINGLE UNEMPLOYED MEN IN TORONTO—CASES ON REMAND AT TIMMINS AND WHITBY

On the orders of the day:

Mr. T. L. CHURCH (Broadview): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask a question of the Minister of Labour (Mr. Rogers), notice of which was given last week-end but a reply to which was not included in his remarks yesterday.

First, will the minister consider the giving of assistance for relief hospitalization? Second, will the minister consider the cases of thousands of senior citizens, industrial workers and others out of work, who are not on relief but are suffering? Third, the minister stated that the prosecutions in Toronto are under the city's by-laws. I would point out that they are being taken under the criminal code as well as under the city's by-laws. The minister stated that these men are in gaol. They got out of gaol last Friday.

Mr. SPEAKER: Order. The hon. member has the right to put questions of public interest on the orders of the day, but he has not the right to make a speech.

Mr. CHURCH: I have a question to ask, Mr. Speaker, but first I wish to call to the attention of the minister, without comment, the cases of those on remand at Timmins, Whitby and Toronto gaols, and to ask what action will be taken. Will the minister give consideration to these complaints, and will he pass some reference over to the provincial authorities when they come up for trial?

Hon. NORMAN McL. ROGERS (Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, the several matters to which my hon. friend has referred are of such a kind as are constantly receiving the attention of the Department of Labour. As I informed the house yesterday with respect to the position of transients in Toronto who are under remand, the matter is now the subject of communication between the Department of Labour and the Department of Public Welfare in the city of Toronto.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

RULE RESPECTING QUESTIONS PERMISSIBLE ON THE ORDERS OF THE DAY

On the orders of the day:

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, perhaps hon. members would allow me, not with a view to curtailing discussion in any way, but rather to enable the house to get on with its business, to draw attention to the rules with respect to asking questions on the orders of the day.

The rules do provide for an opportunity to ask questions on the orders of the day with reference to an emergent situation on which it is desirable to have immediate information from the ministry. But if hon. members will look at standing order 17, and citation 197, they will see that the rule is that:

> A question which could be inserted on the order paper is not allowed on the orders of the day being called.

Yesterday we had a regular battery of questions on the orders of the day. I think most of them might have been placed on the order paper. Probably they would not have been allowed except that his honour the Speaker did not wish to prevent anyone from having as much latitude as possible. The rule which I have quoted is there for the convenience of all members of the house, and no doubt his honour the Speaker will wish to see that it is enforced as we proceed.

Hon. R. J. MANION (Leader of the Opposition): Just one word in connection with what my right hon. friend has said. I quite agree that the rule is there. At the same time I think that both he and I have been impressed with the fact that in the British House of Commons the question hour is literally an hour or more; and I am wondering if it would not be to the advantage of all of us, of the house, and of the country, if in this, as in so many other things, we were to follow the British custom and permit a little more latitude in regard to questions, so that the country would have a reasonably prompt reply in regard to many matters. I am not saying this with any thought of embarrassing the government or of criticizing the remarks of the right hon. gentleman. It is merely that I believe that for the sake of good government it would be a good thing, whatever party is in power, to permit a considerable amount of latitude in regard to such matters as this.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: First, in regard to what my hon. friend had to say as to the custom in the British house in answering questions on the orders of the day, the British house, like this house, is governed by its standing rules, and the rules of the British house are somewhat different from the rules here. If the rules of this house are to be changed they ought to be considered in the first instance by the appropriate committee of the house and approved by the house. So long as the rules are what they are, I think my hon. friend will agree with me that they ought to be observed.

I have not in mind at the moment the practice of the British house, but my recollection is that except questions which are of an urgent character the only kind of question which is permitted to be asked which does not appear on the orders of the day is a supplementary question arising out of a question that is already on the orders of the day; a minister may be asked—and I think it has been permitted here—if the reply is not regarded as adequate, to supplement his remarks so as to make them quite clear.

My colleague the right hon. the Minister of Justice (Mr. Lapointe) has drawn my attention to the wording of the rules of the British house with respect to questions. I quote the following:

> No questions shall be taken after a quarter before four of the clock, except questions which have not been answered in consequence of the absence of the minister to whom they are addressed, and questions which have not appeared on the paper, but which are of an urgent character, and relate either to matters of public importance or to the arrangement of business.

The questions that are taken before that are the questions which are on the order paper.

Mr. T. L. CHURCH (Broadview): I rise to a question of privilege. In regard to the remarks of the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King), we might as well settle what rule 191 says as to what may be asked on the orders of the day. This matter was raised in the British house the other day, and my question is this: Has there been any interpretation by you, Mr. Speaker, regarding questions on the orders of the day? I would ask that you give a ruling, because the question I raised relates to the liberty of the subject and to Magna Carta. I am surprised that the Prime Minister has raised the point which he has, straining that point, and as he read Carlyle for three years to the unemployed, and now he reads Beauchesne. Regarding the rule itself, it has been interpreted just recently in the British house owing to the labour party members rising every day and calling the attention of the prime minister and others to foreign affairs and defence and the labour and relief situation. In this parliament we, fortunately, have not found ourselves in the position of Toronto, but when I find the gaols there and in Ontario filled with many people who had come from all over Canada because they could not get work, I think it is a matter of urgent public importance—

Mr. SPEAKER: Order.

Mr. CHURCH: —and seven youths in gaol at Timmins—I think it right to raise these questions on the orders of the day, under this rule.

Mr. SPEAKER: I would ask the hon. member to state his question of privilege.

Mr. CHURCH: Under this particular rule a minister can be interrogated on the orders of the day on matters of public importance and matters of emergency. I believe that if the Prime Minister were seized by the authorities because he could not find work, and were placed in gaol without a trial and without clothing or food or light, he would not quote Beauchesne—oh, no; he would take the law into his own hands, as was done back in 1837.

Mr. SPEAKER: Order.

Mr. CHURCH: Mr. Speaker, I would ask for your ruling—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: On the question of privilege, may I point out to my hon. friend that he has been speaking on citation 191. I was speaking on citation 197, which is a different one. I regret that my hon. friend did not hear the one I was referring to. However, what I wish to point out to him is this. I waited until his question was answered before raising the point I did. I took no exception to his question or to its being answered. I did intend before I came into the house, regardless of who might ask a question, to direct attention to the rule with respect to the asking of questions on the orders of the day. Before doing so, however, I waited until my hon. friend's question had been answered.

RADIO BROADCASTING

ADDRESS OF PRIME MINISTER BROADCAST ON MONDAY, JANUARY 23

On the orders of the day:

Hon. R. J. MANION (Leader of the Opposition): I have a question to direct to the Prime Minister. Probably it is one of those which he thinks might have been put on the order paper, but if he takes that view I do not agree; I think it is urgent enough to require an answer to-day. I have to preface it by a remark or two. In my speech the other day in the house I offered in a general way some criticism of the right hon. gentleman about his not having travelled across the country. The right hon. gentleman replied. But last evening he made a speech over the radio which, according to the press reports—I did not have the pleasure of listening to it—was a very good speech, as his speeches always are, and he made a pretty elaborate reply, I believe, to my criticism in the house. I should like to know from him, or from the Minister of Transport (Mr. Howe) if he prefers, whether the Liberal party paid for that political broadcast over the radio last night or whether the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation presented that time as a gift to the Liberal party.

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): In regard to what my hon. friend has just said about my address last night, I was asked, as he was asked, by the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation to give one of a series of addresses relating to the business of government. I was asked to explain the position and responsibilities and duties of the prime minister and the secretary of state for external affairs and the president of the privy council in relation to the business of government. My hon. friend was asked to give an address on the duties of the leader of the opposition, who has a recognized position of responsibility in the affairs of government and is a salaried officer of parliament. My hon. friend did not take advantage of the proposal. I was asked, not by the corporation but by one of my secretaries, if I would not see him about making sure of having his address included in the series, simply to make sure that the series would be complete; but I thought that my hon. friend could decide best what he wished to do and therefore I did not say anything to him about it.

Now as to the substance of my remarks last night. As a matter of fact they were not in any way intended as a reply to any criticism on the part of my hon. friend; they were an explanation of my position as Prime Minister and as Secretary of State for External Affairs. I set forth what my duties were in that regard, some indication of the amount of time they consumed, and the extent to which, the time being consumed in the way it was, it was not possible for me as Prime Minister to do some of the things I would like to do—among others, travel about the country as frequently as I would. I may say that in my remarks I was referring to the duties not only of the present Prime Minister but of previous prime ministers and of possible future prime ministers.

Mr. MANION: Did my right hon. friend mention any of the others?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Yes, I made a reference to Sir Wilfrid Laurier and his successors. I said that while all agreed that it might relieve the prime minister of some of his duties to have as the secretary of state for external affairs a member of the government holding a separate portfolio, all had found that our leading questions, our big problems in Canada, are so intimately associated with our membership in the British commonwealth of nations, or our membership in the League of Nations, or our proximity to the United States, that it was inadvisable to separate the matters of greatest concern to the Prime Minister from those of external affairs. There was nothing political in the remarks; and if my hon. friend should ever occupy this seat —which I do not imagine will ever happen— he will thank the Lord that I made the speech I did.

Mr. MANION: I am not going to carry on a debate, and I do not intend to discuss the right hon. gentleman's speech. He always makes a very good speech, and I think he made a good political speech last night. But I just want to say, in reply to his remark that I was invited, that it is true the chairman of the radio corporation did ask me to be one of about eighteen or nineteen to speak; the other eighteen would be the ministers on the other side; and I did not think that it would be a fair division.

Mr. DUNNING: You are equal to it.

Mr. MANION: It may be that the chairman of the commission looks on me as quite equal to the whole group. But I was too modest to think so.

GOVERNOR GENERAL'S SPEECH

CONTINUATION OF DEBATE ON ADDRESS IN REPLY

The house resumed from Monday, January 23, consideration of the motion of Mr. J. E. Matthews for an address to His Excellency the Governor General in reply to his speech at the opening of the session, and the proposed amendment thereto of Mr. Manion, and the amendment to the amendment of Mr. Woodsworth.

Mr. E. E. PERLEY (Qu'Appelle): I would suggest, Mr. Speaker, that we extend the question period preceding orders of the day, because it seems to me to put the house into that jocular frame of mind that makes it easy for the first speaker who rises after that period.

The speech from the throne is remarkable in two particulars: first, in its length, and second, to my mind, in the fact that it is more or less a death-bed repentance; for we find forecast legislation that may be brought down this session which should have been brought down three or four sessions ago.

If I had time I should like to review the period in our history from 1922 down to the present time, and to discuss the records of the three governments that have been in office during that period: the King government from 1922 to 1930, the Bennett government from 1930 to 1935—the most critical period in our history, not even excepting the war period—and the regime from 1935 to the present. Time will not allow me to do this. I recall, however, that strikingly eloquent message of hope that was flashed across the dominion on the night of the election of 1935, when the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) promised that he would abolish poverty and adversity and bring about in Canada that condition whereby all our difficulties would be settled by peaceful and harmonious conferences with the provinces, and there would be one happy family in the dominion.

I have time only to summarize briefly what has taken place in the last-mentioned period. We find taxation the highest in Canada's history. The government still finds ways of spending more money than it receives. The annual increase in trade which they found when taking office has now become an annual decrease. Exports continue to fall. For the first ten months of last year exports to the United States declined to the extent of $140,000,000. Wheat prices are still low. The Canadian wheat board was illegally discontinued in 1936-37. Taxation has increased, the railway problem is untouched, unemployment and poverty are still with us, and no steps have been taken to strengthen interprovincial or domestic trade or to equalize the prices of primary and secondary products in the domestic market. This last feature is important and it is regrettable that no effort has been made to deal with the situation.

We have had for the last three years what has been rightly termed a do-nothing government. We have had government by commission—commissions headed by party men and party counsel, regardless of their knowledge or lack of knowledge of the subjects with which they have dealt. Lastly, in summarizing, may I point out that the social reform legislation passed by the previous government has been destroyed, partly by judicial decisions and partly by repeal, and there has been no clear hand of leadership in sight.

It is my duty to deal with one or two problems pertaining more particularly to western Canada, and I speak with special reference to relief in Saskatchewan. In that province we have had, in connection with the distribution of relief, a system which in my opinion is a disgrace to this government and to the dominion. I am not complaining of the amount expended, because relief was necessary. Many would not have been able to carry on had it not been for relief. What I am complaining about is the manner in which relief has been distributed in the west. I am referring to the maladministration that has been and is at the present time so apparent—irregularities in the carrying out of relief, and graft in many instances. I repeat, it is a disgrace.

For example, what is going on in the northern part of the province at the present time? Many hon. members, particularly western members, are no doubt aware of what has been taking place. There, the daily press carries red headlines with reference to the evidence given in the courts where certain persons have been prosecuted. Relief has been given out promiscuously to party friends and a favoured few. Orders have been approved by inspectors, supervisors, reeves and secretaries of municipalities and others; and as one witness said before the court, "The government give, I take; thank him nicely." I have here, dated December 27, a headline that reads:

Not Sufficient Checks kept on Relief by Official.

A prominent king's counsel, when pleading for leniency for his client before the court before concurrent sentence of two and a half years was imposed on each of 332 counts for forgery and uttering relief vouchers and cheques, said there had not been sufficient check. The magistrate, in passing sentence, said the accused was only part of a crooked machine. I ask this government what system of auditing or checking is in effect in that province when a man could get away with 332 forgeries involving sums from $15 to $50.

Another headline reads: "Handed more relief than he applied for." On January 14 one witness tells of laxity in checking up municipal relief. Another headline states that direct relief was paid for in the hire of a car of one of the inspectors. The garage people were given an order for groceries. Then we are informed that the Fish Creek relief list is changed daily, and that there is laxity in the check-up. On January 17 a witness states that this check-up was not very efficient; and at the Wakaw trial it was stated that relief was granted to favourites. Again, one man swears that he got all and more than he asked for. The evidence was that it was very easy to get relief.

I have here a statement as reported in the Regina Star of January 17: "Orders for relief were handed out on election day." This is a good one. In point the witness said that some of the relief orders were distributed to people when they came to the polls. He said his father had distributed relief vouchers at his home on election day, and there was a polling booth at his home. What do hon. members think of such a condition as that being allowed to prevail in this country?

Then I have here something that I regret to have to bring to the attention of the house. It is to the effect that the party men in that province decide who shall get the jobs. This is dated January 18 and states:

No jobs for other than Liberals, says Regina M.L.A.

The reference is to the new member-elect of the provincial house and that is the statement he made to the Liberal council when he thought it was behind closed doors. The report continues:

In future, said Mr. McDaniel, "no appointment will be deemed to be properly made unless it bears the initials of Mr. Hogarth (senior member elect for Regina), Mr. McNiven (federal M.P. for Regina), or myself."

I submit that it is a sorry state of affairs when no one in that province can be considered for a position in the service, temporary or otherwise, unless he has the O.K. of these men. I do not think the hon. member for Regina (Mr. McNiven) would be a party to that; I know him too well. But he owes it to this house to make a statement repudiating this, or as to how he appears in the favoured committee that has to O.K. these positions. I think he should repudiate Mr. McDaniel's statement, and I hope he will do so. I should not like to think that he is a part of this political machine, but I have quoted that to show that there is a real machine operating in that province.

Mr. McNIVEN: Read Mr. McDaniel's explanation, given in the same report.

Mr. PERLEY: His explanation I have here. He stated that he thought it was behind closed doors, that his reference was only to post office appointments, and that he did not think there was a reporter present. The reporter comes back and says he shook hands with ten of the council and was in the building.

An hon. MEMBER: Read it all.

Mr. PERLEY: I cannot read it all, but I give the date of the paper and hon. members can look it up; perhaps the hon. member for Regina would like to read it all. I hope he will make a statement to clear himself from any business of that kind.

[Mr. Perley.]

We have also a statement here that tokens have been handed out by merchants in the northern part of the province; that these tokens were taken to pool rooms, beer parlours, barber shops, and that they come back to the merchant who gives goods and cashes the tokens in Regina.

Mr. McLEAN (Melfort): Who is responsible for that statement?

Mr. PERLEY: I have the authority right here of men who have seen the tokens and young men who have used them. If hon. members want to know, all they have to do is to appoint the commission that I am going to demand this afternoon, and I will give the information.

Mr. McLEAN (Melfort): You are not giving it now?

Mr. PERLEY: I have it here, but I do not propose to give it right now. But I think this has been going on in the district of the hon. member, and he can tell the house about it.

Mr. McLEAN (Melfort): I deny that.

Mr. PERLEY: I ask the hon. member to keep his seat.

Mr. McLEAN (Melfort): On a question of privilege, Mr. Speaker, I deny that at any time to my knowledge have tokens been given out and used in that way or in any way in the district I represent, and I ask the hon. member to withdraw that statement.

Mr. PERLEY: The towns named in the information I have received I think are very near the hon. member's district. I am not sure of the towns, but I have the names of several villages and towns in which these tokens were in use. It is very prevalent in all the northern part of the province, and it is a wonder to me if the hon. member's district has escaped. We have inspectors, supervisors and reeves issuing orders even from the cars during the election campaign. Gas coupons are being issued and used at filling stations. There is political patronage in that province that should be cleared up.

I now ask the government to consider, even at this late date, the setting up of a national relief administration or commission to handle the distribution of relief in Saskatchewan from now on, such a commission as we had from 1930 to 1935. I demand that the government take the suggestion into consideration with a view to clearing this thing up. Such a commission should be appointed in due course. The condition I have outlined has perhaps not been prevalent in every part of the province; in the central part I do not think it has prevailed. I know many of the municipal clerks and reeves and councillors in my district; many of these councils are composed of men who have a sense of responsibility and duty, and I am sure it would not be safe to suggest anything such as this to them.

I regret to have to inform the house that owing to a blunder or incompetence on the part of someone last spring, seed was not delivered to the farmers in proper time in the areas in which it was required. Distribution of seed wheat was late. In some cases one farmer had his seed and got it in in proper time, while his neighbour had not, and there was a difference of five to ten bushels an acre in the crops. That condition should be inquired into with a view to finding out who was responsible. We know that the municipalities had prepared their statements and estimates, had arranged their credits at the bank; we know that the board had the order from the government to convert the options into seed, and we know that there was blundering somewhere, and the people in that western country through the lateness of distribution of seed suffered a loss of at least $30,000,000. We know what that means to eastern Canada and to labour and transportation. The loss is so serious that it is the concern of this dominion to know who blundered, because we do not want it to recur this spring.

If the Minister of Finance (Mr. Dunning) were in his seat I should like to ask him to state when this matter of seed wheat is going to be dealt with in this house. When does he propose to bring down his bill providing for seed? Last year he will recall that he asked some of us on this side to refrain from asking questions. In order to facilitate the passing of the bill we did so, but we want to know this year that the bill will come down in time to permit of proper distribution of seed for spring seeding. I have here a resolution which has come to hand in to-day's press. If hon. members care to look it up in the reading room they will see that the association of rural municipalities have protested the delay in the seed distribution in 1938 and requested the government to take action in proper time this year.

I should like to deal with the live stock industry as it affects us in the west. As far as Saskatchewan is concerned it has been struck a blow from which it will not recover for many years. I regret that the Minister of Agriculture was not more concerned last year when there was a demand from farmers in many western rural districts for an increase in the number of sires. I hope that this year he will give proper consideration to the matter and see that it is dealt with efficiently. The live stock industry is in a precarious position, and I urge upon the minister that he take every possible step to foster that industry and restore it to the position it held a few years ago.

The marketing question is also important. I am pleased to note that in the speech from the throne it is indicated that the government may take some action to improve the marketing of our primary products. I have prepared a resolution on this subject and have it ready for the order paper, but unfortunately the procedure does not permit me to have two resolutions on the order paper at the same time. But I ask the government to take some action looking to the passing of the necessary legislation. It may be providing for marketing boards to be set up as under the Bennett government, but some action should be taken to correct the inequality between prices of primary and secondary products in our domestic market. We realize that the domestic market is the best market we have. Ninety-five per cent of our products, other than wheat, are consumed in the domestic market, which should be preserved for the Canadian producer and equalized as I have just suggested.

Now I come to the question of wheat and wheat marketing. Never has the western producer of wheat been in a more precarious position; never have the world wheat markets been more demoralized; never has the future looked more uncertain than is the case at the present time. After listening to the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) the other day I think everyone will agree with that. We only need to look at the comments which appear in the press every day, in any paper you may pick up, to realize the truth of that statement. I would refer to the conference that took place in the city of Winnipeg not long ago, called by the premier of Manitoba, attended by representatives of the federal and provincial government, of the grain exchange, the wheat growers, the wheat pool and so on, to consider this question of the marketing of wheat. No constructive suggestion came from that conference. Then we had the international conference not long ago in London. Nothing of very much importance came from that except the appointment of a committee including the representatives of ten nations to consider five distinct subjects and report at a world conference to be held later. The fifth subject was important; it concerned the desirability of a set export quota, not on a bushelage basis but on the basis of a percentage of world demand. Acreage reduction was definitely shelved at that meeting.

I believe that is an important subject, which should be considered. The farmers of western Canada realize now that there must be some control of production, or at least some control of marketing. I am not in favour of controlling acreage, but if I had the opportunity I think I could work out a scheme for controlling deliveries to the market. I had another resolution ready for the order paper—I do not suppose it will be reached this session—to the effect that the government should consider the advisability of amending the Canada Wheat Board Act to empower the board to control deliveries to it through a system of licensing producers to sell or deliver a given number of bushels per seeded acre, and that the permits to sell should be negotiable among the producers only. I should like to enlarge upon that matter, but time will not permit. However, I do think a system of that kind could be worked out, which would control the amount marketed based on world requirements or possible Canadian exports.

May I say here, Mr. Speaker, that I think there is altogether too much publicity given this question, altogether too much talk with respect to our difficulties in connection with marketing, too much advertising as to our surpluses, and so on. I think there should be some censorship. I hold in my hand a little chart which came to my hand just a day or two ago; I think every member received a copy of it, and I would commend it to the study of hon. gentlemen. It deals with the world and Canadian wheat situation under three heads; world and Canadian production, world and Canadian surplus and world and Canadian exports. After reviewing that, sir, I have no hesitation in saying that I am not fearful of the future. I am not a pessimist, and on that I agree with what was said by the Minister of Labour (Mr. Rogers) yesterday. I think many of these problems could and should be approached from an optimistic rather than a pessimistic point of view, and I am an optimist in connection with the possibilities of marketing our wheat in the future.

Now, I should like to say just a word with regard to the wheat board in 1938. I commend the government for carrying on that board for the 1938 crop. They set the price at 80 cents. I think if they had pursued a proper selling policy they could have set the price at 90 cents without incurring any greater loss than will be incurred under present conditions. The policy which was announced when that price was set tended to depress the market. I have before me a statement by Mr. Sanford Evans of Winnipeg, who is a statistician of some renown, as follows:

> In announcing the plan this season the government went to questionable extremes in disavowing market-price motives.

In another article Mr. Evans quotes from the Chicago Journal of Commerce, in which that newspaper said that when the price was set and the policy of the government announced, it had the effect of depressing the market. Then he quotes from Broomhall's Corn Trade News, of Liverpool, a day or two after the price was set. That should be an authority, and here is what Broomhall said:

> As a fact, after a small advance, Winnipeg futures dropped several cents a bushel, considerable importance being given to a statement by the Canadian premier, Mr. Mackenzie King, that the wheat board's policy would not be to withhold supplies from the international market, but rather to offer competition at all times. In other words, no attempt is to be made to dictate prices to consumers and, in the prosecution of this policy, the government is prepared to absorb any loss which may be sustained.

The Minister of Agriculture made a very great mistake a few days after the price was set— I am not sure of the exact date—when down in Ontario he made the statement that the board was prepared to take a $30,000,000 loss. I would ask this question of any man who has had anything to do with industry: If you had a new manager in charge; if you had a year's business to transact, and if in the first three weeks your chief director went out telling the people to whom you expected to sell your goods that you were prepared to take a $30,000,000 loss, what would you think? I say that statement, or any statement with respect to the possible loss, should have been withheld until the last three weeks of the crop year, at least. I have already quoted statements to show that the policy as announced by the government had a depressing effect on the market.

Just here I should like to ask the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Euler), one question, though it may be a question which should be placed on the order paper. Before the price was set, on August 4, did the board sell futures? Perhaps he can turn that question over in his mind and answer it some time later. The price at that time in the open market was 86 cents, and if the board did sell futures—and I hope they did—they may make a handsome profit. If that is the case we will not have the loss everyone seems to expect.

What I want to know is this: What is to be the policy of this government with respect to the marketing of wheat in 1939? They should have a policy, and it should be announced. Western Canada was expecting that announcement by the Minister of Agriculture at the first opportunity. Does any hon. member of this house know the government policy? I do not think so. But I believe the minister has a policy. He took part in the Brandon by-election campaign, during which he spoke at Reston on October 25. He is reported by the Canadian Press as follows:

> The minister stated that the government's experience with the present wheat board had convinced him that the board was only effective to deal with temporary emergencies.

The following day he spoke at Souris, and in the Regina Leader-Post I find the following headline:

> Permanent Wheat Board Inadvisable, Gardiner Believes

It is true that a day or two later, at Saskatoon, the minister tried to correct that statement and said he did not mean exactly what the press had reported him as having said, but he can tell us now, in this house, exactly what he means; that is what we expected him to do the other day. I do believe, however, that the minister has made up his mind and that he has a policy. I would refer to the Regina Leader-Post of January 19, which I saw in the reading room the other morning. There I found this headline:

> Gardiner Informally Approves of Wheat Quota Plan Proposed by Weyburn Farmer

The article goes on to say that a Mr. Lowery, of the Weyburn district, had outlined a scheme under which a farmer would be permitted to sell a thousand bushels at a dollar a bushel, and that the farmer must have been actually farming during 1938 and 1939 in order to come under the plan. The remainder of his crop could be disposed of in some other way, or through the open market. It goes on to say that the person in question had outlined the scheme, had sent it to the Minister of Agriculture and that the minister had replied saying that he informally approved of the scheme. That is the quotation from the Regina Leader-Post.

Mr. GARDINER: I think the hon. member wishes to be fair, and that he will agree the article underneath that headline does not agree with the headline.

Mr. PERLEY: I have quoted it and copied it from the Regina Leader-Post. It is unfortunate the minister's mouthpiece in Saskatchewan cannot report or interpret his views as to what he means. However the minister has the opportunity right now. There is the statement that the minister made a reply and that he has some policy. We would like to know what it is.

The other day the Minister of Agriculture made some observations concerning increases in acreage. His statement was that the importing countries in Europe had not increased their acreage but had improved their system of farming and had thereby increased their production. My reply to that is that Canadian producers have very materially increased their acreage in the period mentioned by the minister, but that increase in acreage was a patriotic duty. During the last one or two years of the war, and in years following, Great Britain asked Canada to make sure of a food supply for the British isles, and with that end in view we increased our acreage in western Canada for the production of wheat. That action was taken as a patriotic duty. Because of action taken at that time we find ourselves in a difficult position to-day, and I do not think that it is fair to ask the farmer to reduce his acreage, when there should be some other way of giving him a fair deal.

The minister referred to the increase of production in European countries. He might have added that Germany, Italy and France increased duties against Canadian wheat during the period between the years 1922 and 1930 when the Liberal party was in office. For the information of hon. members who are of the opinion that a general reduction in tariff to those countries means an increase in what they purchase from us, I should like to set out certain facts. In 1922, when hon. members opposite were in office, France was enforcing a duty of 20 cents per bushel on wheat; it was admitted free into Germany and free into Italy. When the Liberal party left office in 1930, France had increased her duty to 85 cents per bushel, Germany had imposed a duty of 97 cents and Italy one of 86 cents. That was the reply made by those countries in connection with our exports of Canadian wheat, and during a period when we had made general reductions in rates of duties on goods coming from those parts of the world.

The Minister of Agriculture has made reference to the six-cent preference. His statement was that the removal of the preference had nothing to do with shipments through Canadian ports. May I point out that while the preference has been taken off, the United States has not offered us any compensation by reducing the duty of 42 cents on Canadian wheat entering that country. The rate still prevails. And with reference to the observation that the six-cent preference has nothing to do with grain entering through Canadian ports I would refer the minister to a statement issued by the Secretary of State of the United States the day after the treaty was signed. This statement made public the text of the new reciprocal trade pacts between the United States and the United Kingdom, and the United States and Canada and said, in part:

The state department, making public the text of the new reciprocal trade pact between the United States and the United Kingdom, predicted the agreement should facilitate recovery of a larger share of the British wheat market by American farmers.

One of the most important British concessions it said "is the removal of the duty on wheat which has been equivalent to about six cents a bushel." This has tended to divert trade to Canada and Australia.

The United States formerly sold great quantities of wheat to the United Kingdom, and with normal crops in the future and the restoration of free entry it again should be able to sell large quantities.

Ports in Competition

Also, as a result of the removal of the preference it should be possible for the United States port and transportation interests to regain their lost business in the transshipment of Canadian wheat to the United Kingdom.

It may be noted that important concessions have been obtained for United States wheat flour in Newfoundland and the British colonies.

The United Kingdom is the leading wheat-import market of the world. Formerly about a fourth of the total of United States wheat exports were shipped regularly to the United Kingdom.

Under the influence of the world economic depression and the establishment of an import duty in 1932 (with empire wheat remaining duty free), imports of United States wheat into the United Kingdom dropped from 39,267,000 bushels in 1930 (20·1 per cent of total wheat imports) to only 9,000 bushels in 1933 (less than ·05 per cent of the total while imports from empire sources for the corresponding year rose from 79,234,000 bushels (40·5 per cent of total wheat imports) to 140,459,000 bushels (67 per cent of the total).

It is also pointed out that the United States is likely to get back business for her ports.

Then, there is something further I should like to place before the Minister of Agriculture for explanation. This is from a report in the New York Journal of Commerce, dated December 13, 1938:

Britain takes More U.S. Subsidy Wheat
5,000,000 bushels Bought—Attainment of Export Goal is Seen

Another substantial portion of the self-imposed wheat export quota of 100,000,000 bushels for the United States has been filled with the disclosure by the Department of Agriculture late yesterday of an additional sale of 5,000,000 bushels to the United Kingdom.

Then, mark this:

Price again was not mentioned. The trade is aware, however, that low levels must have been received in view of the depressed condition of the world wheat market. This, in turn, means additional expensive subsidizing of the exports.

May I now refer to the matter of low prices? On my way to Ottawa I paid a visit to the grain exchange. Although I am not very popular at that place I made a call and was told that in the first sale of 20,000,000 bushels made by the United States to Great Britain under the new arrangement the market had broken to the extent of two cents, and that there had been dumping. In the agreement of 1932 with the United Kingdom there was a clause which protected the Canadian wheat grower against unfair competition, in that British authorities agreed to impose the dumping duty against Russia, the Argentine or any other country guilty of dumping. The United States has been guilty of dumping on the first sale it has made. I know the British authorities were disappointed in the fact that the market was broken to the extent of two cents. The British producer is subsidized in his own market to the extent of $1.30 per bushel. Every cent the Liverpool market is broken is another cent out of the British treasury.

As the time at my disposal is drawing to a close there are some matters with which I shall not have time to deal. I wish however to refer briefly to the treaty. From the standpoint of increased export trade I do not believe the results will be satisfactory. The Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) admitted giving concessions but he did not give details of compensations we were to receive. He is trying to sell the idea to the primary producers of Canada that he is giving up preferences as a means of promoting harmony, unity and peace. What bunk! I do not believe the western producer will swallow that explanation. He will not believe that it is necessary for us to give up all these preferences in order to create peace and unity among the English-speaking nations or democracies. Does the Prime Minister think the United States would not want our friendship if Japan happened to throw a few bombs in the country across the border? What does the Prime Minister think of what Hitler will say with respect to the fact that we have foregone our six-cent preference? Will he be more friendly to us? There is nothing assured in the treaty.

I have made some calculation with respect to the quota on live stock, and they show that the constituency of Qu'Appelle could supply a very considerable proportion of the quota, and four times the milk quota.

Mr. SPEAKER: Order.

Mr. PERLEY: I thank you, Mr. Speaker, for the consideration given me last night. I should have liked to have another moment or two, but I realize that without unanimous consent I may not proceed.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Go on.

Mr. PERLEY: In conclusion I wish to point out that the British market is the stable market of the world. During the whole period of the depression Great Britain decreased her exports by only five per cent, whereas the exports of France decreased 56 per cent, of Germany 77 per cent and of Italy 60 per cent. I urge that these figures prove the assertion that Great Britain is the stable market—and we are now out of it.

I asked the minister a few moments ago to state the wheat policy of the government, and I hope that he or some other member of the cabinet will do so. Why was industry not consulted in the making of this agreement? Why did not this parliament have the opportunity to pass on it, as it had in 1932? All that western Canada wants is a square deal. There is no east or west so far as we are concerned, and I regret to see that some of the press are trying to make an issue of that. The Conservative party intends to give the west a square deal. Ours will be a constructive policy that will give protection to the great agricultural industry of the west, the backbone of this dominion; and the Conservative party realizes that just as well as anyone else.

Just a word with respect to the subamendment. In great part I could have supported it, but I regret that I am unable to do so because of the way it is worded. If the amendment had read "those financial institutions which are exploiting the Canadian people" I would gladly have supported it. But we have a certain control over financial institutions generally at the present time. I would be almost one hundred per cent, I was going to say, behind the subamendment if there had been one other word in it. As it is I propose to support the amendment of the hon. leader of the opposition (Mr. Manion), and I shall have something further to say later as important problems come before the house.

Mr. R. W. MAYHEW (Victoria, B.C.): Mr. Speaker, I rise on this the first occasion of my addressing this house, recognizing my obligation to the city of Victoria, the constituency which I am proud to represent here. I recognize also my obligation to hon. members to make any suggestions that I consider will tend to create a better understanding between the different parts of Canada and better conditions within our country.

I would ask the house to bear with me for a moment while I say a word about the city of Victoria. I believe that its advantages are fully appreciated, generally speaking, but in some quarters our city is not very well known. I shall not say anything about its wonderful climate or about the beauty of the city itself. I do not wish to say anything in particular about our industries, which are mainly lumbering, mining and fishing, and the tourist trade. But I do wish to say a word about Victoria as the western gateway to Canada. It is the gateway to Canada for all those people who are living on the shores of the Pacific ocean, and as such the city of Victoria and its citizens recognize their responsibility to the rest of Canada. We would like to make it such a city that when people enter it for the first time they will get not only a view of the beauty of the city itself but a glimpse into the character of the people who live in this wonderful country of Canada.

I am sorry to say, however, that we have at least one drawback in Victoria. Our outer port is very badly run down, and is very greatly in need of repair. It presents a very bad approach to the city. It is owned practically by the dominion government, and I am in hopes, Mr. Speaker, that the present condition will be improved within a short time.

I should like now to join with other members in congratulating the mover (Mr. Matthews) and the seconder (Mr. Chevrier) of the address in reply to the speech from the throne. I had never before had the experience of listening to addresses of this kind, but from what has already been said by so many members of the outstanding ability of the mover and the seconder, I can readily understand that their rank with other speakers on similar occasions is very high. I heartily congratulate them both upon their efforts.

I should like now to refer briefly but most sincerely to the forthcoming visit of our king and queen to Canada, and particularly to their visit to the city of Victoria. I can assure hon. gentlemen that the kindness and warmth of the reception which their majesties will receive in the city of Victoria will not be surpassed by that of any other community of equal size in this dominion. I am pleased to note that a representative has already left Ottawa and spent a week-end in Victoria arranging for their majesties' visit. Already offers of assistance are coming in from all quarters of the city and from people in all walks of life who are anxious to assist in the reception. I hope that a definite organization will soon get under way to co-ordinate the efforts of those who are willing to assist in the reception, and that everybody, particularly our young people, will be given the opportunity to see their king and queen.

The benefits that will accrue from this visit will be many, and I hope they will be permanent. I hope that it will be a time when we as the people of Canada will examine our own hearts and minds and find out for ourselves if we are big enough to look beyond the boundaries of our own community, over the borders of our own province, and beyond the shores of our own country and realize that we are an integral part of the British Empire, and that as such we have a right and a duty to stand with the empire in peace or in war, for good or for ill.

As a new member and comparative stranger in the house, Mr. Speaker, it would not be in very good taste for me to criticize men who are much my senior in matters of government, men who I am sure are just as sincere as I am and who will do all they can to make a contribution to the welfare and progress of Canada. But I cannot refrain from remarking that much of the criticism which has been offered by the opposition has been about as original and as constructive and as annoying as losing one's gate on Hallowe'en. This "do-nothing government" is a phrase coined for election purposes, and it is no more reliable than catchwords and slogans often are. I am inclined to believe that the people of Canada read the reports of proceedings in this house, and I am sure that we can depend on their intelligence.

Much has been said in this debate about the diminution of trade in Canada. It is true there has been a diminution, but is the government responsible for that? Is not the diminution of trade due to world conditions? Has not trade diminished because countries are at war with one another, while other countries are engaged in preparation for war?

Mention has been made in this debate particularly of the pulp and paper industry. I happen to have been engaged in that industry for the last twenty-four years, and I admit that the pulp and paper industry on the Pacific coast is having a hard struggle at the present time, but that is not due to any action by this government. It is due particularly to the war between China and Japan. Some of our trouble in the lumber industry is also due to similar conditions.

I am inclined to think that, rather than criticize the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King), we should compliment him on the interest that he has taken in world affairs. I am confident that in taking that interest he will help to correct the present situation. I am confident that, with the new trade agreement in effect, with things settled in the orient and in Europe, we shall not be looking for a solution of our unemployed problem; the difficulty will be rather the other way, namely to find men able to do the work. I am sorry to see evidence in so many places of defeatism in our people. Even at the present time in some of our cities we have no great surplus of trained mechanics. The wastage of ten years will have to be taken care of. Let the clouds of war roll by, give us a few years of peace, and we shall soon find a solution of the problem of unemployment.

My attitude to the tripartite trade agreement is one of gratification, appreciation and general satisfaction. I do not believe that the people of Canada are looking for a gift in the way of trade; they are looking for an equitable agreement, because they realize that it must be equitable to endure. We are looking not for a good bargain but for an opportunity to trade beneficially and uninterruptedly on a friendly basis. We are not looking for a one-way street, as some would indicate. Yet in fairness one must admit that there is a little hardship in some branches of both industry and agriculture. I will mention one branch of agriculture that is affected, particularly in our own district —potato growing. Before the present agreement went into effect the potato grower had the privilege of a countervailing duty which he does not now enjoy. That countervailing privilege was given to him by the present government in the agreement of 1936. He has enjoyed it for two years; but he is no worse off than he was before that time. On the other hand the agriculturist reaps a benefit from the sale of his cattle, his hogs, his dairy products, and many other items, as well as getting an advantage on the things which he has to purchase.

There has been some criticism in this house because of the loss of the six-cent preference on wheat. Naturally we would have liked to see it retained, but I believe the change will provide at least one advantage which we cannot overlook. Wheat, after all, is a raw material. Will not the effect be to encourage the milling business in our country?—and if that happens, the by-products from that milling business will go a long way towards the raising of cheaper cattle and cheaper hogs. It will at least provide cheaper food for our live stock.

One branch of the lumbering industry which is particularly pleased with the treaty is the cedar shingle business. We have several such firms and factories in Victoria. Not only is their quota increased but they are able to continue to sell on a comparatively small duty after their quota has been filled. The lumber business generally is not finding fault with the treaty. Naturally retailers would have liked to retain the full British preference, but they realize in fairness they have to give something. They realize also that the value of a trade with 130,000,000 people across an imaginary boundary line, without any transportation difficulties, is far greater than a market of probably fifty million people six thousand miles away, with transportation interferences to be overcome.

Just here I should like to say a word as to how we may counteract some of the disadvantages that we are under in the way of trade, if we are prepared to pay the price. Alberta is full of coal. Why not bring some of it from Alberta to the east and keep our men in Alberta and the employees of the railways busy, rather than buy our coal from the other side? I ask further, why not bring petroleum products from the Alberta oil fields and use them down here rather than purchase our gasoline and fuel from the other side? Why not give a little assistance to our moving picture industry at the coast, so that we may be able to use our own pictures rather than buy them from the other side? There are many ways in which we can assist, provided we are prepared to pay the bill.

I wish to deal for a moment or two with the youth problem and with youth training. I do not suppose there is a man in this house possessing any of the milk of human kindness who will not be interested in assistance to our youth. I believe the Minister of Labour (Mr. Rogers) should be thanked for what he has done, and encouraged in his work. I cannot understand how the opposition can be honest and yet call the government a do-nothing government when they consider what has been done for youth and for the cure of unemployment. The government is to be congratulated on the start it has made upon the training of youth in Canada. It is true that it is only a start, but reports coming in from every province, such as we had the opportunity of hearing the other night, are evidence that that start is appreciated by the mothers and fathers of the young people of this country.

We talk a great deal about the wonderful natural resources of Canada, but of all the potential values in Canada there is nothing to be compared with the potential value of our young people, and I urge that we give them every opportunity we can to make full use of their Canadian citizenship.

Large numbers of high school graduates, as well as those who do not complete a high school course, cannot find jobs. More and more, the young people reaching the age of employment each year encounter a regiment of newly-invented machines, competing with them for their jobs.

The failure to keep the open door of opportunity for youth is tantamount to recruiting large numbers for the marching clubs of dictators. Since this condition is a serious one is it not time to stop criticizing the efforts that are being put forth, and to make suggestions that may help, viewing every suggestion with an open mind in the hope that out of it all some good may come?

We must not create the impression that the government owes a living to our young people. The government does owe the young people good sound practical education and as little interference as possible so that they as individuals may develop themselves and our natural resources. We do owe them an opportunity to make a living, but the obligation on the part of the government is particularly that of education. That I think we are doing in the youth training program. I would like to see it extended so as to give all young men who have left school and who are unable to find employment three chances —in fact I would say four. It would have to be on a purely voluntary basis, and the choice would have to be theirs. The opportunities I would suggest are these; that they be given an opportunity of joining the militia; that they be given an opportunity of joining the navy, and that this government establish training farms where they may learn agriculture. These farms could be small units scattered through the provinces so that the men trained on them would be absorbed in their own communities as soon as the training had been completed. The other suggestion I make is that mercantile marine training ships be established on both the Atlantic and the Pacific. Many of our boys to-day are jumping into ships, going off to learn seamanship without realizing the nobility of the profession, without realizing the dangers and hazards of it. The result is that after one or two trips they find they are not fitted for the calling. A few weeks in foreign ports is enough to ruin the boy himself. If he were put on a training ship under a proper man he would appreciate the responsibilities of the profession and such training would make him a good mercantile mariner.

With regard to the other two suggestions, I believe that this government have the facilities as well as men of calibre, intellect, loyalty and ability, men who could direct boys in both the militia and the navy, giving them a chance to learn a vocation under reasonable discipline.

I should like to add a further suggestion to the one I have already made. It has to do with the treatment of our older people, because the youth of to-day will be the elderly people of to-morrow. I believe that there is no fear in the human mind so great, no fear that retards the activities and efforts of people to the same extent, as the fear that when one is old one will be dependent upon friends or the government for a living. That fear, I believe, can be very largely banished by putting into effect a compulsory contributory superannuation policy. By this I mean that all employers and all employees in any walk of life should be obliged to contribute an equal share so as to provide for the superannuation of employees when they have reached the age of sixty or sixty-five. I am sure that there would be no opposition to a policy of this kind from the larger employers of labour, and I do not believe that there would be any objection to it by labour itself. It is not fair either to the people or to the government of Canada that workers at the zenith of their earning capacity should be allowed to drift on without making adequate provision for their needs when they are unable to work. Nor is it fair for the employer to use the best part of a life of the employee, making use of him in a competitive system, and then when he is worn out toss him on the scrap heap without consideration as one would a piece of worn out machinery. The government's contribution to this scheme would be one of management, to see to it that the funds as they were collected were properly taken care of.

I would suggest that a uniform plan for Canada be proposed by the dominion government, but that each province look after its own collections, investing its funds in its own securities with the endorsement of the federal government, and thus giving the fund raised for this purpose every security possible. Could we in any saner or better way repatriate our government loans than through some such mode of procedure?

In conclusion I wish to thank the government for what it has been able to do: the consummation of the United States trade agreement; its contribution to unemployment and relief; its contribution to unemployment through the home improvement plan—and in this regard I would ask whether this plan could be extended to business properties so that many of the present dilapidated buildings in our cities might be improved; its contribution to home life through the home building plan; its contribution to people living in municipalities through its municipal aid plan. I would ask the government to pursue this policy of progress so vigorously that no reasonable member could stand in this house and accuse it of being static.

[Mr. Mayhew.]

As a business man I think the only definite cure for our present trouble is an expanding policy. I admit that there is a danger of expanding too rapidly, and in my opinion the expansion of business must not be left entirely to the government. It is an obligation on the part of the individual as well. It is an obligation put upon us by democracy and must be carried out if we are to retain that privilege. In a word, I believe that industry, not quack remedy, is the solution of our present distressing problems.

Mr. T. C. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): May I join with those who have preceded me in extending congratulations to the mover (Mr. Matthews) and the seconder (Mr. Chevrier) of the address in reply to the speech from the throne. I was particularly pleased to listen to the mover of the motion because I had the pleasure of knowing him and his family in Brandon some years ago when I attended college there. It was a very great pleasure for me to hear him make such a fine impression in his maiden speech in this house. I should like also to extend my congratulations to the leader of the opposition (Mr. Manion) upon his accession to his new and difficult position. He is following in the footsteps of a gifted and able predecessor, and I trust he will be granted strength to discharge the duties of his office in a manner that will bring credit to himself and the Dominion of Canada.

I am sorry I cannot concur with hon. members opposite in lauding the pact of Munich as a milestone on the road to world peace. In my opinion, the pact of Munich did not avert war; it only postponed war until that time when, collective action having become impossible, and our allies having fled, the English-speaking nations of the world, isolated and discredited, will face the fascist aggressors alone. The pact of Munich was the final culmination of a long series of concessions to force, each concession leading to a situation that demanded still further surrender. Yielding to dictators does not bring peace; it merely brings about demands for further concessions. However, it is not my purpose at this time to discuss the question of foreign policy, the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) having assured the house that ample opportunity will later on be afforded for a discussion of the matter. Neither do I wish to discuss the government's announcement that there will be increased expenditure for national defence, because that, too, will be debated later in the session. I do wish, however, to urge upon the government that before they bring down the estimates for increased expenditures for national defence, they shall first of all bring down legislation dealing with the national control of the armament industry.

On the order paper, standing in my name, there is a resolution asking for national control of the armament industry, and I trust that the government will anticipate me in this regard. We are agreed in all parts of the house that in view of world conditions Canada ought to be prepared to defend her shores. But what right have we to ask the Canadian taxpayer to contribute between $50,000,000 and $60,000,000 a year for national defence, while at the same time we permit armament manufacturers in this dominion to send a steady stream of aeroplanes, munitions and war material to the very countries against which this government is asking us to arm ourselves? I hope that before this session has proceeded very far the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Mackenzie) will bring down legislation calculated to assure this house that a situation like that revealed by the recent Bren gun inquiry will not recur, and to assure the country that the equipping of Canada for defence will not be accompanied by armament profits, graft and corruption.

Mr. MARTIN: Where is the evidence of that?

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): I did not say there was any. I think the hon. member is a little touchy. There is an old saying that when you throw a stone into a pack of dogs and one yelps, he has been hit.

Mr. MARTIN: Surely the hon. gentleman is going to withdraw that remark.

Mr. MANION: It is a general statement.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): I have nothing to withdraw. I merely made a general statement.

Mr. MARTIN: I ask the hon. member to withdraw that remark if it is intended with reference to any hon. member of this house.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): Certainly, in reference to any hon. member of this house.

Mr. MARTIN: I ask the hon. member to withdraw that statement.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): I have already done so. I said I withdraw any reference to any hon. member of this house.

As a member who represents a western constituency I naturally scanned the speech from the throne to see what it would contain of material benefit for the people whom I represent. I confess that I was disappointed. The problem of the prairies can be summed up in a sentence. It is this: While the primary producer has been compelled for years to buy the necessities of life at a fixed price which has been relatively high, at the same time he has been compelled to sell his products at a fluctuating price which has been disastrously low. In other words, the farmer has to buy in a closed market with a more or less controlled price, while he has sold in an open market with a fluctuating price.

As an example I quote the figures submitted by the Saskatchewan government in their brief to the commission on dominion-provincial relations last year. At page 172 they say that the cash income of the farmers of Saskatchewan declined from some $334,000,000 in 1925 to a little over $48,000,000 in 1937. The average cash income for the nine year period 1929 to 1937 was 65 per cent less than the average income for the eight year period 1921 to 1928. Also the total estimated value of farm land, buildings, live stock and equipment declined from $3,255,294,000 in 1921 to $1,980,000,000 in 1936; a disastrous decline of approximately 40 per cent despite an increase in the same period of 12,444 occupied farms.

The brief goes on to say that the total decline in income of the three prairie provinces in the five year period 1926 to 1930 compared with the period 1931 to 1935 was from $3,526,313,000 to $1,590,725,000, a reduction of more than 50 per cent.

At page 179 there is a comparison between the prices of 147 articles which farmers commonly buy and the prices they have received for products which they have to sell. In 1920 the ratio was 196 as compared with 182; in 1936 the ratio was 127 as compared with 76. In other words, while the farmers have been receiving much less for the goods they have to sell, they are paying relatively more for the goods they have to buy.

This decline in agricultural income has had two results for the farmer. First, there has been a tremendous increase in debt. It is quite apparent that obligations which were often difficult to meet with good crops of wheat at $1.25 a bushel have become impossible to meet with poorer crops and wheat prices down to forty or fifty cents a bushel.

The brief pointed out that the mortgage indebtedness in Saskatchewan at the end of 1937 was in the neighbourhood of $482,000,000, which sum was nearly $15 per acre of crop land, or almost $7,000 per mortgaged farm. The brief further states that not more than five per cent of the farmers are free of debt. The result, of course, has been an increase in tenant farming. In 1901 only 1·6 per cent of the farms of Saskatchewan were occupied by tenants; in 1936 the figure had increased to 20·4 per cent. In 1901 two per cent of the farmers of Manitoba were tenants, while in 1936 the proportion had increased to 20 per cent.

A second effect of the decline in agricultural income has been a reduction in purchasing power. Some years ago Professor Rogers, now the Minister of Labour, made the statement that the people of Saskatchewan paid $29,000,000 a year more for the goods that they buy in the stores than they would pay if they were buying these goods in the markets of the world. He said further that the people of the three prairie provinces pay $86,000,000 a year more in tribute by virtue of the tariff because of the fiscal policy under which we live. The amazing thing remains, however, that the gentleman who compiled these figures is a member of the present government, has been for three years, and the situation is not altered. I remember in 1935 seeing a pamphlet entitled "The Forgotten Consumer" issued by the Liberal party. It listed a series of articles such as razor blades, coffee, aspirin, baking powder, and pointed out that prices in Canada were anywhere from twenty to thirty-five per cent more than in the United States. I have checked those figures in the United States this fall and find that the spread has not decreased but in some instances has actually increased. The constituency which I represent lies along the international boundary. I have therefore an excellent opportunity of comparing prices in this country and the United States. I have before me in tabulated form a list of articles; I shall not take time to read it but am quite willing to put it on Hansard if any hon. members wish.

An hon. MEMBER: Nobody wishes.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): The list includes articles such as International trucks, Ford automobiles, tires, gasoline, distillate, cream-separators, gas engines, combine harvesters, disc harrows, sugar, coffee, oranges, overshoes, overalls, unbleached sheeting, radios, et cetera. In every instance, taking two towns opposite each other, one on each side of the international boundary, we find that the Canadian consumer is paying twenty to forty-five per cent more for those articles, despite the fact that wages in those parts of the United States are higher than in Canada. In the case of repairs for automobiles the consumer in this country pays as high as seventy per cent more than the consumer in the United States. I draw this to the attention of the house because the hon. gentlemen who complained about this and the Minister of Labour himself are members of this government. What have they done about the matter? When it was raised at the last session the Minister of Labour rose in his place and said that it was impossible at the present time to lower tariffs in this country without destroying the basis of confederation.

I reviewed this material to point out that while the income of the farmers of the west, and particularly of Saskatchewan, has declined until last year in Saskatchewan it was one-seventh of what it was in 1925, at the same time by means of such factors as fixed interest rates, tariffs and excessive freight rates the prices of the commodities they have to buy have been kept fairly high. This government has been in office now for almost four years.

An hon. MEMBER: Too long.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): It is quite likely that next fall they will be going to the country—at least we all hope so. During their term of office what have they done to meet this situation? It is not altogether fair to say that they have done nothing. No government can be in power for four years and do absolutely nothing, but the net result of what they have done amounts to nothing.

Let us see first of all what they have done for the farmer. When they came into power in 1935 the prairie farmer could deliver his wheat to the wheat board and receive a guaranteed minimum price of 87½ cents per bushel at Fort William, together with participation certificates that would give him a further return if the wheat brought more in the markets of the world. Three wheat crops have been taken off since this government took office. In connection with two of them the farmer was denied the right to deliver his wheat to the wheat board, and in connection with the third crop he received 7½ cents per bushel less than he got before. Some hon. gentlemen opposite have been very loud in their praises of the government for paying on the 1938 crop a fixed price that was higher than the market price. May I remind the house that the price of eighty cents per bushel is payable at Fort William and that according to the crop report released last Friday by the agricultural branch of the dominion bureau of statistics the average price received by the farmers themselves was fifty-nine cents per bushel for No. 1 wheat. May I point out further that according to the same report, despite the fact that the wheat crop of 1938 was a little more than double that of 1937 in terms of bushels, the total cash income of the farmer was only about eleven per cent more, while the net income was about six per cent less because it cost more to take off the wheat.

Mr. McLEAN (Melfort): Would the hon. member be good enough to inform the house where those figures are available?

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): I refer the hon. member to the report of the agricultural branch of the dominion bureau of statistics which report was issued last Friday at four o'clock.

Mr. GARDINER: Giving fifty-nine cents for No. 1 northern?

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): Yes.

Mr. GARDINER: Not the average price received by the farmer?

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): According to this report the average price was fifty-nine cents.

Mr. GARDINER: For No. 1 northern?

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): No; the average price received for wheat.

Mr. GARDINER: That is too high, I think.

Mr. McLEAN (Melfort): That is quite impossible.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): Well, I refer my hon. friend to the report; I shall be glad to send it over to him if he wants to use it. I do not propose to take up time reading any more of it, but after I make one more quotation from it I shall send it to my hon. friend.

Mr. McLEAN (Melfort): I wish it were correct, but I am afraid it is too high.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): It may be too high, but I am trying to give the government every possible credit, as the hon. gentleman will appreciate. The report which I received in November gave the figure as fifty-seven cents, while the report issued last Friday gave it as fifty-nine cents.

Now, with reference to the marketing of products other than wheat, the government has failed to take any constructive action. They were a party to having the Natural Products Marketing Act, which might have assisted the farmers in controlling the marketing of their own products, referred to the courts, and they have put nothing in its place. There has been no attempt to work out a marketing scheme as between the federal and provincial governments which would enable the farmers to control effectively the marketing of their products. Consequently, this year, farmers who have sold oats, barley, rye, hogs, poultry and so on have done so at prices so low as to lead to nothing but bankruptcy for those engaged in these phases of agriculture. I refer again to this crop report released last Friday, which says:

> The gross farm value of production of the 1938 field crops is now estimated at $528,860,000, which is five per cent below the value of $556,222,000 in 1937, due to price reductions more than offsetting the effect of increased production.

The third claim made by the government is that they have given the farmer increased trade by virtue of the recent trade agreements. As has been said from all parts of the house, it is too early as yet to assess the merits or demerits of that agreement. One thing is certain, however; the United States government considers that the removal of the six cent preference on wheat will enable that country to export large quantities of wheat to Great Britain at the expense of the farmer of western Canada. I have in my hand a statement which was issued by the state department at Washington under date of November 18. I have time to read only two or three short excerpts, as follows:

> The United States formerly sold great quantities of wheat to the United Kingdom, and with normal crops in the future and the restoration of free entry it again should be able to sell large quantities. . . .
> Under the influence of the world economic depression and the establishment of an import duty in 1932 (with empire wheat remaining duty free), imports of United States wheat into the United Kingdom dropped from 39,267,000 bushels in 1930 (20·1 per cent of total wheat imports) to only 9,000 bushels in 1933 (less than ·05 per cent of the total) while imports from empire sources for the corresponding year rose from 79,234,000 bushels (40·5 per cent of total wheat imports) to 140,459,000 bushels (67 per cent of the total). . . .
> In view of the large wheat surplus this year in the United States and the probability that the United States will continue to be on a wheat export basis in the future, the removal of the competitive disadvantage which confronted our wheat in the United Kingdom should facilitate recovery of a larger share of that market.

There is no doubt that the western farmer is going to pay the price for any concession this government has gained under the trade agreement.

May I turn now to what this government has done for the unemployed. First of all, as they promised, they set up a commission; not a commission to administer or dispense relief, as they had promised, but a commission to advise the government and to gather statistics. Having brought in its report and made recommendations to the minister—four-fifths of which he did not accept—that commission was dissolved. The second thing they did was consistently to throw the problem of relief back upon the municipalities and provinces, where it does not belong. These bodies, with only limited fields of taxation, cannot begin to carry the burden of relief, nor should they be expected to do so. This government has found refuge behind the divided responsibility set up under the British North America Act. But they knew there was divided responsibility in 1933, when the present Prime Minister said from his place on this side of the house that unemployment was Canada's most urgent national problem, and when he promised to appoint a commission to deal with it. They knew there was this divided responsibility in 1935, when they were elected to office; yet not until 1937, two years later, did they appoint a commission to investigate this divided responsibility. And now in 1939, two years later, we are still waiting for a report from the commission. Someone should change the old saying to "The mills of the Grits grind slowly." Then in the speech from the throne the Prime Minister says that when they finally do get a report from this commission they are going to have a conference. I do not want to say anything about that conference; I shall just quote what the Prime Minister said in this house about conferences on January 27, 1937, as reported at page 322 of Hansard for that year:

> It seems to me our generation has gone a little mad on the question of conferences. A conference is often a very convenient way of appearing to be doing something while in reality very little may be achieved.

That may well define the conference that is going to be held. Then, Mr. Speaker, what has this government done for youth, particularly unemployed youth? They have set up some youth training courses, which are commendable. I visited a number of these schools, and I think the men and women who are doing that work ought to be encouraged. But when you realize the comparatively small number of young people affected, as compared with the hundreds of thousands of young people who to-day have no hope of getting gainful employment, you will see that as yet we have not even scratched the surface of the problem. I cannot go into the figures the minister quoted yesterday, but I must point out that they touched only upon the numbers on relief or those who have been employed. In the past eight years thousands of young people who have become of age are living with their parents. They are not registered as being on relief or as having worked. Those young people are to be found in every town. They have never worked and they are not registered. In every small town of Saskatchewan they may be seen standing around the filling stations or street corners looking for jobs, and their only hope is that of obtaining a little work on government projects. The situation has reached a point in Saskatchewan where one cannot get work on a government project unless one happens to be of the right political complexion.

Mr. YOUNG: That is not true.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): The hon. member says that is not true. Does he wish me to read what appeared in the Leader-Post of last Wednesday?

> Party men to decide.
> No jobs for others than Liberals, says Regina M.L.A.
> A definite clamp has been placed upon the appointment of Regina residents to posts within the civil service that bars those whose political faith is other than Liberal, B. J. McDaniel, K.C., junior member-elect for Regina, told the meeting of the Liberal council at the Labour temple Tuesday night.
> In future, said Mr. McDaniel, "no appointment will be deemed to be properly made unless it bears the initials of Mr. Hogarth (senior member-elect for Regina), Mr. McNiven (federal M.P. for Regina), or myself."

Mr. YOUNG: Read his denial.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): I expected that. I am not trying to misrepresent the matter. I have before me Mr. McDaniel's explanation—even Mr. McDaniel thought it ought to be explained. This is what he says:

> Appointments discussed by members of the Regina Liberal council Tuesday night were not permanent positions over which federal or provincial civil service have authority, according to B. J. McDaniel, M.L.A., retiring president of the Regina association.
> In further explanation of his statements before the council, Mr. McDaniel said Thursday that only temporary Christmas jobs in the post office were involved and he contended the report would cause misunderstanding if this point were overlooked.

Mr. YOUNG: The first question is this: Does Mr. McDaniel—if that is true—control all positions in Saskatchewan?

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): That is exactly what I want to know. Since when did the retiring president of the Liberal association, a member of the provincial legislature of Saskatchewan, begin making appointments to the post office, which is under federal jurisdiction? I ask this: Has the public morality of this country sunk so low that a Liberal member may bluntly state in a Liberal paper, or publish boldly the fact that no Canadian, though he may be a Canadian citizen and a Canadian taxpayer, though he may have fought for his country on the field of battle, shall have a job, even if that job be one of shovelling snow, unless upon his application are the initials of the three musketeers from Regina? Is that situation to prevail? That seems to be the situation, as it is set out here. And then, one other thing—

Mr. McNIVEN: Probably the hon. member would read the balance of Mr. McDaniel's explanation.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): Mr. Speaker, I do not purpose using up the forty minutes at my disposal in reading lengthy statements. The hon. member for Regina (Mr. McNiven) may, if he wishes, in the forty minutes at his disposal, read the entire Leader-Post. If the house would permit me sufficient time, I would be prepared to put the whole article on Hansard.

Mr. GARDINER: But it looks better to send out your Hansard without it.

Mr. PERLEY: The balance is worse; it gets the government in deeper.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): I hope you are taking note of the time, Mr. Speaker. I should like to make some observations with respect to what has been done in connection with the farm placement scheme, the regulations for which I have in my hand. This year those regulations have been constructed so as to make impossible the qualification of thousands of young men and women who were eligible last year. This year they find they are deprived of the opportunity of earning a few dollars. I have before me many letters from people in and outside my constituency who worked under the scheme last year but who find it impossible to do so this year. I doubt if anything I encountered on the prairies this fall caused quite so much bitterness of feeling as the new regulations in connection with the farm placement scheme.

In the time I have left at my disposal I should like to outline some of the suggestions the group to which I belong has advocated in the past three sessions as alternatives for the policies which have been followed by the government. From time to time, in common with all opposition parties, we have found it necessary to criticize the government. At all times we have tried to be constructive in our criticisms and to offer alternative suggestions. I shall set out briefly the suggestions which have been made by this group, the first of which is as follows:

1. The Cooperative Commonwealth Federation have asked for fixed guaranteed prices to the primary producers under a properly planned marketing system.

A few nights ago the Prime Minister repeatedly stated the fact that trade was the only hope, and that economic nationalism was responsible for the depression. I believe that suggestion is capable of debate. Be that as it may, however, are we to assume the Prime Minister means that we in Canada can do nothing towards trade revival until the world returns to a state of sanity? Are we to believe that we must sit and wait until the other nations of the world are ready to forsake economic nationalism and return to free trade? Surely the government must realize that the selling of a greater quantity of commodities on the markets of the world will not meet the situation, unless the price received by the farmers for those commodities is commensurate with the cost of production.

The other suggestions are as follows:

2. Members of the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation consistently advocated a crop insurance scheme which would enable farmers to manage in those years in which, through no fault of their own, they are deprived of a crop.

3. The Cooperative Commonwealth Federation group have advocated consistently a work and wages program which would utilize the unemployed in the city and farmers of the drought stricken areas.

4. Members of the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation have advocated the lowering of the age for old age pensions and increasing the amount of the pension.

There are 850,000 people in Canada who are over sixty-five years of age and who, if it were possible for them to retire with security, would be able to leave jobs to younger people who at the present time cannot get work.

5. Members of this group have consistently advocated an unemployment insurance scheme and are still waiting for the government to take some energetic steps in this regard. No doubt the close proximity of a general election will bring forth something—at least on paper.

6. Federal grants to education and national scholarships have been advocated by this group as a means of dealing with the terrible plight of school teachers and pupils alike in the depressed areas of Canada. In Saskatchewan back salaries owing teachers is in the neighbourhood of $1,000,000 and the conditions in the schools almost beggars description.

7. We advocate cooperative handling of farm machinery, with a view to enabling the farmers to secure machinery at a much lower price.

Last year I moved an amendment to the farm implement committee's report to this effect, but the government did not see fit at that time to accept it. During that debate the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) figuratively shook his fist under the nose of the farm implement manufacturers. He told them that serious consequences would follow unless something were done about the high price of farm machinery. What has he done? May I ask any member of the government what has been done about the high prices of farm machinery. In the recent trade agreement there was no indication of a lowering of the tariff on farm machinery, despite the fact that many hon. members opposite advocated and intimated that farm machinery and cream separators should be placed on the free list.

8. Last year a comprehensive scheme of slum clearance and housing was advocated by the hon. member for Vancouver North (Mr. MacNeil) on behalf of this group. There is no more pressing need in Canada, but as yet nothing has been done in this regard. A housing scheme was passed. It has built houses for a few people who are able to meet the requirements. How many houses have been built on farms? How many slum areas have been cleared? How many low-rental houses have been constructed? These things have not been done because part 1 of the scheme requires enabling legislation by the provinces, and that legislation has not been forthcoming.

9. This group has advocated the extension of the principle of the Farmers' Creditors Arrangement Act to enable not only farmers but homeowners and small business men throughout the country to reduce obligations which were assumed in times when the purchasing power of a dollar was much less than it is to-day. The government's only response has been to restrict rather than to extend the operations of the act.

10. Members of this group have suggested that such a program could be financed without increasing the burden of taxation, which now rests too heavily upon the people least able to bear it, not by an eight per cent sales tax to which we are violently opposed, but by (a) an increased income tax in the higher brackets; (b) a surplus profits tax, and (c) by deriving revenues from some of the great monopolies such as the tobacco industry, the meat packing industry, and the gasoline industry, which are at the present moment exploiting the Canadian people to an extent that amounts almost to highway robbery.

In conclusion may I say this, Mr. Speaker. Last Easter when I was returning to this house, I met in the town of Sudbury a young man who was out of work and had been riding freight trains across Canada looking for a job. He said something to me that I fear is being said too often in various parts of Canada to-day. He said, "I believe in democracy, but if I have to choose between democracy and a job, I am going to take the job and let democracy go." Only last week a prominent official of the Anglican church on leaving for England gave an interview in which he said, "I believe that Hitler is the greatest statesman in the world. Germany and Italy have solved their unemployment problem, and Canada should be able to do the same."

Mr. MARTIN: Of course, that is not true.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): I cite these two instances because I believe they are symptomatic.

Mr. YOUNG: But is it the hon. member's own view?

Mr. DOUGLAS: (Weyburn): If my hon. friend will allow me to make my speech, I shall in turn listen to him. I may say that it is not my own view. But there are in Canada to-day, hundreds of thousands of people exhausted by eight years of economic insecurity and instability, who are now beginning to say: "If we have to choose between security and democracy, we will take security and let democracy go; if we have to choose between freedom and stability, we will take stability and let freedom go." I believe, Mr. Speaker, that democracy is on trial to-day as it has not been on trial for centuries. I believe that democracy must be made to work, and that unless it can provide jobs for the unemployed, equitable prices for the farmers, and give opportunities and stability to the business and professional classes, democracy will be thrust aside in favour of some other form of government. It is not enough to talk about democracy. The present Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) has talked more about democracy than any other man in Canada, and perhaps, in view of his great opportunity, he has done less than any other man in Canada to preserve it.

The Prime Minister also talks about national unity. But people do not unite simply because you tell them to unite. People unite if they have some great goal in common, and when they feel they are marching toward some national attainment, with some unity of purpose. But the people of Canada do not believe they are marching towards some national attainment.

We in this group believe in democracy. But by democracy we do not mean laissez-faire, maintaining things as they are, inefficiency. We believe that you can have freedom and social security; we believe that you can have democracy and employment. We believe that you can have liberty and economic planning; we believe that we can give to the people of Canada a more abundant life without destroying freedom of speech, freedom of assembly, freedom of the press, freedom of religion, or parliamentary institutions. Rather we believe that building upon these fundamentals of our society we can go forward from political democracy to economic democracy, without which all talk of democracy is idle and futile.

Abraham Lincoln said that no nation could long exist half-slave and half-free. It is equally true that no nation can long exist politically free and economically enslaved. That is where we part company with hon. gentlemen opposite. I believe that most of them are democrats but they are political democrats, not social democrats, not economic democrats. They believe that parliament should be controlled by the people of Canada, but that the economic life of Canada should be left in the hands of the monopolies and financial barons. But unless parliament is prepared to control big business, in a few years big business will control parliament. That has happened in other countries, and it can happen here.

We in this group believe that the salvation of Canada depends upon this parliament taking effective steps to control those financial institutions and monopolistic enterprises that are now exploiting the people of Canada. When we have done that, and only when we have done that, can we be sure that government of the people, for the people and by the people shall not perish from the earth.

Mr. BRUCE McNEVIN (Victoria, Ont.): Mr. Speaker, I rise for the purpose first of all of extending my congratulations to the mover (Mr. Matthews) and the seconder (Mr. Chevrier) of the address to his excellency in reply to the speech from the throne. Both hon. members made a profound impression upon this assembly.

My next thought is to express great pleasure and satisfaction on my part and on the part of my constituents at the proposed visit of Their Majesties the King and Queen to this dominion in the months of May and June. This gracious gesture on the part of our sovereigns, which is without precedent in our history, will I am sure quicken the spirit of loyalty within the mind and heart of every true Canadian.

As one of the members who did not have the pleasure prior to the present session of parliament of sitting in the house with the hon. member for London, the leader of the opposition (Mr. Manion), I desire to extend to him my heartiest congratulations upon being chosen to lead his party. May I also express my sincere wish that he may long be spared to lead His Majesty's Loyal Opposition in this dominion.

I wish to voice a note of regret at the retirement of one of the foremost privy councillors in the history of this parliament. I refer to the hon. member for Middlesex West (Mr. Elliott), the former Postmaster General. Mr. Elliott has had a long and distinguished public career in the public life of his native province and in that of this dominion.

I feel I should be remiss in my duty if I did not add a word of congratulations to the hon. member for Essex West (Mr. McLarty) and the hon. member for Edmonton West (Mr. MacKinnon) who have been chosen to take their places on the front benches of the government. I go a step further than the other hon. members who have preceded me; I wish to congratulate the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) and the government upon being able to secure the services of these two gentlemen, who I am sure are well qualified for the strenuous duties that have been assigned to them.

During the course of this debate much has been said upon the questions referred to in the speech from the throne, and not a little has been said upon matters untouched or unmentioned in the speech. This is in accordance with the usual custom, but in the course of my remarks I shall endeavour, with a few exceptions, to confine myself to the subject matters contained in the speech itself.

The first question which I wish to discuss is marketing. It is a very large question, and for the present I shall content myself with making a few observations with regard to the wheat situation. At the very outset I want to make it perfectly clear that I am not going to offer serious objection to the action taken by the government in setting the price of wheat at eighty cents a bushel for the crop year of 1938. In the year 1937 I travelled over a large part of the drought area in western Canada. I am therefore, in a position to judge with regard to conditions existing on the prairies at that time. However, I feel sure there will be general assent to the suggestion that we cannot establish as a settled policy in our economy provisions which would permit the payment of a set price for any commodity in one part of Canada and deny the same concession to those producing a similar commodity in other parts of the country. In addition, may I point to the unequal results which must inevitably follow the distribution of funds on the basis referred to, that is the eighty cent price for western wheat. For example, to the farmers who have much, much is given; to the farmers who have little, little is given; and to the farmers who have nothing, nothing is given.

Furthermore, may I point to what I believe would be a dangerous precedent. For instance, supposing a large producer delivered under this plan ten, twenty, or even thirty thousand bushels of wheat—which I assume is not impossible—and the world price eventually turned out to be twenty cents below the set price, the thirty thousand bushel producer under these circumstances would receive from the federal treasury $6,000 on one year's operations. I am of opinion that the significance of this statement requires no further comment.

Then we have the broad aspect of the situation to consider. Is it practicable to select one particular commodity and set the price for it, thus ignoring the producers of other commodities which may entail as much or more effort and expense to produce? Upon this aspect of the question I may have some further remarks to make at some future time.

Now let us analyze some of the conditions affecting the marketing of wheat. We have in one classification the exporting countries and in another classification the importing countries, in regard to this commodity. A review of the figures of the importing countries for the last five years, 1933-1938, shows that wheat imports were on the average for that five-year period 223,000,000 bushels less than the average during the 1922-1927 period. What is taking place is that coarse grains, potato flour, rice flour, chemicals, et cetera, are replacing wheat flour on the tables of the consumers in these countries. It is true that these substitutes are much inferior to wheat flour; therefore this changed condition represents a lowering of the standard of living in the countries referred to. Some of these countries may not be in a position to purchase both bullets and bread. The purchase of the latter is restricted and the purchase of materials for the former is increased. The net result is to increase the surplus of exporting countries, of which Canada is one of the greatest, and thereby reduce world prices for wheat.

Now with respect to the Ontario farmers' position, the increased price in some lines of production has improved their position over a few years ago. I believe the majority of the farmers referred to have been able in the last three or four years to meet their immediate obligations. Complete recovery has been impossible, due to the accumulation of unpaid taxes, unpaid interest, repairs which should have been made but were not, worn-out equipment which should have been replaced but was not—all of which was piling up for the previous five or six years. I have no hesitation in saying that the Ontario farmer is not in a financial position to assist in carrying the burden of taxation which would be necessary to maintain permanent fixed prices which must be materially above world prices for any farm commodity in other parts of the country. The whole question of set prices for farm products will be under consideration later in the session, when all aspects of the situation must be fully explored.

With reference to the problems of unemployment and relief: both of these difficult questions are in a large measure attributable to the low price level of farm products. I venture to predict that, in spite of palliative measures which may be used, no permanent solution will be achieved with regard to these matters until such time that farmers' returns are comparable with those of people who are engaged in other important vocations. If this were attained, it would immediately reflect an improvement in the position of the low wage employee.

In view of the remarks made by some hon. members to my immediate left with respect to employment in industry and with respect to the effect of the trade policies of this government upon improvement in industry in this country, that is the next point which I desire to discuss for a few minutes.

I am of opinion that our greatest problem is the surplus of unskilled labour. I so state because a review of employment by industries shows that while employment is down slightly when compared with 1937, it represents a substantial improvement over any other year since 1930. In fact it is only surpassed in the years 1929 and 1930 since the post war period. The figures I now propose to place upon Hansard cover employment in manufacturing, logging, mining, communication, transportation, construction, service and trade. The reason I desire to deal with these matters is that in my riding we have substantial lumbering industries, and I am sure that the Canada-United States trade treaty which was passed in 1935 very materially improved the condition of the lumbering industry, which gives employment to a large number of workers in the riding I represent. Note that the relative weight shows the proportion of employees reported in the industries indicated above to the total number of employees reported in Canada by the firms reporting at December 1, 1938. The index in all instances is on the basis of 1926, 100:

1934	96·0
1935	99·4
1936	103·7
1937	114·1
1938	111·6

If we look at the employment situation from the viewpoint of economic areas, we find that the greatest decrease in 1938 when compared with a similar period in 1937 occurred in the maritime provinces; British Columbia and Ontario registered slightly lower figures; while Quebec and the prairie provinces showed an increase, attributable, I think, to the fact that they had a crop.

Now let us compare the results in the eight leading cities in Canada. I desire to place these figures on record by reason of the fact that farmers in Ontario and, indeed, all over Canada are dependent, in a measure at least, upon these cities for the disposal of such commodities as milk, eggs and poultry. Taking the same index of 100 in 1926, we find that employment in these eight cities stood as follows:

1934	88·2
1935	93·1
1936	97·7
1937	105·8
1938	105·7

With respect to the eight leading cities in this dominion, as far as employment is concerned the year records a drop of one-tenth of one per cent. I am sure that this does not illustrate the disaster which has been so forcibly discussed by hon. members to my immediate left. It may be interesting to note that employment in 1938 showed a steadier trend, while in 1937 there was revealed a wider fluctuation from low point to high point.

I am not one to state that all our economic troubles in the depression years were caused by the government policies in force at that time. I believe the policy of economic nationalism which was pursued by the government of that day was one of the important contributing factors in connection with our economic troubles. At the present time I give some credit to the trade and other policies of the present government as a means of assisting to counteract a contraction in industry and business comparable with the extreme condition of unemployment which prevailed for many months in the neighbouring country to the south, the United States.

I think this is a splendid example and endorsation of the policies of this government which have materially assisted stability in Canada, and I make this comparison with regard to employment in the United States and employment in Canada. A comparison between these two countries for the years 1937 and 1938 shows a drop in industry in Canada of approximately three per cent, while in the United States for a similar period the drop amounted to slightly over nineteen per cent. In this connection may I point out what must be firmly impressed on the minds of all the members of this house, that government spending on a huge scale does not cure economic ills nor offer any permanent cure for unemployment. For this reason I trust that as the discussions of this session proceed, the interests of the taxpayer will receive more recognition and consideration by this parliament than has been the case so far in this debate.

I come now to an item which is of special interest and significance to myself and my constituency. I refer to that portion of the speech from the throne dealing with matters pertaining to the Department of National Defence. I so state because dominion arsenal No. 2 is located in the riding I have the honour to represent. Before proceeding further, I desire to convey to the minister of this department my appreciation of the start which is under way at the Lindsay arsenal; but this represents but a small part of the plant. It is a well-established fact that the administration which preceded us prepared plans and already had proceeded with the construction of additional extensive arsenal buildings at Valcartier.

As is well known to the officials of the government, soon after my entry into this parliament I offered strenuous objection to this development because it appeared unreasonable to me to proceed with the construction of additional arsenal buildings to meet the needs of this department when at the same time the extensive facilities at Lindsay were idle and unused except for storage purposes. I am well aware that until that time the Lindsay arsenal had been classified as an auxiliary arsenal for use when the country was actually engaged in war. I also offered my strenuous objection to this policy. It is true that during the regime of our predecessors, and up to the present time, certain requirements of the department were procured from private industry on the basis of cost plus profit. Mr. Speaker, I want to make my position perfectly clear with regard to this point. I am unalterably opposed to the further extension of this policy until such time as all the remaining facilities for production at the Lindsay arsenal have been utilized. I strongly favour and urge upon the government and this parliament the policy of using the government arsenals to their utmost capacity when it is necessary in times of peace. With respect to private industry it should stand ready in times of war for auxiliary armament production. At such times the interests of the Canadian people should be carefully safeguarded by government supervision of such plants. Now, having so expressed myself, I trust that the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Mackenzie) whom I, in common with the large majority of Canadian people, hold in very high esteem, will, when the opportunity presents itself, inform the house in regard to the government's intentions with respect to this important matter.

I come now to another point. In listening to the addresses of hon. members to my immediate left, I note but little variation in their remarks. The thought occurred to me that the hon. leader of the opposition (Mr. Manion) may have missed his calling in taking up medicine. He should have been a schoolmaster, because it would appear that his followers, in the absence of any reasonable grounds upon which to attack the administration, have learned to repeat a few inapplicable phrases, prominent among which we find the one, "do-nothing government". I say, let the opposition be fair. If we look out upon the world around us to the south, to the east, or to the west, do we find the sun of tranquillity, of prosperity, of peace and contentment, shining with its noonday strength upon the nations? I feel sorry that it is not so. But what do we see? War, and the rumblings and rumours of war. In many lands when the sun goes down the people know not what the morning may bring forth. This condition resembles very much, in fact it is in some respects more aggravated than, the condition behind which these same hon. members excuse their own inaction.

This government has diligently applied itself to the difficult problems confronting it, and has more definite accomplishments to its credit than any other government since confederation. What are they? In the first place, with respect to exploring world markets, more effective trade agreements have been negotiated by this government than by any of its predecessors. I mention this point particularly because it has a quite definite interest to farmers, lumbermen, and others in my own constituency. Under the provisions of the 1935 treaty, lumber producers, live stock producers, and producers in various other lines of agriculture have received great benefits. In fact, I sometimes wonder, if it had not been for that assistance, where the live stock producers and others would be at the present time. Furthermore, the final completion of the revision of that treaty, which will be before the house in the not distant future, contains in my opinion many provisions which will much more adequately serve the interests of the Canadian people.

In my riding there is a large woollen manufacturing industry. I observe in the provisions of the Great Britain-United States treaty that the woollen industry of Great Britain has been given material concessions upon woollen textiles entering the United States. Canada is not mentioned; that provision deals only with the nation which in connection with the exchange of commodities contributes the largest quota of the article, but the same provision applies to Canada. I am satisfied that the woollen textile industry in Canada will reap substantial benefit from the treaty reductions on woollen goods entering the United States.

The recent pronouncement by the Minister of Labour (Mr. Rogers) regarding the problem of transients deals with an extremely difficult situation. I am sure every hon. member has great sympathy for the transients. I pay tribute to the thousands of Canadian citizens who, while not working at the present time, are willing and anxious to work. But the principle embodied in the British legislation should apply, whereby men, when given the opportunity to work, must accept that work in preference to relief. In saying this, however, I do not mean that married men should be removed from their homes and families.

I might proceed to enumerate many more accomplishments of this government: for example, the taking over of the central bank. When this government assumed office, credit was hard to get from banks, while to-day the banks are looking for borrowers who have any reasonable security. We have also the housing legislation; the elimination of taxation on the construction industry; and a constructive youth training program is under way. I do not know what form the government expenditures through the Department of Labour may take. If the construction of the trans-Canada highway is resumed, I would be interested in seeing it completed through the eastern section of northern Ontario, and I should like to see an artery built through Algonquin park, which is in my riding. Our citizens and tourists would then have the opportunity of travelling north and south as well as east and west. But that matter will come up for discussion later on. I know that up to a certain point road problems are entirely provincial matters. The latest proposal to absorb a larger share of relief costs will greatly relieve the excessive taxation on real estate, and act as a stimulant to business and the building trade.

Then with regard to national defence: what were the conditions when this government came into power? A group of officers and men equal to those of any other country were training with antiquated and obsolete equipment. Now we have modern aeroplanes—

An hon. MEMBER: And Bren guns.

Mr. McNEVIN: —which, if not completed, are nearing completion, and warships for the partial protection of our shores. I believe that achievement alone is worthy of the commendation of every Canadian citizen because, much as we regret the necessity for larger expenditures on armaments in this country, world conditions are such that this expenditure can no longer be avoided.

In answer to the contention that this is a do-nothing government, I simply say that they have proceeded along sane lines, acting on the motto that where there is a will there is a way. In conclusion, I pay tribute to the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) for his excellent work throughout the September crisis.

Mr. MANION: He did nothing.

Mr. McNEVIN: I am satisfied that his handling of that situation alone will commend itself to every thinking citizen throughout this dominion.

Mr. Speaker, I support the motion.

Mr. M. C. SENN (Haldimand): As this debate proceeds it is becoming difficult to avoid repetition in discussion of the matters referred to in the speech from the throne. There is, however, one important matter which received very little attention in that speech, and which, until a day or two ago at least, has received very little comment by hon. members in the house. But it is a most important matter to all the citizens of Canada. I refer to the plight in which agriculture finds itself in this country, and I intend to confine my remarks largely to a discussion of that question. It is true that some mention was made in the speech from the throne of the intention of the government to revise the grain act and to introduce a bill further to regulate grain exchanges. But these are matters which affect only the farmer in the west, in fact the western wheat grower, and have very little to do with the problems facing the mixed farmers of Canada. The hon. member for Qu'Appelle (Mr. Perley) this afternoon made an excellent speech in discussing the problems of the western wheat growers, but I wish to take a few minutes to discuss the problems of farmers in Ontario and particularly those engaged in mixed farming.

Before proceeding further, I should like personally and on behalf of my constituents, to join in the unanimous expressions of rejoicing in this house over the approaching visit of Their Gracious Majesties the King and Queen. Their visit will undoubtedly tend to increase the loyalty and devotion to the crown of all true Canadians, and will also tend to strengthen the ties which bind Canada to the empire.

I also wish to express the satisfaction and relief of the people of my constituency at the fact that the recent threat of war has been averted for the time being. In every municipality in the constituency of Haldimand cenotaphs have been erected bearing the names of those who made the supreme sacrifice in the great war. They serve to remind us, among other things, of the horrors of warfare. The memory of those trying days is still fresh in the minds of everyone, and I express the hope of all Canadians that any international complications which still exist may be speedily and amicably settled without recourse to arms.

I should like also to take this opportunity of expressing the pleasure I feel at the reentry into this house of the hon. member for London (Mr. Manion). I wish to congratulate him upon being chosen as leader of a great party. He possesses those qualifications, those graces of heart and of mind, which have made him an able debater and one of the most pleasant and gracious personalities in the house. I make one prediction, and it is that in the next house he will lead a much larger group than he does at present; and, unless all signs fail, I believe he will be Prime Minister.

In listening to the debate which has taken place so far, it seems to me strange that so little enthusiasm on the part of hon. members sitting on the government benches has been displayed over the new trade agreements. A survey of their speeches in Hansard will show that, apart from the mover and the seconder of the address, very little comment has been made by hon. gentlemen opposite. This attitude is in direct contrast to the enthusiasm which was evidenced when the 1935 agreement was brought into the house. On February 25, 1936, the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) introduced the resolution approving the 1935 trade agreement and used these words, as they appear at page 502 of Hansard for that year:

> The government of the United States and the government of this country were actuated by one and the same motive, namely to make an agreement which would be equally beneficial to both countries. . . . Could anything destroy the agreement more effectively than that it should be shown in the course of the next three years that one country had got considerably the better of the other? Would not the effect of an agreement reached in that way be to destroy the possibility of its continuance beyond the period of three years.

The trade figures for the past few years prove conclusively that one party to the agreement, to use the Prime Minister's words, did get considerably the better of the other, although that has not prevented the government from continuing the treaty and negotiating a new one. Let me for a moment review the question of trade balances between the two countries. The other day the hon. member for Huron North (Mr. Deachman) pooh-poohed the idea that trade balances had any particular significance. The hon. member is an expert in statistics. He has always professed a great belief in the value of figures, and from time to time has used figures to prove his own arguments. I suggest that the trend of trade balances between the two countries indicates, more clearly than anything else could, the effects of the treaty of 1935 upon Canadian trade with the United States. For the first thirty years of this century Canada had an unfavourable trade balance with the United States amounting to over five and a half billion dollars. That is an enormous sum of money, much greater than our national debt if we do not take into account our railway liability. It is about five times as great as the average annual agricultural production of this country during the past ten years. Yet that does not take into account the sums of money which have been sent to the United States in payment of interest charges and dividends. That flow of money across the border has greatly retarded our progress in days gone by; it has had a very bad effect upon our industrial and economic life and also upon our population, because during those years thousands and, indeed, hundreds of thousands of our young men followed that flow of money across the border in order to obtain employment.

When the Bennett government came into power in 1930, however, one of the first acts they performed was to revise our tariff schedules, placing them almost on a level with those tariffs which the United States had raised against Canadian products. The result of that action became apparent immediately. Our unfavourable trade balance began to dwindle and finally disappeared altogether, so that in 1934, 1935 and 1936 we again had favourable trade balances with the United States amounting to some $120,000,000. When the new treaty came into effect in 1936 another change took place, and in 1937 we again had an unfavourable trade balance of some $8,000,000, which rose last year to about $79,000,000. So, if we consider the Prime Minister's statement in view of these figures, what could be more apparent than that one country did get considerably the better of the other in connection with that agreement? Yet the present government, obsessed as it is with the idea of making treaties, has entered into another agreement with the same country. It is a treaty which will give little if any encouragement to Canadian agriculture, but it will encourage the importation of manufactured goods into Canada not only from the United States but also from all those countries which are enjoying favoured nation treatment.

In the speech from the throne much attention has been paid to the question of unemployment, which continues, of course, to be one of our most pressing and urgent problems. On the other hand, as I said in the beginning of my remarks, little has been said of the problems facing agriculture, which problems are just as important and just as vital to the prosperity of Canada as any others that exist in this dominion. Perhaps little was said about the problems facing agriculture because many at least of the ministers of the crown made statements at the beginning of the year forecasting what they thought would be the situation in the country during the year to come. For a moment I should like to refer to the statement made by the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner), appearing in the Globe and Mail of January 3, 1939; I believe it is worthy of comment. Among other things the hon. gentleman asserted that there was an abundance of feed in Canada; that is, feed for live stock. He also made the significant statement that the numbers of our live stock —hogs, cattle and so on—had greatly decreased and on that fact he based the prediction that live stock prices probably would advance. To me it seems strange—indeed, it is a commentary upon the inaction of this government—that the only prediction the minister made in regard to better agricultural prices was based on the fact that the numbers of our live stock had decreased. I remember very well the glowing terms the minister used some three years ago when he told the house he was going to institute a marketing branch within the department; but now, after that branch has been in operation for three years, all the minister can say is that we may have better prices for live stock simply because their numbers have decreased.

The farmer has been always faced with that very difficulty. In years of plenty prices fall, generally below the cost of production. In years of scarcity, or when the farmer has very little to sell, prices soar. In 1938 we had a bumper crop; yet prices of all kinds of grain and feed fell to the lowest level they have experienced since the very trough of the depression. It is true that in 1938 the farmers of Canada, and particularly those in the western provinces, had more difficulty in paying their taxes and meeting their obligations than they have had in many years.

I am convinced that the cure for unemployment does not lie in measures such as those advanced by the government, including the home improvement plan and the new housing plan, or in the expenditure of public moneys, such as has been forecast in the speech from the throne, for building programs to provide work. Nor do I think that the cure for unemployment lies in another suggestion made yesterday by the Minister of Labour (Mr. Rogers), namely the employment of men on our farms. I say that simply because the farmers of to-day cannot compete with other industries in the labour market.

After all, these are only palliative measures and provide no permanent employment. I believe the causes underlying unemployment in Canada are economic. To a great extent they arise from an unbalanced price structure. I do not suggest for a moment that prices of manufactured goods are too high; I do not suggest that the price of labour is too high, but I do say that the price of farm products is out of proportion to other commodity prices in this country. Recently the Hon. Mr. Morrison, Minister of Agriculture in Great Britain, speaking in the British House of Commons upon the question of the orderly marketing of farm products, concluded his remarks with these words:

> I hope the lesson is now well learnt that this great edifice we have built up of commerce and industry in various countries rests upon the foundation of primary production throughout the world, the empire and our country. If the primary producer is denied his proper reward, it soon brings ruin upon those who hope to sell him their goods, and I believe that stable organization for a market of this kind would really be a contribution not only to the prosperity of agriculture, but to the prosperity of trade and commerce as a whole throughout the world.

Those words express much more concisely than I could the idea I am trying to present. For instance, if agriculture were to be placed on a prosperous footing, it would immediately and of necessity initiate a building program much greater than any government can afford, simply because farm buildings and equipment are sadly in need of repairs and replacements, which cannot be carried out under present conditions.

It is, after all, the new wealth created each year in primary industry which maintains the buying power of the people, and which is in large measure the controlling factor of distribution. We have a number of primary industries in Canada, but the greatest of them, the greatest industry of all, is agriculture. It is therefore most important that the farmer should receive a price commensurate with the cost of his production, so that he may buy a liberal share of all kinds of merchandise. If this could be brought about, I believe our unemployment difficulties would gradually but surely disappear.

Governmental activities, both federal and provincial, have largely been directed towards assisting and teaching the farmer to produce efficiently and economically. I am not trying to discredit the operations of governments in this respect. Essential and efficient services have been performed, and the farmer has been taught the value of good live stock, good seed and proper cultivation. He has been taught soil chemistry, food values, balanced rations, and so on. But too little attention has been paid by governments and departments of agriculture to the farmers' most pressing problem, namely, the marketing of his products.

I have stated many times, in this house and in other places, that if the farmer were assured of attractive prices he would produce goods in quantity and in quality. But he has little encouragement when prices for farm products fluctuate as violently and rapidly as they are doing to-day, and as they have been doing for some time past.

Agriculture must take a leaf from the book of industry, and set up a proper system of merchandizing its products. The day is gone for the producer as an individual to market on a competitive, cutthroat, hit-or-miss basis, without knowledge of what other producers do, or what his competitors do from day to day.

At six o'clock the house took recess.

After Recess

The house resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. SENN: Mr. Speaker, when the house rose at six o'clock I was discussing the imperative need for more stability in the price of farm products in Canada. I had stated that if the farmer could be assured of prices which were commensurate with the cost of efficient production, our unemployment problem would gradually disappear. It cannot be questioned that farm prices are not on a parity with those of other commodities, particularly in times of plentiful production on the farm. The reasons for this are many, I believe, but I shall refer to only one or two.

Agriculture is practically the only Canadian industry whose prices are controlled by supply and demand. The price of manufactured goods bears a very close relationship to and is largely governed by the cost of production. Lawyers, doctors and professional men in Canada all have a schedule of fees which they adhere to more or less closely. The salaried man knows at the beginning of the year what his income is going to be. Merchants endeavour, and very successfully, to maintain a constant margin of profit between buying and selling prices. Freight rates, passenger rates, telephone rates and so on are controlled by a government board. Government contracts contain a fair wage clause, and labour has its union scale of wages which is recognized by statute. Recently I read in one of the Toronto papers an item stating that a Toronto barber had been haled before the court and fined because he had charged twenty-five cents for a haircut, which was lower than the union wage scale.

Unquestionably, Mr. Speaker, these systems of price maintenance are here to stay. But notwithstanding these schemes for maintaining prices on every hand, the farmer has little or no control over the prices which he obtains for his products. Agencies must be maintained to collect, to process, to grade and to distribute farm products, and they all take their margin of profit. The spread between farmer-producer prices and consumer prices is gradually widening, but little or no effort has been made by the present government to provide a remedy; in fact, the present government immediately on coming into office took steps to destroy the machinery set up by the former administration to assist agriculture by referring the Natural Products Marketing Act to the privy council for a decision as to its validity.

I want it to be understood that I am not suggesting that prices for farm products should be fixed in Canada in the way that was done by the present administration when it fixed the price for western wheat. I do, however, agree heartily with the suggestion made by the hon. member for Prescott (Mr. Bertrand), and again this afternoon by the hon. member for Victoria, Ontario (Mr. McNevin) that since this has been done for the western farmer, similar concessions should have been made to the eastern grain grower and the mixed farmer.

May I point out that in many lines of farm production a very large percentage of the production is consumed in the Dominion of Canada. I have before me a bulletin issued by the bureau of statistics, agricultural branch. It is entitled, "The relationship of exports, imports and apparent consumption of agricultural commodities to Canadian production." I find that it gives the percentage of exports to the amount produced in Canada in the year 1935, for example, and I shall give the house only three or four commodities as an example of what I mean. In 1935, of oats, for instance, we exported only 3·9 per cent of our production; 9·11 per cent of barley; 2·4 per cent of potatoes and 7·9 per cent of cattle. Of our total meats we exported 12 per cent; of our total dairy products, 6·8 per cent; of eggs, ·6 per cent; of our total poultry products, ·8 per cent. Unfortunately, Mr. Speaker, it is the price we receive for this small exportable surplus which, in a great many instances, determines the domestic price. Why should the price received for the eight per cent of our cattle exported control the price of cattle in our home market? And yet it undoubtedly does.

In a bulletin which I received from the industrial and development council of Canadian meat packers I find this significant sentence:

> It is evident that with a duty of six cents per pound on dressed beef the Canadian packing industry has been eliminated as a competitive factor in United States markets.
> This situation makes market prices for Canadian cattle dependent on United States cattle prices. The value of any cattle in Canada (with some possible minor exceptions) will be what they are worth for export alive to United States and any possible export to Britain. This must obtain in every class of cattle of which there is a surplus over domestic requirements.

This is surely a case of the tail wagging the dog. It is a most unsatisfactory and unprofitable method of determining domestic prices. In many instances our Canadian farm products compete in foreign markets with the cheap goods of other nations which have lower wage scales and lower standards of living. The search of the present government for markets in foreign countries, no matter how successful, can never solve the problem of the farmers' price structure in Canada. Some leadership must be given, whether we like it or not, towards maintaining a reasonable price structure for farm products in this dominion. Other countries have taken drastic steps in this direction. Australia some time ago put into effect what is known as the Patterson scheme of bonusing exports to help maintain a profitable price level at home. New Zealand two or three years ago set the price of butter fat in that country, where the production of dairy products is the most important industry, and as yet its government has not paid out one cent on that account. Great Britain has established a quota system, in order to maintain farm prices by means of the quantitative regulation of imports. France, Germany and Italy have bonused the production of cereals in their respective countries and have erected impassable trade barriers against these commodities.

The former administration passed the Natural Products Marketing Act, under which some twenty-two schemes were operating when the act was declared ultra vires by the privy council, to which body it had been submitted by the present government for adjudication as to its validity. In contrast to all this, the present government has done little or nothing toward assisting agriculture in Canada to maintain a stable price for farm products. Fluctuations in prices continue with startling rapidity, and the Canadian farmer is powerless to prevent them. If Canadian agriculture is to survive, something must be done and done quickly. I heard a responsible man not so very long ago say that a very large number of our farmers are to-day bankrupt. He placed the proportion at fifty per cent. I am not going to say that such a percentage is at all correct, but I know the number is very large and is gradually increasing. It is little wonder, therefore, that everybody in this country is condemning in no measured terms the inaction of the present government. It is high time that action should be taken, and I suggest to the government that if they are unable to cope with a situation they should make way for somebody else.

For the reasons I have outlined I intend to vote for the amendment which was proposed by my leader. In the words of that amendment:

> . . . the government has failed . . . to show a proper realization of the serious economic conditions existing in all sections of Canada, as evidenced by . . . widespread distress which prevails in agriculture; and has failed—> —to take appropriate measures to relieve such conditions.

Dismally.

I should like to conclude by quoting one sentence which I read recently in a trade journal and which expresses in a few words my sentiments regarding the great basic industry of agriculture:

> It can be said that agriculture is God's chosen profession, and nothing can be nobler than producing foodstuffs for the Canadian people. If the producer cannot get his just reward, then no other class of people can enjoy permanent prosperity. The farmer in the last analysis asks for nothing more than a square deal with a decent standard of living in the farm homes of Canada.

Mr. J. J. KINLEY (Queens-Lunenburg): Mr. Speaker, in this house we have assembled 245 members, and each one has an intimate knowledge of conditions in some part of Canada. They are men and women who in the aggregate know more about the country and have more accurate information than could be obtained from any other source. This knowledge was exhibited at the outset by the mover (Mr. Matthews) and the seconder (Mr. Chevrier) of the address. I have a great deal of pleasure in adding my congratulations to those they have already received.

As the debate has continued, some have spoken of our achievements and other have told of our problems and our difficulties. But with it all I am sure we shall all subscribe to the thought that in spite of those difficulties and our problems, we all feel thankful for the many blessings and advantages we enjoy. Canada is a good country. In fact at this time I can think of no other that is superior. We have freedom in this country, and in the midst of a troubled and perplexed world we have a degree of security which is assuring. Our associations with outside peoples are most fortunate, and we believe that in spite of conditions which exist and pending disasters that seem to have threatened us during the last few years we are making economic and social progress.

To judge of our country we must compare it with others; and when we make these comparisons I am certain we shall agree that Canada is in the very forefront of progress. Trade after all is the industrial blood stream of the nation. We are told that we are sixth in foreign trade in the world, that our domestic exports are fourth of all countries of the world, and I am sure we agree that this is a splendid position for a country such as Canada. We are told also by experts, men who admire us from the outside, that Canada is a bright spot in the industrial life of the world and that her immediate future is full of promise.

The leader of the opposition (Mr. Manion) thinks we have failed, and he has so expressed it in the amendment which he moved to the address. Well, this is natural. As leader of the opposition he is supposed to criticize and show the imperfections of the government. But I am reminded that he was formerly a member of the Bennett government. Being a member of that government, he has memories; from his speech the other day I think one can draw the conclusion that he thinks he was most severely and wrongfuly criticized in the days that are gone, and now that he is leader of the opposition he is going to return the compliment. He would like a reduction of taxes, but he is not so enthusiastic about the removal of the three per cent excise tax. And when he talks about a reduction of taxes and enumerates in this chamber the taxes that have been placed on the statute books, we are reminded that most of those taxes were placed there by a former government, and for a purpose, that purpose being to pay the enormous burden caused by the war. That burden is still with us and is still growing. While we thought that during recent years some way would be found to overtake and lessen this burden, we have discovered that we must now spend millions of dollars in order to defend this country and make it safe as a part of the British Empire, and therefore we cannot see, in view of the spending which is imposed upon the government, how this reduction in taxes which he talks about can take place.

The right hon. member for Calgary West (Mr. Bennett) led the opposition in this house for three years, and he was most critical; he also thought that the government had failed. He recently decided to move to another land, and in being entertained before he left he took the people of this country into his confidence. He has now decided that the church has failed. Well, I should hate to think that the church has failed, and it would be sad to visualize a country where there is no church. I do not think the church has failed in Canada; but, like all progressive movements, all movements for uplifting the people and raising the standards of the citizenship of the country, the church can never completely accomplish its purpose and in this world it will never reach its goal. On the one hand we have the present leader of the opposition saying that the government has failed; on the other we have the leader who has retired from the field saying that the church has failed in this country. I am sure that we all have faith in this country; but some hon. members, in trying to inform us how the administration fails, will go to distant countries and exhibit to this house what they think is a good picture of prosperity there.

The hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell), who almost always contributes something of interest to the discussions in this house, the other day told us how well New Zealand was getting along. Well, my information is that New Zealand enjoyed a period of artificial prosperity induced by a program of expanding expenditures in public works and in other ways. But they found it too great a strain on their resources, and they are now endeavouring to restore the situation by making drastic restrictions in imports in the hope that this will relieve the financial strain. It looks as if they will be required to pay for their carnival of prodigality.

I have before me a circular that came to our office in the course of business. It deals with New Zealand's import licensing system and advises that a further cablegram has now been received from New Zealand stating:

> The New Zealand Finance Minister has decided to admit any goods ordered on or before December 5, 1938, irrespective of the date of shipment of such goods, provided the quantities are not abnormal. As to orders received since December 5, the present status is that the importer in New Zealand must get a licence from his government to import before it is safe for the Canadian exporter to forward shipment.

It seems to me that the story about New Zealand's prosperity can well be taken with a grain of salt. Our friends to the left refer from time to time to Norway and Sweden, which countries they say we should copy. Their example, we are told, is well worth considering. I have never been in Sweden, but in our harbour I have visited vessels from both Norway and Sweden and have talked to their crews. I have seen how their men are fed, and I know that Canadian sailors would not be satisfied with what is given sailors from Sweden and Norway. I know also that these people are undermining the marine trade of this country. Through the low wages they pay their crews they are able to compete successfully against our people. I have seen these vessels come and go for years, and I know that there are members of crews who will desert at every opportunity in order to remain in Canada.

I took the trouble to prepare from the records of the League of Nations a statement of wages paid different classes of men in Norway, Sweden, Great Britain and Canada. The list comprises shipyard workers, machinists, shipwrights, helpers and labourers, carpenters, bricklayers, electricians, cabinet-makers, street-car conductors and motormen, machinists generally, truck drivers, bakers, and civic labourers. I find that in every instance the wages paid in Canada are a great deal more than those paid in Norway and Sweden.

But, we are told, the social structure in those countries is so good that there are no monopolies in Norway and Sweden. The fact is, however, that the most iniquitous millionaire of the century carried on his work in Sweden through a match monopoly, and his operations had their repercussions in other countries. He finally came to an untimely end by shooting himself.

However, there are difficulties in this country, and as we all know, unemployment is one of them. To-day it is really the fly in the ointment; it is the thing that troubles us most. But why should that be? I wonder if our people are making a really determined and intelligent effort. Some responsibility rests, of course, with the government, and there is some responsibility with those who are unemployed; but I am referring especially to the intelligent, virile and strong people of the country, who, after all, are the people who must make it a success or a failure. On Sunday morning it was my privilege to listen to a missionary from the island of Formosa, which is about as large as the island of Vancouver. I am told there are over five million people there, and one wonders sometimes how they get along. The same is true of many other countries with large populations. But here in Canada we have eleven million people with great resources and a vast territory, and it seems to me that if the matter were seriously considered by every Canadian citizen, a way would be found of providing employment for our people.

I was very much interested yesterday to hear the speech of the Minister of Labour (Mr. Rogers). He spoke of the responsibility of private industry. He said that private industry had a responsibility in Canada to see that men were employed, and I agree with him. Perhaps there should be a more extensive system of subsidized apprenticeship in order that every man could learn a trade. When I think of unemployment I think naturally of my own riding. In my counties there are men who naturally wish to work at sea. On the seacoast of Nova Scotia we have the greatest commercial fishing centres of Canada, and I am constantly approached by young men who are anxious to get a berth so as to work on the sea instead of being unemployed.

I have known for a long time that the Canadian mercantile marine and the marine interests in this country were not very considerate of Canadians. I came across, in the Financial Post, an article that startled me. May I read it:

Whose Vessels are They?

Should Canada contribute to the support of the British navy? A member of the staff of the Financial Post recently in London was asked by many English people when Canada intended to carry its "share" of the load of protecting Canadian shipping on the North Atlantic.

This question is one capable of provoking a prolonged discussion in any group. In the ensuing argument there is one factor that is likely to be overlooked. Not a determining point, it is nevertheless important.

The ships on the North Atlantic that carry cargoes between Canada and the United Kingdom are British ships. The Post staff man came home on a C.P.R. ship. It had been built in Britain and was of British registry. It carried a crew of 381, of whom only one was a Canadian. That man was the railway ticket agent!

In the twelve months to March 31, 1937, 911 vessels of British registry carrying cargo entered Canada with 1,523,557 tons of freight from the United Kingdom. The vessels were manned by a crew of 114,211 men. In the same period, one vessel of Canadian registry, carrying cargo, with seventy-five tons of freight and with a crew of thirty-nine, entered Canada from the United Kingdom.

Now we know that the head of the Canadian Pacific Steamships and the Canadian Pacific Railway is interested in youth. He is a public-spirited man who is anxious to see unemployment ended, and it is to his interest to see that it is ended. But how can we do away with unemployment if men of that standing forget that the people of this country must be employed in industry if unemployment is to be ended? I am told that these railway companies are anxious to have more immigration into this country. And I believe that if fifty or one hundred thousand people came into this country from Europe they would be employed within a year or two. But I am more interested in the men of Nova Scotia who in the past sailed to every country in the world and on all the seas. These men desire employment; it is a natural ambition and a legitimate claim that they should have the first openings in the services of this country. They are not looking for big wages. From Vancouver we are told that it is a matter of wages. What our men want is a chance to start to learn something; it is a question not of wages but of getting employment. When the statute of Westminster was passed I thought it was the emancipation of the coasting trade and the merchant marine; but concurrent with the enactment of that statute was also enacted the merchant shipping agreement; which handed back everything we gained as far as shipping is concerned, and Canada's coasting trade to-day—differing from that of the United States and other countries—seems wide open.

With regard to relief, we realize that there has been an abnormal situation in western Canada and that the effects of those years of drought are still being felt. Were it not for that condition, good as our progress has been it would probably have been much better, and the ministry could have presented a better report. In Nova Scotia it is hard to think of a farmer on relief. We very rarely have a failure of crops, and whatever else he has, he at least has enough to eat and is able to keep himself warm. In my riding there is no relief. I have under my hand a report relating to the municipal council of Lunenburg, which appeared the other day. It states:

> While other municipal councils in the province are raising their tax rates, Lunenburg's governing body gave assurance in their opening session to-day that the rate for the municipality of Lunenburg would be lowered again this year. For the past three years this county has been favoured by a reduction in rates, and it is expected that the present rate of $3.10 will be brought down to the $3 level.

This condition prevails not only in the municipality of Lunenburg but in the town of Lunenburg, where the tax rate has been reduced and they are retiring bonds; also in the towns of Bridgewater and Liverpool. These are the three important towns in my riding.

Hon. members may wonder how this comes about. The year book shows that we in Nova Scotia earn less than in practically any other province except the other maritime provinces, that we have less per capita wealth, and that our production is less. Still, in my riding there is no direct relief. Thrift is a virtue which I commend to the people of Canada. It seems to me that the municipality is primarily responsible for relief, notwithstanding the contributions from the federal government and the provincial government. But if the municipalities do not realize that this relief is a canker in the life of this country, there is little hope of accomplishing much. It is probably true that in urban districts the position is worse than in the rural districts. That is to be expected because in the artificial life of cities when people are out of work they have no resources with which to maintain themselves.

With regard to unemployment, I think that youth training is the most important matter with which we have to deal. Time will cure the troubles of the older people, but teaching our youth to be good, responsible citizens is the right place to start to solve this problem. If a young man lives to the age of twenty-two or twenty-three loafing around pool-rooms and becoming a drifter, he is not apt to be much of an asset to his country. As a subject for youth training in the maritimes, navigation at once presents itself. I am glad that I succeeded in getting the marine section of the Department of Transport to open a navigation school in a principal seaport town in my riding. It should be part of the public education from a technical standpoint in Nova Scotia. Every boy who exhibits a desire to go to sea should get training in navigation. Six years ago parliament passed the Canada Shipping Act. Sometimes laws aggravate unemployment. In my riding the Canada Shipping Act aggravated unemployment. Our men were men of experience. They go to sea and become expert sailors by experience. But they did not have certificates. But when this shipping act came into effect they were put out of their jobs; they were told they were not fit because they had not a certificate. I approached the Minister of Transport (Mr. Howe) and explained the matter; he sent his technical officers to Nova Scotia, got these men together and held examinations, and in the town where I live fifty or sixty of them passed. This year again we had some trouble with certificates; the minister again sent his technical officers to the province, and I believe they found a satisfactory solution of the matter.

With the advent of the internal combustion engine we should be training engineers capable of handling the Diesel engine. This is a new field of endeavour for young people. I believe that the Diesel engine will bring back wooden shipping along the Nova Scotia coast. These wooden ships with Diesel engines are very economical; they do not need a large crew and they have good speed. Quite a number have been built during the last few years; we have had a revival of wooden shipbuilding in Nova Scotia by reason of the Diesel engine. I want our men to be taught to be good engineers to operate these boats.

We sometimes hear about public works, and we are told that public works are not much good to help unemployment. Well, public works are good. Along the coast of Nova Scotia there are many fishermen who hardly earn enough to get by, and if there are public works which enable them to earn $50 or $75, it just makes it possible for them to get along comfortably and helps out the situation splendidly, in addition to providing the breakwaters and wharves that are necessary in order that the fishermen may properly carry on their business. I think public works, as they apply to the sea coast, are absolutely necessary, and the men give a return for the money they receive.

I am glad that the speech from the throne contained a reference to the fishermen. That is a compliment, because it is not often that the fishermen are mentioned there. At page 27 of Hansard for January 16, the leader of the opposition (Mr. Manion) quoted from the speech from the throne, as follows:

> Continuous improvement in the position of the fishing industry as a whole has been reflected—

He stopped there, and said that his reports were to the contrary. As a matter of fact, however, this is what was said in the speech from the throne:

> Continuous improvement in the position of the fishing industry as a whole has been reflected in annual increases for the past few years in the aggregate amounts received by the fishermen from their work. The Department of Fisheries have given, and will continue to give, increased attention to the problem of marketing. The government have also assisted fishermen substantially through direct aid.

Well, we are not satisfied with the condition of our fishermen, but we think a great deal has been done. I must remind the house that it was a Liberal government that first appointed a separate Minister of Fisheries in the person of Hon. Cyrus Macmillan; and during the last few years a great deal of attention has been paid to this industry. Loans have been granted, with the cooperation of the provincial government. In some provinces direct contributions were made, but in Nova Scotia it was done by way of loan. A collection service has been established in eastern Nova Scotia, where the worst conditions prevailed, and this year nearly two million pounds of fish have been brought from that section to the market at Halifax. Then I am reminded that the provincial government has been giving a bounty of one dollar per quintal on salted fish, for the export trade. After that had been in existence for two years it was reduced to seventy-five cents, but the fisherman still got his fifty cents while the owners of the vessel got twenty-five cents.

Our hon. friends to the left ask what we have done for the fishermen. I recall when a delegation from my county came to the government, before 1930, complaining that conditions in the export trade were bad and asking for a bounty of fifty cents in connection with salted fish. That request was refused. Then, when the Liberals came into power in Nova Scotia, with the cooperation of this government a bounty of a dollar was paid the fishermen in order that they might have a fair show in the export trade in competition with other countries doing the same thing. There was also a bounty established on seals, which were destroying the fish and causing a great deal of damage. In my riding also, I am proud to say, we have the Nova Scotia fisheries exhibition each year, which was honoured last year by the attendance of the Minister of Transport. That exhibition has been subsidized since its inception, and we feel that it is a great advertisement for the fisheries of this country. That subsidy is also something we obtained from the Liberal government.

I should like to refer to old age pensions. As hon. members know, the old fisherman was always a problem on the coast of Nova Scotia. He might possess considerable wealth one day; then along came a storm and his nets would be swept away. We find that as the fishermen get older most of them have very little of this world's goods, so the old age pension did a great deal for the fishermen of Nova Scotia, making an asset of many an old man who had been a liability to his sons, and bringing some social justice to these people along our shores.

When we came here in 1935 we had high hopes in regard to the trade treaty. I must confess that I was a little disappointed, when the trade treaty was consummated, that fish of the cod family were not included in it. But we thought perhaps there would be a chance in the future. Some fish, swordfish, halibut and so on, were covered by the treaty, and the production of those fish immediately increased. In my riding we have the largest fishing fleet in Canada, and I thought if we could get a trade treaty with the United States, giving us entry to the best market in the world for fresh cod, halibut and other Canadian fish, we would be doing something for the people whom we try to represent. Now this three-way trade agreement between Great Britain, the United States and Canada has been consummated, bringing with it reductions in the duties on fish entering the United States. I believe that will do more to stabilize and assist our fishing industry than anything that has been done by this parliament for many years.

In 1932 we had an imperial trade conference in Ottawa. Right Hon. Stanley Baldwin delivered an address in this very chamber, and speaking of empire trade he said that there were two ways in which increased preferences could be given, either by lowering tariffs among ourselves or by raising them against others. Then he said:

> The choice between those two must be governed largely by local considerations, but subject to that it seems to us that we should endeavour to follow the first rather than the second course.

He was in favour of the lowering of duties. I think this trade treaty, though it is to extend for three years, will be more stable than the treaty of 1935 because it is linked up with the British trade agreement, and the British agreement with the United States is of greater importance in the industrial life of the world. Of course if the British trade agreement fails, we shall get back some of the things which our friends say we lost but which probably were given so that the cod fish of the maritimes might get into the United States market.

Let me say I was very proud of the position taken in Nova Scotia by the Minister of National Revenue (Mr. Ilsley) just after the treaty was signed. He represents a great apple growing constituency, one enjoying a preference in a free market. On the other hand fishermen have had to enter a market carrying a high duty, a market which was by no means a free one. I might add that apple growing is also carried on to a considerable extent in the constituency I have the honour to represent, which adjoins that of the minister. I believe the minister spoke for the people in Nova Scotia when he said that, after all, apples still have a good preference, and will continue to supply the British market.

I do not believe trade is divine in its origin, but I am of the opinion that the Divine Architect of the Universe had some regard for trade when the world was created. We find oranges and bananas growing in warm countries, fish in the cold waters of the Atlantic, minerals in the unexplored regions of the frozen north. All this is a challenge to man. Trade is a challenge to man to be industrious and to be diligent in his business operations. After all, trade is the life of the nation. Has any hon. member entered a town and heard someone say, "Oh what a dead town!" What did that person mean? He meant there was no trade—nothing moving. No one knows better than the leader of the opposition that if a man's blood stops circulating, he is dead. If water remains quiet, it becomes stagnant, and develops power only when it begins to move and when there is circulation. The same reasoning applies to the trade of a country. The circulation of trade is what makes the people prosperous. It is my belief that Canada's exceptionally good position as a trading country means that our future is assured and that the government in office deserves credit for this achievement.

The West Indies treaty has been the cause of much discussion, and the hope shared by hon. members from the maritime provinces is that we may obtain a better deal under that treaty. Criticism has been lodged in the country about a lack of notice at an earlier date. Hon. members can well see that in view of consideration of the three-way British-Canada-United States trade agreement it would not have been a good idea to have given earlier notice and thereby cause embarrassment in connection with the arrangemnts with Great Britain and the United States. Notice to the West Indies was given immediately after the trade arrangements with the United States and Great Britain were signed, and I believe in due time hon. members from the maritimes will find the amended trade treaty will be signed, will exhibit their desires, and will show that we represent our people in an intelligent manner.

I have spoken about the low earnings per capita of the people of Nova Scotia, and have pointed out that no direct relief has been paid in Queens-Lunenburg. From those observations hon. members may have received the impression that we have little culture, that we do not look after our social services, and that we are lacking in intelligence. I would remind hon. members that such is far from the case. I have felt grateful to the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation which has given us an opportunity to give expression to the cultural side of our people. The broadcasts over the Canadian network of the concerts of the Lunenburg glee club have left no doubt as to the cultural development in that part of the country. We are of the opinion, too, that the contest in which the Bluenose took part was well handled by the broadcasting corporation. Both the race and the musical activities are expressions of the cultural development in Queens-Lunenburg, the riding I have the honour to represent.

In closing, let me point out that the price spreads committee of which the hon. member for Kootenay East (Mr. Stevens) was chairman, stated that the fishermen of Canada needed markets, and that there was no trouble about production. As a matter of fact, we have over-production, but we need more markets. In Canada, while we consume only twenty-six pounds of fish per capita a year, we produce one hundred and twenty pounds per capita. Hon. members will see that there is a large surplus which must go somewhere, and it will be recognized at once that trade treaties for the fishermen of the Atlantic coast are of paramount importance. We must have such treaties if those men are to live and prosper, and I hope the fishermen will get a larger share of the consumer's dollar.

We hear fears expressed to the effect that democracy is imperilled. Democracy is not easily attained; it is militant and demands a virile, industrious and alert people. I do not believe the peoples of Europe want dictatorships, but they have sunk below the level of men who can govern themselves. The question occurs to me: How long in this country can men who cannot support themselves govern themselves? The question arises as to whether or not we should take a firmer stand and the captains of industry, the governments and the alert people of the country join together in an effort to eradicate unemployment which, after all, is the real and serious problem which faces us.

Mr. WILLIAM HAYHURST (Vegreville): Mr. Speaker, I quote the last sentence of the speech from the throne:

> In this critical time of the world's affairs, I pray that Divine Providence may guide and bless your deliberations.

Yes, "guide and bless your deliberations." At the present time the international situation calls for enlightened leadership. Canada is placed in a position where it may give leadership to the nations. Surely by our exertions we might do something to save ourselves and by our example might do something to save others. The health and happiness of mankind are of more importance than the piling up of armaments, something which is most distasteful. Out of the anguish and distress of to-day it seems to me that it would be possible to make Canada one of the leading nations of the world.

The public ravings of some people in various countries are creating an attitude of fear not only among neighbouring peoples but among ourselves. The powers of fear and hate have superseded the power of reason. The defenders of democracy are being challenged, and that implies the possibility of conflict. May Providence guide us from such conflict, which can lead only to chaos. Public opinion in neutral countries would and could change for good the balance of our civilization.

Democracy as practised by this government is said to be aimless, inefficient and economically unjust. It is time the government did some really democratic planning. Democracy in Canada does not give freedom or opportunity to the mass of the people on account of economic inequalities. I ask, what good is freedom to a starving man? He cannot eat or drink freedom. The situation is critical. Time is a vital factor. The world is changing rapidly, and dilatoriness can easily give the fascist dictatorships the control they desire. The road to victory lies in taking the offensive, and the first offensive should be the crystallization of public opinion against inroads on our liberties. We must be quick to organize against such inroads while there is still time. We cannot be silent in the face of injustice; for liberty must arouse respect in the minds of our people. Those who know what liberty means will not surrender. Democracy should adopt a counter-strategy to fascism, but this strategy must have aims which are worth working for. It has been said that democracy stands for liberty, equality and happiness. We should not be afraid to advertise these facts to the world.

The armies of unemployed in the world, the economic interdependence brought about by booms and slumps, take from us the power of judgment. It is impossible for us to penetrate beneath the mask which our enemies prepare, and thus has been killed the very idea of freedom. At times it seems that mankind is again heading into a new dark age. The search seems to be for power. Witness Japan in her lust for imperial dominion, carrying on a ruthless warfare with China. Angry passions rule nations. Making war in order to gain economic objectives has become the adopted policy of many nations.

Security is all that people want, but insecurity has made people careless; for we are not free if we are helpless to keep our security. The policy of to-day is such that foreign glory has been presented as a substitute for a higher standard of living. Social reform must await the completion of arms programs. The normal habits of freedom will be difficult to attain in lands where dictatorships have flourished. Hate and passion have taken the place of free debate, and who knows whether it will not end in revolution or international conflict? The urge for freedom should be powerful enough to make us organize and be prepared for eventualities.

Democracy will survive only if its most ardent devotees prefer it to other ideologies. Democracy has a real responsibility. It must oppose the encroachment of dictatorships, or the struggles of our fathers will prove to have been in vain. We should not compromise on fundamental principles. It seems that we must choose between an open-door economy and a closed economy, between open diplomacy and secret diplomacy, and if we choose the former we must realize that it must be based upon faith in each other's pledges. Too often these pledges have been broken. We have compromised on armaments only to find that other nations have not kept their agreements.

With purpose and decision we should plan for a better society. No doubt our society should eliminate poverty and unemployment, and it is within our power to do so. Can we remove these evils; can we hand on the freedom won to the generations that are yet to come?

I shall never forget the time of the recent crisis in London. One day I listened at Hyde Park corner to the speeches of various people. I was particularly interested in the startling remarks of a tall, gaunt, hollow-eyed man who was denouncing Mr. Chamberlain. He said that Mr. Chamberlain had gone to see the barbarian in the barbarian mountains, and that he might have brought back peace, but it was peace with dishonour. It is not for me to pass judgment upon him. Later I visited Westminster, with all its history. Here is the very cradle of our parliamentary institutions. Here the lives of the great men remind us that the administration of the empire or of any part of it has been far from perfect. But where do you find perfection in democratic government, which believes in a maximum of liberty for the individual? This very liberty gives us freedom to do so many things that we are bound to make mistakes somewhere. The administration of the empire, I repeat, is far from perfect. There are many stains on our record —stains on the record of our treatment of the native peoples of Africa—stains on the record of the treatment of our Indians—but these stains are abhorrent to us and we are anxious to wipe them out. We stand for justice, mercy and beneficence. Far from perfect, the record of our parliamentary history will compare favourably with the history of any other people with a different form of government.

It is difficult to find a satisfactory basis of classification of the governments of the world, but in any such classification the parliamentary form of government, imperfect though it be, is still our greatest heritage. Conditions will not remain as they are. We shall have changes. Indeed to-day the great need is to change. We have witnessed the adoption of the federal system of government in Canada and Australia, and have seen the unification of South Africa. The process will not stop there. Science and geography will make us change as the needs arise. Our achievements in the past will urge us on to greater and better liberties, and we shall ease and lift the burdens now borne by many. Every type of civilization, every cause, however hopeless, has always found defenders who would accept martyrdom in its behalf.

In this connection I wish to read a passage from The Things Men Fight For, by H. H. Powers:

> But while our preference is not due to the superiority of our civilization, the superiority of our civilization is largely due to our preference. The most ideal civilization would die if its devotees did not passionately prefer it, just as the most perfect species of animal would perish if it did not cherish and protect its young with unreasoning devotion. Hence our unreasonable preferences as measured by the inherent quality of things, are justified as the only thing that can give our way of life a fighting chance in the great struggle for survival.

It is invidious to make comparisons, and I do not propose to do so. I shall simply say that our ideals are the result of a long and arduous struggle. The yoke on our shoulders has been lightened by the struggles of the past, and now we must hold fast to the intangible things that have made our empire great.

The nations of the world are engaged in a mutual effort to strangle each other by war, by raising tariffs, or by lowering quotas. Every nation is trying to increase its exports but is unwilling to import. The imports of one nation are, however, the exports of another, so that in so far as world imports are reduced world exports are thereby correspondingly reduced. Until, therefore, nations generally are prepared to increase their imports, world imports cannot increase.

The reason for dwindling world trade will accordingly be found when it is discovered why nations wish to reduce imports. The individual merchant is vitally interested to see the removal of the obstacles which each nation places in the way of imports, and a consequent expansion in total world trade. He is personally concerned in the discovery and removal of those causes which have led nations to attempt to restrict imports by means of tariffs, quotas, and exchange restrictions.

The dragon's teeth of discord are being sown in countries of eastern Europe. Will this break down our civilization? Will bitter propaganda kill all originality of mind and creative thought? Will democracy survive? If it will, it must be reinforced. The dark clouds of war are casting their shadows over the world to-day. Italy has struck, Japan has struck, and Spain is experiencing the horrors of internecine strife. It is a grim outlook. Different ideologies are attempting to win converts by brute force. Fascism is the dominant force in many lands. We know that the violent words of Herr Hitler were supported by a tremendous increase in armaments in Germany. It seemed to anyone in London on that memorable day when the German chancellor delivered his speech that the question was one either of war or of peace. It would not have mattered greatly who had represented the British; he would have had to consider this cold and unpleasant reality—to be or not to be? That was the question. It would be presumptuous on my part to pass judgment on what happened at Munich. I was in England at the time, and there was both praise and criticism of the Munich pact. The dramatic events which succeeded each other in quick succession are now history. The consequence of the decisions reached by Chamberlain, Bonnet, Hitler and Mussolini will have tremendous results in the destiny of Europe. Our international relations seem to be confused. Our conscience is shocked by reports in newspapers from day to day. The Spanish situation makes us wonder how it will all end. Statements in the press, on the radio or in reviews perplex and confuse us; so we may well pray for guidance in our deliberations.

Has Munich merely postponed the evil day for a day more terrible? What a terrible state of affairs! Look at China; here is the Daily Telegraph's Supplement of June 27, 1938, on China. What does it say?

Ruin and terror in China!

Bombing has maimed and killed thousands, destroying homes and industries.

Burning has wiped out towns, villages, crops and stocks.

Floods have engulfed immense areas of fertile land.

Famine is transforming China's peaceful folk into wandering terror-stricken refugees.

The same applies to Spain. Public indignation in a democracy changes the course of events, sometimes for the worse. It is possible that the public indignation which caused the resignation of Sir Samuel Hoare at the time of the Hoare-Laval plan was primarily responsible for Italy joining Germany.

Timidity and lack of knowledge and foresight have done much in the past few years to allow a handful of men to paralyze whole nations, but we must not despair. We must learn to draw from misfortune the means of future strength. It is the hour, not for despair but for courage, remembering that justice is as important as peace.

The greatest wastage in Canada to-day is the wastage of our youth. The government should give a lead in defining democracy; should tell us plainly what the benefits of democracy are, and should help our young people by means of scholarships or in other ways to become leaders. Democracy can survive only if men and women know what it means. Democracy should work so that our young people will be enthusiastic in its cause.

Regarding the subject of democracy I will take a quotation from Constructive Democracy. Here is a piece by the Marquess of Lothian:

But the weakness of liberal democracy has been—

And this applies also to Canadian Liberalism.

—that it has not hitherto been able to establish economic liberty or equality. It gives liberty to those who can command property or credit to initiate and conduct economic enterprise. But it does not yet give liberty to the man without capital. It is not liberty to be free to look for a job when there is no job to be found. And it is not equality to have access to the multitudinous goods which capitalism puts in the shop window when, through no fault of your own, you have no money in your pocket with which to buy them.

And what of the new Canadians in our land? Our ancestors came from nearly every European country. We have in Canada over 600,000 citizens of Ukranian descent, and they are asking us to take an interest in them. During the past twenty years the Ukrainians have been struggling to establish once more in the Ukraine a motherland which could be called their own. They enjoy democracy and would uphold it in this country. It seems to be the dream of every Ukrainian that they have in Europe a free Ukraine as their motherland. In general they have remained a democratic nation and continue to believe in the liberties of democracy.

I have received several communications from friends of the Ukrainian people, and they are desirous that an impartial Ukrainian viewpoint concerning Ukrainian problems in Europe be given. I have before me a declaration from Ukrainian Canadians and friends regarding the Ukraine. In publishing this declaration the committee hopes, first: to stop false representations of the Ukrainian cause to international opinion as sponsored by some foreign influences, and, second, to provide true information to the British authorities and thus enable the British Empire to take part in a settlement of the Ukrainian question on behalf of her citizens in Canada. This is the declaration of Ukrainian Canadians and friends regarding the Ukraine:

The grave danger to world peace during the European crisis which resulted from internal minority problems in Czechoslovakia, has shown clearly to the powers of Europe, as well as to the rest of the world, that minority problems within the artificial boundaries of post-war European states composed of several nationalities are dangerous sources of strife and are productive of great international conflicts. At this moment, we, the British citizens of Ukrainian origin, enjoying the privileges of free government, feel that it is our supreme duty to raise our voice in the interests of world peace, the British Empire, and a just and permanent solution of the Ukrainian problem. That problem involves the largest subjugated nationality in Europe of to-day. We are supported also by Canadian citizens who, though not of Ukrainian nationality, are friends of Ukrainian liberation.

The Ukrainian problem concerns the vital interests of over forty millions of Ukrainian people, a number equal to the population of France or Italy, who inhabit a solid area of more than one million square kilometers between the Carpathian and the Caucasus mountains in a great arc north of the Black sea.

This entire territory and its people with state traditions dating from 862 A.D. were again united into one sovereign Ukrainian state by the act of January 22nd, 1919, on the basis of the Wilsonian principle of self-determination.

Blockaded and attacked from the north by soviet red armies, from the east by the monarchist Russian armies of Generals Denikin and Wrangel, from the west by Poland, and from the south by the armies of Roumania, this newly created power in eastern Europe for three years without support from the great allied powers heroically endeavoured to defend its borders from these enemies and at the same time to check the waves of Russian communism threatening western Europe. However, under the weight of simultaneous and successive blows of overwhelmingly greater armies, and burdened with the outbreak of a deadly typhoid epidemic, Ukraine finally collapsed before it was able to exert its stabilizing effect upon post-war Europe. This rich Ukrainian state, so important economically and strategically, was nevertheless partitioned, its people degraded to the level of "minorities" and divided between the nationally-mixed powers, Czechoslovakia, Roumania, Poland and the Soviet Union. By incorporating considerable parts of the Ukrainian territory and population within their political boundaries, all these states from the very beginning of their existence after the great war and the Russian revolution, became the breeding grounds of dangerous national struggles, oppressions, hatreds and fears, as well as potential sources of a new world war.

During the past twenty years the Ukrainian people, under the four occupant powers have experienced various degrees of cultural, religious, economic and particularly political oppression, including mass pacifications, and famine policies. Not the least of the grievances was the fact that this great nation was deprived, through censorship, suppression, and terrorism, of an opportunity to speak freely of its cause in the international forum.

It is for this reason that we, the citizens of Ukrainian origin in the free British Empire, together with the friends of the Ukrainian people in Canada, are moved on behalf of the Ukrainian nation in Europe, to draw to the attention of the British government and other world powers the following points concerning the Ukrainian problem:

1. In the interest of the balance of power and of a lasting peace in Europe the creation of the Ukrainian sovereign state in the spirit of the acts of January 22nd, 1919, embracing all ethnographically Ukrainian territories, is a historic necessity of wide international significance.

2. The Ukrainian territories now within the political boundaries of Czechoslovakia, Roumania, Poland and the Soviet Union, must be regarded and dealt with, not as separate minority problems in each case, but as integral parts of the Ukrainian cause as a whole.

3. To avoid further complications similar to that of the recent European crisis arising from the minority problems of Cechoslovakia, we strongly urge and earnestly request the great powers, signatories of the Munich pact, to appoint without delay an international commission for the final settlement of the Ukrainian problem in Europe.

[Mr. Hayhurst.]

Mr. Speaker, we are a country of many races. His Excellency the Governor General in a speech at Halifax said:

> The strongest peoples have always been a mingling of races . . . but they are only strong if that mingling is conducted in the proper way. And that proper way is that each accepts and appreciates the qualities of the other.

I shall close my remarks, Mr. Speaker, by quoting a few lines from Shakespeare's King Lear:

> If that the heavens do not their visible spirits
> Send quickly down to tame these vile offences,
> It will come,
> Humanity must perforce prey on itself,
> Like monsters of the deep.

Mr. PIERRE GAUTHIER (Portneuf) (Translation): Mr. Speaker, at the outset, I wish to tender my congratulations to the hon. member who has moved and to the hon. member who has seconded the address in reply to the speech from the throne. I can add nothing to the praise given to them for the manner in which they have fulfilled their task, for no word of mine would add anything to their merit.

During the few years which have elapsed since I was returned as a federal member, it has been my wish that some day, in order that we might enjoy all the better the wonderful speeches delivered in this house, the government, on the recommendation of Mr. Speaker, would provide loud speakers, which would allow those who, like myself, occupy seats in the far corners of the house, to hear better, and to take a more comprehensive view of, the statements of national import made by our legislators. I shall bring up the matter again later on and insist upon it until we succeed in securing that improvement which may seem more or less necessary, but the importance of which is unquestionable.

It is a pleasure for me, Mr. Speaker, to see you presiding again over the debates of this house. The sound judgment which marks your rulings is a great comfort to those who take part in the discussions. May you long remain in the position you occupy; your presence ensures the smooth working of the parliamentary machinery.

I would be remiss in my duty, and my electors, both men and women, would upbraid me if I did not thank publicly the leader of this government (Mr. Mackenzie King) for the sympathy he extended to my constituency on the occasion of the unprecedented disaster which occurred during the night of August 31 to September 1 of last year and which caused such great hardships. The torrential rain which had swollen the Portneuf river had scarcely stopped when we learned that eight human lives had been lost within a radius of about one mile. Two Canadian Pacific Railway employees trapped inside their engine, a mother with her five children swept away by the river which had become a raging torrent; bridges wrecked as if they had been so many toys; dwellings engulfed and carried away like houses of cards, such was the havoc wrought during a single night in the parish of Portneuf. In spite of his heavy duties, the Prime Minister sent us his sympathies that very same night. The people were greatly moved by this splendid gesture of his, and sufferers seemed to regain their spirit.

The government, through the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Cardin), who came quite unobtrusively to survey the extent of the losses, extended its help to the stricken municipality.

The necessary work is now practically completed and the thanks which I am now extending to the government are well deserved. The action of the Minister of Public Works was very much appreciated by the people. To him also I tender my heartfelt thanks.

I also wish to thank the right hon. the Minister of Justice (Mr. Lapointe) for the deep sympathy he has shown, upon his return from Europe, to the sorely tried population of my constituency.

The forthcoming visit of their British majesties to Canada has been, for the last few months, the main topic in the press and among the public men and the whole population of the country. Naturally, our interest is awakened and our curiosity aroused when we realize that the rulers who will be welcomed in this country are the king and queen of Canada, visiting for the first time one of the countries freely associated in the British commonwealth of nations. This democratic gesture does great credit to their majesties; and following the visit of the President of the United States, it is of exceptional significance for the great democracies, and in view of the recent renewal of trade relations, it augurs well for a much more reassuring future and for the realization of a victorious union in the struggle for supremacy between the different nations of the world.

When, from aboard ship, their majesties shall cast their eyes on the Canadian shores, they shall still see the British ensign flying on ships masts and on the house tops the colours of Britain and France as well as those of the head of the Catholic church in the world. However, during their stay in Canada, they will live among a people without a flag. And yet we are a proud people! More than ever, we realize our national responsibilities, we have confidence in our vast resources which, properly used, are such as to make our country entitled to a voice among the nations. However, we Canadians are still without a truly distinctive Canadian flag. I doubt if within the next few weeks to elapse before the arrival of their majesties, we shall have time to reach unanimity of opinion on this matter, in order that we might unfurl a flag which will announce from afar that one is nearing Canada, a truly independent and free nation. We have a long way to go before we are taken seriously and our statements are acknowledged. A flag is only a piece of cloth for the materially minded, but recalls the history of a nation for those who realize all that it stands for.

Although the speech from the throne was severely criticized by some hon. members who saw nothing in it, it contains, however, some very interesting and highly important statements, for instance the government recognizes the necessity of increasing the expenditures for national defence, in view of the world conditions, as well as the need of giving increased attention to the unemployment problem of the country. The assistance given to the youth of the country, worried over the future, shows that the government is determined not to neglect an issue of such importance to our young country. I am greatly concerned by that very consideration which I view from a particular standpoint.

The duty of the government is primarily to provide for those who were born in this country and for those also who, foreign-born, have chosen this country as their land of adoption. Let us hope each and every one of the latter group shall always place the Canadian point of view before any other, and that both these groups of Canadian citizens, in a close and durable unity of purpose, shall help public authorities to improve the economic conditions. Such as have cast a longing look upon our country as the promised land for those who suffer persecution elsewhere, must understand that notwithstanding our spontaneous disapproval of methods which an exaggerated nationalism has inspired, and our deep sympathy for their cause, at the same time, if some of our people can successfully take care of themselves, others must depend on state assistance until better days.

The youth of this country cannot and must not accept any immigration policy tending only, in final analysis, to aggravate their own difficulties. It is not to be wondered at if they have taken the lead in an important movement which can no longer be ignored, which has been rapidly gaining momentum and promises to last indefinitely should we fail to meet their demands. The statement made by the Secretary of State in Montreal last Friday has caused great rejoicing among the younger people. With your permission, Mr Speaker, I shall quote an article published in Le Canada on January 23rd:

Hon. Mr. Rinfret and Immigration.

Commonsense has inspired the federal government's decision not to loosen the restrictions on immigration from Europe. Moreover, it is in accordance with public opinion in the whole country. Hon. Mr. Rinfret, Secretary of State, in the speech which he recently made in Montreal, very ably described the situation in which we find ourselves at the moment.

The minister states:

While we deeply deplore the fate of foreign refugees, particularly of those coming from Germany, our sympathy remains with the people of Canada. We are aware that many of our people are unemployed and that certain elements are not easily assimilated to the French and English population of Canada. And the dominion government has come to the decision, while sympathizing with the foreigners, that the existing statutory restrictions on immigration should be maintained. The dominion has no intention of curtailing present restrictions, so long at least as we still have to cope with unemployment in this country.

The editor of Le Canada goes on:

No doubt the systematic persecution endured by the Jewish race in Germany and Austria is bound to move us to pity, but precisely, the dominion government does not want this problem to grow into a question of sentiment. Both wisdom and properly understood charity require the government to look first after the well-being of our Canadian population.

The attitude of the government would undoubtedly be altogether different if they could get the assurance that all those who desire to enter Canada could settle on the land and earn a living, but such is not the case. In his remarkable book, Canadian Mosaic, Mr. John Murray Gibbon has noted that the flow of Jewish immigration which made its way to Canada around the year 1880 headed chiefly for Montreal and Toronto where they built up the garment industry. The same thing would happen again to-day and we know that neither of these two cities, affected as they are by unemployment, are prepared to receive additional workmen.

According to the census of 1931, out of 156,000 Hebrews settled in Canada, 794 only were farmers. The greater number were employed in the textile industry.

I endorse the views voiced in this editorial and, on behalf of the youth of my province, I wish to thank the hon. member for St. James (Mr. Rinfret) for having dispelled the uncertainty which had been brought into their mind by certain newspapers striving too eagerly for the success of a political party on which they are founding their hopes. I have already stated that I wanted no race in particular to be ostracized. Each one is entitled to a living in this Canada of ours; on the other hand, all nations have the right to choose their new citizens, even if radio addresses are broadcast from overseas, even if committees are being set up in our country in order to prove that Canada, in the words of Dr. Wallace, principal of Queen's university, in Kingston:

A free and broadminded country, a country that needs more population, has the privilege to show in a practical way that it thoroughly understands the needs of a suffering people. We must not neglect this opportunity.

Had the distinguished doctor lived a century ago he would not have to join such a movement to know whether Canadians can understand the needs of a suffering people; he would realize that sufferings of others need not be added to our own difficulties.

People ostracized by Germany will have the sympathy of all. We have in our midst hundreds of thousands of citizens of Jewish origin. Would it be in their own interest and would it be practical for them to add to that present considerable number thousands of their brothers? We all agree that agriculture has no inducements for them. And is there one Canadian citizen who could reasonably believe that the greatest need in Canada is not more man-power on the farms?

Before accepting further immigration, whichever it may be, let us lead our own people towards lands which would be productive, but for the lack of settlers. The youth training plan is an excellent idea; it should be multiplied fivefold and constitute the chief concern of our governments. The problem of our youth is far more important than any other now before us. Should we fail to solve it we shall have to resign ourselves either to perish economically or to await the leadership of others more bold and concerned with the famous equal distribution of citizens owing the same allegiance in the different colonies which they inhabit.

Our young people must not be let down. They are ever ready to follow whomever will undertake to lead them out of their distressful state. This government has made a good start. Let them continue in spite of all criticism; the people will be grateful to them.

A second interesting point in the speech from the throne is the government's declared intention actively to pursue the execution of its national defence program. I have already expressed my opinion on this question, saying among other things this: A country of 10,000,000 people stimulated by the fever of war, by enthusiasm for the empire, can raise in a few months a considerable army. Public men categorically opposed to participation in foreign wars did vote for the sending of troops to the empire's assistance. Circumstances and events proved stronger than men's wills and Canada did take part in a foreign war.

My opinion has not changed. It has not changed, because the circumstances and events to which I was referring will occur again.

We all know about those press campaigns carefully carried out all over the country, those series of speeches having an effect similar to that of the drop of water regularly falling upon the rock, those manoeuvres conducted in different parts of the country with the certitude that politicians, whose election was brought about by the display of posters showing the piled up corpses from wrecked battleships upon a rocky shore will afterwards take refuge among people known as rabid supporters of participation in all the wars of the empire. Such a campaign as we all know, gradually brings the people to such a frame of mind that they finally accept as a necessity something of which they nevertheless disapprove; all such concerted action will bring about a repetition of events which the true dictator, gold, multiplies seemingly as it likes, and it leads to circumstances which men fail to understand and to which they fall easy preys.

No one entertains any doubt about the necessity of national defence; not even he who now has the floor. To my knowledge, no hon. member from this side of the house questions the sincerity of the clear cut statements made by the leader of the government and his ministers, concerning participation in foreign wars. Those who look at things from a Canadian standpoint only—and it is the one which must be considered—are delighted with his firm stand, frankly and admirably Canadian. That stand will, I believe, be the objective of a campaign, already under way, and not unlike the one waged from 1910 to 1914. There seems to be in Canada, a keener and more deeply rooted public opinion. I heartily wish that such may be the case, for it will then be a harder task, to-morrow, to oust the successor to the Canadian we lost in 1919. Democracy in danger; the empire in danger—for certain sections of the country; the frustrated rights of the provinces—for some other sections; the revamped nationalist doctrine; everything will be used to discredit the man who places Canadian patriotism above everything else.

First, he must be dismissed from the scene, and then we shall witness the repetition of what occurred in 1911, 1914 and 1917. I had that picture in mind when the military estimates were first discussed, and it is now even more vivid and enlarged. When the armaments mongers, having disposed of their abominable wares through a war, shall feel like taking a rest, a new crisis will engulf the whole world and Canada, in common with the other countries, will suffer from the flood of unemployed workers from the war industries thrown back into the ranks of those who will not have been able to find employment elsewhere, and the whole game will start all over again.

The whole world is arming, one might say. Unfortunately, such is the excuse offered by those who live from the blood shed during war times and that excuse has found an echo in many quarters.

I have declined, and still decline to be a party to such a farce meant to draw one's attention away from the world wide tragedy. I prefer to devote myself to other activities and to spend my life in bettering the economic life of my country. I stand for Canada above all, for Canada alone, and for Canada forever.

Mr. W. A. WALSH (Mount Royal) (Translation): Mr. Speaker, I shall first congratulate my hon. friend the member for Portneuf (Mr. Gauthier). I can not approve of all his opinions, but he has stated his views to this house in a splendid speech.

(Text) Mr. Speaker, I wish I could go farther in that language without making too many grammatical errors.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): That is pretty good.

Mr. WALSH: If I had been placed on a platform in my constituency I would not hesitate to reply in as good French as I could command to many of the arguments of my good friend the hon. member for Portneuf (Mr. Gauthier).

I should like with other hon. members to offer my sincere congratulations to the mover (Mr. Matthews) and the seconder (Mr. Chevrier) of the address, and particularly to the seconder, who spoke so easily in both French and English, and set an example for every Canadian citizen. I should like, too, to extend my congratulations to the new members of the house. Naturally I regret the reason which brought them here, but I am pleased to see that those who have left us apparently have been replaced to good advantage. I hope the new members will soon fit into the atmosphere of the House of Commons and will discharge their duties to the advantage of their constituencies, and to the country in general.

May I take this opportunity to extend my congratulations to the hon. members who have recently been elevated to the rank of privy councillors. It is gratifying to sit in the house and see one or another of those with whom one has been associating in the ordinary walks of life selected by their political leader for preferment and advancement within their own party. If one may judge from the names and constituencies, it would seem that the Macs have something which some of the rest of us have not, and that a constituency with the suffix "west" may win the favour of a considerable number of people. Entering the house this afternoon I noticed a floral display on the desk of the hon. member for Bruce (Mr. Tomlinson). In passing may I congratulate him upon having attained another milestone in life, and may I wish him much joy and happiness as he goes from one milestone to another.

With your permission, Mr. Speaker, may I digress briefly. During the course of the last session there was a somewhat heated debate on a subject centring around the city of Kingston. During the course of that debate I was interrupted by the hon. member for Northumberland, Ontario (Mr. Fraser), and in a rather heated reply I used words which might very well be construed as casting a reflection upon his character and reputation. I went to him personally and apologized, and have awaited an opportunity to do so publicly. This is the first opportunity, and may I say here and now that any unworthy ideas or suggestions which could be woven into those words were not intended to be there. I hold the hon. member for Northumberland in the highest esteem and regard, and I believe I do so in common with every hon. member of the house.

It is noticeable that times and conditions of Canada are not good. When times were good and conditions seemed to be improving there was no one on the government side unwilling to take the credit for such improvement. We heard of it in 1937; we heard in 1938 how conditions were improving—and, of course, we were told that conditions were improving only and solely because there was a Liberal government in power in Ottawa. But conditions are not so good to-day. That fact is recognized in the utterances of the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King), the Minister of Labour (Mr. Rogers), the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) and all other hon. members who have taken part in the debate. If the government wishes to take credit in the good years it must of necessity take discredit in the lean years, and must not be content to refer to world conditions and suggest that they, as a government, have no responsibility for conditions prevailing in Canada to-day.

If we examine the records of our exports and imports, my reference will be apparent. In 1936 exports were valued at $1,015,000,000; in 1937, $1,110,000,000, and in 1938, $913,000,000, a considerable drop. They still continue to drop, and I have no doubt the report in March, 1939, will not be pleasing to the citizens of Canada. Imports have shown a like tendency. I shall not quote the figures; they speak for themselves and they are already on record. I have noted, too, that revenue returns showed a marked increase in 1936, again in 1937 and again in the fiscal year ended March 31, 1938. If we examine the figures for the year which will end on March 31, 1939, we shall notice that, to the disadvantage of hon. members on the treasury benches, revenues are showing a decided drop. May I point out in passing that this drop is not noticeable, so far as direct taxation on business and industry is concerned. That branch of taxation shows a revenue increase of $20,000,000 to the government. These figures serve to show that despite times which are not good, $20,000,000 more than in previous years has been extracted from business and industry, and it means too, that there is left in business that much less money with which to keep the wheels of industry turning. A government should endeavour to leave in business and industry as much money as possible, because it is that money which keeps industry busy and people employed. But apparently it is the ambition of this government to extract from all sources as much revenue as possible in order to have more money to spend.

I also draw attention to the construction figures for Canada, in order to emphasize the conditions which prevail in this country; and seeing that we were forced to agree last year that conditions were good, and the government claimed credit for that, this year, when conditions are bad, it is only fair to impute the blame to the government. As a further proof of our business recession during the past year I quote the 1937 construction figures, which stood at $304,000,000; in 1938 that figure had dropped to $274,000,000. I call the attention of the house to the paragraph in the speech from the throne in 1938, in which the government says:

> It is gratifying to note that, during the past year, there has been a further substantial advance in Canada's economic recovery. Revenues have reached new levels. Trade with other countries has materially expanded.

There is no such reference in the speech from the throne this year. It is noticeable by its absence; it is absent because times and conditions are not good, and therefore they could not be referred to in the glowing terms which this government liked to use with reference to what had taken place previously, and for which they endeavoured in the past to take credit.

It seems to me that every time there is a discussion of a United States trade agreement it is a bad omen for this country. Conditions in Canada immediately begin to get worse, as we shall notice if we study the trade figures. The benefits that we derived from the empire trade agreements of 1932 have often been emphasized in this house, and those benefits are obvious from the trade figures. But while our trade agreement of 1936 with the United States was followed at first by a substantial increase in trade with that country there was later a substantial decrease, and I want to assure the house from my study of our trade agreements with the United States that this will always be our experience. Our only safe and sure market is the market in Great Britain, the market of the empire, and the least sure market in which we deal at any time is the United States market; for surely that republic will take advantage of every opportunity to encourage trade on behalf of its own people, and we in Canada will suffer in consequence. I feel that this government has sold its birthright, the golden opportunity on which we were launched in 1932, and sold it for something that may look all right on the surface; but when the surface is scratched and we begin to experience the results of the agreement, after it has come into operation, we find that it is impossible for Canada to trade on an equitable basis with the great republic to the south.

In passing I want to lodge my protest against the manner in which this trade agreement was drawn up on behalf of Canada. In the United States they have a regulation that if any tariff items are to be changed or amended by a trade treaty, the industries affected must be advised and given an opportunity to present a brief or to make representations before final action is taken. But a similar situation does not prevail in this country. Our business men and industrialists are kept decidedly in the dark as to what is going on. The only thing they know about the treaty is after it has been signed and is beginning to affect their business, without their having had an opportunity to present their views or to register a protest against the provisions of the treaty. I shall not take further time on the trade treaty because we shall have an opportunity to discuss it at a later date. I hope that every member of this house will take an intelligent, Canada-wide point of view in discussing such an important piece of legislation.

Not only do I take this government to task for the condition in which Canada finds herself economically to-day, but I would suggest that the present administration has made absolutely no headway in reducing the expenditures of government. For example, ordinary expenditures in 1936 amounted to $372,000,000, whereas in 1938 they amounted to $414,000,000, and this increase took place despite a saving of several million dollars by a process of refunding. That does not show any economy in expenditure so far as this government is concerned. This government seems to be beset with the idea of raising revenues, collecting the money and increasing the expenditures of government, rather than decreasing the costs of government and leaving in the hands of the taxpayers some money by means of which business can carry on and prosper, and unemployment be made to shrink. I think of that item of ordinary expenditures increasing, and I think of the possibilities of extravagant expenditures being found in the estimates for the coming year. I think of many of what we call in ward politics, "pork-barrel" items, that might appear in the estimates this year, to increase still further this $414,000,000 of ordinary expenditures. I think, too, of the railway deficit of over $50,000,000, and of the outlay of over $60,000,000 incurred through fixing the price for wheat. There are other items to which I could make reference; but surely, Mr. Speaker, in view of the items I have cited and the conditions that prevail in this country, this government, despite the fact that this is most likely an election year, will devise ways and means of presenting to the house estimates that will show a decided shrinkage in the cost of government so far as the dominion is concerned. If this government would set an example in economy, I believe the provincial governments would follow suit, and I believe the municipal governments would follow the lead of the provincial governments. The result would be that we would have decreased costs of all our government services, and the Canadian people would have to pay less in taxation to their various governments.

There is one item to which I wish to make special reference to-night. I am sorry the Minister of Transport (Mr. Howe) is not in his seat. An item has appeared in the press indicating that the board of directors of the Canadian National Railways has authorized an expenditure of $12,600,000 for work on the terminal or tunnel station at Montreal. To my mind this looks very much as though the Canadian National Railways was getting back into politics. We are in an election year, and here is the government getting the board of directors of the Canadian National Railways to make this expenditure of $12,600,000, spread over a period of four years.

Mr. DUPUIS: Is the hon. gentleman against it?

Mr. WALSH: I will make my position so abundantly clear before I finish my remarks that the hon. member for Chambly-Rouville (Mr. Dupuis) will quite appreciate the point I am making.

Mr. DUPUIS: That is no answer.

Mr. WALSH: I am making the suggestion that the Canadian National Railways is getting back into politics, and it is being forced into that position by this present government. The Secretary of State (Mr. Rinfret) during the St. Henry by-election made use of these words:

> The government of which I am a part will settle this problem of the Canadian National railway and the level crossings; we will fill the hole on Dorchester street and solve the problem of the approaches thereto.

In that he was supported by the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Cardin). I have heard in this house so frequently from the Minister of Transport (Mr. Howe) that the board of directors of the Canadian National Railways have been completely divorced from politics; that they are not under the control of the Minister of Transport; that they are not under the control of the government, but that they are an independent body conducting the affairs of that railroad as they would conduct a corporation of their own. Yet we have during the course of a by-election statements of this kind from responsible ministers of the crown in order, with the people's own money, to purchase their support during the course of the election. Now the money is being spent: $12,600,000 of it is being spent, and for no other purpose than to purchase the votes of the electors in and around Montreal, so that this government, which is discredited in other ways, can come back into office, purchasing their way into office on the strength of bringing the Canadian National Railways back actively into politics—which we tried to avoid in 1933.

Mr. DUPUIS: And filling holes left by the Tories.

Mr. STEWART: They did not make the hole.

Mr. WALSH: I ask the question seriously, and I ask the hon. member for Chambly-Rouville to give it serious consideration:

Has the Canadian National Railways got back into politics? Have we gone back to the conditions which prevailed prior to 1932? My answer is yes, and I support that answer by the suggestion that the very first act of this government was to change from a board of trustees to a board of directors. The warnings of the Duff commission were not in any way heeded by the present government. I read, on page 13 of the report of the royal commission to inquire into railways and transportation in Canada, words like these:

> Running through its administrative practices, however, has been the red thread of extravagance. The disciplinary check upon undue expenditure, inherent in private corporations because of their limited financial resources, has not been in evidence. Requisitions of the management have been endorsed by governments, and successive parliaments have voted money freely, if not lavishly.
> Within the railway organization there has been freedom in expenditure and encouragement in plans for expansion and extension of services which were inconsistent with prudent administrative practice. The administration failed to realize that this country, with the greatest railway mileage in the world in relation to population, could not afford further capital and maintenance expenditures for unwarranted branch lines, for de luxe services, for unrequired hotels, for the building of ships in competitive service to be shortly abandoned; and, generally, for costly adventures in competitive railways out of proportion to the needs of the country.

I would ask hon. members, Is it the intention of the government to go back on the recommendations of this report, or are they shoving the Canadian National Railways back again into politics? I warn the government that if they do so they will get exactly the results which were experienced in this country from 1920 to 1932, the experience that is warned against in this report, and this country will be brought into a financial condition where our bonds and other securities will not be of the value they were when this government came into office in 1935.

I want to ask the hon. member for Chambly-Rouville if he recalls an item in the Duff report bearing on cooperation. If there is one place in the world where these two railways can cooperate, it is in terminal facilities. Everyone, even the hon. member for Chambly-Rouville, knows that terminal facilities are not a paying proposition. Terminals are an expense, and if there is one place where railways can cooperate and where they do cooperate, it is in the matter of railway terminal facilities.

Mr. DUPUIS: May I be allowed to answer that question now?

Mr. SPEAKER: Order.

Mr. DUPUIS: The Minister of Transport said—

Mr. SPEAKER: Order.

Mr. WALSH: I want to continue.

Mr. DUPUIS: —the union station will be built there—

Mr. SPEAKER: Order.

Mr. WALSH: I am always willing to have anyone ask a question.

Mr. DUPUIS: The hon. member asked a question.

Mr. WALSH: But I do not want hon. members to make speeches at the expense of the few minutes I have left. I want to read from page 65 of the Duff report:

> We have emphasized the fact that a principal weakness of the past decade has been the failure of the railways to act together in their own interests and in the interests of the public. It is not enough that each should take all practicable measures of economy in respect of its own system. There must be joint action with a view to savings in the wider sphere.

I could go on to the next paragraph of that report, but time is short. I just wanted to use that to show hon. members that the Duff commission, after a careful study, presented a report urging cooperation, and that we in parliament at a later date, in 1933, in the Statutes of Canada 1932-33, chapter 33, sections 16 and 17, incorporated that principle, urging cooperation. I say again, and it cannot be repeated too often, that if there is one place in the whole system of these railways where cooperation could be effective without detriment to either railway and without any detriment to the people of this country, it is in railway terminals and terminal facilities. Yet this government are condoning the action of the directors of the Canadian National Railways in going ahead with this expenditure of $12,600,000. I ask this government, where does cooperation fit in with their railway policy? Have they any railway policy which is going to assist this country in curbing its $50,000,000 deficit? Do hon. members ever stop to appreciate the significance of that deficit? Practically one million dollars of our taxes is going every week to provide for the deficits of the Canadian National Railways. Yes despite that condition they are burdening the railway further with this terminal site expenditure of $12,600,000.

And that is not all, Mr. Speaker. I turn to the Palmer report. On page 9 you will find these figures, figures which show an estimated cost of $46,000,000. They have already spent $18,000,000; the balance left to complete the work is $28,000,000. The proposal is to spend $12,600,000 during the next four years. This leaves another $15,400,000 to be spent at a later date, most likely just before another election, if this government is able to buy its way back into power at the close of the present session of parliament.

Mr. MacNICOL: Money cannot save them.

Mr. WALSH: Bear in mind that these are only estimated figures; they are not final; if we have anything to go by in past estimates, government figures for government projected expenditures are very far beside the mark, and this balance of $15,000,000 which is left to be spent will doubtless be expanded to thirty or forty million dollars before that tunnel station is complete.

We have as an example of government estimating, the building of a harbour bridge in Montreal, where the estimate was $9,000,000 the final figure was $18,000,000. No doubt the tunnel station will fall into the same category. Why should there not be a union station in the city of Montreal? There are union stations at Halifax, Saint John, Quebec, Ottawa, Toronto, and other cities throughout Canada. That plan has been adopted in most of the large cities in the United States in order to save expense to the railways, and it has also been adopted in European countries. Why can we not adopt it in Canada? It would not be detrimental to either railway to have a union station in Montreal.

Again, would it not be wise definitely to settle the railway and transportation problem in Canada before launching upon such an extravagant expenditure for something that will possibly block the future as far as Montreal is concerned and prevent our ever having union station facilities for the railways and the public travelling in and out of Montreal?

I was going to suggest that if the government is doing this work as a relief measure there are many other relief measures that could be adopted in Montreal. There are many others that would bring greater glory to the city of Montreal than the filling of that hole by a tunnel station. The tunnel station work already done there could be used to advantage for the building of a civic centre, a road approach from Victoria bridge into that hole in the ground. It could be used as an entrance and exit for buses and a tram service to parts of Montreal, and the $18,000,000 would not be at all lost. I repeat, the work already done could be used to advantage. If it is really a relief measure, then I think of those huge buildings I have spoken of on another occasion, referred to as the university of Montreal. That project is unfinished, unused. An opportunity exists there for a government to do a really useful piece of work for the general uplift of the whole community, because from that expenditure untold benefits could be derived through the establishment, in the way of a return on the money that might be spent, of scholarships that would enable our young men to attend that university from every point in Canada. Also young French-Canadians who cannot afford it at the present time could take advantage of further education in that institution. Money spent in that way would not be ill-spent.

Mr. DUPUIS: It was flatly refused by the previous administration.

Mr. WALSH: I am afraid that this government is so intent on politics that it forgets the ultimate good of Canada. Politics seems to be an obsession with this government. Why, they cannot even appoint returning officers without having politics as the predominant factor in their consideration. I had spoken to the Secretary of State about a returning officer in my division, a returning officer who was there in 1926. He was reappointed by the government in 1930 and in 1935. I had half a promise that he would be left there because he was a competent man, but he has been removed and in his place what name do I find? I find the name of the chief organizer of my Liberal opponent. He has been appointed returning officer for the constituency of Mount Royal, a position which is supposed to be held by an unbiassed public servant. I am given to understand that mine is only one example; very many others could be quoted along the same line.

There is only one other phase of government I should like to touch on in conclusion, and that is the condition we find in Canada on account of lack of cooperation on the part of this government. A complete lack of unity exists and is all too apparent. While visiting in Charlottetown I read on a tablet erected in confederation room these words:

> In the hearts and the minds of the delegates who assembled in this room on September 1, 1864, was born the Dominion of Canada. Providence being their guide, they builded better than they knew.

It has been left to a Liberal government practically to undo what the fathers of confederation have done. Just take a glance over the political map of Canada and you will readily see to what I have reference. This government is not on speaking terms with the government of Alberta—not through any fault of the Alberta government. Because they were not a government after the complexion of this administration, this administration refused to consider with the Alberta government the question of taking care of a loan that became due. It had, in my opinion, a political motive in view. That should never have been. No dominion government should allow any provincial government to fall down on the repayment of any loan secured from the public. This government says it was impossible to deal with the premier and the provincial treasurer of Alberta. I say that it was not only possible, but that it was the duty of this government to do so. It was the duty of this government to bring the premier and the treasurer of Alberta to Ottawa and to lock themselves in a room with those gentlemen and say, "We will go out of this room when this question is settled satisfactorily both to you and to ourselves." The province of Alberta had as much right to fair treatment from this government as any other provincial government in Canada. That was the beginning of a very sharp antagonism between the province of Alberta and the dominion government at present holding office.

Then we come to the older provinces of Ontario and Quebec. With regard to the present discord let me read a statement made by one of the ministers in the course of a speech. In supporting the Minister of Labour (Mr. Rogers), the Minister of Transport (Mr. Howe) said:

> I subscribe most heartily to everything which Mr. Rogers has stated with regard to the alliance which exists between Premiers Hepburn and Duplessis and also with regard to the altogether deplorable effort which has been made to bring about the retirement of Premier Mackenzie King as leader of the Liberal party —a move very clearly intended to establish a government at Ottawa which would be subject to the joint control of provincial administrations in Toronto and Quebec and which as such would constitute the very antithesis of responsible government under the accepted federal system. Subterfuge must be uncovered, selfishness must be blasted asunder. We must make our stand on the solid foundation of national unity.

Do words of that sort bring about national unity? I say that such words, the irresponsible utterances of responsible ministers, create a condition which it is impossible for this government to remedy. Unity in the Dominion of Canada will never again be a recognized fact as long as the present government holds office.

Mr. MacNICOL: It is only another year.

Mr. WALSH: I could go further in reading this, but the time is short. I was surprised at the bizarre utterances of these two ministers. It was a terrifying story that they had to tell at Port Arthur. These details of a conspiracy that they were going to unfold to a waiting public have not yet been told.

If we read such a story from Germany or Italy we would think something sinister was taking place. These responsible ministers speak of a conspiracy in this country; do they understand the terms they are using? Do they understand that national unity can never be brought about in this country by responsible ministers of the crown making such bizarre utterances? I verily thought that the days of Guy Fawkes had returned and that we had better place additional guards in the corridors and cellars of these parliament buildings to protect ourselves and even the members of this government from what might happen in the course of this conspiracy as it was being hatched. Both of these ministers have already spoken in this debate; yet we have had no unfolding of the details of this conspiracy. It is rather a bold charge. Subterfuge must be uncovered, they say; selfishness must be blasted asunder, intrigue and conspiracy must cease to flourish; yet they have given us no details. I think hon. members should demand an explanation. Men occupying high public office have had their names connected with such sinister expressions; yet we have had no explanation either in this house or in public. They go further, suggesting that the premier of Ontario and the premier of Quebec might even be conspiring with the leader of this party to get rid of this government. That is going rather too far. The object is a worthy one, but I am sure that these two premiers are not at the present time in any conspiracy with the leader of the Conservative party here to overthrow the present government by the means suggested by the two ministers. Certainly the leader of the opposition (Mr. Manion) is anxious to overthrow the present government, by constitutional means—

Mr. SPEAKER: Order. I am sorry to have to interrupt the hon. member, but his time is exhausted.

Mr. WALSH: I just want to finish one thing.

An hon. MEMBER: Let him finish.

Mr. SPEAKER: By unanimous consent of the house.

Mr. WALSH: Surely the leader of the opposition cannot be drawn into a conspiracy to get rid of the present government. To get rid of it is his duty; he is paid to do that work, but he is going to do it by educating and enlightening the public, not by associating himself with people who enter into conspiracies. It reminds me very much of the condition we had in Quebec prior to 1936, when the Taschereau government had outlived its usefulness. During the last two or three years of their existence, whenever any criticism was directed against them they haughtily suggested that the province of Quebec was being assailed. There was some indication of that attitude in the speech of the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King); he took us to task for not going from one end of Canada to the other to tell what this government had done for the people of Canada, which he said it was our duty to do. Although we criticize the government we are no less loyal to Canada than is the Prime Minister. We shall continue to criticize, believing that we are acting in the best interests of the people of Canada; we are trying to stir up this government to solve at least some of the major problems with which Canada is confronted.

In conclusion I agree with the statement of the premier of Ontario when he said:

> I am very optimistic with regard to Ontario, but I am most pessimistic over the condition in which we find the affairs of the dominion.

And further:

> I would suggest that Mr. King lift the blinds of his summer retreat at Kingsmere, peek out, and then go back and hibernate again. It strikes me that's about all he has been doing the last four years, and he might as well continue.

On this side of the house we are in hearty agreement with those sentiments, although we cannot always agree with the person who gave utterance to them.

Mr. H. E. BRUNELLE (Champlain): Mr. Speaker, I agree with the several hon. members who have so justly praised the mover (Mr. Matthews) and seconder (Mr. Chevrier) of the address in reply to the speech from the throne. Also I congratulate the hon. member for Essex West (Mr. McLarty) and the hon. member for Edmonton West (Mr. MacKinnon) for their recent appointment as ministers of the crown. It is also a pleasant duty to felicitate the leader of the opposition (Mr. Manion) upon the honour which was conferred on him when he was chosen as leader of the Conservative party and leader of the opposition. I wish him courage and patience.

Before I came to Ottawa for this session I heard a great many contradictory comments about the leader of the opposition. I even heard it said that he is a self-made man. Of course I reserved my judgment. But when I listened to his speech last week and saw the rather rude way in which he was treating the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King), who is usually so kind and considerate of his political opponents, I did form my opinion; I came to the conclusion that the leader of the opposition is a self-made man, and thus Providence escaped a great responsibility. Many hon. members of this chamber knew him and sat with him in this house in previous sessions. It was therefore particularly interesting for a new member like myself to listen to the three-hour speech that he made at the beginning of last week. I dare say new members could not help thinking that he is capable of saying a great many things. I expected in the first place that he would refer to the different reforms which he wishes to bring about in this country. I expected also that he would make a new declaration as to immigration, those fifty or seventy-five million people whom he wishes to bring to this country, as stated by himself at the meeting which he held in Toronto in July shortly after he was chosen as leader of the Conservative party. Let me read the report which I saw in Le Devoir of July 22, shortly after that meeting:

R. J. Manion in favour of immigration.

There is room in this country, he said, for 50 to 75 million people. If we adopt a wise immigration policy, there is no limit to the future development of the Canadian nation.

That statement, of course, was quite consistent with the program—

Mr. MANION: I do not wish to interrupt the hon. member, but neither do I wish to be misrepresented. I have not advocated the bringing of immigrants into this country, during the past eight or nine years, at any place or at any time, and if any newspaper states that I have done so it is telling a falsehood.

Mr. BRUNELLE: Well, Mr. Speaker, the report I just read from Le Devoir apparently came from the Canadian Press. The leader of the opposition should not blame me for reading the newspapers as they are; he should blame the newspapers for publishing what he said instead of what he meant.

Mr. MANION: I rise to a point of order. After I have made a statement of fact that hon. gentleman has no right to imply that I am telling a falsehood. That is what he is suggesting by the remark he just made, and I object to any implication of that sort. I know it has been stated in the province of Quebec, in some of the newspapers, that I advocated immigration, and a man there named Bouchard has stated many falsehoods about me in that connection. I want to say again that I have never, at any time since the depression of 1929, advocated bringing in immigrants. Before that we all did.

Mr. SPEAKER: I think the hon. member should take the word of the leader of the opposition when he states that he did not advocate that policy.

[Mr. Brunelle.]

Mr. BRUNELLE: I will take the word of the leader of the opposition, but I must read the newspapers as I find them, and this news was supplied by the Canadian Press. Later, in the city of Quebec, it seems that the hon. gentleman changed his mind, at least again according to the newspapers. There he stated that he was opposed to immigration. For his satisfaction allow me to read a passage from Le Nouvelliste, of Three Rivers:

Dr. Manion, the leader of the Conservative party, declared last night his categorical opposition to the admission of immigrants to this country when there are so many unemployed Canadians.

I hope the hon. member will accept that.

Mr. MANION: Yes, I accept that fully.

Mr. DUPUIS: In Quebec only?

Mr. MANION: No, the attitude is the same everywhere.

Mr. BRUNELLE: According to what I read in the newspapers it would seem that the leader of the opposition is quite in accord with the principles of that southern politician, to which he referred the other day in these words: "Them's my principles, but if you don't like them I can change them." The fact is that the Conservative party is pledged to a policy of immigration. Allow me to read from the platform of the Conservative party, adopted at the convention held last July in the city of Toronto:

In order to ensure a continuance of the British connection and Canadian participation in the benefits that accrue from membership in the British commonwealth of nations and the economic welfare and safety of Canada, this party recognizes the immediate necessity of our government's approaching the government of the United Kingdom and discussing and deciding upon a policy for the selected migration of British families from Great Britain and Ireland under a carefully prepared plan whereby ample and proper provision will be made for British finance and supervision and the return of families found unable to fit into the national and economic life of Canada; and be it further understood that similar advantages be extended to France.

To confirm this view the right hon. member for Calgary West (Mr. Bennett), at a banquet tendered to him in the city of Toronto on the 16th of this month, declared:

It is urgent that Canada's gates be opened to immigrants. . . . Canada should welcome newcomers to help develop the raw materials possessed here in such abundance.

The leader of the Conservative party in the senate also was present and apparently gave his blessing to that statement. When the platform of the Conservative party is in favour of a policy of immigration; when all the leaders of the Conservative party state that they are in favour of a policy of immigration—

Mr. MANION: Except the leader himself.

Mr. BRUNELLE: Except the leader himself—it makes it hard for the people to understand the position.

Mr. MANION: Perhaps that might be cleared up. I am the leader of the Conservative party.

Mr. BRUNELLE: Was the choice of the new leader of the Conservatives a success? Was the Conservative platform adopted last July a success? Probably the hon. member for Argenteuil (Mr. Heon) could tell us something very interesting if he cared to speak his mind. Be that as it may, however, let me read what was written by a writer in Toronto Saturday Night who signs himself "Rideau Bank," and who is well known to have Conservative tendencies, with regard to the new platform of the party now led by the hon. member for London.

Mr. WALSH: If I might ask the hon. member a question, from whom did he get his information that "Rideau Bank" was a known Conservative?

Mr. BRUNELLE: Well, it is sufficient that I should state it.

Mr. WALSH: I may inform the hon. gentleman that he is not.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. BRUNELLE: I quote:

> It is permissible to suggest that the conclave of federal Toryism just ended heralds the decline of a once great party to the status now occupied by Liberalism in Great Britain. This view is based less upon the selection of Dr. Manion as a leader, than it is upon the almost incredibly weak and innocuous program which the master minds of the party drafted as a platform. The chief defect of the new platform is its failure to express any definite political philosophy . . . the strategy of course, is to avoid having a definite platform which will invite attack, and to win on the mistakes that the Liberal government may be expected to make. In other words, the game which the Conservative convention played politically was the old game of "Ins" vs. "Outs."

Speaking for my constituents, sir, I say I am opposed to immigration. Let our abundant raw materials be developed and exploited by our own Canadians who are now without work. I congratulate the government upon not allowing the entry of immigrants into Canada. I congratulate the Secretary of State (Mr. Rinfret) upon the statement he made recently in the city of Montreal, to the effect that the government was not in favour of amending the restrictions in regard to immigration. I want to be placed on record as one who objects strongly to the entry of Jews, en masse or otherwise, into our country. I hasten to say that I have no brief against the Hebrew race; but since through all the ages they have been the cause, justly or unjustly, of great difficulties in various countries, I say we must take care. History repeats itself. I have deep sympathy for the Jews who are now being persecuted in certain countries of Europe; I think their situation is deplorable; but at the present time in our own country we have thousands of fellow citizens whose situation is also deplorable, and I believe that charity begins at home. I do not want one job in Canada to be taken by an immigrant, be he a Jew or otherwise, so long as we must spend money for relief. It is known by all hon. members that for the most part Jews inhabit only the cities and towns. If they are admitted they will either find jobs or be thrown on relief. We have at present too many people on relief, and if there are jobs available they should be given to our fellow citizens. I dislike reading press reports to the effect that the government in London or some English societies wish to assist the Jews by sending them to the colonies—and in that statement they include Canada. May I point out that we are not a colony. To preach charity and generosity, and then to practise those virtues at the expense of someone else is not a worthy procedure.

I now approach a more pleasant subject. May I congratulate the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) upon the treaty with the United States he signed in 1935, and upon the one signed more recently. A greater trade within Canada and a greater exchange of goods with other nations will help to solve unemployment. At the risk of repeating what other members have said, I would point out that the exchange of goods between nations will help primary and secondary producers and will give more employment to a greater number of people. New industries will establish themselves in Canada, as it becomes known that their products can be exported to other countries. It is in great part on account of the fiscal and commercial policy of this government that a new industry called International Foils has erected a large plant in my native city of Cap de la Madeleine. The entire production of the plant is to be exported. Could that industry have established itself in Canada if there had been no exportation facilities or the possibility of exchanging its products for other articles which Canadians require?

The problem of unemployment will be at least partly solved if we have a sufficient number of new industries in Canada. Another partial solution lies in the exploitation of our natural resources, the greatest of which is agriculture. There is plenty of unbroken land awaiting cultivation and occupation. Let the provincial governments, which control colonization, undertake a serious back-to-the-land movement. Let them pay the unemployed to improve our unbroken lands and thereby make them attractive, remunerative and suitable for settlers. Large areas of partly improved land are to be found in several of the older and more settled districts. Those lands are lying idle and unproductive, despite the fact that there are highways, railways, schools and churches to be used by settlers who would need only a little assistance for purposes of exploitation. I feel so certain that a real back-to-the-land movement is urgent that I never miss an opportunity to speak about it.

The fact that I prepared this speech on the train may have directed my thoughts to the situation as regards railway station accommodation in the city of Montreal. I have thought, too, of the large sums of money the railways have cost Canada. My mind goes back to the millions of dollars which are about to be spent on the erection of a Canadian National Railway terminus in Montreal. If we must do work to relieve unemployment—and I think we must—it is urgent to choose the most useful way of spending public funds. Until the contrary has been shown to me, I shall hold that we should make a union station out of the present Windsor station to serve the western part of Montreal, another union station out of the present Viger station to serve the east end of the city, and eliminate that miserable and pitiful stopping place now known as Moreau station. I shall say no more on the subject and shall be content to await the views of my colleagues representing the city of Montreal.

On motion of Mr. Euler the debate was adjourned.

At eleven o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

Wednesday, January 25, 1939

The house met at three o'clock.

CUSTOMS ACT

INQUIRY AS TO REVISION AND CONSOLIDATION DURING THE PRESENT SESSION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. G. ROSS (Moose Jaw): I should like to ask the Minister of National Revenue (Mr. Ilsley) whether it is the intention of the government to introduce this session a bill to amend and consolidate the Customs Act.

Hon. J. L. ILSLEY (Minister of National Revenue): The committee that has been working on a new Customs Act has not yet completed its work, and under the circumstances all I can say is that I hope to be able to introduce it later in the session.

VALIDITY OF QUEBEC STATUTE

REFERENCE TO SUPREME COURT OF CONSTITUTIONALITY OF "ACT RESPECTING COMMUNISTIC PROPAGANDA"

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. S. WOODSWORTH (Winnipeg North Centre): In view of the disturbing situation in Montreal, arising out of the threatened eviction of citizens from their homes for alleged holding of political opinions, will the government reconsider its decision and refer the constitutionality of the "padlock law" to the Supreme Court of Canada?

Right Hon. ERNEST LAPOINTE (Minister of Justice): No.

GOVERNOR GENERAL'S SPEECH

CONTINUATION OF DEBATE ON ADDRESS IN REPLY

The house resumed from Tuesday, January 24, consideration of the motion of Mr. J. E. Matthews for an address to His Excellency the Governor General in reply to his speech at the opening of the session, and the proposed amendment thereto of Mr. Manion, and the amendment to the amendment of Mr. Woodsworth.

Hon. W. D. EULER (Minister of Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, may I first of all join with those who have already spoken in the debate in complimenting the mover (Mr. Matthews) and the seconder (Mr. Chevrier) of the address. In my rather lengthy experience in the house I cannot recall any occasion on which the subject-matter and the manner of presentation were excelled in the speeches of those who proposed and seconded the motion.

I might also congratulate again my hon. friend the leader of the opposition (Mr. Manion) upon taking his seat as leader of his party. I say that with particular pleasure because of the fact that he and I entered parliament at the same time in the same year, after the elections of 1917. While at times we did not agree, and perhaps the same thing will be true in the future, our relations were always very cordial indeed, and I trust they may so continue.

I should also like to express my very sincere regret that my colleague, my personal friend and my deskmate, has found it advisable on account of health to withdraw from the office of postmaster general. I should like to welcome my new colleague, the Postmaster General (Mr. McLarty). I can assure him that I surrender very willingly, and with a degree of gratitude which perhaps he will appreciate a little more fully as the days go by, the responsibilities and duties of the office of acting postmaster general.

I have no intention of discussing at length the matters which are mentioned in the speech from the throne. Indeed I propose to confine my observations very largely to matters of trade, to discuss particularly the principles underlying trade agreements in general, and more especially the principles which underlie the trade agreement which has just been concluded with the United States. Perhaps it may be possible for me to give some information which the house has not now, although I do not propose to discuss the agreement in detail—that may very well be left to a later occasion. But I may be able to remove some misconceptions and to answer some criticisms which have been made in the house.

My hon. friend the leader of the opposition has said that it is quite impossible at this time to judge of the merits of the agreement, that only time will tell. I think he is quite right in that statement. At the same time I am surprised, in view of his having said that, that he should then proceed to criticize rather fully the agreement itself.

It is quite possible, in reading the speeches made by hon. members on the other side, to read into them—although perhaps not so much into the speech of the leader of the opposition—a very decided antagonism to the making of commercial agreements with other countries, especially such agreements as contain what is known as the most favoured nation clause. If we accept that view we might as well abandon the idea of export trade. Yet when we consider the United States, with which we made the most recent agreement, we should realize that our exports to that country are greater than they are to any other country in the world, not excluding even Great Britain. Last year our exports to the United States were some $5,000,000 greater than they were to Great Britain.

It ought to be unnecessary—and I make these observations only because of criticisms that have been made and antagonisms that have been displayed—to discuss the vital importance to Canada of finding export markets. In a country like Canada, which has tremendous surplusses of products such as wheat, of which we consume only one-quarter of the normal crop; with our dairy products; our forest products, which employ literally thousands of people; our mines, which employ tens of thousands; and with our many other products, it becomes absolutely necessary, if we cannot consume these commodities in full ourselves, that we should find markets in other countries. Some people fear the results of permitting goods to come into Canada from other countries, more particularly such products as are manufactured in Canada; but surely it should be realized that to the extent to which we can dispose of our surplusses in foreign markets, not being able to consume them ourselves, precisely to that extent do the producers of such commodities in Canada obtain buying power to buy again the products of our factories. We have, therefore, not a vicious circle, but a happy circle which I think governments have a duty to maintain as far as possible.

This, of course, implies that if we are to sell our goods in other countries we must also buy in those countries. It would be an ideal situation if it were possible for us to make our trade agreements in such a way as to allow the importation of only such commodities as we cannot produce ourselves, or produce to advantage, and perhaps to sell to other countries the commodities which they cannot produce, or produce advantageously to themselves. But desirable as that would be, it is not always possible, as hon. members know very well. In these days trade agreements are absolutely essential. We all know that more particularly in recent years, when the countries of Europe, having the fear of war in their minds, are trying to make themselves self-sufficient and self-supporting within their own borders, it is almost impossible, by reason of their tariffs, quotas, and exchange control, to enter into those markets unless we make special arrangements with those countries. If we did not make these special arrangements with them we should find ourselves discriminated against in favour of such countries as are prepared to enter into such trade agreements.

After all, these trade agreements of ours have been pretty successful. I know that criticism may and does come from the other side that in the last year or so business has begun to fall, has been reduced. I am not going to enter into the reasons for that because they are fairly well known to everyone. I do say, however, that our trade agreements have been pretty successful. Canada to-day is still the fourth exporting nation of the world, her exports being exceeded by only three other countries—Great Britain, the United States and Germany. There is really only one country in the world with which we have what is usually called an unfavourable trade balance, and that country is the United States, which sold us last year about $78,000,000 more than it bought from us. But if we take into consideration the amount of money that flows into Canada by reason of the tourist business, I believe it could be shown to the satisfaction of every reasonable person that even with that country we have a favourable trade balance of $75,000,000 or $100,000,000.

It will be of interest to the house to know —many hon. members may know it now— that while we have had a shrinkage in our exports and imports, we nevertheless, in the year ended in December last, sold $956,000,000 worth of goods and imported $677,000,000 worth. So that we have a favourable world balance of trade of $280,000,000. With regard to the balance of trade and the disparity that exists between our purchases and sales, so far as the United States are concerned, I should like to make a good-natured reference to the argument advanced the other day by the leader of the opposition (Mr. Manion). I will read from Hansard because I made at the time an interjection with which he did not agree: He said:

> In the last twelve months ending in November, 1938, we bought from the United States $40 worth per capita—it may be a little more or a little less, $39 or $41. How much did they buy from us? They bought $3.50 worth per head of population.
> Mr. Euler: That is not a fair comparison.
> Mr. Manion: Why not? What is wrong with it? I do not see anything unfair about it. I can see no reason why one Canadian should buy eleven times as much as an American buys from Canada. But that is precisely what happens when my hon. friends opposite deal with the United States.
>
> An hon. Member: One rabbit, one horse.
> Mr. Manion: We get the rabbit and they get the horse. We buy eleven times as much per capita as the United States people buy from us. I cannot see anything unfair in the comparison. I submit that it is perfectly fair.

It is a poor rule that does not work both ways. The Americans can say: Each Canadian sells us $33 worth of goods a year, yet each American sells to Canada only $3.50 worth. One statement is just as true and just as misleading as the other. Of course, the basis of comparison is absolutely wrong, or rather a change is made in the comparison when he makes the statement. If you want to put it on a per capita basis, then I contend that the leader of the opposition should say: Each Canadian buys $40 worth of goods from the United States and each Canadian sells $33 worth of goods to the United States. Or, if you want to reverse it, you can say: Each American buys so many dollars' worth and each American sells so many dollars' worth. Taking it on the per capita basis, if you like, you take what each Canadian buys and what each Canadian sells, and what each American buys and what each American sells. Or, taking it on the basis of the countries themselves, you can say: Canada as a whole buys so many dollars' worth of goods and the United States as a whole buys so many dollars' worth. If anything can be made out of this comparison, which I contend is fair, well and good. The Canadian buys $40 worth from the United States and sells $33 worth.

If you want to carry the comparison to the point of absurdity, I would refer to what my hon. friend said, that each Canadian buys eleven times as much goods from the United States as each American buys from us. The only inference that one can draw from that statement is that the Americans ought to buy eleven times as much from us as they do now. What would happen if they did? They now buy from us $350,000,000 worth. Multiply that by eleven, and they ought to buy nearly $4,000,000,000 worth. On the other hand, the American could calculate in exactly the same way and say that Canada ought to buy nearly $4,000,000,000 worth of goods from the United States. I am afraid that even if we applied the principles of the social credit party, we should not have enough money to pay for the overwhelming mass of goods that would come in.

It will be of interest to give the exports to and the imports from the most important countries in 1938:

Country	Exports	Imports	Balance (+) or (−)
United Kingdom	$339,711,086	$119,268,179	+$220,442,907
Australia	32,982,051	9,043,630	+ 23,938,421
Union of South Africa	15,546,687	1,991,295	+ 13,555,392
New Zealand	16,370,857	4,561,824	+ 11,809,033
Belgium	9,658,745	6,180,793	+ 3,477,952
France	9,152,226	6,104,841	+ 3,047,385
Germany	18,166,228	9,930,456	+ 8,235,772
Italy	1,745,343	2,631,434	— 886,091
Japan	21,092,215	4,642,762	+ 16,449,453
Netherlands	10,267,088	3,755,896	+ 6,511,192
Sweden	5,411,427	2,114,030	+ 3,297,397
The United States	345,911,915	424,754,818	— 78,842,903

There are just two countries with which we have an unfavourable balance—Italy and the United States. With Italy our trade is very, very small. But our trade with all the world for the calendar year 1938 left us a favourable balance of some $280,000,000.

I should like hon. members to appreciate the fact that our trade with practically all countries of the world shows a favourable balance. I think it has been suggested that we ought to abolish some of our trade agreements with foreign countries. If they should say to us, "We are buying more from you than you are buying from us; we are going to stop buying from you and buy from countries which will buy more from us than you do," that would be a very serious situation for the producers of Canada. If I may use the word used the other day by an hon. member from Toronto I would postulate that if we can keep a favourable trade balance with all the world, we ought to be pretty well satisfied.

Mr. LAWSON: Would my hon. friend permit a question? Do the figures he gave include exports of gold from Canada?

Mr. EULER: To the United States, yes.

Mr. LAWSON: The United States only, or in all trade figures?

Mr. EULER: I do not think we export gold to any extent to any other country than the United States. And I see no objection, although some persons may object, to including the exports of commodity gold, because, after all, the production of that gold gives employment to a great deal of labour.

Mr. MANION: Is it not true that we have always had what my hon. friend speaks of as a favourable balance of trade, at any rate in the last twenty-five or thirty years?

Mr. EULER: No. I am sure that during the time of a previous Conservative administration the balance was against us.

Mr. MANION: I do not think so.

Mr. EULER: I have not the figures before me; my hon. friend may correct me later if he desires. I still contend that if Canada can maintain a favourable world balance we ought to be well satisfied.

Much has been said in the press and in this house about the effect of the most favoured nation clause in these agreements. Particularly has it been said that the inclusion of the most favoured nation clause in the Canada-United States trade agreement is going to benefit particularly such countries as Italy, Japan and Germany. I believe that the public of Canada has been somewhat impressed by that idea, for reasons into which I need not enter at the moment.

May I first explain the meaning of the most favoured nation arrangement? To put it very simply it means this, that when we enter into a mutual most favoured nation arrangement with another country, then we must give to all other countries with which we have most favoured nation arrangements any concessions that we give to the country with which we make the agreement. They on the other hand must treat us in the same way. For instance, under the United Kingdom-United States agreement in which the most favoured nation clause applies, we receive automatically all the concessions which the United States gives to Great Britain. That is one advantage which immediately flows out of what we may call this three-cornered arrangement between the three countries. As a matter of fact, in regard to 400 items on which the United States gives concessions to Great Britain, Canada gets the full benefit of those concessions. Canada has most favoured nation agreements with some thirty-two other countries. That, of course, does not include the agreements we have with the different commonwealths of the British empire; those are definitely excluded always from the operation of most favoured nation agreements which we may make with foreign countries. The United States has some fifty-six agreements containing the most favoured nation clause. I say with considerable confidence that the more the most favoured nation agreements are extended, the more we remove obstacles to international trade, and that surely is advisable.

Mr. CAHAN: And the more we create domestic unemployment, in many instances.

Mr. EULER: Well, my hon. friend may make that argument, but I think he will find considerable difficulty in supporting it.

I have shown that, generally speaking, our trade balances with other countries are favourable. What if we cancelled those most favoured nation agreements? We should immediately be placed in the position of losing a good part of our export trade, which, as I have said, is in our favour practically all over the world. Take for example Japan, though some persons will deny that it is an advantage with regard to Japan. We will say, for example, that although our trade with Japan is favourable to the extent that they buy from us about four dollars' worth for every dollar's worth we buy from them, we decided, for reasons which might seem sufficient to the members of this house, to cancel our most favoured nation arrangement with them. What would they do? Naturally, of course, they would cancel their arrangement with us as well. We sell large quantities of wood pulp to Japan; that is a very good source of revenue to our producers and to the country. They would immediately cancel that trade, and I presume they would buy their wood pulp from Scandinavia. Then if our producers of pulp wood desired to get that concession back undoubtedly we would have to make certain concessions to Japan in return, and we would only disrupt business in the meantime. That example might be cited right across the board, if I might use that term. Some countries will benefit slightly from our agreement with the United States; Sweden, for example, Belgium and Switzerland. But with those countries we have favourable balances of trade, and in addition they are great buyers of Canadian wheat and potential buyers of still larger quantities.

The charge has been made, I repeat; largely in the press though it has been made in the house and perhaps will be made again, that by the agreement we have made with the United States we are conferring great benefits upon Italy, Japan and Germany. Let me show how the principle underlying the United States trade agreement reduces to a minimum the possibility of that occurring, and here for a moment I should like to explain the principle under which we considered the items in connection with which we gave concessions to the United States and those upon which they gave us concessions. It is the principle of what is called the chief supplier. That is, as these items were studied they were considered from the point of view that the country asking for a concession on any item must be the chief supplier of that commodity; and if it was not already the chief supplier it would not receive any concession. The idea, of course, was that it was not desired to give a concession to one country, in this instance the United States, on some item of which some other country was the chief supplier. That would be giving the other country still greater advantages. The purpose of the agreement was that when we made a concession we gave it to the country with which we were making the agreement, and not to some other country, and thus depriving ourselves of a bargaining power which we might very well want later on if we made an agreement with that other country. The United States adopted the same principle. We might have asked, and we did ask, for concessions on certain commodities. They would not give them to us because they stated that they would simply benefit some other country more than they would benefit Canada. We had to be the chief supplier.

[Mr. Euler.]

Each item was very, very carefully scanned. In my few public addresses while the agreement was being negotiated I said I was confident that no legitimate Canadian industry would be injured by the making of this agreement. I still believe that to be true. There may be isolated instances here and there where there may be some dissatisfaction, but taking it by and large I believe that no Canadian industry, manufacturing or otherwise, has been seriously injured by this agreement. And right here I should like to pay a compliment, if I may, to the three officials of the Canadian government who were instrumental in examining the terms of the agreement. I refer to Mr. Wilgress, of the Department of Trade and Commerce; Mr. McKinnon of the Department of Finance and Mr. Robertson of the Department of External Affairs. During the course of his speech my hon. friend the leader of the opposition said some bungling had occurred in connection with the excise tax. I hope his remarks were not directed to these three gentlemen.

Mr. MANION: No, I was directing them to the ministry.

Mr. EULER: I am very glad to hear that, because whatever censure may be due the ministry I am sure it would not apply with regard to any charges that might be made against these three gentlemen.

Mr. MANION: I entirely agree with my hon. friend.

Mr. EULER: This country was exceedingly fortunate in having in its employ these three men with a knowledge, I believe, of all the circumstances, of the tariff, of all the implications that enter into the making of an agreement of this kind and an understanding of what may result from it that I believe it would be very difficult to equal in any other country.

Japan can receive very little benefit from this agreement. That, perhaps, may be examined by hon. gentlemen more in detail. Some may say that they receive benefits from certain concessions made in connection with cotton textiles, but the agreement is so framed that the United States gets a concession on cotton textiles concerning only the higher priced range of goods, which Japan does not make in any quantity. So I say with considerable assurance that Japan will receive very little benefit. So far as Italy is concerned, our trade with that country is almost infinitesimal, and Italy will receive very little benefit. With regard to Germany—and I think perhaps most of the criticism has been directed against us with regard to that country—Germany cannot receive a great deal of benefit as far as this agreement is concerned. I have made a pretty close examination; this matter was carefully considered when the agreement was being drawn up, and there are only two items under which that country may benefit to some extent. Those items are specialized machinery and a certain kind of acid, neither of which commodity is produced in Canada. Perhaps I might refer to the trade agreement between Canada and Germany, negotiated some two years ago. In 1935 Germany bought from us only about three and a half million dollars' worth of goods. Last year she bought from us nearly eighteen million dollars' worth, while we bought from Germany only a little more than half that amount of goods. That may not be satisfactory to my hon. friends, but after all that is the situation as the result of our making a trade agreement with that country.

I should like the house to bear this in mind. If there should be any prejudice with regard to doing business with Germany, in the agreement with that country we have a saving clause under which the agreement may be terminated upon two months' notice. So the danger there cannot be very great. More than that, in our agreement with the United States there is what I might also call a saving clause. Article XIV of that agreement is as follows:

> The government of each country reserves the right to withdraw or to modify the concession granted on any article under this agreement, or to impose quantitative regulations on the importation of any such article if, as the result of the extension of such concession to other foreign countries, such countries obtain the major benefit of the concession, and if in consequence imports of the article concerned increase to such an extent as to threaten serious injury to domestic producers:—

That would be the producers in Canada.

> —Provided, that before any action authorized by the foregoing reservation is taken, the government proposing to take such action shall give notice in writing to the other government of its intention to do so, and shall afford such other government an opportunity within thirty days after receipt of such notice to consult with it in respect of the proposed action.

I contend that this provides a safeguard which makes it certain that if any other country gets a greater benefit from concessions granted the United States, we can deal with the matter by having that concession withdrawn.

I think hon. members are apt to forget that, after all, this clause which is known as the most favoured nation clause is reciprocal in its effects; that while we give certain concessions it follows that we also receive concessions. That is the whole purpose of the clause.

Mr. MANION: Not at the same time, is that not right? That is true if they happen to be making a trade treaty. But at the present time while the concessions we give to the United States go to other countries we get no concessions in return.

Mr. EULER: Yes, but if the United States has a most favoured nation agreement with some other country, the United States must give us the same concessions.

Mr. CAHAN: But not the other country.

Mr. EULER: It is a mutual arrangement.

Mr. CAHAN: The other country is not bound to reciprocate.

Mr. EULER: It must, if it has a most favoured nation agreement with us, give us all the concessions it gives to others.

The criticism has been made that we have given up some preference in the British market, the preferences obtained under the Ottawa agreements of 1932 and continued, or perhaps enlarged, in the agreement of 1936. We did give a concession, if you like to call it that, on wheat. We agreed to the withdrawal of the six-cent preference. Australia, which perhaps is just as much concerned as we are, also agreed to the withdrawal of that preference. My colleague the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) dealt with the matter the other day, and I think showed conclusively that the preference was never regarded as of much benefit to Canada.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. CAHAN: I think that is not the general belief throughout Canada.

Mr. EULER: Well, opinions may differ with regard to that; I suppose opinions always have differed. But I will say that the people most concerned, the farmers of western Canada, have made no complaint because the preference has been dropped.

Mr. ROWE (Dufferin-Simcoe): They should not this year.

Mr. EULER: So long as Great Britain cannot absorb all the wheat produced in the British dominions—and in a period of ten years they took an average of only 200,000,000 bushels a year, whereas the Dominion of Canada, Australia and India exported 300,000,000—just so long as the condition exists, and so long as we have competition in foreign markets, just that long will the preference be of no great value. I might give an opinion from the United States with regard to the matter. A few days ago I read this from the Journal-American:

> There seems little chance that we shall be able to take advantage of the wheat tariff reduction until some year when the British dominions are unable to supply British demand.

I think it will be a long time before the British dominions will not be able to supply the demands of Great Britain.

Another reason why the six-cent preference was not of great value—and this has not been mentioned—is that, as hon. members know, the United States has been granting a subsidy to its producers of wheat, to its millers and flour exporters.

Mr. ROWE (Dufferin-Simcoe): So has Canada.

Mr. EULER: I do not make this observation in criticism, but may I point out that a country like the United States, which does not hesitate to spend millions, perhaps even billions of dollars in conserving the interests of its producers and farmers, might easily overcome a matter of six cents a bushel by giving subsidies to its exporters. After all, in the final analysis, the position of the Canadian wheat farmer or wheat producer is made reasonably secure through the fact that he produces the best wheat in the world.

Something has been said in regard to ports; the statement is made that through abolition of the preference Canadian ports are going to lose business. In the original agreement framed in 1932 there was no clause which stated, or made it obligatory, for Canadian wheat to go through Canadian ports. Most of it did, it is true; but some Canadian wheat did go through United States ports.

Mr. CAHAN: To secure the preference of six cents it had to go through Canadian ports.

Mr. EULER: No, the hon. member is quite wrong. It went through on a through bill of lading, and was admitted under the six-cent preference, though the quantity was not large.

Mr. CAHAN: That was the effect of the ruling, anyway.

Mr. EULER: Perhaps it might be just as well to remind hon. members that in former days, when the United States had wheat for export, a good deal of United States wheat went through Canadian ports.

We made some cencessions on lumber?—yes. But we also received concessions on lumber. In my conversations with the lumbermen of British Columbia, who are as much affected as any group in any other part of the country, I was assured—and the assurance came after the treaty was made—that they were well satisfied. I was assured that the British Columbia lumber producer is much better satisfied with an alternative market in the United States, or an extension of that market, than he would be in having recourse only to one market, good as it may be, in Great Britain. In years gone by, during a period when Great Britain was undertaking an extensive housing program, the lumbermen of Canada sold large quantities of lumber to Great Britain. That program however has somewhat slackened. I believe the British Columbia lumber producer is quite satisfied—he says to us that he is—to have an extended market, while he gives up something of the market in Great Britain. I do not believe what he is yielding is very serious. I know that the lumbermen approve of the agreement.

Something has been said with regard to apples. Hon. members from Nova Scotia may answer in this respect better than I can. There is a reduction to three shillings per barrel, but despite the reduction there still remains a preference of ninety cents per barrel, which works out at about 30 per cent ad valorem. In any case I believe there is very little complaint from the apple producers. The British government is quite satisfied that the interests of the British apple growers are sufficiently protected by the duty of three shillings per barrel. There is this further point which has been brought to my notice, and it seems reasonable, that to the extent to which the tariff on apples to Great Britain is raised, just to that extent is there encouragement for the growing of apples in Great Britain which would provide greater competition than if the tariff were a little lower, permitting the entry of Canadian apples to that country.

Mr. SPEAKER: Order.

Mr. EULER: I shall try to finish very soon. Canada receives extremely valuable concessions in fish, cattle, lumber, potatoes and some manufactured articles. I was going to say something with regard to potatoes, but time does not permit. Something has been said respecting boots and shoes, but I shall not have time to go into the matter. Perhaps I should say—

Mr. CAHAN: The hon. member will have days on which to speak of the treaty.

Mr. EULER: There are only one or two matters about which I should like to speak at the moment. A few days ago the hon. member for Broadview (Mr. Church) stated that if at the end of three years the United States should cancel the treaty, and another government were to take office in the United States, we should lose our preference. But there is a provision under which our preferences are only suspended, and if the agreement between Great Britain and the United States is renounced or terminated we receive our preferences back.

Mr. CAHAN: Is that a separate agreement with Great Britain?

Mr. EULER: It is in the agreement itself.

Mr. CAHAN: Which agreement?

Mr. EULER: Our preference is suspended only until such time as the treaty between the United States and Great Britain may be terminated.

Mr. CAHAN: Is that stated in any British agreement, in black and white?

Mr. EULER: It is in the exchange of notes between Canada and the United Kingdom. The leader of the opposition has stated further that the withdrawal of these preferences has sounded the death-knell of the British preference. My submission is that it is just the contrary. The agreement reaffirms the principle of the British preference, and the United States is admitting that principle. May I read an excerpt from the United Kingdom-United States trade agreement:

Nothing in the agreement shall entitle the United States of America to claim the benefit of any treatment, preference or privilege which may at any time be in force exclusively between territories under the sovereignty of His Majesty the King or under his majesty's protection or suzerainty.

Nothing shall interfere with that. The United States now willingly admits that it is proper for a special agreement with respect to preferences to exist between the various dominions and Great Britain, without there being any necessity of granting those concessions to any other country with which she may have a most favoured nation arrangement.

Mr. CAHAN: Where is that said?—because they have made every pernicious effort to destroy the preference.

Mr. EULER: If the hon. member wishes to read the agreement between the United States and Great Britain he will find it right there in black and white. It establishes very firmly the principle of the British preference, recognized now by the United States, as by any other countries with which we have agreements.

I would say in conclusion that no other agreement ever made by Canada with any other country has ever received so little criticism or so much approval. We have had favourable comments from such papers as the London Free Press, the Hamilton Spectator, the Montreal Gazette, the Montreal Star, Saturday Night and the Financial Post. I do not think any of my hon. friends will say that any of these publications are particularly friendly to this government. Actually we have had favourable comment from no less a person than the Hon. Howard Ferguson, who gave the trade agreement his blessing. If we have had some criticism here, there has also been criticism in the United States. Makers of cheese, producers of dairy products, those engaged in the fishing industry, producers of shingles and lumber—all these claim that they have been sold down the river. Sheep and cattle producers, farmers, potato growers, the American Federation of Labour and the Mining Journal all complain bitterly that the United States has received the worst of the bargain. When complaints are heard on both sides, it is perhaps fair to assume that the agreement is fair to both sides. I should like to give just one more quotation which I think will be almost conclusive. I read from the columns of the Vancouver Province:

Hon. H. H. Stevens, M.P., who framed the trade agreements of 1932, described consummation of a trade treaty between Great Britain and the United States as "of paramount importance at this time" and believed that "Canada was justified in making some concessions to that end."

While making it clear he would reserve detailed criticism of the agreements, he declared "it is impossible to overestimate the importance" of the Anglo-American agreement.

"As far as Canada is concerned, if we can assist in that major thing by making some concessions, I think we are justified in doing it," he said.

Apart from its effects on specific industries, he explained, the triangular treaties "will probably make a greater contribution toward a stimulation of trade between empire countries and the United States and even the rest of the world than anything else at this time could have done."

"Taking it as a whole," he added, "the treaties will lead to an improvement of trade relations between Canada and the United States."

I believe that this agreement will prove to be a good one, good for Canada and good for the United States. That is as it should be between friendly neighbours. A mutually beneficial agreement is the only kind that can be of real and permanent value, and I have every confidence that this agreement is of that kind.

Hon. H. H. STEVENS (Kootenay East): Mr. Speaker, let my first word be an expression of pride and pleasure at being associated with my hon. friend the leader of the opposition (Mr. Manion) in the task which he has assumed and in the efforts which he will make to serve his country in the position he now holds. This will renew years of close companionship and friendship with him which I have always treasured very dearly. To certain hon. gentlemen opposite who have expressed some curiosity about the move that I have made during this session I have no hesitancy in saying that I look forward with a good deal of pleasant anticipation to our times together when I shall be a loyal supporter of my hon. friend, the leader of the opposition. Let me say one further word. His approach to the various social and economic problems of Canada and to other such problems generally has always given due weight to the human equation. It is that element in him which appeals to me very strongly.

During the debates on the speech from the throne and the budget an opportunity is given to hon. members of the House of Commons as representatives of the people to discuss the country's conditions generally and to present to parliament the views of their constituents or, as they may view it, the needs of the country. In the present speech from the throne, as is proper, we have the government's proposals to meet immediate needs and a review of the record. That is customary, and this speech from the throne is no different in that respect from any of its predecessors. But I looked in vain for any indication that the government had an adequate appreciation of the real conditions prevailing in this dominion.

It is useless to dilate on the privations of our grandfathers. I prefer to consider the problems facing my sons and daughters. I am perturbed, as are undoubtedly other hon. members, about the future of my children and of countless thousands of young people throughout Canada. I prefer to consider the future of my children and my grandchildren rather than to consider what my grandfather may have done or not done in Penzance, whence he came. The reference to Penzance may suggest certain sinister thoughts to every hon. member who has read the romance of that famous port. I am not concerned very much to-day with whether the press-gangs of those days were onerous and burdensome; I am not concerned with the fact that the administration of the customs in that period really inspired a miniature revolution in the hearts of my forebears; what I am at present concerned about is the welfare and the plight of the children of this day.

I ask: What is there in the speech from the throne for the young farmer? I am not exaggerating when I say that thousands have been driven from their farms because of the poverty of their parents. You can meet them every day. What is there here for the young worker? There are 500,000 of them, perhaps not all registered. Let us stop this piffling talk about whether they are on the register or off the register. What hon. members know is that there is an army of unemployed willing workers. What has this speech from the throne to offer to them?

Mr. MacNICOL: Nothing.

Mr. STEVENS: What has it to offer for the tens of thousands—again I do not exaggerate—of young high school students who have just left school? These young people are looking hopelessly about, trying to find out where they are to go. What about the young graduates from our universities? What about our young engineers, of whom there must be hundreds? I have met many of them. What about our young lawyers? What about our young doctors and other professional men? These men are to be found in the bread lines and in our camps. They are scattered throughout the country by the thousands, not knowing where to turn. What is there in the speech from the throne for them? What is there in it for the merchants? Yes, what is there in it for capital? My right hon. friend (Mr. Mackenzie King) gave quite a lengthy dissertation about capital. He spoke of the difficulty of directing it from time to time and the various influences that affect it.

There came into my hands the other day the vital statistics. I read them just casually, but may I say that there was in them an item which I think is enough to perturb us. It will be recalled that while typhoid, smallpox, scarlet fever, diphtheria and such diseases have been, in years past, perhaps the chief sources of epidemics and deaths in this country, all are under control; I believe medical men will bear me out in that statement. I shall state the figures briefly, and then I shall have a point to make. Deaths for the second quarter of last year were as follows: Typhoid, 39; smallpox, nil; measles, 62; scarlet fever, 41; whooping cough, 128; diphtheria, 73; influenza, 544; infantile paralysis, as to which there has been a great deal of alarm, 11; tuberculosis, which we are getting under control, 1,651; cancer, 2,908. But deaths from diseases of the heart numbered 6,814. What is one of the main contributing causes of deaths from diseases of the heart? I do not believe I shall be challenged if I say: worry, fear, anxiety. When I saw these statistics I paused for a moment.

An hon. MEMBER: That is a far-fetched argument.

Mr. STEVENS: I know that some of my hon. friends laugh.

Mr. SPEAKER: Order.

Mr. STEVENS: When I read these statistics I paused for a moment and there came to my mind instance after instance of young business men whom I knew who have dropped off at their prime through heart disease. If hon. members read the news press from day to day they will see that fact plainly evidenced. I refer to it for this reason. that the casualties among business executives are totally disproportionate to their numbers compared with the casualties among other people in the country, and this indicates that leaders in business to-day are, through worry, vexation and anxiety, being subjected to an unusual strain. What is wrong? The impossibility of planning for the future; instability in business; anxiety about taxation. These are economic problems which ought to be engaging the attention of parliament. These are problems which are causing a great deal of difficulty in the country to-day. The imperative need is, in my opinion, closer cooperation between government and business in Canada.

The other day the Minister of Labour (Mr. Rogers) referred to the necessity of private business bestirring itself to assist in the reduction of unemployment. I am not disposed to quarrel with him, but what I say to him is that industry is looking for a lead from Ottawa and is not getting it. I ask, what is there in the speech from the throne to encourage the harassed business man, the young man or woman, the unemployed worker, or the stricken farmer? There is nothing in the speech but more commissions, more constitutional platitudes and more evasions, with a total absence of leadership.

Our problems are economic. Certain of them are vital—too low a price to the farmer, disproportionate rates of wages to the worker. I need not dwell on that. One worker is getting $1.75 an hour; another is working under almost sweatshop conditions. There is a disequilibrium of reward both to workers and to farmers, in fact to those engaged in active production work; low purchasing power; inequitable distribution of wealth. These are some of the internal domestic problems which ought to be engaging the attention of parliament, to the exclusion, in my opinion, of all else. They are vital to our people. It is not a question of the economic nationalism which the Prime Minister is constantly talking about; it is a question of national economics, which is a vastly different matter.

By the way, the Prime Minister made reference to the speech from the throne under three heads. I shall not attempt to follow him under those headings except very briefly as to two of them and at somewhat greater length with regard to the third.

We may take the Prime Minister's speech as the interpretation of the views of members of the Liberal party in the house as to the speech from the throne and the policies of the government.

Let me refer very briefly to defence. Probably we shall discuss it later, and I have just one short reference to make to it at this time. We are going to spend $50,000,000. We are to have a purchasing commission. My first word is this: The purchasing commission ought to be a non-partisan commission under the control of the Minister of Finance (Mr. Dunning). I suggest that this point should be considered before the proposal is brought before the House of Commons. My next inquiry in this connection is whether, as we are going to purchase munitions and equipment and a great deal of new machinery will be required, it is the policy of the government—I ask the question so that they may consider it—that a substantial portion of this machinery will be bought outside Canada. If so, I shall criticize such a policy very severely, because if you are going to spend fifty million dollars on defence it ought to be spent so as to stimulate and build up as far as possible industry in this country. I invite the Prime Minister's consideration of this thought, that we have workshops, factories, skilled engineers and skilled workmen, as I am authoritatively advised, capable of producing any machine which may be required for the purposes I have indicated. Give them the specifications, and we have the shops that can produce those machines. Do not let us go outside Canada, buy these machines elsewhere and bring them in. If we are going to spend money on defence, let us utilize that money to the fullest possible extent for the stimulation of industry in our own country.

I turn now to the trade agreements, because the Prime Minister and his colleagues have placed this matter at the forefront of their policies. I believe the Prime Minister will not criticize me if I put it in this way: He says we have a number of perplexing problems in Canada, but a solution of those problems can be found in the expansion of Canada's external trade. In the speech from the throne the Prime Minister placed in the mouth of his excellency the following words:

> The agreements constitute a constructive contribution toward a betterment of world conditions and—

And.

> —advantages to Canadian producers and consumers.

I shall reserve most of my comments on this subject until the agreement resolution is before us, but there are a few observations I would like to make now.

In the first place, the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Euler) said a few moments ago that Conservatives were opposed to the making of any trade agreements.

Mr. EULER: I did not say that definitely, no.

Mr. STEVENS: The minister can correct me if I am wrong, but I took his words down.

Mr. EULER: I do not remember precisely my words, but I have reason to believe, from the remarks made by hon. members on the other side of the house, that they were not particularly friendly to agreements made with foreign countries. I think so still.

Mr. STEVENS: My hon. friend has modified his words considerably. However, we shall take his statement. What he suggests is not the case. The Conservative party, during all my association with it, has been quite willing to make agreements with foreign countries, but it believes in making agreements that will not be damaging to Canadian industry and Canadian interests. Before I am through with this part of my speech I hope to show briefly wherein I think there is a danger of some damage being done to Canada by these agreements.

My hon. friend quoted a news dispatch. In that interview I was very careful to say that I had not seen the agreements; I had seen only the news dispatches.

Mr. EULER: Was the quotation correct?

Mr. STEVENS: Oh, quite. I am not disputing the quotation. This is what I said then and I say now: Any action on the part of Canada that will tend to bring Great Britain and the United States together is desirable; but, as I shall seek to show, the question is this: Have we paid too big a price? That is the question which I shall submit in a moment.

The Prime Minister refers to economic nationalism, which, he says leads to war. There is nothing new about that. There is nothing new about economic nationalism. There was economic nationalism in 1923 when Italy took about thirty items of our exports to that country and imposed upon them inhibitions, prohibitions and high tariffs. They raised the tariff on our wheat to 87 cents, and they also raised the tariff on hams, bacon, honey and all down the line. In short, they started what was economic nationalism, and the same was done by Germany, and to a certain extent by France and by nearly every other country in the world—that is, in western civilization. And why did they do it? It was because of fear and anxiety, fear engendered by their experience during the war.

The point I wish to make, however, is that it is not a new thing. It has prevailed for fifteen years, and if the Prime Minister suggests that this is something new which he has discovered and which he is going to take some part in eliminating, then I think it is a pretty weak position for him to assume. These conditions are in existence to-day; they are a reality, an ugly fact which we might as well recognize. The thing we have to do is to endeavour to meet these conditions step by step, nation by nation.

My hon. friend (Mr. Euler) a few moments ago argued that there was no danger in the most favoured nation treatment clauses. I think I am reflecting the opinion of some members of the government when I say that they are very much perturbed about this policy. I know that when I was minister some years ago one of the things that gave me serious concern was the most favoured nation clause. What I sought to do, although I left office some years ago, was to find some means of making specific bilateral agreements rather than most favoured nation agreements such as we have. In so far as the advantages given to most favoured nations, thirty-two of them, are concerned, Canada gets nothing in return, and it is well for us to keep that fact clearly in mind. In other words, we give them access to our market, an advantage in our market, for which we get no return; and what is more we have parted with a substantial part of our bargaining power.

It is in the results of international trade disturbance that the basis of the Prime Minister's policy is found. Is it not possible that international trade disturbance ensues from internal distress and the efforts to correct it? For instance there are quotas, embargoes, barter, bonusing, shipping control, all of which have been brought into force in recent years because of internal distress in other countries. Let me say in warning to the Prime Minister that there are serious conditions developing in Canada. There is internal distress, and internal distress may be distinctly aggravated by action taken pursuant to this treaty, particularly in the extension of the most favoured nation treatment clause.

I submit that what we need is a recasting of the whole trade policy of Canada. We should boldly face the issue of most favoured nation treatment. There has been too much tinkering with the tariff in recent years, too much interference. The Minister of National Revenue (Mr. Ilsley) knows that when the importer to-day orders an article from abroad he cannot tell until that article is in the examining warehouse exactly where it will be classified, whether as before it will be under item 521 or 397 or anywhere else.

Mr. ILSLEY: That applies to a fraction of one per cent.

Mr. STEVENS: Fraction, nothing. I showed a year or two ago that some 1,400 rulings had been made in less than a year, and I venture to say that in the past year over 1,000 were made. I have not had time to review them, although I have a deep pile of them.

Mr. ILSLEY: They added to the certainty, not the uncertainty, of the importer.

Mr. STEVENS: No, they added to uncertainty. Importers tell me they have difficulty in telling where an article will be classified. What we need in Canada is less dislocation of trade through the instability of the tariff, and a revised, simplified and stabilized tariff. That is what we want here, so that both importers and those engaged in industry will know precisely where they are. The Prime Minister laughs.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: No, I am not laughing.

Mr. STEVENS: Does the Prime Minister know to-day the effect of the withdrawal of the three per cent excise tax under this agreement? I venture to say he does not, nor does any other minister know what effect the withdrawal of that three per cent excise tax, in connection with three or four hundred items mentioned in the agreement, will have on other items not mentioned therein. I venture the prediction that the Minister of Finance (Mr. Dunning) and his staff will be considering shortly whether they will not wipe it out altogether. The minister laughs. It has become so complex and involved, however, that I suggest there is only one solution, and that is to wipe it out.

Mr. MacLEAN (Prince): It should have never been put on.

Mr. STEVENS: Let me now turn to one or two other considerations. When this agreement was made did the government consider the fact that we were a debtor country and that Great Britain and the United States were two creditor countries? The Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Euler) a moment ago gave the trade between Great Britain and Canada and indicated a favourable balance of $190,000,000 or thereabouts.

Mr. EULER: It was $220,000,000.

Mr. STEVENS: He forgot, however, that we owe Great Britain interest on moneys borrowed from them, and in shipping services, representing roughly $200,000,000 a year. He forgets that for the last fifty years—and I challenge contradiction—the adverse balance of trade between Canada and the United States, plus our interest payments to them, has amounted annually to upwards of $300,000,000. That has been the average over that period, and how has that been paid? It has been paid by what we see on the order paper. On the order paper is a resolution wherein the Minister of Finance is asking for $750,000,000, part of which is to go for renewals and part of it to meet obligations of government. We have paid the United States for the last fifty years, with very few exceptions if any, an average of around $300,000,000 a year by increasing the American mortgage on Canada.

Mr. DUNNING: No.

Mr. STEVENS: Absolutely. There is one exception and it is this. Certain payments from London to New York have reduced that, and that payment from London is not, as the minister intimated a moment ago, equal to the favourable balance of trade, because from that must be taken the interest we owe to London. That there is a favourable balance with other countries, and that it has been paid to New York, there is no question; but the net result I venture to say would be upwards of $150,000,000 a year.

Mr. DUNNING: Will my friend permit me just to correct that? Canada has had a favourable balance of international payments for each of the last two or three years if not more.

Mr. STEVENS: I cannot accept that, because I have gone into these things very carefully. I put on Hansard a few years ago—it never was done before and I have never seen it done since—an analysis of Canada's international balances. You have to take into consideration insurance premiums paid abroad, which are substantial, about $20,000,000 to the United States; shipping services with Great Britain, which amount to about $75,000,000—no one knows exactly, because there are no exact statistics. We have to pay various other things, including tourist balances, favourable one way and adverse the other. All these things have to be taken into consideration, and there are no precise statistics, only estimates. But what we do know is that we have borrowed from the United States $4,500,000,000; that is our indebtedness to the United States, upon which we pay interest and dividends at around five per cent per annum. It means an annual payment of at least $225,000,000 in interest. And how are we paying it? Chiefly by extending our borrowings in the United States. There is no question about it.

Mr. DUNNING: The fact is that we are reducing our indebtedness there.

Mr. STEVENS: We are not reducing it.

Mr. DUNNING: Yes, we are.

Mr. STEVENS: The minister cannot get away with that with me, because I have gone through it upside down and inside out.

Mr. EULER: And the hon. gentleman is still upside down.

Mr. STEVENS: My time is going and I am being diverted from my argument. But the fact that we may pay off a loan in the United States now and then and transfer it to the domestic market does not alter the main statistical basis of my argument. It may vary a little, one year up and another down, but I am speaking by and large.

In 1925 I warned the Prime Minister that if the policy which we were following then, which is the policy he is following to-day, were persisted in, sooner or later we would be bankrupt. I am suggesting to the Prime Minister that if he will consult with any statistician, any economist or any group of them, as to the debt of Canada, public, private and corporate, he will be impressed with the fact that Canada has almost reached the limit of her capacity to bear debt. That is the point we have to consider. We have undeveloped resources, I know; we have been exploiting them for the last twenty-five years, but the fact is that in regard to its capacity to pay interest on debt, public, corporate and personal, Canada is at the saturation point. Some parts of Canada are beyond that point, and say so; other parts which are richer have not quite reached it.

The Minister of Agriculture and the Minister of Trade and Commerce referred to the six-cent preference on wheat. The Minister of Agriculture said:

> . . . the six-cent preference has not benefited the wheat growers of the western or any other part of Canada.

And, he said, we were asked by the British government to surrender this as a concession. Let us see what the United States government think about it—not some United States journal, but the United States government. This is what they say on page 6 of their publication:

> One of the most important concessions is the removal of the duty on wheat, which has been equivalent to about six cents per bushel. This has tended to divert trade to Canada and Australia.

The question I ask is, did we make a sacrifice or did we not? The Minister of Agriculture says, no, we made no sacrifice, because it did not mean anything. The Prime Minister says we made a notable contribution. Which is right?

Then I find the Minister of Agriculture saying this in regard to Canadian ports:

> . . . the removal of the six-cent preference has very little, if anything whatsoever, to do with the amount of wheat that is to be shipped through the maritime ports.

Again the United States government differs from the minister in that respect. They say:

> Also, as a result of the removal of the preference, it should be possible for American port and transportation interests to regain their lost business in the transhipment of Canadian wheat to the United Kingdom.

That is what the United States government say. Did Canada make a sacrifice? Did she make a notable contribution? Then I ask, was it necessary, or is the price too great? The Minister of Agriculture, in answer to such a contention as I am making, gave figures of the exports from all the ports in Canada. But he did not give the exports through Saint John and Halifax, which are the two ports affected. He read a long list, disregarding the drought in the west and the fact that there had been small crops for a few years; then he said that following 1932 there was a diminution, and now there is an increase in exports; which do the farmers of the west want? The facts are that we did build up exports through Saint John and Halifax; we did have a preference in the British market; the United States knew we had that advantage and asked for the concession; the minister himself said that we were asked by the British government to release them, and did release them. Was the price too much to pay?

It is a most serious thing, and one is naturally inclined to ask: What is the objective? What is the justification? The Prime Minister says, world appeasement. I wonder which is likely to contribute more to the betterment of world conditions, an economically emaciated Canada, or a strong, virile, united Canada? Which? One associated with the motherland and the British commonwealth of nations, or one in no man's land, whither we seem to be drifting? Which, I ask, is more likely to contribute to world appeasement? One thing the Prime Minister has lost sight of is the fact that internally Canada has widespread distress. He has lost sight of that in his obsession about participating in this world appeasement. I am not suggesting for a moment that we should aggravate the international situation; indeed we should do all we can to help it, but we should do it only after looking after internal conditions in Canada.

The Prime Minister referred to Gresham's law. I was very much amused at this, because he has frequently brought Gresham's law into discussions here. Gresham's law is a simple declaration of a condition existing years ago, a century or more. The sovereign at one time had the right to issue currency, and it was always metal coinage. When he got hard up and in financial straits he would adulterate the coinage and so make some money. So Gresham's law declares that whenever a sovereign does that, the debased currency drives the good currency off the market. But that is out of date; it is outmoded. What happens to-day? What about managed currency? Managed currency as we now have it circumvents that and achieves the same ends as the old sovereigns sought to achieve in that crude way. The international economic conference in 1933 declared that note issues were to be considered as on a sound basis if they were protected with twenty-five per cent reserves of gold.

Mr. DUNNING: Not less than twenty-five per cent.

Mr. STEVENS: Yes. That is simply a modern method by which governments achieve the results attained by those harassed sovereigns under the crude conditions of their day.

But the Prime Minister says there is another law to which he is very much attached, and that is the law of competing standards. I listened in vain, however, for him to apply to his policy the principle of the law of competing standards. He went on with a long dissertation on armaments, but he did not refer to the law of competing standards to any greater extent. The law of competing standards, Mr. Speaker, is that a country with a low standard of living will drive a country with a high standard of living out of the trading world. That is what it means, but again science, skill, progress and efficiency circumvented that law. These economic laws are not immutable. like the law of gravity; they are laws of man, and it is possible for them to be circumvented. So through skill, efficiency and science nations learned how to circumvent that law. During the last decade of the last century and the early part of this century we saw the United States and Germany surging ahead of the whole world because they had efficiency; and although the standard of living in the United States particularly was high, that country was able to compete with low standard countries because she had more efficient machinery. But what is the situation to-day? Japan, one of the most noted countries in regard to low standards of living, adopted American methods. So now we have an evasion similar to the evasion of the Gresham law; and Japan, having adopted modern methods, is successfully competing in the world market against the United States and other countries.

The Prime Minister has nailed to his mast the law of competing standards and the law of supply and demand. I can see little Canada, with her ten million people, with the law of competing standards and the law of supply and demand nailed to the masthead of the ship of state about which the Prime Minister talks, and that ship sailing forth to meet the world armada in connection with trade, with my right hon. friend on the bridge, at the helm.

An hon. MEMBER: He will not leave it.

Mr. STEVENS: Someone says he will not leave it, that that is where his place is.

Mr. DUNNING: He will stay there.

Mr. STEVENS: My hon. friend says he will stay there, though the old ship of state be floundering; though the rats be swarming; though the cargo be shifting; though the crew be mutinying because of poor food or lack of clothing; though the officers of the ship, whom I see before me, be quarrelling among themselves. There may be a conspiracy—

Mr. SPEAKER: Order. The hon. member has exhausted his time.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Go on.

Mr. SPEAKER: The hon. gentleman may continue with the unanimous consent of the house.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Please do not stop at that point.

Mr. STEVENS: No; that would be too bad. I say the officers have discovered a conspiracy, but will the captain make an inspection? Oh, no; his place is at the helm. I want to say to the Prime Minister that his place is not at the helm. To carry out the simile, it is his place to go over his ship and see what are the conditions; to see whether the crew is being properly fed and cared for; to see whether his passengers are being reasonably looked after; to see whether his ship has sprung any leaks, because heaven knows there are some pretty serious leaks in the old ship just now.

Mr. FRASER: You should know. You scuttled one ship.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. STEVENS: Unfortunately I did not catch that joke, but probably I will hear about it later.

I had intended to discuss the question of unemployment, but my time is up. I should like to conclude with just one or two words, and hon. gentlemen might do me the courtesy of allowing me to finish what I have to say.

Mr. SPEAKER: Order.

Mr. STEVENS: I was going to say that I would conclude with a brief reference that I hope may impress upon the Prime Minister and the government the fact that there are great problems facing this country to-day and that our people are looking to Ottawa for leadership. The right hon. gentleman may disregard all that is said from this side of the house, but I would ask him to ponder the speech of the hon. member for Humboldt (Mr. Fleming); the last paragraph of the address of the young member for Stormont (Mr. Chevrier), who seconded the address, and the speech of the hon. member for Huron North (Mr. Deachman), together with several other speeches that have been made by his own followers. These hon. gentlemen, after many flattering allusions to the government, sought to impress upon them the seriousness of the situation in their own districts. I ask the right hon. gentleman to ponder these words and to give consideration to the situation in Canada. We have the railway problem; we have dominion and provincial rapprochement, which calls for leadership at this time. To-day we have nothing in Canada but discord, more so than at any other time since confederation. The Prime Minister came into office with a large majority, with eight provinces behind him, and what has he to-day?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: A bigger majority.

Mr. STEVENS: He has his majority simply because of the matter of the constitution, but he has discord in the country and he has not that friendship among the provinces which he had when he came to office. Effective unemployment and relief readjustments are needed. Economic advance and security; strong government, with the emphasis on administration and not on legislation—these are some of the problems that he should meet. Truly, sir, the country is torn with fear and hatred, discord and greed. The task of parliament and the duty of the government is to banish these ghouls of despair and to give leadership that will replace hatred with tolerance; to banish fear and inspire courage; to bring stability and cooperation where now there is discord and restore the rule of justice so that greed no longer shall control the lives of men in our country.

Mr. VICTOR QUELCH (Acadia): First of all, Mr. Speaker, I should like to take this opportunity of congratulating the group to my right, the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation, on their amendment, which is as follows:

> We are of the opinion that these conditions can be remedied only by the effective control of financial institutions and monopolistic enterprises which are exploiting the Canadian people.

I can assure that group that they will receive our wholehearted support in regard to this amendment.

Mr. SPEAKER: Order. There is too much noise in the chamber. I would ask hon. gentlemen to keep order. I can hardly hear the hon. member who is speaking.

Mr. QUELCH: I should like also to congratulate my hon. friends to my right on their apparent change of front in regard to this question. You will remember, sir, that back in 1936 the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell) introduced a motion calling for the nationalization of our banking institutions. At that time we stressed the fact that we did not feel that ownership was a matter of paramount importance; but we did feel that it was absolutely essential to take whatever action might be necessary to obtain absolute and effective control of financial policy. Hon. members will notice that this motion stresses the necessity of obtaining effective control. No reference whatsoever is made to public ownership, and therefore, in conformity with the stand we have taken in the house and outside, we intend to support the amendment to the amendment.

In passing, perhaps I should congratulate the hon. member for Athabaska (Mr. Rowe), because we feel he may possibly have been instrumental in bringing about this change in front. We have listened with a certain amount of apprehension and a great deal of regret to the addresses attacking a guaranteed price for wheat in western Canada which have been made inside and outside the house by hon. members representing eastern Canada. The very people who make these attacks will talk glibly about the need for tightening the bonds of confederation and for a better spirit of unity in Canada. Yet in connection with this matter they adopt an attitude which appears to me to be one of extreme selfishness, inasmuch as they take the stand that the farmers of western Canada should be prepared to sell on the open market at world market prices, at a time when the people of eastern Canada are benefiting through the operations of a protective tariff, a tariff which operates greatly to the disadvantage of western Canada.

Such an attitude is bound to weaken the bonds of confederation. It is bound to bring about disunity in Canada, and I believe it is to a great extent responsible for observations regarding secession which are continually heard in western Canada. That part of Canada bitterly resents this form of exploitation. In the past the cry seemed to be that the west could pay more, and apparently the slogan of "soak the west" was adopted. That has been evidenced by higher interest rates, higher freight rates and higher sales prices. It used to be a common occurrence to pick up a periodical and see the prices of certain articles listed at certain amounts, and then below one would find the notation that west of the great lakes the price would be so much higher. That difference in price was generally considerably more than just the difference in freight rates. In the past the attitude has been that the farmers of western Canada must be prepared to sell on the open market and, at the same time, to pay highly protected and restricted prices for practically everything they buy.

We hear a great deal about the benefits of the so-called open market system, and for a few moments I should like to speak on the subject. The open market system is generally referred to as the free marketing system, based upon a theory which was prevalent during the middle of the last century, that free competition would bring about a just equilibrium between the prices of goods in various industries, and that goods create a demand for goods.

Could we say that the system has operated to bring about those results? Has it had those results, so far as the farmers are concerned? Has it brought about a just equilibrium as between the prices of goods the farmer sells and the prices of goods he buys? If that has not been the case, then we cannot say that the system has operated as a free marketing system. I believe the main reason for the failure of the present system to operate in that way lies in the fact that industries have organized into trusts, combines and cartels for the purpose of maintaining, controlling and fixing prices. Trade unions have fought a reduction in wages, in the face of falling prices for commodities that they produce. And may I point out that I am not criticizing trade unions for that action. It was absolutely essential, if the workers were going to be able to maintain a decent standard of living.

Governments have raised tariffs at the behest of industry, in order to maintain higher price levels. The result of all this has been that the farmer has had to pay a highly protected price and at the same time has had to sell on an open and unrestricted market.

As an example of the extent to which industries have controlled production in order to maintain higher price levels I should like to quote from a memorandum submitted by Mr. J. T. Hull, on behalf of the Manitoba cooperative conference to the royal grain inquiry. I quote this from page 5:

> In January, 1935, the secretary of the United States Department of Agriculture submitted to the United States senate a document prepared by Gardiner C. Means of Columbia university, entitled "Industrial Prices and their Inflexibility." The following table taken from this document shows the relation between price level and production for certain industries from 1929 to the spring of 1933:

	Permanent drop in prices	Permanent drop in production
Agricultural implements	6	80
Motor vehicles	16	80
Cement	18	65
Iron and steel	20	83
Auto tires	33	70
Textile products	45	30
Food products	49	14
Leather	50	20
Petroleum	56	20
Agricultural commodities	63	6

Hon. members will notice from the table that where there is free competition a decreased demand results in a greatly reduced price, with only a very slight drop in production. For example, in connection with agricultural commodities it will be noted that the permanent drop in prices stood at 63, whereas the permanent drop in production stood at only 6. Under the protective system the decreased demand results in a large drop in production and only a very small drop in price. We note that in connection with agricultural implements the permanent drop in price was only 6 per cent, but the permanent drop in production was 80 per cent. In other words, the greater the control of production, the less the fall in price.

Of course the only sane solution is to increase the effective demand by increasing the amount of money in the hands of consumers. But that argument will not hold where the production of any commodity is in excess of the actual physical demand throughout the world. We hear a great deal as to whether or not the farmer has a right to demand a price equal to the cost of production, and for a few moments I shall deal with that subject. Some hon. members have stressed the fact that the farmers of western Canada do not want to be subsidized. They say they do not want a guaranteed price. On several occasions the hon. member for Moose Jaw (Mr. Ross) and the hon. member for Huron North (Mr. Deachman) both members of the Liberal party and supporting the government in power, have stressed that fact. But would anyone suggest for a moment that there is any likelihood, any probability or even possibility that action will be taken whereby the people of Canada will be able to buy at world market prices. That being so, and as there is no likelihood or possibility that such action will be taken, I maintain that the farmers of western Canada have every right and justification for demanding a price equalling cost of production.

Then, another point: Even though it were made possible for the farmer to buy at world market prices, if the debts he has incurred through working under this unfair system are ever going to be paid, he will have to secure a price not only equal to cost of production, but one which offers a fair profit. I say that, because accumulated debts of the past are not included in cost of production. The only way they can ever be paid is by the farmer being able to get a fair profit.

If on the other hand we are going to allow prices to fall, the farming industry will become bankrupt and it will be only a question of time before we shall have to retrace the ground already covered by the Farmers' Creditors Arrangement Act.

On several occasions, speaking outside the house, the Minister of Mines and Resources (Mr. Crerar) has stressed the fact that the farmers have no right to demand a guaranteed price, where that price is in excess of the world market level. The reason he gives is that it would be placing a burden upon the taxpayer, and that the farmers have no right to expect the taxpayers to assume that burden. It seemed strange to me that a man who has been so closely connected with the west, and who has taken that stand, should not have also taken the stand that the manufacturers or industrialists of Canada have no right to expect that the burden of the tariff under which they benefit will be assumed by the Canadian people. On the one hand we hear that the farmers have no right to demand a price equal to the cost of production, because it will increase the taxpayers' burden, but there is no mention of or reference to the manufacturers. I shall deal with the matter again later on.

I am sure the Minister of Finance (Mr. Dunning) is far too much interested in attempting to balance the budget to be willing to give up the revenue derived from the tariff. At this point I should like to say that there can be no credit given to a minister of finance who balances the budget upon the misery of the people. The balancing of a budget is only a means to an end, and that end must be the bettering of conditions in Canada. If by balancing the budget we increase the misery of the people and bring about greater poverty, then I say there can be no credit to a minister of finance or to the department he represents. Therefore I say as there is little likelihood in the near future that the farmers will be able to buy at world prices; that trade unions will agree to wages falling in line with agricultural returns, or that the debts incurred by these industries will be cancelled. I maintain that the farmers have every right to demand a price equal to the cost of production, plus a fair profit.

There is another side to this argument upon which I should like to touch, the one raised by the Minister of Mines and Resources (Mr. Crerar). Have the people of Canada any right to protest against the demand of the farmers for a fixed price equal to the cost of production? Let us examine that argument. To grow a crop of wheat costs money and it results in payments being made to various industries and various individuals. Payments must be made to machine companies, insurance companies, merchants, railways, bankers and other organizations and individuals. The payments distributed in the process of raising wheat represent incomes to these various individuals and organizations and the aggregate of those payments represents the farmer's cost of production. Therefore, in demanding a price equal to the cost of production the farmers are only taking back from society that which they have distributed already. In other words, when a farmer produces at below the cost of production, he is subsidizing society to that extent.

I am not suggesting that a guaranteed minimum price is a solution to the problem of marketing wheat or to the problems faced by any other primary industry, but it is an essential step that will have to be taken until that problem has been dealt with adequately. I am satisfied that in the future governments will have to assume far greater control over production and distribution than they have in the past. Dealing specifically with wheat, by increasing production in excess of the actual effective demand, even in excess of the actual physical demand of the world, we are really lessening the value of our markets. To-day the surplus of wheat is used as an excuse or as a reason, whatever word you want to use, for forcing prices down.

Would it be desirable for the exporting nations to take steps to reduce production to where it would only meet current demand? I think we are all agreed that such action would be very dangerous from the point of view of the importing nations. Should a serious world drought occur, the importing nations might find themselves in danger of actual famine. However, as long as the surplus is used as a reason for forcing prices down, this appears to be the only logical step the producers can take. For this reason, if for no other, I think the importing nations should be prepared to pay a fairly moderate minimum price in the face of actual surpluses of wheat.

We find that to-day four nations contribute approximately 86 per cent of the world's imports of wheat. These countries are Australia, Argentina, the United States and Canada. Unquestionably these four dominate the wheat situation. I urge that Canada take the initiative in calling a conference of these four nations for the purpose of making a thorough investigation into the whole question of a fair economic price for wheat, taking into consideration the cost of production and other contributing factors. Both inside and outside the house the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) has taken the stand that this matter is more the responsibility of the United States than of Canada. The reason he gave for this contention is the fact that the United States have increased their acreage by some 15,000,000 acres. At an estimated rate of production of twenty bushels per acre, this represents a surplus of some 300,000,000 bushels. However, I would point out that the United States has taken steps to place only 100,000,000 bushels upon the export market.

Rather than try to place the responsibility for this problem upon the shoulders of the United States, I think we should admit that the problem is of greater concern to Canada. Over a period of ten years the United States has exported an average of only 9·5 per cent of her total production, whereas over a similar period Canada has exported approximately 61·8 per cent of her production. If the four countries I have mentioned could get together and could come to an agreement as to what a fair price would be and what steps might be taken to control production, then an international conference might be called at which all the cards could be laid upon the table face up and an attempt made to bring about an agreement whereby this minimum price would be guaranteed. If this international conference should fail; if the importing nations should refuse to recognize the justification for such a demand, then I think the exporting nations would be justified in taking the steps necessary to remove the surplus wheat from the world. I do not suggest that this should be done by the destruction of the wheat; it could be done by the proper control of production and marketing.

I realize that restrictions on production are opposed on various grounds. The main opposition is based upon the ground that a reduction in acreage means a loss of wealth, and also that it would be impossible to enforce a reduction in acreage on an equitable basis. I shall deal with the first contention. That statement is nonsense when you are dealing with a country that is on an export basis because you cannot assess the value of a country's wealth by quantity alone. You must take into consideration its exchange value. As an example I would refer hon. members to what happened in 1932 and 1937. In 1932 we exported three times as much wheat as we did in 1937; yet we received $22,000,000 more in 1937 than we did in 1932.

As far as the second point is concerned, I would oppose the blanket reduction in acreage because I have yet to hear of a plan whereby that can be brought about on an equitable basis. On the other hand, I would advocate an aggressive policy of taking marginal lands out of production. This type of land aggravates our problem. In exceptionally good years it will produce a certain amount of wheat which helps to swell the surplus. In poor and dry years practically no wheat is produced on this type of land, and this at a time when production would in all probability be useful. Once this land had been taken out of wheat production it could, in some instances, be irrigated and used for the production of sugar beets and forage crops. If, on the other hand, it was not suitable for irrigation, or if at this time the land is not needed for purposes of production, it could be sown down to grass and preserved for a future emergency. Then in years to come, if that land was needed for grazing or hay purposes, it would be in a good condition to supply the needs of the country. Evidence to-day proves overwhelmingly that the problem of a fair market price will never be solved permanently until steps are taken to cooperate with other major exporting nations in exercising control over the production and the sale of wheat. This, I believe, would require a compulsory wheat board, and I am satisfied that the majority of farmers in western Canada to-day would support the idea of a compulsory board. I say that in spite of anything which may be contained in the Turgeon commission report.

That report takes the stand that there are some farmers in Canada who are opposed to a compulsory board and for that reason we would not be justified in putting it into operation. Of course that is nonsense, because you meet the same objection towards all legislation; you never get a unanimous decision on any question. You must put into operation the legislation which is of the greatest benefit to the greatest number of people.

I believe that the report of the royal grain inquiry commission was a great disappointment to all progressive farmers. I think it must be condemned for adopting a weak, timid and grovelling attitude. It stresses time after time that nothing must be done which might possibly indispose importing nations towards us. In other words, we must go down on our knees and beg importing nations to take our wheat at any price. There is one paragraph to which I take special exception; it will be found on page 158, and it reads as follows:

If ever again circumstances should induce the government of Canada to intervene in wheat marketing by paying the producer a price in excess of world prices, no attempt should be made to enforce that excessive price overseas, that is, to pass the burden of our relief to the producer on to the overseas buyer. He will not accept the burden. And in the long run all attempts to pass it on, by withholding supplies or otherwise, will prove detrimental to the producers themselves, because it will again indispose buyers towards Canadian wheat.

I would comment that, when we are trying to procure a fair minimum, moderate price based upon cost of production, by no stretch of the imagination can that price be termed an excessive one. On the contrary, when we sell to a foreign nation at a price considerably below cost of production, we are to a certain degree subsidizing that nation and asking the producers of the goods so sold to bear the burden of that relief. In so far as indisposing buyers towards us, so long as cooperative action is taken by the four major nations to procure a moderate price there should be little or no danger in that regard.

As a matter of fact the necessity of the control of production is recognized by the European grain trade and, seeing that the Turgeon report stresses so many times the fact that we must do nothing to indispose the grain buyers of Europe towards us, I should like to quote from a circular from the grain trade to be found on page six of the Farm and Ranch Review. I quote as follows:

In a trade circular issued by Messrs. Weil Hermanos & Co., of Rotterdam, Holland, it is pointed out that subsidies are now paid to export wheat producers in fourteen countries. It comments as follows:

[Mr. Quelch.]

"From the above it appears that no exporting country can export a bushel of wheat without some sort of subsidy. There is no country in the world, either in the exporting or importing countries, which can produce wheat at a price arrived at in free competition without government assistance. The importing countries do not wish to have imports of foreign wheat at low prices. In other words, there is nobody in the whole world who has any interest in low prices at all, and yet prices are low, very low. All this seems stark lunacy!

If this system should be continued, there must arrive a point sooner or later when it will break down, when a complete chaos will reign in the world of wheat. There will be a regular wheat war raging, a war which certainly will not contribute to create an atmosphere favourable to a better feeling all around the world.

What is the use of such a mad race to get as much as possible of the share of exports when the total is strictly limited, and when the lowering of prices can only increase the total of wheat consumption by the relatively small amount used for stock feeding?

We believe, therefore, that this state of affairs cannot continue, and that some sort of general agreement amongst the various exporting countries will be reached, although we quite realize that a similar agreement broke down a few years ago, and we also quite see the danger of such an agreement to free trading in the world.

Such an agreement may not be a permanent measure but only temporary until the present time of overproduction or underconsumption will be over . . . fixing of such an export quota will alone be sufficient to bring the price up again to such a level that subsidies will become unnecessary. . . .

After all, there are far more serious consequences behind the wheat crisis than just the fall in wheat prices alone; we need only remember that in 1929 the general world crisis was preceded, and in the opinion of many, was originally caused by the agricultural crisis."

This article by the grain trade stresses the fact that the present policy is one of stark lunacy. It states that some sort of general agreement among the various exporting nations will have to be reached. That is stated in spite of the fact that the Turgeon commission report holds that such action would indispose the grain trade towards us. It also states that the fixing of an export quota alone will be sufficient to bring the price up again to such a level that subsidies will be unnecessary. I have quoted this article to show that the timid attitude of the Turgeon commission report does not necessarily represent the attitude of the European grain trade.

Another approach to this problem is that of stimulating the home market through chemurgics, that is by applying science to work in industry so as to use more edible and non-edible farm products. Great strides have been made in this direction in the United States by the Farm Chemurgics Council

Incorporated. I recognize that a great deal of work has already been done in this regard in Canada through the research council, but I believe that the federal government might well give added financial assistance in order that everything possible shall be done to increase their activities.

But in this regard I should like to sound a word of warning. If such action displaces the materials that we are importing at the present time, it will still further restrict the market for our exports. If, on the other hand, it means utilizing farm products in addition to present imports, it means an increase in the aggregate of our manufactures. In either case the result would be lack of markets for goods produced by such action. Therefore once again we are met with the same old problem, one that we have stressed time and again in this house, that if we are going to be able to increase the general well-being of the Canadian people to the full capacity of the country to supply it, we shall have to increase the purchasing power of the people; that is, we shall have to issue the money that is necessary to convert the great physical demands of the people into an effective demand against the production of the country.

Briefly to summarize my suggestions, I would advocate:

1. That Canada should take the initiative in calling an international conference for the purpose of controlling production and stabilizing prices.

2. That every possible assistance be given by the federal government for the purpose of stimulating the home market for agricultural products through chemurgics; recognizing, of course, that such action will increase the wealth of the country and therefore necessitate that steps be taken to increase the effective demands of the people of Canada against this new wealth.

3. That until steps have been taken to solve the present problem, the government should maintain a minimum price based upon the cost of production plus fair remuneration.

I have addressed my remarks chiefly to the problem of wheat, because that is probably the main agricultural problem. On the other hand, I feel that all farmers and all primary producers are justified in demanding a guaranteed price for their products. So far as the burden that may be created by such action is concerned, we feel there would be no difficulty; providing this government would institute the program which, before the election, it pledged itself to carry out, namely, to make currency and credit available in terms of public need. We shall be dealing more fully with that side of the picture at a later date.

Mr. A. G. McAVITY (St. John-Albert): I wish to add my tribute of congratulations to the mover (Mr. Matthews) and the seconder (Mr. Chevrier) of the address. I wish also to express the delight we in the loyalist city of Saint John feel at the prospect of a visit from their Majesties the King and Queen. We are sorry that they are not scheduled for a longer stay with us, but you may depend upon it, Mr. Speaker, that the mayor of our loyalist city will prepare for them a hearty welcome. From all parts of the constituency of St. John-Albert the people will turn out to see their majesties either at Saint John or at Moncton, and those who are now children will hand on to their children's children the story of the big day when the king and queen came to visit us in New Brunswick.

To-morrow night at Saint John the Right Hon. R. B. Bennett will be tendered a banquet on the occasion of his departure for the new home in which he has elected to spend his remaining years, his home in England. The right hon. gentleman is a native son of Albert county, and I am sure I should be recreant to my duty if I failed to tender to him on this occasion our best wishes for his success and health and happiness. We believe he will take his place with Beaverbrook and other native sons.

I am going to deal first with the question of unemployment. The Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) referred to the hard times of the 1890's, but he neglected to remind the house that Tory policies were in effect until 1896 when Sir Wilfrid Laurier came into power and the hard times disappeared. It will be perhaps of interest to the house to recall how the city of Saint John at that time set about solving its own problem of unemployment by developing a great port. Grants in aid and other forms of federal assistance were not then available. I believe I can best picture to the house the conditions at that time by quoting from an article written by Mr. Ian Sclanders, one of the most promising of the young journalists of the maritime provinces. Referring to those hard times in the nineties he wrote the following in a souvenir booklet which was published in Saint John in 1935 on the occasion of the late king's silver jubilee:

> There is unemployment in St. John. The city council has instructed the board of works to ascertain what can best be done to provide work for the jobless. The city's economic structure is being buffeted first from one side, then from the other, in the changing condition of the middle 90's. In the midst of this St. John has one bright hope. St. John decides to become a great national port. The transportation interests had adopted Portland, Maine, as Canada's winter port. Long trains of Canadian freights moved to and from Portland, Maine, over the lines of the Grand Trunk railway. Work that should have gone to Canadian railwaymen, Canadian port workers, was being given to the labourers of a foreign country. The Canadian government was subsidizing the Allan and Dominion lines to carry his majesty's mails from the United States port of Portland.

In St. John the common council was instructing the board of works to ascertain what could best be done to provide work for the jobless. And in St. John the tide of indignation was rising! By the end of 1892 the city had well over $200,000 invested in its effort to make this a national port, nor was there anything but idle facilities to show for the expenditure. It was disappointing, of course, but it did not discourage. The city met "passive resistance" on the part of the federal government and the transportation interests by pouring more money into port facilities in 1893 and 1894.

In a period of five years—and as yet with no employment for waterfront workers, no port business to show for it—the city had made an investment on the west side of upwards of $1,000,000. Nor were these expenditures to stop then. Up to the time the dominion took over the harbour in 1928 St. John's investment in port facilities amounted to some $2,000,000.

It is doubtful whether in all Canada any other city has so courageously and with such unswerving conviction expended its own funds to build a national institution and mould a national policy. St. John virtually gave Canada an all-year port. To-day, even though not always adhered to, a national transportation policy is an actual fact—a fact that means the employment of thousands of Canadians and the annual disbursement of millions of dollars in wages. How much the indomitable efforts of those old leaders of St. John had to do with the establishment of this policy is difficult to say. A lot, certainly.

I endorse what Mr. Sclanders says in that article. Saint John is peculiar in that up to 1928 the development of the port of Saint John, with respect to terminal facilities for the servicing of ships, and the generation of commerce through the port, was carried on by residents of Saint John to the tune of about $50 per capita. This is in direct contrast to other ports across Canada whose facilities and enterprise in developing business or commerce had been for many years a responsibility of the dominion government through local harbour commissions. In other words, the entire resources of the dominion government were behind certain national ports. If you examine the situation at the ports of Montreal or Quebec you will find that for the last forty years practically all terminal facilities have been owned and operated by the dominion government. It is now recognized that the cities in which national ports are located are not financially able to develop, and should not be alone responsible for the development of facilities and the generation of commerce for dominion trade.

It was our present Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) who inaugurated the national port policy in 1928, whereby the port of Saint John was made a national port and its facilities were increased and improved. After the transfer was made from the city of Saint John to the federal government there was an increased interest in our port. Instead of going to the city hall with suggestions and complaints, people went to the harbour commissioners' office. From 1928 to 1936 there was intimate contact between the people of Saint John and the port management. I regret to say that this intimate contact does not exist to-day. Close contact with port workers and users who are vitally interested in the success of their port should be encouraged, not stifled; developed, not destroyed. When the national harbours board took over the control of Canadian ports and centralized that control in Ottawa it took away much of the initiative which inspired the local people but which they now have no opportunity to express. Notwithstanding the recommendation of Sir Alexander Gibb that considerable latitude should be allowed to port managers, these port managers have been given no initiative whatever. What is more important, with the removal of any stimulus to enterprise on the part of the local officers at each port, this board in Ottawa makes no attempt to set up any organization directed towards maintaining even the volume of business which ports now under its jurisdiction previously enjoyed. Agents in Canada of United States railroads are very actively canvassing to get this business for their own ports. To offset this I feel that the national harbours board should have a traffic department directing business through Canadian ports.

On the subject of unemployment, permit me to put on record that the federal government is the largest employer of labour in my constituency. I have not collected the exact figures, but there are about 500 permanently on the government payroll. The second largest employer of labour is the St. John Dry Dock & Shipbuilding Company, which is subsidized by the government. In addition the harbours board spent $333,000 on capital account and $88,000 on maintenance. Also $45,000 was spent on our airport, and a loan was made of $115,000 at two per cent to build a hospital. In addition there were contributions towards relief, and larger expenditures than usual by the public works, fisheries, national defence, mines and resources, and other departments. There is no evidence of any lack of federal aid in my constituency. Moreover, port workers collected for the year 1938 a total wage of $1,181,759 which is slightly higher than the figure for 1937. We were a little disappointed that the port figures for this year were slightly under those of last year. The total tonnage handled dropped from 2,018,412 to 1,930,525 tons. If December grain shipments had been forthcoming in the same volume as last year we should have been 27,408 tons to the good instead of 87,887 tons behind. But the dock labourers got more money, notwithstanding the slight drop in tonnage. Not much labour is employed in handling grain; one carload of package freight will distribute more wages than many carloads of grain.

I am of the opinion that the new trade treaty has not been in effect long enough to show any results. Our grain shipments dropped from 131,903 tons in December, 1937, to 16,508 tons in 1938, but this was before the treaty went into effect. It may have been due to the fact that the elevation charge for handling grain at certain United States ports has been established for some time at half a cent a bushel as compared to a rate of one cent a bushel at Canadian ports under the jurisdiction of the board. It seems clear that our harbours board should see to it that our ports are freed from this handicap. I am told that there is some dispute as to whether the harbours board or the railways should make the reduction, but my contention is that the rate should be dropped at once, so that trade will flow through our ports; a settlement can be arranged later between the harbours board and the railways.

It seems probable that most of the drop in our December shipments was not due either to the treaty or to the difference in elevation charges just mentioned, but rather to the lower ocean rates on the Pacific coast, which have drawn trade away from the Atlantic. I am surprised that the hon. member for Kootenay East (Mr. Stevens) did not have this information when he was speaking recently. The total shipments through all Canadian and United States Atlantic ports during December dropped from 6,007,000 bushels in 1937 to 1,175,000 in 1938. What could we expect under those circumstances but a drop in the amount of grain handled at the port of Saint John during December? Moreover I am informed that there is very little grain at the bay port elevators. That being so, I am afraid there will not be much brought to Saint John or Halifax during the present winter.

Recently at the port of Halifax the storage of grain has been made absolutely free. It seems apparent that action should be taken immediately to put Saint John on an equal footing with her sister port so that she also may have this advantage. Moreover the national harbours board should be just as smart as the agents employed by our United States cousins in soliciting traffic in Canada for ports under their control. We were given to understand that port charges of all kinds would be equalized, and that rate cutting as between ports would be abolished. It is very hard to reconcile this policy with the present grain elevator tariffs in Saint John and the granting of free storage on export grain at Halifax as well as at the port of Quebec during the summer. As recently as September 13, 1938, the Minister of Transport (Mr. Howe) at Saint John gave assurance that the harbours board would not build up one port by deviations from tariff rates at the expense of other ports.

The financial reports of the harbours board show that considerable progress has been made in reducing expenses, and that additional revenue has been raised by revising tariffs. But I can assure those interested that we who come from cities in respect of which the port is a weighty factor in the economic life of the community are very much interested, and wish to see a more active canvass made for trade through our ports. The Canadian Pacific steamship lines usually take enough grain, if they can get it before the close of navigation on the great lakes, to ballast their vessels operating from the port of Saint John during the winter months. Apart from that I cannot see anyone sufficiently interested in securing traffic through our ports. The responsibility for the development of business through the port has been taken away from the local people and now lies right with those who own, administer and operate the national terminals. If the national harbours board make a real effort to build up trade for our ports; if they paint the picture in its true perspective and fail to get Canadian shippers to use Canadian ports; then, if we are doomed to suffer after a real effort has been made, the loyalist city of Saint John will not complain. You may depend upon it, Mr. Speaker, that Saint John, if it must, will take the bitter end of the bargain in order that the rest of Canada may benefit by the generally sweet terms of the treaty.

In dealing with the matter of grain shipments last week the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) remarked that the source of supply for maritime ports was the bay port elevators. We often wonder why maritime ports should be dependent upon the bay port elevators when, from Prescott to Quebec, there is storage for twenty-five million bushels of wheat, and those elevators are located approximately only half the distance from the maritime ports. It may be that the top wharfage which the harbour board imposed at these ports is killing the business. This is another matter I think should be looked into, in the interests of efficient transportation. It is always cheaper to carry grain by water than by rail; and if as a matter of policy the grain can be brought down to Prescott, Montreal or Quebec the rail haul to Saint John thereby would be shortened.

Since 1890 we have had unlimited confidence in the port of Saint John as the outlet, naturally and geographically, best located to handle Canadian export and import trade. This opinion was confirmed by Sir Alexander Gibb, who in his report stated:

> The port of Saint John holds a very important place in the national transportation system. Although it has a longer rail haul from Montreal than either Portland or Boston, it affords the only means of meeting the intense competition from the more favourably placed United States Atlantic seaboard ports, on terms that are not wholly disproportionate from the economic, business and traffic points of view.

Since 1935 I have noted with pleasure and satisfaction that those policies which our leader initiated, notwithstanding the very troublesome world situation, have been reflected in increased shipments through our ports. It is gratifying to note the shipments of native lumber, pulpwood, potatoes and other commodities produced in New Brunswick. Every ton of these exports represents increased purchasing power for New Brunswick producers and manufacturers; and, through them, purchasing power for the labour employed.

It seems to me that we may expect the new trade treaty to be beneficial both politically and economically. I think the Minister of Agriculture showed conclusively that we need have no fear that the removal of the six cent preference on wheat will have serious results. In his speech of January 19 he gave the figures for the five year period before 1932, when the British preference began, showing 791,840,000 bushels of Canadian grain and 135,360,000 bushels of United States grain going through Canadian ports. During the next five years, when the preference was in effect, the figures were 551,815,000 bushels of Canadian grain and 6,061,000 bushels of United States grain. And if more assurance were needed we had it to-day from the Minister of Trade and Commerce. Let me point out also that profitable cargoes of package freight and an increased volume of trade in general are results that I believe will follow as this treaty takes effect. Increased world trade has always been the Liberal policy and you can depend upon it, Mr. Speaker, that this treaty will have more benefits than handicaps. I believe a few years from now history will record this treaty as the finest yet made.

This brings me to another matter referred to in the speech from the throne, the question of defence. Where could any attack be made on this country except on her coast line? Any attack from the frozen north is highly improbable; any attack from our good southern neighbour is inconceivable. If any attack is made it will be directed, probably, chiefly against key positions at rail and transport centres which would be supplying materials of war. We urge the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Mackenzie) to concentrate especially on the possibility of attack by submarines or aeroplanes. During the last war it was rumoured that submarines came into the bay of Fundy and sank ships within a few miles of Saint John. In that city we have a detachment of the Royal Canadian Naval Volunteer Reserve, and only to-day I received from Saint John Branch No. 14, Canadian Legion, British Empire Service League, a petition which states:

> Be it therefore resolved that the Saint John Branch No. 14, Canadian Legion, British Empire Service League is of the opinion that along with such defensive measures for the port of Saint John as may now be contemplated or planned for the near future, that the local detachment of the Royal Canadian Navy Volunteer Reserve be increased to a total of three hundred other ranks; that a commander and other necessary commissioned officers be appointed; and that proper equipment and facilities for training a unit of this size be authorized and allocated to the Saint John detachment.

It is conceivable that aeroplanes might attack our coast, but in my opinion the most important thing is the question of transport. In addition to the defence of the coast line should we not also consider more fully our transport system, which will be essential to assist in any world war, even if we are not attacked. We cannot employ our force fully and effectively unless Canadian ports are connected with both Canadian lines without the necessity of travelling over foreign territory. This was a fundamental policy behind the construction of all railways in Canada. The Intercolonial and the National Transcontinental railway lines were constructed to permit, so far as possible, the transportation of supplies through all-British territory, as far away as possible from the international boundary. The only exception to this is the Canadian Pacific short line, the principal artery of the port of Saint John, which passes through the state of Maine. In 1903 the Liberal government under Sir Wilfred Laurier initiated a national railway policy which eliminated Portland and diverted traffic to Saint John and Halifax. As a result of this policy we had the National Transcontinental railway from Quebec to Moncton for service during the last war. Just listen to the testimony which was given by experts before the special senate railway committee last session. Mr. Walter Appleton, vice president in charge of Atlantic lines, at page 1088, said:

The strategic position of the National Transcontinental railway in time of war will also be apparent because of the fact it is in all-Canadian territory and a sufficient distance inland to be safe from attack by sea. On the other hand, the Canadian Pacific Railway line passes through the state of Maine for a distance of approximately 201 miles or 41·55 per cent of the distance between Saint John and Montreal, and in the event of war could not be used for the movement of munitions and troops unless the United States were an ally. For heavy troop movement the National Transcontinental route would be of great value because of the longer trains that could be handled than on either the Intercolonial or the Canadian Pacific.

Mr. S. W. Fairweather, referring to the Canadian Pacific Railway, states at page 319:

They have no connection except with their line through Maine, which is in part a leased line. Its trouble is that the grades are much less favourable. And just consider what would happen—as it did happen one time—if we were in a position where we had to ship stuff out of Canadian ports over Canadian railways and we did not have the National Transcontinental and we were barred from using the Canadian Pacific lines. The Intercolonial is a poor grade line through settled country and was deliberately made long and roundabout so it could keep in contact with the British navy. It is utterly incapable of supplying the transportation requirements of the maritime provinces. That is it has not got the capacity to do it in a period of stress, and I do not know what we would have done if we had not had the National Transcontinental as a link. Our whole port fabric from 1914 on would have fallen down. We could not possibly have handled the freight.

An hon. Senator: The war years.

The Witness: That is what I mean. I did not want to bring it out exactly that way, but if that line were not available you could not possibly handle through Canada the traffic which would be concentrated on those ports down there, which are highly important from a national standpoint. It would have been utterly impossible to do it. Not only is this the shortest link in Canadian territory, but it has the greatest traffic carrying capacity of any route and is the cheapest route to all points in the maritime provinces east of Moncton.

I heartily concur in every word that Mr. Fairweather uttered, but I want to point out that Saint John is not east of Moncton. It is southwest. To get to Saint John via Moncton from McGivney junction the Transcontinental traffic moves due east a distance of about 97·6 miles, then southwest from Moncton to Saint John 89·3 miles over a second-grade roadbed. On the National Transcontinental a single locomotive can haul 4,000 tons over the National Transcontinental from Quebec to Moncton, but it takes three locomotives to take the same train over this inferior roadbed to Saint John. Then, when these three trains arrive at Saint John they are on the wrong side of the harbour, and must be transferred to the west side by the Canadian Pacific. Last winter port season, the Canadian Pacific bill for the transport of approximately 300,000 tons from Saint John to West Saint John amounted to $156,000. This charge can be avoided annually and the rail haul from McGivney junction can be cut almost in half by going to Saint John via Fredericton over the new bridge which was completed by this government last summer. From McGivney, via Fredericton, is only 99 miles if the Canadian Pacific tracks are used from Fredericton to West Saint John, or 116 by the Valley railway which is owned and operated by the Canadian National. This is, in consequence, not only a short route for the Canadian National to use at all times, but an emergency route which might be used by the Canadian Pacific if they are restricted in wartime on their short line through Maine.

In his national port survey Sir Alexander Gibb made the following statement:

The question of railway services and railway connections is of great importance. To enable the port to be used to its full advantage, it is essential that it should be fully served by both the main railways, and that both should have equal access to each side of the harbour without the heavy charge on the traffic which the present switching rates necessarily involve.

If during September the Right Hon. Neville Chamberlain had not been successful in avoiding conflict, traffic through Maine might now be denied by the neutrality laws of our good neighbour to the south, and our only access to Saint John would be by the longer route of the Canadian National via Moncton.

Sir Alexander Gibb also states:

In my opinion the Canadian National railways should run direct into West Saint John by means of the Valley railway.

Surely, if we are going to spend $50,000,000 for defence of this country, an item of say $1,000,000 to complete a direct line with good grades to Saint John to give our own Canadian National Railways direct access to its nearest seaport, and to give the Canadian Pacific Railway an alternative route, if needed, should be considered seriously at this session. In my opinion we should approve of any reasonable amount to provide unrestricted transport over Canadian territory for both railroads to both of our great national Atlantic all-year ports.

This brings me now to the part of the speech from the throne which indicates that a defence purchasing board will be established.

May I suggest that this board be headed by the strongest dictator that can be found. I should like to see a man there who would shoot at sunrise all profiteers. I served for two years on the imperial munitions board, and it was a surprise to me to discover of some men that although they would proudly send their sons to fight, or in some cases go themselves, when it comes to the business of supplying war materials the firmly ingrained commercial instinct prevails. The men who serve on this board should be fireproof, non-magnetic, and impervious to oil and moisture. It seems to me that the scope of the board should be wider than the purchase of munitions. In Germany in 1914 manufacturers did not assemble in Berlin to see what was the most profitable way in which their efforts and resources might be applied. Immediately on the outbreak of war an ordnance or stores officer stepped into each factory and took charge. Mechanics and other key men were not allowed to go to the front. Plans were produced showing the article to be manufactured, and army inspectors with master gauges were in attendance, so that with little delay and no confusion each factory was commandeered to set to work on its allotted task. The proposed purchase system should include all supplies, not only munitions, but clothing, transport and all things vitally necessary.

I was superintendent of production on the imperial munitions board which sat in Ottawa from 1915 to 1917, and it may interest the house to know that although no private manufacturers had any knowledge of shell manufacture in 1914, this country in 1917 was producing so many shells that we received orders from the ministry of munitions to slow down and to divert our activities to other lines. Before we curtailed production we were shipping 56 per cent of all the 18-pounder shrapnel used by all British armies, about 40 per cent of the 4·5 howitzer shells and about 25 per cent of the 6-inch, 8-inch and 9·2 calibre.

I am glad to note that the Canada-West Indies trade agreement will be given consideration. This treaty means much to the people of New Brunswick. Each year the banana boats come to our port with from 20,000 to 30,000 tons of bananas. A clause in the treaty gives a preference of 50 cents a bunch on bananas provided they are brought into Canada via a Canadian port. As a result we have been receiving bananas by the boatload and shipping them out by the trainload. This was all new business brought into being by the Canada-West Indies trade agreement made in 1928 by the Mackenzie King government. It is a business which continues during the summer months, providing a very welcome payroll for dock workers during the slack season. This year the harbours board installed heating facilities and frostproofed additional sheds, which I hope is an indication that the West Indies trade agreement will be renewed.

This week, on my suggestion, a clause was inserted in a lease made by the harbours board for the largest weir in Saint John harbour, which provides that the lessee must pay forty cents per hundred for all gaspereaux offered by other harbour fishermen. This arrangement was made when the Minister of Transport (Mr. Howe) and the Minister of Fisheries (Mr. Michaud) were in Saint John last September, and it was not my fault that the sale was delayed, causing inconvenience to the fishermen in ordering their twine. I am sure the arrangement will prove of real benefit to all the fishermen of Saint John harbour and will not curtail the export of gaspereaux annually to the West Indies.

On motion of Mr. McNiven the debate was adjourned.

MAIN ESTIMATES, 1939-40

A message from His Excellency the Governor General transmitting estimates for the financial year ending March 31, 1940, was presented by Hon. Charles A. Dunning (Minister of Finance) and read by Mr. Speaker to the house.

On motion of Mr. Lapointe (Quebec East) the house adjourned at 5.55 p.m.

Thursday, January 26, 1939

The house met at three o'clock.

DOMINION ELECTIONS

PROVISION FOR TAKING OF BALLOT ON SPECIFIC QUESTIONS OF NATIONAL IMPORTANCE

Mr. T. L. CHURCH: (Broadview) moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 11, respecting balloting on questions of great national importance.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Explain.

Mr. CHURCH: The principle of this bill is to trust the people.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. CHURCH: That was a very popular plank of the Liberal platform, to trust the people. The bill is enabling legislation similar to that for many years in vogue in democratic countries. We are living in a new world and have over-government and over-taxation. At present the people have little or no control over their affairs or national property. The proposal embodied in this bill is found to be in the public interest and most useful, permitting the submission of important national questions to the wisdom and judgment of the electors. The provinces have used it extensively for years through the municipalities, thus providing an opportunity for giving the public a direct voice in government policies. It will create a prerogative of checks and balances and make for government "of the people, by the people and for the people." The governor in council can be thus enabled to submit to a vote any matter of national importance that parliament asks to be submitted, such as constitutional, parliamentary, cabinet and law reform, the transportation question, or any other domestic question, but no matters relating to defence on foreign affairs.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

PRISONS AND REFORMATORIES

PROPOSED SUBSTITUTION OF DETERMINATE FOR INDETERMINATE REFORMATORY SENTENCES

Mr. T. L. CHURCH (Broadview) moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 12, to amend the Prisons and Reformatories Act.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Explain.

Mr. CHURCH: The Prisons and Reformatories Act gives the court jurisdiction to impose a definite and an indeterminate term in a reformatory. The bill proposes to substitute determinate for indeterminate sentences. The several expressions relating to "indeterminate sentence" are found in eighteen sections or subsections of the act and the draftsman considers it inexpedient to amend each of such sections by a separate clause. This bill would revert to the old law of sentences for a definite period only.

The indeterminate legislation has been condemned by many judges and magistrates as inhuman and illegal. Canada's prisons at present are filled with youth, many first offenders, who have been unable to secure work. The lack of employment, by cause and effect, is one of the reasons for crime. Recently the appellate division of the Supreme Court of Ontario in Rex V. Bond, 1937 O. R., page 535, judgment of Hon. Mr. Justice Middleton, questioned and made observations on the legality of such legislation, as the provinces only had fundamentally the right of providing confinement for one year and three hundred and sixty-four days, and also condemned it on grounds of public policy. The law has not acted as a deterrent nor is it reformative. It should be repealed because in practice it confers on officials of these institutions the right to detain those who have not influence enough to have employment awaiting them at the end of a definite period and gives to their decisions the force of statute law.

Mr. Justice Middleton has criticized the present practice. Let me read what he says, in part:

> Many judges and magistrates when imposing an indeterminate sentence address the prisoner somewhat in these terms: . . . "If during this determinate term you prove yourself to be a good prisoner, and comply with the rules of the institution and show a disposition to be law-abiding, the parole board may, at the expiry of the definite term, allow you your liberty. It all depends upon yourself and your conduct as to how much, if any, of the indefinite term you may be called upon to serve."
> Thus encouraged, the prisoner proves to be a model prisoner. He gives every indication of his reformation, and is taken at the expiry of the definite term before the board. He is hopeful of liberty and full of good resolutions, and the board announces that by reason of an earlier conviction, a fact well known to the judge who imposed the sentence, they will not allow him parole, and he must serve the indefinite term. I can imagine no situation more cruel and more likely to convert a man really desiring to reform into an enemy of society.
> Indeterminate sentences had their origin in Michigan, and have been adopted in many places. Fundamentally reformatories are for up to one year and three hundred and sixty-four days definite, and by being indeterminate are made four years. The legality of the whole thing is questioned and the court of appeal makes criticisms on its usefulness.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

FOOD AND DRUGS ACT

AMENDMENTS TO BROADEN SCOPE AND CLARIFY CERTAIN FEATURES OF THE ACT

Hon. C. G. POWER (Minister of Pensions and National Health) moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 13, to amend the Food and Drugs Act.

He said: The object of this bill is to amend the Food and Drugs Act, to broaden its scope and clarify certain features with a view to increasing its usefulness.

It is thought that foods and drugs should be more clearly defined for purposes of classification and that certain materials not now covered by the act should be brought within the scope of the statute. Means are being sought to make more effective the restraints upon misrepresentation in the marketing of foods and drugs.

It is the intention to bring within the scope of the act certain material used in the practice of surgery and for the purposes of medical diagnosis.

It is the intention to extend the definition of drugs to include certain substances for which no medicinal claims are made but which may be injurious to human health. In addition, there are marketed to the general public, and extensively employed, certain extracts of animal tissues and other substances whose manufacture and sale should be strictly supervised in view of their potency for harm through uncontrolled distribution.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

TRADE AGREEMENTS

UNITED KINGDOM-UNITED STATES-CANADA—REQUEST FOR TABLING OF CORRESPONDENCE

On the orders of the day:

Hon. R. J. MANION (Leader of the Opposition): I should like to ask the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) if there has been tabled the preliminary correspondence with the United Kingdom dealing with what are called the triangular trade treaties recently negotiated. If this correspondence has not been brought down, would it be convenient to have it tabled before the discussion of the treaty in the house?

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): There has been a great deal of correspondence, much of it, as my hon. friend will realize, necessarily of a confidential nature as affecting other countries. I shall make inquiry and ascertain if there is any correspondence of importance that has not been brought down and which can be brought down without violating any obligations to other countries. It would of course be necessary to get the consent of the British government to the bringing down of any correspondence which they might consider to be confidential.

Mr. MANION: Yes, I understand some may be of a confidential nature. Frankly what we would like is to have the correspondence dealing with concessions that were granted at the request of the British government. Anything of that sort that can properly be tabled we should very much like to have, in order to simplify the discussion when the time comes.

SASKATCHEWAN RELIEF

QUESTION OF IRREGULARITIES IN DISTRIBUTION SINCE 1935

On the orders of the day:

Mr. E. E. PERLEY (Qu'Appelle): I have a question which might properly be directed to the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner), but he not being present the Minister of Finance (Mr. Dunning) perhaps can answer it. The question is: In view of the revelation that has taken place through the reports of court proceedings and prosecutions in the Wakaw district with respect to the distribution of relief, which involves federal moneys, will the government consider setting up a commission to make a thorough investigation into the distribution of relief in Saskatchewan since December, 1935?

Hon. CHARLES A. DUNNING (Minister of Finance): I gather that my hon. friend is referring to certain criminal prosecutions. I take it action is already under way by the proper authorities in the province. I cannot go any further than that.

ANTHRAX

REPORTED INFECTION OF IMPORTED JAPANESE SHAVING BRUSHES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. GORDON GRAYDON (Peel): I have a question to direct to the Minister of Pensions and National Health (Mr. Power). Has the government made any investigation into the report that certain imported Japanese goods said to be infected with anthrax germs were seized in Toronto this week by officials of the Ontario department of health working in cooperation with the Ontario provincial police? If so, will the government say what steps are being taken to protect the public from such dangers in the future?

Hon. C. G. POWER (Minister of Pensions and National Health): My hon. friend was good enough to give me notice of his question. If the house will permit I might give a somewhat more extended answer than a merely categorical reply to the question.

On Saturday last the Department of Health received information from the head of the United States public health service, Surgeon-General Thomas Parran, to the effect that a case of anthrax which had been traced to a shaving brush had been discovered in North Dakota, and that it had resulted in a fatality. Immediately investigation was made by the United States authorities. The wholesale distributing house which handled the brushes was questioned, and certain brushes seized and the hairs analyzed, with the result that a number were found to be contaminated with anthrax spores. Tracing the shipment still further to the distributing house in New York it was found that this house sold these brushes to a large number of variety stores throughout the United States and Canada. The surgeon-general of the United States advised the Canadian Department of Health that a number of these articles had been shipped to Canada, and gave the shipment numbers and the markings on the brushes. It was found that some had been distributed in the provinces of British Columbia, Manitoba, Saskatchewan and Alberta. The health authorities of each of these provinces were advised as to these shipments and the stores to which they had been shipped. The medical health authorities in the other provinces were advised that shipments might have been made into those provinces. We have had replies from the health authorities of British Columbia, who have not as yet completed their investigations, and from Saskatchewan, Alberta and Manitoba, which found no brushes. The Ontario department of health found and seized a number of brushes which had been shipped into this country about two years ago. They are now proceeding to make an analysis, and the report of that analysis will not reach us until early next week. The Department of Health is in communication with the Department of National Revenue for the purpose of tracing any other such shipments to Canada and in order to inaugurate restrictions at the port of entry on similar shipments into Canada.

BRITISH FOREIGN POLICY

REPORTED CRITICISM BY VANCOUVER RESIDENT AND SUBSEQUENT ACTION BY MOUNTED POLICE

On the orders of the day:

Right Hon. ERNEST LAPOINTE (Minister of Justice): On Monday last the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Woodsworth) called attention to an item which appeared in The Nation, a periodical published in New York, to the effect that two members of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police had had an interview with a certain person who had been writing letters to Mr. Chamberlain criticizing British foreign policy in order to dissuade him from writing such letters, and that that gentleman answered that "just so long as postage stamps are available" he would keep on writing. My hon. friend wanted to know what the facts were and whether such action is a part of government policy.

These letters were sent to the Royal Canadian Mounted Police by Scotland Yard, in exactly the same way as Scotland Yard would investigate at the request of the Canadian police. The letters were not only abusive but scurrilous and libelous, contrary to the criminal code and in contravention of the postal regulations of Canada. In undemocratic countries anyone who wrote such letters as these would have been suppressed by methods which are well known. The Royal Canadian Mounted Police merely tried to convince that man that he should not write such letters. If they erred in any way it was on the side of leniency. The unfortunate part of it is that someone in a foreign country, just for the purpose of showing that the system is not good at the present time, should have written an item in disparagement of an administration of justice which bears comparison with the best existing anywhere.

Mr. J. S. WOODSWORTH (Winnipeg North Centre): May I ask, is it usual for Scotland Yard to communicate directly with the Royal Canadian Mounted Police? Should there not be a communication through the Secretary of State? Secondly, have we not courts? Why should there not have been a prosecution, instead of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police acting both as judge and policeman?

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): Well, Mr. Speaker, it is the practice not only here but in every civilized country that, when they are required to do so, police authorities may investigate for the police authorities of another country, especially in respect of illegal acts. The man who wrote that letter ought to be either in a lunatic asylum or in gaol. I do not think the hon. member is quite fair in criticizing the police for having given a warning to desist from writing those letters. Had the writer of the letters been prosecuted there would have been good souls who would have said that he was being persecuted for having written to Mr. Neville Chamberlain.

Members of the government are receiving letters of that kind. His Excellency the Governor General is receiving letters of that kind, and we are investigating in an effort to find out who are the crazy or guilty ones who are doing it, in order to try to prevent it. I am surprised to hear the hon. member criticize that course of action.

GOVERNOR GENERAL'S SPEECH

CONTINUATION OF DEBATE ON ADDRESS IN REPLY

The house resumed from Wednesday, January 25, consideration of the motion of Mr. J. E. Matthews for an address to His Excellency the Governor General in reply to his speech at the opening of the session, and the proposed amendment thereto of Mr. Manion, and the amendment to the amendment of Mr. Woodsworth.

Mr. D. A. McNIVEN (Regina City): Mr. Speaker, I should like my first observation to be one of commendation of the hon. members who moved and seconded the address. Both performed in a most acceptable manner a difficult task, before a highly critical audience. Having lived in the constituency of Brandon for some twenty-five years, and having some knowledge of the political history of that seat, I was particularly interested in the effort of the hon. member for Brandon (Mr. Matthews), who established himself as a worthy successor to that amiable and kindly gentleman, the late Mr. Beaubier, and to the long list of outstanding men who have represented that city in bygone years. It is significant that the hon. member who now holds the seat is the first out-and-out Liberal to be elected in Brandon since 1908, and that signifIcant fact establishes the popular appeal the policies of this government have made to a seat which is both urban and rural. In addition, the hon. member came from Prince Edward Island, and forms part of the large group of maritimers who, having thrown in their lot with us, have made a substantial contribution to the building up and development of the last great west.

This is not the first occasion, Mr. Speaker, upon which the hon. member for Stormont (Mr. Chevrier) has captivated the house. I refer particularly to his address delivered in February, 1937, during the debate on the address in reply, upon which occasion he outlined the Liberal attitude towards capital and labour, and indicated a minimum which labour should receive. His address on that occasion will bear frequent perusal and I refer it to hon. members of the opposition who, while they have displayed an interest in jobs, have not shown any particular interest in that partnership of labour and capital which means security for employees. I forthwith exempt from that mild indictment the hon. member for Kootenay West (Mr. Esling), who frequently has brought to the attention of the house the ideal conditions which prevail in the plant of the Consolidated Mining and Smelting Company of Canada, Limited, at Trail, British Columbia. By so doing he has given encouragement to industrialists throughout Canada to follow the excellent example of that company.

May I join with others in extending congratulations to the leader of the opposition (Mr. Manion) upon his selection as leader of the Conservative party and upon attaining a seat in the house. I was somewhat disturbed by a news dispatch of a couple of months ago which indicated that the great Conservative party had decided to abandon western Canada and the maritimes. It was with great relief I heard his declaration that there was no truth in that statement, that the great Conservative party was still an all-Canadian party, and that in future it would function in western Canada. I am glad of that, and the hon. member both as leader of the Conservative party and personally may be assured of a cordial and warm welcome in the capital city of Saskatchewan.

May I extend my personal congratulations to the two new ministers who were honoured a few days ago. They bring to their jobs a long experience and a very high order of merit. The hon. minister without portfolio (Mr. MacKinnon) representing the constituency of Edmonton West, is a western man with an eastern background; the Postmaster General (Mr. McLarty) is an eastern man with a western background, having practised in western Canada for some nine years. They will therefore bring to the council chamber of the nation qualities designed to build an all-Canadian viewpoint.

I also join with hon. members who have expressed their pleasure upon the recovery of the Minister of Finance (Mr. Dunning) from his recent illness, a pleasure which was emphasized by the splendid reception accorded him when he entered the house on the opening day of the session. May I assure him that the sympathy extended to him by his innumerable friends throughout Saskatchewan was paralleled only by their relief and gratitude upon learning of his progress toward recovery, and by their expressed hope that he will soon be restored to that vigour which we in Saskatchewan know so well.

Apparently there was a meeting in Regina a few days ago, the subject matter of which was referred to by the hon. members for Qu'Appelle (Mr. Perley) and Weyburn (Mr. Douglas), who attempted to magnify into something of national importance that which is really just a small and local matter. With that thought in mind the hon. member for Weyburn placed on Hansard a certain part of a newspaper dispatch. In order that we may recall the subject matter of the article, I shall repeat it:

Party men to decide.

No jobs for others than Liberals, says Regina M.L.A.

A definite clamp has been placed upon the appointment of Regina residents to posts within the civil service that bars those whose political faith is other than Liberal, B. J. McDaniel, K.C., junior member-elect for Regina, told the meeting of the Liberal council at the Labour temple Tuesday night.

In future, said Mr. McDaniel, "no appointment will be deemed to be properly made unless it bears the initials of Mr. Hogarth (senior member-elect for Regina), Mr. McNiven (federal M.P. for Regina), or myself."

I am firm in the belief, Mr. Speaker, that Mr. McDaniel was either misreported or misunderstood, and in any event this forms an excellent example of what generally happens when a line, a sentence or a paragraph taken from a general discussion, is divorced from its context. A wrong impression of what was intended generally follows. I am confirmed in that belief because I know of no such arrangement as that described in the article in question. Further, in Saskatchewan there is what is known as a public service commission which looks after appointments, and hon. members know the extent to which the civil service commission has control over federal appointments. As an illustration of what I mean, within the last few weeks the provincial government appointed two police magistrates in the city of Regina. I was not consulted with regard to those appointments by any member of the Saskatchewan government, though I did make recommendations on behalf of individuals who asked me so to do.

During the course of that meeting an attempt was made to confine the discussion to the question of temporary appointments in the post office during the Christmas rush. When I was requested to assist the postmaster in securing extra help for the Christmas work I immediately got in touch with the various veterans' organizations, the Canadian legion, the war veterans' assistance commission, the army and navy veterans and the disabled war veterans, and asked them to furnish lists of those whom they could recommend. When the lists were furnished they were too lengthy for the employment that was available, and I asked the officers of these associations to select from their lists those whom they would recommend, having in mind the efficiency of the service and giving the preference to married men, particularly those with small children. This was done, and from those who interviewed me personally asking for employment a list of approximately 175 names was drawn up, which included those who had been recommended by the four service organizations. That list was forwarded to the postmaster in order that he might make the selection of the help he required. Included among the individuals who came to see me was a returned soldier who had walked the streets of Regina for three months without a tooth in his mouth. He had served in France for two years, and I recommended him for employment so as to assist him in purchasing a set of teeth. I also promised him that further assistance would be forthcoming, from some source, in order to complete the purchase of a set of teeth.

No questions were asked as to political affiliations. The list was sent to the postmaster, and he made the selections therefrom as help was required. According to my information from the postmaster, 143 men were taken on during the Christmas rush. Of that number 31 were on what is described as the eligible list established by the civil service commission, who under the regulations were required to be given such employment as was available. Of the remainder 70 were returned soldiers, of whom 69 were married men. There were 42 civilians, of whom 33 had dependents. So I suggest, Mr. Speaker, that this employment was divided on a fair, just and equitable basis, having regard to the efficiency of the service, and in accordance with the generally accepted principle of the greatest good to the greatest number.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): I think all will agree that this was very fair, but is it not a fact that the manner in which these appointments were made is exactly what Mr. McDaniel was objecting to?

Mr. McNIVEN: No, that is not so, as the hon. member would have learned if he had referred to Mr. McDaniel's explanation of what occurred at the meeting. I am also informed that all these facts, which are generally known throughout Regina, were disclosed to and discussed at the meeting but were not mentioned in the report, which was the reason for Mr. McDaniel's explanatory statement. There was no complaint on the part of Mr. McDaniel with regard to the method that was followed in making these selections.

As an indication that this method met with general acceptance I have a telegram from F. J. Rowan, secretary-treasurer of the Canadian legion at Regina, addressed to myself, as follows:

Officers and members Canadian legion, Regina branch, express and desire to acknowledge publicly deepest appreciation your efforts in obtaining employment for ex-service men at post office during Christmas rush and on other occasions elsewhere.

May I just mention that there have been other occasions when it was possible to provide employment in connection with work being done under the direction of the Department of Agriculture. Substantially the same method was followed on those occasions, with the approval of the Minister of Agriculture. Then I have another telegram from R. D. Lamont, secretary of the war veterans assistance commission at Regina:

No complaint from veterans' assistance commission re Christmas post office employees. Your cooperation entirely satisfactory.

I venture the opinion, Mr. Speaker, that the hon. member for Weyburn (Mr. Douglas) could not conceive, much less execute, anything fairer than the manner in which the responsibility was discharged on this occasion. And, sir, that plan has been followed consistently since and including 1935, notwithstanding the fact that we in the city of Regina and the province of Saskatchewan had a harrowing experience with a coalition government made up largely of Conservatives but kept in office through the votes of friends and supporters of the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation group in this house. Between 1929 and 1934 that government dismissed hundreds of employees for no reason other than that they were Liberals. Men and women who had been employed by the government for twenty or twenty-five years were dismissed; and, sir, it is singular that Mr. McDaniel, who is the hero of this tempest in a teapot, was himself an employee of the provincial government in 1929.

In 1930 he was dismissed from office by that government notwithstanding the fact that he was a returned soldier, notwithstanding the fact that he had been decorated upon the field of battle and notwithstanding the fact that he had been seriously wounded and was able to progress down the streets of Regina only with the assistance of a cane. Members of the legislature friends and supporters of the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation group in this house by their votes kept that government in office from 1929 to 1934. But the hand of retribution fell heavily on them; for not a single supporter of that government was returned to office in 1934.

Mr. COLDWELL: I rise to a point of order. If I do not misunderstand my hon. friend, the statement was made that the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation members in this house kept that government in office during those years. I would say that that statement is incorrect.

Mr. McNIVEN: The friends and supporters of the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation members in this house. Mr. McDaniel was elected to the provincial house on November 24 last. He was elected by a majority of over 4,000 over his Conservative opponent, by a majority of over 6,000 over his Cooperative Commonwealth Federation opponent—who was supported by the hon. member for Weyburn (Mr. Douglas)—and by a majority of over 10,000 over his Social Credit opponent, a cause with which the hon. member for Weyburn was in 1935 allied. I apologize for taking up so much time in dealing with this trifling incident.

Mr. PERLEY: The statement the hon. member has made is apart from the record. If he will take the quotation he will see it reads, "In future—"

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. SPEAKER: The hon. gentleman has a right to put a question to the hon. member who is speaking, but he should not make a speech.

Mr. PERLEY: He should deal with the matter as reported.

Mr. McNIVEN: The hon. gentleman will appreciate how difficult it is for me to deal with it when I was not present at the meeting. I say that I have no knowledge of any such arrangement at all, and I can only repeat that. I believe that Mr. McDaniel has either been misreported or misunderstood, or the phrase has been taken from its context, with the damaging results that have been indicated.

I shall make only cursory reference to certain passages in the speech from the throne. Notwithstanding the continued efforts of its critics to weigh the speech from the throne by avoirdupois, or to measure it by yardage, by verbiage, by wordage and other methods, it becomes increasingly apparent that the speech from the throne is broad and comprehensive. When elaborated, as it was during the course of this debate by the Minister of Labour (Mr. Rogers), it is found to contain a broad and comprehensive program intended to carry to the homes of the people of this country the benefits of the policies of this government. So far as we in the west are concerned we welcome these trade treaties. We welcome the Canada-United States treaty in the same terms as it has been acclaimed in eastern Canada. The treaty of 1935 showed direct and positive benefits to those of us who reside in western Canada. As the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Euler) pointed out yesterday, it did no specific harm to any existing business institution.

Some comment has been made doubting the significance of the international effects of the treaty. Never in the history of Canada or the United States have there been such friendly relations between the two countries as prevail at the present time, which relations have come about since the signing of that treaty in 1935. There is no doubt at all that the terms of the treaty of 1935 and the experience gained under it paved the way for the enlarged treaty of 1939. Once again doubts are being voiced as to the international effects to be obtained from this treaty. In this regard I should like to refer to the comment of Mr. Paul Van Zeeland, a former prime minister of Belgium, who was asked recently to make a report to the governments of France and the United Kingdom as to the possibility of obtaining a reduction in the number of quotas and the removal of other obstacles to international trade. Mr. Van Zeeland, in part, said:

—in the present state of affairs the negotiation of bilateral commercial agreements, based on the most favoured nation clause, remains one of the most efficacious methods for reducing tariff barriers.

And again, writing some ten months before the British-United States agreement was completed, he used this language:

No one would underestimate the effect which would be produced—either directly, in its reaction, on the two national economies concerned, or indirectly in its repercussion on the whole world, by the conclusion, in a spirit of international collaboration, of a commercial agreement covering a wide range between the two great Anglo-Saxon communities.

No matter what the critics of this agreement may say, the former prime minister of Belgium believes that it will have direct international effects with repercussions of benefit to the world. As an indication that tariffs are a disturbing element in the peace of the world, I should like to quote a short passage from the Fascist handbook which was issued on October 28, 1937. The following passage is to be found on page 88:

A prohibitive tariff policy was adopted by the United States; England first depreciated her currency and then closed her markets. The Ottawa agreements introduced differential tariffs throughout the British empire. Currency dumping was practised on a large scale by Japan and other countries. Not content with tariffs, France introduced quotas and prohibitions, followed in this by most of the European countries, exchange regulations and blocked credits finally demoralized the markets, and paralyzed foreign trade.

For five long years from 1929 to 1934 Italy held out against the quotas and exchange control system. The Italian government participated in all efforts made by the league of nations and other international organizations in favour of freer trade, a policy which had the wholehearted support of her delegates, but all was in vain. The doctrines of exasperated "nationalism," economic "self-sufficiency" and manipulated currencies prevailed, and Italy had no choice but to resort to similar measures in self-defence. But if the doctrine of economic "self-sufficiency" is to prevail, and if the settlement of international accounts by goods and services is ruled out, then the possession of adequate national resources is a question of life or death for a nation.

I should also like to cite this passage from the Nazi Primer at page 246:

Germany would in its present strained condition gladly and willingly buy from abroad the raw materials which we lack, if a sufficient possibility were given for doing so. Foreign countries, however, demand payment in foreign currency. The only way that we can obtain foreign money is by exporting German goods. In a senseless manner the countries with raw materials shut out German imports, isolate themselves in their great economic enclaves. Our exports have shrunk, therefore, in exactly the ratio that the revival of our country has increased our need for raw materials. For that reason the German economy in industry and handicrafts finds itself in very serious difficulties. If, therefore, German industry is to put all German workers back again, and to raise the production of goods to the point of doing away with German poverty, extraordinary measures are necessary in order to obtain sufficient supplies of raw materials.

That is the attitude of the fascist and nazi governments, and it does seem to me that some move might be made by our government towards improving our trade relationships with these countries. I am told, for example, that there is a shortage of butter fats in Germany and Italy, while we have in storage some thirty to forty million pounds of butter. Could not a deal be made whereby the butter which Germany and Italy so much require could be exchanged for their products? Germany and Italy, in making such a deal, would be doing a good thing for their own countries, and at the same time the stress and strain on our economy would be relieved.

Reference is made in the speech from the throne to youth training. I shall make only a casual reference to that subject. Suffice it to say that in our province youth training has been a most interesting and productive experiment. In its first year of operation some nine thousand young men and women trained in the courses then provided, and some 566 took the courses in Regina. The courses are being continued and extended so that now instruction is given in subjects running all the way from beauty culture to aeroplane mechanics. A few days before I came down here I visited a home where a class was in progress for the training of domestic workers. They are making a splendid success of that undertaking, training girls for useful work in the future. Much has been said, and much may be said, about flaming youth, but that our young people are taking an interest in preparing themselves for the future is evidenced by the attendance at our universities, where more are taking advantage of the educational courses offered than ever before, training themselves for that opportunity which will undoubtedly come with the return of something more nearly approaching normal times.

I notice that in the speech from the throne reference is made to agricultural distress, crop failure in western Canada, and the activities under the prairie farm rehabilitation plan. In that regard I should like to make a passing reference to a statement made by the hon. member for Carleton (Mr. Hyndman) when he was speaking in the debate. By the way, I wonder if the hon. member for Carleton would tell me if Carleton county is in his constituency.

Mr. HYNDMAN: Ottawa is not.

Mr. McNIVEN: If Carleton county is not in the constituency of Carleton I should like to know where it is. Anyway, it is right near here and I understand that Carleton county is represented in the house by the hon. gentleman. I believe the Minister of Finance (Mr. Dunning) lives in Carleton county.

Mr. DUNNING: Yes, and I have a good member, too.

Mr. McNIVEN: I was interested in an article in the Ottawa Journal of. January 24, which shows that Carleton county in eight years has reduced its bonded indebtedness by over one million dollars; that in the year 1938 it paid off $187,000 odd of principal, and also paid in interest charges, $75,775. They propose for the year 1939 paying off $193,000 of principal and $66,000 of interest, or a total of $260,000 odd; and the county has a schedule of payments for each year up to 1944 when their bonded indebtedness will be retired in full.

As I listened to the hon. gentleman the other day, he painted a gloomy picture of the dominion and of conditions in his own constituency, but these figures from his own constituency for the year 1938 prove that the policies of this government have had no detrimental effect but rather a beneficial effect on the constituency which he represents. Carleton county anticipates no detrimental effects for the future because it plans with confidence to make yearly payments of principal and interest up to the year 1944, expecting by that time that Liberal policies will have blossomed forth into full fruition.

The hon. member for Carleton, in his endeavour to establish that there was discord and disunity throughout Canada, referred to the province of Saskatchewan, and said:

> I am not criticizing the government for the money that has been spent in that province—

[Mr. McNiven.]

For that I thank him.

> —but with all the money that was spent, even to win a provincial election, what do we find?

May I assure the hon. gentleman that if he had in mind federal money, there was no federal money spent in the province of Saskatchewan to win an election. What do we find?—he asked, and then proceeded to say:

> They have raised the threat of secession—

And in order to establish that fact he quotes a resolution which reads as follows:

> The United Farmers of Canada, Saskatchewan section, devoted a long debate to the subject at its annual convention and unanimously adopted a resolution instructing its board of directors "to assimilate and prepare authoritative material on the subject of setting up a western autonomous state within the British empire, governed by a single government elected democratically by the people."

Shortly after that resolution was passed, one of the leading newspapers of Saskatchewan, with a province-wide circulation, provided through its columns for a vote on the question of secession and one or two kindred questions. Just to show you, Mr. Speaker, that secession is not an issue at all, is not even being considered in Saskatchewan, approximately only three thousand people made any response at all and gave their views, and of those who did respond about one-half voted in favour of consideration of some such resolution as the hon. member quoted, while the rest were diametrically opposed to anything in the nature of secession. The fact that only three thousand people, out of a population of nearly one million, would pay any attention to the matter at all, is proof positive to me that there is nothing in the way of a threat involving secession from confederation. But seeing that agriculture, the bad crops and the distress in Saskatchewan have been referred to from time to time I thought it might be permissible, even at the risk of criticism for being narrow and parochial to address the rest of my remarks to conditions in that province.

Western Canada contains the finest expanse of good agricultural land to be found anywhere in the world, and the largest block intact, of that description, lies in Saskatchewan. In sixty-two years western Canada has produced 8,900,000,000 bushels of wheat valued at 10,200 million dollars; and in that same period it has exported 6,100 million bushels of wheat valued at 7,200 million dollars. In other words, in sixty-two years western Canada has brought into the country in the way of new wealth a sum equivalent to the entire debt of the whole of the dominion, federally, provincially, municipally and individually.

Mr. SPEAKER: I regret to interrupt the hon. member, but his time has expired.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Go on.

Mr. SPEAKER: With the unanimous consent of the house.

Mr. McNIVEN: From 1918 to 1929 in our province alone we produced 4,150 million dollars of new wealth. For 1926, 1927 and 1928 our agricultural production was valued at $1,200,000,000 and in the year 1928 alone it amounted to nearly $500,000,000. And then the holocaust! From 1930 to 1935, a period of six years, production only totalled $817,000,000. The 1936 crop was reduced to 110,000,000 bushels, the 1937 crop was 37,000,000 bushels, and in 1938 our wheat crop approximated 140,000,000 bushels. These are astronomical figures, but conditions in the last eight years have exacted a terrific toll.

It may be asked, with that production why cannot you take care of yourselves? There are many reasons, prominent among them being the fact that certain laws, supply and demand and the currency question, have not been allowed to work out as they should have done; and western agriculture has been the sufferer in every instance. Let me go back to the year 1917. In that year wheat sold at $3.05 a bushel on the Winnipeg grain exchange. The exchange was closed and a fixed price of $2.18 was made payable for the crops of 1916, 1917 and 1918, and that at a time when the United States farmer was selling his wheat at a price as high as $4.50 a bushel. The western farmer did not complain, but if you wish to ascertain the western farmers' contribution to the winning of the war, just multiply the production of each one of the prairie provinces by at least $1.50 or possibly $2 a bushel and you will get it. You will then know what the western farmers' contribution was to the winning of the war.

Wheat was the only commodity over which the government of the day took control, and notwithstanding that fixed price, the farmer had to pay war prices for everything he had to buy. During the deflationary period of 1930, 1931 and 1932 the Canadian dollar was tied to the United States dollar. I fully appreciate why that was done, but at the same time export commodities, principally wheat, had to meet competition with countries that had depreciated currencies, namely, the Argentine and Australia. At a time when the British pound was quoted at $3.70 it simply meant that the western agriculturist received less in terms of Canadian dollars than he would have got had the Canadian dollar been tied to the British pound. The hope of the western farmer lies in providing against wide fluctuations in price such as from $3 a bushel down to 38 cents, which was the prevailing price in 1932.

May I make one reference to the value of western farm lands as a matter of defence. Two years ago I heard Sir George Paish, one of the leading economists of the British empire, say that the war could not have been won, or in other words that the war would have been lost, had it not been for the bountiful crops of western Canada in 1915 and 1916 and the ability of the British government to transport those crops overseas. The most effective contribution that Canada can make to the defence of the empire and of our own country itself is in maintaining the wheat lands of western Canada and maintaining the population there on a reasonable standard of living.

Mr. A. J. BROOKS (Royal): May I at the outset congratulate the hon. member for Regina City (Mr. McNiven), who has just made an excellent speech. It did seem to me, though, that it was a shame that so much of his time should have been taken up in explaining the rather questionable activities of one of his colleagues in Regina. It might be said of him, as has been said of others on other occasions, that he is blessed with one of the best friends a man was ever cursed with. Unfortunately, the "McDaniels" are not all located in western Canada or in Regina. I fear there are many in other parts of Canada and, if I may say so, the unjust patronage which is rampant in certain sections of the dominion is one of the greatest enemies of our democracy.

I take this opportunity to congratulate the mover (Mr. Matthews) and the seconder (Mr. Chevrier) of the address in reply to the speech from the throne upon the excellence of their speeches. I fancy they are becoming weary of congratulations; nevertheless the congratulations have been well deserved.

I was particularly interested in the remark of the hon. member for Regina City (Mr. McNiven) with reference to the mover of the address in that he was a maritime province man. It has often occurred to me, as it must have to others throughout this dominion, to wonder just what other parts of Canada would have done had the maritime provinces not supplied them with their leading men in various activities of life.

I wish to congratulate the new Postmaster General (Mr. McLarty) upon his appointment to that very important office. It is a well deserved tribute to his ability, and I am satisfied that in the short time he will hold that office he will do credit to it. I also wish to congratulate the hon. member for Edmonton West (Mr. MacKinnon) upon his promotion. While he is not a maritimer I believe he did the next best thing; he went to the maritime provinces and took one of our fair daughters as his wife. I have no doubt that the inspiration which he received and the success which he has attained are due to the good advice he received from that source.

In my province of New Brunswick we have been thrilled, as the people all over Canada have been, by the prospective visit of Their Majesties the King and Queen. I am sure their visit to our dominion is an expression of their love of and loyalty to the people of this country, just as the great welcome they will receive will be an expression of the love and loyalty of the people of Canada for them. In my own constituency of Royal we expect to have the pleasure of a rather more extended visit than some other constituencies in Canada are to enjoy. King's county, in which I reside, is one of the few counties in which their majesties are to take a motor trip. Driving from Moncton to Sussex they will see the beautiful Kennebecasis valley, and on their trip from Fredericton to Saint John they will have the pleasure of seeing the beautiful Saint John river.

The speech from the throne made reference to the formal visit of the President of the United States to the Dominion of Canada. We in New Brunswick had many visits from Mr. Roosevelt before he became president. He spent many of his boyhood days on the beautiful little island of Campobello in the bay of Fundy, and doubtless the good feeling he entertains for this country and for the people of the British empire was more or less inspired by his contact with that part of Canada.

There is a criticism I should like to make with reference to visits of distinguished guests to our country, and it is this: that on too many occasions they are led to believe that Canada begins at Montreal and ends on the Pacific coast. Only last year a number of such visits were organized, supposed to be to eastern Canada. One party consisting of 200 Scottish school boys came out to see the eastern part of this country; their itinerary embraced Quebec, Montreal, the Laurentian mountains, Ottawa, Hamilton, Niagara Falls, London, Port Stanley, Toronto and Kingston, but did not include the maritime provinces. Another party of 200 under the auspices of the Overseas League—this by the way was the largest party organized by the Overseas League in the United Kingdom for travel in Canada, and represented one of the most important steps in furthering the chief aim of the league, namely, the cementing of friendly relations between the different parts of the British commonwealth of nations by the actual exchange of visits—this party visited Quebec, Montreal, Ottawa, Toronto and Niagara Falls, and returned to Great Britain, although the tour also purported to cover the eastern provinces. A similar thing happened to the British parliamentarians who visited Canada recently; they commenced their visit at Quebec and ended it at Vancouver and Victoria. This is unfair to the three eastern provinces, and I hope that those who are responsible for such visits will see that this neglect is not continued.

The speech from the throne refers to the very important matter of defence. I am sure that all citizens of Canada to-day realize that defence is one of our most urgent necessities, and one of the biggest problems facing us. With world conditions what they are and have been for the past number of years, with nations seeming to be preparing to spring at one another's throats, and with conditions such as they have been in Ethiopia and Spain and China, it almost looks as if this old world were slithering back to the Middle Ages. If an emergency comes it will come quickly, so we must be prepared. I commend the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Mackenzie) for the preparations he is making; I can only say that they are belated and not as extensive as they should be. In this morning's paper we see that a sum of $63,500,000 is to be provided for the defence of Canada, to be expended over a period of years. In the newspapers a short time ago we noticed that the Commonwealth of Australia also realizes that she must defend her territory against possible invasion. That dominion with only seven million people has voted some $250,000,000 to be expended over a period of three years. Australia is spending for defence something over $11 per person, while in our present estimate we are proposing to expend $5 per person.

I feel that we in eastern Canada have again been neglected as far as defence is concerned. The ports of Saint John and Halifax are without any adequate defence. We are told that the aeroplane is a great arm of defence. Other authorities tell us that the aeroplane is not the proper weapon for defence of cities and ports. Be that as it may, I am satisfied that at these two ports on the eastern coast we must have more anti-aircraft guns, more artillery and coast defence. These I believe, as the minister told me last year, will take something like three years to provide.

As a maritimer I feel that we have another quarrel with the Minister of National Defence. I notice in this morning's paper that

$1,800,000 is appropriated for Royal Canadian Air Force works in Nova Scotia. Last year I complained, and I complain again, that no appropriation has been made for military air fields in New Brunswick. We consider the port of Saint John just as necessary to the commercial life of this country, and of the maritime provinces in particular, as the port of Halifax; and it seems singular that there should be $1,800,000 spent in Nova Scotia, and five military air fields established in that province, and not one in New Brunswick. This item says:

> More than $1,800,000 will be appropriated for the R.C.A.F. works in Nova Scotia. These embrace $919,000 for four hangars and other works at Dartmouth; $170,000 for runways at Yarmouth; $570,000 for runways at Sydney and $258,000 for magazines, quarters and runways at Truro.

If we are to defend the port of Saint John by air I claim there should be a military air field in the vicinity of that city. I also wish to give my approval to the formation of the defence purchasing board. It rather looks as if this is the direct result of the Davis report, and I would say it is all to the good for both Canada and the department. There is no member of this house, and I am sure there is no right thinking person in Canada, who does not feel that as far as profits are concerned there should be none from the various activities necessary to equip the militia of this country. I hope the activities of this board will be extended to include all the operations of the defence department, including both the permanent and the non-permanent militia.

Last year I called to the attention of the minister a matter which he admitted was a mess as far as his department was concerned. That was in connection with the building of the Venture by the Meteghan Shipbuilding Company in Nova Scotia, and I believe that matter has not been settled yet. The man who obtained that contract never would have been considered, I am sure, if there had been a board of this kind. In the first place the contractor was not capable of handling such a contract, and it is common knowledge that his men have not been paid, that the selection of the men for the work reeked with patronage and that labour was being exploited. Finally the Minister of Labour had to have an investigation into the activities of this company.

Now I come to a matter which is of very great importance to Saint John, the port of my own province, and also to Halifax. According to reports appearing in the newspapers of that part of the country, people are not satisfied with the explanation given by the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) here a few days ago. He quoted figures to show that there had been more wheat shipped from Canada in the five years prior to 1932 than in the five years following 1932. He did not say to what ports he was referring, nor did he give what is perhaps the chief explanation, that there was less wheat produced in Canada in the latter five years. According to my information, during the five years prior to 1932 we produced 2,056,244,000 bushels of wheat, while during the five years from 1932 to 1937 we produced only 1,241,304,000 bushels, or not much more than half as much. So it would not be logical to argue that during the five years in which we produced over two billion bushels of wheat there should not be more exported than during the period when we produced only a little over a billion bushels.

The minister also quoted from a report appearing in the Telegraph-Journal of January 10, under the heading, Grain Shipments Key to Port Problem, Workers Maintain. He was answering, as it were, the contention made by the heads of the longshoremen's association in Saint John. The president of that association is Leicester Wearing and the secretary is James Steen. These men are thoroughly informed in regard to everything concerning the port of Saint John, the shipping of grain and other commodities, rates and charges, and, in fact, all matters pertaining to the port. In an open letter regarding conditions in Saint John they have this to say:

> That we are of the opinion that when the Anglo-American trade pact was signed, Canada was sadly neglected. The fact that British millers, within a week after pact was signed, placed an order for half a million tons of wheat with American shippers, coupled with the knowledge that in the last few days steamers have left our port to go to Baltimore to load grain, is sufficient proof for the members we represent to make this statement.

They also go on to say that the day the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Euler) made the statement that the Anglo-American trade pact was one of the greatest achievements of the Canadian year, grain shipments through Saint John to steamers amounted to 874,473 bushels as against 5,024,716 bushels on the same day the previous year; while on track and in elevator there were 337,437 bushels as compared with 2,418,763 on the same day in the previous year. Speaking of trade going to the American ports they say:

> We do not expect the trade conditions in this port to show much improvement in the near future; steamers are leaving here with only part cargoes, some calling at American ports to complete loading. . . .

During December the steamer Brant County came to Saint John, discharged a few hundred tons of freight and went to Baltimore to load a full cargo of grain.

The S.S. Cape Lena came here with 160,000 bushels of wheat loaded at Baltimore.

There is talk of the S.S. Melmore Head, now in port, discharging coal, going to Baltimore for grain.

That was on January 10. Since then there have been many more instances of the ports of Saint John and Halifax being neglected, in connection with grain shipments, in favour of United States ports. Here is a dispatch from Boston, under date of January 19:

First Canadian wheat to move through the port of Boston to British markets in more than two years, a shipment of 24,000 bushels will be placed in the steamship Newfoundland Saturday for delivery at Liverpool.

I could go on and read a great many similar statements, but it is not my intention to do so. In the mail this afternoon, just before I came into this house, I received a letter from the secretary of the longshoremen's union of Saint John. Among other things he says:

. . . never in the experience of the writer (nineteen years at this work) has work been so poor as this year has proven to be; and it was forecast on December 8, when this local took this matter, along with other points in dispute, up with Hon. Mr. Howe. . . .

Let me assure you that conditions here are terrible in so far as port business is concerned, and our members are not earning sufficient to keep their families while in previous years, at this time, they would be quite comfortable.

Irregardless of what Messrs. Howe, Euler, Michaud and Gardiner state in their remarks during sessions, the fact that steamers are coming here, discharging a few hundred tons of cargo and sailing to American ports to pick up Canadian grain, is convincing enough proof that there is some advantage over our port held by United States ports, and we are of the opinion that the preference abolishment, coupled with bonuses to American wheat exporters by U.S. government and railroad freight charges and elevation charges reduced, are the causes.

Then, too, in the Telegraph-Journal of yesterday, which I received just before coming into the chamber, there is a splendid editorial headed, Grain Elevation Charges. In this editorial it is stated that the one-cent charge per bushel in the elevators of Halifax and Saint John as against the half-cent charge in United States ports is having a very bad effect on the shipment of grain through those two ports. May I be pardoned to the extent of reading a part of the editorial as follows:

Steps should be taken to see that Canadian ports do not suffer as a result of competition from ports outside the dominion boundaries. If Canada is to gain the full benefits possible from the grain trade, which is heavily subsidized with federal funds to which all parts of Canada contribute, then no circumstance should be disregarded which will guide the flow of that trade over Canadian transportation systems and through Canadian ports. The case presented to Ottawa by the Saint John Board of Trade should have the weight of Canadian public opinion behind it, and it should receive from the Ottawa authorities the attention which its national importance demands.

Saint John suffers also from discrimination as compared with Halifax in the matter of elevator storage charges on grain, which are assessed here but not collected in Halifax. This is another matter to which the National Harbours Board should give attention to put all national ports on the same basis.

I believe the hon. member for St. John-Albert (Mr. McAvity), speaking last night, called the government's attention to that matter. Again, in yesterday's issue of the Moncton Times—

Mr. HOWE: On a point of order, I would ask the chair if it is in order to read editorials from newspapers.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER: On the point of order raised by the Minister of Transport (Mr. Howe) may I point out that usually very wide latitude is given in the debate on the address in reply. I believe hon. members who have preceded the hon. member who has the floor have been permitted to read editorials.

Mr. SPENCE: Everybody has.

Mr. ROWE (Dufferin-Simcoe): Every day.

Mr. BROOKS: They not only read editorials; they read their whole speeches.

Mr. HOWE: But occasionally put in a little of their own material, though.

Mr. BROOKS: That is exactly what we are doing. The article is as follows:

Conditions at Halifax port described as far from satisfactory.

High elevator tolls divert traffic to United States.

Alarm expressed by retiring president over proposed cancellation of three per cent excise tax on goods shipped through United States ports as against direct to Canada.

Mr. ISNOR: What paper is that?

Mr. BROOKS: The Moncton Times. It is not my intention further to discuss the matter of the ports of Saint John and Halifax. The condition in which the labouring men find themselves in those ports this year is generally known.

When the Canada-United States treaty was first talked about the maritime provinces were led to believe, and possibly in some parts still believe, that they will derive great benefits from the reduction of duty on fish. The condition of the fishermen of Nova Scotia, as well as of those in other parts of the maritime provinces, has been very bad. For a number of years succeeding politicians have held out promises to them for a betterment of their condition. In 1935 they were told that so far as the export of fish to the United States was concerned, reductions would be made in duty. All hon. members know there was very little if any benefit so far as those reductions were concerned.

Then again, when the Anglo-United States-Canadian trade arrangements were talked about, the fishermen of maritime provinces were led to believe that great benefits would be achieved by reductions in duties. A few days ago I listened in vain to the speech of the hon. member for Queens-Lunenburg (Mr. Kinley) for any indication from him of any great benefits that were to accrue to the fishermen of his province, or to any other part of the maritime provinces. He did say that the fishermen were receiving bonuses which were helping them to live. He did say that when they reached old age they would receive old age pensions. Surely this is a poor commentary on one of the great industries of Canada.

Not so long ago I read a speech delivered by the Hon. Joseph Howe, the great Nova Scotian and Canadian, also a great Britisher. In that speech he foretold great things for his native province. He spoke about the fishing industry, and said the day would come when the fishing industry of the maritime provinces would be one of the great industries of Canada. He spoke, too, of the prosperity of the men who go down to the sea in ships. He said the day would come when the maritime provinces would have over a half million men obtaining a living from the fisheries and the coastal trade. He said, too, that before the turn of the century the population of his native province of Nova Scotia would exceed a million people. All hon. members know how those prophecies have turned out.

Mr. KINLEY: He was against confederation, too.

Mr. BROOKS: He was against confederation for a time, I believe. I come from an inland constituency and will confess that I have very little knowledge gained from practical experience in the fishing industry. For that reason I was interested in an article in the Commercial News, the organ of the Halifax board of trade, in which the following was stated:

> The looked-for reductions in duties by the export fish trade in connection with the Canada-United States treaty have not materialized.

It goes on to say that the salt fish industry will obtain less benefit from the treaty as it now reads than it would appear at first glance.

While the reductions are quite substantial, it must be remembered that Newfoundland receives the same treatment under the agreement. The maritime salt fish merchants hoped and expected an equalization in the rate of duty, both over and under 33 per cent moisture content, which would put them in a better competitive position with Newfoundland in the important Puerto Rico market.

The industry was also keenly disappointed in the failure to secure a reduction in the duty on salt mackerel—apparently Norway is the major supplier of this article, and the United States will only grant reductions on articles to the country which is the main supplier.

Then, again, The Maritime Merchant gives the opinion of Mr. F. Homer Zwicker, secretary-treasurer of a well known Lunenburg fish firm. He says that at first the people seemed to be well pleased, but that now they are highly displeased with the provisions in the treaty respecting fish.

If I understood the hon. member for Queens-Lunenburg rightly the other day he said that the Minister of National Revenue was to be congratulated upon his courage in foregoing certain rights for apples, in Nova Scotia, in preference to fish. I looked in Hansard afterwards and I found that statement was not there. I may say I took the hon. member's words down when he was speaking, but I did not find them in Hansard later on.

Mr. KINLEY: Mr. Speaker, what inference is the hon. member making?

Mr. BROOKS: Well, I am not making any inference. I simply say that I took the statement down while the hon. member was speaking, and when I looked in Hansard later it was not there.

Mr. MacNICOL: Probably it was struck out.

Mr. KINLEY: The hon. member took it down improperly, then, or incorrectly.

Mr. BROOKS: I was fairly close to the hon. member for Queens-Lunenburg, and my hearing is pretty good.

Mr. KINLEY: What I said is there.

Mr. BROOKS: It is a well known fact that the apple growers have not been particularly pleased as far as their market in the United Kingdom is concerned. Practically one hundred per cent of their export apples have been shipped to that market. What the effect of the present treaty will be, we will have to wait to see. However, one thing is certain: there will be a reduction of two shillings per barrel in the price received by the apple producers.

Mr. SPENCE: Two and three pence.

Mr. BROOKS: Two and three pence.

The hon. member for St. John-Albert referred last night to the great benefits that were accruing to the port of Saint John because of the West Indies treaty. I am not sure that his views are shared by people in other parts of the maritimes. I see the hon. member for Halifax (Mr. Isnor) smiling. There is no doubt that the ships coming into Saint John every two weeks loaded with bananas from the West Indies do create some work for the people of Saint John. In that respect I think it has been of great benefit and is appreciated. We hope that these benefits will continue. But the British West Indies treaty which was negotiated by the Liberal government in 1925 has not been beneficial to the maritime provinces. In fact the results have been just the reverse. I am sure there are hon. members who will agree with me when I say that the loss of our salt fish market in the West Indies has been due to that treaty. We also lost our great Cuban market for potatoes. To further their own ends politicians in the maritime provinces have tried to make out that this treaty was not responsible for those results. I should like to quote the opinion of Mr. O. F. Mackenzie, a fisheries expert who was engaged last year by the federal government to investigate southern fisheries markets. Speaking before the rotary club in Halifax a short time ago, he said:

> The claim has been repeatedly made that the dump duties were responsible for the loss of our Cuban markets for codfish and potatoes. No one knows better than the gentlemen doing the talking that dumping duties had nothing to do with the loss of this trade.

As I say, it has been claimed for years by certain politicians in the maritime provinces that the dump duties brought about these results.

Mr. KINLEY: What do you say?

Mr. BROOKS: I say that the dump duties, were not the cause of it.

Mr. EULER: The result or the cause, which?

Mr. BROOKS: The loss of that market was brought about by the British West Indies treaty. That is the opinion of Mr. Mackenzie who was employed last year by this government. Speaking a few days ago the right hon. Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) said in effect that the people of Canada were blessed by the results of the 1935 treaty. I wonder what would be the present condition of our people if that treaty had not been negotiated? Let us consider some of the products of our provinces. Take lumber, for instance. How much lumber, over and above the ordinary shipments, has been shipped to the United States since that treaty came into force? Lumbermen will tell you that that treaty was of no benefit as far as their product was concerned. In 1936 we shipped 111,780,000 feet of lumber to the British market, and 148,522,000 in 1937. In 1936 we shipped 56,134,000 feet to the United States and 53,757,000 in 1937. The hon. member for St. John-Albert spoke of having seen ships at Saint John loading lumber. I should like to know to what destination that lumber was being shipped. I know it was not being loaded for the United States. Those shipments were not brought about because of the treaty negotiated in 1935 by his government. Those shipments were brought about because of the operations of the 1932 treaty negotiated by the Bennett government of that day.

Let me consider apples for a moment. I wonder what the present position with regard to apples would be if the treaty of 1935, which the Prime Minister says was of great benefit to this country, had not been negotiated. In 1936 Nova Scotia shipped 929,348 barrels of apples to the British empire market, and in 1937 the shipments totalled 1,089,655 barrels. Shipments from Nova Scotia to the United States in 1936 totalled 60 barrels, and the 1937 shipments consisted of 72 barrels. The province of New Brunswick shipped 48,523 barrels in 1936 to British empire markets, and the 1937 shipments totalled 25,744 barrels. The shipments to the United States amounted to 38 barrels in 1936 and 33 barrels in 1937. Where was the great benefit to the apple growers under that 1935 agreement?

What about milk? No milk was shipped from the maritime provinces. What about bacon? England has been the great market for bacon, as it has been for many other products of Canada. My time will not permit me to go further into this matter, but I simply want to say that as far as the primary producers of the maritime provinces are concerned, the statement made by the Prime Minister is not borne out by the facts.

The question of unemployment has been discussed extensively in this house. I do not intend to criticize or commend in detail the methods adopted by this government and by the Minister of Labour (Mr. Rogers) in particular to stamp out unemployment. I believe it is generally known throughout this country that unemployment is still rife. As far as New Brunswick is concerned I believe there is more unemployment to-day than there has been for a number of years.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER: I regret to have to inform the hon. member that he has exhausted his time.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Go on.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER: The hon. member may continue with the unanimous consent of the house.

Mr. BROOKS: There has been much less lumbering in my own county. I have seen men come in there from Prince Edward Island, Nova Scotia and the northern part of New Brunswick looking for work in the woods; they walked long distances into the woods only to be told that there was nothing for them to do. I think it is generally realized that in New Brunswick conditions were never worse than they are at the present time. It was with considerable interest that I read a recent article by the Right Hon. Margaret Bondfield, a former minister of labour in the British government. She made a visit to Canada and the United States to study labour conditions, and speaking with reference to the youth in the United States she said:

> Young men are made to feel that their country is looking after them.

Referring to Canada she had this to say:

> It appears that no one takes the slightest responsibility for the Canadian youth once he is unemployed.

That is a terrible indictment of this government. It is a terrible indictment of our country.

In closing I have just a word or two to say about economic appeasement. I wonder why in a democratic country there should be talk of the necessity of economic appeasement in order to defend democratic institutions. What are the great democratic countries of the world? They are France, England and the United States. Is it not logical and reasonable to expect that these three nations should stand together both for their own defence and for the defence of democracy? We in Canada are very proud of France and England. During the great war these two nations fought shoulder to shoulder, and I believe they were fighting the battles of democracy. They are still standing shoulder to shoulder, but it is just as much in the interests of the United States that democracy should survive in this world as it is in the interests of the British empire or in the interests of France. Why then should we talk of economic appeasement?

The Prime Minister prates of health and peace and sweet content being the rightful heritage of all. Why should the longshoreman and the workingman in the city of Saint John, for example, be sacrificed for the economic appeasement of the longshoreman and workingman in Baltimore or some other port of the United States? Why should the primary producers and our workers in the factories of this country be sacrificed for the economic appeasement of workers elsewhere? I do not believe that the American people require it; I do not believe they want it. I believe they are willing and anxious to stand shoulder to shoulder with the British empire and France in the defence of that democracy which we all love. In this recent treaty I fear that Canada has again paid too high a price, and that the treaty is out of balance, as far as lasting benefits to Canada are concerned.

Mr. C. G. MacNEIL (Vancouver North): Mr. Speaker, other members of this group have given adequate reasons for supporting the subamendment moved by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Woodsworth), and I associate myself heartily with their views. But at this time I intend to confine my attention to those references in the speech from the throne which deal with national defence and the proposed defence purchasing board. I am aware that these matters will be discussed in more detail later; nevertheless, in view of certain recent disquieting disclosures, I believe the government should at the earliest possible date give more adequate assurances that conditions repugnant to the public interest will be rectified.

In the forecast of the legislative program set forth in the speech from the throne, priority is given to the proposal to increase substantially appropriations for national defence and for the establishment of a defence purchasing board. At this stage I shall not attempt to discuss whether such increased appropriations are justified, but I express the hope that the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Mackenzie) will take the house fully into his confidence as to the policies to be pursued and as to the manner in which these huge sums will be applied. It is important that the government, before embarking on such policies, should give more definite assurances than have heretofore been given that Canada will receive full value in defence measures for every dollar spent on defence. Increased defence appropriations will place additional burdens on the Canadian taxpayer and will demand of the Canadian people further sacrifices. Clearly we have reached the point where increased expenditure for this purpose will retard the promotion and development of necessary social services. Before launching a still greater spending program to provide armaments for Canada, this country has a right to expect the closest and most rigorous scrutiny of the spending methods of those to whom the administration of these vast sums is entrusted. The competency of these men is now a matter of grave doubt.

The minister has stated publicly on more than one occasion that because of the limitations of the appropriations made by parliament he could not make satisfactory progress in providing for the defence of Canada. It is now evident that something more than huge appropriations are needed to guarantee us defence against external dangers. In the period between 1918 and 1937 something in the vicinity of three hundred million dollars was expended in defence. Yet the minister in 1937 rose in his place and said that defence had been so neglected that Canada was without any means of defence. Apparently the trifling sum of approximately three hundred million dollars entrusted to the general staff had gone with the wind.

In the last two years an additional seventy million dollars has been made available to the defence department. Apparently with regard to coastal defence the results achieved have been negligible. No one can understand where the money has gone. The sums voted by parliament in the last three years, approximately ninety million dollars, should have made evident some effective measures of coastal defence. Must we conclude that the clue to the mystery is to be found in the recent judicial inquiry into the Bren machine gun contract? One contract out of many was submitted to a searching inquiry, and the most amazing circumstances have been disclosed. We knew that the Department of National Defence was becoming one of the biggest spending departments of the government. We now have good cause to regard it as the most wasteful and inefficient. We have good cause to ask if the additional millions requested from parliament are actually for the defence of Canada or for the defence of the profits of the privileged ring of armament manufacturers. We now discover that department officials have shown the most arrogant disregard of policies enunciated in parliament and accepted by parliament in good faith. It now rests with parliament to determine whether there has been a gross betrayal of public trust.

During the last session members of this group endeavoured to obtain from the Minister of National Defence more definite information regarding the conditions under which the Bren machine gun contract had been negotiated and executed. We got from the minister in this regard little more than the most eloquent assurance that it was the best of all possible contracts for the Dominion of Canada. It is a matter of regret that the minister did not discuss the matter with greater frankness and that it required a judicial inquiry to unearth facts which should have been in the possession of the house when the matter was under consideration. The minister can no longer boast that it is one of the finest contracts ever made on behalf of Canada. I venture to predict that it will prove to be one of the most humiliating episodes in his public career.

It was claimed in press releases at the time the commissioner's report was tabled that the department had received complete exoneration. Nothing could be further from the truth. No one was exonerated except in the matter of personal graft and corruption, which was never in question. The very fact that the commissioner found it necessary to recommend an entirely new method of awarding contracts of this kind is by implication a condemnation of the method followed in this instance. If it had been shown that the method of placing government contracts followed in this instance had been entirely satisfactory, the commissioner would have said so. Instead he recommends a drastic change in the whole system. The government now finds it necessary to act on this recommendation. The methods which we questioned last year, and which were then defended by the government, must now be discarded because the public interests were then inadequately safeguarded. The condemnation of departmental administration is indirect, nevertheless so plain that he who runs may read.

In an editorial the Winnipeg Tribune aptly said that the commission might be described as having done a very neat job of washing its hands and holding its nose alternately. It also said that Mr. Justice Davis had parked that squawling brat, the Bren gun contract, right back on the dominion government's doorstep where it belongs. That exactly describes the situation in language which is easily understood. The commissioner places on record certain facts with regard to which he reports there was no dispute. He states:

> It will be for those charged with the responsibility of dealing with the facts, i.e., the government and parliament, to examine and study them and to take such action, if any, as they may see fit.

Further than this, the commissioner places certain issues squarely before parliament. Parliament is asked to judge on the facts in evidence, as to—

(1) Whether Bren guns should be produced by the government in publicly-owned factories or through private manufacture (page 10 of the report).

(2) Whether the conduct of the individuals concerned was above question (page 35).

(3) Whether adequate reasons existed for the failure of the interdepartmental committee to report back to the government when the system of supervision of contracts broke down (page 41).

(4) Whether the procedure followed in negotiating this contract protected the public interest (page 49).

(5) Whether proper steps were taken to ensure proper discharge of the responsibility assumed in the selection of a favoured contractor (page 50).

I contend that these issues should be dealt with by parliament before we approve further appropriations to be administered by those whose administrative competency is now a matter of grave doubt.

From time to time the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) and the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Mackenzie) have given assurances in this chamber as to the policies that would be pursued in placing armament contracts. I submit that the facts disclosed in the commissioner's report indicate that in many important respects no attempt was made to give effect to these policies in administration. As a matter of fact, it is shown by the evidence that the intentions of the government as declared in the house and accepted in good faith were evaded and even thwarted by those responsible for the negotiations leading up to the execution of this contract. This administration is on record as favouring the principle of public ownership as applied to the manufacture of armaments, particularly during peace time. When on the witness stand, the Minister of National Defence was most emphatic in his declaration on this point. The evidence shows that senior officers with responsible positions on the defence council had advocated the establishment by the government of a plant capable of meeting the requirements of the Canadian forces in respect to the Bren gun. These officers pointed to the unsatisfactory results which had followed the placement of similar orders in privately-owned factories in other dominions. The minutes of the defence council as recorded in the evidence make it quite clear that in 1936 there was a considerable weight of technical opinion on the side of public ownership. The original agreement between the British government and the patentee stipulated that manufacture in the dominions should be in a factory operated by the government in question. Even while Major Hahn was in England negotiating for his contract, the chief of general staff argued in a memorandum made in October, 1936, for the establishment of a government-operated rifle and gun plant. If manufacturing in government plants was ever seriously contemplated, why was a favoured contractor commissioned to secure secret information in England for his own purposes when at that time an officer of the Department of National Defence had the necessary technical information?

The reason given by the minister, when on the stand, for his non-adherence to the principle of public ownership was the limitations of appropriations made by parliament. He described these appropriations as meagre and stated that it was impossible even to make a start towards the establishment of government-operated plants. When the Bren gun was under consideration, he stated that he had been provided with an estimate showing that from $30,000,000 to $35,000,000 would be required to proceed with such a scheme. Actually, when this estimate was mentioned in the minutes of the defence council, it referred to the creation of a complete group of government manufacturing establishments on a scale that would meet all the requirements of the Canadian forces.

The commissioner was in doubt upon this point, for at page 11 of the report he says:

> But the testimony given before the commission established that only 60,000 square feet of space was necessary for the purpose of production of the 7,000 Bren guns for Canada as well as 5,000 guns for the War Office and that an entirely new building (apart from land) would cost approximately $120,000. In proposal "B" of Major Hahn (Exhibit 11) of December 29, 1936, the building was shown at an estimated cost of $104,196.40.

This testimony should be considered in conjunction with the terms of the contract which placed government equipment at Valcartier and Quebec at the disposal of the John Inglis Company and made provision for a substantial reimbursement on the purchase of additional equipment required. No real attempt was made to explore the possibilities of public manufacture. It does not require an expert accountant to show that a government-owned plant might have been established, as originally stipulated by the British government, at a cost within the bounds of the appropriations made by parliament.

Furthermore, apparently no attempt was made to examine the possibilities of manufacture in plants already under government control. It was reported to the house last session that a complete survey had been made of such plants, and we know there are such plants capable of expansion, where machine tolerances are quite as close as required in the manufacture of Bren guns.

In view of these facts and other disclosures made, this house should receive a more satisfactory explanation than any yet given as to the reasons which prompted the minister to abandon so readily his professed adherence to the principle of public ownership in the manufacture of armaments for this country.

Another point on which there was a deviation from publicly declared policy was with respect to the practice of accepting competitive bids when the policy of private manufacture was decided upon. The minister affirmed that this was the next alternative to that of public manufacture. The Prime Minister stated in the house; I quote from page 11 of the report:

> At the present time, in a time of peace, the government is proceeding on the theory of permitting competition with reasonable remuneration, the work to be subject to inspection and audit.

The commissioner summarizes the minister's evidence as follows; I quote from page 11:

> The Minister of National Defence said in his evidence before the commission that that statement was in agreement with his own view. The minister said that there had been no change in the actual policy of the government, or of himself; that government ownership is the best and that the next is competition. His qualification as to public ownership was, "provided you will give us the finances," and his qualification as to the general principle of competition was, "where competition is possible."

According to the evidence a determined effort was made to eliminate all other manufacturers from the opportunity specially created for the manufacture of this gun by a favoured contractor. Major Hahn's previous experience was gained principally as a business executive engaged in the manufacture, or rather, the assembling and distributing of radios and washing machines. No other companies in Canada, and there are many with technical experience in working with precision steel, were allowed to participate. They were not even given an inkling that the department was prepared to consider private manufacture. The minister simply states that they were not considered because they did not ask for business. Major Hahn approached the department because, as he states, he discovered in his plans to reorganize the defunct John Inglis Company that the plant had manufactured shells some years previously. He was introduced to the department under the most favourable political auspices. The intentions and plans of the department with regard to the Bren gun were disclosed to him, but held as a closely guarded secret from all other manufacturers. He was allowed to examine the gun in the department and almost immediately secured consent to have the gun shipped to Toronto for a more detailed examination and photographs. At this time the department had an officer in Canada who was familiar with the processes of manufacture developed for the Bren gun in England. There was no obstacle in the way of consultation with reliable and established firms in Canada.

A little later Major Hahn went to England in company with the hon. member for Trinity (Mr. Plaxton). After a whirlwind exchange of cablegrams of the most amazing nature, Major Hahn was given the status of representative of the Canadian government. He was given this status by the action of the department and with the knowledge of the minister and the Department of External Affairs, even though it was known at the time that he intended to negotiate contracts on his own behalf. By this action he was given a privileged status in England, a status which could not be obtained by any other manufacturer. No stone was left unturned to place him in a preferred position above all others. No attempt was made to discover whether these guns could be manufactured in any other plant in Canada. After these arrangements had been made and the element of competition was completely eliminated, the minister wrote to the Prime Minister asking what the policy should be with regard to the manufacture of these guns in privately-owned plants.

Later we find that Major Hahn was associated with the deputy minister in negotiating for permission from the British government and from the patentee to manufacture these guns in privately-owned plants in Canada. It was a perfect set-up for Major Hahn. Not at any point was any willingness shown to permit competition. So anxious was the department to eliminate all competition in favour of Hahn that little consideration was given to the advantages that might have been gained by ordering preliminary requirements through the British government. In response to an inquiry from the master-general of ordnance, the following cablegram was received from Canada House on November 17, 1936:

> War Office state the arrangements now in progress for manufacturing Bren guns in this country on large scale and while definite dates of delivery cannot yet be quoted small numbers for training purposes might be supplied in 1938 with bulk of supplies in subsequent year. Estimated cost per gun including tripods and spares will be in the neighbourhood of £100 but this figure not regarded as firm price.

This dealt, of course, with an estimated order of 2,000 guns. In commenting on this information when received, the deputy minister said in a memorandum extended in the evidence that this materially altered the situation, but "notwithstanding the above, the department should not lose all interest in Major Hahn."

When it was shown in evidence that there had been no thought of competition, the minister insisted that he had followed exactly the British practice in selecting a contractor. It is widely known that the British practice involves a careful prior investigation of the facilities at the disposal of the contractor, and his financial stability. No such investigation was made before the department was committed on October 20, 1936, to negotiations with Major Hahn and the group which he represented. Had such investigation been made, it would have been found that he had no facilities for the manufacture of Bren guns, and that his company was only in the promotion stage. The British practice involves a selection from among all those manufacturers who might be considered to be in that particular field. In this instance the selection was narrowed down to Major Hahn and his group, to that company alone. It was never a selection in the sense in which the term is employed in the United Kingdom. It was a gilt-edged guarantee of assured profits for one favoured contractor, chosen for reasons quite other than the usual businesslike considerations. In the light of the evidence, the house should hear from the minister the reasons why he did not call for competitive bids. Certainly it could not have been the desire to preserve secrecy with regard to manufacturing processes. These secrets were made known to an individual who was not an officer directly under military discipline. It is difficult to believe that the heads of other established firms were less reliable or patriotic than Major Hahn. It could not have been the need for haste; for by reason of the determined effort to protect Major Hahn, deliveries will be delayed. Canadian requirements were stated in July, 1936. The contract was signed in March, 1938. The plant of the resurrected John Inglis Company did not commence operation until April, 1938. We may get delivery of some guns in 1940, four years after the requirements were stated. Why then were the recommendations of the interdepartmental committee in regard to competitive bids side-tracked?

On various occasions the house has been assured that the government would not assume any direct responsibility in negotiating contracts with the British government for private firms in Canada. The policy of the government is laid down clearly in a letter of the Prime Minister which was placed in evidence. On August 24, 1936, the hon. member for Trinity wrote to the Prime Minister inquiring as to the policy in this respect, and received a reply set forth on page 17 of the commissioner's report. I read in part:

> I may say, in reply, that we see no reason why a Canadian firm established for the manufacture of munitions should be precluded from obtaining orders from the British government. It would be necessary, of course, to see that it was distinctly understood that such orders as were obtained were at the instance of the firm itself and not either directly or indirectly at the instance of the government of Canada.

On September 15, 1936, the hon. member for Trinity sent a copy of this letter to the minister, with a covering letter in which he thanked the minister for his many courtesies. Since I have read the report I have been wondering how the Prime Minister could possibly overlook the deliberate evasion of his instructions which followed. By reason of action taken by the deputy minister, Major Hahn, on November 10, 1936, was made a representative of the Canadian government with respect to the Bren gun. He was in England at that time in company with the hon. member for Trinity. Major Hahn enjoyed the status of a representative of the Canadian government when on November 19, 1936, he proposed to the British War Office that an order for 5,000 guns be placed with his company. He further solicited financial cooperation with regard to the special tools and machinery required. On his return to Canada, Major Hahn reported on these negotiations to the department, and definitely indicated that he had interested the War Office in placing an order with his firm. In the following year he accompanied the deputy minister to London, when permission was obtained from the patentee enabling orders to be placed with a private manufacturer in Canada.

There is a strange inconsistency in the evidence given on this point by the minister before the commission. He stated on one occasion that "neither by us, with us or through us would any contract be entered into by another government." On another occasion, when examined as to correspondence and cablegrams exchanged with the War Office, he admitted quite frankly: "It was a sustained endeavour to press the British authorities for a decision as to whether they would produce in Canada or not. That is the tenor of all the correspondence for nine or ten months in 1937—a sustained endeavour to obtain a decision from the War Office as to whether or not they would place an order for Bren guns in the Dominion of Canada."

For some time the British government insisted upon its desire to deal with the Canadian government and not directly with a Canadian manufacturer. The report makes it clear that from the earliest stage of the discussions and negotiations it was the aim of the department to secure a complementary order from the War Office for Hahn's firm. Subsequently Colonel Orde, judge-advocate-general, assisted in drafting the contract between the British authorities and the John Inglis Company. The commissioner states "That pressure from Canada upon the War Office during the period was continuous is in my view the proper inference from the facts directly proved in evidence." Contrary to the statement made by the minister in the house last session, it was this pressure for a full year from the Department of National Defence which secured a profitable contract from the British government for the John Inglis Company. I refer to the minister's statement which appears at page 3555 of Hansard for June 3, 1938.

The Prime Minister also assured the house that all such contracts would be reviewed by the interdepartmental committee. The commissioner in his report points to the breakdown of this system and to the failure of the committee to report back to the government. The chairman of this committee is the deputy minister of the Department of National Defence. The committee wanted to get price comparisons from other competent companies. They kept urging some method of competitive bidding. The chairman indicated that he had then an understanding that the British authorities would not deal with any other firm. Later, in February, 1938, he intimated to the committee that the British government had picked the John Inglis Company. When the committee suggested that a cablegram be sent to the British War Office asking, "Will you or will you not deal with a selected list of companies?" the deputy minister is reported as feeling very strongly about the matter and practically insisting that they must not take such action. The committee was forced to accept the deputy minister's word that the British government would deal with no other company than the John Inglis Company.

This becomes a serious matter when the proceedings of the interdepartmental committee are viewed in the light of the negotiations conducted with the British government from 1936 and the pressure actually exercised to persuade the British government to place an order with one particular company. The minister accepts full responsibility for the actions of the officers of his department. I look to him to explain whether or not the committee was shamefully deceived and misled as to the true facts in the case.

The truth about the situation must be plain to every hon. member who reads the report. It was one of the rankest and most barefaced political patronage deals ever foisted upon a long-suffering public. When political patronage is admitted at the back-door, all businesslike and patriotic considerations are thrown out of the window. This becomes especially serious when patronage is extended to armament contracts. Patronage becomes the most convenient cloak for our profiteers to cash in on the profits of the next war. The report of the commissioner contains one clear-cut illustration of how patronage operates to block ordinary, clean, honest, business-like methods. On August 24, 1936, the hon. member for Trinity wrote to the Prime Minister stating that a group of friends in Toronto were fully equipped to manufacture munitions. On October 25, 1936, the deputy minister, following several conversations, wrote to the Department of External Affairs asking that Major Hahn be sponsored in the British War Office by the high commissioner. He described Major Hahn as representing—and I quote:

—a reliable group, which controls certain manufacturing plants, capable of manufacturing armament and munitions—

He did not wait until he had received a report on the plant from the officers of his department, but subsequently he did receive a report which reads in part as follows, and I am quoting from page 22 of the commissioner's report:

This plant is primarily equipped for the manufacture of boilers, turbines and the working of heavy plate generally. All equipment is in reasonably good condition, considering the length of time it has been in use.

The machinery at present in this factory with few exceptions is unsuited for the manufacture of aircraft, but it might be used for the manufacture of tanks or shells . . .

This factory is at present inoperative and has not been in operation since April, 1936. There is no design staff at present employed and the total number of workmen now employed consists of three men as factory maintenance staff.

Another officer reported:

This firm is equipped to do heavy engineering work, boilers, etc. The shops would require to be stripped of their equipment to be suitable for aircraft construction. The shops are more suitable for shells, gun carriages, etc., than for aircraft or aircraft engines.

Thus it appears that both the communication of the hon. member for Trinity and the communication of the deputy minister were grossly inaccurate.

Mr. PLAXTON: I should like to question that statement, and I would like the hon. member, while he is speaking, to point out the inaccuracy. I do not wish to interrupt, but I should like him to do that.

Mr. MacNEIL: The hon. member may read his letter to the Prime Minister and the letter of the deputy minister to the Department of External Affairs, and compare them with the reports I have just read. I submit that I am fully justified in drawing the conclusion that his letter was inaccurate.

Mr. PLAXTON: Well, the facts speak for themselves.

Mr. MacNEIL: During the argument by counsel special reference was made to that inaccuracy and to the responsibility of the hon. member in that regard. There is no evidence to show that this information was communicated to the British War Office. Apparently the British authorities were allowed, during the negotiations which followed, to proceed on the assumption established in the letter of the deputy minister. The minister gave evidence on the stand that he did not know the personnel of the group behind Major Hahn, and did not know what previous experience they had in the manufacture of precision steel; he stated that he was completely in the dark on these matters. The deputy minister also swore that he did not know who were included in this "reliable group." According to the report, not until May, 1937, were any inquiries made as to the financial standing of Major Hahn, when a banker's reference was obtained. Why were ordinary business precautions so grossly neglected, if there was not the determination to place this contract to the advantage of political friends?

The report confirms statements I have made on previous occasions with regard to the inefficiency of the Department of National Defence. There is evidently a lamentable lack of coordination between the administrative and technical branches. If these huge expenditures are to provide a party "pork-barrel," we shall get little in the way of actual defence. I suggest that hon. members read the volume of appendices issued with the first volume of the official war history and refresh their memories as to the humiliating experiences in connection with war purchases during 1914-1918. It would be well to remember now, in the light of these disclosures, the Ross rifle, the Oliver equipment, the Bain wagon, the motor equipment and spare parts, and so on. Read the exchange of cablegrams between the Canadian authorities and the British War Office. When boots of Canadian manufacture were condemned by the British higher command, the Canadian authorities, to satisfy profiteering interests in Canada, ordered thousands of overshoes which were never used and which never could have been used by men in the front line. For similar reasons they let contracts to remodel the Oliver equipment, all of which was later dumped somewhere, and so on ad nauseam. A number of painful inquiries were held by committees of this house, during which the most scandalous evidence was unearthed. Because of these things, the lives of our troops were exposed to additional and needless risk in the most callous manner.

There can no longer be any doubt but that these misdeeds found their root in political patronage. Much was forgiven because of the emergencies of war time. There can be no such excuse for similar practices now which may lead to results quite as iniquitous during crises of the future. The mere appointment of a defence purchasing board does not meet the situation. The responsibility lies upon the government to deal severely with those who have been playing political "ducks and drakes" with defence appropriations. Defence purchasing must be freed entirely from political patronage.

Because of this report, which is not at all reassuring but definitely alarming, I urge that an inquiry be made by this house or by a committee of this house into the facts cited by the commissioner, to which I have referred, together with the related evidence. I also urge the drastic reorganization of the Department of National Defence, to accomplish greater efficiency and coordination. Further, I urge the nationalization of armament manufacture.

Mr. L. D. TREMBLAY (Dorchester) (Translation): Mr. Speaker, my first words will be an expression of the joy felt throughout Canada, and already voiced by many hon. members, at the coming visit of our king and queen. The joyous anticipation felt by the people of Canada has been properly expressed in the speech from the throne. I think I can add that it is felt with particular keenness in the province of Quebec. Canada's recent history reveals numerous reasons why we, a minority, should show our attachment to the British crown. Especially since the enactment of the statute of Westminster, we can say: the King of Canada. We sincerely hope, particularly we of the province of Quebec, that their majesties' visit to Canada will be a most pleasant one. We are sure that throughout the country they will find, wherever they go, an atmosphere of cordiality and of attachment to the British crown.

The speech from the throne also makes reference to the visit which the president of the neighbouring republic paid to Canada last summer. We are particularly glad of it. Indeed, it is comforting to note, in these times of universal distrust, the friendly relations existing between Canada and the United States and which are an example to the world. All will admit, I venture to say, that through his personality and intellectual outlook the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) enjoys valuable friendships abroad, which have been of distinct benefit to us.

Not very long ago an Ottawa newspaper paid the following tribute to the Prime Minister. I quote from the Ottawa Evening Citizen of February 15th, 1937:

> The spirit of Canada, the spirit of friendly cooperation, readiness to meet the other man half-way as the most hopeful way to make an enduring agreement, is reflected in every substantial achievement of the Prime Minister's long political career.

We can sincerely thank Providence that in these times of universal stress the present Prime Minister is directing the affairs of the country.

(Text) May I now offer my congratulations to the leader of the opposition (Mr. Manion) upon his election to the leadership of the party and subsequently to the house. He seems to be a very sympathetic gentleman, and all hon. members are pleased to welcome him. For many years he has been a leading figure in Canadian politics, and we Liberals were particularly gratified that our party did not oppose his election. Though I do not by any means wish to be disagreeable, may I add that having carefully listened to and read his speech on the address and having read and listened to the reply of the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King), our sense of security as Liberals is such that I am wondering whether the beau geste of the Prime Minister at the time of the London by-election was altogether disinterested.

May I extend my congratulations also to the hon. member for Brandon (Mr. Matthews) upon his able speech. He has good reason to be proud of his success in Brandon, and we are glad to welcome him among us.

(Translation) I also wish to offer my congratulations to the hon. member for Stormont (Mr. Chevrier). The legitimate feeling of pride which his success in this chamber has caused to us of French origin can easily be understood. He has revealed himself a brilliant politician and indefatigable worker, with an intelligent interest in all the difficult problems which confront the legislative bodies of the country. I trust his constituents will keep him a long time in the House of Commons, so that he may fruitfully continue an already promising career.

The speech from the throne refers to present developments throughout the world, which are of grave concern not only to those charged with the administration of public affairs, but to the entire country, nay to all the countries of the world. Every day we anxiously open the papers to find out the latest developments in the international situation. Last September we all breathed a sigh of relief when, thanks to the intervention of the Prime Minister of England, Mr. Chamberlain, war was avoided at the last moment. Those of my generation especially, who vividly recall the horrors of the last war, rendered thanks to Providence that the intervention of the great English statesman had succeeded, for a time at least—for ever—in ensuring universal peace. I suggest that the leader of this country was largely responsible for that result. From nearly every quarter attempts were made to obtain from the right hon. the prime minister, or from the government, statements that would have committed Canada to one stand or another, but with his well known caution our leader was more than a match for those who wished to extort from him an ill-timed statement.

As stated in the paper I have just quoted, the right hon. the prime minister is a true Canadian, and I believe it is high time that his Canadianism should be shared by other eminent public men who seem to have much more concern for the interests of the empire than for those of Canada. A few days ago, I was reading lectures and speeches delivered all over the country by the erstwhile leader of the Conservative party during his farewell trip. He is a former prime minister and the predecessor of the present leader of the opposition (Mr. Manion). He always gives the impression of having at heart the interests of the empire to the extent, I am afraid, of forgetting that the duty of a Canadian is, above all, to promote the interests of Canada. We have just one country: Canada. It is all very well to watch over the safety of the empire, but it is more legitimate and patriotic to look after the security of Canada.

I should like to read an article from the January 25th issue of the Liberal party's organ in Quebec, which I am sure reflects the opinion of the majority of my compatriots from Quebec. In an editorial entitled "His last will", Le Soleil, of Quebec city, had this to say:

> To look after the safety of the empire, such is the ideal which Right Honourable R. B. Bennett propounds to the young people of Canada, at a time when he is leaving this country to enjoy in England the consideration he has earned through his loyal services. The former Tory leader is thus at variance with his political platform of 1930, which he used to sum up in two words: "Canada first." Moreover, in that farewell speech the words and the actions of the speaker are not in harmony.

After all, he is a healthy, wealthy and influential man who now renounces the duties of Canadian citizenship in order to go and lead an easier life in a country where he will be able to fulfil other ambitions. Like a successful adventurer he takes away with him what he earned during a long stay in the colonies. Obviously, he does not realize that he is setting a bad example. Otherwise, he would feel some embarrassment in laying down a policy for those who are staying here.

In conclusion the editor of Le Soleil writes that for some Canadians——that last pilgrimage to the imperial fatherland is not unlike the crowning of a wish similar to the one which an exiled Arab makes when turning towards Mecca he invokes Allah. But for those native citizens who have just one fatherland and do not want to serve another, the action of the abdicating leader shows the danger of the imperial delusion.

Taking these facts into account, I do say that we in Canada are well advised in supporting the man who truly exemplifies the feelings of Canadians. And that is, without the least doubt, the reason why the province of Quebec has not hesitated in supporting the present prime minister.

In the speech from the throne reference is also made to the importance for Canada of having adequate military defences. In this connection, I should like to quote from the speech delivered by the leader of the opposition during the debate on the address. His words were obviously intended for the province of Quebec. Here is what the hon. the leader of the opposition said:

If some of the right honourable gentlemen from the province of Quebec had not been so assiduous, in years gone by, in preaching to the people of that province the doctrine that this party was the militaristic party because we believed in a certain amount of defence, about half of what we have to-day—if they had not been so assiduous in building up prejudice—they would not to-day find it so difficult to remove the prejudice which they built up in regard to defence.

Mr. Speaker, anyone who asserts that we, from the province of Quebec, are against defence is saying something that is absolutely unfounded. Nothing shows that such is the case. We have our own opinions and freedom to express them is the very essence of liberalism. A few of my hon. fellow-members have done so. By-elections have since been held in the province of Quebec and the armaments question has been discussed before the electors, and everywhere we have gained signal victories. To the hon. leader of the opposition who suggests that some of our leaders have built up prejudice in the province of Quebec, I will say that his statement is unfounded and unwarranted. But I remember quite well that some twenty years ago, the hon. the leader of the opposition was in sympathy with a government which succeeded in raising prejudice against the province of Quebec in all the other provinces of the dominion. We, from Quebec, do not claim that Canada should have no defence or armaments; on the contrary, but Canada is our only fatherland. We are neither French nor English, we are Canadians, and our only fatherland is Canada. When we are requested to vote for an increase in the estimates of the Department of National Defence for the protection of Canada and the defence of our territory, I say that Quebec is willing to support that, but we do not want to share any longer in foreign ventures; that is all we have said and that is the feeling of the province of Quebec.

Mr. Speaker, unemployment of course is a matter of concern for all governments. This government refers to it in the speech from the throne. Last year, it was my privilege in this house, to say a few words about the elimination of abuses in the organization set up for the relief of unemployment through projects initiated by the provincial authorities of Quebec or carried out by them in cooperation with the dominion government. I mentioned cases where the Quebec government showed discrimination against destitute people solely because they did not share their political opinions. It is a well known fact that the government of the province of Quebec refuses to cooperate with the dominion government. Last session I asked the government this question: Is a responsible government justified in asking the House of Commons to vote millions of dollars of the tax-payer's money to be spent by another government which has so often showed bad faith and from which no cooperation can be expected? Subsequent events force me to repeat this question and to ask if such a condition should continue.

Last year I had to inform the Minister of Labour (Mr. Rogers) that I had repeatedly asked the administrators of the youth training plan in the province of Quebec, but always in vain, to give to some of my electors an opportunity of taking advantage of the plan. I am glad to acknowledge to-day that my recommendations have had at least partial effect, for I have since succeeded in my attempts on behalf of a certain number of unemployed young men residing in my constituency. It seems to me, however, that the application of the scheme could be extended somewhat. There are, for instance, young men who would have liked to take courses at the Quebec technical school. I recommended some of them, but I was told that they could not be admitted this year under the youth training plan.

Youth is such an important factor in any nation that we ought to be more generous with regard to that part of our population. Our contribution to that plan should be larger in order to give young men and women, who have reached or will soon reach the age of earning their livelihood a chance to take advantage of the present depression to learn a trade that will enable them to serve the community at some future time.

The sons of our farmers cannot easily avail themselves of the opportunity offered by the youth training plan. May I suggest that extension courses in agriculture should be given more extensively? During the winter months, young people in the rural districts have practically nothing to do. If agricultural experts could visit the different parishes in order to give such extension courses, young people could improve their knowledge of agricultural sciences and prepare themselves to make a more useful contribution to the development of agriculture. Such an expenditure would prove to be a good investment. As I represent an almost exclusively rural district and am acquainted with the facts, I am satisfied that legislative bodies would do well to give more attention to the youth of our rural communities. I would therefore ask the Minister of Labour (Mr. Rogers) to take such steps as may be necessary, under the federal-provincial agreement, to call the attention of the youth training committee to my suggestion.

Does the government propose entirely to assume the cost of old age pensions as some people have suggested? I cannot say. But let me urge upon the government, if provincial governments are to retain the administration of the act, the necessity of at least appointing federal inspectors to see that those who are entitled to it get a pension and to avoid any favouritism in that respect. In the province of Quebec, there is cause to complain of the shameful partiality shown by the provincial government. Consequently, the federal government would be well advised to ensure an equitable distribution of pensions.

During the Christmas holidays, I read a circular letter addressed to all those in receipt of government pensions by the Union Nationale member for the county of Dorchester. In that letter, he emphasized his solicitude in their behalf, and all the trouble he had taken in order to secure old age pensions for them. Mr. Bégin added that, so long as he is the representative of their electoral district, those poor old people could feel assured of their economic security, without mentioning that 75 per cent of their pension is paid by the federal government. I want to call the attention of the government to that fact, which shows that all possible means are used in the province of Quebec for political propaganda.

I desire to join with hon. members who have congratulated the Secretary of State (Mr. Rinfret) for his recent statement in Montreal. I fully endorse the words not only of the minister but also of my fellow members, and especially of the hon. member for Portneuf (Mr. Gauthier). I sincerely congratulate him for his speech in this chamber. He accurately expressed the sentiment of my compatriots of the province of Quebec. I heartily join with my desk-mate, the hon. member for Champlain (Mr. Brunelle) in congratulating the Secretary of State for his statement. We have nothing against any minority, but we are opposed to all immigration. We should solve our own problems instead of aggravating them and creating new difficulties. After we have found a job for every unemployed man in Canada, we will be in a position to cast a sympathetic eye on other nations of the world labouring under hardships. Until then, let us devote all our energies to the solution of our own problems.

In conclusion, sir, I again make this appeal to my fellow members and all Canadians: By all means, during the difficult days in which we live, let us act and think as Canadians. The affairs of our own country must engage all our attention. Let us silence those who create prejudices and try to set one class of society against the other in order to gain some personal benefit. United, we will be able to do something for Canada. Let us think a little more of Canada, our country, than the British empire.

At six o'clock the house took recess.

After Recess

The house resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. H. C. GREEN (Vancouver South): Mr. Speaker, before commencing my remarks on the speech from the throne I should like to add a word of praise for the speeches of the mover (Mr. Matthews) and the seconder (Mr. Chevrier) of the address in reply. I thought the hon. member for Brandon spoke excellently and I have no doubt he was aided considerably by the odd timely nod and smile of your honour, which has meant so much to all of us new members in this parliament. Of course the hon. member for Stormont also spoke well; we all knew he would do so. Although one of our youngest members, he is one of our ablest and at the same time one of our most modest, and I have always believed that he is destined to render great service to Canada. I wish I could say as much for the government.

To-night, however, I aim to be entirely constructive in my criticism of the government, and I intend to offer them sincerely certain suggestions which I know will be accepted in the spirit in which they are given. I do this particularly because in these days, as we all know, there are literally thousands upon thousands of good Canadians who are unhappy and unsettled and whose lives could be greatly brightened if this government will only act at this session.

As the basis for my suggestions may I say that, looking back, I am convinced that from the start, from the year 1935, this government have made one great mistake. Of course, there have been many minor mistakes, but they have made one great mistake, and judging by the speech from the throne, and particularly by the speech of the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Euler) delivered yesterday, they plan to persist in that same mistake, which is, in expecting too much from our export trade instead of placing equal importance upon improving directly the living conditions of the Canadian people.

Coming from the great Pacific port of Vancouver, one of the gateways of British Columbia, which is an export province, I realize to the full the importance of developing our overseas markets. But side by side with the development of those markets there should have gone policies for the improving of conditions within Canada. Take, for example, the 1935 trade agreement with the United States. That obviously did not solve our internal problems, and the new Canada-United States trade agreement, with the concessions made by Canada in respect of the United Kingdom agreement, will not solve these problems. They may help a bit; though I am afraid they will not, I hope they do. But no one in British Columbia, or at least no considerable body of people in that province, expects them to create many jobs. The people there fear that the agreements will wipe out present jobs. In fact the general reaction is the negative one, "Oh, well, they might have been worse."

But now that these trade arrangements are concluded, I urge the government to give its undivided attention to conditions within Canada, and particularly to the problem of what is to be done about Canadians on relief or on aid of one type or another, ranging in number from approximately three-quarters of a million to a million as the seasons change, and that after we have been in a depression for eight or nine years. The government should also face the problem of what is to be done about those other Canadians, numbering no one knows how many thousands, who are living from day to day on the verge of relief, not actually on relief but very near it, in fear of what the morrow may bring forth. Both these groups are without security for future happiness and without much incentive to be enthusiastic over Canada or over Canadian institutions.

The speech from the throne offers these two groups very little more than the same old soothing syrup of public works. We all admit that public works are not a solution; they are merely a stop gap; and yet that is what we are offered in the speech from the throne. For the permanent solution of the problem we have a promise. Promises are great things, and we have the promise that after the Rowell commission reports there is going to be a national conference at which, I quote from the speech from the throne:

> . . . among the important subjects to be dealt with will be the problem of unemployment and social services generally.

In other words, this government is marking time on this issue of relief and security, continuing the great mistake that has been made by Canadian governments since the depression began, of treating unemployment as an emergency, treating it as something local and temporary, instead of what it is, a great national issue.

I suggest that at this 1939 session the government, while it still has the chance, take the first step toward providing unemployment insurance by passing an act authorizing the dominion to pay, to those provinces which set up a satisfactory unemployment insurance scheme, either the whole or part of the cost. This was the way in which Canadians got old age pensions. I would refer hon. members to section 3 of the Old Age Pensions Act, which tells the story. It reads.

> The governor in council may make an agreement with the lieutenant-governor in council of any province for the payment to such province quarterly of an amount equal to seventy-five per cent of the net sum paid out during the preceding quarter by such province for pensions—

Then I stress these words:

> —pursuant to a provincial statute authorizing and providing for the payment of such pensions to the persons and under the conditions specified in this act—

That is, the federal act.

> —and the regulations made hereunder.

No doubt it would be more workable and less expensive to have unemployment insurance provided for under dominion law exclusively, but it seems obvious that the provinces will not agree that the dominion should have the necessary power. For example, I would refer the house to the speech from the throne in 1938, particularly to that portion dealing with unemployment insurance, which reads:

> The cooperation of the provinces has been sought with a view to an amendment of the British North America Act which would empower the parliament of Canada to enact forthwith a national scheme of unemployment insurance. My ministers hope the proposal may meet with early approval in order that unemployment insurance legislation may be enacted during the present session of parliament.

That was a year ago. Since then it has developed that three provinces, Alberta, Quebec, and New Brunswick, will not agree, and apparently the government are bogged down on unemployment insurance. Judging by the speech from the throne this year, it is now in the government's land of dreams; for we find this lone reference:

> The government have not altered their view that a national unemployment insurance scheme is essential to a permanent policy of meeting the problem of unemployment.

Unemployment insurance will not settle the relief problem, but it will partly settle the problem of security for Canadian wage-earners, and it should not be delayed one day longer. There is no reason why Canada, with her progressive people, should lag behind the rest of the commonwealth in security legislation. I am afraid the main reason that such is the case is that we have the most out-of-date government in the commonwealth.

My second suggestion is that the government have a committee of this house look into the possibility of extending old age pensions to Canadians between sixty-five and seventy years of age. It seems absurd to me to force people over sixty-five to work, with thousands of young people clamouring for work and unable to get a start in life. It may be that we would require a contributory scheme, but the whole question should be investigated and should be investigated now, not after the Rowell commission reports and not after the next election. In any event the government should stop the present tendency to treat those elder Canadians who apply for pension as paupers—which is an objectionable feature in the administration of the act at the present time, and very far removed from the original intention, which was that pensions should be a reward to pioneers.

As a third suggestion, I recommend that the government have part II of the National Housing Act amended at this session; that is, the part dealing with low rental housing. It was passed last year with the best of intentions from all sides of the house. A $30,000,000 fund was provided, and yet not one dollar of that fund has been spent. Apparently this part of the act is a dud, and the reasons for that, at any rate in the city of Vancouver, are two. First of all, under the provisions of the act the taxes that a municipality levies must not exceed one per cent of the cost of construction. We have been met with the argument that it is unfair that a housing scheme in one block should be taxed only on the basis of one per cent whereas property across the street is taxed on the basis of, say four per cent. For that reason there is a strong objection to the act. The other objection is this: under the act rentals paid must cover carrying charges; for example, on a home which cost $2,400, the carrying charges amount to about $14 a month, so that that amount of rental must be collected; but then there is the further provision that the tenant cannot pay over one-fifth of the family income; this means that the income must be at least five times $14, which amounts to $70, so the lowest income group which can be helped must have an income of $70 a month, which amounts to about $850 a year. There are hundreds of thousands of Canadians who are below that income group, probably all the people who need the help, so part II of the act is of no use to those who need it most, and in addition competes with the ordinary house owners who are desirous of renting their property.

I suggest that the act should be amended to meet these difficulties. I do not know just how it can be done—perhaps by providing that municipalities can tax up to two per cent, and certainly by giving the dominion power to make contributions to what is known as a rent reduction fund. At the present time only the municipalities and the provinces can contribute to such a fund.

There is great need of low rental housing in Canada. I do not want to take the time of the house, but I would quote briefly from the interim report of the national employment commission, which, at page 11, sets out the conditions very clearly. It is the report to the government made in July, 1937:

> The commission recognized the desirability of a rounding out of governmental housing policy, particularly as regards accommodation for those unable themselves to afford an economic rent—often associated with slum clearance. Action in this field was considered necessary both from the viewpoint of eliminating a social sore all too prevalent, especially in the larger cities, and because of its effect in stimulating employment in the construction field.

Then they go on to make this startling statement:

In making this recommendation the commission was influenced by the fact that Canadian governmental bodies had expended some $14,000,000 in 1936 to rent accommodation for relief recipients, and that in many instances such accommodation was unsanitary and unsuitable in the extreme. The commission feels that such a situation should not be allowed to continue in that it breeds conditions tending to increase unemployment by decreasing the employability of numbers of workers, thus making it harder for them to secure employment.

The fourth suggestion I would make is that the government follow the recommendation of its own national employment commission by setting up a national employment service in Canada. The present position is that the provinces have their employment agencies and the dominion subsidizes them to an aggregate sum of $150,000 a year. The commission found that these employment agencies are entirely inadequate. I should like to make it clear that I have nothing but praise for the personnel of the men in these employment agencies. They are not being given a chance to do the job. But this commission has found that our employment service is entirely inadequate. Appointed in June, 1936, it was only two months before the commission recommended to the government that these agencies should be administered by the nation. Five months later, in January, 1937, we find another emphatic recommendation that it was of vital importance that Canada should set up national employment agencies. Nothing was done in either case. Again, six months later, in July, 1937, we have the interim report of the commission, and I should like to read to hon. members one of the statements found at page 17 of that report:

Employment Service of Canada

Early in the commission's investigations it became evident that the first and most vital step necessary to the successful handling of employment, re-employment and aid administration problems is the development of more efficient employment services throughout Canada. The present provincial employment services are in practice unfitted to meet the exigencies of the situation.

Again nothing was done, although the commission pleaded for action. In the final report, brought in a year ago—I believe it was a year ago to-day; no doubt members of the government will remember it very well—we find this further strong recommendation, one of the most emphatic recommendations of the commission. Dealing again with the national employment service it states at page 15:

The requirement here, as pointed out on page 19 of the interim report, is the prompt modernization and extension of the employment service of Canada, this with a view to a better linking together of employer and employee; to providing focal points for attacks on local employment problems, and as a means of gauging the relative degree of employability of those in receipt of aid. In discussions which the commission has had in recent months, general agreement has been expressed by all provincial governments as to the unsuitability of the existing set-up, and of the restricted services of the provincial employment services in fulfilling these vital functions.

The commission wishes to emphasize the urgency for action. It recommends that the service be placed immediately under the direction of the dominion government, both as to controlling principles and broad policies, but with provision for the appointment of strong regional directors, and regional advisory councils, to whom certain decentralized powers would be given, so as to ensure adequate weight being accorded, and attention being paid, to the problems peculiar to particular regions.

Similar advisory councils were used with great success under the home improvement plan.

Yet nothing has been done. Probably this is the worst example of drift by this government. The folly of such inaction is best shown by pointing to their fine youth program, for which I think the government are to be commended; yet there is no proper employment service to help these youths find jobs after they have completed their training. This condition is so bad that the minister of labour of British Columbia, Mr. Pearson, speaking in the provincial house last November, is reported by the Vancouver Province as saying:

"I'm not satisfied with the present set-up myself." . . . When the federal government proposed to take over the whole matter, in conjunction with unemployment insurance, he had had visions of an efficient employment service in charge of the provincial authorities, but had dropped it. He had waited in vain for Ottawa to act. Finally, he said, he had debated the matter of dominion and provincial employment service and last year decided the dominion intended to do nothing for the present, so set about his own reorganization plan.

"I started on the women's section, which needs reorganization more than the men's," Mr. Pearson stated. "I am going ahead," he said, "in spite of the indecision of Ottawa, and in the hope of permissive unemployment insurance in the provinces."

Then I suggest that the government follow the further recommendation of its own national employment commission, that through a national employment service the government take over the administration and payment of unemployment aid for all employables, as distinguished from unemployables, freeing the provinces and municipalities of this burden which certainly should not be the burden of the municipalities, because in the end that means a burden on the homes of Canada. There is no reason why the municipalities should be responsible for the burden of such relief under the present tax set-up in Canada.

Meanwhile the government should do something about the problem of non-residents and migrants wandering by the thousands back and forth across this country. There are several steps the government could take. In the first place they could lay down uniform residence provisions. Each year a great deal of the money by way of grants-in-aid goes from the dominion government under agreements with the provincial governments. I suggest that in these agreements the government insert a provision that each province, in accepting the money, must adopt uniform residence standards so that we shall not have the present difficulty of one province insisting on two years' residence, another on three years, another on one year and so forth. This principle has been adopted in the agreement with British Columbia concerning municipalities in the province, by means of the following paragraph:

> The province agrees to maintain such residence regulations that no person shall become ineligible to receive material aid by reason of having lost residence in one municipality or jurisdiction within the province before having established residence in another—

I say a similar provision should be written into the agreements to provide for regulations as between the provinces. Then the government should take full responsibility for the real migrants, those Canadians who cannot meet residential qualifications in any province; for those hundreds who really are not fit, the older men who are "burnt out," I suggest that the government set up farm hostels operated on a subsistence basis; certainly these men should be withdrawn from the employment market.

Another suggestion, which I particularly wish to present to the Minister of Transport (Mr. Howe), is that the government should place far more emphasis upon the trans-Canada highway than they do at the present time. To me the trans-Canada highway means not only jobs in connection with construction; it also means jobs resulting from tourist traffic, and most important of all it means a wonderful way of promoting unity in Canada. Anyone coming from the more remote provinces of Canada cannot fail to be impressed by that argument. If this highway is completed it will give thousands of Canadians, who otherwise could not get it, an opportunity to travel across their own country and to meet and understand their fellow-Canadians. I would point out that at the present time there are two gaps in the trans-Canada highway. In British Columbia there is a small gap known as the Big Bend gap; but in the northern part of this great province of Ontario there is a gap of about 250 miles, with very little apparent effort to have that gap completed. Someone suggests that is due to failure to agree with Mitch, and that may explain a lot. But surely it is not too much to ask or expect that action should be taken, and at this session; and in that connection I should like to remind the house of the policy of the National Conservative party on this project:

> The National Conservative party reaffirms its policy of completing the construction of and the future maintenance of a trans-Canada highway from coast to coast as a national undertaking.

If this government does not hurry up and do that this year, it will not get a chance to do it at all.

My final suggestion is that this country this year should accept full responsibility for its veterans who served in France or another theatre of war and who are at the present time on the relief rolls across the country. In other words, I believe Canada should accept responsibility for its fighting men. I do not think there are many people in Canada to-night who would not say heartily that this responsibility rests right here, with the dominion government. Yet year after year we have been unable to get the government to take any action. They have taken the responsibility for the unfit man, but they will not assume responsibility for the fit veteran who wants to work but is unable to find employment. That is the stand of the government despite the recommendations of the Hyndman committee as far back as 1935 and the recommendations of its own Rattray commission in 1937 and again in the final report of 1938. I should like to refresh the memory of hon. gentlemen with regard to the recommendations of that commission, which are to be found at page 63 of the report:

> . . . the commission has come to the conclusion that it can do no less than recommend that the dominion government accept responsibility for all indigent unemployed veterans who were domiciled in Canada at date of enlistment and who saw service in a theatre of actual war.

There are only about ten thousand of them, according to the commission, so it is not as though there were hundreds of thousands of these men to be provided for. The reasons given by the commission for that recommendation still hold good, and have not been answered by this government. One reason, for example, is that the average age of these men is about fifty years. What possible chance under present conditions has a veteran fifty years of age of finding employment? It has been found further that these men are pre-aged, that they have suffered through loss of training during their younger years when they were serving at the front, and that they are a marginal group on the labour market; in other words, that they can work for only a few months or a few weeks at a time. The commission also found a fact which every hon. member knows to be true, that the tendency of the municipalities and the provinces is to say to those veterans on relief, "Oh, you belong to the dominion government; what are you bothering us for? It is not up to us to look after you. You should be cared for by the dominion government." The final and the most telling reason given by the Rattray commission is this, as it appears at page 40 of the report:

> We feel, as we are confident the country at large feels, that no matter what Canada has done to requite the services of her veterans, her obligation to them is not discharged while one of them walks the streets vainly in search of work, or while one of them is in distress.

These men served Canada. We were proud of the word "Canada" on our shoulder-straps. We were not serving British Columbia, Ontario, Prince Edward Island or any single province; we were serving Canada. The responsibility for the care of those fighting men rests with the Canadian government, and the form the assistance to be given them should take is a matter for the government to decide. They may adopt the recommendation of the commission for a provisional economic allowance, or they might consider an extension of the War Veterans' Allowance Act. The point is that the responsibility rests right here.

In conclusion, may I say that all these are problems within Canada. The government has its precious trade treaty. Now let it get down to business at home. Let it face these vital issues now, in the 1939 session. Canada cannot afford to lose these years for development, for progress and for bringing greater happiness to her people.

Mr. J. J. DUFFUS (Peterborough West): Mr. Speaker, I hope the hon. member for Vancouver South (Mr. Green) does not expect me to follow him in all his arguments, much less to agree with them. At the outset I desire to join hon. members in paying my humble tributes to the hon. members for Essex West (Mr. McLarty) and Edmonton West (Mr. MacKinnon) upon their elevation to the cabinet. I am confident both of these gentlemen will do great honour and credit to themselves, their constituents and the government of Canada.

One of the reasons I have sought the indulgence of the house at this time is that I do not wish the opposition groups to conclude that because I occupy a seat on this side of the chamber I am in agreement with their philosophies, their theories or even their bitter criticism of the government and the splendid legislation it has brought down.

In order to do my part towards making it possible for the house to prorogue prior to the royal visit, which I believe should be the aim of all hon. members, I shall be as brief as possible.

With what has been so eloquently said by previous speakers of the great honour to be conferred upon the people of Canada by the proposed visit of Their Royal Majesties King George VI and Queen Elizabeth, I am in full accord. I am sure the committee which has this important matter in hand will arrange for and extend to their royal majesties a very cordial welcome and fitting reception.

I wish also to express my congratulations to the hon. member for Brandon (Mr. Matthews) and the hon. member for Stormont (Mr. Chevrier) upon their excellent speeches in moving and seconding the address in reply. Each acquitted himself in a very creditable and dignified manner. I desire also to take advantage of this opportunity to congratulate most heartily the leader of the opposition (Mr. Manion) upon the honour which has come to him upon being elected leader of the National Conservative party and of His Majesty's loyal opposition.

Permit me to refer, with a limited amount of pardonable pride to the constituency of Peterborough West which I have the honour to represent, a constituency comprising the industrial city of Peterborough, one of the finest cities in Canada; Lakefield, the "village beautiful" on the Trent waterway; the fertile township of South Monaghan lying "sunny side up" on the shore of Rice lake in Northumberland county, and eight townships dotted with lakes and rivers in the county of Peterborough. The residents of the agricultural area of that constituency, in their efforts in advanced agriculture, have achieved many outstanding records in dairying, live stock, grain and other products.

I believe I can give the house a concrete example of how a judicious management of public affairs can bring about happiness, economy and increasing confidence. During and subsequently to the war, the city of Peterborough looked to the future with a determination to reduce debt. For several years past the city has not issued any debentures. It has, moreover, paid out of current revenue all relief costs, and in addition has gradually reduced its mill rate.

The net debt of the city of Peterborough at the end of 1933 was $3,145,900. In the intervening years this amount has been reduced by approximately $1,205,900, leaving at the present time a net debt of approximately $1,940,000. I am proud to say that, at this ratio, within a few years the debt will be entirely wiped out.

The county of Peterborough also is in an enviable position financially, with a debenture debt of only $85,000, which is rapidly being reduced. I am sure hon. members will agree with me when I say that the favourable financial condition of the city and county of Peterborough is tangible proof that when spending bodies deliberately plan to balance their budgets, they can do so. It is marvellous what economies can be effected in public administration without impairment of its efficiency, when once a governing body sets its mind seriously to the task of bringing it about.

Peterborough is a Mecca for home-seeking citizens and manufacturing concerns looking for favourable locations. Peterborough is blessed with low taxation, cheap electrical power, unsurpassed labour conditions and attractive living surroundings. There are many winter and summer resorts in the immediate vicinity, and skiing, boating, fishing and hunting facilities are right at her door. Obviously the house is aware that the attractiveness of a community is enhanced by the character of its people and institutions.

The constituency of Peterborough West has a population of approximately 45,000 people, among the best citizens of the Dominion of Canada. Her industries and institutions are unsurpassed. In Peterborough there are eighty-one industries, large and small, of greatly diversified character. The customs receipts for the year just closed soared to a total of $2,085,840, the second highest in the history of the city. This is ample proof of the extent of the business enjoyed by our manufacturing concerns and business institutions.

The city and county of Peterborough is the gateway of that great recreation area known as the Kawartha lakes, which with the Trent are said to constitute the most beautiful waterway in the world. The district enjoys an average annual tourist revenue of approximately $500,000. Obviously the expenditure of this sum of money is of great value to our business people, our hotels and restaurants, our summer resorts as well as our farmers and gardeners. These people are provided with a substantial ready cash market for a large amount of their products.

It is only too true that conditions generally throughout Canada have not improved as rapidly as we all hoped they would. This state of affairs is definitely due to world conditions, to the crop failures in western Canada, to the serious recession in the United States of America and also to the war-clouds that gathered in Europe and the far east which threatened human rights and the choicest fruits of modern civilization. The recession in the United States, the extent and duration of which was not anticipated by any of us, reduced substantially the sale of many important Canadian products in that market. Moreover, other world markets were affected also, causing a further indirect contraction in the sale of our products. Wars and alarms of war in Europe and the far east seriously dislocated markets and produced an atmosphere of uncertainty and fear which was not conducive to the normal functioning of business enterprises. Notwithstanding these handicaps, Canada has made substantial economic advances since this government came into office a little over three years ago. This improvement was due to the splendid trade treaties entered into with many of the great trading nations of the world, which treaties resulted in exports of upwards of $4,000,000 a day.

I have every confidence that the new Anglo-United States-Canadian pact will have far-reaching effects in reducing world trade barriers which, in the minds of a great many people in Canada, have been the chief factors in perpetuating economic and social distress. I believe that these treaties will strengthen the democracies and brighten the prospects for the preservation of peace. It is amazing to me that so many hon. members are so bitter in their criticism of the government in respect of these trade negotiations with our great neighbour to the south, which comprises our largest market right at our door. The same applies to the trade negotiations with the United Kingdom.

May I refer for a moment to a conference of the Canadian chamber of commerce held in Hamilton last May, which issued the following statement in connection with governmental policy:

> This conference believes that the deepening of national channels of world commerce by the negotiation of trade agreements with other countries carrying reciprocal benefits is one of the major tasks before the people of Canada.
> The conference further concurs in the established policy of the federal government to remove the fettering restrictions of international commerce. Such a policy provides the only constructive alternative to extreme economic nationalism which has already proved so damaging in its limitations of the freedom of world commerce.
>
> The imperial trade pacts and the trade agreements or conventions with foreign countries made during the last few years have been beneficial to Canada's export and import trade, and are thereby contributing to domestic prosperity and demonstrating that prudent negotiations actually improve international trade relations without impairing the general domestic well being.

The conference deems such agreements a sound method of trade encouragement. The conference regards with satisfaction the impending readjustment of trade agreement between the United States and Canada as evidence of the desire of both countries to promote reciprocal trade.

All the proven benefits of the Canada-United States agreement of 1935 have been extended until the end of 1941. A great many trade stimulating concessions have been accorded by these two countries. Moreover, the most important tariff adjustments in Canada's history have been incorporated in the new trade agreement which was signed at Washington on November 17 last by the right hon. Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) and the United States Secretary of State, Mr. Cordell Hull. At the same time the history making trade agreement between Great Britain and the United States was signed. Both these treaties have paved the way for tremendous increases in commercial traffic between the United States, Great Britain and Canada for a period of three years. In their combined effect they will influence the major portion of world trade. Roger W. Babson, after his return from a recent trip to Europe, made the following statement:

I have come back very bullish of Canada. All indications point to vital developments in Canada during the next few years. There is no doubt that an unusual condition exists in Canada to-day. Purchasing power, according to our estimate, will be the greatest this fall and winter of any time in the last decade. The recession of the past twelve months is over. Recovery is here. We look for a new peak in Canada in 1939.

In my humble opinion, Mr. Speaker, if Canada does not continue to cooperate in every reasonable way with the United States of America and the United Kingdom, we shall largely be left out so far as markets for our ever-increasing products are concerned; hence the reason for the recent negotiations, in order to secure and maintain greater advantages. We must cooperate with respect to every single item that is of mutual advantage. By the exercise of cooperation and common sense we have built up a record of increasing good will, a rich natural asset that is not surpassed anywhere in the world.

The chief hope for the future lies in linking up the democratic countries of the world by a restoration of international trade, which will stimulate consumption all round and reinforce the expansion of internal markets with the parallel expansion of foreign markets. No one can prophesy the progress that will be made in this direction during the next year, and it is encouraging that at last more practical views prevail than those which formerly impeded the way to durable social and economic improvements. It is upon this that I base the hope that a Canadian economy more sufficient and productive than ever before will soon overcome the new difficulties of recent months and resume a progressive course in the future.

I come now to the savings effected by refunding and the lowering of interest rates on Canada's debt. As a result of the successful refunding by the present government, of Canada's direct debt at lower rates of interest we are enjoying a saving of nearly ten million dollars annually. Similarly the refunding of Canadian National railway bonds has resulted in a saving of upwards of three million dollars annually. On March 31, the end of the fiscal year 1931, the average rate of interest on Canada's outstanding debt was almost five per cent, but since then the average rate has been reduced to approximately 3½ per cent. In addition, a substantial revenue has been obtained from income tax collections as a result of the refunding of $326,086,600 of tax-free bonds. This revenue amounts to approximately fifteen million dollars annually. These are extraordinary savings to the Canadian taxpayer. It may be information to some hon. members that, notwithstanding the increase since 1930 of over one billion dollars in the public debt of Canada, the total interest burden to-day is less than it was at that time.

Coming to the National Housing Act, to my mind in view of present-day conditions, this act as brought down by the government last year is an achievement which was directed to the fundamental needs of our country. It was one of the most timely and far-reaching pieces of legislation that has ever been introduced into this house. It is a great satisfaction to me to be able to state that in my home city, as a result of the housing act, construction expenditures reached a total of upwards of $500,000, included in which were 102 dwellings compared with less than $190,000 odd in 1937, notwithstanding the fact that the act was in operation for only approximately five months of the year.

I should further point out that there has been no expansion of industry or real estate activities, and hence the benefits I have mentioned must be attributable almost entirely to the advantages of the act. Construction industry labour was at a premium during the latter months of 1938, while in previous years lumbermen, carpenters, bricklayers, plasterers, painters, masons, plumbers and electricians were in dire need of work.

If we approach this question nationally, from the standpoint of labour, it is estimated, taking the generally accepted basis that eighty per cent of the cost of construction goes to labour directly or indirectly, that new home-building activity financed under the dominion housing legislation accounts to date for a payment to labour of approximately $29,000,000; and if advances of over $24,000,000 under the home improvement plan are also taken into account, it is evident that the combined total has provided for the payment to labour of a sum amounting to date to about $53,000,000. This is a formidable figure, and the expenditure of this amount has obviously greatly assisted labour, notwithstanding the criticism of hon. members opposite.

In view of the extremely rapid increase not only in the number of loans being negotiated but in the increasing number of municipalities all over Canada that are taking advantage of the benefits of the National Housing Act, it is difficult even to hazard a conjecture as to what the increased activities of the construction industry will be during this and following years. It may indeed tax our lumber and building material industries to the limit.

Speaking of the basic industry of agriculture, which all hon. members admit is the bedrock foundation of stable prosperity for all our industries, it must be obvious to all that the Anglo-United-States-Canada treaty, with its great possibilities of increasing world's markets, was designed also for the purpose of giving our farmers the assistance which they so greatly need and to which they are justly entitled. I should like to make some extensive observations in respect of agriculture, but time will not permit.

Farmers are the founders of civilization. More and more agriculture is honoured with a place among the sciences. It is a science of necessity, a science which has stood the test of ages. Our country's weal and woe depend absolutely upon agriculture and the farmer. Empires have risen and crumbled into dust; various arts have been learned and forgotten; but agriculture still survives. Many nations owe their life and progressive advancement to the character of their agriculturists. Amidst all the mechanical skill that has characterized nations, agriculture has held a distinguished position. The happiest days of ancient Rome were marked by agricultural prosperity. When Italy was in danger, consequent upon the evil of civil wars, every effort was made to restore that noble art in order to rescue her from ruin. In the primeval ages agriculture was the commodity parent of traffic. To-day it is still essential for the promotion of trade in general. If all our mines of gold and silver became exhausted, our commerce with all nations prohibited; if all art were abolished, the fertility of the land alone would supply sustenance for the people of the earth.

May I express the confident hope that the hon. Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) and his colleagues will continue their efforts toward bettering the lot of those without whom it would be impossible to find a means of sustaining the teeming millions of the world. In this connection I suggest that the government give consideration to the advisability of bringing down during this session, legislation, such as exists in some of the provinces, with a view to controlling the orderly marketing of all farm products.

In view of the successful efforts of the government in so many directions it is little wonder that there is increasing confidence in the minds of the people of Canada. Canada's Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King), with his fine sense of constitutional accuracies, has always served the best interests of Canada, Britain and the British commonwealth of nations, with unparalleled distinction. His expressed determination that a strong, united empire is the best guarantee of world peace at a time when communism and other isms are so prevalent is recognized throughout the world. The enhancement of national unity, the demolition of sectional barriers, the stimulation of a deeper spirit of community interests and all his utterances, both in parliament and out of it, reveal a conspicuous consistency of policy resulting in the present government enlisting a continually widening circle of favour in the dominion. When Canadian history is written, our present Prime Minister will come into his own as a prime minister whose achievements do not deserve him to be ranked less than Canada's most outstanding statesman among those who have preceded him.

Speaking before the press after the session in 1936 the late Right Hon. Sir Robert Borden said:

> Dunning is a splendid fellow, the highest type of public man, who enjoys the confidence of his countrymen, and well may they be glad that he has charge of a department of such tremendous responsibility in these critical days.

And further, "Young men of promise" was his description of the Minister of Labour (Mr. Rogers); the Minister of Transport (Mr. Howe); the Minister of Pensions and National Health (Mr. Power); and the Minister of National Revenue (Mr. Ilsley). What Sir Robert said in respect of these hon. gentlemen in my humble opinion applies equally to the other members of the cabinet, including the two new appointees.

How fortunate we are to have such able administrators at a time when there is so much economic and social turmoil throughout the world. But for them we could not sustain the huge increase in trade that Canada has enjoyed, such an expansion of international activity in commerce and industry as producing and earning Canadians hope for and are now enjoying in large measure.

I wonder if we who live in Canada have anything like a full appreciation of the advantages we enjoy—the freedom, liberty and security that are ours—in comparison with what people in other countries of the world have to endure who live in constant suspense, in those lands where people go to bed at night not knowing whether they will see the morning and, if they do see it, whether in the morning earth and sky will be darkened by approaching death.

Divine Providence has surely blessed our country in many different ways when we consider her wealth in agriculture, mines, forests, and fisheries, her vast resources of water power, her grain and fruit land, her unimpaired freedom of three oceans, and last and most important of all, the character of her people.

I believe I am within the bounds of moderation when I say that history does not reveal a finer example of good will and friendship between two great nations than that existing between Canada and the United States of America. By common consent, on both sides of the border, we recognize a permanent pact of two peoples sealed by upwards of one hundred years of history and deriving its authority from the mutual good will of these people rather than from exchange of diplomatic pledges. Canadians sometimes think the United States fails to comprehend the political structure of the empire. To dream of a commonwealth of nations that will some day take in the United States of America is perhaps to dream too greatly.

In the meantime, it is much to know that on all vital matters, in nearly all the supreme things of life, the heart of the great nation to the south of us does beat with the empire, holds her common ideals, common aspirations, common truths.

Mr. Speaker, in the maintenance of that free harmony in the years ahead lies much of the future goodwill of the world.

Three thousand miles of border line!
—nor fort nor armed host
On all this frontier neighbour-ground from east to western coast;
A spectacle to conjure with—a thought to stir the blood!
A living proof to all the world of faith in brotherhood.

Three thousand miles of border line—nor has a century
Seen ought along this common course but peace and harmony
O nations bound in brotherhood! O faith in fellowman!
What better way on earth to dwell than this God-given plan?
Three thousand miles of border line! One hundred years of peace!
In all the page of history, what parallel to this?
God speed that surely dawning day—that coming hour divine—
When all the nations of the earth shall boast such border line!

Mr. R. M. WARREN (Renfrew North): In my contribution to this debate I shall dispense with the preliminaries except to say that I heartily agree with the sentiments so ably expressed by so many hon. members in appreciation of the mover (Mr. Matthews) and the seconder (Mr. Chevrier) of the address in reply to the speech from the throne. I want also to extend to the leader of the opposition (Mr. Manion) my congratulations upon his elevation to office as leader of the National Conservative party. I would also extend a word of welcome to the new members: the hon. member for Waterloo South (Mr. Homuth), the hon. member for Brandon (Mr. Matthews), and the hon. member for Cartier (Mr. Bercovitch). I should like also to congratulate the hon. member for Essex West (Mr. McLarty) and the hon. member for Edmonton West (Mr. MacKinnon) upon their elevation to cabinet positions in this government.

A great variety of subjects has been discussed in this debate. This parliament is blessed or cursed with having three groups on the opposition benches. Many speakers, particularly on the other side of the house, appear to consider it as one of their first duties to make the efforts of the government appear futile and unavailing. The reading public, if they do not use their own judgment, must receive the impression that we are surely living in a land of misery, hardship and unhappiness. My effort will be to attempt to introduce a note of optimism among so many speeches of a pessimistic nature.

This government, during their three years of office, have devoted a great deal of attention to the development of trade and the negotiating of fair trade agreements with any countries which are willing to trade with us. In this they have been singularly successful. That is very well illustrated by comparing our trade figures of 1938 with those of 1934. In 1934 our imports amounted to $513,000,000 and our exports to $660,000,000; in 1938 our exports had risen to $956,000,000 and our imports to $677,000,000, being an increase of 44·85 per cent in our exports and of 31·97 per cent in our imports. Recently we have seen negotiated new agreements between the United States and Canada and between the United States and Great Britain. I believe I could not do better in the way of expressing the feeling of the farmers generally throughout Canada regarding this treaty than to quote from the speech of the hon. member for Brandon:

> Experienced cattle dealers have told me that they have found a distinctly healthier tone in the cattle market ever since this agreement was announced. These men are convinced, after years of experience, that the tariff reductions and the increased quota admissible to the United States, now 225,000 head, will mean a very decided impetus to our live stock development. An alert business man with an analytical complex remarked to me a few days before I left for Ottawa that, having studied this agreement, he had come to the conclusion that it was the smartest—that is the word he used—piece of business legislation enacted in Canada since confederation.

I feel, Mr. Speaker, that it is also quite true to say that our lumbermen are quite optimistic respecting the improvement of their industry as a result of this new trade agreement. If all governments throughout the world would follow the example of the Canadian government in their endeavour to negotiate and carry out fair trade agreements, would this not go a long way toward solving the problems of the world?

One of the favourite topics in this debate has been unemployment. I wish to deal with it for a few minutes, although I am not sure that I shall be able to offer the government any new suggestions regarding it. The government has been deluged with advice, some of it good and some not so good. I feel that the handling of this problem is just as safe in the hands of this government as it would be in the hands of any body of men whom the Canadian people could elect.

In discussing this question we ought to keep in mind that, compared with the figures during the lean years of the Bennett-Manion regime, we have reduced unemployment by approximately 50 per cent. If we can accomplish that within the space of three years, what may not be done within the space of six years? With the same amount of progress our problem would be entirely solved in another three years.

I desire to inject a note of cheer into a debate which has fairly bristled with pessimism. If we get one cheerful speech from the government side of the house, it is followed by three speeches from the opposition benches where the speakers vie with each other to paint as black a picture as possible. I say as a new member that this has a most depressing effect. I am not worried about the effect it has on us in this house; what troubles me is the effect that it does and must have on citizens generally throughout the dominion. Of all the orations of gloom to which we have been permitted to listen, none excelled that of the hon. member for Kootenay East (Mr. Stevens). When he reached his climax and was so ably describing the actions which he considered should be taken by the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) as captain of the ship of state, it did seem rather a pity that his speech was more or less spoiled by the hon. member for Northumberland, Ontario (Mr. Fraser), interjecting the remark that the hon. member for Kootenay East ought to know, for he had scuttled one ship.

But I was particularly interested in the remarks of the hon. member for Kootenay East (Mr. Stevens) in reference to the difficulties of our farmers. While he was speaking, my mind went back a few years to the time when he and the present leader of the opposition were sitting on the treasury benches, forming part of the government of this country. I remembered that we sold hogs on the Montreal market for $3.85 per 100 pounds, and the finest finished cattle for as low as $3 per 100 pounds. I compared that in my mind with conditions to-day, and recalled that this week hogs sold on the Montreal market for $9.75 per 100 pounds and finished cattle for $7 per 100 pounds, an improvement of considerably more than 100 per cent in the prices paid for these two important products of the farm. I am sure even the hon. member for Kootenay East should agree that the picture is scarcely as black as he would have us believe.

But, Mr. Speaker, this wail of woe comes regularly, without variation, from a number of hon. members from Alberta. Listening to their speeches one would think that in their beautiful province the birds never sing, the clouds have no silver lining, the sun never shines and the flowers never bloom; that they have nothing at all in that wonderful province to be thankful for. But is the situation as bad as all that? They have almost limitless areas of perhaps the most fertile and productive land in the world; they have lakes and rivers; they have timber resources; they have so much coal that you can shovel it out of the hillsides; they have an almost inexhaustible supply of oil; they have railroads and bus lines and beautiful cities—a great, youthful, growing nation in itself. Even this year there was a building boom in the city of Edmonton. They have flocks and herds, which carry off prizes in any competition, and then they always have the hope that one of these days each person will receive a monthly cheque of $25, which, indeed, must be comforting to the people of that province.

It is quite true that each province has its troubles; but troubles and difficulties do not hurt us if we develop the ability to overcome our troubles and surmount our difficulties. It is true that we have our problem of the single transient, but we had that in normal times. We have our single, homeless men in every community, but why do we hear so much about it to-day? One reason is that under the Bennett-Manion regime the then administration instituted the idea that it was the duty of the government to look after these men. When I hear this question being discussed, I always think of the single, homeless men in my own community. I suppose they are in every community, men who came from the old country as boys, who have grown up and have no place they can call home, though many of them have established themselves. I recall that in lean times, a few years ago, these boys would wander away from our community. They would ride the rods; they would try the slave camps, but they would always come back, always without a dollar; and I never knew one of those boys in our community who did not come back to find an open door waiting for him, with a farmer offering him wages to help on the farm. It is true that at times the wages may have been small, but I always noticed that when one farmer was finished with one of those fellows invariably there was another farmer waiting to give him a job.

The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Woodsworth) rather sarcastically referred to what he called a soup-kitchen in Winnipeg, where he told us three thousand men were being fed. I was in Winnipeg at that soup-kitchen when harvesting and threshing were in full swing in Manitoba, and when there was plenty of work. Why, even the high school boys were in the harvest fields; but as I was shown the splendid way they feed those men who call themselves single, homeless transients, it seemed to me like a great haven of rest for men who were too tired to go out and fork sheaves to a separator or follow a binder.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): Shame.

Mr. WARREN: Fancy how a man could loaf the long day through while others toiled, always sure of two good meals of good food and a bed to sleep in at night, knowing that the taxpayer would take care of the cost. I should like to congratulate the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre upon having such a splendid institution in his home city. As I said before, we have always had the problem of the single transient. It may be asked where those men were in the old days, because many of them are actually unemployables. We always had our unemployables. In the old days many of those men would be back on the homestead with a father or a brother, working and worth at least their board and clothing. To-day they are cared for by a generous government.

I was greatly interested in the speech of the hon. member for Yukon (Mrs. Black) and in her inability to control her language when a drifter refused to take a pick-and-shovel job. Evidently the people of that territory, as well as their member, have retained their pioneer spirit and stick to the old truth that if a man will not work neither shall he eat.

I was greatly interested in an article which appeared in the Ottawa Journal of January 23. Evidently there had been some dispute between a gentleman named Tom Moore and Doctor Putman, a controller in the civic government of Ottawa. Doctor Putman had suggested that Mr. Moore was complaining about the hundreds of skilled men who are not able to find employment, and made a suggestion that Mr. Moore should organize a cooperative building association among those skilled mechanics who are idle. Doctor Putman said, in part:

> Find an architect, a business manager, carpenters, bricklayers, plasterers, plumbers, painters and labourers. Let these idle tradesmen build half a dozen semi-detached houses on city owned lots. I will do my utmost to persuade the city to supply all material. When the houses are completed the city will sell them at auction, deduct half the assessed value of the land and the total cost of materials and hand over to Mr. Moore the balance for distribution among the workmen.

I was not particularly interested in that part of the article. The following is the part of the article which attracted my attention:

> Doctor Putman goes on to say he doubts if Mr. Moore knew what he actually said in council or why he felt called upon to say anything. He explains he did so because other speakers in council were giving an impression that "Canada had quite gone to the dogs," that there was no work, young people were in despair, faced the future without hope, that someone, presumably the city council, ought to find jobs for the thousands of fully trained and highly efficient young folk who were eating their hearts out in idleness.

Then Doctor Putman is reported as saying:

> Now to my mind, we have had during the past two years, too much preaching of this pessimistic nonsense. Some of it comes from leaders of youth, some from social workers, some from the pulpit, some from the press and, much of it from cheap politicians. But whatever its source the effect is vicious. It leads youth to think they are victims of circumstances which they cannot control. It tends to make sour their attitude toward society and toward our political and economic structure. It tends to make them lean upon the oars at a time when they ought to lend every effort toward pushing their boat against the stream.

Then the article states:

Canadians held half a continent and numbered eleven millions. There was everything needed to create a paradise on earth, millions of acres of fertile soil only half cultivated, rich deposits of economic and precious minerals, valuable clays, rivers, lakes and sea coasts teeming with fish, fertile protected valleys for raising fruit, great areas of waste lands ready to grow more forests, rich swamp lands begging to be drained. What more could a people ask?

The sun shone, showers descended, grass grew, flowers and fruit ripened, animals thrived, with sheep giving wool, cows giving milk, hens laying eggs, bees gathering honey. What more could the Lord give a people? Whose fault was it if some went hungry and half naked and lived in shacks? Surely it was the fault of the people themselves. Any man who said youth had no chance was ignorant and a worker of mischief.

Doctor Putman challenged his critic to point to any country where youth had a better chance. Was it Germany, Italy, China, Japan or Russia? Or would it be Belgium, Holland or Scandinavia where youths worked long hours for a pittance and ate meat once or twice a week.

This is the spirit of the rural districts, the spirit of the villages, and to a lesser extent, the spirit of the towns. Unfortunately, however, it can scarcely be said to be the spirit of the cities, as expressed by gatherings of mayors who get together to urge that the federal government ought to take over one hundred per cent of the responsibility for relief.

This statement coming from an official of a civic government was to me just like a balmy breeze in the midst of a blizzard. In the rural parts we have our needy; but how do we take care of them? We look after them in the old-fashioned way; the neighbours assist, and the churches help. We have managed to get along in that way. Is it any wonder that we resented the suggestion of the present leader of the opposition who, in his speech at Barry's Bay shortly after his election, said it ought to be the duty of the federal government to bear the whole cost of relief. If we take away all the responsibility from local municipalities, and remove all the incentive on their part to get rid of the burden of relief—

Mr. MANION: I do not wish to interrupt the hon. member, but the other day when the Minister of Labour (Mr. Rogers) was speaking I pointed out the proper report of the speech at Barry's Bay. If the hon. member was not in the house I would suggest that he read my remarks made at that time, because he is now misquoting me.

[Mr. Warren.]

Mr. WARREN: I should be very sorry to misquote the hon. member, but reading the local papers at that time I could not help interpreting the statement as a definite pronouncement of policy.

Mr. MANION: I do not interrupt the hon. member to be discourteous, but I made it very clear the other day that what I said was—and it was so reported by the majority of papers—that the dominion government should take over in greater part the relief costs of unemployment in the cities.

Mr. WARREN: In closing, may I point out that we have made progress. As an indication of the progress being made I would direct the attention of the house to an editorial respecting the county of Carleton which appears in this morning's issue of the Ottawa Journal. I quote:

Once more we can commend Carleton county council and its clerk-treasurer, Mr. H. R. Washington, for a substantial reduction in its public debt. At the end of 1930 Carleton owed the colossal sum of $2,241,469. Eight years later the debt had been reduced by a million dollars to $1,222,034, and in 1939 additional payments will bring it down almost to the million-dollar mark.

By continuing its present policy, restricting new debenture issues to cases of the most exacting necessity, Carleton in another five years will see its public debt almost extinguished, with further important reductions in carrying charges and consequent relief for the taxpayers of the thirteen municipalities that make up the Carleton governmental unit.

What is true of Carleton county is true to a great extent of local rural municipalities throughout Ontario. I might say that some of them are in even much better financial position than the county of Carleton. Then, on the same page appears this further paragraph:

Ottawa's relief rolls in December had 590 fewer families and 2,444 fewer individuals than a year earlier, and for the month relief costs were down by $48,000.

Another item in the same issue quotes Mr. J. A. McLeod, president of the Bank of Nova Scotia, as follows:

President McLeod termed the recently concluded trade agreements between Canada and the United States and the United States and Great Britain "the greatest achievement in reducing trade barriers since the onset of the depression."

And again:

But it was "remarkable" how the economic structure withstood depressing influences. The president said that from the peak in 1937 to the low point in 1938, the decline in industrial production in Canada was only 20 per cent as against 35 per cent in the United States. The drop in factory employment was 9 per cent in Canada compared with a 25 per cent fall in the United States.

Occasionally someone breaks into print with a statement that the church and democracy have failed. At this point I should like to pay tribute to the work of the churches in the district with which I am best acquainted. I do not confine my tribute to any particular denomination. During the past lean years ministers and priests alike have distinguished themselves in helping the needy and trying to solve this problem with which we are faced. I have in mind an Irish priest in Renfrew county in whose parish an agitation had occurred for the distribution of relief. One Sunday morning this priest preached a sermon in the course of which he told his congregation that there would be no relief in his parish. There was no relief and they got along nicely without it. These ministers and priests are still carrying on. When the statement is made that the church has failed or that democracy has failed, quite often no thought is given to the good things with which we are surrounded.

I have noticed that there appears to be an awakening among our younger men, our younger business and professional men. They appear to be more ready to enter into local activities, and there seems to be a keen desire on their part to render service to their communities. It seems to me that with the cooperation of labour, and with a more fearless and aggressive attitude on the part of employers of labour who might make an effort to employ a greater number of labourers, we in this dominion can surmount our difficulties and solve our problems.

Mr. G. E. WOOD (Brant): Mr. Speaker, I desire to follow the hon. member who has preceded me (Mr. Warren) in extending my congratulations to the mover (Mr. Matthews) and the seconder (Mr. Chevrier) of the address in reply to the speech from the throne by his excellency to this House of Commons. I desire also to extend my congratulations to the newly appointed cabinet ministers. I am sure we have every reason to expect that they will represent us as ably as those ministers already appointed to a cabinet which is considered to be one of the most brilliant Canada has ever had.

I desire also to extend my congratulations to the hon. leader of the opposition (Mr. Manion) upon his appointment as head of what is now termed the National Conservative party. He has been receiving so many congratulations lately that he hardly pays any attention to them, but I do want him to know that mine are sincere. I have heard my own leader say that if you want to know what the future has in store for you, you will be wise to take a glimpse at the past. With this thought in mind I have a few kindly suggestions to make to my hon. friend. The Conservative party is very rich in leaders and ex-leaders. I think we shall have to give them at least that much of a break. There are also triplets of would-be leaders, and it will be interesting to watch just what they are going to accomplish in their respective departments. I am of the opinion that the people of Canada, if they look back over the road they have travelled, will be extremely reluctant to place any great responsibility on the shoulders of these hon. gentlemen. I am sure the Canadian people have learned their lesson, and will realize just what problems each of these ex-leaders has left upon the door-steps of the Canadian people.

If we go back into history for a period of twenty-four years, I think we can discover something of the record of the ex-leaders of the Conservative party. Every one of these ex-leaders has left a national problem upon the door-steps of the Canadian people, and I am inclined to the view that this is the reason why they have adopted the name of National Conservative party. In the first place they left us a national debt. During the past twenty-four years there have been twelve years of Conservative administration and twelve years of Liberal administration. During the twelve years of Conservative administration there were deficits totalling $2,441,700,000. The combined deficits of twelve years of Conservative administration amounted to that astronomical sum. During the twelve years of Liberal administration there were deficits totalling $235,000,000, but during that time there were seven years of surpluses which totalled $310,000,000. There was a credit balance in favour of the Liberals amounting to about $75,000,000, representing a reduction in our national debt in consequence of Liberal administration.

I was greatly interested on Sunday night in listening to the radio address of Mr. McCullagh, the publisher of the Globe and Mail. He stressed, quite rightly, the importance of the national debt. He emphasized the fact that so much of the Canadian taxpayers' money was used to carry our national debt. There were many observations which Mr. McCullagh made with which I agreed heartily. I am inclined to the view that he is doing a worthy act by directing the attention of the people to the serious situation that exists. But I want the people to understand the true condition of affairs, so that by taking a look back into the past they may be able to guide and direct their actions in the future. I would say to the leader of the opposition that he and his trio can never expect to win the confidence of the people.

Around 1917 or 1918, when the leader of the opposition was a supporter of the government of that day, we had inflicted upon us another national problem in the form of the Canadian National Railways. Not that I am saying that the intentions were not good, and undoubtedly the Canadian National Railways has given a wonderful service to this dominion. I believe, moreover, that it never gets a fair deal in the press, which is inclined to expose all the shortcomings of the system without giving it credit for the many contributions it has made to the national life of this country. But I can never understand why a company that goes insolvent, when it is taken over by the government as the national railways, was not purchased for what it was worth without all its obligations being assumed. I believe that if we had had sound business administration at that time, the Canadian National Railways would not be the menace to the prosperity of the Canadian people that some are saying it is to-day. So far as I personally am concerned, I rather defend the Canadian National Railways because, although they have a deficit of around one million dollars a week, we must consider the services rendered by the system. It gives us the cheapest freight rate of any transportation system in the world, a rate of less than 98 cents per ton-mile, which I do not think can, at the present time, be paralleled by any other transportation system on this continent.

Furthermore, Mr. Speaker, I am not so sure but that the competitive railway to the Canadian National Railways may be costing us just as much as the Canadian National Railways when one takes into consideration the contributions which the country has made in subsidies to the privately-owned road. I had occasion to refer to the 1938 Year Book, and I saw at page 649 that we have granted in subsidies to the Canadian National Railways, prior to the amalgamation, $98,000,000, and to the Canadian Pacific Railway, $119,000,000; the Canadian National Railways were granted land subsidies of 7,640,000 acres, while the Canadian Pacific Railway was granted 36,956,000 acres. So I really do not believe that the head of the Canadian Pacific Railway has reason to complain very much of the cost to the Canadian people of the Canadian National system. When you sum it all up, I am not so sure but that the Canadian Pacific Railway may be just as guilty of bearing down heavily upon the people of Canada.

I do not wish to be misunderstood. I do not wish it to be thought that I do not view seriously the deficits on our national railway system. On the contrary I believe that every effort should be made to wipe off that deficit. But there are certain facts that I believe should be brought to the attention of the Canadian people. There is the fact that 83 per cent of the stockholders of the Canadian Pacific Railway live outside Canada; and the fact that 75 per cent of the bondholders of the Dominion of Canada live within Canada is one indication that we ought to move very cautiously in doing anything that might interfere with the credit of this dominion in regard to those bonds. So much for the second national problem that was left to us by a Conservative administration.

I come now to the national problem of unemployment, which is considered Canada's greatest national problem. In 1930 we were told by the then leader of the opposition (Mr. Bennett) that if we elected his party to office he was going to cure unemployment or perish in the attempt. I am not doubting at all the sincerity of the predecessor of the present leader of the opposition. In my association with him in the last three years I came to admire him very much. Nevertheless he is human like the rest of us, and liable to make mistakes. It seems to me peculiar that most of the great national mistakes seem to have been made by the Conservative party. My own leader was condemned for a particular speech which he made in the House of Commons in the year 1930. I am not so sure that he was wrong because he did object to this federal government taxing the people of this country and then handing out money for other people to hand out for relief and give something for nothing. That is where the national problem comes in. It is not so much what we have given away but rather the fact that we have destroyed the morale of the people—

Mr. MANION: That was not the attitude of my hon. friend's leader. It was that he would not give anything to any province that was governed by a Conservative administration—not a five-cent piece.

Mr. WOOD: That was the interpretation.

Mr. MANION: No, those were the words.

Mr. WOOD: Our hon. leader was not so short-sighted as that. As far as administrators are concerned, he knew what the future had in store for us. I quite agree that the leader of the opposition and his party lent themselves to distorting that speech for their own ends.

Mr. STEWART: We did not have to distort it.

Mr. WOOD: We have to face this problem of unemployment; I suppose it is not so very necessary to talk about what has been done in the past, except that we should keep it in mind, and I am simply drawing the attention of the people of my riding and of Canada generally to what has taken place. Then, when the time comes, we shall offer our policies to the people and leave them to decide. I have every confidence in the intelligence of the people of Canada, and when they see the road travelled in the past three years by this Liberal administration, there is no doubt what their verdict will be.

Mr. MANION: Hear, hear.

Mr. CRERAR: Hear, hear.

Mr. WOOD: The proof of the pudding is in the eating.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Mr. WOOD: I am very glad hon. gentlemen agree with me on that. Hon. gentlemen opposite have been condemning this government for taking the position that Canada's prosperity largely depends upon our export trade. Remember, Canada is a nation of eleven millions of people, with a great wealth of natural resources, and it is only by marketing those resources of the farm, the forest, the fisheries and the mines, that we can bring back to this dominion the money that is necessary for its development. Have we made any progress in that regard?

In 1935, the year before the present administration came into power, our exports amounted to $69.11 per capita. In 1937 they had risen to $96.23. In 1938, according to the estimate of the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Euler), and assuming our population to be still eleven millions, our export trade had receded slightly to $88 per capita. How does that compare with the export trade of other countries? Great Britain's export trade amounted to $56.83 per capita, and the United States, a country which hon. gentlemen opposite always hold up as an example, and which they try to follow in their policy of exclusionist tariffs, had an export trade amounting to $25.83 per capita. Compare that with our $88 per capita in 1938. That seems to me convincing evidence that a reasonable amount of progress has been made.

After all, the success of any country depends largely upon the prosperity of its internal industries. Money is timid, and if there is anything a man will fight for it is probably the little bit of savings he has. In my opinion it is extremely necessary, even though the leader of the social credit party (Mr. Blackmore) will not agree with me, that money should receive its fair share of reward in our economic life. Let me point out what industry has contributed to the prosperity of the country. In 1935, total dividends paid out by industry amounted to $222,629,000, and in 1938, that had gone up to $315,000,000, or an increase of almost $100,000,000. That represents what industry received as the reward of its efforts. I am not so sure that the employment of labour has wholly kept pace with the rewards of industry, but I might point to another record I have from the bureau of industries—and this relates to my own constituency in particular.

I have the honour to represent a part of the city of Brantford, and so I take this opportunity to show what progress has been made in Brantford city and in the town of Paris. I find that the total number of employees in Brantford in 1935 was 6,002, and in 1936 the number had gone up to 6,384, a pretty fair increase for one year. And what about the wage bill? The wage bill had increased in one year, under Liberal administration, $660,000. Take next the town of Paris, with a population of 4,000. There has been an increase of employees from 1,151, to 1,221, with an increase of $158,219 in the wage bill. And that is only one year. I am satisfied that the figures for 1937 will show a large increase and 1938 will be a long way ahead of 1935.

I have under my hand a bulletin published by the commissioner of the city of Brantford, and I find recorded therein that in two and a half years fifteen new industries have been started—not very large, because all the industries in that community start on a small scale. In that community, if there are any savings the people try to put them back into industry so as to develop an industrial organization that will create goods and services for the people. I do not think we have any reason to be downcast. We are making progress. After listening to the pessimistic speeches of hon. gentlemen opposite, who are always looking down, who have their noses in the gutter all the time, stirring up filth, and who, if there is anything wrong, are great artists in throwing it into our faces, I think it is time to call attention to some of the nice things in this dominion.

For instance, consider the fact that we stand fourth among the exporting nations of the world. We were in the sixth place in 1935; today we are fourth, and though it is true that in 1938 exports may have declined to some extent, it must be remembered that we had a poor crop in 1937. Surely there must be something in the Canadian people; surely there must be some good in the administration of the affairs of the country, when we have been able to find markets and have risen to the fourth place among the nations of the world in selling the products of our labour. These are facts that cannot be denied, and I would ask the leader of the opposition and his followers to peruse these figures carefully and to see if they can honestly rise in their places in this house and indulge in criticism.

Our national debt, it is true, is considerable, but the Liberal party is not responsible for the great portion of it. In 1935 the national debt of the United States was much lower relatively than the national debt of Canada, but to-day our debt is $23 per capita less than the debt in the United States. It has generally been characteristic of our Conservative friends opposite, on all occasions, to hold up the United States as an example, to refer to that country's tariff and the way in which its affairs are administered. But when it comes to an election, those same gentlemen opposite have a way of wrapping themselves up in the flag of loyalty and talking imperialism as though they had a monopoly of the loyalty of Canada. The Liberals, however, prefer, in the matter of administration, to follow the British policy rather than that of the United States. While conditions have been depressed in the past year, if we take into consideration internal and external trade we shall find that Canada's trade has receded only 16 per cent, whereas the trade of the United States has receded 46 per cent. It shows that the Canadian economy is so built up by wise administration as to be able to withstand the impact of conditions such as we have had to face in the past year. These are things the people have a right to know.

At this point I should like to quote a famous authority on trade. I do not want to take up the time of the house in reading extracts, because I do not like to read either my own speeches or the opinions of others. What I have to say is the product of my own mind. I represent the people of Brant; I believe that they sent me here to give expression to the views which I think they hold; and I have always endeavoured to follow that rule. I shall, however, depart from it on this occasion to quote briefly an opinion expressed by Sir George Paish, who has been quoted before. He says:

> Progress has brought railways, steamships, motor cars, airplanes, telephones, telegraphs and the radio. All countries are joined together into a single unit. Why should not each part of the world give what it can to the welfare of the entire world? The result would be amazing prosperity.
> Bear in mind, there is no limit to the possible trade of the world. I am convinced that as soon as we can get things on to the right lines, there will be an expansion of trade such as we have not even dreamed of. There is not one physical thing lacking to bring about a vast expansion of trade. The only thing lacking is mental capacity and courage.

[Mr. Wood.]

The first, and vital, thing is that the nations should trade freely with each other. There is no doubt about it.

The second thing is, again open money markets to the capital and credit needs of the world. You cannot have prosperity unless capital and credit are freely available. The difference between periods of prosperity and periods of depression during the past century came through the fact that when there was confidence, and capital and credit were flowing freely, you had active trade, and when there was no confidence and no movement of capital and credit there were trade depressions.

I am satisfied that if our good friends opposite would be more cautious; if they would refrain from undue criticism and not try to undermine the morale of the people, and if my good friends of the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation and of the Social Credit party would desist from preaching their unsound theories, we should find that money which is now hidden would soon be brought out and would be invested in industry, with the result that there would be an enhanced standard of living, a standard higher even than it is to-day.

I notice that the other day the hon. member for Red Deer (Mr. Poole) made some rather extravagant remarks with regard to the integrity of hon. members on this side of the house, suggesting that every time they voted they must have qualms of conscience. Perhaps he can tell me how a man can conscientiously issue a cheque, knowing that he has nothing in the bank with which to meet it. That is absolutely the theory of social credit; they want to issue money upon the credit of the country, upon its natural resources. But I know that if I issue my cheque and sign my name to it, and have no funds in the bank, there is no use in my telling the judge when I go before him that "I intended to have some here," or "I expect to have a good crop and in two or three years I shall have some money and you can cash my cheque on that." But that, as I see it, is exactly social credit, and nothing else.

Mr. QUELCH: I suggest that the hon. member is deplorably lacking in knowledge of social credit.

Mr. WOOD: I am prepared to admit to the hon. member that I am lacking in understanding of it, although I have tried hard to see whether there was some sound theory in it.

I was brought up in a home where life and religion were taken seriously, where I was taught that wealth was the result and product of labour; that only by the application of labour to our natural resources could you get any results, and that you could not get them before you applied the labour. Failure to recognize that is one of the reasons why we are suffering to-day. I am inclined to take the view that if we had all our people employed in creating national wealth, our difficulties would be solved.

Mr. QUELCH: Why does not the hon. member employ them, then?

Mr. GARDINER: Why does not the hon. member for Acadia (Mr. Quelch) hire one of them?

Mr. WOOD: Personally I am employing all I can afford to employ. As the hon. member has raised the question, let me say that I believe it is the duty of those of us who are in a position to employ labour to endeavour to do so. I commend the Minister of Labour (Mr. Rogers) for having drawn attention the other day to that point. Industry must rise to the occasion. I have drawn attention to the fact that they have received this year in dividends around $319,000,000, and I believe it is their duty to put into employment some of the unemployed men in their particular communities.

I remember that when I was a boy my father spoke of a depression which existed in the early nineties. At that time 60 per cent of the population of the dominion lived on farms and only 40 per cent in the cities. What happened? Did the farmers put these men on relief? No; during the winter these men snuggled in, did chores and cut wood so that they would start at least on equal terms the next spring, go out to work for eight months and get wages. But we have lost that pioneer spirit. Until we get back to some of the sober realities of life, we shall never come out of this depression. You cannot continue to mollycoddle people and give them something for nothing. I am inclined to think that it is just as wrong to take money from some people and hand it to others without any return, as it is to take something for nothing.

I notice that the service clubs have taken a great interest in the problem of unemployed youth. I believe that if they would organize in various cities and endeavour to meet the needs of these people, there are many things they could do. So far as men with money are concerned, there are plenty of farms they could buy, and they could put some of these men now on relief upon the farms. This would increase the value of the farms, and I believe those who took this course would eventually be rewarded. But if people who have means do not rise to the occasion and make some voluntary effort towards the employment of the unfortunate people in the cities, I hate to think what the future has in store for us. If the unemployed continue to increase, they will eventually have power and will attempt to try out some of the isms which are advocated by our friends opposite. The advocates of these isms may be sincere. I am not going to question their sincerity—I think a great deal of these hon. members personally—but I know what would happen if ever their isms were put into effect. There has always been a group of people who are never satisfied with the existing condition of affairs; not that they ever do anything to make them better, but they have acquired the habit of finding fault with everything, of always looking down in the gutter to find something wrong. You may change your economic system—as far as I am concerned I do not care what kind of system we have; I made a living in the past and can make one in the future—but you would have the same people then complaining about the new economic system who are complaining about the present one; for if you have it in you, you are going to rise to the top, no matter what kind of system is in operation; and if you have not, the only thing those who are more fortunate can do is to take you by the hand and help you along.

A great deal has been said with regard to the unfortunate position we are supposed to be in. While I am making an honest defence of the government, I am not saying that everything is right. Everything never was right. But I do believe it would be wise for us to draw attention to some of the good things we have to-day. Something has been said about the standard of living. In my view there is no such thing as "a" standard of living; we have eleven million people and eleven million standards of living. Be that as it may, let me remark that there are some men who would get $20 a week and by the time they were fifty years old would be prosperous; others, although receiving the same income, would always be poor. So I do not believe there is any way of defining what a standard of living is. The fact of the matter is that the Canadian people to-day have the highest standard of living of any country in the world; I do not think we need take second place even to the United States. Do you know, Mr. Speaker, that for every eight people in the Dominion of Canada there is a car or a truck? You could load everybody in the dominion in a car or truck and get them right out of this country without making a second trip. In only one other country can that be done, and that is the United States; they have one car or truck to five people.

It may be our good friends across the way would like to go to Russia or Spain or some other country and enjoy the fruits of the economic system there. In Russia, where one rides one hundred and fifty walk; in Germany, where one rides ten walk. The hon. member for Red Deer made allusion to the fact that Germany did not have any unemployment, and recommended that we take a leaf out of Germany's book. Let us admit they have no unemployment in Germany, but neither have we any forced labour or compulsory military service to keep our people employed. I think hon. members should be very cautions about making such statements. In the constituency that I represent, Brant, there are more cars registered than there are in some of the countries of central Europe.

We ought to appreciate some of the good things we have in Canada. There is a radio in practically every second home in the dominion. We enjoy many of the luxuries of life which are not obtainable in other countries, and I think it will be just as wise if, instead of refusing to show appreciation of the advantages we have, we take into consideration some of the blessings we enjoy. The fact is that we have so many blessings and such a high standard of living that we think we are entitled to them without making very much effort. I do not think there is a country in the world where people can make a living with as little effort as in Canada. I notice the hon. member for Weyburn (Mr. Douglas) muttering something over there; I do not know what it is.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): The hon. gentleman should try his hand on a homestead in Saskatchewan.

Mr. WOOD: Can the hon. member for Weyburn speak from experience? I am quite willing to start at scratch with him at any place, if he will take me on. I think I know something of pioneer life. I am a grandson of one of the old pioneers. We were brought up on oatmeal porridge and the bible. We hear a great deal about the youth movement. I had the advantage of a good father and mother, who have since passed away. I do not want to say anything unkind, because they were the very best; but they used to wear the high top-boots, and, believe me, they could start a good youth movement themselves. No; I have my doubts as to whether the hon. member for Weyburn has ever done a good day's work in his life. I am prepared to admit that he has the ability—

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): I should like to inform the hon. gentleman that I did something he probably never did; I served my time in a trade and am a member of a trade union. I have done not one day's but a good many days' work in my life, and after having done so I have never spent my time in making fun of other people.

[Mr. Wood.]

Mr. WOOD: I would not want to take away any credit that the hon. member really deserves, because I feel that he will need all the credit he has in order to carry him through. I was merely speaking from my own observations and the general opinion I had formed of him. I grant that he has ability; he is a member of the cloth, and I want to tell him that he and I are on common ground in our religious views. But, sometimes, when one of the family goes wrong, it makes one feel the worst, and I feel that perhaps the hon. member for Weyburn would make a greater contribution in his chosen profession than he could make as a member of this House of Commons.

Now, Mr. Speaker, perhaps I have taken up all the time to which I am entitled.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Go on.

Mr. MANION: The house sits until eleven.

Mr. WOOD: In passing, I must say I am sorry Hansard has to take down everything I say, but I have a personal connection with the leader of the opposition (Mr. Manion), because I know some of his family and he knows some of mine.

Mr. MANION: We shall not tell on each other.

Mr. WOOD: The hon. member for St. Paul's (Mr. Ross) the other day made a remark in which he emphasized some of the difficulties facing the city of Toronto. Well, Toronto has the highest tax rate of any city in Ontario. I know they are having some difficulties, but they enjoy more luxuries in that city than in other parts of the country, and I do not think they should object to paying for the privileges they enjoy. They want to get out from under their debt, but they want the rest of us to assume some portion of it. I had occasion to go through the records concerning the province of Ontario, and I found that Toronto had a per capita tax rate of $66.40. Next highest was the city from which the leader of the opposition comes, with $63.60. That might be a fairly good warning to the Canadian people; if that is the way he has left the city of Fort William, we should be very cautious about inviting him to administer the affairs of this country.

Mr. MANION: I left Fort William some time ago.

Mr. WOOD: The city of Brantford had a per capita tax rate of $46.70 while the rate in the township in which I live was $20. The hon. member for Renfrew North (Mr. Warren) mentioned the fact that some of the rural municipalities have led the way in good financing. I would say that at least they have refrained from going into debt, and it might be a good thing if some of our cities would adopt the more frugal methods that are followed in some of these one-horse towns, as they are often called. If you are going into debt, you should assume the obligation of endeavouring to repay that debt. I agree with Mr. McCullagh in one thing, at least; I believe we can pay our debts if we really take steps toward that end, and we should see to it that we do not go further in debt. I agree with the policy of paying our way as we go.

Well, Mr. Speaker, since you have seen fit to give me the time, I am going to direct attention to how we spend our money. In 1937 we had a national income of $5,000,000,000, and how did we spend it? We spent about $1,000,000,000 for government, federal, provincial and municipal. Of that amount some $300,000,000 went for interest on our debts. We spent $135,000,000 for education, $100,000,000 for relief, $58,000,000 for soldiers' pensions and $38,000,000 for old age pensions, of which over $28,000,000 was contributed by the federal government and a little over $9,000,000 by the provincial governments. We spent $35,000,000 on defence. The balance went for hospitalization, administration of justice and other services.

As I have said, we spent $1,000,000,000 for government. How did we spend the other $4,000,000,000? We spent about $1,000,000,000 for food; about $500,000,000 for clothing, which amounted to only about 13 cents per capita a day; about $300,000,000 for housing; about $200,000,000 for furniture, and $300,000,000 for fuel. In other words, we spent about $2,000,000,000 on food, clothing and shelter. This resumé was taken from Toronto Saturday Night and was prepared by Mr. W. A. Kague. I am not going to be responsible for its accuracy, but I did check many of these figures with the Canada Year Book, and found them to be approximately correct.

As I have said, we spent $1,000,000,000 for government and $2,000,000,000 for food, clothing and shelter, leaving $2,000,000,000 to be accounted for, in connection with what might be termed non-essentials. How did we spend that money? In the first place we spent $300,000,000 on automobiles, some of which no doubt are quite necessary. We spent $125,000,000 for liquor, half of which of course returned to the revenue of the country. We spent $90,000,000 for tobacco; $45,000,000 for theatres, and $45,000,000 for other amusements, including $25,000,000 for horse-racing, baseball and other games. We spent $150,000,000 for doctors and lawyers. I do not know how much the leader of the opposition got out of that, but I believe he would be better practising his profession than in endeavouring to try to cure the ills of the country.

There is one point to which I should like to draw attention, and that is that we spent $10,000,000 more on the church than we did on tobacco. We spent $100,000,000 on the church; $60,000,000 for books, magazines and newspapers, and $50,000,000 for telephone and telegraph services. We spent $100,000,000 on the tourist traffic, while at the same time $250,000,000 was spent on tourist travel in Canada. We pay to banks, insurance companies and brokerage and other financial services. We buy musical instruments, sporting goods and jewellery. We support the barber, and various other tradesmen.

But what I do say is this, that I believe we can assume the obligation which has been placed upon us. I do not think there is any short-cut to it except to get down to business. We may have to sacrifice some of these non-essentials, but I think any hon. member who will take the trouble to make a comparison with any other country of the world will find out that the Canadian people do enjoy a higher standard of living, higher possibly than that of any other group of people. As I have said, unfortunately we have the poor; they are always with us. It is our duty to do our bit towards trying to assist them to get back to the sober realities of life, even though this means sacrifice to ourselves.

I should like to thank you, Mr. Speaker, for this extension of time. May I say in closing to the leader of the opposition—and it is described as His Majesty's Loyal Opposition: Be loyal to Canada. Be frank and truthful, and if you are going to tell some of the facts, tell all the facts. We know there are some unfortunate conditions, but I believe we should blend with them some of those fortunate things the people of Canada do enjoy.

Mr. JOSEPH H. LECLERC (Shefford) (Translation): Mr. Speaker, at this stage of the debate on the address in reply to the speech from the throne I do not wish to trespass unduly on the valuable time of the house. I desire first of all to congratulate the hon. members who proposed and seconded the address on their excellent performance of this important task. My special congratulations go to the young and modest member for Stormont (Mr. Chevrier) who has done honour to his constituency. On behalf of my compatriots of Quebec province I am happy to offer him my respectful homages and to salute in him a public man who is at the threshold of a promising career.

I also wish to offer my congratulations to the two ministers who have just recently joined the cabinet, as well as to the new leader of His Majesty's Loyal Opposition (Mr. Manion) to whom I wish a long tenure of office.

Mr. Speaker, the government deserves commendation for its constant efforts to re-establish normal conditions in this country. I am pleased to note the keen interest the King government is taking in the training of our youth. Once it is better understood and practically administered, the youth training plan will certainly prove very useful.

I am certain that the new trade agreement with the United States will prove of great benefit to the farmers of the eastern townships in the sale of their products, particularly maple sugar. On the whole, 1938 has not been too bad a year for agriculture; prices kept up satisfactorily until the end of the summer, but there is room for improvement. However, there is a dark side to the question; that is over-production of dairy products, particularly of butter. Although our exports in 1938 were practically at the same level as in 1937, we had in storage at the beginning of the present winter an abnormal quantity of butter which brought about a decline in price and afforded our opponents an opportunity to make political capital with the aid of unsound arguments.

In his speech of January 20, the hon. member for Carleton (Mr. Hyndman) said that the price of butter, in December last, was only 21 cents a pound, compared to 26 cents in December, 1935, and he ascribed that decline to our imports of last winter. Seeing that Tories use that argument from one end of the country to the other in order to mislead the farmers, let me, sir, give the actual facts. The hon. member for Carleton may be in good faith, but he evidently does not know anything about the subject because his statement is not borne out by the facts. It is true, as the hon. member said, that we imported last winter, from New Zealand and Australia, 4,271,373 pounds of butter. But does he know that, at that time, we were short of 10 million pounds for the ordinary needs of the country; that, as a result, the retail price of butter jumped to more than 40 cents a pound, and that a number of organizations of housewives in our large cities decided to boycott that product?

Imports are harmful when they hurt the producer; they are justified when they have the effect of protecting the consumer. Had we not imported butter, last winter, who would have benefited by the high price, which would have jumped to 50 cents a pound and even higher? The farmers would certainly not have derived any benefit from it, for, during that period, butter production was at its lowest; speculators would then have reaped huge profits at the expense of consumers, and prices would have become prohibitive for the labouring classes.

Mr. Speaker, judging by the speech delivered by the hon. member for Carleton, it would appear that quite a number of members of this house do not have the slightest knowledge of dairying. If I may be permitted to use a financial term, I should say that in the case of butter the fiscal year ends with the month of April. At that time of the year, the stocks in storage are usually at their lowest. The year's production begins on May 1, when any large surplus may have a depressing influence upon the new butter-making season.

Mr. Speaker, in order to prove conclusively to the house and to the farmers of this country that the imports of last winter have not affected the prices now prevailing, I may say that on May 1, 1938, there were only 4,677,240 pounds of butter in storage in Canada, as compared with 6,125,243 pounds on the same date in 1937, when no imports had been made. The year 1938-39 thus began under the best possible conditions, there being only a minimum quantity of butter in storage and no imports having been made since that date. If the hon. member had seriously wanted to enlighten the electors of this country, he could easily have looked into the reasons for the drop in the price of butter since the beginning of this winter. The first of these reasons is to be found in the abundance of rain and in the excellent condition of pastures during the season of 1938 which have resulted in an increase of over 20 million pounds in the production of creamery butter, with no corresponding increase in consumption. The second lies in the high prices of butter during the winter of 1938, which caused a large number of people to speculate in the hope of reselling their butter at the top prices of last winter. It would be interesting to know the number of merchants, business men, professional men and others in our rural communities who have speculated in butter, and bought last June at 25 and 26 cents, thus holding prices above the export price at a time when we should have been shipping our surplus production. If it had not been for that speculative craze, the price of butter would have fluctuated normally. We would have exported our surplus production which has disturbed the market since the beginning of the winter, and the Christmas and New Year holidays would have been better enjoyed by the speculators. But they should feel happier at the thought that the money they have lost in speculation has fallen into the pockets of the farmers and buttressed the prices during the season of abundant production, which is better than the high prices in winter and low prices in summer which we had been getting from 1931 to 1934.

Mr. Speaker, while I have made clear the causes which have affected the market for that product during 1938, it does not necessarily follow that I am content with allowing the price of butter to find its own level, as dairying is the main branch of the farming industry in Canada, and the one on which the greatest number of Canadian farmers are dependent. That industry deserves more consideration than it has received in the past.

I am pleased to notice the interest which my fellow members, especially those from the eastern townships, are taking in that matter. But were I alone in promoting the interests of that industry and of the farmers who depend upon it, I would do it apart from every political consideration. Liberalism is broad enough to allow its representatives to hold views which they consider in the general interest. I hope that before the end of this session the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) will realize the necessity of creating an organization empowered to fix a minimum price for our dairy products and to export any surplus left over and above the country's requirements.

Following this brief analysis of the present situation of the dairy industry in this country, allow me, Mr. Speaker, before resuming my seat, to define my attitude on another burning question, the question of immigration, concerning which many petitions have been received. In spite of the deep sympathy we feel for certain persecuted peoples, we must remember that charity begins at home. We have enough unfortunates to help at home without opening our doors to those from abroad.

On motion of Mr. Golding the debate was adjourned.

On motion of Mr. Lapointe (Quebec East) the house adjourned at 10.47 p.m.

Friday, January 27, 1939

POWERS OF COMMITTEES

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister) moved:

That the standing committees of this house shall severally be empowered to examine and inquire into all such matters and things as may be referred to them by the house and to report from time to time their observations and opinions thereon, with power to send for persons, papers and records.

Motion agreed to.

EUROPEAN SITUATION

QUESTION OF PUBLISHING OF CORRESPONDENCE RELATING TO CRISIS OF SEPTEMBER 1938—TABLING OF WHITE PAPER

On the orders of the day:

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): The hon. leader of the opposition (Mr. Manion) inquired some days ago as to the possibility of publishing correspondence between the British and Canadian governments dealing with the international situation of last September. The hon. member stated that he excluded confidential information. In reply I stated that I should be glad to communicate with the British government to ascertain to what extent if at all they considered the correspondence should be made public. I added that it would be realized that the correspondence in question contained references to other countries, and it was not the practice to produce correspondence of this nature.

I at once communicated to the British government the substance of the question and answer. I now have a reply, which indicates that in the view of the government of the United Kingdom the telegrams in question, so far as they have not been published, belong to a class of correspondence which it has generally been agreed could not be published without detriment to the system of full exchange of information between his majesty's governments on foreign affairs. I can only say that on review of the documents in question I concur in this view.

It will be recalled that an extensive compilation of documents on the Czechoslovak crisis was issued by the government of the United Kingdom as a white paper, and presented to the parliament at Westminster on September 28. The same collection was printed and made public on the same day in Canada. The government thought that hon. members would wish to have this information at once, so the document containing the correspondence as compiled and printed was mailed to all members of parliament. Additional copies are available if desired. They can be had from the Department of External Affairs.

I now table the white paper as issued in Canada.

It may be of interest to the house to know that there was a comment in a leading Paris newspaper, Le Temps, regarding the French version of the white paper in question, to the effect that it was interesting that the most complete version in French of the official documents bearing on the crisis had been issued at Ottawa rather than at Paris.

TRADE AGREEMENTS

UNITED KINGDOM-UNITED STATES-CANADA—STATEMENT IN REPLY TO REQUEST FOR TABLING OF CORRESPONDENCE

On the orders of the day:

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): I might also answer another question of the hon. leader of the opposition (Mr. Manion) in respect to the preliminary correspondence relating to the trade agreements. An examination of the files of official correspondence with the government of the United Kingdom concerning the trade negotiations with the United States has confirmed my impression that we could not reasonably request the government of the United Kingdom to agree to the publication of that correspondence which, in accordance with established usage, has been treated as confidential.

By way of explanation I might add, in the first place, that the original United Kingdom approach to the government of Canada in the matter was paralleled by similar and simultaneous inquiries of other empire governments as to whether they would severally agree to facilitate the successful conclusion of the contemplated trade negotiations between the United Kingdom and the United States by concurring in the requisite modifications of certain margins of preference guaranteed in their agreements with the United Kingdom. Publication of such preliminary correspondence would therefore require the consent, not only of the government of the United Kingdom but of all the other empire governments concerned.

Secondly it may be observed that the understanding finally reached between Canada and the United Kingdom regarding the extent to which they were each prepared to agree to modifications in the margins of preference which they respectively enjoyed in the markets of the other country was effected by the exchange of letters between the High Commissioner for the United Kingdom and myself, which have been tabled as an annexed document to the Canada-United States trade agreement. This understanding was arrived at in the course of the prolonged and complicated negotiations which Canada and the United Kingdom were simultaneously conducting with the United States. It represents the outcome of a confidential correspondence between governments, supplemented by discussions from time to time during the year that led up to the signing of the trade agreements.

In the light of these explanations it will, I trust, be understood why the government does not feel itself in a position to table any of the preliminary correspondence requested.

Hon. H. H. STEVENS (Kootenay East): I am not going to presume to express any view regarding the question of the leader of the opposition (Mr. Manion), who is absent to-day, but one point occurs to me which I think is important. The Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) referred to or declared that there had been a definite request by the British government, and it seems to me that when a reference such as that is made in the house, under the rules we are entitled to the particular document upon which such statement is based. As a fact disclosed in the statement is of very great importance in coming to a proper understanding of the whole agreement, I think that document at least should be tabled. For the moment I am not saying anything further with regard to the answer of the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King); we will leave that until the leader of the opposition returns, but I would like to direct the Prime Minister's attention to that particular document.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: As I recall what was said by the Minister of Agriculture, and possibly he could verify this, I did not understand that he was quoting from any document at all. I agree with my hon. friend that no hon. member should quote from a document unless he is prepared to table the document itself.

Mr. STEVENS: If my right hon. friend will permit me, I did not say the minister quoted from the document. He made the statement that the government of Canada had been requested by the British government to do certain things, which I contend brings it under the rule.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I do not think there is anything to add to the statement I have just given the house. I think it answers the question of my hon. friend and makes it quite clear that there were requests made on the part of the British government not to the government of Canada alone but to other governments of the British empire. Undoubtedly it would be that request that would be referred to by the Minister of Agriculture.

Hon. GROTE STIRLING (Yale): In connection with the statement just made by the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King), may I direct a question to the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Euler). Speaking the other day he said:

> Our preference is suspended only until such time as the treaty between United States and Great Britain may be terminated.

He was asked:

> Is that stated in any British agreement, in black and white?

Then he referred to the fact that it was in the exchange of notes between Canada and the United Kingdom. Does that therefore fall within the category referred to by the Prime Minister, and may we not be informed as to the details?

Hon. W. D. EULER (Minister of Trade and Commerce): I should think not; I believe that could be very well tabled when the agreement itself comes up.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: It is already a part of the correspondence tabled.

FOREIGN PROPAGANDA

REPORTED CONNECTION BETWEEN GERMAN GOVERNMENT OFFICIALS AND NAZI PROPAGANDA IN MANITOBA

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. S. WOODSWORTH (Winnipeg North Centre): According to a statement made in one of a series of articles published by the Winnipeg Tribune—

> A direct tie-up between German government officials and Nazi propaganda in Manitoba is revealed by records in the office of the provincial secretary of Manitoba—

Does this statement, with the accompanying evidence, (1) indicate that the present and previous German consuls have exceeded their diplomatic privileges; and (2) warrant an official investigation into such subversive activities in Canada?

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): My hon. friend was kind enough to give me a copy of his question before the house met, together with a copy of the Winnipeg Tribune which contains the evidence, so called, to which the question refers. I am sorry that I have not had time to look through the Tribune; therefore I am not in a position to answer my hon. friend's question categorically to-day; but I would say to him that activities of the kind to which he refers in his question have been drawn to the attention of the government from time to time and have been and are being investigated. Some time later I shall have a statement to make to the house on the matter, but I think that is as far as I can go at the moment.

SEED GRAIN

INQUIRY AS TO PROPOSED MEASURES FOR SUPPLYING OF SEED IN WESTERN CANADA

On the orders of the day:

Mr. E. E. PERLEY (Qu'Appelle): In view of the fact that it is almost February 1 and the farmers in western Canada will soon require their seed for the 1939 crop, would the Minister of Finance (Mr. Dunning) make a statement as to when he proposes to bring in a measure which will provide for the supplying of seed; and will he assure the house that there will be no delay in furnishing the seed this year, as there was last year?

Hon. CHARLES A. DUNNING (Minister of Finance): I think my hon. friend knows that is scarcely a proper question to address to the government on the orders of the day. Does my hon. friend mean that there is a situation which demands dominion financing, in the same manner that was adopted a year ago? The hon. gentleman implies that such is the case, but I have no evidence that there is any condition as serious as that which warranted the action taken a year ago.

Mr. PERLEY: Would the minister inform the house, then, if he has had any requests from the provincial governments, from any associations or municipalities or from other bodies, with respect to seed?

Mr. DUNNING: Such requests might not come to me, but in any case I have had none personally.

DOMINION ELECTIONS

APPOINTMENT OF RETURNING OFFICERS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. F. E. LENNARD (Wentworth): I should like to ask the government from what political group or groups the 245 returning officers recently appointed were chosen.

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): I think my hon. friend will have to find that out for himself.

GOVERNOR GENERAL'S SPEECH

CONTINUATION OF DEBATE ON ADDRESS IN REPLY

The house resumed from Thursday, January 26, consideration of the motion of Mr. J. E. Matthews for an address to His Excellency the Governor General in reply to his speech at the opening of the session, and the proposed amendment thereto of Mr. Manion, and the amendment to the amendment of Mr. Woodsworth.

Mr. W. H. GOLDING (Huron-Perth): Mr. Speaker, at the outset I want to extend to my hon. friend the leader of the official opposition in this house (Mr. Manion) my sincere congratulations upon having been chosen for that important position. I congratulate him also upon his recent election and his reentry into this house. The party of which he is now leader has had a great deal to do with the shaping of the history of this dominion, and it is a very high honour to be chosen as its leader. The hon. gentleman is an aggressive exponent of his party's cause, and I know he will put forth his best efforts to lead it to victory. The first time I came into personal contact with the force of his aggressiveness was during my own by-election campaign in Huron South in 1932; and I want to go on record now as expressing the hope that in the years to come his aggressiveness will meet with the same success that it met with on that occasion.

Then, too, with all others who have spoken I want to extend my congratulations to the mover (Mr. Matthews) and the seconder (Mr. Chevrier) of the motion now before the house. Both these hon. gentlemen made excellent, constructive speeches, and they are deserving of all the congratulations which have been offered during the course of this debate.

I should like also to extend my congratulations to the two hon. gentlemen who were recently appointed to the cabinet. I believe that both these hon. members will fulfil the duties of the offices to which they have been assigned, and will prove to be a credit to their constituencies, to the government, and to the country.

Then, too, on behalf of the citizens whom I have the honour to represent, I should like to take this opportunity of expressing to Their Majesties the King and Queen the appreciation of the people of my constituency for their having graciously consented to visit our country in the coming summer. I believe this is the first time in the history of Canada that royalty will have visited our shores, and I can assure them that from the people of the counties of Huron and Perth they will receive a loyal welcome.

I am sure everyone interested in the welfare of Canada must have been deeply impressed with the full and able presentation of our whole general situation which was so splendidly made by the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) in his very excellent address, and by the other members of the government who have spoken in this debate. It must be gratifying to every hon. member and to all the citizens of Canada to know that notwithstanding many disturbing and serious factors which have arisen in the last year and a half, Canada has maintained a steady position. I am glad to know this, because I have been interested in seeing each of the cabinet ministers make a success of the administration of his particular department. I believe that is the desire which has been widespread throughout Canada. Indeed shortly after the last federal election, when the personnel of the cabinet was announced by the Prime Minister, there seemed to be general satisfaction and a feeling that a body of studious and reliable men had been selected to carry on the business of our country. Indeed the announcement was received with general approval, because it was felt that in the cabinet we had a group of men who knew conditions in Canada and who could be relied upon to deal with them in a sound, sensible and businesslike way. Now, after a little more than three years in office, the confidence in the ministry is greater than it was when they received their appointments, with the result that during the past three years business men throughout Canada have confidently endeavoured to extend their business, in order to restore prosperity to our country, and to overcome the feeling of pessimism and hopelessness which had settled over us after a taste of a depression which, I believe we all agree, was unprecedented. I believe the confidence which has been so apparent is attributable in no small degree to the splendid way in which Canada's business has been managed by the Prime Minister and his worthy colleagues. If one had the time to deal with each department he would find that these ministers have worked early and late, keeping a close watch over all the activities of their departments, in order to give Canada a sound business administration, and also to prove themselves worthy of the confidence reposed in them by the Prime Minister.

In the past three years we have followed the visits of our ministers to other countries. In a quiet and effective way they have been endeavouring to arrange trade agreements with this and that country, making it perfectly plain that they are willing to buy as well as to sell in order to restore our trade, and thus endeavouring to improve the position of our agriculturists and our industrialists, and to assist in removing one of our greatest problems, namely unemployment. Time will not permit me to deal with each department separately and to say what I should like to say about the Prime Minister and each of his cabinet colleagues. I do take this opportunity, however, publicly to express my confidence in them, to congratulate them upon their success so far and to give them full credit for what they have been able to accomplish in a little more than three years in this parliamentary term. Particularly do I extend my congratulations to those who are serving in the government for the first time.

In this debate I believe hon. members are permitted to deal with the general situation in Canada. In the few moments at my disposal I wish to refer particularly to our financial position, and to our position in connection with trade. May I first congratulate our good friend the Minister of Finance (Mr. Dunning) upon his restoration to health, and also upon the accuracy of his budget forecasts in the past three years. I believe that in the Minister of Finance the government is fortunate in having the right man in the right place, and that under his supervision the financial affairs of Canada will be well and faithfully guarded.

I know that at the present time under the circumstances which exist the government is being compelled to make expenditures that it would be very glad not to make. But in view of the tremendous burden of taxation and debt we are now struggling to carry it becomes the duty of every hon. member to rally to the support of the Minister of Finance, to help him in his effort to practise economy and thus relieve our people of some of their burden. I believe the time has come, indeed it is long overdue, when the federal government and all other governing bodies in Canada will have to be more considerate and adopt policies more generous to the taxpayer.

In many of the speeches in the house we hear appeals to the government to be more generous with this or that class or with this or that proposal, but we all too seldom hear an appeal to be more generous with the taxpayer. It seems to me it should not be necessary to warn the members of the house that even with the splendid upturn of business we have had we cannot now balance our budget; just what hope, then, can we hold out to our people of ever being able to relieve them of this burden, one which is already almost too great to be borne? I fully appreciate the fact that the government is extremely anxious to adopt a policy not only of pay-as-you-go but also of reducing our debt, which has been piling up year after year. I confidently believe this can be done, provided the government has the backing and sympathy of its supporters in the movement. It seems to me that if we are going to be fair to those who have placed us in our present position we ought to endeavour to manage Canada's business just as carefully and economically as if it were our own. If we do that certainly we will not be encouraging the government to make expenditures running into millions of dollars which cannot be met out of revenue and which through interest charges add to our burden of taxation. If we were to conduct our own private business in this manner we would soon reach the place where we would not be able to operate at all. We must not forget that governments, whether they be municipal, provincial or federal, are not unlike individuals in this respect. If we continue to spend more than our income, sooner or later we will not be able to operate and will be facing bankruptcy.

We have all heard it stated by certain journalists and speakers that our politicians are wholly and entirely to blame for the financial position in which the country now finds itself. Indeed, there are some speakers who seem to think it clever to belittle those who represent them in a public way, whether it be in the municipal council, in the county council, in the provincial legislature or in this federal house. It seems to be the procedure of some to try to create suspicion and distrust of those who are in public life, no matter in what capacity. Constructive criticism is necessary and is one of the finest things we can have, but if this carping and destructive personal criticism, this attempt to undermine and cast suspicion on our public men, is continued on a wholesale scale, it will eventually lead to revolution of one kind or another. It has always seemed strange to me that a person in a profession or in any other walk of life may be a respected citizen to-day, but if he enters politics to-morrow, every word that he utters and everything he does will be viewed with suspicion. This condition is an unfortunate one and should not exist.

In every municipality, in every country, citizens of integrity and honesty are needed to fill the positions of public trust and to represent the people in the administration of public affairs. But I am afraid that if this kind of criticism is continued the time will come when it will be very hard to persuade citizens of the desirable type to accept these positions. I wonder if we ourselves are not partly to blame? In this house we vote millions of dollars for the relief of the unemployed and at the same time we tell the country that nothing is being done for these people. I think we should make it perfectly clear that while we differ seriously and strenuously and honestly in regard to policy and matters which we think affect the welfare of the people, there is no reason why those who differ with us should be called crooks and rogues or other similar names. There is no doubt that among politicians, as among other classes of citizens, there are good and bad, but I do think that those who fill their positions honestly and conscientiously should be given credit.

As I say, I am inclined to agree with the statement that politicians, both past and present, are largely to blame for the financial position in which the country now finds itself. But we should not overlook the fact that the people themselves are not wholly free from blame. There is no governing body to-day that is not being continually petitioned to extend services of one sort or another and to do things here and there, all of which increase taxation and debt. Therefore I submit that we must all accept our share of this responsibility.

However, setting aside for the moment the debatable question as to who is responsible, I must confess that when I endeavour to make a survey of our financial structure, I cannot help but be alarmed. I believe that if we are ever going to be able to give any relief to our people, definite steps must be taken to set our house in order. First, drastic reductions must be made in our expenditures. Second, we must eliminate all overlapping services as between the federal and provincial governments. Third, there must be a gradual reduction in tariffs and all other forms of taxation on consumer goods. Fourth, we must endeavour in every way possible to promote and extend our trade in order to assist in the solving of our railway and unemployment problems. Fifth, we must keep firm control over relief expenditures.

I should like to express this opinion. I believe that if this government ever undertakes to assume full responsibility for relief, if it ever takes away this responsibility from the municipalities, at that moment you can say good-bye to the solvency of this country. I say that after twenty years of municipal experience. I do not believe there is any body in this country that is better able to keep a finger on the relief situation than the municipal councils. Therefore I would warn the government, the opposition and all others in this house to be very careful about taking over that problem. This country cannot afford to finance the necessary machinery to keep full control over relief across the dominion.

Both the government and the Minister of Finance (Mr. Dunning) are extremely anxious to practise economy and to put this nation upon its feet financially. I submit that we as members can assist them materially in doing this. It is our duty to do it because if we are to give any consideration to the problems which confront us we must realize how essential it is, if we are to expect our agriculturists and industrialists to compete in the markets of the world in selling their products, that taxation be reduced in order to reduce the cost of production. When I was a boy on the farm—I am sure many hon. members who have had practical experience in farming can recall this also—farm prices were much lower than they are at the present time. Notwithstanding that fact, our farmers were making steady progress because their overhead costs were also much lower. Generally speaking, farming in those days was more prosperous than it is in these modern times. That is why I contend that we should endeavour in every way to reduce the cost of production.

I appreciate fully the fact that practising economy alone is not sufficient. Confining our efforts simply to the balancing of the budget might mean impoverishment and hardship to many. We must consider other plans and policies that will assist in solving our problems. In the first place, we must recognize the fact that this is an agricultural country. Our first consideration should be for the welfare of our agriculturists. I am persuaded that we are not going to solve our problems by carrying on a large program of public works, by endeavouring to promote extensive housing schemes, or by adopting a definite policy in regard to advanced social legislation. I agree that there is a great deal of merit in many of these things and that they are deserving of serious consideration, yet I believe that the solution of our problems lies largely in the adoption of a policy which will put agriculture on a paying basis. If we could accomplish that, I am perfectly satisfied that our unemployment problem would dwindle to the vanishing point, and the Minister of Labour (Mr. Rogers), who has now one of the heaviest burdens to bear in this government, would be relieved of that particular burden. In passing I should like to say that in my opinion no more honest, no more conscientious man has ever filled the portfolio of labour in this country than the present minister. He is endeavouring to do a good job. During the last parliament I listened to criticism directed against the Minister of Labour of that day, and I felt then, as I do now, that the portfolio of labour is not a desirable one, and that any minister of labour, no matter what he does, will be criticized.

Canada, Mr. Speaker, is an exporting nation. I have always believed, notwithstanding any talk to the contrary, that the prosperity of Canada depends largely on our ability to negotiate trade agreements with other countries, and therefore I wholeheartedly agree with my right hon. leader and with the policy of the Liberal party of endeavouring to promote trade with foreign as well as empire countries. It is only by following this principle that our trade figures have increased to the extent they have since this government came into power. The policies put into force by this government have been in keeping with the assurances given by this party to the people at the last federal election. I can assure the government that the people are pleased with the results that have been attained and with the reductions that have been made in tariffs in order to negotiate the various treaties which have been concluded with other countries.

There has been a great deal of criticism of some of the posters used in the last federal election. But, Mr. Speaker, I believe that this government has been a government of action. Immediately after it took office in the fall of 1935, realizing that one of the most effective ways of assisting agriculture was by securing markets for the vast quantity of products we produce, and which with our limited population we cannot consume, this government took steps to make a trade agreement with our neighbours to the south. When the agreement came before the house it was subjected to a great deal of criticism, and a large number of members did not agree with the terms and conditions of that agreement. If we look up the records of that debate and of the vote on the resolution which preceded the introduction of the bill itself, we shall find that every member of the official opposition voted against the resolution, while it had the endorsation of every supporter of the government and of every independent member. During that debate the right hon. gentleman who was then leading the official opposition (Mr. Bennett) took a leading and very active part, and certainly he did his utmost to persuade the members of this house to vote against the resolution. Listening to him and to other hon. gentlemen opposite in that debate I could not help thinking that they were running true to form so far as trade with the United States is concerned.

I have a very vivid recollection of some of the arguments that were used when this country was considering the reciprocity pact which was defeated in 1911. I think it will be remembered by all who were interested in that controversy that our right hon. friend, the former leader of the opposition, was one of those who bitterly opposed the reciprocity pact. Speaking on one occasion, and I have kept this clipping a long time, he said:

> Little did I think that within a generation the Canadian people would be called upon to face the issue which endangers our land and the existence of the flag under which we live. Little did I think that the same issue would come to us. Now they (the Americans) have come to us with the golden eagles and the gilded dollars. They have come with their insidious promises to ask the people to traffic with their birthright. Since when did men begin to sell their birthright for a few peas and beans? . . . We have not fallen so low as to allow this country's resources to be exploited by Mr. Taft and the United States. Because I believe this treaty threatens the empire, I ask you to smite it with all your might.

These arguments and this attitude did not go unnoticed by the Liberal chieftain of that day, the late Sir Wilfrid Laurier, who, speaking in this house after the defeat of his government, used these words:

> Sometimes I realize that I have reached the allotted span, the three-score years and ten. I may not live to see it, but the time will come, my friends, when my fellow-countrymen will wonder if, after all, Fielding and Laurier were not right in seeking freer trade in natural products with our neighbours, while increasing our trade with England through British preference. Even my brilliant young friend from Calgary (Mr. Bennett) may concede it some time. I cannot pierce the mists of the future, none of us can, but I am confident coming years will vindicate our course.

These, Mr. Speaker, were prophetic words. The time did come when our trade was at a very low ebb and when we would have been glad to enter into a trade agreement with our neighbours to the south. I remember well, because I was a member of the house then, that in 1933 Mr. Roosevelt, after he was elected President of the United States, sent out a message to the world that his government would be glad to enter into trade agreements with all other governments in order to get trade moving. At that time there was a widespread feeling in Canada that once more we were to be given the opportunity to sell our goods in United States markets, and I remember how this house was thrilled when the then prime minister announced that there was a possibility of a trade agreement being negotiated between the two countries. But, Mr. Speaker, our hopes were crushed by the speech delivered by the same right hon. gentleman in 1934 when he hurled questions at the opposition asking them what they wanted reciprocity in. He went on to quote the prices of cattle and hogs and butter and eggs, all of which were a little higher in Canada than in the United States, and he asked: Are these the products that hon. gentlemen opposite want reciprocity in? Do they want the Americans to come over here and get our prices? Listening to that address, Mr. Speaker, and remembering the attitude of years gone by, one could come to no other conclusion than that the negotiation of a trade agreement between our neighbours to the south and a government led by any person with views and feelings such as these was an impossibility, and I think the Canadian people had that definitely in their minds when they voted as they did in 1935.

I have heard a good many references to the fact that our trade is less than it was in 1937 although we still have these trade agreements, and sometimes there seems to be in these remarks a tone of satisfaction rather than regret. But do hon. members opposite think for a moment that if we did not have the trade agreements our trade would be as large as it is? I should be glad to have an answer to that.

I cannot forget the many speeches which have been made in this house since I became a member, in reference to the impossibility of expanding or extending our trade. The reason given always was, of course, that all other countries are trying to provide for themselves. It has seemed to me as I have sat here that the Liberal party is the only party with confidence in its ability to do something worth while along these lines. It is now a matter of history that on October 14, 1935, the people turned to the Liberal party hoping that it would be able to accomplish what it evidently believed and led the people to believe could be accomplished in the way of expansion of trade. Anyone who wants to be fair and who looks up the record of increased trade from 1935 to the present time will come to the conclusion that it has kept its promise in this respect, and that its record is appreciated by all classes of our citizens.

Mr. KARL K. HOMUTH (Waterloo South): Mr. Speaker, if the voice that started this debate was the voice of the west, I think I can truthfully say that I am the voice of the east; and when you compare the figures of the two by-elections they give a very interesting picture of what the people of Canada are thinking to-day. By adding the figures together we find that the Conservative party polled 13,336 votes, the Liberal party 10,313 votes, and the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation 10,121 votes—certainly a record from which we have nothing to fear so far as the coming election is concerned.

May I first crave the indulgence of Mr. Speaker and hon. members during this address? I realize that I am a new member of this house, and it is possible that in some respects I may contravene the rules. But if I do so it will be purely through ignorance, and not because I have any desire, sir, to call down your wrath upon me.

I want in the first place to thank many hon. members on all sides who in various ways have assisted me since I first came here. I have found them very willing to help me in looking after the many details to which a member must give his attention while he is in Ottawa.

I also want to make some reference to their majesties' visit, because I understand that they are to pass through Waterloo county. I have not been advised of this, but if and when they do come to Waterloo county they will find not only a district where they will be loyally welcomed, but one in which many of the nations of the world are represented—English, Scots, Irish, Germans, Poles, Ukrainians, and many others, and all loyal Canadian citizens.

As a new member I hesitate to criticize the government because I realize there are those who will think that in doing so I should be taking a great deal upon myself. But during my time in the Ontario house I was very close to many of the problems we have been discussing in the last few weeks, problems of vital interest to the people of this country. For that reason I feel that I am justified in rising in my place to-day and criticizing the government for its do-nothing policy.

I had hoped that before I had anything to say in this chamber I should have heard from the government something more tangible than what we have heard as to just what they are going to do for the destitute people of the dominion. It is true that we have promises — indefinite ones — in the speech from the throne. But in examining those promises we cannot find one thing really based upon a policy which will be of some benefit to the people of this country. Reference is made, of course, to the trade treaty. Later on I want to deal with that for a few moments. I come here, a representative of the Conservative party, as a direct rebuke by the people of South Waterloo to this government because of its trade policy and the fear of what it was going to do to Canada—a fear which has been realized to-day.

From what I have heard from the government benches I doubt very much whether the government realizes what the conditions in this country actually are. In 1935 throughout the whole campaign they blamed the Bennett government for everything that went wrong. In the speech from the throne they blamed drought conditions in the west and world conditions. No mention of those things was made in 1935. I have before me a copy of the speech from the thone. Very little is promised in it, and if the promises are of no more value than those which were made by the Liberal party in 1935 there is certainly a very poor outlook for the people of this dominion until another election can be held. To my mind it is a very meagre menu that the government offered the people of Canada. No reference is made to national unity, which I consider one of the most important questions affecting the dominion. It is true that there is a reference to the commission on dominion-provincial relations, a body which, had this government carried out the promises it made in 1935, would never have had to be appointed. As everybody knows, the electors were told then that all that was necessary was to elect a Liberal government at Ottawa and all the troubles and the trials and the lack of unity in this country would come to an end. Who can forget the speeches made by the Hon. Mitchell Hepburn as he went up and down the country asking the people to vote for a Liberal government at Ottawa so that the provincial governments could cooperate with them? Incidentally, that is one of the things which Mr. Hepburn states he will never be able to live down. But what do we find? Immediately after the election they had a dominion-provincial conference. It lasted a day or so and broke up in a quarrel. Mr. Hepburn went home disgusted with the whole matter; when they were hunting for him one afternoon he had taken the train for Toronto. From that day on we have had disunity in this country and it has been a big factor in the troubles we have to-day. As Canadians we read with pride the story of confederation. We realize what those men who brought confederation into being did, and how well they built this nation. They forgot their political differences and joined together to do a job. They did a good job. But over seventy years have gone by and what they did then naturally requires revision now. Are we as Canadians and members of this house going to say to the people of Canada that after seventy years in which to learn by experience the various things that could make this country better and cement its unity we are not big enough to handle the job?

Mr. MARTIN: That is what the hon. member is saying.

Mr. HOMUTH: If we will forget this interprovincial disunity and the hostility of provincial governments to the federal government; if we forget our political bickerings and get together and deal with this matter from the standpoint that there is no east and no west in Canada, no Quebec, no Ontario, but just one nation, willing to give and take, if need be to give more and take less—if we do that there is no reason why we cannot cure many of the ills that afflict us to-day without interfering with the sacredness of provincial rights. These things can be done. All we need is some lead from this government, who promised in 1935 that they would do it. Every hon. member of this house and I believe every provincial government in Canada would do its utmost to bring that about. Instead of that we have quarrelling, quarrelling, quarrelling; charges of conspiracy, and so on. I take some pride in the fact that the by-election in Waterloo South had something to do with bringing this condition into the open, because it is just as well for the people of Canada to know something of what is going on behind the scenes. The Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) did not have to go to Toronto to see Mr. Hepburn in order to find out why the Liberals lost the election in Waterloo South. They lost it because of the three years of do-nothing policy of this government, and fear of their trade treaties. Is it strange that when we think of this break between the Prime Minister of Canada and the various provincial premiers, particularly Mr. Hepburn, we wonder if there is the solidarity in the dominion cabinet that hon. gentlemen opposite would like us to believe exists? In fact if the editorial suggestion of the Montreal Standard of Saturday last is true, they had a very interesting caucus a week or so ago. And the two peacemakers who went to the Bannockburn farm and tried to bring peace and harmony in the party apparently were thoroughly chastised for their efforts.

In the campaign in Waterloo South we had three cabinet ministers taking part, the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Euler), the Minister of Justice (Mr. Lapointe) and the Minister of Transport (Mr. Howe). Whom did they come to speak for? Naturally for the Liberal candidate. But I do say they did me a lot of good. What was the Liberal candidate's attitude so far as the Prime Minister of Canada is concerned? Let me read what he said in his nomination speech. And, mark you, this gentleman made this the one great point throughout his campaign.

Mr. GARDINER: That is why he was defeated.

Mr. HOMUTH: And a lot more of you are going the same way too. This is what Mr. R. K. Serviss, the Liberal candidate, said at his nomination meeting:

> "It is my belief," the mayor continued, "that the urban workers particularly in the textile and shoe industries must have adequate protection. We in Ontario are the big brother among the provinces of Canada. If we are going down into our pockets to help sustain the free trader prairie provinces by subsidizing their wheat at 30 cents a bushel, the farmer in Ontario whose province is contributing 47 per cent of the total revenue to the dominion treasury is entitled to some consideration too. These same free traders be they Liberal, Conservative or bolshevik must give consideration to the working men and women in Waterloo South. They must make their contribution by permitting an adequate tariff for the protection of the workers."

[Mr. Homuth.]

Listen to this. This is the prime piece of the whole platform on which the gentleman ran:

> "The two greatest problems in our country to-day," said the speaker, "are relief and the railway problem, and we will never solve the latter problem until you get a man like Mitch Hepburn at Ottawa to do the job for you."

Mr. MARTIN: That is why the hon. gentleman is here. That is the secret.

Mr. HOMUTH: I referred a moment ago to the distress of our people and some of the promises that were made in 1935. Who can forget the tirade carried on by the Prime Minister, particularly in 1935, against the camps that were established throughout this country, or the promises he made that he would take the boys out of those semi-military institutions and give them jobs throughout the country at decent wages? Yes, they closed the camps, but what did they do with the boys? Scattered them over the highways and byways of Canada. Motoring through the country I have picked up many of them, forgotten men, uncared for by anyone. Who are these young men? If the crisis which threatened last September had broken, as many of us feared it would, they are the young men that this government would have expected to take their part in the military service of this country. They are the young men they would have expected to line up for whatever service the Department of National Defence wanted. They are the young men they would have gone to and said: Here is your opportunity to do something for your country. "Fight for the country—why?" they would ask. "Fight for the privilege of wandering up and down the highways and byways of this country, not wanted by anyone?" What answer could this government have given to them? If that crisis had broken, this government would have found ways to raise millions, yes hundreds of millions of dollars for the purpose of equipping these men, feeding and clothing them—for what? To defend Canada, yes; to be killed or to kill. If we can find money for that, why can we not find money to give them a chance to live and work out their destiny here? If we had been in power when the riots occurred in British Columbia about which we all read, I can easily imagine the Prime Minister and his supporters hurling taunts and accusations across the floor of the house about it. The riots that occurred out there were directly due to the policy of this government.

I have referred to the destitute people of this country. By destitute I mean people who are hungry, ill clad, ill housed, without decent living conditions. This government is working on a long range policy, so hon. members tell us in their speeches. As a result of it we have had three disastrous years. They are so busy looking at that long range policy, looking at the horizon hoping against hope that the sun of prosperity will break through, that they fail to see the poverty and destitution at their feet. We hear of communism in this country. Certainly we have communism. The surprise to me, after the failure of this government to do something for the people of this country, is that we have not something worse. We all read the stories that appeared in the Globe and Mail relative to the condition of the fisherfolk of the maritimes. You do not have to go down there to find poverty-stricken people. You can find them in Ontario; you can find them in Ottawa; you can find them in every township, village, town and city throughout the Dominion of Canada.

I wonder what the poor, hungry people of this country think when they read in the press all the talk coming from the Liberal benches, and learn that the government are hunting for markets for the milk and cream produced on the farms of Canada, when we have thousands of children who are not getting enough milk to build strong, healthy bodies; that they are hunting for markets for our pork and our beef, when we have families in Canada that do not see meat twice a week. The same thing applies to many other commodities the hon. gentlemen are talking about exporting. Give our people jobs; give them adequate, steady wages; give the farmers decent prices for their produce. Then a great deal of this surplus produce will be used up. Our people do not want government pap; they do not need it. We have the right kind of people, who can work out their own destiny if they are only given the opportunity by those who are in power in the provinces and the dominion.

I said I wanted to deal at some length with the trade treaty, and because of my knowledge of the condition of industry in this dominion to-day I say that industry has the jitters and is afraid. There is no security for industry.

An hon. MEMBER: Tax the farmers more.

Mr. HOMUTH: You will have the jitters too, before this is all over. The other day the Minister of Trade and Commerce said they had heard no real protests against this trade treaty. Perhaps not, but there will be plenty of protests yet. I do say that industry is afraid when the Liberal party is in power, because for the last few years it has been their direct policy continually to chisel, chisel, chisel at the tariffs under which these industries have been operating. Sometimes I am amazed at the childlike simplicity of the Prime Minister, at his belief in the benevolence of those countries with whom we make trade treaties. He believes they would do him no wrong, but in the working out of the treaties we find that they are the sort of countries who would trade a coconut for a peanut any day, and we would get the peanut. I recall a little ditty that I heard in my childhood and which, with a little revamping, fits very well the attitude of the Prime Minister since 1935 in connection with trade treaties:

Tinker, tinker, little man;
Do your tinkering while you can.
Mischievous tinkering cannot last;
Elections come and your tinkering's past.

The other day the Prime Minister accused our party of being apostles of economic nationalism and of saying that trade was war. He also suggested that we were not being fair to the government in that we continually knocked it. In the first place, Mr. Speaker, as the hon. member for Kootenay East (Mr. Stevens) said the other day, we are not the apostles of economic nationalism. We are interested in national economics, which is something this government apparently has forgotten. And when the Prime Minister asks us to say something kind and good about this government, why do they not give us a chance to do so? Why do they not do something so that at least we can go to our people, who are worried and harried and wondering what is going to happen in the future, and say, "At least the government are going to do this." Would it not be a good idea for the Prime Minister to take some of that philosophy to heart? Can one forget the campaign that he carried on in 1935? Was there ever a more bitter tirade against a leader or a party than that of the Prime Minister and his supporters in 1935? The Prime Minister accuses us of saying that trade is war. Well, Mr. Speaker, speaking for myself I say yes; trade is war. It is commercial war, and when we make a deal with another country the only way to figure out whether or not that deal is fair to Canada is by the number of lucrative jobs that are given the workingmen of this country as a result of that deal, and the type of market that is given to the farmers at the same time.

The other day we heard two different lines of thought from hon. gentlemen opposite. In his speech the Prime Minister referred to trade under the new treaty but dealt more particularly with the treaty from the standpoint of appeasement; that it was necessary to do this; that even if the benefits were not as great as they should be, this was the one thing Canada had to do. The Minister of Trade and Commerce, my fellow representative from Waterloo county, dealt with the question from an entirely different angle; and to my mind, poor as his argument was in regard to the benefits that Canada would receive as a result of this trade treaty, at least he dealt with it strictly from the standpoint of the trade between the two countries. To me that is the right way to deal with it; because under this so-called trade treaty from the Prime Minister's standpoint of appeasement, we make a treaty not only with the United States but with Germany, Italy and Japan, while some of the nationals of those very countries are to-day attacking us and trying to undermine the British constitutional system of government. So I ask: What mandate has this government from the people to go out and try to make a trade treaty as a gesture of appeasement to Japan, Germany and Italy? If the safety of the democratic institutions of the United States, Great Britain and Canada is to be predicated only upon the question whether or not we are prepared to sell out our workingmen and farmers to the people of the United States and other countries, then, as reverently as I can, I say God help democracy.

In his speech the other day our leader referred to the question of shoes. The Minister of Trade and Commerce immediately checked him up and quoted figures showing that only some two or three per cent of the shoes used in Canada were brought in from other countries. I still say, Mr. Speaker, that as a result of the trade treaty of 1935 and the trade treaty just negotiated we are going to give work to Czechs, to Germans, to Japanese and to people in the United States, while our own people will be put out of work. But it is not a question alone of how much stuff comes in, because after all we are not going to have the factories closed. Men who own industries dare not close them. Every cent they own is invested in them. They dare not close their doors; they have to keep them going. And so, regardless of what is done with the tariff, they try to keep their industries in operation.

How do they do it? Right to-day, in order to compete with the United States on shoes, manufacturers have to reduce wages in the shoe industry in Canada. They will have to lower the quality of the goods which go into many lines of shoes. It is not a question of how much stuff comes into Canada because of trade agreements; rather it is a question of what, as a result, will have to be done in our industrial areas in order to compete against conditions in other countries. When the trade agreement is up for discussion I shall be able to show only too plainly that the conditions are just as I have described them. I will give facts and figures which will indicate that even though they are importing shoes to-day, and bringing them into Canada in competition with shoes made in the county of Waterloo and other parts of the country, the consumers in this country will not get them one cent cheaper. They are purchased over there simply on the basis of the amount of write-up that the merchant and wholesaler can put on them.

So that when we look back and read what the Prime Minister said in 1935 as to what he expected the trade treaty to do, we have cause to wonder. I challenge the Minister of Labour to go out to any industrial riding in Canada and say to the people, "As a result of the trade treaty of 1935 we have brought you prosperity." I challenge the Minister of Agriculture to go among the farmers of Canada and say to them, "As a result of the trade treaty of 1935 we have brought you prosperity, as predicted by our leader at that time."

Mr. GARDINER: I did it in Brandon.

Mr. PERLEY: The rural vote did not show that.

Mr. GARDINER: Yes, it did.

Mr. HOMUTH: Long before I came to the house I heard that the Minister of Agriculture was more or less the bantam or the scrapper of the cabinet. But I have no hesitation in saying he will never be able to sell the argument in eastern Canada that this government has brought prosperity to agriculture in Canada. If he can do it in the west he has made a poor job of it, because he has a minority supporter from Brandon.

My time is nearly up, but there is one more matter with which I did wish to deal, namely the question of commissions. The people of Canada are sick and tired of commissions —commissions for this and commissions for that. Our party has not been wholly blameless in the matter, either. But I do not hesitate to say that the people of Canada, and I include myself, are sick and tired of commissions. A commission which was supposed to work free—$300,000; a provincial commission now set up is going to cost over $100,000, simply because the federal government at Ottawa could not agree with the provinces.

Surely if we are to have commissions to govern the country we might just as well go home; we might as well quit having cabinet ministers. I cannot understand why we should pay cabinet ministers the large salaries they are paid, and maintain their staffs, if we are going to turn over to a commission every real problem that comes before them.

Furthermore, there has been too much of this business of trying to build up some constitutional issue with regard to everything the people want to have done for them. If a request is made for something, immediately a constitutional issue is raised; lawyers are always able to find one. While I have every regard for the legal members of the house, I do not hesitate to say that the people of Canada are sick and tired of being told, every time something should be done for them, that it cannot be done because of the lack of constitutional authority to do it. I sometimes wonder why the Prime Minister has not taken the bit between his teeth once in a while and done something about it. But he is one who can raise a constitutional issue just as quickly as anybody else.

The people are tired of the whole thing, and they want to see action this year from the government.

Mr. MacNICOL: They cannot get it here.

Mr. HOMUTH: The government has a chance to do something. It has a chance to do something to make up for the disastrous three years through which the people of Canada have just passed, in spite of the promises made in 1935. If the government had had a proper approach to the provincial governments, if it had gone out in a spirit of compromise, we would have in Canada to-day national health laws, national hospitalization and national labour laws, all of which are badly needed. All these improvements could have been law to-day if the government had been willing to compromise with the provinces, as it ought to have done.

And so I say that when one reads of the promises of 1935 he has cause to wonder. I well remember the morning of October 15, 1935, when I thought the sky had fallen and there was no longer any chance for Canada. I picked up a paper and read a statement made by the Prime Minister, to which my leader referred in the course of his observations. I read that speech of dedication, and I read it carefully. Who could help being impressed by those beautiful words, those wonderful phrases? They were music to the ears of everyone in Canada who had hoped that something good would come from the election of the Liberal party. I read that dedication speech—and then, of course, I realized who had made it. I recalled the flowery speeches he had made in the past and I began to understand that perhaps after all the sky actually had fallen. Three years later we find that it has; the people of Canada are absolutely crushed under the burden which has been placed upon them.

Not only do I like the wording and phrasing of this speech, but I think hon. members of the house and the people of Canada generally should be impressed with the significance of the wonderful dedication speech made by the right hon. gentleman; we may then realize how little he has lived up to it. The Prime Minister said:

> In the new era which dawns to-day the struggle for the rights of the people will, in the realm of economic liberty and security, be carried on as never before. Poverty and adversity, want and misery, are the enemies which Liberalism will seek to banish from the land. They have lain in wait at the gate of every Canadian home during the past five years, and their menacing mien has served to destroy the souls as well as the minds and bodies of an ever-increasing number of men, women and children in our land. We take up at once, as our supreme task, the endeavour to end poverty in the midst of plenty, starvation and unnecessary suffering in a land of abundance, discontent and distress in a country more blessed by Providence than any other on the face of the globe, and to gain for individual lives, and for the nation as a whole, that "health and peace and sweet content" which is the rightful heritage of all.

And then they tell the hungry, ill clad, ill housed people of Canada that we are hunting for some place to get rid of our meats, our butter, our eggs, our milk and other things that our own Canadian people have not the money to buy.

At least in that dedication speech the right hon. gentleman admitted that the Conservative government had kept these terrible enemies of the people at the gate. We were slowly but surely driving them from the country. But this government has opened the gate. Those enemies have opened the door and entered the homes of our Canadian people, and out of them they have driven peace, happiness and security. The words of the Prime Minister's statement were brave words, but what use are they without deeds?

I say that unless this government makes some definite move to do something it will stand indicted before the highest tribunal in the land, the Canadian people, as a government which has absolutely forgotten those who put them into power. When the opportunity comes, as it must come, and the people hope it will be soon, they will be in a position to undo the wrong that they did themselves in 1935. After all there is no hope for the government that is in power. No blood transfusion or dope or anything else can revive the little spark of life that once was there. They are on their way out. Politically they are dead. All that is necessary now is an election so that the people of Canada can give them a proper burial under an avalanche of ballots. When we come into power we will once more make effective the policies which in the past brought security to Canada.

Miss AGNES C. MACPHAIL (Grey-Bruce): Mr. Speaker, I intend to lump my congratulations. I offer them to the mover (Mr. Matthews) and the seconder (Mr. Chevrier) of the address in reply, to the new leader of the Conservative party (Mr. Manion) and to the new members, although I think perhaps I should offer condolences rather than congratulations. I offer them to the new cabinet ministers. Their appointment particularly interested me. This choosing of cabinet ministers is a strange business. There must be some rules by which the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) decides who is to be appointed. I do not know what they are and I was wondering if some time he would not take the house into his confidence. We would then have some idea as to who were to be our future cabinet ministers.

I do not intend to follow the very eloquent speech of the hon. member who has just spoken (Mr. Homuth). He is new to this house, but has had legislative experience. There are only two things I would say to him. First, we did not have a riot in British Columbia when the Conservatives were in power, but there was one in Regina. I get no enjoyment out of saying this, but I think it is well for us to remember it. The other thing I want to say is that much as I would like to become enthusiastic over the trade treaties, my honest opinion is that if we heard nothing of them one way or another for six months we would never know they had been signed. I have waited so long for Canada to be relieved of its difficulties by means of trade treaties that I do not intend to be fooled by this one.

I do not intend to follow the speech from the throne paragraph by paragraph. I shall refer to only one subject in it. I intend to confine myself entirely to a few questions which seem important to me.

In these days of confusion and tragedy abroad one's mind turns to things at home, to things that one can understand. All over the world we are seeing liberty, freedom and personal security being swept away for thousands, yes even millions of people. We see democracy backing away before the onslaught of fascism. What surprises me more than anything else is the fact that the conscience of the world has been seared to such an extent that we can endure the tragedy of China, the betrayal of Czechoslovakia and the unparalleled agony of Spain without doing anything about it. We even see Great Britain and France, countries which we thought were great democracies, aiding the fascists to overthrow the Spanish government by means of the non-intervention pact. Quite apart from what was in our innermost hearts, we listened to the Prime Minister of Great Britain being lauded the world over in the name of peace, or this new word "appeasement", for having delivered democracy into the hands of the fascists in response to a gigantic bluff on the part of the greatest dictator of them all. In many countries we see thousands of people who are striving to get away from fascism, who want to be allowed to enter the free democracies. An Austrian woman who was my guest yesterday told me that the actions of the leaders in the fascist countries did not break the spirits of the people as much as did the indifference of the democratic peoples like ourselves.

I feel that something has happened to the spirit of mankind when we can go about our daily tasks, even earnestly about the business of government, in days like this, unmoved by others' misery. As I said before, in despair we turn to things at home. I think it can be said that every hon. member of this house wants democracy in Canada. We want to save and perfect the democratic system, but I think we all realize that that cannot be done unless we solve the economic problems of the people. We must pass from a liberal democracy to a social democracy. In the last analysis a desperately driven people will be ready to give up liberty and freedom in search of economic security. As a matter of fact, there is no liberty and there is no freedom for a person who is absolutely destitute. We as members of the parliament of Canada must set ourselves resolutely to the task of solving the economic problems which face the Canadian people. I say in all seriousness that if we do not do this a harassed and bewildered and disillusioned people will turn from the democratic form of government to anything else that they think will give them economic security. In my opinion that other form of government will never be communism, but I think they are ready to consider some form of fascism unless we who are the guardians and trustees of democracy discharge well our duties.

If we really want to preserve democracy, and I believe we all do, we must be willing to forsake all artificial differences. We must be ready to acknowledge that up until now there have been artificial differences between members and parties in this house. We must be willing to get rid of them. It is true that in a democracy there must be free expression of opinion. The beauty of democracy is the fact that we are free to advocate different solutions to a problem. But surely we have reached the time when we should be willing to vote in support of that in which we believe. Surely we have reached the time when we should not be looking for either personal or party glorification in what we do. We should be willing to support the things in which we believe, no matter by whom they are suggested or by whom they are supported.

As I listened to the speeches delivered in the opening days of this session by the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Manion), whom we all welcome again to this house, and the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King), I felt that there was danger in the fact that the people of Canada will believe the unkind things they said about each other and about each other's policies. That is exactly what has happened. When the terrible row between the Prime Minister and Mr. Hepburn was on —in my opinion it is still on—I heard many people in my constituency say, "Well, at least we are hearing some truth now"; that is, they thought each was telling the truth about the other. I say in all seriousness it is time we stopped political scrapping and settled down as honest people to find solutions for the problems which are besetting and wearing down the spirit of our Canadian people, because I think in Canada we cannot afford to lessen the confidence of the people in our members of parliament and public men and in our parliamentary institutions. In simpler days—and one can look back to seventeen years ago and regard them now as simpler days, when there were not the pressing problems we have to-day—there was an interest taken in the rough-and-tumble of political strife between the leaders and members of different political parties. Nobody minded that very much then. I think perhaps the country even took an interest in it, but I again say in all seriousness that that day is done.

When I heard the speeches of the first day or two at the opening of the session I thought: Can it be true that we must all session hear this drivel again? When you come from places where you see people who do not know what they are going to do to live, who have not houses, who have not clothes, who cannot educate their children, who do not know where the next meal is coming from, and then come here and see people with fine abilities—because I am not one of those who think that members of parliament have not ability; I think they have—use those fine abilities in a verbal battle over non-essentials, it seems to me nothing but a complete waste of time. If we are to save democracy the only kind of partisans we can afford from now on are partisans in favour of democracy, both political and economic.

There are only two subjects on which I shall speak, and the first is agriculture. I feel that we can do more towards solving unemployment and a great many of our other problems in Canada by restoring the purchasing power of the farmer than we can do by any other method. In Canada we have some 728,623 farms, and it is true of almost every farm family that they cannot buy the goods they need; and we have idle machines, unemployed workers, and a drift of rural youth to the cities and into white-collared jobs and into the professions, if that is possible.

Agriculture until now has been asked to buy in a protected market, and not only a protected market but a market restricted in many ways, and to sell in a non-protected market. Farmers have been asked to pay exorbitant prices for farm machinery. I am sure no other industry passing through such times as agriculture is experiencing would have been asked to pay such high prices and to stand such a high tariff on their implements of production. Farmers have been asked to pay high prices for the goods and services which they require, and the high prices which they had to pay were very largely the result of the regulating of supply to meet effective demand. And yet the farmer, because he had this mounting overhead, went on producing more and more goods without any consideration for the effective demand for his goods.

Farmers have been asked to pay high interest rates. Even the farm loan board—I am grateful to have it as it is, but it could be so much better—charges the farmers five per cent. That is too much, because agriculture cannot pay five per cent. Since I have been in this house the farmers in western Canada have been charged, by various discounting methods, rates as high as twelve per cent. Farmers have suffered very much from a tight money policy. During the last administration, when we could have benefited as Australia and New Zealand and the Argentine did by valuing the British pound at close to six dollars, it was quoted here at only $3.75, and that did very much to impoverish agriculture in Canada.

What immigrants we took in, and I think we ought now to consider very carefully taking in people from countries from which all sense of humanity has gone, agriculture in the last few years has been asked to absorb—not labour, not the professions, not business, but agriculture. The result is, and it need hardly be mentioned, that we have had such an overplus of agricultural products that prices have dropped lower and lower and for a period of years now our farmers have been selling their products below the cost of production. I notice that Mr. Robert Gardiner, at the convention of the United Farmers of Alberta, a few days ago, had this to say, and I am quoting from the Western Farm Leader of January 20, at page 2:

> It is time that the government and the people of Canada realize that they cannot forever expect that the primary producer will be content to continue to produce new wealth at a loss—a loss which means economic insecurity, hardship and debt for the farmer and his family.

All this, of course, has resulted in certain things. It has resulted in farm mortgages being a drug on the market; nobody wants to invest his money in a farm mortgage. Even farm buildings show the decadent agriculture we have to-day. You do not need to be able to read to know the present condition of agriculture. All you need to do is to drive along country roads and see the farm dwellings in need of repair, old buildings falling down, unpainted houses, houses where just the trim needs painting and even that not done; farm homes, the great majority of them, without the comforts and conveniences which even people of small means in the city think are essential. We see farmers working very hard and getting very little pay. We see farmers suffering for lack of medical and dental care. We see a vastly increasing number of cases of high blood pressure and heart disease among our agriculturists. This, Mr. Speaker, cannot go on forever. The farmers are rousing themselves again. They go into long sleeps, and they are now just emerging from one.

The farmer in Canada knows that there were thirty-three acts passed by the British parliament, during the last seven or eight years, having to do with agriculture and tending to raise the price of agricultural products, so that the British farmer did not have to sell below the cost of production. Our farmers see that the farmer in Britain gets $1.30 a bushel for his wheat, in France $1.50, in Italy $2, and in Germany $2.50; and the farmer in Canada, and certainly the farmer of Ontario, feels that something must be done about it.

[Miss Macphail.]

The first thing that must be done, and the only thing that the farmer can do for himself, is to organize farmers so completely that there will be one body that can speak for agriculture.

I hear farmers talking for the first time in favour of producing for a known market. They see that other countries which used to buy our farm products do not do so any longer. They regret that there are people in Canada who would like to buy cream and eggs, steaks, cereals, chickens—all the things that go to make up a good table—but who cannot afford them. I saw in the Journal of, I think, last night, that a man living at North Bay died of voluntary starvation in order that his wife and children might eat. That happened in this country, where we have such surpluses that we do not know what to do with them. But the farmer is coming to recognize the meaning of these great surpluses, and although he would like to see them consumed by needy people in urban places and the needy who are to be found sometimes in country places, he cannot afford to produce for nothing. He cannot afford to give the goods to the people who need them. So for the first time in his life the Ontario farmer, and I think I can say the Canadian farmer, is coming to the conclusion that what he must do is to produce goods for a known market; that is, to estimate how much the market will absorb and produce that much and no more.

An hon. MEMBER: What about crop failures?

Miss MACPHAIL: Well, the government can store some of the grain in the elevators in case of a crop failure, and not ask the farmer to do so. The government can conserve for future needs.

And so the farmers of Ontario and, indeed, the farmers of all Canada, first getting together in a great organization—and they are beginning to do so—will soon be coming to the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) and to the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) and demanding marketing legislation which will give authority to the majority of a commodity group to bring the minority into line with their wishes, and they will demand a price which is equal to the cost of production, including wages to the farmer. It sounds revolutionary; but it is coming; it is almost here, and it will have to be followed by controlled production. It must give Conservatives some satisfaction when they think back to the Natural Products Marketing Act and remember the opposition—the political opposition, if I may say so—that the Liberal party put up to that act. They did not want it, and the privy council of Great Britain—I shall not say for that reason, although it may have had a bearing—threw out the legislation and called it ultra vires. I wonder when we are coming to the time when we shall stop sending legislation to Great Britain to see whether or not—

Mr. STIRLING: The Supreme court threw it out here.

Miss MACPHAIL: Yes, in that instance both courts did so; nevertheless it was sent on to London.

There is no reason why other Canadians who for a long time have been gauging their production by the market should feel aggrieved or resentful because the farmer is coming to the conclusion that he too must do the same. Take the case of the farm implement firms, which between 1929 and 1933 curtailed production by eighty per cent because the farmer did not have the money to buy their products, and let their price drop by only six per cent. That is, they were not willing to go on producing for idealistic reasons, because the farmer needed machinery, as no doubt he did. They said, "We cannot afford to produce if we cannot sell; there is no effective demand, and therefore we must curtail production." A great many of our manufacturers do the same thing. They estimate how much they can sell; then they start their factories running to supply the market, and when they have supplied the market they close the factories.

Until now Canadian farmers have been reluctant to follow this example—not so reluctant to get marketing legislation or to obtain a price equal to the cost of production, but reluctant to consider the thing which must follow that, namely the control of production. Canadian farmers have not been reluctant to receive the better price for bacon in Great Britain which came as a result of the artificial setting of prices, nor have they been unwilling to crowd the Danish farmer off the market in Great Britain, although it has reduced him to a place where he has had to control production and allot production among the various hog producers in Denmark. There every farmer who produces hogs has what they call pig cards, and the total number of cards that is issued is equal to the number of hogs that may be produced. It is true that farmers can buy and sell the cards among themselves, but the total cannot increase. Nor indeed are we unfamiliar with this type of action on the part of farmers even in Ontario. The adjustment of the volume of production to the demand in a known market is carried out by milk producers. The whole-milk producers supplying our cities and towns are practically all working on a basis which regulates marketing and effects an indirect control of production, with each farmer supplying milk on a quota basis, and with a considerably lower price for that part of the supply which exceeds the quota. That is exactly what is done in Denmark in connection with hogs. Anybody who insists on producing more hogs than his quota gets exactly half price for them.

May I draw the attention of the federal government, in case they have missed it, to the Bracken conference which was held in Winnipeg? It seems to me it would have been more fitting if the federal government, which is concerned with agriculture all over Canada, had called that conference. I do, however, approve the action of Mr. Bracken in calling it. Everybody who attended that conference felt that in their discussion they got down to essentials, and that the farmer was talking about his own business in exactly the same way that business people —manufacturers and business men generally —have until now talked about their business. I believe that if we did something along the lines suggested at that conference—and I think we shall do it finally—it would so increase the purchasing power of the farmer as greatly to lessen unemployment, by starting the factories of Canada running again.

I notice that the same theme is dealt with in the issue of Liberty of February 4, 1939—it is a little bit ahead of the date, but I suppose we shall finally arrive there—in an editorial in which it says:

> Half of our nation looks to the land for support. Agriculture is the driving shaft of our national economic machine. So long as it remains broken, the machine cannot function. Once it is repaired, the nation as a whole will be on the highroad to recovery.
> I issue solemn warning to you business men of urban Canada: Your great industries cannot prosper permanently, nor will your unemployment problem ever be solved while this dislocation of the agricultural machine persists.

When the farmers can buy, urban Canada can sell.

There are some things which farmers can do for themselves, and these, I think, they are going to do. I believe that for the first time in many years farmers are interested in adult education. They are also very much interested in consumers' cooperation, believing that they will be able, as the years go by, to buy together, to form their own wholesales and, finally, their own manufacturing plants. But that is all slow, very slow. Whether it will come fast enough to save the situation, I do not know.

There are two other things which I believe agricultural Ontario and all Canada want to see come from the federal government. One is a farm loans scheme which will give loans to young farmers at not more than three per cent and will not require the repayment of the loan in a short period but will allow it to run for any period up to, I suggest, thirty years. Many of the young farmers who come to the cities do not want to come; they want to stay on the farm, but they cannot. The present loan scheme requires them to have 50 per cent of the amount needed, in addition to some farm stock and implements. Unless the father is very well to do, that is more than a young farmer can manage. I am sure that as time goes on we shall have to offer farm loans in which the farmer will not have to put up more than 25 per cent, if so much, on which he pays only three per cent interest, and which run for a long period of years. Then the farmer wants, and as time goes on I believe will get, loans from the federal government, possibly passing through the provincial governments, for great cooperative enterprises in processing, almost debt free. There is no reason except prejudice to prevent the federal government from issuing money at a service rate.

For the rest of my time I should like to deal with the problem of youth. We ought to try for youth a plan that is many-sided and continuous, until we solve or come close to solving the problem. I connect with this the securing of farm prices that cover the cost of production. Then we could go on and do many other things. The problem facing youth to-day is, I am sure, distressing to everyone in this house. One step we can take to help them is to reduce the age for old age pensions from seventy to sixty-five, and later to sixty. I see no reason why that should not be done. It is not going to hurt a man of sixty-five not to work, particularly if he does not want to, and I imagine that when I reach that age I shall not want to work; I do not want to even now. But it does hurt youth not to work. The government should develop a youth program covering the whole field of Canadian economic life, not just one or two phases. And the Minister of Labour (Mr. Rogers) is well qualified to take charge of such a program.

We must admit that this is a difficult time for youth; not hopeless but certainly difficult. In my generation youth did not worry about a job. We worried about learning to do the kind of work we were preparing ourselves for; we worried about examinations, about a diploma, about apprenticeship, but not about finding a job. I recall, when I applied for my first job, just in order to be safe I applied for five and was accepted for all five. That was no compliment to me; it was merely that teachers were scarce.

Mr. MARTIN: No, it was special aptitude.

Miss MACPHAIL: No, they did not know me. Young people to-day would be very much surprised if, on applying for five jobs they were accepted for all five. It is more likely that when a young person applies for one job to-day, there will be a hundred other applicants—
